Even in Canada there are limits to what the forests can produce for us if we do not take proper care. We will, of course, never run out of trees in Canada. Even in my province where 60 per cent of the economy is dependent upon our forests, we only use less than 30 per cent of the land base for commercial conversion. The rest is perhaps not as accessible economically or is so-called scrub or weed variety. Nevertheless those forests too are critically important to the environment. We are facing some very critical problems and some tough decisions have to be made.

We are engaged in serious conflicts over the use of our land, the need to set aside for environmental purposes certain critical areas that are ecologically sensitive. Of course we are required to respond to new demands for industry.

In the past I can recall reading in Hansard the words of Right Hon. Prime Minister John George Diefenbaker who pointed out in 1960 that it was estimated that industry would double in its capacity and its shipments over the next 15 years. Conservative as the then Prime Minister was, he was even too conservative in making those predictions because we went much further than doubling the output of this important industry. Today we have data and evidence which would indicate that over the next 20 years the industry will double again. Already we are the world's largest shipper of construction lumber, and we are playing the most important role in trade in many of our forestry products.

We are adding 100 million new people to the world's population. All of them will lay a claim to the scarce resources and, of course, the potential for growth in the forest products industry is increasing at exponential rates. I predict that the present estimates are conservative again and the industry will require more fibre every year if we are to retain the share of our world markets that we have carved out for ourselves and indeed realize the potential we have to enlarge our market share. The countries with which we compete in world markets have very much reached their potential for increased yield and growth in their forests, harvesting second, third and fourth generation forests and having shifted to much more intensive management than we had to in the past many, many decades ago.

It is predicted by our scientists that we can get up to three times the volume of fibre if we shift to more intensive management modes. Really what this bill is all about is helping our industry make this transition, helping our industry improve its market share but helping our industry reshape its attitude toward our forests to the point where important business decisions are made not in accordance with market opportunities or the availability of investment capital but in accordance with the fibre that is available.

That requires us, of course, to equate all of the various concerns and all the various aspects of forestry. It means we will have to shift to more intensive management of those forests we have allocated for commercial conversion. It means that we have to look at other aspects such as tourism which comes to mind.

Tourism is an ever-increasingly important industry in our province of British Columbia, the second largest industry and growing. Our forests are the backdrop of the tourism industry so we have to keep that in mind and manage our commercial forests in a way that they provide an asset to that important sector.

Likewise wildlife, the streams and fresh air have to be considered in all of these equations. There has to be a refocusing of our research efforts, a mobilization of the combined efforts of everyone that has a stake in our forests, indeed, every individual Canadian, because our forests are very much a part of our psyche. They are part of our nature.

When you travel and mention the word "Canada", it is immediately related to forests, to tall trees, to the prairies, and some of the other assets we have.

As my friends on both sides of the House have repeatedly pointed out, we have a custodial responsibility, not just to future generations of Canadians, but to those throughout the world. It has been said—and I said it in my earlier remarks during second reading—that over the last 10 years the area that was populated with trees has declined on a global scale from 25 per cent to just over 20 per cent. If we allow these trends to continue, our own children would experience a complete depletion of the world's forests. Without forests the planet cannot be sustained and certainly life on the plant could not be sustained.

We have a custodial responsibility to the rest of the world to manage those assets which we claim as ours, claiming sovereignty over an area which is the world's second largest with the assets that we have. We have one-fifth of the world's fresh water, which our forests help to cleanse and replenish.

• (1400)

In conclusion, I would just like to say once again, thank you for the co-operation that we have received and thank you to many of the stakeholders in the forest community throughout the country for allowing us to take this important initial step to redefine the role of the federal government and give me an opportunity to exercise the leadership that the Prime Minister has mandated me to exercise through our country to reaffirm the concept and the spirit of the idea of sustainable development to ensure that our forests are able to meet the needs of the present generation without compromise to the future.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being two o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

[English]

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

DRESS CODE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway) moved:

That this House express its support for the decision of the Commissioner of the RCMP to revise the Force's dress code to allow Canadian Officers of Sikh origin to wear turbans, to more fully reflect the multicultural reality of Canadian society.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise at this time to speak on this very important motion at a particularly significant time for the discussion of this question.

I want to just again read out the terms of the motion before the House. The motion reads:

That this House express its support for the decision of the Commissioner of the RCMP to revise the Force's dress code to allow Canadian Officers of Sikh origin to wear turbans, to more fully reflect the multicultural reality of Canadian society.

I want to emphazise that this motion in fact supports a decision that was made many, many months ago, some 18 months ago in fact, by the Commissioner of the RCMP, a decision which has not yet been implemented by the minister responsible, the Solicitor General.

I want to as well take this opportunity to emphasise the hard work of all of my colleagues on this issue and to single out in particular a number of those colleagues who, hopefully, will have an opportunity to participate in this debate and who have asked that their support be acknowledged. They include the member for Surrey North who in fact made a statement in this House some weeks ago urging the minister to act; my colleague, the member for Vancouver East, our spokesperson on multiculturalism, who I am hoping will participate in the debate; my colleague from Kootenay West—Revelstoke; my colleague, the spokesperson on the ministry of the Solicitor General, the hon. member for Victoria; and many others. Indeed I speak, I say with confidence, on behalf of all of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party in supporting this very important motion.

Earlier today my colleague from Victoria questioned the Minister of Justice as to when he would finally move on this important issue. The Minister of Justice indicated that the Solicitor General was studying the issue, that he would be consulting and that there would be a decision in what he called the very near future. Last June the Solicitor General said that he was "in a consultation process with my caucus and everybody." In September he said he was "still consulting".

This minister has abdicated his responsibility and his leadership in this very important area. In fact, I would have to ask with whom is the minister consulting? We know that he is a part-time minister, that he is also responsible for agriculture and that he has political responsibilities in the Quebec area. How much longer must we wait before leadership is shown in this important area? Why is it that despite repeated requests by the Federation of Sikh Societies to meet with the Minister to discuss this important question, he has refused to meet with these representatives?

I have a letter dated June 19 which was sent by Mr. Mohinder Singh Gosal, the President of the Federation of Sikh Societies of Canada, urging that they be given an opportunity to meet with the minister to discuss this question. Despite repeated attempts, the minister has refused to do so.

Who is the minister listening to? With whom is he consulting? It seems, because of the delay, that perhaps he is listening to the voices of some of his colleagues in the Conservative caucus, what I would call the dinosaur wing of the Conservative caucus, certain Alberta members of Parliament; the member for Wild Rose and the member for Calgary Southwest, who have suggested that this very important recommendation by the Commissioner of the RCMP should not in fact be implemented.

I know that there is division, discontent and confusion on that side of the House, but today we have an opportunity to send out a very clear message as a Parliament to the people of Canada who are watching this debate, not just the Sikh community, but all Canadians, as to our view. Will it be the view of the member for Wild Rose and the member for Calgary Southwest? The member for Wildrose is quoted as saying that "in western Canada the RCMP mean a lot to us", and they do of course, "and the uniform does. I want to keep it as it is." She went on to say: "Something must be done if we are to keep it forever as it is now".

Let us look at the history of the RCMP uniform. The Northwest Mounted Police were founded in 1873. If we are to look at the traditions that the hon. member has spoken of, the tradition was a pillbox. Does the hon. member want to go back to the days of the pillbox? It was in 1900 that the stetson was brought in at the urging of prairie members of the RCMP because of concerns about the sun.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, back in 1873 and 1900, there were not too many members of the RCMP who wore skirts, nylons and high heels, at least not on duty. The reality is that the RCMP has changed with the times.

I would have hoped that the minister responsible for multiculturalism might have drawn to the attention of the Solicitor General the fact that the changes have been made. Instead, the minister responsible for multiculturalism has been silent while some of his Conservative colleagues have been fanning the flames of hostility and intolerance. That is shameful.

I suggest that we have again an opportunity in this session this afternoon to speak out and voice our concern about this kind of attitude. It is an attitude which has unquestionably led to a rise in the incidence of violence, hatred, and intolerance directed at the Sikh community, particularly in Alberta, where those members are fanning these flames.

Another Conservative member of Parliament, the member for Calgary North, has said that the tabling of these petitions has given rise to unfortunate incidences of prejudice and racism in Calgary. Ron Chahal of Calgary, the president of the World Sikh Organization, has said the frequency of obscene gestures directed at Sikh motorists by other drivers has gone up. That is the kind of atmosphere which is being promoted, whether deliberately or otherwise, by the attitudes of the hon. members.

We have seen shameful badges which have the head of a Sikh in a turban and say "ban this". That kind of badge has no place in a civilized society, and certainly no place in Canada.

I have asked why the minister responsible for multiculturalism has been silent. Understandably, the Sikh community is raising concerns in a more general sense as well. They are asking if perhaps this is part of a more general lack of understanding and concern about issues affecting this proud community, a community which has contributed so much to our society.

For example, there are deep concerns about the way in which the Air-India disaster has been dealt with and the fact that we are still waiting for a comprehensive inquiry into that terrible disaster which resulted in the loss of 329 lives and which also resulted in the blackening of the reputation of an entire community by certain unforgivable actions of CSIS and others.

Why has this government and this minister not spoken out on the serious violations of human rights affecting the Sikh community in the Punjab and affecting Canadians of Sikh origin in the Punjab? Why has the Secretary of State for External Affairs been silent on that? Why no effort to improve the very difficult problems of immigration, for example, with an additional consulate in the Punjab? Why no grants to the community for over three years? Why no amendment to the Human Rights Act to include the provision for reasonable accommodation which is so important to make that a reality?

I suggest that instead of listening to the narrow-minded and intolerant voices of the minister's Conservative colleagues from Calgary, he should be listening to the Commissioner of the RCMP. The Commissioner of the RCMP, when he was questioned in the justice committee earlier this year, strongly supported this change. He said that the face of Canada is changing and he felt that the RCMP, because it has always had representatives of the country it has served in its ranks, needed to attract people from visible minorities and aboriginal peoples.

We have much work to do in that regard. In fact, of the 14,843 members of the RCMP, 14,418 are caucasian and only a little over 400 out of 14,843 are non-caucasian, including aboriginal peoples. That is a record which has to be changed. That was one of the reasons why the Commissioner of the RCMP made this important recommendation. The Commissioner of the RCMP went on to say that there are other more pragmatic reasons. He pointed out that when the Air India investigation led to certain questions there were only two members of the RCMP who even spoke Punjabi. Even for those practical reasons the RCMP must welcome into its ranks and encourage the hiring of Sikh Canadians.

The Commissioner says as well that we need members who can bridge the psychological gap that sometimes exists between new Canadians and police and how we view police in this country. We need to be able to help them with their problems, to carry out our investigations in an effective way and to deliver to them a police service to which they are entitled. He goes on to note that to deny Sikhs the right to wear turbans would in fact be in breach both of the Canadian Charter or Rights and Freedoms and the bona fide occupational provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act.

Why does the minister not listen to the Commissioner of the RCMP who has made this very important recommendation? Why did he not accept that recommendation some time ago, before the flames of intolerance could be fanned by a number of hon. members opposite?

I want to say a couple of words about the significance of the turban in the Sikh religion because some people say this is just a question of tradition. This is not a question of tradition, it is not a question of a particular cultural artefact. This is a fundamental article of faith, an essential element of the Sikh religious faith. Indeed, there are five articles of faith: the kes, the kanga, the kirpan, the kara and the kachha. Each of these is a fundamental article of faith.

One of my correspondents has written to me with some background. He says that the turban is known in the Punjabi language as the pag. He said if we study Punjabi culture and Sikh religion, the folk songs, the proverbs and the sayings, we see that the word "turban" is used as a synonym with the words "honour of a person". So a turban is not just a head cover or protection of the hair and head, it is also regarded as a fundamental part of the honour of the Sikh that he must guard at all times at any cost. In fact, removing the turban from a Sikh's head is seen as dishonouring him. It is a fundamental part of the religious tradition and surely we must recognize that and respect it.

Indeed, I care far more about what is inside the head of a member of the RCMP than what is on top of it. If I am in a situation in which I have to call upon the RCMP for assistance, I do not care if they have a turban on their head or a stetson or anything else. I want someone there who is sensitive and able to do the job, as members are in these circumstances.

We are talking of a turban, in the case of members of the RCMP, of a particular nature. In fact, the RCMP turban is made of navy blue cloth and it has a strip of yellow cloth which is wrapped around it. There is a metal brooch of the RCMP emblem similar to the pin worn in the standard uniform cap which is attached to the front of the turban. It is a dignified and appropriate way to accommodate this very important request.

I want to note as well that we would by no means be the only jurisdiction to take this very, very small step because, after all, that is what it really is. The United Kingdom, for some time, has allowed all members of the police force of Sikh origin to wear the turban. In fact, Mr. Speaker, when we talk about tradition there are not many traditions longer than the tradition of the London bobby. Yet London police of Sikh origin are permitted to wear the turban and it has not resulted in any difficulties whatever.

The Canadian Armed Forces have changed their regulations to allow a turban which, again, is an appropriate colour and design, to be worn by members of the Canadian Armed Forces. Similarly, the metropolitan Toronto police force and the Edmonton police force have incorporated this important tradition, have incorporated this important element of religious faith, because it is not just a tradition.

I am very pleased that we have a number of representatives of the Sikh community in the House today. As has been pointed out by representatives of that community, any baptized Sikh would not be able to join the RCMP if he is not allowed to wear the turban. There should not be any fear that Sikhs will somehow destroy anyone's heritage, culture or beliefs. Sikhs simply want an opportunity to serve their country, our country, in the best possible manner while their religious faith is being respected. That is what this is all about and that is why it is so important that we take this opportunity this afternoon to send out that message.

I will conclude because I do want my colleagues to have an opportunity to speak on this question. In closing, I think it is important we recognize that we have an obligation to show leadership here. Parliament has an opportunity this Friday afternoon to send out a message of confidence in our country, a message that we celebrate the diversity of our country. We have an important opportunity to send the message to the Solicitor General who has waited far too long to come to a decision. Let us demonstrate leadership in this area.

I appeal to all members of the House this afternoon, those who might think of talking this motion out, to think twice, because those who would talk the motion out are going to have to explain, not just to Sikh Canadians, but to all Canadians why it is that they are not prepared to celebrate the diversity of this country and not prepared to accept this very important recommendation of the commissioner. As the clock approaches three o'clock, we will be watching with great care to see if any member of this House actually insists on blocking this bill. For those who are not familiar with the procedure, if there is a debate continued at three o'clock that means there cannot be a vote of this House, that this House will not have an opportunity to speak.

So once again I appeal to all members of this House to let the House speak this afternoon on this important question. Let us take a decision. Let us accept this fundamental recommendation of tolerance and hope for all Canadians.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, the Member for Burnaby has presented the House with a question relating to proposed changes to the uniform of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The potential introduction of the turban as part of the red serge Mountie uniform has elicited a very strong reaction from many Canadians across the country, both for and against the idea.

Many of those who are arguing against change are adamant that their position is not reflective of a desire to exclude individuals of Sikh origin or, indeed, any member of a visible minority group from joining the force. Rather, they are interested in preserving the red serge uniform as a symbol of Canada's history and tradition.

The most common question being asked in western Canada is, why surrender our tradition for another tradition? It is common knowledge that the wearing of a turban in the Sikh society is based on tradition and custom and not on religious grounds. The obligatory tokens of the Sikh faith are the five Ks, the Kes, the Kara, the Kirpan, the Kanga and the Kachha. Whenever we read a newspaper or listen to a newscast these days, we hear more and more about our distinct society and the preservation of our Canadian culture. The unity of this country has even been challenged when reflecting cultural desires.

While Commissioner Inkster may have had good intentions, I think this proposal for change was for the worst possible reason. If you make an exception for one group of people, where do you stop? In order to come to a satisfactory resolution of this issue, I believe it is important to understand why some members of the public are so concerned about possible changes to the red serge uniform. To do so, both the history of the force and of the uniform must be examined.

The idea of a mounted police force originated in response to a need to establish law and order in the northwest in advance of any settlement. The solution of Sir John A. Macdonald was the creation of a paramilitary police, trained for the warfare, with preliminary civilian responsibility. Its model was the Royal Irish Constabulary. Accordingly, in 1873, the Dominion Parliament passed legislation for the establishment of a mounted police force for the Northwest Territories to be known as the Northwest Mounted Police.

Three divisions of 50 men each were mobilized at Fort Garry, Manitoba, where training and organization took place during the winter of 1873. Recruitment proceeded and reached a strength of 1,000 by the year 1885.

Once established in the northwest, demands upon the force increased. Members supervised trading practices, provided some relief and medical services to the Indians and they carried out patrols throughout the area. In addition, the force had an economic and cultural impact on the west as many members, upon leaving the force, made the west their home.

Furthermore, by the start of the Klondike gold rush in 1896, the Northwest Mounted Police was already established in the Yukon. From the start, the force carried out almost all the administrative functions of government. Its members acted as land agents, magistrates, police and mail carriers. After the peak of the rush had subsided civil servants had relieved the force of many of its administrative duties. A few years later, the force was also to play a prominent role in opening up the Canadian Arctic frontier.

In 1905, the first contracts were negotiated for the force to act under the direction of the provincial authorities to enforce the criminal laws and local statutes. The force was active in the campaign of the Canadian government to attract settlers to the prairies. By 1914, over a million settlers had arrived. The police became land agents, agriculture experts, welfare officials and immigration officers. By this time, the mounted police had achieved an international reputation for its part in bringing about the orderly development of western Canada. It is noteworthy to add that the force sent contingents to fight in both World Wars.

In 1920, the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, as it had become in 1904, absorbed the Dominion Police which had been responsible for federal policing in eastern Canada. In keeping with its national role, it was renamed the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

I have provided only the briefest of overviews of the origins and the history of the force. My intent was simply to illustrate why many Canadians identify with and are protective of the red serge uniform. In fact, the history of the uniform is central to this discussion. In keeping with the para-military role of the force, many of the traditions established in the early days were of military origin. These military traditions were nowhere more apparent than in the style of the uniforms of the force which followed the patterns of the British Army.

In accordance with Sir John A. Macdonald's apparent desire to keep the uniforms of the new police force simple, a jacket made of heavy scarlet serge with a wool lining was issued as the tunic for all ranks; dark blue cavalry pattern overalls, black boots and a pillbox cap or white helmet completed the uniform.

By 1876 officers were pressing for a distinctive uniform in keeping with their social and military status as well as one that would distinguish them from members of other ranks. An elaborate full dress uniform and a simpler everyday uniform were authorized. Scarlet was used for tunics of all ranks, partly because it was the traditional British military colour and also to avoid confusion with the blue-clad U.S. army.

Although the scarlet tunic coupled with the stetson hat is generally reserved for ceremonial occasions, this uniform still represents the image that most Canadians have of the force. This image is continuously being reinforced and promoted both within Canada and abroad through the performances of the RCMP musical ride. Based on traditional cavalry drills, the ride provides audiences with a unique opportunity to experience an exciting part of Canada's past.

Today the RCMP truly has a presence from sea to sea, across all provinces and in the north. In eight of the ten provinces the force is under contract to enforce the Criminal Code and provincial laws. Under comparable arrangements, the force provides policing services to over 190 municipalities across Canada. The RCMP also has exclusive police jurisdiction in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

It is also important to note that the symbolic importance of the red serge, or the "significant" uniform, is recognized in the current RCMP regulations of 1988. Pursuant to the regulations, the Commissioner of the RCMP can approve changes to all uniforms except to the significant uniform. Any changes to the red serge require ministerial approval.

Today's uniform depicts neutrality, impartiality, tradition, history and heritage. This uniform is a symbol of Canada and should only be changed to benefit the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as a whole and only to reflect safety and comfort.

• (1430)

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity to speak to this motion. I do not want to derogate from the motion itself because I find myself very favourably disposed to it.

I want to refer to the phrase "officers of Sikh origin". I do not think origin is really at issue here. What we are talking about is a faith and not origin. The reference to origin is perhaps a little unfortunate and slightly distracting. That aside, I also want to refer to the portion of the motion that refers to multiculturalism. It is my view that here multiculturalism is not just a reflection but it is a true manifestation of the community itself. It is a reality for us all that many of our fellow Canadians fervently and proudly subscribe to a faith wherein because of their devotion to God, the creator, they do not cut their hair or kes as it is called, and for reasons of tradition and good grooming, it is bound in a turban. I have, and perhaps we all have, friends and neighbours who are Sikh and they are an integral, real part of our Canadian culture.

My father was a Mountie. All of my growing up years were spent with a man who proudly wore the uniform of that day. I remember trying on his boots more than once, those big high boots and the big stetson hat, which did not fit me at all. I recall one day my father came home with a tuxedo and a small hand gun, a concealed weapon. That became the RCMP uniform for a day or a week in terms of undercover work. The uniform has changed. It has changed to accommodate women most recently.

In Halifax, where I was born after the last war, I saw many uniforms from the services, as well as the RCMP. Even though I was not alive during the last two wars, I know that men of the Sikh faith have served with distinction and valour in service to our Crown. They did that with or without battle dress, with or without helmet, even though the absence of a helmet might have put them at greater risk to their lives.

In my riding of Scarborough, in metropolitan Toronto, the Metropolitan Toronto Police will shortly have men of the Sikh faith proudly serving in the force. They will do that without cutting their hair, without removing the turban.

The Charter provisions in our Constitution speak for themselves. I do not want to spend a lot of time on that, but I feel it is likely that if the issue is pressed in the courts, if we are truly going to rely on our Charter, then the courts will find almost certainly that men of Sikh faith should not be barred from serving in the RCMP simply because of a uniform requirement.

I have children in my riding playing football, ball hockey, and they have their hair, their kes, properly done up as they play these sports. I am confident, and I think the whole country is—I like to think it is—that these children can grow up and be able to serve as Mounties just as proudly as my father did.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to rise to speak in support of this private member's bill introduced by the member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

Passage of this bill is vital to Canada's commitment to multiculturalism. It is also vital to Canada's commitment to our Charter of Rights and Freedoms which is lauded for its promotion of equality and of human dignity, and which recognizes our multicultural heritage.

Multiculturalism is a fundamental characteristic of Canada. We must embrace and act on the concept of equality and diversity. I ask the question: What is more important, the uniform an officer is wearing or the qualities that officer has on the inside? Does the RCMP tradition consist merely of red serge and brown stetson, or does it consist of the integrity and dedication that RCMP officers possess? In the final analysis, what is important is not an officer's headgear, but the quality of the head under the hat or the turban.

I certainly support this bill. It is in keeping with the principle of multiculturalism and it is in line with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and it will ensure that the effectiveness of the RCMP is not obstructed. Equality is based not on popularity; equality for all ought to be a living principle. Support for this bill is support for the principle of equality for all.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, unless I speak for about a minute, I am told that the bill will be talked out.

Very briefly, having worked as a Crown Attorney in three western provinces for many years and in this city with the RCMP, I would yield to nobody in having greater respect for the RCMP and the fact that the members risk their lives, theoretically, every hour of every day they serve. I have many friends in the RCMP.

I would also speak in favour of the motion. There is only time to make one key point: wearing a turban is a requirement, to the best of my understanding, for a baptised Sikh. It is not a cultural or an optional thing. If you are baptised, you have to wear a turban. Therefore, if you are banned from wearing the dress uniform and, therefore, from joining the RCMP, you are being banned, as I understand it, on the basis of religion.

Secondly, I wonder why the people who in good faith defend the present dress code, did not object when women were allowed into the RCMP at first, and when we began to have skirts in the dress code. It has been pointed out by members of the New Democrats and the Liberals that there have been many changes in the dress. The reality is that the RCMP should be accessible to all on the basis of competence.

I believe if the House were to support this motion today and not to talk it out, that we would have a significant impact on recognizing the fact that eight million Canadians are of non-British, non-French origin. I would urge all members here to support it and not to talk the bill out.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, this protest which is challenging the decision of the commissioner of the RCMP to allow turbans to be worn by RCMP officers is promoting hatred in Canada. I am appalled and sickened by a pin that is being worn in Alberta saying: "Keep the RCMP Canadian", with a picture of a Sikh in a turban and a line drawn across. This is the kind of hatred that is promoted by the actions of some members of Parliament. I deplore this.

I had many things I wanted to say today. In the interests of not talking this out, I just want to say simply that this is contrary, not only to our Charter, but also to the new Multiculturalism Act which requires that federal institutions like the RCMP must enhance the understanding and respect of the diversity of Canadian society.

I call on all members of this House to support the motion before us today.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the member for Burnaby has asked the House to consider the question of whether or not the turban should be introduced as part of the uniform of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. This issue has clearly evoked a strong response from many Canadians, both for and against the proposal.

I believe it would be helpful to this discussion to examine briefly the policies of police forces in other parts of the country and what they are doing. For example, what is the Department of National Defence doing regarding the turban. In so doing, I hope to provide some information to those individuals who have differing points of view on this topic. Both sides have raised valid concerns in support of their respective positions. This is the reason why a decision in respect to the proposal requires careful consideration and reflection.

It seems to me that the reason the RCMP's proposal to introduce turbans has elicited such a heated response is because it brings into play two long-standing traditions. On the one hand, the red serge "Mountie" uniform has become for many Canadians a symbol of this country's unique heritage and culture. Those familiar with the force's role in the orderly settlement of western Canada have every reason to be proud of the RCMP's enormous contribution to the development of this nation. Consequently, any change to the RCMP dress code represents more than just a simple variation to a police uniform. It represents to some a challenge not only to the policing traditions of the RCMP, but also to the traditions which lie at the foundation of our Canadian identity.

On the other hand, we have welcomed into our country people of various ethnic origins who have come to Canada to establish a better life for themselves and their children. Those of Sikh origin who choose to follow the tenets of the Sikh faith are required to observe a number of religious practices. Part of the Sikh religious tradition includes a series of symbols known as the five Ks, namely, the kes or unshorn hair and beard; the kanga or comb; the kara or steel bracelet; the kirpan or sword; and the kachha or undershorts.

Each of these objects has a religious significance for practising Sikhs. Together with the turban they form part of the Sikh uniform. The question then becomes, can we reconcile the RCMP dress code with the dress code of religious Sikhs?

The need to attract more members from visible minorities is an issue being faced by police forces across Canada, not just the RCMP. It is important to note that a number of these police forces have adopted policies to accommodate religious Sikhs. By the same token, while the experience of other police forces is instructive in looking at the issue of turbans in the RCMP, it is by no means prescriptive. The issue must be decided on its own specific merits in the context of the RCMP's unique role as Canada's national police force.

A number of years ago the Metropolitan Toronto Police Force amended its dress code to permit practising members of the Sikh religion to wear a turban made of issued fabric in place of the standard head-dress issued to other police officers. The unshorn hair must be concealed under the turban and beards and moustaches are to be worn in a neat fashion. In addition, the other religious symbols are allowed.

It is interesting to note that in respect to the kirpan or sword the dress regulations provide for the wearing of a small replica of the sword in the form of a pin. It is to be worn under the police uniform and cannot exceed three and a half inches in length.

The Sikh member is also requested to sign a form acknowledging that he cannot be permitted to perform certain duties where the wearing of a special head-dress or special safety equipment, for example, helmets and hard hats, respiratory equipment is required by statute or is necessary for safety reasons.

I understand that both the Peel Regional Police Force and the Halton Regional Police Force have dress regulations for Sikh officers similar to those of the Metropolitan Toronto Police Force. Similarly, the Edmonton Police Force has adopted dress regulations which permit adherents of the Sikh religion to wear a police blue turban with a cap badge centred and secured midway on the front of the turban. Hair and beard may remain uncut provided that a member's safety is not put into jeopardy when required to wear operational equipment.

Finally, my understanding is that while the Ottawa Police Force does not have regulations in place on turbans, a statement was issued a few years ago by the force to the effect that the need to wear a turban for religious reasons would not bar an applicant from being considered as a candidate.

My objective in canvassing the policies of the above noted police departments is simply to illustrate the pairing of a police uniform with a turban in Canada is not without precedent.

In fact the Department of National Defence has adopted a dress policy which allows members of the Canadian forces who are adherents to the Sikh religion to wear an issue turban as well as the other required religious symbols. These items must be modified or removed if they interfere with safety or operational requirements. Also, the hair and beard must be worn uncut, provided the member's safety is not jeopardized by the need to wear occupational or operational equipment.

This is not to suggest that the solution for the RCMP will be a straightforward one, or that it should simply follow what a small number of other police forces have done. It goes without saying that there are many more police forces that have not addressed the issue of turbans in their dress code.

Perhaps this question is simply not relevant given the needs of their particular communities. Others may be of the view that changing the dress code to accommodate any religious group is not advisable because the distinction would hinder the assimilation of the member into the force; if one group is accommodated, equal consideration would have to be accorded to all requests for concessions no matter how valid.

These are important concerns. I do not believe that those who are against changes to the RCMP red serge uniform are against the idea of Sikhs or a member of any minority group joining the force. Quite the contrary. The focus of these arguments is the notion that no matter what a person's ethnic or religious background may be, if that individual wishes to become a member of the RCMP, he or she should accept the established dress code. In other words, membership may have its privileges, but it also entails certain obligations.

In so far as the RCMP uniform is concerned, the view is that we are not dealing with just any uniform but the uniform of Canada's national police force. The significance of the scarlet tunic for those who view the uniform as a symbol of Canada's history and traditions cannot be underestimated.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, the member for Burnaby—Kingsway has presented for the consideration of this House the issue of the proposed changes to the uniform of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police which would allow members of Sikh origin to wear turbans.

Given the diverse and intense reaction to this proposal, it is clear that this is not a simple cosmetic variation to a police uniform. The issue of modifying the RCMP uniform to allow turbans is a complex one, because it serves to bring into play our respect for Canada's unique history and tradition, and the desire to welcome into the society as full participating members individuals of various ethnic origins.

For this reason, I would like to examine the different points of view expressed in regard to this issue in order to better assess what the proposed changes represent to Canadians. It is imperative that a workable solution be found to this question through serious study and consultation.

Some members of the public have expressed their strong opposition to the introduction of the turban as part of the RCMP uniform. This issue has clearly struck a deep nerve across the country. The gist of many of the opinions expressed centres on the view that the red serge uniform has evolved over the more than 100–year history of the RCMP into a national symbol, one that is instantly recognized across Canada and indeed throughout the world. And, of course, Canadians have every reason to be proud of the outstanding reputation the force has earned over the years both at home and abroad.

Thus arguments have been advanced that modifying the red serge uniform to accommodate turbans in lieu of the stetson hat would not accord with the traditional image of Canada that many Canadians associate with the Mounties.

Furthermore, it has been contended that introducing this variation would make it more difficult for new members wearing turbans to be assimilated into the police organization both from the point of view of the public and of other RCMP members. If the purpose of any uniform is to identify its wearers as being part of a distinct organization and to create an esprit de corps, at what point does allowing variations to accommodate new members counter the purpose of the uniform as a unifying force?

These are all valid concerns which deserve serious reflection. I do not believe they are directed against the Sikh community or any religious group but are simply indicative of a sincerely expressed desire to maintain a long standing symbol of Canada. Indeed, from the perspective of native Canadians, the preponderant majority of us sitting here today is descendant of immigrants to this country. Multiculturalism is a fact of life in Canada and has been since its inception. The RCMP is made up of Canadians. Their roots represent many cultures and religions. All have been proud to wear the traditional RCMP uniform.

Canada has always welcomed immigrants to her shores. I realize that we have benefited from the contributions of many countries and many cultures. However, in the past Canadian traditions, laws and institutions have been adopted, upheld and strengthened by the people seeking to make their home in Canada. Everyone has always been welcomed and everyone will still be welcomed.

In Canada, people are free to practice their religion and keep their customs. People can make choices about how they choose to live their lives. The face of Canadian society is changing and there is a line of thought that so too must the composition of the police force which serves that society. The need to provide more effective community-based policing is clearly not a concern facing the RCMP alone but must most established Canadian symbols be altered to achieve this goal? I do not deny that the RCMP uniform has changed over the years. However, the change did not interfere with uniformity nor did the change reflect any religious affiliation.

The issue being debated today is not a simple one but one that has far reaching implications. It is clearly a desirable goal to have the RCMP open to all who wish to serve in it. I do not believe anyone involved in this debate would argue to the contrary.

Lately in this country we have been moving in the direction of separating religion from state. Would this not be a step back from this position? At the same time, it is recognized that policing in general is a profession which has a different code of conduct, standards and dress than other disciplines. Coupled with the particular history of the red serge Mountie uniform, there are arguments to be considered against modification.

Somehow a solution must be found. The outcome of a decision on this issue must produce a win-win situation for all concerned, but must Canadian symbols give way? This is why the matter is being reviewed carefully and why further consultation is necessary.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a very special and personal reason for entering this debate today. My father was an immigrant to this country. He brought with him a strange language and some different customs and, until his retirement, he was master tailor for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. For over three decades, he dedicated his life and his career to making sure that the Mounted Police was the best dressed national police force in the world. He took great pride in personally measuring every new recruit for his first uniform and even had the honour of making a Mountie suit which was sent back to England with Queen Elizabeth II for Prince Charles. I know because my younger brother was the model for it.

I share the view that I believe my father would have had, that we should be grateful to live in a nation that would not force any Canadian to abandon an important element of his or her religion, and that would not exclude any Canadian from being a member of the RCMP for religious reasons.

The Mounted Police is a symbol of Canada because they uphold the values that make this a great country, values that include respect for the differences that exist among Canadians, and values that include the right we all enjoy to participate fully in Canadian society regardless of differences in religion, race, gender or colour.

I have no doubt that there were also objections when some uniforms first included skirts. There are no doubt some people who feel that oriental skins or black skins or native Canadian skins do not go with—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway on a point of order.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, having regard to the clock and not wanting to stop the hon. member, I would seek consent of the House to extend the debate so that speeches may be finished.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When the member for Burnaby—Kingsway asks to extend the debate, I would ask him to what time. The member knows that if we do not see the clock, we could be here until Monday morning. It is not that I object, but I would just like some indication from the member.

Mr. Robinson: I would suggest that we allow the speakers who wish to participate to do so—I understand there are very few who wish to do so—and that the debate be continued no later than 3.30 p.m.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no unanimous consent. The member for Ottawa West.

Mrs. Catterall: The integrity and excellence of the force does not depend on such superficial considerations as a piece of serge or a piece of brown felt. A multiculturalism department and policy are travesties if our institutions cannot change to accommodate differences.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, the issue of the proposed changes in the uniform of the RCMP which the Hon. Member for Burnaby—Kingsway has asked the House to examine should be considered within the broader context of providing police services in a multicultural society. The RCMP's decision to allow the wearing of turbans by members of the RCMP is a delicate matter that obliges us to strike a balance between our respect for the agency's traditions and the desire to improve services.

Mr. Speaker, to give the House a better understanding of what motivated this proposal, I would like to explain today how the RCMP has evolved to respond to the changing needs of the many communities it serves.

I hope to show that the motion before the House today will have important implications, not only for the RCMP but also for other Canadian police forces that are seeking ways of improving their relationship with minority groups.

[English]

The RCMP has recognized the need to become more representative of the people it serves. Although the force, as we all know, has its origin in the west, it must be remembered that today it provides policing services across Canada through agreements with various provincial, territorial, and municipal governments.

Accordingly, a national recruiting team was created last year to target and attract personnel from visible minority groups. As part of this initiative, both posters and brochures designed to attract visible minority youths are being produced in the language of the target audience. I understand that to date over 200 people from these target groups have joined the ranks of the RCMP.

Furthermore, the RCMP is making considerable efforts today to increase representation of women and Francophones. This type of recruitment, Mr. Speaker, is recognized as a very good way to promote co-operation and understanding between police forces and the general public.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being three o'clock, the House stands adjourned until Monday, at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS AND GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS—FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the first report of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations in both official languages.

This report deals with the issue of credit cards and Canadian consumers. I might just briefly outline the themes that our report discusses. First, we talk about fairness to consumers. We believe that fairness to consumers in terms of credit cards involves reasonable interest rates. We also believe that interest calculations should be done on a common sense basis.

A second theme is the disclosure of the costs of using credit cards on a consistent and industry-wide basis so that consumers can easily compare the different cards that are out there in the market-place.

Third, we believe that society should not discriminate against those who do not choose to use credit cards or revolving credit and we address that fact.

Fourth, we are very concerned about public education. Complex rules now exist in terms of the credit card industry and we want to ensure that consumers have all the information at their finger tips to make wise credit decisions.

Finally, we are concerned with the fraudulent use of credit cards and wish to have measures put into place that would make it more difficult.

I am pleased to table this report and pursuant to Standing Order 109 of the House of Commons, the committee requests that the government table a comprehensive response to our report.

STRIKING COMMITTEE—NINETEENTH REPORT

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the nineteenth report of the Striking Committee. If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in the nineteenth report later this day, and I would ask that we dispense with the reading of that report by the Clerk at the table as that report concerns only membership changes to committees.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition today with regard to the goods and services tax. It is signed by a number of Canadians explaining how they think it is an unfair taxation system and that it is going to hurt people. It is going to tax reading, haircuts, diapers, coffins, home heating fuel, et cetera. They call upon the House to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax, to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations to ensure that if and when there is a consensus on this sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, this reform not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition on VIA Rail which calls upon the House to maintain an adequate VIA Rail system throughout Canada and to ensure that the federal government provide adequate funding to upgrade the service we have at the present time.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am presenting seven petitions, which have been verified by the Clerk of the House, containing the signatures of 328 residents of Vancouver and surrounding regions of the lower mainland, and an additional 18 petitions containing the signatures of 1,178 residents of Sarnia, Ontario. These citizens call upon the government to withdraw its proposal for a regressive and inflationary 9 per cent goods and services tax.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition concerning the goods and services tax on behalf of the constituents of Winnipeg North. Some 200 signatures are included, because they believe that the proposed goods and services tax will impose an undue burden on them and will ruin small businesses. The petitioners hereby pray that Parliament grant them the necessary remedy and reject the proposed goods and services tax.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my other set of petitions concern the issue of the protection of the life of the unborn. The petitioners, over 500, believe in the sanctity of human life from the moment of conception and believe that there is a need for a just law to protect the lives both of the unborn and the mother and further believe that there is a need for families and communities to develop various forms of support and shelter to provide care and assistance to mothers and mothers–to–be. The petitioners pray and call upon Parliament to formulate and legislate law to protect life from conception, a law which seeks to save the life of both mother and child.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present a petition signed by several dozen constituents in Massey and Elliot Lake, Ontario, in which they point out their displeasure with the proposed goods and services tax. They point out that this will cause higher taxes and that it will be especially onerous for low income families, that it will cause higher inflation, higher interest rates and will have an adverse effect on the regions of this country.

VIA RAIL

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition certified by the Clerk of Petitions of this House calling upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada not to cancel in whole or in part passenger rail services in Canada.

SOUTH MORESBY PARK

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured this morning to table four petitions that have been certified pursuant to Standing Order 36. The first is a petition of over 80 pages. It has signatures from British Columbians who are concerned about the South Moresby Park agreement that would allow for millions of dollars to be spent to explore for minerals and hydrocarbons in this first national marine park. They are also concerned that they do not want any more hydrocarbon exploration activities to take place in the coastal waters of British Columbia.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition that is certified correct pursuant to Standing Order 36, signed by residents of northern British Columbia who are concerned about the proposed goods and services tax. They call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax because it would shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): I have a petition certified correct pursuant to Standing Order 36 from residents of northern British Columbia who are concerned about the announced cuts to VIA Rail. They call upon Parliament to maintain VIA Rail as a national network and to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment and to give VIA sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

FORESTRY

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition certified correct pursuant to Standing Order 36 regarding Canada's forests. It calls upon Parliament to renew the FRDA agreement for forest renewal with British Columbia, thereby providing a renewed commitment to the restocking of our forest lands, advancing forest research, promoting silviculture and assisting the forest industry in developing new products and markets that will provide British Columbia with forestry jobs for the future.

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE ORCHESTRA

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present a petition which is in proper form under Standing Order 36 in the interest of the National Arts Centre orchestra, which is considered a world-class orchestra. It has brought fame to the capital city and is an important instrument in cultural development across Canada. I call upon the minister to consider financial aid to the National Arts Centre and to see what can be done to enable the people of Canada and the people of Ottawa to enjoy the National Arts Centre and its orchestra.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): It is a pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to present this petition on behalf of citizens of Thunder Bay and the district of Thunder Bay condemning the government for its shortsightedness in reference to its action on VIA. It is a pleasure to present this petition which has been properly prepared and attested as to proper content and form.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present 1,365 signatures in support of the petition to request the Ministers of Employment and Immigration and Health and Welfare Canada to revise the medical standards for admission to Canada with a view to compliance with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in the enhancement of the human rights and dignity of the disabled.

There must be a change in the act which allows families and individuals to be considered on their merit as immigrants to Canada. A medical disability of an individual should not be an automatic bar to admission to Canada.

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 in which several hundred constituents from all over Canada have indicated that the government subsidies to VIA Rail are not disproportionate to subsidies required for highway infrastructure or for airports. They request the Government of Canada not to cancel in whole or in part rail passenger services in our country.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure today to present yet another petition from people in the Madoc, Tweed and Eldorado area of Ontario calling upon the government to reverse the decisions that it has made on VIA Rail.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to present this petition to the House on behalf of the people from Sudbury who oppose this goods and services tax.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition duly certified by the Clerk of Petitions objecting to the Government of Canada withdrawing its contribution of $2.9 billion to the financing of unemployment insurance and leaving the financing to workers and employers, pleading with Parliament not to withdraw from the unemployment insurance scheme and not to pass Bill C-21.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a further petition on the goods and services tax objecting to the tax and asking that Parliament not approve the goods and services tax.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, today I have about 15 to 20 petitions with 300 to 400 names objecting to the proposed goods and services tax. The people of Sudbury and the surrounding municipalities are extremely concerned with the effects of such a tax on outlying regions of our country.

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition from northern Ontario residents who object to this government's plans to get rid of VIA Rail passenger service. They want to remind the government that many people in rural communities rely exclusively on rail passenger services.

• (1120)

VIA RAIL

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present a petition this morning from residents in Winnipeg, Red Lake and other parts of Ontario and Manitoba who are objecting to the cuts to VIA Rail and point out that the government, through its cuts, is going to cause closure or sale of parts of VIA Rail. It is cutting it by at least one third. It is a pleasure for me to present this petition duly authorized under Standing Order 36.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, like many other members, I have a petition signed by dozens of residents of the great city of Sudbury who are concerned about the GST and what it is going to do, for example, to Sudbury Downs Race-track. Like dozens of other race-tracks across the country it will be forced to close if this national sales farce goes through. The people of Sudbury want the government to revoke any tax, 9 per cent, 7 per cent, on food, on all goods. We want no GST.

EXTRADITION

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a number of petitions which have been certified correct as to form and content. These petitions contain over 860 names from the Calgary area, calling upon the government to revise the laws of Canada relating to extradition to allow the Justice minister of Canada to order the extradition of alleged or convicted criminals at any time after their apprehension in Canada, even during their period of incarceration for crimes committed in Canada.

Over 90,987 names have already been presented to this house, so the total is well over 91,000 names on this specific issue to amend the extradition laws.

VIA RAIL

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present a petition on behalf of several hundred Canadians opposing the cuts of some $500 million to VIA Rail, the closure, sale or transfer of substantial parts of the VIA Rail system, which will mean a disappearance of one third of Canada's national railway system. They call upon Parliament to maintain VIA Rail and the present national network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment and to bring in a new passenger train act with a revised costing arrangement with railway companies.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36, certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions, that points out a whole variety of concerns that the petitioners have regarding the goods and services tax. They point out that it is a mean, cruel and unfair tax, highly discriminatory and are asking the government to simply abandon its efforts to introduce the tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, these petitioners are asking the government to reconsider the decision to curtail VIA Rail service and point out a variety of concerns, namely, that it is a very environmentally unsound decision to curtail passenger rail service in the country, as the government proposes to do. They are asking the government to reconsider and actually invest in an enhanced passenger train service so that we can move people efficiently in an environmentally sound way.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, today it is my pleasure to present two petitions, both certified under Standing Order 36. The first one is, as were others presented before the House today, a petition pointing out that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system presently in place in Canada, and asking it to stop the present proposed goods and service tax and instead look at real tax reform.

FORESTRY

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is a petition in which the petitioners from various parts of Canada encourage the Parliament of Canada to renew the FRDA agreement with British Columbia and thereby provide for renewed commitment to restocking our forest land, advancing forestry research, promoting silviculture and assisting the forest industry in developing the new products and markets that will provide us with forestry jobs for the future.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I too have petitions from residents in the ridings of Prince George—Peace River and Cariboo—Chilcotin in the Province of British Columbia urging this government to renew the forestry resource development agreement right away with the Province of British Columbia to ensure that we can get on with the proper management of our forests.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 139 and 140.

[Text]

BANK OF NOVA SCOTIA—SURPLUS PENSION FUNDS' WITHDRAWAL

Question No. 139—Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River):

Has the Bank of Nova Scotia withdrawn surplus pension funds pursuant to the terms of the Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985 at any time since 1969 and, if so (a) on what dates (b) in what amounts?

Mr. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): I am informed by the Office of the Superintendant of Financial Institutions as follows:

The Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985 and the predecessor Act, the Pension Benefits Standards Act, require that a pension plan sponsor receive authorization from the Superintendant before withdrawing surplus funds from its pension plan.

Under the current legislation, the plan sponsor must follow a detailed procedure, as prescribed in the Regulations under the Act, and must demonstrate its entitlement to the surplus funds before the Superintendant will consider authorizing any withdrawal from the pension fund.

Neither the Superintendant of Financial Institutions nor his predecessor, the Superintendant of Insurance, has authorized the Bank of Nova Scotia to withdraw surplus funds from its pension plan in the period between 1972 and the current date. Government records prior to 1972, in this regard, have not been retained.

BANK OF NOVA SCOTIA—SHORTFALL PAYMENTS

Question No. 140—Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River):

Has the Bank of Nova Scotia ever been obliged to make shortfall payments pursuant to the terms of the Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985 at any time since 1969 and, if so (a) on what dates (b) in what amounts?

Point of Order

Mr. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): I am informed by the Office of the Superintendant of Financial Institutions as follows:

We presume that the Member intends the term "shortfall payments" to mean any actuarially determined special payments required to amortize unfunded liabilities or experience deficiencies in the pension fund. According to periodic statements and reports filed with the Office of the Superintendant, the Bank of Nova Scotia made no such payments to its pension fund in the period from 1972 to date because none were required.

Information filed with the government on this plan prior to 1972 has not been retained.

SUPPLY DAY MOTIONS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the Leader of the Opposition, but I do want to raise a point of order which should take me two or three minutes.

I was away last week, but I have followed the debate that went on and some of the events that are recorded in Hansard. I have several procedural questions about the multiple notices which have preceded our entering this order just now. I do not want to argue that the motion is not receivable. That is not my intention at all. I only ask the Speaker to rule on these several questions as a guide for the future.

Since the first notice of this opposition day motion was given last Wednesday, before the government designated that today would be an opposition day, the first since the week before last, my first question to you is: Is a designation a necessary precondition to giving notice of an opposition day motion, and if not, why not? I submit on this point that our whole chapter of Standing Orders on Supply begins after the designation of the continuing order for Supply with the words in Standing Order 81(2) to be precise, and I quote:

> On any day or days appointed for the consideration of any business under the provisions of this Standing Order—

All the rest of the procedure flows from the appointment of such days. Such appointment is a precondition to everything else, including notice. Surely one reason for this is, as the same Standing Order 81(2) says, that such days are government business days on which Supply business takes full precedence.

My second question grows from what we saw on the Notice Paper Friday, a second motion from the same opposition political party identical in wording to the first, but in the name of another member. My question is as follows: Given the wording of Standing Order 81(2)(c) about the Speaker's power of selection and the commentary on that Standing Order in the Annotated Standing Orders, is it not the case that what is contemplated in Standing Order 81(12)(c) for the Speaker to select from are motions from different political opposition parties, not the same party?

My third question grows from what I see on today's Order Paper and Notice Paper. The original motion from the Leader of the Opposition is the only one on the paper, since the one that came on notice one day later has now I take it been withdraw. While there were two identical motions on Friday's paper, now there is only one. My question is the following: Is it in order for any or all notices for such motions to be withdrawn without the consent of this House?

I have a fourth question, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order, either before or after an allotted day has been designated, for one or both opposition parties to raise multiple notices of motion on the paper, thus giving the Chair, I would argue, the impossible task of exercising its selection power of Standing Order 81(12)(c) in a way I do not think was contemplated, that is within a single political party? Is it the Chair's view that members have to prepare for a possible debate on any of a number of motions?

I cannot recall the House having faced the unusual placing of notice, multiple notice, premature notice, and then withdrawing notice that we have seen the official opposition demonstrate over the last several days.

I ask the Chair to see the need for the return to traditional practices concerning the notice of such motions. The designation comes first, notice follows, and the notice stays. Mr. Speaker, am I wrong on that count? If the Chair looks at Hansard for May 28, 1987, notice and calling of debate on allotted days are inter-related in that order. If there is a slip-up anywhere along that path, it has to get set right by the consent of this House.

I submit we should keep our notice system as rigorous as it has been traditionally. This requires discipline for both the government and for private members. I do not believe that the Notice Paper should be empowered to somehow appear to legitimize proposals that cannot procedurally be put to the House and do not belong where we, as members, sometimes want to put them on that paper.

I do not wish to impede the debate today on the Liberal leader's motion. I am happy he is able to propose it here today. We want to get on with that debate. I do ask the Chair to consider these questions I have raised, hear other voices as there may be different views and then help the House out at a later point by giving us some answers to these technical but important questions.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary has raised some very interesting points. It is very difficult to know exactly when an Opposition day is going to be held. Normally on Thursday after Question Period, it is the responsibility of the Government House Leader to tell the Opposition parties when the next Opposition day is going to take place. It was very unclear last Thursday whether the government was going to call an Opposition day, which was our turn, on Friday or on Monday. Thus it is very difficult for people on this side of the House to plan any motion that is put down.

I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that maybe if the government would clearly set out its plan of work for the House, then Opposition parties would not have to put down two motions and then withdraw after they find out what the government is going to do. I would say in passing that it would be very nice, when we give notice this far ahead, as the Leader of the Opposition has, to have the Minister of Agriculture here to respond.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I too do not want to extend this important discussion. We are anxious to begin the debate on the Opposition motion on agriculture, particularly in light of the Minister of Agriculture's comments late last week condemning the free trade agreement in terms of what it has done to agriculture.

Having heard the various questions that the parliamentary secretary has put to the Chair, I think they are questions that must be answered. As my good friend from Algoma has also indicated, some earlier notification of Opposition days would be appropriate. On Thursday, late in the day, we were still unsure makes it impossible for critics to be here as presumably there is some difficulty with the Minister of Agriculture being in attendance here today. As Opposition parties we really had no alternative but to take some of the steps we were forced to take. Perhaps by responding to the questions of the parliamentary secretary and hearing our concerns we can avoid this problem in the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have heard from all three parties on the same point of order. I think the hon. member has brought this to the attention of the Chair. I will take it under advisement and give a ruling at a later date.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—AGRICULTURE AND TRADE POLICIES

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That this House condemn the government for having jeopardized the future of Canadian agriculture by its ill-conceived trade policies, especially the Canada-U.S. Trade Deal,

1) which have failed to gain access to the U.S. market in spite of the promises of the Prime Minister in the 1988 General Election;

2) which have failed to counter U.S. protectionist actions (including those taken after the enactment of the Trade Deal) against Canadian agricultural products such as pork and other commodities vital to our economy;

3) which have failed, as evidenced by the recent GATT panel decision on ice cream and yoghurt, to ensure that Canada is able to maintain its marketing board and orderly marketing systems;

4) which have failed to have any effect on U.S. agricultural export subsidy programs, such as the export enhancement program, which are contrary to the claimed "spirit" of the Trade Deal while the Canadian government has, at the same time, been moving unilaterally to dismantle programs beneficial to Canada's farmers; and

5) which have failed to create confidence among farmers in the future of the food supply system in Canada and its ability to ensure long-term food security for consumers.

He said: Mr. Speaker, what we are talking about today is the future of Canadian agriculture. What we are talking about as well in this House of Commons is the future in Canada of the farm family.

This Tory party claimed for years to be the best friend the Canadian farmer ever had, but for the last five years it has done nothing but stab Canadian farmers in the back.

For many years we have heard Hon. Members opposite tell us that rural and farming communities were the natural constituency of the Conservative Party. For years, they maintained the fiction that only the Tories were prepared to defend the farmers, that only the Tories understood the problems facing Canadian farmers. For years, they told us "Wait until we are in power! You'll see how much better off Canadian farmers will be." We are waiting, Mr. Speaker, and it has been a long time. It has been five years, and we are still waiting for the farm revolution the Tories promised us!

Canadian farmers have been waiting for a long time. They have been waiting forever, and we are still waiting here in the House for that so-called farm revolution. The Tory revolution never happened, however. Increasingly, the younger generation is leaving the farm. Farm bankruptcy rates have increased dramatically. Farmers are still facing a debt crisis. Operating costs have gone up. When the Government finally decided to help, those who benefitted most were the big corporations and large operations, while small farmers were at a disadvantage.

Canadian farmers have faced natural disasters. They realize it all part of farming floods, droughts and all kinds of natural catastrophes but the worst disaster they ever experienced was the Tory Goverment.

[English]

Most of us in this House represent urban constituencies. I want to say that the urban citizens of Canada, the people of Vancouver Quadra and of all the other great cities of our country take our food too much for granted. We tend to think that if it is there in the store or on the shelf it will always be there and we will always have plenty. But that will only remain true, and I say this to the metropolitan citizens of Canada, if we maintain our self-sufficiency in food production; if we Canadians do not become reliant on another country for our food.

What I want to say clearly to Canadians is that the Tory government, under this Prime Minister, has started us on the road to agriculture dependency. This government signed a trade deal with the United States that will devastate the Canadian farm family. It told us the reason was to get secure access to the American market. We said in the House of Commons, across the country and during a federal election that the only way we would get secure access to the American market for our farm products, or any other Canadian export, was to obtain a specific exemption from the United States protectionist trade law.

Once upon a time that was the government's own position. I recite again to the House of Commons the Prime Minister's interview with the Wall Street Journal on April 3, 1987, as follows:

U.S. trade remedy laws cannot apply to Canada, period.

In the same interview, he stated:

You can't have a free trade arrangement and expect the traditional laws of countervail to apply.

Those were his words. They were echoed by the Minister for International Trade who said in St. John's, Newfoundland, to his own Board of Trade in July 1987:

Unless we get out from under the threat of countervail and other U.S. trade remedy law and unless there is an effective dispute settlement resolution to bind the Americans to their commitments, a free trade agreement with the United States would not be a good deal for Canada.

We could not have said it any more clearly. However, the trade agreement is clear and to the contrary.

Article 1902.1 is absolutely unambiguous. It says that the United States still has the right to use countervail against us. It says that the United States still has the right to use any trade remedy law against us. It says, quoting the agreement, that the United States "reserves the right to apply its anti-dumping law and countervailing duty law to goods imported from the territory of the other party," that is, Canada.

We did not, therefore, get secure access to the American market. We did not get an exemption from American trade law, whether that be the all-embracing law of 1930 or the U.S. trade law of 1974 or the recent omnibus trade bill of 1988. All of those very comprehensive trade laws applicable to Canada still apply against Canada and are currently being applied by the Americans against our exports.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, what are the implications of the FTA for agriculture? First, seasonal tariffs have been eliminated. Ours is a harsh climate, and our crop season lasts no more than four or five months. Canadian farmers will not be able to compete with their American counterparts in California, Florida, Georgia and other southern states. Why? Because they can harvest crops throughout the year. Canadian farmers know that free trade is impossible in the agricultural sector. With a five-month season here in Canada and a twelve-month season in the southern U.S., there is no way Canadian farmers can compete under the Free Trade Agreement. Only a Tory Government would sign a trade agreement that is completely oblivious of our Canadian climate.

[English]

Under the trade deal, our whole marketing board supply management system is in the course of being negotiated away. It includes marketing surveillance over eggs, chickens, dairy products, turkeys, you name it. Every Canadian farm support system is going to be harmonized, to use the words of the trade agreement, with American programs under the negotiation with the United States of the definition of subsidy.

Our programs are specifically listed in an annex to the trade deal. I am going to read a few of them, applicable particularly to the western farmer: the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, the Agriculture and Rural Development Act, the Economic and Rural Development Agreements the Agricultural Stabilization Act, the Western Grain Stabilization Act, the Special Canadian Grains Program, the Prairie Grains Advance Payments Act, the Crop Insurance Act. Every one of those programs is listed for negotiation to be harmonized with the programs of United States and harmonized down to the U.S. level.

Our government could not even wait for the negotiations. It has already started to slash those programs and sell out our farmers to the Americans. Also, before any negotiations began, it sold out the Niagara and British Columbia grape growers. It eliminated the two-price wheat system. It eliminated interest-free cash advances to our farmers. In the last federal budget alone, the minister announced the following cuts totalling $.5 billion by the end of 1990: Crop insurance to be cut by $200 million; grain and flour transportation, $60 million; rail branch line rehabilitation program, $48 million; grain and crops advance payment programs, $54 million; dairy export program, $12 million; commodity based loan program, $15 million; Canadian Dairy Commission, $10 million; ending farm fuel rebate, $100 million; all cuts against the Canadian farmer, all cuts concluded in the last federal budget.

You would think, those guys over there were working for the Americans.

Some Hon. Members: They are!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): With friends like that, the Canadian farmer does not need any enemies.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): By the time our so-called negotiators sit down with the American negotiators to negotiate farm support programs, there will not be anything left to negotiate. Look what the Americans are doing in the meantime. They are not stupid. They are taking advantage of a weak Canadian government.

They are using their trade legislation which was specifically incorporated in the trade agreement with Canada to attack our agricultural exports. They have imposed a countervail duty on fresh, chilled and frozen pork. That is in addition to the current duty on live hogs. Now Canadian hog producers are being asked by their own association to contribute $2 for every hog sold, whether the hog is sold domestically or in export to the United States, to help to pay for that duty.

In the case of yogurt and ice cream, the Government says this has nothing to do with the FTA and that it is a GATT decision. That is not true, Mr. Speaker. Yogurt and ice cream have everything to do with the FTA! We wouldn't be talking about this today if there were no Free Trade Agreement. So what happened? Before signing the FTA, we had tariff protection for dairy products. The United States had similar protection. Since the middle of the 50's, the Americans have enjoyed a GATT exemption, allowing them to prohibit imports of dairy products from Canada. Since that time we have been unable to send them our dairy products.

How did the members of the brain trust across the floor, the Tory brain trust, manage to sign a free trade agreement that will eventually eliminate all tariffs on dairy products while at the same time protecting our dairy industry? They simply withdrew dairy products from the protected tariffs list and transferred them to the import control list whose items are supposedly protected by GATT.

The Americans have now obtained a decision from GATT that prevents us from doing so. A decision by Canada to transfer the tariff protection list to the import control list has now been overturned by GATT, and we have no protection whatsoever. What a monumental blunder on the part of the Canadian Government!

[English]

We saw that happening last year. I questioned the former Minister of Agriculture, John Wise, who sat with distinction in this House. I asked him about the dairy question, and I have no doubt that the real reason John Wise did not present himself for re-election was because he knew exactly what was going to happen to him.

At any rate, in his amiable manner—I can still see him and so can you—he said to me, "The hon. gentleman can just sit back and relax because we will deliver to the dairy farmers of Canada exactly what we told them we would deliver".

I feel pretty relaxed this morning, but the dairy industry is not relaxed. They have been sold out by a bunch of incompetent amateurs. My colleague from Lambton—Middlesex will talk in more detail about the fact that the U.S. is not even able to supply its own market and yet now is trying to sell into ours.

The Deputy Prime Minister of Canada, the part-time Minister of Agriculture, is going around complaining bitterly about the American action on hogs and milk products. Just last week, in a speech to the Canada Grains Council in Toronto, then apparently in Calgary, this is what he had to say:

> It defies belief that the United States can complain about our quotas while their market is closed to Canadian suppliers.

Where has he been? What has he been smoking, as we say? Join the club. All I can say to him is that it defies belief that this government was dumb enough and gullible enough to sign a trade deal that got us into this whole mess in the first place.

These are the words of the Prime Minister on March 16, 1987:

> Our highest priority is to have an agreement that ends the threat to Canadian industry from U.S. protectionists who harass and restrict our exports through the misuse of trade remedy laws.

This was said in the House of Commons in response to one of my arguments. Then he signed the deal. He signed a deal that he said would end that harassment. We told Canadians it would not.

One of the worst things you can do in life, whether you say it to your family, to a neighbour or to a business partner, is to say "I told you so". It is not a popular thing to say. You cannot even say it on a football field. But I will say that we did tell them so and exactly what we said was going to happen is happening to the Canadian farms!

Let me return to the Deputy Prime Minister of Canada. He said last week of the latest American industry plan to seek countervail of our Durum wheat exports which the Americans now claim are causing the decline of prices in their markets:

> If the U.S. is serious in its rhetoric about free trade in agriculture, I would hope that they would begin by ceasing this trade harassment on Durum.

Oh, what a late convert. What a slow learner. The Deputy Prime Minister can huff and puff all he wants. The problem is that Canadian farmers just do not believe this government any more.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): We told Canadians that the Americans would retain all the trade remedies they now have. We told Canadian farmers that the Americans would continue to harass Canadian agricultural exports under the same laws they always had because those laws are not exempted from this trade agreement. They are incorporated into the trade agreement. They have the same remedies against us they have always had.

The Canadian government will not admit it but Canadian farmers now know who was telling the truth. We, in the Liberal party, were telling Canadian farmers the truth.

My colleagues, including our critic for agriculture, the member for Algoma, will speak in more detail about the devastating impact this government has had on rural Canada, not only because of the trade agreement but because of its efforts and continuing policy of shutting down rural and small town Canada, the cuts to VIA Rail, the cuts to Air Canada, selling it off and privatizing, the threats to the post office and the threat to public broadcasting. This country is turning into two Canadas, the country of the rich and the big cities and the country of the neglected poor and the neglected farmer in the smaller communities of our country.

We can strip away all the details, the complicated marketing boards, complex formulas on tariffs, quotas and GATT decisions, but just look at what is happening to our Canadian farmer on the land. He is the person who is growing the wheat we need to feed ourselves and to feed a hungry world. The farmers are growing our vegetables, raising our cattle, hogs and chickens. It has never been an easy life. It is a 24-hour a day job. There are so many unpredictabilities, most of them caused by nature. But this government is making it harder and harder for farmers to stay on the land. Sons and daughters are moving away. We are in danger of losing a whole generation of farmers. I want to say that that would be a catastrophe for this country.

The burden of our motion before you this morning is this: It is time for this government to start telling Canadian farmers the truth. It is time for this government to stop pretending that this trade deal with the United States will help our farmers. It is time that this government admitted that it made the mistake of the century in agriculture. It is time that this government understood that the farm family is in deep trouble in Canada. It is time this government understood that its policies are not part of the solution, they are part of the problem, and it is time that this government understood that it is contributing to the disappearance of farm life in Canada. That is what we are saying to Canadians, through you, Mr. Speaker. It has to stop or we will not be the kind of country we were. We will not be self-sufficient in agriculture. We will be dependent on other nations, particularly the United States, for our food and, that, to me, would be an abandonment of sovereignty as severe as any aspect of the trade agreement.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Under Standing Order 81(2), there are 10 minutes of questions and comments. Are there any questions or comments?

Resuming debate with the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, when I looked at this motion this morning, I almost believed that the Minister of Agriculture, when speaking in Calgary on Friday, would be our first speaker, because in that speech, he pointed out the shortcomings of the free trade deal and the problems we have raised for ourselves with this free trade deal.

One of the very difficult things about dealing with farm crises is the tendency to deal with each of the disasters, concerns and problems in the farm community separately and to forget about the others for the period of time that you are dealing with that. That is the way that Tory members have been approaching the farm problem and agriculture across the country. They have been dealing with each part separately and have not been taking into consideration the cumulative effect of their actions and policies, upon the agricultural community.

Some of the disasters like the free trade deal are disasters which were sponsored by the Conservative Government, but many of the others that have turned out to be disasters have been put in place by changes in policies or changes in the nuances of policies which give the market the edge in every situation where the Canadian farmer is dealing with that market. At one time it was the policy of the government to make sure that there was enough security in the process of agriculture so that the farmers could have some kind security that they could survive under almost any circumstances.

Right now, for instance, there are places in western Canada that are under snow. We used to think that we had security in those kinds of situations. Back in 1984, there was a suggestion by this government that it would put in place a security system which would work when it was needed. We have been waiting for that system ever since. Instead of that, we are getting less and less security, more and more of it is being taken away.

This particular motion talks about the problems developed by one particular policy, the policy of free trade. This government signed an agreement with the United States which was supposed to increase our access to the U.S. market, and it was supposed to put in place the kind of structure which would allow us to make use of that access and consequently, we were supposed to live happily and prosperously ever after.

One of the agreements that we made when we signed this free trade agreement was the fact that none of the trade laws, none of the protectionist trade laws that were already in place or that the government would want to put in place or make use of in the future were going to changed. Consequently, we have a situation now where we have gine in to all of the bad protectionist laws which the U.S. had in place and which we could fight.

Now that government gives itself two alternatives when it wants to defeat the Canadian farmer. If the Americans cannot get what they want under GATT, then they turn to the free trade agreement. If they cannot get it under the free trade agreement, they try and bring it through under GATT. Because this government has established the kind of structure which allows us to be taken in by these kinds of situations, we are worse off now than we were before.

It is kind of interesting to look back a little bit when we are talking about this situation. What did the government say it was going to do for agriculture? What did it say was going to be the situation after the free trade had been put into place? The Prime Minister, when he spoke in Dundurn on October 7, 1988, as reported in The Montreal Gazette, said:

> We're not going to allow a single farmer to hang out to dry simply because the Americans and the Europeans have this (subsidy) war going on—Until the matter is brought to a halt, the Canadian government has a responsibility to step in and defend the interests of the Candian farmer.

He said that "free trade will help farmers by guaranteeing access to U.S. markets while maintaining marketing boards. In their response to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture during the election in 1988, the Tories said, "Nothing in the free trade agreement affects our ability to maintain our supply management systems in Canada. The agreement will not require any changes in current supply management programs with the sole exception of the slightly larger import quotas for chicken, turkey, and eggs." They could not really get around the fact that they had already taken a considerable slice out of the possibility of the maintenance of the free trade structure. They said, "these small import quota increases pose no threat to the continued viability of the supply management programs in place for these sectors. In addition, the agreement will not prevent Canada from implementing new supply management programs".

I can go on. They spoke about GATT, saying that free trade was not going to affect GATT in the least. To use one more quote, when the Prime Minister was in his leadership mode, which he stayed in only until he became leader, he made the statement that free trade was a danger to Canadian sovereignty. On Friday, when the Minister of Agriculture was speaking in Calgary, he pointed out that free trade was not working quite the way they thought it should work, that there were some things that were going a little bit wrong with it. He suggested that the U.S. was using the free trade agreement to harass the Canadian farmer. He stated that the United States is harassing Canada with some trade policies which are wrong, unfair, and hypocritical, and he sounded surprised.

A newspaper article reports:

> Speaking in Calgary Friday Mazankowski hinted that Canada will have to get tough in response but he refused to specify what actions would be taken.

He said:

> Rather than harmony, we have been subjected to harassment and it is timely and necessary to remind our American friends of the spirit within which the free trade agreement was negotiated.

The article continues:

> Mazankowski said U.S. countervail action on Canadian pork and pork products, threatened countervails on Canadian durum wheat and quotas on dairy products contradict the agreement's purpose of breaking down trade barriers.

And he sounds surprised.

There are two things about this. If he is really surprised, then I suppose we can say he was very gullible because he should have known. But somehow I do not really think that he is surprised at all, that anyone in the government is surprised. I think that when the government dealt with this free trade agreement it had the alternative of saying, "Okay, either we go along with the U.S. and we acquiesce to the U.S. position in these areas, or we do not sign the free trade deal". The government chose the free trade deal and, in doing so, it sold a good portion of the agricultural community down the river.

Right now the U.S. is probably in a much stronger position to deal with their products as they enter Canada. Before the free trade deal was announced we could make the GATT work for us. If it did not work for us, we had at least the opportunity to say we would not accept that ruling. Now they have it both ways. If the GATT ruling does not go their way, they can bring in the free trade agreement. If the free trade agreement does not work, they can go to GATT. In both ways we lose, and in both ways they win.

There is much more under this free trade agreement that needs to be looked at as part of the attack on rural Canada. As the leader of the Opposition indicated, the process of harmonization of the structures of the economies of the two countries to the seemingly lowest common denominator is affecting us much more than it is affecting the United States. They do not have to come up to our standards. They do not have to put in the protection that we have tried to put in for our farmers. All of our supply management boards, programs such as stabilization programs—both the crops stabilizations program and the western grain stabilization program—the special wheat programs, the Canadian Wheat Board and the turkey marketing board are in place for a particular purpose, that is, to allow our industries to survive and to give some kind of security to the production of the products that they produce. In the attempt to harmonize with the United States we are being forced to change these directions.

The Minister of Agriculture stood up not too long ago at a meeting and told Canadian farmers that it was about time we had a second generation of marketing boards, that the marketing boards we have now are not going to work. Again he seemed surprised that suddenly there was an attack on marketing boards because of free trade when all along the marketing boards themselves, during the free trade negotiations, were putting before this government and before the committee that studied the free trade agreement the reasons why these marketing boards were going to be under attack.

I notice the minister responsible for grains and oilseeds sitting across the way, Mr. Speaker. He very, very cautiously pointed out, ahead of time of course, that the two-price wheat system would not be affected. Of course it disappeared, but it disappeared a year before the free trade agreement so he could say that the two-price wheat system was not affected by free trade. There are some arguments to suggest that maybe he was right, but it would not have happened when it did except for the free trade agreement, and the negotiations which eliminated it would have been quite different if the free trade agreement had not been pending.

Right now the United States is continuing to use its laws to undermine our agricultural industry. For instance, not too many days ago there was an article in a paper suggesting that the European Economic Community is quite disturbed by the fact that even as it has backed off from developing new markets with subsidy programs, the U.S. has offered millions of tonnes of subsidized wheat to China, one of our traditional markets, and to the Philippines. Both of these are new markets to the United States, although they have made some exports to China before. But the point is that even now when there is a shortage of grain across the world, or at least when our stocks are low, the U.S. is out there still trying to gain a major portion of any new market that arises, to our detriment. They are doing it against a supposed understanding that we have regarding free trade. They are saying, "Well, we had this in place before the enhancement program was in place and we did not say we would get rid of it when we signed the free trade deal. It does not matter what you guys thought, we did not say we would get rid of it, therefore we are going to allow it to continue."

There does not seem to be very much relationship between what they say when they are negotiating and what they really intend to do as far as trade is concerned with the States. In fact they told us very directly that the enhancement program was controlled by the Department of Commerce and that they did not have any control of it in trade, that they could not do anything about it.

What I have been trying to point out is that there is a considerable disaster looming in rural Canada in the agricultural community. That disaster is the cumulative effect of many of the policies of this government and its direction which is based on the supremacy of the market. In every example that I can give you, if the government has been forced to make a decision it has made that decision in favour of the free and open market. It has, in every case, sold the farmer short and said, "We have no responsibility for protecting you".

One of the biggest problems that we have in agriculture today is debt. If you wanted to sum up the problems of agriculture in a couple of words you could say "income" and "debt". If you do not have enough income, you cannot survive. But if you allow the debt to grow and grow, eventually you have a situation with which you cannot deal. Regardless of how you look at it, you cannot deal with security of income because the debt becomes too great. That is the situation we are facing in Canada today.

We have $23 billion of debt across Canada in agriculture. The government has said, off and on, that it was going to do something about it. What has it done about it? On the prairies the financial institutions now hold 1.5 million acres of land. A large portion of that, about a third, is held by the Farm Credit Corporation. That is the direction we have gone in the solving of the debt. Instead of helping him the farmer out, foreclose.

Supply management was a strong security system. It gave to those farmers who were involved in it the secure income that they needed. But what is happening to supply management? In the future, the insecurity of income, along with debt, will eliminate a lot more of the marketing boards. If the Minister of Agriculture has his way and we get a second generation, as he calls them, of marketing boards, you can be sure that that second generation marketing board will be based on the supremacy of the market and not on security for the farmer, because that is the basis under which this government has operated in the past.

We cannot isolate ourselves from the international market but we can be sure that we have some security. The free trade agreement allowed the U.S. to do those things which it thought was necessary to penetrate our market or to guarantee that our products would be cheaper when they came to the United States.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the member's time has expired. Questions or comments?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed listening to the comments of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt. I would like to ask a question but before I do that I would like to make a comment about the general trend on the prairies, which I am sure he recognizes, and that is the trend of the federal government to pull support away from the transformation of western Canada. We are all very saddened by the decline in the family farm and the decline of farm income. But we also must recognize that the federal government has a real role to play in enhancing life in the west through other measures.

For example, last week I attended a conference in Brandon on rural development. Speaker after speaker talked about the lack of initiative in the Western Diversification Fund on issues of community planning. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the structure of the current federal government has the minister responsible for grains, which is a very important commodity in the western economy, also being the minister responsible for western diversification. It is a great surprise to westerners that more money is not forthcoming from western diversification to assist small communities in planning alternate futures. Certainly the attendance at the conference of over 300 people indicates that there is a desire among western Canadians to approach their problems differently. One would only hope that the federal government would see its way to changing its style.

Perhaps I could ask the hon. member who has just spoken on behalf of his party whether he, in fact, in concluding his speech, did endorse our motion, or was seeking a different way of approaching this.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the motion entirely. If I were to fault it at all it would be in the fact that it again tries to deal with only one part of the real disaster that is happening in the rural areas. The GST, the VIA Rail cutbacks, the freight rate increases, rail line abandonment, post office abandonment and high interest rates and negatively. If I had to fault the motion at all, it would be the fact that it has the tendency to deal with only one part of the problem, when the problem is the policies of this government in all of those other areas as well.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I am from the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt and part of that riding is the fertile Okanagan Valley. As I drive through that valley I see hundreds of acres of barren property where one year ago there were grape vines, cherry trees, peach trees and apricot trees. In one year we have seen the start of the destruction in my area of the fruit-growing industry. The Liberal Party has noted this in subparagraph 5 of the motion wherein it states that the government has:

> —failed to create confidence among farmers in the future of the food supply system in Canada and its ability to ensure long-term food security for consumers.

Under the free trade agreement and under the GATT rulings, which the government has failed to appeal on behalf of the farmers in my area, in the past year we have seen a glut in the cherry market in western Canada of Washington state cherries. A lot of farmers in my area who normally ship to these markets found their cherries rotting in cold storage. They were scrambling to find new markets to which their product could be diverted. I spoke to some of the American farmers and found that there is a perception that under the free trade agreement they are free and clear, that they can ship into the market up here, and they are doing so with impunity. They are doing so by offering advertising dollars to the locals to sell their cherry products.

As a result of the heavy debt, farmers no longer have security for the future. They have difficulty in knowing where they are going. Those with debt are going to go under. Those without debt feel that they will survive but it is much tougher now to do so. They have just had a clawback of their apple advances from last year because of the apple market they are in. They do not have sufficient support from this government to ensure that their products are able to keep up to date. The high interest rates make it very difficult for these farmers to purchase the equipment needed to ensure that their farms are upgraded on a constant and continual basis in order to ensure marketability of their product. Can the member for Saskatoon—Humboldt tell us what his opinion is with particular reference to soft fruit, orchard farming and the wine industry? Almost one year after the free trade agreement has come in, what is his impression of what has happened in this area?

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian way has always been to protect the farmer enough so he can survive in those particular areas. The free trade agreement did away with that protection. The government recognized, even as it was developing the free trade agreement, that it was going to affect the wine industry and the small fruit industry. It set up some basic support to help those people in the transitional period but it must be understood and recognized that it eliminated a way of life for large numbers of farmers who had been doing well under the system that was there before, and we got nothing in return for it. We get California wine at a slightly cheaper price, but we have eliminated a way of life and security for a large portion of our agricultural population.

What happened in the small fruit industry and the wine industry was very glaring. What is happening in the rest of the industry across Canada is less glaring but it is changing. There is less feeling of security now among farmers than there has ever been before. They do not think that this government is going to do anything to help them out in those circumstances.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the Hon. Member for Prince Albert if he will only get into his own seat. Not this time, but next time.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the speech of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt because he raised the whole question of rural agriculture. I am conscious of the fact that the government seems to move unilaterally. In the case of the decision to take oats out from under the control of the Canadian Wheat Board, this was a decision that was opposed at most meetings across western Canada by representatives of the Wheat Board Advisory Committee. These are individuals freely elected from their areas throughout the western prairie provinces. The price of oats had dropped and nine months previously the government had done away with the two-price wheat system which provided some $280 million. I thought the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt would want to respond as to how he sees this decision with regard to oats, especially when many producers are saying we should have some kind of marketing structure for a commodity like canola, whether under the Wheat Board or a parallel structure. A very large percentage of farmers see a need for something like that.

It seems to me that the whole free trade deal militates against orderly marketing on the prairies. But we see this decision with regard to oats as being perhaps the first chink in the dismantling of the Canadian Wheat Board because clearly the large grain companies in the United States have indicated they want to get rid of it. I would just like to hear the hon. member's comments with regard to that decision.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is an important question, therefore I will allow another minute or so for the hon. member to answer. Again, I would say to the hon. member for Prince Albert that he had better move back one more seat, otherwise he will not be recognized next time.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, it is, possibly, the first overt attack on the Canadian Wheat Board, I agree with the member on that. It is not, however, the first attack on orderly marketing or on supply management marketing, which is the basic structural part of orderly marketing in this country. The government will tell you that consultation took place. The consultation showed that a large portion of the organizations were against the idea and the grassroots of the farm community was against any weakening of orderly marketing.

Consultation, in the minds of this government, is to talk to the farmers, listen to them, and then do what it intended to do anyway.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the speeches that have been made here this morning. In so doing, you realize why a lot of people think this place is so irrelevant. If we would listen to the Leader of the Opposition and the spokesman for the NDP who just concluded speaking, we would think that farming in Canada was going to cease to exist.

Certainly there are problems in Canadian agriculture. There have been problems and there will continue to be problems. But to suggest, as the Leader of the Opposition did twice, that we are started on the road to agricultural dependency—and by that I take it he means dependency for food on another country, namely the United States—is absolute nonsense.

I have never heard such foolishness coming from anybody in the House with regard to agriculture as I heard from the Leader of the Opposition this morning.

I listened to him very carefully. I could not detect one positive thing that he said that we had done. If he did indicate such a thing, I missed it. Certainly, in all the initiatives that we have taken agriculturally, there should have been something that he would have been able to find a little bit of favour with. If he could not, it would have been very nice to have him suggest some alternatives as to what in fact we should be doing. I heard none of that.

In lieu of that I guess I have to look at the record of what the previous government did, of which the Leader of the Opposition was a member. Some of us remember back to the days of the early 1970s when we had a situation fairly similar to what we have experienced here in the last four or five years when we had surpluses of grain and not enough market. The international wheat agreement was in the process of winding down for the simple reason that nobody wanted to pay any attention to it. It was a voluntary agreement, as a lot of international agreements are. Canada lived by, if you will, the spirit, and certainly the letter, of that agreement longer than anybody else. But in response to that the previous government took us right out of the international wheat market, and got us into what was called the LIFT program.

If you remember, Mr. Speaker, in the early 1970s Canada was producing about 18 million tonnes of wheat. With the LIFT program we faced a difficult international situation, no question about it. I can remember oats being sold for three bushels for a dollar, barley selling for 35 to 50 cents a bushel. We faced a very difficult situation.

What did the previous government do? It took us right out of the international market. Our production dropped from 18 million tonnes one year to 9 million tonnes the next. What happened to the United States and the Europeans? They kept right on increasing their production. It took us seven long years to get our production back to the level it was when we started the LIFT program, an absolutely incredible situation. When we had what came to be known as the great grain robbery, which was the period of time when the Soviets came into the market, bought all the grain and drove up prices, we did not have any grain to sell.

Let me contrast that to what this government has done. We faced a very difficult situation, not entirely similar, but in many ways very analogous.

Let me deal with the Europeans and the Americans. Nobody talked about the Europeans. It is all: "blame the Americans for everything". Nobody said anything about the Japanese. But what did the previous government do? They took us right out of the international market.

What did we do? We stayed with the farmers. In a time of very difficult markets we actually increased our market share from something like 19 per cent of the world market in 1986–1987 to 23 per cent two years later, as contrasted to the time of the previous government when our production dropped by 50 per cent.

If we are going to listen to the members who just spoke in the House, they do not offer any alternatives. We have to look at their record. That is their record. Whenever there is a difficult international situation as far as agriculture is concerned, they run, avoid it, don't face up to it. Not only did we increase our market share, we did it at a cost to the Treasury. It was the largest deficit in the history of the Canadian Wheat Board, and they talk about support for the Canadian Wheat Board. The easiest thing would have been to say: "Don't sell. We are in a very difficult situation fiscally, don't sell". We did not do that. We worked with the board and the finance department on a day by day basis. We ran over a $200 million deficit in the pool accounts three years ago. To me that does not look like anything but total support for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Let me talk about what happened to farmers and why farmers are still facing some very difficult situations in this country. You want to talk about interest rates. Farmers have to borrow money. By the way, it is not all gloom and doom. I do not know whether I am going to have enough time to correct all of the misinformation that was put out here so far this morning. I am not in any way signalling that there are no problems. Certainly there are. But some of those problems are coming around getting to be a little less severe than they were one and two years ago.

With regard to interest rates, I have neighbours where I farm who used to listen to the Bank of Canada rate in 1981, 1982 and 1983, as much as they listened to the weather forecast. When you had interest rates that got to a peak in August of 1981 of 22.75 per cent and five-year mortgages were going at 21.75 per cent, you can understand why farmers were concerned.

We talk about the variables that the farmers have to put up with, such as weather, markets, grasshoppers and wind. When you have a farmer who listens as much and pays as much attention to what happens every Thursday over at the Bank of Canada as he does to the weather reports, that tells you something has been going on with the government. A lot of us, including myself and a lot of my neighbours, were crippled by those kind of interest rates. To have the Leader of the Opposition get up and suggest that the policies of this government are going to make Canada less than self-sufficient and that we will have to go and buy food from somebody else and offer no suggestions based on his record it is Alice in Wonderland. It is incredible.

Let me tell you what has been happening, Mr. Speaker. We have about a $20 billion industry in agriculture, of which somewhere close to half is exported, which means $8 billion and on occasion over $9 billion worth of exports. From 1986 to 1988, we have doubled the trade surplus in agriculture. We have gone from $1.8 billion as an agricultural trade surplus to $3.6 billion. That does not sound to me like a country that is going to become dependent on somebody else for food.

We export 80 per cent of the wheat that we grow, 70 per cent of the canola, 50 per cent of the barley, and somewhere close to 40 per cent of our hogs. We do not produce pineapples or oranges. We do not produce carrots and lettuce when the ground is frozen and it is 20 below. We know that. We have to import those kind of things. But, on balance, we have been running a $3 billion and $4 billion trade surplus in agricultural products.

For anybody to get up and try to scare consumers in this country and suggest that this country is ever going to be dependent on food from another country is absolute and total rubbish.

Everybody would consider Japan a sovereign country. I have a quote here made by the Leader of the Opposition during the election campaign that I will not use. He says: "You cannot call yourself a sovereign country unless you are self-sufficient in food". I think Japan would be considered a sovereign country. It runs $50 billion to a $60 billion trade surplus on an annual basis. It has a very strong currency. Everybody wants to see it appreciate so we can have better access to its markets.

Japan is at best 60 per cent self-sufficient in food, because it does other things better but Japan has got some very restrict tariffs and some very restrictive measures at its borders that keep us out of that market. Why? Because it wants to protect its farmers, but it wants access to other country's markets for its electronic things. We understand that.

That leads me to the second point I want to make. This government has taken the lead in trying to get some regular and secure access to international markets for agricultural products. The previous government did nothing. It is the first time in 40 years that we have had agriculture on the GATT agenda. Why was it there? Because a lot of us pushed to have it there. At the agenda setting meeting in Punta del Este in the fall of 1986 the Secretary of State for External Affairs played an important role in having agriculture put on the agenda. The Prime Minister has played a role. We have all played a role in terms of seeing that we have better and fairer trade rules.

I am not sure that the previous government were there at all. The thing that sticks in western Canadian minds is a Prime Minister who came out there from the previous government and literally gave us the finger and told us to sell our own wheat. Contrast that to what has happened here. Not only did we continue to sell our wheat, we increased our market share at a time when there were some very difficult international markets. Nobody mentioned Europe.

There are some interesting figures here from Europe that show what has happened as far as European exports are concerned. This is something that we need to bear in mind. We have problems with the Americans, and we readily admit it. We are doing some things to resolve them. Here is what has happened in Europe, largely with subsidies. Europe used to be one of our major customers for wheat. In 1973–74, about 15 years ago, Europe was a net importer as far as grain is concerned of about 13 million tonnes. It is now a next exporter to the tune of 25 million tonnes. That is a turnaround of about 38 million tonnes.

If we are going to talk about international trade, and if we are going to be fair about it, we also have to point out the major problems that we have with Europe. There are some major problems with Europe.

Europeans have a crushing subsidy on some of their oilseed products, their canola. I checked it this morning. It is about 300 ECUs, European currency units. It works out to somewhere close to $400 Canadian. That is the crush subsidy. When a European farmer produces canola, sells it to the crusher, the crusher gets a subsidy to crush European produced products. We do not get it if we send it to them. We are not eligible for that. The subsidy is over $300 a tonne, probably closer to $400 if you do the arithmetic on what 300 European currency units means in Canadian dollars.

Do you know what our price is today to farmers? About $250 to $260 a tonne. That says a little bit about the European community common agricultural policy. In my view we have to start looking at some of those things and see what in fact is legal under the GATT. To get up here and simply talk about all of the things that we have been doing wrong belies the actual situation in Canadian agriculture.

Someone mentioned oats. I do not know who it was in the opposition. Let me tell you what has been happening as far as oats is concerned in the last little while. A week ago today in fact we had an announcement in Portage La Prairie, and not from a multinational. Everybody is talking about the multinationals. A Canadian company—in fact a Manitoba company—is going to start an oat processing facility in Portage La Prairie. It is going to spend $17 million. Just think about this. This is not a multinational, one of the big so-called sisters. I do not know what that has to do with anything anyway, but this is a Manitoba company. It is going to spend $17 million to build an oat processing facility in the town of Portage La Prairie. Why? It gave three reasons.

Let me give you a couple of them at least. It said because of the increased demand for oat and oat products. Because of the way we look at our bodies these days we want more from food than just sustenance. We want a healthy diet. Oats is becoming more and more looked at in terms of something that we need to keep ourselves healthy. That is one reason.

Bill Kent is the president of this outfit. It calls itself CanOat Milling. I think I can find the quote here.

Mr. Kent made the point that if free trade was not there, in all likelihood he would not be spending $17 million to build an oat processing facility. This is an example where free trade has meant jobs. Additionally Manitoba regularly produces between 400,000 and 500,000 tonnes of oats, just to put this into perspective. This one processing facility in Portage La Prairie anticipates processing about 100,000 tonnes, somewhere between 20 per cent and 25 per cent of Manitoba's total oat production now. That is a pretty significant plant.

It estimates that 50 per cent to 70 per cent of that production is going to go to the U.S. market. Without free trade he said he would not be doing it because he has a larger market when Canada and the United States are put together.

We had an announcement a week ago from an outfit called West Glen Milling in conjunction with ConAgra, a very large American outfit in the United States, indicating that they were going to build an oat and barley processing facility in your country, Mr. Speaker, west of Edmonton in a town called Barrhead. Why? Because of the free trade agreement and because it will have access to a larger market.

Do not think for one minute that what is happening in the oat market has anything to do with some of these so-called multinationals. There are a lot of individual Canadians involved, a lot of the small processors. The people who want to set up a cleaning plant in the middle of winter and provide a job for themselves and some of their neighbours now have direct access to some of those markets in the United States, markets that they did not have access to before because of the free trade agreement. That is not in any way an attack on the Canadian Wheat Board. It seems to me that that is something that is done in favour of Canadian farmers.

So when you hear some of these things that are being said and you talk about Canadian agriculture and what is happening, let me give you some interesting points in terms of investment in the food and beverage processing industry. The most recent estimates indicate that capital expenditures on food and beverage processing will be $1.6 billion in 1989, up 13 per cent from last year's actual figures and unchanged from the earlier 1989 forecast of those expenditures. That says a little bit about the faith that people outside of this place have in Canadian agriculture, and the fact that we produce some of the highest quality products in the world and are willing to invest money to further process them. That is value added, that is jobs for Canadians. Instead of shipping the raw product out, we process it here. It provides jobs and a little more stability for some of the smaller communities like Portage La Prairie.

I would like to say a few things about the over-all health of the Canadian agricultural industry. Based on information from farm lenders, it is estimated that some 17,000 farmers—that is a lot of farmers, no question—or 9.5 per cent of all farm borrowers were in arrears in the first quarter of 1989. That is not a particularly happy situation, but compared to a year ago it is better. This represents a decline of 2.3 per cent from the 11.8 per cent in 1988. We are not saying that is ideal, but things are starting to get a little bit better. Over-all arrears fell by 31 per cent from the same period in 1988. Again, we are not saying that is ideal and that there isn't room for improvement, but things are starting to get better.

Federal agri-food expenditures from 1987 to 1988 were $6.1 billion compared to $3.3 billion for the combined federal and provincial agri-food expenditures in 1981-82. Again, it tells you the part that this government has played in working with the agricultural industry in a very difficult time. We did not back away from them like the previous government did in the early 1970s with the LIFT program. We stayed right there and increased our exports at some considerable cost to the Treasury.

The Minister of Finance has done a much better job of managing the economy. We do not have interest rates at the 22 per cent and 25 per cent. Farmers are not paying nearly as much attention to the bank rate. There is no question that there is room for it to come down. We are not saying that we are happy with the present rates, but they are certainly nowhere where they were—up to the 22 per cent, 23 per cent and 24 per cent—in the early 1980s. To suggest again that this government is not doing anything is wrong.

Let me make one other point. People are concerned about the age of farmers. There is concern that there are not enough young farmers entering the farming business. That in fact may be true. It is like asking how many women are elected to the House of Commons. In my view, not enough. We have more every year but there are still not enough. We have more young farmers entering the farming industry every year, but there needs to be more. Think about this. A longer term perspective shows that the age distribution of farm operators in 1986 was almost identical to that of 1931. I am not saying it was ideal in 1931, but things are not quite as bad as you would think by listening to the opposition parties.

I do not know how much time I have left, but perhaps I could conclude on a positive note. I firmly believe that we are going to make some progress in the GATT round. You understand that any agricultural policy that we have in this country has to be based on trade, especially when about 50 cents out of every $1 that a Canadian farmer earns comes from trade. It has to be founded in some sound trade policy. I believe that we are going to make some progress in the GATT round on agriculture. It has taken us 40 years to get where we are, basically with no rules in agriculture. We have the United States with waivers on some of its programs.

Nobody has ever tested the common agricultural policy in the European community to see if it is in accordance with GATT rules. I think we are going to make some progress there.

Nobody said the free trade agreement is perfect. No one has heard me say it is perfect. On the other hand, it gives us a set of rules that are lot more predictable. There are a lot of people out there who think that that predictability is better than what we had before, as indicated by the increase in investment in food processing and, as I mentioned, the announcement made just in the last week by two oat processing facilities in western Canada. Quaker Oats, by the way, is in the process of spending $13 billion in Peterborough on its oat processing facilities there.

But, above all, Canadian agriculture can compete. I have farmed all my life. I would be very happy to compete directly against an American, European, Argentinian, or Japanese farmer, without having in between us national treasuries.

Nobody is talking about having a total abandonment of farmers as far as the government is concerned. The hon. member who just spoke for the NDP talked about supremacy of the market. Nobody is talking about backing away totally from government involvement.

In fact I can make the argument that in today's world there is probably a bigger role for government in setting international trade rules than there ever has been because of the amount of trade that goes on. With a better set of trade rules and with the kind of quality of product that we produce in this country, and the fact that we are competitive on a day by day basis, have more arable land per farmer than anywhere else in the world, good research institutes and a good transportation system, we are going to be competitive.

By working together we are going to continue to see that the consumer of this country is very well served by the Canadian farmer. Together, the farmers, and the provincial and federal governments working together will see that Canadian agriculture continues to serve this country the way it has in the past into the future years.

Mr. Parent: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. minister. There were two points that he brought out in his speech that were of particular interest to me. The first one has to do with the fact that he lauded the conditions in Japan where they are, I guess if not to use his words but his thoughts, not completely self-sufficient in food. We all know they are not completely self-sufficient in food in Japan. They have to import a great amount of their food.

The cost of food in Japan, according to the information I have—and I would like the minister to address himself to this—is at least 40 per cent higher than the cost of food in Canada. If that is what he wants for Canada I would like to know his opinion on it.

The second thing is that the minister said that he was and is a farmer. That is very laudable in itself. He said he is not afraid to compete with the United States, nor is any other farmer in Canada, providing we have what his party calls a level playing field.

I address a question to him about the grape farmers in the Niagara Peninsula who this year have had to rip up thousands—I repeat, thousands—of hectares of vineyards, all because of this free trade deal that this minister is lauding. I would like to know what answer he has for the farmers in the Niagara Peninsula who have had to rip up these vineyards.

The minister said in his speech that the free trade deal was not perfect. I would beg to differ with him. I think it is perfect. I think it is perfectly asinine.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, I was not lauding or being critical of the situation in Japan. First of all, I was pointing out what the actual situation was in Japan. There really is no comparison between Canada's capacity to feed itself based on a very large land mass and a population of 25 million or 26 million people and a country like Japan with a very limited amount of land available and 120 million or 130 million people. There is no comparison.

The point I was making is that if we as Canadian farmers are to have better access to that market, we are going to be able to sell a lot more product to them. We regularly sell them a little over 1.5 million tonnes of wheat per year. It is very restricted how much we can sell to them because they protect their domestic market. If we are going to have trade that is even both ways, and the Japanese want to have access to other markets but want to protect certain markets at home, then some of those things in my view are going to have to change. I think the Japanese themselves have realized that and are prepared to address that to a certain extent in the present GATT round.

With regard to the situation in the Niagara Peninsula, he is not totally accurate. Some of the problems the vineyards have are also to do with the GATT. He should also know that in the free trade agreement there are some very significant provisions on the horticultural industry concerning some fresh fruits and vegetables. There is a very quick snapback, as it is called, so that if prices over a five-day period vary a great amount from previous prices, there is a provision that we can snap back to a duty to protect that. That is something that the Americans and we have agreed to.

We should remember that are the problems that the Niagara Peninsula is having with grapes is not 100 per cent attributable to the free trade agreement. The big part is with GATT. We do have some significant exceptions to the over-all reduction of tariffs over a 10-year period in the soft fruit and vegetable industry to protect the areas that he talked about.

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, I noted your previous admonishment about being in the wrong seat. I guess I find it hard to separate myself that far from the previous member for Prince Albert who is a very good friend of mine.

I would like to take up the challenge that the minister left with us. I think he is listening to different voices from what I am hearing and other opposition members are hearing from the farm community. I am wondering if he has even heard the voices from his own convention.

Nevertheless, he did leave the challenge for the Opposition to come up with some alternatives. I will mention two that the government rejected. One was to use a crop insurance based drought program, which I think he might even now concede might well have solved a lot of the problems which many of us are still experiencing in dealing with that program.

Second, just last week or the week before the hon. member for Mackenzie rose with a Private Member's Bill which in principle asked the government and all members here to endorse the concept of including farm-fed grain under stabilization which although the government members said was a good idea they opposed. There were two alternatives.

I would like to ask specifically about a third one. The minister did speak about the situation concerning oats. He must remember that most major farm organizations and 70 per cent of farmers opposed taking oats out of the Wheat Board and were certainly happy to see value added activity. I think that could have happened under the Wheat Board.

Nevertheless, I would like to ask the minister this question. He indicated that 70 per cent of canola is exported. Canola is a major market. The Canadian Wheat Board is our major guarantee for access to the international market. It has worked well for years. Is the minister prepared to put the question in a plebiscite to farmers, yes or no, as to whether farmers in the Wheat Board area want canola under the Wheat Board. If he is not for some reason, would he be prepared to accept the results of such a plebiscite if organized by a major farm organization or farm organizations in western Canada?

Mr. Mayer: The hon. member talks about the crop insurance based drought program. That is exactly what we did. If you look at the drought program, what farmers wanted us to do was to have a targeted program. We topped up crop insurance both on the yield and on the price side.

If he is suggesting, which I do not think he is, that we should have only provided assistance to producers that had crop insurance, then that would have been a terrible injustice. It would have meant that producers who did not have crop insurance would not have received any drought payment. We should know that the drought program was and is based on crop insurance data.

Second, he talks about farm-fed grain. He should go back and look at the previous House when the Standing Committee on Agriculture was chaired by the hon. member for Brandon—Souris and the standing committee undertook a review of western grain stabilization. I was the first person the committee called. I asked the committee to look at a way of including farm-fed grain in western grain stabilization.

The committee came back and said on a practical matter that it did not know how it could do it. If there is a way of doing it that makes sense which is administratively feasible, we are prepared to look at it. The member should go back and look at the report of the committee to see what was said. Some of his own members sat on that committee. They came back with a recommendation which said that while it is a good idea, they did not know how they could do it.

With regard to canola, this is a very involved situation. Before we jump holus-bolus into a marketing board—and I said that I do not have any particular philosophical hang-ups one way or another, and there are some arguments that I can make in favour of a marketing board for canola and there are some concerns about it—the member had better ask the major customers. About 90 per cent of the raw seed that we export goes to the Japanese. Ask your major customers what they think.

We know what happened in 1973 when the U.S. embargoed the sale of soybeans to the Japanese. Brazil now produces about 18 million to 20 million tonnes of soybeans, whereas 15 years ago it produced hardly any.

It is find to stand up here and say, on a philosophical basis: "Give everything to a marketing board". The member better understand—and we are not saying that we have to be totally beholden to our customer—that it is a very involved issue. There are more things to it than just simply as I said jumping up in your seat and saying, on a philosophical basis: "Give everything to a board". There are some good points and there are some other things that have to be addressed before we want to jump into that kind of a situation.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before my learned colleague begins his speech, there have been discussions among the parties and I think you would find, Mr. Speaker, disposition for a House order that when Your Honour calls a member of a party for debate during the 20 minutes that is normally allotted for that speaker, it would be possible for the party at its option to divide the 20 minutes into two periods of 10 minutes. Each ten-minute period would be followed by a five-minute question and comment period.

I can say for the record that for our party for the remainder of the day it is our intention to follow that practice with each of our speakers. So that when Your Honour chooses to recognize a Liberal speaker there would be then two speakers in succession, each with ten minutes and five minutes for questions and comments.

I believe the same will apply for the government party, except on the occasion when a minister may wish to address the House. I understand that the New Democratic Party wishes to follow the usual 20-minute regimen. I wonder if there would be an understanding that we proceed for the rest of the day on that basis.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, the government would agree to that proposal.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to support the notion of each political party making a decision at the time of their speaker. At the moment our preference would be to continue as the practice would have it, but with the option of changing it if we wished.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Algoma has the floor.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, there are some differences between the clocks, but they all look to be at about 12.59 p.m. I wonder if we might agree to call it one o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there agreement?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in recent days, there have been deep debates in the country on the Meech Lake Accord. Unfortunately, some regrettable statements have been made, describing Manitoba's position as anti-Quebec, even racist. Ms. Carstairs was right to ask for an apology for Le Devoir's cartoon: it does not reflect reality. The Manitoba report presents the honest position of Manitobans on this agreement.

In addition, the Reform Party of Canada made unacceptable comments when it said that Quebec could leave Canada. We must admit that Quebec has been waiting for a constitutional agreement for years.

We must put an end to this climate of animosity. We must not forget the efforts of Canadians in all regions to preserve the rights of francophones and anglophones.

This is clearly the time to begin an honest and serious debate. The Prime Minister must finally show leadership and find a solution to this problem in a constructive spirit.

NORTHERN TAX BENEFITS

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the report of the task force on financial compensation for isolated northern communities recommends that only those north of 51*sco*ro.05' parallel, North latitude, be eligible for financial compensation.

Matagami, Joutel, Lebel-sur-Quévillon, Desmaraisville, Waswanipi, Miquelon and other places in Quebec will not be able to benefit from this fiscal policy, according to the task force.

The concerns of us northerners are not the same as those in the South and tax incentives are necessary to attract people to remote regions. The inhabitants of the towns just mentioned should be compensated for the various hardships they face.

Mr. Speaker, the cost of living is high in the North because more fuel is used and the price of food and clothing is higher. I am strongly opposed to the report tabled last week by this task force.

SCIENCE

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the minister of finance and technology expressed surprise that fewer and fewer of our young people seem to be enthusiastic for science and engineering.

[English]

The minister seeks an explanation. Consider the quality of the teaching of science and mathematics in the high schools and universities. Consider the absence of any real federal or provincial initiatives in setting national educational priorities. Consider the disgraceful condition of university research laboratories, inadequate operational funds and faculty salaries. Consider the cutbacks in EPF and the failure of government to accept the Lortie report's recommendation for doubling of university research dollars. Consider the predominance of foreign ownership of Canadian industry. Consider the free trade agreement with its acquisition rules, procurement rules and subsidy limits, and its role in keeping Canada a resource based economy. Consider the stories of Connaught, Lumitron and Northern Telecom. Then ask not why our youth do not value science and engineering. Ask what really is the message they get from government.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, in the riding of Elk Island a hard working music producer in the Sherwood Park area has informed me that the current manufacturer's sales tax is crippling the western Canadian music industry.

This Albertan is well known for his contributions to Canadian music as a performer and as a producer. He said that under the current federal sales tax, the MST, Alberta record stores are required to pay the federal sales tax before their product is sold. He recommends a federal sales tax at the point of consumption rather than at the point of production. He says that the GST will help.

We must work together to diversify the economy of western Canada. Our government must take a leadership role in helping the music industry in western Canada. The Government of Canada must replace the existing federal sales tax, the MST, in order to build a stronger economy in western Canada.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I want to appeal for moderation and goodwill in the continuing Meech Lake Accord debate. The implications of this issue for Quebec and all of Canada are too serious to be left to demagoguery, threats and accusations.

The discussion is becoming divisive and destructive and there is extremism on both sides. I accept the distinctiveness of Quebec and agreed to its original five conditions, but the Meech accord goes beyond those conditions and impacts on many other matters.

Those who propose amendments are not anti–Quebec, nor is Quebec anti–Canadian because it wishes to protect its distinct language and culture in an English North America.

I plead with the government to bring both sides together so that Quebec can live comfortably within Confederation and so that Canada will continue to thrive nationally as a strong political unit.

CANADIAN COAST GUARD

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, as a Member of Parliament for a Nova Scotia riding bordering on the Bay of Fundy and the Northumberland Strait, I would like to say that my experience in dealing with the Coast Guard has been nothing but positive in every respect.

Recently, the residents of an area of my riding which suffers high unemployment asked me to approach the Coast Guard in the interest of utilizing two Coast Guard lighthouses to enhance their tourist potential. The local director of the Coast Guard, Mr. Larry Wilson, and his associate, Wilford Tucker, responded immediately by sending a representative to meet with the residents to find out what they wanted and how the Coast Guard could be of assistance.

The happy conclusion was that the Spencer's Island lighthouse was turned over to the community, and the grounds and buildings of the Cape D'Or lighthouse were made available to the community of Advocate.

On behalf of the people of Spencer's Island, the people of Advocate, and myself, I would like to thank Larry Wilson and his staff at the Coast Guard not only for what they did but also how they did it.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, deep concern and mistrust over the Constitution and the Meech Lake Accord are tearing our country apart and the time has come for strong leadership by the Prime Minister.

There is disquiet and discontent out there and the Prime Minister must listen. I fear people are settling into entrenched camps which is destructive for the country and can only be stopped by principled leadership that will listen, understand, and advance solutions that overcome insecurities.

Ultimately, the federal government must safeguard and promote the national interest for all Canadians. Let's end the confrontation. The Prime Minister must restore calm and begin building a consensus. We must make our nation more united by Constitutional change, not divided by it.

It is not a question of Quebec versus Canada, nor one of a deadline, but about responding with openness and honesty to legitimate and sincere differences of opinion from all parts of our country.

The Prime Minister must emerge from the First Minister's meeting with an agenda for dialogue in either official language that brings parties together towards a solution allowing all Canadians to live in mutual harmony and with respect for each other.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, this year's Auditor General's report overstepped the bounds of speculative criticism by unfairly reporting on the Sugar Beet Tripartite Stabilization Program. The Auditor General bases his criticisms on the requirement of the Agricultural Stabilization Act to run programs that are financially self-sufficient.

How, in 1989, can the Auditor General be so critical of a program that only started in 1987? He concludes that the sugar beet program is not self-sustaining.

The Sugar Beet Tripartite Program is a 10-year program. Prices have fallen below predicted levels and costs of production have risen very quickly. Over the next eight years, it is not unreasonable to predict that prices will rise and the program, in fact, will sustain itself.

If the Auditor General really wants to assess the impact of federal spending, I suggest he review the impact of our foreign aid spending that increased the production of sugar cane in Caribbean countries and helped drive down the international price of sugar. The Auditor General would be much better off if he understood the magnitude of problems facing agriculture before commenting on them.

ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, Canada's decision to join the Organization of American States, where it has had the status of permanent observer since 1972, will enable the Canadian Government to play a more active role on the international scene.

The Organization of American States is the oldest regional organization in the world, and its basic objectives are to promote and reinforce peace, security, solidarity and economic and social development, in addition to protecting the independence and territorial integrity of its member States, which currently number 32.

Through our membership in the OAS, we have become full-fledged citizens of the Americas. Canada, because of its strength, its history and its economic presence, will have a very important role to play in this organization.

Our membership will encourage stronger ties between OAS agencies and interested organizations in the public and private sector in this country.

Even if some heads of State are less amenable than others, the OAS promotes discussion, understanding and co-operation in areas that concern all governments.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, on January 28, 1988, the Supreme Court ruled that Section 251 of the Criminal Code contravened the rights of women under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in Canada. Following this decision, the government promised that it would enact a new law, and it attempted to produce a consensus. It failed on both counts.

The government then said it would hold off until the Supreme Court ruled on Borowski. On March 9, 1989, the Supreme Court ruled unanimously that there is no longer an issue because the law was unconstitutional.

The Supreme Court sent a strong signal to this House. The function of the Court is to interpret and the function of this House is to make law. The onus is on this government to introduce legislation which will fill the current void or tell Canadians they have no intention to introduce legislation at all. The Daigle and Dodd cases are unacceptable.

Many Canadians want to know when the government will act in this regard.

CANADA CAREER WEEK

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, October 29 to November 4, 1989, has been designated Canada Career Week. This week is an opportunity for young people to become more aware of the changing aspects of employment and the importance of career planning. Young people must be encouraged to take advantage of the facilities and help provided by the local Canada Employment Centres as well as organizations such as the Niagara Peninsula Industry Education Council and career counselling centres in my area. These organizations increase awareness of labour market trends and stress the importance of career planning.

This year's theme, "Careers in Focus", highlights the positive opportunities that come with technological change. It provides an excellent forum for showing young people that they can take advantage of the opportunities presented by change and carefully plan their education in order to manage that change and achieve maximum benefits in their lives.

TERMINAL 3—PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, when it comes to building airports, it is not what you know but who you know in the Conservative government that counts. A former Conservative MP received $390,000 from the developers who were awarded the $380 million contract for Terminal 3 at Pearson Airport.

You might ask, Mr. Speaker, what does Mr. Lundrigan know about airports. Well, apparently very little, but he did say that he was an expert on political systems and finances. Mr. Lundrigan said that his clients were "aggressive" and that "they do make waves in Toronto", so that was why they needed his expertise.

This sort of revelation breeds cynicism amongst Canadians about how their government works. Why would the developer hire a consultant who knows absolutely nothing about the contract it has bid on? What expertise from this consultant, other than selling access to government officials, is worth $390,000?

At a time when Canadians are being told of the virtues of restraint and austerity by the federal government, it is absolutely essential that an example be set in the awarding of government contracts. Does the government not realize that if these sorts of fees are being charged for so-called consultancy by its friends then this will mean higher costs for the contracts?

The Lobbyists Registration Act is of no help because it does not tell us the sorts of fees that are being paid for awarding government contracts. We know that Mr. Lundrigan received $390,000, but we do not know how much the major player in the deal, Government Consultants International, were paid. Canadians were promised transparency in government, but it seems that only the promise is paper-thin.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, this morning I was approached by a young woman on the Sparks Street Mall who passed me a flyer and encouraged me to come to the rally against the GST. "What is the GST?", I asked. "The general sales tax", she replied. "Can you explain it to me?", I asked. "No, I do not know much about it", she said. "Well", I said, "before you campaign actively against it, don't you think you ought to inform yourself about it starting with the name, for it is the goods and services tax, not the general sales tax?"

It is very difficult for Canadians to be well-informed about the GST, given the negativism and efforts at obfuscation by so many members opposite.

Canadians are free to like or dislike tax reform, the GST, or any other measure of government they please. But good government most often occurs within the environment of an informed electorate and constructive opposition.

I urge the government to renew its efforts through public advertising, if necessary, to see that Canadians are truly informed as to what the GST is and what it is not so that they can make an informed decision about it.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I, and I am sure thousands of other Canadians, are appalled by the hypocrisy of the Prime Minister's speech in Costa Rica. The Prime Minister told Latin American leaders how concerned he was about Third World debt. He told them how concerned he was about poverty in Latin America, how concerned he was for the need for foreign aid.

Why didn't the Prime Minister tell Latin American leaders according to the official estimates of the Canadian International Development Agency, the current report given to Parliament, that out of his great concern for poverty in Latin America he has cut developmental assistance to Latin American countries by over $20 million this year?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition may have been disappointed at the Prime Minister's speech in Costa Rica. I can tell him that all of the heads of governments of Latin America, the Caribbean, and of North America very much welcomed, not simply the joining by Canada of the Organization of American States, but the clear indication that now Latin America, our neighbour in this hemisphere, is going to be a major priority of this government as we play our full role not only in the rest of the world but also in this hemisphere.

With regard to aid, the Leader of the Opposition knows better than anyone else that the reason there have been reductions in the levels of ODA expenditure is because this government was faced with a massive deficit created by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and by his colleagues when they were in government. We cannot ignore that deficit, nor can we pretend like ODA. What we have done is undertaken a program that keeps our commitment to get the deficit down and allows Canada to play a leading role in contributing to international development in Latin America and all around the world.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, why in those circumstances didn't the Prime Minister come clean with his Latin American colleagues that he was cutting aid to their region, instead of extolling himself and his government in a flowery speech to the Costa Rican audience?

Part of a precondition to any membership in that organization should have been a meaningful presence diplomatically and a meaningful presence in terms of aid in the region and, indeed, a full parliamentary and public discussion preceding that decision.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in the same speech to Latin American leaders, the Prime Minister said that external debt problems in this region were a cause for great concern, and that he intended to help them. Again, why didn't the Prime Minister tell the Latin American leaders that last April, the Canadian Government cut Canadian aid to the Inter-American Development Bank by more than 40 per cent, and assistance given to the Caribbean Development Bank by more than 80 per cent? Isn't this rank hypocrisy?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know the Leader of the Opposition will or would be both surprised and pleased to hear that all government leaders present last Friday and Saturday congratulated not only Canada and the Canadian Government for having taken this important initiative to enhance Canada's relations with Latin America. I think it is also important to point out that Canada's decision was approved by a great Canadian, the Hon. Paul Martin, Senior, who said today in a report that Canada's decision to play a more active role in the OAS was long overdue.

As far as the debt is concerned, the Leader of the Opposition knows pefectly well that Canada played an important part in dealing with Mexico's debt under the Brady Plan, that the Minister of Finance led an important initiative to help Guyana, and that all members of the Commonwealth attending the conference in Kuala Lumpur thanked us for the generosity of all Canadians.

• (1420)

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it is true that since the day he made his first speech in the House in 1935, Paul Martin had considered this possibility, but even Mr. Martin would be sorry to hear this morning that the Government's actions are a direct contradiction of its statements.

As for Parliament, it certainly did not condone this error, Mr. Speaker. Parliament didn't even consider the OAS membership.

[English]

In the same speech the Prime Minister told Latin Americans how concerned he was that 40 million Latin Americans lived in abysmal poverty. He told them that he was concerned that half the adults in Latin America do not have a full-time job and how concerned he was about the increasing infant mortality rate.

If the Prime Minister is so concerned about these issues and about world poverty, why did he cut humanitarian food aid by $46 million this year? Why has he cut the amount of food that Canada gives to the poorest of the poor in this world?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend is quoting from someone else's speech. I never gave the speech or the extracts that my hon. friend has just quoted.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): That's right. You never say those things.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend, unless I misunderstood him, has suggested that I issued that particular statement which I did not. It does not mean that I disagree with some of the things that my right hon. friend says, but I did not make those remarks.

He also says that this matter was never considered by the House. My information is that Canada's membership in the OAS was considered very actively and thoroughly by a committee of this House in 1982.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Seven years ago.

Mr. Mulroney: It is true, Mr. Speaker, that seven years is a long time in politics. The Liberals were in a majority. They made a recommendation, as I understand it, that Canada should join the OAS. Paul Martin, Sr., recommended it 35 years ago, and this government has done it.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Today at noon thousands of Canadians came to Parliament Hill and called on the government to drop the goods and services tax.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, obviously my colleagues can hear whatever they like to hear. Today at noon thousands of Canadians came to Parliament Hill and called on the Government to drop the goods and services tax. What more do Canadians have to do to make this government listen and drop this unfair and unholy tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not like to contradict my hon. friend's numbers, but I was advised by people that the media had done a count, which was somewhere around 300, or possibly 350.

The right hon. Leader of the Opposition made some comments. I think we should go back to figure out how he counted back in the time when he was the Minister of Finance. Government spending was increasing at a rate of 29 per cent per annum in his last year as Minister of Finance. When government spending is increasing at that rate, that is the sort of thing that leads to high levels of taxes.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Did you bring down a surplus?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member talks again about his surplus, the surplus that he had in his first year as Minister of Finance.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Two in a row.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I think the right hon. gentleman is talking about the surpluses that he inherited and then we went straight down hill from there as a country as he led us into deficit after deficit.

Mr. Harb: Mr. Speaker, if anything, it is the smugness of this government that is ignoring millions of Canadians across the country from coast to coast. Eighty per cent of Canadians are opposed to this goods and services tax.

My question is for the Minister.

[Translation]

Across the country, millions of Canadians have said no to this tax. When will the Government listen to Canadians and withdraw the GST? When?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very much aware that Canadians do not like paying taxes. I do not think anybody likes taxes, but we all understand that taxes are necessary if we want to have the programs and services that Canadians demand.

I am sure that when my hon. friend spoke to the group of people that were on Parliament Hill today he took a good deal of time to explain to Canadians the nature of this tax, not just use rhetoric. I am sure that is exactly what he did. It is important for Canadians to understand the details of the tax, how it is going to benefit low-income people, how it is going to benefit our exporting industries and how it is going to benefit small business by removing the tax on their inventories. The members opposite say, "Come on, Mike". These are the facts.

Ms. Clancy: We say how?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My friend from Halifax says "how". I would suggest she read some of the documentation and that is where she will find the answers to all of these benefits.

ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has just returned from Central America and in a few weeks he leaves for the Soviet Union. I would like to first ask him about his trip to Central America.

As he will know, previous Canadian Prime Ministers and heads of government in Latin America have often expressed the concern about Canadian membership in OAS in relationship to the power American foreign policy seems to play within that organization.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister how he can really believe we will be in a position to have independent sources of information that are crucial to an independent Canadian policy when our government has announced cut-backs in our foreign service in Ecuador, Brazil and Guatemala. Is this not a contradiction to be joining OAS precisely at the time we are cutting back on our diplomatic service?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is never obviously a perfect time to do anything. You make value judgments about problems and opportunities and that is what a government is supposed to do.

I tell my hon. friend that we were well satisfied after the visit to Central America that this is a decision very much applauded by all governments in Latin America. They view the Canadian presence there in an extremely positive way.

I refer my hon. friend to some observations made by a distinguished Canadian, the Hon. Paul Martin, Sr. who as minister of external affairs promoted this idea for many years. It is a value judgment that the Government of Canada made. Past governments have refused to join the OAS. This government believes the time was right, that the opportunities are there, and we believed it was appropriate for this government to provide the leadership for this to come about.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's answer had nothing to do with the question which was how are we going to have an independent policy if we do not have people on the ground to give us independent information?

With reference to the need to have an independent foreign policy in this country, on the weekend the former Canadian ambassador for disarmament had this to say about American pressure in Canadian foreign policy. He said that the Secretary of State for External Affairs himself had been pressed by the Americans to stop Mr. Roche from his pursuing disarmament matters at the UN in the manner that he was. Mr. Roche specifically said that the Secretary of State for External Affairs said his work was "too vigorous" in pressing for disarmament.

• (1430)

I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, is Mr. Roche accurate in this? Did the United States put direct pressure on the Secretary of State for External Affairs and, if so, what was the Canadian response?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to answer the direct question correctly, the United States did not put direct pressure on me with respect to Canadian policy.

Now if the Leader of the New Democratic Party is suggesting that in the world of international affairs other countries do not express their views to the foreign minister of Canada then he is living in some kind of a dream world. I have received suggestions about Canadian policy from his friend Daniel Ortega of Nicaragua.

Mr. Broadbent: Our friend is the President of Costa Rica. Talk to your boss.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I have received suggestions about Canadian foreign policy from officials of the United States. I have received them from a number of other people. Our rule is whatever other foreign governments might suggest about Canadian policy, we set Canadian policy here in Canada for Canadian reasons. That has been our practice, that will continue to be our practice.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that it was not the New Democratic Party, it was Mr. Roche, a former Conservative MP, a former Canadian Ambassador for Disarmament who said this pressure was put on the Government of Canada; it did not come from this side. The minister did not answer the question in an appropriate way, and he knows it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a supplementary to the same minister or the Prime Minister, who is going to the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union has on a number of occasions recently talked about creating a nuclear free zone in the Arctic. Recently Mr. Gorbachev was in Finland again and he repeated the proposal. Canada has always been cool to this suggestion. I want to ask the Prime Minister if when he goes to the Soviet Union he will respond seriously to this suggestion by the Soviet Union, including asking questions about the Soviet armaments they have in the Kola Peninsula? Instead of reacting in a carte blanche negative way which the United States has to this, will he accept and propose a positive response on this important matter?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yes, indeed. I propose to review with the President of the Soviet Union all avenues of co–operation and to explore with him and his colleagues all reasonable opportunities for progress and for a greater degree of stability.

I really do not know why my friend is so exercised in putting questions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or to me in this regard. I doubt if there has been a greater degree of disengagement by the superpowers than in the last two or three years. I think that any fair–minded person would say that this results on the one hand from a great degree of leadership from the new President of the Soviet Union and also a great degree of firmness and leadership from the President of the United States and the leaders of the NATO countries in solidarity. It is generally recognized that we are entering a new era of hope and opportunity and I would have thought my hon. friend would celebrate that rather than be carping and negative as he enters his—

An Hon. Member: Swan song.

An Hon. Member: Twilight years.

Mr. Mulroney: The twilight years of a very distinguished career.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. According to the U.S. Department of State 1988 report to Congress on human rights practices around the world, as many as 20 of the 32 OAS member countries have been accused of human rights abuses. Of those, nine are known to have frequent disappearances, political killings and tortures.

I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, now that Canada has joined the OAS without public consultation, how does the government intend to monitor these violations and how does it plan to contend with these abuses?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is an interesting theme running through these questions. Are we to assume that the Liberal party believes that Canada should not play a leading role in this hemisphere?

Mr. Allmand: You should have an agenda.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Is it the position of the Liberal party that we should not be in the OAS? I would appreciate some clarification.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Know what you are doing before you do it.

An Hon. Member: Where is Paul Martin when we need him.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I know the Liberal party on several earlier occasions has preached a kind of isolationism. They made it clear that we should not play a leading role in the hemisphere. We believe that Canada should play that kind of leading role and I would be interested in knowing the position of the Liberal party.

We did not wait to join the OAS to make representations to Latin American governments regarding the question of human rights. We make those representations regularly and effectively. We will continue to do that. If anything, our membership in the OAS will increase our capacity to make those representations for respect for human rights far more effectively.

Indeed, if the hon. member would read the speech that was given to the meeting in Costa Rica on Friday, he would notice that among the themes upon which the Prime Minister laid emphasis was precisely the question of human rights and the essential relation between human rights and democracy, both of which we encourage by our active presence in Latin America. I am sorry to see that the Liberal party wants to draw back from our obligations in this hemisphere.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. Perhaps I can clarify to the Secretary of State what our policy is. The Liberal statement released on OAS membership stated that membership in the OAS cannot be used as a proxy for substantive policy for Latin America.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Stewart: Policy should not be developed without consultation. The Secretary of State, if I heard right, said he had suggestions from the U.S. and Ortega about our relationship in Latin America. Why did this government in this parliamentary session not consult with Parliament's own Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade and Canadian non-government organizations before grandstanding an empty policy in Costa Rica? Will the Prime Minister now appear before the committee to justify his move?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that of course is an old question that was raised two or three weeks ago and answered two or three weeks ago.

I understand that there will be an invitation extended to me to come before the standing committee and I look forward to doing that as I have regularly throughout my time as Secretary of State for External Affairs appeared before standing committees to discuss public policy with the members of that committee.

There is an obligation upon national governments to make decisions, to take actions in the national interest. We believe that it is time to contribute, to add more force to an already effective Canadian policy respecting Latin America by joining the organization that draws together the countries of that region and provides a political forum.

The OAS is far from being a perfect organization. We believe that Canada's role in that organization can help strengthen it as the role of Canada in the last four years has markedly strengthened the Commonwealth and as the role of Canada in the last four years has not only strengthened but has allowed the creation of la francophonie.

There may be some in this House who think that we should be drawing away from international organizations. We believe that there is a particular Canadian capacity to strengthen those organizations, and we think it is appropriate for us to apply those Canadian talents in Latin American in our own neighbourhood.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister said that he would be very open to suggestions as to how to cut the deficit. I have a suggestion today for the Prime Minister.

The Toronto Star tells us that the Prime Minister had his armoured limousine flown to Costa Rica with an additional one to serve as a back-up. What a waste. They could not be used because there was no unleaded gas in the country to put in them.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: When is the Prime Minister going to come back down to earth and realize that the Canadian taxpayers are the ones who are paying for his moments of illusions of grandeur?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1440)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are some questions that go beyond the very flexible standards of this House. I think the insinuation of that question is one of them.

Let me make two facts known to the hon. member. I think he might know them already. The first is that decision was not taken by the Prime Minister. It was a decision taken by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who are responsible for the security in Canada and abroad of members of the government and of officers of Parliament, including the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

They made an assessment that the security situation in that meeting, at which was present, for example, the President of Colombia, that the security situation was sufficient that it required unusual precautions to be taken. I point out to the hon. member, and this may not be of much interest to him, that there were frequent assassination threats issued upon people who were present at that meeting. During the presence of the President of Colombia at the Costa Rica meeting there was in fact a continuation of the series of assassinations and bombings in his country.

We have a choice. We can back away from the struggles of that continent, we can back away from the fight against drugs, or we can take our role to try to help the other countries of the Americas deal with serious problems that affect this whole hemisphere. We believe it is important for Canada to be there and if the RCMP says that the Prime Minister of Canada should enjoy security while he is there then I think most Canadians would accept the advice of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, it is always great when you can back up and blame the RCMP. Who runs the RCMP? They are under this government.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Hopkins: That is where they are. In addition to the limousine fiasco, the Prime Minister had, at times, an entourage of some 41 to 60 secretaries, advisers, valets, bodyguards and other functionaries with him during his 18 day trip to Kuala Lumpur and Costa Rica. This was double the number that Great Britain's Margaret Thatcher had. When is the Prime Minister going to practice what he preaches, tighten his belt and set an example for all Canadians? It is no wonder the Minister of Finance has to levy a 9 per cent GST in this country.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting revelation that Liberal members of this House believe that the government of the day runs and directs the RCMP. That is not the practice of this government, although it may well have been the practice of Liberal governments in the past.

Second, the figures quoted by the hon. member are distorted and are false. Third, we have just heard from the leader of the New Democratic Party the importance of having available to Canada when we are engaged in important international conferences and important international decisions the best Canadian advice available. The Prime Minister was dealing directly in the two conferences from which he has just returned with 65 heads of other governments. We dealt with important questions ranging from trying to fight drug trafficking through to trying to protect the environment to trying to find ways in which we can deal with the burden of debt upon low income countries, not to mention questions with regard to the situation in southern Africa.

Of course we had advisers there to help us ensure that Canadian policy was effective and I think that the hon. member will find when he looks to the testimony of other participants in that conference that Canadian policy on those matters has been effective.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. A major potential loophole for evading the goods and services tax is now emerging around land and housing.

Developers will, prior to the GST being implemented, simply transfer land and houses into a numbered company and then sell the shares of these companies. Of course, the sale of shares is exempt from the goods and services tax. In view of the mounting opposition to the goods and services tax, the increased confusion around the implementation of the tax, including statements made by the chairman of the finance committee on taxing new houses, the statements made by the Auditor General about the inability of the government to collect the tax and now a major loophole in the ability of the government to collect the tax on housing and land, will the minister withdraw this ill conceived goods and services tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have read of the comments made by certain people in the housing sector. The advice that I have received is that that is a very, very limited opportunity. We are grateful to receive this type of advice during the consultation period, before we put final legislation to the House, so we can address this type of problem and other problems which are bound to develop as people get a better understanding of the tax. That clearly is a reason why it is important that we have this period of consultation and why we get to Canadian individuals as much information as we can about the nature of the tax.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, what is obviously happening is that they are giving out the information to help their friends evade the tax.

In British Columbia holding companies have been purchasing buildings in order to avoid the 1 per cent sales tax on the provincial property. There is a 1 per cent sales tax on property in B.C. and they have been putting the buildings in the names of holding companies. If this is done to avoid a 1 per cent sales tax, it will certainly be done in spades for a 9 per cent tax.

Can the Minister of Finance now tell us how he intends to plug this major loophole in his goods and services tax?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talks about a 1 per cent tax in British Columbia on housing. There is today an existing sales tax which is levied at the effective rate of between 3 per cent and 4 per cent on the purchase of a new house. This is not something that is not new. What we are trying to do is develop an equitable tax, a fair tax that is going to be balanced across the board and one that will avoid the loopholes that the hon. member has referred to.

On the question of loopholes, let us also not forget that in the existing federal sales tax there are 75,000 tax collectors. There are 22,000 special deals between Revenue Canada and those 75,000 tax collectors. That demonstrates clearly that the existing tax is riddled with loopholes and the hon. member should be on his feet telling us to get on with changing the tax from the existing tax which people can take advantage of and put in a new tax that is fair and is not going to have this type of loophole.

THE SENATE

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister on his stopover. Albertans have been anxious for the Prime Minister to return and celebrate the political reform that has begun in his own country.

In light of an overwhelming victory on October 16, indeed over a quarter of a million votes for one man, when, not if but when can Canadians expect to hear of Mr. Waters appointment to the Senate of Canada?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I see applause from the Liberal party. I thank my hon. friend for the question. I have, as the hon. member elegantly pointed out, just returned and—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: —I have a strong urge to leave again.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Best news we've heard all day.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps while the right hon. gentleman is here he could answer the question.

Mr. Mulroney: Well all right, Mr. Speaker, if you insist. I thank my hon. friend for the question. I have not yet had a chance to consider this matter with my colleagues. I will do so and be happy to respond as soon as I can.

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, I know that there has been some time to address this issue since October 16 and I know that the fax machines were busy between here and Singapore after that was over. It is not a matter of when, but it is a matter of why not reform the Senate. I think that we in Alberta are getting restless for this to happen.

The time has come for Senate reform. I heard from a Senator at our weekend convention in Edmonton that the Senate sleeps 104. When will this change be made in the Senate of Canada?

Am Hon. Member: Sleeps?

Miss Grey: That's what a Liberal Senator said at our convention.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, did I hear my hon. friend say that a Liberal Senator was attending the Reform convention on the weekend? It would be interesting to know if this is the new position of the Liberal party. Given some of those principles adopted there I would expect the Leader of the Opposition to call in that Senator and start putting his feet to the fire right now, because I plan to do it at an appropriate time.

With regard to my hon. friend, I have already answered the question and as soon as I can consult with my colleagues I will be happy to give her an appropriate response.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it concerns the continuing Oerlikon saga. We have now learned that following both an RCMP investigation and an internal audit of National Defence that four top officials of National Defence assigned to the Oerlikon's low level air defence project have now been either forced to retire or fired.

I want to ask the Prime Minister what is the link between the investigation, the audit, and the firings in question?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the question that the hon. member asks is a question that has been addressed by the Department of National Defence. There were two internal audits done. There were investigations done by the RCMP. There was not a recommendation by the RCMP to have criminal charges laid. The appropriate investigation has been undertaken and the appropriate action has been taken. There were no allegations and no evidence of anything other than management—

Mr. Kaplan: What is going on?

Mr. McKnight: The hon. members ask what is going on. There was an audit and there was an investigation. There were irregularities in the management practices of that office. In some instances individuals whose terms had expired were not rehired. The action that was taken was appropriate and if the hon. member wishes additional information he should ask someone else.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I did ask someone else. I asked the Prime Minister. Perhaps he would answer the question the next time.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is as follows and concerns the Oerlikon affair. The four people in charge of the Oerlikon project have been fired by the Tory Government opposite.

I would like the Prime Minister to give us a reasonable explanation instead of the ridiculous answers we have just heard.

Why were these four people fired? If nothing was wrong at Oerlikon, why fire them?

[English]

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has reached a conclusion that is not logical, but that is not surprising. He suggests that there is a relationship between actions taken by the management of the Department of National Defence to have efficiencies and management practices that are appropriate for not only the program management office but other departments of government.

The actions and the firings alleged by the hon. member did not take place. What took place was a reassignment of one individual, expiration of term contracts by other individuals and a finding of inappropriate action by another individual. As the hon. member knows, please ask what actions were taken but do not ask this minister or other ministers to release names of individuals in the House of Commons that cannot be released outside the House.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, with answers like we just heard from the ministers, is it any wonder that Canadians are more and more indignant about this government.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Hard–pressed taxpayers are seeing hundreds of thousands of their dollars going to cronies of cabinet ministers for winning the Terminal III contract at Pearson Airport. This morning it was revealed that $390,000 went to John Lundrigan, a former Tory MP from Newfoundland, for 15 to 20 meetings that he attended.

Can the government, and the Prime Minister, assure this House that in awarding this rich contract, which contains a government guarantee for the promoters against losses, that the Minister of Transport of the time, and the government, were not influenced by the fact that the consultants who made money on this deal included not only the former member from Newfoundland but also the minister's former aid, Chester Burtt, the former Tory Premier of Newfoundland, Frank Moores, as well as two close personal friends of the Prime Minister, Gary Ouellet and Gerald Doucet? Tell us that all these good Tory connections were irrelevant in winning that contract.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, lobbying is not against the law in Canada. It has not been, and will not be in the future. Nor is there any law in respect of how much lobbyists, be they lawyers or otherwise, are paid. What this government has done is introduce a lobbyist registration system so that people can know who is lobbying and on whose behalf.

I think it is going some way beyond a sense of decency to infer wrongdoing or impropriety. If the hon. member has evidence of that, let him bring it forward. Otherwise he should keep his mouth shut.

Mr. Kaplan: It sure is easy to see why taxes are going up and why the cost of air travel is going up.

If the minister wants the respect of the Canadian people for that legislation, will he accept the amendment that was proposed on this side, and will he, without the amendment, make public, as is done in other countries where lobbyists exist and are regulated by statute, disclose all the amounts that were paid for the winning of this contract and who received them; all the amounts and who?

Mr. Andre: The contracting procedure of this government is well known.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: The Auditor General has full access to the procedure. There was a competitive procedure.

I repeat to the hon. member, if he has any evidence of wrongdoing he has a duty to bring it forward. He makes a suggestion about the fees paid and so on. I wonder, if he were continuing to act as a lawyer, if he would be agreeable to a system that provided that his legal fees in respect of any action that involved this kind of contract must be a matter of public record. It was for considerations of the invasion of privacy that would be involved that the committee which studied the legislation did not take the recommendation of the hon. member that fees be disclosed.

I repeat again, there is no accusation in the article, none whatsoever, of wrongdoing. It is wrong of the hon. member to suggest wrongdoing when he has no evidence.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Today all the federal parole and case management officers are being forced out on strike by this government. There has been no pay increase for the last three years. This strike is a crisis in the administration of justice. It will mean an even greater overcrowding of the prisons. It will deny prisoners their right to parole, and mean that parolees will not be supervised.

My question is this. Last week the Solicitor General announced with great fanfare that today of all days is the start of Crime Prevention Week. Is it the minister's idea of crime prevention to turn his back on his own employees who are on the front lines of the administration of justice?

• (1500)

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I already informed the House last week that in consultation with the National Parole Board and Correctional Service Canada, we have taken all the necessary steps to deal with the current situation.

I can assure this House that we will take care of all people who are on parole. Management staff at the penitentiaries and the National Parole Board will be monitoring the strike very carefully closely.

I can assure the Hon. Member that since this morning, I have been in touch with the authorities at the National Parole Board and Correctional Service Canada, and that at this time, everything is going well. I think that we must act as responsible citizens and avoid raising such matters in public. We must not create false fears where none exist at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Given the time, we will move on. I will hear the hon. member for Windsor West on a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

RALLY ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, today at noon several thousand Canadians gathered on Parliament Hill—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I was present at the rally. None of the Conservatives had the nerve, the courage or the commitment to their ideas to come out and meet those thousand of Canadians. As between my statement that thousands were there and the comments of the Tories, I suggest that Canadians will decide who they want to believe on this subject since the Conservatives did not have the guts to be present.

These Canadians rallied on the Hill against the government's goods and services tax. Among them were several hundred taxi drivers who had driven to the Hill in a procession and they hoped that at the conclusion of their rally, they could drive their cabs around the driveway in front of the Parliament Buildings and out again. However, the taxi drivers, when they first approached the Hill in a procession, had been stopped by a road-block of RCMP cars approximately opposite the Centennial Flame. When the taxi drivers attempted to proceed around the driveway of the House of Commons and the Senate to the main entrance of the Peace Tower, they were stopped by this road-block.

The RCMP officers who had gathered around the police cars in question persisted in maintaining this road-block even after Members of Parliament entered the cabs at the front of the procession and asked to be driven up Parliament Hill to the main entrance of the Parliament Buildings at the Peace Tower.

I and other Members of Parliament asked the sergeant in charge why we were not allowed to proceed in these taxi cabs. He said that he was acting under instructions and could not remove the road-block until those instructions were changed. When I and other MPs asked the sergeant who had given these instructions he remained silent and refused to say who had done so.

At that point, I and several other members went to see the Sergeant-at-Arms who apparently had not heard about this matter. He came out with us to talk to the RCMP sergeant in charge and, as a result, there was initially an agreement between the RCMP and the representative of the taxi drivers that some 30 cars could proceed around the main driveway by the Peace Tower.

After this was announced to the taxi drivers and a large number of other people who were there watching what was going on, the individual taxi drivers at first said that if all the drivers could not drive their cabs around, none would do so, at which point, I and some of the other members proceeded back on foot to the Peace Tower. At that point, a number of cars came through bearing members of the public and some Members of Parliament.

I submit this action by the RCMP raises the issue as to whether this action I have outlined by RCMP officers and those who gave them their instructions breach the privileges of this House. I am sure the officers in question were acting with the best of intentions, but the issue of parliamentary privilege still remains to be considered. I say the issue was there, even though it was possible for members of Parliament, in the case of myself and others, to walk up the hill to the Peace Tower and eventually for several others to ride in taxi cabs to the main entrance to the House of Commons. I say this because when I and a number of other members of Parliament first attempted to be driven by taxi cabs around the main driveway up to the Peace Tower, we were prevented from doing so by a road-block of RCMP cars and a large number of RCMP officers.

What do the authorities say in this regard. I refer you to Beauchesne's, fifth edition, page 35, citation 104 which states:

> The time-honoured privilege of Members to have free and unimpeded access to the Parliament Buildings should be recognized even if there is some question as to the extension of the term "parliamentary precincts", and in particular whether the jurisdiction of the Speaker, exercised on behalf of Members, extends beyond the limits of the Parliament Buildings themselves.

In this case, the obstruction in question took place on the grounds of Parliament, just off the gate from Wellington Street, near the Centennial Flame.

I also ask you, Mr. Speaker, to take a look at Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, Twentieth Edition, page 156, where there is the heading, "Molestation of Members while in the execution of their duties". Erskine May says:

> It is a breach of privilege to molest a Member of either House while attending such House or when coming to or going from it—and on June 6, 1780, the Commons resolved, "that it is a gross breach of the privilege of this House for any person to obstruct and insult the Members of this House in coming to, or going from the House—

I repeat that I am sure the RCMP officers in question were acting with the best of intentions, but the fact is that when I and a number of other members of this House attempted to be driven up to the main entrance at the Peace Tower in taxi cabs, we were prevented from doing so by RCMP officers who had created a road-block of RCMP vehicles. I submit that this action falls four square with the accepted definitions of what is involved in preventing members from having access to the House of Commons. I submit that what we have here is a prima facie breach of privilege. If you agree with me, I am prepared to move the appropriate motion.

I want to say, by way of conclusion, that I realize there are questions of security with which we ask the RCMP to be concerned. However, I say that in instances such as this, these matters should be worked out in consultation with the Speaker, the Sergeant-at-Arms and the RCMP, and no one instructing them should act as the officers in question did today, no matter what their intentions were. We have the potential for a very dangerous situation, where no matter what the intentions are, no matter how well-intentioned the officers may be, the result may well be to prevent members of the public, and as was the case here, members of Parliament from having access to the Parliament of Canada.

I do not think this is acceptable under any circumstances. I certainly do not think it is acceptable in this case, where large numbers of Canadians, in a peaceable way, wanted to carry out their long-standing privilege of demonstrating and expressing their views against a very unpopular government policy, the goods and services tax. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that what happened amounted to a prima facie breach of privilege, and if you agree with me, I will be prepared to move the appropriate motion.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the point of my question of privilege is one of access, access by an elected representative, a member of Parliament, specifically this member of Parliament, to this place. There was a noon hour rally on Parliament Hill, a rally attended by Canadians who were very concerned about the GST, in fact, so concerned they were protesting the GST. Behind each one of them, I might add, there are thousands more who say that enough is enough.

Following this noon hour rally, members of Parliament who boarded taxis to return to the front door of the House were stopped by police on the lower road. My colleagues and I were denied access to the front door. I questioned an RCMP officer who told me, and I quote, "Potentially 295 MPs, if every one of them took a taxi to the Hill, they would disrupt the dignity of Parliament so bad it would be unbelievable". At this point, the officer said, "Mr. Member, if you would like a ride to the front of the House of Commons, I am offering you a ride." I was not aware of that. I will phone and ask if I have that same privilege available to me tomorrow morning from my apartment.

I have the honour and the privilege of being a member of Parliament and it is my solemn commitment to my constituents to serve. But how is any member able to carry out his or her duties without total and unimpeded access at any time and by whatever means is at our disposal?

Number one, can a member of Parliament arrive at this place whenever and, more important, however he or she wishes? Two, is there a limit to the number of members of Parliament who can arrive at the front door of this place at any given moment? With all due respect, is there a set of rules governing this activity of which I am not aware, or is it common practice for the Sergeant-at-Arms to make himself available as chief negotiator, as some sort of conciliator, between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the taxi drivers of Ottawa?

You have had put before you and this House, Mr. Speaker, the rules outlined by my colleague, the Hon. Member from Windsor West. I submit that we have a prima facie case of privilege and I would support my colleague's motion, if you so request.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I was one of four members in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms at noon hour along with the Leader of the Opposition and two other MPs. I was there because I too was one of those who was at the rally of many, many Canadians who were here to protest the tax.

After the rally, I too tried to summon a taxi to return to Parliament Hill. My colleagues for Prince Albert—Churchill River and Saskatoon—Dundurn tried the same thing. There were RCMP cruisers blocking the path by the Centennial Flame.

I and the House leader of the opposition party asked why they were doing this and on whose authority they were acting and they would not tell us. We then went and disturbed the Sergeant-at-Arms who was half way through a lovely lunch in his office. He appeared not to know anything about it so we brought him down to the Centennial Flame and negotiations were undertaken. The House leader of the official opposition has already referred to that in detail.

My point is really two-fold. I think it is important, because of the possibility of a real confrontation having occurred, because of some of the emotions and tempers that were around, to find out who made the decision that we were not to have access to the House of Commons in taxis.

I have always known since I was elected as a member of Parliament that I have the right to call a taxi and be dropped off at the Centre Block under the Peace Tower, and other members know that as well. We have access to the Hill. You know that, Mr. Speaker, and we all know that. We have access to the Hill, and you as the person in charge of Parliament Hill is the only person who can deny that access under certain circumstances.

I think we should look at this in terms of a question of privilege regarding access to Parliament Hill. Second, Mr. Speaker, I think you would want to find out who made the decision to have the RCMP block the lower road down by the Centennial Flame because that was something that could have escalated into an incident that none of us would have wanted to see.

On behalf of many members of Parliament, I too support this question of privilege. I think it is a pretty fundamental thing. It is something that you as Speaker certainly would want to get to the bottom of as quickly as possible.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point as my colleague for Windsor West. This incident happened in an entirely different set of circumstances.

Shortly before one o'clock, I had a meeting off the Hill and I was returning to the Hill by taxi. We turned in to the entrance way in front of the East Block. As soon as the taxi got on to the property, we were stopped by a member of the RCMP who advised us that we could continue no further and would I walk from that point up to the Centre Block. I acquiesced, naturally.

In the House today, I heard my colleague talking about the denial of access and it came to my mind that the same situation happened, so I join my colleague for Windsor West and adopt his arguments on access to the House.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could ask the hon. member for Windsor West whether any members were stopped from approaching the building if they were walking.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I thought I had said that members who wished to approach the building on foot were able to do so, but that is exactly my point. I think that access to the building should not be based on somebody else's decision as to the means of conveyance, whether or not it should be on foot.

I respectfully submit that if members of Parliament wish to enter the building by travelling there by taxi or private car, that should be their decision, even if they may well be doing it for symbolic purposes. There was no doubt, there were all sorts of witnesses to this, that when members of Parliament initially attempted to travel from opposite the Centennial Flame to the Peace Tower, they were prevented from doing so by a road block of RCMP cars and a large number of RCMP officers. Therefore, I have decided to present this point to you.

I have made it very clear that members could go to the building on foot. I ask you to consider, Sir, whether anybody, except perhaps yourself on behalf of the House, has a right to dictate to members how they should go up the Hill, whether it should be on foot or in a taxi or in a private vehicle or whatever.

I hope I have answered your question and I respectfully submit that there is an issue of obstruction even though there is no doubt that in my case, I was able to eventually approach the building on foot.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I am hesitant to speak on this particular point of privilege, but the point that I want to make is, first it takes me back to the work that was done with the McGrath task force and the whole question of the jurisdiction of the Speaker. One of the things that was found to be real problem is that the Speaker does not have the jurisdiction over the grounds of Parliament and that those decisions are made off of the Hill and are not in any way connected to the Speaker's office.

To me, the solution on this particular case would probably be to make a reference to the committee to ask it to look at the whole question of the Speaker's role and that of the Board of Internal Economy in terms of setting guidelines that affect the Parliament Buildings. We, Sir, would not in any way want to interfere with the rights of members opposite to take a cab from the Flame to the centre of the Peace Tower any time they choose to.

• (1520)

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it is an absolutely gorgeous day here in the nation's capital. Why would anybody concern himself with access when he can get out and walk the very few feet or yards that it is to the Centre Block? It also seems to me that—

Mr. Gauthier: How did you get here, with a chauffeur?

Mr. Mayer: You ask me how I get here. I make it a practice, if members are interested, to walk on a regular basis. I do not ever use a car to come up to the Centre Block. When the option is there, I use the green buses. I am sure the green buses were still able to run.

Mr. Keyes: No, they were not!

Mr. Mayer: If the green buses were not running, they were not running. I was not aware of the situation.

The point is that if you have access and a very few hundred yards to walk on a day as gorgeous as this, I think members opposite are being rather frivolous in this kind of a point of order.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Windsor West and others have addressed the Chair on a question of privilege. Basically, the fact, as explained here in the last number of minutes, is that indeed certain vehicles carrying members of Parliament were stopped at least for a while.

There was also some suggestion that members were denied access to the front door. I think that the hon. member for Windsor West mentioned that. The hon. parliamentary secretary has made a suggestion which seems to be quite sensible. There is some difficulty with respect to jurisdiction outside the walls of these buildings and under the circumstances, I am going to find that there is a prima face case and I would hope that the appropriate motion would be put.

Point of Order

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West:

> That the matter of access of certain members of Parliament by taxi to Parliament Hill today be referred to the Standing Committee on Elections and Privileges.

Motion agreed to.

POINT OF ORDER

SUPPLY DAY MOTIONS

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I recognize the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a point of order.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to respond, if I may, to assist Your Honour in making a ruling on the matters raised this morning by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader. There are two or three questions that he put to you and asked you to answer in a hypothetical way and I wanted to make clear our position on this matter so that Your Honour, in making a ruling, will be able to consider the views of the opposition.

The significant question that he posed was, was it necessary before a discussion on an allotted day and before a motion could be put down on an allotted day that the government designate the allotted day. I have reviewed the authorities as best I can and I submit that the answer to the question is no, there is no need for a designation before any member of the opposition can set down a motion.

I refer the Chair to Standing Order 81(12)(b) which makes it clear that in putting down a motion on an allotted day that is to be votable on a Friday, the opposition must give 48 hours' notice of the motion. If the parliamentary secretary's interpretation of this rule was correct, it would mean that by holding up the designation until Thursday evening on any supply day on a Friday, the government could effectively forestall the opposition from choosing to have a vote on a Friday. It is clear from the reading of the rule that the intent is to leave the leeway with the opposition. I submit that the answer to his first question must be no, there is no necessity for a designation before the opposition may set down a motion for a supply day.

Second, I want to note that the Notice Paper for Thursday, as my friend will see indicates that the notice was given pursuant to Standing Orders 81(12) and 81(14). It was clear on the designation of the Leader of the Opposition's original notice that it was for a votable supply day on Friday last week.

The government chose not to designate Friday as a votable supply day and accordingly, another notice was given on Thursday for Friday and it appears on Friday's Order Paper, by the hon. member for Algoma. While the terms are exactly the same, the fact is the first notice was given to conform with Standing Order 81(12)(c).

I submit that in making any ruling on this matter, the words of Standing Order 81(12)(c) are relevant, and I have dealt with the other issue. There is no need for designation, in my submission, before the notice is given.

With respect to the withdrawal of notices, the Parliamentary Secretary suggested that it was improper for the member to withdraw without recourse to the House. I refer Your Honour to Citation 543 of Beauchesne's sixth edition which states as follows:

> There are only two ways in which a notice can be withdrawn from the Order Paper: first, by the Member giving a written notice to the Clerk of the House or second, by the Member informing the Speaker of the desire that the question be dropped or withdrawn.

I understand that the appropriate notice was given in writing to the Clerk, and accordingly, the notice is withdrawn ipso facto and there is no need for the member to do anything else or seek the leave of the House to withdraw the notice. I ask Your Honour to rule accordingly.

The member suggested that it was improper to have multiple notices. Again, I refer to Standing Order 81(12)(c), which states that when notice has been given of two or more motions by members in opposition to the government, there is no reference to parties, there is no reference to anything except members in opposition.

In this case, there were two notices from two members of the opposition and apparently a third was given for today. Again, I suggest the wording of the rule clearly implies that more than one notice can be given and there may be a duty on the Speaker to make a selection. However, in this case, there was no such requirement because of the withdrawal.

Finally, on the question of whether the notice was properly given, I submit it was perfectly proper in this case because under the special order adopted by this House last April, subsequently amended in June, subsequently amended in September, to the best of my recollection and I do not have all the dates of the amendments, the Parliamentary Secretary knows that there were two allotted days to be held before the end of October, and as of Thursday, that had to be on either Friday, Monday or Tuesday. It was obvious that there was going to be an allotted day on one of those three days. I submit, in the circumstances, it was more than proper, indeed, it was being generous and fair, that the opposition chose to give its notice on Wednesday night of the fact that it wanted a debate and a vote on agriculture on Friday.

To put this in perspective, I want to read from the words of the Chief Government Whip on Thursday, October 26, as recorded at page 5210 of Hansard. At roughly eight o'clock, or nine o'clock in the evening, he was asked what the business of the House would be for Friday. This is his reply:

> Mr. Speaker, the government House leader anticipated being here for a 1 a.m. vote and bringing the information on the business of the House with him on that occasion.
> The surprise ending of the debate and the quickness of the vote make it clear that he is not here with us and that that information is with him. We will share it with all members of the House as quickly as possible upon his arrival. The House will start at ten o'clock.

The obvious thing is that no one on the government side at nine o'clock on Thursday night had any idea of what the business was going to be the next day except the government House leader himself who had fled the coop. He was going to come back at one o'clock on the morning of the day and tell us what the business was going to be that day.

It is typical of the way this government mismanages the time of this House. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary, I admit, was absent last week and missed this fiasco of mismanagement on the part of his colleagues. Indeed, I suggest that if he had been here, perhaps it would not have been bungled quite so badly. The fact remains, it was badly botched.

The government could not make up its mind from one day to the next what the business was going to be. When it did not get a designation in for Friday, it had to then make Monday and Tuesday the allotted days and so we changed the notice and withdrew the old notices that had been given, as we are entitled to do.

My final point is this. Your Honour can ignore the mismanagement to Your Honour's content. I will not argue that because that is more a political point than a procedural one. But I say that the government, in raising this point of order, has no right to raise hypothetical questions and put them to Your Honour.

Your Honour must make decisions based on events that have transpired. The parliamentary secretary, at the opening of his remarks, indicated he had no objection to the procedural propriety of the motion that we are debating today and, accordingly, I suggest that his entire point of order be ruled out of order by Your Honour at once because the questions that he has posed are truly hypothetical and ought not be dealt with in a ruling from the Chair given in the normal way.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I sat here and listened at great length to the point of order raised by my hon. colleague, and I just want to say that if a person is to properly represent the matter in a serious vein, which I have no doubt he intends to do, then perhaps he should get his facts straight.

Because I was here I can speak with some degree of qualification. In the first instance he made some reference to the government Whip indicating that at 9 p.m. that evening he was unprepared to give the Orders of the Day because they had expected that the vote would be taken at 1 a.m. I say to you, Sir, I was in the House when I heard, I believe it was the Whip of the Liberal party say, with waved finger: "You will be here until one o'clock this morning voting on the matter." That is the first point.

The second point is the government Whip did not make that statement at 9 p.m. He made it at precisely 7.50 p.m. because immediately following that time I went and attempted to eat at the parliamentary dining room and they told me the restaurant was closed, and that was at about two minutes to 8 p.m.

With those points of correction I think that the hon. member should adjust the tenor of his comments so that you, Sir, might more seriously consider his comments.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prolong this point of order at all, but I think it is important to make one comment.

If I am not mistaken I heard my hon. friend say that 48 hours' notice should be given on what is to be designated as an opposition day. Our point is that in fact the problem we have is if there is no notice on the floor of the House of Commons that such and such a day will be an opposition day, then we find it very difficult to understand how there could possibly be a number of motions placed on the Order Paper for a day that has not yet been designated.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I just can't believe my ears. We are trying to make a point. It is very simple. There were three days left in October, that is working days for this House. Two of those had to be opposition days. We therefore thought, because the government will not tell us what was going on, that we would use the rules thoroughly, and we used them. Standing Order 81(12)(a) says:

> Forty-eight hours' written notice shall be given of motions to concur in interim supply, main estimates, supplementary or final estimates, to restore or reinstate any item in the estimates.

That is exactly what we did. And when we saw the government still persisting in not wanting to tell us what the work of the next day would be, we put another motion on the books because we thought at that time they were going to play tricks on us.

Mr. Cooper: They shouldn't have thought it.

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, because you are a tricky, tricky government. You do have this in mind. You have a mentality that says "we must play tricks on the opposition". So to avoid you playing tricks we put forward two motions. Nothing in this book says we cannot put two, three or four motions. Mr. Speaker, you would have to choose which one of those motions is going to be taken up when the government makes up its mind as to whether tomorrow or the day after is an opposition day. That is the problem.

The Conservatives will not tell us what the agenda is yet they expect us to guess. Well, if they want to continue that kind of game, we will continue that kind of game also.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to thank all hon. members for their contributions. I know that the Chair will take note of the comments this afternoon and we will proceed to the Orders of the Day. When the House rose at one o'clock p.m., the hon. member for Algoma had been given the floor.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—AGRICULTURAL AND TRADE POLICIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra):

> That this House condemns the government for having jeopardized the future of Canadian agriculture by its ill-conceived trade policies, especially the Canada-U.S. trade deal,
> 1) which have failed to gain access to the U.S. market in spite of the promises of the Prime Minister in the 1988 General Election;
> 2) which have failed to counter U.S. protectionist actions (including those taken after the enactment of the trade deal) against Canadian agricultural products such as pork and other commodities vital to our economy;
> 3) which have failed, as evidenced by the recent GATT panel decision on ice cream and yoghurt, to ensure that Canada is able to maintain its marketing board and orderly marketing systems;
> 4) which have failed to have any effect on U.S. agricultural export subsidy programs, such as the export enhancement program, which are contrary to the claimed "spirit" of the trade deal while the Canadian government has, at the same time, been moving unilaterally to dismantle programs beneficial to Canada's farmers; and
> 5) which have failed to create confidence among farmers in the future of the food supply system in Canada and its ability to ensure long-term food security for consumers.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I was concerned as to whether the House was trying to talk out our opposition day without getting to the very important matter before us, that being our motion which describes the tremendous uncertainty and the fear of the situation that exists in many rural areas of Canada because of the actions of this government with regard to trade issues. Clearly I do not believe there has ever been a time when marketing boards, the legislation and the support programs for marketing boards have been in greater jeopardy.

I found it interesting to listen to the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds because he talked about the history of agriculture in this country and all kinds of other issues, but he did not address the four or five points in the motion before the House today which deals with the failure of the Government of Canada to secure access to the United States market.

He did not talk about the failure by the government to counter U.S. protectionist actions on things like pork. He did not talk about the jeopardy in which our marketing boards and supply management have been placed. He did not talk about the fact that we signed a deal with the United States stating that we were not going to interfere with each other's customers abroad, yet the United States is increasing the funding under its export enhancement program. He did not address the tremendous lack of confidence that there is in this country now with regard to our whole supply management system.

I thought it was interesting that he talked about the billions of dollars which the government has provided during the trade wars in the last two or three years between the EEC and the United States. It is interesting that he talked about those billions but did not talk about the $500 million which the Minister of Finance cut out of the budget of the Department of Agriculture last April.

Those programs, amounting to $500 billion, include the advance payments program. It is rather interesting he did not mention that because practically every major agricultural organization in Manitoba—the Keystone Agriculture Producers, the Manitoba Canola Growers, the Manitoba Corn Producers, the Manitoba Pulse Producers, the Western Barley Growers, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture which includes the pools, and so on, is opposing the government's position for that funding under the advance payments program which the minister did not bother mentioning.

The former Minister of Agriculture faithfully promised Canadian dairy producers in the spring of 1988 that he would secure and protect the underpinnings of the supply management system in this country. He said he would move products like ice cream and yoghurt from the tariff list to the import control list and that would salvage the whole supply management system.

He said it many times in the House of Commons and on the hustings and, yet, today we have the whole agricultural economy of this country, supply management and the marketing boards in jeopardy of being destroyed by a ruling.

We could not believe the minister at the time because the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee in the United States, Senator Benson, was complaining at that time. As soon as the government placed commodities like ice cream and yoghurt on the import control list, the United States Government applied to GATT for a GATT panel to strike down the import controls that Canada had placed on it. A decision was made in the past month or so to strike that down and disallow it.

The implications of that decision could not have come at a worse time and they could not have had greater impact on the Canadian dairy industry. The Minister of Agriculture plays lots of games, but if that decision is upheld by the GATT the prediction is that at the end of the day he will accept that decision by the GATT panel at the December 4 meeting in Geneva, probably not implementing it until the end of the GATT round negotiations a year from this December. That precedent at that time in that way, with that timing, is the worst possible decision that could be made. Clearly the government should have made a deal in the free trade deal to control those imports.

The Americans did. They had a waiver which says that those commodities cannot be brought into the United States. If the government was serious about protecting the supply management and marketing board system in this country, there would have been that kind of arrangement in the free trade deal. Now we are faced with the prospect during the next year or so of losing that import control, which is one of the major reasons that we can have supply management. It will be a devastating decision, not only for the dairy industry but for the whole feather industry: broilers, turkeys, and egg products.

That is the one devastating response to the free trade deal. The pork countervail is an even sadder story, although it is hard to choose between the two. Last fall, sometime in October, the United States passed the free trade deal, agreeing to it, and then proceeded to amend in the omnibus trade bill the provisions for the countervail duty.

In other words, they said: "Okay, we are going to have a free trade deal with Canada, but we are going to toughen up our countervail duty in direct violation of the spirit of the deal". In the April 3, 1987 The Wall Street Journal the Prime Minister said: "You cannot have a free trade arrangement and expect the traditional laws of countervail to apply". "Such laws", he said, "can be triggered by any disgruntled group in the U.S. at any time". He said: "It would be illogical in the extreme to negotiate a free trade agreement and then have the other side say oh, by the way we forgot to tell you all of our nice little tricks, our countervail and what have you are going to be kept".

They not only kept all of them, as the Leader of the Opposition said, in section 1901(2), but they reinforced them, made them stronger. They said that any countervail that is applied to a primary product will be deemed to apply to the secondary product, in this case to pork. They have had a countervail on Canadian hogs for the last couple of years.

Now that countervail of 2.6 cents a pound is in place, but we know that the payments on the tripartite pork stabilization program have been very large, I think in the order of $36 a hog during 1989, compared to an average of $6 a hog in 1988. That means that our pork producers, on pork that is sold to the United States, could have a retroactive countervail applied on them back to this past September.

Now we have the situation where the Canadian Pork Council is making arrangements to provide a levy on every hog that is sold in this country, not just on the ones that are sold to the United States which perhaps represent some 25 per cent of our production but on those sold within the country and those sold to Japan and other countries, of $2 per hog. That means we are buying access to the United States market, this access that the Prime Minister talked about in The Wall Street Journal interview in 1987. It does not sound very free if we have to levy $2 on every hog marketed in this country, whether they are going to the U.S. or not.

It is easy to see why the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds did not respond to the motion put forward today because the government has really muffed our whole trading relationship with the United States, and it is having implications far beyond those relationships with the United States.

The other area that we are very concerned about is that under the free trade deal with the United States we agreed to negotiate, over the next five to seven years, a subsidy code, a list of subsidies that would not be subject to countervail duty by each other. It is interesting that in the budget which came out this year and in other actions which the government has taken something like nine out of the fourteen or fifteen subsidies mentioned in the free trade deal are either reduced or done away with completely.

We believe that the government has placed in jeopardy the very important supply management marketing board system, our whole pork production in this country. We believe that their trading relationships have been jeopardized by these actions, not only through the free trade deal but the negotiations which are going on at the GATT. That is why we have put down this motion today condemning the government for its lack of proper action with regard to agricultural trade.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this debate to demand that this government abolish its present policies that are undermining our marketing systems, that are ignoring the needs of Canadian farmers, that are resulting in an exodus of young people leaving the farms across this country and are resulting in a closing down of rural Canada. It is a sad commentary that so many Canadian farmers and their wives have to find off farm employment, not only to survive and put food on the table but to subsidize their farm operations.

It was with a great deal of shock and dismay that I read just recently that the United States Secretary of Agriculture had made the statement that they intend to discipline Canadians and their subsidy programs. If there was ever a pot calling the kettle black, this was it. The western Canadian wheat producers, have the ability to grow the highest quality of wheat in the world. Because they started to make some inroads into the United States markets the United States Government was called upon, by the producers in the United States of the same Durum wheat, to bring a countervail action against Canadian wheat moving into the United States.

Obviously, because of the fact that this wheat was higher quality and that it was readily available through the Canadian Wheat Board, the Canadian Wheat Board and the farmers were able to fill this market. It seems a sad commentary, after being led to believe that the free trade agreement was going to open up these markets in the United States and secure the access to these markets for Canadian products, that all of a sudden we have had one countervail action on Canadian pork moving into the United States, on live hogs themselves, then later another one on the dressed pork.

When we asked the American representatives about this, they said that of course they have the power to do this under the omnibus trade bill because it supersedes the free trade agreement. The free trade agreement was not ratified until after the omnibus trade bill came into effect.

So we have those actions against our pork and our live hogs, the threatened action against our Durum wheat producers, and still another one that is being talked about toward Canadian beef going into the United States. Yet I have not heard one word from any of the ministers on the other side of this House as to what action they are going to take against the United States or, in fact, what laws the U. S. changed to adhere to the free trade agreement.

I am shocked that a government of a country with the resources that we have in Canada would allow itself to be manoeuvred into a position where we would find ourselves shut off from these markets with the Americans, in addition threatening countervail action that was supposed to have been removed by the free trade agreement.

I am also rather shocked when I read the various accounts of what is happening in the GATT negotiations. We are hearing various buzz words. One that is of primary concern to me is the buzz word "tariffication". If we ask for the meaning of tariffication, some of the negotiators and people in the civil service tell us that tariffication means taking away all import restrictions and barriers that perhaps are not visible but are there, some by legislation and some by statute, and replacing them with tariffs. Then of course the next step, if they do this, will be to negotiate the tariffs downward step by step until there is free movement of product across these borders.

In all seriousness, while it may sound exciting to hear people saying "yes, we can compete", we have to realize that there is no level playing field because mother nature herself has dictated that that is not the case. In Texas, for example, they can grow up to three crops a year. California can grow three crops of tomatoes a year; in Ontario we can grow one. So naturally we can guess where the products are going to be grown if we go toward the route of tariffication and negotiate away all subsidies.

Canada has tremendous potential and expertise in agricultural production, but we must realize that we are tempered by the climate. In that context, no country should ever allow itself to be put in a position where it cannot produce its own food because it has been traded away.

I had the honour last Friday of speaking to Dr. John Kenneth Galbraith, one of the foremost economists of the world. He said:

> I very much think that in Canada, and equally in the United States, we have a cultural identity which identifies itself in the family farm.

He went on to say:

> I have always felt as a broad rule that agriculture must be under the constraints of production control or marketing boards. It is the nature of the agriculture market, as distinct from General Motors or (other large corporations), that there is a total absence of control of total output. Such control is essential to agriculture.

Yet we have a government over here that systematically starts to take away the underpinnings of the various marketing structures that have served this country so well over the last number of years, that were put in place by various governments, and that have been the envy of producers of the world. In fact, it has been referred to as the most sophisticated marketing system of any country in the world. At no time have we contributed to world surpluses of any of those commodities that are under that system of planned production.

I just want to compare what is happening here. For example, in the dairy industry we have our production under control through a series of planned production, for both industrial and fluid milk markets, which has been very successful. To compare that to what they have in the United States, at the present time there are four or five states that are facing acute shortages of milk. Georgia, a large producer, is now producing half of what it needs. Alabama and Tennessee are short of product. All of the east coast of the United States has shortages. Even New York State, a major producing state within the United States, is very short of milk at the present time. Even the State of Michigan is short in the area north and west of Lansing. The price is only now starting to show a return to the producer, and this is after approximately 1 per cent of the producers in the United States per month have decided to throw in the towel and leave the industry.

It is shocking that such shortages would occur within the United States. They are picking up the milk every day from farmers. If consumers want milk on a weekend they must buy it before three o'clock on a Saturday or Sunday afternoon because of what has happened.

That is an example of where this government is leading us. It is leading us to a system of supply and demand and shortages in this nation. I abhor the direction it is taking which will leave Canada as a nation vulnerable to the whims of the market of supply and demand that it no longer controls but rather leaves the control in the hands of the corporate structures.

In closing, I would ask this government, for goodness sake, to stop and take a look at what it is doing to the farmers of Canada, at the credit being made available to them through the Farm Credit Corporation, and at the hardships it is inflicting on the people of this nation.

I have in my own riding a man who is severely disabled. He has been held at the end of a string for the last three months and nothing has been done to help resolve his problem. The Farm Credit Corporation Act states that the corporation may make compromises, rewrite mortgages and do all those things that are conducive to a lending operation. Yet that has been ignored in the case of this family.

I ask the government to show some compassion, not only for the producers of Canada who are facing these hardships, but for those left to the whims of the market-place to wither and die on the vine.

In closing, I just want to ask this government to stop and realize where it is going, how it has been taken in by the United States on the free trade agreement and the subsidy wars that it is escalating at the present time. I should point out that the United States appropriations committee for the second year has now placed a cap of $770 million on the funding for the export enhancement programs.

The government has to take action, dig in its heels and not allow itself to be pushed around any more.

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to make a couple of comments and ask the member for Lambton—Middlesex a question. As we read through the trade deal which has been touted by the government, the real strength, as it says, is the snapback as far as duties and tariffs on fruit and vegetable crops that the trade deal puts in place is concerned. They brag about the five-day situation there.

I can tell members of the House from experience of producing quite large quantities of these products that the reality is that when you need five consecutive days the damage is done. In other words, if it happens for two or three days and then someone can say it was okay for the fourth day, the five-day cycle is broken.

Let us look, for example, at the production of strawberries in Canada which are produced for about three and one-half to four weeks. Is the damage not going to be done by the time we can prove five days? Then we get through the bureaucratic red tape, et cetera, and the influx of those products coming in. I would like to ask the member to comment on whether he thinks that snapback mechanism has a possibility of having any success.

The other thing, along that same line in fruits and vegetables as well, is that the word "harmonization" is used quite frequently in the free trade agreement. What does the member for Lambton—Middlesex think is going to happen over the years as we harmonize our grade standards, our regulations and our residue standards with the United States? Are we going to continue to have the high standard of food safety in Canada that we are proud to say to Canadians that we have at the present time?

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for the question. Obviously the harmonization of regulations that has been going on since the government took office has brought down our standards to be more in line with those of the United States. Canadians can no longer afford to brag that we have the highest quality standards of any nation in the world. This is reflected not only in terms of fruit and vegetables but also in our grains.

We are equally alarmed that the government would bring in a system through the free trade agreement whereby a load of grain coming into Canada does not have to show the grade or the quality of that grain. All it needs is an end user certificate. It could be some very low quality grain that is brought in here in a series of truck loads simply to break and undermine a price structure that exists within our market-place. I think we should insist on having those grades and the quality shown on those end user certificates.

I would also like to comment very briefly on the snapback provision. The member is absolutely right in terms of the tender fruit harvest, in particular strawberries, cherries or peaches, because we have a price structure established at the start of a harvest season. If you have a few truck loads of lower grade quality dumped on the market-place, the price is tremendously undermined and that price normally remains in effect for the rest of the season and ends up with our own producers being forced into bankruptcy or whatever.

A few moments ago I quoted a man to whom I listened very attentively last Friday. He spoke about the concentration of power in the market-place, the power of the big multinational corporations and what they are doing to the Canadian agriculture industry. He was very firm in his resolve that the producers themselves must have a counterbalance and a counterbalancing force in the market-place to compete against these people. It is only through structures that we have here in Canada, the marketing board and the wheat board that we are able to do that. It would be a shame if these were ever traded away such as this present government is doing.

Mr. Gustafson: Mr. Speaker, I have just a couple of comments on the remarks of the member for Lambton—Middlesex. First of all, it is obvious that he is not familiar with the situation in the western prairies especially with regard to wheat and Durum and to the export of Durum wheat to the United States. We have had record exports of the best high quality Durum wheat. Also, Canadian wheat producers can compete in the international market-place. We have without a doubt the best hard red spring wheat in the world. While we have been facing some problems in the international market-place, there is no question about that, there has never been a government in the history of this country that has stood in for the farmers like this present government. I think it would be well if the member would research his material a little better before making statements to this effect.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I should advise my colleague on the other side that I am a wheat producer, maybe not Durum wheat but I am a wheat producer. In fact, about 186,000 tonnes were exported to the United States this year which is up substantially from previous years precisely because of the high quality of that wheat. The quality of that wheat is a credit to the Canadians producers who produced it.

I would like also to point out to him that five prairie farm organizations wrote to the Minister of Agriculture requesting action against this American action. This has not been forthcoming at this time. I would ask my colleague on the other side to put pressure on the Minister of Agriculture and his two assistants. They have three part-time ministers over there. I hope between all three of them they will bring a stop to these actions and protect the interests of our own Canadian producers.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to rise to speak again in this House on the question of the future of agriculture and how this government's actions are making a much tougher and insecure environment for the farming communities of Canada.

Today particularly it is interesting that we are finally getting around to talking in a concerted kind of way about the effects of the recent free trade agreement which has now run for virtually a whole year. I think some of the chickens are really starting to come home to roost, especially in the agriculture community.

I remember very well as I was running for the nomination for my party in my constituency that this debate was raging in the farm communities in Saskatchewan. The Premier of Saskatchewan, the Hon. Grant Devine, came to Prince Albert and provided a briefing to the citizenry of the area on the free trade agreement. He made two points very, very clearly with respect to agriculture. His big point, of course, was that Saskatchewan is an agriculture producing province, something on which our economy depends. Obviously he could not very well come out in support of an agreement that would clobber the heck out of the leading industry in his own province.

The premier made two points that stuck with me. One is that our access to markets through the supply-management system would in fact be enhanced under this free trade agreement because it was spelled out in that agreement that it was more than iron-clad, that our access to markets would be better than it was.

Second, he said the reason we had to get the free trade agreement and why farmers had to support it was because there was all kinds of potential for the sale of red meat into the American market. Without the free trade agreement that access for red meat not only was not assured but could well be in jeopardy.

I want to say that there were farmers who listened to the remarks of the Premier and who were in some ways convinced by that. They thought we were doing well selling red meat into the American market. We do not want to lose that market. There had been threats of countervail on pork. There was an element of the farm community that said yes, free trade in agriculture is going to be a benefit to farmers.

What have we seen since then? I think it is becoming quite a litany. First, as somebody mentioned previously, we gave up two-price wheat. There was a commitment at that time that the $280 million that we got under the two-price wheat system would continue to flow to farmers. I have yet to see where that flow-through to farmers has come or where the substitution has been on the two-price wheat payment. That just dropped right through the cracks in terms of any kind of benefit to the producer at all.

Second, the marketing board structure has never been under more threat in this country than it is right now since its inception in the 1960s. We have seen that through GATT. It does not really matter, as the Member for Saskatoon—Humboldt pointed out before. What the free trade agreement has done is give the Americans two routes to get at us, two routes for harassment and they are using both of them. They used them in the case of ice cream and yogurt. If that should stand there is no question that the whole supply management system would start to unravel.

The point is not so much the technicalities of what is happening, but that the Premier of Saskatchewan and agriculture spokespersons for the government made it very clear that what we were entering into is an era of understanding and harmony, that there would not be any more harassment and that we had to co-operate. People like to hear that kind of thing. We do not want to be fighting the Americans for markets or fighting harassment again and again. It is not our way. Where do you see Canadian action against American producers? There was one on corn, but it has been very seldom that Canadian producers have taken even the opportunities that they do have to beat on American farmers. That is not our way of doing things. We were told that it would not happen to us, and it is.

Furthermore, the whole thrust of the government's agriculture policy is taking us down a road that interacts with the free trade agreement in such a way as to lead us to an agriculture economy that is going to be based on agri-business very much the way the American agriculture community has moved almost totally into an agri-business kind of mould. We see the removal of oats from the Canadian Wheat Board.

Certainly everybody agrees with those who say that we need to process more oats at home. There is no reason oats cannot be processed in Canada under the auspices of the Canadian Wheat Board. We have milled flour in this country for years and done a very good job of exporting flour, something which operates under the Canadian Wheat Board. There is no way oats cannot operate just as effectively through the Canadian Wheat Board.

That action was taken in the face of the virtually unanimous opinion of the farm communities. Polls were done by Decima Research, a company the government tends to listen to during election time and most other times. A poll done by Decima Research found that approximately 70 per cent of farmers wanted to keep oats under the Canadian Wheat Board. The reason they want to do that is because the institution of the Canadian Wheat Board has been the main bulwark of our defence and the most successful aspect of our penetration to international markets when it comes to the export of grains. It is the envy of producers all over the world. The Australians have one; they like ours better. I had the opportunity over the Thanksgiving weekend to talk to farmers in the mid-western United States. The first comment you most often get from the American farmer is how we have developed such a successful wheat board and what might they have to do politically to get something like it.

If this government were serious about international markets, and it should be, it should be not only maintaining the current role of the Canadian Wheat Board but it should be enhancing the role, moving it into new areas. When you have a winner you go with it. This government makes a big point of going with the winners. Maybe the losers have to lose, but certainly you go with the winners. Our big winner is the Canadian Wheat Board.

This morning I challenged the minister to hold a plebiscite. I am not suggesting anything that is not democratic or that the majority of farmers are not interested in. I think it is time to hold a plebiscite on whether farmers want rapeseed or canola included under the Canadian Wheat Board.

I might remind our Liberal colleagues here, some of whom might not have been around in those days, that we at one time had such a plebiscite. However, Otto Lang, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board at that time, had a personal prejudice against it, put in a convoluted question with yes, no, maybe, don't know, which needed 50 per cent of the vote. There was no way in that kind of a stacked ballot to get any proper reading.

I challenged the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds to organize a plebiscite in the Canadian Wheat Board area on whether Canadian farmers in fact want canola marketed under the Canadian Wheat Board. I challenge this government to stand by the results of that plebiscite because if it is really serious about using our best possible vehicles for international trade, then it has to take the Canadian Wheat Board seriously. It has to make that vehicle available before canola disappears as a profitable crop in Canada as well.

I would like to say that when it comes to the whole range of agricultural policies which the government is proposing I note that in a few weeks we are expecting a White Paper from the Minister of Agriculture in which again we will see the same general thrust.

The government talks about self-reliance. It talks about market orientation. What that means is making us much more vulnerable to the ravages of the international market. That is what pits our small producers and our small industries against the international giants. At the same time, rather than strengthening the Canadian Wheat Board and the marketing board system, which have worked very well for us and which are world models, this government should make it clear once and for all that it has gone as far as it is going to go in dismantling those structures and that in fact it is going to get together with the Canadian farm community to help enhance those vehicles.

Certainly nobody on this side of the House has ever said that we do not need export markets in agriculture. We do. We are asking for this government to take the actions that will in fact help farmers, not help Cargill, not help Continental—

An Hon. Member: We need to make our agriculture more competitive, right?

Mr. Funk: We have a member from Manitoba who says we need to make our agriculture more competitive. We certainly do. We are not going to do that by cutting our farmers off at the knees.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the comments of the hon. member from Saskatchewan. I thought he might have listened very closely to the comments made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister. He was talking about the great record sale of Durum wheat. It reminded me of the speech that the Deputy Prime Minister made last week to the Canadian Grains Council in which he said he was "deeply concerned and deeply annoyed by the recent actions by the United States that run counter to the spirit of the trade agreement". He went on to say: "The American Durum growers are wrong to complain continually about our exports of Durum for pasta and noodles. They are wrong to threaten countervail action."

It occurs to me that perhaps there is something wrong with the free trade deal if these guys are so wrong. We think they are wrong too. It seems to me that it is very naive of the government to enter into a free trade deal in which the United States has the full power to implement countervail action and dumping duty action and expect that groups are not going to do it. It seems to me that it is the free trade deal that is wrong.

It is interesting to note that in this case all the American Durum wheat producers have to do is lay a complaint with the International Trade Commission and they can start monitoring and gathering all the information—this is a very expensive business—so that they can launch a countervail action against Canada for their Durum wheat or whatever the arrangement is. We put that amendment forward in the free trade deal so that we would be able to take similar action. We wanted to try to strengthen it, to improve it, but of course it was voted down by the government.

I just wonder if the hon. member from Saskatchewan, whose producers would be equally concerned about the actions taking place, thinks that the free trade deal is wrong not to anticipate these kinds of problems and have remedial actions within it.

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, I thank the non. member for that very excellent question. A member from Saskatchewan should not have forgotten to mention the question of Durum, especially in the southern part of our province which has experienced some very tough years through drought, prices and so on. Durum wheat has been one of the few bright spots in the agricultural picture in Saskatchewan. In fact it amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars worth of crop for Saskatchewan producers.

As the member pointed out, we are now being subjected to harassment, as we are any time we do anything that is effective in trade. The Americans are not interested in fair trade. That is becoming quite clear. As soon as we beat them at something they are harassing us. The whole point, as I understood it, of the free trade deal was that it was supposed to take this harassment out of the system. First, the spirit was supposed to be different. Second, mechanisms existed to shake this harassment that constantly is happening to our farm communities.

I was interested too in the Deputy Prime Minister. He sounded like an opposition member. He is the guy who endorsed this free trade agreement. He is the guy who sold it to people as the answer. Now, a year later, he is crying in Calgary saying that it does not work. I was just hoping that he had made those comments personally and perhaps with even more force to the Minister for International Trade who is in the House and who hopefully is taking these things to heart.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated on the first ten minutes and five minutes of questions and comments. The next one is the Hon. Member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak briefly on the opposition motion today which condemns the government for having jeopardized the future of Canadian agriculture by its ill-conceived trade policies, especially the Canada-U.S. trade deal. There are five points to the motion. In the 10 minutes that I have I will try to speak quickly to each.

The first points out that we were promised by the proponents of the trade deal that this would allow us to gain access to the U.S. market. It is not obvious that there has been any great gain in access to the market. We have seen instead complaints about our exports of Durum wheat into that market. We have seen a countervail lodged against pork producers into that market.

During the period when the trade deal was being debated the proponents of the deal said that one of the things that we could be assured of if we got a Canada-U.S. trade agreement was that there would no longer be countervail actions against pork and hogs. It turned out that they were wrong. Those of us who read the agreement and looked at the U.S. law were quite certain that they would be wrong. The words were there. In fact, if anything the words strengthened the U.S. position and the U.S. power to countervail provided them with an opportunity under the new U.S. trade law to countervail against the secondary product, namely the pork which had previously been seen to be a separate commodity from hogs.

Now under a new U.S. trade law pork is deemed to be simply a byproduct of hogs. If there are subsidies going to the production of hogs, then it is thought that those subsidies apply to the production of pork. Therefore the pork is countervailable. So far, and we are right at the last stage, it looks as if we have lost that countervail argument.

The Canadian pork producers are setting aside $2 a hog in an attempt to stop the processors from depressing the market even further. Producers are saying: "We'll take the loss of that American market ourselves and set aside a fund in the event that future rulings permit an even larger countervail action retroactively," something which the American trade law does in fact permit.

The advantages that we had in the pork market and in other agricultural sales to the United States have disappeared in part because of the trade deal, but also because of a change in the value of the Canadian dollar for which we can thank this government and the Bank of Canada's interest policy. As we keep putting the interest rates up, we increase the value of the Canadian dollar and make it much more difficult for our farmers to export commodities into the United States on a competitive basis.

The actions that have been taken by members of this government have been twofold. They have virtually sold out Canadian agriculture interests with the signing of the trade agreement. They have made the economic viability of those exporters less viable because of a changed interest and dollar policy, making it very difficult for us to compete with the export of goods into the United States because the dollar is ever strengthening.

We have not recognized the reality of dealing with a larger power. We made these points during the course of the trade debate. I make them again because I think that all sides in the current GATT round have forgotten that economic conditions changed dramatically in the field of trade. When we are manufacturing rules to conduct trade, we have to be cognizant of what those changes are likely to be.

After the Second World War some of our first efforts at regulating ourselves in the international market I believe failed in the wheat market because Britain and Europe became able to produce their own wheat after the war. It took them five or six years to get their fields worked up again and to get the machinery and inputs there, but when they finally got them there they became almost self-sufficient. A very large market for our wheat and barley largely dried up in the early 1950s. Mr. Speaker, you will remember the glut that we had then. We were at odds as to how we could find new markets. We gradually opened up markets first to the U.S.S.R. and then to China. In the midst of these trade negotiations, we are perhaps at a pivotal point in history. Both China and the U.S.S.R. are very close to becoming self-sufficient. At the same time we are seeing a strange new pattern emerging from the United States where for the second year in a row the Americans have failed to produce enough food to sustain themselves. They are beginning to live off the mountain of surplus grain that they have had in storage.

If the greenhouse effect is going to continue and the desertification of the western United States does continue on at its current rate with the result that parts of China and parts of Russia become more productive, we could see a switch in the flow of trade from west to east in the other direction. Our negotiators do not seem to realize that these power positions do change. Governments change. Even world power situations change and the balance of power shifts.

I think the United States and the European Economic Community could be more cognizant of the fact that the shoe could be on the other foot very quickly. During the negotiations they should begin to look at what would happen if they were on the receiving end of some of the policies they are attempting to bring forward in the GATT. That is something that our government did not pay very much attention to during the negotiations with the Americans. Yes, it is true that they are a much larger power than we. Yes, it is true they would have more clout at the bargaining table. We had put ourselves in a very vulnerable position taking on the largest power in the world, a country which is 10 times the size of us economically, and a good neighbour. There was no one else at the table to side with us when the sledding got rough, so we ended up with the kind of deal we got.

During the debates on the trade deal some of us recalled the comments that some of the American business people were making about the deal. I recall the president of Campbell Soups making a marvellous observation about free trade between Canada and the United States. He said: "Free trade will be great. We can shut down all of our Canadian subsidiaries, run the plant in Chicago Sunday night and supply the whole Canadian market". A year after we are finding that the subsidiary in Portage la Prairie is going to be closed. There will probably be other announcements. Maybe some of them have been made. I noticed the one in Portage la Prairie because it is in my region. A lot of his own predictions are coming true.

The problem for Canadian farmers and for Canadian agriculture is whom you sell to. Who do you sell your potatoes and vegetables to when Campbell Soup's plant is down in Chicago? It is pretty hard to ship a product that far when the area around Chicago can produce virtually the same quality of vegetables and produce a lot cheaper. The producers are much closer to the market.

Some of the things that we feared are coming true. This government should be criticized for that.

Likewise with the ice cream and yogurt decision, the decision came down as we predicted it would. It will undermine supply management. It will undermine the Canadian Dairy Commission and the marketing board structure in this country. We do not see this government fighting for the strength in Article 11 which will permit countries to have supply management and marketing systems in their own country. We think the government should be stronger on this. We know it is against its basic convictions, that the market should determine things, but it should always remember that when you leave things to the market you are leaving things to the most powerful and, in this case it is the Americans and the Europeans. We are not particularly enthralled about being in their clutches without some international body standing in between.

We think this government should be siding with the other smaller countries to get a good, fair deal for Canadian agriculture and agriculture in the other smaller countries so that our farmers can survive in the new world that is developing and emerging out there right now.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the member could tell us what has happened to the price of oats. During the last crop year, they were removed from under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. The minister spoke very glowingly this morning about what has happened in the industry since they were taken out from under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. I would like to know what has happened at the farm level. What has happened to the price of oats? What is liable to happen in the future?

I would also like to hear some comments about several grain sales. In the week of September 21 the United States sold 22,000 tonnes of Durum wheat through its Export Enhancement Program at a subsidy of $6.48 a tonne. On October 5 it sold 1 million tonnes to Egypt, Algeria and Sri Lanka at an $8 a tonne subsidy. It sold 1.5 million tonnes to the U.S.S.R. under the Export Enhancement Program at a subsidy of $8 a tonne.

Is this impacting on the farmers of western Canada? Does this government have any programs to counterbalance those large subsidies? Does the member have any personal suggestions as to how we can stop this type of action by the United States government?

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, there were two aspects to the question. The way the U.S. has continued on with the enhancement program I think breaks the spirit and even the letter of the law, but it persists in it. This was raised in the House numerous times after the signing of the agreement when the enhancement program was going on. One of the things that our negotiators seemed to have been unaware of was that the U.S. was moving—at the same time as it was signing this agreement which has a clause which appears to say that the enhancement program would not be used in markets that we are into—to authorize the use of the enhancement program well into the 1990s, unbeknown to our negotiators apparently.

The United States Government does not seem to have any intention to live up to the writing in the deal. This is fairly consistent with previous wheat agreements and other international grains agreements where its perception and understanding of the deal is not what it says in writing but how it feels it should be interpreted. It basically comes down to who is the biggest, who has the most power and who can get away with it. That has not changed with the agreement in spite of all the high hopes of the Prime Minister and the Never Never Land that he comes from.

With regard to oats, since the Canadian Wheat Board no longer markets oats, oat prices have gone into the pits, Mr. Speaker. You should know that. The price is around $1 a bushel this year. It was well over $2 and sometimes approaching $3 last year. We do not have that any more. We do not have a Wheat Board to negotiate prices for producers, and neither do we have an interest free cash advance program so that producers can feel confident in holding the oats off the market. As a result, there is a surplus of oats coming onto the market, depressing the market, and it looks as if it will be depressed for at least all of this year. We need the Wheat Board back.

Mr. Speaker: Questions and comments are now terminated.

On debate, the Hon. Minister for International Trade.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in what is supposed to be a debate. Mind you, we are debating one of the most feeble Opposition day motions ever to come before the House of Commons. Both opposition parties have not got one positive suggestion as to what they would do, were they in power.

Mr. Funk: Put canola under the Wheat Board.

Mr. Crosbie (St. John's West): They are Lilliputians. Two Lilliputian parties without anyone to lead them, wandering in the wilderness, and all they can do is act as naysayers. Why, they are against everything. They haven't a positive—

Mr. Funk: Put canola under the Wheat Board.

Mr. Crosbie (St. John's West): You might be able to out-lung me. Go ahead and out-lung me if you wish. But if you want to listen to some common sense and logic, keep that aperture there closed and you will be able to hear and, I hope, learn something.

I have only been here to listen to two speakers, both from the lost party, the wandering-in-the-wilderness party, the New Democratic Party. Idi Amin said this: "Sometimes people mistake the way I talk for what I am thinking". Well, in listening to the hon. gentlemen talk, I thought it showed they were not thinking in the first place. There was no evidence of thinking in what they said.

This is a serious topic. The reason why it is serious is this, that about half of the $20 billion in cash receipts generated in our agricultural sector every year are generated by international trade. Yet, if the hon. pygmies opposite were ever to be put into a position where they could influence what was happening in international trade, then this half of $20 billion in cash receipts would be under serious threat, of serious damage, because they want to believe that they can operate alone in a world all by themselves in Canada, that they do not have to worry about the rest of the world, that do not have to participate in a world trading system that has rules that have to be observed and a system that needs the rules improved.

Agriculture in Canada and the food industry is big business. Ten per cent of Canada's Gross Domestic Product comes from the industry; it provides 1.6 million jobs, about 15 per cent of all jobs in the country. That is why it is one of the most important priorities of ours. That is why it deserves better attention than this jacked-up, scrambled, disheveled, this confused resolution that we have before us today that states that the future of Canadian agriculture was jeopardized by ill-conceived trade policies, especially the Canada—U.S. trade deal.

The Canada—U.S. trade deal was stated by us to better protect our market access to the United States market, and that is what it is doing.

Mr. Milliken: And you were wrong.

Mr. Ferguson: You should hear what the hog producers have to say about that.

Mr. Crosbie (St. John's West): Whether the hon. gentlemen opposite like it or not, the United States market takes 75 per cent of the exports from Canada. That creates 2 million jobs in Canada. The hon. gentlemen do nothing but bray like donkeys or oink like the hogs that the hon. gentleman is talking about. They bray and they oink about the sins and the policies of the U.S. They complain about the Americans every day in the year. They continually blackguard the Americans and they continually ignore the fact that 75 per cent of all the exports of this country go to the United States of America. When are they going to grow up and start accepting the responsibility, they are responsible as well—for trying to improve our performance. They have to get on with the United States, just as we have to get on with the United States, just as most countries of the world have to get on with the United States of America.

If they were travelling around the world today, they would discover that because of the U.S.–Canada Free Trade Agreement, the rest of the world looks favourably on Canada as a place to invest, as a place for the future, because of our improved market access to the United States of America.

This may have been mentioned earlier today in this debate, I was not able to hear my hon. colleague, the Minister of State responsible for the Wheat Board, a brilliant minister, but just look at our record in agriculture. We came to the aid of the farmers of Canada when they were caught in the crossfire of the trade war between the United States and the European Community. Largely to offset the effects of that trade war, we paid about $12 billion in direct and indirect support to grain producers between 1985 and 1989.

That is a record that the hon. gentlemen, no matter how much they caterwaul, how much they complain, how much they niggle, how much they distort, how much they bray, cannot gainsay $12 billion in direct and indirect support. While the hon. gentleman who preceded me was braying away in this House over the last four years, we were acting. We were acting to put $12 billion in direct and indirect support to grain producers.

We want to help grain producers further by negotiating the conclusion of a successful Uruguay Round of the multilateral trade negotiations at Geneva and that is what we intend to do. The only way Canadian farmers and farmers interested in exports are going to have assurance for their future is if we can successfully conclude a trade negotiation at Geneva in the Uruguay Round that will set proper international rules for agricultural products and bring them under GATT from the end of 1990 onwards. That is what will give them assurance because our farmers, if left to compete fairly, can compete, outsell, outdo, outgrow and be more efficient than any other group of farmers in the world.

In fact, over the previous four years the Government of Canada, of which I am proud to be a member, has invested $17 billion in agriculture, double the money spent by our predecessor Liberal government in the previous four-year period. The Liberals are not even in the picture.

We have had to defend farmers against destructive trade practices, and we have defended them. Just keep in mind that the net market receipts for grains and oilseeds dropped from an annual average level of $2.4 billion between 1981 to 1984, to $475 million in 1987, and you can see the impact and the need for the unprecedented support that we have given the Canadian farmer.

Now we have to go on and we have to secure international trade reforms. This is the most important negotiation for the nations of the world since the world began—that is not to sound too dramatic—but certainly, since the GATT system came into effect in the late 1940s. Agriculture is going to be the making or the breaking of this trade negotiation. That is why we have tried to take a leading role in the negotiations that have to do with agriculture. That is why we have been members of the Cairns group to try to get an acceptable compromise agreed upon by the nations of the world in agriculture so that agriculture can be covered by world trading rules.

Middle nations like Canada are not one of the world's giant nations. We are middle power. We do not have supervening power. We cannot ignore all the other countries of the world. We are not one of the world's great military giants. We are not one of the world's great economic giants. We are the kind of country that is going to be really hurt if we cannot get a successful resolution of these issues in the MTN negotiations.

The government has put in at Geneva a market access paper that will apply to Canadian agri-food products as well as to other agri-food products. We have put in papers and subsidies and countervail. We are taking a leading role in these negotiations, non-tariff barriers and other barriers to trade that are being discussed at Geneva. We are working on clarifying and strengthening Article 11 which sets out the conditions under which countries may operate supply management systems.

Now, don't let us get anyone confused by the meanderings and the distortions of the honourable Lilliputians opposite, the honourable dwarfs—dwarfs when it comes to policy. How often do we ever hear a suggestion with respect to policy by the honourable dwarfs opposite? Very infrequently.

Now, what is our position with respect to agricultural trade reform? We know that agriculture in Canada is going to profit from increased trade liberalization and that is why we are supporting a clear and fair set of rules for trade in agricultural products. That is why we are supportive of the general thrust of approaches such as the one suggested by the United States a few days ago. We want to work with them, and we want to work with the European Community and the other nations at GATT to try to get a substantial result, and work with the nations that make up the Cairns Group.

We are pleased to see that the United States has adapted much of our approach to the subsidy question, and the establishment of three categories of subsidies: those that would be prohibited; those that would be allowed but reduced; and those that would be allowed without any reduction. There is much to be done in negotiation and analysis before that is settled. We are ready to examine seriously any proposal that will reduce trade distorting domestic subsidies and which eliminate export subsidies. But, we intend to maintain our right to develop programs which respond to Canadian conditions. It is clear that all countries, including the U.S., will want to continue to support their agricultural sectors, but in ways which are less trade distorting than are some current programs.

With respect to supply management, our position is that Article 11(2)(c) has to be reviewed and clarified so that countries will be able to operate effective supply management systems within their rights and obligations under the international rules. I am the minister in charge of the negotiations.

Mr. Speller: Are you sure?

Mr. Crosbie (St. John's West): I am quite sure. I have my instructions, and my instructions include what I have just passed on to you, that we are going to continue to be able to operate effective supply management systems within our rights and obligations that are set under international rules. That is the purpose of this exercise. We do not intend to negotiate at Geneva or a final result to the GATT discussions that does not meet that principle. We intend to preserve the supply management system in as reasonable a way as is possible, and to have it covered clearly and effectively under international rules. That is our objective. That is why, of course, we cannot accept the American argument with respect to supply management systems as contained in their submission of several days ago.

It was here suggested that the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement would do away with the problems or irritations that might arise between the U.S. and Canada with respect to trade. No one ever pretended that the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement would do away with U.S. domestic legislation any more than anyone pretended it would do away with Canadian domestic legislation. Just as we have the right to take action to protect ourselves if we think there is an unfair subsidy by foreign exports coming into Canada and take countervail action, the Americans have got legislation that permits the same or similar type actions to themselves.

We think that some of their legislation is unfair. We think that they are too protectionist in the Congress. We know that the American administration does not control the Congress. In fact, we know that no one controls the Congress. Congress is controlled by little coalitions of groups that come together on one issue, dissolve, and form up again on another issue. No one is really in control under the modern American Congress. So we understand how the system works down there and while it is irritating, we have to accept the irritation. There is nothing we can do about that particular irritation.

You can imagine our irritation, Mr. Speaker, at the American position on ice cream and yogurt, when they themselves have a GATT waiver that effectively prohibits us from exporting dairy products to their domestic market, and then they turn around and complain about a quota that we put on with reference to U.S. ice cream and yogurt imported into Canada to protect our own domestic industry.

Mr. Milliken: Which you would not have had to do, if you had done it right in the free trade deal.

Mr. Crosbie (St. John's West): How would we do it right in the free trade deal? Are we to take the American's arm and put it up behind their back and twist it, and force the big giant to its knees? That is what the hon. Lilliputians opposite would have done, I am sure.

So there is a GATT waiver for the United States, but there will not continue to be a GATT waiver for the United States, if there is a successful and substantial completion of the agricultural discussions which are going to go on from now until next fall in the Uruguay Round of the GATT negotiations. There will be no substantial results in agriculture if the U.S. continues to hold on to this waiver. There will be no successful result if the EEC continues to hold on to unreasonable practices that the EEC has involved itself in, or Japan, or other countries as well. This is a multi-way process. Everyone is going to have to give to some extent to get a satisfactory result.

We are well aware of the importance of supply managed commodities. Poultry and dairy, major sectors in Canadian agriculture, contribute about one-fifth of our total farm cash receipts. We know that supply management has provided a strong measure of stability to poultry and dairy producers, and it is going to continue to be an important instrument of our federal agricultural policy.

The Deputy Prime Minister, my colleague, made a speech yesterday in which he outlined some of the annoyances he felt as a result of some of the things that have occurred with respect to U.S.-Canada relations in trade matters as they affect agriculture. One can understand his annoyance. We think that with the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement in place both sides should be able to approach these disputes in a larger spirit so that they did not all have to be settled as though they were legal cases that somehow had to go to a court to be settled. Nevertheless, it is a great advantage to us to know that many of these disputes are now going to a binational dispute panel on which we will have representatives so that we have a fair chance of getting a better result when trade disputes occur in the United States of America.

I might point out that the processed food industry is gearing up to take advantage of the agreement. Statistics Canada figures show investment intentions in food processing are up 15.4 per cent this year to $1.3 billion, an increase from $1.1 billion in 1988.

However, as the Deputy Prime Minister pointed out yesterday, we share the concerns of industry about certain recent actions in the U.S. that we think run counter to the spirit of the trade agreement. One of the silliest areas are the threats by U.S. Durum producers with respect to the sales of Durum by us to the United States market. We believe that U.S. Durum producers are away ahead in the subsidy game. We believe that the subsidies they receive amount to something like $40 to $50 a tonne more than any subsidy that could be alleged to exist with reference to Canadian Durum producers. We think, as well, that the U.S. export enhancement program is a significant factor in depressing prices in world wheat markets. That is why this agriculture negotiation is so important and so necessary.

It is regrettable that neither the Official Opposition nor the unofficial opposition, neither the opposition party that does not have a leadership contest on at the moment but has simply been without a leader for a number of months and is more than satisfied because it does better in the polls without a leader than it does with one nor the other party that has Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs running around the country trying to compete for the leadership of their parliamentary rump, has made one solid contribution to this debate as to what our policy should be either in the MTN negotiations or in the agricultural field generally.

All we have heard is the usual shibboleths, half-truths, distortions, and gobbledegook about the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement. They do not even realize that it is enacted now, it is passed, it is entered into. It has been in effect for 10 months. Chicken Little was wrong. Chicken Little Turner ran around Canada saying that the sky was going to fall if we had this agreement and now the Canadian people—

Mr. Milliken: You can't call him names here.

Mr. Crosbie (St. John's West): The right hon. Chicken Little Turner ran around saying the sky would fall if we enter into the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement. It has not fallen. The sun is brighter than ever. The opportunities are endless, and I thank you for allowing me the time to speak.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the genial comments of member for St. John's West, the Minister for International Trade. He talks about listening to some sense. I was very interested in his comments that it was never expected that the free trade deal would do away with countervail and American trade actions.

It is rather interesting that he is saying that today. He really made a lot more sense in a St. John's board of trade meeting in July 1987 when he said: "Unless we get out from under the threat of countervail and other U.S. trade remedy law, unless there is an effective dispute settlement resolution to bind the Americans to their commitments, a free trade deal with the United States would be not a good deal for Canada." I think he was making more sense then than he is making now. We always thought he was deteriorating, but this proves it.

I wonder if he would also agree with what the Prime Minister was telling his friends down on The Wall Street Journal just two or three months before that on April 3 when he said: "U.S. trade remedy law cannot apply to Canada period." He went on to say in the same interview: "You can't have a free trade arrangement and expect the traditional laws of countervail to apply."

How do you believe any of this stuff? It is just unbelievable. He said in his speech: "How would you do the ice cream and yoghurt deal in a right way under the free trade deal?" You know, one thing he might do is start to tell the truth. The Minister of Agriculture ran all over this country and said: "Boys, no worry about the supply management and marketing boards. We have put all those products that are going to lose their tariff over on the import control list. No problem". There is a big problem today and that precedent at the GATT threatens to completely destroy our whole supply management and marketing board system.

But I wonder in a more serious vein if the minister could just answer a couple of questions, just so that dairymen will know in this country. Is the government going to accept the GATT panel recommendation decision with regard to ice cream and yoghurt either at the November 7 meeting or the December 4 meeting?

Could the minister say how he is going to oppose the United States tariffication system for controlling imports? Essentially that system is exactly the system that we now have in ice cream and yoghurt which as the tariffs come down leaves it totally wide open. I wonder if the minister could comment on that.

Is Canada going to oppose that because we are in a free trade area, we are going off to the GATT, and we are going to remove all subsidies? I wonder whether he is getting any support for Canada's position at the Cairns Group. Supposedly we are members of the Cairns Group. Is he getting any support for Canada's position? I wonder if the minister could also comment on whether or not the government is planning to accept the proposed aggregate system of measurement for subsidy systems on farm commodities.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I think we have to forgive the hon. gentleman a certain measure of exaggeration when he makes the quotes that he is allegedly making there. He quotes my leader, the right hon. Prime Minister, and I want to quote one of his leaders.

The hon. Premier McKenna of New Brunswick said on June 21, 1989: "Because of the FTA we are starting to feel like we are on the move and that we have got an opportunity to share the wealth of Canada in an equal fashion."

This was stated by Premier McKenna six months after the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement went into effect. One of the few Liberals in this country one can listen to, pay any heed to, learn anything from, who speaks his mind and has a contribution to make; not a ghost like the present Leader of the Opposition, if they have a leader. One day he is in this Chamber and the other day we do not know where he is. He is not visiting international precincts, that is for sure. He is not giving much leadership.

Premier McKenna, who is a leader of a substantial number of people in the Liberal party, has said: "We are starting to feel like we are on the move, and we've got an opportunity to share the wealth of Canada in an equal fashion." That will explain what the value of the free trade agreement is. I do not need to go on to prove any more about it, but perhaps I should. Who would you like me to quote? Do you want a quote from a politician, a quote from a businessman, or a quote from a business statesman?

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): How about answering the question?

Mr. Ferguson: Just answer the question.

Mr. Crosbie (St. John's West): You want me to answer the question. With respect to the GATT panel on ice cream and yoghurt, we will decide on that matter as matters proceed as to whether or not we should accept the GATT panel report with respect to ice cream and yoghurt.

I think we want to look at it in the same context as the United States has looked at certain GATT panel reports that have been made with reference to certain complaints with respect to U.S. policy. One of our options, presumably, is that this would be a matter that would be looked at in the context of the whole MTN negotiations during 1990.

Of course there is a considerable difference between accepting or not accepting the GATT panel report and the implementation of that report. Time will tell what our final position will be with respect to the GATT panel report on ice cream and yoghurt. It is a decision that, to some people, was not unexpected and we will have to deal with it in the context of the negotiation that is now going forward.

With respect to the question of clarification, that is a concept that needs examination and careful analysis. We are not going to reject it out of hand. This is the end of October 1989. The negotiations are going forward over the next 12 months before they are concluded. It is a concept that has to be examined.

Trying to get the costs of non-tariff barriers by applying the principle of clarification can be useful. Aggregate measure of support is a very useful concept. It is a complicated, involved, and intricate process. There has been no agreement yet by all sides on what is an AMS, an adequate measure of support. That is a concept that certainly has to be pursued so that everyone can see just what it costs them to give in certain areas and just what they may gain in other areas. These are useful tools, but all they are are tools.

With respect to the laws of subsidy and countervail, Canada has made a submission to the GATT and on all hands this has received considerable support. I hope the hon. gentleman has read it. It is going to be used, I think, as the document for negotiation with respect to subsidy and countervail. If that paper is accepted in the course of these negotiations then the whole system will be that much further ahead and we will have a much more favourable, fair and sensible system with respect to what is legitimate and what is not with reference to subsidies and countervail.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address the minister, who spoke late in the day, when the sun was low, observed his own shadow and decided he was bigger than the rest who had spoken earlier. I notice that the minister has belatedly recognized that the U.S. Congress is never bound by international agreements. However, that is not what I really want to ask him.

As I noted in my speech, world situations change rather quickly in agriculture. I wonder if he could explain to us why Canada and other members of GATT have decided to proceed with these arrangements to try to solve for the next decade or so the agriculture and other trade related items without including the U.S.S.R. and China in the agreement. Both countries are showing signs of becoming very large agriculture producers. China has had a surplus for export two years out of the last three years, at a time when the United States of America is no longer supplying its own needs and has been living off grains in storage for the last two crops.

Does the minister not think that any future GATT agreement with the existing members is almost doomed to failure, as the climate changes that appear to be taking place leave both the Soviet Union and China in a position of being exporters of grain and other basic commodities? How can we be in a position to attempt to resolve any trade disputes when we have left out two of the potentially largest produces of agriculture?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the People's Republic of China wishes to become a member of the GATT and there have been discussions in that connection going on for a number of months now. The U.S.S.R. is interested as well. These countries can only become part of the world trading system when they are prepared to accept the market system and the kind of international trade rules that apply to the world market system. Once they are ready to accept those rules then I have no doubt that they will be welcome.

It often puzzles me, Mr. Speaker, how it is that in Canada our socialists are so retrograde, so far behind their compatriots in New Zealand and Australia, countries which have discovered the market, like the East European socialists. The market has been discovered in Australia and it has been discovered in New Zealand by socialists, die-hard socialists. Yet, here in Canada we have a few Jim Crack socialists running across the country opposing anything to do with the market, which they say is heartless and so on. Here are their socialist compatriots, and the leader of the New Democratic Party is one of them, he is a vice-president, and they are going around the world saying the exact opposite. Talk about inconsistencies.

I might say that Mr. Jack Parnell, the U.S. Undersecretary of Agriculture was here today for discussions with our Deputy Minister of Agriculture and one of the issues we raised was Section 332, investigation of our Canadian durum exports to the United States. It is an investigation, of course, which in itself does not lead to any action being taken against us, but we do not like the suggestion that there is anything to investigate in the first place and that was a matter discussed with the U.S. undersecretary today.

I might ask hon. members opposite, if the trade agreement was such a bad deal why is it that since the agreement came into effect there have been several major announcements by oat millers? I think the subject of oats was brought up a bit earlier, the hon. gentlemen opposite do not know their oats, I can tell them that. There have been several major announcements by oat millers. They are going to spend up to $30 million. That is the total so far for upgrades to take advantage of the opportunities that now exist for us south of the border with respect to oats, $30 million. There is Quaker Oats in Peterborough, $17 million; CanOat Milling Incorporated, with a $17 million oat processing mill just outside Portage la Prairie, Manitoba; and another unspecified number of millions of dollars by West Glen Milling in Alberta. All of this is to follow up the opportunities that Canadian oat producers have as a result of this agreement.

It is time for the hon. gentlemen opposite to get their nose into the oat bag and learn a bit about it.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, as I begin my comments today, I have a nagging question. Where are the benefits to agriculture that the Tories promised under the free trade agreement? I have not seen any of these benefits as a member of this House, nor have I seen benefits as a farmer. I do not think this government can name one—not one benefit.

Agriculture has been hit the hardest blow. Here is the Tory agricultural record: the two-price wheat system axed; supply management in the dairy industry has eroded; transportation programs are at risk; Advance Payments for Crops Act eroded; At and East threatened with elimination; countervail duties increased on Canadian pork.

These are only but a few of the attacks on agriculture. Is this fear mongering? No, these are facts. Fear mongering is a term that is near and dear to this Prime Minister and his colleagues. To satisfy American interests, this government dropped the two-price system to the detriment of the domestic wheat producers across Canada and in particular, to the small fledgling milling wheat industry in the Atlantic region.

Canadian wheat production is boasted around the world as the stalwart of the Canadian economy, but it suffered the first attack. Since then, Canadian agriculture has become a combat zone, with Tory destruction hitting all areas of agriculture.

Transportation programs in Atlantic Canada are also threatened. Feed freight assistance is under review. This subsidy, and I use the word with great caution, was put in place to equalize the cost of feed grains across Canada. In doing this, it stimulated the establishment of pork, egg and poultry industries in the Atlantic region. These subsidies allow maritime producers to compete with producers in other parts of the country. We can make sure that this review will eliminate this program as we know it, and with it the fair equalization of feed grain prices, leaving Atlantic producers again stripped from protection, another free trade victim.

At and East is also on the block. Bill C-26 has already had first reading. The elimination of At and East will leave Halifax and St. John elevators totally at the mercy of the marketplace, or should I say, American interests. Virtually all export grain in the east moves under rates provided under At and East. As the Maritime Farmers' Council wrote in their position paper of January 1989:

> The continued use of the Port of Halifax as a grain export point is also dependent on the continuation of the At and East program.

Then in March 1989, less than three months later, At and East is listed on the budget cutbacks, demonstrating no concern for the views of maritime farmers.

The grain storage depot for Atlantic Canada is threatened and the consequences on the livestock industry will be severe. The free trade victims are adding up. This government has no commitment to the cereal industry in Atlantic Canada or in this country.

Speaking of commitment, where is the government's commitment to the pork industry? Pork producers across Canada have stated that the countervailing duty order imposed by the United States on fresh, chilled and frozen pork imports from Canada is completely unjustified. Along with this 8-cent duty, the potential exists for supplementary duty amounts to be assessed. The uncertainty this will cause among producers will ultimately affect an already depressed market. This uncertainty in the pork industry is also evident in the dairy industry and is contrary to the stable environment created by the supply management system, a system farmers and previous governments worked hard to create. They were governments that were obviously concerned about farmers.

This uncertainty has been further strengthened by the action of some banks of discounting quotas by 50 per cent. Banks fear that, "Production quotas will be the sacrificial lambs". They will be sacrificial lambs at the altar of the free trade agreement.

Worse still is that this government has reneged on the commitment made to the dairy industry under the long-term dairy policy. This weakening of the supply management system seriously threatens the dairy industry in Canada. The Americans continue to challenge supply management and this government allows it to happen.

The P.E.I. Milk Marketing Board stated, on February 15, 1989 in the P.E.I. "Dairy Industry Concerns": "It is imperative that the Canadian government successfully defend the United States challenge or the Canadian dairy industry will suffer irreparable damage."

Canada has to uphold the rights of Canadian farmers to control the import of ice cream, yogurt, skim milk, ice milk, et cetera. If this is not upheld, the doors will be open wider to American demands. The fear is that the United States wants full access to the Canadian market, giving us nothing in return. The United States is determining how Canadian farmers will survive.

This government is blindly and uncaringly sitting by and allowing American interference in Canadian policy. Programs such as the Advance Payments for Crops Act benefited all farmers. The government is eliminating the interest free portion of this act, for no other reason than it is considered a subsidy under the free trade agreement. It has nothing to do with deficit reduction, nothing to do with impending markets or any other rhetoric. It has to do with free trade.

The agricultural industry is being seriously eroded beyond redemption. Farming operations are being curtailed and farmers are selling their farms. Farmers do not see any future in farming because this government is selling them off to the Americans under the free trade agreement.

It is bad enough that this government favours big business and has no vision of Canada, but this government has been kowtowing to the United States. The Tories are slowly and surely turning Canada into a distribution centre and service industry for the Americans. With no viable agricultural industry of our own, the Americans will have a captive market for their own over-production and Canada, sad to say, will be an American dumping ground.

So, as you can see, in less than a year this government has managed to undermine and destroy programs in agriculture that it took decades to perfect. The future looks grim and unless this government starts to put the interests of Canadian farmers ahead of their American counterparts, it will be even grimmer.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I was glad to hear the hon. member for Cardigan, Prince Edward Island. While he was speaking I was thinking about the comments that our task force on the free trade deal heard when we were in the maritime provinces a year or so ago during the free trade debate. It was made very abundantly clear to us in our hearings in Fredericton that the kinds of diversified agriculture that we see in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick and in some of the other maritime provinces, we would not see if we go into the free trade deal. The farm groups at those hearings said that if we want to see what agriculture will be like in New Brunswick, and I think we could extend this to P.E.I. and Nova Scotia as well, we could look at the agricultural scene in Maine where there is certainly not the kind of diversified agriculture that we see here. That is why I was very concerned when the Minister for International Trade was talking about agriculture being on the move.

Representatives of McCains Foods said that unless they put in a mechanism to protect supply management, there was a danger that some of their companies were going to be on the move to the United States, that the manufacturing and processing would take place there rather than in New Brunswick. They were talking about frozen pizzas and the use of mozzarella cheese and so on.

I was very concerned when the Minister for International Trade said this afternoon that the ice cream and yogurt panel decision would be treated very similarly in the United States to a dispute the United States had dispute with Australia over sugar, they did accept their GATT panel report. It sounds like the minister is also going to accept the GATT panel report on ice cream and yoghurt which would be a devastating move for our industry in this country. It would mean that 60 per cent of all processed dairy products would flow easily into Canada if there is the same decision as that taken in the United States.

Also, I was concerned about his comments that Canada would not reject out of hand the use of tariffication, because tariffication means exactly what has been done under ice cream and yogurt where it starts with a tariff that is reduced over a 10-year period. The minister's comment about aggregate measure of support being a useful mechanism is also of great concern because essentially what the Americans and most of the Cairns group will be trying to do is reduce the price of our supply management commodities to the world price, that is, the American price.

I think the concerns expressed by the hon. member for Cardigan about the government's moves on supply management are well taken.

Mr. Holtmann: Mr. Speaker, I listened intently to the member for Cardigan. He reiterated that this government was undermining programs for Canadian farmers, so I have a few questions for him. He might want to have a conference with his colleagues from that side of the House because in the previous session it was his party that voted against $500,000 for capital gains exemptions to farmers. It was the Liberals who voted against $92 million for drought relief for western farmers. He might want to question why they voted against such a measure. They also voted against some $200 million to meet the deficit of the Canadian Wheat Board. With all due respect, there he is standing in his place saying that we have undermined programs for western farmers, but in every case it was his party that voted against significant benefits for western farmers.

What about Bill C-92 where there was legislation to improve the operations of the Wheat Board, and again it was his party that voted against that legislation.

Mr. MacAulay: Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member. Just for an example, let me state what we voted against in this budget. The government wished to withdraw $200 million from crop insurance; grain and flour transportation, $60 million; rail and branch line rehabilitation programs, $48 million; grain and crop advance programs, $54 million; dairy export programs, $12 million; commodity based loan program, $15 million; Canadian Dairy Commission, $10 million. I would like to remind my hon. colleague from across the floor that the free trade agreement is destroying agriculture in Canada, and if we lose supply management, we have no dairy industry, which is the backbone of agriculture in Atlantic Canada. I used the Advance Payments for Crops Act a number of years as a farmer, and I am well aware of what a benefit it is to agriculture and to seed producers. Even if you do not use the program, if the farmer who needs the money gets the advance interest free, it keeps the product off the market which is a major asset to marketing.

• (1720)

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues in condemning this government's actions and that party for its policies on agriculture and trade. Everyone remembers almost a year ago when the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture, and the Minister for International Trade went travelling throughout this country telling Canadians how free trade would be the best thing they ever voted for and how it would be the greatest thing ever for our agricultural community. Well, we recently found out that this in fact is not the case. With all the recent problems we have been having in the pork industry, in the dairy industry with ice cream and yogurt, clearly this government was less than truthful in what it was saying this past election.

As agriculture is very important to my riding, I take this debate very seriously. I want to outline for members why I believe our agricultural industry is slowly but surely being destroyed by this Minister of Agriculture and his government. It is clear to me that we are facing a new era in agriculture. I would go so far as to say we are facing a new type of Canada under this government.

Agriculture in Canada faces its greatest challenge in recent history. This apprehension has increased in the days following the free trade agreement and following the recent negotiations on the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Decisions that have been made for us behind closed doors on free trade I believe are tearing down the institutions that took years to build up in Ontario and across Canada, institutions like marketing boards and the food processing industry.

Some of the marketing boards are over 60 years old. The Milk Marketing Board of B.C. was created in 1928. The Ontario Vegetable Processing Marketing Board and the Canadian Wheat Board are well over 50 years old. I will contend to you, Mr. Speaker, that these marketing boards are now in jeopardy because of this government's policies with regard to free trade and its recent agreements at the General Agreement on Tariff and Trade.

My colleagues and I have voiced our concerns respecting this direct attack on the supply management system of marketing and in my role as opposition critic for trade I will continue to defend Canadian farmers and the interests of Canadian farmers against this government's attack on agriculture. Why do I believe that agriculture will be adversely affected by this government?

In the past few years the United States has found its agricultural industry in chaos. In most cases farmers have simply produced, produced, and produced, hoping that they will receive a fair return for their products on the export market. When they do not, the American government uses huge amounts of money to subsidize producers of these products, caring little for what they receive on the world market.

Agricultural trade policy analyst Mark Ritchie, from the state of Minnesota, agrees when it reported that according to U.S. figures, the return on wheat recently sold to the U.S.S.R. only gave them 39 per cent of their cost of production. This, he said, established an artificial world price. Well, if they are subsidizing their farmers by that much how are we to compete? If we are to trade fairly in agricultural products, surely we can expect the Americans to also trade fairly. Nowhere in this free trade agreement, or nowhere in this government's trade policies do we find anything that says that we will have the same trading conditions as the Americans. This is not a level playing field. Unfortunately some years ago under GATT the Americans were given an exemption.

Well, we cannot have a free trade deal while the Americans have an exemption. And this government was neglectful in signing a free trade deal under those conditions.

I believe the government is trying to circumvent marketing boards by increasing imports. Once it destroys the agricultural industry, we will be dependent on our good natured buddies to the south, or the Prime Minister's friends to the south, for our food products. What kind of country will we have when we depend on a foreign country for our foodstuffs? What kind of sovereign nation will Canada be if we will have to continually buy food from the Americans? This free trade deal and this government's policies with regard to trade in agricultural products will eventually lead us to that spot.

Now we have the so–called proponents of the free market system saying, what has worked before must go, and we must be a part of the world chaos in the marketplace. I say this must not go. We must be able to have our own institutions. The former Prime Minister shakes his head. Quite frankly, your negotiations at GATT with the Minister for International Trade have gone nowhere.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not know the philosophy on the rules. I am not sure if I can ask a question at this stage. But I wonder if the hon. member would like to compare the multilateral trade negotiations under the Liberal government in the Tokyo round with those that we are engaged in now with regard to the protection of agriculture.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There will be an opportunity after the hon. member finishes his debate at 5.30 p.m. for questions or comments.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I could not hear exactly what he said over all the noise.

Mr. Boudria: It was irrelevant anyway.

Mr. Speller: As in all the areas of policy this government deals with, we see a long line of broken promises. Let me review this trail of broken promises for you, Mr. Speaker. I am afraid with my short time I will only be able to mention one or two. The one that we are specifically talking about today is the commitment by this government during the past election that our Canadian agricultural industries would not be harassed by the Americans.

We have clearly seen in recent weeks and months that this is not the case. In fact, in the areas of pork, fishing, steel, yogurt, and ice cream there is constant American harassment of our industries, with no response from this government. In fact, the part-time Minister of Agriculture said recently in Calgary that the United States is harassing with some trade policies which are "wrong, unfair and hypocritical." This is a great time to tell us. Why did he not tell us that during the last election?

When the U.S. omnibus trade bill was passed, the Liberal opposition cautioned the government that this new body of trade laws would have to be applied to the free trade agreement. They denied this was the case. Now we have seen the response. We have seen the Americans using this omnibus trade bill to circumvent any spirit of free trade. They should not have signed a deal without first outlining what a subsidy was. As a result of this neglect, we get this constant harassment by our friends to the south. The government has allowed the U.S. omnibus trade bill to be entrenched in the free trade agreement, instead of securing an exemption from its ramifications as a condition for signing the agreement. Make no mistake, a precedent was set here. A precedent has been set in the pork case. I fear that unless Canada takes a strong stand in opposing this countervail, this could adversely affect our other areas of trade, especially those areas of trade that are supply managed.

Time after time, this government has told us about the good will that will follow as a result of the free trade agreement. It is clear that Canada and its representatives, the Minister for International Trade and the part-time Minister of Agriculture, are simply pawns in the United States game to acquire full access to our markets.

Once again, it is the people of rural Canada, the farmers of our country, who are the losers in this. This action is just one more affront to our supply managed system. The U.S. is determined to see our marketing boards destroyed, and this government does not have the intestinal fortitude to fight back.

In my last minute I just want to summarize by saying that I believe this government, in its policies with regard to agriculture, are adversely affecting the lives and livelihoods of farmers in Canada, especially those farmers in Haldimand—Norfolk who are good farmers and good people. They do not deserve the policies of this present government.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief and specific question for the hon. member who has just spoken. Does the member approve of the treatment of Canadian agriculture by the Liberal government in the Tokyo Round of trade negotiations?

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, we are concerned about the Uruguay Round. I will tell him that right now. We are worried about the future here, and the right hon. member should know that it is his government that has to stand up for the farmers in Canada or there will not be any farmers left in this country to farm.

It is a serious situation that we have in GATT. The government promised that supply management was not on the table. What do we have? Now it is saying: "Well, I guess supply management is on the table, but we will get the best deal we can". For Canadian dairy farmers that is not good enough. Canadian dairy farmers want this government to have the fortitude to stand up for supply management.

We are not like the Americans. We do not have their abundance of products. We are not like the Europeans. In fact, it is the Europeans who are now coming over to the Canadian system. This government wants to regress. It wants to go back to an American system.

I hope the right hon. member will go down to a dairy farm in New York State to see how those dairy farmers survive. It is not like our good dairy farmers up here in Canada. It has been that way because of the supply managed system put in by previous Liberal governments.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that the hon. member declined to answer that specific and direct question.

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I question the second round of questioning by the right hon. member. Is this normal procedure for the House?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, if there is nobody else rising, and it is a supplementary question. Therefore I will recognize the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, my point is very brief. I naturally want to let other members of the House have the opportunity to take part in this debate.

I asked the question about the Tokyo Round of negotiations very deliberately, because those who follow international trade negotiations will remember—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville.

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. You mentioned that if there were no other members standing you would give a supplementary question to the hon. member. There were other members standing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I did not see them, I am sorry. Is the right hon. member finished with his supplementary question?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I regret this challenge of your authority in the House.

I am not surprised that the hon. Liberal member would not answer the question about the Tokyo Round because his colleagues in the House who are familiar with agriculture, perhaps more familiar than he is, will know that the biggest sell-out of Canadian agriculture in international trade negotiations occurred under a Liberal government in the negotiation of the Tokyo Round because the representatives of agriculture, farm groups, provincial governments and others, were excluded from the process of negotiation, excluded from the process of consultation.

He talked about the Uruguay Round. I had the opportunity to lead the Canadian delegation to the Uruguay Round three years ago and brought with me representatives of Canadian agriculture and started at that time a process of involving directly in the negotiations representatives of producer groups and of farm organizations from across the country. That has continued to be the case.

The hon. member has an obligation to this House to recognize that while there is chaos in international markets, it is part of the obligation of Canada to try to bring an end to that chaos and try to establish a situation in which Canadian farmers who on the basis of their ability are the best in the world can compete successfully in international markets. My question is: Why does he run away from that responsibility?

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. minister surely must know that the free trade agreement was the biggest sell-out to Canadian farmers in history.

With regards to consultation, the right hon. member should ask the part-time Minister of Agriculture what consultation he had with the farmers. Surely the minister must know that the Canadian farmers with him were not in the negotiating room; they were SAGITs. They were set up for consultation with you, but they were not in the negotiating room. In fact the Minister of Agriculture—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. The hon. Solicitor General has the floor.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I don't know—

[English]

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. You have completely ignored the Opposition and everybody else around here while you let the minister speak twice. Then you turn around—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. Solicitor General on debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I don't know whether we should blame these Liberal scare tactics on Hallowe'en, but while we are on the subject of our ability to consult, which was mentioned by my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark), I think we should recall that for sixteen years, a previous Liberal Government and more specifically its prime minister, never bothered to meet farm leaders, so we don't need your advice on how to consult!

Since 1984, the Prime Minister of Canada has met farm leaders nine or ten times. We established the consultation mechanisms you mentioned earlier, such as SAGIT, where farm producers were consulted at every stage of the Canadian Government's decisions concerning the future of agriculture. If there is one shortcoming we are certainly not guilty of, Mr. Speaker, it is failing to consult. In fact, during the last five years, farm producers have been consulted as they never have been before, and they have been involved in our negotiating process at the international and national level.

Mr. Speaker, at noon I met representatives of the dairy industry who were at a convention in Quebec attended by representatives of producers, processors and consumers, all in the dairy industry.

For the first time, Mr. Speaker, under this Government, we were able to bring together, around the same table, people interested in developing the dairy industry in Canada, not in working against each other but in working together, to ensure that the agro-food industry, especially in the dairy sectors will be as prosperous in the future as it has been during the past few years.

Mr. Speaker, we agree that as in other sectors, we are facing certain problems. It is clear that the decision handed down recently to the effect that yogurt and ice cream—this is a recent GATT decision—are not covered and protected by the import controls Canada had been using and still uses to protect its marketing boards, that the Canadian Government will continue to defend and protect the interests of farm producers before the GATT tribunal, next week.

It just goes to show that we must defend the integrity of Article 11 of GATT. This question, which may seem technical, is a very important one. For more than 40 years, ever since GATT and its regulations came into effect, member States, including Canada, and especially this area, have always used Article 11 to protect marketing boards. However, about two years ago when we were into the last lap, so to speak, of the GATT negotiations, we realized this was very important, considering the fact that Article 11 is the only article that protects our marketing boards and allows them to exist. It was our sincere conviction that we had to both strengthen and clarify this article. When we consider that a major part of our agriculture, worth several billion dollars, depends on the interpretation of an article that is subject to an international tribunal, it seemed to us, and we still feel, that it is important to clarify this article and ensure that it accurately represents what we want it to represent for Canadian farm producers. Mr. Speaker, we have said many times that this is what we are going to do at GATT, that is what we are doing, and that is what we will keep on doing.

Farm producers and the people I met at noon, including the president of Québec producers, are somewhat concerned, and they were very pleased with this meeting, Mr. Speaker, where they sat with us and the processors at the same table, to ensure that the GATT tribunal, which is more or less our last resort, will be able to protect our interests satisfactorily.

Another message which I think is very important, Mr. Speaker, and I believe Members on the other side of the House should pay attention to this, is that marketing boards must change with the times. It is very important to make the fabric of our Canadian agriculture more market sensitive. In the past few years, Mr. Speaker, we have seen a number of often radical changes in the eating habits of Canadians, and all sectors, including the meat sector, the grains sector and the dairy sector, one of the most important ones in Canada, must become more aware of the needs of Canadians. They must be market-sensitive both internationally and nationally.

Mr. Speaker, we must meet the challenge of free trade, which is of considerable benefit to Canadian agriculture. Our exports in many areas have increased since the beginning of this year. However, free trade is not a panacea. Obviously, all agricultural sectors must be prepared to meet the challenge of these new markets, whether they are inside our borders or across the globe. As far as globalization of markets is concerned, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Given the difficulty we had in raising questions and comments after the last speaker because of the minister's two interventions, are we going to have an opportunity before 5.45 p.m. to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No, you will not. The hon. minister has the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I know that I have little time left. In closing, I believe that the message we must with the whole Canadian farming community is one of hope, a message that we have to work together to solve our problems.

Mr. Robichaud: To repair the damage you did!

Mr. Blais: I was very impressed this afternoon to see around the same table with me processors who take milk and transform it into products that are to be increasingly available—

Mr. Robichaud: Have you talked to Mr. McCain lately?

Mr. Blais: Yes, in that industry as in others, the individual you mention had threatened to go to the United States the day after the Free Trade Agreement was signed but he has since changed his mind.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. minister's time has expired.

It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the Business of Supply pursuant to Standing Order 81(14).

Accordingly the question is on the motion of the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

PETITIONS

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House this morning a number of petitions that have been certified correct pursuant to Standing Order 36. The petitioners are from throughout northwestern British Columbia, from Terrace, Prince Rupert, Kitimat, the Hazeltons and other communities who are expressing concerns about the proposed goods and services tax. They believe that this tax should not proceed and that the government should cease with the proposal which would shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reforms.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, it is also my pleasure to present a petition to this House signed by over 1,000 Canadians, most of whom are students at the Mount Allison University in Sackville, New Brunswick. They call upon their elected representatives to stop the erosion of quality and accessibility in our universities, colleges and other post-secondary educational institutions in Canada.

The petitioners are quite concerned that Bill C-33, introduced in the House on June 27, will reduce federal transfer payments for post-secondary education by approximately $900 million over five years and they respectfully call upon the government to withdraw Bill C-33.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition, signed by a number of people, with regard to the VIA Rail issue. In this petition these people, many of whom are Canadians, avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right to present a petition in front of the House of Commons. They believe that the railway passenger service as carried on by VIA Rail is an essential means of transportation for many Canadians and has been part of the basic Canadian infrastructure for over 100 years. They believe that the government's announcement of a $400 million cutback over five years will hurt the industry and they believe it is very important for tourism.

• (1110)

I would like to explain that this petition has been signed by Canadians from Wabowden, Churchill, Gillam, Lundar, Winnipeg, Thompson, Rankin Inlet, Flin Flon, Rexdale, Ontario, and also by non-Canadians from Sweden, Greece, Germany and England.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and privilege to submit a petition to this House pursuant to Standing Order 36. The attached petition is certified as correct in format and content and is from many Canadians of Eglinton—Lawrence and the greater metropolitan area. All of them pray that this House put aside the GST proposals because they see in the GST proposals a tax that will encourage a greater number of cash transactions and lead to greater scoffing of the law and will begin to classify many Canadians in those categories of those who will start to evade as well as avoid paying tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege today to present a petition, properly signed by the residents of Thunder Bay, who plead with this government to reconsider their orders to cancel VIA Rail passenger rail service through the city of Thunder Bay.

We have had passenger rail service in Thunder Bay for the last 105 years. As of January 15, unless this government changes its mind, we will no longer have passenger rail service.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present another petition on behalf of the citizens of Egmont who plead with this government to review what it is proposing to do with respect to the goods and services tax that is presently before this House.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty to table a petition in the name of several Canadians who join with thousands of others to tell this House that they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax. These people were seen on the Hill yesterday protesting this unfair and inflationary measure proposed by the Tories and would like to make the point that indeed the government should understand that it has an imperative to withdraw this very regressive tax.

RIDEAU RIVER

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I have this morning in my possession over 1,500 signatures from residents of Ottawa South, certified correct pursuant to Standing Order 36, asking for the federal government to co-operate with provincial and local governments to once and for all begin the process of cleaning up the Rideau River, an historic waterway that flows through the National Capital.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition duly signed by a number of residents of Toronto and Mississauga who are concerned for the aboriginal peoples of Canada, especially those in Labrador and Quebec. They ask this Parliament to join with the Assembly of First Nations and the Innu of Labrador and other aboriginal peoples of northern Canada in opposing use of their lands for NATO-NORAD attack training, specifically the low level flight training in Canada, and opposing the establishment of a NATO operations base in Canada at Goose Bay. They request the funding that Canada gives to NATO and NORAD be redirected toward enabling the aboriginal peoples to regain control of their land and livelihood and toward promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have also a petition from a number of people of Toronto who are concerned for the large number of people who depend on VIA Rail transportation. They ask this Parliament to reject any proposed reduction or elimination of VIA Rail service, to see to the modernizing of the equipment so that VIA Rail can provide world-class service and to build a high speed passenger train between Montreal and Windsor.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting two petitions in accordance with Standing Order 36, petitions from Prince Edward Island in such places as Mill River and Port Hill, but the predominance of them are from Summerside, P.E.I. The petitioners suggest that this proposal in addition to other things that have happened to them will have a devastating effect on their economy. It is a pleasure to present this petition.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to present a petition this morning, pursuant to Standing Order 36 and certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions, that points out a whole set of reasons why the petitioners oppose the government's decision to curtail passenger rail service. The petitioners point out particularly their concern that this is a very environmentally unfriendly decision which the government has taken and are asking the government to not only reverse the decision but to actually invest in a modernized VIA Rail system to provide a rapid, economical, safe and environmentally sound means of transportation.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on another matter,I have another petition signed by a number of western Canadians who are very concerned about the government's decision to tax reading materials, baby diapers, home heating fuels and almost everything else. They are asking the government to cease and desist from proceeding with this goods and services tax.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to rise in this House today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present three petitions on behalf of the residents of Lambton—Middlesex.

Wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax. There are eight petitions here and it has been an honour to table them.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of petitions to table today. The first is signed by 138 customers of the B & B variety store on the corner of Brock and Brown Streets in Westfort, Thunder Bay. It is addressed to Parliament and is duly certified as appropriate. The undersigned call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax, and to reform the taxation system so there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the second petition, signed by residents of British Columbia, is one of hundreds of petitions that have been tabled in this House by this party, calling upon the Government of Canada to scrap its plans to decimate VIA Rail and to move forward to not only maintain the existing VIA network but to upgrade VIA's equipment and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger service.

I also have a petition bearing 10,500 signatures from people from one end of the country to the other protesting the VIA Rail cuts. I will be forwarding that to the Prime Minister.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the revolt against that unholy tax continues. What you saw on the Hill yesterday is but a small aspect of what is happening across this country. Here is the latest manifestation of it. More than 1,000 signatures from Burin—St. George's, Isle au Morts, Port au Basques, Grand Bank, Grand Bruit, Burin, Mortiere, and many other communities, people who want to register their protest against this terrible tax.

The undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax. There will be more.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I want to present four petitions on behalf of the people of Egmont, who want the government to scrap the goods and services tax.

The petitioners believe the new tax to be an unfair tax grab and they request the government to set aside this new tax policy.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I would also like to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of the people of Thunder Bay, Ontario, who are asking this government to keep the VIA Rail service now operating in Canada and to improve upon it.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, today I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by the residents of Hamilton Mountain. The petitioners have spoken out overwhelmingly against the Conservative government's proposed 9 per cent goods and services tax. The petitioners feel that the tax is unfair.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon this House to reject the Conservative government's 9 per cent goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege today to stand and present two petitions, one from Canadians all the way from British Columbia to Ontario, calling upon the Parliament of Canada to maintain VIA as Canada's national railway.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, in the second petition, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax, mostly on the basis that it is an unfair tax because of its lack of regard for people's ability to pay.

• (1120)

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and my privilege to rise again on a petition on behalf of the residents of Thunder Bay, who humbly pray and beseech this Parliament and this government to reconsider its decisions regarding cuts to VIA Rail passenger service, especially as it pertains to the citizens of Thunder Bay, who feel themselves very much a part of this province and this country, and who will, as a result of the cuts, feel themselves further isolated.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

COPYRIGHT LEGISLATION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader. This is in no way intended to be an awkward question, I want him to understand that. He would be aware that there are a number of people visiting Parliament today who are concerned about phase two of the Copyright Act legislation that is being proposed and processed.

I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could simply give the House some indication of the status of that legislation and when we might expect it to begin the process through the House of Commons.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to give some observations to the hon. member. I am looking forward to receiving my own delegation in this regard this afternoon.

I am told that work is proceeding on target on phase two of the copyright legislation and that we should have a bill in the House in the early part of the new year. I am given to understand that there are issues other than the issues in which the ACTRA people are interested. It is indeed those issues which have caused some of the delays. There is no intention on the part of the government to not discharge its commitment to artists in Canada.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I say to the parliamentary secretary that we appreciate that indication. I think all we needed was some indication of the relative status of the bill and the fact that the first of the new year is being aimed at as the time for introduction, which I think is satisfactory.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena) moves:

That this House calls upon the Government to implement an ecologically sound "green" tax system.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have today as a votable day with the motion before the House, calling upon the government to implement an ecologically sound green tax system.

Many members of the House, and certainly many Canadians, will wonder just exactly what that is. The green tax system, the GTS, as we call it, we believe is the way of the future. It proposes to make a new system out of the best of our options either technologically or in terms of the workforce in terms of the natural resources that our country has. The GST, on the other hand, the goods and services tax as proposed by the Minister of Finance, is an admission of failure. It proposes to make a failing system more expensive.

The government says that it endorses the concept of sustainable development, the government says that it wants to integrate economic concerns in all aspects of its policy making, and the government says that it cares about the environment. The government says that it endorses the Brundtland report, the World Commission on the Environment and Development, yet one of the most important doctrines in this report is that economic and environmental processes are inseparable.

It is with amazement and disbelief that we watch this government go backwards in time as it proposes a Draconian tax measure that only serves to compound and amplify our current environmental crisis. The GST is regressive. It taxes recycled paper at the same rate as unrecycled paper, bicycles at the same rate as cars, canoes at the same rates as motor boats, alternative energy at the same rate as fossil fuels.

The GST is not just environmentally neutral, it is environmentally damaging. Environmentally sound products often cost more than products that are sustainable. The GST only widens this gap, making it more difficult for consumers to choose greener products. As we have learned in a number of recent polls that have been done by Angus Reid and by others across this country, Canadians are prepared to pay more taxes for certain objectives. The number one objective of Canadians from coast to coast is to have a cleaner, safer, sustainable environment.

The conservative approach of the Minister of Finance, as he admits himself, is to regressively tax workers, the middle class, the poor and small business, to tax transactions, to replace the manufacturers' sales tax with the 9 per cent GST. Many Canadians are wondering why 9 per cent. That is obviously a targeted amount which the Minister of Finance wants to raise for other purposes. The reason the minister has chosen 9 per cent to flog is so that he can bring the rate down to a lower one, then ratchet it back up again and look as though he has done some kind of honourable deed in lowering the tax from nine to eight to seven to six or to five only to ratchet it back up again as was done with the manufacturers' sales tax which went from 9 to 10 to 11 to 12 and continues progressively upwards.

The Conservative and Liberal approach to taxation is identical. If one looks at the last three decades of ministers of finance from both the Liberal and Conservative Parties, we now see the results. Corporations three decades ago paid 50 per cent of the taxes in this country and working families paid 50 per cent. Now corporations pay only 20 per cent and working families pay 80 per cent of the taxes in Canada. Most wealthy Canadians pay little or no tax and thousands of profitable corporations pay little or no tax as well.

We have to ask some fundamental questions such as where does such a tax system lead. The evidence is now overwhelming in Canada. We are among the most polluting and wasteful countries in the world. We learned just this morning in the environment committee from witnesses from Environment Canada that each Canadian produces more than four tonnes of carbon dioxide as a result of our activities in driving cars, through industry and through the various forms of carbon dioxide production which are adding to global warming through the production of greenhouse gases.

We are passing on huge fiscal and environmental debts to future generations. One does not need to look far in our environment to find the kinds of huge costs, whether it is the hundreds of billions in national debt to the kinds of debts that are being passed on through poor fishery and forestry practices, the erosion of farmland and the many other problems we have with toxic and hazardous waste dump sites across the country.

The simple fact is that we cannot produce laws, regulations inspectors or courts fast enough to halt, prosecute and clean up the colossal messes that are about us. The list is long. There is acid rain. There is toxic rain. There is Great Lakes pollution. There are holes in the ozone layer. There are greenhouse gases and global warming, toxic and hazardous waste dumps, PCBs, pesticides, nuclear waste, enough low-level radioactive waste and tailing ponds and impoundments to cover the highway from Halifax to Vancouver six feet deep.

The list is long and growing. How often do we now hear of endangered species and endangered spaces in Canada? We need a tax system that is fundamentally simple, ecologically sound and designed to encourage sustainable development. This tax approach will create jobs, reduce resource waste, clean up the environment and pass on to future generations as good a planet as we inherited, the fundamental premise on which the Brundtland recommendations were made through the United Nations to the world.

How does a green tax system work? It is best, in my view, to deal with examples so that the public has as clear an idea as possible about what a green tax system is all about.

One could ask a question in relation to recycled paper. The question would be, what is the maximum amount of virgin paper that can be reasonably recovered and delivered for recycling. One could take any city, any urban area and in fact many rural areas of the country and ask how many packages, newspapers, and paper are out there and in terms of the costs of gathering and transporting that to a centralized depot near enough to a facility that can de-ink and recycle that paper. As we have learned in some cities on this continent including some cities right here in Canada, a very substantial amount can be recovered for that form of recycling.

Then you ask what is the maximum amount of recycled fibre that can be reasonably placed in various kinds of products. We know, for example, that the Minister of Public Works, whom I am glad to see here today, produced a Householder made out of recycled paper that had roughly 50 per cent recycled fibre in it. It is good quality paper, it provides legible type, it can carry the reproduction of graphs and photographs, and so on. In some products you in fact can go considerably above the 50 per cent recycled fibre capacity for paper and still have good reproduction quality.

Then you ask what are the environmental costs of landfills and so on. For paper packaging and paper waste and so on it is now approaching one-half the contents of the dumps. In Ontario alone landfills are now consuming one and a half acres a day. One has to ask what are the costs of, rather than recycling that kind of material, putting it into dumps that produce methane and other serious problems for the environment.

Take these and other factors such as the real cost of harvesting forests which must now include the loss of fish, bird and wildlife habitat, soil erosion and the forest's role. One of the fundamentally most important matters that the Standing Committee on the Environment is now looking into is the capacity of various species of trees and plants to act as a carbon sink to take that carbon dioxide out of the atmosphere and hold it so that we do not face the horrendous consequences of global warming.

Then you plug in the green tax system which is really a very simple tax system, Mr. Speaker, as you would know. The Minister of Finance, just to deal with his day-to-day business, has dozens of feet of tax law. There are constantly new rulings. Parliament is constantly passing new laws in relation to the old tax system that we have adopted and has proven to be very negative in terms of our environment and our social development.

You plug the green tax system in at one or more levels to obtain the desired result. This is just in relation to the recycling of paper. You determine the maximum fibre use and the minimum environmental damage and then you regulate the green tax based on your desired result.

There are amazing side benefits. The energy saving in recycled paper alone is up to 40 per cent and there is reduced marine pollution from pulp mills. We know that 40 per cent of the marine pollution of both fresh water and salt water in Canada, comes from pulp mills. You get improved air quality and improved water quality by having fewer dioxins, furons and organochlorines placed into the environment.

The staggering fact is that recycled paper is already cost competitive but because of present structures in Canadian society, including tax, marketing and industrial, it is not fully available and in fact is not available at all to many institutions such as Parliament itself.

Green taxes are not new. We have had them to encourage recycling here in Canada on glass milk bottles, for example, going back one-third of a century through the form of deposits on bottles so that people would not throw them away but would in fact send them back to the milk company to be refilled. Aluminum, steel, old batteries, beer bottles, pop bottles and many other items have been collected for the purpose of recycling.

For waste reduction the idea is catching on, from simple things such as a toilet dam which costs about $2. A toilet dam goes in the back edges of the toilet tank and reduces the amount of water that is required per flush. It might sound like a foolish thing to be raising in the opening speech on a debate on a green tax system, but simple, available Canadian-made technologies would save Canadian consumers $250 million a year on water bills. The way that you implement those kinds of measures is through a green tax system.

On packaging, many products have three or more forms of packaging. There is plastic covering on whatever you are getting, then there is another kind of styrofoam or fill, then there is a cardboard box and in many cases there are additional forms of packaging.

The green tax system would tax the waste packaging based on real energy costs and real landfill costs and designers will soon help Canadian society in phasing out the waste through the implementation of green taxes on those forms of waste.

Let us take a look at acid rain, an area where green taxes would be far more efficient and far more effective than the kinds of reduction programs that have been implemented here or are proposed to be implemented, for example, in the United States. Parliament and government can design targets in terms of tonnage and timetables in terms of the time frame for the reductions and set caps or limits so that there is not future growth of acid generation of the atmosphere.

You base those on what the environment can safely handle and you tax directly through a green tax system every gram of SO2 or NO2 or SOX and NOX as they are more commonly known, based on known impacts. We know that a most conservative estimate that we deal with here in Canada is that the negative impact of acid precipitation on our environment is $1 billion per year made up of several hundred million dollars in lost forest growth, the killing off of more than 15,000 lakes, the impact on human health and so on.

If one wanted to look at the calculations that have been recently done in the United States on a per annum cost to the environment, it is $7 billion per year in building and monument destruction, $16 billion per year in lung damage according to the American Lung Association, $40 billion per year in damage resulting in medical costs and lost time to workers due air pollution and $5 billion a year in loss of lakes and forest productivity in the United States.

As we learned on a visit last week to Washington, D.C. to encourage our colleagues south of the border to do something serious about acid precipitation, a 50 per cent reduction of acid precipitation production in the United States will cost only $15 billion, less than one quarter of the cost in one year of airborne pollution and acid precipitation on the U.S. public.

This green tax system will fire up the research and development arms across Canada and bring about the production of energy efficient products, energy conservation and new clean sustainable technologies. We already know that we can save 52 per cent of the energy now consumed in Canada through conservation, releasing this energy for commercial, residential and other purposes.

What about a carbon tax, something that has rarely if ever been seriously debated on the floor of this Chamber. We already know that carbon dioxide, methane, CFCs and other greenhouse gases pose a relentless threat to the survival of planet earth. Entire countries will disappear beneath the oceans if we wait.

There are already alternatives. Mercedes Benz, for example, has produced a commercial test vehicle powered by hydrogen. One of my constituents in Prince Rupert makes his own hydrogen in his back yard out of simple wind technology through direct current, simply cracking the hydrogen from the water. He recompresses it with scuba equipment and puts it into retired aircraft oxygen cylinders. He has produced his own carburation system and has simply converted existing available North American and Japanese produced vehicles directly to hydrogen and, in fact, can operate them with the same carburation system on either gasoline or hydrogen should he want to take a long trip.

Present vehicles and future vehicles can be economically converted. A green tax on carbon is the carburetor for conversion costs because, as we know if one looks even at the more recent fossil fuel projects that are being proposed, whether it is Oslo, Lloydminster or Hibernia, those projects, at least according to their proponents, will only proceed if the Canadian taxpayers provide billions of dollars in direct welfare to those projects so that they can proceed.

It makes much more sense in the energy sector to have a green tax system in place providing for conversion to available technologies and alternatives that are more environmentally benign or, in fact, to options such as hydrogen which do not produce greenhouse gases.

The fossil fuel industry has become a leading danger to planetary survival.

Global warming is real and there is no known means to dramatically reduce CO2 from fossil fuel use. We must go to alternatives.

This government has promised to reduce carbon dioxide output by 20 per cent by the year 2005 and yet has not taken any steps to substantially reduce it since the announcement was made 18 months ago. The rate is too slow and a carbon tax can make a much larger transition possible by the year 2000.

• (1140)

There are holes in the ozone. According to the most recent reports from Scott Base in Antarctica and from our own measurements, they are growing very fast. CFCs, or fluorocarbons as they are called, is the basic element in the cooling systems of automobiles, air conditioners in homes and businesses, refrigerators and freezers. It is frequently if not always released when the air conditioner, freezer and refrigeration units are taken to dumps. The CFCs are continuing to release unhindered into the atmosphere. CFCs are still being sold in the Canadian market at basically the same price as they were before the Government of Canada announced the intention to phase out 85 per cent by the year 2000.

This is exactly the kind of area where there should be a green tax levy. A green tax levy would apply not only to new CFCs that are being produced but to those that are already in systems, encouraging municipalities, producers, and facilities that are involved in the re-gasing, whether it is of rail cars or of refrigeration units or whatever, to move much more quickly to new and available compounds, but also to safely remove and destroy those CFCs that pose one of the most severe environmental threats that we face.

A green tax will do all this by making the product as expensive as necessary for its complete and urgent removal and replacement. In all of these cases, part of the green tax can be diverted as direct funding for R and D, replacement products, retooling and refitting, or for a reverse green tax credit for environmentally friendly or benign products.

We are on the brink of disaster or to a new and exciting frontier of ecological sustainability. A GTS, a green tax system, can provide many acceptable economic and environmental impacts. It can encourage transitions from non-renewable to renewable energy. It can discourage waste in terms of packaging, reusable products and resources. It will promote recycling of paper, metals and containers. It will encourage new technologies, conservation, solar and energy efficiency. It will create new jobs. While it would require three, four or five jobs per unit, rather than one or two, in the forest sector, only a green tax can seriously address those kinds of broad resource and economic questions.

Forty thousand children will die today around the world from diseases, starvation and poor quality water. Several species will become extinct while we have this debate today. The tax system as we know it in Canada is inequitable, regressive and designed to keep afloat economic systems that are drifting us toward unparalleled disaster. A green tax system that is designed to halt the flow of persistent, toxic and bioaccumulative wastes into our environment, that is designed to minimize energy use and resource waste, that is designed for full employment, sustainable development, proactive as well as reactive health care, sustainable agriculture, fisheries and conservation areas, preservation of existing species and recovery of our much harmed environment is the politics of Canada's future and the fate of the earth.

We must have a green tax system, not a GST or any other proposal presently being promoted by the present government and Minister of Finance.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the presentation by the hon. member for Skeena. I must say that I was moved by his futuristic concepts and the fact that he has presented before us some very creative, thought-provoking ideas in terms of our tax system.

I suppose we could raise all sorts of points, but I would like to ask my hon. colleague from Skeena a question. He is aware of organizations that have put together ethical mutual funds, funds that are raised by those people who want to invest in economic activities that have ethical implications of a very positive nature.

Does my hon. colleague foresee tax incentives that might be provided for those people who would invest in ecologically positive enterprises? Does he foresee the possibility of a youth ecological corps in which young people could be mobilized to play their role in combating environmental deterioration? Does he foresee something of the nature of an ecological mutual fund where tax incentives could be provided for those investors who would put capital aside to mobilize and fight pollution?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. First, on the concept of ethical mutual funds, there is no doubt that they are catching the interest of a lot of Canadians who have either a small or a large amount of money that they want to invest. The ethical mutual funds look at not only the impact of a particular industry or a particular proposal on the environment, but at what kinds of plant facilities there are, what kind of collective agreements there are for the workforce and so on. They are gaining wide support from a broadening section of Canadian society.

In terms of the member's question in relation to tax incentives for those who are participating, that would not be the best approach. The best approach in fact is to apply the green tax system in relation to the resource sectors and in relation to industries themselves because the principle that is involved in ecologically sound taxation policies is to make sure that certain principles are adhered to; minimizing the amount of energy used, minimizing the amount of waste that is produced from any particular product, applying certain sound internationally respected principles such as using closed circuit technologies to make sure that persistent, toxic and bioaccumulative materials do not continue to go on to the land, into the marine environment or into the atmosphere.

The principal intention of a green tax system is and should be implemented by the Government of Canada in order to reduce waste and to move our technologies to the cutting edge. I think many of the stocks, shares and so on that would be found within an ethically sound mutual fund would be of those technologies, industries and social developments that are on the cutting edge and have been encouraged to do so by a green tax system.

The reason we do not have more accessibility and availability of renewable energy sources in this country is that it is not encouraged by the present tax system. The government has not only closed down access to public information in relation to the renewable sector, but in fact funding for R and D and so on has also been cut off. That is direct discouragement. On the other hand there is direct encouragement, through the funding of billions of dollars from Canadian taxpayers, to the nuclear and fossil fuel sectors which are now being demonstrated to be the least beneficial option either in terms of cost or energy efficiency.

The member's point on a green crop, I suppose you might call it, is one that I think Canada must look at with a much greater vigour because there are things in every single province and in both territories that require the serious address of not only young people, but society as a whole. It is often best to involve young people, either at the high school age or in the years immediately following high school, whether in terms of replanting stream banks to improve fisheries habitat or simply planting different species of trees.

There should be scientific people along who talk not only about the commercial nature of the various species that are being planted, but the benefits to fish, birds and to wildlife and also the growing threat to the planet in terms of global warming and the greenhouse effect. The process of simply replanting trees is helping to get a larger carbon sink growing that takes more of that out of the atmosphere.

In terms of ecological mutual funds, I think there is a direct relation to a green tax system in that a green tax system is ethically appropriate.

I think one of the most repugnant self-admissions by our present Minister of Finance is that he has admitted that the GST, whether it is 5 per cent or 9 per cent, is a regressive form of taxation. Why, at this point, would we be making some of the more ecologically expensive and devastating industries in terms of the long term for future generations more expensive and less likely to be able to redesign, retool and refit to make themselves, at the very least, ecologically and environmentally benign?

I think there is a great parallel between ethical mutual funds and the ethics that one finds in the kind of taxation I am talking about in terms of a green tax system.

Mr. Friesen Mr. Speaker, first of all, I think we should correct the record. I do not think the Minister of Finance has ever said that the GST is regressive.

Mr. Riis: Yes he has.

Mr. Fulton: He admitted it in here.

Mr. Riis: He said it in the House.

Mr. Friesen: I think he has misquoted the Minister of Finance.

I think the member's point is well taken in some areas. I think all of us are dismayed at the amount of styrofoam, for example, that McDonald's uses and the abuse of paper products by that corporation. Dr. David Suzuki has certainly made that point very well. He has also made the point that McDonald's gets much of its beef from Brazil to feed our hunger for red meat. He has labelled McDonald's as one of the great contributors to environmental problems.

In some ways you cannot argue with that. But at the same time McDonald's also is using its forum to have people send in coupons to oppose the GST. Now here you have an organization that is a polluter also opposing the GST. Since that is contradictory, would the member suggest that we should ignore all those coupons coming from McDonald's opposing the GST?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, first on the member's attempt to correct the record, the Minister of Finance has stated, not only here but outside of this Chamber, that the GST is a regressive tax. It is obvious that it is a regressive tax. Any economist anywhere in the country would point out that it is a regressive tax.

On the matter of McDonald's, I do not think there would be any better or more efficient way of getting McDonald's to clean up its act than applying a green tax system to it. You would simply continue to push on the accelerator in terms of a green tax in relation to the amount of packaging they use until they go to recyclable, reusable or at least reduced packaging systems.

As the member quite properly points out, the problems that are being faced globally now as a result of the burning of the rain forests in Brazil to provide very short-term pasturage for beef in Brazil is creating a colossal problem for one of the largest parts of our global lungs.

In terms of McDonald's sending in coupons and opposing the GST, I think they are responding quite properly on behalf of their consumers. It is a bad tax and it should go.

Mr. Speaker: Questions and comments are now terminated. I would like to listen to the hon. members all afternoon, but there are other members who want to speak.

[Translation]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the motion before the House today.

[English]

This motion relates to a new and insidious reality that has dramatically confronted not only Canadians but all citizens of our planet in recent times, namely that our environment is being threatened by the scourge of pollution and other ecological ills.

[Translation]

The problem is a global problem and requires global solutions. However, I think we can take some comfort from the fact that more and more countries are realizing they will have to take steps to protect the environment.

[English]

Let us be clear; safeguarding the environment is one of this government's highest priorities. We are committed to positive steps that will halt the abuse of the environment and preserve this most precious natural heritage.

I do not take issue with the broad concern for the environment that is implicit in the motion. But the proposal outlined in the motion—specifically that the government implement an ecological sound green tax system—puts the cart before the horse in my view. It fails to recognize that one can only build from a sound base.

A tax system can be used to pursue good, desirable and important objectives, but only if it first meets the fundamental objectives of a tax system, namely, to provide a stable, reliable source of public revenue. This is necessary to provide Canadians with the services they need and to support an efficient and competitive economy. It is to provide Canada with just such a tax system that the government has undertaken its proposal for tax reform.

A sound, basic tax system is a key requirement for Canada's continued economic prosperity. Our objective as a government has been to ensure that Canada has a tax system that is as fair and as efficient as possible.

We have been working to achieve exactly that. In stage one of tax reform we restored fairness and efficiency to the personal and corporate tax systems. We lowered tax rates and broadened the tax base, eliminating many of the special tax breaks that distorted investment and hindered the development of an efficient, competitive economy.

Our tax reform package ensures that investment decisions are based on economic merit rather than tax considerations. It assures that corporations and higher income Canadians pay their fair share of taxes. It ensures more equitable treatment of individuals in similar economic circumstances. It ensures that Canadians in lower income brackets have a smaller tax burden in proportion to their income than higher income Canadians.

In stage two of the tax reform we are proposing to replace the existing, outdated federal sales tax with the goods and services tax.

[Translation]

The GST will achieve three major objectives: First, it will help the general effort to reduce the deficit and ensure that we can continue to afford the programs and services valued by Canadians. Second, it will help ensure that Canada is able to compete effectively on world markets. Finally, it will improve the basic fairness of our tax system. In fact, low and middle income Canadians will be protected when the GST is implemented.

[English]

Building a sound tax system is part of our overall strategy for ensuring a stronger, more competitive economy. During the last five years we have made considerable progress in implementing that strategy.

[Translation]

One of the main objectives of this plan is to deal with the need to cut back public spending, reduce our annual deficit and control the growth of the public debt. Mr. Speaker, we have made considerable progress towards achieving that objective. We have reduced spending on government operations as well as the rate of growth of program spending. Last year, we spent $1.7 billion less on government operations than in 1984–85, a drop of 10 per cent. As a result of the measures taken by the government, we were able to reduce program spending as a percentage of our gross domestic product from 19.5 per cent in 1984–85 to 16.5 per cent last year.

• (1200)

We have also cut the government's deficit by more than $9.5 billion compared to what it was in 1984, and we have reduced the growth of the public debt. During the past fiscal year, for the first time in 15 years the increase in the debt was below 10 per cent, compared to a peak of 24 per cent in 1984.

In addition to controlling costs, major steps have been taken to ensure that Canadians are competitive. These measures include deregulation of the energy and transportation sectors, improved training programs, a new competition policy and, of course, the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

These changes have helped to provide for a healthy and confident public sector. About 209,000 jobs have been created in Canada since January 1 this year, when the Free Trade Agreement came into force. These jobs are part of the 1.5 million new jobs created in Canada during the past five years.

[English]

In working to build a healthy economy this government recognizes that it is increasingly important to ensure that economic growth is compatible with the protection of our environment. The government is firmly committed to the principle that a healthy environment and a healthy economy go hand in hand. It is impossible to have one without the other.

We are giving concrete expression to this commitment by our support for the concept of sustainable development, in the policies we are pursuing here at home, as well as in initiatives we are undertaking internationally.

[Translation]

The public demands that we strike a new balance between the way we do business and the way we manage our environment. For governments, this means making environmental concerns a priority in economic policy development. Industry must make better use of natural resources. Our natural resources are a basic raw material for the production process and are vital to our growth and economic well-being. Our natural resources are also directly affected by production processes and the resulting waste. Finally, the general public must change its demand for consumer goods, its methods of waste disposal and indeed its way of life.

We have already seen the beginnings of a commitment to this: industries are developing codes of good environmental practice, consumers are taking part in waste recycling programs and choosing environmentally friendly products, governments are setting stricter standards to protect the environment and international agencies are developing protocols to protect the planet.

To protect our natural resources from environmental deterioration and misuse, we must ensure that consumers and producers bear the real costs of their decisions—not only the direct costs, but also all the social costs. Market forces can be channeled by creating economic incentives and deterrents that will encourage consumers, businesses and also governments to make decisions every day for more a cost-effective resource allocation and better environmental protection.

Incentives based on market forces provide real benefits for the environment and the economy, they promote more enlightened use of natural resources, they encourage businesses to be creative in finding economic solutions and they complement the policy framework already in place.

[English]

Like most countries, historically Canada has relied mainly on regulatory approaches to protecting the environment. We continue to believe that strong regulations are necessary to deal with the variety of threats to the environment such as dangerous chemicals. Nevertheless, in other areas there is significant potential to mobilize market forces to preserve the environment and to ensure that consumers and producers of polluting products bear the environmental costs of their actions.

Many activities that are a threat to the environment are not the result of efficient markets but rather of market failures. These activities often lead to what economists call externalities, where the environmental costs of manufacturing certain products are not borne by the producer or the consumer but by society as a whole.

In fact, in the case of transboundary pollution like acid rain, the costs are borne by the citizens of other countries. Using our resources effectively, which is, after all, the key to sustainable growth, requires an accurate assessment of the real costs and benefits of production and consumption.

[English]

This is the philosophy that underlies the initiatives we have taken and that we will continue to take in the international arena to ensure that environmental protection and economic development are mutually reinforcing and not mutually exclusive. This is the approach the Prime Minister pursued with his colleagues at the Paris economic summit. It is the approach we are pursuing at the OECD, in the Commonwealth and in our proposal to ensure that the World Bank integrates environmental concerns more effectively into its operations.

We are committed to the same principles domestically as we are internationally. We do not believe that we can rely entirely on regulatory and legal approaches. Important as they are, they essentially stop things that should not be done.

[Translation]

It is also important, Mr. Speaker, to encourage appropriate action, and this is where market-oriented solutions could be used, for instance by encouraging a switch to new technologies that are able to bring pollution down to levels that can be absorbed without unacceptable consequences for the environment.

[English]

The importance that this government places on the environment was made evident in the Speech from the Throne. The government identified preservation of Canada's environment as one of four fundamental objectives for this mandate.

Recent changes to the cabinet decision-making system—the creation of the cabinet committee on the environment—will ensure that all government policies and initiatives are compatible with environmental objectives.

The forming of this committee represents a major change in the governmental decision-making process. As a catalyst for this change the government has created a new institution, the National Round Table on the Environment and the Economy. The round table brings together representatives from government, business, environmental groups and the academic world to seek acceptable means of reconciling environmental concerns and economic challenges.

While round table members may have diverse views and priorities, they share a common goal: to harmonize economic and other types of development with the need to conserve the environment.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, has announced that this government is preparing an exhaustive action plan that will translate the concept of sustainable development into real terms in Canada.

• (1210)

Although it will take many years to implement, this plan will provide a framework for initiatives that will help us change our decision-making.

Our environmental action plan will improve our decisions by providing for better scientific knowledge, and training, more reliable data, better communications and more widespread use of advanced technology to monitor and report on the state of the environment.

[English]

Our plan will emphasize the importance of maintaining partnerships and establishing new ones among all elements of society—governments, industry, labour, non-governmental agencies, citizen groups and individual Canadians.

The federal government is taking responsibility for implementing the environmental action plan. Because the market-place cannot by itself establish the proper framework for responsible decisions on environment issues, governments at all levels must establish roles governing activities that affect the environment. We must establish the value of the environment through regulations, laws, and through economic and financial penalties and rewards.

As I have suggested, selective environmentally-oriented tax measures can have a place in our tax system in cases where this is the most effective means of achieving specific goals. However, as I said at the start, a modern, efficient tax system cannot be designed to achieve one single desirable goal, no matter how desirable. We must have a fundamentally sound, fair and efficient tax system before considering the use of the tax system to pursue so profound and wide-reaching objective.

Mr. Speaker, I may recall and repeat that this government has made a commitment to take all necessary steps to protect and preserve our environment.

We encourage policies that are ecologically sound. We do not oppose them. In fact, considering the complexity and extent of the pollution problem in Canada, we must seek new and imaginative solutions.

[English]

However, the opposition motion ignores the wider range of considerations that a responsible government must take into account. Canada must first have in place a stable, reliable tax system that will ensure our economy and fiscal health. Only when such a tax system is fully in place can we be sure we will have both the means and the ability to achieve the goal this motion seeks.

[Translation]

That, in a few words, is what this government is doing, Mr. Speaker, and for the reasons just mentioned, I believe the House should reject this motion.

[English]

Mr. Karygiannis: Mr. Speaker, the environment is something that concerns not only the members in this House, not only the average Canadian, but every person around the globe. We must stop borrowing the land from our children. We must work very hard to protect the environment in the future.

In the Scarborough area very close to my riding there is a committee called Save the Rouge Committee, that is working very hard. It is an area where there is talk that an expressway will go through, where houses will be built. It is an area where children at the present time go for school trips to clean up the environment, and they feel happy about it. It is an area for wildlife and where metro residents can go to enjoy themselves.

However, I heard the hon. member across the way talk about tax reform, and about the GST being 9 per cent. Clearly I was just baffled. Has the member not listened to the people of Canada, 80 per cent of whom are saying that they are opposed to the 9 per cent GST? Yesterday, outside, we had thousands of people voicing their concern against the GST.

The member rambled on about how fair the taxation is that the government is implementing and how it is working to reduce the deficit. I am just wondering if the member is in a nightmarish state and he has to open his eyes and see exactly what the people of Canada want.

Yes, the people of Canada want a better environment. However, the people of Canada have repeatedly said, "No, no, no" to the 9 per cent GST.

Just the other day my children brought home a form that I had to fill out and send to the government stating that we are against the GST because they will be taxed on their skating lessons. My little daughter asked me, "Dad, does that mean that I will have to pay more?". I am just wondering how the hon. member would answer this question to future generations of Canadians, how he will tell them that they have to pay more for their music lessons, more for their skating lessons and more for everything else. We are again turning around and taxing our education.

The Prime Minister stands up there and says, "We created 1.4 million jobs after the free trade legislation came in". These jobs are hamburger helpers at McDonald's.

My question for the minister is this. When will this government actually open its eyes and ears and see what the Canadian people want and listen to the Canadian people and stop rambling on about reducing the deficit? Since this government came into power the debt has doubled. Probably by the time the people of Canada kick you out, you will have taken it up by four times. The government should actually see what it has done to this country. It has taken it down the tubes.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that since we have come to government the deficit has not doubled. It has been lowered by approximately $10 billion, which is something important that he needs to know.

Second, when I listen to the description the hon. member from across this hall gives of our tax reform, I am not surprised that Canadians have some hesitation. But we will proceed to explain to them that this change is needed, that this change is a modern change, that it is a fair change.

I heard a little while back another hon. member say that the Minister of Finance had admitted that the GST was regressive—not at all. What the Minister of Finance has said is that sales tax can be regressive, and we have taken every measure to make sure that it is not so.

So we are talking about the deficit. We are taking the necessary measures to guarantee the income this government needs in order to provide Canadians with their programs. I can assure the hon. member that we will continue to do so.

He must agree that the decision we have taken to proceed with tax reform has not been done because we want to be popular. It has been taken because it is needed for this country. We are putting aside a tax which is devastating to our economy. We are doing it, following a model that is used in a large number of modern countries. Therefore, I do not agree with him on his conclusion.

I think that the environment, like all social programs, is threatened, not by decisions of any one government, but by the state of the finances of this country, which have to be put in order.

We inherited a very high deficit. We have worked to bring it down. It has been difficult, but we will continue to do so because we consider this to be the best way to guarantee this program, and to tackle environmental problems which are with us.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of State for Finance is in relation to the concluding remarks he made, that there needs to be some further changes to our tax system before any serious consideration can be given to bringing in environmentally appropriate taxation or a green tax system.

I would like the minister to address some of the simple points that I made when I was speaking. How does he explain that it is appropriate to tax bicycles under the GST at the same rate as motor vehicles, virgin paper at the same rate as recycled paper, and to tax a non-polluting industry producing any given product at the same rate as a similar industry that in fact is a polluting one?

If one looks at the nature of the environmental problems facing Canada, one sees that they are broad, they are severe, and they are increasing in their severity right across the country, whether it is with respect to toxic and hazardous waste or the movement of persistent and bio-accumulative materials into the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence system. What is happening is that every major run of fish in the world is on the decline, which is true of the Canadian fisheries as well. There is the rate of soil erosion to be looked at, and so on. If you talk to any economist you can find a direct link between the form of taxation that is taking place, the rate of environmental decline, and the amount of waste that is going on in our society.

The minister says that we have to wait until some future, more regressive tax measures are put in place before doing anything serious about the environment. Does the minister support the concept of a green tax system, or does he only support the kind of tax measures that are in place or being proposed by the present Minister of Finance?

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, what we support are all the measures that will enable this government to assume its full responsibility in all sectors. As I have indicated, we are changing a tax system which is very porous, which threatens the resources of the government, resources which are needed.

The member talks about bicycles. It is very easy to be very emotional about any particular item which is taxed, but bicycles are already taxed. He may not know that. A lot of other things are taxed directly or indirectly.

What we have been very careful about doing is providing a very generous credit system by exempting a certain number of basic essential products so that the system is fair. Once people are given the capacity to make their own choice they are not hampered by our reform.

This tax is far from being regressive. If we start removing this or that article, you will have to increase the rate, as the hon. member obviously knows. We are getting away from a tax system in which there are 75,000 tax collectors and 22,000 different particular arrangements, which are throwing our economy into a state of disorder.

These are central issues that we have to tackle in order to face the problems, which I agree are serious. The greatest reward or the greatest hope we can have is that we, at long last, are tackling these problems of the environment which have been with us a very long time.

I am very hopeful that all together we can pull out of this very damaging situation and make sure that we pass on a better world to our children.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, to keep it short, the minister speaks about how devastating the federal sales tax has been on the economy, and his word was "devastating". I think Canadians will note that his government has increased the tax from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent, thereby increasing the devastation by 50 per cent.

I would like to ask the minister this. Since he does not feel this tax is regressive, and since he thinks that the government has taken measures to ensure that it will not be regressive, why on earth does this government refuse to index the sales tax credit so that the poorest in our society can be assured that they are not going to be punished any more by this tax?

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, we are very glad to stand by our record. We are the government that has put in place a tax credit for the sales tax. We have always been very careful to adapt it and raise it as needed in order to meet the same objective we have given, which is to have the fairest possible tax system. We will continue to do that.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the motion introduced today by the hon. member for Skeena. I salute him and congratulate him for his initiative. It is a timely initiative, drawing our attention, in the broader context of tax reform and fiscal policy, to the possibilities that the tax system can provide for better environmental control and for improved services, both municipal and federal, to the people of Canada.

Most people in Canada, of course, as in many countries, see pollution as something that directly touches their lives, a matter often closely linked with public health. The challenge facing governments is to persuade people that curbing pollution is always in their interest, and that, invariably, it costs money.

In the past, Canadian governments and, indeed, governments in many western countries, have chosen to pursue the "command" route: thou shall not pollute. More recently, a number of European countries in particular have explored the possibilities of using the tax system as a method of encouraging environmental policies.

I have in mind the fact that Sweden taxes the active ingredients in pesticides and fertilizers. Finland and Norway impose charges on non-returnable containers, Italy on plastic bags, and Sweden on batteries containing mercury or cadmium. One could continue, for the examples are many. The initiatives in Europe are certainly something that Canada could look at with benefit. I suspect that my colleague for Skeena may have had such initiatives in mind when he introduced his motion today.

Traditionally, governments have used the tax system for purposes other than merely to raise revenues. In a variety of ways and over the past century there have developed in Canada methods within the tax system either to encourage certain economic policies or to discourage certain practices considered to be contrary to the public interest.

The government—and I do not speak merely of this government but of previous governments as well—has sought in the Income Tax Act, the Excise Tax Act and the Customs Act various ways in which to encourage environmental policies, particularly in the corporate world.

In all those cases, and I could cite one or two other examples of the tax system being used as a method of encouraging better pollution control, they are only effective if they are coupled with broader governmental policy on the environment. In other words, if we are to make further use of the tax system as a method of encouraging better environmental practices, then it must be linked to the environmental laws and policies that we already have in place.

I mentioned the Income Tax Act. Capital cost allowances under the Income Tax Act have provided for the depreciation of equipment relating to pollution control. It may be that the government would like to examine further the possibilities of accelerating the write-off of capital costs as an additional incentive to corporations, both with regard to water and air pollution.

The capital cost allowance write-off was three years. I believe that it is now two years. The government may wish to look again at that term to see whether some further incentive might be provided under accelerated capital cost allowances so that equipment would be purchased and put in place now for the future benefit of the environment and, indeed, the benefit of all Canadians.

I would also remind the House that the Income Tax Act has been used as a means of directly influencing environmental behaviour. The Oil Substitution Program were two elements of the National Energy Program that is now largely forgotten, but which did bring real benefit in terms of environmental improvement.

The Excise Tax Act is a second example of government tax policy which can have an effect on the environment. It provides for exemptions and reductions for a broad range of policy reasons. The government may want, as it revises and reviews the Excise Tax Act, to look again at its schedules of exempt equipment to see whether they are, indeed, comprehensive enough, whether they offer the municipalities in particular the possibilities of installing and improving the level of the equipment that they have available to them for pollution control.

Finally, of course, customs duties have also been a method whereby the import of pollution control equipment could be facilitated. Under the free trade agreement with the United States those duties will be eliminated. But, of course, the United States is not the only source of good pollution control equipment. Therefore, the government may wish to consider what further measures could be taken under the customs tariff to determine whether equipment from other than the United States might be made more readily available in Canada.

I have said that the tax measures cannot be viewed in isolation. In the case of environmental control incentives, if they are to be efficacious, the tax measures should be directly related to other programs that the government is conducting in the environmental area.

I do, however, want to say more about possibilities for the future. There has been a whole range of suggestions, and I regret to say less from this House than from outside this House, that has come forward about the use of the tax system as one route toward improved environmental control. These have ranged from additional deductions for scientific research to proposals for capital cost allowances for pollution control devices. We have seen more recently even more imaginative proposals that have been brought forward which have a direct effect on our tax system.

I speak, of course, of the idea of environmental bonds which have been advocated, I believe, by some members of this House, and certainly by a number of our fellow Canadians. Taking the United States example, a municipality floats a bond and the interest paid on that bond to the bondholder is exempt from federal taxes. That type of bond related to environmental purposes might be developed in Canada. A municipality, for environmental purposes, could introduce a bond, the interest on which would be deemed tax-free by the federal government. That is one area where some substance might be given to the proposal of the hon. member for Skeena for a so-called green tax.

Many of us also will be aware of the initiatives taken by some Canadians to put forward the idea of environmental mutual funds. Particularly in Vancouver we have seen the initiative taken to limit the investment of certain mutual funds to those companies whose processes or products are considered environmentally respectable. The incentive for those mutual funds to invest in the companies making such products or conducting certain procedures, is limited of course by the profitability of those companies.

It may be that within the tax system there are ways in which investment in mutual funds directly related to the environment could be encouraged by a tax incentive.

The question of environmental flow-through shares has also been raised on a number of occasions, the comparison being with the flow-through shares in the oil and gas industry where basically the benefits of the profitability of the company flows directly through to the shareholder. The tax benefits normally earned by the corporation can be passed on to investors by the company renouncing its use of those benefits.

It may be that with some imagination and perseverance, it would be possible for us to develop within Canada, again basing ourselves on the precedent of the oil and gas flow-through shares, such a practice within the environmental area as well.

In conclusion, I want to say a word more about sales taxes, which of course are very much on everyone's minds these days. With regard to enviornmental incentives, the precedent in the case of the manufacturers' sales tax is there. The Minister of State for Finance will know that the present manufacturers' sales tax does provide, in a number of instances, for the exemption or reduction of the tax on products that are intended for environmental control.

I know that as soon as one puts forward the proposal for exemptions from a sales tax, one gets into a complicated area of public policy. But it may be that if the government chooses to pursue its present policy of exempting certain products and services from the effect of its proposed goods and services tax, it may want also to look again at its former practice of exempting pollution control equipment from the sales tax and consider whether it wishes to extend that practice into the new tax.

There is another possibility, in my view, where we could seek the opportunity to use taxation as a method of encouraging better environmental practices, and that is to try to develop an emissions tax. We have effectively provided for such an emissions tax in the case of automobile gasoline. Indeed, in Europe today there is a number of countries pursuing different taxations for different types of emissions by, for example, taxing unleaded petrol at a lower rate than leaded petrol.

The case that I have in mind is whether we can use an emissions tax as an effective method of encouraging better environmental practices when related to other government initiatives in the environmental field. I believe that we could.

There are methods of establishing environmental norms against which the practices of any corporation could be measured, whether it be in the area of air or water emissions, and a tax levied for those who are not meeting the norm. I want to acknowledge at once that a tax is paid only by a profitable company. In a number of instances the worst polluters are companies of only marginal profitability or indeed those that are not profitable at all. Therefore, broadly speaking, the effectiveness of a so-called green tax or a tax system along the lines that I imagine the hon. member from Skeena has in mind can be limited by the fact that a company must be profitable to respond to tax incentives.

I might conclude what I have offered this morning with the observation that today firms are often financially worse off by being good environmental citizens. There is not, in effect, a broadly based incentive for corporations to seek better environmental practices. I would join with our colleague from Skeena in seeking, through the tax system, any opportunity to make it profitable for companies to benefit from the introduction of better environmental controls and procedures.

Mr. Fulton: In listening to the hon. member's remarks it seems that he is supportive of the idea of a green tax system. As I am sure he is aware, the present process of prosecution under the Fisheries Act for allowing persistent or biocumulative materials to go into the Great Lakes, the St. Lawrence, or into the salt water environment, simply is not working. In fact under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act there has only been one prosecution since the act was proclaimed.

We know that prosecution is simply not working, even though we have the concept of zero discharge included in our bilateral treaty with the United States on Great Lakes Water Quality. As we learned both from the IJC and the more recent reports from both Canadian and environmental authorities, the quality of the Great Lakes is continuing to go down. We know in terms of the atmosphere that the same is true. The quality of the air in Canada is continuing to decline. Prosecution and fines are not the way to encourage industries to clean up.

I wonder if the member could spend a moment to reflect on whether or not it is appropriate to bring in something like the GST which will tax recycled paper at the same 9 per cent rate as virgin paper. That is certainly not going to encourage the more environmentally appropriate use of recycled paper. In relation to waste reduction whether it is coming from a smokestack into the atmosphere, or from a pipe into a river, lake, or the ocean, or in terms of the more than 50 per cent of hazardous and toxic waste that is being illegally and improperly disposed of across the country, the prosecution route is not working. That stick is not working.

Would the member not agree that the carrot approach of a varying green tax in relation to minimizing energy used, minimizing waste production, and moving toward the cutting edge of technologies and renewable energy, is the route we should be going with our tax policies in Canada? We know that our environment is becoming increasingly degraded. We are facing significant levels of unemployment in areas where we in fact should have full employment in the resource production areas. By adding another layer of regressive tax, it will simply accelerate the rate of environmental destruction rather than reduce it.

It seems the member is supporting the concept of a green tax, but could he clarify exactly where the Liberal party stands in relation to a green tax system and compare it to the GST as proposed by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MacLaren: I certainly agree with the hon. member that the "command and control" approach to environmental matters is not often the most effective. Depending on how that approach is applied, it can penalize new entrants to an industry, since regulations are probably tougher on new entrants than they are on existing producers. Quite often the command and control procedure, for whatever reasons, is much less effective than the incentive system. I have no dispute with the member for Skeena in that regard; obviously it should be the carrot rather than the stick.

However, I want him to recognize that using the incentive system has some real problems. I was not certain this morning whether in his discussion he would become specific about what particular fiscal measures he envisaged to give substance to his green tax idea.

Having said that, let me add that in the case of the Liberal party—and I did not wish to interject any particular partisan note into this question because I think it is one question that concerns us all, I recall that it was a Liberal government of the late 1970s and through the early 1980s which did introduce various fiscal measures intended to provide incentives for corporations to introduce procedures environmentally improved over what they had been before. The record of the Liberal governments, while perhaps not always as aggressive or as imaginative as one might wish, did at least point in the right direction.

In the case of the manufacturers' sales tax, which was then 9 per cent and subsequently 11 per cent, the Liberal government of the day did provide exemptions for improved pollution control equipment.

Now we have the government of the day offering a goods and services tax which to my knowledge, except possibly in the case of municipal taxation, does not offer any comparable incentives for environmental improvement. It is for the government, in deciding whether it will set the rate of tax at 9 per cent or 7 per cent, whether it will also offer rebates for the equipment for improved environmental control. That is an option open to the government. I have not yet heard this government come forward with such exemptions or rebates. It may be that the Minister of State for Finance, if he were with us, would want to respond to the question of how indeed the federal government intends to tax under the GST the services and the equipment used by municipalities, many of which are directly concerned with environmental control.

I for one share with the member for Skeena some puzzlement by what the government intends to do with regard to the imposition of the goods and services tax on municipalities. If we could at least have such clarification today, that alone would justify the member's motion.

Mr. Jordan: Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague from Etobicoke North for what I thought was the very clear and scientific way in which he developed his position.

I just want to go back to the comments of the previous speaker from the other side of the House and try my colleague from Etobicoke North on a concern which I have and which I think all Canadians have. They set out something that was an action plan and it contained four vital elements. One of them in the future would have a great concern for the environment.

In other words, I think what they meant was that things would be put to the test and, if they could not stand the test in relation to what this action would do to the environment, they would not allow it; they would condemn it.

I am really puzzled as to why they would take the action that they have in reference then to VIA. Rail transportation has been proven to be the most compatible with the environment as far as emissions standards and the like. I am not aware of any public input that was allowed or any study that was done and released to the public to show that there was any concern there at all.

In your opinion do you think that they have broken with what they set out as a very noble set of conditions? And I think Canada would applaud those, however at almost the first opportunity that comes along, deliberately or otherwise—presumably an ignorance of their own rules—they put this out to the Canadian people without any discussion or any seeming justification for it. Certainly it has not been proven to be the most accepted way to go as far as environment is concerned in reference to mass transportation.

Would my colleague from Etobicoke North comment?

• (1250)

Mr. MacLaren: The hon. member is of course quite right. In its decisions with respect to VIA the government has not limited itself by environmental considerations. Equally in its policy of airport expansion and, as the hon. member has put it, in mass transport generally we see no real commitment on the part of the government to take into account environmental considerations before making its final decisions with regard to the abolition of rail services or the expansion of airports. Both of those policies have major environmental considerations. It is a deplorable fact that this government has not seen fit to consider the environmental elements before announcing its commitment to the expansion of airports and the reduction of rail services.

With regard to rail services in particular, it seems to me self-evident that with the investment of additional funds in rail services not only would the services be improved for certain communities but, broadly speaking, the environmental impact would be a positive one.

In the name of deficit reduction, which is an understandable policy on the part of the government, it has decided to reduce those services, to reduce those government expenditures. It has not, however, shown any inclination to tackle the real problem which is high interest rates which make the deficit so high and which in turn encourages the government to turn to such alternatives in its view as reducing rail services or other environmentally damaging practices. I agree with the hon. member that the government has acted hastily and acted with only short-term considerations in mind.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the time for questions and comments has now terminated. The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in a debate which is a very important one in terms of a new idea for our tax system that has not been pursued in this country before. It is the fact that we have a tax system that takes into account the ecology. The motion of the hon. member for Skeena reads as follows:

> That this House calls upon the government to implement an ecologically sound "green" tax system.

I believe, as most people around the world believe, that we do not have too much time left in terms of saving the planet from the pollutants that we are constantly spewing out into the water, the atmosphere, our food system, and into the earth. We have to do whatever we can in this country and around the world to try to reverse the very dangerous direction that this world is going in.

Our country, despite its small population, despite its relative economic wealth, abundance of resources and progressivity in terms of social and economic programs, is one of the worst pollutants on a per capita basis in the world. I think that is a very sad commentary of where we have been and where we are as a country.

The question we must ask ourselves is: How can we change that? I think the member for Skeena has made a recommendation today that is very important about how we can go a major distance into changing how we look at our environment and what we do to the environment. If you look at the history in our country and other countries around the world, we find that tax policy has a tremendous impact on the social and economic policies and institutions of this country and other countries around the world.

We see around the world example after example of governments reaching out for their objectives through the taxation system and making sure that certain things happen because of a taxation system in this world and in this country in particular.

We see in the provinces as well social economic policy being determined in part by taxation policy. I know that in my own province of Saskatchewan, which is very rural, we often have taxation regimes that help people living in rural communities, small towns, farms, communities that are a long way from the major cities of Regina and Saskatoon. I suggest that we can do the same thing with the taxation system here.

I want to make the assertion—and I hope you agree, Mr. Speaker—that our present taxation system is one that was designed for the horse and buggy in terms of the modern problems of the environment. It is antiquated, out of date, and out of touch in terms of doing something real about the environmental problems that we have.

I will give a few examples of what I mean. The government across the way has introduced a goods and services tax. It is a 9 per cent tax across the board touching everything from the pizza that you are going to buy, Mr. Speaker, to the haircut you will have every once in a while, to what goes into the inputs of industry, and so on. It is a tax that covers a broad sweep, regardless of whether or not that industry or that activity is polluting the atmosphere. It does not discriminate in favour of companies, activities, or products that help keep this planet green. It does not discriminate against companies, products, or activities that indeed pollute the environment and make this world a much worse place in which to live.

It is an antiquated system. It is a system that has to be changed. For example, the goods and services tax will have the same tax on a bicycle as on a motorcycle. A motorcycle will pollute the atmosphere where a bicycle will not. It will have the same tax on cycled paper as on recycled paper. Recycled paper in the first place costs more than virgin paper, yet the tax is the same. It will have the same kind of tax on alternative forms of energy as on energy that is based on fossil fuel. It will have the same kind of tax on motor boats as canoes. Yet of course a motor boat will pollute the atmosphere and the waterways a lot more obviously than one without a motor.

We will have a tax that will not discriminate at all on the basis of whether or not a contribution is made to keep our planet green, beautiful, and alive for this generation and future generations.

Perhaps what Parliament should do is to take this motion put before the House today by the hon. member for Skeena and in a very non-partisan way refer the idea to a parliamentary committee or to a task force for a thorough study of how we can change the taxation system in this country to make sure that it helps produce at the end of the road a planet that is liveable, safe, decent, and clean for this generation and generations that are to come. That would be a very useful activity of a number of members of Parliament in terms of a contribution to the economy and a contribution to the environment in the years that lie ahead. I think that that is something that could be done.

I believe that taxes in this country should reflect the cost of a product to the environment. The current taxation system does not reflect that at all.

I remember back in 1969, Mr. Speaker, about a year after the two of us were elected, when the then Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau brought in a novel idea. It was called the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. It was to set aside some moneys for places like the Atlantic provinces, the Gaspe, northern Quebec, northern Ontario, and parts of western Canada to try to stimulate growth in the areas that were slower growing in this country. It was an area to use fiscal policy in order to provide economic development for people in this country who lived in areas where the market forces were not useful in terms of producing jobs.

I think now, some 20 years later, the time has come to change the taxation system in this country where one of the prime motivators is going to be the impact in terms of greening this country and greening the planet, along with other prime principles like progressivity and the ability to pay for ordinary Canadians.

That is perhaps a very radical idea. It is a very radical idea, but I think it is an idea whose time has come. The time has come to make sure we penalize companies that pollute, that we penalize individuals that pollute. A simple way of doing that is through the taxation system. It is a way that is not complicated, and it is not bureaucratic. It is a way that can be done that is in tune with the tradition of our times. It is something that can be done that is very, very useful. I think that that green tax system should reflect the environmental cost of manufacturing products in this country. I think that the money that we receive from that system can be churned over once again into promoting a greener planet and a greener Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have 12 minutes left, plus 10 minutes for questions and comments when we return on debate.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, for the first time in Canada, 1,100 parole officers of the federal correctional service will go on strike next Monday morning, unless an immediate agreement is reached between the Canadian Union of Public Employees and Treasury Board. These public servants have not had a salary increase since December 1986 and have to work in deteriorating conditions. Mr. Speaker, if Treasury Board does not take these workers' demands more seriously, maybe it will take the security of Canadians more seriously, because if these 1,100 parole officers decide to walk out at the same time, who will supervise and monitor all the paroled prisoners?

It is imperative that the government act this week to keep this situation from worsening and all labour relations in the Public Service from deteriorating as a result.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, representatives of the major fisheries unions in Canada are meeting here today in Ottawa to discuss the growing crisis in their industry.

A serious question has arisen. Who in this government is responsible for fisheries policy? Legislation before the U.S. Congress threatens the Canadian lobster industry. It calls for a ban on the import of lobster under a certain size. The Minister for International Trade describes these efforts as trade protectionism at its rankest. The Prime Minister told the House that the full weight and influence of the Canadian government will be brought to bear on behalf of Canadian fishermen.

What of our Minister of Fisheries? His briefing book prepared for the media reassures us that the new regulations are being brought forward for conservation reasons. Why has the minister judged the U.S. claim so favourably, thus prejudicing any case this country may make in terms of protecting our crucial market? Could the Minister of Fisheries explain why U.S. claims of conservation are legitimate when his fellow cabinet minister and the Prime Minister so obviously disagree?

CANADIAN ARTISTS

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to draw to your attention today the presence in Ottawa of a group of Canada's leading performing artists, some of whom are with us here and who have come to promote the issue of performers rights in the context of the second phase of amendments to the Copyright Act.

For the benefit of those who will be unable to meet with these performers today, members of this House should be aware that these performers are seeking the right to be compensated for the use of their performances.

This government is very sensitive to these concerns, and will be taking them into consideration in planning the final phase of copyright revision. Moreover, the government is committed to broader initiatives that will enhance the socio-economic status of our artists and the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture will begin reviewing this important subject next week.

RIDEAU RIVER

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, just a few hundred metres from this spot, one of Canada's most beautiful and historically important rivers, the Rideau, enters the Ottawa at the Rideau Falls.

This river makes its way slowly through the national capital and contributes much to the beauty of Ottawa and the pride that most Canadians have in their capital city, surely one of the most beautiful in the world.

But tragically, Mr. Speaker, the Rideau has become a symbol of what has gone wrong in Canada. Its waters are polluted, its beaches are closed, and no one that I know would think of eating a fish drawn from the lower Rideau.

The problems of the Rideau do not exist in isolation. They reflect the strains on water systems throughout Canada. But surely the Rideau should be a symbol of what is right in Canada. This historic waterway, flowing through the heart of our capital, is a challenge to governments at all levels to prove our commitment to a clean and healthy environment.

That is why over 1,500 residents of Ottawa South in petition have urged the Government of Canada to engage in co-operation with the provincial and local levels of government to demonstrate on the Rideau a model of river clean-up and maintenance. I ask, Mr. Speaker, if the Rideau cannot be made clean, how can there be hope for the major industrial waterways of our country?

NORTHERN TAX BENEFITS

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, health care for residents of northern Quebec is a major problem because hospitals providing a full range of basic services are rare in Matagami, Joutel, Lebel-sur-Quévillon, Desmaraisville, Miquelon and Waswanipi. Furthermore, many communities in northern Canada face a chronic shortage of physicians and hospital staff, which forces residents of these towns and villages to go to urban centres at great expense.

The task force on financial compensation for isolated northern communities wants to abolish travel deductions paid by the employer for medical reasons and also the deductions for two vacation trips a year.

Mr. Speaker, if Canada cannot afford to allow northern Canadians to travel for medical reasons, why does our government not reduce the size of ministerial delegations and abolish publicly funded travel abroad for members of Parliament who are part of a parliamentary association or Commons committee?

CONNORS BROTHERS

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I was honoured this past Friday to present on behalf of the Minister for International Trade the Canada Export Award to Connors Brothers. Located in my riding of Carleton—Charlotte Connors Brothers is the largest sardine processing plant in North America employing close to 3,500 people, and exports its canned herring, sardines, and kippers to over 30 countries around the world. In fact, exports account for 70 per cent of its production.

In addition to maintaining its strong market share of the United States, Australia, New Zealand, and the Caribbean, Connors Brothers this past year entered new markets in Israel, Mexico, the Philippines, Bolivia, and Hong Kong.

Since the Canada Exports Program was initiated in 1983 only 95 companies have been recognized for their contributions to the expansion of Canada's export capabilities.

Connors Brothers stands as an example that given the opportunity, Canadian businesses in every region of the country can successfully compete in the increasingly competitive global market-place.

NORTHERN TAX ALLOWANCE

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, the task force report on tax benefits for northerners and isolated areas calls for one northern zone, thereby eliminating many hundreds of communities across Canada from the current northern residents deduction.

In Kenora—Rainy River some 35 communities will lose the benefit if the government accepts the recommendation of the task force. If the recommendation of a single northern zone is accepted, employers will be faced with a dwindling workforce as workers leave northern Ontario and head south where the cost of living is cheaper.

The Dona Lake gold mine in Pickle Lake is already suffering from a shortage of workers and without the northern residents deduction it will have a more difficult time of it.

[Translation]

The Government must remember that the main purpose of this program was to encourage workers to go north where there are jobs.

[English]

If the government fails to keep this in mind hundreds of jobs will be lost to the south. I urge the government and the Minister of Finance to ignore the one-zone concept included in the report and to come up with multiple zones and graduated levels of benefits which are equitable and simple.

ARMS CONTROL

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, last week the Canadian Centre for Arms Control and Disarmament issued a significant report on Arctic arms control and security co-operation. This report was in response to proposals on Arctic security made by Soviet General Secretary Gorbachev in October, 1987. Unfortunately, the Canadian government's response to the Arctic arms control proposals by Gorbachev has been negative.

Is it not time that this government adopt a new attitude to arms control, particularly with the Arctic? Unless we start playing an active role, Canada runs the risk of allowing arms control to be bypassed in the thawing of east-west relations. The Prime Minister will have a golden opportunity to help make Arctic security co-operation a realizable goal when he visits with Gorbachev next month. While Arctic security is not on the formal agenda, the Prime Minister can further the cause by initiating some informal discussions. At a minimum, the government should accept two of the Arms Control Centre's recommendations. It should create an ambassador for circumpolar affairs, and it should extend the open-sky proposals to include the Arctic Ocean region.

There are historic opportunities to dismantle the military apparatus that has been built up during the cold war. I urge this government to take a leadership role in bringing about a secure and demilitarized north.

FREE TRADE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, as you well know, Canada is a trading nation. Our exports around the globe support three million Canadian jobs. By supporting the free trade agreement Canadians showed they understand the importance of competing internationally and expanding our export sector. That is why I am proud to rise here today to congratulate Westcan Alfalfa Inc. of Regina on winning the 1989 Canada Export Award.

Westcan is an excellent example of the progressive entrepreneurial spirit found in Regina and throughout Saskatchewan. The determination and initiative shown by Westcan Alfalfa is what will be needed to drive the Canadian economy forward in the face of tough international competition. It is a good example to those who would have Canadians believe that we cannot compete with the rest of the world.

I know that the leadership shown Westcan Alfalfa will encourage other Regina companies to enter the international marketplace and bring increased prosperity to Saskatchewan and Canada.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): The Minister of Fisheries has been hiding behind a report of the Scotia–Fundy Industry Capacity Advisory Committee. He has used this report as his bible to give direction to a hard–pressed inshore fishery in the Scotia–Fundy region.

The members of that committee acted in good faith, something I am beginning to realize this minister knows nothing about. At no time did the committee feel that this report would be acted upon in isolation. One has only to look at the report to know that it could not be taken in isolation from the problems in the groundfish management plan and the offshore fleet capacity. The first page of the report states: "The committee emphasizes that quantification of over–capacity of any fleet sector is a direct function of the resource allocations available to that sector. Thus, implementation of capacity reduction programs should be preceded by resolution of long–term resource shares. Although the review of this offshore enterprise allocation program was undertaken by DFO while this committee was functioning, the committee could not achieve success of what it viewed as the important results of that review" without review of the offshore program.

As well, the last sentence of this report, and there are only 11 pages, states that: "The committee now seeks a commitment from DFO to complete the task, in continued consultation with industry". I say, Mr. Speaker, that at no time did the members of the committee see this report implemented before a further in–depth study of the critical areas be done. This has not been done, it is not being done.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. The Hon. Member for Sarnia—Lambton.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's noon–hour incident was indeed unfortunate even more so unnecessary and uncalled for. Arrangements had been made prior to the demonstration which would have permitted an agreed on number of cabs to drive by the Centre Block in a safe and orderly fashion. However, once it became apparent these conditions were being changed, the RCMP responded in an appropriate and responsible manner. An earlier 12–minute fire alarm only enhanced the fundamental need for access to the Centre Block.

Less appropriate were the actions of some members opposite. Certainly in a democracy the people have an inalienable right to demonstrate and express their opinions. This, however, must be done in a safe and responsible manner. As such, the choice of some colleagues opposite to aid and abet a demonstration which clearly would raise security concerns and deny emergency access to the House of Commons borders on irresponsibility. It is incumbent upon us as Members of Parliament to fully recognize a proper and important role which security and safety assumes in this place for all members, their staff and the staff of House of Commons. In the future, let us all work together to continue to make this place an accessible, secure and safe place for us all, not simply for a select few.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac–Saint–Louis): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same subject as my colleague. To demonstrate publicly and legally in support of or against an issue is one of our basic rights as citizens.

Yesterday's efforts by cab drivers and others to focus attention on the goods and services tax was no exception. In the course of those events, officers of the RCMP had difficulty in meeting their obligation to ensure access to Parliament Hill for emergency service and for those people, including MPs and Senators, who work here. I hope that all in this place, government supporters and opposition alike, will act to uphold the RCMP when officers act to protect the persons and property that comprise the Parliament of Canada. It was disheartening to witness on the TV reports of the incident yesterday the intolerance of some of the demonstrators in their attack on the young man who publicly supports the GST as the best alternative to the unfair and long out of date sales tax on Canadian manufacturers.

ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs said in response to my leader's question about Canada's ability to act independently within the OAS: "We set Canadian policy here in Canada for Canadian reasons. That is our practice, that will continue to be our practice".

Will the Secretary of State practice what he preached? Will Canada denounce continued covert aid to the Contras whose present activities have resulted in the death of hundreds and which threaten to destabilize Nicaraguan peace process? Will Canada denounce the $9 million spent by the United States government in support of opposition parties in the Nicaraguan election as an unacceptable intrusion in the internal affairs of another state?

In short, will Canada resist the OAS' historic compliance with U.S. military and political intervention in the affairs of member states, or will the Secretary of State be fearful that in reflecting Canadian opinion the Americans will perceive him, as they did Douglas Roche, as too vigorous?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADIAN ARTISTS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, Canadian performers are in Ottawa today with flowers and with the message that bouquets are not enough. Performers are playing a primary role in the shaping and strengthening of our Canadian cultural identity, our national consciousness. Accolades are fine, but it will not put food on creators tables, it will not look after their social benefits or their tax concerns. That is not going to happen until the status of these artists is given full professional standing.

My question, in the absence of the Minister of Communications, is for the Prime Minister. I want to know, artists want to know and Canadians want to know when will he introduce status of the artists legislation that will provide for the social and economic benefits to which these artists are entitled?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, this question was raised earlier today on a point of order having to do with questions about phase two of the copyright legislation. I can tell the hon. member that the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture of which she is a member will shortly be seized with the issue if it is not already. It has the authority under the House rules to identify its own areas of study and the minister is anxiously awaiting the labors of that committee.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, it is ironic that the Parliamentary Secretary would answer in that way. He knows that we did not one, but two studies on the status of the artist, the taxation of the artist, and he was chairman of the committee at that time.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my second question is as follows: It has always been recognized that one has the right to be paid once a job is finished. This is a fundamental human right. Nowadays, in the 20th century, in a so–called civilized country like Canada, hundreds of performers do not receive money that is rightfully theirs, in return for the reproduction and sale of their work, and the government is not doing anything about it.

Mr. Speaker, I want the Minister to tell us here and now, in the presence of all the great artists with us here today, exactly when he intends to table phase two of the copyright bill that would give them the legal means to collect the fruits of their work.

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the hon. member for her question. Today is of course a very important day for members of the Canadian arts community who have come to meet Members of Parliament and the ministers. I met them this morning, and we discussed these issues, with particular emphasis on two aspects: the status of artists and copyright phase two. The hon. member knows perfectly well that the government is defining its approach, objectives and goals in close co–operation with the Canadian arts community. We have advisory committees that are travelling across Canada to identify the areas the government will deal with. I can give the House the assurance that the government's commitment as expressed and approved by the Prime Minister, is well-known to the arts community.

[English]

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, bouquets and flowery words since 1984 have not changed one bit the status of the artist nor the legislation that we wanted in phase one of copyright.

It is now clear that artists, orchestras, dance troupes, opera companies, playwrights and regional theatres will face severe financial hardship because of the government's proposed goods and services tax.

• (1420)

That 9 per cent will strain to a breaking point the cultural activities which employ thousands of people in Canada. Does the minister not realize that the GST could be the straw that breaks the artists backs? Why is the minister sitting on the sidelines while his colleague, the Minister of Finance, is busy sinking the cultural ships of this country?

[Translation]

Mr. Masse: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to show her teeth, I will have to answer that since 1984, there has never been a government in this country that did so much for structural reform in the cultural domain.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Masse: Since 1984, we have created task forces on the arts and on copyright. We identified policy, and as far as legislation is concerned, we started to do what not a single government had done previously, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Communications. Over 70 per cent of English language television programming in Canada originates in the United States. This country allows Americans to sell their product to Canadian networks at a fraction of production costs. That is dumping and that is unfair to Canadian artists.

Foreigners are not allowed to do that, say, with their wheat. They are not allowed to do it with clothing. They are not allowed to do it with boots. Why is television programming treated any differently from other products that enter the Canadian market-place from abroad? My question for the minister is this: why are Americans allowed to dump their television programming on the Canadian market-place thereby undermining Canadian cultural sovereignty and taking much needed jobs away from Canadian artists?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the answer is very simple. It is because what we have now is the law that you passed in 1968. That is the one we want to change.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for culture and communications. Many Canadians do not realize that most artists in this country do not get their full pay cheque after the first production of their work. Many Canadians do not realize this, Minister. And the question that I have to ask you is: do you realize how insulting it is for people to watch their work on television when they are not being paid? How would you like it not to get your full pay cheque?

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, we are now making structural changes to correct a vast number of problems we have identified in the cultural sector. When Leméac, a publishing company, went bankrupt, which government helped the creative arts? The Government of Canada, Mr. Speaker.

Tomorrow in Toronto, I will have the pleasure to announce increased revenues for Canadian writers under the public library utilization program, and that was arranged by this government, with the agreement of my colleagues and especially of the Prime Minister. And we intend to continue in that vein, Mr. Speaker.

MEMBER OF THE SENATE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister, and I must say that I am sad to have to ask the Prime Minister this question. He will be aware from the press reports this morning that Senator Cogger was found to be in breach of the Parliament of Canada Act. As a result of access to information, it was found that Senator Cogger was in clear contravention of the laws of Parliament by sending a bill to the Federal Business Development Bank for legal services.

The Prime Minister will be aware, very aware, that under section 14 of the Parliament of Canada Act, it is illegal for a senator to do business with a Crown corporation. Now that he has been informed of this act by Senator Cogger, has he done the right thing, the decent thing, and approached his friend and asked for his resignation?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the member is referring to reports alleging impropriety on the part of an hon. senator. That should be dealt with in the other place.

I understand that the hon. senator is making a statement, at this very moment, in the other place. I think that is the appropriate forum for that issue to be dealt with.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister essentially appoints the senators, I think it is only appropriate that he respond.

It was only after access to information that we were able to determine that Senator Cogger, in fact, had collected money from this Crown corporation. I hope we do not have to go and do an examination of every single Crown corporation to determine where else Senator Cogger was collecting funds.

Mr. Speaker: I want to proceed with very great care. What we have in front of us—and I ask hon. members to pay attention—is apparently something which has appeared in the newspaper. The hon. minister has said that the gentleman involved, who is a member of the other place, is making a statement this afternoon.

I am very reluctant to let questions go too far for fear they become, by way of their preamble, accusations to which there may or may not be any evidence whatever, and certainly, under the principles of fair play, if the hon. member of the Senate is going to make a statement this afternoon, that statement ought to be heard.

I would ask the hon. House Leader for the New Democratic Party, who is very experienced in this place, to proceed with very great care.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I will proceed with very great care. I appreciate the comments that you have made.

The question is that this issue only arose after this information was provided through using access to information on this one Crown corporation. We do not want to go through every Crown corporation using the same process to find to what extent the senator has been involved.

I am asking the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: I very much regret feeling that I am going to have to go on to the next questioner, because the preamble is becoming an allegation, at least it is an implied allegation and I think that the obligation of the Speaker in this place is to be extraordinarily careful.

I have said in the past that there has to be, and there is, a duty upon members to ask questions. But especially in this day of television a preamble can be very close to a charge, and there is another place to make a charge. There is, of course, instant publication of this. I think that somehow the Speaker has to find a way that respects fair play and, at the same time, allows questions to be asked.

There is another hon. minister here who is ultimately responsible for that particular Crown corporation. If the member wants to put a question to the minister with respect to the Crown corporation then I invite him to do so.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the sensitivity of this issue and I want to be very careful. I simply want to say that we will await the senator's comments in the other place and would expect, of course, that if the accusations are correct, that not only does he have a $200 fine per day to pay, which would be about $140,000 now, but we would expect the full amount to be paid back.

Mr. Speaker: What I am asking hon. members to respect is that if hon. members have charges to make there is an appropriate place to make them in this House. There are consequences that go with it. There may be more questions on this and I would ask hon. members to proceed with fairness and care.

The hon. member for York Centre.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister who you identified as being responsible, indeed, for the Federal Business Development Bank. I want, before asking, to underline that whatever happens in the other place, there is no doubt that ministers here have responsibility for the operations of the corporations under their jurisdiction.

[Translation]

My question for the Minister is as follows: Did he get in touch today with officials at the Federal Business Development Bank to find out whether this payment had been made, as indicated in information released by the government, which shows for instance that $72,000 was sent to this law office, attention of the senator? I would like to know whether the minister is prepared to ask the bank to recover these funds.

• (1430)

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, yes, I have been in contact with the Federal Business Development Bank and was informed that the Federal Business Development Bank has hired the law firm of Lapointe Rosenstein on many occasions going back over a couple of decades.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, the documents which that department released show that payments made to that firm of lawyers were made to the attention of Senator Cogger and there is no doubt about that, it is in the minister's own documents. Therefore, I am not satisfied that the answer the minister has given about what years and years of work may have been done by a firm. Is the minister looking this into and does he agree that these payments should be reclaimed by the Federal Business Development Bank?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the Federal Business Development Bank representatives informed me that they made the decision to hire Lapointe Rosenstein on this occasion as they have on other occasions. They hire companies across the country. They received the work for which they contracted and they satisfied the invoices. I am not aware of any obligation on the Federal Business Development Bank to ascertain whether the invoice is properly filled out and so on. Those are the kinds of things that the member in the other place will perhaps be dealing with.

The responsibility that I have, that this government has, is did the Federal Business Development Bank conduct itself properly, did it hire a law firm to do legal business. Yes, it is a firm that it contacted with many times in the past. It received the services it contracted for.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. In August, the President of the Treasury Board said that the personnel necessary to administer the goods and services tax would be provided as they became necessary but this will not result in further job reductions elsewhere in the public service.

Why then has the minister gone ahead and pulled 200 people so far out of other federal departments? How many more people does he intend to bleed off from other departments to implement the goods and services tax?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the letter the hon. member refers to written by the President of the Treasury Board stands. We are following the advice as outlined by the President of the Treasury Board.

I can say to the hon. member that within my own department obviously we are looking for existing resources to prepare for the administration of the GST. We are utilizing the people who are administering the very flawed existing federal sales tax. I think the hon. member opposite and all Canadians across the country would have to agree that it is very important for us to be able to utilize existing resources from a flawed sales tax in order to administer a far better sales tax.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. People are being drawn from other departments, not only from his own department. Perhaps he might wish to clarify his answer. In fact, they are being offered positions. The President of the Treasury Board also said that he could not comment on either the costs or the staff needed to implement the GST. What he did say was that through supplementary estimates we will be seeking parliamentary approval for resources to develop detailed plans to implement the new tax.

Will the Minister of National Revenue then tell the House why he is going ahead and staffing a whole section from other departments to develop these detailed plans when he has no authority from Parliament to spend one cent, when the government has not even formally presented a bill to this House and when Parliament certainly has not approved the goods and services tax?

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that my department and the government as a whole has been working toward a more efficient public service. We are very proud and Canadians have applauded us for being able to reduce the size of the civil service by 12,000 people over the last five years for the benefit of all Canadians. That is a mandate that we ran on five years ago. That is a mandate that we ran on one year ago. So far as the specific question is concerned I can assure the hon. member that we are applying our efforts in accordance with the letter written by the President of the Treasury Board to the letter and that we are utilizing, wherever possible, resources that exist within our department that are now administering the flawed federal sales tax in order to prepare for a smooth launch as we move toward the GST.

CANADIAN ARTISTS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: I thank my colleagues over there for the applause, but if they could just send donations that would be—

My question is directed to the Prime Minister and is a follow-up on previous questions and the fact that the Minister of Communications has said that the performing artists who are here today have the support of the Prime Minister. I asked one of the artists, a well-known woman performer, if she were in my place and if she had to put a question, what question would she put. I put that question to the Prime Minister.

We know that the Prime Minister can sing, we know that the Prime Minister can act in a manner of speaking and we know that the Prime Minister thinks, at least, that he can direct. The artists want to know whether he can produce.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: They want to know whether he can produce a timetable for phase two of the copyright legislation that these artists want and—I would ask him to answer this personally—whether he would give that his own personal support.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the nasty question from my hon. friend. I have already sent my cheque in.

The question is, can I produce. That is a sexist question but I will answer it anyway.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Four kids and two majorities.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: With regard to the serious part of the question, and I take my hon. friend's question very seriously, I have had the occasion to meet personally on a number of occasions with many members of the artistic community who are promoting and have promoted the needs that my hon. friend has just described. I would not be violating any great secrecy if I conveyed to my hon. friend the fact that I have instructed the minister and his colleagues to make certain that this government proceeds as quickly as we can to ensure that those legitimate needs of the artistic community are met for the first time in Canada.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Right Hon. Prime Minister for his serious answer and for the cheque. I have not received it yet. Perhaps it has been detoured by way of the Senate or something like that. Perhaps it is in the mail.

I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware, to follow that up, that the average income for a Canadian artist in Canada is about $8,000 a year and in Quebec, Le groupement des professionnels de la danse says that the average income for a dancer is $3,500 a year. For a choreographer, it is $1,500 a year. These Canadian artists are the lowest paid people now in Canada.

• (1440)

I ask the Minister of Communications or the Prime Minister, would the government go further and give us a timetable for phase two of the copyright law, and when?

Would it go even further and agree on principle to bring in status-of-the-artist legislation whereby artists could get properly treated in taxation and could get access to social services in Canada?

[Translation]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I was able to meet Serge Turgeon, Diane Juster, Gilles Vigneault and other artists who worked on this initiative, which reflects the entirely legitimate desires of artists in Quebec and across Canada. In fact, there are even more on the anglophone side whom I met and who also met the Minister. The hon. member identified the purpose of these efforts. With the support of all members of this House, I am sure that in the near future, the Canadian government will be able to draft a bill and take steps that reflect these wishes, for the greater benefit of the Canadian arts community.

NORTHERN TAX BENEFITS

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The task force on northern allowances has recommended that deductions for northern workers who must travel for medical reasons be abolished. My question is as follows: Is the tax situation in Canada so bad that we have to skimp on travel for medical reasons for designated workers in the North, as opposed to trips made by Members of Parliament abroad for a parliamentary association or a Commons committee? Do you intend to approve this recommendation?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the government has established a task force to look at the question of northern allowances. That task force was manned by three individuals who live in northern communities and have some good understanding of the problems of living in northern communities. They worked for well over a year in preparing the task force report which was given to me last Friday.

Our position is that we want to review this report before making any decisions to try to understand better the reasons for the recommendations that the task force committee put forth in its report.

AIR TRANSPORT

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Yesterday, the minister stated, and I quote:

> Intair couldn't get the slots it wanted at Pearson International Airport because it was too late with its application.

Does the minister now realize he was misinformed and that Intair was in fact one of the first companies to apply for slots under the winter schedule, and that Canadian Airlines and Air Canada, who co-ordinate the terminals at Pearson, blocked these applications? Consequently, is the minister prepared to intervene and give this small regional carrier fair treatment?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct the Hon. Member. Intair could not have applied for slots in Toronto in June, since the company did not exist at the time, and in fact was only established this month. The application was made by Inter-Canadian. The flights were operated by the company today known as Intair. Twenty-nine of the thirty-eight applications were approved. Four were eliminated because there were no slots, and the other five are now being negotiated.

So what I said yesterday, and I say it again today, is that as everybody knows, the airport in Toronto is extremely congested, and the number of landing opportunities is limited. We have tried to accommodate all the companies at Toronto, but it is clear, Mr. Speaker, that generally speaking the minister does not and will not intervene in a process that is meant to achieve a balance between the various airlines. Again, a final answer regarding the five slots that are still being negotiated will be given by a committee a week from now, while both companies have been asked to reach some kind of agreement. The minister did not intervene in Saint-Hubert to avoid interfering with the process, and he will not intervene in Toronto for the same reason, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ouellet: The minister's answer is very disturbing because in fact, when the Conservative government passed the bill deregulating air transport, we were told that it would increase competition and enable new small airlines to have access to airports. Now the exact opposite is happening. Air Canada and Canadian Airlines are dividing the market between them and elimi-nating all competition. Is the minister aware that it now costs $371.40 to fly from Montreal to Toronto and back in economy class, which is twice as much as a trip to Boston and about the same as a trip to Europe? Will the minister act to put a stop to this abuse by the two giants of Canada's aviation industry?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, first of all, my colleague knows very well that throughout the country, from Vancouver to St. John's, Newfoundland, accessibility is three or four times greater, in terms of number of airlines and flights offered to Canadians.

As for cost, Mr. Speaker, all these airlines offer competitive prices compared to other modes of transport, so that in the past three years and since deregulation, Canadians do 30, 40, even 50 per cent of their traveling by air. My colleague himself told me that the Toronto airport is overcrowded. Surely that is because Canadians like to go by plane, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the part-time Minister of Agriculture. I note the minister has recently confessed about the effects the free trade agreement will have on Canadian farmers and Canadian-American trade relations. He said in a recent speech in Alberta that Canadians were being subjected to American trade policies which were "wrong, unfair and hypocritical".

Given this new-found friendship with the truth, will the minister now admit to Canadians that we do not have the access to the American market that he claimed we had during the past election?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I find it strange that the hon. member would take issue with the Minister of Agriculture of Canada standing up for Canadian farmers, and that is exactly what I have been doing.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Notwithstanding the fact that there are some irritations from time to time which we have to defend, and will defend, I would draw his attention to the Financial Post of October 18 which states in the headline "Canada is reaping benefits from the trade deal, U.S. figures show". That should be proof positive that the trade deal is working for Canada.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if his buddies at the Financial Post know anything about Canadian agriculture.

My supplementary question is also for the Deputy Prime Minister. The minister stated in the same speech that the Americans want to play rough, and that if Americans want to play rough, then Canadians will have to do the same.

What is the minister saying here? Since the minister has realized that his government signed a bad deal, is he now admitting to Canadians that the only remaining alternative is to have a trade war with the Americans? What effect does he think this trade war will have on Canadian farming?

Mr. Mazankowski: I must say, Mr. Speaker, I would rather take my cue from the Financial Post, which does a pretty good statistical job of evaluating agriculture trade, than from the part-time critic sitting across the way.

NORTHERN TAX ALLOWANCE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Earlier in this Question Period in answer to a question he said he would wait to find out what the reasons were for the report of the task force on northern benefits before he made any decisions. I want to submit to him that the reason the task force came down the way it did is because he changed the rules in midstream.

• (1450)

On April 29, 1988, the Minister of Finance, in establishing the task force, said in his terms of reference that any changes should be "essentially revenue neutral". On May 26 of this year, after all the northerners had made their presentations to the task force, he changed the rules. He said that the changes must reflect "federal budget restraints".

Over 2,693 communities are being cut off from northern benefits. My question is, does the minister think it is fair to change the rules after each and every northern community had a chance to present recommendations based on the rules he had made earlier?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me just correct what the hon. member said in repeating what I had said. I said I wanted to consider the recommendations of the task force report before making any recommendation to the government as to what decision we should take in relation to that report. The hon. member is quite right, we did change the terms of reference at the request of the task force members themselves because they found it difficult to arrive at an equitable borderline, an equitable means of assessing which people should be eligible for the northern allowance and which should not. It was because of the difficulty in arriving at an appropriate borderline that the request was adhered to.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, the proposal is no longer revenue neutral. It is a tax grab that is going to affect thousands and thousands of Canadians in northern Canada. Since this same minister has said that his goods and services tax is also supposed to be revenue neutral, how can he expect all Canadians to trust him when he has already betrayed northerners by changing the rules after the hearings?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, let us revert to the establishment of the task force. The task force was established because the qualification criteria that were in place were creating a large number of inequities between people who found they were eligible and others living within a few kilometres who found that they were ineligible for the northern and isolated post benefits. It was on that basis, to try to find some equity in the qualification criteria, that the task force was created.

If the hon. member will refer to the report, he will find that the task force members who, as I pointed out in my earlier response, all live in isolated communities themselves, set out the reasons why their criteria have been proposed. I would suggest that my honourable colleague, as well as the government, review the reasons and try to understand those gentlemen who spent a good amount of time visiting many, many communities across northern Canada to listen to people and try to understand the problems before they came up with the recommendations in the task force report.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the Opposition, yesterday and today this House heard little substance, few constructive suggestions if any at all and a lot of rhetoric from our colleagues opposite on the state of Canadian agriculture. My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Can he tell this House what he and the government intend to do to continue to support and enhance the situation of Canadian farmers in response to recent U.S. trade actions?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I share the hon. member's view that there is very little in a positive sense emanating from across the way that would enhance agriculture trade for Canadian interests.

The Prime Minister about three years ago decided that it was important to bring agriculture to the top of the agenda in international fora, whether it be at the GATT or whether it be at the multilateral trade negotiations, to redress the debilitating trade-distorting subsidies that were killing Canadian agriculture.

There have been a number of initiatives taken since that time, including the discussions at the MTN where we are pursuing Canadian interests and attempting to strengthen and broaden Article 11 under which the supply-management system exists. With respect to the issue of the pork countervail, thanks to the free trade agreement, we now have an objective binational dispute-resolving mechanism that can deal with this thing in an effective way. With respect to Durum, we only have to remind Americans that they are not free of sin when it comes to subsidies. By virtue of the fact of their actions, the export enhancement programs and the subsidies, they in fact are driving down the price of grain and we are asking them to cease and desist that practice.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As a result of the recommendations of a royal commission report which came out of the Ocean Ranger disaster, a national search and rescue secretariat was announced on April 15, 1986. This secretariat was to be "an independent body responsible and accountable for a national search and rescue program under a lead minister with no conflict of interest in supplying search and rescue services".

In view of this directive, how can the Prime Minister justify having the same minister responsible for both the search and rescue service and the secretariat? Clearly there is a conflict of interest and clearly there has been no consultation with the secretariat before the move of the 413th squadron to CFB Greenwood.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the NSS, which reports directly to the Minister of National Defence, does just that. It reports directly. There are two other departments involved in search and rescue in Canada, as I am sure the hon. member is aware, the Department of Transport, with coast guard responsibilities, the Department of National Defence which augment those responsibilities of the Canadian coast guard and provide additional support. The national search secretariat provides direct information to the minister responsible. In this case, it happens to be the Minister of National Defence.

There is also an interdepartmental committee of government agencies to which search and rescue recommendations are provided, and those recommendations are then communicated to the lead minister.

Mr. McGuire: Mr. Speaker, all I can say to the minister is the lives that were lost in the Ocean Ranger disaster will appear to have been lost in vain if this government refuses to follow the recommendations made to it to prevent any such accidents from happening in the future.

I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister has been to Summerside and she has seen first-hand the impact the impending closure is going to have there. The town is suffering economically and emotionally. After six months of fighting, the people do not see any light at the end of the tunnel. The minister has all the recommendations from the joint federal-provincial committee, and all of the reports. A significant federal presence is required there—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. McGuire: Can the minister tell us what the committee is doing at present, and will she be making an announcement this week as to what will be replacing CFB Summerside?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, certainly my visit to Summerside was a very useful one. I was very impressed with the eloquence of people in the community who are not just looking to the government for support in this but are also looking at plans that they can develop themselves.

We have two people who are continuing to work with the task forces because this is an ongoing job. We are looking at both private sector and public sector alternatives, as I made clear to them. I will be making recommendations to the Prime Minister because we do care very much about the future of Summerside and we are going to come up with some answers.

Mr. Speaker: A single question from the hon. member from Glengary—Prescott—Russell and a single question from the hon. member from Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the Federal Business Development Bank and it concerns the administration of the Federal Business Development Bank.

I want to know from the minister why the Federal Business Development Bank paid an invoice when Article 14 of the Parliament of Canada Act says that no person who is a member of the Senate shall directly or indirectly, knowingly and wilfully, be party to a concern in any contract under which the public money of Canada is to be paid. I want to know why that invoice was paid to Senator Cogger when he has just admitted in the other house, and I quote: "I have in some instances signed the covering letters accompanying such bills for fees".

• (1500)

He admitted signing a bill, sending it to an agency of the government, and the government paid it against its own laws. Why did the government break the law?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, all of the invoices sent to the FBDB and from Lapointe Rosenstein were from Lapointe Rosenstein. All of the cheques written in respect to those invoices were written to Lapointe Rosenstein, the legal firm that did the contract.

The hon. member asked about a covering letter. With the invoices that were sent from Lapointe Rosenstein, as admitted in the other place, Senator Cogger apparently wrote a couple of the covering letters. Other lawyers in the firm wrote other covering letters. FBDB received legal services from Lapointe Rosenstein and wrote cheques to Lapointe Rosenstein in response to the invoices for those legal services.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. As he knows, the transport committee has been studying the government's plans for VIA Rail. This morning the committee was told by the director general of surface policy and programs for Transport Canada that not only were the staff who conducted the initial environmental assessment not trained in environmental matters, but in fact they did not do an assessment of the increased pollution that would be put into the environment as a result of people moving from VIA Rail to automobiles.

Given that revealing bit of information that no such study was done, will the Prime Minister now indicate that a moratorium has been placed on the changes to VIA Rail until such time as both the royal commission has reported and a full environmental assessment has been done on this vital part of Canadian institutions?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer has not changed because the Prime Minister is here. It is exactly as we have been saying. The deputy minister said this morning that, as we would for any department, we would have done a preliminary study on the environment if it had been necessary at the time, in consultation with the Department of the Environment. That is what he said. He also stated that if it becomes necessary and is requested by the Department of the Environment, we will move to a full environmental assessment. We did not because it was not necessary. Again I repeat, there is no necessity to put a moratorium in place.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ENVIRONMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fulton:

> That this House calls upon the Government to implement an ecologically sound "green" tax system.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Normally on an opposition day there is an agreement among the three parties that each party can use its time as it wishes; for example, either having one 20-minute speech and a 10-minute question and answer period or two 10-minute speeches, each followed by a 5-minute question and answer period. I would ask the unanimous approval of the House to do this for the remainder of the day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it so agreed? The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that those who address the House will give notice before they start their speeches what period of time they intend to use for their speeches.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to signal once again our willingness to co-operate with the opposition on a day that is theirs. I would also ask at the same time that they consider in the future giving us the same consideration when we would like to get a number of speakers on government bills.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, before I respond to the parliamentary secretary's request, I would like to indicate to the Liberal Whip that it is our intention to have the member for Yorkton—Melville not take 20 minutes, that he would finish his speech with one more minute of debate and then we would go to the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan for another 10-minute speech.

In response to the parliamentary secretary's request that more Conservative members get up in the House, we certainly would welcome them speaking on a number of the bills.

If they wanted to speak on the UI bill, we would let them. If they wanted to speak on tax reform, we would let them. If they wanted to talk about the clawback, we would let them speak.

Mr. Parent: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you could direct the House as to whether or not, after his or her speech when we ask questions of the speaker, supplementary questions are ever allowed, or does the intervener simply have one question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will allow supplementary questions if nobody else gets up in the chamber.

I think it is agreed that the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville will have another two minutes left in his speech, plus five minutes for questions and comments.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I want to ask the House to think very seriously about the idea of a special task force or a parliamentary committee to look at changing our taxation system so that a very important part of that system is what we call the greening of Canada or the greening of the planet. We need a system of sticks and carrots that will motivate not only corporations, but also individuals, to consume and produce products that are going to be of benefit to the environment of Canada. I think we should be doing that.

There is so much we can do with the tax system in this country in terms of the kind of country we want. If we are to have incentives to keep this country cleaner and penalties to make sure that industry does not pollute our rivers, our lakes and our air, I think we would all be better off for it.

It is a new idea being pushed by the member for Skeena that we should have a very important principle in our taxation system namely, that we have the eco-tax or the green tax. I think it is something that we should study. I am sure that we can get all three parties looking very seriously at the problem, and perhaps we can make a very important change that would be as important in principle as the principle of ability to pay or of making sure that our taxation is not regressive but progressive.

Let us take a look at that in our taxation system.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate today. I want to focus my comments for the next 10 minutes on the impact of an ecologically sound green tax system on transportation because, in this vast country of ours, no policy that we develop should be in isolation of transportation.

We and my colleague from Regina-Lumsden in particular, who has fought this battle for many, many years, have talked about and believe in the concept of a transportation system that is interconnected, a multi-modal system wherein you maximize each of the modes of travel to the extent possible within the geographic realities, but more importantly in the context of this debate, in terms of environmental realities and in terms of the use of fossil fuels and other forms of fuel.

Just a few moments ago in this House I raised a question about the environmental impact of the cuts to VIA Rail. We were told this morning by the officials of the department, the person who is in charge of surface transportation, that the seven-page initial environmental assessment that was conducted by the Department of Transport, by her and a gentleman who comes from the economics branch of transport—we have a transportation specialist and an economic specialist deciding on environmental matters. It is like the Minister of Finance making decisions about VIA Rail and transportation matters. But we will come back to that at another point.

First of all, they did say that x number of people will be shifted from the rail passenger mode, which is one of the most environmentally friendly modes of travel, particularly in terms of the large scale movement of people within a country, to see what the impact would be. They know how many people will take their car rather than the train, and how many people will get on a bus or how many people will get on a plane. But what they did not do is to then quantify that. If we have one million more car trips per year, which is what they are suggesting it will be the result of their decision on VIA Rail, although even that is in dispute, that means one million more cars driving probably an average of 250 kilometres which I think is the suggested norm.

Mr. McDermid: No, it doesn't.

Mr. Angus: I am not talking about one million new cars, I am not talking about trips that would not have otherwise occurred. But what they did not do was the next logical step. In any environmental assessment the most logical step is to measure the impact on the environment. How many more kilograms or kilotonnes of nitrous oxide or carbon dioxide would be emitted in the atmosphere? They did not do that, Mr. Speaker. They just said that one million more car trips, really will not have much of an impact so let's not bother doing a full environmental assessment. Part of the reason why we of the New Democratic Party put forward this motion today is to make the point that we have to treat our world a lot better than we are now.

Any kind of government policy, in this case on taxation, but also on transportation, should have as its uppermost concern the impact on the environment. Let us hope it is in terms of how we can lessen the impact on the environment, not how we can add more like this decision on VIA Rail has done. In this great country of ours, which is such a vast magnificent land, many people live in a very narrow corridor next to the Canada-U.S. border, with some fingers of development in the northern territories. In northwestern Ontario we have had to build around Lake Superior and the Great Lakes in order to get from east to west. We need an integrated system.

It does not make sense for people to be flying from Toronto to Ottawa or Toronto to Montreal, or Montreal to Ottawa when for substantially less money, fuel and land, and much less pollution, we could be using high speed electrified rapid transit between those main communities. Given the congestion of Pearson International Airport, which is not going to be solved by a new terminal, it will be quicker, downtown to downtown, to travel by rail between these cities. Think of the atmosphere, Mr. Speaker. I know that you travel on the trains from time to time. Consider how much easier it is to do business in that particular corridor with the high-tech we now have. On the train we can use cellular phones and have a desk away from home, so to speak. You arrive in a much less frazzled state. We can do with that kind of thing.

It makes sense in some of the regions of the country to use rail, to link Thunder Bay and Dryden for example, or Cape Breton and Halifax, rather than air for these short distances. There are many options for environmentally friendly forms of transport.

That is on the passenger side. What about the freight side? As a country we have to be able to move both raw materials and finished goods. Right now we do it on the basis that because of the high cost of transportation, those people who are farther away will pay more.

From an economic standpoint, dare I say it, we could change a couple of policies and follow the lead of the private sector. Some of the major department stores have what they call a regional pricing policy. We all get the fliers from Sears or Eatons and see that a fridge in Thunder Bay is priced the same as the one in Toronto. We have done it with beer in Ontario. We do it with milk in other provinces. We are required, by the company policy, to include transportation costs in the over-all price so it becomes part of their cost of doing business. Therefore, it is averaged out so that that fridge can be sold in every community at the same price.

One might ask what that has to do with an environmental tax. It has everything to do with it. We are crowding so many people into the golden horseshoe of southern Ontario, mainly because that is where the markets are, the people buy the finished goods. Therefore it makes sense, given the Canadian economy as it is structured now, to locate the plants there. So that means more people come to the golden horseshoe to work and therefore create more demand, and on and on and on. A transportation policy should reflect the environment and land use planning. We so often forget that land use planning is an important environmental consideration.

I listened with interest to an open line CBC program last week on which a well known author, who is also a farmer, was talking about the impact of the paving over of the agricultural land in southern Ontario. That by itself reduces the emissions of oxygen into the atmosphere, the ability of this planet to recycle its air, to clean it and to put it back out in a form that is suitable for human beings.

We could mix all these together and have an environmental tax system under which there is no tax or lesser tax on environmentally friendly things. For example, what if we exempted bicycles from sales taxes, from manufacturers taxes, to lower their price so that more and more people could afford to use that extremely non-polluting form of transportation? We could electrify. The reality in this country is that by themselves CN or CP or VIA Rail, whatever is left of it by the time this government is finished, on their own cannot justify electrification because of the high up-front costs, but if the government was to do it we would not only save in the environment, we would save in terms of fossil fuels and we would promote a healthier planet.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, with each passing day Canadians are more aware of and concerned with the state of the environment. More and more they realize that life on earth is predicated upon a delicate and complex fabric of ecologic systems. As humans we are at the same time a product of that environment, a major cause of its present state and a determining element of its future evolution. Each calory of energy used, each ton of mineral mined and processed by our technologies, each crop planted and harvested impacts in some way on the environment. From time immemorial the earth has provided the basic ingredients that are essential to life, namely air, water, food and heat. Those resources also are a global environment capital drawn upon by every economic activity, every development project. And, perhaps more importantly still, the earth sets the natural limits of economic development and life itself.

Mr. Speaker, it would be a total delusion to believe that we can escape environmental features and processes that are quite independent from human actions. The bottom line is that nature deals the cards and establishes the rules of the game.

[English]

In the last few generations the capacity of man to alter the global ecosystem has increased dramatically with increases in population and rapid advances in technology. World economic activity, for example, has increased 20-fold since 1900. As a result, many of man's activities are taxing the capacities of our global ecosystem beyond its limits. Each year we dump five billion tonnes of CO2 in the atmosphere, consume 40 per cent of the planet's biomass and the amount of fossil fuel it took the planet about one million years to create.

While global economic activity has expanded rapidly and living standards have improved enormously in the developed world, global poverty and population growth remain a fundamental problem. Global population is projected to double by 2050. Eight-five per cent of this will join the majority of the world's population which lives in poverty today and aspires to a better quality of life. Whether the global economy and the global environment can accommodate these hopes is perhaps the greatest challenge of our time.

Without a systematic framework for addressing these stresses, it is unlikely to be any relief for our global ecosystem. As the 21st century approaches, the outlook is for more and more demands on our planet's environmental resources as the global economic system seeks to meet the needs and aspirations of the growing world population. This will put at risk not only the capacity of our planet to sustain economic growth, but its capacity to sustain life. Future generations will pay dearly if we do not act now.

Mr. Speaker, when thus describing our environmental problems, one might think they are far remote from concerns of the Canadian people and that individual efforts are futile. However, neither perception is true. The problems that directly concern Canadians, for instance air pollution in our cities, Great Lakes water quality, climatic changes, ozone layer depletion, all those problems are symptomatic of larger problems deriving from the complex process of environmental interactions at the continental or global level.

It is equally erroneous to believe we are powerless as individuals. The way we use the natural environment is the result of countless day-to-day decisions made by individuals, corporations and governments. Whether this involves setting the thermostat and deciding how to use water or dispose of household garbage, managing effluents or building new industrial facilities or determining government economic policy, all those decisions have a cumulative impact on the environment. If the global environment today is threatened, it is because in making those decisions we failed to consider the costs of pollution to the environment and our environmental heritage. Indeed, we treated the environment as a gift of nature.

[English]

We have not been blind to the need for action. There have been some important successes in dealing with pollution problems. Through the combined actions of individuals, corporations, interest groups and governments, sulphur dioxide emissions in Canada have fallen by almost 50 per cent since 1974, while lead levels have fallen by over 50 per cent. In many cases, however, these responses tended to be reactions to a crisis or problem situation, sometimes focusing entirely on clean-up. More than ever we realize the need to anticipate a problem and prevent its occurrence.

What is needed to cope with our emergency environmental challenges is not more rhetoric, not meaningless resolutions. What is needed is a fundamental change in the way we make decisions at all levels of society. We must begin to integrate environmental considerations into the day-to-day decisions we make as individuals, as corporations, and as governments. We must begin to treat the environment like the scarce and unique resource that it is; an ecosystem that is essential to the sustainability of development and life itself. This is what sustainable development is all about, changing behaviour, changing the way we see the environment, and its relationship to our activities. And that is how we will move from a reliance on reactive solutions to preventive solutions.

Each of us has a responsibility and a role as a decision-maker in changing behaviour and the behaviour of those around us. Globally, Canada has a responsibility as a steward of a significant fraction of the world's environmental resources and as a source of global ecosystem stress. This means we must look to a response that is both domestic and international in scope and demonstrates much needed leadership. Individuals, businesses, and governments have an important stewardship role as property owners and users of environmental resources.

However, governments bear an additional responsibility. A good part of the natural resources used by our economy are outside the market system and therefore considered a free product or service.

Normal market forces do not provide sufficient incentive to make environmentally sound decisions. Since the market is not able to provide a decision-making framework for responsible measures—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Hamilton East.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, on the most important issue on the government's agenda there are only two government members here. We lack a quorum.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I now see a quorum. Resuming debate, the hon. minister still has two minutes left in his speech.

[Translation]

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, Canadians expect the federal government to play a leading role on the environment. The government is meeting this challenge eagerly, and, in the spirit I announced several weeks ago, the government is now preparing an environmental action plan for Canada consisting of a national framework for implementing sustainable development.

Mr. Speaker, we know that the environment is a "hot" issue, a subject of concern in Canada and throughout the world. We know that governments are forced to react to the situation.

That is why the government decided several months ago now to task my department and all those departments represented on the environment committee with preparing a comprehensive environmental action plan for the next five years. We all know that we need comprehensive policies, additional measures and more resources.

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the motion before us, not because I believe that the government does not need more resources: I do believe we need more. But, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the concept of an extra tax for the environment must be part of an approach that includes new environmental policies with new fiscal policies and harmonizes them, and that it must be perceived as such. All this will be in the action plan that will be presented to the government and made public in the spring.

• (1530)

[English]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to the remarks of the minister. It seems to me that he is hedging. He is not saying that he is opposed or that the government is opposed to a green tax system. It is a bit of a wait and see attitude.

As the minister knows, many countries around the world and very much across Europe have already introduced carbon taxes. They have already been introduced in Japan. Many of these green system taxes have been demonstrated to be highly beneficial. Not only do you reduce your energy consumption, but at the same time you are reducing the amount of pollution and in fact you are creating commodities. You are creating jobs at a much faster rate than under our existing archaic tax system.

I would just like to get clarification from the minister. Does he think that the approach being taken by his colleague, the Minister of Finance, in applying the new proposed 9 per cent GST to recycled paper at the same rate as to virgin paper is environmentally appropriate? I think the minister knows that a green tax system can be put to a wide range of uses, whether it is on recycled paper, on bicycles versus automobiles, or on canoes versus motor boats, or whatever. It will make for a cleaner environment, lower costs, lower energy use, less pollution, and full employment.

What kind of a recipe would any government be looking for that would bring in a more regressive form of taxation, self–admitted by the Minister of Finance, when other countries around the world have picked up and cobbled together different pieces of a green tax system? Does the minister not really want to stand up today and say he supports a green tax system, that now is the time to bring it in, and that we cannot wait any longer?

Mr. Bouchard (Lac–Saint–Jean): Mr. Speaker, taxes will always be needed for one main purpose—to raise money. The government needs money. The reason for which governments have been created is to pool the resources of a nation in order to address the national and global problems of a nation.

This being said, we in this government think that we now have a new challenge in front of us, an international challenge, a national challenge. This challenge will call for new and additional resources. The problem is of such a magnitude that it will require the government to devise new fiscal policies. The GST question has no direct link with what we are doing in environment. GST is there to rationalize the way taxes are raised in Canada. This must be done. This has been the objective of our government. No government before has had the courage to do it. We had this courage because we think it is necessary. We did not do it to be popular. We did it because we think it is our duty.

Apart from that, we think we need more money for the environment. The way to raise that money is not necessarily something to do with one more tax. It is something to do with the framework of a new approach wherein, as the member has very eloquently said, we have to mesh the environmental purpose and the money raising purpose. This can be done. I am sure it will be done.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a question. Given his concerns rightfully expressed about global warming, why has his government cut energy efficiency research and development grants and programs by 91 per cent?

Mr. Bouchard (Lac–Saint–Jean): It is a matter of philosophy, a matter of perception of what the problem is. This government does not believe that all the money spent on the environment must come from the public purse.

Recently, I had the opportunity to announce the creation of a fund to clean up orphan sites. One of the main conditions is that provinces must, in return, implement a legislative and regulatory mechanism in order to make it compulsory for companies to clean up 950 other sites. I give that example to show that the money will not come exclusively from new taxes and energy consumption measures, but also from the application of the polluter pays principle.

So it is obvious that, in our action plan, there will be a very strong emphasis on energy conservation measures, but energy conservation does not create energy. Obviously, that is where we must start, and that is exactly what we will do. As we look at possible ways to conserve energy, we must also find ways to create energy.

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris) Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in today's debate, particularly with respect to the fact that daily we are becoming increasingly aware of the deteriorating nature of the environment. There are front page stories and television news items. Literally Canadians and other people around the world are being bombarded with a litany of old problems getting worse and new problems becoming more evident.

There have been tremendous implications for us as a government and as a country in terms of our domestic policy and with respect to our international relations with other nations and other governments. Later on this afternoon my colleague, the hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury, will be speaking with respect to some of the matters to which the Government of Canada has responded vis-à-vis domestic policy.

I would like to look for a while this afternoon at some of the very, very important developments which have occurred in international arenas. To a very real extent the crisis of the environment is a global crisis, and the solutions must be found both outside our boundaries as well as inside.

As you know very well, Mr. Speaker, the United Nations-sponsored Brundtland commission issued a new agenda just a short time ago saying that the planet needs "a new era of environmentally sound economic development". That report said from now on—and I think most governments including ours have echoed that conclusion—we must have policies and economic positions based upon the concept of sustainable development. We must ensure that in future environmental decisions are a first thought in the decision-making process rather than an afterthought as they were all too often in the past.

We must change, as the Minister of the Environment said just the other day. We will have to tailor and change our lifestyles to fit the ecological realities of this new world in which we live. It may affect the way in which we grow food, harvest trees and generate power. We will obviously have to reduce the pollution that changes the atmosphere and endangers our food and water supplies. We will have to protect our all too critical resources such as the farm land, the forests and the wildlife from overuse.

I come from Brandon—Souris in the province of Manitoba. We are all too aware of the fact that we have had drought for two years in succession. There is a growing amount of concern that it might be one of the first results of global warming.

We must favour types of economic development which fall within this planet's ability to absorb our wastes and to renew its resources. To do that we will have to link economic decisions and environmental impacts, whether we are making household purchases, industrial development decisions or forming government policy at the federal, provincial or the municipal level.

The question before us, however, is not whether the Government of Canada is prepared to respond to the key environmental problems that we face either as Canadians or as citizens of the world, which clearly we are. The question before us is whether or not we are simply prepared to put our eggs in one basket, in this case the basket of the so-called green tax, or whether we believe that we must develop a comprehensive national strategy in order to address all aspects of environmental issues.

We believe that there must be that comprehensive action plan to which the minister has alluded. We have given notice of our intention to act. We have indicated our willingness to translate the concept of sustainable development into concrete reality.

I think Canadians understand that some of the most compelling of the problems facing us are global, transboundary. We as a government understand therefore that we are going to resolve the problems, whether they be with respect to the depletion of the ozone layer, global warming or acid rain; that we are going to have to secure the co-operation of governments outside our own country.

I am proud of the activity that has occurred in recent years in which Canada has played an integral part. For example, we were the first nation to ratify the Vienna Convention for the protection of the ozone layer. This government took a lead role in developing and adopting the Montreal Protocol on substances that deplete the ozone layer.

I was proud, if I may say so, as an individual member of Parliament to head our delegation to the Helsinki Convention last May where the nations of the world took further steps, recognizing that the Montreal Protocol in itself would be inadequate to rectify the crisis facing the ozone layer.

We agreed in Montreal to a partial reduction of chlorofluorocarbons by the year 2000. We as a government and other governments throughout the world now understand that there must be a total ban on the use of CFCs by 1999 or earlier.

In 1988 Canada hosted the Toronto Conference on the Changing Atmosphere, an important international conference with real implications for global security. In February of this year we followed that with a meeting of legal and policy experts where we developed proposals for a convention for the protection of the atmosphere. These initiatives have placed Canada in the foreground of international environmental diplomacy.

The Canada–United States Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement was renewed in November of 1987, providing stronger control over toxic substances entering the Great Lakes. Fulfilling a promise made in the Speech from the Throne the minister announced just recently $125 million as part of the five-year Great Lakes action plan.

Although we understand that the action plan is going to require the co-operation of provincial and municipal governments and industry if that cesspool, if one can use that term, of the Great Lakes is to be clean, what was announced just recently by the federal government was an important first step. It will have to be one of many.

Canada signed the Basel Convention which puts in place an international regime to govern the transboundary movement of hazardous wastes. This will prevent in the future the embarrassing situation of hazardous wastes being dumped as we have seen in the past in developing countries.

More recently, the Commonwealth heads of government issued a strong endorsement of sustainable development. These accomplishments demonstrate our commitment to the environment. I believe we have been among world leaders in reducing threats to global environment.

Over the past 10 years, however, probably no single issue has been more important to Canadians with respect to international consequences than acid rain. The progress this government has made in that regard demonstrates our commitment to reducing the problem of acid rain and our commitment to ensuring better air quality for Canadians today, tomorrow and in the future.

Mr. Speaker, if you remember in 1984 there were no specific emission controls in place. Funding for vital acid rain research was about to lapse. Emission standards for new cars and trucks had not been changed for almost 10 years. Significant amounts of lead were still being used in gasoline in Canada.

Since 1984 we have reached an agreement with the seven most easterly provinces with respect to reduction of sulphur dioxide emissions. Those emissions have been reduced by some 40 per cent now, and it is clear that we will reach our objective of 50 per cent by 1994.

Loans have been made available to large emissions sources, to companies such as Noranda which have met their objectives for the reduction of sulphur dioxide emission reductions. Funds have been made available to assist in the development of new technologies.

Reduced allowable emissions from automobiles have been changed on two different occasions—in 1987 and in a very important agreement in Charlottetown last week where it was agreed we would adopt California standards by 1994. A decision was also made to eliminate the use of lead in gasoline by 1990 and to increase the excise tax on leaded gasoline in the meantime.

All these instances, plus a continuing effort on the part of Canada to work closer together with the United States to ensure that acid rain will be reduced, are evidence of first the recognition on the part of this government that the threat to our environment is global in nature and will require the co-operation of international governments, and that the federal government must work closely together with the provinces. We must come up with a long needed and much overdue comprehensive action plan of which perhaps the proposal that is before us today may indeed be a part. I would not be able to anticipate that.

Certainly what I think is evident is that to preserve the environment from some of the dangers that we have so readily inflicted in the past and to ensure that the damages are reduced in the future requires a comprehensive and co-operative approach in which I hope all members of this House as well as all governments in Canada will participate. I hope the end result we see will be a better environment for our children, our grandchildren, and their children and grandchildren.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member whether he believes that pollution control devices should be subject to the goods and services tax.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, I think, as all members of this House know, the proposed goods and services tax is a long overdue response on the part of this government to the inadequacies of a manufacturers' sales tax which has been in place in Canada since 1924.

If I understand correctly when members on that side of the House in the Official Opposition had responsibility for government, which they did for many years, they looked on occasion at the possible abolition of the manufacturers' sales tax but, for whatever reason they chose, they decided not to proceed.

What the government is proposing today with the goods and services tax is something which is obviously not politically advantageous to us. I may say that sometimes I often hear from constituents who say to me as a politician, to the government of which I am a part: "Why do you not take tough decisions? Why do you not provide the kind of leadership which Canadians are seeking?"

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the hon. member that the proposed goods and services tax is clearly an example of a government deciding that it must act in the interests of the nation as a whole.

All the polls tell us that what we propose is clearly not done in order to incur political favour. You need not be a political scientist to know, when you look at the statistics, that Canadians like other people throughout the world do not enjoy either new taxes. Nor do they enjoy direct taxes that are highly visible. I see in the goods and services tax an attempt to rectify an old problem, one that has been here in Canada, one that has not worked well since 1924.

Speaking in general terms some 75,000 businesses have been affected by that tax. There are some 22,000 different tax arrangements. There is an estimated $2 billion in tax revenue that legally belongs to the Government of Canada that is not being collected.

I would suggest that we take that $2 billion, assuming we could collect it now under the goods and services tax which would be far more difficult for people to escape than otherwise before—and I would mention to members opposite that they have often criticized the government for permitting loopholes through which people can escape their obligation to pay tax—give it to the Minister of the Environment and permit him to do what he would wish to do. Not only would we have a very effective comprehensive action plan in place within the next 12 to 24 months. He would also have the kind of resources necessary to do the job in such a way that all members of this House would applaud.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, did the parliamentary secretary to the minister just announce that there is $2 billion being given out of the goods and services tax to the Minister of the Environment?

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): What I announced, however, and I think the member probably knows this, is that the manufacturers' sales tax has worked so inefficiently that there has been on a year by year basis in essence $2 billion that was traditionally due to the Government of Canada which has not been collected because of the inefficiencies in that particular tax.

What I said to the hon. member was that that revenue by law properly belongs to the Government of Canada. I suggested that if we had those kinds of additional revenues in place we would have far more resources. I think all members here would agree that the environment should be higher on our priority list. We would have the resources available to do some of the things we believe are necessary.

At this point in time the Government of Canada must spend $28 billion, $29 billion, $30 billion a year on interest alone on a debt which has accumulated since the early 1970s. It takes almost 33 per cent of our government revenues alone to go to interest on money spent in the past. We have limited our capacity to respond to the degradation which has already existed.

We live in the midst of a crisis, a crisis that is twofold. First of all, we have inherited as a people a degraded environment as a result of the failures of Canadians for decades. Governments as well as individuals have contributed to that degradation through some sort of failure on their part.

• (1550)

In addition, the second part of the crisis which is so significant is that the growth of the national debt at a time when there was no economic rationale for its development, particularly during buoyant years of the 1970s, has contributed to an economic malaise and almost an economic bankruptcy within this country to the extent that they cannot respond to the environmental crisis which is ours.

We are now at a stage where we are well aware of the problem, where we have the political will to address it, where I think to a large degree we have the co-operative support of not only members of this House but governments throughout the land, federal, provincial and municipal, that are strapped with the fact that they lack the economic resources that they would wish.

If the goods and services tax can succeed in reforming the tax base to the extent that it becomes a fairer and more equitable tax with fewer loopholes and the moneys which are legitimately the Government's of Canada are collected more effectively and distributed more equitably than they were in the past, then I would suggest that that indeed would be good for the country even though it may not contribute to our political well-being in the short term.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard from the Minister of the Environment a difficult and repetitive bilan of the state of the Canadian and the world environment.

I feel somewhat frustrated because it seems to me that time and time again we hear from this minister how bad the situation is, and we have heard his rather flowery rhetoric on this subject on dozens of occasions, but in actual fact his capacity to encourage change is completely lacking. I am frustrated, as millions of Canadians must be frustrated, when I hear the Minister of the Environment and the Prime Minister claim that their first priority is cleaning up the environment, when he actually has the audacity to stand in his place today and vote against the principle of a green tax.

The principle that has been put forward in the votable motion by the hon. member for Skeena is in fact a wide-ranging motion which would incorporate the notion of green taxes into the Canadian economy. I fail to understand the logic of the Minister of the Environment who claims to be an environmental advocate when every single one of his actions since taking office has gone in the opposite direction.

He avoided the question about how this government has cut back drastically on alternative energies and on conservation research. He claimed that he wanted a public-private sector mix. How does he rationalize that statement with his own budget document which shows that his government is going to be spending $5 billion to develop energy megaprojects which they know contribute to the burning of fossil fuel that is creating a situation in which our climate is warming at the same time as the total package for alternative energies is pathetically small and cut on a daily basis?

Friends of the Earth analysed the financial objectives of the government in relation to energy policy. They showed, quite rightly, that for every dollar spent on energy conservation the government is setting aside $19 to spend on development of fossil fuels which lead to global warming. In fact the actual amount cut in alternative energies and energy consumption in conservation since 1984 will reach 93 per cent within the next few years. The actual amount of money the government has set aside for conservation unrenewables, according to a document published recently by Friends of the Earth, is actually $250 million and falling—I believe it has actually been reduced a further $60 million since that time—as compared with $5 billion set aside for fossil fuel megaprojects.

I do not know whether the Minister of the Environment thinks Canadians are stupid. I do not know whether he takes us all for fools. But how can he continue to insist that his government has a plan for global warming, that his government has a plan for reducing the amount of fossil fuel that we burn, when his own department along with the Department of Energy are unwilling to even assume target dates for fossil fuel reduction for this country?

It came as no surprise that California emission standards were announced by the Ontario Minister of the Environment at the national conference in Prince Edward Island a few days ago. It seems that when you talk about leadership in the environment in this country the Ontario Minister of the Environment is taking the leadership. We have the federal minister who followed up with a recommendation originally.

A recommandation from the premier of Quebec encouraging the adoption of the California emission standards.

[English]

But they did it after the United States had already decided to move in that direction.

I would like to ask the minister—and I would like him to speak to the people of Canada—about why a green tax is such a bad thing. He says he may not want to use tax policy to shape our conservation and consumption practices in this country. But he should admit right now that his own department in an internal document is examining the possibility of setting up emissions trading in the same way that is currently being endorsed by the Clean Air Act in the United States. He is examining a proposal which would turn pollution into a marketable commodity. That is how his government sees the market-place. They are going to be able to buy and sell pollution permits.

Instead of saying to companies that they should reduce their over-all level of pollution because it is going to be good for the air we breathe, it is going to be good for our children, it is going to be good for our country, he is actually examining the creation of a pollution permit which would permit Canadian companies to trade pollution rights among themselves. God forbid that we arrive at the day in this country when the right to pollute is a marketable commodity. That is exactly what is envisioned in the notion of having these pollution permits.

I know that the government likes to take ideas from its American counterparts. I know that that is currently one of the domestic provisions of the U.S. Clean Air Act. But I believe that in the past under successive Liberal governments Canada has shown a leadership role in reduction of SO_2 emissions. I would hate to see us follow in the footsteps of the United States where it concerns turning sulphur dioxide and other emissions into a commodity.

Canadians deserve better. Canadians want better. We only had to attend the meeting of the International Joint Commission at which for the first time in the joint study released by the Conserver Society and the IRPP, which is as a matter of fact as we speak making a presentation before the environment committee on global warming, to see for the very first time a link between airborne toxins and human brain damage.

I know that that biannual meeting of the International Joint Commission did not interest the minister. He would prefer to be studying water filtration problems in Paris. I can understand why he would not want to have been there for the launching of the IRPP report. It is the first time that we have actually drawn a link between actual brain damage in humans and airborne toxins.

Last summer I had the opportunity to go to Broughton Island. I had a chance to meet there with the city council of Broughton Island. It is a small community in the eastern Arctic that volunteered for a study of the effects of trace contaminants of PCBs.

Do you know what that study showed, Mr. Speaker? In the most pristine, untouched part of the world currently accessible only by plane, set up on the DEW Line in about 1960 essentially to service the needs of the military, the women in that community have PCBs in their mother's milk.

This minister and this government will not move to reduce the allowable burning of trace PCBs from 50 parts per million to 20 parts per million because, the minister says, the scientific data is inconclusive. The scientific data may be inconclusive for trace contaminants, but the scientific data for those women who have PCBs in their mother's milk is not inconclusive.

We actually heard during the Liberal caucus in Iqaluit that some mothers were so distraught about the situation that instead of feeding their children with their own mother's milk, they fed them with Coffeemate and the children suffered from malnutrition. They could not afford to pay the exorbitant price of fresh milk that comes in by plane and costs about $6 a litre in the store in Broughton Island, so they fed their children with Coffeemate.

When the minister talks about developing a world protocol and about the international conventions, they are all extremely important and should be supported, but in our own country we have to act and we have to act now. That means we have to be prepared in the case of green taxes to look at examples that have been working for example in the European Community, with which the minister is very familiar and from which he likes to draw a lot of ideas. Why do we not look at what has been done in the European community or in Japan to cut back on the consumption of carbon fuels at the same time as we increase the awareness that there is a cost benefit relationship between pollution, taxation, and the GNP.

In the current move in Alberta to set up, at the latest count, almost nine or ten pulp and paper mills using old technology which would not be acceptable in Japan, why is it that we have not included in the cost benefit analysis the cost to the rivers and to the health and to the future of the people of the Northwest Territories, and the people who are living along the Athabasca and Slave River basins?

Why is it we have not moved with the recommendation that there be in fact an element of the GNP assessment specifically devoted to environmental degradation. Surely as trees are cut down across this country so there is a cost, short term and long term, that is being borne by ourselves and by our children. That cost is not currently reflected in the tax system, and that cost is not currently reflected in accounting principles adopted by the government.

What the hon. member for Skeena is recommending is that we be prepared to move in new and different directions.

For quite some time we have heard the Minister of the Environment's empty rhetoric on his good intentions with regard to the environment. But where was he, Mr. Speaker, when the PCB crisis broke out in Quebec? He was hiding in his cottage afraid to come out and take a stand. He did not want to show federal leadership on a national issue, just as he is now ready to reject the proposed tax system which would reflect more closely for the Canadian people the cost of pollution and the cost of preservation.

We know full well that the tax system, for example, has been used for years to speed up corporate development. For instance, a company can claim depreciation when purchasing new equipment. It is a strategy adopted by several governments precisely to speed up development in our country. We have now got to the point where, in our own future, in my daughter's lifetime, temperatures in the Great Lakes are expected to rise so much over the next 50 years that winter in southwestern Ontario will be two to four weeks shorter. As Canadians, we can say that a shorter winter is a good thing but we have to consider the effect it will have on farmers and agriculture since, according to the Great Lakes report, Canadian farmers will have 50 per cent less moisture to work with.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House held a debate on the crisis facing family farms in Canada. We know that the tax issue is not the only major problem with which the farming community must come to grips, for it has to deal as well with rising temperatures and the world-wide warming trend which has become so obvious.

In that context the minister has little choice other than at least endorsing the principle of green taxation, much in the same way as he must support a federal government policy aimed at reducing grants awarded for megaprojects. At the same time, additional funds must be set aside for conservation technology and research on renewable resources.

Mr. Speaker, ever since this government took office the Minister of the Environment and his officials reduced by 93 per cent the money available for conservation and alternate energy projects, not to mention the fact that at the same time they are going to allocate $5 billion for megaprojects without first considering the possibility of cutting down on Canada's over-all energy requirements, along the line of well-established European conservation principles, for example.

So all I can say to the minister is that talk comes cheap, but why is he not prepared at least to consider the advisability of implementing green taxation such as they already have in a number of sectors in Europe and Japan and which seems to have a double impact. The first has to do with tax revenues, and the minister maintains that it is the only purpose of a tax system. The second impact can be seen in consumer habits. If as citizens, as federal government, as provincial government, or as corporations we really want to distance ourselves—

[English]

If we want to get ourselves out of the mess we are in, we are going to have to be prepared to look at new ways of encouraging changes in behaviour patterns. That includes encouraging Canadians, by way of tax policy, to conserve. Why is it in our own House of Commons we cannot get recycled paper?

Last summer I was in British Columbia looking at the over-all environmental situation. I sat at a table across from a lumber company representative who told me that they could not get into the manufacture of recyclable papers because Canadians were not disciplined. Unlike the Japanese, I was told Canadians would not be prepared to separate paper from plastic waste from other waste. It is happening all around us. Canadians are crying out not only for recycled paper, but they want to be able to buy the products and be able to recycle plastic. The technology is available. It is the companies and the politicians that are lagging behind.

Once again, with the simple principle of a green tax the government comes forward and states: "No, no. We have done it this way for 30, 40 and 50 years". Heaven forbid that we should look at a new way of directing the tax system to achieve the objectives of obviously having enough money to run the government, but at the same time to reshape behaviour patterns.

If the minister truly believes that we are on the edge of a precipice, as he is wont to say, and he has described us rightfully as the most wasteful country in the world, the least energy efficient country in the world, we should be ashamed. We should be examining innovative new ways of encouraging conservation and innovative new ways of rewarding those people who, for example, are into conservation by taking their bicycles, or those people who are into purchasing cars that are more energy efficient or those people who in fact are following the mandate of thinking globally and acting locally. There are many millions of concerned Canadians out there. You only have to look at any magazine, Chatelaine, The Financial Post, the Report on Business—

L'Actualité. Everyone involved in environmental issues knows full well that the people want to forge ahead. Politicians however are the ones lagging behind, afraid to say something new that might cost them votes.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians are willing to make sacrifices, they are even prepared to accept new pollution taxes, new green taxes in order to answer direct needs, such as pollution control and environmental clean up.

Mr. Speaker, I know Canadians are ready. I wonder why the Minister does not trust the people of Canada.

[English]

Mr. James: I listened with interest to what the member for Hamilton East had to say. I was especially interested in that last part of her discourse because I, too, have great concern over those who talk about the environment but do not practise it.

Any time we ask a hundred people what is the most glaring issue of the day, their answer is it is the environment. However, if we followed those hundred people around for a day, we would find that a great percentage of them are polluting our environment. It seems to be a mindset; it is somebody else's problem and not theirs. They use environment unfriendly products; they throw their cigarette butts on the street; they wash their driveways down into the storm sewers without cleaning them up; they sneak burn their leaves; they take all the wrappings that they should not take at the fast food stores. I might ask the member when was the last time she refused some of the wrappers offered at the fast food drive-in. We should say no, we do not want them. We just want the food. We do not want all that environmentally unfriendly material.

I wonder what we are doing with our young people. I met with a number of school children just a week or so ago and they were talking about the environment. The environment is of great concern to them, but they do not seem to realize that they should be concerned about the environment through all they do.

Do we really have to throw money at this sort of thing and tax people? Do we have to use taxes to make them think about the environment, those individuals who pollute our environment every day? I have concern about whether we have to tax them, or whether we should be using other means.

Members of Parliament themselves should show examples. Perhaps we should use some of the ways we have of communicating with the public, i.e. Householders and so on, wherein we could talk about the environment and what people individually could do to be helpful in not polluting our environment and not necessarily always have to look at dollars. Yes, we need dollars, but are there not other ways.

We as members of Parliament, the member from Hamilton included, should do something by communicating with our constituents and do a better job of communicating the need to being environmentally conscious and practise some of the more simplistic measures rather than constantly bombarding them with the more complex side. Not that we should not be concerned about all that, but individuals on the street need to be coaxed and cultured into being more environmentally conscious in everything they do all day long every day.

Ms Copps: My point, and I do not know if the member agrees with it, is I believe that the people are doing and are prepared to do much more than the politicians. The member mentioned fast food packaging. Who establishes packaging laws in this country? It is the federal ministry of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It could move in and require that all packaging be produced in a material that is recycled. The federal ministry of Consumer and Corporate Affairs could move in and do that. What I am suggesting is that the public is prepared to do it, but we the politicians are not prepared to come forward with some innovative new approaches.

The federal government is not broke when it comes to the $5 billion it is setting aside for energy megaprojects, so it is a question of making choices.

Who chose to spend $5 billion on energy megaprojects and about $250 million or less on the renewables? That is a political choice of his government. It was his government that moved in 1984 to do away with the Canadian Home Insulation Program, probably one of the single best ways of permitting Canadians to insulate their homes so they would use less energy.

What is the intelligence of cancelling the Canadian Home Insulation Program and at the same time spending $5 billion on energy megaproject claiming it is in the effort to assure security of supply? Surely security of supply has to deal with not only getting new energy sources available, but also reducing the energy that we are using on an ongoing basis.

Every single Canadian could move with a retrofit of incandescent light bulbs. People in Europe or other countries who have not had the tremendous access to "unlimited energy supplies" that we have had in this country are more energy conscious. They do not use as much water in their toilets. It sounds ridiculous, but a simple water dam could save millions of dollars in water costs across this country because it would reduce the amount of water needed to flush a toilet.

Surely we can build a federal tax policy that provides incentives for people to make these kinds of changes and disincentives to continually consume, merely to create a larger demand for the supply. That is the point of a green tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today on the motion which asks the House to enact important changes to the present tax system. I must at the beginning of my remarks place the issue in its proper context. As the member for Trois-Rivières, I feel the government has shown up to now that we are more than favourably disposed towards the environment and since 1984 we have done tremendous work in that regard and about the environmental situation our country and the world is in. I think we owe it all to our Right Hon. Prime Minister as well as to the Minister of the Environment we have had for five years.

There is always great danger, Mr. Speaker, when politicians and particularly managers of a country such as Canada try to mix apples and oranges. That is what this motion does today. It says on the one hand: We want to protect the environment, and on the other hand: Let us tax, let us use the tax system for the environment. That reminds me, and you will remember it too, Mr. Speaker, the pre-1984 tax measure called scientific research tax credit that cost not millions but billions of dollars to Canadians and did not in the end bring any scientific research to the country. We must be very careful. If, regarding environmental matters, a budget is allocated to the Minister of Environment, his competent officials administer that budget, invest the money and develop proper policies, fine!

Mr. Speaker, I agree with that approach. But don't ask the Department of Finance, don't ask the tax experts, who are certainly not environmentalists, to make decisions on a tax for the environment. That is the problem, Mr. Speaker. Since 1984, we have established or re-established a tax system that works. We closed loopholes and removed tax shelters that existed when we came to power in 1984. We introduced a minimum income tax. We reduced the number of tax brackets from ten to three, as you know. We removed personal exemptions, basic exemptions, exemptions for the sick, and so forth, and we replaced those with a tax credit, the same amount for everybody, irrespective of income. We made the system fair and effective.

And now in Phase II of the tax reform, we will finally get rid of a 13 per cent manufacturer's sale tax and replace it with a 9 per cent goods and services tax, which will benefit all Canadians. This will be the last step towards an effective and valid tax system in this country, one that will make us competitive internationally. It is all very well to have a fiscal policy in this country, but that policy must also help our businesses, either to compete with imports or to export their products and compete on the international market. In both cases, our fiscal policy and our economic policy must be compatible and help Canadian business. Our tax system will now be complete. However, if we want to add a tax to deal with environmental problems, I can see the Opposition saying tomorrow or the day after: We should have a tax to deal with some other problem in another department, for instance, a special tax on transportation. The next day, the Opposition will tell me they need a special tax for the deficit. And in three, or four or five years, if we listen to the Opposition, if we introduce every single tax they ask for to deal with all these problems, our tax system will be in the same mess, it will be the same major problem we had when we came to power in 1984. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I think we must keep taxation and the environment separate.

Mr. Speaker, when we talk about improving the quality of life of our constituents, we must always be sure it will be in their best interests. A typical example Canadians will remember, as I said earlier, was the scientific research tax credit—some cases are still before the courts—where there was a terrific waste of taxpayer's money without any benefit to the community. This was an example of bad management, and it certainly didn't do scientific research any good.

The Minister of the Environment, the Hon. Member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Bouchard) has acted responsibly on environmental issues. He has made firm commitments. We must not forget, when we are talking about the environment, that this is not a regional or a provincial issue but a federal issue, and also an international issue. At that level, the Prime Minister of Canada and the Minister of Environment have also acted responsibly, and that is very important. We must keep working at the international level because even if your own backyard is clean, if the neighbours don't clean theirs, it is very likely the bugs will migrate from their yards to yours. So as far as the environment is concerned, we must keep up the pressure, both internationally and nationally.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, you will realize that in the circumstances, I cannot agree with the motion as drafted.

As I said earlier, there have been some very substantial changes in our tax system since 1984. We have expanded the tax base, both for individuals and companies, so that everyone will pay his fair share of taxes. The same applies to capital gains. The same applies to the lifetime exemption on capital gains.

I don't think we should dismantle what we managed to build during the past five years, a system that has resulted in substantial dividends both for Canadians individually and for the quality of life in this country.

With the GST, all families with an income of $30,000 or less will be in a better position as far as taxes are concerned, meaning that once the system is in place in 1991, they will have more disposable income than they have now. They will be entitled to an annual tax credit of $275 per adult and $100 per child, to which may be added another tax credit, depending on individual or family income. Furthermore, businesses will be entitled to a maximum of $600 for completing the paperwork required in connection with the goods and services tax. You know as well as I do, Mr. Speaker, that the paperwork will not be significant. It will be just one 8 1/2 by 11-inch sheet the company will have to complete once a month. Monthly sales minus monthly purchases, and the difference multiplied by 9 per cent, and that amount is sent to us here at the federal government. Nine million Canadians will receive a cheque in December 1990. Before the goods and services tax is even in place, nine million Canadians will have received a cheque. That is not what I would call a regressive consumer tax system but rather a just and fair system.

Moreover, we will further reduce by 1 per cent the personal income tax of Canadians who are in the middle tax bracket.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we will have an excellent tax system. And I don't think we should collect a green tax because if we do start with the environment, we will have to follow through with transport, fisheries, and so on. Departments have competent people to manage their budget, and we should give them the money they need to improve the quality of life for Canadians.

To conclude, as I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, I am against the spirit and the letter of that motion.

[English]

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if the hon. member could rise and give the House a single example of a green tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Either I did not get the point raised by my hon. friend opposite, Mr. Speaker, or he failed to get the gist of my remarks. What I said is that our tax system and environment minister are both excellent. Let us keep our tax system and the environmental separate, for if we adopt today the principle of this so-called "green" tax system, we might be faced again with the same problem tomorrow and the day after. Departments exist to look after the problems of this country. Each department has its own framework and professionals. Again, for my hon. colleague's information, I will remind him of the so-called scientific research tax credit scheme which was supposed to promote scientific research in Canada. Did it promote scientific research in this country? No, but there were people who managed to make a bundle at the expense of Canadian taxpayers. It did not help scientific research one little bit. What we are saying is that the Department of Finance exists to implement the income tax and sales tax legislation for the purpose of collecting money for the federal treasury. Then, the federal government is responsible for distributing this wealth among Canadians men and women, through the various departments which apply the programs set up and adopted by the House. That is the point, and not through a tax system.

• (1630)

The purpose of the income tax legislation is to collect money, the Department of Environment exists to improve the quality of life for all Canadians in every part of this country. That is the difference we should recognize, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate, with the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I heard comments in this House that I often hear when we want to introduce social and economic changes and change for the better of our world. The question is asked: what are we doing with our young people? Our young people are not the ones who have messed up the world. We are. Let us take the responsibility for that and let us take responsibility for our ongoing contribution, not only for the pollution of our environment and our water and the world, but for the rapid depletion of the world's resources.

I spent a number of years before I entered this Chamber in municipal governments, including chairing the committee that was responsible for dealing with sewers, garbage and river pollution, among other things. I guess I have a very down-to-earth view of some of the solutions that we need to pursue. It is very clear to me that we need to pursue intergovernmental solutions, not all at one level and not in isolation.

We need to recognize that municipalities are way ahead of us. We need to recognize that the people of Canada are way ahead of us as governments, as politicians and as leaders.

I want to address a number of areas in which we are not meeting our responsibilities or obligations. Every time there is a measure that is retrograde and counterproductive it is blamed on taxes. We are told we have to cut the public service because taxes are too high or our deficit is too high.

What are we cutting? In many cases we are cutting the solutions to our problems. Rather than solving problems, we are creating new ones. We have done that by cutting millions of dollars out of environmental programs at the National Research Council. The solutions to the world's problems and, to a large extent, our economic problems are in that research. Energy research within the federal government departments has been cut. There have been cuts to programs that lead people to reduce their energy consumption and ultimately reduce costs to all of us.

We fail to take a comprehensive approach. Let me suggest another way of looking at how we spend our dollars. In the ministry of the environment alone, the purchases of vehicles this fiscal year jumped by some $3 million, nearly a third over last year. That is one of the smallest departments.

How many millions of dollars are we spending on those vehicles? How are we using that purchasing power to exercise leadership in demanding the kinds of vehicles for government use that will help deal with the problem of global warming? The government has failed to use its economic power to demand the kinds of products in a variety of fields.

Through that leadership, in fact, we could be providing the incentive to industry to develop products that not only do less damage to the environment but delete less of the world's resources.

If we look at all levels of government, the power of that purchasing ability is multiplied severalfold. Municipal governments across this country spend 25 per cent more than the federal government on the purchase of goods and services and slightly less than the provincial governments. We as governments can triple our influence simply by what products we choose to purchase and what criteria we put on the product we buy. We can have a triple whammy effect on what kinds of products are produced and therefore available to the public.

I am not tremendously optimistic that there will be that kind of comprehensive approach because in the last year, and as a member of the environment committee, I have seen very little indication that there is any high level of understanding.

Let us not talk about educating the public. They are educated far beyond us in terms of what they are doing, what they are prepared to do and what they are prepared to spend. If anything, they need information from government on how to carry out the motivation that they already have.

As I say, I am not optimistic. I listened with a great deal of concern to the debate in this House when one of my colleagues proposed that the Ministry of Industry, Science and Technology should include in its mandate responsibility for sustainable development. The minister dismissed it as basically hearts, flowers and music, something nice to have, but can live without. What does that have to do with the economy? Anybody who understands the principle of sustainable development understands that if we do not change the way we run our economy and do not develop economically in a way of our resources, we will have no resources on which to prosper.

I see the same approach in transportation. I see the Minister of Transportation who stands up in this House day after day in Question Period and says: "I can't afford to be concerned about the environment." If that is the government's attitude about its own operations and its own activities, I cannot believe that this is a government that is going to say to industrial polluters, "It is going to cost you but you are going to have to clean up."

We see it in department after department. The Minister of the Environment says that he is not responsible for environmental matters, that it is the responsibility of every department. When a department is challenged on its responsibilities for environmental matters within its area of operation it states that it is the responsibility of the Minister of the Environment. The other side of the House is going to have to get its act together or the world is going to fall apart.

I want to talk about the issue of intergovernmental co-operation. We have an ideal opportunity in this capital city of Canada to demonstrate how intergovernmental co-operation can work to ensure that transportation policies, land use policies, parks policies, activities of government are carried out not only in a way which does not damage the environment but would improve the quality of our environment and diminish our use of resources.

We have in this region three levels of government. Two provincial governments control what happens on both sides of the river. There are numerous municipal governments and the federal government. The federal government controls one third of the land mass in the national capital region and 30 per cent of the employment. Such influence on how a community develops gives one the power to work with the other levels of government to make substantial changes and demonstrate through our own national capital region how other cities in Canada and, indeed, around the world can become energy-conscious communities. Yet, not a 10-minute walk from Parliament Hill, the National Capital Commission is planning the development of the last major open space in the heart of this region. It is not paying attention to principles of sustainable development. It is designing a standard community in standard ways.

One of my colleagues has a private members' motion, which I certainly hope comes to the floor of this House, proposing that the NCC take the leadership and initiative to become responsible to co-ordinate and co-operate with an effort to use the nation's capital as a demonstration project for environmentally sustainable urban living.

It is not always a question of spending money. We know from a number of experiences and experiments and some great successes in the private sector that doing things in on environmentally sound way can be cheaper, less wasteful and less harmful to the environment. I wonder how many members of the House have Research Council report. The council co-ordinates grants and identifies environmental technology as one of the key economic opportunities for Canada in the future. Here is a marvellous opportunity to not only prosper economically but to contribute to the future survival of the world. What is the government doing to seize that opportunity to develop those technologies? It is cutting back on research and development. It is cutting back on our scientific institution such as the National Research Council. It is fragmenting programs like our space program by having a space agency in Montreal and a centre of excellence for space in Calgary.

We are too small an economy for that kind of fragmentation. We do not yet have the critical mass that we can afford to scatter programs like that here and there across the country. That is what happens when science and research is treated like a political goody to be handed out wherever you need a few more votes or need to reward a friend. It is time for all of us to make a commitment to exercise leadership as politicians to make it clear that this is of national priority not only in terms of words but in terms of where our dollars are spent and how our decisions are made.

It is time for leadership, not by telling Canadians the severity of the problem, what they should be doing about it, but by seeing how we, as the largest employer in this country and controlling virtually any kind of a process that is operated in industry, can we set the example. How can we use our purchasing power and our role as employer to demonstrate to other Canadians that creating a better world is a sound economical policy? We have never even addressed how present tax policy hinders or helps achieving environmental objectives. To refuse to even begin to address that issue is truly foolhardy.

In the area of scientific research there are all kinds of tax credits and tax write-offs, as well as in the area of scientific development. Are these incentives achieving the objectives with respect to the environment and the use of resources that we want to achieve? Is it not time to begin that examination knowing that tax policy and economic factors are a key initiative to people, either to act positively of negatively?

I encourage members to adopt this motion. Above all, whether or not the motion is adopted, I encourage the government to take seriously the debate in the House this afternoon and have a serious look at how its tax policies affect the environment.

Mr. Jordan: Mr. Speaker, I have a question and a comment. I wish to compliment my colleague for her excellent speech. Maybe I am paraphrasing a bit but the Minister of the Environment said something to the effect that he did not want to use a tax or a lack of a tax to dictate environmental policy.

Sometimes I think we do need motivators. It is not a perfect world that we are living in, and when profit is the motive, sometimes people will do things out of character, very unusual things perhaps with little or no regard for the final results. I look upon the "green tax" as a motivator to try and clean up the environment. What would be so wrong with having a tax on those things which, in their final stages, are left to society to clean up? Would this not be a way of having those who have been responsible for the contaminants pay for the cleaning up of the contaminants?

If we were in the ideal situation we would not need that motivator. We would think enough of our environment that we would not dare touch this or we would make sure that that species survived. But that is not the world we live in. Would it be so wrong then, to put the responsibility for cleaning up the environment in the laps of those who are responsible for contaminating it in the first place?

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker,I thank my colleague for the question. Obviously, I do not believe there is anything wrong with that. In fact, I think it is absolutely essential.

The government already has tax policies that either encourage or discourage certain things. The very minimum that needs to be done is to look at the existing tax policy and see to what extent it discourages. I think we all have to recognize that what we pay for in goods and services is only a small part of the real cost of those goods and services. Obviously we are reaching the stage where we all have to be responsible for our own pollution, and that includes financial responsibility.

I trust we will never again see a situation where we are shipping off our poisons and our pollutants, risking the pollution of the oceans of the world, just to get them out of our backyard. Until there is a responsibility for us to clean up, to treat, or to destroy whatever we produce in the way of waste, there will be no responsibility for our actions. I personally believe it goes far beyond simply taxing the undesirable by–products of production. I think it requires more of an incentive process. For the minister to say that he is not prepared to use the tax system to help clean up the environment, when elements of the tax system already encourage the damaging of the environment, is absolute nonsense.

Mr. James: Mr. Speaker, through you, to the member for Ottawa West, I want to express my concern and interest about the environment. I live adjacent to the Great Lakes and even though someone earlier made a fairly disparaging comment about the Great Lakes, they are still beautiful and wonderful, but we do need to be very careful about what we do around them.

I am also especially interested in the municipalities that are around the Great Lakes or on our rivers and lakes. Earlier, a colleague of the member opposite from the immediate Ottawa area expressed great concern about how the rivers in the immediate area have been polluted, how the beaches cannot be used and so on. I relate that with the member saying that she was on a municipal council, it appears, and also headed up an important committee that was certainly connected with the environment.

So I would be interested to know, as a guide for all of us to follow, what percentage of the levies were paid by the taxpayer toward environmental concerns in her municipality, how that changed while she was there, and how she laid on an environmental tax. Because that seems to be what is being promoted I would be interested in that. It does not appear that it is working so well if, in the immediate Ottawa area, we still have this ever polluting of our river that certainly has been contributed to by the municipalities in the area. comments in that regard.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I might say that one of the contributors to pollution in the Ottawa River is the Agriculture Canada research station upstream from Britannia Beach.

I am pleased to say that while I was on council I did initiate a major study of the Ottawa River designed precisely to identify what actions the municipalities could take. Some of that has been done. I understand there is ongoing work as a result.

We are into the issue of municipal infrastructure. As the member opposite is well aware, a number of programs in the past did assist municipalities with major sewer works and other works that contributed to environmental clean–up. They have the national and provincial associations of municipalities, an agreement by all environmental ministers or responsible ministers at the provincial level across the country, that that is one major initiative needing to be taken on a cost–shared basis. The municipalities are prepared to put in their bucks and the provinces are prepared to put in their bucks. It is only the federal government that has said no.

I think it is worth-while pointing out that that kind of work is Government of Canada can put its money.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

On debate, the hon. member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak in this debate this afternoon as a member of the Standing Committee on the Environment and as a supporter of the goods and services tax measure as well.

The hon. member for Skeena has very cleverly combined the considerations of the environment and the taxation issue in a very interesting motion, one which I cannot support, but one which I nonetheless appreciate for the essence of its provocation and for the attention and emphasis which it brings both to the environment and to the tax issue.

Let me say that I support the environmental concerns of the hon. member for Skeena. I acknowledge and pay respect to his considerable knowledge about things environmental, and I share his concerns and his environmental goals but I must say that I differ considerably on how to accomplish and pay for the achievement of those goals.

On October 23, the hon. Minister of the Environment addressed the United Nations and said that we can speak to the environmental problem in rather simple ways. We can either move to develop sustainable economic and social practices or we can leave the problems to our children and hope that they are capable of solutions that escape us.

If the choice can be stated that simply, it does not mean a quick-fix single panacea like a green tax system, or some other socialist-oriented, profit-motive that I would fail to understand, but a comprehensive framework for action, a comprehensive strategy, and a financial strategy designed to provide the wherewithal by which government can carry out not just its environmental program but its entire program from which we may ultimately be able to initiate some environmentally sensitive taxation issues. The idea is not all bad. Were it not for the fact that the hon. member would move the entire federal government taxation structure in the direction of the environment, I think that some of his ideas certainly bear watching although I am not sure they would bear scrutiny.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your atention to the comprehensive strategy that the government addressed in the Throne Speech in April, in which it talked about five significant directions. One direction was financial integrity, solvency and fulfilling our fiscal responsibility to future generations. I believe that the goods and services tax is a progressive tax, one that raises funds with the growth of our economy, with the growth and spending of our nation, and that we are addressing financial integrity.

The second direction is economic growth, the creation of jobs, regional development, and I think we are addressing that.

A third strategic direction is national unity, one proud country. We are addressing that in a number of ways.

The fourth is the environmental imperative, the search for sustainable development in almost all that we do. We are certainly addressing that today. This motion and its emphasis in those directions is valuable for debate in this House.

Lastly, the Throne Speech spoke about a caring and compassionate society. I think that the goods and services tax speaks to that subject. The goods and services tax is not just a new source of revenue. The goods and services tax is an effort to change the burden of taxation, to shift the emphasis from those who are unable to pay to those who are better able to pay. The goods and services tax does that in a number of ways. It does it by eliminating and maintaining the elimination of taxation on food. It does it by providing a goods and services tax credit to low-income families. It does it be integrating effectively with the income tax system. It does it by replacing the federal sales tax which is a very bad tax and which has inhibited many of the progressive measures we would like to take, including those in the environment. The goods and services tax is an instrument of social change, an instrument of shifting the burden of financial support of government administration and government efforts from those at the low-income levels to those who are able to pay. I submit that the goods and services tax is an essential instrument of both financial responsibility and financial fairness.

When we address the environment in Canada, we have to think about some of the geographic facts, some of the economic facts and some of the demographic facts of our nation. For example, one in three Canadian workers is employed directly or indirectly in resource based activities. These activities count for one half of our export earnings. That is not an area that we can deal with frivolously in a quick fix green tax approach.

Canada has one of the world's longest coastlines, I guess the world's longest coastline of about 29,000 kilometers. We cannot deal with that on a user–pay, quick–fix green tax basis. Canadians are responsible for nearly 8 per cent of the world's total volume of fresh water lakes. We cannot administer those on a quick–fix green tax basis.

Our country has some of the planet's largest stretches of productive farmlands and forests, and we cannot manage those on a quick–fix green tax basis. Beyond any kind of economic ties, the quality and diversity of Canada's natural resources, our parks, our mountains, our forests, our wheat fields, our rugged coastlines, undeniably shape our self–identity, our sense of Canadianism and shape our thoughts about how the rest of the world thinks of us. We certainly cannot address our statement of nationhood on one quick–fix green tax basis.

In light of those considerations, it is hardly surprising that Canada was an early and strong supporter of the Brundtland Commission on Environment and Development. Indeed, it is fair to say that the Brundtland commission served as a catalyst for changes that were already under way in Canada.

I have invited the hon. member for Skeena a couple of times now to visit New Brunswick and to get New Brunswick forestry legislation straight in his mind. He would discover that it, conceived in the early years of this decade, was moving in the direction of sustainable development. We are going to get him down there some day soon and set him straight. We may even get him to change his political loyalties, because sooner or later, he is going to realize that if he really wants to participate in progress in this country, he is going to have to join another team.

Canada has embraced the sustainable development credo as much as any other nation. We are working in all sectors to help put that philosophy into practice, and Canada's actions have come in a number of areas. We have established a national round table on environment and the economy, chaired by Dr. David Johnson, principal of McGill University. We have passed a new Environmental Protection Act. We will be introducing new legislation to protect our water resources and for stricter control of toxic chemicals. Under this government's environmental choices program, we are providing seals of approval to products so that the consumer can make the right environmental choice. In 1988, this government made major amendments to the National Parks Act and moved to establish six new national parks.

All of these actions and more illustrate the movement from the old environmental agenda to the new one. The development of a comprehensive environmental agenda does not involve a single initiative. It cannot be solved by a single quick–fix green tax but by a series of purposeful steps of which the tax reform which we are presently debating and introducing in this country is a major pillar. From being simply a regulator, we must become a leader.

From simply treating symptoms, we must deal with the causes and the solutions. From merely acting in isolation, we must build partnerships.

Regulation remains an important element of our environmental policy tool kit, and Canada has recently adopted a new environmental law, the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. Nevertheless, Canadians also recognize that regulation alone will not achieve sustainable development. Governments, industry, communities, and individuals must demonstrate leadership within their own spheres of influence.

This government has moved quickly to establish innovative decision–making approaches that institutionalize sustainable development and make it part of the every day process. Some of those recent developments include a new federal cabinet structure that gives prominence to the environment, a new environment committee of cabinet that has been established to provide leadership in ensuring that all federal policies and programs take environmental factors into consideration.

The Standing Committee on the Environment, of which members of all parties in this House participate, has demonstrated leadership in the care it has taken to select its program for a study and a report on atmospheric pollution in the context of sustainable development with respect to global warming. A federal environmental assessment review process has been established which will have a legislative underpinning, a state of the environment reporting system, development of conservation strategies in the areas of waterfowl habitat and wetland preservation, fish habitat maintenance, and efforts in the forestry sector.

The second major step in meeting the new agenda is shifting from treating symptoms to dealing with root causes and solutions. No one can ignore, for example, accidents or spills when they occur. Yet the cliche is true, it is cheaper to prevent than to clean up. Sustainable development imposes this attitude as a necessary condition.

The third element is the shift from acting in isolation to building partnerships. The government has created round tables on the environment and the economy to bring these two important decision-making perspectives together among government, industry, labour, science, and citizen groups. They are to serve as permanent mechanisms for exchanging concerns, finding areas of common ground and seeking approaches that are understood and respected by all sides.

Canadians are building partnerships in other forums as well. Industry and consumer groups are co-operating to establish an environmentally friendly products labelling system so that consumers can make informed choices in their purchases. Environmental interest groups are working with governments to increase public awareness about acid rain and other environmental problems such as the ozone layer and global warming.

These domestic initiatives will help establish sustainable development in Canada. The actions in effect will help put our own house in order. The government is dedicated to taking clear and decisive leadership on the environment in partnership with all Canadians. It has taken mankind a great deal of its history to realize that we the people are really the cause of the ecological crisis of unprecedented proportions which we are now facing. We in this government have decided to act.

In the Speech from the Throne, we committed ourselves to a vision of a nation living in harmony with the environment and one that will co-operate with other nations to establish and achieve sustainable development on a global scale. This mission demands that all of our energies be directed toward that goal.

The key word is still development. We must create new capacity to feed our human populations which will double on this earth in the next 50 years. We must create new energy sources and new energy capability five times the present capacity, according to the Brundtland Commission, just to be able to create and sustain the development of our emerging population.

The aim of this House must be, as the previous speaker said, to rise in a non-partisan way above political posturing and to take real and constructive action. We have the opportunity to join peoples from all regions, young and old, men and women, in a common cause. We have among us the talents and the energies to demonstrate that we deserve the trust of future generations to protect and to preserve their interests. We must move beyond debates of simple answers to complex problems and get on with the development and the implementation of a comprehensive environmental agenda.

This motion, as well-intentioned as it may be in an environmental sense, is really an exercise in quick-fix simplicity, a user-pay guide to environmental sustainability. That, with respect, Mr. Speaker, simply will not work.

I will be voting against this motion.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the fundamental objective of the tax system is to raise revenue, to finance the provision of a Public Service and to service the public debt. The tax system should be fair and efficient and it should not distort economic decisions in an undesirable direction.

This motion would have the House make major changes to the tax system, including the corporate income tax system, so that its fundamental objective would be to achieve a quite different goal. While it is a laudable goal, I would question whether the taxation system should be so changed. Rather, we should continue the process of tax reform initiated by the government in order to build a sound, reliable and fair tax system. Only then should consideration be given to using it to achieve goals such as that proposed in today's motion.

The corporate tax system that existed when this government came to office in 1984 was seriously in need of overhaul. A host of special deductions, exemptions and credits had seriously eroded the tax base. Many of these incentives had been put in place for what would appear to be exemplary reasons; for example, job creation, economic growth and the expansion of research and development. But their existence forced tax rates to be increased to generate the necessary revenue.

Moreover, the results being achieved by the combination of generous incentives to direct corporate behaviour and high tax rates is well known to all members, including members of the opposition.

Many profitable corporations were non-taxpaying. Corporate tax revenues were low and there was little evidence that the measures were achieving the desired objectives. Numerous schemes to further reduce corporate taxes were being developed by aggressive tax planners seeking to get the most out of these measures. It is extremely useful to look at this experience and the results of the corporate tax reform when considering the wholesale introduction of tax incentives or penalties to achieve other eminently desirable objectives. Preservation of the environment is an objective, of course, which we all support.

As the Minister of Finance emphasized in his speech to the Commonwealth Finance Ministers meeting in September, the environment is an area where changes in policy are essential. This presents a great challenge to governments in Canada and elsewhere in the world. Managing changes in policies to achieve the best results with minimal adverse side effects are as important here as in other areas of economic management.

The corporate tax system is one part of the tax system where there has been substantial change and experimentation in recent decades. It is instructive to look at it as an example of the constraints that arise. As I noted, the corporate tax system which this government inherited was widely considered a failure. Substantial corporate resources were being used, not to create real economic benefits, but rather to generate tax benefits, and the objectives of growth and job creation were not being achieved.

Equally disturbing was the fact that the generosity of these special incentives led to their growing year after year at a faster rate than could possibly be used. Intricate mechanisms were designed to use losses against income from unrelated activities.

Faced with the situation the government made a fundamental choice. It did not adopt a quick-fix solution with an appealing name. It developed a careful analysis of the problems of the system and the direction and changes that should move the system.

Following the release and public response to a discussion paper in 1985 outlining this analysis, proposals for change were put forward as part of a tax reform. The changes were balanced in nature, recognizing the factors that bear on the system. Taxes were raised by some $1 billion annually from the corporate sector. Tax rates were designed to keep us internationally competitive. The base was broadened to reduce the list of profitable non-taxpaying firms. Perhaps most importantly, the system was redirected so that economic, not tax factors, were at the base of the corporate decisions.

The steps taken in line with this over-all strategy have extended well beyond tax reform itself and include measures taken throughout the government's mandate. The first step was the moratorium on scientific research tax credits, that prime example of a wasteful and ill-conceived incentive, albeit directed at an important objective, R and D.

Other steps include measures to prevent a variety of schemes to transfer tax losses from non-profitable corporations to profitable corporations; the reduction of the accelerated capital consumption allowance rates across a broad range of capital goods and industries; the elimination of the general investment tax credits which proved to be such a failure in producing real wealth; the reduction of a variety of special purpose investment tax credits; an increase in the rate of taxation of capital gains; the introduction of a corporate surtax; the introduction of put-in-use rules to limit the use of deductions where taxable income is not forthcoming; removal of inventory allowance; curtailment of the use of leasing to transfer benefits for accelerated capital consumption allowances from non-taxable entities to profitable firms; and a creditable tax on large deposit-taking institutions.

Most recently, a large corporations tax has been adopted to ensure that all large companies contribute to deficit reduction. This tax, of course, will add almost $1 billion dollars to the debt control effort.

These changes were fundamental and their benefit has been significant. We have a broader and more stable corporate tax base which ensures that corporations, and especially large corporations, pay their fair share. They had not done this in the past. In total, these measures add some $2 billion annually to corporate tax revenues and, just as important, it directs attention back to the basic economic fundamentals.

I have not listed these serious problems of the past and the major effort that has been made to correct them to imply that tax changes should not be used to support desirable objectives such as environmental policy. Rather, I have set them out to show what serious problems can arise if wholesale measures are adopted without recognition of the limits on the tax system's ability to deliver. Let us not revisit the mistakes of the 1970s in the name of environmental policy.

I appreciate the opportunity to bring some of this information to the attention of the House today as we consider the motion of the member opposite, which is about adding a new tax for environmental purposes.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in favour of this motion. Since I was elected a number of people have asked me, of all the things that we deal with in Parliament, what really are the significant issues. I started off by thinking that when it really comes down to it, there are probably only three overriding issues that are particularly significant to the next generation. The first is peace and the question of disarmament, because without that, the next generation is not going to be here.

The second is the question of poverty and the distribution of wealth, not only within Canada, but on a world-wide basis. Canada is starting to create a whole class of poor people; 1.2 million children live in poverty. In the world, we have a severe problem of economic wealth on the one hand and abject poverty, starvation and death on the other.

The third issue is the question of the protection of the environment and sustainable development. In many ways, these issues are rolled up into one. Certainly peace and disarmament is going to mean less use of materials that are involved in the pollution of the environment and that will allow us to deal with the question of income and poverty. I think there is an interrelationship between those three issues.

The environment is one issue on which this government does not seem to be leading the way. There is far more acceptance in Canada of strong measures to deal with the question of the degradation of our environment than this government is prepared to deal with.

I just want to remind government members of what the Secretary General of the United Nations Commission said about this government. "The federal government is long on talk and short on action when it comes to cleaning up the environment. Canada is a country noted for leading with rhetoric and following others with action". Again that is what is being discussed here, when the people on the other side say that a green tax is not a feasible way to change the way we relate to our environment.

Let me talk a bit about the whole question of what is the purpose of taxation. Hon. members on the other side of the House indicate that the raising of taxes is simply a matter of raising money. If that were true, then I would think they would simply raise the money from those who could most afford it. They use tax for social policy. They have consciously shifted the tax burden from corporations to individual families. That is a social policy. That has nothing to do with raising revenue. This country has gone from corporations paying 50 per cent of the tax down to them paying 20 per cent.

The GST is as much a direct social policy as it is a method of raising money. There are many ways that the government could raise money and what it is choosing is a regressive tax.

One speaker said this afternoon that corporations only use pure economic considerations and that is what we should do in making decisions about taxation. Most big corporations do make pure economic decisions, and if they can get away with polluting because it is simply cheaper, they will do so. There are many large corporations, including Cominco, that consider fines almost like a licence to pollute, simply because it is less expensive than putting in proper scrubbing or air pollution equipment.

In this country, we have allowed the companies to make the economic decisions that are best for them, and we pick up half the costs. For example, do we bill McDonald's for disposing of all their garbage? The cost to the whole community for cleaning up pollution, dealing with garbage and a deteriorating environment is very, very expensive. Yet we have told companies that we will pick up that cost so they can become profitable. The total community is subsidizing that industry through taxation.

The other thing I hear a lot about from government members is the discussion about reducing the deficit and the debt. I think it is time someone went back to basic business school and started looking at what is involved with debt. Debts include assets. This government has reduced a lot of its deficit by getting rid of some of its best assets like Air Canada. It has given away our assets.

When one starts looking at debts, one has to look at accounts payable. Any corporation at the end of the year has to take into consideration accounts payable. What we have done as a society is create an accounts payable for our children in environmental damage that is horrendous. Right now, in order to allow a big corporation to make a little bit more profit today, we are transferring the debt to our children. I think it is time that some of the people over there not only learn a little bit about the environment but learn a little bit about basic economics and how a balance sheet reads.

In Surrey we have a number of environmental problems. The whole question of the use of landfill as a dump has been very difficult for the Greater Vancouver Regional District to deal with.

In the last year, Surrey went into a recycling program. Initially people thought it might be done as cheaply as $4 per household. It has turned out to cost $15 per household. Let me tell you, most people are quite willing to pay an additional $15.

As they brought in the blue boxes, they were surprised at the extent of their use within the community. Eighty per cent of the households are now using the blue boxes. This has already meant a 16 per cent reduction in the use of the landfill, and that is only with part of the municipality participating.

Also, the volume of tonnage going into the blue boxes and being recycled is much greater than we had anticipated. In fact, in Surrey, out of the first 36,000 homes, we are collecting more recyclable materials than is now being collected from 67,000 homes in Edmonton.

We are now seeing that individuals are willing to change their behaviour to become environmentally responsible and are also willing, at the local level, to pick up some of the costs. They are quite prepared to pay through their municipal taxes additional money to allow recycling.

The government does not seem to realize that Canadians are quite prepared to pay through a tax system in order to bring about environmental clean-up. I refer to a survey which showed that two-thirds of Canadians would accept a five cent a litre pollution tax on gasoline if the money would be turned back into air pollution control. Six out of ten Canadians would pay 10 per cent on energy consumption in order to promote conservation. Two-thirds of Canadians would accept a 50 per cent increase in the cost of garbage collecting, not just a minor increase, but 50 per cent, if there was a recycling program involved.

The Canadian public is more than willing to start to look at not only their individual behaviour but their tax base as it relates to the environment. We now have to bring in a green tax that will do two or three specific things, particularly as it relates to large corporations. It will provide us with some revenue that would allow us to monitor environmental impact. It would provide us with some funds for cleaning up the environment. It would also allow us funds for research because the new technologies are what we are going to have to develop if we are going to get control over our environment.

Many of the processes we are now using simply are not environmentally sound, but there is no incentive for corporations to do new research if they can get away with using the old technology. We need an environmentally sound green tax that would collect money so we could do things like monitor, clean up and research. It would also give an incentive to users and corporations so it would be more to their economic advantage to change their methods of production and to change their ways of interacting with the environment.

I would like to talk briefly about one of the things that we have to do in the area of carbon fuels. That is one of the major areas where, if there was motivation, government leadership and a proper green tax, we could reduce our carbon fuel use by at least 50 per cent. This would have a significant impact on global warming and on the quality of air plus on the reduction of a limited resource, our fossil fuels.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to say how much I appreciate your recognizing me today to speak on what is a very historic debate. I think that we will look back in years hence and say that this was the day that the House of Commons really began addressing the serious environmental and ecological issues facing not only the country but indeed the planet.

I am pleased to participate in today's debate sponsored by the hon. member for Skeena, the New Democratic Party's environment spokesperson, who moved that this House call upon the government to implement an ecologically sound green tax system.

We sometimes ask what the point of the tax system is, and I think it is fundamentally twofold. One is naturally to obtain revenues for the federal government to enable it to serve the people of Canada in a variety of ways. But the tax system also does other things. It certainly shapes consumer demand, and that is what we are talking about to a certain extent today.

We are most familiar, in times past, with what we called the sin taxes. We would jack up the prices on beer, wine, spirits, and cigarettes, presumably not only to generate revenue but also to encourage people not to use these sin products with the assumption that if the price is high enough people will have second thoughts and realize that not only are these products bad for their health, they are also very expensive.

We also encourage corporate behaviour. We, as a matter of fact, lose billions of dollars each year through our tax system as we encourage companies to locate in certain areas, to invest in certain types of activities, to introduce new plants and equipment, and to conduct various research and development programs. We use the tax system not only to shape consumer demand but also to shape corporate behaviour.

In that respect my hon. friend from Skeena has introduced to us now an approach to use our tax system to encourage not only consumers, but corporations as well, to behave in ways that are environmentally friendly. He has referred to the green tax system or the GTS as opposed to the GST, the goods and services tax, which my hon. colleague has pointed out adequately was very regressive not only in terms of taxing the lower income people at essentially a much higher rate than the upper income earners but also in terms of the environment.

As my hon. friend from Skeena pointed out, the taxes on recycled paper are the same as on unrecycled paper, bicycles are taxed at the same rate as large automobiles, canoes are taxed at the same rate as luxury motor boats, and alternative energy is taxed at the same rate as fossil fuels. This simply shows that as a Parliament we do not distinguish in our tax system between those activities and those products that are environmentally friendly and those that are environmentally unfriendly. The green tax system would differentiate clearly between these types of products and their related behaviour.

I cannot help but bring to the House's attention the fact that Margaret Thatcher, who I suspect is no friend to the environment in many ways, saw the need to introduce a lower tax on unleaded gasoline. Within the year following that tax measure unleaded gasoline tripled its market share which of course resulted in health benefits for British children. Probably a lot of young children are alive today simply as a result of this one measure that encouraged people to use unleaded gasoline. I hate to think for a moment that Margaret Thatcher is ahead of us as a country in terms of dealing with environmental issues. That is why I am so pleased to participate in this historic debate today calling for a GTS, a green tax system, as opposed to the goods and services tax initiative.

I think it is important to recognize that we do not have years and years to deal with the environmental catastrophe that presently faces us. It is happening around us as we speak. There will be cataclysmic implications unless dramatic action is taken. To create a Department of the Environment and so on, to go out to have a look after a major spill has occurred or major toxic wastes has been dumped into a river system, to say "naughty, naughty", to slap somebody on the wrist and to impose a small fine is obviously an approach of the past tense. No longer can we afford to approach the challenges in this way.

That is why this green tax system is so important, because it would reflect the environmental cost of manufacturing a product, for example. Such a tax system would reflect the cost to the environment of dumping toxic substances into lakes and rivers and the cost of dumping chemical waste down river banks and in landfill sites.

To look at something very specific to those of us from British Columbia, those forest companies which are investing in practices that result in sustainable development would be taxed at a different level than those corporations which are involved in practices that are obviously resulting in the deterioration, decline, and destruction of our forest resources. We will say to those companies that that type of corporate behaviour is unacceptable and consequently they will be taxed at a much higher rate than the company that is very environmentally sensitive and is conducting silviculture and reforestation practices at a very sophisticated level to ensure that the forest resource is maintained in perpetuity.

We will be able to reward, on the one hand, and say to those who simply ignore the environmental and ecological implications of their corporate behaviour that this is something that we are not going to accept and they will be paying taxes to compensate accordingly.

Obviously, the green tax system would be used to promote and encourage recycled products. Those manufacturers who use new resources, especially non-renewable resources, would be taxed for these while other manufacturers who use reused resources would benefit. This is one way that we can indicate how serious we are as a Parliament in encouraging those manufacturers that would be open to using recycled material.

Of course, this idea that we can recycle is not a new idea. After all, we do make it financially attractive so that certain companies will recycle copper, batteries, bottles and so on. But we need to extend this to a much greater extent to encourage those firms which it will actually in most cases cost more money to participate in using recycled material. They can be compensated for those additional costs at least in the beginning, by a revised tax system. In that way we will be encouraging those environmentally and ecologically sensitive manufactures.

Under a green tax system styrofoam egg cartons would have an extra tax to reflect the waste that is created in the manufacturing of styrofoam, paid for by the manufacturer, as well as the cost of safely disposing them, which is now paid by the consumer. Again the tax system would be modified so that the users of styrofoam, the manufacturers of styrofoam products and so on, would again be paying a different tax from those who are using products that are much environmentally sound.

I must say that I do not feel comfortable making that statement knowing that in our own lobbies here on Parliament Hill and in the restaurants we are drinking beverages from styrofoam cups. While we speak today we ought to be cleaning up, in our own lobby, to indicate at least some sensitivity even here.

Sticking to the egg carton example, egg cartons that a manufacturer would make out of recycled pulp would be tax exempt or would be taxed at a significantly lower level. Or, perhaps an incentive could be built into the corporate tax system that would require them to use these types of these recycled materials.

We can refer of course to the need to have a carbon tax, recognizing that carbon emissions are very serious polluters in many ways. Not only are the carbon emissions contributing to the greenhouse effect, but carbon emissions combine with sunlight to produce ground level ozone which has serious implications and impact on the health of Canadians. A carbon tax would recognize the heavy cost to the environment of burning fossil fuels. Such a tax would encourage energy conservation and raise revenues for research and development of alternative energy sources.

When we look at what other countries do we see that we are quickly falling behind countries that already have modified their tax systems to fend off the impending global catastrophe. Sweden taxes the active ingredients in pesticides and fertilizers and batteries containing mercury and cadmium. Italy taxes plastic bags. Finland and Norway tax non-returnable containers. Japan, West Germany and Switzerland charge higher landing fees for large, noisy and polluting aircraft.

In our own country those people who choose a smaller fuel efficient car should be taxed on that vehicle at a much lower rate than those people who, for whatever reason, choose a large gas guzzling car, again contributing much more in terms of environmental deterioration than the person driving a energy efficient vehicle.

One could go on and on in terms of the details that a green tax would incorporate.

I simply want to say that I feel, as I am sure do all the others who participated in this debate and the people who have listened to the debates, that today may be a turning point in that this is the first time such a discussion has occurred in Parliament in terms of using our tax system to motivate Canadians, to motivate the corporate sector to behave in different ways that would be more in tune with a clean environment.

As I say, we do not have ten years to work this out. We do not have five years to discuss this matter. We must move with haste and we must encourage people, not only in Parliament but beyond, to do what we can together to ensure that such a tax system is implemented as quickly as possible.

I give great credit to my hon. colleague for Skeena for initiating the discussion today and introducing a lot of us to the possibility of a green tax system.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank my colleagues for the debate on this topic. I think it is a legitimate topic. It is very topical, if you will; with the times.

I would also like to say what a great opportunity this is for Canadians to look at the option of taxing in the area of environmentally unsound products. I would like to address my question to my friend in the area of agriculture. Within the Similkameen Valley in particular we have what is euphemistically called organic farming. It, of course, uses no pesticides, no herbicides, and no chemically produced fertilizers.

In an area in the Okanagan and throughout the Similkameen Valley where a lot of those products have been used over a good number of years in the agricultural community, we have high levels of phosphates in our water systems and we are in the process of looking at methods of cleaning it up.

It seems to me that the area of organic farming is an area that should be looked at. Does my colleague see a green tax as a way of encouraging research in the area of organic farming and, in fact, encouraging farming methods that will be environmentally friendly?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's very thoughtful question. I must say that he has touched an area that a lot of us have spent a lot of time thinking about in the last little while, that is, how to encourage the use of organically grown food that is pesticide-free in terms of residue.

I think it is fair to say that at the moment, unfortunately, those foods that are most ecologically sound often cost more because of the way they are grown and the intensive labour involved and so on. I think this green tax provides us with an incredible opportunity to send a very clear signal to those firms, large or small, and those individuals who are presently involved in organic food production, to give them encouragement and provide a tax system that would encourage the development of organic food production and, quite the contrary, increase taxes on those foods that are saturated with herbicides, pesticides and fertilizers of one kind or another.

That is exactly what the consuming public is saying. It is prepared to pay a slightly higher cost, but I think we can do our role by changing our tax system to give all the encouragement possible to develop organic food free of pesticide residues.

I appreciate the comments of my hon. friend who represents part of the Okanagan Valley because I know in his constituency there are a number of individuals who are actively involved. If there is some way we could provide them with encouragement, that would be very satisfying indeed for all of us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5.45 p.m., it it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the Business of Supply pursuant to Standing Order 81(14).

Accordingly the question is on the motion of the hon. member for Skeena.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to ask the government House leader what the business for tomorrow will be. Has he any idea what bills will be called tomorrow morning?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, earlier this afternoon I had the opportunity, which perhaps my hon. friend does not have, to communicate with his House leader. It was agreed that we would call Bill C-38, legislation dealing with the Federal Courts Act, followed by the forestry legislation at third reading. On Thursday, we will call Bill C-21, the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. It will be the first day of third reading.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I attended that meeting. I asked the question so that all members of this House will know what is going on and so that they will know that there are no secret meetings.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Schneider: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. While at a committee meeting in Room 536 of the Wellington Building we noticed, thanks to a reminder from someone with the Clerk's office, that the time was pressing on. The time was five minutes to six o'clock and the bells calling us to vote had not sounded. I wanted to bring that to your attention.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 6.15 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.15 p.m.

TOWN OF BANFF

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I draw to the attention of this House an event of historical importance in Banff, Alberta, today. November 1, 1989, marks a significant step forward for the town in its advancement toward municipal government.

Starting today the mayor-elect, councillors, and school district trustees will join with the Banff Municipal Committee to facilitate the orderly transition of authority, for on January 1, 1990, through the co-operative effort of the Hon. Lucien Bouchard, the local authorities and the provincial government of Alberta, Banff will become a town with an elected mayor and council.

I am sure that my fellow members here in this House of Commons will join with me in wishing the Banff town council every success in its future endeavours in local government.

FIREFIGHTERS

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, earlier this year I contacted the Minister of Finance about the $500 deduction allowed to volunteer firemen across Canada. This $500 exemption can only be called a pittance in light of the costs incurred by these volunteers for such things as car insurance, clothing, cleaning bills and cost of gasoline, not to mention the danger that these men and women put themselves in the path of. All of this is incurred in the name of community duty.

The minister has refused to raise the exemption to a well deserved $1,000. A few days ago the Auditor General advised that the Minister of Finance is "letting hundreds of millions of dollars slip through his hands". Further, the Auditor General, Mr. Dye, points out that nothing has been done to close the loopholes which represent a loss of revenue to the government in the order of $350 million a year.

I suggest that the minister's mistake is being compensated for at the expense of a fine group of people, a group of people that I think deserve our respect and, at this time, at least a little more in the exemption that they can claim. These are the very proud volunteer firemen of Canada.

NORTHERN TAX ALLOWANCE

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, on October 27 the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas reported to the Minister of Finance and recommended that he initiate massive cutbacks to a program which until now has tried to address the economic needs of Canadians who live in northern and isolated areas. Those cuts will disqualify 150 Saskatchewan communities and thousands of Saskatchewan families from appropriate tax breaks and discourage future community investment and development in these important parts of our province.

On behalf of my colleague, the member for Prince Albert—Churchill River and my other Saskatchewan colleagues in the New Democratic Party, I call on the Minister of Finance to immediately reject these recommendations which do not address the needs of northern people. I ask that he make a real commitment to reform the northern tax benefit program so that he provides a fair and equitable response to the economic realities in these communities.

TRAVEL EXPENSES

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, since the Auditor General's press conference, federal Liberals and New Democrats have constantly denounced the air travel expenses incurred by Members of our Government. Of course, they overlook the sound expenditure cuts made by our Minister of Transport (Mr. Bouchard) to save Canadian taxpayers' money. For example, I would like to give the details of my latest trip in the North, where our Minister sent me to open the airports in Salluit and Kangirsujuaq from October 19 to 21. I went to Québec City to take the Québec Government's F-27. In two and a half days, I covered over 5,000 kilometres and my expenses were only $662.35 in all. This includes accommodation at the Confortel Motel in Québec City for $47, lodging in Salluit and Montreal for $164, four meals for $32.35, two taxis for $15 and airfare of $404.

Mr. Speaker, this trip is the third of its kind that I have made at the Minister's request and we thus saved over $75,000. I congratulate the Minister and thank the Government of Québec.

SOUTH AFRICAN DEBT

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, on September 28 the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that major banks co-ordinating South Africa's debt "agreed that they would be seeking the highest possible interest payments and the fastest possible repayments". As we all know, this did not materialize. In fact, South Africa won more favourable terms on its agreement with the banks for debt rescheduling. In light of the propaganda victory for South Africa, the words of our Secretary of State for External Affairs have become an embarrassment.

The strategy failure of this government with regard to South Africa demands that the Prime Minister immediately commit to his four-year-old promise made to the United Nations where he stated: "My government has said to Canadians that if there are not fundamental changes in South Africa, we are prepared to invoke total sanctions against that country and its repressive regime".

Although we can hope the present government in South Africa may reconsider its apartheid policy, we know that it is increased sanctions, not hope, that will influence the required changes.

• (1410)

Lest the Prime Minister lose all credibility nationally and internationally with regard to his stated position to mount the necessary anti-apartheid policies, sanctions against South Africa must be increased today.

FINANCE

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, for several weeks, Opposition Members have denounced the proposed goods and services tax and claimed that all Canadians are against it.

I am now consulting my constituents in Montmorency—Orléans on the GST and the comments I receive tell me that when they are well informed about the deficit, a large majority of people in my riding support the GST in principle.

For example, a businessman in Sainte-Famille on the Isle of Orleans, Georges-Henri Blouin, wrote to me: "I do not like the GST, but we have no choice, the deficit must be reduced. The debt did not start yesterday. Governments have come and gone and the debt goes up all the time. This must stop and I hope that you will stand firm."

Mr. Blouin adds: "It is the same thing for VIA Rail. People want the train but do not take it. This has gone on far too long already. Sincere congratulations."

Mr. Speaker, Canadians appreciate the strong action taken by our Government to ensure their future and their children's.

NORTHERN TAX ALLOWANCE

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, on October 27 the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas reported to the Minister of Finance and recommended that he initiate massive cutbacks to a program which until now has tried to address the economic needs of Canadians who live in northern or isolated areas. These cuts will disqualify many communities in northern B.C. and discourage future community investment.

On behalf of the member from Skeena, and presumably the member from Prince George—Peace River, I call on the Minister of Finance to immediately reject these recommendations which do not address the needs of northern people. I ask that he make a real commitment to reform the northern tax benefit program so that it provides a fair and equitable response to the economic realities in these northern communities.

FISHERIES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, on October 17, the FTA panel reported its conclusions on the B.C. salmon and herring issue. Canada is not bound to accept the ruling.

The decision to accept or not to accept would seem to pit the interests of fishermen against the interests of plant owners. One thing that is unclear is the implications of the panel decision for the Atlantic fishery, particularly in view of the Americans' apparent predisposition to apply the principles of the decision to the Atlantic fishery.

Seafood producers in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland fear that land-based processing jobs could be imperilled if the implication of the decision is that over-the-side sales could become rampant. On the other hand, fishermen could be short-term beneficiaries of higher prices.

Failure to accept the ruling would likely bring about immediate retaliation against east coast fisheries, particularly Nova Scotia lobsters.

I urge the government to use all the time available before making its decision. Possibly the best solution for all concerned would be to set the decision aside and to seek to negotiate an alternate agreement with the United States. In either case, full consultation should take place with all affected sectors and parties before any decision is taken or announced.

SARNIA PETROCHEMICAL INDUSTRY

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under the provisions of Standing Order 31 to draw to the attention of the House that Polysar Limited of Sarnia, Ontario, was established by the Government of Canada during World War II. It has become a world class international petrochemical company operating in all global geographies.

It has provided employment opportunities to all production and corporate levels in the Sarnia—Lambton area over many years. This company has pioneered new technologies from its highly skilled research and development laboratories.

I bring to this House today my deep concern about rumours of impending layoffs in the Sarnia based operations of Polysar by Nova Corporation which acquired controlling interest in this company in 1988. This Sarnia operation is a world scale plant and has operated profitably over the years and, in several cases, employed technologies developed and introduced by Polysar.

There are early indications that the research activities are being curtailed. The consequences are serious for Canada in terms of our international competitiveness and the loss of opportunities for the graduates of our colleges and universities.

I call upon the government to investigate and report to the House on the impact of these cutbacks in the petrochemical industry and its research capabilities in this major and only Canadian owned petrochemical industry.

This government has a responsibility in this matter because it was through its policy of privatization that Polysar was purchased by another company, the priorities of which may not be research and development on a world scale. This company has been consistently profitable and it will be a major setback to Canada, and the Sarnia—Lambton region in particular, if these cutbacks take place.

ELK ISLAND SENIOR CITIZENS HOUSING

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Housing has shown his commitment to the riding of Elk Island with support for senior citizens' housing. Through the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the federal government will be providing an estimated subsidy of $243,515 per year for the next 50 years to Elk Island senior citizens at Lakeside Legion Manor in Sherwood Park, Alberta. This financial support will continue throughout the amortization of the mortgage in order to assist with operating costs.

Our senior citizens are important and this support from the housing minister is solid evidence that the Government of Canada is committed to our seniors. Let us work together in Canada to continue to support housing for the people who built this country. Let us work together to provide a brighter future for our senior citizens. Let us all work together for a better Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

MEMBER OF THE SENATE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, since the Conservative government has come to office, the opposition has been raising questions about the way in which this government conducts public business. Whether it is privatizations, whether it is the awarding of defence or Air Canada contracts, whether it is the construction of public buildings or the leasing of space in private buildings, whether it is getting funds for government programs or loans from government sources and whether these transactions in the end are legal or illegal, there are two constant themes which emerge. Friends of the Prime Minister are making lots of money, usually public money, and the awards are made without respect, in fact with nothing but contempt, for the taxpayer.

I want to ask a question of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday it was shown that Senator Cogger's firm was getting money from the Federal Business Development Bank. Today it is revealed that he received $2,500 for getting a $340,000 grant from the department of energy.

Will the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources tell us how, after departmental records show that the ministry's Enerdemo budget was exhausted and the applicant for funds was informed that it was exhausted, Hydromega was able to obtain the largest grant made under the program, ten times the average? What role was played by Senator Cogger in finding this money that made Hydromega feel obligated to pay him $2,500?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, this morning when I heard the first allegations on morning television I asked the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to prepare for me every bit of information relating to the Hydromega application, as well as a chronology of the events surrounding Hydromega. Approval, subject to funding approval, was granted to Hydromega on the basis of project criteria in 1987 and funding approval was granted January 26, 1988.

With respect to the allegations that the hon. member made at the end of his question, I am advised that there is no record within the department of any representation that Senator Cogger made, either verbally or written.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, we have it on the record that he received a $2,500 payment for his work in connection with that matter.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister about the answer given yesterday by the minister responsible for the Federal Business Development Bank. He said that he saw no difficulty with the bills being sent by Senator Cogger being paid. Yet the law makes it very clear—and I will read from the Parliament of Canada Act—that:

> No person who is a member of the Senate shall, directly or indirectly, knowingly and wilfully be a party to or be concerned in any contract under which the public money of Canada is paid.

It is not argued that Senator Cogger did not send in the invoices for payment, nor that the payments made by the corporation were mailed to Senator Cogger.

• (1420)

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister on behalf of the Prime Minister to direct the minister responsible for the bank to review the safeguards which the bank has in place to assure that the law is complied with, to bring those safeguards into compliance with the law and, in particular, to get back that money for the taxpayers of Canada paid to the Senator's firm.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, on receipt of the information yesterday respecting this matter, of course we checked with the Federal Business Development Bank and were assured that in every case the decision to hire Lapointe Rosenstein was taken by FBDB. In every case the legal services contracted for were provided. In every case the invoices which asked for payment to Lapointe Rosenstein were examined by the comptrollers within the corporation. The whole receipt of invoices and payment has been audited. There is no evidence whatever of wrongdoing on the part of the Federal Business Development Bank.

Ms. Copps: What about the senator?

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, no one is arguing about whether work was done by the law firm. I listened to the statement made by the senator in the other place yesterday. The burden of what he had to say was to confirm the charges we were making in the House. In particular, the senator did not deny that he did part of the work and he did not deny that he may have benefited from the payment that was made by a corporation of the Crown to that law firm contrary to the section of the act that I have just read.

I therefore want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether he is at least prepared to take the advice of his colleague, the MP for Mégantic, and agree that the senator should resign from the caucus.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the allegations made by the hon. member ought to be and I understand are being dealt with in the other place, most appropriately. Nothing the hon. member has suggested has anything to do with the administration of the Government of Canada.

Ms. Copps: Come on.

Mr. Andre: In terms of the administration of the Federal Business Development Bank—

Ms. Copps: Did he break the law?

Mr. Andre: I hear the hon. member from Hamilton East shouting from her seat again.

Ms. Copps: Wrong member.

Ms. Clancy: She's not alone.

Mr. Andre: I and my colleagues are prepared to answer for the administration of the Government of Canada in terms of the Federal Business Development Bank. I am convinced, on the information it has provided, that its behaviour is unassailable, that, in fact, it paid for legal services it has been acquiring from this firm for decades.

If the hon. member has an accusation to make against the senator, it should be made in the other place by himself and by his colleagues in the other place. It does not deal with the administration of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Deputy Prime Minister. I want to tell the Deputy Prime Minister that the answer we just heard is totally inadequate and that the people of Canada expect answers to be coming from this House and from the government across the way. Concerning the issue of the energy department, can the Deputy Prime Minister, he who is the administrator of the conflict of interest rules, tell this House how the firm Hydromega GP Incorporated got the $340,000 grant from the federal government, a grant that just happens to be 10 times what it usually is? Was it because Senator Cogger had lobbied on behalf of the company? Is that the reason, or is it just a coincidence that the right conservative is there at the right time to collect the cash?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the member's question, and going back to the question that was asked by his colleague, I say to him there is not a record of any payments that have been brought to my attention, any information brought to my attention, with respect to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources of any payments being made by the department to anyone but Hydromega which, on July 10, 1985, made its first application for approval of a grant.

As I said to the House earlier, I asked for a chronology record. I have asked for every piece of information. I have been advised that the record is as I have given it, the requests were made, the approval was made prior to January, 1988, and the funding was approved in January, 1988.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, with respect, the questions are not being answered.

I would now like to put the following question to the Deputy Prime Minister who is responsible for monitoring compliance with our conflict of interest legislation. In 1974, Mr. Jean-Claude Boutin, a lawyer and Québec MNA, had to resign his seat because his law firm had received payment for fees billed to the Crown while he was an MNA. Considering this precedent, what steps does the Deputy Prime Minister intend to take to deal with this new crisis of confidence within his government? What specific steps? Will we get an answer?

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I have not yet heard in any of the questions asked by the opposition, where, in fact, the administration of the Government of Canada is being called into question. The opposition members keep asking about the behaviour of a member of the other place. The proper place to raises those questions is in the other place.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. But I say to the minister who just answered that the Senate of Canada happens to be part of the Parliament of Canada and we have a responsibility here to make sure justice is done.

I listened with care to what the minister just said, and he was taking care with what he was saying, I noted, from his notes. The senator in question himself is quoted as saying, and these are his words: "I like to think that I have been helpful to Hydromega". He says he has been helpful; presumably not washing cars for the building or doing something like that. The private citizen involved, with reference to the senator said, "He was asked for a favour and he asked for one in return". The minister knows this is extremely serious. In the United States this would be an indictable offence if this were the case.

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment, what it might be somewhere else is one thing, but if the suggestion is being made that it is necessarily an indictable offence here, that suggestion—.

Mr. Broadbent: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute.

I think that hon. members will agree that the Chair is trying very hard to make sure that proper inquiries are made, but the Chair is not interested in allegations being made with reference to somebody else's law in another country. The hon. member will continue his question.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy has quoted officials who said that they were not approached by Mr. Cogger. Mr. Cogger has said publicly that he was doing something on this deal, and the man on the business side of it says the same thing about Mr. Cogger. Has the Minister of Energy directly put the question to Senator Cogger himself and, if so, what did he say?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, again I say to the Leader of the NDP that information was given to me respecting the work that was done this morning. I think I was very clear when I answered the first question. I said that when I heard the allegations on public television this morning I asked for all the information. The information that I have been given is the information that I have given to the House. I have not asked Senator Cogger directly or indirectly for any verification of the allegations.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I say candidly to the minister that that is totally irresponsible. The senator in question is a member of the minister's own caucus and if he were interested in public probity he would have put that question directly to the senator before Question Period today.

• (1430)

Could the Solicitor General inform the House if there is an investigation under way in this very, very serious matter of public policy?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, the leader of the NDP says that these allegations on these matters are serious. I take them very seriously. I do not think there is any great point in the hon. member making some of the allegations without substantiation.

I want to say this to him. He said that it was irresponsible on my part that I "had not asked the senator directly". I refer the hon. member to a statement which was made by the senator today regarding the matter in which he places disclaimers that he has not either received money or made representations to the department.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I say through you, Sir, to the minister that we all hope, frankly, that what the minister has just said is the case. The public information that has been given, as the minister knows, is to the contrary. There was a cheque for $2,500. I ask not the Minister of Energy here again but the Solicitor General whose department has direct responsibility for this matter.

In view of the fact that the public has a major interest in the confidence that the administration of public funds is being done with full regard to the law, will the Solicitor General now tell the House whether his officials are investigating this, including having interviews with the senator and all those others who are involved?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues already answered those questions a few minutes ago—

Some Hon. Members: Not so!

Mr. Blais: The matter is before the other place at this very moment, and it should be dealt with internally. It is not the first time this sort of thing has happened—

Some Hon. Members: It certainly isn't!

Mr. Blais: As far as I know, this is not the first person to be involved in this sort of thing.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: The matter should be dealt with before the appropriate forum, in the other place, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. I want to direct him to Section 16 of the Parliament Act.

Section 16(1)(b) states that no member of the Senate shall receive or agree to receive any compensation, directly or indirectly, for services rendered or to be rendered to any person, either by the member or another person, for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence any member of either House.

According to The Gazette of Montreal it was reported today that Senator Cogger admitted setting up a luncheon for representatives of Hydromega with two conservative members of Parliament following which he sent a bill for professional services to Hydromega and was paid in return $2,500.

I want to ask the Solicitor General, is he investigating whether this conduct could be a breach of Section 16 and what, in general, is he doing to see that this section of the Parliament Act is being enforced?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I answered the question a few minutes ago.

Mr. Robichaud: No, you didn't!

Some Hon. Members: That's not true!.

Mr. Blais: I said the matter was raised yesterday in the other place, and I think we should let the other place proceed—and see whether the question was properly dealt with, Mr. Speaker.

For the time being, I have no intention of making any commitment whatsoever in this respect.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General should read section 16 of the Parliament of Canada Act which speaks in terms of offence and punishment if a senator does anything "for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence any member of either House".

I want to ask the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice what they are doing to enforce compliance with this section of the Parliament of Canada Act. This is not the responsibility of the Senate but of the ministers responsible for the administration of justice.

Why won't these ministers answer the question and discharge their responsibilities?

[English]

Why do these two ministers not accept their responsibilities under this law of Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, speaking of discharging one's responsibilities, it is certainly up to those who make charges to make them where they should be made. If you have any specific charges to make— If there are people representing you in the other place, it is up to them to do the job.

These are allegations, and if you have any charges to make, you should make them in the proper forum, and that forum is not the House of Commons.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. The situation of the fishery industry in New Brunswick, and especially in the Acadian peninsula, is deteriorating rapidly.

Several plants have already shut down and several hundreds of working men and women have been laid off. If there is no crab fishing next spring, between 7 000 and 8 000 more jobs will be in jeopardy.

My question is simply this: What special attention will the Minister give to the crab fishing problem in the gulf?

[English]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I had the pleasure of meeting with the Minister of Fisheries for New Brunswick last week to discuss this matter and other matters in Saint John, and also with groups of fishermen's representatives concerned about the crab fishery and other related fisheries in the southern gulf region.

With regard to the future of the snow crab fishery, I should tell the hon. member that we are carefully assessing the state of that important crab stock which has been a source of abundance to the fishing industry in the southern gulf these past several years. We do not yet have a scientific report on the extent to which we will have a quota available to the crab fishery in 1990. As soon as that evidence becomes available, the hon. member will be so advised.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, the Federal Government has done absolutely nothing to correct the situation. The Provincial Government has already put a plan into action in the form of an intensive diversification program for the crab industry and its workers.

Is the federal government or the minister willing to participate immediately in such a diversification program, in order to have it in place before the crab fishing season, next Spring? Is he ready to get involved right away?

[English]

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recall that earlier this year a special federal–provincial program of assistance was announced to assist the fish plant workers and reorient them by my hon. colleague, the Minister for Employment and Immigration.

When we are looking to 1990, the hon. member knows there is a process of consultation with the industry based on scientific advice. We will establish quotas and determine what additional forms of assistance might be required in the months ahead.

MEMBER OF THE SENATE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I want to follow up with the Solicitor General. He has now had two chances and I am going to give him one more. Because he has not answered the question on the two previous occasions, will the Solicitor General stand in the House now and tell this House that he has launched an investigation of the allegations that have now been current for the last two days in respect of the hon. Senator Cogger?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): If necessary, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to repeat two, three, or even five times that these are mere allegations. The appropriate forum to deal with this matter is the other place. It is there that they should decide whether charges should be laid or considered. I suggest this is not the responsibility of the House of Commons.

[English]

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General is responsible for the RCMP and for the administration of justice. Will he stand up and tell this House that he will no longer neglect his duty and will launch an investigation right now?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleagues have already replied several times to these questions since the beginning of the Oral Question Period. These are simply allegations dealing with a member of the other place. A reply was made in the other place yesterday and I suggest it is the responsibility of their members to deal with these issues.

The House of Commons is not the proper forum for this.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Agriculture) and involves dairy producers in my constituency, in Quebec, and in Canada, who are concerned about the GATT negotiations, especially after the recent ice cream and yogurt ruling which is harmful to their interests and could jeopardize our marketing boards. Can the Minister assure the dairy industry that they will be well represented and that our negotiators will be well informed so as to defend the interests of our dairy producers next week, at the coming GATT meeting of November 7?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Sollicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, this is a good question from the Hon. Member, and indeed the current GATT negotiations are very important for Canadian marketing boards. For that reason, we are pleased that the Chairman of Quebec's milk producers sits on the Canadian strategy committee, in order to ensure that Canadian interests, the interests of producers and the dairy industry in general are well represented. We believe the dairy industry is vital for Canada, and the Canadian Government will do everything it can to protect the interests of Canadian farmers, as we have done in the past.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to members' attention the presence in the gallery of Mr. Imre Pozsgay, Minister of State for the Republic of Hungary.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I wish to also draw members' attention to the presence in the gallery of Mr. Zigmas Vaisvila, Deputy in the Congress of People's Deputies in the U.S.S.R. and Deputy in the Republic of Lithuania, Supreme Soviet.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MEMBER OF THE SENATE

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to the Cogger affair.

I would like to say that the Solicitor General of Canada has claimed that this matter was discussed yesterday in the other House. The revelations regarding Hydromega were only announced this morning, so it would have been pretty difficult for them to have been discussed yesterday.

I want to ask the Solicitor General, and I trust that he will give us an answer, does he intend to do his job under Section 16 of the Parliament of Canada Act?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat what I said earlier. This matter is in the other place, and the other place should deal with that.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, it is a hard life for lawyers in this House but this time I will try the Minister of Justice.

Under an act respecting the Department of Justice, Section 4 states: "The minister is the official legal adviser of the Governor General and a legal member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and shall see that the administration of public affairs is in accordance with the law".

I ask the Minister of Justice, will he perhaps do his job?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, my colleague has made it very clear that this is a matter for the Senate. That is where the job should be done.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Milliken: This man should be in jail.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: That allegation was clearly heard by every member in the House and across the country. The difficulty is that it was probably intended to be heard, and that is not satisfactory in this House. That is the very thing that while there has to be inquiry and there has to be answers, that kind of allegation is, if anything, at very worst, terribly immature but yet it is also not proper to be made.

I would ask hon. members to refrain from making comments like that. The Speaker is making every effort so that proper questions can be asked. I am laying down a line beyond which it is not appropriate to go because it is not fair. I ask hon. members to co-operate.

The hon. member who was asking the question, will continue.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, if I said something over the microphone that should not have been said I apologize and withdraw the remark. I can discuss the matter with Your Honour later and deal with the matter at that time.

Mr. Speaker: I did not single out a particular member. The hon. member has risen and apologized. I appreciate that. We shall proceed with questions. The hon. member has the floor.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House have always believed that we are a multicultural nation. We have always defined multiculturalism as meaning that no one culture is any less or greater than another.

Last night in our committee on multiculturalism the minister refused to give a definition of a multicultural society. In the absence of the minister responsible for multiculturalism and the Prime Minister, my question to the Deputy Prime Minister is what is this government's view of a multicultural society and a distinct society?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is asking for an opinion, I think that is an inappropriate question.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, that is the problem with this government. They do not seem to like to define things. They refuse to define things.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put the question and we will see what the answer is.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, in the minister's own press release last night he states, and I quote:

> —the Department of Communications is grappling with how they implement multiculturalism.

If the Department of Communications is grappling, what are other departments doing? Who is responsible in this government for multiculturalism?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I know that the party of which the hon. member is a member is wrestling and grappling with the issue of multiculturalism. They really do not know where they stand. I will tell you where the Conservative Party of Canada stands. We stand four-square behind the multicultural mosaic which has been an important feature of Canada. It is part of our strength and part of our heritage. We will continue to defend it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MEMBER OF THE SENATE

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. I have here a letter from the Federal Business Development Bank to the Hon. Michel Cogger:

[Translation]

> Dear Sir:
> Please find herewith a cheque for $27,000 covering your invoice for professional services rendered in reference to your file number 17615.
> Yours truly,

[English]

It is signed by S. M. A. Desjardins. That is a letter that went from the Federal Business Development Bank to Senator Cogger. It seems to me that the FBDB is clearly in violation of the act as well because they participated in an illegal contract.

I want to ask the Solicitor General if he is prepared now to deal with and investigate the role of the FBDB in the payment to Senator Cogger.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member made the accusation that the FBDB participated in an illegal act. That comment is totally out of order and if you were not being diverted by the hon. member—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lapierre: Are you the Speaker now?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nickel Belt made the accusation that the FBDB participated in an illegal act. I think that statement is out of order and he should withdraw it.

In any event, I want to point out to the hon. member that the cheque in question for $27,000 in payment of that invoice was made out to the law firm of Lapointe Rosenstein which provided the legal services for which FBDB paid.

• (1450)

If the hon. member would like to make that accusation again of illegal behaviour, perhaps outside where he does not have immunity, we could then deal with him.

Some Hon. Members: Outside the House.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, if I said they participated in an illegal act, I withdraw that and I will put in "they may have". I am not afraid to apologize.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: I wish other people around here would take their responsibilities as seriously.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs wants to answer questions, I will put this one to him.

My question is this. When the bank's comptroller questioned the payment of the invoice, he was not given the reasons for the payment. He was told in fact "You pay it".

I want to ask the minister: Why were the reasons withheld? Is it not the practice that in fact these fees from law firms have to go before some sort of arbitration process to weigh the accounts? I want to ask him: Why were these reasons withheld from the bank's comptroller on the instructions of the bank's president? Is this just another form of what the Prime Minister says "You dance with the ones who brung ya"?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, for a couple of decades at least the FBDB has been contracting with the law firm of Lapointe Rosenstein for legal services. They did it before 1984. They have done it since. They will undoubtedly do it in the future.

As usual, when the services have been provided an invoice is sent and the bank pays it. I have asked the FBDB whether in fact these services were contracted for, whether they made the decision to hire the firm, they said they did. Were the services provided? Yes, they were. Was there anything irregular? There was nothing irregular. That is what they tell me.

If the hon. member would have the courage to make a charge to back up his implications and live with the consequences, he would be showing a lot more character than he is showing now.

SKYLINK AIRWAYS

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Recently, Transport Canada cancelled the operating licence of Skylink Airways for safety reasons. It is now my understanding that they may now be taking reservations again. This concerns some of the consumers in British Columbia.

Could the minister clarify for the House today just what the status is of Skylink Airways?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the licence for Skylink was cancelled a few weeks ago for safety reasons. I do not know if the company is making reservations. There is something I know—the licence will not be given back to the company.

MEMBER OF THE SENATE

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs about the Cogger affair.

I have in my hand a letter from SMA Desjardins of the Federal Business Development Bank. I am going to quote the letter verbatim in its original French. It is addressed to:

[Translation]

Honourable Michel Cogger, Q.C.
Lapointe, Rosenstein
Montreal

Please find herewith a cheque for $27,000 covering your invoice for professional services rendered in reference to your file.

[English]

I want to ask the minister if this was just a normal account reflecting professional services rendered by Lapointe Rosenstein, why was the covering letter for the cheque addressed specifically to Michel Cogger, talking about payment for "your account" and "your file"? Can the minister explain that, even though it is impossible to explain the unexplainable?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, from the documents released by the FBDB under access to information, there is, as the Senator indicated, a letter from Senator Cogger to FBDB enclosing an invoice from Lapointe Rosenstein for services provided. The FBDB returned a letter to Senator Cogger stating: "Enclosed is the cheque in payment of the invoice". If the hon. member has that letter in his hand, he will also have a photocopy of the cheque for $27,000 to the law firm of Lapointe Rosenstein.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the hon. member. Can he tell us whether or not any of that money ever went to Senator Cogger? If he cannot tell us, does he not think he should get us the answer in view of the fact that it is his responsibility as minister responsible for the Federal Business Development Bank to ensure that the agency respects Section 14 of the Parliament of Canada Act, which states that no person who is a member of the Senate shall, directly or indirectly, knowingly and wilfully be a party to or be concerned in any contract under which the public money of Canada is to be paid?

Let us have some straight answers for a change.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the question which is quite properly the jurisdiction of the other place.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: If the hon. member is a lawyer, I would like him to reread that section and find in there any condition, any indication that the FBDB is responsible to see that every cheque they send out in answer to an invoice does not indirectly end up in the hands of a senator or a member of Parliament. I want him to point out where that legal responsibility rests. He knows that is absurd.

HEALTH

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Labour, the Acting Minister or the Parliamentary Secretary.

At a press conference this morning the CLC stated that there will be an emergency meeting on November 16 with the council of governors of the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety to discuss ways of restoring this great organization.

My question is, will the government not only listen to the proposals that will be forthcoming, but will the government take these proposals seriously?

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we are in constant discussion with CCOHS. They are anticipating a new plan to be brought forward to look at their future and how they will economically facilitate the carrying on of that very important centre. The task force, members of the board of governors, along with the chairperson are working toward the goal of bringing that plan forward by January 31.

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, if it is found that more time is required to secure alternatives to maintain this centre as a world leader, will the government agree to continue full funding for at least two years as has been requested already?

Mr. James: Mr. Speaker, the chairperson of CCOHS has come forward with a request for extended time. The minister has responded that we would like to have a plan back to the minister by January 31, 1990. Funding of $5.1 million is going to the centre next year, 1990. The following year the centre will be fully cost recovered and the government will then not participate any longer directly through funding.

AIR TRANSPORT

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The Minister admitted yesterday that Pearson Airport is not able to meet present needs. More than 13 airlines, including Intair of Saint-Hubert, have reportedly been refused the additional slots they need.

Will the Minister now admit that his decision to cut VIA Rail has only worsened the situation?

Mr. Speaker, his department's incompetence in planning is obvious.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member for Timmins—Chapleau had listened carefully to what I have been saying in the House for the last three weeks, he would know that transferring passengers from VIA Rail to air transport does not require any more flights: there are already enough. So I do not see how this can upset the Toronto airport.

REPLY IN QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I just want to give a clarification of the answer I gave about Skylink in Vancouver. As far as I am concerned, the licence will not be given back before an appeal is made by the company to the Civil Aviation Tribunal. If its decision is contrary to the decision already made, we will reconsider at that time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

TRAVEL AUTHORIZATION

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties and I think you would find there is unanimous consent for the following motion to be put immediately without debate. I move:

That up to five members of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade representing each of the recognized parties in the House be authorized to travel to New York and Washington for the period Sunday, November 12, to Thursday, November 16, 1989, for the purpose of studying the international debt problem; and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

PETITIONS

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by many people from the province of Quebec. It is a petition against the GST, the goods and services tax in Canada. It says that the goods and services tax proposed by the Minister of Finance is an unfair form of taxation, that it does not take account of taxpayers' ability to pay tax in this country and, Mr. Speaker, it also says that the House of Commons should reject the proposed goods and services tax.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, it is a petition signed by many people in your province, Québec, and as you know, almost everyone is against the Finance Minister's proposal.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, today it is my duty to table ten petitions from the riding of Ottawa—Vanier which I represent in this House, in which your petitioners say that since September 1984, the government has inflicted at least 31 new taxes or tax increases on Canadian taxpayers; that since September 1984, the present federal manufacturers' sales tax has gone from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent; that the Conservative Government wants to saddle Canadians with a new universal 9 per cent tax on goods and services; that this tax will be hidden in the sale price and will apply to practically anything that moves; that imposing this new, universal tax on goods and services will create serious hardship for low- and middle-income Canadians; and that the tax will put a severe financial burden on small businesses.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, your petitioners strenuously object to this tax and humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the new goods and services tax.

[English]

RCMP DRESS CODE

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the standing orders of this House, I am tabling petitions with over 4,000 names. The petitioners hold the legitimate and honest view that the RCMP uniform is a secular uniform accepted by our many cultures and religions and they wish it to remain that way.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, today I have the honour and privilege to present to this House, pursuant to Standing Order 36, many petitions containing over 13,548 signatures of concerned citizens from British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to preserve the distinctive heritage and tradition of the RCMP by retaining the uniformity of dress code with all the recognizable colour and trappings that have such great historical value to this country. The pride and esprit de corps should not be jeopardized by any concessions to religious or ethnic minorities which result in changes to this truly great police force and its proud traditions and uniforms.

These petitions have all been duly certified as to form and content. This now brings the total of petitioners to well over 103,000 that I have presented to this House.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege today to present two petitions signed by about 100 people in my riding, York West.

They argue against the GST because they are getting far too many taxes from this government. They think the GST will be very negative for Canada's middle-income families in my riding, for small businesses and for middle-income Canadians across the country.

I hope the government will take the advice of these people and reverse the government's decision on the GST.

M. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr Speaker, I have the privilege of tabling a petition today which asks the government to reject the proposed goods and services tax and demands that the government cancel its plan to implement a goods and services tax that will shift the entire tax burden to middle-income Canadians by imposing a regressive consumer tax, and that it undertake a genuine reform of Canada's tax system.

Mr. Speaker, this petition was signed by residents of several towns in the province of Québec.

[English]

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty on behalf of a number of farmers in Meadow Lake and other Saskatchewan towns to present a petition which reacts to the removal of oats from the Wheat Board. The petitioners suggest that, in the future, the government take action to make sure that oats and barley cannot be removed from the Wheat Board, that they be kept in that organization so that the farmers and their organizations have to be consulted before changes are made in the marketing of these products.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the pleasure to present a petition signed by more than 1,200 residents of the riding of Carleton—Gloucester. Your petitioners humbly state that since September 1984, the federal Conservative Government has inflicted at least 31 new taxes or tax increases on Canadian taxpayers; that since September 1984, the present federal manufacturers' sales tax has been raised from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent by the federal government; that the federal conservative government wants to saddle Canadians with a new, universal 9 per cent tax on goods and services; that this new tax, which will be hidden in the sale price, will apply to practically everything Canadians buy; that this new, universal tax on goods and services will cause serious hardship for low- and middle-income Canadians; that the tax will create a severe financial burden for small businesses; that the Liberals, speaking on behalf of all Canadians, strenously object to this new goods and services tax which constitutes an unprecedented attack on the incomes of Canadians and, in addition to forcing them to pay higher taxes, will also expose them to increases in inflation, interest rates and unemployment.

Therefore, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject this new tax.

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of a community service centre in the west end of Ottawa which works regularly with low income families and the unemployed. The petitioners are reminding the Prime Minister and the government of its statement during the last election campaign that there would be no cuts to unemployment insurance and they are challenging the government's withdrawal of $2.9 billion from the fund, thereby abandoning any responsibility for unemployment in this country caused by its fiscal and monetary policies. The petitioners pray that the government not change the Unemployment Insurance Act as proposed.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present two petitions to the House this afternoon. One deals with the government's cut-back and gutting of VIA service. Thousands of people have pleaded with this government to rescind its action and to restore VIA to its rightful place in our Canadian history.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, thousands of people have petitioned this government to scuttle its proposal for the goods and services tax as it will be harmful and detrimental, not only to individuals, but to the economy of this country.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a number of petitions to the House today. They have all been certified correct as to form and content by the Clerk of Petitions.

The first one is signed by 506 customers of Creative Croissants on South James Street in Thunder Bay, who point out that the Minister of Finance's proposed goods and services tax is an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for a taxpayer's ability to pay. They call upon Parliament to reject the tax.

The second petition is from 388 customers of Grewins Variety Store in Northwood. They point out that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place that permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax, while forcing lower and middle income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden. They, too, call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition signed by 1,726 Canadians from one end of this country to the other. The petitioners are very concerned about the government's decision regarding VIA Rail. They point out that it is an essential service for many Canadians, it has been part of Canada for more than 100 years, and that these cuts will result in a serious reduction in railway passenger service and threaten maintenance, safety and jobs. They call upon Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade VIA equipment, and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger service.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a number of petitions on a variety of issues, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first petition is from Kamloops, British Columbia. The petitioners are disillusioned, disappointed, and distressed over the government's decision to tax almost everything that moves now as a result of this goods and services tax. They ask the government to rethink this whole matter, go back to the drawing board, and come up with serious and fair tax reform.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, another petition refers to the decision of the government to reduce passenger rail service. The petitioners point out at some length all of the reasons why the government should not curtail VIA Rail, but should invest in modernizing VIA Rail so that it is not only an economically sound method of transportation, but environmentally sound.

FOREST RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Finally, Mr. Speaker, a large number of British Columbians, I could not begin to even mention the number or the communities from which they come, point out that British Columbia now has a new Minister of Forests, Mr. Claude Richmond, from Kamloops. He should sit down with the federal minister and begin renegotiating the federal-provincial Forest Resources Development Agreement because of the tremendous importance this agreement is to the province of British Columbia and actually right across Canada. The petitioners are asking that FRDA be renegotiated, that additional funds be included, and that the present minister of forests and the provincial minister of forests in British Columbia sit down and renegotiate it as soon as possible.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36, I present a petition signed by Canadian residents in the province of Québec, who humbly point out that the goods and services tax proposed by the Minister of Finance is an unfair form of taxation, since it does not allow for the taxpayer's ability to pay. Therefore, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to demand that the government cancel its plans to implement a goods and services tax that will shift the entire tax burden to middle-income Canadians by imposing a regressive consumer tax. As in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray.

[English]

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition from a number of residents of Toronto who are concerned about the government's intention of building a NATO base for extended low level flights in Goose Bay, Labrador, to extend over Labrador and eastern Quebec. They demand that the government listen to the Assembly of First Nations, as well as the Innu of Labrador, and end all NATO-NORAD low level flight training in Canada, oppose the NATO establishment proposed, and redirect the funding for that to the well-being of the Canadian NATO people and their land claims and the promotion of sustainable development.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition from a number of residents of Toronto who are concerned with the government's decision to cut VIA Rail. They demand that this Parliament reject any proposed reductions or elimination of VIA Rail service, modernize the existing equipment so that VIA Rail could provide a world-class service to Canadians, and build a high speed passenger train between Montreal and Windsor.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36, I have the honour of presenting petitions from my riding, Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, in which thousands of citizens express their profound opposition to the goods and services tax.

[English]

The petitions come from service stations, retail outlets and manufacturing outlets, both large and small, and they are unanimous in their condemnation of the proposed tax measure.

The signatures are from places like Antigonish, Inverness, Baddeck, Arichat and Canso, to name a few. They join millions of Canadians in calling for the government to withdraw this cruel and unfair tax.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have another large number of petitions from people of Canada protesting the confiscatory, regressive, unfair, burdensome, and disgraceful goods and services tax.

• (1520)

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition from a number of citizens of Revelstoke, many of whom are meeting tonight to protest the closing of the very VIA line to which this petition refers.

These petitioners from the city of Revelstoke, which is a major rail centre, call on Parliament to maintain VIA Rail's present national network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment, and to give VIA Rail sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service. They feel this is particularly important since they have 200 kilometres to travel to reach an airport, and their bus services are interrupted by snow and avalanches more than any other community in Canada.

Petitions

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition to the House from a local retail outlet in my constituency of Okanagan—Shuswap located in the Vernon area.

The petitioners have signed this petition because they are most concerned about the Draconian measures that this government has taken with the introduction of its goods and services tax. The petitioners are asking the government to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax, and to reform the tax system so there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

They also ask to ensure that if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax that this type of reform not simply be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab on the Canadian taxpayers.

I also have another petition of similar nature and concern presented to this House from another local retail outlet in the Vernon area in the constituency of Okanagan—Shuswap. These constituents also feel compelled to request the government to reject this Draconian tax measure.

[Translation]

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by a number of Québec residents who state that the GST in an unfair form of taxation; that the government allows corporations or wealthy people to pay little or no federal income tax; and that the government seeks to tax many basic goods and services. Canadian men and women humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the GST, and to reform the tax system with a view to making it more equitable.

[English]

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENTS TO HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am pleased to introduce two petitions. I am pleased to see the Minister of Justice in the House while I am presenting this first petition because it deals with a matter that comes within his jurisdiction, that is the proposed changes to the Canadian Human Rights Act in respect of sexual orientation.

In 1986, the government accepted the report and said it would take whatever measures that are necessary to ensure that sexual orientation is a prohibited ground of discrimination. The petitioners call upon the government to introduce legislation in respect of this matter as soon as possible.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John F. Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the other petition is in accordance with Standing Order 36 and relates to the GST. The petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax and to reform the tax system.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Pursuant to Standing Order 36, Mr. Speaker, I have the duty to present two petitions bearing duly certified signatures and concerning the Conservative government's proposition aimed at levying a goods and services tax beginning January 1, 1991.

The citizens of the riding of Hull—Aylmer want to say to the government that they totally disagree with the imposition of this new tax on goods and services, and they call upon Parliament to reject this tax.

Today, more than 10,000 residents of the riding of Hull—Aylmer have caused to be presented to this House a duly signed petition asking Parliament to reject this tax.

[English]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present petitions from various communities in my riding of Northumberland, such as Port Hope, Colborne, Hardwood and Roseneath.

The petitioners are all consumers of goods and services and they ask and petition that this government withdraw any proposed legislation on a goods and services tax. They sign their own names, but many have spoken to me individually. Municipal leaders and members of community groups all feel that farmers, families, and independent businessmen in my riding are going to be very negatively affected by the proposed goods and services tax. They petition and beseech this government to withdraw any proposed tax.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a number of petitions from constituents of the Prince Edward—Hastings riding who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36, signed by over 2,500 Canadians, some of whom are from my riding, and others across the province of Alberta.

These petitioners believe in the sanctity of life from the moment of conception, and believe that there is a duty to protect that life and preserve its well-being. They are calling upon Parliament to formulate a law which will protect and save the life of both mother and child.

FOREST RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition today from residents of Prince George in northern B.C. who are concerned about the renewal by this government of the Forest Resource Development Agreement. In light of the appointment today of a new forestry minister in the province of B.C., they urge the minister of forestry in this House to move immediately to ensure that we get a new FRDA agreement signed as soon as possible.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of Sainte-Thècle residents who humbly sheweth that the goods and services tax proposed by the Minister of Finance is an unfair form of taxation, for it does not take into account the tapayers' capacity to pay. Wherefore they humbly call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax and to reform the tax system so as to levy a genuine minimum income tax on rich people, individuals and corporations.

[English]

I also have a petition on behalf of some 60 senior citizens who reside at 217 Pine Street North in Timmins asking the government to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax, and to ensure that there is no taxation on goods and services such as loans, the arts, and other non-luxury items.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FEDERAL COURT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C-38, an act to amend the Federal Court Act, the Crown Liability Act, the Supreme Court Act and other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset how pleased I am to have the opportunity to bring forward this bill which contains amendments principally to the Federal Court Act and also to the Crown Liability Act. The over-all purpose of this legislation is to give the ordinary citizens who wish to sue the federal government easier access to the Canadian courts and to reduce or eliminate the legal barriers and the inequities that a citizen now faces in such litigation.

First, I want to deal with the Federal Court Act proposals. It has been almost 20 years since the Federal Court was established. It was established to replace the old Exchequer Court and, although much of the jurisdiction that was conferred on this new court reflected the jurisdiction of the predecessor, there was also quite a bit that was new in this legislation. For example, the Exchequer Court at that time, as it was constituted, was only a trial level court and appeals from the decisions of the Exchequer Court were made directly to the Supreme Court of Canada. The act in 1971 established a new Federal Court of Appeal to hear the appeals from the decisions of the court's trial division.

Second, the Federal Court was granted an entirely new jurisdiction to supervise or review the activities and decisions of federal boards and tribunals. Generally I think it is fair to say that the establishment of the Federal Court a generation ago can be characterized as a bold and far-sighted experiment in reforming the federal civil justice system on behalf of all Canadians. It has proven itself to be invaluable to the Canadian system of justice, and it serves a number of special purposes that provincial courts cannot adequately fulfil.

First, the Federal Court is a Canada-wide court which has national jurisdiction. As a result it is not impeded by any territorial limitations on jurisdiction and on process to which the provincial courts are necessarily subject. The nation-wide quality of the Federal Court has proven essential for example in cases of admiralty and intellectual property, patents, copyright, trademarks and industrial design.

Second, the Federal Court is a court with specialized knowledge in a few specific areas. These include the Income Tax Act and other federal revenue laws, intellectual property and admiralty law.

The importance of the Federal Court to the Canadian legal system is evidenced by the fact that although the court and the provincial courts both have jurisdiction with respect to matters such as intellectual property and admiralty matters, most matters of this type are brought in the federal court.

Third, the Federal Court helps to ensure that the federal tribunals operate effectively, efficiently, and fairly throughout Canada under federal legislation that applies uniformly across the entire country.

I think it is appropriate at this time to pay tribute to the present Leader of the Opposition who as the Minister of Justice of the day in 1970 introduced legislation that established the court. Since that time there has been an opportunity for assessing the results of that experiment. I think it is fair to say that the Federal Court has proven to be an over-all success. But our assessment—and I think it is fair to say the assessment of the bar and others—has revealed a number of areas where improvements could be usefully made to the Federal Court Act and the related legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the major objectives of the proposals contained in this Bill are to facilitate access by individual Canadians to the federal civil justice system, to make that justice system fairer, to improve its efficiency and effectiveness and to improve service to the public provided by that system.

The first objective is that the Federal Court in particular and the federal justice system in general should be accessible to the ordinary citizen.

For example, a person should be able to sue the Crown in a suitably convenient court for breach of contract to purchase goods or for negligent driving by a Crown employee that causes injuries to another motorist. At the moment, such actions can only be brought in the Federal Court. However, it is not as available as provincial courts.

The Federal Court only has offices in the larger centres and judges of the Court, based as most of them are in the National Capital Region, are not as readily or as frequently available throughout Canada as are judges of provincial courts.

Moreover, for both citizen and lawyer alike, provincial courts, including their procedures and personnel, are much more familiar.

Therefore, the Federal Court is often not the most convenient one for the private litigant. With this in mind, the government has proposed that both the provincial courts and the Federal Court share jurisdiction with respect to such actions, thereby generally giving the plaintiff a choice of forum.

[English]

Another example relates to the court supervisory jurisdiction. First of all that jurisdiction is now split in a confusing way between the trial division and the court of appeal.

Second, at the moment the Federal Court Act defines the court's general jurisdiction to supervise federal boards, commissions, and other tribunals solely by reference to the traditional common law remedies, many of which have Latin labels and are loaded with arcane technical baggage.

For example, among the remedies that are available in the trial division under the present provisions of section 18 are certiorari, mandamus, quo warranto and no one other than a person knowledgeable in administrative law or in Latin would probably have the remotest idea what sort of relief is offered by this language.

The bill deals with both these matters. The jurisdictional split between the two divisions of the courts will be removed, and everyday language is used to describe relief that the court can order, the grounds for obtaining that relief, and the procedure available to the individual for applying for that relief.

A second objective in the amendments is fairness. Fairness, with the powerful voice of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in support, strongly suggests that distinctions between litigants should be kept to a minimum and any that exist require a rational justification.

To illustrate this point, I would point to the present legislation which confers a number of special privileges and immunities on the Crown that no longer have quite the same justification as they once did. Of particular interest are the special notice requirements when the Crown is sued, and the immunity of the Crown from paying prejudgment interest. The bill will remove or modify these specific privileges and, in doing so, continue the trend of placing the Crown on a footing of greater equality with the ordinary citizen.

A third objective is to improve the efficiency and the effectiveness of the federal civil justice system. As I already mentioned, there is a confusing split in the supervisory jurisdiction of the trial division and the court of appeal. The bill clarifies exactly what remedies are available, on what grounds, and where a citizen goes to obtain them, thereby reducing confusion, needless delay, duplication and expense.

A second area of inefficiency relates to the constitutional limitation on the federal court's jurisdiction in the field of Crown proceedings. The Crown can be sued but cannot sue in tort and contract in that court. The result has been that when an action is launched against the Crown in the Federal Court, the Crown must bring separate proceedings against the plaintiff or some other person in a provincial court. That is known as a counterclaim in third party proceedings. Remedies to eliminate this inefficient and wasteful method of disposing of Crown litigation is also addressed in the bill.

The fourth objective is to improve more generally service to the public by the federal civil justice system. In support of the objective to improve access to the public, the government proposes in this bill to transfer to provincial courts full responsibility for compensation appeals under a number of agriculture statutes. In addition a number of provisions, which provide for an absolute bar to a suit against the Crown if certain notice requirements are not fulfilled, will be repealed.

Moreover, the review of decisions and activities of federal administrative bodies will be conferred on the trial division rather than the Court of Appeal. Since matters at the trial division are reviewed by a single judge as compared to the three judges when an appeal is heard, litigants will have more flexibility and improved access to the court.

This proposal will also enable members of the Appeal Court to devote more of their time to considering cases of broad public importance.

[Translation]

Proceeding to the bill itself, Mr. Speaker, and before giving detailed consideration to its provisions, I believe it may be useful to list, briefly and generally, the reforms the Bill contains.

First of all, whereas at present ordinary common law and civil law actions for relief against the federal Crown can only be brought in the Federal Court, as mentioned earlier, under the bill that jurisdiction will be shared with provincial courts.

Second, an entirely new regime for supervising the validity and legality of the activities of the federal government is being established.

Third, the provisions of the Federal Court Act that govern appeals from the Federal Court to the Supreme Court of Canada are being transferred to the Supreme Court Act.

In that way, appeals from provincial courts and the Federal Court to the Supreme Court of Canada will all be dealt with together in the same statute.

Fourth, drawing on the experiences of some of the provinces, a representative rules committee composed of Federal Court judges and representatives of the legal profession and the Attorney General is being established to make the rules of the court.

This Committee will include judges of the Federal Court, representatives of the legal profession and the Attorney General, who will work together to improve court proceedings.

[English]

Fifth, modifications to some of the procedural advantages now enjoyed by the Crown are being made. These include the repeal of some of the special notice requirements in the Crown Liability Act and the imposition of responsibility on the Crown to pay prejudgment interest.

Sixth, consequent upon the increased role of provincial courts in the area of Crown proceedings, it is necessary that there be legislation dealing generally with practice and procedure when the Crown is a party to litigation. At present such matters are duplicated by the Federal Court Act and the Crown Liability Act simply because the latter is restricted in scope to actions against the Crown in tort, that is, civil wrongs of a non-contractual nature. All such provisions are being consolidated and are retitled Crown Liability and Proceedings Act. The Federal Court Act itself will no longer provide specifically, as it does now, for such matters.

Seventh, a few minor changes to the admiralty provisions of the Federal Court Act are being made. The definition of "ship" is being updated to bring it in conformity with recent changes to the meaning of that word in the Canada Shipping Act.

As well, authority is being conferred on the Federal Court to improve the scope of remedies available to the owner of the ship which has suffered damage.

That, in a nutshell, is what the bill proposes to do. In summary, this proposed legislation is going to improve access by Canadians to the courts. It is going introduce greater fairness into the federal civil justice system and will enhance the efficiency and the effectiveness of that system.

We think that this measure is a step forward and will provide Canadians with a more rational, comprehensible and open process for litigating matters with the federal government.

[Translation]

Consequently, I urge Members of this House to give this Bill their full support.

[English]

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity today to speak to this badly needed and long awaited reform to the Federal Court Act, the Crown Liability Act, the Supreme Court Act and several other federal statutes, generally all pertaining to the federal court procedures and technical requirements which our members of the public must follow or endure as they involves themselves in litigation or contest with the federal government or federal interests.

One of the outstanding issues surrounding this particular set of reforms is the length of time that it has taken to reach this stage. I practised law for approximately 15 years prior to being elected to this House.

I want to set out at this time my view that the delay of many years, about 10 years, in putting these reforms in place has cost all of us as taxpayer who pay for the government and individual litigants millions of dollars in terms of costs, being the costs of the inefficiency and duplication that were found in the federal court system and procedures.

For example, an individual litigant who found himself or herself on the losing end of an administrative decision would be forced to take a decision as to whether or not an appeal was appropriate. Even if that person had the finest of cases and could see the error in judgment of the tribunal of first instance, that person was usually faced with a trip to the downtown of one of our major cities and a potential retainer of $2,000 to $5,000. That is a huge hurdle in attempting to achieve the justice that our litigation system and our federal tribunals initially set out to achieve.

The reforms that have been proposed now are just not for lawyers, but they are for the public as well. They remove ambiguity, they broaden jurisdiction appropriately, they remove some technical limitations, and they streamline procedures. I know those are probably the words of the hon. minister and the government, but as a practising solicitor prior to arriving here I concur that these technical changes are long overdue and they will produce real savings and efficiencies in the cost of litigation.

Up to now it has been common to commence litigation by issuing a filing process in both the Federal Court and the superior court of the province. Not only was it a wasteful duplication, but it also required the lawyer and the support staff to devote resources to the avoidance of technical or other obstacles in both courts. There is a veritable mine field of obstacles out there from the legal point of view. That this relatively non-controversial set of reforms remained unrectified for so long is I think a bit of an embarrassment to this Parliament.

The purpose of our court system is to provide a means of dispute resolution for our society, generally between persons and organizations, persons and government, and to provide a system of disclosure and balance of interest within a democratically constituted legal framework.

But other barriers remain in our justice system now, and the average person out there is very aware of it. The initiative for reform was on the table at least five or six years ago. The list of housekeeping chores that had to be accomplished, which was brought forward by the legal profession, by people in government and by judges, was on the table. We were all well aware of them. There are still inefficiencies and other outstanding business in the field of justice that we must look at.

One of the areas that we should be aware of is the cut-backs recently to the federal government program to support litigation on public issues. These cut-backs affect litigation that pertains to what I would call the leading edge of development of legal principles in our society. That leading edge is very important in securing a balance of interest between the people of the country and the government. To the extent that these cut-backs retard the development of this leading edge of litigation, all of our society will pay the price for the delay.

Another matter we should recall is one that I have raised in this House previously. It is my sense that the government for many reasons has acquiesced in a non-disclosure on the part of institutions or publicly elected officials in areas where the public has I think rightfully asked questions about the appropriateness of conduct, the appropriateness of spending of tax dollars. I think of plea bargaining which in some courts will prevent the public from knowing the factual basis for charges. That is in the criminal court. In the civil court there is bargaining in settlement of litigation which will prevent disclosure of the real issues lying behind the litigation.

We heard today a suggestion that because a public official sits in the other place there is some general immunity from the laws of this land, that perhaps those laws do not apply through our government quite the same way as they apply to members in this House. From the point of view of the citizen and the taxpayer I have to ask the question: Where is the balancing of interest? Where are the mechanisms to achieve that balance of interest?

Procedural obstacles and conflicts between our immigration laws and our extradition laws are again another problem. I know the Minister of Justice recently carried out his administrative or quasi-judicial function in dealing with the matter under the Extradition Act involving an individual by the name of Charles Ng. Almost every day there is an article in the paper about some alleged killer from another country who is here illegally. He is staying in custody at our expense. He does not want to go back to his or her country to face the music. I ask: Where is the justice there? I think I read yesterday that we had one of these individuals actually attending school, taking a course, I guess at our expense.

The conflict here is that our Extradition Act and our Immigration Act have been developed separately in terms of procedures. As a result, the citizen of this country, the taxpayer, is unable to pursue directly the course of justice that should be there. It is perhaps unfortunate that the burden of that lies upon a minister of the government as opposed to a tribunal or a procedure already existing in government. That is an area that also requires attention from the justice point of view.

Another matter involves the decision of the Supreme Court in The Queen versus Morgentaler. In that action an entire provision of the Criminal Code has been removed. If there was justice for the unborn, for the life that lives in the womb in the days or weeks prior to birth, where is it now with that provision removed?

It has been approximately two years since it became clear to most of us in the country that the Young Offenders Act was failing to adequately serve some interests of society. I think it is inappropriate for this government to permit us to continue with a statute that treats a killer like a child. I think most of us would agree with that without too much argument. I know this Parliament will have an opportunity to look at reforms, but those reforms are long in coming and we must address them quickly.

My hope from this side of the House is that the government will acknowledge that matters of justice are just as important as other matters of government. They are just as important to the citizens of this country as old age security, environment, trade, taxation and other matters we deal with in our federal government. I hope that with the government's magnificent success in achieving these existing reforms in this Bill C-38, achieved after 10 years of thinking and paper pushing, this success will spur this government to improve its record in the field of justice.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to participate in this debate on the proposed amendments to the provisions of the various acts, both the Federal Court Act and the Crown Liability Act dealing with the Federal Court.

I listened with care to the comments of both the minister and my colleague from Scarborough—Rouge River. I am not going to canvass the waterfront of justice issues in the very limited time I will be taking to respond on behalf of the New Democratic Party on this important legislation. I did note, however, that the hon. member made some reference to the provisions of the Criminal Code on abortion and suggested we should recriminalize this area of the law.

I must ask: Who is it that speaks on behalf of the Liberal party on this very important and difficult issue of abortion? Is it the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River? Is it the leadership candidate from Scarborough West? Is it the leader of the Liberal party? Is it the member for Halifax, the spokesperson on the status of women who says we do not need a new criminal law? Who is it today that speaks for the Liberal party on this very important and sensitive question?

We have heard the call from the member for Scarborough—Rouge River for new criminal law in this area. I say on behalf of the New Democrats that we believe that there is no need whatsoever for recriminalization of this area of the law. Indeed, changes to the Canada Health Act are necessary to ensure equitable access. It is an insult to the women of this country and to doctors in this country to suggest that we have to go back to those dark days of criminal sanctions in this area.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Leeds—Grenville.

Mr. Jordan: Mr. Speaker, if this is supposed to be a debate on abortion I think we should have had some notification that we are having a debate on abortion this afternoon. I am critically interested in the topic. I think we should get back to the bill at hand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On debate, the member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I was merely picking up the theme that was introduced by the hon. member's own colleague during the debate. I would welcome the views of yet another Liberal member on this question. I am sure we will have yet another variety.

• (1600)

The hon. member also spoke on the question of the Young Offenders Act. We all recognize the deep concerns that exist about the quality of the delivery of justice in the area of young offenders. I would, however, remind the hon. member who was so critical of the Young Offenders Act that that piece of legislation was introduced by his own colleague, the member for York Centre. He may want to have a word with his colleague about the provisions of that legislation.

Turning to the provisions of the Federal Court Act and the Crown Liability Act, I note that Bill C–38 is legislation which represents the first major change to the Federal Court Act and the Crown Liability Act since the Federal Court Act was introduced in 1971. For those Canadians who are not familiar with the Federal Court, perhaps it is appropriate to comment briefly on the jurisdiction of that body.

The Federal Court, which includes both the Trial Division and the Federal Court of Appeal, was established by Parliament in 1971 to deal with, among other things, lawsuits against the federal government, cases based wholly on federal law, patents and copyright for example, maritime law, interpretation of the Access to Information Act, the Privacy Act, and challenges to decisions by federal tribunals, the Tariff Board and the Pensions Appeal Board, for instance.

In the area of access to information and privacy, I might just note that the current conservative government has displayed utter contempt for the parliamentary process in rejecting the unanimous recommendation of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General to strengthen the provisions of the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act. Promises were made by the late Walter Baker to strengthen this legislation which, after all, is at the heart of our democratic system, the right of citizens to have free and open access to the information which forms the basis for government decision–making. This government has failed miserably in making information available to Canadian citizens.

There have been a number of concerns arising about the jurisdiction of the Federal Court. It is an incredibly complicated area of law. A lawsuit, for example, which involves claims against both the federal government and private individuals, corporations or other governments can be very, very complicated. In some cases, such a lawsuit cannot be disposed of in one court alone. It actually has to be taken in a number of different courts.

One example of this was the litigation that arose from the 1978 crash at the Cranbrook airport. In that instance, the plaintiff airline brought action against the federal Ministry of Transport, various Crown servants, the city of Cranbrook, various city employees and the manufacturers of the airplane and the plane's thrust reversers. The Trial Division of the Federal Court decided that while the Ministry of Transport had to be sued in Federal Court, ministry employees, like other defendants, had to be sued separately in the B.C. Supreme Court since their liability was governed by common law.

There are many other examples of a similar nature of the confusion in jurisdiction between the Federal Court and provincial superior courts.

As well, the second major area of difficulty was with respect to the division of responsibility between the Trial Division of the Federal Court and the Federal Court of Appeal in challenges to the decisions of tribunals. That has been an area that has caused difficulty and confusion for some time. Indeed, lawyers would frequently file documents in both the Federal Court Trial Division and the Federal Court of Appeal just so they would not make a mistake or miss out on a limitation period. Obviously that kind of situation is one that is not only unfair to the legal profession but ultimately is unfair to Canadian litigants generally who have a right to clarity in the law. I want to say, on behalf of the New Democrats, that we certainly welcome the general thrust of the amendments that have been brought forward by the minister in this area.

I want to raise an issue of concern with respect to process. The minister received on October 6 last, a little less than a month ago, a letter from the Attorney General of the Province of British Columbia, Bud Smith. In that letter, the Attorney General of British Columbia indicates that following consultations with provincial and territorial Attorneys General they were unanimous in their view that the issue of the continuation of the Federal Court of Canada as presently constituted was a matter which they all felt merits further consideration and study.

We all know the position of the Attorney General of British Columbia. It has been his position for some time. I have a paper here that was prepared by Bud Smith in which he states that the long-standing position of British Columbia with respect to the Federal Court of Canada has been that the establishment of the Federal Court of Canada is wholly unnecessary and is not only a wasteful expenditure of public funds but has resulted and will yet result in practical disadvantages and inconveniences to the citizens of Canada.

That is the position of the Attorney General of British Columbia. I do not think it is fair to suggest that that is a position shared by the colleagues of the Attorney General of British Columbia from other provinces or the territories. I certainly would not suggest for a minute that that is the case. What is clear is that all Attorneys General at the recent meeting in June of this year in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, directed their deputies to study this possibility. That study is under way. At the same time, as I understand it, the Federal Law Reform Commission is looking at the whole question of the role of the Federal Court and the jurisdiction of it.

The Canadian Bar Association decided just a month ago to reactivate its committee of the 1970s on the matter of the Federal Court and to prepare a report by December of this year in order that the council of the Canadian Bar Association might take a position at its mid-winter meeting in February, 1990.

Speaking on behalf of the Attorneys General, Bud Smith urged the Minister of Justice to postpone the introduction of this bill, or at the very least, to postpone debate at second reading, until the Canadian Bar Association report had been considered by the council of the CBA and until the Law Reform Commission had made its views known on this important question as well. I regret that the Minister of Justice has refused to heed this call not only from the attorney general of British Columbia but from attorneys general of at least eight other provinces and territories as well.

This is an issue which obviously has to be moved on, but it has now been many years since the original proposals were made. I think it has been over 10 years since the Canadian Bar Association's study in this area. I would have thought the minister might have waited just a few more months before proceeding in the rather high-handed way that he has proceeded.

The government has claimed to be concerned about consultation with the provinces. Here is an illustration where provincial governments, through the attorneys general, have asked for consultation and have asked for delay. The federal Minister of Justice says, "No, I am going to proceed without agreement".

So I wanted, both as a member of Parliament from British Columbia and as the spokesperson on justice for the New Democratic Party, to raise that concern about process and to urge the minister to consider the possibility of delaying any further proceedings on this legislation until such time as both the Canadian Bar Association and the Law Reform Commission have been given an opportunity to make their views known.

At the very least I am pleased to have received an earlier assurance from the minister that in committee proceedings there will be full opportunity for representatives of the Attorneys General, the Canadian Bar Association, the Law Reform Commission and others to voice their concerns at an appropriate time. I would hope that perhaps there might be some delay in this area.

Naturally, a number of the proposed changes flow from recommendations of the Canadian Bar Association from 1977 and from the report of the Law Reform Commission issued three years later.

I referred earlier to the two main areas of confusion about the Federal Court, the distribution of jurisdiction between the Federal Court and the existing provincial superior courts and the division of responsibility between the Trial Division and the Federal Court of Appeal. I am not going to summarize the jurisdiction of the Federal Court at this time. That has been done by the minister in his comments. To the extent that Bill C–38 attempts to resolve some of the confusion, uncertainty and difficulty that has arisen with respect to jurisdiction, those are changes that we in general terms support.

We welcome as well the changes in the bill that would abrogate certain long–standing advantages enjoyed by the Crown such as not having to pay interest on damages for the period before judgment. That was always unfair. I am pleased the minister has brought forward changes that will ensure the Crown does, in fact, pay interest on damages before judgment as well as post–judgment.

I am not going to go through some of the key areas that are covered by the bill because, once again, that has been touched on. There is a requirement now that parties before the Federal Court give notice to the Attorney General of Canada and the Attorney General of each province when a constitutional question is to be argued. In general terms, once again, that is not something with which we would have any difficulty.

There is a provision in the bill that removes a requirement that litigants give the Deputy Attorney General of Canada advance notice of a legal claim against the Crown. There is a new remedy that will allow the courts to issue an order declaratory of the rights of parties in certain proceedings. While injunctions and specific performance are not to be granted against the Crown, at least there is the opportunity for declaratory relief, and that is a step forward.

The amendments, as I say, in general terms are amendments which we welcome. The removal of the dilemma in having to choose between the Trial Division and the Court of Appeal is welcome. I know that the hon. member for Halifax, a distinguished legal counsel with extensive experience in the Federal Court, will be sharing that with us at an appropriate time. I am sure she would agree that her experience in the Federal Court would lead her as well to support these amendments which have given rise to such confusion and such uncertainty.

I want to raise a couple of other areas of concern, while I am on my feet, with respect to access to justice. That is part of what this whole process is about. We know, of course, that in the area of judicial appointments unfortunately the history of the Federal Court is not a happy one. In fact, in the report of the Canadian Bar Association on the appointment of judges in Canada, it was noted that political favouritism has been a dominant, though not sole, consideration in appointments to the Federal Court of Canada.

Too frequently the Federal Court has been a repository for friends of the government. I am speaking of both the Liberal government, which engaged in that orgy of excessive patronage in June of 1984 including appointments to the Federal Court, as well as the current government. Let us hope that this history of patronage appointments to the Federal Court will soon be a thing of the past.

We are watching with interest the new appointments process.

And I must say that I am very happy to see the role played by several conservative members from Quebec that have long been looking for ways to improve the system whereby judges are appointed. Mr. Speaker, the new system should hopefully curtail patronage appointees, both conservative and liberal. Time will tell! There are always problems in this regard, but we want to see the best men and women appointed to courts of all levels in Canada.

[English]

I mention as well the importance of appointing women. While certainly it is true that this government and this minister has appointed a number of women to the bench, there is still significant work to be done in that area. Given the history of the previous conservative governments, I would note that prior to 1984, no conservative government had ever appointed a single woman to the federal judiciary. That is slowly changing and I certainly welcome the recent improvement in the number of women who have been appointed, but further work remains to be done in that area.

Certainly recent commissions of inquiry in the area of access to the law by native people have demonstrated glaring problems in this area, including the Marshall inquiry in Nova Scotia, the inquiry into the delivery of justice to native people in Manitoba and the inquiries in Alberta, British Columbia and elsewhere. Our treatment of native people in the law has been shameful and I would appeal to the minister to examine far more seriously than he has done the proposal for a justice system which would be a parallel justice system for native people. It has been a recommendation of the Canadian Bar Association and it is one that the minister should not reject out of hand as he has done.

We want as well to ensure that our bench more accurately reflects the multicultural nature of this country. Again, there has been small progress but not nearly enough. there is deep concern about the level of the government's commitment in this area. This is a government which is still not prepared to allow our national police force, the RCMP, to reflect that multicultural heritage, a government which has a minister who refuses to accept the recommendation of the commissioner of the RCMP to make this very reasonable change in the uniform, a government which is still listening to the Neanderthal voices of certain members of the Alberta caucus on this question, stirring up an atmosphere that unfortunately has led to badges with symbols of banning turbans. That has got to change and an important part of reflecting the multicultural reality of our country is to ensure that it is reflected on the bench as well.

Speaking as well of such a fundamental question as access to the courts, I must underline my concern and the concern of my colleagues at both the provincial and federal levels about the serious under–funding of legal aid programs, a terribly difficult problem. Those who want access to the courts, not just federal courts but to courts at all levels, are too frequently denied that access particularly in the area of civil litigation, because they cannot afford to go to the courts. I would appeal to the government and to the Minister of Justice to show leadership in this area and to ensure that legal aid programs receive significant increases in funding.

Another area in which the federal government must show leadership with respect to access to the courts is in renewal of the funding of the Federal Court challenges program. The minister spoke of the charter and some of the new challenges facing the judiciary under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Litigants who cannot afford to bring their cases before the courts are obviously denied that element of justice. As Frank Scott said, the trappings of democracy hang loosely on an emaciated body politic. It is so true, and if the court challenges fund is not renewed, then those individuals who want to have access to the courts to pursue charter challenges will be denied that access.

I want to emphasize again that certainly in principle we support this legislation, and the changes that have been proposed in many instances are long overdue. The bill will introduce an element of equity and fairness into a system which is too often confusing and unfair. It is legislation that will require careful study in the legislative committee which has been appointed to consider it.

I would hope as well that there might be an opportunity for us to call some of the witnesses I mention, the representatives of the attorneys general, the law Reform Commission, the Canadian Bar Association and others. There is still much work to be done in this area; the gain in terms of general concerns in the judiciary area, the whole concept of citizenship court judges. We know that the Canadian Judicial Council in its recently issued first report has recommended changes in this area. No longer will these people be considered as judges but rather they ought to be considered for what they are a type of commissioner. Obviously this is another area which has been rife with patronage but it is one in which we hope there will be changes.

The law of contempt of court is an issue that must be addressed as well. Again, we have to ask ourselves whether we should not consider the recommendations of a number of distinguished Canadians, including a former justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, Justice Willard Estey, who suggested that there should be a role for Parliament in the appointment process of federally appointed judges. As he points out:

> —the closed circuit system we use in Canada doesn't allow much input by the democratic basement of our community, the electorate. It's all based upon the theory that you elect good people who in turn appoint good people. That's a debatable formula.

Fortunately, we have in general terms been well served by our judiciary in this country but much work remains to be done, work with respect to access to the courts and to the justice system for Canada's first nations, for native people, ensuring that women are appointed to the judiciary and ensuring that judges are sensitized to the concerns of sexual equality in this country. Too frequently we see examples of an absence of awareness of the importance of equality in sexual assault trials. For example, comments are made which are not only offensive and sexist but completely unacceptable in this country.

In closing, I once again want to emphasize that we do support in principle Bill C-38 which is before the House. We will be urging in committee a number of improvements to the bill and particularly urging that those witnesses from the Law Reform Commission, the Canadian Bar Association and the Attorneys General be given an opportunity to appear before the committee. Let us hope that these changes will ensure more justice in the judicial system in this country.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise today with some concerns regarding this bill, but in general, I can say it certainly is an idea whose time has come. In actual fact, its time had come a number of years ago.

I also want to commend my honourable colleague from Burnaby—Kingsway for his very kind mention of me and my experience in the Federal Court, but I must give over to him because I do understand that his experience in the Federal Court is far more extensive than my own and I understand that it may possibly be even more extensive than that of the Hon. Minister of Justice across the way.

However, I do want to make a few points in particular with regard to the topic that we are addressing today, namely, amendments to the Federal Court Act. It may not be the most riveting and the most exciting legislation for members of this House. It may not make it to the national news, the local news or indeed any news. But it is terribly important in the over-all legal scenario that we as legislators and as lawyers attempt to create in this country.

There are many problems with the legal system in this country, but I believe the major problem is the mystification of the process. Those of us who are legally trained, who practise law and have now turned to a second avocation of the lawyer, that of a legislator, realize from our past experience the fear and trepidation with which many Canadians go to law. It is a system that seems burdened with its own language, its own shibboleths and its own difficult and tortuous paths which are completely unintelligible to the vast majority of everyday people. Consequently, anything that helps to demystify the process is to be appreciated and perhaps from time to time even applauded.

For lawyers, the proposed amendments will surely be welcome. Changes in the Federal Court Act pertaining to judicial review will eliminate the dilemma in choosing between the Trial Division or the Court of Appeal. Experienced lawyers are, at the present time, filing two requests, one before each court, in order to get around the limitation period and to be sure that at least one request will be fully heard and not rejected on a preliminary motion.

In cases against the Crown, these changes will make it much easier for lawyers to take the proceedings before the superior court in their own provinces where they generally have more expertise. Ultimately this will benefit people who sue the Crown.

The problem again is the one of burgeoning legal class in this country, the inability of our government or indeed our system to provide a judicare system anywhere close to our medicare system for reasons that are obvious to anyone who has ever had to go through the trauma and the costly experience of going to court.

There are several questions with regard to these amendments that I would like to bring forward today. Bill C–38 and its amendments to the Federal Court Act follows recommendations long put forward by both the Canadian Bar Association and the Law Reform Commission. As a matter of fact, some of these recommendations go back as far as 1977. I have here The Federal Court Act, a Study of the Court's Administrative Law Jurisdictions, which is of interest to me and to others for a variety of reasons. One reason is that it was written by a well–known legal scholar in this country, David Mullen, a former professor of mine. Even more so, and I would draw this to the attention of all members of the House, footnote No. 187 in this brilliant work of legal scholarship mentions my hon. colleague, the member for Ottawa South, who unfortunately is not here today. The erudition and the ability as a legal scholar cited by my hon. colleague is one that would be of benefit to all members to take under advisement.

With regard to the bill itelf and the amendments, in 1983 the Law Reform Commission issued a report which ostensibly recommended the amendments that are being brought forward today. I know that all of us are experienced with, in the Shakespearean phrase, the law's delays, but six years is a little excessive. I think that the people of Canada might want to know what took so long in getting these amendments, laudable as they are, finally to the floor of the House.

Mr. Lewis: Trying to get up the excitement level?

Ms. Clancy: Chill out, Mr. Minister, it gets more exciting as we go on. I have more questions for you, none of which you are prepared to answer but I will certainly give it a try. Unfortunately, I may not be at the committee, Mr. Minister, and I have you here as a semi–captive audience and I will attempt at least to plant the seeds of these questions in his mind where I am sure they will find fallow ground.

Mr. Arseneault: There's no problem, he's open–minded.

Ms. Clancy: Do you think? Those people from New Brunswick are so idealistic.

Ms. Catterall: Seeds don't sprout in the dark.

Ms. Clancy: Now, now, heckle him, don't heckle me. You're on my side.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Clancy: At any rate, in 1983, the report of the Department of Justice allegedly has been put to a study and has been reconsidered. If this is so, I wonder why the Minister of Justice has not at some point revealed the results of such a departmental study or the examination thereto to the public at large. I should not suppose, given the subject matter that it probably is anything of great embarrassment to the government, but it might perhaps increase the demystification of what is ostensibly a fairly mystifying process to people in general.

Some of the changes in Bill C–38 grant to the Federal Court jurisdiction concurrent with that of provincial superior courts. I am wondering if there was consultation with provincial counterparts of the Minister of Justice in order to obtain their opinions on these changes as some of the provincial courts are already overburdened. I perhaps could be suggesting that the Minister of Justice get on with it and appoint more judges in certain provinces. Certainly some of the appointments he has made I have already congratulated him on privately and I will now do so here publicly. Some changes, note that, some. Can the Minister of Justice explain when the significant part of the Federal Court's jurisdiction is concurrent with that of these provincial superior courts why he did not take advantage in the reforms in Bill C–38 to reduce the concurrent powers of the Federal Court? Would not this reduction of the Federal Court's jurisdiction have allowed the federal government to reduce expenditures required for the administration of the court and do what it wants to do so badly in every other area of Canadian life, reduce the deficit?

Perhaps if it had reduced some of this concurrent jurisdiction and the expenditures thereto we would not be sitting here mourning—certainly the way they are mourning in my region of Atlantic Canada—by the cutting off and the strangling of the unemployment insurance program. I merely say that as a suggestion to the hon. minister because I know that underneath that cruel exterior there is a soft heart.

An Hon. Member: I would sure like to see it.

Ms. Clancy: Aha! Now we have heckling from the minister's side. There is a light at the end of this tunnel.

The provincial superior courts as well have long experience in matters involving suits against a provincial Crown. I wonder again why the provincial superior courts could not have been given exclusive jurisdiction as well over actions against the federal Crown.

The Law Reform Commission and the Canadian Bar Association have been lobbying for a time, and indeed I have mentioned this to the minister, to have some of the peripheral criminal matters that are currently in the Federal Court's jurisdiction with regard to certain federal statutes transferred. From my own experience as a provincial and municipal prosecutor in the past, I recall that there are criminal sanctions, not just attached to the Income Tax Act but to various acts such as the Small Birds Act, the Customs and Excise Act and a number of other federal statutes.

These are recommendations of both the Canadian Bar Association and the Law Reform Commission to ensure that the Federal Court is not, with the greatest of respect to that court, getting involved in criminal matters which in the opinion of both of these august bodies are better off in the other court system.

Prior to considering any amendments to the judicial review of administrative tribunals, can the Minister of Justice tell us if he has reviewed the provisions of the provincial statutes in this regard? Can he also explain why he did not refer more to the pertinent provisions in provincial statutes which are simpler and more comprehensive?

Again, it is a question of demystification of the legal process. The people of Canada are basically suspicious of and live in a certain amount of fear and trepidation with regard to the legal process. I do believe that it is our duty as legislators to in every way make this process more comprehensible to the people of this country. I am sure that the minister does agree with me and that these oversights will be corrected at the earliest possible date. But then again, I always was an optimist.

With regard to the amendments in general, I can say that they are long awaited, and while we do not feel that they go far enough, they do make in the long run an honest effort to begin a process long needed, not just in the Federal Court Act and the other statutes pertaining thereto but in the legal system generally.

In closing, I would like to refer to a quote from political scientist Peter Russell. In his recent book, The Judiciary in Canada he said:

> Rather than simply adding judges to the (Courts) to cope with this expansion in administrative law cases, the government should pursue the proposals set out in the 1983 MacGuigan paper and reduce the court's role in fields where it has no special expertise and which overlap with the jurisdiction of the provincial superior courts. In this way, the benefits of developing a court with a special competence in some complex area of federal law (like the judicial review of federal authorities) can be realized while curtailing the drift toward a dual court system.

I think that these sentiments add to those sentiments expressed here today of the need to make the legal system in this country more relevant to the people and more comprehensible to the people. In this particular area the government has made one small step. Perhaps, in the words of Neil Armstrong, it should look toward making one giant step.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed, from Friday, October 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mulroney that Bill C-29, an Act to establish the Department of Forestry, to amend the Forestry Development and Research Act and to make related amendments to other Acts, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, although we have the assurance that this Bill will be passed unanimously on third reading, I would still like to submit a few comments to the House, to highlight the amendments passed in the legislative committee.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on third reading of Bill C-29, an act to establish the department of forestry. I feel that this particular bill has been rushed through its stages, but by no means should it be interpreted as a non-controversial or unimportant piece of legislation.

The creation of a forestry department is a step in the right direction. After hearing time and time again the same complaints from witnesses before the legislative committee, the press and the opposition, I do believe that the government is starting to get the message.

I must reiterate, as I have done in previous speeches time and again, that the forestry industry provides one in ten jobs in Canada directly or indirectly. In fact, close to 800,000 people work in the industry and 350 communities depend on it.

I am very pleased to say that there was a certain amount of flexibility that took place in the legislative committee. There were a total of five amendments passed. This shows that the government realized that the bill could be improved and it has put forth certain efforts to try to correct certain aspects of this bill.

To the preamble my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur introduced an amendment which was accepted unanimously. The definition of sustainable development proposed by my colleague echoes the one devised by Dr. Gro Harlem Brundtland, the former Norwegian Prime Minister and Chairman of the United Nations World Commission on Environment and Development. "The defining of sustainable development in law, as a development which meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs, is a very significant step", the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur said. Many environmental groups have criticized the federal government for using a term which lacks a standard definition and which may be easily misconstrued.

"This definition ensures that the forestry department will play a key role in the preservation of Canada's valuable woodlands. Moreover, it clearly establishes a term that the government has been recklessly brandishing about", the hon. member further stated.

[Translation]

On a more personal note, I also wish the minister would do what he suggested last July, when he said:

> We should send an offer to the Americans, to sound them out before sending them a termination notice.

To my amazement, nothing has been done so far. That is really too bad!

[English]

On October 27, in the House, the minister's answer to my question was very disappointing. At one point he stated that the 15 per cent surtax on softwood lumber was a minor factor. I found that incredible. He categorically stated in July that the 15 per cent surtax has had an effect on the Canadian softwood lumber industry. If it is so minor, why is he planning to send a termination notice? On the other hand, I was pleased to hear him say that he is constructing the evidence that would provide him with the necessary authority and jurisdiction to renegotiate the MOU. I might add, if he needs any help in expediting the evidence, I have numerous files on the subject.

• (1640)

I would like to explain to Hon. Members the amendment I proposed to this Bill, concerning clause 6(c) which stresses the development and application of forest management codes and standards, which were not adequate.

[English]

It was obviously not enough just to promote, we needed muscle in there. We needed government presence in there to monitor and ensure that the codes and standards were being followed. I hope that the government will go forth and carefully monitor, without impeding on the provincial governments' jurisidiction. It should be stressed that this monitoring be done in harmony with the provinces as well as the industry.

In the forestry sector the government seems to be very concerned about endangering its relations with the provinces. It is afraid to jade the provinces. I would like someone to indicate to me what is wrong with showing some direction. What is wrong with working with the provinces? By "working", I mean negotiate the strict enforcement of quality reforestation, integrated forest management and do more research. Those provinces which do not comply will simply not have their forest resource development agreements renewed. In the same process, let them answer to their constituents. I am certain that both governments have the same common goal.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on the working paper prepared on September 8 this year by Dr. J.S. Maini, Assistant Deputy Minister (Policy), which deals with my amendment to clause 6 (c).

On page 7 of the working paper he mentions the following, under the heading: "The Challenge".

First, to make proper use of available knowledge to provide for integrated management of resources and create a national network of demonstration areas dedicated to integrated forest management.

Second, to intensify research on the potential impact on the forest environment of disruptions due to natural causes and human activity and to transmit the knowledge thus acquired.

Third, to enhance the productivity of woodlands in selected regions and increase the yield per hectare through improved management and enhanced protection of our forests, in such a way that multi-use of woodlands is possible.

Fourth, to reduce the waste produced by forest operations and wood processing. To rationalize the use of wood in various manufacturing processes leading to finished products.

Fifth, to undertake a systematic policy analysis, so as to better understand the decision-making process in the forestry sector and harmonize the various timeframes involved, bearing in mind economic, ecological, political and program considerations.

Mr. Speaker, we all know that the forestry sector is almost entirely a provincial responsibility. The provinces own about 80 per cent of our productive woodlands, the federal government only 12 per cent, while 8 per cent belongs to private landowners.

Although the vast majority of these lands belong to the provinces, this does not mean the federal government should renege on its responsibilities and leave everything up to the provinces.

[English]

My second proposed amendment was, as I expected, ruled out of order. I still wish to press the point that the forestry workers be protected. I am very concerned about the layoffs in the industry. Not enough is being done to retrain these people. I had proposed that training programs in co-operation with other departments be established for laid off workers.

We also need people in the forestry sector who have first-hand knowledge of the industry needs toward initiating training programs that would have a much higher rate of success than the current general programs offered. Taking into account the reason why my amendment was inappropriate, I caution the government that we on this side of the House will be vigilant in order to ensure that forestry workers be given the most chances to either recuperate their job or to have access to a training program geared to accommodate their talents and aptitudes.

I felt that adding "in co-operation with the other departments" to the amendment would have been enough. However, I hope the government will consider suggesting that the department in question propose a job recovery program specifically for workers who have been laid off in the forestry industry.

[English]

The third amendment that I proposed to this bill, I am pleased to say, received a favourable response from the government, so favourable I might add that the government proposed an identical one in substance. This clause deals in essence with exports and the competitiveness of Canadian forestry products on a global scale. It was mentioned briefly in clause 7(b) of the bill, but in a vague and unspecified manner. I had proposed to strengthen this.

When you take into account that the forest resource has an annual value of about $33 billion in goods shipped, the industry is also Canada's leading export sector, accounting for an annual net trade surplus in this sector of around $16 billion. As a result, the government added section (e) to clause 6 stating "to seek to enhance the utilization of Canada's forest resources and the competitiveness of Canada's forest sector domestically and internationally."

I would like to say a few words on the interesting comments made by a witness who testified before the legislative committee on this bill. The witness, Mr. Leslie Reed, professor in industrial resources, faculty of forestry, University of British Columbia, stated five possible elements in a strategic plan. The first element was production targets that are doable and measurable. How much timber and non-timber do we want to have in the year 2000, 2020, 2050 and so on? It is pretty hard to talk about policy in a vacuum. We must think in terms of targets of predictable capacity.

On this I would like to point out that Canada's productive forests cover a total area of 220 million hectares or approximately 50 per cent of the area of this country. Over the years 12 per cent of those lands have not been satisfactorily restocked. We are looking at an increase of 240,000 hectares or nearly a 1 per cent per year increase in unforested land. Granted 88 per cent has been restocked. However this means that this year it may be 13 per cent, 14 per cent next year, and 15 per cent the next year.

We cannot let this kind of situation go on. Furthermore, according to the Auditor General's report for the fiscal year ending 31 March, 1988, at section 7.7:

> Lack of adequate forest management in the past has resulted in depletion of the forest resource. Significant shortages of wood are now reported at the local level in every province. Restocking of productive forest lands has not kept pace with the harvest, and this threatens future forest productivity. Given the importance of the industry to Canada's economy and social structure, it is clear that any significant decrease in the supply of wood will have a serious impact on all Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I may also add that since 1903, Sweden has had its "one for one" law which says that for every tree that is cut down, another one has to be planted. In Canada, similar legislation was passed for the first time in 1987, by the province of Quebec. In fact, there is a lot of catching up to do, and we must start today and take the lead.

The second point raised by Mr. Reed was priorities. There are a number of things we want to do. These priorities should be ranked carefully. Our first priority should be silviculture and reforestation, as I said earlier.

[English]

His third point was an action plan that says in effect this is what we are going to do and these are the time frames we are working in. In 2 years, 5 years, 10 years, 25 years from now, this is where we expect to be. Too good to be true.

• (1650)

His fourth point was about accountability. We have to make someone accountable, someone to whom we can come back and make sure that the mandate indeed has been fulfilled.

I questioned Professor Reed on this point. I agreed with his term "accountability". I then asked how the federal government could be involved in such a process in perspective with the provincial jurisdiction in the Constitution. He replied that most reports talk about responsibility. This is a soft word. I prefer talking about accountability and enforcement, supervision, inspection and reporting. I think there is an easy way for the federal government to exercise leadership in a way that will soon have teeth. This goes back to my amendment "monitor and promote the development and application of forest management codes and standards".

His fifth and final point dealt with the monetary aspect. This is where the feedback, updating and change come in. Again this refers to my amendment which aims at supplying the necessary funds to guarantee the viability of our largest industry in Canada. This is where we will reap the benefits or, hopefully, not the disaster of our efforts.

I want to refer to comments by another witness who was invited to the legislative committee. Mr. Jim Cayford, executive director of the Canadian Institute of Forestry, gave a very good definition to the meaning of integrated management which was inserted as an amendment in clause 6, section (d).

By integrated management I mean, first of all, the management of Canada's forestry resources in terms of various products and services, and second, management in terms of lumber, fauna, environmental values, water, woodland areas and recreation. This is a very complex field, I have no doubt about that, and I would say that in most cases, one use should take precedence over other uses in a particular area.

Increasingly, we will be faced with the following dilemma: Should governments promote the interests of industry or the environmentalists? Many misconceptions and misunderstandings are created by lack of direction and information. However, I am convinced that in the long run, both parties will understand each other's values and will be able to reach a compromise.

[English]

Mr. Cayford went on to suggest several very good points. I will not state them all but I would very much like to quote the following:

> We propose that the duties and functions of the minister should include specific reference to the establishment of an interdepartmental committee on forestry. This committee should be chaired by the Department of Forestry and have the responsibility to review all forestry programs of the federal government and to prepare an annual federal forestry budget.

I spoke to Mr. Cayford abut this suggestion. He indicated a requirement long overdue, that all the various national and provincial forest industry associations meet once or twice a year for information sessions. Government officials from the department and the minister's office would be present to listen to their concerns and proposed solutions to the different problems facing the forestry sector of our economy. Their contribution is extremely valuable because they deal with the forest on a daily basis.

What better way for the federal government to acquire all the current, up-to-date information and suggestions from the various sectors of the industry across the country. On this point, I have heard that the minister is very much in favour of such a conference. I would like to attend such a meeting, which I hope will take place in the very near future.

In conclusion, I would like to quote the words of Professor Reed:

> Let us not kid ourselves. Either we have a commitment to forestry, either the provinces put up long-term strategic plans that have substance and then follow through in a courageous way, or they are not entitled to the federal sharing of funds.

This statement is in total agreement with what I have said earlier about the conditions that should be attached to the federal contributions in the Forest Resource Development Agreements.

In closing, on September 26, at the second reading of this bill I said that under the Constitution Act, 1982, natural resources including forests are a provincial jurisdiction. From an environmental point of view, this does not mean the federal government should divest its responsibility for the forest sector. The industry needs us and national parks need the federal government. We should take our responsibilities and show strong leadership.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate today in third reading of Bill C-29, the long-awaited legislation to establish the department of forestry. As all members know, third reading is generally an opportunity to wrap up the discussion and debate and to review some of the amendments that have been made both in committee and in report stage to this most important legislation.

I say it is important because we heard a great deal in committee and in this House about just how much forestry impacts all of us, whether we live in northern British Columbia, northern Ontario, or in fact in downtown Toronto where a number of people depend on the forest for their cheques because of the wealth that our forests generate.

It would help us to remind ourselves of the over 300 communities that depend on the forest industry for their livelihood. It is the number one industry in this country, with some $38 billion generated annually. Some 840,000 Canadians are employed in all of the various forestry sectors. This bill and this debate is very important to many people in this country. It is a credit to this House that we have come to this point with this bill.

We have come to this point not without some work. The Prime Minister had promised this legislation some five years ago and we are finally just about there.

During discussion in committee, we pursued a number of the different clauses of the bill and questioned the minister who appeared on a number of occasions, and we thank him for that. We asked him if there was going to be more. This was housekeeping legislation, the government said, it was basically administrative in nature. Members on our side presented a number of amendments and, to use the words of one of the members, the government liked the flavour of our amendments but chose at this time not to adopt those amendments or to support all of the amendments that we put forward.

You may not be aware, Mr. Speaker, that there have been discussions and the standing committee on forestry may be approaching yourself, Your Honour, and the important committees that decide these things to review the mandate of the department to talk to Canadians about forestry issues. Let us do that, and when we do and we hear from Canadians, let us be prepared. Let us get the commitment from the Prime Minister to enhance and strengthen the minister of forests' hand as is needed so that he can ensure that Canadians know that our forests, our national heritage if you like, are being well protected.

Just before I go into a couple of points specifically on the legislation, I want to read from a couple of letters from some of the people to whom I wrote and have been keeping up to date on the progress of this legislation. Let us hear what they had to say.

I am particularly pleased, for example, with a letter from the IWA of Canada which recently passed a new environmental policy. The IWA is aware of the importance of forests, not just for jobs but also with regard to the role that forests play in the environment and in our recreation. The letter is from Ms. Claire Dansereau, their environmental planner, commenting about our proposal for an annual forest ministers' conference and also for a conference every five years of the first ministers so that they can talk about our number one resource in this country.

They also supported our recommendation for a forest trade commissioner so that we would not get into the bind that this government has us in with the memorandum of understanding on the softwood lumber tariff. I will comment on that a little later.

All of the Canadians we know who live in our ridings and our communities talk to us about their jobs and the forests. They talk about the debate in the newspapers and on the radio and TV between environmentalists and the loggers, and ask how we are going to resolve this. They ask are we going to be able to use some of the responsible suggestions such as the one put forward by the leader of our provincial party, Mr. Harcourt, who has proposed a sustainable development policy so we can resolve those disputes.

I just want to read into the record a letter from Colin and Nelia Barnfield from Victoria. I extend my thanks to the member for Victoria who assisted here on Friday in the report stage of this bill. The letter states in part, "In order to be truly effective, we believe that a federal Department of Forestry should have the authority to stipulate precise management procedures for the sustainable development of the forests and lands over which it has jurisdiction and to be required to take appropriate legal action against any party which fails to follow these management procedures."

I know my friends in the Liberal party will support that because we have talked about it in committee. I know that when we get into the debate about our forest resource development agreements and how important they are to the replanting of our harvested lands, the intensive silviculture that has to take place, we will see that those standards are in place.

I am pleased that we did have an opportunity to present some amendments to this legislation that received the support of all parties and were passed. One that I am particularly proud of was the amendment I proposed that strengthens the minister's hand when it comes to the development of a public awareness program as it relates to our forests.

I think the polls are showing now that Canadians are aware more than ever of the importance of our environment. Of course, that goes hand in glove with the importance of our forests.

I suggest that we do not need a public awareness program that basically pats us on the back, that is just more rhetoric or pits the loggers against the environmentalists. I know the minister will certainly pay heed to a public awareness program—a national education program perhaps—that ensures all components of forests are considered when developing this awareness, most importantly for our young people.

I am also pleased with the amendment to clause 10 to the annual report provisions. When this legislation was first introduced in the House one of the first comments I made was that an annual report to Parliament should be an important event. It should not just go into the pile that ends up in the recycling bin. The filing of an annual report by the minister of forests should be an important event in this Chamber and give us the opportunity to debate some of the expanded areas that our amendment proposed. We talked about the need to have information, but it should not be restricted to information on forest employment, which is often forgotten, as well as an inventory of Canada's forest lands.

In British Columbia we are talking about most of our province where we do not even know what is out there in our forested land. An inventory has not been done for 20 years. Our Ministry of Forests in British Columbia does not know what there is to cut out there. So that inventory is critical. It is important that we hear about that in this House.

A survey of the environmental standards should be applied by the forestry industry. All we have to do is to have watched the news last night and the headlines today. "Ottawa Condemns Alberta Pulp Mill Proposal". If this government and the provinces got their act together, then we might not run into this situation where we have projects proceeding. The federal official quoted in this article suggested that, "We"—meaning the federal government—"could not stop the project". This is a pulp mill proposal. We know the haste with which the provincial government in Alberta is proceeding on this matter. He stated that they could not stop the project from being built, but once built we could shut it down if it contravenes federal regulations.

If that is not an indication of the problem that we have with this government's inaction in putting together an environmental assessment procedure that is fair, that works with the provinces, industry and all concerned people, we are going to have ridiculous situations like this. We are going to continue to have these federal-provincial conflicts.

I should comment, while discussing the inventory of our old growth forests in our province and some of the new species that are becoming valuable as a resource now, that today there was a cabinet shuffle in our province and a new minister of forests was appointed. My colleagues from British Columbia would probably agree with me that anybody would be better than the last one. The last minister, frankly, was giving forestry a bad name. It is early, of course, to judge the new minister.

The message I have for the federal minister is that as quickly as possible he should meet with the new provincial forest minister to ensure that especially the discussions and the negotiations, whatever have been taking place on the Forest Resource Development Agreement with B.C., get under way immediately.

One of the provisions in the legislation that gives the minister some authority to do some work—and this is a proposal I have that I think I would like the minister to consider—has to do with a lot of the resource use conflicts that we are hearing about. I think there is a certain degree of frustration, if you like, on the companies' part, on the part of people who work in the woods, the environmentalists, those concerned with native land claims, and, frankly, with the provincial governments. I am referring to the clause in the legislation where the minister is able to appoint committees.

It is my suggestion that he consider as one of the first actions to take a measure to appoint a committee upon the voluntary referral from any of the interested groups in these resource conflict areas that they sit and consider, collect and collate much of the federal information that is available from the federal government, its expertise in the forest research area and the economic development areas and, of course, the work that we hope is being done to settle land claims. I suggest we attempt to provide some outlet, if you like, for the frustration that I know is out there.

I think this would be a way for the federal minister to show his concern in this field and to give us an opportunity to work with those interested groups to ensure that these resource conflicts are resolved. We are respectful of provincial jurisdiction, but I think it is important, as the Minister of the Environment here has already offered to the province of B.C., to have assistance and research in the old growth when it relates to the Carmanah Valley. That is the kind of co-ordination I think we need.

I have not heard much yet about the department's work in single industry towns. My brief message there is to the minister and his department. Let us not just restrict it to sitting down and going through a few Statistics Canada reports and regurgitating information that has already been there. Let us get a chance to go and talk to some of these communities that are suffering now from a lack of wood supply. There are a number of mills in my home town that are suffering now. I would ask the minister and the government to consider much more seriously some of the work in the single industry towns, a section of the Estimates that they have mentioned.

A lot of these communities are suffering. I was lucky to be in northern Ontario just a short time ago, in Thunder Bay and Kenora, where we talked about the forestry issues there and, in particular, the memorandum of understanding, the softwood lumber tariff and, of course, how this government sold out Canada's forests with that deal. As I said before, I hope Pat Carney is listening today because her government sold it out, with the help of the Prime Minister who said it was a good deal for Canada.

His own minister now recognizes, some couple of years later, that maybe we made a mistake. We are going to revisit the issue with the United States. I said: "It is about time". I said it in stronger words than that, but the editors at The Toronto Star edited out a few of the words. It is about time this government paid attention to the issue that the memorandum of understanding and that tariff is causing us.

In our province alone, the reporter mentions British Columbia accordingly jacked up its stumpage rates.

I managed to do a bit of research this morning with my colleague, the provincial member from Prince Rupert, Dan Miller, our provincial forest critic, to talk about what this has meant in B.C.

What has it meant in my part of the province? From the information I have prepared, basically because of the effect of the MOU by this government and by that crazy government in British Columbia, we have seen stumpage rate increases in northern Ontario of over 56 per cent. There is no flexibility built in. It is a hard and fast method. Obviously the social credit government and the Conservative government are in collusion on this. It is obviously one of the first issues that the federal minister should deal with, in consultation with the new minister. Let's get a move on. It has been too slow already.

The forest resource development agreements are dealt with in the legislation. We have spent a good amount of time in committee and in this House debating those agreements. The reason we are doing that is because they play such an important role for the federal government and the provincial governments to get together and help manage our resources.

This government has allowed these agreements to expire; six of them expired at the end of March. The minister is making his way along. We learn a little bit here and a little bit there about what the criteria is going to be. Who knows if this government really knows exactly what it is doing. The provinces, at least in western Canada, have identified some $400 million of their needs for forests. Yet we hear from this government that there might be $242 million available for all sectors, for all provinces.

I remind the minister that when he was on this side, as reported in the April 18, 1984 Hansard, of a question he put to the then Minister of the Environment. Of course the Liberals at the time were not sure just what to do with the minister of forests. At least the government across the way has agreed to create a full department of forests, not like the Liberals whose leader came to Prince George in the 1984 campaign and opposed a full department of forests.

The current minister, in a question to the then Minister of the Environment asked: "Is it really because the minister does not have the money to take to the bargaining table?" Well, I think the same comment could apply today. I think the minister responsible for western diversification who was here earlier will have to be held accountable sooner or later for the lack of help to our forests in western Canada.

In the few minutes I have left I want to wrap up about the importance of forestry to this country and to all members of Parliament, whether we are from urban or rural ridings. It is the minister of forests who should be the minister for sustainable development. Let us get his annual report on recycled paper. He should be the number one environmental department. As he says, the trees are the lungs of the earth. Well, our lungs work too.

The point I am making is that people have a livelihood from our forests and this minister should be responsible for that. He should be given the resources for that and the strength to do that.

In closing, I just want to say as a member of the committee I know that we are all sincere in our debate on this matter. I want to wish the staff of the new department well, because often they are the ones who do a lot of the work. I want to wish the minister well—not a lot—and we will see them all in committee.

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and comment on my colleague's address to this motion. I know that my colleague from Prince George—Bulkley Valley was responsible for the amendment to a motion increasing the public information component to this ministry.

As a member of the environment committee of this House I think it is crucial that there is more public information. We have heard very worrisome testimony in the environment committee about the kind of degradation of the forests and the relationship of that to the global warming, the phenomenon that is threatening us all.

I have a question for my colleague. The new minister of forests I trust will actually be the minister for sustainable development, particularly for the resource provinces like British Columbia from which we both come. How does he feel that that is actually going to be realized with this new ministry of forests?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend and colleague from Saanich—Gulf Islands who I know from our discussions has a great deal of concern over forests not only in the country and internationally but also in her own riding.

The first way to get that awareness out there, one simple way, is through the minister's annual report. It should be on recycled paper. It should be made available to schools across this country and to as many people as possible so that they can see what is taking place across the country.

He should sit down with his provincial forest ministers and provincial education ministers to see that the informational material on our forests is available to our schools. Even Adam Zimmerman thinks that we should get together and find that common data base so that we know what we are dealing with.

If we do not get that information to young people I think we may be doomed. I thank the member for her concerns in this regard. It is an excellent point. The way to hold the government accountable is in this Chamber and in the forestry committee where we will see that he gets the work done we want done.

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my words of praise to the work that the hon. member has done on this particular bill. I think he has done an excellent job of alerting the forestry community, certainly in western Canada and even in my province where I do not think he has even visited the forests. However his name is certainly known there for the good work that he has done on this legislation.

I had the opportunity to work with the member on a proposal to the minister calling for the creation of community conservation brigades which would be groups of young people. We had proposed 12,000 from Canada who would be taken on as conservation brigades to fight fires, to plant trees and so on in the forested communities of the country.

I would just like the hon. member to comment on what prospects he might see for that kind of initiative being adopted.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I too want to thank the member for Prince Albert—Churchill River. He is right, I have not visited his province yet. I hope to do that soon. I fly over it on the way home, so I have seen the big picture from time to time.

The member is right. He presented an excellent idea to the minister and to provincial ministers. We have received some favourable comment from some of the provincial ministers. I believe even the federal minister gave a little bit of a nudge and a wink in that direction.

As we work in developing these forest resource development agreements, I think that is a method and a way to deal with it. When the legislation is passed, it gives the minister the mandate to get on with the job. If he likes the idea, let us work together. I cannot think of a better way to do the public awareness that the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands talked about than through a conservation program that works with young people.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure and pride that I have participated in the debate on Bill C–29. I wish to take this opportunity to thank all individuals who participated in the process for their valuable contributions. I wish to congratulate the opposition for its fine performance.

I would especially like to highlight the important contribution of my colleague, the hon. member for Cochrane—Superior, his very valuable amendments, especially those dealing with the monitoring and promoting of the development and application of forest management codes and standards. I would also like to congratulate the member for Cochrane—Superior for his persistent fight against the 15 per cent export surtax on softwood lumber. My hon. colleague will certainly agree that it is indeed a pleasure to have the opportunity of improving the government's legislation.

• (1720)

Last week, the Minister of State for Forestry expressed his appreciation for the amendment concerning the definition of sustainable development which I proposed during the committee deliberations. I would like to thank the minister for supporting my amendment. I am extremely pleased that he is finally beginning to see things my way.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the definition of this expression in a bill, namely, that sustainable development means meeting the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs, is a very significant step in dealing with the environment. Bill C–29 is the first piece of legislation in Canada to contain this definition.

As you no doubt know, Mr. Speaker, several groups have criticized the federal Government for using an expression that has no current definition and that can easily be misinterpreted. From now on, the Government will no longer be able to bandy this expression around thoughtlessly. Furthermore, my amendment will ensure that the Forestry Minister will play a key role in preserving Canada's precious woodlands.

[English]

The term sustainable development was originally coined in 1987 by the United Nations Royal Commission on Environment and Development chaired by the former Norwegian Prime Minister Dr. Gro Harlem Brundtland. Indeed, the Brundtland report must take a great deal of the credit for the current and apparently high level of public concern about pollution and the global environment.

The report's main recommendation called for the international adoption of the concept of sustainable development, a blend of strong economic growth and environmental regulations aimed at preserving the planet as a hospitable habitat for mankind.

With respect to the forestry sector, the inclusion of a definition of sustainable development in this legislation will ensure that the forestry department will have regard to the conservation and effective management of our country's valuable forests. As the minister said in a CBC interview in Edmonton last week, and I quote: "Forests do more than sustain an industry; they sustain our environment". With that in mind and with a definition in law the foundation has been laid for the effective management and conservation of Canada's forests.

Although the forestry bill has been improved and strengthened by the diligent work of the opposition and the co–operation of the government members of the legislative committee, it still has several shortcomings. During committee deliberations many witnesses testified that the forestry sector was of such vital importance to Canada's economy that it needed a strong department to represent it.

The executive director of the Canadian Forestry Association, Mr. Glen Blouin, stated categorically that the mandate given to the forestry department ought to have been stronger and more all encompassing. "Such a mandate", he said, "would have reflected the significance of the forests to all Canadians in terms of the environment, balance of payments, employment, tourism and recreation".

Unfortunately what we have is a department with little clout. Mr. Blouin asked for the government to give the forestry department control of the vital forest resource development agreements, a mandate to provide leadership in all matters relating to forestry, along with a budget to reflect the importance of this new department. Instead, the department suffered a $28 million cut and a personnel reduction of 47 person–years in the budget tabled last spring.

Moreover, the minister still must run to other government agencies such as the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, western diversification and the Department of Industry, Science and Technology in order to obtain the money to fund forestry agreements with the provinces. Is that what you would call a strong department? Definitely not.

As I said earlier, the creation of a forestry department is of considerable importance in the recognition of the importance of this sector. Unfortunately this bill does not provide the forestry sector the representation it needs. How could it, after all? The government is creating a department, yet it is reducing its resources.

In fact, forestry suffered an 11.9 per cent cut in the 1989–90 budget while all other natural resource based programs received budget increases. For example, the environment department's budget grew by 9.4 per cent. Energy, Mines and Resources received a 22.9 per cent increase. Fisheries and Oceans had its budget raised by 6 per cent, and agriculture received a 21.5 per cent increase.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker: Where is the government's commitment to forestry? It cannot go on setting up a department and then pull the rug out from underneath it. That just does not make sense.

If this new department is going to represent Canada's forestry sector effectively, it must receive a budget increase similar to those received by natural resource based programs.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, during the deliberations of the legislative committee on this Bill, the executive director of the Canadian Institute of Forestry, Mr. Jim Cayford, also said that the Government does not specify the new department's role clearly enough. He stated that the new department should have national responsibility, in that it should play a leading role in forestry, promote research and technology transfer, conclude federal-provincial agreements on forestry resource use, compile data on forest resources, conduct studies on the industry, marketing, trade and forestry economics, promote international forestry relations; set up programs concerning human resources management, employment and education; and, finally, make the public fully aware of this new project.

Talk about a tall order! However the new department will never be able to assume the leadership role described by Mr. Cayford unless its budget is geared to that kind of challenge.

The Minister told us that forests are among the priorities of his government, yet the only natural resources component has been downgraded. Why such disparity? Why would the government claim it will do more for the forest sector when in fact it will be doing less?

Our forests deserve better treatment. To a large extent, our country's growth can be traced back to this sector. It has been the foundation of our economy. Today still the forest industry remains one of the cornerstones of this nation. Nobody should underestimate the significance of the forest sector in our economy: Canada has 4.31 million square kilometres of forest, or about 176 square metres of forest for each of our 25 million inhabitants.

Close to 300,000 people earn their living directly in the forest sector, and it provides indirect work for about 750,000 other Canadians, including railway workers, truck drivers and heavy equipment operators in related fields.

Last year, productive forests made it possible for us to ship in excess of $30 billion worth of goods. One seventh of manufacturing revenues comes from a forest-related sector, and our forests account for more than $17 billion of Canada's net trade balance, more than agriculture, fisheries and mines put together.

Mr. Speaker, the great importance of the forestry industry for the Canadian economy requires much government leadership so that the Government can promote and enhance the health and viability of this sector. However, this Bill gives no weight or importance to the Department of Forestry, since it will have to obtain funds for forestry development agreements from other departments and agencies of the federal Government.

The federal-provincial forestry agreements with Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta expired on March 30. In addition, the agreements with Newfoundland, Québec and British Columbia will lapse next March 30.

It is inconceivable for a government that says it supports the forestry sector to allow such a situation to occur. To date, these agreements have not been renegotiated. The Government must rectify this situation, because these agreements are vital for the future of Canada's forests.

• (1730)

Federal-provincial forestry agreements have provided over $1.1 billion for reforestation and management since 1985. More than 50 per cent of these funds come from the federal Government. These agreements will encourage increased forest management activities by providing funds for ground preparation, tree-planting and plantation maintenance.

[English]

The Canadian Council of Forest Ministers issued a document in 1987 entitled "A National Forest Sector Strategy for Canada", calling on the federal government to improve and continue the forestry agreements. The federal government must take the upper hand in order to ensure that forest resource development becomes the cornerstone of Canada's forestry industry.

Although this bill as amended and reprinted, following the recommendations of the opposition, is much improved, it still provides the minister with responsibilities for the forestry agreements. Indeed, the minister's commitment to the agreements is somewhat shaky. When he appeared before the legislative committee, he expressed his reservations with respect to the forestry agreements. He said that whether or not the federal role in the forestry sector is best served by the agreements is an open question. He also said that the forestry agreements were, in his view, not the most effective way to manage the resource.

The Canadian Institute of Forestry has said that forest renewal must remain the essential element in future agreements, and that the agreements were very crucial to the future of the industry. Moreover, the Canadian Forestry Association has also said that the agreements are critical to the future of forestry in Canada.

How can a minister deny the importance of these agreements, while everybody agrees that they are extremely important? Does the minister know something we do not? If that is the case, I would appreciate him sharing that information with us.

The necessity of these agreements becomes even more clear when considering that world consumption of forest products is expected to increase substantially within the next 20 years. Without sound agreements to ensure the future of Canada's wood supply, there is no way that this country will be able to meet the demands of the future. Is that what the minister means by sustainable development?

It is very interesting to note that a study which was commissioned by the Canadian Forestry Service, the Woodbridge-Reed report, neither addressed the environmental ramifications of forestry practices in Canada nor the urgent necessity of implementing adequate reforestation. All this study mentioned was that the forestry industry's output would increase over the next 20 years. Without adequate reforestation and without a continued commitment from this government to forestry agreements there will, quite simply, be no usable wood supply left in the next 20 years.

Why is the government establishing a forestry department? More importantly, is this government not taking the future of Canada's forestry sector seriously? Canada's forestry sector needs to be improved if it is to remain competitive with the rest of the world.

The 1988 Auditor General's report stated that three considerations directly affect decisions involving investment in reforestation. First, the vastness and great dispersal of the forest demand necessitates large expenditures for forest management. Second, federal investment in forestry usually also involves the provinces. Third, the growing cycle for mature forests involves a time span of between 40 to 80 years.

If the government claims that it wants to take the lead in the forestry sector, then its decision to manage and invest in forestry must reflect a commitment to a long-term view of the resource. The only way it can do this is to provide the minister with the responsibility for the forestry agreements. It must renew its commitments to these forestry agreements.

In conclusion, I would like to say that although we of the Liberal party support the principle of a full-fledged forestry department and agree that Bill C-29, as it now stands, is much improved because of the interventions of the opposition, we are duty bound to express many reservations which we have in regard to this legislation. The government is not out of the words with this one yet. It has voiced its commitment to the forestry sector. It has set up the department, although it has actually reduced its resources. It must now provide the strong leadership needed to ensure the health of this sector.

The opposition will be diligent and unrelenting in its endeavours to ensure that the government will give forestry the support which it needs and that it will live up to its commitments.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely happy to have a chance to speak on this bill. I had hoped to be able to speak on second reading, but it ended fairly abruptly last week. It was with some pleasure that I realized I would have a chance to express a Saskatchewan perspective on the question of forestry.

It may come as a surprise to many members of this House and the people of Canada, if like my esteemed colleague from Prince George—Bulkley Valley, they have not visited the forests of Saskatchewan or flown over or driven through southern Saskatchewan, have the perception that there is not a tree in Saskatchewan. I know there are trees in Saskatchewan. I have planted about 2,000 of them on my farm. My family now has to look after those trees and they know that there are trees, at least on that patch of ground.

It is a little recognized fact, and one of the problems that the Saskatchewan forest industry faces, that 46 per cent of the land area of the province of Saskatchewan is in forests and 20 per cent of that is commercial forests. If you contrast that with 40 per cent in agriculture you realize that the commercial forests are half the size of the agricultural portion of Saskatchewan.

In my constituency of Prince Albert—Churchill River, 90 per cent is forested. It is a major issue in half of the geographic area of Saskatchewan. Through the years, it has been very difficult for that fact to be recognized, especially in our own province. Forestry is the second leading industry in Saskatchewan; 10 per cent of the gross provincial product comes from the forestry sector, both direct and indirect. In 1985, $290 million and probably more now, of income to the province was generated by the forests. As well, 8,000 people are employed in the forestry sector.

What happens in forestry is very important to the people of Saskatchewan, although it admittedly has not been a leading player in the forestry scene in Canada historically. Since agriculture is so dominant in Saskatchewan, that tends to be the leading economic debate. The population of the forested areas is sparse, therefore it does not have the numerical or political representation on the federal scene. It is a mere 6 per cent of the forests of Canada, and although it is a very significant land area and income generator that often does not get recognized.

It was, however, recognized by my predecessor, a former member for Prince Albert, the Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker, who took a major initiative in this country by bring in the ARDA program in the late 1950s as an attempt to bring to life the economy of those communities that relied both on agriculture and forestry. That was a pioneering step, one which we should re-examine and perhaps consider reintroducing. In the context of the new department, some of those ideas might well be brought back.

I personally became involved with the forestry sector in Saskatchewan in 1982 when there was a major forestry congress in Saskatchewan. It was a very successful congress. The Saskatchewan Forestry Association, the industry and the unions, the IWA, the CPU, felt it was time that we as a sector in Saskatchewan took a hold of the situation, put our views on the record, analyzed what we had, and charted a common game plan.

At that time, the first round of FRDA agreements were in the process of negotiation and a large part of our intent was to create some kind of vehicle for input into that process. It turned out very well. The awareness within the province jumped to another level. Coupled with the activities that occurred as a result of that FRDA agreement, in many ways forestry has experienced its best seven years in the history in our province.

I would very much like to second the motion of my colleague for Prince George—Bulkley Valley that public information be a significant portion of the new department. It was an amendment that was adopted. I think activities like the forestry congress to launch the new FRDAs—and hopefully there are FRDAs—or to acquaint people with the activities of this department might well be a route to go. A congress like that every five years or so in every province is an excellent way to get the sector in thinking on the same wavelength.

FRDA had a funding level of $28 million, $14 million from the federal government, $14 million from the provincial government. It did some significant things. In firefighting, it allowed the development of a computer and a detection system that Saskatchewan did not have before. They purchased inventory and new equipment, trained people, and so on.

I have to confess that when the Auditor General said some provinces skimmed the FRDAs to carry on activities they should have been doing anyway, I thought that that applied in Saskatchewan, especially with reforestation. In 1982 the Devine government gutted the reforestation program. I know that because I live two miles from the forest nursery where they were burning trees and little seedlings because they did not have the money to plant them. Nevertheless, through this FRDA agreement, we are back up to the 10 million seedlings a year level. We need 20 to 25 million, however, to catch up on the backlog, because only half of our annual harvest is being reforested.

Also we started some initiatives in Indian forestry. A good portion of the land area in commercial forestry is either now on Indian reserves or potentially so if the claims are settled. As well, the Indian communities that are not reserve communities obtained some benefit from the fact that the Indian forestry was recognized as a sector with a training institute. Farm woodlots were also introduced, going back to the old ARDA idea.

The most critical aspect was the introduction of technical expertise to the province which we never had because we were a small industry. We did not have the personnel in many of the technical areas. FRDA brought together a critical mass of expertise that has been of tremendous benefit not only to the public sector of the communities, but to the private sector and the province as well.

We were disappointed when that did not come through. We were disappointed when we saw that there was only 28 per cent of the money available under the new regional development agreement in western Canada compared to what it was under the old ones, $242 million instead of $870 million. If that equation, 28 per cent, applies to the new FRDA in Saskatchewan, that would be a $4 million agreement, which would really be a pittance.

However, I have made representations to the minister of WDO. Somebody criticized the current structure, saying the ministry of forestry has to run all over to get its money. I think that is a valid critique, not to diminish the role of the minister of WDO, but it would be nice if forestry had its own money here. I have indicated to that minister that the two main priorities under the new ERDA agreements, or children of ERDA, need to focus, first of all, on renewable resource sectors with forestry as the leading renewable resource sector. Second, we need the the development of organizational capacity at the community levels so that people can organize businesses and contracts to take advantage of opportunities and create opportunities for small businesses that utilize wood products. Third, we need to retain that expertise in the province that is so critical. We cannot do with any less. Even in that context we are happy that there is a department at least to relate to, and to start focusing some of that thinking.

Hopefully it will give some focus to the whole notion of sustainable development and the very critical role that the forest areas play in that. The vast majority of the land mass of the country is forested. How we treat that land mass is a very critical part of any attempt on our part to control climate change and to do our part to stop soil erosion. I think we have a real opportunity there.

Although we are supporting this legislation, perhaps we could offer some words of criticism with regard to the government's fundamental direction as is indicated here. The government ran on a platform, until it got sidetracked by free trade, of managing change. That is a very legitimate challenge for any government to take up. But I do not think, in all honesty, that this challenge is being met, certainly not in respect to the forest when only half of the reforestation is taking place that should be. Also, there is over-investment in capital in many cases for pulp mills. There has been huge private capital investment in plant and equipment that will not have the forest to process, or the wood product to process in a very few years. There has been a misdirection of resources. No matter what is the ideology of the government in something like forestry, it is its responsibility to make sure the investment is made in the right places. With all due respect, I do not think that this bill reflects the fact that the government realizes that.

There has not been nearly enough emphasis placed on benefiting the people who live in the forest, the communities of the forest. That is not only their physical environment, but their economic environment. I think that has often been lost.

In that context, I would like to mention that it has become widely noted that the hinterlands of Canada, the resource producing areas are being ignored. Even Ma- clean's magazine saw fit to devote a cover story to the fact that the resource producing areas of this country, the hinterlands, and the people who do not live in big cities, are being ignored by this government. That is partly the result of 85 per cent of the land mass being represented by the opposition, and only 15 per cent by the government. It is starting to be reflected in the policies of the government.

For example, when one considers changes to the UI, increasing rates on fly-in food by 30 per cent, charging people $16,000 to $20,000 to get a private line phone, taking away the northern allowance, and what is happening to agriculture which often interrelates on the fringes of forestry, the communities of the forests are really hurting, in many cases, as a result of government policy. If there needs to be money invested, it would be best if it came from the people who actually lived there, but because of many of the government's actions they are not having the opportunity to do that.

In closing, I do appreciate the fact that we now have a department. I would again like to put on the record that the resources are woefully inadequate and that the forestry community, both the professional as well as the community at large are very disappointed. It has not been seen as a victory by people who are interested in the forests. It points out again that what this government has is not so much an image problem as a substance problem. This sums up as well as anything that all too many times we are getting an awful lot more image than we are substance. I challenge the government to take that into account as the process of evolving this department into full reality takes place.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Prince George—Buckley Valley on a question or comment.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciated the contribution the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River made to the debate on this legislation. I know his concern for his riding and his province with regard to forestry. We have had many discussions on this topic. I take up his offer to visit Saskatchewan sometime rather than just flying over the province and get a chance to see some of those forests first hand and maybe even the nursery near where he lives. The hon. member is shaking his head in agreement, I am glad for that.

The member raised a question, and I am pleased to see that the minister responsible for western diversification is actually in the chamber right at the moment. The member mentioned that from what we have been able to glean so far, there appears to be a lack of funds available not only to forestry but other sectors in western Canada, as well as the funds that have to be shared with the provinces. The part of this that we often forget is the role that the provinces have in designing their priorities so that when they sit down with the federal minister, or federal counterpart, that they can work out some kind of priority listing. In B.C. we have already talked about our new forest minister and our hope that the federal minister and the new provincial minister will get together quickly.

I am interested in knowing if the Saskatchewan government puts a high priority on forestry. Do they see it as a sunset industry like some provinces do, as many Conservative provinces have, or are we looking at a government that is going to try and use this federal money to win a few more seats or buy off a few more people? Does the Devine government really care about forestry?

Mr. Funk: There is quite a difference between what one hears and what one sees. One hears a fair bit from the provincial government about its commitment to forestry, but really it has pretty much been restricted to helping companies like Weyerhaeuser which has turned out to be not a bad corporate citizen. Nevertheless, the energy has gone toward helping the corporate sector gain greater control of the forestry industry, with some modernization. They have really neglected reforestation, the community end, and the training end. In fact, what they have done has often been, quite frankly, at the expense of the forestry agreement. It was money they should have been spending anyway. In fact, covered under the agreement I think that it is a legitimate critique.

I might also reiterate that it is part of the problem of the Minister of Forestry having to go all over the place for money. For example, in the conservation brigades which we suggested, I thought it was a great idea to hire and train 1,000 young people in Saskatchewan in a constituency where $35 million a year is paid out in welfare. Approximately the same amount is paid out in unemployment insurance. We had fires burning out of control, and half the forests that should be replanted not being replanted. I thought devoting $6 million in Saskatchewan, a federal contribution, putting 1,000 young people to work accomplishing those tasks would surely be a good use of money. I think the government should have spent money on that, but as is so often the case everybody said it was a good idea but bureaucratically impossible.

We have to use this department. We have to give it enough authority to make sure that we can shake some of those bureaucratic trees so that what actually makes sense actually gets done.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, may I thank the members of the House for their co–operation. We have no further business to call at this time so I would call it six o'clock.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on that statement. I think the government realizes today that with co–operation, understanding, and good relations the House deals quickly and efficiently with subject matters.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 6 p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

ORDER IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF APPOINTMENTS AND REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1).

MEMBER OF THE SENATE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have circulated a motion to all sides of the House, a motion which in essence would be calling Senator Cogger to attend the bar of the House.

I simply want to say that since this session began in April there have been approximately 70 motions that have passed during routine proceedings without proper notice being given, based on unanimous consent and without debate.

I think we would agree that consent is given on dozens of occasions in any month to suspend rules of the House in order to let bills receive report and third reading on the same day, to dispense with the bells for votes and to apply votes. I think it is fair to say that hundreds of times the opposition parties have been asked for unanimous consent. We have always given it because we recognize that consent is appropriate in providing good government and for the effective and efficient business of the House. We realize that this place only works as a result of co-operation on all sides.

I think it is appropriate that I ask today—and this is the first time in 10 years that I have asked for unanimous consent—to present a motion and to pass it without debate. I do not want to take up important time of the House. I do not want to disrupt any aspect of routine proceedings. We are anxious to get on with the debate of the day.

I am asking my colleagues in both the official opposition and as the government to provide unanimous support to allow this motion to be put without debate.

• (1110)

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. House leader for the New Democratic Party for having given me a copy of the motion that he is now putting before the House.

I was interested in his comments about unanimous consent in this House. He is quite correct in saying that we are always happy when the House can work on a basis of mutual co-operation and discussion. I want to stop a second and say that I was interested in his remark that we always have given unanimous consent. I think perhaps the member was caught up in his own enthusiasm because there has been so much good co-operation. I do not think we always give unanimous consent, neither within his party, the official opposition, nor within the government. We like as much as possible to co-operate, but that is a bit of an ideal world.

To get to the motion itself, I think for such motions there has been a procedure that is more or less laid out. I am referring to Chapter 15, "Standing, Special and Joint Committees" of Beauchesne's, Fifth Edition, that seems to indicate that the normal procedure for attaining the goal that the member proposes today be first and foremost that a request be made to the person who the member would like to call, and that procedure should be followed.

I think in this circumstance the government cannot see anything exceptional happening which would not require that we go through that normal procedure before coming to this exceptional measure of asking the House for unanimous consent.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the advice from my colleague. I listened yesterday to suggestions from the Solicitor General and also the minister responsible for the Federal Business Development Bank that questions regarding Senator Cogger ought to be raised in the other place. This makes it difficult for us in the New Democratic Party. I suppose it makes it impossible to raise it in the other place because we do not have members in the other place—not that we want members in the other place. The reality is we are not there.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, with your indulgence, if I could ask for clarification from my hon. colleague. From what I can gather he supports in principle this idea, but had a further suggestion on a more appropriate way to proceed in order to have Senator Cogger appear before the House. I must admit I did not follow him carefully.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has raised the suggestion that there may be another way to do this, if in fact it was the disposition of the House to do it. I think I should advise members that certainly the past practice has always been that in a circumstance like this a request is sent by the House to the Senate prior to moving on a motion which is the same as the one that has been proposed by the hon. member for Kamloops. I am just bringing that to members' attention because I think the Chair might have to intervene on this.

Mr. Charest: If I understood you correctly, Mr. Speaker, I think you and I, with all respect, are more or less indicating the same thing. The procedure that would be normally followed by the hon. member if he wishes to have somebody in that person's capacity as a senator to come before the House would require that the request be sent to that person.

What I am saying today is that on procedural grounds I think the motion put forward by the member is a bit premature, that he should first go through what has been established in the past as being the procedure that should be followed in such circumstances and then come before the House again if he feels he has not been successful in that procedure.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should clarify the situation. The notice of motion which the hon. member for Kamloops put on the Order Paper is asking the House for an order that a certain Senator attend at the bar of this House. The request the hon. member for Kamloops has now put to the House concerns another motion which has been distributed to hon. members, which reads:

> That a message be sent to the Senate requesting than an Order of the Senate be issued for Senator Michel Cogger to attend at the bar of the House for the purpose of providing information concerning the receipt of public moneys by any firms with which he has been associated.

As I understand it procedurally we are now in the position where the Hon. Member for Kamloops is asking if the House would consent to this order without debate at this time. Am I correct?

Mr. Riis: Yes, that is correct, Mr. Speaker. I say with all due respect to my colleagues that this is a common practice in the House. For many months and years we have been providing, on most occasions, unanimous consent to permit the government to initiate motions of one kind or another without the proper notice. I recognize, as you have pointed out, Sir, that I have not given adequate notice and have changed what is on the Order Paper. For that reason I am seeking unanimous consent, without debate. As I have indicated, I have no intention of stopping the procedure of the day in terms of dealing with the orders of the day.

I seek unanimous consent to move this motion without debate and hopefully have it passed.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for Kamloops for making the situation completely clear.

The position that the House is in now is that on the proposition put forward by the Hon. Member for Kamloops the question is: Is there consent? I will hear the minister on that narrow point.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, to respond to my hon. colleague on the question of what usually constitutes an issue of consent, I think the House knows there is consent to matters that refer to procedures within the House and things that come under the jurisdiction of the House. We may find as we look at the motion before us now that it refers not to something that relates directly to the day-to-day operations of the House for which there is, as my hon. colleague points out correctly, many instances when there is co-operation and consent. For that reason, as I have mentioned before, because there may be other procedures that normally would be followed I do not think you will find the government would be willing to go along with my hon. colleague's proposal.

Mr. Speaker: The situation now is that the Hon. Member for Kamloops has put forward a motion and is asking the consent of the House to send a message to the Senate with respect to bringing a senator before the bar of this House. That would, if it was to pass today, require consent. The government has indicated that it is not prepared to give consent. I point out to the Hon. Member from Kamloops that that of course does not in any way impede the hon. member from bringing the matter in another way on another day.

PETITIONS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty to table several petitions relating to the Conservative government's proposal to impose upon Canadians a goods and services tax starting January 1, 1991.

These petitioners, and there are several hundred, maintain that this new imposition of additional taxes after having been subjected to 31 new taxes and tax increases since this government took office in 1984 would be really unjust and unfair to many Canadians and would put a severe hardship on low and middle-income Canadians. Also, it would impose on small business an onerous burden in administrative costs. To the objective that they would like to reach with this government to withdraw this proposal, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition here signed by a large number of people from the Pembroke, Petawawa, Deep River, and the Cobden area. They are very concerned about the 9 per cent goods and services tax that this government is planning to lay on the people of Canada.

They point out that there have already been 31 new tax increases since this government took power in 1984. They also recognize that the Conservative Government has increased the manufacturers' sales tax from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent in recent years.

They feel that this 9 per cent goods and services tax which will be levied on all goods will be very detrimental to average and low-income Canadians out there. They request that the government withdraw this plan, go back to the drawing-board and come up with a tax that is fair to all Canadians.

The petitioners are absolutely opposed to any 9 per cent goods and services tax because of its unfairness and also because of the inability to apply it fairly.

VIA RAIL

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to table a petition that has been certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions. I present this petition on behalf of the residents of Thunder Bay, Ontario, who call upon the Government of Canada not to cancel in whole or in part passenger rail services in Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thrilled): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions today. It is particularly apropos that the Minister of Employment and Immigration be here because I wish to table a petition on behalf of the thousands of workers in my riding who are worried about the proposed changes to the unemployment insurance program. You, Mr. Speaker, are aware that today we are to have third reading on that bill.

The petitioners urge the Canadian Government to rescind its decision to withdraw its contribution of $2.9 billion to the UIC fund. In so doing the petitioners also wish to remind the government of a prior promise made to Canadians that social programs would not be cut.

WELLAND CANAL LANDS

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorald): Mr. Speaker, the second petition has to do with the Welland Canal lands. I have the honour to table a petition presented to me by Mayor Roland Hardy of Welland on behalf of thousands of my constituents who are concerned about the future use of the Welland Canal lands.

The petitioners urge the Canadian Government through the Ministry of Public Works to retain the Welland Canal lands as a major heritage and tourism resource for the benefit of the people of the immediate area, and also for all Canadians who would be interested in enjoying this enclave of natural beauty.

It should be noted that Mr. Terry Hughes of Welland, Ontario, co-ordinated many different groups to gather these signatures. I reiterate my own personal belief that not one square inch of the canal lands should be sold.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition with 33 names asking this Parliament to enact legislation which would effectively protect the life of the pre-born child without distinction as to the stage of development. These 33 names represent people from my constituency.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 which has been certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions. This petition is from a number of western Canadians who are very concerned about the government's intention to impose taxes on a whole range of goods and services that are presently not taxed by the federal government in terms of the sales tax. They point out that any tax that would tax children's clothing, story books, skating, music lessons and so on has to be inappropriate.

They are calling upon Parliament simply to encourage the government to stop proceeding with the goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on another matter, unrelated, but again very important, petitioners from western Canada are concerned about the government's intention to cut VIA Rail service. They go on at some length in a very elaborate and thoughtful petition pointing out that passenger rail service is the most environmentally sound alternative to move people.

They are asking the government to indicate that if it is concerned about environmental deterioration that it reconsider cutting back on VIA Rail service and actually invest in a modern passenger rail system something which virtually every other western industrialized nation is doing.

OPPOSITION TO OVERFISHING

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to present a petition to the House signed by people in my riding, residents of Saint-Thomas, Cocagne and Cormierville. Your petitioners humbly declare that the sovereignty of Canada has been violated and its resources pillaged by countries engaging in overfishing off our coasts. By doing so, these countries have caused a crisis in the Atlantic fisheries, threatening the livelihood of dozens of communities. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to extend its jurisdiction to include the entire continental shelf, so that Canada can protect the fish resources so vital to communities in Atlantic Canada.

[English]

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege today to present a petition properly certified by the Clerk of Petitions.

The petitioners are residents of the city of Thunder Bay, the area I represent, who strongly oppose and urge this government to reconsider its position with respect to the action they intend to take on VIA Rail services in northern Ontario.

I might say that should the government decide to go ahead with the proposed cuts to VIA Rail—for the first time in over 100 years—people along the north shore of Lake Superior, including Thunder Bay, Nipigon, Red Rock, Ignace, Dryden and Kenora will no longer have passenger rail service available to them.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, once again I have the honour to rise in the House pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of the residents of Thunder Bay. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada to come to its senses and not to cancel in whole or in part the VIA Rail service in Canada.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a number of petitions signed by residents of my own constituency about the proposed goods and services tax. The petitioners claim that the government, and rightly so, has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax while forcing lower and middle-income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of people from Thunder Bay. The petitioners call on the government to maintain and upgrade VIA Rail rather than cutting it.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to present two petitions today. The first petition is on the proposed goods and services tax and has been signed by many residents of southern Ontario, all of them who speak with rage and with anger at the proposed imposition of this goods and services tax.

Many of the people who have signed this petition have joined with other members of the Bowling Proprietors' Association, one of whose members presented 1,100 signatures in my office just the other day.

They wish to point out for all Canadians the wide impact of the negative aspects of the GST, that is, those who engage in an exercise that is both recreational and healthy will not be able to profit from some of the rebates that the government is proposing. There will be some 600 jobs in that industry lost in Ontario alone if this proposal goes through.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is signed by residents of Thunder Bay who are objecting strenuously to the fact that one of the basic infrastructures of this country is being derailed through the cuts to VIA Rail and who now find themselves isolated from all other Canadians.

The petitioners humbly pray and beg this House to engage the minister to reconsider his proposed cuts to VIA Rail.

• (1130)

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36, I would like to table in the House a petition signed by people from Thunder Bay who strenuously object to the dismantling of VIA Rail. Considering that the region of Thunder Bay has enjoyed VIA Rail services for over a century, the dismantling of VIA Rail will not only be disastrous for the region's economy but also for all users of this transportation mode.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on the subject of VIA Rail which has been certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions. The petition calls upon Parliament to maintain VIA Rail in Canada's present national rail network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment, and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

It is one of a long series of petitions, signed by some 55 constituents from the riding of Kootenay West—Revels-toke, including signators from the cities of Rossland, Trail, Nelson and Castlegar, the villages of Fruitvale and Slocan, and the communities of Winlaw and Waneta.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present to the House a petition opposing the government's proposed goods and services tax measures.

These petitions are literally flooding in to all members of the opposition. This particular petition from individuals in Maple Ridge and surrounding areas, and Pitt Meadows in the lower mainland. It asks that the government reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax. It also asks that the government reform the tax system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, and to ensure that if and when there is a broad public consensus on the sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, this reform measure not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab which is just what this proposed goods and services tax is.

It is also my pleasure to provide a similar petition also signed by a number of constituents in the Maple Ridge area again protesting the Draconian measures taken by the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to stand on behalf of several Canadians and present this petition duly submitted under Standing Order 36. These petitioners humbly showeth that the goods and services tax is an unfair tax in that it does not regulate itself on the basis of a taxpayer's ability to pay. They also state that the taxation on reading materials, haircuts, diapers and so on is a regressive, unfair tax, and they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax.

FAMILY VIOLENCE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36, I rise to present a petition on behalf of men and women in my constituency of Mission—Coquitlam. This petition is in response to the statistics that one out of every ten Canadian women is beaten by the man she lives with, one in four is sexually assaulted or abused, and every 17 minutes a Canadian woman is raped.

The petitioners humbly call on this House to provide alternatives to protect women and children from violence by increasing funding for transition houses and advocacy centres, and ensure that women receive greater protection under new laws.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and also my pleasure, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition from a number of residents of British Columbia who are strongly opposed to the goods and services tax because of its lack of regard to the taxpayers' ability to pay. They are asking the government to ensure that if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, this reform not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved that Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, be read the third time and passed.

She said: I am very pleased to begin this final stage of debate on Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. It was last April when I first rose in the House to announce the government's labour force development strategy and our intention to amend the UI act as an integral part of that strategy.

Since then hon. members have spent some considerable time in this House and in committee debating the new directions, the priorities, and the merits of the labour force development strategy.

A legislative committee to consider Bill C-21 was struck and held its first organization meeting in June this year. At the time, opposition Members proposed a travel schedule that was approved without changes by government Members. At the suggestion of the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), the committee did not travel right away but spent two preparatory months getting acquainted with the contents of the Bill and the provisions of the unemployment insurance system, attending talks on the technical aspects and analyzing statistics. During the past two months, the legislative committee spent four very busy weeks collecting evidence and listening to the views of Canadians across the country.

[English]

This bill was subjected to the scrutiny of a large number of people. It was applauded and it was criticized from a wide range of perspectives. The range and diversity of viewpoints reassure me that we have developed a bill that contains just about the right degree of reform.

Prior to introducing the bill in the House, the government had spent a lot of time and energy designing the labour force development strategy and drafting Bill C–21. To assist us in our work, we had the recommendations on labour market adjustment measures and income supporter arrangements from the Macdonald commission, the Forget inquiry, the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration, and the de Grandpré advisory council.

A great deal of study and reflection has gone into these issues in recent years months. It is now time to get on with the passing of Bill C–21 and implementing the results.

[Translation]

The fact that we wanted to pass this legislation and implement its provisions and all the components of the labour force development strategy as soon as possible does not mean that we ignored the critics of this Bill. In this respect, I must say I appreciate the diligence and sense of commitment of the legislative committee, and I would like to thank all its members for accomplishing a difficult task. Thanks to their efforts and those of many Canadians who took the trouble to appear before the committee, we have made a number of major changes in the Bill.

[English]

One of the criticisms, raised a number of times, dealt with the proposal to increase penalties for those who left their jobs voluntarily for no just cause and simply chose not to work. Witnesses who appeared before the legislative committee expressed concerns about the definition of "just cause" and the process for deciding whether a cause is legitimate and is just. Women's groups, in particular, spoke of the problems women face in identifying sexual harassment as a reason for quitting their jobs.

It has been and will continue to be our policy, as a government, to regard sexual harassment as reason for leaving a job. But in response to the concerns expressed, we amended the bill to include a definition of "just cause" for greater certainty. This definition specifies that, among others, sexual harassment is indeed a just cause for leaving a job. It has been worded carefully so as not to result in any loss of flexibility, or in any narrowing of interpretation. At the same time, it provides legislative expression to the protection that women and other UI recipients deserve.

We also listened to hon. members and to the many Canadians who raised objections to the duration of benefits for adoptive parents. I certainly understood their concerns, and we attempted to deal with those with considerable sympathy. I am very pleased, as a result, that the House approved the amendment that we drafted. It will meet the needs of the majority of adoptive parents in a way that conforms with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I also want to draw the attention of the House to two other amendments, first proposed by the hon. member for Ottawa West, and accepted unanimously by the legislative committee. One of the member's amendments will ensure that disabled persons have access to training by providing them with the special facilitative devices they need in order to participate in classroom courses or other activities.

The hon. member's second amendment concerned UI recipients who are offered developmental opportunities, specifically the capitalization of their benefits to establish themselves in self–employment or to move to another location. The amendment will guarantee that these individuals are informed of how this choice may affect their future eligibility for benefits.

The Committee thinks that these proposals are extremely valid, and I agree with it. We on this side of the House are pleased that all the amendments which I just spoke of were made to the Bill. They go a long way to meeting some of the concerns raised about Bill C–21. But, Mr. Speaker, they do not deal with everything.

Opposition Members and many groups who met members of the legislative committee felt that it was not right to finance other training programs and increased special benefits from the unemployment insurance account. Their criticisms were sincere, but the Government does not agree.

As for parental benefits and those for workers aged 65 and over, these significant improvements are really part of a modern unemployment insurance plan.

[English]

With regard to training, we are building on a foundation that is already established. The UI program taxes employed Canadians and employers, so that assistance can be provided to workers who lose their jobs, both with income support and with the opportunity to train for new employment, and to build a more stable future.

As I have said in the past, our workers face many new challenges today. They require new and changing skills, as they go about their job, just on a day–to–day basis. As a result, many unemployed Canadians need more than income assistance. They need training and other types of help in order to find lasting, secure, and satisfying jobs. The government believes, therefore, that UI funds provide an entirely appropriate and practical way of meeting those training needs.

Moreover, this source of funding is entirely consistent with our goal of encouraging the private sector to play a more dominant role in training. In order to pay for these new priorities, the UI program of course must be made more efficient. Having said that, let me state emphatically that the UI program will continue to play a critical role in Canada's social support system. It provides, and it will in future provide income replacement to those who need it. In addition, we will maintain the ability of the UI program to respond to differences in regional labour markets. The new variable entrance requirement will, if anything, make the program more regionally sensitive.

The legislative committee and others who followed the deliberations know that companies, unions and others were unanimous on the need for increased training nationwide.

Mr. Speaker, the Government believes that the business community, labour, non–governmental organizations and community interest groups who provide training should have their say in the design of a new training program as part of the labour force development strategy.

That is why I began a major consultation with the private sector, in particular, with representatives of workers, business, training institutions and others. Their recommendations will help us flesh out the specific measures of the program.

In implementing a labour force development strategy, the Government will fully maintain its commitment to employment equity objectives, that is, ensure that women, native people, members of minority groups and the disabled will be able to benefit from the new opportunities provided in all our programs.

By way of conclusion, the government had to make some very difficult decisions in drafting Bill C–21. The situation that we confront is neither black nor white. It is a question of finding the right mix among measures that result in improvements and those which minimize any potential adverse impacts. We have been very conscious of those difficult realities and we believe that we have achieved the right balance with sensitivity to local and national needs.

I am very anxious to see Bill C–21 passed as it will enable us to launch a major new effort to increase the training of Canada's labour force, and ensure that it has the requisite skills in demand by employers and by those workers themselves. The task before us is primarily one for employers, workers and educators.

Bill C–21 will provide the government with the necessary resources to encourage those groups, our partners, to get on with the job.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I rise, obviously, in opposition to this particular bill, especially after I heard the intervention of the hon. minister. I am not sure that we are talking about the same bill.

I guess I would have to start by contesting some of the affirmations that have been made with such assurance; first of all, that the committee that was studying Bill C–21 had ample time to consider all of the deliberations. It will be instructive for all members of the House to appreciate that the legislative committee was empowered to study this bill only after with the opposition that the committee actually do travel, and in so doing perhaps get a sense of how the government and the country should actually be receiving this Bill C–21. The committee was not empowered to travel until the end of August. After much debate, the committee went to 14 cities in a bare 21 days. It was able to hear 202 briefs, 157 of C–21. If the minister actually did read them, as she said she did, and I have no reason to believe that she did not, she will have been struck by the absolute visceral as well as steady reaction to many of the amendments that she says were absolutely necessary for the UI bill to reflect the new needs of Canada.

The fact that there were others who did not react as vehemently is a reflection, as the parliamentary secretary to the minister has said on several occasions, of the fact that there were interest groups that wanted to promote a particular view and vision of what should happen to the UI legislation.

It is fair to say that perhaps repetition does drive home a point. Of those who actually found something worth while in this proposed bill, most objected strenuously to the government's withdrawal from the UI program; that unemployment insurance was no longer going to have the participation of the government.

That is important for all hon. members because unemployment insurance was deemed to be unconstitutional and that the government did not have the right to introduce such a program until 1940 or 1941. There had to be a constitutional amendment introduced empowering the government to participate in such a program. That constitutional amendment gave the government the right to be a third party in a tripartite program whose scope, whose intent, and whose direction was insurance, income support, and income maintenance at a time when a contributor might find himself or herself without work. In other words, this program was supposed to be designed to ensure that there would be a modicum of continuance and constancy in the revenue required by Canadians from all provinces, from all sectors of our economy, and from all classes of our society to live with the decency and dignity that a fair remuneration would give to all Canadians which we value as one of the paragons of western civilization.

When we were faced with many of the organizations who came before us as a legislative committee, we took to heart some of the studies that they produced, some of the statistics that they generated, and some of the other surveys that they examined and researched by way not only of contrast or of support in some cases, but in all cases there was the view that the Unemployment Insurance Commission changes represented by Bill C–21 were in fact in the best interest of all Canadians. However, 157 of the 202 organizations who appeared before the committee said, "Absolutely not. This in no way represents Canadian interests, in no way at all".

The parliamentary secretary says, "You're wrong". In most cases the hon. member was there when all of these presentations were made and heard exactly what they said. We had representations from church groups, poverty groups, labour organizations, business organizations, organizations representing the disabled, women's groups, ethnic groups, farmers' groups, fishermen's groups, all of them, to a man or a woman said that this government is headed down the wrong road; the direction that it is pursuing is absolutely inimical to the interest of all Canadians. The parliamentary secretary knows that. I cannot understand why he would persist in suggesting that because there were labour groups that actually dared to question the statistics presented by the government, that in some fashion they were speaking an untruth, were perpetrating an image or an illusion that the truth lies somewhere outside the government's statements on this issue.

Members of our committee would have dearly loved to have heard from the general public, many of whom had written to the committee and asked for the right to appear. In all cases where they were able to do so, we heard a tale of woe. It is not surprising. This country is a vast territorial entity. There are great diverse and divergent social and economic conditions and realities that prevail in such vast territorial domain. What does our government do? It treats them all the same.

I ask hon. members how parliamentarians could possibly consider a monolithic hegemony for this country's conditions. It takes eight hours by plane to go from one end of the country to the other. Yet we adopt a program that suggests that this government is going to pursue amendments to one of the most fundamental programs for this country, not simply on a social basis, but on an economic basis. Perhaps it will serve the deliberations of this House some purpose to consider the economic perceptions that prevail everywhere except in the minister's own department.

We were not able to meet all Canadians on an individual basis groups which were, in the opinion of some members of the committee, and I dare not mention their names lest I incur the wrath of the parliamentary secretary, who does not want to be referred to directly or indirectly in that regard, and lest, in fact, that we learn that people in Canada will suffer. In Vancouver the committee found that farm workers, many of whom are newly arrived Canadians whose dependence on very low wages puts them at the mercy of economic realities beyond their ability to dominate, but who are willing enough to take whatever employment is available in the market-place. Many of them, because of their own financial condition, must engage in sacrifice, thrift, saving, and in self-restraint. In those circumstances they work happily on the farms, facing in many cases the kinds of dangers that people who work in an agricultural environment today face as a result of the proliferation of chemicals that are designed to produce a much more attractive product.

Because of the limited growing period, and in terms of the market value of the industry in which they are engaged, these people must earn a salary from which they can derive sustenance for their family and pay for the necessities they require while living on the west coast.

Bill C-21 is going to literally devastate their opportunities to maintain a modicum of income that will see them through those times when the demands of the market-place and the climatic realities will restrict their opportunity to fall back on a system into which they paid. This is something the parliamentary secretary and many members of the government side cannot seem to fathom or appreciate, that these people contributed to a system from which they hoped to derive benefit at a time when they found themselves unemployed.

All those people who came before the committee were members of a community whose dependence on the market realities was further heightened by the fact that their linguistic skills in English were less than adequate to give them an opportunity and an entry point to the larger market-place. For those people we are going to impose a system that restrains even further their opportunities to engage in the kind of activities that will give them the occasion to profit from their own labour.

There is no great dignity in this particular bill offered to Canadians. The minister said a few moments ago what this bill will do. I have to restrain myself, Mr. Speaker, after having listened to those presentations and having seen some of the very moving presentations by individuals who are going to suffer as a result of them.

I had to restrain myself when the minister said that the amendments presented under Bill C-21 would give Canadians an opportunity to engage in work that will be lasting, secure and satisfying; three qualities that will magically surface the moment this particular bill is presented and accepted before the House. I do not know how that will happen; in fact neither did any of the 202 people who presented briefs and testimony before the parliamentary committee or, I dare say, all the others who were unable to appear before the committee but took the trouble to write about their views. I do not know how that is going to happen and I dare say neither does the minister, but there is a certain blind faith that this kind of activity is going to be well worth while for everybody.

Before I begin my presentation on my party's view of this bill, it is instructive as well, as I found it instructive, to hear what the minister had to say in glowing terms, I might add, about the government's sincere intent to listen to criticism and to make this bill a paragon of great legislation.

My colleague on the committee smiles as well because quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I had to ask one of the messengers to go over and give him some water because he was about to croak when he heard some of these things. The minister says: "We accepted amendments", referring to just cause, "because we were receptive accepted as well amendments regarding adoptive parent's rights". I think she said the government moved the motion on adoptive parent's rights, and that she was delighted to be able to say that there was unanimous consent in the House in providing through an amendment assistance devices for the disabled. I think the "blues" will bear me out when I say she found these to be "extremely valuable". And she pins her symbolic hat on Bill C–21, on these three items. One does not know whether to laugh or to cry.

These were the absolute minimum that the committee could garner from the minister and her department. We had to use a crowbar to pry free some sort of receptivity of attitude; that we could not possibly present this kind of legislation before the people of Canada and leave out those three items.

Upon reflection all members will realize that these three items were imposed upon the government. They were not generated by the government's desire to create a bill that was going to work for the benefit of all Canadians. No, they were imposed by court decisions, by charter demands.

The minister and her department have the unmitigated nerve to take full credit for something like this. Well, the government might take some credit and on a political plane I would say fine, but let us recognize from whence these kinds of suggestions come. They are prerequisite of our judicial system, our Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the hard work of committee members on both sides of the House.

Finally, the minister agreed that since we were twisting the department's arm she would do this. She said something else that was most instructive, that is, that unemployment insurance changes would now "tax employed Canadians and Canadian employers" in order to serve the interest of those who are unemployed.

How do we serve the interests of the unemployed when in one fell swoop the government eliminates for them a right to which they had become accustomed, a right around which they were building their daily and annual lives, a right around which they were planning the economic future of themselves individually and of their families collectively.

How can we say this is working for the good of all Canadians when, with the new requirements under Bill C–21, we will effectively deprive people of an opportunity to qualify for the unemployment insurance which they paid and to which they had become accustomed, if they wanted, to live under certain conditions and in certain regions of the country. I do not know how we can do that. I do not know whether it is going to be instructive for us to go detail by detail, individual by individual, family suffering by family suffering, in order to get the point across.

The government on one hand says to us: "Here is a macro view of the world, and you have to learn to understand how we as Canadians will work in this new view". So we do that. We take a look at the government's statistics. We take a look at its surveys. We take a look at how it arrives at its conclusions. We may present a contrary view of the mechanisms and the procedures that will be required in order to implement this new vision.

The word "vision" implies some sort of depth of perception. It requires some sort of philosophical thought. I think it requires a certain amount of planning, based on more or less verifiable facts and conditions, which are going to prevail not only today in the short term but down the road three, four, five, ten years. Dare I say that perhaps it involves planning with an image of a Canada that will go beyond the end of this century.

That might be one thing. However the moment we present a contrary view, the department pooh–poohs all this stuff as garbage. It says it is nonsense. It is not coming from its side of our analyses. Departmental officials say: "It is not coming from our researchers therefore it has no validity so we go on the individual assessment". What is the micro impact of this macro view of the way the world is unfolding in Canada?

It might have been instructive for the minister to have joined us, for example, in Saskatchewan where we had presentations by people who are normally extremely skilled at what they do. They are members of the trades organizations—bricklayers, carpenters, electricians and plumbers who have been paid for their own skills development on an ongoing basis from the moment they entered their particular career. They are people who did not wait for the minister to say that this country needs skilled labour, who did not wait for the government to say: "We have to get more money out there so that we can educate our people, make them more mobile in terms of labour necessities".

These are people who were, of their volition, of their own energy, out of their own costs, willing to go forward and educate themselves, train themselves, hone their skills, and move to the markets where those skills were in great demand. They appeared before the committee and pointed to periods during the year or in the economic cycles where 80 per cent of members whose skills and training require better than five years of post-secondary education were unemployed. I know that my NDP colleague from Saskatoon, who was a member of the committee, will verify these statistics.

These are people who have an understanding of what it means to prepare oneself and one's families for all difficulties and changing realities of the market-place.

What did they do? What else did they say? It would have been instructive for the minister to have heard, in some cases when they have 80 per cent unemployment and even when they do not, that when the new market invites their skills they move. They go from one part of Canada to another. Many of them move to southern Ontario. There is one Canada, and then there is southern Ontario. While I come from southern Ontario I make no apologies for the wealth and prosperity that is there, even if some of my colleagues from Winnipeg would say: "No, this is unfair". It is unfair but at least the people are trying to make a go of things.

When my friends, my fellow Canadians come from Saskatoon, Saskatchewan or from other provinces out west they bring their skills to southern Ontario because the market-place there requires skills that are already there and already proven at no cost to Ontario and its educational system, at no cost to the social programs in Ontario, and at no cost to the industries in Ontario.

We get a beautiful finished product, but what happens to those people? Well, they move in flocks. I believe the hon. member can bear me out, but there was a 2,000 net emigration out of Saskatchewan in order to meet the demands presented some place else in order to address the inconsistencies of the economic environment of the day in Saskatchewan. The minister says: "Well, we need a population that is better trained. We need a population that is willing to move".

She does not seek to develop an economic strategy that will address the interests of those from northern Canada, northern Alberta, northern Manitoba who appeared before the committee and highlighted with some great chagrin and regret that there was upward of 90 per cent unemployment in some of the northern communities and that when employment opportunities were created they were filled by southerners.

They pointed to a desire to develop skills and training, a new economic environment in northern Canada, but even now they would not be able to look to the unemployment insurance system for that little income maintenance to which they at one time, prior to the presentation of this bill, could look with some sense of planning, sense of direction, and some sense of organizing their lives for themselves and their families.

It might have been instructive if the minister had been with the committee when we went to Montreal and saw the presentations before the committee from organizations on the west side of Montreal that pointed to the unemployed and gave us a particular picture, which I am sure would move her to think in different terms about this particular bill. Some 37 per cent of those people who were unemployed in west Montreal had education levels that were less than Grade 8.

I remind the minister that a Grade 9 and Grade 10 education today qualifies most Canadians as functionally illiterate. That means that they are unable to qualify for higher skilled jobs, for programs that will give them an opportunity to enhance training.

Aside from being that 37 per cent having below Grade 8 level education, what else would qualify them as a typically unemployed? Some 60 per cent of them are unable to have any savings. The moment they are unemployed they have nothing to [illegible]rlook forward to, nothing to fall back on, except the benefits to which they have contributed.

I stress that because the government does not seem to understand that these people who are going on the unemployment list are actually coming from employment.

Yet the minister says that that is not the whole picture. She says that they have to make sure that people find it tougher to leave a job. That is okay. Nobody wants to leave a job unless they are going to go to a better job. If they leave frivolously, without justification, yes I think everybody accepts that there should be some penalties.

Well, take a look at some of the penalties that are imposed. The penalties initially were from one to six weeks; now they are going from seven to twelve weeks. If you want to punish somebody you give them the maximum penalty. The average penalty is now 2.2 weeks. If you want to raise it, do so. Do not automatically go ahead and impose a six-week penalty because somebody leaves a job. You do not automatically impose a penalty on everybody just because a few people abuse the system.

I know the government has a particular disposition, a neo-conservative view of the world. I do not share it, quite frankly. I know many members on both sides of the House do not share it either. It is too easy to engage in partisan political rhetoric, and I am not going to do that. I am not going to do that at all.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Volpe: I do not want to wake up all the Rip Van Winkles on the other side of the House. If I did that, though, some of them might start paying attention. If we are to be talking about people who are to profit in any way from an unemployment insurance system, then it should only be those people who contribute to it. Even those people who suggested that the government is headed in the right direction maintain that the government has no right, as a result of this bill, to make any regulations regarding unemployment insurance because it is no longer a partner. It no longer pays into the system.

The parliamentary secretary and some of the members of the committee from his side were saying: "Oh, well you know the government is a major employer. We contribute a lot to unemployment insurance because we are an employer". There are 13 million employed Canadians, and the government according to the minister's own figures before the committee employs something like 225,000. I do not know if 225,000 out of 13 million employees qualifies the government as a contributor to a program. It certainly does not have any status that is different from anybody else.

Certainly, if it is not to contribute to a program it should not make any rules, least of all, those rules which will deprive contributors of an opportunity to maintain an insurance scheme. Maybe that is the government's agenda all along. Withdraw from the program, remove $2.9 billion last year from the program, allow the program to function on the basis of premiums now raised by 14 per cent, paid by employees and employers, and then let them thrash it out.

Those of us who know anything about negotiations and labour contracts know quite well that what is to happen at the next round of negotiations, or when the employee goes before the employer for a job where there is no organized labour, there will be factored in the additional employer costs in premiums. The person who is going to bear the full brunt of—the minister perhaps in a Freudian slip let it out—this increased tax is to be the employee and the employee alone.

The business groups that appeared before the committee—and the parliamentary secretary will bear this out—upon questioning responded that yes unemployment insurance premiums incurred by employers is considered a business cost and therefore subject to the usual deductions from income tax and other kinds of taxes from the government. There are no such loopholes for the employees who find that their wage demands and wage requisites are going to be reduced because employers find that they will be even less competitive.

I do not know where the government is going when it says that it will consult with everybody in the private sector, including institutions that are engaged in training, organized labour, and including of course industry.

There are a few members of the committee here and they will bear me out. I know that they will not say that this is an exaggeration; nor will they say that this is an understatement of the truth. Witnesses who appeared before the committee came from large corporations, chambers of commerce, industrial groups, organized labour groups, and women groups. Upon questioning, not one of them said "yes, we have been consulted; yes, we have been invited to sit down in consultation with the department".

Who is this government talking to? Where is it getting its facts? Where is it getting the rationale? Where is it getting the foundations for the kinds of initiatives that it wants to present? Well, it cannot be from Statistics Canada because if we read StatsCan figures they cause any Canadian who was willing for one brief moment to be critical to shudder. The minister's glowing allegations of greatness that will befall this country as a result of Bill C-21 certainly are not borne out by the statistics.

I just want to draw your attention, for example, to an item by a renowned economist. I know that there are varying economic views but according to this economist, reported in The Toronto Star, October 2, 1989, the only way that we can eliminate unemployment is to develop growth and growth, not wages, is the key to cutting unemployment.

Why does he say that? I suppose these people must have gone to the same economic think tanks, certainly not attended by any of the government members or by the departmental members it would appear. There is another report which comes from the department itself. I cannot believe that it is giving out information that actually contradicts what you want to say. We have seen one little shell game after another. Now some truth comes out.

There was a headline in the The Globe and Mail of October 30, 1989, "Cheap Labour, A Costly Social Strait-jacket". Let us keep that in mind because it appears that the government wants to create a cheap labour pool.

The article states: "The myth about cheap labour is that it is necessary for the economy to function. The fact is cheap labour is not cheap. The Canadian labour force survey done by StatsCanada in 1986 shows clearly that the higher the degree of various forms of social assistance, the higher the rate of unemployment and the higher the level of government expenditure".

According to that same survey, workers earning less than $6 an hour were unemployed for an average of three weeks a year. I quote further: "Although they constitute half of the unemployed labour force, the under $10 an hour worker accounted for 85 per cent of the money spent on unemployment".

This particular bill attacks precisely those who earn in that 85 per cent category, that is under $10 an hour. They are not the ones who are carrying the country so to speak. They are not the ones who are hoarding vast sums of money. They are not the ones who are plundering the Treasury. The real cost for labour under $6 an hour, according to this article, is actually between $7.50 and $8.50 an hour when the taxpayer's contribution is counted in.

What is instructive as well for the parliamentary secretary and the minister is that from 1981 to 1986 more jobs were created in the category of about $5.50 an hour and below this wage category than all other categories combined.

The Prime Minister and all his other ministers stand before this House and say 57,000 jobs were created in B.C. last month. They forget about all the net losses in the other provinces. They say 189,000 jobs were created this year as of the end of September, in the first three-quarters. It sounds fabulous.

There were 348,000 created last year before the free trade agreement was signed, an agreement that was supposed to bring untold wealth. If increased employment is an indication of untold wealth, I ask the parliamentary secretary opposite to take out his calculator and take a look at what happens to that 189,000 when I add one more quarter to it. If I am very, very generous and add another 70,000, there are still well over 100,000 fewer jobs created for this first post FTA year than in the pre FTA year.

Where did all those jobs go? The Prime Minister says: "Well they are all full-time jobs". That is great. Where are they? They are in the low end of the earning capacity. People are being compelled to take jobs that will give them a bare minimum for sustenance.

I want to go on a little further. The problem that we have in Canada according to this economist is that Canada has had by far the fastest growing labour force in the industrialized world because of the growth and because of the continued availability of cheap labour. I say that cheap labour is going to be increased drastically and dramatically as a result of this bill, this pernicious bill that does nothing to develop the population, does nothing to develop the labour potential of Canadians, and does nothing to extract from the talents and the energies of the dynamics of our population. It does instead put more people at the mercy of those whose abilities to engage in a competitive economic environment. It does not take into consideration the new technological realities of the world.

It says here that Canadian investment per new worker has been the lowest among Organization for Economic Co-operation in Developing countries over the past two decades. Is it little wonder that we speak often in this House about the lack of competitiveness of our industries when our government refuses to do what is the absolute obvious to anybody who thinks or anybody who does not even think but sees the obvious? No, not to this government. Low investment means low productivity increases in the long term, and Canada is at the very back of the line.

I was so offended as a Canadian—and it sounds a little schmaltzy but I know that my friend opposite from Winnipeg shares this view—that we as Canadians could be at the back of the line in anything, especially when it comes to economic matters.

I know that there are members on the government side who trumpet the great entrepreneurial energies of Canadians. Yet we are able to read something like this, criticism from one of our own. The supply of cheap labour breeds dependency on it to the point where modernization becomes an impossible hurdle.

Those of us who have at least a small understanding of history will refer to the decline of all kinds of civilizations where the pool of cheap labour—dare I say slave labour—contributed to the total collapse of the civilization. We do not want that for our own country, nor should we. In fact one of the problems that we have is that not only do we have cheap labour; we have mismatches of jobs.

I do not know whether the minister or her department looked at some of the things that average people on the streets see on a day to day basis. Instead, they point to the unemployment rate in the country, 7.3 per cent and therefore dropping. I will come to that in a moment.

Not only am I applauding the members opposite, I think it is also a point that bears reflection because there is inherent criticism in it. Members opposite say: "That is it, nationally, but what about that nasty place, southern Ontario, or that place that is the centre of nastiness, Toronto, where the unemployment rate is only 3.4 per cent? That means the country is doing well. So what about those nasty people who actually rely on the unemployment insurance fund?" Remember that is a fund into which people paid into. It is not one that somebody else is paying into on their behalf. All my insurance broker friends on both sides of the House will say: "If you pay premiums then you engage as a participant in the fund and, therefore, you have a right of access to that fund in time of need".

The unemployment rate in Toronto is 3.4 per cent. That is great. Three point four per cent unemployment in Toronto represents some 70,000 men and women who are out of work. In fact, with all due deference to my colleagues from New Brunswick, that is twice as many people as are unemployed in all of New Brunswick. Yet Bill C-21 is going to penalize everybody in the Toronto area who is so unfortunate as to not find a job. There are lots of jobs available in Toronto. We can look in the newspaper any day. Do you know what they are like, Mr. Speaker? Almost every restaurant, retail outlet and convenience store, it seems, have help wanted signs in the window. In my riding of Eglinton—Lawrence every store has a "help wanted" sign. What they do not say is what you will be paid for your labour.

But God help you, Mr. Speaker, if you happen to be one of the individuals that the hon. parliamentary secretary is so fond of reading about from a list. God help you if you happen to be an unemployed mechanical engineer. You are not going to find a job. This is a country that requires specialization, it requires great training. If one reads the minister's own words, she says that in the next 10 years 50 per cent of all jobs—I think the figure is 55 per cent—are going to require five years or better of post-secondary schooling or training. Here we have a mechanical engineer who has at least that and cannot find a job because the market is not prepared. In Toronto this man cannot find a job; not because he is not looking, not because he is not trained, not because he does not have skills and not because he wants to go on unemployment insurance—heaven's no—it is because he happens to be a mechanical engineer in a soft market, because manufacturers are not tooling up, because entrepreneurs are not taking advantage of the new technologies that are required to make their industries competitive, because many companies in the Toronto area, as well as across Canada, as those of us who read the daily papers know, are moving south.

Why are they doing that? Heaven forbid. It could not be because the government made it possible for them or encouraged that kind of activity by signing some sort of a document that suggests that it is going to be less competitive to be here in a restricted market, in a market that stretches over better than 5,000 kilometres. No, it could not possibly be that. We would engage in sarcasm if we said that. But the fact of the matter is that the cheap labour pool is making it very possible for entrepreneurs to exploit that kind of a market and avoid making the technological changes and innovations that they have to bring forward.

As an example, in Toronto in the last several weeks we saw a situation wherein the government has one policy in isolation of a whole series of others. Those of us who are familiar with the construction boom in Toronto over the course of the last few years will realize that one of the most severe problems in the Toronto market and the greater Toronto–southern Ontario market is the lack of skilled labour. The number of people who have been coming from Saskatchewan with skills in construction, carpentry, plumbing, electricity and bricklaying has not been enough to satisfy the great demands. As a result there have been unscrupulous entrepreneurs and brokers in the greater Toronto area and the southern Ontario area who have gone overseas to look for that kind of help. But now that the market is drying up, ciao, baby, we are sending you home. And there are 5,000 of them.

I want to say this in a language that some of those people understand. And maybe, because some of the government members are listening, we will have a copy for them in English as well.

[English]

These 5,000 workers who are being deported are (citizens) individuals whose productive abilities, dynamism and skilled training have proven to be advantageous to this country.

Many of them are victims of unscrupulous exploiters, the majority of them Canadians, with the tacit compliance of our government whose inaction allowed such illegal activity.

These workers came here as the "finished product" with no cost to our educational system, to our training programs or to our industry. Now this government acts with complete insensitivity to their worth, even in the face of recommendations by the Homebuilders Association which consider them an asset to this country.

[English]

Five thousand Portuguese workers have been exploited because they bring some very desperately needed skills to a segment of Ontario and then they are whisked away because they are no longer necessary in the estimation of the department. I do not know whether our minister, our departments, our government, are working in tandem or whether they are playing "I don't know what he's doing, I don't know what she's doing and I don't care".

How can we develop a labour strategy, a labour market for this country to meet the needs of this country outside of the parameters of a general immigration policy, a general industrial policy outside the parameters of a solid, long–term, well–thought–out research and development strategy?

Let me go to that for a second because in terms of research and development we certainly do not, as a country, have much to boast about. In fact, I have commissioned a little bit of research myself. We have taken a look at research and development among several of the nations of greater industrial import throughout the world; Canada, the U.S., the United Kingdom, West Germany, Australia and Japan. Do you know where Canada sits in terms of research and development? Dead last.

In terms of percentage change in government inputs—now this is the government contribution, this is government initiative in research and development into developing not only a labour market but an industrial sector, an economic environment, an entrepreneurial sector that is going to take complete and total advantage not only of the market possibilities but also the global dynamics and the needs for technological innovation—what does our government do by way of showing leadership? I do not know if leadership is a dirty word on the other side of the House. It would certainly would appear that it is because, as an example, in 1986 there was a net reduction of 2 per cent, in 1987 there was a further reduction of 3 per cent in research and development, in 1988 there was a further reduction of 5 per cent in research and development and in 1989 there is an estimated 3 per cent reduction in research and development. How does a nation develop a market-place and labour to fit into that market-place if it does not have any commitment or any financial input into research and development or if that research and development goes on a decreasing plane year by year?

I do not know how we can sit here and listen to the exhortations of the minister that Bill C-21 is going to be the solution to all of the economic woes of Canada. It is not going to be anything like that, Mr. Speaker. In fact it is going to give the government an opportunity to cut $2.9 billion from the deficit, which is all it is interested in, and it is going to do it on the backs of those people who have been honestly, sincerely and devotedly contributing to an unemployment insurance scheme that they thought was going to protect them against the vagaries of the market-place.

I take a look at what other countries such as West Germany are doing. West Germany most people think is a lighthouse in terms of technological innovation. I know that my hon. colleague, the parliamentary secretary, who is fond of looking at all kinds of examples, will relish this one. In that same period in 1986 the West German Government input into research and development went up by 3 per cent. It went up by a further 5 per cent in 1987, a further 6 per cent in 1988 and a further 5 per cent projected for 1989.

We are going to be a competitive country when others are deliberately establishing an economic strategy, an industrial policy and a labour policy. We are going to sit back and snip, snip, cut, cut because the deficit is the only problem the world has. It is a problem, and I sincerely would wish to have an opportunity to cut it away, as much as the government if not more. But if we are going to curb growth how do we expect to generate revenues to pay off the deficit let alone the public debt?

Let us look at a smaller country, Italy. Italy is the cradle of civilization for some of us. Most of us think that, well it is in the Group of 7, but it is a poor cousin. What did Italy do? In 1986 it increased research and development funds by 4 per cent while we were already dropping that funding by 2 per cent. We are in last place so we have nowhere else to go but up. But if we cut, we get up faster, right? What did Italy do in 1987? It only raised it another 4 per cent. What did it do in 1988? The snipping disease must have caught Italy too because it dropped to an increase of 3 per cent. It learned by its mistakes, it appears, because in 1989, the government says in order to encourage greater productivity and competitiveness among our industries and in order to engage in productive labour development, creation of job and employment opportunities, do we have to put in more money because there is a greater return. You invest and you can expect some sort of return on your capital. Italy went up by 6 per cent over and above what it spent in 1988. That is at a time when we were dropping by 3 per cent. Remember, we were in last place. So what now?

I do not know how Canadians can brook this kind of misdirection—I do not want to say inaction, but misdirection on the part of this country when it comes to developing an economic environment productive for all Canadians. I just cannot understand that.

What happens? You can look at some of the statistics. We are trying to develop an intelligentia, people who are able to meet the immediate changes; PhDs, MAs in engineering, in research, in mathematics and computers. In 1988 we show a net drop of people who are involved in engineering, just a modicum of a rise in medicine, a dramatic drop in mathematics, and a dramatic drop in computers. These are the areas where, if we are going to show some leadership, we have to start developing personnel who are willing and able to enter those fields. But we are not doing that. It might be bad enough that the government does not engage in any serious education of its population, that the government does not engage in any stimulation and development of technological innovation, but when there is a decline in our export markets as a result of our uncompetitiveness, then we have to point the finger to where it properly belongs—at government misdirection.

Let us take a look at Canadian market shares of major export markets. We seem to be hanging our hat completely on the U.S. market. In 1988 it accounted for 73.1 per cent of all our exports. We probably could not compete with the Japanese because they are responsible for about 6.3 per cent of our exports. The U.K. is responsible for 2.6 per cent; China, 1.9 per cent; West Germany, 1.3 per cent, virtually all of them in resource-based industries, not in manufacturing or consumer goods.

The merchandise trade balance, which will be a reflection of our competitiveness, which will be a reflection of the government's ability to indicate and establish an economic environment that is good for all Canadians both on an industrial and an unemployment side, has been dropping steadily with respect to the United States, so much so that in 1988, as a comparison with 1985, we have dropped a grand total of 5 per cent.

Compared with Japan we have been collapsing steadily. Compared with the U.K. we have made absolutely no progress. There is a negative drop of 1.1 per cent. China is the only major economic environment with which we have any kind of positive growth, 1.6 per cent growth. Compared with West Germany we have dropped our share of the market by –2 per cent. Those kinds of facts tell us quite frankly that we are not going anywhere and we are going there fast. Let us talk in terms of developing language, which most of these countries recognize is important to preparing not only their labour market but also their managerial class, because this is becoming increasingly a global market-place both for labour and industry.

Canada in terms of gross expenditures on all official government programs—and keep in mind that much of this is in the official languages sector—contributes a paltry $7 million. The United States contributes $170 million.

Keep in mind that their market-place is only 10 times the size of ours. Their contribution should have been somewhere around $70 million, but no, it is $170 million. The Americans, despite the downturn in their economy, their loss of position all over the world in terms of progressiveness, are at least capable of understanding. In terms of language perhaps they increased the competitiveness of their peoples.

West Germany contributed $39.2 million. Australia, a smaller country than our own, yet it appears more competitive, spent $12.4 million on languages. Japan, a great monolithic, hegemonic nation which does not have all of the opportunities that our own country provides us with, a multicultural fabric, spent $96.2 million. Where does Canada sit? In last place.

I am absolutely ashamed that our government would not recognize that Canadians have to be provided with the opportunity and the leadership to be able to take their role and their proper position in this world.

Let us take a look at education, for example, in terms of percentage change in government inputs. I know what the members opposite are going to say right now: "Oh well, education, that's not our business, that's provincial stuff and in fact we can't do anything about it". With the same breath the government turns around and says that with this bill it is going to take some moneys from premiums. It is going to tax people and, on a national basis, establish training programs.

Okay, we are going to establish training programs. We like that. With whom? " Oh well, that is not our business. We have to defer it to the appropriate provincial authorities. They have to take a look at what is available and what is not available and we just buy into the programs".

I cannot believe that this passes for serious government policy. I cannot believe that at a time when most other nations in the world are taking an initiative on a national basis to educate the public, to educate the entrepreneurial class, their managerial class, Canada sits down and says: "Well, you know, I have to wash my hands of this, that is really not my job. That is not in my jurisdiction. We don't have any money". I cannot believe that that passes for political and juridical leadership.

In terms of government inputs in education Canada, since 1986, decreased by 4 per cent. In 1987 there was a further decrease of 3 per cent. In 1988 a further decrease of 3 per cent. For 1989 we establish consistency without all doubt; there is a further decrease of 3 per cent, absolutely incredible.

This is the same government that says it is going to engage in a new training program and establish a training ethic because Canadians spend half as much as their American counterpart. Is it the industries that spend half as much or is the government? Let us take a look. What does the government do in the United States? This is the symbol and role model for our great leaders opposite.

The United States dropped 3 per cent in 1986 and had a further drop of 2 per cent in 1987. But the Americans changed their ways in 1988 and actually increased it by 1 per cent and then collapsed into the same Canadian disease of further decrease in education, in long-term investment in this country and in its people by 3 per cent.

Let us take a look at what our less progressive cousins world-wide are doing. It is important to keep in mind the unwashed masses overseas. They do not know anything, right? They cannot understand the value of education because we have a monopoly on it. That is why we can afford to cut.

In 1986 Italy increased government inputs by 6 per cent. It made a further increase of 5 per cent in 1987 because that was not enough, and then in 1988 it increased inputs by a further 6 per cent. In 1989, discovering the merits of increases in education for long-term development, Italy increased it by a further 8 per cent. Little wonder that poor little Italy is moving up the ranking in the Group of Seven. It is now pushing for number 4; it used to be below Canada.

It seems that the Australians are at least as astute because in 1986 government inputs in education went up by 7 per cent. They increased it to 10 per cent. Those guys know what they are doing; 10 per cent in 1987, 4 per cent in 1988, and a further 6 per cent in 1989.

Where are we in Canada? Refresh your memory. There is a steady, continuous decrease year by year of on average three and one-quarter per cent. We are not headed down the road of salvation. We are not headed down the road of deficit reduction. We are not going to be able to generate the kind of growth that is required to decrease the public debt, to cut back on programs that have been the lifeblood of sustenance, of social programs made necessary by government and mismanagement. We are not going to be able to do that if we keep having a myopic view of where the government and this country ought to be heading.

I do not want to offend some of the members here about retraining programs, but we are going to talk about that at great length in a few minutes. The combined private sector-public sector input over the course of the last five years in retraining programs in Canada has been an increase of 2 per cent in 1986, 3 per cent in 1987, 5 per cent in 1988, and 2 per cent in 1989.

In 1986 Australia saw an increase of 7 per cent; in 1987, 12 per cent; a further increase of 9 per cent, in 1988; and in 1989 there was a further increase of 12 per cent.

I know that the members opposite are very interested. I could go ahead and read some of the figures for Taiwan, Japan, Italy, West Germany, even for Great Britain, which by the way, I am told, can no longer can be called Great Britain because of the economic mismanagement of its current leader, a leader who felt that she had to come here and tell all Canadians in an admonishing tone that they had nothing to fear from the free trade agreement, that we would be able to maintain our identity, and that we would be foolish to overlook this opportunity to engage in a great big market-place. She told us all at election time: "You have to vote Conservative if you want to secure". Secure what, complete mismanagement?

That is the same Prime Minister who is now balking at everything that is going on in Europe. "No, no, no, we can't lose our own identity. Oh, we cannot lose control over our own economic destiny", even though all intelligent peoples in Europe are saying: "We have nothing to be afraid of, business is business and good business makes better business for everybody. We are going to engage in productive programs".

What does Canada do? It does not even follow the example of a country like Britain whose government is repeatedly and continuously viewed as being at least socially regressive if not economically backward. They have slipped from third in ranking in the Group of Seven down to fourth, to fifth, to sixth and, if it were not for us, for Pete's sake, they would be down at the bottom.

This sort of thing may not be of great interest to members opposite who have already made their mind up that Bill C–21 is the best thing since sliced bread. They are going to be able to go back to their business buddies and say: "Do you know what we did for you? We went snip, snip, and cut away $2.9 billion from our deficit. We are no longer going to help the unemployed. We do not have to worry about them. They are not going to be able to come to us and live off the fat of the land. They are going to have to take your jobs at your rate of pay."

What is that rate of pay, pardon me again? Was it higher? No, that is not what I heard. It goes down below $5.50 an hour. In fact most of the jobs being created are at this rate of pay, which rate of pay reduces the amount of revenue available for this government. It reduces the abilities of entrepreneurs and industries to retool and engage in investments and technologies that will make them more competitive, more productive, and much more aggressive in the world economy.

We are going to do that because we have a myopic view of the world, because we have short–term visions, we have no vision on the economy, no vision on industrial strategy, none whatsoever on labour development, on sectorial development, on regional development. We are going to say to all our fellow Canadians who live in some of those areas where the long reach of absent industrial strategy is still making many people dependent on social programs that they would otherwise reject and reject willingly: "We no longer want you to be able to profit from a program into which you make a contribution. We want you to move, to go where the jobs are."

Where are they? They are not in Newfoundland, they are not in the other maritime provinces, and they are certainly not in Quebec. In the last quarter of last year and the first three quarters of this year Quebec experienced a net job loss: 11,000 fewer people employed in Quebec over the last three quarters than in previous times. Where are these jobs being created? The government is going to make available under this bill $15 million for relocation, $15 million so we can depopulate Atlantic Canada, so that we can depopulate northern Quebec.

Those who were with the committee in Jonquière in northern Quebec would have heard that many of those residents were saying that they were going to be forced if this bill goes through to leave the place where they have established a stable, secure, social, cultural, economic environment.

They are going to move to Toronto. Let's all go to Toronto. Great place. The average price of a new single family detached home in my city of North York in metropolitan Toronto is a shameful $832,000. The average price of a resale home last month in Toronto was $272,000. You would require a 25 per cent down payment just to qualify for this, and then you would have to qualify for the mortgage payments. How can somebody who has been on unemployment in maritime Canada possibly qualify for that? Where are we going to put them?

I know, Mr. Speaker, that we are pressing one o'clock and you will want to hear the rest of my dissertation. Perhaps I can finish after the House resumes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Burlington.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions, I understand, among the parties and there is an agreement that after the normal first rotation of speakers the second rotation will have ten minutes to speak and five minutes of questioning.

We have agreed to forgo occasional speakers to allow the opposition to present more speakers to the House.

Mr. Gauthier: We are in agreement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

ATLANTIC PROVINCES ECONOMIC COUNCIL

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, there is some good news coming out of New Brunswick that I would like to bring to the attention of the House. APEC, the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, released its quarterly report on Monday and the news is good. Investment in New Brunswick rose by 20 per cent last year and will undoubtedly exceed 20 per cent this year.

Let's look at some facts. Unemployment has fallen by 8,000 since we took office. In percentage terms, unemployment was at 16 per cent when we took office and is now at 12 per cent, a reduction of 4 per cent. Exports are up, farm cash receipts are up. Private sector construction is up, manufacturing shipments are up. Much to the chagrin of our Opposition, things are looking good in New Brunswick and under this government will continue to be good.

HAITIAN POLITICAL REFUGEES

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, two days ago, I received a delegation from the Viau ethnic groups centre headed by Rev. Charles Martin in my riding office. They protested the lifting of the moratorium on Haitian political refugees.

We do not really understand how the Conservative Government can claim that the situation in Haiti has returned to normal and how it can now expel anyone it thinks is no longer welcome in Canada, without endangering these people who are fighting for democracy and freedom.

Right after the coup d'état which brought him to power, General April promised to restore democracy with no turning back. Today, many Haitians instead fear that he will rule as an iron-handed dictator and they certainly expect the Canadian Government to understand the situation better.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has noticed the very beautiful bouquets that are on the desks of some hon. members and while I would be the last one to remove beauty from this Chamber, I must remind hon. members that it probably breaches the guidelines which we have set for ourselves on using other items to make demonstrations, and I would ask hon. members to co-operate.

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, for the sixth year in a row, I wish to thank the Témiscamingue Economic Development Corporation for organizing its "Météoritem" gala.

I would like to point out the remarkable work and leadership of the companies that received very special mention: in the agri-food sector, G.M.S. fish products of Laniel, distributor of the famous whitefish caviar; in the tourism sector, the Truck Rodeo of Notre-Dame du Nord; in the manufacturing sector, Marik Concrete of Ville-Marie and Témiscamingue; in trade and services, the Vivacolor Photo Studio of Ville-Marie; businesses of the year, all categories: Témisko of Notre-Dame du Nord and Cardinal Forestry Equipment of Angliers. Finally, the entrepreneurs of the year in my region: Guylain Paquin, owner of Châlain Farm in Saint-Bruno de Guigues, and Joachim Robitaille, president and CEO of Dolo-Mine in Saint-Bruno de Guigues.

Congratulations to all these companies whose determination and dynamism contribute to the economic development of our beautiful Témiscamingue region.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, it was the Minister of Finance and his department who did the studies on VIA Rail in preparation for the last budget.

Where was the Minister of Transport and his department? It was the Minister of Transport and two other people in the department who knew nothing about the environment who did the environmental study. Where was the Minister and the Department of the Environment? Doesn't anybody in the government do their own job?

A great Canadian, Doctor Suzuki, said the VIA Rail decision is being justified by an environmental assessment, but such analyses have almost no scientific value. It is clear the study was done in a hurry to satisfy the minister's political agenda. The VIA Rail decision must be considered in terms of the message it is delivering. We are in a period when scientists are urging a cut-back in emissions in a massive way so society will be weaned off the use of cars. Truer words were never spoken.

LABOUR FORCE DEVELOPMENT STUDY

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, all members of the House will know that the job-creation record of our government stands second to none. Yet as we move forward, Canada's future economic growth and development will increasingly depend on a highly skilled and flexible labour force. In a fast-changing, restructuring workplace, we as a society must be willing to make a sufficient investment in our human resources to adequately meet and accommodate the demands of the economic and technological change.

Our government, in its leadership capacity, must demonstrate both a willingness and a will to address the potential divergence between the flexibility and skills of our workers and the skills that our economy will demand.

The initiation of the Labour Force Development Strategy, I believe, strongly demonstrates that leadership and signals our commitment in this respect. Coupled with complimentary measures to maintain an economic safety net, this is both a necessary and smart investment that I believe will help successfully propel our great country into the 21st century.

AIR CANADA

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, the privatization of Air Canada will adversely affect the lives of many dedicated Air Canada employees. At Windsor airport alone 32 families will suffer the ill effects of privatization. They have been notified that their employment will be severed with Air Canada or be transferred to another city.

At the same time Air Ontario, which is an integral part of Air Canada and Air Service in the Windsor area, will be hiring new people to fill these jobs, the same jobs. This is a blatant example of an unfair and uncaring attitude of this government as it continues its rampage of privatizing Canadian institutions. Thirty-two families in the Windsor area must now decide to uproot and move or lose their jobs, although Air Ontario will hire people to do the same work. The displaced and experienced Air Canada employees were not given the option of employment with Air Ontario in their home community.

This is a tragedy not only for the employees, but for the customers of Windsor and the nine other airports subjected to this inhumane treatment.

CANADIAN STUDENT LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Canadian students are preparing for the future. The need for leadership is being stressed and recognized. Discussions on issues of national interest, understanding, bilingual programming and participation of francophones, commitment and direct action to protect our environment and concern for the disadvantaged were the features of a four day Canadian student leadership conference last weekend at John Rennie High School in my riding of Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis.

With tremendous help from community leaders, volunteers and counsellors, this fifth congress attracted several hundred delegates from across the country, many of them from ridings that are represented here, to share ideas, make friends and develop their leadership skills.

From personal observation, I can as sure the members of this House that the future of Canada will be in good hands.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to call the attention of this House to yet another example of discrimination of this government toward Atlantic Canada. I am referring to the Northern and Isolated Areas Task Force Report which was made public last Friday.

Taxpayers in hundreds of small communities across Canada, including my riding of Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, are threatened with the loss of existing tax benefits if the government accepts the recommendations of this report.

Atlantic Canada has been punished too much already. We cannot tolerate another blow to our rural ridings. I give the example of Canso, Nova Scotia, which is at this time faced with possible closure of its fish processing plant. The task force recommends that Canso be dropped from the list to qualify for this tax deduction.

Rural ridings are not the ones which should pay the price of a mismanagement of this government. They should be on the top of the list for benefits, not removed and forgotten.

HOUSING

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I want to draw the attention of this House to the government's record on co-operative housing. In 1986 the government made a commitment to fund 5,000 co-operative housing units a year. Yet in 1986 they funded only 2,900; in 1987, 3,800; and in 1988, 3,100. Now, in this year, they are funding only 1,700, one-third of the promise of 1986.

Today the minister made an announcement that gave no indication that this government was abandoning its attack on co-operative housing. Instead, the many struggling co-op housing resource industries which are desperately trying to keep afloat following federal government cut-backs have been given larger project advances for start-up funds. These advances will have to be repaid in full. This will not build one additional co-op housing unit. People in need of homes want a substantial housing policy. Instead, they get smoke and mirrors. When will the government live up to its commitments on co-operative housing?

COMMUNITY ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention that last Monday was dedicated to of community organization involvement and promotion in Québec.

About 67 organizations in my riding told me about their shortage of funds and the lack of recognition for their role as social intervenors.

I therefore ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mrs. McDougall) to consider the demands of community groups and help them obtain genuine recognition by introducing a satisfactory funding policy.

In this connection, enhance and hiring criteria for various federal employment programs should be drafted in terms of the needs of community-based organisations.

No country, Mr. Speaker, not even Canada, can do without the thousands of volunteer workers who are an invaluable resource for improving the quality of life of the neediest among us.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government is telling Canadians they do not understand the goods and services tax. Canadians are accused of being misinformed and naive in this respect.

[English]

I stand today to say that Canadians do understand. They understand that they have been deceived about this tax. Canadians are disappointed and they are diametrically opposed to what this government is doing.

The government said that the tax will be revenue neutral, visible and combined with provincial sales tax systems. The government shook the hands of Canadians before the election and has shaken their confidence today.

In my riding of Ottawa Centre alone over 2,500 people joined a coalition against the goods and services tax and said "no" to the 9 per cent, "no" to the 7 per cent, and are saying "no" to the goods and services tax.

When is this government going to start listening to Canadians and drop this tax?

ATLANTIC PROVINCES ECONOMIC COUNCIL

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council released its quarterly report on Monday. It contains some welcome news about the state of the New Brunswick economy. APEC says that New Brunswick will have the strongest economy in Atlantic Canada in 1989 and into 1990 and will match or exceed other provinces in terms of economic growth.

Investment in New Brunswick rose by 20 per cent last year and is now nearly twice the national average. Our optimistic outlook, the impact of ACOA, the frigate program, the free trade agreement and generous IRDAs have all contributed to this increased investment. These positive economic indicators have provided it with a solid base to encourage more economic growth. Much remains to be done and we need to build on the momentum created in the province over the last five years, but clearly New Brunswick is open for business once again.

CENTRAL AMERICA

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, events in Central America this week have cast a shadow over the peace process in the region. In El Salvador, the office of the National Union of Workers was bombed by the U.S. supported military, killing 12 and injuring 40. In Nicaragua, the continued disregard for the 19 month cease-fire by the U.S. backed Contras has left hundreds of Nicaraguan civilians dead and place the upcoming elections in jeopardy.

The government has announced its desire to join the Organization of American States and to play an influential role in the area. Unfortunately, empty rhetoric will not lead to peace in El Salvador and Nicaragua. When asked if Canada would act as an intermediary in the Nicaraguan conflict, the Prime Minister declared that as the "new kid on the block" he planned no action to assist the region. Are we peacemakers or are we idle bystanders?

Canada must involve itself in the peace process in an active and constructive way. While the Prime Minister is finding new clubs to join, people are dying in Central America. The time has come for the government to admit that the United States is a direct contributor to instability in the region.

NORTHERN TROLLERS ASSOCIATION

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, for many years the boundary between Alaska and British Columbia in Dixon Entrance has been in dispute, the latest evidence of these difficulties being the arrest of the Canadian troller inside our waters earlier this year by the U.S. coast guard.

In order to help prevent such incidents, the Northern Trollers Association has requested that Canada establish a navigational aid on Nunez Rock, one mile inside Canadian waters. This would clearly mark the rock to aid Canadian fishermen and mariners in an area noted for strong tides and inclement weather.

If the light beacon were to be equipped with automated devices, it would also provide badly needed weather reports for Canadian and American vessels alike. Most important, it would clearly establish Canadian sovereignty in this area to prevent a recurrence of last spring's incidents and thus ensure the freedom and safety of our Canadian fishermen.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the centres of excellence announcement made by the government show shamefully how little commitment it has to research and development. We are still miles behind the leading nations of the world. We are losing our competitive edge. Government has abandoned the social sciences and the humanities in this whole process. Not one single project has been funded. The social sciences and the humanities contribute to our quality of life, to productivity, to our competitiveness. There is no vision, no in-depth knowledge of what research and development can do for the nation.

[Translation]

Where is your vision? Where is the financial support for social sciences and the humanities? I ask you to reconsider your decision.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

MEMBER OF THE SENATE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the ministers that we questioned in connection with the Cogger affairs all insisted that ministers of the Crown have no responsibility for the honesty, the probity or the proper functioning of their departments. They insisted that the matters we were raising were matters for the Senate.

I want to ask the Minister of Energy about the very superficial inspection which he claims to have done of records of his department. He says there is no paper record showing any involvement of Senator Cogger. I want to ask on top of that whether he has done any checking to see if the senator made any oral representations in the department. Did he check with his predecessor, the present Minister of Communications, to see if representations were made to that minister in connection with it, or did Senator Cogger's close friend, the Prime Minister, or any members of the Prime Minister's Office make representations in connection with these projects?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member by that last reference does not add anything to the legitimacy of the first part of the question. I say that to him as colleagues who have been in this House for a long period of time.

I think it has to be said and should be said to the hon. member. I have gone back to the department again. I have asked whether there was any representation of any form by Senator Cogger in terms of the department in reference to the project in question. I have been advised that the department has no record of any verbal, oral or written representation from the Senator.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will have to see the record, but I wonder whether the minister answered that there were no representations from the senator or on behalf of the senator by others from the Prime Minister's Office.

Let me point out that the statement made by Senator Michel Cogger yesterday is a very narrow statement in which he says:

> I have in no way intervened with anyone in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

This Hydromega grant project is a very complicated project. Environment Canada and the Department of Transport were also required to approve of this project. I want to ask the main minister responsible for it if he has checked to ascertain whether those departments which provided their approval in an amazingly short period of time when this project was under active consideration received representations and whether he has investigated the situation in relation to them.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, with reference to any representation made from anyone in the Prime Minister's Office, that has also been checked. The answer to that is an unequivocal no, as I gave with respect to any advice we received in relation to Senator Cogger.

In terms of my predecessor, he has also been asked and the same answer applies there.

With respect to this project being "very quickly approved", it is a complicated project and it was not very quickly approved. If the member goes through the guidelines of application, he will see that on July 10, 1985, the concept proposal was submitted by Hydromega. You then go from July 10, 1985 to February 1988. Yesterday the innuendo was left that money "somehow was found to fund the project". The answer is very clearly there. The project was approved at that time with moneys that were approved by Parliament for this program, effective April 1, 1988.

Additionally, if the member looks at the project he will find that there was another innuendo by the member from Glengarry–Prescott–Russell that this was a large project and all the others were much smaller. Let me read some of the projects: Carleton University—

An Hon. Member: Table it.

Mr. Epp: I would love to table it—Emcon Enterprises $470; Hamilton Street Railways $635; Cristy Adams $343; Newfoundland Light and Power $436. Let us stay with the facts and not the innuendoes that you are so quick to throw across the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Kaplan: I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question about this matter, because there are several departments involved. Senator Cogger's statements have been contradicted by others. I would like to ask him whether, as he has done in the past, the Prime Minister brought the case to the attention of the RCMP.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as I said yesterday, this is a matter that concerns the other place. However, I have been informed that a request has been made to have the matter referred to a committee of the other place.

Furthermore, in the light of allegations made in the House and elsewhere, I can confirm to the House that this morning I was informed by the RCMP that it was now considering whether there was a case for conducting a formal investigation.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice stated that the allegations against Senator Cogger should only be investigated by the other place.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Is it seriously the position of this government today that any and all matters relating to alleged improprieties by senators only be investigated by the senate?

An Hon. Member: He won't answer.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, it is too bad the hon. member did not listen to the answer to the previous question. I made it very clear that in the light of allegations made here in the House and elsewhere, the RCMP informed me it was now looking at all the facts to see whether there was a case for conducting a formal investigation. Again, my answer was quite clear, and it is still the same answer, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, it is fortunate that we have the RCMP in this country so that they can press the cabinet into doing its job. I am still concerned about the way the cabinet looks at this. Thank heavens an investigation may be under way, wherever it started.

We are dealing here with allegations involving possible infractions of two Criminal Code sections. Given what the minister said yesterday, there is a lot of curiosity on this side of the House. Can the minister define for us which Criminal Code sections normally come under police authority and which ones he thinks belong only to the Senate?

An Hon. Member: That is out of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, it is not a minister's role to give legal opinions in this House. The RCMP is a police force that acts independently and conducts its own investigations. It is an honourable police force, and I think it should be allowed to conduct its investigation. It is not up to a minister to give the RCMP directives or legal opinions, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy. It pertains to Section 16 of the Parliament of Canada Act. I will just read part of it so the minister will know directly what I am asking about:

> No member of the Senate shall receive or agree to receive any compensation directly or indirectly for services rendered or to be rendered to any person either by the member or another person
> (b) for the purpose of influencing or attempting to influence any member of either House, that is to say, including a member of Parliament.

There is a report in the press today that Senator Cogger in fact arranged a meeting that included a couple of Conservative MPs, specifically the Member of Parliament for Châteauguay, for the purpose of influencing, so the story alleges, a decision ultimately to obtain funds from the Government of Canada.

The Minister has taken care to say that the senator in question did not contact the department at any time. He will agree that if he contacted a Member of Parliament with the purpose of trying to obtain influence and obtain a fee for that, he would be in violation of the statute I just quoted, the Parliament of Canada Act.

In exercising his responsibilities, has the minister ascertained whether that story in the press today is true or false?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have. Two points should be made. First, I understand that Senator Cogger has denied the allegations. I thought there was a tradition in this House that we do not question the word of members, and I think we should respect that.

Second, I asked the member whose name appears in the press today what the meeting and reference was about. I asked my departmental officials as well. There was no meeting relating to the department. There was no departmental official at any of the meetings referred to in the press. The meeting that took place, as it was referred to in the press, was between the principals involved and Hydromega.

Mr. Broadbent: Again the minister chose his words with care. The issue in the part of the act that I quoted is not whether the department officials were influenced. It is whether a member of Parliament was attempting to be influenced. If the senator does that, it is in clear violation of the act.

I would like to ask the minister to come clean with the House on that. Did he ask the members in question whether the subject under discussion at that meeting arranged by Senator Cogger concerned the money. That is the issue.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I am choosing my words carefully because I want to be very accurate. I take it that the hon. member expects that of me and I expect that of him.

I asked the member in question and the description of the meeting that I referred to is accurate. It is exactly as he gave it to me.

The last point that I would make is this. So that there is no confusion or that people in the House say that I have not given the full details, members of Parliament, the questioner or anyone in this House, may make representations to a department as to when approval will be given to a project. I think we do that regularly as members of Parliament, asking for information about projects in our ridings as to the status or whether or not they will be approved.

• (1430)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have certainly drawn my conclusion from what the minister said because once again he did not deal with the issue. The issue is whether—and that is what would be the violation of the act—the senator obtained a fee for having a conversation with a Member of Parliament to try to influence that Member of Parliament in obtaining funds or a grant for the company in question. That was the issue at stake, and for the third time the minister failed to deal with that.

[Translation]

My last question is directed to the Prime Minsiter of Canada. Today, the Gloge and Mail reported a member of the Conservative Caucus as suggesting he was a participant in a conversation about a contract with the federal government, and that this conversation had been arranged by a senator. Is this process acceptable to the Prime Minister of Canada, yes or no?

[English]

Mr. Epp: Again, Mr. Speaker, the senator has denied that allegation. I referred to that denial earlier.

In my conversation with the Member of Parliament I received every denial that he was not involved in any of the allegations that are made, and Mr. Cogger has very categorically denied the allegations.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It concerns the subject of double standards in the handling of this latest chapter of ongoing Tory cronyism, the Michel Cogger affair.

On January 20, 1987, in response to allegations of wrongdoing against then senator designate Jean Bazin, the Prime Minister said, and I quote from page 2449 of Hansard:

> —the same facts were brought to my attention and I immediately asked for a police investigation. And no one will receive special treatment in this respect: neither you nor I nor Mr. Bazin— The only way to see justice done is to ask the RCMP to conduct a complete and independent investigation.

My question is this. How long has the Prime Minister and this government been aware of possible wrongdoing in this particular case? Will he now tell the House that he will order a full RCMP investigation into these allegations?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I believe this question was already raised a few minutes ago. In the circumstances, in the light of the allegations that have been made, I can only repeat that the RCMP informed us this morning that it was checking all the facts to see whether there was a case for investigating the matter further. I think this is entirely normal in the circumstances, and it is not up to the Solicitor General or any other minister to interfere with the RCMP's work. We must let the RCMP do its job.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the Solicitor General told us repeatedly that this was a matter for investigation and consideration by the other place. Since the Government Leader of the other place is a member of this cabinet, what instructions has Senator Murray been given on how to proceed with this matter in the other place? Where did these instructions originate—with the Solicitor General, with the Minister of Justice, or with Senator Cogger's close personal friend, the Prime Minister?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the display of emotion.

Mr. Fontana: We are happy to see you.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says he is happy to see me. I am happy to see you.

With regard to the question, my understanding is that the senator has denied the allegations that have been brought forward.

Second, he has asked for the Senate to constitute an appropriate investigation of his activities. I am informed by the Leader of the Government in the Senate that that will be acceded to.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. It concerns the operations of the Federal Business Development Bank.

In addition to issues raised earlier in the House today by my colleagues, there is now a report that Senator Michel Cogger, whose firm acts as counsel to the Federal Business Development Bank, lobbied the Federal Business Development Bank for a grant to the University of Sherbrooke, which has as a member of its board of directors none other than Senator Michel Cogger. The purpose of this grant was to purchase courses from Pleuricanaux Ltee., a firm half-owned by none other than Senator Cogger.

Given this series of incestuous relationships, will the Prime Minister now do the right thing and call for a full judicial commission of inquiry now?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, in July, 1987, the Federal Business Development Bank entered into an agreement with the University of Sherbrooke to develop a home study course which included audio-visual support. This was a new project as the bank was not then involved in the home study format.

The loan of $100,000 was made to the University of Sherbrooke from the Federal Business Development Bank. Part of the payment back from the University of Sherbrooke to the bank was by way of royalties. The Federal Business Development Bank received $120,000 in royalties, so that more than paid it off.

Pleuricanaux had previously successfully marketed a home study business management course for Tele—Université and Pleuricanaux did this on behalf of the University of Sherbrooke. It was a successful effort all the way around.

Mr. Boudria: Well, it sure was successful if your name was Michel Cogger. I want to ask a supplementary of the minister.

Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister and concerns another issue, Hydroméga.

Yesterday, the Hon. Member for Châteauguay admitted outside the House, to the media, that he himself had been lobbied by Senator Cogger. Considering the fact that shortly afterwards, the senator allegedly received $2,500 from the same company, my question to the Deputy Prime Minister is this: Isn't it time we ensured that section 16 of the Parliament of Canada Act is observed? Section 16 prohibits a member of the Senate from lobbying a member of the House of Commons for a fee.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the law applies to everyone, and that is why this morning, the RCMP informed us it was looking at all the allegations made here in the House and elsewhere, to find out whether there was a case for pursuing the matter further.

It is not up to a minister of this Government to interpret the law or legal precedents in this case. It is up to the RCMP as an honourable police force to look at all the facts and make its decisions accordingly, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. One of the central issues before the House now is how the Solicitor General has carried out his responsibilities in this matter.

The Solicitor General has indicated, in his words, that he was informed by the RCMP 24 hours after this matter has been raised in the House. My question to the Solicitor General is: Did he take initiative and raise this with the RCMP? Or did he wait until the RCMP had launched its investigation before he informed this House of its actions?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's question concerns the RCMP. What is important in this country, Mr. Speaker, is to let this honourable police force do its job, without political interference.

Mr. Speaker, the RCMP has in fact informed me that it was reviewing all the facts in this connection. And I think that the freedom we enjoy in this country also means having a police force that operates without government interference.

[English]

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, it is very clear from the answer that the minister did not, in fact, ask the RCMP to do its duty in this respect.

Given the onerous other duties that the minister has been given by the Prime Minister in this case, perhaps it is not surprising he is not aware of his duty under Section 5 of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act. That act makes it very clear that the Commissioner of the RCMP is under the direction of the minister, and the minister is responsible to this House for its actions. Given that the minister with a great deal of fanfare last week declared this Crime Prevention Week, is this his idea of crime prevention?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I was very clear in my previous answers. I informed the House that the RCMP had exercised its right to engage in an investigation and to look at the facts as it sees fit, whether or not at the request of the Solicitor General.

In the circumstances, I felt it was of the essence to announce, at the earliest opportunity, which was this afternoon, that the RCMP informed me this morning it had already started looking at all the facts, all the allegations made here in the House and elsewhere, to find out whether there was a case for pursuing the matter further. I think this is entirely normal in the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, and that this complies with the spirit and intent of the legislation.

• (1440)

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy who is being very careful in his choice of words today.

The Parliament of Canada Act prohibits a senator or MP from taking money for lobbying another senator or MP. The Minister of Energy today said: "Yes, but Senator Cogger did not lobby anybody in my department. I have checked. That has been confirmed".

Given that the Member for Châteauguay has told several reporters outside the House that that member and the then Member for LaSalle together attended a meeting with Hydromega officials, organized and at the request of Senator Cogger, and given that we know that Senator Cogger was paid $2,500 for lobbying those members to attend those meetings—that is the allegation—my question for the Minister of Energy is the following: Will he check the records, or has he checked the records, and can he tell us whether the member for Châteauguay met officials of his department? If the member for Châteauguay and the then Member for LaSalle met officials of his department, were they lobbying on behalf of Hydromega? In other words, were they fulfilling the request of Senator Cogger who has violated the Parliament of Canada Act?

Mr. Speaker: I have tried not to interrupt because, as I have said before—and I want not only members to hear this, I want the public to hear it—in this place there is not only a right to inquire on matters such as this, there is a duty. It is very important that allegations and accusations are not made unless there is a very serious basis for them. The Question Period in preambles is not the place to do it. I would ask the hon. member to be very careful. I think that the hon. minister is prepared to answer. But, clearly, that preamble goes a little too far.

Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, on the first point in respect to Senator Cogger, I repeat that he has denied the allegations. It has been said in this House today that he has asked for an appropriate committee of the other place to investigate the allegations that have been made.

I refer the hon. member to an earlier argument along very similar lines which was made in this House on May 12, 1983. The then Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, said this, and I quote: "I do know that the Senate and House of Commons Act"—which it was then called—"speaks for itself. The qualifications of a senator are clearly defined".

As to the latter part of the question, will the government be taking any initiatives, I believe it is for the Senate to determine any question relating to the status of its own members.

On the last point, yes, I have checked in the department, and I answered the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party as to whether there was any representation made by any member of the House of Commons, said to the House at the time, and I repeat it, the member called the department and asked when the funding would be approved. I say to the hon. member that he has done that in various projects for his own riding. I have done it. If there is any member in this House who has not done it, he or she is not fulfilling the responsibility and duty which that member was were elected to do.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I certainly acknowledge the Speaker's advice and caution. The issue is not whether the member for Châteauguay, or the then member for LaSalle, or the Minister of Energy, or the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte called a department in support of a community project. That is not the issue. I have no objection to the member for Chateauguay making 10 calls on behalf of a project for his constituents. What I have an objection to is if that call is made as a consequence of a request by another member of Parliament—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tobin: —a Senator or MP—if that occurred and if that individual was paid for putting that influence on a member.

So that it is perfectly clear, I want to ask the Minister of Energy whether or not he is prepared to inform the House now, if he has the information. And if he does not, at the first opportunity, precisely when—because it is public information as the minister just said—the member for Chateauguay and the then member for LaSalle made representations to the Department of Energy? Was it one day, one hour, two days or two hours after they attended that meeting with Hydromega officials, which in the words of the member for Chateauguay, was arranged by Senator Cogger?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member confirms what I said, namely, that the member had every right and every responsibility to check on the status of projects in his riding, particularly this one relating to Hydromega.

With respect to the allegation that the hon. member just hurled across the floor again, namely, that the hon. member if and when he called the department, therefore by extension he naturally is acting relative to the allegations is something that is not sustainable and I suggest to the hon. member that the hon. member called as a member of Parliament. He should not make the allegation that he called only because of the statements related to the press.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. It is on the same subject. There is a basic principle of law in Canada. It is that justice must not only be done but it must appear to be done.

In this particular case the perception is that Senator Cogger is being protected, that there is a double standard, one standard for the average Canadian and another standard for a friend of the Prime Minister.

I would like to ask the Solicitor General to carry out his responsibility and to direct the RCMP in an unequivocal fashion to conduct a full and complete investigation into all the allegations and, furthermore, to table that complete report in the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend believes in the basic principles of justice, under such principles we are not here before a court of law, and people should not be convicted before there is a full investigation.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blais: Those are basic principles of Canadian justice and British justice.

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, the RCMP informed me that, in the light of the allegations inside and outside this House that were brought to its attention, it was reviewing the matter to see whether further investigation was warranted. I believe this is quite normal and proper for the RCMP, and it would be improper for me to interfere in the process by telling it what it should or should not do. I believe that in the interest of the basic principle of justice, I should let the RCMP do its job.

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, what the Solicitor General is saying is that the RCMP is investigating in order to determine whether a full investigation is necessary. Of course a full investigation is necessary. If it were Joe Blow from Kokomo you would have a full investigation into these allegations.

The RCMP is looking into criminal activity. The Senate will be looking into the personal conduct of Senator Cogger. My question for the Prime Minister is this: Who will be looking into and investigating the conduct of his ministers and members of Parliament?

• (1450)

Would he not consider it appropriate in the circumstances to conduct a full investigation of conduct on the part of members of Parliament falling short of criminal activity?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I think it is important again to stress that every Canadian citizen has a duty to respect the RCMP's integrity. If the hon. member has any factual information, not mere allegations, he has a responsibility as has every other Member of Parliament to go to the RCMP, state his information, and let the RCMP proceed with its investigation. That is the proper way under the basic principles of justice in Canada, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to the Minister of Energy. His responses have been very carefully crafted. I want to seek some clarification from him.

In the minister's discussions with the hon. member for Châteauguay, did he identify whether the member of Parliament was doing, as others do, that is, lobby to encourage a particular financial support for a firm which is considering locating or expanding in his own constituency? The question is, did he determine from the member that Senator Cogger had lobbied that member to encourage the member to lobby on behalf of the firm from which he had indirectly received fees?

Mr. Speaker: The question may be a very interesting one, but it is getting dangerously into the ground, and I think it may well be in the ground, where if this line of questioning is pursued and was answered the hon. member in question would probably have a right to at least raise a question of privilege in this House. It puts me in some considerable difficulty.

Perhaps I could help the hon. member for Kamloops. The implication of the question seems to me that the minister is to make some comment about what the member did or did not do and that, it seems to me, is getting dangerously into the question of the privilege of a private member.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy indicated that he had had conversations with the hon. member. I am simply asking if, in those conversations, he asked the hon. member whether he had been encouraged by Senator Cogger to do this lobbying?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said earlier that I was choosing my words carefully. I am. I am choosing my words carefully not because I am trying to hide anything, but because I have always thought that in this House we were very conscious of the rights of individuals and that we did not try to throw out allegations which the person did not have a chance or a right to defend himself or herself against. That is the way I thought this place functioned.

Second, I spoke to the hon. member, as I have said in the House today and I have asked my department as well. In everything that I have been advised about there has been no indication of any type that any moneys were exchanged, that the project was not approved in a legitimate and approved manner, or that the hon. member received any benefit. That is the only issue to which I can refer member about the references that were in the public press today.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

It seems to me that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is agreeing that it would appear now that Senator Cogger did lobby the hon. member for Châteauguay to lobby on behalf of the firm—

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Given what I have said, and concerning myself particularly with respect to that question regarding the privilege of a member of this place, I am going to rule that question out at this time.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In light of last night's three statements by party leaders on the Meech Lake Accord, does the Prime Minister expect further developments before next week's First Ministers' Conference in Ottawa?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Opposition expresses surprise when a question that goes to the heart of the well-being of the nation is raised.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: It is 2.57 p.m., and this is the most important question that has been raised here today. I commend the member for raising it.

I want to commend the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the NDP for what I thought, if I may say so, were excellent speeches last evening defending the Meech Lake Accord, which is so important.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: If I may say so, mine was pretty good too.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I have had conversations and meetings with premiers. We hope to have a productive conference next week when the first ministers arrive. It is a conference on the economy. But there will be, as often is the case, constitutional matters discussed. We hope to work our way through some of the obstacles that presently exist.

My hon. friend asked if there was anything new. One thing that is new is a statement that appeared in this morning's Le Devoir by Mr. Chrétien, which states:

[Translation]

> Still in favour of granting Quebec a right of veto on constitutional amendments, as proposed by the former Trudeau Government, he sees no reason why this should be extended to every province.

He said, and I quote:

> I am not convinced that Prince Edward Island should be granted a right of veto.

There,

[English]

That is a very important statement by Mr. Chrétien, Mr. Speaker. He proposes, it would appear, to erect a two-tier kind of country where Quebec gets a veto, but Newfoundland does not; where Ontario gets a veto, but Manitoba does not. This is unacceptable. This is what the Meech Lake Accord was designed to correct.

ARTS AND CULTURE

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, like most nations' capital cities around the world which take pride and showcase their national cultural treasures, so too do we here in Ottawa through our museums of Civilization, Natural Science, Science and Technology, as well as the National Gallery and the National Arts Centre.

The Minister of Communications is accountable for, through this House, and in the name of Canadians, the well-being of these national treasures. Will the minister state here and now that he will respect the national mandate and ensure the survival of the National Arts Centre for all Canadians as a national showcase for dance.

Speaker's ruling

• (1500)

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the mandate of the National Arts Centre is well known. The budget was discussed in a parliamentary committee. I am quite aware that there is a labour conflict there, as there has been in many other places, and that labour conflict must be settled between the orchestra and the directors of the National Arts Centre.

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the same minister. We have a National Arts Centre that is starved financially and the response from the minister implies that its problems are not solely financial.

Rumours are rife that the minister is prepared to allow the National Arts Centre to become a regional rather than a national centre. The orchestra is at risk. Newspapers across this country have stated that the orchestra's demise would be a capital offence.

Will the minister move swiftly to bring the NAC from its knees to its feet and assure Canadians that this government is committed to the National Arts Centre as its national cultural institution?

[Translation]

Mr. Masse: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the House of Commons is the place to comment on the rumours going around Ottawa.

POINT OF ORDER

STANDING ORDER 86(5)—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Before I call orders of the day, I have an important point of order to respond to raised by the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby on October 20 and again on October 26.

The member questioned the inclusion on the Notice Paper of two items which she argued appeared to be substantially the same as two other private members' bills now on the Order Paper, namely Bill C-261, standing in the name of the hon. member for York South—Weston, and Bill C-266, standing in the name of the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex. These two bills were introduced and read a first time on September 27, 1989 and October 10, 1989 respectively.

[Translation]

The first of these is a bill introduced by the member for Scarborough-West (Mr. Wappel) on October 20. It is an Act to Amend the Criminal Code (Human Being). The second was introduced last Thursday, October 26, by the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria); it is an Act to Amend the Criminal Code (Destruction of Foetus).

[English]

Standing Order 86(5) states:

> The Speaker shall be responsible for determining whether two or more items are so similar as to be substantially the same, in which case he or she shall so inform the Member or Members whose items were received last and the same shall be returned to the Member or Members without having appeared on the Notice Paper.

The hon. member is invoking this standing order to ask the Chair to use its discretionary power to keep these items from appearing on the Notice Paper.

When I say "to keep these items from appearing on the Notice Paper", I should point out that the hon. member has put the application forward on a perfectly logical and proper procedural motion and that is, of course, the only basis upon which I can respond. I want members and the public to know that the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby is raising a procedural point and she certainly has every right to raise it and to have it argued.

I have carefully considered the argument presented by the hon. member and have reviewed the items in question with equal care. I should say that in the view of the Chair, two or more items are substantially the same if, first, they have the same purpose and, second, they obtain their purpose by the same means.

Accordingly, there could be several bills addressing the same subject, but if they took a different approach to the issue the Chair would judge them to be sufficiently different so as not to be substantially the same.

In my view, that is exactly the case we have here.

It is clear that the two bills which have already been given first reading, and the other two bills introduced and now awaiting first reading treat the same subject matter. Hon. members will know, and the public should know, that the subject matter is the question of the unborn child and what the law ought to be with respect to that. On these grounds, they meet the first criteria for being substantially the same. However, on examination of their contents, the Chair has concluded that there are sufficient differences as to how they sought to accomplish their purpose so that they could not be judged to be substantially the same.

This approach accords with the practice both before and after the introduction of this standing order in 1986. The intent of the new rule was to give members an opportunity to put before the House items of concern to them, but to prevent a multiplicity of identical bills being submitted in the draw for Private Members' Business. However, Standing Order 86(3) provides that any member prevented from submitting a bill because of a decision of the Chair can add his or her name as seconder to a bill already on notice on the Order Paper.

In the present case, the Chair has carefully examined the bills in question and finds that there are sufficient differences in their content to allow them to proceed. I would, therefore, allow the hon. member for Scarborough West and the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell to move first reading of their respective bills.

I thank the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby for giving me the opportunity to clarify the position of the Chair with regard to Standing Order 86. Again, I stress that the point raised by the hon. member was a procedural one and one to which she was completely entitled to argue. I also want to say to the hon. member that because of the nature of the bills, the Chair most carefully examined the references to various sections of the Criminal Code, and I do want to say to her that those various references did help to persuade the Chair that the bill should go forward. I assure the hon. member that very considerable attention was given to the legitimate point of procedure which she has raised.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, this being Thursday, I would like to ask the government House leader to give us a statement of the business that the government intends to call for the coming week.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we are going to call first reading of Bill C-40, the broadcasting bill, followed up with Bill C-16, space agency bill, on Monday we will call the second day of the third reading debate on Bill C-21, on Tuesday there is a very good chance we will commence debate on the abortion bill.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs. McDougall that Bill C-21, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak on this very important bill.

As many members of this House might have noticed, today we had a demonstration from members of an organization of Canadians who are highly trained, who have had training, and could have well-paying jobs. They are protesting the thrust of this bill, not only for themselves as beneficiaries, as people who will lose a lot because of this bill, but also for all the other Canadians who do not have the opportunity or cannot come to Ottawa to protest strongly against this Government's bill.

• (1510)

With them, I join the protests of other groups like Action Chômage, like the one in Montreal which at the same time as we are debating is holding a press ocnference in Montreal to protest the actions of the Department and the Government. What we see here, Mr. Speaker, is confusion between the policies of the Department, that is, the bureaucracy and officials, and the actions and statements of the Minister. The two are not working together in a way that all Canadians find valid and can accept. We have to know who is in charge, who is calling the shots for all these departmental projects, the officials or the Minister?

In a press clipping dates September 3, we see the Deputy Minister of Employment state the philosophy underlying this bill, and I will quote him in English since I do not have the French translation:

[English]

"The assumption which is rather fundamental for this bill that nobody's behaviour would be changed if you changed UI, whereas we assumed that if you make it necessary for someone to work 14 weeks instead of 12, people will make the extra effort and will work the extra two weeks in many cases where they have the opportunity".

I do not know where they are going to find these jobs. If the deputy minister says that by simply mandating that everyone must look for another job that they will find it, the only reaction we can ask on this side of the House is, who is running the show? Is it the department, or is it the minister who condones this kind of rationale, or does the minister herself believe this? I do not know how she can believe it, because when we take a look at the government's own statistics we can see the average duration of unemployment. The average duration of unemployment, after six years of unprecedented growth in this country, and we are going to accept the government rhetoric in this regard, nationally is 18.7 weeks; prior to these periods of unprecedented growth prior to the recession, the average period of unemployment was only 17.2 weeks so we are not making much progress.

The employment and growth rates in this country after six years of so-called unprecedented growth nationally are only 7.8 per cent. I caution all members that when we are talking about 7.8 per cent, we are speaking about a ratio that is considerably lower than the pre-recession period. At the lowest in that period it was 7.5 per cent. Nothing in this government's strategy indicates that we are actually making any progress in that regard.

I have to ask myself again, what is it that drives this department and this minister? If we look at whether we are creating a new labour force for some purpose and reason, how do we go about it? Do we go about it by decimating the people and workers of various regions and sectors of our country, those who are less advantaged than others, especially when, in terms of labour market programs, Canada ranks well below the other OECD nations? In fact, in employment promotion, were it not for countries like Japan and the United States, Canada would be at the very bottom in terms of investment in employment promotion. It ranks somewhere near the middle in terms of income maintenance, but that is going to change after this particular proposal.

For example, the growth of labour in Canada between 1977 and 1981 always exceeded 2.9 per cent. In the last four years, after unprecedented growth, we are one percentage point below the level that we had prior to the recession.

I do not know if we are going to think seriously that because we are going to implement Bill C-21, which is going to ravage an income-maintenance system, that we are going to satisfy the needs of the deputy minister of this department. The deputy minister says, I guess on behalf of the minister, "if we force people to look for a job for an additional two to six weeks they will find it because they can always move to Toronto. Look at all the shops that say 'help wanted'", at less than $5.50 an hour. "Let them take that." After all, minimum wage is going to be more than the average amount that one derives from unemployment insurance benefits if one qualifies. They are going to get help to move. There is a $15 million fund. Everybody is going to move from from the maritimes, northern Ontario, the prairies, northern B.C., and the Northwest Territories, to where all those jobs exist Burlington and southern Ontario.

The growth of employment in addition to the growth of labour is still well below the rates that were verified in Canada prior to the recession. This government's record is not all that good after six years of unprecedented growth. For example, from 1984 to 1987 there was an average of 2.6 per cent in growth of employment, whereas the average in the 1977 to 1981 period was well in excess of 3.5 per cent. Those are not my statistics. These are statistics that the government accepts. They are StatsCanada figures. I got them at the same place that the government gets its statistics.

When we take a look at where we are going, we can no longer think in terms of success in the works as the government says it program is, in terms of whether we will actually get people to work, because we have not been able to do that in sufficient numbers and with sufficient quality. I stress the word quality because what we need to do if we are going to enhance the productivity and the growth of this nation is to develop a program where people can earn more, progress, and provide long-term advantage for their entire families, where they can look beyond the needs of today and the exigencies of the moment. In fact, they can engage in some long-term planning.

How can the government propose this bill in the absence of a comprehensive industrial economic strategy and immigration policy? Over the course of the last couple of decades, we have developed a cheap labour pool that has been a disincentive for technological innovation, and yet in this country where immigration continues to serve the interests of this cheap labour pool, what have we done? We have cast aside the potential for growth represented by a sound and progressive immigration policy. We have put a tariff of $150,000 for those who have a few dollars to spare and will invest in Canada. We will give them landed immigrant status regardless of their location of origin, their race, their creed, whatever, as along as they come up with $150,000. We do not take advantage of the talents, the energies, the dynamics and the risk-taking characteristics that many of these new Canadians could bring to us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Kootenay West—Revelstoke.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I regret to interrupt my hon. friend, but I believe that the House lacks a quorum.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We now have a quorum. The member for Eglinton-Lawrence.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, in that moment of reprieve as we were taking a count of the members, I know there were many more than other colleagues could see because they were more and more attentive.

Mr. Kempling: Your speech was so boring that they couldn't stand it.

Mr. Volpe: What was happening, Mr. Speaker, more than anything else, is that some of them are catching up on the rest that they have been losing at night as they have been thinking about what is going to happen to their jobs. Tory times, as one of my colleagues said, are hard times indeed. They stay awake at night thinking about what they are going to do the day after this bill is presented.

• (1520)

So, Mr. Parliamentary Secretary, let's start thinking about making proposals that are comprehensive in nature so that this government can at least show some initiatives and leadership, the kind of leadership that has been lacking so far.

Mr. Kempling: Say something with substance.

Mr. Volpe: You wouldn't understand it if I gave it to you all in one lump sum, Mr. Parliamentary Secretary. We have been giving you more substance than you can handle and you say pooh-pooh, we do not believe this. We have given you statistics from all kinds of organizations and research groups. I have read some into the record. I see the parliamentary secretary giving a shrug of the shoulders and saying: "Well, they are not our statistics. I do not believe them."

I am going to read some of the statistics from his own impact studies and perhaps maybe he will be able to understand that there is a different interpretation to some of those figures and those interpretations give a better picture of Canada than the one that he and his minister would like us to have believe.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, many people from other countries bring energy, talent, dynamism and entrepreneurial spirit to Canada. We have someone who is both Minister of Employment and Minister of Immigration making decisions in a vacuum.

[English]

The government should be looking for ways to capitalize on the creative talent of all Canadians. Many who come from overseas have energy, talent, education and commercial expertise that goes untapped. A solid labour development strategy should seek to exploit this source of talent through a progressive immigration policy.

[English]

If the government is not going to pay attention to the comprehensive nature of its decision, can we be at all surprised that when it proposes these restrictions on qualifications, when it proposes enormous reductions in benefits that we will suffer throughout Canada?

I want to draw to the attention of the parliamentary secretary because he asks for something substantive. I am going to give him some of the statistics that they gave us from an impact study that they passed out surreptitiously without much notice three months after we asked for it in this House, impact studies of this Bill C–21. Even though they tried to hide some figures they did admit finally two months after they had said that only 300,000 people would be affected negatively throughout the country according to their impact studies based on StatsCan figures, we are looking at better than 770,000 Canadian who will be impacted negatively as a result of this proposed legislation.

I am not talking about figures that I derived from StatsCanada. I am not talking about figures that the minister says come from the CLC and other labour organizations and therefore they must, department's own statistics. The department's own statistics show that, in terms of the percentages of claimants who will suffer reductions to unemployment insurance in the province of Newfoundland 41 per cent will suffer reductions. These are the government's figures.

In P.E.I., 46 per cent of all claimants will suffer reductions. In Nova Scotia, 31.5 per cent of all claimants will suffer reductions. In New Brunswick, 40 per cent of all claimants will suffer reductions. In Manitoba, 49 per cent of all claimants will suffer reductions. Surely, this is a vindictive rather than a constructive approach to labour development. I say vindictive because those same figures reflect just a little bit more heavily on the general population. When we take a look at the percentage that claimants will suffer as a result of a new benefit schedule and new entrance requirements we see 36 per cent in Newfoundland, 39.3 per cent in P.E.I., 33 per cent in New Brunswick, 33.1 per cent in Manitoba. Those people as claimants are a percentage of the total population. We are not talking about people in a vacuum. That will give an indication to all hon. members just how significant the unemployment insurance program is as an income maintenance program and as a program to address the regional disparities of this country.

In Newfoundland those who claim benefits from unemployment insurance, a program into which they have made their proper payments, represent 19.67 per cent of the entire population. That is one in five man, woman and child is going to have a negative impact as a result of the application Bill C–21.

When one considers that the average is better than $1,200 per claimant, I ask members to think in terms of the impact, in a macro sense, as I said earlier, not in a micro sense. What happens when one out of every five residents of Newfoundland suffers an average of better than $1,200 in annual income reduction? What does that do to the disposable income of the residents of such a province? What does that do to their purchasing power? What does it do to their ability to purchase more in the market–place and to stimulate more growth? I think the answer is obvious.

It would be okay if it was only an isolated case in Newfoundland. But in Prince Edward Island, 17.43 per cent of every man, woman and child will suffer reductions. In Nova Scotia, just a little bit better, 11.25 per cent; in New Brunswick, 14.82 per cent; in Quebec, 10.5 per cent of the population will feel the pinch of this particular bill.

What is really sad about this is that the government in the committee hearings and in this House, in the press, and in the media, has refused to engage members on this side of the House in debate. It has been saying out loud that we have to clean up the act of all those claimants. I said earlier in this debate, that if the government wants to punish those who abuse, punish them. If it wants to be severe with them, be severe. But do not ruin the system, tear apart the structure and punish every single man, woman and child in this country because of a few abusers. We do not know whether those abusers are individuals or corporations.

In terms of justification, let me given an indication since I read some figures about eastern Canada and the maritimes being the repositories of this Tory government's vengeance. Let us see the reaction in terms of statistics. Remember they come from the government's impact studies. Only 5.3 per cent of all claimants of the unemployment insurance system from Newfoundland actually did so because they quit their job without just cause. That tells me that residents of Newfoundland will accept a job if there is one available. They do not go some place else willy–nilly. In P.E.I. it is only 6.7 per cent of all claimants.

We are talking about an over–all global picture of better than $1 million per annum. We can check the exact figures in a moment for the sake of the parliamentary secretary. But in P.E.I. as a percentage it is only 6.7 per cent. By contrast, in wealthy Ontario, the great golden horseshoe of southern Ontario around the great metropolis of Toronto, from which I come, 13.2 per cent actually quite their job without just cause. That tells us there is not much of a correlation between the government's decision to justify its cutbacks on the basis of a just cause theory.

In Saskatchewan, only 11.5 per cent quit their jobs without just cause. In wealthy B.C. it was 12.4 per cent. So, the poorer provinces find that their citizens work assiduously at whatever job is available.

• (1530)

Does Bill C–21 give them an opportunity to develop new jobs? The minister says that we are to develop new skills so that these people will be able to work and work productively. I say great. Where are these new skills to be applied? What is the economic strategy, the industrial policy, in which all these new skills will function and produce the kinds of benefits that the minister says will be there?

The minister cannot answer that question because she has not yet consulted with all those groups that appeared before the committee in order to give the committee an indication of what should be done. Even if we do give them some skills development, where will we apply them?

I say "even if" because quite frankly most of us in the committee began to look askance and with some scepticism that the minister and the department were intent on a new training system.

The minister is listening very carefully. In job development in 1988 the government actually reduced its input of moneys spent by 8 per cent. If we are to look for sincerity and direction in this particular bill, we have to take a look at its track record. In job entry programs there is a negative input of 1.7 per cent. The government said that we must train our people for the skills that are to come on line. I agreed with the government.

What did the government do? It cut back funds by 3.6 per cent.

What about skills investment? We need a futuristic attitude. We must look down the road. We must see where we can apply our talents and energies, our future. My leader said the other night, in paraphrasing Robert Kennedy: "Give me your best for tomorrow; give me your best intellectual capacities and your best energies upon which we will build a new nation".

In skills investment the minister and her department last year diminished the amount by 7.05 per cent. The minister has been justifying many of these actions by saying the government will put in lots of money so that the communities at the local level can tell us what they need. Members of Parliament being from those local areas and being in constant touch with their electorate cannot tell it.

In Community Futures the government reduced its input by 2.5 per cent. In innovations there was a 20 per cent reduction. One must look with scepticism at all these projections that the minister says are on line because when we take a look at the final outcome there is a question of the constitutionality of this particular bill.

One presenter from the greater Toronto area pointed out that what was happening was that the government was asking for an increase of funds available for training of up to 15 per cent of the total UI budget to be applied to training. That is clearly beyond the parliamentary mandate of this government because the UI system is an income maintenance system, not a training system. Yet the government is going to take 15 per cent.

According to the 1989 Estimates—I am going to use the most conservative estimate of 15 per cent of well over $10 billion excluding government contributions—that comes to approximately $1.5 billion available for training. Coincidentally, in Canadian Jobs Strategy the over–all amount of moneys available is $1.46 billion.

If we take a look at the track record of the government over the course of the last four years where there has been a reduction of $770 million toward training, we can expect that the government will take moneys from premiums.

The minister said when she made her Freudian slip earlier on in the day: "We are going to tax the employed and employers in order to provide training for those who qualify". Quite frankly, we will see government input in the CJS program diminish by the same amount of money that is to be transferred from premium payments, payments that no longer reflect any government input. In fact there will be an additional tax, especially upon those who have the low-skilled jobs.

When one takes a look at those kinds of actions, it is little wonder that the minister has pushed this bill through the House with closure at virtually every single stage. After only four hours of debate on second reading we were slapped with a closure motion. Our committee was constrained by time to present a report by October 10 and in fact in its clause by clause consideration was only able to get through 19 clauses. We had to vote on all the remaining clauses in a half hour.

The bill has not been given the appropriate consideration, perhaps rightly so, because if people could study this item by item to have an indication of just how serious and how negative this is for Canadians, there would be a revolution outside the very halls of this Chamber.

I am dismayed that we have now been set to time allocation and will not be able to address the evils of this bill much beyond Monday evening.

What I would like to do is give other opportunities to my colleagues to address some of the nefarious components of this particular bill, components that can draw attention to clause 19, for example, which is a permissive clause.

It gives the department the opportunities, the rights and the powers to draw up programs and to determine who shall qualify for the training programs, who is likely to profit in the estimation of the employment counsellor from those employment programs, and who in fact can implement that profit to personal satisfaction down the road. That would be fine.

I would almost accept that, except the clause also has a subparagraph that denies claimants the right to appeal the decisions of those employment counsellors. These employment counsellors do not have the greatest of preparation to make life decisions for those who find themselves without work and would seek to take advantage of an opportunity to improve their status as workers, as skilled tradesmen, and as productive Canadians.

Because of that, Mr. Speaker, I want to present a motion of my own. I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and the following substituted therefor:

Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, be not now read a third time but that it be read a third time this day six months hence.

• (1540)

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it is with no degree of joy that I rise today on the second last day of debate on Bill C-21, other than to be able to speak against it. There is no joy in the bill itself. This is one of the most devastating pieces of legislation which will ever pass through this House.

The official title of it is "an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act". I would suggest that a far better name for it would be a bill to re-enact slavery in Canada. Within the next 20 minutes I hope to be able to demonstrate why I think that is the case.

First, I would like to look at the record of this government. This government introduced this legislation in the most glowing of terms. If we were to believe what it says, and I am about to show that it certainly cannot be believed, this bill would be so beneficial to Canada that we would not have to worry in the 21st century about Canada's competitive situation in the world.

The government has introduced this measure as the coming mode of the 21st century. All I can say is: if this is what is in store for Canada in general and for Canadian workers specifically in the 21st century, I shudder to think of the dawning of the 21st century in Canada. The 20th century was supposed to belong to Canada. I suspect that that did not quite materialize. If the implication is that the 21st century is going to belong to Canada, I assure you that it will be no more successful because this government cannot be believed. In everything it has undertaken since it was elected it has demonstrated incompetence. It has demonstrated that it is not a government which can be believed.

Deregulation was introduced in the same glowing terms as Bill C-21. If we just talk about the airline industry alone we find not that there is more competition in the airline industry in Canada, not that there is better service to the communities of this great nation of ours, not that the transportation by air is cheaper. We find just the opposite. Communities are being less well served than they were. The cost of air travel has increased and the competition is almost non-existent.

That great airline, Air Canada, one of the great symbols of this nation, is another example of what this government is up to. It seems to be destroying the icons, the symbols of this nation. It has certainly done that with Air Canada. It has demonstrated that it cannot be trusted.

Free trade was introduced in the same manner. We were told that this was going to open markets for us and increase jobs. Canadian workers, of which I was one, were threatened in the last election that unless we voted in favour Canada would go down the tubes because we would not be able to be competitive.

The government said that it would take care of any Canadian workers who were displaced because of free trade. Once the bill passed this House, a day that will live in infamy in this country, in my memory certainly, what did we have? A special committee, set up to come forth with ideas to protect the Canadian workers, stated that it would not be that easy to keep track of who is displaced because of free trade, but that there were wonderful schemes in place anyway to take care of those people so it would not really be necessary. They emphasized that you cannot keep track of it.

Within the last couple of weeks there was a report stating that it was possible to keep track of the jobs displaced and what free trade was doing. We have reports from Canadian Tire that it was to boost its spending from $94 million to $160 million. The government claims from its own report, according to a newspaper item, that Domtar was increasing its facilities and going to create 130 jobs and that George Weston was spending $47 million with the implication that it was going to create untold numbers of jobs. The list goes on and on. Boeing of Canada was to spend $274 million according to this report of the government as a result of a study which said it could not be done. The claim was that free trade was good and this was the proof, in spite of the fact that it said it was not possible calculate. It has all these jobs listed to show that free trade was indeed good.

I suspect that in the whole report there was only bad news and worse news. The very companies which the Conservatives claimed to be the flagship of their proof that free trade was going to be beneficial for Canada, the same companies here such as Domtar may have created 130 jobs but they were also going to eliminate 77. George Weston was to spend $47 million but it is to let 360 people go. Campbell Soup is spending a tremendous amount of money but closing down its plant in Portage La Prairie, losing 168 jobs. It goes on and on.

The bottom line is that the government claims 4,000 jobs created with 2,000 spin-off jobs. If you count the number of jobs which were lost by those very same companies we have seen held up as the best example of the corporate elite doing the best they can for this country, they are going to be letting 6,400 people go. You can add the spin-off jobs that are going to be lost because of that. You cannot trust this government on anything it comes up with. Its very own examples show it to be the incompetent government bunch that the opposition said it was during the last election and previously as well.

During the election campaign we were told that the social programs were sacred trusts that would not be touched. The Conservatives said unemployment insurance was something that would be untouched. We had the Prime Minister's assurance on it. Today we see Bill C-21 gutting the unemployment insurance scheme, after having said that it would not happen. This government cannot be trusted. If we go back to the original sacred trust, the example of the senior citizens' pensions, if it was not for a tremendous amount of effort by the seniors in this country deindexing would have devastated them and their ability to survive even as poorly as many of them do now. It would have been even that much worse.

In spite of promises this government simply cannot be trusted. Now we have a threat to the Canadian seniors pensions again through the clawback provision. All this government does is cut, cut, cut. It has no more imagination than to cut programs. Why does it start with the social programs in this country? It goes back to free trade again.

Speaking of free trade, just yesterday we had some workers here on the Hill. Outboard Marine Corporation are the makers of Johnson and Evinrude outboard motors. They told their 300 employees—that is all that is left now—that because of free trade they could no longer afford to operate in Canada and that their plant was being moved out on January 5, five days after Bill C–21 comes into effect, and because of which workers in that plant would lose on average from 10 to 24 weeks of unemployment insurance. This bill is going to have a devastating effect on those people. Whether you are talking about free trade, whether you are talking about social programs, the evidence is that this government cannot be trusted.

Why is the government doing this? There are several reasons. The two reasons most frequently referred to are cutting the deficit and cutting the national debt. When this legislation was introduced, the government went overboard to point out that it was supposed to be revenue neutral. How can the government introduce a piece of legislation claiming it to be revenue neutral and, during the course of the debate on it, insist that one of the reasons these things have to be brought into effect is that the deficit is out of control? We have to do something to cut back on the national deficit.

The previous speaker made reference to the Prime Minister and his gloating over the number of jobs which have been created. It may or may not be true, I do not know, because one can do almost anything with statistics. Perhaps there have been 1.5 million jobs created, perhaps there have been 1.8 million created, but let us take a look at those jobs. Let us take a look at Canada in spite of the fact that these 1.5 million jobs have been created.

I would not want to be the Prime Minister standing up there and bragging about creating any jobs, when food banks have been proliferating. The tonnes of food that the food banks have given out in this country to absolutely destitute and needy people since this government came to power is phenomenal and certainly needs some kind of an explanation other than that we have created 1.5 million jobs.

I would ask the Prime Minister to explain why, if he has created all those wonderful jobs which he is quick to point out are full-time jobs, so many children in this country are going to school hungry. Why are the school boards and the cities in this country having to take up the slack which the federal government has created in so far as transfer payments are concerned in order to be able to feed the hungry children in this land?

There is no way that we can proceed with Bill C–21 and be confident that what this government claims is actually going to happen. In fact, the entire opposite is true. It will be as devastating for this country as deregulation, as free trade, as privatization, as the cuts to VIA, and as the GST is to be.

This government cannot be trusted. All I can say to the members opposite, and I would say it to Canadians as well: Beware when Bill C–21 comes into effect on January 1. This nation is in for the shock of its life with results that were not even dreamt of three months ago.

I do not know whether the results of Bill C–21 were preconceived by this government or whether it is simply a result of its philosophy. It certainly resembles very much the philosophy of Margaret Thatcher. It seems to me to reflect very much the philosophy of Ronald Reagan. He gives us the best analysis of the depravity of this government in its inability to come to grips with governing. This philosophy that is so well exemplified by Ronald Reagan is the same one that tried to get ketchup made legal as a vegetable for school lunches in the United States. I think that pretty well sums up the depravity of this government and the total lack of any meaning that it can possibly inject into our Canadian society as a result of this failed philosophy.

Let us get back to all these jobs, jobs, jobs that the Prime Minister talks about. Let us take a look at some of the jobs that are available in this country. I have here a list of jobs from, of all places, one of the unemployment insurance offices in the city of Ottawa. I will not go through them all, but I will try to hit the full spectrum. There is a job for a cook for $6 an hour, a counter clerk for $5.25 an hour, another cook for $6 an hour, a hairdresser for $5 an hour, a dish washer for $5 an hour, a car wash attendant for $6 an hour and a meat cutter for $8 an hour up to $13, one of the better ones.

I was on the legislative committee on Bill C–21, which travelled across the country. Here are some jobs that are available in Prince Edward Island from the unemployment insurance office there: waiter or waitress, $4.50 an hour; dish washer $5; meat cutter $8, not bad. But it does not matter where you are, Mr. Speaker, for a family of two with only one person working, that is the poverty line anywhere in this country.

The previous speaker pointed out that there was far less unemployment among those who were above $10 an hour than there was below it. It is a wonderful report that I would recommend to the government any time it feels it needs some enlightenment. I suppose Bill C-21 suggests that it feels it does not need it, but I certainly recommend that it look at the social cost. This is a government that can only understand the bottom line, whether the loonies are jingling in the cash register. The intangible effect of what it does is of no consideration.

Other jobs include: survey technicians, $7.50 an hour; a short order, cook $4.75 an hour. There is a tremendous amount of sexism as well. I will give the government credit for making reference to some jobs which can be left voluntarily without the penalties so prevalent within the legislation that was first introduced.

Here we have a secretary, not only a secretary but a bilingual secretary, for dare I say the princely sum of $7 an hour. Now most of us think that secretaries are some of the best paid people. We all know that they are the best qualified, but obviously they are not among the best paid people in Canada. Best qualified, yes; best paid, no. It is not a coincidence. It is the way our society operates. A woman at best making 60 per cent of what men make, and a bilingual person as well. Can you imagine the gall of the unemployment insurance centre putting an ad on its bulletin board advertising a job for a bilingual secretary at $7 at hour. That is poverty level anywhere in this country for a single person.

• (1600)

Let us not kid ourselves, as the Prime Minister tries to do, that all these jobs he is creating are something wild and wonderful. As a matter of fact, most of the jobs which have been created since this government came in have been the low paying, low quality jobs, and most of the people who have become employed since this government came to power and since the end of the recession have been women, earning 60 per cent less than men. As one of the previous speakers pointed out, the actual employment level is hardly up to pre-recession levels.

There will be other speakers who will get into some of the specifics of the devastation this act is going to cause the people of Canada. I only hope that the devastation is less than I predict it will be.

Mr. Speaker, I realize I am getting very short of time. I would beg this government, I implore this government, even at this late date, to reconsider the implementation of this bill. A motion has been made to have it hoisted for six months. I beg the minister not to even put it to a vote. Do the honourable thing and withdraw it.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs. MacDougall that Bill C-21, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would like to remind members at this time of the agreement that was made this morning between the three parties. Speeches from now on will be ten minutes followed by a five minute question and comment period.

The Hon. Minister of State for Employment and Immigration on debate.

The hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt on a point of order.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I look to the Chair for a direction. I understood that there were no questions and comments on the first two speeches, but there were comments on the last speech. Is that correct? I look for direction on that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The member is absolutely correct. There will be questions and comments. That is my mistake.

On questions and comments, the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I considered it from the point of view of employers and employees to see how it will affect the people of Canada. I looked in small municipalities across Canada to see who the major employers were in those areas. In many municipalities in my riding, as is true across Canada, it appeared that the major employers were hospitals, municipalities and school districts.

I wondered, if these are major employers, how that is that going to affect the people in the various areas of Canada with respect to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Most people from the other side of this House say that the employers and employees are now going to be paying their share and the government will be getting into the job training aspect. When the major employers are those people whom I have spoken of, how is that going to affect the average Canadian within each of the areas of Canada?

Can the member give us an idea of the implications for the average property owner and the average renter in Canada as a result of these unemployment changes? Is in fact the effect of this bill to pass on a tax structure or part of the tax structure and the cost of this to the property owners within Canada?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for the question.

It was not only the opposition members on the committee who recognized how devastating these changes were going to be, it was not only the advocacy groups for the disadvantaged people of this country who are going to be so adversely affected, and it was not only the members who came to us from the unions. I can understand why the members opposite hate unions. Those outboard marine people are making $14 an hour in Canada and when that work is taken to the United States, the workers will only be getting $6 an hour. I can understand why they dislike unions.

The cities as well recognized how devastating this would be for them and they recognized it in two different aspects. First of all, they did realize that they as employers would be subject to the increase in the premiums which they would have to pay. The increase is somewhere in the neighbourhood of 17 per cent. Considering that many of the municipalities have a considerable number of employees, certainly from that point of view alone there will be an increase in cost to the municipalities and the cities.

Second, Bill C–21 by the government's own figures is going to exclude entirely, across this nation, 30,000 people. That is a rather "Conservative" figure. Other studies have shown that there are going to be thousands and thousands of Canadians who will literally no longer be eligible to receive unemployment insurance. I think these studies could have been shown to be more reliable if the government had allowed the committee on C–21 to hear the people who made them in order for them to establish the validity of their assessments based on Stats Canada figures rather than some 11 year old suppositions which resulted in, as has already been referred to, thought control and behaviour modification.

If they do not receive that assistance what are they going to do? Certainly the cities are going to have to look at these people and make a decision. Are they going to subsidize these people through the welfare rolls because the government has abrogated its responsibility on unemployment insurance, or are they going to let them starve? The obvious answer is that course they are not going to let them starve.

Several cities submitted briefs. The city of Toronto in its brief estimated that in the first year it will cost the city $10 million. What will occur subsequent to that is anyone's guess, but it certainly is not going to get any better. The city of Sudbury recognized that the same kind of problem will occur for them. Although being a smaller area the numbers would be less, the effect is no less. If someone is hungry it does not matter whether they are in Sudbury or Toronto. The city of Vancouver presented a brief. They considered it so serious that the person who presented the brief in Vancouver was the mayor of the city.

Included in the briefs by the municipalities were also references to the provinces. The committee heard no witnesses from provincial politics, but we were able to get references to provinces from the cities. I hope that answers the member's question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is very little time left. The member for Mission—Coquitlam on a question or comment.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, many of us are wearing red carnations today. Could you explain where those carnations came from and the symbolism of them?

• (1610)

Mr. Fisher: The construction industry will be among the most devastated industries in the country. We do not often view people who are so highly trained. The government is talking about training. I do not know what it is they are going to train the construction industry for; perhaps meat-cutting or waitressing or bilingual secretaries. I do not know.

These are already highly trained people. All they want is jobs. That is precisely what this is about. The construction industry is going to be highly devastated because of these changes. These men and women were today giving bouquets of flowers as a demonstration of goodwill to the minister and asking her, in the kindest of terms, if she would reconsider what she is doing.

An Hon. Member: She would not even see them.

Mr. Fisher: Yes, it is true. The minister would not see them.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I must say I am very pleased to take part in this debate, especially after hearing what was said by previous speakers, for the opposition, and I will take this opportunity to set the record straight.

This bill is of vital importance to our labour force and to Canada as a whole. This measure once again reflects our government's determination to help workers adjust to technological change and, above all, to deal with a market that will be increasingly competitive during the next ten years.

Mr. Speaker, we could have left things as they were and said "no" to a thorough overhaul of our unemployment insurance system. We could have made a few minor changes and let the vagaries of the economy do the rest. Finally, we could have suggested band-aid solutions instead of providing a permanent remedy to the pervasive ills of underemployment and workers' lack of training.

Our government has realized that in this area as in so many others, one must have the courage to do what the situation demands.

We decided to change a system that no longer meets the current needs of the labour force and adapt it to tomorrow's needs, especially with respect to occupational training for Canadian workers.

[English]

Our government is very conscious that the time has come to substantially adjust the unemployment insurance program. The time has come to provide the training our workforce needs to meet the challenges of our technological era. As a government it is our duty and we will not fail. Faced with a labour market that has become more complex, we realize that there are fewer places for workers with minimal instruction and no professional training. Market pressures are forcing business to turn ever more to robotics telecommunication and high tech. Even traditional sectors must now use machinery that is much more complex.

[Translation]

Over one million people are having trouble finding jobs, and companies are having a hard time finding qualified workers.

Because of the lack of training programs, not all workers are able to take advantage of this new technology.

As far as the training and productivity of our labour force is concerned, our country lags behind other industrialized nations. Considering the Free Trade Agreement, Europe 1992 and increasingly competitive international markets, we must act quickly and decisively if we want to maintain our competitive position.

Mr. Speaker, our economic future is at stake, and it will depend on what we do today.

We currently spend $12 billion on unemployment insurance benefits and only $400 million on training our workers. Clearly, we must achieve a better balance between income support measures and measures designed to maintain or create jobs, and that is what we are trying to do with Bill C–21.

Mr. Speaker, the best legacy a country can give its young workers is the kind of professional training that will help them build a future for themselves instead of joining the ranks of welfare recipients and the chronically unemployed.

The labour force must be able to meet the challenge of technological change. We think it is also essential, however, that the private sector should do its share and invest more in occupational training. As part of the labour force development strategy, between now and 1994, the private sector will be asked to spend $1 billion annually on training its work force.

Mr. Speaker, the action taken by our government reflects once again our commitment to establishing an effective partnership to ensure the prosperity of this country.

The purpose of Bill C–21 is to make our labour force more productive and more competitive, but there is more. The proposed legislation also aims to provide for greater equity among certain categories of workers, and especially among the various regions in this country. I am thinking more specifically of women and older workers. I am also referring to certain measures in connection with our obligation to consider regional disparity when calculating benefits.

Women account for more than half the population in this country, and it stands to reason we should bring the Unemployment Insurance Act more into line with the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms with respect to employment equity.

As the minister responsible for employment equity, I have always maintained that our competitive position as a nation depends largely on that vast potential that Canadian women represent on the labour market. It is time that as a society, we woke up to this reality and made it possible for women to pursue their career objectives while sharing family responsibilites.

In the past, Canadian women have shown they were able to reconcile the two, as long as we, as a society and as a government, were willing to provide them with the means to do so. Our governement recognizes the impressive contribution made by women on the labour market, and as part of its reform, it has introduced some very important social measures. I am surprised that throughout this debate, Mr. Speaker, so little has been said about the major social measures that were introduced to enable women to enter the labour market: maternity leave and parental leave up to a total of thirty weeks. All these measures reflect our government's recognition of the role played by women, couples and families.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, it is also our duty to help older workers. These workers are a pool of experience and talent which is vital to our economy. It is imperative that older workers be encouraged to contribute. The Canadian workforce will be all the more qualified and productive. One hundred million dollars more will be invested in employment programs for older workers. As minister responsible for seniors, I say thanks for this reform.

Presently, workers aged 65 and over are not allowed to pay UI premiums and are not, therefore, entitled to receive benefits when they lose their employment. Our bill will correct this situation. It will allow for workers aged 65 and over to pay into the program and, naturally, benefit from its protection.

But we are also interested in the situation of our youth. We will spend $100 million to develop young people's skills. These funds will be used to launch a new program to meet the needs of various growing industries and occupations and will provide training for another 50,000 young people.

Mr. Speaker, one of the basic principles of this reform is to ensure that Canadians who can work are able to do so and that everyone understands that it is better to have a job than to live on unemployment insurance or welfare. We must, I repeat, break the vicious circle: short–term jobs, unemployment insurance, welfare. The workers of this country want something else, and we as a government are working on it. We know that Canadians really want to work. We are betting that these workers will use the training opportunities that we make available to them.

It is just as important to be fair with the regions. As you know, Canada is not immune to regional disparities. There are wide gaps, especially in hiring. We must admit the obvious fact that it is harder to find a job in St John's, Newfoundland, where the unemployment rate is about 14 per cent, than in Toronto, where it is around 4 per cent. Unemployment data remind us of this reality every month. Instead of giving up when faced with this challenging situation, we should adapt the unemployment insurance scheme accessibility requirements to the true needs and specific conditions which exist in the various regions of our country.

• (1620)

Mr. Speaker, we were compelled to return the unemployment insurance scheme to its original role. As I said, the purpose of this scheme is to provide income support to working men and women who, for reasons beyond their control, find themselves without job and without income. That is our definition of the so-called "safety net". In this context, it is vital that this scheme provide incentives and that its benefit structure encourage workers to keep their jobs and return to the labour force.

In order to provide Canada with a dynamic and competitive skilled labour force, we had to make a number of difficult choices. Mr. Speaker, the improvement of job opportunities since 1984 indicates that we were right in our analysis and forecast. In short, such is our manpower development strategy, as reflected in Bill C-21.

Mr. Speaker, we must support this bill and thus promote the short, medium and long-term development of a more skilled and more productive labour force.

[English]

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make reference to the minister's comments on retraining. The problem we face is not so much one of lack of skills for the jobs available, but the lack of high skill, high wage jobs. We have one of the most skilled workforces in the world right here in Canada. What we need to do is to put it to work. We can see that while training is a necessary component to any full employment policy, it is not enough. It is absolutely vital for us to recognize that this bill redirects $800 million from the benefit fund to the training fund. We need to look at what training is being done, who is being trained, and who is doing the training. The programs to date have simply prepared people for temporary unemployment, and have trained them, not for future needs but to fill short term low paying jobs. I would appreciate if the minister could comment on that.

[Translation]

Mrs. Vézina: Mr. Speaker, I was in the House and I listened to the long and repetitive remarks made by my learned colleague from Eglinton—Lawrence. I was reading while listening to him. In short, business people who took part in a poll deplored the shortage of skilled workers which they felt was a major impediment to the growth of small and medium-sized businesses. We are all well aware of the vital role which small and medium-sized businesses play in this country. We all know just how important it is for our labour force to adapt to new requirements, both for today and the future. A poll carried out in Canada resulted in a definite identification. Owners of small and medium-sized businesses stated: " Because there is a definite shortage of skilled workers, we are determined to work, together with the Government, toward upgrading our labour force." So are we. I agree with my hon. friend that we should work together with the private sector, together with employers and employees to identify real needs. That is what we mean by "partnership" and "consultation". We are striving to identify the needs so that we can put together adequate training programs. Having spent several years in the field of education, I am convinced that if we want to bring the unemployment rate down, we must start by training our human resources.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is important today, especially after the last statement, to explode some myths about the intentions of Bill C-21.

[Translation]

Bill C-21 is not designed to provide Canadian men and women with the new and improved training programs that they need to adjust to the new economic situation.

[English]

Bill C-21 is not designed to improve the employment opportunities of those Canadians who are now toiling at the fringes of society, underpaid, undertrained and destined for increasing uncertainty and poverty in their lives. Bill C-21 is not about developing the talents and expectations of Canadians that if they work hard, try to use their potential to the fullest and nonetheless become unemployed through no fault of their own, a compassionate society has in place a scheme to which they contribute that will provide for the necessities when they are without any earnings.

[Translation]

Bill C–21 is not designed to identify and exclude from the system the few dishonest people and cheaters who are abusing it. Rather, it will deprive the most destitute workers of benefits that allow them to meet their needs when they are out of a job.

[English]

Bill C–21 is about money. A government that has slashed spending on training by $700 million a year since 1984 now wants to make up for its own failures. It now wants to gouge money for training programs from the pockets of workers and their employers. Cruelly and cold–bloodedly it is telling the unemployed that they will have no income or reduced income when they lose their jobs because a greedy government needs their money.

Bill C–21 is about privatization. The government is opting out of any public financing responsibility for unemployment and regional disparities that result from fiscal, economic and trade policies for which it is responsible.

[Translation]

Bill C–21 will have the effect of creating a class of workers forever dependent on the whims of the market and forced to accept second–rate, dangerous and underpaid jobs.

[English]

Bill C–21 is about shutting down rural Canada and turning out the lights on Atlantic Canada, remote regions and small communities across the country.

Let me put some flesh and bones on these points by turning to some of the amendments that would have made this not a good piece of legislation but slightly less damaging. These are amendments which the government, by closure and obstruction, has prevented even being discussed.

[Translation]

Bill C–21 will crush the hopes of hundreds of thousands of Canadians who wish to participate fully in the growth and prosperity of this great country.

[English]

The government says it wants to train those who most need training. Those who most need training are those at the bottom of the employment ladder who have the hardest time getting and keeping a job, who have short term sporadic employment. These are the very people who will be shut out in greatest numbers by this bill from qualifying for unemployment insurance, and if they do not qualify for unemployment insurance they do not qualify for the training that their dollars have paid for.

If this government's intention is truly to train those who need it most, why would it refuse to consider an amendment that would allow workers to qualify for training after a minimum 10 weeks of employment? Shutting them out of benefits is one thing, but shutting them out of training is deplorable. Those who need training most are those already at a disadvantage in the changing workforce. They are women earning only 66 cents for every dollar a man earns. Persons with disabilities are at a similar disadvantage both in income and training opportunities, and the employment disadvantage of persons of visible minorities or aboriginal peoples is already well documented.

Why then will the minister and the opposition not even allow this House to debate an amendment that would guarantee these groups equitable access to training programs, programs I remind the House that these people pay for through their contributions to the unemployment insurance fund?

• (1630)

I suggest this amendment is unacceptable to the government because it is not interested in the unemployed of this country. It is not interested in equity. It is not interested in allowing people to reach their full potential regardless of age, gender, colour or ethnic origin. It is only interested in taking money from the unemployed and turning it over to the private sector to train those who can most quickly and easily be trained.

Those are not the values this country was built on, but they are the values that are quickly overtaking our society under the leadership of this Tory government.

I said this bill is not about training, it is about money. It is a continuation of this government's determination to solve the problems it has created by bearing down with a steamroller, squeezing every last possible penny it can from Canadians, not caring who gets crushed in its path.

This bill extracts $4.2 billion from Canadians who are already living in dire straits. It does it in two ways. First, it pulls out the government's $2.9 billion, money that the government properly contributes to compensate for regional disparities and to support fishermen. Aside from this legitimate government contribution, Canadians need to know that the unemployment fund is self-supporting. In fact, in recent years it has produced a surplus.

Now the workers who contributed to the unemployment fund when they were employed are being asked to pay for the economic policies of the government that have in the last five years increased the poverty of the regions of Canada outside major metropolitan areas. The remaining $1.29 billion of the government's $4.2 billion money grab will come directly from the insurance benefits of the unemployed. The minister has said repeatedly that the unemployed are not paying for training, but that is exactly where the money is coming from. Unemployed workers will do without food and clothes for their children so the minister can top up the training budgets that have been slashed by her government.

Again, those who can least afford it will be the victims. The poorest regions will lose the most. Workers in Newfoundland will lose an average of $2,400 while Manitoba workers with a lot less unemployment will lose less than half of that.

No doubt the minister expects that provinces and municipalities across the country will pick up the welfare bill—this at a time when the government is not meeting its commitments to cost-share social programs.

The best demonstration that this bill is about money, not people, is in the provision that allows the government to hound people for up to six years to collect overpayments of UI benefits even when it was no fault of their own.

This bill deliberately misleads Canadians about how it is going to spend their money. It says piously in clause 20 that it will spend no more than 15 per cent on training programs. But then later on in the bill it says that in addition to this 15 per cent the government can contract not only for the administration but for the establishment or operation of training programs. These are not subject to the 15 per cent limit.

This is an unending tap for privatizing the employment services of the Department of Employment and Immigration. It explains why the minister in her estimates to the House has not provided for one additional person to administer all these wonderful new programs. The minister wants to privatize services to the most vulnerable at the most precarious time of their lives—when they are out of work. It is not the role of the private sector to be concerned about developing the potential and the talent of Canadians. It is their proper role to produce goods and services and make a profit. It is the job of the nation to invest in its people.

I have said this bill will create a sub-class of Canadians, destined to move from one low paid unskilled job to another, from one community to another, serving the ever changing needs of the market-place, never setting down roots, never knowing stability in their lives.

The government has looked at the statistics. It knows there are fewer young people coming into the market-place and that a crisis is looming in the supply of new workers. It knows that 70 per cent of the jobs that will be in our economy are those that are low-paid, unskilled, unstable and part-time. Its answer is to assemble in Bill C-21 an arsenal of whips and bludgeons to beat into submission the unemployed who, to survive, will have to stick with such jobs with no hope for anything better, ever.

This bill damages people and the nation. The Tory agenda is determined to grasp every last dollar from Canadians—$6 billion through the GST, billions more through clawing back old age security, billions more in the government's failure to meet its commitments to fund education, social services and day care, and now another $4 billion from the unemployed.

The government is selling off or starving to death the institutions of nationhood. VIA Rail is gone, Air Canada is gone. The National Arts Centre is strangling. The National Research Council has been stripped of millions. This government is systematically dismantling the framework of a fair, compassionate and proud nation. Bill C–21 is part of it.

Mr. Jean–Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on Bill C–21, having been on the legislative committee that travelled across the country to hear witnesses who had something to contribute on the legislation. The hon. member opposite also was part of our group.

Mr. Speaker, during those three weeks we travelled across Canada and the other week where we heard witnesses here in Ottawa, we heard varying comments depending on group representatives who appeared before us.

On labour's side, many opposed the Bill. They welcomed the Government proposals that suited them, and wished they would be included in the legislation, with the money coming from somewhere else, and hoped that anything that did not suit them would be left out.

These proposals, or the trust of the legislation revolve around two things: First, re–allocating $600 million of funds to new benefits, including for instance maternity, parental and sickness benefits, and second, taking $800 million, also from the unemployment insurance fund, and re–allocate them to training. But what unions wanted initially was not training, they did not even want us to get involved with that, but gradually they realized this made sense indeed. But then they told us: Yes, we agree on training, but the $800 million you will take them from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. You realize, Mr. Speaker, that for the Government matters are not so simple. Taxpayers are fed up with constantly increasing taxes.

It is this Government's responsibility and our common responsibility to try and do more with what we have. The Federal Government now runs nearly 1,000 different programs across Canada. If each time we want to do something new we have to take additional money from the taxpayers' pockets, we and up with a monster that breeds deficits that can no longer be controlled.

This is the new direction and the challenge we face as Canadians and as a Government in this country trying to use available funds, re–allocating them so that they are more effective. This is what the Government is doing with the $800 million allocated to training. We take those moneys from the unemployment insurance fund, roughly $1,4 billion, and re–allocate them to more productive purposes. This is exactly what happens with those $600 million for new social benefits and $800 million for training.

Why are we putting $800 million into training? Mr. Speaker, why do we as a Government decide to use $800 million for training workers? Why do we not leave that to educational institutions?

• (1640)

For two main reasons, Mr. Speaker. By education, we mean full–time studies at high school, college or university level, which comes under provincial jurisdiction. But when someone drops out of school to get a job and becomes unemployed a few years later, we then talk about workers' training. There is a casual relationship between the two. You could pay people to stay home and do nothing when they would rather work. Or you could use those funds to help train them so that they can go back to work in the near future. It would be a lot more satisfying for the people involved.

This is an astonishing member, Mr, Speaker but 30 per cent of our young people are dropping out of high school. Obviously, if you leave school before completing grade 11 or 12 and get a job without training, what will happen to you eventually? You will lose your job and become unemployed. Recently, 50 per cent of the people polled by the Canadian Federation of Independant Business said it was difficult to find skilled workers. So you can see the link between the high school drop–out rate and the skilled labour shortge. We as a governement must do something. We cannot allow this situation to continue. So what are we going to do with the $800 million? Training programs will be implemented so that those young people can take courses for up to 106 weeks. They will be paid to attend school, and that is something they need. I think it is an excellent initiative. This is a major change of attitude on the part of the government and, under present circumstances, no one would dare argue against this basic principle.

Since I am talking about this training, I ought to indicate that our government has gone to the trouble of setting up five different groups responsible for determining what kind of training would be best. Consultations are taking place with management, labour and people directly involved to outline the nature of courses to be made available. The results of this ongoing study will soon be made public in five national symposia where people will consider how to allocate the $800 million and what kind of training is required to meet current needs. Again I would suggest that this new approach on the part the government bodes extremely well because it takes reality into account.

If I may say so, look at the region where I come from, Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean and the riding of Jonquière which I represent. Major companies are not hiring these days. What do they do? They use new technologies. People have to be properly trained to be able to apply new technologies in major industries. Ever more companies update their plant and equipment and people are thrown out of work because they do not have adequate training. It is up to us to take remedial action.

Mr. Speaker, the other major issue relates to the $600 million earmarked for new services or new benefits. We know that 42 per cent of women are now working, which means that 42 per cent of the labour force is made up of women, and this percentage can be expected to increase in coming years. As government we take into consideration the importance of the situation of a couple when the woman bears a child. That is what we did with the $600 million, we have almost doubled the benefits so that instead of only 15 weeks the mother will be entitled to 15 weeks of maternity leave plus 10 weeks of parental leave or 15 weeks of sick leave, at her discretion. In any case the maximum number of weeks will be 30, whichever type of leave she applies for. That is a definite improvement which takes into account the needs of our society.

I might add that I was among those who spoke openly in favour of extending parental leave because 10 weeks are not enough, especially when adopting a child and bringing him or her home.

We did experience some difficulty in the interpretation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but we managed to find a way out: A family who adopts a child over six months old will be entitled to five additional weeks. But that is not what I would have liked. What I would have hoped for is 15 weeks automatically. But we were not in a position to do this under the current laws, the way the Charter is interpreted. We found a compromise which will now amount to 90 per cent of cases I think that this again is co-operate to effort in action by listening to people from across the land, we found a way to address the situation.

I would also like if I may, Mr. Speaker, to make the following point—What struck me in the arguments made by many is the parallel they were trying to draw between free trade and this unemployment insurance reform. It is important to realize that the situation is completely different in the United States and Canada. In the United States, the unemployment insurance fund amounts to some $22 billion Canadian, as compared to 12 billion in Canada. Let's put that in the proper perspective. They are ten times more numerous than we are. So, proportionately, they should have $120 billion rather than $22 billion. You realize that, proportionately, this does not make sense. And in the United States, there is a different unemployment insurance system in each and every state, whereas we have one employment insurance system for the country as a whole.

I could go on and on and on in this famous debate, and already you are signalling that I have one minute left only. We worked very hard across Canada. In this legislation we have taken regional unemployment rates inito account. In Toronto for instance, where jobs are more easily found, people have to work a little longer, they will need a larger number of weeks in order to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. In some other area where the unemployment rate is high, the people there will not have to work as long. This is what we call the variable entry requirements which will now be illegible weeks.

I agree that an extra effort will have to be made everywhere. But look at past experience, Mr. Speaker. In 1978, and I am taking the example of the Maritime provinces, when the requirement was raised from 10 to 14 weeks, 87 per cent of the people found exactly the number of extra weeks they needed. This means that people automatically alter their behaviour when faced with the new requirement, and I believe our reform is good and positive, so more so that we are getting into worker training, and this is important!

Mr. Pronovost: Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a few remarks to my colleague who, as everyone agrees, did a splendid job chairing the parliamentary committee on this important issue of Bill C–21, and more particularly on that aspect of unemployment rates which to me are crucial. Many people told us in the past that we should not take into account the fact that some areas are less privileged because there are unemployed even in regions such as Montreal or Toronto. However, my colleague made one thing very clear and I appreciated his saying in particular that, indeed, there is unemployment in Canada's big cities as in other regions, but the number of jobs available in large cities is relatively far greater than that available in small towns or villages. I would like my colleague to use as an example his riding that is part of a very dynamic region of Quebec and where there is unemployment as everywhere else in order to explain why somebody from an outlying Quebec region may experience more difficulty in the short term in finding a job than another Canadian with the same training and the same degrees would have in an area such as Montreal and Quebec.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): I thank my hon. colleague for his comment. He is absolutely right when he says that the regional unemployment rate must be taken into account. In Newfoundland, where jobs seem more difficult to find, people will not be affected, or very little, by these changes because the unemployment rate exceeds 15 per cent in several communities. However, in Toronto, the rate varies between 3.5 and 3.7 per cent, which means that people will now have to work 20 weeks instead of 14 to be eligible for benefits. In my region of Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean, the unemployment rate is about 12 per cent according to the latest statistics, so people will have to work 13 weeks to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. Hon. Members will know that a redrawing of the economic map of the regions is forthcoming. Everybody is expecting that. The way the various economic regions are classified now causes a problem because, often, it penalizes some areas. But there will be a redrawing soon. Some regions could benefit more than others, but at least the regional unemployment rate will be taken into account.

I would like to add a few words, perhaps, if my colleague allows me, on unemployment insurance and the funds we have.

Mr. Speaker, you know, we too would have liked to have $800 million more, but do you know what our debt is? It now stands at $324 billion. When a debt costs $100 million in interest a day, nearly $100 million a day, it must be looked into. To get an idea of what $100 million a day represents, Mr. Speaker, it is as if I took a list of 5,000 names, I drew the names of 5,000 Canadians by lot, and our Government sent them each a nice cheque for $20,000.

That is what $100 million a day in interest represents. And I could start over again every day, with a new list of 5,000 names. Imagine the situation we are in as a country! We must deal with it, administer, and manage the country and that is what we did with the unemployment insurance reform. We took $1.4 billion from the fund and reallocated it, taking account of the new requirements and Canadian reality.

[English]

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, my colleague on the opposite side of the House had earlier referred to the changes in UI with respect to the free trade agreement, trying to compare the two systems between Canada and the United States.

In making those comments he demonstrated what is really the hidden agenda in the legislative changes under Bill C–21. What we are doing is taking $800 million of government funding out of the insurance premium portion of the unemployment insurance program. By so doing the government essentially removes itself from active participation in the insurance portion of the program. The member opposite said that the participation rate of the United States government through its program is much, much lower when we compare it to the Canadian program. That is the very essence of the argument.

The fact is what we are seeing with these legislative changes in the UIC bill is a harmonization, a watering down if you like, a lowering of the level of Canada's program for unemployment insurance to that more comparable to our neighbours to the south. What we are seeing with these changes to the program is a result, I submit, of living in the post free trade reality. The UIC program, as we well know, was for some time being fingered by our U.S. counterparts as a potentially unfair trade practice, when looked at in those terms. By removing itself from the funding level, I believe this government is hoping to remove the threat of countervail under the reality of the free trade agreement.

Let there be no mistake. These changes are a harmonization of Canada's unemployment insurance program in a post free trade reality, a complete capitulation of what is a very important social service program in order to harmonize it with a less structured program in the United States. Let us call a spade a spade.

[Translation]

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I will answer my colleague by giving him some figures.

Depending on the various state formulas used in the United States, benefits are about 50 per cent of earnings. The basic minimum weekly benefit is between $5 and $62, while maximum weekly benefits range from $95 to $330.

I am told that in half the United States, it is $70 or more, which is the average, while here in Canada, Mr. Speaker, benefits are 60 per cent of insurable earnings and the weekly maximum is $318.

I think these figures show my colleague quite clearly that there is no parallel between the two. If he wants to take the United States as an example, he will realize that they are quite a bit worse off than in Canada. Furthermore, our system provides social benefits that they do not have in the United States.

[English]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso) Mr. Speaker, I want to say in addressing this question of the legislation, Bill C–21, that there is an air of fatigue and resignation in this House as we consider third reading of this bill. I suggest that the resignation mirrors, to some extent, the resignation of the people of Canada as they confront the harsh realities of this government.

In Atlantic Canada where I come from there is a feeling that we have been the victims of a saturation bombing by the government on programs that we had a right to expect would continue. For example, recently VIA Rail has been dismantled in Atlantic Canada and in other parts of Canada. We have witnessed a complete retreat on regional development programs. We are now seeing a crisis in the Atlantic fishery with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans denying that it exists in flagrant violation of the fact that very shortly there may be major lay-offs in the fishery.

The government now introduces this bill, this regressive piece of legislation, and does not listen to Canadians. It did not listen to Canadians when we travelled across the country in September with this committee. It was clear that despite the fact that 157 of the 202 briefs condemned the legislation, asked that it be withdrawn, the government reacted by saying: "We are going forward. There is no reason for us to listen to this testimony. We have heard it before, and we are not listening to it".

There was a sense that the government does not care what Canadians think about Bill C–21, about the increases in the taxes to which we have been subjected, culminating in this dramatic goods and services tax. There is a feeling among Canadians that the government does not listen. Not only did it not listen to the committee, or to this House or to Canadians, we have recently found that it does do not listen to the courts either.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the unemployment action group held a press conference to set the record straight on something the Department of Employment and Immigration had denied regarding the implementation of a Federal Court of Appeal decision on vacation pay and severance pay.

Two weeks ago, on October 11, my hon. colleague, the Member for Eglinton—Lawrence, asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration Minister of State if her Department would implement the Federal Court of Appeal ruling concerning vacation pay and severance pay. She said: "Yes, we will implement it. We disagreed at first but now that we know how to interpret the ruling, we will implement it." That decision affects $100 million in benefits. We found out today that the Department has not implemented the ruling and is now introducing regulations to circumvent it. That is how this government works. She denies everything and refuses to listen to Canadians, the courts and the other members of the Committee. How can we help feeling frustrated or resigned when dealing with this kind of government!

[English]

In the minister's perfunctory conclusion to her remarks this morning she mentioned a few aspects of the legislation, such as how this was going to respond to the Charter of Rights provisions which, as you know, Mr. Speaker, were required, and that was going to create training. I wish I had more time to explain the way in which these training funds are being reacted to in the rural parts of this country. It is a joke. Parts of the country where the private sector is limited at best cannot respond to the provisions of training that are in this bill. What is going to happen is that we are going to be denied benefits, on top of the fact that our entrance requirements are going to increase. The unemployed are going to be shut out of benefits, out of training in the very regions where they need them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The member will be allowed to complete his speech on Monday if he wishes.

I have received from the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) written notice advising me that he will be unable to introduce his motion during private members' hour on Friday, November 3, 1989. Since we could not, pursuant to Standing Order 94, arrange for an exchange of positions in the order of precedence, I am ordering the Clerk to drop this item to the bottom of the order of precedence.

Private members' hour will then be cancelled and, pursuant to Standing Order 94, the House will continue with the business at hand prior to that hour.

[English]

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS

JOB OPPORTUNITIES

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of encouraging and building community-based investment and job initiatives through community and worker co-operatives, community development corporations, regional councils, small businesses and farms and municipal governments.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the opportunity that is given to us as private members to bring a motion before our peers and to get their judgment on whether what we are proposing has merit and if it is something that we should all develop a consensus around and make our voices heard.

I would like to begin by outlining some of the remarks I made when this particular motion was being considered by the committee which decides whether or not it will be a votable motion and have five hours of debate. We had very good discussions at that committee and I appreciated the discussion. I can also appreciate that another member's motion won the day, but nevertheless I would like to inform members that the members of that committee were very interested in the proposal I was making.

The five reasons why I thought this should be votable and should have a five hour debate are the following. First, I find that often economic debate in this House is very sterile, is often very polarized, it pits a vision usually imputed from one side to the other, with big government on the one side versus unfettered free enterprise on the other. There are an awful lot of nuances and an awful lot of things we all actually might agree on that are lost in that kind of a polarized debate.

Second, what I am describing in this motion is national in scope. There are co-operative and community development organizations actively involved in virtually every community in this country. Every member of this House, at some point or other during their career, comes into contact with them probably on a regular basis. Thus, this is a motion that personally affects every one of us as members of this House.

Third, in the spirit of the times, the government has said, and we have to accept it because it has a majority, that this is a time of deficit reduction, when moneys are not available for different projects, economic development projects and community projects, as worthy as they may be.

In light of that we need to take a more positive approach and encourage those community-based ventures that rely on the capital, the effort, the wisdom and the resources of the community to pick up the slack for the unavailability of funds from government sources in many cases.

Fourth, I would have liked to have given the minister of state for co-ops an opportunity to participate in this debate. A lot of people do not know even that there is a Co-op Secretariat that functions within the Government of Canada, that it does have a responsible minister, the same minister who is in charge of grains and oilseeds and western diversification. It would have been useful for that minister to have had an opportunity to stand in the House and explain to members of Parliament what in fact the Co-op Secretariat does, what its projections are and how we, as members, could support the efforts of that secretariat.

Last week there was a federal-provincial meeting of ministers who have responsibility for the co-operative sector, both federally and provincially. I understand that it was a very fruitful meeting because worker co-operatives got identified as a priority. I might add, not perhaps in a partisan way but just to note it, that given the statement this morning of the hon. member for Surrey on housing, I respectfully hope that worker co-operatives will not fare the same way as a priority of this government as co-operative housing has which also at one time was a priority of the government.

The fifth point that I raised with the committee is worth noting. There is no focus for community development efforts within the government, or even within this Parliament, or any place where self-reliant, self-help, local kind of initiatives are discussed, analyzed, and the results of that analysis brought to bear on a wide range of government policies. That is a perspective that has been lacking in many cases since the late seventies. The last body that I know of that had any formal existence along these lines was the Canadian Council on Rural Development which was disbanded in 1979.

My own interest in this area comes very much from my personal background, before I became a member of this House 11 months ago. It comes very much from my parents and I would like to acknowledge that in this House. My father was the chairman of the Laird Saskatchewan Wheat Pool committee for 42 years, from 1946 to 1988. He was a board member of the Laird co-op, the Rosthern co-op, and was a founding member of the Sask Valley Credit Union in Rosthern, so that was always very much a part of our life. I am a co-op shopper and not ashamed to admit it. I buy co-op every chance I get.

My mother comes from a family active in founding and perpetuating an organization called Mennonite Central Committee which has developed a sound reputation in community development, both within this country and in many other countries around the world. With that kind of influence as I was growing up, I could be very little other than the co-operative and community development critic for the New Democratic Party.

After spending 10 years in adult education, in 1985 I established a company called Spruce River Research, a private company that did independent research and training in economic development, most of it in northern Saskatchewan. Through that, I had experience in working with northern communities in my constituency as they, first of all, analyzed their own situation as to where they might go in the future and how they related to funding organizations like the Canadian Jobs Strategy, NEDP, especially ERDA and the regional development agreements. Two, I might note, were very helpful, the forestry agreement in Saskatchewan and the Northern Economic Development Subsidiary Agreement, NEDSA. Both of these agreements lapsed at the end of the last fiscal year on March 30 and have not been renewed, nor is there any replacement. I regret that very much.

I would like to say in a broader framework this is a fundamental issue. In many ways, this country has been plagued for a long time with trends that we are perhaps even widening the gap between the "have" and the "have nots" in this country. Concentration of wealth is indicated in books like The Vertical Mosaic. The Canadian establishment is a characteristic of this country that probably none of us are terribly proud of.

I might point out in that regard, just by way of contrast, that the 12 million co-op members in this country control $68 billion worth of assets, while the 10 richest people in this country control $31 billion worth of assets. So those 10 people control half of the assets that the 12 million co-op members do through their co-operative organizations.

It is starting to be recognized, and I and many of my colleagues have done what we can to point out that the "have" and "have not" syndrome in this country is starting to become much more regionalized than perhaps it used to be.

The lead story in the Canadian section of Maclean's of October 23 states:

> Fragile Roots. Canadians in the Country Feel Abandoned by a Government More Attuned to Urban Voters.

In that article, it states:

> Indeed, some critics among the one-third of Canadians who live in communities with fewer than 10,000 people say that government policies designed to cut the federal deficit threaten to destroy the country' hinterland communities. They cite a host of recent initiatives: cutbacks in VIA Rail; closing of rural post offices; tightened unemployment insurance rules; shuttered military bases; and reduced regional development grants. And more blows may be in store they say, pointing to the threat of reduced regional CBC services and cutbacks in federal crop insurance and freight subsidies.

• (1710)

I might add that since then there have been three added to the list: Canada Post increased the freight rates for fly-in food to fly-in communities by 30 per cent; the northern tax benefits look as if they might be taken away, at least a task force has recommended that they should be; and the implications of the changes in the Railway Act as they impact phone service across the country will make it much more difficult for people in isolated areas to have the kind of phone service that you need to participate in any meaningful way in a modern economy and in a modern society.

This is not a hopeless situation and that is why I am proposing this motion and not in any sense of partisanship. Even if members opposite do not accept the full analysis that I presented and indeed, that Maclean's reported, I think it is still possible for members looking around their communities and constituencies to realize that there are some opportunities to make progress that are not being realized.

This is particularly true with respect to co-operatives and community development, the small business sector, and the municipal sector that I identified in the motion. The reason it is not hopeless, and the reason I think this is something we need to look closely at, is because Canada is considered to be a world leader in the areas of co-operative and community development.

People come from all over the world to places like Antigonish or Memorial University or the University of Saskatchewan. Visiting parliamentarians are often very interested in our regional development programs. We are a world leader recognized around the world as having something to say in this area. That is a tribute to the people who have worked very hard in those communities over the years in the co-op sector, the Desjardins credit union movement, the Antigonish movement in the maritimes, the prairie pools, the Federated Co-operative Organization, and the credit unions. All those organizations that are now 12 million strong are organized in the Canadian Co-operative Association.

Many were established in the thirties as a result of economic problems then, but there have also been new frontiers in the co-op area. In the area of housing there are 1,400 co-op housing developments in this country at the present time, in spite of the struggle they have had for recognition. They are functioning very well and are providing an alternative for people who need low-cost housing. Worker co-ops are something we need to get into very I want to refer hon. members to the region of Montragon in Spain which has developed a very modern efficient and competitive economy based on interlocking co-operatives. That is something that all of us should be more aware of.

In our own country we are seeing, for whatever reasons, and in the spirit of non-partisanship, I do not want to dwell on the reasons, but there are profitable businesses in this country that are being closed not because of non-profitability or because the people are not doing a good job, but because of decisions being made elsewhere. We need a vehicle to maintain those jobs and industries in those communities. Worker co-operatives are a positive alternative and the government itself has recognized that is an initiative it wants to pursue.

In the area of health, we have a very active co-operative health centres in Prince Albert which was one of the first. I might acknowledge my wife is on the board. There has been a recent study released, after the Saskatchewan government sat on for about seven years, that said that the cost of maintaining the health of the residents of a region could be reduced by as much as 25 to 30 per cent if the co-operative health model were adopted in other communities. We have also seen people struggling hard to provide day care for their children, even though it is often financially difficult and there has not been much support. People have used the co-operative vehicle as a way to mobilize their resources to provide that very valuable service.

As well, in northern Canada there are Arctic co-operatives. When we actually went through our list in my own constituency I was somewhat surprised to learn that there are 25 fishermen's co-operatives, a legacy of the organizational efforts of people in the 1950s. There are also consumer co-operatives. There is a very active co-operative movement right through northern Canada.

I would like to also recognize the community development movement in this country, through places like Memorial University, the Council on Rural Development, a Topshee Conference which I had the opportunity to attend at St. Francis Xavier University earlier this year which gathers together people in the maritimes interested in community development. There is a group with the "Garfieldesque" name of ARG, the agricultural and rural restructuring group which recently had a conference in Saskatoon which I attended. Academics, community activists, and the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture were there. There is a real coming together in this country of community development thinking, especially as it applies to the rural area which I am very happy to see, and I think it would behove all members to support.

I would also recognize some of the very positive initiatives that all members can support in the Indian community through the organization of economic development corporations. One which was recognized at that conference and in fact received the award as the fastest growing small business in Saskatchewan last year is an organization called Kitsaki Development Corporation, the development arm of the La Ronge Indian Band. This organization had sales last year of over $10 million, and is a very credible actor in the economy of northern Saskatchewan. They are owners of a hotel, they have a joint venture with Trimac in the trucking business, northern resource trucking. They are very carefully picking their spots, their strategic investments, and are doing an excellent job. The most recent product that they have just brought to market in a very exemplary way is the use of wild rice and pasta. I am informed that it is difficult even to get it in Prince Albert because the American market is gobbling it up faster than they can produce it. So in the interests of making the government look good on free trade, here is an opportunity to support a way to do that.

In closing, I would like to say that the motion I am proposing here I would like hon. members, especially members of the government, to look closely at. This is not a partisan motion. It is not calling on the government to spend money. It is not even calling on the government to make steps one, two, and three. I have ideas of my own about that and other members do. I am trying to communicate through this motion and the reason I am asking members to support it, is that we need an awareness of the problem, but also of the solution. It is not a big government solution. It is a community solution. I would ask that government members and all members pay attention to it and support this resolution.

In closing, I would like to read the motion I am asking members to accept:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of encouraging and building community-based investment and job initiatives through community and worker co-operatives, community development corporations, regional councils, small businesses and farms and municipal governments.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to address this motion which recommends that the government encourage community-based investment and employment through local co-operation among governments, small business, and employee groups. This is the kind of approach which many communities urgently need. Let me add, this is precisely the approach the government has taken and will continue to take in the future.

Anyone who is familiar with the programs of Employment and Immigration Canada knows that these programs are designed precisely to stimulate local involvement and initiative. The Canadian Jobs Strategy introduced four years ago represents a fundamental break with the Liberals piecemeal Ottawa-controlled approach to meeting local needs.

The 1989-90 budget of the Canadian Jobs Strategy is $1.77 billion. It covers a range of activities to enhance the skills and employment of several hundred thousand Canadians a year.

• (1720)

The new Labour Force Development Strategy, the government's response to evolving skill demands and increased global competitive pressures, builds on the same base as the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

Passage of the current legislation before Parliament would make an additional $800 million available for training, as well as such active measures as mobility and entrepreneurship.

We have placed the management of our programs very much in the hands of the people in the community. By turning the decision-making and budgetary reins over to those most affected at the point of contact the Canadian Jobs Strategy has ensured that its programs operate with the maximum impact and cost-effectiveness.

The government has adopted a realistic, workable approach based on programs with the flexibility to vary as local needs vary. Whether it is the closing of a vital plant, the sudden need for employee skill upgrading, or the relentless market change for products no longer in demand, the Canadian Jobs Strategy provides a framework for people in the community to apply their insight, initiative and imagination to deal with the challenges at hand.

Local planning by local people working together is the approach, and the important co-ordinating element of this approach has been the participation of local advisory councils. These councils include representatives from business, labour, government, educational institutions, and special interest groups. Local advisory councils familiar with their local labour markets provide advice so that local priorities can be synchronized with a range of proven government programs available to help small communities.

A program that lends itself to local decision making is the Industrial Adjustment Service which has a renowned record for bringing employers and employees together to solve such problems as obsolete skills, the need for new technology, human resources planning, and possible lay-offs. The IAS signs about 500 new agreements a year. In the last year alone, more than 300,000 Canadians benefited from the Industrial Adjustment Service.

When an IAS agreement is signed, a local IAS committee comprised of equal representation from labour and management, immediately commits itself to solving identified human resources problems. IAS pays up to half the costs of the committee and provides technical advice, information about government programs, long-term planning and, if necessary, explores employment alternatives for threatened workers.

This approach has been so successful that the IAS has been copied by several other countries. The Labour Force Development Strategy announced by the minister in April, proposes to double the budget of this program to $30 million.

I would also like to provide members with a brief description of some of the components under the Canadian Jobs Strategy which are at the disposal of local business and industry.

The Community Futures Program is another initiative that is operating effectively in every region. This $134 million program is currently helping about 200 smaller rural communities across Canada. Community Futures assist people to develop their own answers to the unemployment and economic hardships which often occur in small remote communities and single industry towns. This program is flexible and responsive to input from those who live in and understand the area.

Community Futures incorporates four options. One of them, business development centres, offers locally managed technical and advisory services to small business and developmental loans up to $75,000.

Within a more individual frame of reference, the self-employment incentives program provides $180 a week for a year to help unemployed persons to start their own business.

Another option, the community initiatives fund, matches support from other sources for local projects by local people designed to generate new and permanent jobs.

Finally, there is relocation and travel assistance which provides up to $5,000 to help unemployed people to find work in another community.

In other countries self-employed and entrepreneurship programs have produced significant results, helping many individuals and communities achieve self-sufficiency and prosperity. In Canada these programs have been especially successful among the social assistance recipients, turning welfare cases into business people who not only support themselves but also create jobs for other Canadians. This kind of success is why the Labour Force Development Strategy will be supporting more Canadians who choose to take the plunge and work for themselves.

I must add that under Bill C-21, the government is also enhancing relocation assistance for unemployed Canadians who want to move to areas with more job opportunities. We are extending the concept of capitalizing unemployment benefits for this purpose providing up to $15,000, a figure that more accurately reflects the cost of moving a household today to help unemployed people go where they want to work.

Through the Labour Force Development Strategy, these vital self-employment and mobility programs will be significantly reinforced.

There is another program that also serves to support the local enterprise. The Innovations Program is a Labour Market Research and Development arm of the Canadian Jobs Strategy. Under Innovations, test models have been particularly effective in creating economically viable employment avenues for disabled persons, aboriginal people, visible minorities, social assistance recipients, and young people encountering difficulties making the transition from school to work.

A good example is the Youth Employment Skills Program. This program was tested in Halifax and St. Catharines, Ontario, in Winnipeg, and in Vancouver before incorporation into the broader Canadian Jobs Strategy Program framework. A $4.3 million Innovations contract funded the test phases and produced English and French versions of the Youth Employment Canada curriculum.

These examples illustrate the approach that the government has committed itself to fostering local co-operation to produce local solutions to local problems. It is a coincidence that since 1984 employment has risen in every region of Canada, in fact, in seven provinces by more than 10 per cent.

I am sure many members of this House are aware of what has been accomplished and why their constituents, during the last five years, seem to be quite pleased with what we are doing.

As the motion states, investment and initiative should come from labour groups, economic development corporations, councils, small business, farmers and local government offices in communities across Canada.

In this regard, the industrial adjustment service, Community Futures, and other federal government initiatives, under the Labour Force Development Strategy, are establishing a co-operative, pro-active framework to deal with the inevitable industrial and sectoral adjustments at the local level. Their success in revitalizing companies and communities is directly related to the involvement of the very people in the whole exercise who matter the most: The local employers, workers, representatives, and community leaders.

That involvement by Canadians is a primary reason for the economic progress which has defined this government's economic stewardship.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my comments are going to be very brief, but I felt that I should rise this evening and speak to the motion that is before us.

My first reaction was that it was very philosophical and idealistic, but on the other hand, I started thinking back exactly the things that are being mentioned in the motion this evening. Co-operatives are not something new in Canada. Co-operatives have been around for as long as I can possibly remember, whether it is in the housing market or whether it is in the food industry or in the farming industry, and there have been many of them. The co-operative industry is something that Canada has based itself on for these good many years and has grown the stronger because of it.

The reason I felt that I should speak this evening was because the hon. member mentioned the regional and municipal governments and how they should be involved. My background is 10 years in that area. I know that municipal governments have been involved. However, municipal governments are restricted according to the municipal act. They are not allowed to put an infusion of their own moneys in to create jobs in their own municipalities. The money has to come from either the provincial government or the federal government.

• (1730)

Historically both levels of government have provided municipalities with moneys and job creation programs. This is nothing new. It is something that municipalities have taken advantage of for a good number of years.

The major problem that municipalities have been faced with over the years in this area is the fact that the governments provided this infusion of money, put up the money for a capital project and then withdraw its support. The municipality is left holding the bag. Who carries the operating costs? All of a sudden the municipalities have a project that is under way and they are having to draw from a tax base that is only coming from the property tax.

One program I would like to mention that is absolutely deplorable, that is presently in place by this government, is called "project haven". It comes under the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The corporation puts up the money for a co-operative venture or a municipal venture to build a home for battered women in Canada, but it only provides the capital cost. Then the organization is left with the possibility of trying to raise money and trying to gather funds together. On average, a project of that nature needs approximately $300,000 a year. It is very difficult in today's age to try and fund raise $300,000 a year by a hand full of volunteers. Yet the need for this project is great in Canada today. I strongly suggest that the government start moving to provide operating funds for that.

The private sector and the entrepreneurial spirit have always been very much in the forefront in Canada. Again, they have in many instances relied on government for this infusion of money. This was started by a Liberal government, not by a Conservative government. We were the ones that made the road marks in this area. Again this is not something new.

I commend the member for bringing this forward. I just think that we have to carry it a little bit further. We have to document this a little further. We have to see where these funds are going to come from and be more specific. Let us not chop it off at the knees and leave somebody holding the bag.

We talk about the economy, job creation and the environment. The infrastructure program should be in place across this country today, and it is not. Jobs would be created and protection of the environment would happen, yet this government refuses to put any money into that program. This was something that since the 1930s was supported by a Liberal government. It was a tripartite agreement.

Our Trans-Canada Highway was built by the federal government. Once it was built it was handed over to the province. It is falling apart. It needs three levels of government to maintain it. There are cities and towns that have no sewage treatment plants. Our rivers, lakes and oceans are being polluted.

I ask the government to take action. Let us create jobs in this country. Let's protect our environment. I applaud this motion, but let us make it a little tighter.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the motion of the Hon. Member for Prince Albert—Churchill River and to my government's policy of assisting farm operations. Since the Hon. Member's motion is rather long and varied, I would like to discuss my government's concerns and what it has been doing for the agricultural industry.

As an example of the government's understanding of the essential role played by the agricultural sector in our economy, I may mention that on October 4 this year, our Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of State (Agriculture) and the Minister for International Trade (Messrs. Mulroney, Mazankowski, Blais and Crosbie) met Mr. Jacques Proulx, president of the Union des producteurs agricoles, the UPA executive and a number of senior officials of his organization.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, our government, with the United States, has been vindicated in the yogurt and ice cream case at GATT. Our government has just delegated a commission, chaired by the president of the Canadian Federation of Milk Producers, Mr. Claude Rivard, and as you know, the GATT negotiations on this matter start on Monday. We are trying to strengthen GATT article 11 which will allow our milk producers in Quebec to expand and maintain their position.

As you know, the agricultural sector does a lot more than feed the country. It employs one-seventh of Canada's labour force, requires considerable investments and is responsible for exports totalling billions of dollars.

Farm producers and the agri-food industry contribute very substantially to the prosperity of this country, and that is why the government is monitoring developments in this sector very closely.

In fact, we believe the government has done more than its share to enable the entire agricultural sector to maintain its strength, despite all the problems it is facing. Our support has been unflagging, and some excellent examples are the Special Canadian Grains Program and the Canadian Crop Drought Assistance Program.

During the last four years, over $16 billion has been invested by the government in agriculture. If we were not convinced of the importance of this sector, we would not have done twice as much for the industry as the previous government during the last four years of its mandate.

Our programs are based on a number of different perspectives. Above all, however, they are comprehensive and support the development of all intervenors in the industry.

Mr. Speaker, I have some more examples to show how we support Canadian farm producers.

First, the national farm products marketing development project which subsidizes research and marketing, new product development, marketing studies and development of marketing strategies.

Our purpose is to help Canadian products win a greater market share, both domestically and internationally.

This plan covers up to 50 per cent of the costs for non-profit commercial organizations and affects all production sectors.

The purpose of the production development assistance project is to stimulate the economic development of the agricultural sector by granting financial assistance for specific projects for developing and upgrading human resource.

Under this project, $9.5 million will be allocated this year. Part of this amount will go to fairs and exhibitions, among others.

For farmers in financial difficulty, the Government set up the Farm Debt Review Board Program. Through mediation, these boards help reach agreements between all parties so that the farmer can continue operating or liquidate his assets in an orderly way.

In three years, 7691 applications were considered by the Farm Debt Review Boards. Agreement was reached in 5143 cases, a success rate of 67 per cent. Note that the boards do not impose rules but rather use a mediation process to reach agreement amicably.

Finally, despite the dynamism of the industry and the efforts of the Government, some farmers must give up farming. For them, we created the Canadian Rural Transition Program. Thanks to this program, farmers who are forced to quit farming can more easily go into other fields.

Concretely, this program provides, for example, a transition subsidy, financial aid to pay living expenses for a certain period, help in seeking employment and assistance for all training-related expenses. It also provides employment as well as, legal and financial information.

So far 2,869 farmers have benefited from the program to the tune of an average $6,600 per person.

Mr. Speaker, the government is not content to sit on its laurels. Now is the time to secure a stable and strong future for the agricultural sector. That is why we have launched an in-depth study of the national agricultural policy.

This study will enable the Canadian agri-food industry to remain active and successful in the future by taking advantage of a fast-changing and increasingly global market and of the opportunities arising from the Canada-U.S. Trade Agreement, by facing up to the new environment resulting from the Multilateral Trade Negotiations and by seizing the opportunities offered by Europe after 1992 and the growth of the Asian and Pacific markets.

That study will allow us and all interested parties to share a common vision and to reaffirm our determination even our commitment to meeting consumer demand, especially for healthy and nutritious products.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, our government is committed to maintaining a strong and healthy agri-food industry in Canada. To that end, we will establish a national strategic framework for developing policies based on Canadians' own characteristics and success stories while keeping a confident vision of the future.

[English]

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed pleased today to have this opportunity to talk about workers' co-ops and the work that this government has been doing with the co-operative sector.

Co-operatives are an important sector of the Canadian economy. There are approximately 12 million Canadians who are members of co-operatives whose combined assets are more than $70 billion and who conduct $14 billion in business every year.

There are co-ops in every part of Canada and in virtually every line of business. They are indeed major players in the grain trade, the dairy and poultry industries, and banking. They are also active in fisheries, housing, child care, health care and many other fields. Some of Canada's largest businesses are run by co-operatives. The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, for example, Canada's biggest co-op, ranks sixty-sixth on The Financial Post, 500 listed for 1988. There were also 17 other co-ops including the Alberta Wheat Pool, United Grain Growers, Manitoba Pool Elevators, and several dairy pools among the 500 companies listed.

Co-operatives perform even better on The Financial Post ranking of financial institutions. It might surprise the House to learn that there were 19 credit unions in caisses populaires among the top 100, with the Desjardins Confederation in sixth place over all.

In 1988 a co-op opened Canada's first heavy oil upgrader in Regina. This major undertaking opened on time and within budget. All this proves that co-operatives are viable enterprises that are able to compete with private sector corporations. They compete not only in agriculture and banking but also in fields such as forestry, fisheries, retailing, petroleum, fertilizers, building material, and machinery sales. They are also active in services such as child care, health care, housing, communications, and even funerals.

Speaking of child care co-ops, they were the subject of a recent study by the federal government's co-operative secretariat. This study found that child care co-ops offer significant benefits for parents and their children. They encourage parental involvement in the education system, provide cost effective quality child care, and offer development and opportunities for both parents and the child. According to this study there were 469 child care co-ops in Canada in 1986, with 19,603 members and 944 staff. We can expect to see more co-operative day care centres in pre-schools in the future.

This government has taken an active interest in the co-operative sector. In 1984 the Prime Minister appointed the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board as minister responsible for liaison with the co-operative sector. In 1987 the government established the co-operatives secretariat to act as a focal point for the government's relations with the co-op sector. Then we set up the minister's advisory committee made up of senior representatives of the sector. This committee advises the minister on the potential impact of government policies and programs on co-ops. To complete the infrastructure this government created the interdepartmental committee. This body co-ordinates government activities in relation to the co-op sector.

The government set up the infrastructure but it did not stop there. The minister has co-hosted three federal-provincial territorial conferences of ministers responsible for co-operatives. That is action. The first was held in Regina in 1985, the second in Ottawa in 1986, and the third in Halifax in 1988. Recently the minister held the fourth conference in Montreal.

What makes the Ottawa member's motion especially timely is that the ministers discussed workers' co-ops at their latest conference. Last year in Halifax the ministers directed their officials to work together with officials of the co-op sector to develop a strategy for the development of workers' co-ops. The federal minister responsible for co-ops said on that occasion that workers' co-ops "would create jobs and give people a chance to become involved in making business decisions". He also said it was important for governments at all levels to develop policies to meet the needs of workers co-operatives.

Workers co-operatives are businesses owned and directed by the people who operate them. In 1988 there were about 450 worker co-ops in Canada, more than double the number operating four years earlier. These businesses provide employment for about 15,000 Canadian men and women and had sales of well over $100 million.

Allow me to provide you with some examples of successful workers co-ops. In Montreal, Harpell Press has been run as a co-op since 1947. It is one of the largest workers co-ops and prints in the Canadian edition of the Reader's Digest. Another Montreal co-op organizes northern adventure trips and mountain climbing courses. In the maritimes there is a very active co-op making Acadian hooked rugs. In British Columbia a new co-op specializes in desk top publishing.

Printing, baking, forestry and construction are just a few of the industries where worker co-ops have traditionally been active. In recent years some workers' co-ops have successfully established in the high technology field of computer software. In 1988 workers' co-ops moved into some new areas including two home health care co-ops in Nova Scotia, the Co-operative of Organic Food Growers in Prince Edward Island, and a health food co-op that sells meat from animals nourished with feed free from sprays and pesticides.

There is really no area that is not suitable for workers co-ops. Theatre, taxis, ambulance services, ventilation equipment manufacturing and building maintenance are some of the other enterprises run by workers co-ops. Many Canadians and their communities are highly dependent on a single industry. For them, finding a solution to plant closures is a top priority. Workers' co-ops can often provide that solution. That is why the federal, provincial and territorial governments are interested in encouraging their development. A recent study in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia indicates that workers co-ops actually have a better chance of survival than conventional businesses. According to this report, 58 per cent of the workers' co-ops are still in business after six years. This compares well to the 70 per cent to 80 per cent failure rates typically reported for Canadian business in their first five years.

• (1750)

I would now like to discuss the strategy process that was set in motion at last year's Conference of Ministers that was held June 14 in Halifax. Immediately following the conference, a committee headed by the federal government's co-operative secretariat, including representatives of all 10 provinces or provincial governments and the Northwest Territories, was established and began holding meetings to draft the strategy. The co-operative sector was invited to make its views known and to offer suggestions. The committee delivered its proposed national strategy for the development of workers' co-operatives on January 3, 1989. The report made three levels of recommendations.

Level one calls on governments to "provide equality of treatment" by amending legislation, regulations and policies to eliminate factors that limit the development of workers' co-ops.

Level two recommends that governments "provide equality of opportunity" by making legislative provision for the transfer of incorporation from a company to a co-op.

Level three proposes that governments "provide positive encouragement to the creation of workers' co-ops".

The minister recognizes that governments can provide an environment that enables co-ops and private enterprise to compete as equals. At the conference on October 20 he and his provincial counterparts studied the recommendations and discussed the follow-up to the national strategy to ensure that this type of environment exists. Some provinces have already done what the report recommends, while others are moving in that direction.

As a result of the minister's consultations the national strategy is now closer to implementation in all provinces. The federal government's co-operative secretariat will now undertake bilateral negotiations with the provinces to further advance the process.

This is not just a provincial matter, and I think all members in this House recognize that. The federal government is also responding to the report's recommendations: $5 million from unemployment insurance is being spent on research into the development of workers' co-ops. In addition, proposed changes to the unemployment insurance program are designed specifically to assist the capitalization of workers' co-ops. The co-operative secretariat is studying the implications for the federal government of implementing the recommendations.

In conclusion, let me say that the hon. member has raised an important issue. I want to congratulate him on doing so. The record shows, though, that this government has done a lot to assist the development of the co-operative sector and the worker co-ops in particular.

I see you signalling that my time is up. I just want once again to congratulate the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River for bringing forth his motion to the House for discussion and deliberation. If he listened carefully to what I had to say today, I think he would understand that this government is leading the way and taking its responsibilities for workers' co-operatives very seriously, indeed as the history of this government and the initiatives that we have taken since taking office in 1984 have shown.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to deal tonight with the motion moved by the Hon. Member for Prince Albert—Churchill River (Mr. Funk) which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of encouraging and building community-based investment and job initiatives through community and worker co-operatives, community development corporations, regional councils, small businesses and farms and municipal governments.

In short, Mr. Speaker, our hon. friend would like the Government to do more and provide co-operatives and other organizations with more money. Therefore, I suggest it might be interesting to look at co-operatives, because this is one of the key sectors in our economy today. For instance, financial co-operatives credit unions co-operatives and the so-called caisses populaires have approximately 9 million members in Canada with assets of over $56 billion. Insurance co-operatives, with assets of about $5.4 billion cover 9.5 subscribers and the co-operative trust companies administer nearly $17 billion in assets. This indicates just how strong the co-operative movement is in Canada. In the financial sector there are no less than 3,859 co-operatives with a total membership of nearly 3.1 million and combined assets of nearly $7 billion. This accounts for $14 billion in economic activity in this country.

Mr. Speaker, newly-formed groups of workers and financial services as well as the ever growing number of sectors where the co-operative principles are being applied constitute a growth factor in the Canadian economy. Ever since the members of the British Rockdale movement first stated the principles of co-operation nearly a century ago, the suggestion that ordinary people should work together to meet their own needs has gained currency the world over, so much so that nowadays we have co-operatives actively engaged in practically all sectors of our society. People turn to the co-operative movement to obtain day care services, health services, food or accommodation. The movement has even gained a toehold in the labour market. Let us take forestry co-operatives as an example. There is one in the riding of Jonquière which I proudly represent in this House. I am referring to Laterrière's forestry co-operative, a group of people who got together to develop their economy and improve their working methods to draw maximum benefits from our huge forest resources.

The notions of participatory democracy, education and sharing benefits gained as a result of joint efforts are already firmly established in that field. As a matter of fact, my colleague the Minister of State for Housing had an opportunity to meet with people involved in the Mouvement des coopératives d'habitation permanentes, and I think our colleague was highly impressed by their dedication, energy and efficient approach in promoting their convictions.

I have in mind some people who work in that field, and of course I need not go any further than my own region, my own riding. A good example would be Mr. Allan Gaudreault who works for Brich and who helped a group of people launch their own co-operative project. This is the case of one man who deserves to be singled out for the quality of the work he does for our fellow citizens.

The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the responsibility of our colleague, has done a lot to promote this kind of accommodation for Canadians. Over the years the federal government has always made it a point to consult regularly with the co-operative housing sector, and their discussions have led to a number of innovations in housing.

Under the Canadian co-operative housing program established in 1986, we supported the development of a new mortgage financing called indexed-linked mortgage, a totally new program.

Mr. Speaker, I see that my time is running out and I know you are preparing to interrupt me soon, so I will get away from my text to refer to examples of co-operative projects and a speech I made last week, when I had an opportunity to attend the opening of the Marguerite Belley co-operative project in my constituency. A wide range of people where there, both the well-to-do and the poor. I told them of the quality of housing they were enjoying, because in our cities we can see the difference between projects supported by our Government and those from the private sector, in terms of the quality of existing buildings. I believe this is important because what can be more pleasant in life than living in quality housing, feeling good, being able to live decently. This is a benefit we are providing our people with the co-operative housing program. There are other initiatives we are taking in housing.

• (1800)

And look at what is also coming on stream in respect of senior citizen housing. Things are moving fast in that area.

I see you want to interrupt me, Mr. Speaker, but I believe our co-operative housing program is excellent and we must indeed go on directing funds to better housing in this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The period provided for the consideration of private member business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

Adjournment Debate

VIA RAIL

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate tonight on a question that I put to the Minister of Transport on October 6. It was an important question I think because it followed on the deliberate slashing and destroying of the VIA Rail passenger network system in Canada by some 50 per cent.

What I want to do tonight is to discuss briefly some of the points around the VIA Rail remote services that we have in this country and what they mean in particular to the VIA Rail service in northern British Columbia through my riding.

Briefly, the government has done the wrong thing. I think our transport critic, the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, has done an excellent job in proving how wrong the Conservative government is to destroy VIA Rail as it is doing. As well, we have to look back in time a bit to recall how the Liberals did the same. It is unfortunate that in an inadequate way the Liberal Party when it was in government created VIA Rail. It made cuts to VIA. Now we see the absolute betrayal by the Conservative government of its election promises in 1984 and 1988.

It is important to review what the minister has said about remote services, most specifically the VIA Rail run from Prince Rupert to Jasper which goes through the riding of my good friend, the member for Skeena, as well as through my riding of Prince George—Bulkley Valley and the riding of my colleague, the member for Prince George—Peace River.

The question we put was to the transport minister. It was in light of the fact that he announced that in keeping this run going the three times a week that it does now, Transport Canada would be reviewing the transportation needs of the truly isolated communities along these remote routes to determine whether more cost-effective means of access could be introduced.

For the information of the House, we have not seen the VIA Rail timetable yet. Some of the communities served by this run are Harvey, Dunster, McBride, Goat River, Dome Creek, Penny, Longworth, Dago, Burns Lake, Houston and Telkwa. Many of those communities depend on VIA Rail. Some of those communities depend solely on VIA Rail as their only means of transportation.

The important message that we want the government and the minister to understand is just how important VIA Rail is to those of us in northern B.C. That is why we asked and why I have written to chambers of commerce and city councils throughout my riding to invite the minister and Transport Canada to discuss what this route is going to do. In the review of passenger rail transportation in Canada put out by VIA Rail, the government has to step in. There is virtually no mention in this report of that terrific route from Prince Rupert to Jasper and the tourist potential that it has.

It is critical that the Minister of Transport instruct his officials to travel to our part of the province to review this remote run and the others, and to meet with concerned community groups to ensure that they get a chance to explain the potential that there is for VIA Rail in our area, both from a remote service concept and from the incredible tourist potential that we have.

It is unfortunate that in the debate here and in our hometown on this matter that some of the members from the government party opposite talked about how they did not know what the cuts were going to do. It was as if they were not even aware of the concern that people had about VIA Rail. That is shocking because the community group in Prince George, the Save VIA Rail Committee, was headed by residents of Prince George, some of whom worked at VIA Rail and with whom I took a run some months ago to get a first-hand look at the service, which was sold out on many occasions. Yet this Conservative government does not understand how important a role VIA Rail can play in eastern and central Canada but also in remote Canada.

I ask that when the Parliamentary Secretary or whoever on the government side is going to respond they will have the courage to commit to this House that those officials will have an opportunity to travel and hear from the people who rely on VIA Rail passenger service in the remote parts of our country. It is essential. I hope the government will listen for once on this matter.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to respond to the question raised by the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley about the future of transportation connections in truly isolated communities which are now served by VIA on its remote routes.

As part of the government's announcement of a national, affordable, sustainable network for VIA, the Minister of Transport indicated that he would be reviewing the transportation needs of the truly isolated communities along the remote routes to determine whether more cost-effective means of access could be introduced.

The truly isolated communities are found on VIA's eight remote lines and on the Winnipege-Capreol section of the restructured western transcontinental service. They are identified as points where VIA makes scheduled stops which do not have any regularly scheduled air service and do not have all-weather highways access to the national transportation system.

The review will examine the most cost-effective means to meet the transportation needs of truly isolated communities. It will determine if rail service is the most cost effective transportation alternative when compared, for example, to all-weather runways or roads to serve these truly isolated communities.

If rail continues to be the most cost-effective solution, that will be the basis for future action. If some other approach is indicated the Minister of Transport will engage in appropriate discussions to determine if alternative agreements can be in fact be implemented on a satisfactory basis.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on October 5, 1989, I posed a question to the Minister of Transport. At that time I asked the minister with regard to the termination of the Halifax-Sydney route why those Canadians were being treated as second-class Canadians.

I raised with the minister the fact that the termination of this particular route would negatively affect the tourism industry in industrial Cape Breton and indeed throughout all of Cape Breton. It would deny Canadians living in that region of Canada the opportunity of access to good quality health care in the provincial capital of Halifax.

I also outlined for the minister that the termination of this particular route would prevent students from having affordable, reasonable transportation costs to pursue their education.

It was interesting to note way back in 1981, in particular in July of 1981 when a previous administration had made some cuts, some of the comments which were made by the then Secretary of State for External Affairs and, of course, the present Deputy Prime Minister. These comments were contained in the Report of the Conservative Task Force on Rail Passenger Service, 1981. I think it is worth pointing out to members who are present as well as the viewing audience the hypocrisy that we see being practised each and every day by the government.

The first statement is one by the present Secretary of State for External Affairs. He said on July 28, 1981, with regard to cut-backs of VIA Rail: "An act of the deepest cynicism and arrogance—(that) can only aggravate regional disparity".

• (1810)

The Deputy Prime Minister said on July 18, 1981, as quoted in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald: "The cuts are another example of double dealing and double standards. I find the decision and the whole process most objectionable".

Contained in the report were a number of items which I believe to be germane to the points which I am attempting to impress upon the government, namely, that "special groups of Canadians, such as the disabled, the elderly and economically disadvantaged, to whom other passenger modes are physically or financially impossible, will be severely affected by the cut-backs".

That was contained in the Conservative document of 1981, and it is very much applicable in 1989 with regard to the Halifax-Sydney route. They go on in their document of 1981 to state: "The cuts discriminate unfairly against Canadians living in sparsely populated or remote areas, such as northerners or Indian peoples, who have no other modes of transportation available to or from their communities".

I suggest to the parliamentary secretary, who is ably trying to defend a very impossible situation for the Government of Canada, that in that part of Canada the opportunities in terms of modes of transportation, if you are unemployed, sick, elderly or indeed disadvantaged in some way, are non-existent. The passenger rail train has served Canadians in that part of Canada immeasurably well over many, many years.

Further, contained in their document of 1981, the Conservative opposition as it was then stated the following four things which I believe are worthy of consideration. "The cuts are unjustifiably discriminatory toward certain areas of Canada and thus will create further discord, disharmony and regional tension".

I say to the parliamentary secretary, you have accomplished that. Your goal obviously was to create disharmony, regional disparities and havoc. You have accomplished that by terminating the Halifax-Sydney route of VIA Rail.

"Government policies to improve regional economic opportunities are often offset by contradictory policies of reducing transportation services to those same regions".

Modes of transportation are essential in terms of any economic strategy but, more important, they are absolutely essential when you are dealing with an economy which at the present time, by all standards—provincially, nationally and internationally—is well below average. To make it viable, to make it more attractive and make it more appealing, the way to go is not to cut one of the modes of transportation.

"Over two-thirds of the job losses caused by the cuts will occur in regions beyond central Canada, mainly in areas already disadvantaged or with existing unemployment problems".

In parts of my riding unemployment ranges from 22.9 per cent upward to 35 to 40 per cent. Certainly these cut-backs will operate in a very disruptive way.

The report goes on to state: "A widespread view exists that any savings produced by the cut-backs across the country will be spent to upgrade services in the narrow transportation corridor between Quebec City and Windsor".

What are they going to do with the savings vis-à-vis VIA Rail? Are they going to put them into other modes of transportation in the poorer regions of this country? The answer has been very clear from the outset that this government is not interested in any meaningful way in assisting those poorer regions of the country. What better example do Canadians have than the example of the termination of the Halifax–Sydney run of VIA Rail?

As I said at the outset, and I conclude, it will operate to the disadvantage of elderly Canadians. It will prevent students from having affordable access to their educational needs in universities on mainland Nova Scotia. It will affect those Canadians in eastern Nova Scotia who wish to seek out and obtain appropriate health care by travelling to the provincial capital.

All of those things contribute to the belief, and I believe the evidence is very strong, that those Canadians in eastern Nova Scotia are being treated as second–class citizens by the Government of Canada and it should terminate that kind of ill treatment of those Canadians.

• (1815)

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to comment on the remarks made by my hon. friend from Cape Breton—East Richmond.

The government's decision on VIA's five–year corporate plan maintains a network of rail passenger service that will be national, affordable and sustainable. The network will continue to link Canadians from Vancouver to Halifax and will maintain good connections between eastern and central Canada, as both The Ocean and The Atlantic will continue to operate. No Canadian is being cut off from access to the national transportation system as a result of this decision including Cape Bretons.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond has raised the potential tourism impact of the discontinuance of VIA's Halfax–Sydney route. In response I would like to say that as someone born on the great island I am familiar with the many notable tourism attractions in Cape Breton. The Cabot Trail is world renowned. Ingonish Beach, the Miners' Museum in Glace Bay, Fort Louisburg at Louisburg, the Alexander Graham Bell Museum at Baddeck, and the Acadian Community of Cheticamp play a major role in the tourism industry of Cape Breton.

However, I must point out that these important tourism attractions are not accessible by passenger rail. People travel by automobile or by bus to visit these places.

We must also be aware that VIA's Halifax–Sydney service not only had a ridership drop of more than 40 per cent in 1984 but, as mentioned to the hon. member by the minister, also cost taxpayers about $86 for every passenger it carried in 1988.

In light of these facts it is difficult to argue that VIA's Halifax–Sydney passenger service plays a vital part in the Cape Breton tourism industry. Those who wish to visit Cape Breton and the many attractions there will continue to do as they always have done.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question follows upon the questions we have been raising in the last few days about government scandals.

Over the last few days we have been focusing on the conduct of one particular individual, a member of the Senate, and we are now assured not only that the Senate is considering holding a hearing into his activities in relation to two government departments but that the RCMP is also examining material about that individual.

But there is a much larger question which has not been answered by the government and which I want to see it address. I hope the member sitting opposite will be prepared to do so.

We are not talking about individuals' particular behaviour in relation to this government. We are talking about an over–all pattern which is emerging of the way in which this government does business.

The way in which this government does business stinks, whether we are talking about conduct which is illegal, and I can give examples of individuals like a former Conservative member of Parliament who was convicted of taking bribes; whether there is a criminal trial and the individual is acquitted, and I can refer in that case to former Conservative cabinet minister Andre Bissonnette; or whether we are not even talking about illegalities, and in this category I would put a case like that of Sinclair Stevens.

In so many instances in approaching this government for the use of public funds what has emerged is a pattern in which friends of the Prime Minister, people who are important members of the Conservative party, people who are close to other cabinet ministers, are getting rich and getting rich out of the public trust. Contracts are being awarded with no sense for the taxpayer that any respect is being paid at all to get the best deal or even to justify the contract.

What we are urging and what we are asking is that the government clean up its act. It is not a good enough answer for the government to say that it is cleaning up its act by turning over information about a particular individual or a particular situation to the police.

If I can pursue the example of the Gravel case, during the time in which the matter was under investigation by the police, the government refused to answer any questions about it. It refused to answer not just about Mr. Gravel's involvement but about the implications of having a member of its caucus on the take getting bribes, and the way in which that would alter the operations of the government against the interests of the taxpayer.

When the individual was charged and we asked questions about it, the government refused to answer questions about it because the individual was charged. When he was before the court it refused to answer questions about it because it was before the court. When the individual was convicted and no public interest was served at all in refusing to answer questions about the details and background, again it refused to answer questions saying that the book was closed.

Let me pursue the Gravel example again. If someone is prepared to give a bribe to have his contract accepted by a government department, it is important for us to know, apart from the responsibility of the individual, whether that contract a necessary contract. Was it something the government really needed to be done? Was there someone else who would have done it for less or done it better? These are all very relevant questions. Whether Mr. Gravel in the particular case ended up being convicted or not, we are entitled to ask those questions and have answers to them.

Now I come to the case before us, of Senator Cogger. Whatever his individual responsibility is found to be, whether charges are ever laid or ever successfully brought, what is uncovered is another piece of this pattern of a government that helps its friends en route to awarding government contracts, en route to making government decisions. It is not good enough to tell us that Senator Cogger is possibly being reviewed in the other place. It is not good enough to tell us that the RCMP may be looking into the matter.

Whether they are or not, we insist that the government answer for the probity, honesty and fairness of the way in which government programs are being admitted. Everyone in this country is becoming more intensely aware, day by day, that having a friend of the Prime Minister help you for payment, having a friend of another cabinet minister, having a prominent Tory help you, is a certain way of being able to succeed in getting a grant, a loan, in getting a contract to put up a building at an airport, or in getting a lease from the government for space in a private building.

There are many examples of it, and in each case the government has insisted that it will only focus on the individual and the individual's responsibility. Whether the individual is responsible or not, whether we are talking about a rotten apple, we are talking about a rotten government.

This Parliament is the place where we are entitled to raise these questions. We are entitled to hear from the ministers of their attempts and their sincere efforts to clean up their act and try to restore for Canadians a government that the Canadian people can be proud of.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to say that this question has been raised before and has been answered.

I would like to refer the member to the response by the former Minister of Transport, the hon. member for St. John's West, on February 22, 1988. I quote:

> The procedure was one of the most open and above-board ever used by any government in Canada. A committee of permanent civil servants headed by Mr. Warrick, the former manager of the Toronto airport, was in charge of the call of the proposals for the whole procedure. They made a recommendation. Four groups put in proposals and they recommended what they said was the best proposals, after their weeks of analysis. Everyone was given the same chance to make a proposal and to bid.
> They came to me then and I approved their recommendation. I did not go against their recommendation. I did not try to overrule their recommendation.

I believe that this should adequately respond to any concerns of my hon. friend.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: A motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at ten o'clock.

The House adjourned at 6.25 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York Centre rises on a question of privilege. Before I hear him I perhaps would like to consider the situation.

Because of the courtesy of the hon. member for York Centre a few minutes ago, he gave some indication that he wished to raise a question of privilege. There may be time later in the day to raise it, but I am looking at the order, and that is what I am bound by.

I have to ask the hon. member, is it something that is arising out of proceedings in the Chamber during the course of a sitting? If it is not, I will have to ask the hon. member to go through the usual motions, and give an hour's notice.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to be straightforward about this and ask unanimous consent to raise my question of privilege now rather than raising it at a time which would delay the introduction and first reading of a bill the government has given notice of its intention to proceed with at noon. I can wait until noon, but I think it might be more in the interests of the House that I be able to do it now, and it will not be long.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair wants to co-operate with members. The hon. member has asked for consent, but the members that he is asking the consent of have no idea of what it is the hon. member is raising. I think I have to say at the moment that the application is premature. As a consequence of discussion, the hon. member may be able to obtain that consent, and then of course I am in the hands of the House. The hon. member for York Centre.

• (1010)

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, it had to do with a deliberate interference by an official of the Federal Business Development Bank with the delivery of documents to me which the corporation had agreed to provide me and which it began providing me with yesterday. They were documents which I had phoned the RCMP about. I told them that I would be giving these documents to them between four-thirty and five o'clock. However, they were not made available. I would briefly like to explain the circumstances and indicate that my privileges were affected.

Mr. Speaker: I am bound as your Speaker to follow the rules. I have to say to the hon. member for York Centre that perhaps if he has discussions and if events change then of course the Chair would hear him further. For other members and for the public that is watching, I cannot help but hear a discussion that is going on among members. That is a discussion that members will need to have. I am bound by the rules.

Mr. Kaplan: May I seek unanimous consent to deal with the question of privilege now?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York Centre has asked the Chair if he could seek unanimous consent. I, of course, am prepared to listen to the Hon. Minister of Justice.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the comments of my hon. friend, I now understand a little better what he is driving at. I think it might be in the interest of the House and the business of the day to briefly address the question of privilege, but we do have only a short time between now and eleven o'clock. If he can address it briefly, that might assist everybody.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has agreed that the hon. member for York Centre be permitted to raise the question of privilege and I will hear the hon. member for York Centre.

Mr. Kaplan: Yesterday morning, in the light of the apparent unwillingness of the government to call in the RCMP in connection with work being done by Senator Cogger, or possibly being done by Senator Cogger and his firm for the Federal Business Development Bank, I telephoned the Commissioner of the RCMP and told him that if an inspector would attend at my office between four-thirty and five o'clock yesterday afternoon I would present him with a collection of documents.

Before doing this a member of my staff, Marc Laframboise of the research bureau of the Liberal caucus, telephoned the Federal Business Development Bank and arranged for relevant documents from the bank to be transmitted to Ottawa for me to include in the package to present to the RCMP.

These documents were sent from Montreal by the Federal Business Development Bank and they were in effect seized by the vice-president of public relations for the bank in Ottawa, so they were not available to me to present to the RCMP.

I consider this to be an interference with my responsibilities as a member of Parliament to do my job in bringing forward the evidence that was available that had to be considered in relation to Senator Cogger's involvement with the Federal Business Development Bank.

I learned only this morning of the reasons which I have just outlined why these documents were not delivered. If you find a prima facie case of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I would certainly be prepared to move the appropriate motion.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member. Are there other members rising on this matter? The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): I am the member who phoned back the Federal Business Development Bank to find out what had happened.

I was informed this morning that the documents in question had been seized by a gentleman by the name of Michel Azam, identifying himself as the vice-president of government relations for the Federal Business Development Bank. This information had been sent to my colleague, the member for York Centre, to the attention of all Liberal members actually, by the Access to Information Co-ordinator of the Federal Business Development Bank.

One element that is important to add here is the fact that these documents we requested, which were promised to us and which were subsequently intercepted were documents in the public domain. They were photocopies of documents previously given to people in the media, i.e. the Montreal Gazette.

If you look at the matter closely, Mr. Speaker, you will find that privilege is defined as the sum of our peculiar rights enjoyed by either House and by members individually and collectively.

Using that definition, Mr. Speaker, you will agree with my colleague for York Centre and I. Information was provided to the media, photocopies of which were promised to members of Parliament to do their job. My colleague organized a meeting with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police pursuant to a suggestion made in the House of Commons by a cabinet minister, as a matter of fact.

Those documents were withheld from members of Parliament by a deliberate action on the part of an individual at the Federal Business Development Bank who, by the way, has since agreed to release the documents. Nevertheless, they were not available yesterday for the meeting in question.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that you will be inclined to agree that this House cannot function unless officials of the government give us at least the same courtesy offered to people in the media and others.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to take the matter under advisement. I thank the House for giving consent and the hon. member for York Centre for raising it. I may want to hear further on it. I shall take it under advisement.

CANADIAN SPACE AGENCY

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of of Bill C-16, an act to establish the Canadian Space Agency and to provide for other matters in relation to space, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING—MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There are 10 motions in the amendment set down in the notice paper at report stage of Bill C-16, an act to establish the Canadian Space Agency and to provide for other matters in relation to space. I have had the opportunity to examine them, and I am now ready to make the ruling.

Motions Nos. 1 and 2 are in order and will be grouped for debate but voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 3, 8, 9, and 10 are also in order and will be grouped for debate but voted on as follows: (a) Motions Nos. 3 and 10 will be voted on separately; (b) an affirmative vote on Motion No. 8 obviates the question being put on Motion No. 9; (c) an negative vote on Motion No. 8 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 9.

Motion No. 4, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, will not be selected because it deals with the same subject as Motion No. 3.

[Translation]

Motion No. 5 by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Pagtakhan), is identical to a motion that was moved and debated in the Legislative Committee. For this reason this motion will not be selected.

Motion No. 7 in the name of the same Hon. Member is similar to a motion that was proposed and debated in Committee. However, the Chair is of the opinion that this motion is sufficiently different and therefore I will allow it to be put to the House. It will be grouped for debate with Motion 6 but each will be voted on separately.

I shall now put motions Nos. 1 and 2 to the House.

[English]

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-16 be amended in Clause 5 by striking out line 23 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"nology for non-military, peaceful purposes;"

and by striking out line 25 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"space technology for non-military, peaceful purposes to and throughout".

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-16 be amended in Clause 5 by adding immediately after line 26 at page 2 the following:

"(c.1) assume all existing contracts, memoranda of understanding or other arrangements in the name of Her Majesty in right of Canada related to its functions;".

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, both Motion No. 1 and Motion No. 2 attempt to establish clearly defined limitations in the mandate and the operational structure of the proposed space agency.

• (1020)

I would like to concentrate my remarks particularly on Motion No. 1. The current bill before the House outlines that the proposed space agency shall promote "the peaceful use and development of space".

It was argued in committee, and I think the argument is valid, that although the term "peaceful use and development of space" indicates that we will be seeking to use the mandate of the agency for non-aggressive military purposes, the argument can be made that the term "peaceful use" does not preclude the use of this agency for non-aggressive military purposes.

During committee stage the minister acknowledged that the agency could actually become involved in a type of non-aggressive military action. The minister gave the indication, by way of example, of the launching and maintenance of surveillance satellite systems.

The crux of the argument lies in what can be construed by the term "non-aggressive military use". Such a definition in the past has been used, for example, to qualify the low altitude testing of cruise missiles in Canadian air space. It is non-aggressive, but ultimately the testing of those cruise missiles has forwarded the whole problem of the use of nuclear military weaponry.

Therefore, because the current legislation does not specifically preclude military actions under the mandate of the space agency, it leaves the door open for Canada to enter into the exploration of space as a military frontier.

The potential for the abuse of the mandate of the space agency for military purposes, although it may be non-aggressive military purposes, is heightened by the fact that Canada has not specifically excluded itself from participating in the U.S. strategic defence initiatives or star wars initiatives.

Collusion with our southern neighbour in the deployment of any star wars space based weapons system remains, I submit, a very distinct possibility, unless this current legislation is strengthened to ensure beyond all reasonable doubt that this cannot take place. The only way of ensuring that is to strictly define the mandate of the new space agency as being one of non-military and peaceful purposes.

The intent of Motion No. 1 is to do just that. It is to define, in very specific terms, the function of the space agency to include the planning, direction, management and implementation of programs and projects for non-military and peaceful purposes. It is to include co-operation with space and space-related agencies in other countries in non-military peaceful use and development of space.

The operative phrase is the term "non-military peaceful use". By inserting this phrase, as proposed by the motion that I have submitted, we will effectively limit the mandate of this agency to a strictly non-military and peaceful function.

I submit that this is not an abandonment of our responsibilities under the NATO and NORAD agreements. It does, however, clearly establish the fact that Canada should not squander its moral and economic energies in the militarization of the space frontier.

It serves to send a very clear and strong signal to our neighbour to the south that the exploration of the space frontier shall be done for the sole purposes of scientific, technological and economic advances and not as yet another attempt to gain the upper hand in the endless and the morally reckless and economically corrupting game of military superiority. We saw enough of that in the cold war years. It is time to move on to new ground.

By supporting the proposed amendment, the Parliament of Canada will say no to the participation of this country in the militarization of our space frontier. I submit to all members of the House that it would clearly establish the mandate of this new space agency as a proud participant in the quest for the betterment of mankind and not as an instrument for its ultimate destruction.

I appeal to all members of the House today to give serious consideration to the proposed amendment. The slight semantic changes that are proposed here could well represent a very dramatic and very defined shift in the future operations of this new proposed space agency. I appeal to the members of the House to support this motion of amendment, and I thank you for the time to present my arguments today.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak to this particular amendment. However I would also like to speak more generally to the bill. I will be introducing a number of amendments and rather than being on my feet three or four times perhaps I could cover the content of them all now since they are related.

Since the 1930s Canada has had a flourishing space science program and, from the beginning, our remarkable achievements have depended on a small handful of outstanding people—individuals dedicated to the expansion of human knowledge about our world and our universe.

The beginning and the ongoing survival of the space program, the space industry and science has depended on and still depends on science and research being carried out by scientists working for the Government of Canada. Their numbers have been dwindling, partly due to the declining commitment of government to science and research and the increasing tendency to bend everything to the immediate or short-term needs of the market-place.

There is not a new generation of young and eager scientists developing to replace them. Therefore, it is vital as the space agency is established that everything possible be done to keep those scientists we have working for Canada's space program and to inspire a new generation of bright, inquiring minds to join them.

The amendments I have proposed arise from the concerns of these scientists and technicians and their support staff who are vital to the continued success of the space program. It is important that I address them together rather than separately.

They are asking the government to listen to their concerns for their families, their careers, the integrity of the space program and the success of this infant agency. They do not have, at this point in time, a lot of confidence that their concerns are being heard and answered. In the months since the agency was announced for the nth time on March 1 of this year, many of the questions and suggestions by the staff and the scientists have gone unheeded. They are still in the dark about the structure of the agency, reporting responsibilities, future prospects for advancement in the profession and what their career and earning potential will be.

• (1030)

Until the hearings of the legislative committee began, they even had no assurance that they would not be forced to move first to temporary quarters in Montreal, work out of cardboard boxes and then move again 18 months later to St. Hubert. That concern has now been resolved.

However, other concerns still remain. They still do not have any assurances about the provision of language training for themselves and their families, about career opportunities for spouses, even about the classification of their own jobs.

Let me address the amendments that were proposed to the legislative committee by the Professional Institute of Public Service of Canada and that reflect the same concerns as were expressed by the Public Service Alliance of Canada.

Motion No. 2 simply provides that in addition to entering into contracts and agreements, the agency may also assume existing obligations of the existing programs. This really is just an amendment for greater certainty, as drafters of legislation like to say. I am not sure why it would be a problem for the government to accept that motion. Perhaps one of the members on the opposite side could explain it to me, if there is a problem.

The second amendment, and that is Motion No. 3, is fundamental to the concerns of the professionals working for the government. I suggest that it is fundamental to their ultimate decision about whether to stay with the agency.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the member. The House has no doubt noticed that the hon. member for Ottawa West is making a summary of all her motions. I gather there is consent to allow her to do that, even though we are discussing Motion Nos. 1 and 2. She is doing it in the interest of saving time.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly my understanding of what motivated the hon. member in making such a presentation, and, of course, we have no objection to that, if it is in the interest of the House to proceed in such a way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Very well. The member for Ottawa West.

Mrs. Catterall: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have not been watching my time carefully so you might signal me a minute before.

The purpose of Motion No. 3 is to protect the status that most of the scientists, researchers and technical professionals now enjoy with the National Research Council. NRC has scientific and technical positions that are based less on paper qualification than on experience and performance, recognizing the unique nature of science and the excellence of the results that can be produced. This system is not unique to NRC. It also exists at the Department of National Defence, and perhaps other federal agencies or Crown corporations.

The problem with the existing legislation is that it tries to squeeze these scientists and technical professionals artificially into the rigid engineering classifications of the public service. The paper credential requirements limit their opportunities for advancement because they may be grandfathered in their current positions but that would not apply to subsequent positions they might legitimately expect to move into.

It would also force most of them into pay scales that are well below their current earning potential. I have seen specific examples of this coming from space agency staff. The bill deals only partly and very unsatisfactorily with this issue and it deals with it only for the few scientists in the astronaut category—those who will be going into space to conduct their research.

I say it is unsatisfactory because it allows for the possibility of special appointments under terms and conditions provided by Order in Council. It deprives the persons appointed in that way of the protection of the Public Service Staff Relations Act while treating them in every other way as public service employees.

My amendment simply removes this special provision for the astronaut scientists and gives the agency the authority that the NRC already has, under which these scientists already live and that DND enjoys, to develop classifications for all its scientific personnel that reflect their talent and their contribution to the space program.

The third amendment deals with those people whose position is transferred to the agency. I believe the minister has somewhat agreed that it corrects the bill to say what, in fact, it was intended to say, that people whose positions are transferred to the agency do not have to compete for their own jobs.

The government has a provision in Clause 28 of the bill that says that this applies only for 90 days or three months after the space agency is formally established in law. That is of concern to the people working for the agency now because while they are allowed to transfer with the position to the agency within 90 days and not have to compete for their own jobs. If their position is moved on day 91, after this bill comes into effect, they would then be in a position where they would have to compete for the job they have held for many, many years.

I know it is the intention of the agency to transfer all positions immediately. That may or may not happen, however, and I believe that the professionals working for the agency, in fact, all the staff working in positions that will go to the agency, deserve the protection of not having to fight for their own job just because it is transferred to the agency. It has taken three years to put the agency in place, and even eight months after the final announcement, vital questions about the structure and functioning of the agency have not been resolved. The employees have little reason to be confident that all the issues with respect to the transfer of positions will be resolved in 90 days. If it cannot be done in eight months, how can the government assure them that it can be done in 90 days? I suggest that it does no harm to remove the 90 day provision to give some assurances to valuable employees that their rights will be protected.

Incidentally, the 90 days is there because when the bill was first written two and a half years ago there was no certainty that the transfer of positions could be accomplished in less than that time. Other things were written two and a half years ago, including the press release announcing the establishment of the agency. At that time, there was no question of moving labs and people. Its purpose was simply to establish a consolidation and a new administrative structure for the people working in the government labs and programs that constitute Canada's space program.

The program was and is working very well close to the seat of government and close to all the international connections that are so important. The government let this become a political football thereby delaying the progress of the space program, delaying many vital and costly decisions of the space industry, and, as one person with several years experience with the European Space Agency said: "Making Canada an international laughing stock."

The Prime Minister has already shown his lack of understanding of the space program, and the lack of value he gives to the people who are responsible for Canada's enviable international reputation, when he suggests that they can be replaced as easily as a burnt out light bulb.

He is wrong. Without the handful of people in our space program, we do not have a space program. These people will transfer to the agency because it opens up to them other opportunities in the Public Service of Canada and because that transfer does not immediately mean any decision about relocating the family or themselves. Whether they will eventually go with the agency when it moves to its new headquarters in St. Hubert will depend on how well the government listens and responds to their concerns. There has not been much evidence in the last eight months that this is happening.

I urge the House to adopt the amendments, and I urge the members on the other side of the House to educate and coerce the Prime Minister to treat these people with the respect and consideration they deserve, or the fears of some of the members opposite will become a reality. The space agency in St. Hubert will be a nice new building, but it will indeed be an empty shell.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity this morning to speak on Bill C-16, an Act to establish the Canadian Space Agency and to provide for other matters in relation to space, and in particular on the excellent amendments proposed by my colleague from Okanagan—Shuswap, which will amend and make clear what is ambiguous from the objects and functions section of the bill, which states:

> The objects of the Agency are to promote the peaceful use and development of space, to advance the knowledge of space through science and to ensure that space science and technology provide social and economic benefits for Canadians.

They are very eloquent words, but ambiguous. When we look at Clause 5 (2), the object of my colleague's first amendment, we find that there is a Mack truck loophole, as I describe it. His proposed amendment comes in paragraph (b) and would change the wording to read the application of:

> "space technology for non-military peaceful purposes".

That makes it very clear to the Canadian public, the Canadian taxpayers, just exactly what the purposes of the agency are, particularly in carrying out the objects. It states: "The agency shall". So it is very important that we have that wording added.

As we have learned before in this House legislation must be precise. The intent must be stated, not left to the interpretation of present or future ministers or the bureaucracy.

In particular, as we have learned, the Minister of State for Science and Technology, when questioned about this legislation and the purpose of the agency in committee, indicated that he was considering some military purposes for the agency. He described them as non-aggressive. If that is what the government was interested in doing vis-à-vis the agency, then clearly that should have been included in the objects and functions and included in the shall clause for what the agency shall be allowed to do. We simply cannot allow this kind of loose wording in either Clause 5 (2) (b) or (c) where my colleague has a similar amendment which would make it state: "To promote the transfer and diffusion of space technology for non-military peaceful purposes".

In assessing what any government is doing and where any government is going with legislation, it is very important that one look at what a government is doing, either intentionally or inadvertently. One can look at what is going on vis-à-vis Goose Bay, Labrador with the projected 65,000 low-level flights per year, if the NATO base were allowed to proceed.

One looks in my own backyard at IR-910, the 4,000 kilometre route which is for Stealth first-strike training and route development for the U.S. military, incursions by up to 25 U.S. nuclear capable war planes at a time, a corridor cutting a swath right across British Columbia. It is a route, I might say, that is not allowed in the U.S. There is no similar route in the United States. The Americans want to do the training and Stealth route development in Canada.

Also, IR-920 in Alberta, the Northwest Territories and Saskatchewan will have similar Stealth training for low level war games.

Most recently the Chilcotin low level U.S. war games took place over B.C. airspace, between September 22 and 24 of this year. These are tree top war games with supersonic aircraft flying at tree top level in British Columbia, without there ever having even been an environmental impact statement, a notification to pilots, or a notification to the public that these were to take place.

We see the tritium sales even by the province of Ontario and Ontario Hydro in locking up commercialized tritium sales to the United States for use as a key component in nuclear bombs. The facilitation by the Canadian government of military sales and technology exchange to global dictatorships, human rights abusers, and such weapons bazaars as Armex right here in downtown Ottawa gives one some idea of the kind of expansion into the whole world of military development and deployment this present government is so interested in.

One need only read the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States to see the provisions that are included there for technology transfers and the redevelopment of some parts of Canada's economy for military purposes.

This House should be dealing immediately and urgently with the proposal by the United States Government to go ahead with a contract in the middle of this month to develop a Trident nuclear submarine base just 40 miles from Prince Rupert, placing it in an area to make it an international nuclear target. There have been no environmental impact studies done of the proposal. It threatens and endangers 35,000 Canadians and is to be put in an area where there are only a few thousand American citizens.

Just a couple of days ago, knowing that this legislation might well come up, I wrote a letter to the Prime Minister and to the Rt. Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs, and in that letter I said:

> It is extremely urgent that you take steps to advise the U.S. Government that Dixon Entrance right up to 54 degrees, 40 minutes, is Canadian water and territory and that no Trident nuclear submarines can transit these waters.
> The U.S. plan to construct a $35.5 million Acoustic Measurement Facility in Behm Canal (at the north end of Back Island) would lead to substantially increased dangers to the 35,000 Canadians in the area.
> There has been no risk analysis or environmental impact done on the potential threat to Canada. These must be done and I suggest you take whatever steps are necessary to halt the construction of this Trident nuclear submarine base as it poses risk to Canadian health and security. It as well turns the northwest coast—

Meaning British Columbia.

> May I suggest that the most likely route for access and egress to the Behm Canal will require the direct violation of Canadian sovereignty. Lt. John Williston of Canadian Forces Base Esquimalt has confirmed that there is no agreement for U.S. navy ships to use Canadian waters in the vicinity of Dixon Entrance.
> The northern route along Prince of Wales Island is unlikely to be the Trident highway.
> This project poses substantial risk to Canada. Far more Canadians than Americans live in the immediate zone.
> I trust you will act urgently to halt this project and to advise the U.S. that no Tridents can transit Dixon Entrance.
> Your prompt and favourable response is eagerly awaited.

This was delivered by hand to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who know full well that there are trial proceedings in Washington, D.C., going on right now before the Ninth Circuit Court, where American citizens, through various foundations, are trying to halt this development in the Alaska pan handle because no environmental impact studies have been done, no risk assessment has been done. We know that there are eight Tridents presently moving up and down the west coast of North America, working out of Bangor, Washington. The fact is that each of these carry at least 24 nuclear weapons. They have nuclear cores by which they operate.

If one looks simply at the number of accidents that there have been with Soviet nuclear submarines off northern Europe, Norway in particular, one can realize that these are the kinds of measures you take in advance. You do these kinds of assessments.

I know the concerns of my constituents. We have in Masset, on Graham Island, the Island upon which my home is, we have one of the largest acoustic listening devices on planet Earth.

Mr. Edwards: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would appreciate the hon. member clarifying the relevance of what he is reading into the record and to the debate at hand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena has the floor.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that my cousin from the other side of the House had not been listening somewhat more carefully to what I have been saying. If one looks at the amendment being proposed, it is to clarify the legislation. The minister, in committee, indicated an intention to use the bill for what is not stated in the bill. The minister stated an intention to make use of the space agency for military purposes, something that Canadians do not expect, accept or support.

The reason I am pointing out what is going on in relation to this government's approach to military matters is that it is allowing our airspace to be used for Cruise missile testing, for Stealth bomber training. They are promoting a part of Canada for NATO low-level flights.

What we can see here, in tying it into my own constituency, is a government doing nothing to protect Canadian sovereignty from the transit of Trident nuclear submarines through Dixon Entrance and on up into the Behm Canal. We have the existing acoustic listening device at Masset which is now a joint Canada–U.S. operation. So there would be a joint military operation there.

• (1050)

If one looks at the policies of this Conservative government, it involves the substantial militarization of the submarine areas, the surface water areas and the land base. I do not even need to touch on the fact that we are in contravention of the Helsinki Accords with the development and testing of chemical weapons at a defence research establishment in Suffield, Alberta.

If the government is not given a very precise understanding in terms of wording in legislation it will proceed, in my view, to militarize at every single opportunity. I do not think Canadians want, in any way, to know or even to have the possibility out there that the new space agency might be involved in star wars or in any kind of space militarization or space military activity. Those are the reasons for my remarks.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give the government's position on Motion No. 1, moved by the Hon. Member for Okanagan—Shuswap (Mr. MacWilliam), which adds the words "for non-military, peaceful purposes" to paragraphs 5(2)(b) and 5(2)(c). The government cannot accept the motion because the Agency's objects are stated clearly in clause 4 of the Bill. They consist in promoting the peaceful use and development of space. Consequently, adding the word "peaceful" to subsection 5(2) is redundant, especially since this provision specifically mentions the Agency's objects from the outset.

The terms "for peaceful purposes" are entirely appropriate, since those are the terms used in treaties on outer space.

Mr. Speaker, I would therefore like to remind the Hon. Member for the New Democratic Party and the Hon. Member for Skeena that according to the Canadian government's policy, also stated in clause 4 of the bill which provides for promoting the peaceful use and development of space, Canada is a signatory to the Outer Space Treaty which requires space to be used for "exclusively peaceful" purposes.

The terms "peaceful purposes" can apply to certain non-agressive activities such as monitoring compliance with arms control treaties, telecommunications and search and rescue operations. It is clear the terms "peaceful purposes" do not apply to aggressive activities such as the "militarization" of space.

Thus, the Agency can only exercise its duties in relation to matters concerning space that are not by or pursuant to law assigned to any other department, board or agency of the Government of Canada.

Section 4 of the Department of National Defence Act provides that the Minister of National Defence has the management and direction of all matters relating to natioanl defence, including preparation for civil defence against enemy action.

Consequently, there is nothing in the proposed legislation that empowers the Agency to engage, in space, in activities related to the national defence of Canada, since this is an area that by law is assigned to another department, in this case the Department of National Defence.

Regarding the motion moved by the Hon. Member for Ottawa West (Mrs. Catterall), Motion No. 2, sub-section 5(2) on functions, adds a new paragraph, 5(2)(c):

> assume all existing contracts, memoranda of understanding or other arrangements in the name of Her Majesty in right of Canada related to its functions.

This motion is not acceptable to the government because the new paragraph is redundant and in fact might cause confusion and create problems of a legal nature. It is unnecessary because all these obligations are obligations of Her Majesty in right of Canada.

It is the program or project that is transferred that determines whether a contract or other agreement is transferred or not. An agreement is not transferred automatically. It must be part of a program, project or other obligation that is transferred to the Agency.

Adding this clause might create legal uncertainty in cases where one party to a contract maintains that the contract now comes under the Agency because it relates to space, while in fact, the contract is still the responsability of another department.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we intend to vote against both motions.

[English]

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on these particular amendments. Canadians have accepted the idea that the space agency is for peaceful and non-military purposes. That has been the basis on which the the planning was done for the space agency.

However, members of this House who have watched agencies develop relative to their responsibility to this government know that quite often they do not ultimately fulfil their mandates, particularly the aims as stated by the government in many cases. Consequently it is necessary to put into the legislation very specifically the mandate of the particular agency.

The value of space research is inestimable because we really do not know how far it could go and how necessary it will be. But its value could be nullified entirely if it is taken over as a base for military research and military development rather than for research for peaceful and non-military purposes, as it was intended.

I recognize it as a partial commitment, but there is a commitment by this government to assist in star wars development. Many of our companies in Canada have accepted contracts related to the star wars project. That means there is already a suggestion that the space agency would assist in that development of the star wars structure in Canada.

Military one-upmanship leads to arms races, which deplete the resources of the world. We cannot allow the squandering of the brains, the talent and the materials to research that is attempting give one power of the world the upper hand militarily. We should not accept it.

Consequently, we obviously should not allow it to be the basis of an agency which can be used to develop the military might of a particular sector of the world. The mandate of the agency should have very specific wording about the aim of this agency. That is what this particular amendment intends to do.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, the goods and services tax will bring Canada considerable benefits. We plan to replace a tax system which has every defect imaginable.

The present tax favours imports, hurts exports, is narrowly based and an unreliable source of revenue.

The GST is modeled on a system in place in 48 countries. We studied the application of this system at length and adapted it to the needs and realities of Canadians.

Our objectives are clear: we want a strong economy, sound public finances and a fair and effective tax system.

The GST will achieve three major objectives: it will contribute to deficit reduction and ensure that we can continue to pay for programs and services to which Canadians are attached, it will ensure that Canada can continue to compete effectively on world markets and it will ensure the basic equity of our tax system.

CANADA POST

M. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to object to the possibble privatization of Canada Post.

Canada has had mail services since the Union Act of 1840. Since Upper and Lower Canada united to form what has become today's Central Canada, we have recognized the need to maintain a public mail system bringing the whole country together.

As a mainstay of the country, Canada Post Corporation offers other means of consolidating national unity and I think it is essential to preserve its integrity even though it might make us a little less competitive at times.

Even western countries such has France, Holland, Belgium, England and the United States recognized the basic value of unity. Even Margaret Thatcher, a champion of privatization, did not dare tamper with the post office.

The Hon. Minister should do the same.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on February 20 of this year, Photogravers and Electrotypers Limited of Rexdale, Ontario, locked out the Graphic Communication International Union members after demanding concessions at the bargaining table, claiming they were needed to compete under the free trade agreement. This plant normally produces the Sears catalogue but this year it is being printed in Salem, Illinois.

Two weeks ago the company demanded further concessions to meet those agreed to by the Illinois workers. This resulted in a 15 per cent reduction in wages over five years, a 10 per cent reduction in each of the first and second years, no increase in the third year and a 2.5 per cent increase in the fourth and fifth years.

The government has a responsibility to ensure that its election promises are kept, that a level playing field does not mean Canadian workers should be hammered down to American levels.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Brampton—Malton): Mr. Speaker, recently officials from the Department of Immigration and some members of Parliament, including myself and representatives from the opposition, attended a public meeting where we were given a chance to listen to the concerns of refugees and immigrants.

With a large contingency present from the Sikh community, much of the meeting dealt with specific concerns of these individuals. It was a chance for us to gather together to discuss problems associated with the Canadian immigration process and to assure these individuals that the government continues to work at building a compassionate and fair immigration system.

I was most disappointed when opposition members used this meeting as a forum to bash government policy on immigration. Immigration is an issue where human emotion has an intrinsic impact requiring a delicate and careful approach on the part of government officials. If the opposition continues to misjudge the ability of constituents to see through these political manoeuvres, I am afraid they should brace themselves. With this kind of political misconjecture, members of the opposition should be prepared to sit in opposition for some time to come.

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, citizens in my riding of Northumberland and millions more across this country are stunned by the government's decision to cut essential VIA Rail passenger services. The Northumberland riding has had a 20 per cent increase in ridership since the beginning of this year which levels out to 400 to 500 trips per day. VIA reports significantly underestimate the ridership levels. On the Corridor and Toronto–Havelock lines through my riding, the major destination point is Toronto where the routes provide essential service to commuters, students, seniors, as well as general public users. There is no alternative transportation service available.

When the Toronto–Havelock line was terminated in 1982, the federal Progressive Conservative Party provided the local citizens' group with $15,000 on a matching dollar basis to fight the decision in court. At the time, the PCs promised the citizens' group that if they were elected VIA services would be improved and run in a businesslike way so as to increase ridership. This citizens' group and many others realize they were deceived by this government.

With citizens across this country depending on VIA Rail passenger services on a daily basis, I believe that this government must put a moratorium on the proposed rail service cuts of essential services. Further, this government has a moral, if not a legal responsibility to assure constant rail passenger service.

SAFETY AT SEA

Mr. André Plourde (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Recently, when the Auditor General tabled his report, Mr. Speaker, he blamed the coast guard for assigning without reason an ice-breaker to the Matane—Baie-Comeau area. I suggest he was wrong, for he has failed to take into account the fact that during the Winter, in addition to ensuring ice-breaking duties for shipping, this boat provides the area with important search and rescue services.

Following the judicial inquiry into the loss of the Hudson Transport oil tanker in 1982, the judge recommended that a specialized search and rescue ship be assigned on a permanent basis to that area.

We should remember also that, as recently as last Winter, a fire started on board the Star Rover ship in that area. A quick intervention by this ice-breaker was instrumental in saving the lives of the crew members.

In the area of safety at sea, the Government of Canada must assume its responsibility and not only carry out a simple accounting procedure, as the Auditor General did. An ice-breaker in the Matane—Baie-Comeau area is essential and it must stay there.

LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, more than a century ago First Nations from northern British Columbia, led by Nisga'a and Tsimshian chiefs, travelled to Victoria demanding recognition of title, self-government and negotiation of treaties.

Today, despite a common political position of the federal parties in the House of Commons calling for negotiation of aboriginal title and rights in B.C., despite the landmark ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada on the Calder case in 1972 which gave rise to the federal comprehensive claim process, despite Section 35 of Canada's constitution which recognizes and affirms aboriginal title and rights, despite the rulings of the B.C. Supreme Court and the B.C. Court of Appeal in support of the Gitksan Wet'Svwet'en and to protect resources in their territory, Victoria has yet to find the political will and backbone to enter negotiations with B.C.'s First Nations.

The Nisga'a has patiently participated for the past decade in a negotiation process severely delayed by Victoria and Ottawa. The Haida have been frustrated at every turn including South Moresby. The Haisla just last week raised a pole at a Kemano to warn Victoria, Ottawa and Alcan of their opposition to the destruction of their resources. The Tlingits of Taka River and the Tahltans wait for justice.

The First Nations ask for respect. The court-supported roadblocks and detours set in recent months by the Gitksan Wet'Svwet'en have halted logging activity. Now the federal Crown must act, not wait. Victoria must act, not wait. To wait will cause chaos.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, Carla Williams is back home. After 17 years of life in the Netherlands which included sexual abuse by her adoptive father and subsequent shuttling between eight different orphanages, attempted suicide and a stay in a mental institution, the 25 year old from Fisher River Indian Reserve in Manitoba is back home.

Carla Williams is a painful example of how a government policy of the 60s and 70s that promoted foreign adoption of Manitoba children of native ancestry has often had negative results. Chief Louis Stevenson, chairman of Anishinaabe Child and Family Services, the native agency that worked hard to repatriate Carla Williams, has asked that a system be established to ensure that all other such native exiles who may wish to return home be given the opportunity to do so. He has also called for financial compensation for these persons who were wilfully dispossessed of their land, their culture and their heritage by a deliberate government policy. I ask the Minister of Indian Affairs to consult with his provincial counterparts and to communicate directly with Chief Stevenson to bring about this overdue corrective action.

NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, headlines today claim that Campeau Corporation has made application to build a 36-storey building at Kent and Queen Streets within the environs of Parliament Hill. The construction of the office tower would exceed the city's 45-metre height restriction. To allow this building to be built would set a dangerous precedent in the long-standing practice of protecting the vista of Parliament Hill and its surroundings.

While I understand that these buildings are important to the economy, it is imperative that the historical practice of protecting the view of the capital be maintained. These buildings such as the Peace Tower are a symbol of Canada. To have a 36-storey tower jutting into the view of Canada's most important national symbol would be a desecration of our federal land.

• (1110)

We must make every effort to protect the beauty of our nation's capital and continue the past practice of limiting the height of buildings within the precincts of Parliament Hill.

FISHERIES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the problems of the Scotia Fundy groundfishery are well known. Too many fishermen have too great a capacity to harvest too few groundfish. Clearly, our future lies in part in reducing our capacity, but is it reasonable to ask fishermen to stop being fishermen or plant workers to stop being plant workers?

Surely, our real future lies in encouraging and making it viable for significant numbers of our fishermen to pursue and harvest species other than those traditionally harvested by Canadians. Silver hake and dogfish are examples of two species for which there is specific foreign demand but for which there is inadequate harvesting and processing capability in Canada today.

I believe it is appropriate as part of the government's management strategy to make every effort to ensure that Canadians take full advantage of our Canadian fish resources. Accordingly, I encourage the special cabinet committee to establish or recommend the establishment of a special fisheries diversification fund to benefit and assist coastal communities in Atlantic Canada to adjust to the new reality of the Atlantic fishery as well as to maximize benefits from our fisheries resources through both diversification and maximum value added processing.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, as you are aware, the government has its horrendous revisions of the unemployment insurance legislation before the House at the present time. An outstanding injustice that has not been addressed by the Conservative government is the fact that the spouses of military personnel cannot collect unemployment insurance benefits when they are stationed abroad.

A Canadian base abroad is still a Canadian community. It is administered under Canadian law. Our Canadian nationals cannot get a job, for instance, in the West German economy by virtue of their being Canadian citizens. More often than not, employment opportunities are very limited on the base itself. Not only do they give up their jobs in Canada when they are posted abroad but they may end up jobless with no available unemployment insurance benefits. This is something that would not happen if they were stationed elsewhere in Canada, or in the United States.

This is an injustice that should be addressed by this government. However, considering the destructive, reckless and shoddy way that this government has treated the Canadian forces, there is probably little hope of it addressing this issue.

CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the Minister of State for Housing and the department of housing for the dramatic increase in the limits available to co-operatives wishing to develop housing projects. These limits have been increased from 75,000 to 500,000 and will now allow many co-operative ventures in my riding to qualify to develop affordable housing which up until this time would not qualify. This funding is made available through interest free loans to the successful applicant co-operatives for costs for land purchases, regulations and actual construction.

Many areas of my riding in northern Nova Scotia are not high income areas and this new program, through Canada Mortgage and Housing, will be welcome. In fact, I am already receiving positive response.

FOREST INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, these days a job in the forest industry means that workers are in an occupation that is among the most dangerous in Canada. Forty workers a year are killed on the job. On Monday, a logger from Powell River, British Columbia, was killed in the same area that his brother was killed in just three months ago.

According to the IWA, 75 per cent of accidents occur in non-union firms. There are no safety committees and WCB regulations are not followed. This situation has reached a critical stage and I call on the Minister of Forestry to use the powers given to him in clause 8 of the new forest department legislation to appoint a committee of workers, industry, government and compensation agencies to recommend measures to bring a halt to this carnage.

COOPÉRATIVE D'HABITATION DES MOISSONS

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to represent the Government of Canada this week at the official opening of the Coopérative des Moissons, a project for less advantaged families.

The Minister of State (Housing), the Hon. Member for Don Valley East (Mr. Redway), asked me to congratulate, on his behalf, all those who helped build this splendid, 22-unit project, and especially the members of the Coopérative d'habitation des Moissons.

Under the Non-Profit Housing Program, the Coopérative will receive financial assistance estimated at $165,674 annually. This subsidy will be spread over a period of 35 years.

Furthermore, no cost mortgage insurance for the full amount of approved construction costs, namely $1,347,742 was underwritten by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Speaker, this housing project is another splendid example of what can be accomplished when people and governments work together to build decent housing at affordable prices.

LINGUISTIC MINORITIES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, in answer to my question in the Official Languages Committee on Tuesday October 31, the Chief Statistician of Canada said that Statistics Canada was not sure whether language would be included in the short form during the 1991 Census.

Mr. Speaker, this is unacceptable, considering the importance of this kind of information in connection with section 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which deals with the right to be educated in the minority language where numbers warrant. If we have to count these numbers, we should count them properly.

Furthermore, such a decision would jeopardise implementation of new regulations arising from the Official Languages Act, to establish significant demand, which I hope will soon be determined on by the Government.

Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada should change its position and reverse a decision that will be harmful to language minorities across the country, both in and outside Québec.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

MEMBER OF THE SENATE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I regret the absence of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion who has a lot to answer for. In his absence, I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister about statements made by that minister outside the House yesterday.

The minister contradicted what he had been saying in the House and what his officials had been saying and, in effect, substantiated what we have been saying about Senator Cogger's involvement with the Federal Business Development Bank.

On October 31, 1989, an official of the bank told the Canadian Press that the bank never did deal with Senator Cogger directly. In this very House on November 1, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion said about that matter:

> Was there anything irregular? There was nothing irregular.

Now we know there was. As the minister himself indicated outside the House, Senator Cogger did work for the law firm for the bank.

When did this fact come to the attention of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and why did he not do the honourable and proper thing and come back to this House to correct the misinformation given by his official and given by himself on November 1?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member yesterday in a scrum before the press was doing the honourable thing, he was being open with the media in saying what he understood.

What happened is that the hon. member was open and aired what he knew about this matter based upon what a middle-level official had told him verbally. Based on that, the minister said what he did.

It turns out today that the information that he was given by the official is at variance with the facts. The bank will be issuing a statement about that today.

What the hon. member should realize is what we need is freedom to pursue this, freedom not only for the senator but freedom for those who are concerned about this matter, and fairness. This, therefore, should go before the senator's peers and before the appropriate committee. This we are doing. If you believe in that fairness and that freedom, you should support that too.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, we have our responsibilities in this place, and I understand the minister to be agreeing that we do. It is in that spirit that I am asking these questions.

We are entitled to know, after that admission of misinformation to the House, whether these mistakes, if I can call them that, being made at the Federal Business Development Bank in favour of this close friend of the Prime Minister are mistakes that are being made for the benefit of the Prime Minister's friend or whether there is a general laxity in operation at the Federal Business Development Bank.

In the same interview on October 31, the official of the Federal Business Development Bank said that the bank had been told by a lawyer that it could deal with the senator's firm whether or not one of its members was a senator. Who was the lawyer? Where did that legal advice come from? Why did the bank not come forward and correct that as soon as it knew that that statement was certainly not the law?

• (1120)

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, the course of these questions prove how impossibly unfair the hon. member is in pursuing this on the floor of the House. What must happen is that this thing be fully aired before a proper committee of the Senate.

On the specific point that the hon. member raised, the chairman and the president of the FBDB have made it clear from the beginning that billable work by senators is not to be done for the FBDB. This has been made clear from the beginning and they have made it clear to all of their employees.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I am not asking questions that should be directed to the senator. I am asking questions that should be directed to the minister who is a member of this place and is responsible for the operation of the Federal Business Development Bank, and where else should they be asked?

In the House on October 31, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion told us:

> —the Federal Business Development Bank has hired the law firm of Lapointe Rosenstein on many occasions going back over a couple of decades.

Today in The Globe and Mail, a spokesman for the bank corrects that and says that the bank first used Lapointe Rosenstein for legal work in early 1985.

This is the place, and I am asking now of that minister, who gave the misinformation to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion who told us the other day that work for Lapointe Rosenstein goes back a couple of decades? Where does that misinformation come from?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member is trying to do is quote a middle level official against other officials in the bank. This whole thing—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hockin: What he is trying to do is do something that should properly be explored in a Senate committee.

Let me answer his question directly. We know that the hon. member himself is a lawyer, has probably been a member of a law firm. This particular firm has dozens and dozens of lawyers. We will have to do a computer search to find out how far back individual lawyers did work for the FBDB.

You understand that when you act as an agent for the FBDB, it can be on a matter as small as a $10,000 loan to something large. That firm clearly is a major firm in Montreal. It has a number of partners who very clearly could have done work for the FBDB. They will have to search their files to see how far it went back. It is clear that they have done work for many years and certainly before 1986.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is about the same topic. I want to tell the minister who just answered that this is responsible government and we expect answers to be coming in this House and no stonewalling.

Two days ago, Senator Cogger apparently had not worked for the FBDB while he was a senator. Yesterday he had. Today again he has not. When are we going to get straight answers and why can we not have a full royal commission of inquiry to look into this thing? Why can we not find out the truth?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, it is precisely hyperbole like that which does not do justice to the fairness and integrity of our legal system. If we are going to protect the freedoms of everybody included, to be fair to everybody included, we have to have a proper pursuit of this, not on the floor of the House but before the senator's peers, which will happen.

[Translation]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister who, this morning, has refused to answer practically any questions at all and even contradicted his own colleague who was answering questions yesterday.

I would like to know why yesterday, the Minister did not make a statement in this House to correct himself. Why aren't we given the right information? And I also want to ask the Minister what explanation he has for the fact that the Federal Business Development Bank's correspondence refers to Mr. Cogger as the Hon. Michel Cogger. Didn't the Bank realize that in this case, it could only mean he was a senator? Didn't the Bank realize it had violated the Parliament of Canada Act?

[English]

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, we know that in the operation of any law firm, and especially dealing with the Federal Business Development Bank which has millions of dollars worth of contracts, communications of all sorts come from various lawyers, small matters and large matters. This particular billing in fact was quite small. It would not necessarily be brought to the attention of the president or the chairman of the bank.

What the hon. member must realize is that what I have said today is that the evidence indicates that what the minister said yesterday in the scrum was at variance with the facts. The bank had looked at this and it does not have written evidence that what the minister said was true. Therefore, the verbal advice he was getting from a middle level official was not accurate.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question also is directed to the minister, in the absence of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. The statement of the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion on October 31 was that the responsibility that he has, that this government has, is that the Federal Business Development Bank conduct itself properly. That was three days ago. Yesterday the minister responsible indicated that Senator Cogger had in fact been directly involved in contracts and had received financial benefit for those contracts from the FBDB.

I want to ask the minister who is now answering, how can we seriously accept the assurances of this government that this minister was doing his job when three days ago, he recognized he had a responsibility to get the facts and yesterday he misled the Canadian public? What is the specific answer? Did Senator Cogger at any point receive any financial remuneration whatsoever for work that he had done for the FBDB while he was a Senator, yes or no? Come clean with Canadians.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member made a highly misleading statement. He said that the FBDB paid the senator a certain amount of money. That allegation is totally untrue. All billings go to the law firm and he knows that. He is a lawyer. It is not fair and it is not just to allege otherwise.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, we still do not have a clear answer as to the fundamental issue here, which is whether or not Senator Cogger did in fact at any point, after he was named to the Senate, receive a financial benefit for work that he had done for the FBDB in contravention of Section 14. That is the question that the minister still is not answering.

My supplementary question is this. In view of the fact that a number of colleagues from the Conservative caucus, including the member for Matapédia—Matane, the member for Lévis and others have chosen to absent themselves from the Conservative caucus as a result of investigations which are under way by the RCMP, I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister, in the absence of the Prime Minister, if he is prepared to exercise some leadership here, to recognize the deep concern of Canadians about public morality? Is he prepared to indicate to the House whether Senator Michel Cogger will follow the example of his Tory colleagues who are under investigation, do the honourable thing, and either resign or at the very least, get out of the Tory caucus while this is being investigated?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, I must ask the hon. member, does he believe in fairness? Does he believe in justice? Does he believe in freedom to pursue a matter? That is going to be done, not on the floor of the House with these kinds of questions which are based on allegations that the hon. member knows are false or inaccurate. It will be done before the senator's peers at Senate committee. All of those questions will be answered there properly, and that is where it should be done.

The hon. member raises further questions in order to get all sorts of different stories running. All of this, in fairness to the senator, and in fairness to those who are interested in this, should be looked at before the committee of the Senate, and that is where it will be looked at.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, it seems that there is one standard for some Tory members of Parliament and there is another standard quite different for buddies of the Prime Minister. That is what seems to be going on in the House.

[Translation]

My supplementary is a follows, Mr. Speaker. For several years we have been waiting for the government to table conflict of interest legislation. Bill C-114, tabled in February 1988, provides that a Member of Parliament may not use his position to try to influence, for the benefit of his own private interests, a decision made by another person. My supplementary is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

When will this Government table its conflict of interest legislation, especially considering the case of Richard Grisé who was convicted of influence peddling, and also the government's other problems with public morality? When will the government finally table its conflict of interest legislation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Very soon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism in the absence of the minister responsible for the Federal Business Development Bank.

It is well known that the bank keeps records of lawyers to whom it contracts work out. Will the minister provide to the House the FBDB's current list of lawyers whom they use for this outside work?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I think that is the kind of question that should be a written question for the House.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Clancy: What's the matter? Didn't you understand it?

Mr. Hockin: The hon. member is trying to make a different point with his question here in Oral Question Period.

The fact is that the Federal Business Development Bank does a great deal of legal work. It needs agents for its work with people who come before it for loans. It also does corporate work. It also makes major inquiries into major policy questions. All this requires lawyers. It has a list.

A written question being more precise, we would provide that list.

Mr. Rideout: Mr. Speaker, all we want is to get the facts, just a little information, and all we get is stonewalling.

My supplementary question is directed to the same minister. Now that the minister responsible for FBDB has confessed that Senator Cogger has indeed provided legal services to the bank after he was appointed a senator, is the government aware, or has it taken any steps to determine if there are any other government departments or agencies which have utilized the legal services of Senator Cogger or his law firm, Lapointe Rosenstein?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, this is the sort of unfairness, this is a lack of justice, this is a lack of basic liberty that is being promoted by the hon. member's party with the cast of these questions. He started with an allegation which he knows has not been proven. It is not clear whether Senator Cogger did any work for the FBDB after he was named a senator. We do not know that. The Senate committee will tell us.

In terms of openness, the complete record on that is being made evident today through access to information. In addition, the lists have been available for years, and they are still available.

PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE OF CANADA

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Some 1,500 parole officers and prison counsellors are on strike for the fifth day. Prisoners eligible for parole are being kept in jail.

Federal parole officers are paid 14 per cent less than their Quebec counterparts and 24 per cent less than those in Ontario. Does the minister think this is fair? If not, why is he letting this situation drag on and risking the security of Canadian prisons and communities?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, following the Conciliation Board report that was tabled last week, mediation was undertaken over the weekend. The mediation talks broke off on Sunday, and the union decided to go on strike Monday of this week.

During the course of the week I have been in close contact with the union to try to ascertain at what time we could get negotiations going again, with the hope of reaching a settlement that would be fair and satisfactory to both parties and that would be in keeping with the over-all settlement that was reached by over 155,000 public servants earlier this year. I am keeping in very close touch with the union. I will do so during the next few days, and hopefully we will get the talks resumed very quickly.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I think the figures speak for themselves. This is an intolerable pay inequity. Because the government still cannot settle this labour dispute after two and a half years, Canada's veterans have no one to turn to for help in meeting their social, health and financial needs, and access to alcohol treatment and child protection programs for native Canadians are suffering.

Just how long will the minister let veterans and native Canadians be the victims because the government seems unable to settle this contract? When will the minister act?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, if the union is prepared to sit at the table this afternoon I will have the table fully staffed on the part of the employer.

We are willing to negotiate at any time, at any place, at any moment, to get this strike resolved. That is the intent of this government. We will do it as soon as the union indicates that it has a willingness to sit down with us. We are prepared to sit down.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Earlier this week, as the Deputy Prime Minister will know, a senior environment department official testified at an environmental impact hearing on the Alberta-Pacific proposal for a huge new pulp mill in northern Alberta. As part of his excellent brief he said: "No other mill should be approved until we have enough information". The Minister of the Environment has declared his support for and accord with the views expressed by his official.

Will the government now exercise its authority and suspend all consideration of the Alberta-Pacific proposal, including environmental impact hearings, until studies of the cumulative effects of existing pulp projects on oxygen levels and fish in the Peace and Athabasca River systems have been completed and made public?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that an environmental review process is under way to gather precisely the information that he seeks.

It is true that a federal official has expressed concern with the scientific data presently available in support of this particular project. The provincial minister of the environment has expressed concern as well. Of course that is why we have a federal EARP process in which the province participates to find out all the facts and to determine what modifications to the project would have to be made to bring it into conformity with all the standards and regulations we have imposed on this particular industry.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the point is that until the cumulative impact studies are completed and made public, the hearings are not based on any necessary, essential information. The hearings are rendered thus nonsensical.

In addition to the government suspending those hearings at the moment, I ask: Assuming that the ministry agrees with its officials that "some of the other mills should be revisited to examine their cumulative effect", will the government order new hearings into previously approved projects, especially that of the Alberta Energy Company at Lesser Slave Lake?

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, there is a parallel process under way. There is an EARP process under way with regard to the Al-Pac project, and there is a study under way looking at pulp mill affluence everywhere in the country.

The hon. member proposes to terminate these processes—

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Suspend.

Mr. Oberle: —or to suspend them in search of information. Why would we suspend these critical processes designed to seek the information the hon. member wants? We want this information as well.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): You won't get half the information.

Mr. Oberle: Perhaps the hon. member would listen. The more we can do to find information to back up the imposition we have already made on the industry in terms of sustainable development and the concept related to it, the better off we will be.

Instead of wanting to terminate or suspend these processes, why does the member not support them and provide evidence to the working tribunals?

CANADA POST

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation. In 1986, the federal government decided to cut back subsidies for postal services to northern communities, and did so without consulting northern Canadians.

Last night, we managed to obtain a three-month moratorium on an increase in commercial parcel rates that would have become effective on November 13 this year, according to a decision by Canada Post.

Mr. Speaker, my question is as follows: Could the Minister confirm to the House whether a task force will be appointed by the government, involving the Departments of Indian and Northern Affairs, National Health and Welfare and the Canada Post Corporation, in order to find a solution to this very serious problem that will affect all northern Canadians in 1990, and I am referring to postal rates for local air services?

• (1140)

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague for his question.

[Translation]

I understand there is now a moratorium, and we intend to set up a task force in order to find a solution, and the Hon. Member will also have an opportunity to state his position.

[English]

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, we have just been told that the parcel post rate increase will be delayed by three months, until January 31. The fact still remains that there will be a 32 per cent rate increase, or thereabouts, in the northern commercial freight rate to about 85 northern communities.

Because the cost of living in those northern communities is now two or three times higher than down here, is the minister prepared to ensure that we are not faced with a food crisis in the north after January 31, 1990?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I can just repeat to the hon. member what I said to my colleague from Abitibi, that is the moratorium is in place to allow a working group to try to arrive at a solution to these questions.

We would be very happy to get input from the hon. member.

Mr. Anawak: I would be happy to be part of that working group, however, there is still a 32 per cent proposed rate increase.

My supplementary question is to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As was mentioned earlier by the member for Abitibi, without publicity, without consultation, and without concern for the health and well-being of native and northern people, in 1986 the government decided to reduce its subsidy to Canada Post for this service by $3 million over the past three years. Will the minister today request his cabinet colleagues to maintain at least the present level of funding to the food mail service of $16 million?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, obviously the working group to be set up following the moratorium announced today will address those questions.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question was to be addressed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, but in her absence I would be pleased to address it to her parliamentary secretary. The subject is the refugee backlog clearance program.

The House will remember that on December 28, 1988 the minister, with great fanfare, announced her refugee backlog clearance program and stated three points: that it would begin immediately, that it would conclude within two years, and that it would cost $100 million. In the hearings of the subcommittee on immigration on May 9, May 11 and October 24, the minister's own officials contradicted her categorically with respect to all these statements.

My question is simply: Why is the minister saying one thing while her officials are contradicting her in committee?

What are the true answers to these three simple questions: when did the program start, when will it conclude, and how much will it cost?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, the program that was announced is fair and equitable and is intended to respect those who apply for refugee or immigrant status in Canada. It is a major reform we made and we do intend to keep our commitments. We are sticking to our timetable and when the Minister responsible for immigration makes a statement, she tells the truth.

So the system is fair and equitable, it respects the applicants and their cases are reviewed individually with the humanitarian approach that characterizes Canada's immigration procedures.

[English]

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister indicated that when the Minister of Employment and Immigration makes a statement it is correct. The minister made the statement that the program would cost $100 million. Her officials have said, in fact only 10 months later, that it is going to cost $179,568, an 80 per cent increase from her estimate.

As well the minister said that the program would begin immediately, and that was on December 28, 1988. On October 24 in committee, Mr. Bissett, the executive director of the immigration department, said that Treasury Board always had a plan that the program would begin September 1, 1989.

My question is simple. Why is the minister saying one thing and her officials categorically contradicting her? How about an answer to that simple question?

[Translation]

Mrs. Vézina: Mr. Speaker, it is a fair and equitable program, a commitment that was made here in the House of Commons, a commitment that we will keep, by respecting the individuals and their financial ability. With the person-years allocated, we have the needed resources to keep to this schedule. We can keep the commitment in the time allowed and we will do so.

[English]

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the senior minister from the prairies, the Deputy Prime Minister.

Is the minister aware that just a few days before the Minister of Communications lowered the boom on the prairie phone systems he received a compromise proposal from the three Conservative prairie governments?

Why did the federal government not even reply to the serious proposal those governments made to the minister? Is this what co–operative federalism is supposed to mean to the prairies these days?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, this question was raised several times and I can assure the House that since the Supreme Court decision on telecommunications, I have met almost all my provincial colleagues on several occasions. My department is negotiating and consulting with the telephone companies and provincial officials every day. We are continuing in that spirit. I believe consultation is necessary. It has already been announced and we are continuing with it, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my supplementary question to the minister who just replied.

I have in my hands a copy of the serious proposal those governments made a few days before the minister lowered the boom. He never replied to that serious proposal. That cannot be considered consultation.

I would like to know which of the three principles included in that document he categorically rejected. Was it that the prairie governments maintain control over a prairie phone service, that the prairie governments were willing to concede jurisdiction over interprovincial and international phone service to the federal government, or that the federal and provincial governments should share responsibility for making sure that local users not get clobbered in the process? Why did he not reply to that?

[Translation]

Mr. Masse: Mr. Speaker, I would first like to know if the NDP has changed its policy, because it is the same party which always complains that the government does not provide enough federal presence in this country and that Ottawa should direct everything. Now when Ottawa makes a decision which might not be in line with the NDP's centralizing philosophy, but which is in Canada's interest, this party demagogically changes sides and takes another position.

Mr. Speaker, this position is very well known and we will consider it.

HOUSING

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Housing. Although the new regulations increasing the limits on proposed development funding loans for co–op housing are good news for my riding, will the dramatic increase in limits from $75,000 to $500,000 change the other criteria for qualification? Will low income regions receive priority in application consideration?

• (1150)

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, the change in the increase in the proposed development funding is certainly going to be very helpful, as the hon. member has indicated, in his riding and I believe right across the country as far as co–operative housing projects are concerned. I have to tell the hon. member that the other criteria will not be changing.

As far as giving priority in the distribution of funding for co–operative housing units across the country, that process is done together with consultation with the Co–operative Housing Foundation of Canada. I am sure that that agency and the federal housing agency, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, will take into account the serious concerns of the hon. member, the people of his riding, and the people of other low income regions of Canada in arriving at that distribution.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Judge Batten of the Court of Queen's Bench in Saskatchewan has ruled that the Bank of Montreal has been arbitrary and high-handed by changing a farmer's loan from a fixed rate of interest to a floating rate of interest and has ordered a refund of $11,246 plus interest for the last six years.

A few farmers like Mr. Raoul Blanchard of Duck Lake, Saskatchewan have gone to court and won refunds for these overcharges by the chartered banks, but thousands have not been able to or could not afford to.

When will the government get behind farmers and order banks to refund these overcharges?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, of course my friend across the way and I share in the concern about high interest rates and the proper application of those interest rates.

The whole issue of farm finance as it relates to the financing of farm operations and the adequacy of our programs, whether it be the Farm Credit Corporation or whether it be provided by the banks, is something that we are currently considering in a very comprehensive way.

I am sure the hon. member will be encouraged by the fact that when we release a policy discussion paper there will be included in the paper a very thorough chapter on farm financing and the future of the family farm. Hopefully we can consider some of those points at that particular time.

Mr. Foster: We look forward with great interest to that paper next Tuesday.

Would the Deputy Prime Minister be willing to direct the Superintendent of Financial Institutions to prepare a report requiring all chartered banks to give a complete and full report on all farm loans which have been switched from a fixed rate to a floating rate without notifying the farmer and on the amount that has been overcharged so that this whole scam which took place in the early 1980s can be exposed and proper refunds provided for?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member recognized that this took place in the early 1980s when the party of which he is a member was the Government of Canada. It did nothing at that particular time. As is so often the case, it is quick to criticize things that occur, but it did very little when it was in office.

When we came into office we established the farm debt review process which has worked very well. It has acted as an intermediary between banks and other financial institutions and the farmer. The 70, 75 or perhaps even 80 per cent record of success is testimony to the fact that we have provided the kind of mechanisms necessary to deal with these particular issues.

I will certainly take the hon. member's suggestion into consideration. Maybe it will not require an ordering. Maybe the banks would be prepared to do that on their own. I will certainly undertake to look into it.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The Grand Chief of the Mohawk Council of the Akwesasne, Mike Mitchell, faxed a letter to me yesterday pleading for multi-departmental government assistance and intervention at the highest level to deal with an explosive situation which exists at Akwesasne, and he stated:

> We are faced daily with providing law enforcement at the border, in the waters, preventing the encroachment of the gambling activities and generally containing any potential violence.

What is the government prepared to do to assist the Grand Chief in ensuring that these people can live with the security and peace all other Canadians are afforded?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the question I missed whether that letter was addressed to me and faxed to the hon. member. What I understand from the hon. member across the way is that it was addressed and faxed to the hon. member. I would appreciate being given a copy of the letter.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, we are obviously very concerned with the situation in Akwesasne. I understand there are already some discussions with various departments of this government on the very serious incidents that are occurring there. We will obviously continue to monitor that situation and will intervene as much as we can.

Ms. Blondin: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the letter was not addressed to the minister because the chief took the opportunity to brief the members of the department on the issue concerning Akwesasne.

I know that the chief is not unappreciative of the efforts today. However just yesterday he wrote:

> Our border rights and related problems are not even being discussed at a high enough level and unless we have recognition of those rights, the abuses will continue to mount. The anger I am feeling needed to be shared—I sometimes feel that I am left alone to hold back a forest fire that is threatening to consume all of Akwesasne.

Mr. Speaker, through you I ask the minister what immediate action he is prepared to undertake on behalf of these people. This situation is indeed critical, and I know he realizes that.

Mr. Cadieux: Mr. Speaker, I sometimes feel alone too when the letters are not addressed to me and they are asking for my intervention.

Ms. Blondin: You got lots of letters.

Mr. Cadieux: Obviously, as the House knows and as my hon. colleague knows, we have been having some discussions with Chief Mitchell. Other departments have been having those discussions also, and we intend to pursue them.

PRISONERS OF WAR

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, with the approach of Remembrance Day we had an example last Sunday of the crassest and most outrageous kind of journalistic sensationalism in The Toronto Star.

Allegations were made in that newspaper concerning allied troops, including Canadians, who were captured and held as prisoners of war by Germany during World War II. The Toronto Star cites American researchers who claim that thousands of Canadian, American, British and other Commonwealth prisoners held in camps liberated by the red army at the end of the war were never released by the Soviets.

I would like to ask the Associate Minister of National Defence, or whoever is responding on her behalf if she would report to the House on what the government has found out on this matter.

Is there any scintilla of evidence that Canadian prisoners of war were held by the Soviet Union after World War II? What efforts have the government made to gather such evidence?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, further to the report published in the newspapers that some Canadians might have been imprisoned in the Soviet Union, the Secretary of State for External Affairs asked his officials to meet with a senior member of the Soviet Embassy to ask him to begin a serious investigation of these allegations.

To date, the Soviet Union has no evidence to support these claims, but has told us that they would investigate and inform us as soon as possible to allay our concerns.

[English]

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, the other problem is that this is going to cause a great deal of unnecessary anguish to thousands of people in this country who had a loved one declared missing in action and presumed dead or who did not survive a prisoner of war camp. They are now wondering whether that loved one might still be alive.

Would the Associate Minister of National Defence or the Minister for External Relations request the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs to investigate this matter and to call on these so-called researchers and investigative reporters to appear before the committee and to put up or shut up?

• (1200)

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly agree with the hon. member that stories like these do cause a great deal of distress. His suggestion is an interesting one. I am sure that he can make it along with us to the chairman of that standing committee.

I would like to add that in addition to getting copies of the report, to which the member refers, and reviewing it; within the Department of National Defence we are going back over all our old records from World War II to see if there is any evidence at all that there would have been any Canadian who was not accounted for. I would like to assure the member that to date there certainly is no evidence in that regard.

I think it might also be helpful in understanding this issue to say that, as the member may be aware, some of these allegations may have been based on some misinformation, some messages that were sent at the end of the Second World War which implied that perhaps some Americans and British were being held in the Soviet Union. This was at the end of May, 1945. That message was then counteracted within the week to say that that was was not the case, that in fact the message was referring to Soviet personnel who were perhaps being held in some of the western countries. Some of that may have been the cause for this misunderstanding. But I can assure the hon. member and the House that we will pursue every avenue possible with respect to this concern.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-43 , an Act respecting abortion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan on a point of order.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the government has indicated to its members that some of them will be free in this particular vote. I would therefore respectfully request that you take the vote row by row, rather than in the normal manner.

Some Hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The practice of the House is to vote the way that we generally do, that is, by party. The only way to modify that procedure would be by unanimous consent.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no unanimous consent. The vote will proceed as usual.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

ABORIGINAL LANGUAGES FOUNDATION

MEASURE TO ENACT

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-269, an Act to establish the Aboriginal Languages Foundation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

• (1220)

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to introduce this bill. It is a bill proposed for the purpose of establishing an Aboriginal Languages Foundation, to assist by the way of various activities and programs the revitalization, regeneration and maintenance of some 53 aboriginal languages which are unique and distinct first Canadian languages.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE DRESS CODE

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present to the House pursuant to Standing Order 36 a number of petitions representing the signatures of approximately 13,000 citizens of Alberta. The petitioners are of the opinion that the RCMP dress uniform is a symbol of Canadian tradition and culture and should remain unchanged.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have today the duty to table some 10 petitions asking this Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax on the basis that the federal government, the present Tory government, has imposed on Canadian taxpayers 31 new tax increases since it took power in 1984; that the present federal manufacturers' sales tax has already been increased by the federal government from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent; that the Conservative federal government wants to impose on Canadians a new general 9 per cent tax on goods and services. This new tax will be hidden, as we know, from Canadians and will be applied to virtually everything that moves.

The imposition of this new general goods and services tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-class Canadians. The imposition of this tax will create an onerous burden on small business.

The people who have signed these petitions pray that the House of Commons call upon all members to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I also have the honour to present a petition from people in The Pas, Flin Flon, Snow Lake and Cranberry Portage in my riding, in addition to people from Prince Edward Island indicating their opposition to the government's goods and services tax.

They reject the current proposal and call for reform of the current taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

They want to ensure that if and when there is broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, this reform not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab. They wish the House of Commons to cause the government to cease with the proposal that will shift the tax burden to the ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of real tax reform.

I want to indicate that in addition to this petition I and the New Democratic Party leader from Manitoba, Gary Doer, gave to the office of the Minister of Finance 30,000 cards against the goods and services tax this morning.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition which is in proper form.

It has to do with the government largely closing down VIA service. It is signed by Canadians predominantly from eastern Ontario, but a strong predominance of those people are from my own riding of Leeds—Grenville. They object strenuously to the discontinuation of service that VIA has been providing.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): It is my honour and duty to present on behalf of a number of petitioners, mostly from Manitoba, a petition which asks the Parliament of Canada to maintain VIA Rail in its present national network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment, to pass a passenger train act giving VIA Rail a firm legislative mandate and, finally, to have a revised costing arrangement to be arranged with the railway companies.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I too have the honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 which has been certified correct as to form and content.

The petitioners from various points in Ontario say that the government has failed to provide the resources necessary to fulfil its promise of improved passenger rail service.

They call upon Parliament to maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail service in those areas of the country where it can provide a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient, environmentally sound and energy efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

[Translation]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from Canadians, pursuant to Standing Order 36. These Canadians are opposed to the Government's plan to cut VIA Rail service.

[English]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I too have the duty and the privilege to present a couple of petitions on behalf of Canadians who are concerned about the goods and services tax.

I stand pursuant to Standing Order 36. These petitions have been certified correct as to content and form by the clerk.

The petitioners point out that under the GST there would be an onerous burden put on the shoulders of Canadian taxpayers. They also point out that it would be, in their opinion, an unprecedented tax grab on Canadian taxpayers, and that it would cause higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

AIR-INDIA CRASH

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to stand pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of 700 petitioners.

This petition reads that whereas on June 23, 1985, 329 innocent civilians, mostly Canadians, lost their lives as a result of a terrorist bomb explosion aboard an Air-India aircraft; and whereas extensive media research prominently broadcast on TV and radio has shown that this heinous crime was preventable. There were eight warnings, including a test explosion that pointed to impending disaster; and whereas Canadians have been clamoring for a public inquiry to come up with a recommendation that would prevent similar disasters, but last year an identical terrorist bomb destroyed a Pan American jumbo jet in Britain.

Recommendations from a Canadian investigation could have averted the Pan American tragedy, wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to give Canadians a commitment to hold a Royal commission of inquiry into all facts surrounding the Air-India disaster of 1985. This is presented by petitioners from the city of Nepean and also from the city of Ottawa.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to rise to present five petitions on behalf of music teachers and the parents of some of their students.

The petition points out that music educators are active participants in the education departments in every province in Canada preparing students to enter the university faculties of music, and that with a sales tax on music lessons Canadian children will suffer, talent will be undeveloped and the future of Canadian music, both nationally and internationally, will be jeopardized.

They are pleading with the government to consider music studies as an educational process and therefore not subject to tax.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the honour and the duty to present a petition certified correct by the clerk of petitions.

It is signed by 55 constituents of Hamilton West and other parts of Hamilton who humbly pray and call upon this Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): I also, while I have the floor, have the privilege pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition certified correct by the clerk of petitions signed by some 35 Canadians who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada not to cancel in whole or in part rail passenger service in Canada.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by the residents of Hamilton Mountain.

These petitioners are against the Conservative Government's proposed 9 per cent goods and services tax. These petitioners humbly pray and call upon this House to reject this 9 per cent goods and services tax that is proposed.

• (1230)

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege and duty to present a petition which humbly prays that this government not cut in part or in whole rail passenger service in Canada. For many it is an essential service. Many people in Canada depend upon VIA Rail passenger service for their livelihood.

Canadians have demonstrated in many ways their concern about the cuts. Tomorrow in my riding there will be a public meeting to back up the signatures that appear in this petition and the many others from across this country.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present two petitions in connection with the goods and services tax. Both petitions, which contain approximately 60 signatures, are signed by residents of my riding. One of them is interesting in that it is signed entirely by the residents of an apartment building at 2233 Eglinton Avenue in my riding. Both petitions call upon Parliament to unequivocally and categorically reject any attempt to bring in a goods and services tax.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present a petition on behalf of 35 residents of Kingston and the Islands who call upon Parliament to reject the government's proposed goods and services tax. The tax is perceived to be unfair and inequitable, and the petitioners request that Parliament reject any bill that proposes such a tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have two sets of petitions to table today. The first is signed by 29 residents of Burnaby, British Columbia, from the Chelsea Housing Project No. 8. These residents, who are senior citizens, are very concerned about the government's plan for VIA Rail. The petitioners call upon Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade VIA equipment and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger service.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from two sources, a total of 96 residents of Thunder Bay who are concerned with the government's plan for a goods and services tax. A number of members are from one of the women's organizations in Thunder Bay and are employees of the Canadian Grains Commission. They have all signed the petition that rejects the GST as being very unfair to lower and middle-income families. They point out the government is now trying to tax reading, haircuts, diapers, coffins and home heating fuels, and as northern residents they are very concerned about the impact on their ability to survive.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to present two sets of petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36. The first set of petitions is signed by residents right across this country of ours who have recognized the difficulties that have arisen as a result of this government taking a broad axe to VIA Rail service, and have also recognized the fact that a one-third of one per cent reduction in our prime interest rates could have saved the same amount of money that the cuts to VIA Rail have imposed.

The petitioners have asked that the government maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail services in those areas of the country where it can provide a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient and, I might add, environmentally sound and energy efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Another set of petitions, Mr. Speaker, that I have to present today again are signed by people throughout this country of ours. These signatories are concerned about the economic impact that the proposed goods and services tax measures will impose upon ordinary Canadians from Victoria to St. John's. The petitioners are asking the government to ensure that if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the current manufacturers' sales tax that this reform not be an opportunity for the government to imposed a massive tax grab on the Canadian people.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the House will give consent to revert to introduction of Private Members' Bills for the member for Kingston and the Islands. Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Routine Proceedings

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-270, an Act to amend the Department of Agriculture Act.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to delete Section 5 of the Department of Agriculture Act. The Auditor General in his report this year to Parliament stated at page 88:

> In our view, the government's extensive and varied use of section 5 of the Act presents a threat to Parliament's role. Parliament should be given the opportunity to review the Act and decide whether section 5 should continue to be used in this manner.

It is for the purpose of complying with the suggestion of the Auditor General that I have introduced this bill. I hope the House will have the opportunity to decide whether this Act should continue to be used in the way it has been in the past on the debate on this bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 127 and 131.

[Text]

PRINCE CHARLES PROJECT

Question No. 127—Mr. Karpoff:

> In the Toronto housing project known as the Prince Charles project, were required contracts for consulting fees filed with the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and, if so (a) did these contracts specify what work was to be performed (b) what was this work (c) was it carried out (d) what sums were paid (e) to what person or persons?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): No. There was no requirement to file a contract for consulting fees, as the project was built by a "turnkey" contract, where all costs, including consulting fees but excluding the mortgage insurance premium, were part of the contract between the non-profit group and the developer, Tridel.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Question No. 131—Mr. Heap:

2. Do IRB members have at their disposal case overviews from the refugee documentation centre and, if so, are these being put to use?

3. Are IRB members familiar with the country reports on human rights violations issued by Amnesty International?

Hon. Barbara Jean McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. Yes.

3. Yes.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8) the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on motion No. 2. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

motion No. 9, and a negative vote on motion No. 8 necessitates a vote on motion No. 9.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-16 be amended in Clause 16 by striking out lines 19 to 40 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) The Treasury Board shall implement for the Agency a classification plan for the scientific, engineering and related technical professionals that is based on the competence of the person to be employed rather than on the description of the functions to be carried on by such person at the employ of the Agency".

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There has been considerable discussion on Motion No. 8 and I did address it in my comments on the motions generally. I am prepared to withdraw this motion. I think there is unanimous consent to substitute a slightly revised draft. I am not entirely happy with this. It has put a time limit in there that I think is unnecessary. However, it is a substantial improvement over what is now in the bill. In the interests of having protection for the employees, I am prepared to move a motion with the wording that is acceptable to the department.

• (1240)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member for Ottawa West to bring in a new motion at this time?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mrs. Duplessis: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary on the same point of order.

Mrs. Duplessis: Mr. Speaker, after discussion, we shall support the new version of Motion No. 8 moved by Mrs. Catterall.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Motion No. 8 is withdrawn.

Motion No. 8 withdrawn.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

Motion No. 8A

That clause 28 of Bill C-16 be amended by striking out lines 5 through 8 on page 9 and substituting the following:

"28.(1). Where a position in the Public Service of Canada is transferred to the Agency within ninety days after the day on which this Act comes into force, the incumbent of the position continues in the position in the Agency, unless the incumbent otherwise elects prior to the transfer, and any person so continuing is"

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow Mr. Manley to move Motion No. 9 on behalf of Mr. Pagtakhan?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. John Manley (for Mr. Pagtakhan) moved:

Motion No. 9

That Bill C-16 be amended in Clause 28 by striking out line 7 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"service of Canada within one hundred and eighty days after".

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (for the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology) moved:

Motion No. 10

That Bill C-16 be amended in Clause 28 by striking out lines 16 and 17 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"immediately before the appointment, and any person who was so subject".

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I wish to briefly comment on the amendments to the space agency bill before us today.

We all recognize the importance of establishing a space agency. The comment that I would like to make is in relation to the process that was used. First, it took approximately two years to allow this bill to come before the House which caused a great deal of indecision on how this space agency should be implemented and on the jobs of the people who were involved.

At times it appeared to pit one municipality against another as to the location of the space agency, and at other times it appeared to become a political football. That is what was so terribly wrong in the process which was so important. I hope that it never happens again because it did nothing but cause ill feeling. It caused problems with our scientists and with our astronauts. It is the process that I am really speaking against. I hope that we as members can recognize the importance in moving quickly on legislation and determining what is best for our country and what is best for whichever program comes before this House.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal with Bill C-16 to establish the Canadian space Agency. We have a number of motions and amendments which I strongly support, including the following:

-That Bill C-16 be amended in Clause 5 adding immediately after line 26 at page 2 the following:

"(c.1) assume all existing contracts, memoranda of understanding or other arrangements in the name of Her Majesty in right of Canada related to its functions;"

Also, Mr. Speaker, motion no 3:

-That Bill C-16 be amended in Clause 16 by striking out lines 19 to 40 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) The Treasury Board shall implement for the Agency a classification plan for the scientific, engineering and related technical professionals that is based on the competence of the person to be employed rather than on the description of the functions to be carried on by such person at the employ of the Agency."

Also, Mr. Speaker, motion no 5:

"The principal office of the Agency shall be at such place in Canada as may be designated by the Governor in Council."

Concerning Motion No. 8 which was withdrawn, I find it regrettable that the Government has chosen to be political and to indulge in patronage with regard to the site of the Agency. It is a pity that this jewel of the scientific world should have become a subject of controversy, that the choice of its site should have been a travesty of the decision making process, pitting various municipalities, centers and towns against one another. I suggest that, in this Canadian Parliament, every effort should be made to unite this country instead of dividing it. I think that when the time came choose a site for the Canadian Space Agency, the whole process was abused. In short, I am very disappointed because of the bias involved in the selection of the site.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Mrs. Catterall: I rise on a point of order. I wonder if government members could clarify the intent of motion No. 10 and whether it is redundant if motion No. 8A is adopted.

[Translation]

Mrs. Duplessis: Mr. Speaker, since we are debating Motions Nos. 3, 8, 9 and 10 I take this opportunity to explain the government's position on all these motions.

First, with respect to Motion No. 3 about clause 16 concerning employees, the government cannot agree because the effect of this amendment would be to repeal the provisions of the bill which provide for special employment conditions for Canadian astronauts.

This suggestion is unacceptable because if we want to provide the best possible opportunities for our astronauts it is imperative that we offer them special working conditions, for their duties are unique.

Pursuant to this amendment, we would create a classification plan "based on the competence of the person" for all professional employees of the Agency.

Although this formula has its good points—it was used in the case of the National Research Council, considered as a "distinct employer"—it would not be appropriate in this legislation. Should this kind of arrangement ever become necessary, it can be achieved through administrative channels.

• (1250)

To sum up, the special provisions of Bill C-16 are aimed at tailoring the employment conditions of astronauts to their unique duties. They provide additional conditions which otherwise would not be offered. Never will they be used to deprive these people of any right whatever.

Therefore we cannot accept the amendment proposed by the Hon. Member for Ottawa West (Mrs. Catterall).

With respect to Motion No. 8, Mr. Speaker, we are pleased to support the new version advocated by the Hon. Member for Ottawa West and we will vote in favour of the motion.

Motion No. 9 has to do with clause 28 and relates to presumption. The amendment reads as follows:

service of Canada within one hundred and eighty days after

This clause concerns housekeeping provisions for the transfer of employees to the Canadian Space Agency.

It is intented to protect the rights of employees during the tranfer and relieve the administrative burden on the Public Service Commission.

Without this clause, any employee tranferred to the Agency would have to wait until it was established that no other person whose name appeared on a priority list was eligible for his position. He would have to wait until the end of the appeal period and would then again be subject to probation.

In short, each employee would have to compete with other candidates for positions which in some cases, the employee had occupied for 20 years.

The period of 90 days is merely a reasonable period of time suggested by Treasury Board and the Public Service Commission for dealing with all the administrative details.

The clause bears no relation to the decision of employees to enter the Agency or not, nor is there any connection with the move of employees to Montreal or Saint-Hubert. These decisions are subject to other conditions established elsewhere in the Treasury Board's directives.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot vote in favour of Motion No. 9 as drafted.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to comment on what was said by the Hon. Member for Carleton—Gloucester (Mr. Bellemare), who claimed that patronage was involved in the decision to locate the Agency in the Montreal area.

Mr. Speaker, I may remind the Hon. Member that before the election campaign, his leader, Mr. Turner and the Leader of the New Democratic Party, Mr. Broadbent, supported locating the Canadian Space Agency in the Montreal area.

In fact, I would like to say to my colleagues here in the House that the site in Saint-Hubert, since that is where the government decided to locate the Agency, happened to be on land belonging to the Department of Transport and thus to the Canadian government, which precluded any land speculation in the vicinity.

Mr. Speaker, the people in this area prepared a very complete and detailed submission, and that is why their request was approved.

Regarding Motion No. 10 moved by the government, and this is the amendment to Section 28 on deemed appointment, this amendment will help clarify the points raised in committee, Mr. Speaker.

So, the amendment (a) amends the English version of clause 28(2) by deleting the words: "coming into force of this Act" and replacing them with the following word: "appointment."

Mr. Speaker, (b) it amends the French version of clause 28(2) by replacing lines 13 to 16 with the following:

«fonction publique, ces agents sont dispensés de stage, sauf s'ils étaient déjà stagiaires lors de la mutation, auquel cas ils continuent de l'être jusqu'à la fin de la période initialement prévue.»

The important point is, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment in the English version protects employees who are subject to probation at the time they are deemed to have been appointed and not at the time the act comes into force.

It does not make sense to relate an employee's probation period to the coming into force of the Act; it is more appropriate to relate the probation period to the appointment.

Mr. Speaker, the b) amendment harmonizes the French with the English versions, with the understanding that employees deemed to have been appointed are not subject to renewed probation.

I therefore hope, Mr. Speaker, that every member in this House will support that provision.

[English]

Mr. MacWilliam: On the amendment to Motion No. 8, which is the amended Motion 8(A) I believe, it would be very helpful if members of the New Democratic caucus could actually receive a copy of the wording of Motion 8(A).

In hearing the amended motion presented, I do not believe that we have any difficulty with it, but I would like to receive a copy of the exact wording so that we can make a determination at this time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: A copy will be supplied to the hon. member immediately. The Chair will give the member a couple of minutes to read the motion.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Motions No. 3 and No. 10 will be voted on separately. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 8(A) obviates the question being put on Motion No. 9. A negative vote on Motion No. 8 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 9.

The first question is on Motion No. 3. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion is defeated.

The next question is on Motion No. 10. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The next question is on Motion No. 8(A). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Because of the result of the vote on Motion No. 8A there is no need to vote on Motion No. 9.

[Translation]

On a point of order, the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State (Science and Technology) (Mrs. Duplessis).

Mrs. Duplessis: Mr. Speaker, on this side of the House we do not support motion no 9. Even if it is not put to a vote, motion no 9 as introduced is not acceptable to the government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Anyway, it is not before the House.

Motions Nos. 6 and 7 will be debated together but voted on separately.

Hon. Alan Redway (for The Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology) moved:

Motion No. 6

That Bill C-16 be amended in clause 19 in the French version by striking out lines 19 and 20 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

"présidence du comité à l'un des membres de celuici"—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow Mr. Manley to move the motion on behalf of Mr. Pagtakhan?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. John Manley (for Mr. Pagtakhan) moved:

Motion No. 7

That Bill C-16 be amended in clause 22 by striking out line 5 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"place as the Minister may determine. Further, the Board shall meet at such time and place as may be determined by the Chair and not less than once a year to review the activities of the Agency in terms of the overall mandate of the Agency".

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the House for its co-operation, which allowed me to present this motion on behalf of the member for Winnipeg North, who was unable to return to Ottawa for the debate today.

This motion is to create an independent board, a board that will meet at least once a year to discuss matters of importance with respect to the operation of the agency. It is unfortunate that the board, although it is created for good reason, is there and left only to meet at the bequest of the minister whenever he happens to feel so inclined. The intent of the motion is to ensure that at least once per year this board convenes.

In addition, this provides me the opportunity to make some brief comments on the agency, and to express our concern that it has taken so long to finally come to the point where this agency is coming into existence. We hear so often of the government's concerns about financial matters and deficits, that we sometimes wonder whether its entire policy is not driven by fear of the deficit. Here is a very worth-while proposition that, when it is created, is going to streamline some government operations. Maybe in the long run, in spite of some of the initial start-up costs, it will actually save the government some money. In its deficit of ideas and deficit of policy, it has taken the government forever to get this bill before the House of Commons and have the agency described, defined, announced and in place. It is unfortunate that we have had this lengthy delay.

I said on second reading of this bill that we can only treat with regret the manner in which the government allowed the creation of the Canadian Space Agency to become a matter which divided Canada instead of one which united it. Instead of being the crown jewel in our science and technology diadem, it became a symbol of division, a symbol of region fighting against region. Underlying that is this interminable and unfortunate delay.

We are pleased to be here to support this bill and to support the creation of the agency, to see it finally in place, but not without some regrets about what has happened over the time that we have taken to get here.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. Motion No. 6 was brought in because in the original legislation before the committee we felt that the wording "chairman of the board" was not justifiable in light of the situation today, where we try to ensure that we have non-gender clauses in such legislation. It was felt that rather than use the term "chairman of the board" that the term committee members felt was a much more equitable situation. The difficulty arose in the French translation as to exactly how the non-generic term, if you like, "chair of the board", could in fact be interpreted. I believe this present amending motion has resolved that slight difficulty adequately.

My colleagues and I on this side of the House do support amending Motion No. 7. It was felt that leaving the discretion of the call of meetings for the space agency committee completely up to the minister in charge did not give a strong enough mandate to the members of that board. It was felt, and we agree, that there should be some definition of the frequency at which those meetings could be called upon the discretion of the chair of the board.

So we will be supporting both of these amending motions. I feel that they do go a long way to clarifying slight discrepancies in the original legislation.

[Translation]

Mrs. Duplessis: Mr. Speaker, concerning Motion No. 6 put forward by the government, it is to clarify somewhat the amendment that was accepted in committee, since the original version seemed to indicate the chairing of the Space Advisory Board would be shared among board members. For greater certainty, the amendement specifies that one board member only will be selected.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, on motion no 7, clause 22, which deals with advisory board meetings, the amendment as proposed is hardly acceptable because it is in fact comprised of two aspects neither of which is warranted.

First, under that amendment, the board's chairperson shall call meetings to review the Agency's operations. As the Advisory Board has a mandate to advise the Minister on matters specified by the latter, the chairperson has no authority whatsoever to call a meeting that is not attended by the minister. It is the minister's responsibility to determine the dates and places of the Board's meetings, because of the advisory nature of the board. But that does not prevent the minister from consulting the chairperson on such procedural matters.

Second, under the amendment, the advisory Board would have the responsibility to review the Agency's operations at least once a year. There already exist a number of mechanism to review departmental operations, including the Estimates, the Agency's annual report and the Standing Committee of this House. This means that every member here will have an opportunity to attend the committee and ask questions.

Also, Mr. Speaker, it would be highly imprudent to imply through such an amendment that a body other than Parliament is responsible for the operations of some department. This is why, Mr. Speaker, we found it very difficult to accept and support Motion No. 7, and we will therefore oppose it.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Motions Nos. 6 and 7 will be voted on separately. The question is on Motion No. 6. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 7. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Motion negatived.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Normally at this time the House would proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of this bill. However, pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), the recorded divisions will stand deferred until six o'clock on Monday, November 6, 1989.

BROADCASTING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications) moved that Bill C–40, an Act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunication, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the Broadcasting Bill we are debating today for the first time reflects our concept of both Canada and its communications. It shows our determination to make a choice that takes into account our technological and cultural reality, for francophones as well as anglophones. It also indicates our firm intention to give the Canadian people a broadcasting system worthy of their expectations and history.

First of all, let us retrace the development of our broadcasting system. How did it start? How can we define it? Since its beginning, Canadian broadcasting has had to adjust to Canadian realities: the proximity to the United States, a vast and sparsely populated territory, as well as the existence of two official languages. Every measure taken by public authorities since the turn of the century can be explained by these economic, social and cultural challenges, which lie at the root of the bill before us today. Today's hybrid system, where private companies and Crown corporations coexist, which is controlled by a public agency and which recognizes the existence of two cultural realities, is the product of geographical, political and historical circumstances whose basic characteristics have, in many respects, remained the same.

What has changed, however, is the technology of communications and the significant evolution of Canadian values. Our bill takes these changes into account and proposes to the Canadian people a system more in sync with today's world and better equipped for the future.

In 1919, the Canadian Marconi Company broadcast for the first time regular programming from Montreal. In the 1920s and 1930s radio stations sprang up all over Canada spurred by local or regional needs. A new communications era was opening up with its benefits, its challenges and its dangers. Even in those days the American influence was being felt in Canadian radiobroadcasting. For one thing, for all practical purposes a number of Canadian stations were little more than relays for American stations, some of which purposely set up shop near the border to expand their advertising market and thus deprived our stations of the revenue sources they would need to grow.

This invasion of the waves quickly made Canadians aware of the urgency to establish their own coherent communications system to promote our values. Responding to these concerns, the Government of Canada established in 1928 the first commission of inquiry on broadcasting under the direction of Sir John Aird. The analysis and findings of the commissioners confirmed the suggestion that most radio broadcasts originated from abroad and that Canadians wanted to have their own broadcasting system. The commission also wondered whether it might not be necessary to build a national network, all the more so since it had reached the conclusion that the private sector alone would not be able to fund and meet the requirements of a Canadian broadcasting system. The possibility of a joint public–private sector endeavour began to gain support. The Aird Commission also advocated annual government grants for public broadcasting, setting as a technical objective clear reception in all inhabited regions of the country, which at the time meant a 200–kilometre wide corridor along the Canada–U.S. border.

Such were the first parameters of a Canadian broadcasting policy designed to meet the major challenges peculiar to our geographic situation and political context: Canadian or American programming; public or private capital; respective responsibilities of public and private broadcasters; commercial requirements of private stations as opposed to their cultural obligations; regulation of contents or total lack of control; and protection of economic interests or diffusion of culture. All these alternatives were already becoming so many factors of the whole problem.

As early as 1929, this awareness of the importance of promoting and protecting culture was particularly strong in Quebec. For instance, the Quebec Government, the only Government in Canada with a French majority passed broadcasting legislation, invoking provincial jurisdiction over education and culture. However, in 1931, the Supreme Court, considering the interprovincial and international nature of the spectrum, ruled that the Government of Canada had sole jurisdiction over broadcasting.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, it was not until 1985 that a joint Quebec–Canada Committee took into account the distinct identity of French–language radio and television in this country and set out to harmonize policy in this area.

In 1932, further to the conclusions of the Aird Commission, the Conservative Government under R.B. Bennett passed the Canadian Broadcasting Act which created a national broadcasting system and introduced régulations for the private sector.

The Canadian broadcasting system was born. Basically, it was to remain unchanged, with a public and a private system, both subject to government regulations. Subsequent broadcasting legislation was merely a refinement of the original concept.

In the following years, a number of essential principles were formulated as we developed our approach to broadcasting in this country: radio waves are public property and government–authorized users have responsibilities as well.

Financing must come both from public and private sources; programming must be high quality and have Canadian content; and ownership must be Canadian.

The same principles which applied to radio would also guide the government in the 1950s, when television entered our homes. More than 30 years after the advent of radio, history repeated itself: American television programs immediately found their way to Canadian viewers.

This was the situation in the fall of 1952, when the CBC started broadcasting from its television studios in Montreal and Toronto.

Both stations were broadcasting eighteen hours a week: Toronto in English and Montreal in French and English. Remember, this was 1952! This imbalance would be unthinkable today.

American studios, which had already amortized their production costs on their own markets, offered their programs to Canadian broadcasters at greatly reduced prices. Since our own productions had to be entirely financed by our own market, they could hardly compete.

This hard economic truth and its dire consequences led to widespread dissatisfaction. That is why in 1955, the government appointed a second Royal Commission of Inquiry on Broadcasting, the Fowler Commission, which this time recommanded appointing a Board of Broadcast Governors.

In 1958, under a Conservative Government, legislation was passed defining the mandate of the Board of Broadcast Governors. The Board granted licences to private television stations with affiliated status with the CBC. The dual system already in existence in the radio sector was also applied to television.

The same Board imposed Canadian content requirements on owners of private stations. This measure was not always successful, since private broadcasters were torn between their financial commitments and social responsiblities.

This situation forced the Government to rethink its policy, and in 1968, Parliament passed a new Broadcasting Act.

• (1320)

This time, a regulating body with increased powers called the Canadian Radio–Television and Telecommunications Commission, or CRTC was suggested. But the legislation allowed private broadcast licensees more freedom of action in their efforts to achieve the Canadianisation of the airwaves.

For that matter, the CRTC has recognized over the years the fundamental differences between the Francophone and Anglophone markets. This was demonstrated very clearly in its decision concerning the specialized television network which called for different regulations in the case of companies broadcasting in French and those broadcasting in English.

Since 1968, Canada has changed and technology has improved. Already, in 1985, I had come to the conclusion that the legislative radiobroadcasting policy and framework were somewhat inadequate to reflect the new realities of our time. So the task force on broadcasting Policy was set up to examine such issues as cable distribution, the independent production industry, public broadcasting financing, the private cable distribution regulating framework, the impact of new broadcasting technologies, as well as the social, economic and constitutional changes which had occurred since the radiobroadcasting legislation was adopted in 1968.

The task force confirmed the cultural supremacy of the Canadian Broadcasting System and recommended the recognition in both spirit and letter of the distinctive characteristics of French and English broadcasting. It insisted on the need for drama programs which would reflect the identity of the Canadian society in its cultural and regional diversity. The task force examined the new technologies which, although they can foster progress, can also be a disrupting factor for the legal framework defined over 20 years before.

Following a thorough review of the issue, the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture submitted to the Government a series of recommendations for the drafting of a new legislation.

Later on, the Government introduced in Parliament a new bill consistent with the current needs and views of the Canadian society. The Senate failed to adopt this legislation, and election having been called.

Since last March, I have met with representatives of the cultural and broadcasting industries everywhere in Canada.

You will allow me, Mr. Speaker, to note first of all the major improvements over the 1968 Act: explicit recognition of the contribution of women, children, cultural minorities, native peoples and the disabled, as well as the need to reflect the multicultural character of our society more faithfully; recognition of the special characteristics of the French–language market; revision of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's management structure and of its accountability to Parliament; explicit recognition of freedom of expression and of journalistic, creative and programming independence; legal neutrality concerning distribution technologies; in addition, the CRTC, under the new provisions of the Railway Act, will take account of the requirements of the Broadcasting Act in regulating telecommunications; permitting cable companies to create programming, while granting the CRTC the power to arbitrate any conflict of interest situations which may arise and if necessary require cable companies to broadcast other specific programming services.

As for Canadian content, the CRTC will have the power to implement a new system to give broadcasters incentives if required. Note that for some time, broadcasters have been making additional efforts in this direction.

The Governor in Council will be able to give the CRTC general instructions, which must first be reviewed by Parliament.

The new wording will enable companies producing signals and their authorized agents, including cable distributors, to take legal action against those who pirate signals for commercial purposes and who steal their coded signals.

Furthermore, we will use this legislation to make the following changes.

First, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation will actively contribute to cultural expression and to exchanging the various forms that expression may take, and this approach will also apply to its ancillary services.

Second, its president will be a member of the board of directors and will be appointed by order in council.

Third, educational programming, and more specifically programming provided through the facilities of an independent educational organization, will be an integral part of the Canadian broadcasting system. Priority will be given to local stations whose broadcasts will be transmitted by cable.

Mr. Speaker, Canada has decided to relieve the CBC of the obligation to promote Canadian unity and to substitute therefore the obligation to report on the cultural reality of this country. Unity can only come about as a result of a sense of shared identity. The role of our information media is to describe events, not to promote policy. It is therefore unthinkable that Canada should persist in obliging a government agency to promote an ideology instead of reporting on the actual situation.

That being said, I may note that conscience, a strong identity and quality have been the hallmark of the CBC since it was created in 1936. The Corporation made its presence felt across Canada and played an essential role in Québec. It was in the forefront of social change, and has been a tenacious promoter of linguistic and artistic quality, which continues today. I have said many times that this Crown corporation should be the cornerstone of the expression of our cultural reality.

The proposed legislation defines the mandate of the CBC and clarifies its responsibility with respect to the need for Canadian, regional and cultural programming. The role it is asked to play today differs substantially from the role it has played in the past. As a public broadcaster, the CBC must offer Canadians what they are entitled to expect from a service financed with public funds.

One of the most complex aspects of this approach is probably how to meet these expectations. The CBC could do more if it had twice as much funding. I imagine the same applies to health insurance, environmental programs and all the other services offered by the government. The truth is, we cannot afford this kind of luxury.

Because of budgetary constraints, the CBC has been very actively seeking advertising revenue. This approach has not been well received by private broadcasters and has certainly had an impact on programming. Of course, the CBC could decide, of its own accord, to drop advertising on its television network as it did on radio. This certainly deserves further consideration.

From the outset, our broadcasting system has reflected our Canadian values. The proposed legislation reflects the political and cultural changes in Canadian society, its confidence and its maturity. It will benefit the entire population because Canadians will have a broadcasting system that is more complete and closer to their reality.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to what the minister said and found his speech to be a well-thought out historical retrospective which indicated his understanding of the complexity of the public and private sector and the use of Canadian airwaves.

I wish to make a series of observations in the hope that the minister will listen and recognize these as constructive observations so that, hopefully, we will be able to unanimously adopt this bill at third reading.

[Translation]

In that respect, I am honoured and pleased to share with this honourable House and all Canadians what I think of Bill C-40, an Act to amend the Canadian Broadcasting Act.

The bill follows directly from the Kaplan-Sauvageau Commission's report as well as from four reports tabled by the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture. Moreover, the Government already tabled a bill almost identical to the legislation now before us, but that twin died on the Order Paper when the 1988 election was called.

• (1330)

We Liberals believe that by reason of geographic, demographic and cultural conditions in Canada, the Government has a prime role in a cultural sector as strategic as communications and broadcasting, a prime and vital role. In order to grow as a distinct, sovereign and prosperous nation from coast to coast, we have had to face on a daily basis the challenges of climate, geography and the permanent attraction of the powerful giant south of the border, our American cousins.

There is no doubt that without a constant and unflinching determination to be ourselves and the direct and constant involvement of our government, never would we have survived or would we have preserved our own identity.

The Canadian Government gave us such tools as a national railway system, a national Post Office, a national radio and TV network, a national airline and various other parts of a coherent infrastructure that is absolutely essential to the development of Canada as we now know it, or I should rather say, Mr. Speaker, Canada as we knew it yesterday because there is no doubt that this government has a deliberate agenda to dismantle that infrastructure. It is putting Air Canada on the block, it is crippling VIA Rail, it is severing in one fell swoop the links between small communities and the rest of the country, creating a stae if isolation that is totally at odds with the basic principles that allowed this country to advance and develop.

As Liberals, we are going to keep on the fight to preserve those infrastructures, because we are deeply convinced they are essential to this country's future.

[English]

I believe the minister indicated that he understood very well. I am glad to see that at least the broadcast bill is not to suffer the same kind of indignity.

With respect to broadcasting in Canada our basic principles remain, those which were constant from the past. Broadcasting is a public service. There is a need for ownership and control by Canadians of the Canadian broadcasting system. There is also a need to make adequate provisions for the financing and broadcasting of Canadian programs of high standards from Canadian sources. Programs of similar standards should be sought from other sources.

The primacy role of the public sector is to serve both English and French speaking Canadians equally and fairly, as well as all regions of Canada. Providing for program exchange among the regions is important. The fundamental assumptions are that the airwaves are a limited resource that must be used in the Canadian public interest. As well, the principle is that Canadians in all settled regions of this vast land and not simply those in the large population centres are entitled to a broadcasting service.

The stated principles set out by R. B. Bennett in introducing the first broadcast law in Canada which had the unanimous support of both opposition and government were in part:

> This country must be assured of complete control of broadcasting from Canadian sources, free from foreign interference. Without such control broadcasting can never become a great agency for communication of matters of national concern and for the diffusion of national thought and ideals, and without such control it can never be the agency by which national consciousness may be fostered and sustained and national unity still further strengthened.

One of the main reasons for this approach was best articulated by the Aird commission which said on the central issue of Canadian programming:

> At present the majority of programs heard are from sources outside of Canada.

The situation continues today. The commission continued:

> It has been emphasized to us that the continued reception of these (ideas) has a tendency to mould the minds of young people—to ideals and opinions that are not Canadian—many persons appearing before us have expressed the view that they would like to have an exchange of programs with the different parts of the country—In conclusion, in a country of the vast geographical dimensions of Canada, broadcasting will undoubtedly become a great force in fostering a national spirit and interpreting national citizenship.

I would hope that our children and our grandchildren will end up having a sense of Canada and knowing to the extent that it is important who the leaders of this country are, without getting them mixed up with those of our American neighbour.

Those most important principles remain. They are in large measure reflected in the broadcast policy for Canada found in clause 3 of the bill. The 1968 act needed to be altered to reflect technological change. This the government has done. There is a need to examine the division of responsibility for broadcast policy and the role, management and control of the national broadcaster, the CBC, and the regulator, the CRTC, cable, and the private sector. This side of the House sees some crucial flaws that create the gap in the express need for a Canadian system, for Canadian content and for Canadian control as defined in the purposes and objectives of that clause.

The gaps, the errors or omissions, the mechanisms to set in place some corrective measures have been brought to the government's attention through many representations at hearings held across this country, and amendments were suggested. However, the government seems bent, in certain instances, on different directions. Errors of the past are not fully addressed. Remedial solutions are lacking in some of the key nerve centres of this new bill. This is regrettable, for we have this rare opportunity to fix it where it is broken.

The government seems bent on dismantling this country's infrastructure, and we on this side of the House will continue to fight to build and to maintain. My party believes that the development and maintenance of a truly Canadian broadcasting system is fundamental to the future of Canada. I believe the minister shares that point of view, for the most part, and I hope he will see the need for amendments that I am bringing to his attention right now.

As the minister knows, in 1989 Canada is a culturally occupied country. Some 80 per cent of our publishing industry is in foreign hands. Ninety-seven per cent of films shown in Canada are foreign. Eighty-five per cent of records and tapes are based on imported master tapes. In broadcasting, 71 per cent of all programs viewed by English speaking Canadians on television are American. The figure is much lower in French speaking Canada, but as the globalization takes place that too will be impacted.

The minister has given money and a great deal of attention to certain sectors, but here is where he can really do a job. This is where people watch and listen. Therefore, I would suggest that cultural survival will be perhaps one of the most critical problems our generation of Canadians will have to face. I believe that it can be achieved but only by using all the means at our command.

With Canadians spending 24 hours each week watching television and 18 hours per week listening to radio, what we see and hear on television and radio impacts on how we view ourselves and our world, and what our children are going to think. Broadcasting is the central vehicle through which Canadians communicate with one another, a major instrument for Canadian expression in the arts and entertainment and an essential means for providing a Canadian perspective in news, information and programming.

In addressing the broadcast issue of the present and the future, the crucial test will not be just the extent to which the provisions of the 1968 act are retained. The key test will be the extent to which in a more complex world we continue to retain control by Canadians over the system and to provide a reasonable balance between Canadian and foreign programming.

We live in a rapidly developing technological environment. The coaxial cable technology that led to the cabling of Canadian homes revolutionized broadcasting in the 1960s and 1970s, but that technology is now rapidly being replaced and challenged by the development of cheaper fibre optics installed by telephone companies and cheaper satellite communications being bought by individuals, as well as the growing number of Canadians who have VCRs.

We therefore cannot ignore technology, but we must use it creatively to improve the distribution while ensuring Canadian content through it. Jean McNulty, in a recent article entitled Broadcasting Policy in the Canadian Context, sums the situation up very well. She states:

> Communications distribution technologies are seen as both potential national saviours and potential Trojan horses.

It is in that light that we make certain observations and the content that is carried on those systems becomes of utmost importance. It is not counting the number of Canadian buttons pushed and saying that is Canadian content; it is the amount of real Canadian content.

While Canadians are technically well advanced in distribution technology, we are far less advanced in the areas of production and marketing of domestic content. This government must act to ensure domestic production. The government could start by reinstating the 100 per cent capital cost allowance of film and video production which was cut in 1987 to 30 per cent, resulting in significant cuts in production moneys available and in production, of course.

Recently we have learned that the Canadian audience share given to Canadian television stations is significantly lower than that which was sought. What will be the impact now upon the revenues from advertising? Will broadcasters lose resources that could have been earmarked for Canadian productions? These are part of our challenges.

Since Bill C–136 died we had hoped the new minister would have taken the time to reshape a new bill and to put his own imprimatur on the bill.

However Bill C–40 is not such a bill. It is still the hurried bill of a defeated minister with a few tinkered changes.

We had been hopeful that the new minister and the Department of Communications would have prepared a report on all the suggestions and comments that had been made by so many responsible individuals and groups, by so many experts, and at least explain why their concerns had not been met.

I acknowledge the positive and very carefully considered provisions of the bill and yet I wonder about its absences. On the positive provisions, this new bill adds the question of addressing women, children and cultural minorities. Aboriginal peoples and the disabled are specifically mentioned in the legislation as is the need to portray more accurately the multicultural nature of our society. Bravo.

The special nature of the French language broadcasting environment is recognized. The CRTC will thus be required to make these market differences and to take them into account when making licensing decisions. Originators of program signals and their authorized agents such as cable operators will be able to take action in the courts against commercial pirates stealing their scrambled signals.

Provisions have been included making educational broadcasting an integral part of the law and the Canadian scene. Local Canadian stations will be given priority status when carried by cable. There is provision that the president of the CBC be a member of the CBC board of directors and the definition of broadcasting has been changed to give the CRTC more flexibility in dealing with new types of programming services.

I now come to my critique. Bill C–40 drops the CBC's 1968 mandate to contribute to the development of national unity and provide for a continuing expression of Canadian identity. I heard the minister address this point. I do not agree with his observations.

The removal of the national unity reference I know was recommended by both Caplan–Sauvageau and by my own standing committee. The chairman of the committee at that time is sitting here. Caplan–Sauvageau and the standing committee had been concerned that this clause might interfere with CBC's ability to ensure that its programming reflect and interpret as fully, as fairly and as accurately as possible Canada's cultural, social, political, economic, linguistic and regional reality and diversity. I think that it did.

Pierre Juneau, former president of the CBC, told the committee that the phrase "national unity" had not caused any problems during his years at the CBC. The CRTC noted that its interpretation of the term never precluded a free political discussion from all points of view.

Last night, the standing committee reviewed the Orders in Council appointments of Mr. Keith Spicer, Mr. Veilleux, and Mr. Patrick Watson. All three indicated their support and recognized the importance of the broadcasting system as being a key agent for the development of national unity, a sense of shared experience and greater understanding of tolerance and exchange.

I would suggest to the minister that I would like to see the national unity clause put back. It should read something to the effect that the Canadian broadcasting system shall contribute to the development of national unity by providing a continuing expression of Canadian identity leading to the development of national consciousness.

I would like to point out another serious flaw, and that is the part–time position of the CBC chairman.

[Translation]

Perhaps the shell is more important that the content. And this is too bad! Because the content is just as important, and the chair–person or chief executive officer must take the time to look after that.

[English]

Mr. Watson told us that his work week presently needs nine days. I hope that in the future his work week would only need five days, but certainly not five part–time days. I think that was an error, and I hope it will be redressed.

This bill scraps last year's provision giving the board the power to appoint the president of the CBC subject to the approval of cabinet. Under Bill C–40 the president will be appointed by cabinet, a move which The Calgary Herald on October 14 of this year said made some CBC supporters feel that public broadcasting would be more vulnerable to political control.

There has been a lot of discussion around the appointment of chief executive officers in arm's length Crown corporations, particularly those in the cultural milieu. The Nielsen report recommended that chief executive officers of national cultural institutions be appointed by the board of those agencies upon consultation with the minister responsible.

The Caplan–Sauvageau report supported the Nielsen recommendation. However the president and chief executive officers said they should be appointed by and be responsible to the board of directors in recognition of the principle of arm's length.

Our fourth report stated in concurring with the recommendation of Caplan–Sauvageau that:

> Creative autonomy in a publicly funded broadcasting organization is a precious commodity that must be protected not only from real compromise but also from the slightest hint or appearance of compromise.

This is not to say that the appointments were not fine appointments. They were. I would sincerely hope that the same appointments would have been made following consultation, but I think the provision is there. We may not some day have such an enlightened government able to find such competent people.

The additional flaws that I bring to the minister's attention are the recognition of Radio Canada International, the Parliamentary Television Network and Northern Services within the CBC mandate. This bill provides no recognition of those. Both Caplan–Sauvageau and standing committee recommended that these services be incorporated in broadcasting legislation.

I believe each of these services are key to Canada and that by stating them specifically within legislation official recognition and continuity of service are clearly confirmed by Parliament, whether under the public or private sector joint financing. That is not the issue. The issue is that those services are on our screens or in our radio system.

As to programming in representative native languages, the bill recognizes the right of Canada's aboriginal peoples to receive programming that reflects their culture within the Canadian broadcasting system. It does not provide for such services to be in representative native languages where numbers warrant and as public funds become available. Liberals believe that support of aboriginal languages and through them the transmission of native cultures is so important that the new Broadcasting Act must provide such strong affirmation and the role of the CBC be reaffirmed in that area.

A further critique is that the introduction of that new alternative programming service is an idea that truly has merit. The need for increased cultural and artistic programming is real, but it is totally unrealistic at this time when the CBC is suffering major cut-backs and having difficulty in fulfilling not only its legislative mandate but its CRTC licence commitments. Further, why is such a service defined in the law? We have specialty services. We have pay television services. They exist and are not defined in legislation. Whose ego is to be served here?

Liberals are not saying no to an alternative service which could be very enriching, but the dollars are not there. This type of service should be addressed through the normal CRTC licensing process, including a full public hearing.

• (1350)

We have said that one of the most serious omissions is the extent of the ownership and control by Canadians. It fails to require that all broadcasting undertakings be at least 80 per cent owned and effectively controlled by Canadians, and that no single foreign shareholder may own more than 10 per cent of the shares in any broadcasting undertaking. That has been the concept behind the law since 1958. It was directed under a CRTC cabinet direction in section 22 of the 1968 act. I believe that such important Canadian ownership criteria should be written into that act now to ensure that the will of Parliament is understood for now and evermore. It should not be tampered with.

We believe that by writing this requirement into legislation an open, public debate would then be required before any changes could be made.

I also bring to the minister's attention the question of foreign networks. They certainly should be licensed. Cable networks like CNN, Nashville Network, Arts and Entertainment, about 17 or 18 of them, are doing business in Canada without being required to obtain a licence from the CRTC. However, Canadian satellite networks, TSN and Much Music must. Liberals find this to be unfair.

We believe the government should have provided the CRTC with full regulatory authority over any foreign service earning revenue from Canada with no obligation to contribute to Canadian programming.

When we looked at this issue in the standing committee we noted that CNN has penetrated Canadian households to the extent of almost 435,000 subscribers. Others have reached as many as 400,000, as opposed to some of our own Canadian networks that have not been able to meet that target as yet. I think that the importation of these services will compromise the potential for developing Canadian services in the future. These unlicensed services do not make any commitment to the Canadian good or to the Canadian programming goals. I think that there is something to be said about that.

In Bill C–40, clause 3(1)(s)(iv) provides cable the power to become programmers. While we believe that cable should be provided an opportunity to be a contributor to the Canadian broadcasting system, we note that there are dangers of unfair competition, vertical integration and conflicts of interest. We therefore argue that Bill C–40 should incorporate provisions that would limit the role of cable television systems to providing programming that is not already offered by conventional broadcasters.

We are not saying no to cable operators becoming involved in programming. We just believe the programming they offer should be different and complementary to existing programs. We also believe that their role should be more clearly defined with respect to community cable.

There is no serious provision in this bill for community broadcasting, which is now a significant part of the system. It gives access to community based groups and local stories that are not always on the public agenda. It reflects the dynamism and the vitality of the multicultural dimension of our local communities. It is a very important and distinct voice, different from that of the local independent or unaffiliated station to the national network.

It is a system that the CRTC addresses in a way that differs from its approach to either the public or the private broadcasting system. I would hope that we would broaden the definition of the system.

With respect to cable carriage of Canadian services, the bill does provide a framework requiring that cable give priority to the carriage of Canadian programming services and, in particular, the carriage of local Canadian stations.

This is a good start, but what does it mean? Could the weather channel, Vision TV or the home shopping channel be considered local Canadian stations? Does the priority mean channels 1 to 13 or 1 to 35? Would the community channel be considered local?

Liberals argue that the bill should in defining the essential role of cable systems require that in distributing Canadian radio and television services in French and English, both public and private, first priority be given to the public sector French and English networks and then the other public sector services, followed by provincial educators and certainly then the private Canadian broadcasting sector.

The programming is not defined as being predominantly Canadian. I find this unbelievable. The bill provides that each broadcasting undertaking shall make maximum use and in no case less than predominant use of Canadian creative and other resources in the creation and presentation of programming. Presently clause 3(1)(e) only requires that the resources that contribute to programming must be predominantly Canadian but does not require that the programming provided by the Canadian broadcasting system be predominantly Canadian.

You buy trucks made in Canada for Canadians by Canadians, but you do not necessarily have to show Canadian content programs. I think that needs to be re–examined. It is really quite an amazing clause, and I sincerely hope the minister will look at how we can put the predominantly Canadian aspect back into this clause.

Again there are no limits placed on foreign services carried by cable. That is one of the major failures in this bill, to provide the CRTC with this strong legislative framework that would allow it, to the extent that foreign broadcasting signals are carried, to define them to be complementary to existing programming from Canadian sources. In other words, it should be different. It should allow those Canadian programs that are bought from Americans to have the exclusivity which they thought was purchased by the networks when they discovered that was not really so.

The following approach should be taken. First, to avoid disruption the act should make provisions for those foreign channels now carried to continue to be operated. In other words, grandfather what exists and that is it. Second, the test in the future of whether to permit the importation of any additional foreign service should be that it actually adds something significant to the mix of programming available to Canadians. Specifically the test should offer programming complementary to that already available from licensed Canadian program broadcasters. The ultimate effect is not to dilute the Canadian service.

There is no provision for non-simultaneous substitution, something I have discussed in the past and something I will come back to again. I do not think it is fair the way we expect our Canadian networks to purchase rights and then once they have those rights to be able to attract large advertising dollars. How can broadcasters expect to obtain the advertising revenue when they are not able to attain the total rights to those programs?

The status is unclear for MATV systems. I remind the minister that the previous minister had to stand up and make a million excuses and explanations as to what the circumstances were and in what state MATV systems would be found. Condominium and apartment residents have a right to know where they stand regarding the law. If they have access to a master antenna or to a satellite, are they required to be licensed? Do they pay a telecommunication tax? Do they pay retransmission rights? Under this bill there is no clarity as to whether MATV systems will be considered a distribution undertaking and subject to licensing by the CRTC.

If they are exempt, then let us say they are exempt. According to the former Minister of Communications they were exempt. Why not make that clear in the law? Liberals have argued that condominium and apartment residents have a right to know where they stand.

The last issue I would like to look at is that of the cabinet power of direction and review. The way this bill is written it will seriously jeopardize the CRTC's ability to carry out its role as an expert and independent quasi-judicial body because it will grant to the cabinet two powers: first, to provide policy direction to the CRTC and, second, to review CRTC decisions.

Through these powers the cabinet would have sufficient control to effectively supersede the commission, a method by which to have one's cake and eat it too. We have argued that the cabinet should be empowered to issue binding directions to the CRTC, but these directions should be restricted to broad policy matters in furtherance of the objectives of the Broadcasting Act. Furthermore, the direction should refer to the specific objectives in the act which they seek to further. As well, we believe that such cabinet directions should not have a retroactive effect and should not be issued in respect of a particular licence. Regarding the cabinet's power to review the CRTC decisions, we argue that it must be limited. We support the standing committee's view that the power of review be limited to two situations. First, where the cabinet determines that its direction has been ignored or misinterpreted by the CRTC; and, second, when a decision of the CRTC has national policy implications regarding the broadcast system.

• (1400)

At the end, if I have time, I am going to read into the record Mr. Spicer's very astute observations in this regard. I had forgotten that I wanted to mention that I am not particularly pleased with the seven-year term being turned into a five-year term. I think that what happens to the nominees of both the board of the directors of the CBC and the CRTC is that we end up of having the perception of arms length and independence being distorted.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is comforting to find that this time, unlike its approach to VIA Rail and other elements of our national infrastructure, the Government has not dismantled our broadcasting system. It shows that, even in this Government, a Minister can, if he wants to, protect our heritage and refuse to let economic forces undermine the foundations of our society.

Obviously, this Bill is not perfect and I urge the Minister of Communications to consider very seriously my previous comments. He must recognize that my approach is positive, constructive and, I hope, Canadian rather than partisan.

Like thousands of Canadians, I am concerned about our country's future. Every time I turn on the television and every time I go to a bookstore or a newsstand, that mass invasion of programs, books, music and magazines makes me shudder. I wonder how much longer we will survive as a people and as a nation with a distinct culture in North America.

In general, when we talk about cultural survival, we think automatically of this country's francophones. In fact, French Canadians and especially Quebeckers have developed such energy, such cultural self-sufficiency that they are now better equipped than anglophones to face up to the cultural invasion we are experiencing.

Living in isolation on this continent as a result of their language, Canada's francophones have developed creative and other skills in producing their own songs, soap operas, literature and magazines. In short, there undoubtedly exists on this continent a distinct French culture which is neither a by-product nor an imitation of the French culture in Europe and elsewhere.

[English]

I recognize that there is still a need for financial balancing in Radio-Canada, CBC, and I think that with the enunciations in the new bill we can accomplish the equivalence that has been alluded to.

[Translation]

However, the situation is different in English Canada. Culturally, Canada is being invaded, dominated, and occupied by the States. Eighty per cent of our books, 71 per cent of our television programs, and 85 per cent of our records come from foreign countries. They are almost exclusively made in USA.

In the last two decades, Canada has become a leader in the development of telecommunications technologies. We are proud, in fact very proud of our success in that field, and we intend to increase our efforts and do even better.

Unfortunately, progress has been slow in the production area. Technically, we can say we are leaders in development, but culturally, we tag behind.

Mr. Speaker, I believe in Canadian identity. I believe that the links established between Western and Eastern Canada by our predecessors were and still are essential for us to be able do communicate. In learning about each other, Canadians can better understand who they are, they can see how different and independent they are of Americans.

The Leader of the Official Opposition has often described in the most eloquent terms the distinctive characteristics of the Canadian nation. This country is the product of combined British and French traditions. Our Constitution is based on peace, order and good government. We are a people which operates on consensus, moderation and balance. If we have opted for a mixed economy, it is because we felt that it is more conducive to social justice than the strict interaction of the market forces.

In Canada, we respect our aboriginal people we cherish both our founding nations and we encourage them to build for the future. Far from forcing them to conform, we provide them with every opportunity to maintain their cultural identity and thereby contribute to the great Canadian cultural mosaic. The new arrivals are for Canada a source of real enrichment.

It is beyond question that the implementation of the Canada—United States Free Trade Agreement, plus the breaking up of our national infrastructures, plus the destruction of our regional development programs have severely weakened the East-West ties which existed ever since this country came into being, to replace them with increasingly subjugating North South ties.

As elected representatives of the Canadian people, our basic duty is to take all preventive and corrective measures which we fell are needed to ensure the survival and development of the Canadian identity, without which it would no longer be possible to differentiate between a Canadian and an American.

We should make a very special effort to ensure that our national broadcasting network fully plays the vital role in this offensive which is essential to develop our national identity.

Even if we could, we would not isolate our airwaves nor erect a barrier against satellite intrusion. We want to be open to the world. We want to be in tune with national events. We want to discover the universe and its inhabitants. Our approach to broadcasting, therefore, should be progressive, open, dynamic and profoundly Canadian. Generaly speaking, this bill goes in the right direction, but I nevertheless urge the Government, and especially the Minister, to closely study the changes which I have suggested, for they could certainly re-inforce our collective cultural future.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise, as the critic for the New Democratic Party on the issue of communications and culture, to speak on this bill.

[Translation]

I am happy to see that the Minister was here to listen to the speeches. Yet, I see no Oscar and I am anxious to see the Minister's Oscar.

[English]

That is why I call him Oscar Masse. I expected to see the minister with his Oscar here today, but perhaps he is hiding it from us.

We have seen this bill before. This is the broadcasting act that was passed in the last Parliament—well not quite, it passed this House of Commons, but it did not get through the Senate and therefore it never became the law of Canada.

We need a broadcasting act because the act that is still in force goes back to 1968. We have had a lot of new technology in the meantime, especially in the cable industry. So we have to update the act.

The previous process was a long one. We had numerous debates here in Parliament and we had long committee hearings. As a result of that process there were numerous amendments made to what I thought was a very flawed bill when the original broadcasting bill was introduced in the last Parliament. I was happy to see that the government accepted some of my amendments and other amendments that were put forward by different groups. We took a bad bill and we made it better, but not good enough.

• (1410)

This is very important. Adults watch television 24 hours a week, and our young people watch it even more. I will say something more about that in my speech later on. I think this is one of the most important bills that this Parliament could consider, so we have to take time with it and we have to do it right. We have to try once again to make this bill better.

There are some changes to this particular bill from the one we debated in the last Parliament. Let me just summarize those changes so that we know what we are talking about. The first one is that educational broadcasters received a clause that they wanted, recognizing their integral role in the broadcasting system. This is something that we in the NDP proposed as an amendment at report stage last time and, naturally, we think it represents an improvement. I am glad it is part of the bill.

Second, local stations are given priority status on cable over satellite to cable services such as TSN and Much Music. That reflects the importance of local broadcasting.

Third, the job of the chair of the CBC is explicitly defined as part-time. That raises some difficulties which we can explore in the committee, which we explored last night when we had Mr. Patrick Watson, the new chair of the CBC board, in front of our committee. He seemed to define it as a full-time job but in the act it is defined as a part-time job. I am confident he will do a good job there. He is a distinguished Canadian. But we have to look carefully at this set-up between a part-time chair of a very conservative board of directors and a full-time president.

The fourth change is that more importantly, the definition of broadcasting has been changed to include SMATV systems in the broadcast act. This means that Bell, which is explicitly prohibited from operating under the broadcasting legislation, cannot operate such a service. This change should be viewed as positive, in my view, since HDTV, or the direct delivery of programs from a central bank to a particular television set upon request, could well be the wave of the future. This is really the future technology. It is important that the criteria of all types of broadcasting be applied to it as well.

In other words, in a few years you will be able to turn on your TV and phone in or press some buttons and call up, as we can here in our House of Commons system, a particular movie or program that you want to see. This is a tremendous tool to education. It could be a tremendous waste as well unless there is some regulatory criteria put on what you can call up. In other words, we want some Canadian content in that as well.

As I said, the previous bill was passed by the House. There were some amendments passed then. There are some good changes in this bill. The bill has been improved in the process but I believe that the bill is still flawed. I want to deal with some of the questions about Canadian control of communications within Canada, because that is the key issue.

Karl Deutsch, the great social scientist, once noted that the test of nationhood is that more communications take place within a country than between that country and another country. In other words, we communicate among ourselves. By this standard Canada is not doing very well. Three per cent of our film profits stay in Canada. Three per cent of video cassette sales are Canadian made. Ninety-seven per cent are foreign-made. Our own publishers own only 30 per cent of the Canadian market. Seventy-seven per cent of magazines sold in Canada are foreign. Eighty-five per cent of records and tapes sold in this country are foreign. No other country matches the distributing situation we have in this country.

The extent of this problem is best reflected on television. Of the 52,000 hours of English language television programming shown in Canada annually, less than 100 hours are Canadian drama. Of the 27,000 hours of French language television, only 630 hours are original Canadian drama. That is not a very good record.

Francophone teenagers watch foreign programming 50 per cent of the time. Anglophone teenagers watch it 80 per cent of the time. So our young people are being inundated with foreign programming.

I am not one who believes that you should put fences along borders. I believe in having an international outlook. I like to think of myself as a Canadian nationalist with a strong international outlook. I think most Canadians think of themselves that way but I think we are in real danger when we, and especially our young people, are so totally inundated with foreign programming.

There was a report by a committee called the Caplan-Sauvageau committee. Gerry Caplan from Toronto and Florian Sauvageau from Montreal produced an excellent report. I will give you one quote from that report. I admit that I have stolen it sometimes and not really given them the proper attribution, so I will do it now.

They said:

> The reasons for this problem are clear: the public sector which must be the chief purveyor of quality Canadian programming is inadequately scaled and funded; the private sector which should complement the public sector is not doing its job.

If I can summarize that, partly in my own words, the private sector is under-funded and the public sector is not doing its job.

This government has not made it easy to change that situation. I will give you some examples; the trade deal. If I can summarize the problem with the trade deal, culturally, it is this. The government says nothing in the trade deal affects culture. However, in the trade deal the Americans are entitled to take equivalent commercial, if you like, retaliation. So, if you are minister of culture and you want to bring in some legislation changing that situation with film distribution, for example, or tape distribution or magazine distribution, you want to bring in some Canadian nationalist legislation, then the Americans will retaliate against, say, west coast fishermen. Then the west coast fishermen will come to you as the minister and say, "Look, we are getting put out of a job. You had better not put in that strong nationalist legislation." That is how it is going to work and that is why the trade deal affects culture.

The second indication can be seen in the government's approach. The Prime Minister went to France for the bicentennial. What did he do? He just stole out of the Toronto airport a Jean Paul Riopelle masterpiece and gave it to the French. They thought we were crazy giving one of our masterpieces to them. They do not go into the Louvre and walk around the world giving away their masterpieces.

The Prime Minister's action was just, well, we can wheel and deal with our own cultural artifacts. I say that was a sham and a disgrace and it indicated the approach of the Prime Minister and the government.

There is another recent indication of what his government is doing. The Prime Minister met with Robert Maxwell, the international publisher. I bet that meeting was about lowering the requirement on foreign ownership of newspapers. I believe it is 20 per cent. I stand to be corrected, but I think you cannot have more than 20 per cent. I bet, and I predict that there is pressure from Maxwell and there will be changes by this Prime Minister to open up our newspapers.

The fourth indication is on film distribution. Jack Valente, the lobbyist for Hollywood, the friend of American presidents, has the power, if you can believe it, to get the Canadian government to withdraw a bill that it was going to present to the Canadian Parliament. What was the bill going to do? It was going to guarantee a bit of the slice of the pie for Canadian film distributors. Americans only have 97 per cent, they did not want to make any changes there. So this government, ready–aye–ready, withdrew the bill.

• (1420)

I got hold of its bill and I put it in as one of my private members' bills so that the whole country can see what the original bill was going to do and can see a perfect textbook example of how the Americans influenced our cultural policy and got the Mulroney government to withdraw a bill. That is the kind of thing we are faced with when we are dealing with this government.

Let me return to this particular bill and give some general criticisms of it. I believe, first, that the bill will lead to the increased North Americanization of Canadian broadcasting. We are in a fight to keep this country. It is not just Meech Lake that is the problem in this country, it is the rapidly growing loss of independence in this country through the free trade deal and through the way we are dealing with our own institutions in Canada, including Meech Lake.

The government rejected key standing committee recommendations to ensure a distinctive Canadian market. We believe that this rejection is linked to the trade deal. That is my first criticism of the bill and I will come back to that in more detail.

The second one is that the bill is a gift to the cable industry. Cable gets the right to originate programming far beyond its current community obligations. This mixing of content and carriage creates the potential for a clear conflict of interest. In addition, the government has done nothing to regulate outrageous cable industry profits. Cable is the only territorial monopoly in Canada whose profits are unregulated. The phone companies are regulated.

Finally, cable's right to import foreign programming as it sees fit is in no way limited. MPs in this House will tell you that people are phoning them and complaining about cable fees going up and about what is happening in terms of their dial. The cable industry is making a bundle off of them. They have a 30 per cent rate of return on their profit. Canadians are starting to notice that because they are calling our offices.

Third, while the government has given a broad mandate to the CBC, the corporation has taken such a financial beating over the last five years that, in my view, it cannot realistically meet its legislative obligations in spite of what some of the witnesses said last night.

In the first four years of this government the CBC went from $905 million to $775 million in real terms. Now, with the budget last spring, there is a further $140 million cut–back over the next five years. We may have good people who are going to be in charge of the CBC, but they are going to have to produce loaves and fishes for the CBC, they are going to have to produce miracles. I just do not see how they can do it. The CBC needs money to operate.

The other day the minister announced that he would give some additional funds to the CBC, just like that, to help it over a little period. While we appreciate the CBC getting a little bit of extra money, this is a bad pattern. Last night, Mr. Veilleux, the new Chief Executive Officer, said: "We will try and cut back and if we need a bit more we will go back to the minister".

The problem here is that you open up the danger of political control of the CBC, in even subtle ways, when you have to keep going back for bits and bits of money. You need a five–year plan. That is what the House of Commons committee recommended, a five–year plan properly funded.

The fourth objection in principle is that every report on broadcasting in the last decade has decided that the private sector in Canada is not doing its job in providing a distinctively Canadian service and producing quality programming in Canada. That is the private sector now. This bill does little to change this except to provide the possibility of a performance incentive programming that practically everybody in our committee agrees will not work. The private sector keeps promising the CRTC, it keeps coming back to the CRTC and the CRTC lets it off the hook. If the private sector does not produce this Canadian programming, the CRTC should just take away its licence. Forget the performance incentive programs, they will not work. You must have a strict term. If you do not produce, we will take away your licence. In that way we get the private sector in this country producing some quality Canadian programming.

Fifth, provisions dealing with broadcasting in representative aboriginal languages and for multilingual broadcasting are insufficient. We should look at this in the committee.

Sixth, the bill creates a so-called alternate television network. It is quite amazing that this bill creates a whole alternate network. What is this network? What is it to do? What are its responsibilities? It is not given any resource, so I believe it will never come into existence. It is a sham. We might look at that further in committee.

Those are some of the objections I have to the bill on principle and some of the areas in which I think it should be amended.

Let me go into some other details of the flaws. As I said, the bill leads to a North Americanization, especially in television, of our broadcasting. The government rejected two key amendments by the New Democratic Party that would say to American superstations on television, new stations if you like, that those stations could only come into Canada if they were complimentary to Canadian stations.

Let me explain that. They have to add something. If Canadian stations such as an entertainment network or an all news network already existed, then the American stations could not come in. That would require legislation protecting Canadian culture. This government will not do it because it is afraid of the Americans. It has a trade deal and it is afraid to do it.

I am not talking about ABC, CBS, NBC or the American public stations or the border stations. I am talking about these new superchannels which I believe could possibly run right over Canadian broadcasters and could in fact put a lot of our private broadcasters right out of business because I do not think our private broadcasters can compete with them. This is not a level playing field. I believe that is one of the flaws in the bill.

I asked the minister why the government did not accept these amendments. I believe the government is hemmed in by the trade deal, by its unwillingness to interfere with American industries, even cultural industries coming into Canada.

The second flaw in the bill was the cable industry being treated too well. I mentioned the right to originate programming. This was in opposition to all previous reports, especially the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, and to many of the witnesses that came before it. The cable industry has a real in with this government. I do not know what it is, but it must have a good lobby. It has certainly been protected in this bill. I wish my Liberal friends would look at that more seriously and not support the cable industry so absolutely in this area.

Another aspect that we have to look at in the cable industry, and we have to face this, is whether we are going to regulate cable fees. The telephone industry is regulated but cable is not. We are going to have one fibre optic line going into a household in the future, into a phone, into a TV or whatever, and we are going to have to come to grips with that. In some aspects, ironically, this bill is already out of date in many ways technologically before it has even come in because technology is moving so quickly. We have to deal with whether or not we are going to regulate the profits of the cable industry. I think we should.

I mentioned the underfunding of the CBC. I want to quote from a distinguished writer from Southam's, Jamie Portman, who follows this area constantly and is one of the best writers of it. He wrote in The Spectator: of Hamilton:

> The government has ignored a recent call from an all-party Commons committee that it show its commitment to better Canadian programming by increasing its support of broadcasting by up to $250 million—

That is what Conservative members on that committee said.

> —in fresh funding annually—in real dollar terms, the CBC's budget has shrunk by more than $150 million since the Conservatives came to power.

• (1430)

I will not stay on this. The fact is if you want the public sector to work, you have to fund it. You can have all these wonderful expressions, but if you keep cutting back the CBC dramatically like this, what you are going to see is commercials on The National. You are eventually going to see commercials with changes on the radio. You are going to see cut-backs in regional programming, which I think will be a real disaster. Do you remember what I said about Karl Deutsch saying that Canadians have to communicate among themselves in different regions? If we cut back regional programming, we really cut back the essence of nationhood in this country.

The CBC has been asked to make 95 per cent Canadian content in drama. This is good. I mentioned earlier the figures about our sad lack of producing drama. You tell the CBC to do that on the one hand but on the other hand you do not give it any money. What are they going to do? Where are they going to get the money? They will get it from the regional programs. It is not going to cut back its headquarters on Bronson Street or its place in Toronto. It will cut it back in the maritimes, in my area of Vancouver or in the small areas. That is what will happen. The government has to approach this. The government cannot have it both ways. You cannot say the bill is strengthening Canadian broadcasting while at the same time taking money away from the CBC.

There is a problem in Quebec. The French service has to produce more programs on a smaller budget than its English colleagues. As a result, we see fewer and fewer French drama series. I quote Quebec's creative people, La coalition pour la defénse des services français de Radio-Canada, who came to our committee and told us that they have to stay in their studios. They cannot present their viewers with varied settings because it is too expensive.

If you have to compete with Dallas, it takes money and it takes resources. Radio-Canada must have those resources to protect and enhance francophone culture.

Those are some of the flaws in the bill. I have summarized them, I think, as best I can.

Let me conclude by saying this. I have spent the last two months touring 16 cities in Canada—all the major cities in Canada.

Mr. Harvard: Are you running for anything?

Mr. Waddell: No, I am not running for anything. I am just telling the members what I saw.

Let me tell you a little story. On three occasions in Saskatoon, Charlottetown and Edmonton I kept running into American tourists in the hotels where I was staying. They were seniors from the States for a trip. I would say: "How are you doing? Where are you from?" "I am from Kansas—I am from here—". "How do you like it?" They loved Canada. What a country! It is relatively secure. The environment is good. People are friendly, efficient and relatively prosperous. In each part of the country, while they are all distinctive you could see a common Canadianism. I wonder what created that common Canadianism in a country that is so huge. I think broadcasting played a big part. There are other parts, such as teachers in schools, education and so on, but broadcasting did a lot. Canadians could see each other and have that kind of common Canadianism that is there across the country.

I am optimistic about this country. I know we are going through a difficult period. I stood up in this House of Commons and voted against Meech Lake because I wanted to see a better deal. I am not anti-Quebec, as I heard some people in the Ontario legislature say the other day.

[Translation]

And I can accept Quebec as a distinct society.

[English]

We also have to ensure a kind of equal Canadianism right across this country. We can do it. We have a great opportunity in broadcasting.

Remember what I said at the beginning. Think about Canadians watching 24 hours of television a week. Think about from where they are getting their information. Think about those young francophone teenagers who spend 50 per cent of their time watching foreign programs, while the English kids spend 80 per cent of their time doing the same.

We want an open system. But what we need to ensure by legislation is that there is sufficient and quality Canadian programming. As I said, the public sector is underfunded and Canadians have to realize that. They are not going to be able to keep up that standard.

Second, the private sector is not really doing its job, and this bill is not going to help. We had a great opportunity in this bill. We had solutions set out by the Commons committee, the former chairperson is in this House. We had a way set out.

Canadians must make a commitment in the 1990s to a national broadcasting system, to a renewal of Canadian culture, to a bringing together of Canadians, no matter from what part of the country. In this way the people will feel equal and part of Canada. We have to do it through our young people.

That is our vision of where our Broadcasting Act should go. That is why we will propose further amendments to this bill, to try, in spite of that government over there, to make it a more national broadcasting system that really works for Canadians.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by paying tribute to those who were the authors of this bill, including the member who has just spoken, and his predecessor Lynn McDonald, the former member for Broadview—Greenwood. They, along with John Gormley, Bob Pennock, Jim Caldwell, the distinguished member for Mount Royal and the current member for Jonquière were those who wrote the reports on the broadcasting policy and the broadcasting law. These were reports of the standing committee. Prior to that, of course, the Minister of Communications had commissioned Gerald Caplan and Florion Sauvageau to do their task force report. That really is the up-to-date foundation on which this bill is fixed.

The hon. member for Mount Royal said that she was looking for a bill that was not hurried. I believe she was referring to some of the activities of last year, and some of the circumstances of last year.

The industry and Canadians have waited. Since the Hon. Francis Fox introduced his first amendments to the Broadcasting Act in the early 1980s, Canadians have waited.

There is no wish on the part of the government to unduly rush this bill. There is a genuine commitment on the part of the minister and the government to make sure that this time we do it right.

There was a wag who suggested at a conference not long ago on the future of broadcasting in Canada that what we ought to do is to pass again the bill of 1968 and add a rider at the end, "This time we mean it". This time we sincerely mean it. We have been able, I think, to do many things which improve the bill of 1968 and the current law.

I will not respond in argumentative detail to the points that have been made by my colleagues opposite. There is another time and another place for that. But I would just touch on a couple of points.

I believe that the member for Mount Royal sincerely believes that circumstances have changed and that the unity clause thus ought to be rethought. I look forward to engaging her in debate on that subject because I differ with her, but I respect her point of view.

I took note of the other criticisms she made about the changes in the bill and the shortcomings, as she saw them, of the bill. I give her my commitment that as we work together on this bill in committee, when it finally does go to committee, that her view will be heard and properly debated.

My friend, the NDP critic, has given us some predictable items I think. We have heard some of them before. But I want to point out to him that there are many things happening in Canadian broadcasting that are positive and, indeed, show the way toward the building of a genuinely strong industry, both in the public and in the private sector.

• (1440)

I had the opportunity on Monday of this week to visit Montreal and see the facilities of Vidéotron and the new video interactive television that has been in place since September 25. I was very impressed not only with how it works but I was challenged by how, as a society, we are going to adapt to this new technology. Also, I was intrigued that the Vidéotron people had decided against creating any interactive games that involve the theme of war. That was, I think, not only an intrinsically good and sound decision, but it also anticipates what might be produced in that mode elsewhere outside Canada. It provided a strong alternative to that kind of game.

I congratulate those members of the Canadian broadcasting community and many others. There are many examples that can be cited, both public and private, of initiatives that have been taken that are distinctly Canadian and which are very, very constructive.

I am glad that the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam acknowledged the $81 million which was announced this week going to CBC to meet the unanticipated contract costs of recent labour settlements. I think that reflects the fact that this government is aware of the need for CBC to survive and flourish.

Also, I would assure hon. members that the government took careful heed of the interchange that took place yesterday between members of the standing committee and the chairman designate and the new president of the CBC as well as the new CRTC chairman. I thought that it was not only significant in the history of Parliament but also totally appropriate that a committee that is dedicated to communications would be dealing with the country's top communicators. It was a very, very healthy interchange. I was impressed by the performance of all—indeed, by the costumes of most.

This debate is important to all Canadians because broadcasting is more than just a major industry. Radio, television, cable and satellite broadcasts help us to communicate as a people. They contribute to the development of our culture. They help us to interpret our common heritage. They shape our perspectives and ideas. They provide instant access to local, national and international developments.

Radio and television reach into the homes of virtually all Canadians. Like any other media, they offer Canadian creators a national stage to reach a national audience.

Of all the cultural industries, broadcasting has become the principal vehicle by which Canadian creators can reach Canadian audiences. While we are on the subject of creators, I think all of us on all sides of the House were impressed by the well organized lobby which visited us on Tuesday of this week, animated by ACTRA, the Canadian Conference of the Arts and l'Union des artistes and by the response of the minister and the Prime Minister in making a commitment to produce, in the words of my hon. friend from British Columbia and of the Prime Minister.

For all these reasons, the broadcasting system has a vital role to play in the maintenance and enhancement of our cultural sovereignty and in the strengthening of our cultural identity.

The bill before us is designed to ensure that the broadcasting system will continue to play this vital role and that all Canadian broadcasters will contribute in an appropriate way to these fundamental cultural policies. In this respect, the bill addresses directly the major issues and concerns which were brought to the government's attention through one of the most thorough and public policy reviews undertaken by a Canadian government. These issues and concerns stem from two inseparable forces which, together, are changing the face of broadcasting around the world. One of these forces is technology. The other is the trend toward international programming, or global audiences.

Satellites, cable, fibre optics and high definition television are changing the nature of broadcasting and expanding the potential for diversity and choice in programming services. At the same time, the globalization of broadcasting offers rich opportunities for co-operation and cultural exchange.

[Translation]

Still, Mr. Speaker, there is a paradox. Although these two forces offer the prospect of greater diversity, ever rising production costs and market pressures create a need for what might be called international entertainment programs which are totally alien to the cultural values of the various nationalities and which increasingly pervade the program schedule of broadcasters throughout the world because foreigners can buy them at cut-rate prices even if production costs are high.

Given the rapid progress of broadcasting techniques in this country, Canadians were among the first in the world to experience the impact of these forces and witness this paradox.

Before drafting the new broadcasting legislation, we decided that our goal would be to tackle the paradox of modern broadcasting in the Canadian context. To put it another way, we would draft a legislative policy and regulatory structure in such a way as to take into account and favour technological progress, while at the same time stressing the diversity and creation of Canadian programs.

For Canada's broadcasting system, that is the challenge of the coming century.

[English]

Our broadcasting system provides a truly remarkable range of radio and television signals. There are literally hundreds of radio and television signals, and cable television carries dozens of channels. The mix includes Canadian stations, both public and private, in English and in French, as well as foreign services. Yet despite this range of services our policy review revealed that Canadians want more real choice and diversity. Above all, Canadians want more and better Canadian programs, especially in prime time television and especially in drama.

The attachment to Canadian programming on the part of our French-speaking audience is established. But the issue is the inability of our relatively small audience base to support budgets commensurate with the production values of imported programs.

English-speaking Canadians are now beginning to turn more to our own dramatic programming when it is available and when the quality compares with imports.

Our challenge is to equip our system with the means to generate Canadian programming which addresses the needs of Canadians to see themselves on our screens, to see our stories and our creators amid the sea of imported products. Meeting this challenge is of critical importance for Canadian creators, for Canadian culture and for Canadian audiences.

To respond effectively to this challenge—the government must call upon all elements of the broadcasting system to contribute to Canadian broadcasting policy. The government believes that Canadians within the private sector must play an increasingly important role in the creation and presentation of competitive Canadian programs.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation will continue to play its central role as the national broadcaster and as a vital instrument of national development. The recent appointments, as I mentioned earlier, of two outstanding Canadians to head the CBC, confirm the government's commitment to public broadcasting in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we are tabling this bill with the clear impression that we have accomplished an important task. Bill C-36, which the House adopted last September, was the result of a policy review which was unprecedented in terms of its scope and of the extensive public input it generated.

• (1450)

All points of view presented have been considered and all concerns and recommendations have been examined. The public hearings were beneficial to the Bill, which was amended in Committee and in the House before being passed by the Senate.

We believe that it is now time for these legislative measures to become law.

[English]

The improvements we have brought to the bill are not fundamental in nature. Its principal objectives remain unchanged.

The bill updates the language of the 1968 Broadcasting Act to recognize and embrace new technologies and to clarify the roles of private and public broadcasters, providing a new legal framework for the regulation of broadcasting. It gives expression to the responsibility of the broadcasting system to reflect the diversity of Canadian society. It recognizes the place and importance of women, cultural minorities, aboriginal peoples and the physically disabled in our society.

One of its important innovations is to recognize the different characteristics of French and English broadcasting in content, in impact and in environment.

The bill strengthens the ability of the Canadian Radio Television and Telecommunications Commission, the CRTC, to regulate and supervise the broadcasting system more effectively and to foster the creation of more and better Canadian programs. It introduces measures which will make both the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the CRTC more efficient, more responsive to Canadians and more accountable to Parliament while preserving their independence from the government.

[Translation]

The first objective of our strategy, namely to update the legislative framework in which our broadcasting system operates, is critically important. The present Broadcasting Act is 20 years old and out of date. Its description of broadcasting is based on only one of the technologies presently used to distribute broadcast signals, while its statement of policy no longer reflects the constantly evolving roles and responsibilities of public and private broadcasters.

To meet the challenge of the next century, we have broadened the wording of the Act so that it applies to all broadcasting technologies and holds all broadcasters responsible for implementing Canadian broadcasting policy. We have reached this objective in several ways.

First, the policy statement in Clause 3 of the Bill clearly specifies that radio frequencies are in the public domain and that broadcasting provides an essential public service for maintaining and promoting national identity and cultural sovereignty, regardless of the broadcasting method used.

This clause further says that the Canadian broadcasting system should safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, political, social and economic structure of Canada.

[English]

Second, in defining terms such as broadcasting the bill focuses on the activities of creating, presenting and distributing broadcast programs without tying these activities to a specific distribution technology. In this sense, the bill has been called technology neutral.

This marks a fundamental shift in the government's approach to broadcasting legislation. It is an approach that will allow the legislation to maintain its legal authority over all aspects of broadcasting in the face of future technological development and is therefore critical to our over-all strategy.

Third, the bill clarifies the roles of all the players in the broadcasting system, both private and public, and their responsibilities toward Canadian broadcasting policy.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is vital in this enterprise. The bill makes it clear that the CBC will remain the principal vehicle for cultural expression in Canada. It will continue to serve Canadians by providing a distinctly Canadian viewpoint and a broad range of programming including news, variety, drama and sports. The mandate of the CBC, as contained in this bill, expects that the corporation will continue to lead in providing authentically Canadian choices, particularly in popular drama, in both official languages.

But the bill also recognizes that the responsibility for Canadian programs is not that of the CBC alone. For the first time the bill attributes to private broadcasters specific responsibilities for the creation and presentation of Canadian programs. This is an important change. It recognizes the contribution that the private sector has made and should continue to make towards national broadcasting policy.

The bill also recognizes the unique contribution which cable and other distribution services are making to Canadian broadcasting. In defining a role for these services the bill acknowledges that they can and should, where appropriate, contribute to Canadian programming. For this reason, the bill provides the CRTC with the power to mediate disputes between broadcasters and cable distributors so that conflicts can be resolved in the public interest.

[Translation]

Finally, Mr. Speaker, in order to increase the diversity of programs available to Canadians, the Bill also provides for the creation of complementary broadcasting services to meet the needs which are not now being met by broadcasters of mass-audience entertainment programs.

[English]

The final point that I would wish to make is that this bill before us today is about to lead us to an assertion of Canadian consciousness and to Canadian identity. I submit the nub of the debate, once we get it into committee will be as to whether or not Canadian consciousness and Canadian identity must be the forerunner of what we all believe to be a desirable objective of our country, particularly at this time the objective of national unity. For, indeed, without a consciousness, without the reinforcement of that Canadian essence, unity will not come about.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair recognizes the chief government whip on a point of order.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations with representatives of the parties and I think you would find that there is unanimous consent to revert to Routine Proceedings for the purpose of presenting the twentieth and twenty-first reports of the striking committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

TWENTIETH AND TWENTY-FIRST REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the twentieth and twenty-first reports of the Striking Committee. If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in the twenty-first report later. I would ask that we dispense with the reading of that report by the clerk at the table as that report concerns only membership changes to committees.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): I am pleased to table in both official languages a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government. CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-271, an act to amend the Criminal Code.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, very briefly, the purpose of the amendments to the Criminal Code subtitled facsimile advertising is to prohibit the sending of unrequested advertisements by facsimile transmission to individuals or companies.

The bill specifically indicates that it is a facsimile communication advertising for sale any goods or services and anyone found guilty of that is punishable on summary conviction and is liable to a fine not exceeding $200.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

RECYCLING ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-272, an act respecting the recycling of refillable containers.

• (1110)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to require that manufacturers and distributors of soft drinks and beer charge a deposit on the containers in which those products are marketed, which deposit will be refunded upon return of the containers.

The purpose of the bill is to ensure a cleaner environment in Canada by trying to make it more likely that consumers of these products will return the used receptacles to the place of purchase and get the money back rather than throwing them on roadsides and into garbage disposal dumps across our country.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to table some 20 petitions this morning, most of them from my constituents in Ottawa—Vanier, but also from others, who came here during the summer. These people would like to express their opinion on the goods and services tax, this 9 per cent tax that the Government wants to impose or would like to impose in January 1991. These people not only find this tax unfair and regressive but they also find that it imposes an unjustifiable additional burden on small business and in this petition, Mr. Speaker, they say that in their opinion, the House should refuse to implement such a bad tax.

[English]

ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to present to the House today a petition concerning the Rouge Valley in metro Toronto. This is 5,000 acres of beautiful wilderness that the Speaker toured on Saturday to see first hand the beauty of this Rouge River Valley.

The petitioners state that protecting the Rouge, the endangered wildlife and the wilderness area is in the national interest. The interim report of the Royal Commission on the Future of the Toronto Waterfront, which is headed by the Hon. David Crombie, has also recommended that the Rouge valley be protected as a natural heritage park. The mayor of the city of Scarborough and the federal Minister of the Environment are supporting this endeavour, as well as the Save the Rouge Valley Organization and thousands of volunteers.

The petitioners call upon the government to work with the province of Ontario to establish the Rouge River valley as a Canadian heritage land or a provincial park.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and pleasure, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present 14 petitions from corner store owners in my riding who strongly object to the imposition of the goods and services tax because it will create a costly burden for small businesses.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions that I would like to table this morning. The first petition is signed by 838 residents of northwestern Ontario. They signed this petition while they were attending the Hymers Fall Fair on the Labour Day weekend.

The petitioners discuss the proposed goods and services tax and because of its lack of regard for taxpayers' ability to pay. They go on to point out that they want Parliament to reject the current proposal and to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition signed by 201 residents of northwestern Ontario who are primarily native students. They are recording their concerns about the government's approach to native post-secondary education.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to exercise its rightful obligation and duty by withdrawing the draft policy and begin a process of consultation with First Nations and First Nations students who will be most affected by the said policy.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition from 30 residents of Thunder Bay, primarily regarding the proposed changes to the unemployment insurance system. The petitioners call upon Parliament to reject these cuts in the unemployment insurance system, to propose more meaningful reforms and to concentrate on a labour force development strategy combined with a full employment policy, and an effective regional development policy.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition signed by 266 residents of Thunder Bay who are petitioning Parliament with regard to the future of rail passenger services in this country. They call upon Parliament to maintain VIA Rail, Canada's present national network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

FREEDOM OF CHOICE

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Finally, Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by 209 residents of Thunder Bay, men and women, who point out that no new restrictive abortion law is needed, that a new abortion law will not stop ex-boyfriends from seeking injunctions under civil law.

They point out that the provinces continue to receive transfer payments to provide necessary health services but do not provide universal access to abortion, thereby contravening the Canada Health Act. They call upon Parliament to reject any proposed restrictive abortion law and to enforce the Canada Health Act by withholding transfer payments to provinces that do not provide universal access to abortion services.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege today to present 10 petitions representing signatures from various communities within my riding including Port Hope, Campbellford and Cobourg. These people wish this government to repeal its proposed goods and services tax.

The people in my riding represent farmers and small businessmen for the most part, people whose businesses operate on a very low margin of profit. They feel that the proposed goods and services tax will bankrupt them and they ask the government to repeal the proposed goods and services tax.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise today with two petitions brought forward from people in my riding, Mission—Coquitlam, as well as people from Vancouver, Burnaby, Cranbrook, Delta, North Vancouver and a petition from Thunder Bay, Ontario. The petitioners are calling on the government to abandon its ill-conceived goods and services tax. They are outraged at a tax that would tax haircuts, diapers, coffins and home heating fuels. I table this petition in compliance with Standing Order 36.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by over 100 people, objecting to the undue burden that will be placed on Canadians by the proposed goods and services tax and calling upon Parliament to reject this tax.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition signed by 485 of my constituents. This petition has been duly signed and authorized by the Clerk. It is from an area in Bonavista—Trinity—Conception which we can call the Isthmus area. This is the area that joins the Avalon Peninsula to the mainland of Newfoundland. It is kind of caught in the sense of identification. It does not really identify with the urban areas of St. John's, and it is a bit different from the rest of the mainland of Newfoundland. These residents sometimes feel that they are neglected.

Unemployment is probably the highest in this area of Newfoundland than in any other place. They are concerned about Bill C-21 which we will be discussing today. They are concerned that unemployment insurance is vital to their well-being. They are concerned that the government is taking away all their contributions, going to make qualifying time more difficult and going to cut down part of the period in which they will receive benefits.

They call on the government to reject these cuts in unemployment insurance and to propose a more meaningful reform, concentrate on the labour force development strategy that will keep them in mind and combine a better employment policy with an effective, regional development policy.

• (1120)

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise at the request of the member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. The petition is signed by some 33 residents of the province of Saskatchewan, particularly of the communities of Trossachs, Weyburn, Assiniboia, Zenon Park and Burstall.

The petitioners point out that the Prime Minister and the Conservative Party promised during the election campaign to maintain and protect the Canadian Wheat Board, and they call upon Parliament to instruct the government not to remove oats from the marketing jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board and to place oats and barley under the Canadian Wheat Board Act so that in the future, farmers and their organizations must be consulted before changes are made in the marketing of these products.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, like Canadians across Canada, my constituents in Kingston and the Islands are appalled by the proposal of the government to introduce a goods and services tax and hundreds of them have signed a petition that I am tabling today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, expressing their opposition to this tax and calling on Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of, I suspect, the constituents of the Conservative whip. They are definitely residents of Calgary, Alberta who express their opposition to the proposed goods and services tax and they call upon the government to come up with a fair taxation system rather than the proposal that is before the House now.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, signed by a number of residents of Surrey North. In fact, there are seven pages of signatures. They are saying that they object to the government's reduction in support for VIA Rail and call upon the government to continue this vital service.

UNAUTHORIZED USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE

Question No. 141—Mr. Kaplan:

Are there strong sanctions in place to prevent any unauthorized use of Social Insurance Numbers and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Barbara Jean McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The U.I. Act provides for sanctions against a person who knowingly makes an application to be assigned a second Social Insurance Number (SIN) when he/she already has one, or to a person who, with intent to defraud or deceive any person, uses another person's SIN, or who, without the authority of the Commission, manufactures or duplicates a SIN card other than a photocopy for record purposes. A person who contravenes any of the above provisions is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine up to $1,000.00 or to imprisonment for up to one year or to both. (Ref. Sec. 110 of the U.I. Act.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations among the three parties. Members will know that at 4.45 p.m. today, the bells will ring for a vote at five o'clock. The standing orders also require some deferred votes to take place at six o'clock, with a bell to ring at six o'clock.

From the nature of those discussions, I think you will find unanimous consent in the House to hold, first of all, the scheduled vote at five o'clock but immediately thereafter the votes on Bill C–16, and in case an hour is required for private members' hour, we would all be agreed to start the private members' hour after the votes and for it to go on for the normal one hour if it is so required.

If you were to seek unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, I think you would have it for that reality.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it so agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, November 2, consideration of the motion of the Mrs. MacDougall that Bill C–21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, be read a third time and passed, and the amendment of Mr. Volpe (p. 5480).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce.

The last speaker was from the Liberal Party. Therefore, I must recognize a speaker from the NDP and the hon. member for Surrey North has the floor.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I think there is an understanding in the House that the New Democratic Party will get two 10–minute speeches and then we will allow the Liberal spokesman a 20–minute speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that also agreed?

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but say we agree. I would prefer that the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce be heard first because he has a doctor's appointment and he just told me that he would prefer to get away before twelve o'clock to attend that appointment. It will not affect the rotation.

Mr. Murphy: We are certainly willing to fit in the doctor's appointment, as long as it is understood that we do not lose our place in the rotation and that we would get a third speaker before the vote comes this evening.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will see what we can do about it. How can the Chair project at this time whether the last speaker will be from the NDP or from the Liberal party?

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, we are working on the basis of unanimous consent right now. I think there is an understanding among the three parties that we will get a third speaker before the vote at 4.45 p.m.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, we will make sure that the NDP get an additional speaker. I thank them for their co–operation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I thank all members for their co–operation.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I want to start by thanking the members of the New Democratic Party for their co–operation. I apologize for having to make the request that I did.

Once again, we are debating Bill C–21, a bill which savagely cuts back on our unemployment insurance system. This bill, and this is according to the government's own estimates, will reduce or cut back unemployment insurance benefits by approximately $1.5 billion, and those moneys will be redirected to employment development and training.

Government members and the minister justified this bill on those grounds. They say that employment development and training are absolutely essential and consequently we must put more money into that particular area. We in the Liberal party totally agree that more money should be spent on employment development and training. However, we are totally opposed to paying for that employment development and training with unemployment insurance moneys.

The unemployment insurance fund and the unemployment insurance system were set up in 1940 following the Great Depression to provide moneys to people who were unemployed against their will so that they could take care of themselves when they were unemployed. The moneys in the unemployment insurance fund are meant to provide unemployed Canadians with enough money to pay for their rent, to buy their groceries, to send their children to school; to pay for the essential necessities of life. That is the purpose of the fund and that is the purpose of the system. It is totally wrong to take money from that fund, moneys that are to be used for that purpose, and spend those moneys on employment development and training, no matter how important those things are.

It is interesting to note that this same government reduced the the budgets for employment development and training by 32 per cent since 1984. When they came to office in 1984, the budget for employment development and training was $2.2 billion. Last year, that was reduced to $1.5 billion, a reduction of $700 million over a four and a half year period.

Suddenly, the government is under attack for not putting enough money into training and employment development. What does the government do? It looks around for a place to find money to pay for training. They want to get back into the training business. They look at the unemployment insurance fund and they decide to take the money from there. It is difficult to take the government seriously when after four years, it has been reducing moneys for employment and for training and then it attacks the unemployment insurance fund to get those moneys.

We are saying yes, more money for training, more money for employment development, but pay for it the way Canadians always paid for it, out of general tax revenues.

We do not ask parents with children to be the sole supporters of education in this country. When we pay for education through taxation, everybody pays. It comes out of general tax revenue. We do not simply say to parents with children going to school: "You must pay for education and others won't". That is because education benefits the whole of society, and training benefits the whole of society. There can be no rationale for saying that just workers and employers should pay for training. Everybody should pay for training, as has always been done, out of general tax revenues.

With respect to reducing the benefits to the unemployed in order to pay for training, let us look at what those benefits are right now. Right now the law says that the unemployment insurance benefits should be 60 per cent of your recent salary—I won't go into the details—up to a maximum of $363 a week in 1989. The maximum anybody could receive, no matter what their salary, was $363 a week, but at 60 per cent it could be less.

The average unemployment insurance benefit in 1988 was $202 a week. It was $202 a week and we are going to cut it back. What can you buy for $202 a week? That is less than $1,000 a month. Most people have to pay $600 or $700 a month in rent. What if you are supporting a family and you are getting this average benefit? That is the average benefit, it is not the lowest benefit.

What about a man or a woman with a family to support? They have to pay their rent. They have to buy their groceries. If they have to go to work in a car, they have to pay for their gasoline and the maintenance of their car. They have to pay for their clothing and they have to send their children to school. It is ridiculous to want to cut these benefits. We should be trying to improve them, make them better so that people will be able to pay their bills with their unemployment insurance benefits.

How is the government cutting this? Where is it finding this $1.5 billion that it is going to take out of the system, out of regular benefits, and put into training? It is going to find that money by first of all making it more difficult to qualify. It is extending the qualification period that you must work in order to be eligible for unemployment insurance, so fewer people will qualify. It is also going to shorten the benefit period. Even if you qualify you will not get benefits as long as you do now, even though you are still unemployed. It is possible that your benefits will run out before you find a job and you will be without benefits.

The government is also increasing the penalties for people who quit their work. Then we get into the problem of whether you quit for just cause or not just cause, but the government is going to get a large sum of money by not providing benefits to people who quit, and the penalty period will be increased up to 12 weeks.

The government is saying that it wants to put more money into training and into employment development. It is going to take it away from the unemployment insurance system. so people will have fewer benefits and it will be more difficult to quality. At the same time the government is going to terminate its statutory contribution to the unemployment insurance fund. For years and years the unemployment insurance fund, which by the way last year was approximately $13 billion, has been contributed to by workers who pay so much into the unemployment insurance fund each week that they work, by employers who pay each week into the fund and by the government.

Suddenly the government decides it should spend more money on training. It does not want to take that money out of general revenues and is going to take it out of the unemployment insurance fund, but it also decides that it is not going to put any more money on a regular basis into the fund out of general tax revenue.

It is hard to take the government seriously when it says it wants to do more for training but is going to put the burden on employers and employees and stop its regular contribution from its own resources. By the way, last year that contribution was $2.8 billion. As a result of the cut-backs that are set out in this bill, 155,000 Canadians who would have qualified for unemployment insurance will not qualify at all or will lose all their benefits.

That is according to the Global Economic Study. I know that the government thinks that that is a tainted study. We do not. It was commissioned by the Liberal party and the Canadian Labour Congress. We feel it was carried out on a scientific basis.

If you look at any of the impact studies, even the government's own impact studies, they indicate that people who got unemployment insurance before will not get it and those who do will get less.

I gave the figures for those who will totally lose their claims. There will be 775,000 Canadians who will have their benefits reduced. One hundred and fifty-five thousand will totally lose their benefits and 775,000 will have their benefits reduced.

In addition, by cutting the benefits as a result of this bill the moneys that were available to the poorer regions of Canada and to the less well-off provinces will be reduced as well. For example, Newfoundland will lose $83 million because of the cut-back in benefits to Newfoundlanders who are unemployed. Prince Edward Island will lose $16 million; Nova Scotia, $43 million; New Brunswick, $65 million; Quebec, $507 million; and British Columbia, $175 million. The government, by its own admission, is reducing regular benefits to the unemployed in this country. The money that would have gone to an unemployed Canadian in Corner Brook, in Bathurst, New Brunswick, or in Chicoutimi will not be going into those areas as it is now.

The government says it is going to use those moneys for development and training, but that is on a discretionary basis. There is no assurance that that money will go back into New Brunswick, Newfoundland or Quebec to pay for job development and training. We asked the minister about this in committee and she said: "You can rely on me. We will distribute this money for training in an equitable way."

Right now it is in the statute. If you are unemployed and you live in New Brunswick, the money goes to you in New Brunswick. You can use that money to pay for your groceries and help the community in which you live. Under this bill, taking out the $1.5 billion and leaving it to the discretion of the minister, we do not know where that money will be spent. It could very well be spent in Toronto. I have nothing against Toronto but Toronto has a full employment economy. It could be used for high-tech training, for administrative training, and not in the areas where they really need money for development.

I put forward an amendment at the report stage of this bill to ensure that those moneys that were being taken away from regular benefits would go back to the same regions and provinces, but the amendment was turned down.

We have further objections to the provisions in this bill whereby unemployment insurance moneys will be used for training. In many cases, if you retrain workers in certain parts of Canada, there are no jobs for them to go to in those regions. When we were in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island people said: "I am a fish plant worker. I cannot get work. You are going to retrain me, for what? You are not making any provision for new types of work or new types of employment in my community. So you are going to retrain me as a high-tech electronics tradesperson. What am I going to do in my community?" Many of those people believe that this is a bill to relocate them to Toronto, Calgary, Montreal or Vancouver, away from the communities where they have always lived. If you retrain people, they need a job to go to once they are retrained in that new area.

Others said to us: "I am unemployed. I am trained. I am a skilled plumber. I am a skilled electrician. I do not have work now. I want work. I do not want to be retrained. I spent five years in apprenticeship. I spent many years as a journeyman. I am skilled. I do not want to be retrained. I want work."

Again, people are objecting to using their unemployment insurance moneys to retrain them for jobs that do not exist or to retrain them when they are already trained as skilled workers. We all admit that there is a great need for training in certain areas of this country to improve our skilled workforce but, once again, it should not be done with moneys from the unemployment insurance fund.

This leads me to the real philosophy and purpose of this bill, which is not to put more money into training because, as I pointed out, the government cut the training budget by 32 per cent since 1984. The real philosophy and purpose of this bill is to help the government deal with the deficit. That is one of its priorities. It wants to deal with the deficit. After cutting training since 1984 by 32 per cent, the government then realized it had to return to the training area and said: "Where can we find the money?" The government did not want to take it out of general revenues, so it took it out of the unemployment insurance fund. By the way, the unemployment insurance fund had a current surplus last year of $2.8 billion. While the government has a deficit, the unemployment insurance fund had a current surplus of $2.8 billion. The government says: "There is a good place to get the money, we will take it from there and also cut our statutory contribution to the fund".

• (1140)

The other philosophy underlying this bill is that the government really believes that the unemployed are lazy people and if you partially starve them and make it very tough for them, they will find work. How can you really believe in something like that in this country? Admittedly, there is a small percentage of people who might be like that. Our figures show that there are less than 2 per cent in Canada who have that attitude toward work. How can you really believe that when Canada is basically a country that relies on resource industries and a lot of seasonal work.

For example, I return to Prince Edward Island. Prince Edward Islanders are involved in fishing, farming, potatoes and the tourism industry. When November comes, those industries close. You cannot fish through the ice and you cannot harvest potatoes in the middle of winter. Processing them can only last so long. Unless you can rely on conventions, the tourism industry closes down as well.

Mr. Hockin: It doesn't close down.

Mr. Allmand: Here is somebody from Ontario talking. It does not close down altogether but it closes down in substantial terms. The buses that come across the ferry into Prince Edward Island do not come in the same numbers in the winter. It is no fun on the beach in Prince Edward Island in the winter.

Mr. Hockin: There's great skiing.

Mr. Allmand: Here is somebody from Ontario talking. I do not know if the hon. member is trying to maintain that Canada is not plagued by seasonal work. We are plagued by seasonal work. That is one of the things we have to look at. Many of these people want to work but cannot work. There is no work in the winter, even in the construction industry. Everybody admits the construction industry slows down in the winter. What are you going to do? Leave these people without income in the winter?

That is just one point about Canada. Because we rely on resource industries which sell in a world market, we are dependent on world prices and world market conditions. When the legislative committee on this bill went to Sudbury, it was very well pointed out to us that in 1982, when world nickel prices declined, Inco and Falconbridge in Sudbury laid off approximately 7,000 workers because they could not sell their nickel on the world market. The price was too low for the costs that they had. They laid off 7,000 workers and there were approximately another 3,000 workers in related industries who were laid off. So Sudbury had 10,000 people out of work, not because they did not want to work or their employers did not want to put them to work but because of world market conditions. Those people were out of work for almost a year.

Witness after witness told us that if it had not been for the unemployment insurance system the community would have been in very serious trouble but, because we had a sound unemployment insurance system. these unemployed nickel workers and related workers were getting their benefits, were paying for their rent, their groceries and the basic necessities of life, even though the benefits were only 60 per cent of their income. They were still able to keep that money circulating in that community and many small businesses were able to survive.

It was not like the Great Depression of the thirties. One of the problems of the Great Depression was that we had no unemployment insurance. When certain firms closed and the workers had no money to spend, it affected the balance of the community. It had a cumulative effect in the communities, a snowball effect, and that is what unemployment insurance prevents.

This philosophy that if you really hurt people and cut back their benefits they will find work may be true for a very small percentage. But the great majority of Canadians want to work and they are often prevented from doing so.

If you cut back benefits through this bill and make it more difficult for people to qualify for unemployment insurance, if you cut them off sooner, what are they going to do if they still do not have a job? They are still unemployed but have no unemployment insurance. They will have to go to the welfare system. We are not going to let them starve. They will have to go to the soup kitchens, of which we have many more now than we used to have. Every community has soup kitchens.

We heard from the mayor of Vancouver and the regional municipalities of Halifax, Ottawa and Toronto. The welfare budgets in all these cities will go up if this bill passes because somebody has to take care of the unemployed if there is no unemployment insurance.

I want to again refer very briefly to the committee. In the committee we heard from 202 groups of which 157 opposed this bill. Most of the them felt that the bill should be sent back to the drawing board. There were 53 amendments presented to this House at report stage. A number of them were ruled out of order and many others were defeated. The Liberal party had presented 19 amendments to the bill. I think they were all defeated except maybe one or two.

I want to say about the process that the government imposed closure at second reading after one day and we ended up with only two half-days and one full day of debate at second reading. In the committee stage the date of October 10 was imposed, at which date the committee had to report, but we did our best in the circumstances.

At the report stage and third reading, after one day of debate the government has also imposed closure so that we got only two days at report stage and two days at third reading. Many of the amendments that I referred to, the 19 Liberal amendments and many from the New Democratic Party, were not really discussed.

I am trying to interpret how many seconds or minutes I have left.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Five seconds.

Mr. Allmand: Five seconds. That is the problem. It is very difficult to discuss all the very important points in this bill.

Let me say, in conclusion, that during the election campaign of 1988, the minister from Newfoundland, the Minister for International Trade, said that the government had no intention of touching the unemployment insurance system, that there would be no cut-backs, no amendments. He said he even confirmed this with the Prime Minister. Here is another case of broken promises by the government. It said it would not touch the unemployment insurance and now it is.

This is a savage, cruel bill. It will not solve the problems of the unemployed. It may solve the problem of the government with respect to the deficit, but it is a savage, cruel bill cutting back on benefits to the unemployed. The bill should be sent back to the drawing board in accordance with the amendment put forward by my colleague from Eglinton.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I only have 10 minutes and it is impossible to outline all of the problems in this piece of legislation in 10 minutes. I want to make a few general comments that seem to be pertinent about the bill.

One thing that we heard about on the free trade deal during last fall's election campaign was that the free trade deal would not cause an attack on our social programs. No sooner was the free trade deal implemented than we had nothing but a continual attack on social programs in Canada. The government withdrew its day care legislation. It brought in bills that have done away with the universality of old age pensions and family allowances. It started reducing our standard of health care by cutting back on transfer payments for health care.

It made a very specific promise that not only would no social programs be cut but, as the minister from Newfoundland specifically said, unemployment insurance would not be changed. Of course, we now have a bill that is gutting and eroding our unemployment insurance program. It is not coincidental. This bill is before this House because of free trade. This government is determined to bring in what it calls a level playing field to harmonize with the United States. As we know, the United States does not have a program comparable to our national unemployment insurance program.

What is behind this? I think the government hopes that it can force workers into a position of having to take low paying jobs because those are the jobs that are being created under free trade. Industry after industry is coming to its employees and saying: "Look, unless you renegotiate your contract, roll back your wages and working conditions, we will simply close our plants and move to the United States". If employees at least have the buffer of unemployment insurance, they may decide to take their chances on unemployment insurance until they can find another job. So the government has to attack the unemployment insurance program also.

There is a tremendous reduction in benefits. One point five billion dollars is being cut from benefits. The government says that 30,000 people will totally lose their benefits. All reliable studies show there will be at least 130,000. In British Columbia there are going to be at least 16,000. In the Fraser Valley there will be 5,200 people. This is going to have a devastating impact on those kinds of regions. The buying power of consumers will go down. Where do people get the money to pay their rent, buy their groceries, purchase clothing for school children?

In a region like Surrey North, where we have a high number of seasonal employees, it is particularly devastating when entrance qualifications are increased from 10 to 14 weeks to 10 to 20 weeks. Twenty weeks is a long time for seasonal workers to be able to qualify. In Surrey we have a lot of people who work in the farming industry, particularly in the berry industry, and in market gardening. To get in 20 weeks is almost impossible and they will simply not qualify for unemployment insurance.

This is compounded by the way the government calculates the rate of unemployment. The city of Vancouver, downtown Vancouver, has been lumped in with the total lower mainland region which includes not only rural agriculture areas like Langley or Abbotsford but parts of Surrey which has a mixed economy. While in downtown Vancouver the unemployment rate may be 6 per cent or 7 per cent, in Surrey it is up around 10 per cent or 12 per cent. The government has averaged it out and is saying the unemployment rate is 8.1 per cent. This means that people would have to work 17 weeks. There has to be a method of more accurately calculating the unemployment insurance rate.

There are other areas in which the government has reduced the benefits, some of which are just nit-picky and vindictive. Benefits for adoptive parents have been reduced from 15 weeks to 10 weeks. What money is that going to save? The government says it is doing it for the deficit. Not enough money is being saved to make it worth attacking adoptive parents. There seems to be nothing but vindictiveness in this piece of legislation.

There are many other spin-offs which are devastated by this. One is the impact on local governments. Local governments are major employers and $3 billion has been shifted from federal government expenditures to that of employers and employees. This means that an employer is going to have to pay $181 more for his unemployment insurance premiums next year. In Surrey, between the school board and the municipality, there are 4,500 workers. That means that Surrey has to raise $814,000 more. The only place they can do so is to raise property taxes. They do not have large industries so it is going to be mainly from residential property taxes. Is this government trying to tax people out of their homes? The city of Vancouver is going to have to raise $2.3 million. The city of Toronto, not counting suburbs, will have to raise $3.4 million.

Small business people are going to be hit hard because they are going to have to absorb the increased cost of unemployment insurance. I would like to remind government members that when they talk about job creation, between 1984 and 1988 small businesses, those with under 100 employees, created 890,000 jobs in this country. Large businesses, those with over 100 employees, cost us 50,000 jobs. There was a reduction of 50,000 employees in large businesses. The government is attacking the very people who are creating employment in this country. The employees who are unable to obtain unemployment insurance are going to have to go onto welfare, which is a transfer to the provinces of federal responsibility. The provinces pay 50 per cent of the cost of income assistance and welfare programs. Many of the provinces are simply going to have less money to pass on in per capita grants to their municipalities.

I want to briefly touch on one other area and that is the whole issue of training. Training, retraining and job development is the responsibility of the federal government. It should not be placed on the backs of workers and employers. This government has, by sleight of hand, withdrawn from its responsibility and is simply saying: "Look, the unemployed are going to be deprived of benefits in order to finance retraining." That is no way in which to get a skilled workforce.

Fifteen per cent of the unemployment fund is going to go into job creation, moving costs, work sharing and even business start-up. This, of course, means that there are less funds available for what the unemployment insurance fund was designed for. We have to remember that Canada has an unemployment insurance program, an insurance program to protect workers against a period of unemployment. It is not a slush fund out of which the federal government may draw money for its schemes of job creation or its schemes of retraining.

The workers in Canada need not only retraining but a whole series of training programs. Instead, the federal government has cut back from $2.2 billion in 1984 to $1.5 billion in training. Now it is trying to find some method of making up for it by putting this responsibility on the employers and employees.

I see the Speaker is indicating that I am running out of time. In summary I want to say that this piece of legislation, in my opinion, flows directly out of the free trade deal. I am frightened that, unfortunately, this is not the last piece of legislation that we are going to see that erodes our social programs in order to harmonize us with the United States.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member from Surrey North who always speaks so sincerely and passionately about issues in his riding and a number of the items that we have to debate here in Parliament, in particular this legislation which impacts on a lot of people, many of whom do not have a voice. The member has had some experience in government at the local level. I would be interested in hearing his comments on how we can make a difference on issues such as unemployment and unemployment insurance. What can members do in co-operation with local government and business to ensure that we can give those people who need a voice the voice that that they so desperately need.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, one of the problems, of course, in this type of legislation is trying to give a voice to the people who are going to be most adversely affected by it. There are a number of things that I have tried to do to see if I could reach out to the people in my riding and in some of the adjacent ridings because some of the adjacent ridings are represented by Conservative members who do everything they can to prevent the public from reaching out to them and telling them what the impact is of their legislation.

There are a number of organizations that I have talked with. I have talked to people on the local school boards and municipal councils who are desperately frightened by this legislation, particularly in Surrey. This fall in Surrey, because of the fast growth, we have 9,000 children in portable schools. They are having difficulty developing recreation centres and health centres because they do not have a municipal tax base. All of a sudden along comes the federal government which says that instead of developing a recreational centre for seniors, they are going to have to come up with $814,000 in order to pay for the federal government's responsibility for unemployment insurance and job retraining. Sixty per cent of all housing starts in the lower mainland are in my municipality. They are behind in providing services for people.

How do we reach out to them? We have a group of unemployed people who are experiencing increased difficulty in finding employment. This bill does not state that if you do not qualify for UI, you do not qualify for the training. The very people who need the training the most, the ones who cannot get in 20 weeks of work or who have already exhausted their UI, do not qualify. So what good is the training?

We have to start a whole different concept of training, including being able to train people who are already employed. This is to provide them with greater skills because at the high end of the skill market we are always short of workers. What we have to be able to do is provide the backyard welder with the opportunity to upgrade and become a construction welder. Then we can take an unemployed person and train him to be a backyard welder. That is the way the Scandinavian countries do it. The democratic socialist countries such as Sweden, Denmark and Norway allow anybody to obtain training regardless of whether the person is employed. That is why those countries have such a highly skilled workforce. When I was in Sweden, it was evident that the Swedish people were horrified because their unemployment rate had gone up to 1.9 per cent.

Other people who I have tried to work with in my community are members of some of the farm labour organizations. Some of our farm industry is dependent on having a pool of farm labour available at various crop times. In order to stabilize that we have had to provide unemployment insurance during winter months. Seasonal work is a fact of life in Canada. I have tried to meet with farm labour organizations to ask, "Are there things that I can say to impress upon this government that if you do not qualify for UI you are either going to have to rely on unemployment insurance or you are going to have to simply move to different areas?"

One of the things that I am beginning to wonder about is whether this government is trying to drive everybody into southern Ontario. Is the government trying to collapse the Atlantic provinces, forcing people out of the Atlantic provinces, out of the prairie provinces and out of central British Columbia into southern Ontario?

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise to add my voice yet again to the debate on the government's changes to the unemployment insurance system in this country. I do so for two reasons. The first is because I share with my caucus colleagues, and other members on this side of the House, a repugnance for what this government is attempting to do in this bill. The second and most important reason is that thousands of Canadians have been left without a voice with which to tell this government that what it proposes is mean-spirited, ill-intentioned and very unjust.

We travelled this country from coast to coast and heard a great many groups and individuals voice their opposition to this bill. In fact, a vast majority of the briefs received spoke in opposition to this bill, but the government chose not to listen. Even more disgraceful, however, is the fact that a great many groups, representing those who will be hardest hit by this bill, did not receive a hearing. While we sat in luxury hotels, they were lining up at food banks. The reality of this bill is that those food bank lines will be longer and the poverty of many will deepen.

What this bill seeks to do is to readjust the labour market. It seeks to modify the behaviour—I am using government terms—of the unemployed. At its most Draconian, it seeks to destroy communities, families and break the spirit of the already disadvantaged.

This bill redirects moneys away from income support to training programs.

While no one will argue that the training in and of itself is not a good thing, we must look beyond the rhetoric to the substance of the training programs in this country. Training is not a panacea. It is not the sole solution to unemployment.

If we look at what has happened to our economy over the past 10 years since the UI system was last overhauled, we see an increased polarization in the labour market. At one end are the highly paid, high-skilled jobs, and at the other end are the low-paid, low-skilled jobs.

High unemployment throughout the 1980s in both relative and absolute terms has resulted in the proliferation of temporary and part-time jobs. Employment in the relatively low-paying service sector has grown dramatically. This has not happened independent of government action. It has happened because of the failure of government to implement a full employment policy and to redirect the restructuring of the Canadian economy.

The Hon. Member opposite who finds what I am saying so repugnant has an opportunity to get up and say so when I am finished speaking.

The problem we face is not so much one of lack of skills for the jobs available, but the lack of high-skill, high-wage jobs. We have one of the most skilled workforces in the world. What we need to do is to put it to work.

We can see that while training is a necessary component to any full employment policy, it is not enough.

This Bill redirects some $800 million from the benefit fund to training programs. But we need to look at who is being trained, who is doing the training, and for what are they being trained. The focus is not on the low-wage earner or the new entrant to the workforce. It is not on improving basic literacy skills. It is not even on improving the general level of skills in the workforce. The programs have simply prepared people for temporary unemployment, have trained them not for future needs but to fill short-term, low paying jobs.

Over the past few years moneys for training have been cut back. Our colleges and vocational institutes have been demoralized as more and more government funding is directed to private firms which offer not skill development or basic education but rather narrow the skills of workers to fit certain predetermined job criteria. Visible minorities, women, older workers and the handicapped have not seen their over-all position in the workplace improved as the stereotypical assumptions which continue to pervade the workplace deny them access to on-the-job training or see them funnelled into the so-called traditional job tracks.

Bill C-21 does nothing to address these inequities, and, in fact, will only make them worse as the present system is continued with more funds directed to private training facilities. This money will be taken directly from the income support component of the UI system. Workers will be punished, will remain underskilled and remain under the constant threat of imminent poverty.

This Bill does not recognize that those who could benefit most from a comprehensive skill development policy will be excluded from training programs. The increase in the numbers of weeks required to qualify for training programs will only perpetuate an underclass of unskilled and marginal workers.

The discrimination which this bill continues between major and minor attachment claimants ensures that for many there is no hope of breaking out of the vicious cycle of poverty that sees them moving from brief periods of low-paid employment to possibly some UI benefits to social assistance. This is the reality of Bill C-21. I would like to turn for a moment to the experience faced by workers in my own riding. Their experience is indicative of the problem which this government has failed to address in Bill C-21, the lack of a full employment strategy coupled with a regional industrial policy that has taken a toll on those workers in my riding. Not too many months ago, Fiberglas Canada closed its insulation plant in Mission, laying off some 200 workers. The impact of this closure on a relatively small community like Mission, British Columbia, has been hit very hard. What is most disheartening is the fact that now we are beginning to hear of shortages in the availability of insulation from building contractors and building supply firms in my riding. Now they are looking to the U.S. to fill this void in the market.

My point is simply this. Would it not be more cost effective and efficient if the government directed its efforts to providing a comprehensive full employment strategy and a regional economic development plan rather than let the market forces dictate? I know I am not going to get an immediate answer, but the question has been begged on several occasions.

Would not the government's and workers' money be more wisely spent on assuring continued employment rather than on benefits and retraining of an already skilled workforce. Why punish those who through no fault of their own are now unemployed? Why threaten the stability of a viable community when real planning and a concern for economic growth would forgo such hardships?

A second industry in my riding is also suffering from government neglect and short-sightedness. The shake and shingle manufacturers in the Fraser Valley are facing massive loss of market for their product if a decision of the Los Angeles city council to ban the use of cedar shingles is not reversed through the courts. Thirty-five hundred jobs are at stake because this government has come too late to support this $350 million industry.

Should these workers lose their jobs, they will need to call on the support of the UI system to feed their families and to pay their rent or their mortgages. The workforce is a skilled one. The workers produce a valuable, safe product, yet their jobs are threatened. This government would rather spend money to punish the unemployed and to train workers for jobs that have no future.

The most repugnant aspect of this bill is what it will do to the working poor of this country. I have already noted that their voices were not heard during the hearings. They do not have many advocates in this chamber to voice the anger and frustration they feel, but their voices must be heard. It is the working poor who will lose most by this legislation. They will see their benefits cut by $1,500, money needed to feed their children, to keep them from the welfare rolls, to keep what remains of their dignity.

This government knows only too well the effects of poverty. It knows that undernourished children learn at a slower rate than those who are well fed. It knows that the poverty trap exists, that parents cannot find affordable day care so as to take on full time work. It knows that one in four Canadians are functionally illiterate. Most of them are poor. It knows that the two-income family is a necessity just to stay above the poverty line. It knows that 60 per cent of those who will see their benefits reduced by Bill C-21 earn less than $15,000 a year.

The government knows it is punishing the poor in this country. The government is well informed about its ill-intentioned bill. It is the poor of this country who are not being heard by this government. But we know who is being heard. It is the business council.

I would like to conclude my remarks by again pleading with the government. I know at this point that the plea is going to fall on deaf ears. I plead with this government to not pass Bill C-21, to look at bringing in an unemployment insurance amendment that will enhance the situation for workers in this country, not punish the workers.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the member for Mission—Coquitlam on Bill C-21. I would like to give her an example of a situation that we had in B.C. in my riding and ask for a comment from her. It had to do with a recent announcement by the provincial government, that crazy and confused government in Victoria, that some time ago said it was going to require people who were on social assistance to be sure to find a job otherwise they would be cut off from their benefits.

I had the opportunity the day after to visit the CEIC office in Vanderhoof. It is just an hour's drive west of Prince George. I asked the local manager, "What about this announcement yesterday? Has that had any impact on you?" The manager smiled and said it had because already that morning people had come in to his office asking that he or members of his staff sign a form to say that that they had come in to ask for work.

Of course, this local manager made it clear it was not working for the federal government with any of the jobs that were listed there. He said that he was not aware if any co-ordination had taken place between the B.C. government and the federal government on that announcement. The impact was that the human resources department in the province of B.C. would have one criterion for being employable and then CEIC would have yet another. His comment was, "Fair enough, they are going to have to come in and they may or may not fit our criteria".

I would be interested in the member's comments on that kind of federal-provincial co-operation, if there is any, and how these kinds of problems exist and how they can be resolved.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for raising the question. We have two territories and 10 provinces in this country. As the news will portray, seldom do we agree on much.

I think the key point of this is that there are 10 provinces and two territories with 12 sets of rules, plus the federal criteria. I am quite alarmed at what this is going to mean to British Columbians, for example. I had a constituent who was unemployed, who did not have a telephone and who came to my office during the summer and used the telephone. This person wrote endless letters of application in longhand and went to endless interviews. This person happened to be a very articulate and skilled person who documented every move she had made. When she went to the social assistance officer—I might add it is a woman who was not recalled after a protracted labour dispute—and presented her list and her copies of her letters, etc., she was refused and told to go home and fill out the government form because the office was not interested in that material, that it was not relevant and had to be on the form. She was so humiliated that she returned to my office in tears and said, "I'm so disgraced, I'm so humiliated. I really, honestly, Ms. Langan, have tried". That is the kind of situation.

In speaking to the worker after that we found out she had been inundated by people that day—this was following the same announcement to which the hon. member referred—and was having to force people to follow the rules. That worker was at her wits' end. We had a situation where there was an over-stressed worker and an anguished unemployed person at the welfare office. This was like mixing oil and gas. I am very, very fearful, Mr. Speaker, at what this is going to mean to people.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity today to speak on Bill C-21. What this bill represents is the natural evolution of a social program, an essential part of this country's compassionate ability to provide income security for those who are out of work and in need.

When the Unemployment Insurance Act came into being in the 1940s only 50 per cent of the labour force was entitled to receive benefits. Those who were ill or who were unable to work were ineligible, as were employees in occupations generally susceptible to unemployment, such as construction.

Today, 95 per cent of the working population is covered by UI, and more than $10 billion of benefits are distributed annually throughout Canada.

Dozens of alterations and changes over the past 49 years have attempted to bring this program in line with the social and economic times. Today, UI not only protects those who lose their jobs, it also covers seasonal workers, those who are sick, and those on maternity leave.

In the last decade, Mr. Speaker, our labour force has seen some stunning changes faster than anyone can contemplate. The world market is demanding a new breed of worker who can provide technological skills and products. As our knowledge base expands so do global trade links.

• (1220)

While some people in Canada would have us cling to the past of logging, fishing and mining, the world beyond is rushing ahead to learn the technologies needed to compete on a global scale.

At the same time, we have realized that our unemployment insurance system has not progressed fast enough for new labour market needs. It was established in an era when unemployed Canadians would simply have to wait for a mine to open again. In today's economy, based on a diverse array of industry, an unemployed person has more choices. Even in areas of high unemployment skilled workers are in demand, but Canadian workers cannot fill the needs.

With this bill we intend to offer Canadians an alternative so that they can take advantage of current and future labour market opportunities. Canadians realize that they need new skills and training to keep up with the labour market demands. But they are not getting very much help.

Surveys by the Canadian Labour Market and Productivity Centre show that 41 per cent of full-time employees have received no training over the past two years, another 18 per cent have received less than one week's training while 53 per cent of unskilled workers received no training at all.

It is difficult to overestimate the importance of training in our changing labour market. In terms of economic success we only have to look to countries like Japan to see what a little training input can yield in greater economic output.

In the past this government has occasionally felt like the mouse behind the obstinate elephant. The participation of both business and labour is essential for the development of our labour force. Yet traditionally rivalries have until recently prevented these groups from co-operating in any national effort to keep the supply of labour competitive and job ready.

When the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced the Labour Force Development Strategy in April, she called upon labour and business to head up five task forces on training. The result of their work will shape the way for the strategy and new training opportunities. Rather than being the instigator and the implementor, the government has taken on the role of facilitator. Clearly, the challenges we face are too great for the government to tackle this alone.

The bill before us calls for a co-ordinated approach to solving many of our labour market difficulties. It overhauls UI so that more claimants can receive employment training and experience through the active involvement of our private sector partners. By eliminating some of the disincentives to work, it encourages people to be productive participants in the labour market.

Canadians strongly favour these kinds of changes. An April Decima poll showed that 61 per cent of the people support remodeling UI so that funding is available for more skills development; 92 per cent would change UI to encourage job seeking; and 85 per cent would make alterations in order to produce a more skilled workforce.

In 1988 the UI Act allowed more than 105,000 claimants to get skills training. We propose now to reallocate $350 million of UI funds to further increase training opportunities for claimants. With the help of the private sector sponsors an additional 60,000 claimants will be prepared for a lifetime of labour force participation.

As well, we intend to offer even more assistance to the unemployed. Early in their claims they will be referred to job search information counselling services and job training programs on an individual basis. This is the extra help Canadians are asking for.

The reallocation of UI money will also boost entrepreneurship by allowing claimants to use their benefits to start their own businesses. To enhance re-employment prospects we will also provide financial aid to claimants who choose to move to find jobs.

In addition, this bill adds another chapter in the evolution of UI as a fair and just income security program. In line with some human rights concerns changes are being made that will benefit older workers and enhance parental benefits. Currently, the UI benefits cease after a person reaches age 65. This bill will extend regular benefits to all workers regardless of age.

In addition, the current inflexible sickness and maternity benefits are being improved. A new multi-tiered system will allow 15 weeks of maternity benefits, 10 weeks of parental and 15 weeks sickness. All together 30 weeks of special benefits will be available to eligible workers. For parents such progressive income protection allows flexibility in making the arrangements to care for children. For those workers who become sick while claiming UI this bill will provide greater income security.

This fall I travelled across the country with the committee to look at the implications of this legislation. Media coverage, I am afraid, has unduly focused on the negative and inaccurate comments. The changes we are proposing are not intended to take away benefits from certain regions or deny assistance to unemployed people. This bill, in fact, will allow more individualized and increased assistance for claimants in addition to channeling more income security in most of the disadvantaged regions.

Most importantly the changes proposed by this bill are not intended to save money for the government. The employment development measures will be funded by re-allocating up to 15 per cent of the funds used for UI benefits. That money will become available under new measures that will shorten the benefit period and increase the entrance requirements in regions that are economically more buoyant. However, if the unemployed rate rises the entrance requirements and benefit period may be modified accordingly.

For example, in a region such as Toronto where unemployment is below 6 per cent, the new program will require 20 weeks of work to qualify instead of 14 weeks under the old system. Toronto claimants who had worked the minimum amount to qualify for benefits would receive a maximum of 17 weeks of benefits under the new system. For the same amount of work they would receive 20 weeks of benefits under the former system.

By contrast, in parts of Newfoundland where the unemployment rate is 15 per cent and over, qualifying requirements will not change. As before, the claimant will need 10 weeks of work to qualify for a maximum of 50 weeks of benefits. In regions that are economically disadvantaged the unemployed will continue to be covered by UI. They will be able to take advantage of the new training programs we are developing.

Bill C-21 is part of the solution to a labour market problem that has great implications for Canada. Without developing the skills of our workers the standard of living Canadians enjoy now is doomed to diminish. Our UI program cannot continue just to provide income security to unemployed Canadians; it must also help them learn how to survive in the competitive market our country is now developing.

This government has called upon business and labour to co-operate in this challenge. Canadians have told us that they want the UI program to reflect current market trends. With our partners we are now making it possible for unemployed Canadians to break away from the cycle of dependency and to partake in the building of a successful Canada in the next century.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question in view of the government's decision to withdraw the funds that it used to contribute to the unemployment insurance fund. This withdrawal of government funds necessarily would result in increased premiums both on the part of workers and employers. I would like to ask the hon. member for the government whether he can reassure the House that the government would not allow increased premiums to occur.

• (1230)

Second, I would like to indicate that the Liberal party supports training and programs for the unemployed but would like the Government, if it is truly committed to the philosophy of training and programs for the unemployed, to fund these programs directly rather than take the funds out of the unemployment insurance benefits. We should get money by increasing efficiency in government, in response to another hon. member for the government trying to ask me a side question.

My question to the hon. member is whether he would lobby the government not to cut the unemployment insurance benefits but rather secure a separate source of funds for training and development for the unemployed.

Mr. Kempling: The premium rate in the bill is set for three years. Therefore there will be no change as far as the employee or the employer is concerned for three years. We will look at it after that and see where we are. The rates go up and down. Traditionally they are set yearly, but in this bill, with the consent of the commission, we have agreed to set them at a limit that will be established for three years.

As far as training is concerned there is a great deal of controversy over what we do about training. Members of the Opposition tend to say to us that we cannot use premiums that are paid into the unemployment insurance fund for training. That is not right. We have sought and received legal advice on this matter. Benefits under the unemployment insurance system need not only be money.

I think it is quite proper, if a person is unemployed and lacking in skills, that we provide training for him. There is nothing in the law to say that we cannot remove some of those funds from the premiums that are being paid. We quite rightly have done that. We have said that the people who will receive training under the UI system will be those who contribute to the fund.

On the other hand, we have set up parallel funds under the Canadian Jobs Strategy to take care of people who have not paid premiums into the fund or who have been long-term unemployed. We think that it is a good effort. Every survey that we have seen across the country from small business, from labour groups, and from provincial authorities indicates to us that the workforce of the 1990s will have to be more skilled than it is right now.

Technology is changing. Capital investment in industry is increasing dramatically and will continue to increase as far as the projections are concerned. Therefore we think it is quite proper that we take this step and train people to be prepared for the work period ahead of us in the 1990s.

Mr. Anawak: I have a couple of questions or concerns with regard to the comments expressed by the hon. member. There is a tendency to talk about taking trips "across" the country. I wish people would take trips "around" the country so that they would include our area of the north, the Arctic. I would hope that other members will heed this in the future.

With regard to mobility rights or mobility in the UI bill, it states that we should probably move to other parts of this country. My concern is that we have been here for several thousands of years. We are not just ready to pick up and move anywhere just because the UI bill will now make us look for jobs elsewhere in the country.

I would like to assure the hon. member that with other parts of the country wanting to retain their distinctiveness we should also have the right to remain distinct in our part of the country.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question raised by the hon. gentleman regarding going "around" the country instead of "across" the country.

I might advise you, Sir, that we did discuss this matter at our committee. In fact at one stage we intended to fly to the north. We talked about having a subcommittee go to the north. We did not have too many inquiries back from the north. We put advertisements in the paper, we contacted several organizations, and when it came down to the hearings it turned out it would be more economical to bring those who wished to appear before us to Vancouver or Edmonton. In the final analysis none of them turned up. We offered but they did not turn up.

Upon reflection I think we should have gone to the north. There was some reluctance on their part, even though we agreed to pay expenses for them to fly down and stay in a hotel while they were in Vancouver or Edmonton. They were obviously reluctant to do that. I would think that another time we would be well advised to go to the north.

Let me say something about mobility. This matter has been raised several times during our meetings, during the hearings that we had, and also in the House in various speeches. We are a very mobile society.

It may be in your community that they are not very mobile, but generally speaking, Canadians are very mobile. You can go to Alberta and find many people from Ontario. I can recall during the energy crisis that some of my constituents went from Burlington to Alberta and were coming back home for Christmas and telling me I could freeze in the dark. They became westerners or Albertans pretty fast, and so it is with our society. Two of my sons are on the west coast in British Columbia. I can remember moving to three or four different cities because there was work there.

The general opinion of most Canadians is that if work is available they are going to go and find it somewhere, not stand there and let the government bring it to them. There are others who for a variety of reasons prefer the lifestyle they have in the community in which they live. Perhaps that is their choice; it is a free country. Where mobility is available and people want to work in another location either for more experience or better wages they should be allowed to do so. We will see that they are made mobile, to the best of our ability.

In my own business or my own shop at one time almost everybody on the floor came from the maritimes. They were darn good workers and we were glad to get them. We paid them well to stay there. I do not think there is anything in the bill that is going to disrupt communities. If someone wishes to leave it is their free choice to leave.

Mr. Karpoff: I have a very short question. I would like the member to inform me, and through me my municipality, where they are going to get the $814,000 that they have to raise in order to pay the increased unemployment insurance premiums?

Mr. Kempling: First of all I do not accept the $814,000. I would have to look at it to see how it is calculated.

Mr. Karpoff: It's accurate.

Mr. Kempling: I listened to you; kindly listen to me. I would have to see how that was calculated to see whether it is right or not.

If you look at the premiums you will find they are below the 10-year average. There have been times in the last decade when the premiums were much higher than the premium today. The premium today is lower than the 10-year average.

The member's question is a little off base. Wages have increased in the last decade; disposable income has increased dramatically in the last decade. Since 1984 disposal income broadly across the country has been about $1,400 per capita. I do not think there is any problem paying the premiums, and I do not think your question is well founded.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

• (1240)

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak today on Bill C-21, tabled in the House and brought to the attention of the Canadian people some seven months ago, on April 11, and again in the budget on April 26.

There are a number of things that concern this side of the House about this deplorable initiative that in my province affects roughly 150,000 Newfoundlanders. Above all, speaking as the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, it is the negative synergism of this bill that really concerns me. I have a number of concerns, and I hope to be able to get through them in the limited time that I have.

The point I would like to make at the outset is that in this case one and one and one concern does not add up to three. It adds up to more like 15 or 20. The effect is not linear; it is exponential.

In the 1988 election campaign in which everybody sitting in this House participated—it has been said many times, but it is a necessary prelude to what I have to say—the St. John's Evening Telegram on October 14, 1988 quoted the hon. Minister for International Trade as stating: "No one is planning any changes in the unemployment insurance program. There has not been any change proposed to us since we dealt with the Forget Commission and we are not contemplating any changes now".

Almost six months to the day after this promise was made, in disbelief I sat in this very seat and watched as the Minister of Employment and Immigration made proposals for a drastic overhaul of the unemployment insurance system. I had assured my people that a promise had been made, and I did not expect any changes. You can imagine, Mr. Speaker, my disappointment, surprise, and disbelief as I watched this being unfolded.

We were again surprised and disappointed at what we heard. We heard that $1.3 billion would be cut from unemployment insurance benefits. This represents about 10 per cent of the $13 billion annual unemployment insurance payments that the report stated would cut off around 30,000 Canadians of the 3 million Canadians who are receiving unemployment insurance benefits and represented, according to the studies that were done by the government, around $30 million to Newfoundland.

I think I am quoting Benjamin Disraeli who said there are three kinds of lies: "lies, damn lies, and statistics". The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce mentioned statistics in the vicinity of $83 million for Newfoundland.

I am in possession of a report from the Government of Newfoundland which had a separate study done, and it reckoned that the total impact is going to be $112 million. That is quite different. What the impact is going to be will depend on what assumptions are made. Mr. Speaker, you can appreciate that I have to take the worst case not for political reasons but to concern myself with what could happen.

The hon. member for Burlington in a statement dismissed the impact it would have. In fact government stated that the impact would be marginal in the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador owing to the high rate of unemployment.

Let me quote the impact it is going to have, and I have not made these up in my mind. A statistical survey was done using the social policy simulation data base, which is a microcomputer based model developed by Statistics Canada. The indications are that up to 11,000 in Newfoundland may be impacted by the new entrance requirements alone; up to 30,000 by the change in duration; and up to 6,000 by the voluntary quit measures. If that is a marginal impact, I am not standing on the floor of the House of Commons today giving a presentation on Bill C-21.

The government will say: "But you do not understand". It will argue that $800 million of these benefits will be redirected into job training programs. I think this is unfair to rural Canada for two reasons: first, it is paying for job development programs out of the unemployment insurance pool.

This point has already been made by one of my colleagues, and it is unfair to the people who can least afford it. Right now, of the $13 billion annual cost of unemployment insurance, 43 per cent is funded by employers, 31 per cent by worker contribution, and 26 per cent by the government.

Then I look at the job training. Yes, I am in favour of job training, but how does it apply to my riding? Let me give you some examples, Mr. Speaker.

I have analysed with my staff and with members of my riding the designated skill shortages in Newfoundland. There are 50 job titles, and right now around 1,200 jobs. I am not going to bore the House with a great dissertation on this point, but I have to look at some of the titles.

This title is "fish plant manager", maximum training volume 50. Every fish plant in my riding has a manager as far as I know and to my knowledge the government is closing them down, not opening them up. The ones that are open are still only operating at a 55 per cent capacity.

I will give another example. This title is "claims staker soil sampler", 30. I do not have many mines in my riding, but there is a project in my riding to get a mine under way in an area where employment is desperately needed. The entrepreneurial skill is there. The professional and the organizational expertise are there. The whole thing has been staffed, the business plan is available, but ACOA says no.

The recent change in the ACOA action program that affects all existing and potential applications trot out new ground rules that preclude this action program from going through. So, no money, no mines, no jobs.

I would remind the House of the de Grandpré report about which there was great publicity in this House. The government paid $1.5 million to have this report done. If I remember correctly it consisted mostly of businessmen. There was one representation from labour. They were unanimous in agreeing that there should be a change made to training, and there should also be a safety net of unemployment. I think they called the safety net unemployment insurance and the training program was the trampoline, but they made a very important recommendation. They recommended that training be paid for separately, not taken out of unemployment insurance as it is now happening.

I felt the purpose of the task force was not to produce a report that was not followed by the government but was to get things done. If you pay $1.5 million and get a recommendation but do not follow it, I am not quite sure what to make that of that.

Another aspect that concerns us is the over-all business of the government not making downstream its over-all contribution to the UIC. Now, what sort of a backdrop have we got here? You may recall that in the budget the Minister of Finance admitted that unemployment would probably rise at the national average of 7.7 per cent to 8.5 per cent—that is a 10 per cent increase—as a result of the budget.

Let us have a look at the proposed goods and services tax. There is another coffin nail. The finance minister predicts between 2.5 per cent and 3 per cent rise in inflation will result from the GST. This is not a very bright picture at all.

Let me quickly review some of the concerns one more time. First of all, Bill C-21 represents a breach of trust. It breaks a promise that was solemnly made by the government last fall. It redirects money for the unemployed into training jobs that do and will not exist in rural Canada. It provides the level playing field insisted on in the free trade agreement, as was suggested earlier here this morning, for the benefit of the United States.

It hurts the people it was meant to protect. It was done without warning and consultation. It was sudden and abrupt. I know the province of Newfoundland was not consulted. It attacks the very heart of the Canadian social security system. It is a program which Canadians care deeply about. It runs contrary to the expectations of Canadians, all at a time when we are going to have a 10 per cent rise in the unemployment rate and we are going to have a 3 per cent rise in inflation. In Newfoundland we do not know what the quotas are for the fish allocations, but there are other indications that the economic future for the next few years in Newfoundland is going to be very dismal.

This is a constitutional right of Canadians, and the government has attempted to privatize it. That is not on. Like every other member in this House I could go on because there are an awful lot of people listening to what is being said in this House today, and there are 8,000 people who signed a petition telling me to make sure that their voices are heard. I hope they believe their voices are being heard. Of the 80 per cent of the submissions that were made out of the 200-odd submissions—and I sat on the committee—90 per cent were against it, 80 per cent were vehemently against it, and only 10 per cent had some support.

• (1250)

In closing, there is a somewhat sombre thought. In my previous incarnation I was a mariner. Mariners will tell you that of all the flag hoists raised there is one they watch very carefully. It is the phonetic, alphabet flag uniform. When uniform is close up the international meaning of that is you are standing in danger. People pay attention to that. A mariner believes that somebody is trying to tell him something so he checks his navigational position, his sounding, the water under his keel, his course and his speed to make sure that he is not going to get into irretrievable trouble.

I have some advice for the Prime Minister. Mr. Prime Minister, rural Canada has hoisted a flag and its flag uniform close up, be aware.

Mr. McCreath: I listened with great interest to my hon. friend for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception who has had a very distinguished naval career. I must say I am well aware of the fact that sailors are well known for their stories. It seems to me he has been telling a few here today, and I suspect from what he just said that he may have told a few back home in his constituency. Therefore I must ask him one or two questions.

He talks about what he perceives to be the negative impact of this for his constituency, indeed for Newfoundlanders, and yet I did not hear him mention, as I will in my own speech, how pleased we are that fishermen's benefits are not in anyway being impacted by this. Is he not in support of maintaining fishermen's benefits?

Second, he talked about access to the unemployment insurance scheme. If he looks at the proposal before Parliament he will note that there is no increase in the qualification period for the constituents of Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. Yet, at the same time there are benefits to those people because of the Canadian Jobs Strategy, the programs that will flow as a result of that, and the additional funding available for things like Community Futures, the Industrial Adjustment Services and so on.

I think my hon. friend has certainly done an excellent job in toeing the party line in opposing the progressive measures that have been brought forward by the government in trying to bring the unemployment insurance scheme into the 21st century. I wonder if he might not take this opportunity while there is still a moment to recant to his constituents and tell them what excellent stories he has told us .

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, there are times I am sure that all members stand on their feet and they are not really sure of what they are going to say when they get up. This is one occasion that I am delighted to rise and respond to my friend, the hon. member for South Shore.

It is safe to say that as mariners we share a lot of interests. I found it very interesting that the hon. member said that I was toeing the party line. I have come here as a Liberal, as a member of the Official Opposition, but when I was on my feet this morning speaking about unemployment insurance I was not only speaking for the 8,000 people who took the time to tell me and this House that they are not very happy with the changes in unemployment insurance but for Canadians who are concerned about their future and about putting bread and butter on the table. Those are the same Canadians that this House should be concerned with. I can tell you that this side of the House is very concerned for those Canadians and will continue to be so.

I also want to say to the hon. member that I happened to read The Chronicle Herald coming back from my riding. The same member who criticized me and asked me why I was toeing the party line and not looking at the great benefits of unemployment insurance has a problem with fisheries, as we all know, and I think he would agree with that. He was quoted in the paper yesterday as admonishing his own government because he wants to get Community Futures in his own riding to look out for some of the problems that have been created by the policies of this government. I am delighted to respond to those types of questions. I am delighted to say that at least I can talk and toe the party line and still represent Canadians without having to worry about where I am coming from.

I would also like to add that he mentioned the job development strategy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for South Shore.

Mr. McCreath: I know it was not my hon. friend's intention to mislead the House. He may not have been aware of the fact that on Thursday it was my great pleasure to announce that the Minister Employment and Immigration had indeed brought forward—

Some Hon. Members: That is not a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is debate. Questions and comments are now terminated. The hon. member for Nunatsiaq on debate.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. The amendments to the act as contained in this bill will have negative consequences on northern workers. Last April, when the government announced its labour force development strategy and the proposed changes to the unemployment insurance program, I expressed my concerns over the effects these changes would have on northerners. These concerns remain and have in fact been reinforced.

Across the country the government is increasing the minimum period of work required to qualify for benefits and is reducing the maximum duration of those benefits. In the north the minimum number of weeks an individual must work in order to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits remains the same at 10 weeks. However the duration of the benefits is reduced.

Under the current system an individual in the north who works 10 weeks can qualify for unemployment insurance benefits over a 42–week period. The changes in this bill will reduce that benefit period to 39 weeks. Under the current system, an individual in the north who works 18 weeks can qualify for unemployment insurance benefits over a 50–week period. This bill will reduce the benefit period for this worker to 47 weeks.

These changes will have serious consequences for seasonal workers in the northern regions of this country. Seasonal work in the north, unlike the south, is very often short term, project oriented, and has specific termination dates. Workers do not have a lot of other projects to go to.

The north has the highest rate of unemployment in the country. The unemployment rate for the northern region, which comprises the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, is between 20 and 25 per cent. The over–all rate, however, is misleading.

There are wide variations in this rate between the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and between the regions within the Northwest Territories itself. The Baffin, Keewatin and Kitikmeot regions have the highest unemployment rates within the Northwest Territories.

In some communities unemployment rates approach 50 per cent. These high unemployment rates dramatically illustrate the need for substantial economic development initiatives for the north. Cuts to the unemployment insurance program in areas which suffer from economic underdevelopment, without any plans or programs to increase employment opportunities in a significant way, is only going to make these poor regions poorer.

The number of groups in this country opposed to this bill is significant. All the aboriginal and northern groups that appeared before the legislative committee studying the bill were opposed to it. The reasons for their opposition are similar.

Aboriginal communities in the northern parts of the provinces have much in common with northern remote communities. Their economies are largely underdeveloped. In the Northwest Territories there are two economies. One is developed and comprises a very small number of communities. The other economy is underdeveloped and a vast majority of communities, about 46, fall into this category. Most of them are in my constituency in the central and eastern Arctic.

When the Northwest Territories Federation of Labour appeared before the legislative committee examining Bill C–21, it had two messages for the committee: leave the system alone and at least attempt to recognize the uniqueness of the northern economy before making any changes to the benefits structure.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I call it one o'clock, the hon. member will have six minutes remaining in his debate plus five minutes for questions and comments.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave this chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

BILL C–43

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, the federal government has finally brought forward legislation regarding abortion. However, this legislation does not address the rights of the unborn child, despite the recommendation of the Supreme Court of Canada. More than 60 petitions bearing the signatures of more than 2,000 Prince Edward Islanders were presented to me calling upon this government to protect foetal rights.

These petitions were not deemed presentable by the clerk of petitions. How can an average Canadian be aware of the strict guidelines for certifying these petitions? My constituents invested a huge effort in collecting these signatures only to discover that their voice will not be heard in this House through petition's tabling. Guidelines for accepting petitions for presentation in this House are clear and concise. The problem is that ordinary Canadians are not familiar with the rules.

I ask this government to not only develop a public awareness program to assist petitioners in this area, but to seriously consider revising the archaic rules that determine the acceptance or the rejection of petitions.

ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Save the Rouge Valley System organization, the city of Scarborough and thousands of Canadians who are working to save the Rouge Valley, I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for visiting the valley this past weekend. Your strong support for saving the valley as a park has helped give this issue national importance because, as you mentioned, preserving this magnificent wilderness area is in the national interest. Despite overwhelming community support for the creation of the park, and a $10 million commitment from the federal government, the fate of the Rouge is still uncertain.

Each member in this Chamber has a duty to back up your call for action, Mr. Speaker. The Government of Ontario also must show its commitment to establishing a park in the valley. Once again, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for taking the time to visit the Rouge and demonstrate your support in saving the valley as a wilderness park.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to point out yet another negative consequence of the proposed GST. There are 120 border crossings between Canada and the United States.

It is well known that commercial interests on the Canadian side of the border are adversely affected by Canadians crossing the border into the United States on a single day and weekend visits, spending millions of dollars, a situation which has become worse under the free trade agreement. We cannot be critical of Canadians seeking lower American prices, but we must express serious concerns about the long-term implications of the situation, which will be further aggravated by the 9 per cent GST.

I offer the following examples from my own constituency as a graphic illustration of this situation. One service station has suffered a 400,000 litre loss in the past year; $250,000 is spent on groceries each week in Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan; single-day visits number 840,000 for the first nine months of this year. How many more examples does the government need? I call upon the government to scrap the GST.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, in Elk Island and across western Canada agriculture is an important part of our economy. Successful agriculture means more than just successful farmers. Successful agriculture means jobs in fertilizer plants and farm implement dealerships. It means successful small town businesses and thriving world communities.

We all depend on a healthy farm economy. When our farmers were faced with falling international grain prices, our government responded by injecting almost $12 billion into our farm economy. When the west was faced with a killing drought, the Government of Canada responded to keep our farmers in business.

Yes, the Government of Canada is committed to our farmers, but the fight is not over. More work has to be done. Let us work together to development of a long-term plan to manage our farm economy. The Minister of Agriculture must take the lead in developing a vision for Canadian agriculture in the future. Let us all work together to build a stronger farm economy. Let us all work together for a better Canada.

SAFETY REGULATIONS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, the imposed safety regulations drawn up by the Coast Guard division for vessels under 15 tonnes are highly impractical and expensive for Prince Edward Island fishermen. These safety devices could cost the fishermen in excess of $15,000 and would take up so much room on the vessel there would be no room to fish.

The regulations have obviously been drawn up by people unfamiliar with the P.E.I. inshore fishery. The new regulations will require P.E.I. fishermen to have a different vessel for every different species fished. In spite of a series of meetings between the Coast Guard and fishermen, the regulations have not yet been changed to reflect the needs of the P.E.I. inshore fishermen.

Instead of wasting time and money discussing new regulations, the government should enforce the current regulations more efficiently.

Furthermore, if the government truly has the safety of P.E.I. inshore fishermen in mind, why not allocate the funds for dredging harbours and repairing of wharves that are the greatest menace to our fishermen?

PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE OF CANADA

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, during the last few days I have talked with management and staff at the Springhill Institution in Springhill, Nova Scotia, the officials at Treasury Board, and members of the union representing the groups on strike at that institution. It appears to me that the differences between them could be resolved by earnest negotiation on both sides. I urge the Treasury Board to do everything possible and reasonable to bring this situation to a satisfactory conclusion.

Although it is the union's prerogative to strike, many of those on picket lines are already experiencing emotional stress and a great deal of pressure. There is no question that sooner or later the strike will be settled. I just respectfully request that all parties involved get back to the bargaining table and make a settlement sooner instead of later.

SPORTS

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege to rise today in this House to pay tribute to the many Canadian athletes who make a contribution to sports in this country. Sporting events are an excellent way of providing our youth with interpersonal skills and leadership qualities which are needed to succeed in life.

In my riding the Fort Frances Muskies demonstrated that hard work and determination pay off. They won the northwestern Ontario regional football championships by defeating the Westgate Tigers of Thunder Bay with a score of 27 to 13. The Fort Frances High School's football team is one of the best in northwestern Ontario and while it has not held the regional championship for many years, it has held an impressive record of achievement.

This bitter–sweet victory will be long remembered. For the first time in 36 years the Fort Frances Muskies have been able wrestle the championships from the Westgate Tigers of Thunder Bay.

Under the leadership of Coach Dave Montgomery, the Fort Frances Muskies have made football in northwestern Ontario an exciting sport. I am sure that my colleagues from the Thunder Bay area and members from all sides of the House will join me in offering our sincere congratulations to the Fort Frances Muskies football team and Coach Montgomery.

EAST GERMANY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, the world is currently witnessing a migration of dramatic proportions as tens of thousands of East Germans continue to leave their homeland in search of freedom and democracy. These East German citizens are willingly and anxiously uprooting their families and quickly leaving their friends, their jobs, their homes and their relatives to gain the freedom that we Canadians have enjoyed since Confederation.

The urgency of the East German situation is a testament to the desire of humankind to be free. Canadians from all regions join with those East Germans in a united desire to help them attain their objective. I urge this government to take all steps possible to allow the new East German immigrants to resettle in Canada should they so choose. Canada must open its doors to people who have so openly demonstrated their desire to obtain freedom in an open and a democratic society.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, members of this House, both in this Chamber and in committee, have spent many hours over the past month debating the government's proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. We continue to do so, but as we are engaged in this debate with the government, the Department of Employment and Immigration is already training its staff in employment centres across this country on the implementation and administration of the changes.

These changes are proposals for our consideration. They are not yet law. This government has demonstrated its total lack of respect for the democratic process over the past few months. It limited debate at second reading. It refuses to listen to the thousands of Canadians who will be hurt most by this bill. Then it once again brought in time constraints on debate in this House. Now we see it undermining the rights of Parliament to decide the fate of this bill. When is this government going to acknowledge that it was elected to govern in the interests of all, not to dictate in the interests of the few.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER EXPORTS

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, independent sawmill operators have been hurting in northern Ontario. They have been hurting for a number of reasons, but the one factor rarely mentioned is the 15 per cent tax on softwood lumber exports. The problem is not with the tax, but the fact is that the industry does not see the money being returned to forestry activity.

Since the softwood lumber export charge was implemented, the Ontario government has received $63 million in revenue. Last year, the province collected over $21 million and to date this year, it has taken in over $12 million from the forestry exporters.

• (1410)

In the last Ontario budget, the premier committed the province to an increase in spending of $18 million in forestry, but that falls far short of the over $63 million that the province has received from the federal government.

When will the province give the forestry workers of Ontario their fair share? When will the premier begin to think about northern Ontario and the independent sawmill operators and employees?

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on February 27, 1986, Mr. Jean Chrétien resigned as a federal Member of Parliament, and now he says the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) has done nothing about Meech Lake for two years.

Mr. Speaker, why didn't Mr. Chrétien stay in Ottawa where he could have argued his position directly with the Prime Minister of Canada?

PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE OF CANADA

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, parole and case management officers have been on strike for a week now. In response to a question from my colleague from Victoria last week, the Solicitor General stated everything was going well with respect to the way the government was handling this strike. Everything is not going well, Mr. Speaker.

In Kingston, one person is handling the work ordinarily done by 35. Last week, the Quebec police were called in against the strikers. In Toronto alone, 12 parolees have been arrested for breaking the conditions of their parole. Tensions are rising within the institutions as parole board hearings and applications for parole are being delayed. Members of the WP group are on strike because they have serious grievances that have not been addressed by this government in months of negotiations. These employees are seeking pay equity with their provincial counterparts and a reasonable workload. For those who are on the front line in the administration of our criminal justice system, I call upon this government to stop delaying and recommence negotiations now.

VISIT OF PHILIPPINE PRESIDENT

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, President Corazon C. Aquino arrives in Ottawa today. I am honoured to salute Her Excellency on her state visit to Canada, the first by a Philippine president.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pagtakhan Indeed, her visit is an historic one. Truly concerned for the well-being of the Filipino people, Her Excellency brings their aspirations to all Canadians.

There is hardly a need to remind Canadians about the seriousness of her purpose. The Philippines needs Canada for investment and trade as the Philippines reconstructs itself from the economic ruin caused by past authoritarian rule. In turn, Canada benefits from such economic partnership.

I urge the Prime Minister to reaffirm Canada's commitment to assist the Philippines not only through international aid programs, but also through enhanced trade and investment, and thereby assist her in cementing the pillars of democracy and human dignity in the Philippines, in improving the living conditions of the poorest of the Filipino people, and in bringing peace to them.

I invite my colleagues to join me in welcoming President Corazon Aquino to Canada.

MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, as of today, Monday, November 6, the Hon. Michael Wilson has served as Minister of Finance for 61 months and 20 days.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: This makes Michael Wilson the longest serving Minister of Finance in over 35 years. He has now surpassed the time in office of Donald Fleming, who served as Minister of Finance in the Diefenbaker government for 61 months and 18 days. buffs, it is a reflection of his outstanding abilities.

Canadians know that while Michael Wilson is the Minister of Finance, the effort to balance the books will be unrelenting. The competence, consistency and tenacity of the Minister of Finance, not just over a short time but over the long haul, deserves our respect. Let's give him a standing ovation.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the fact that Michael Wilson has served as long as he has as finance minister means only one thing, that the government does not care at all what the people of Canada think.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has done for the finances of this country what the Boston Strangler did for Avon ladies.

Today I received a petition, signed by 228 citizens of my constituency, protesting the government's introduction of the GST, the gouge and squeeze tax to the people of my riding. It is most interesting to note that this particular petition was organized by none other than the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, an old ally of this government.

Recently Sydney, Nova Scotia, ranked one hundred and seventeenth levels in a survey done by Statistics Canada into the income of urban areas. With an average income of under $17,000 a year, the people of my riding are in no position to withstand the savage attack on their spending power which will result with the introduction of this tax. The government has taken away the trains, it has taken away the regional development assistance, it has wrecked the fishing industry. Will the government please, at least, relent and do away with this terrible tax.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, one of the most precious traditions of our Canadian democracy is that the RCMP has the independent responsibility to decide whether and when to lay charges, especially in cases of political interest. It appears from sworn evidence, given by an RCMP officer this morning in a criminal trial, that this tradition has been violated. In the budget leak affair on May 30, I asked the Solicitor General for an assurance that the—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I will hear the question, I do not want any more preamble. I will hear the question and then I am going to decide whether we can proceed with it. I would ask the hon. member's co-operation.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, on May 30, 1989, the Solicitor General assured the House, and I quote from page 2324 of Hansard:

> The RCMP has conducted its investigation. It has consulted with members of the Attorney General's Department of the province of Ontario. It has concluded that charges should be laid.

I ask the Solicitor General to explain his behaviour and the behaviour of the government in the light of the evidence adduced this morning under sworn testimony by an RCMP officer.

Mr. Speaker: The question creates very considerable difficulty for the Chair, and I would ask that all hon. members bear with the Chair for a moment because the matter is a very serious one. I want to be sure that all hon. members understand why I feel that I must intervene at this time, and I want to be sure that the public understands.

In Beauchesne's fifth edition, page 118, I read paragraph 335 under the heading, "The Sub-Judice Convention":

> Members are expected to refrain from discussing matters that are before the courts or tribunals which are courts of record. The purpose of this sub-judice convention is to protect the parties in a case awaiting or undergoing trial and persons who stand to be affected by the outcome of a judicial inquiry.

I ask hon. members to listen carefully to the next words.

> It is a voluntary restraint imposed by the House upon itself in the interest of justice and fair play.

The next paragraph is 336(1) which reads:

> The sub-judice convention has been applied consistently in criminal cases.

The case referred to is clearly a criminal case. And, there are some references to Debates. I do not have those references in front of me, yet.

Paragraph (2) reads:

> The precedents in criminal cases are consistent in preventing reference to court cases before a judgment is rendered—

It goes on to say:

> —however, the convention ceases to apply after the judgment is given.

There is no question, I think, at the moment that this is just the commencement of a criminal trial and judgment has not been given.

Those are the immediate references which I must bring to the attention of the House.

• (1420)

The hon. member for York Centre out of courtesy to the Chair, and I advise hon. members of this, indicated to the Chair that he would seek to ask a question along these lines. I know he will put some arguments at an appropriate occasion as to why those references in themselves and as read to the House ought to be the subject of some examination. What I am going to do at the moment, and I hope the hon. member for York Centre will accept this in the best spirit of this place, is indicate to the hon. member that I will not take any further questions on this point, but I will hear the hon. member at an appropriate time and as quickly as possible after Question Period. I will listen to his arguments.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I came prepared earlier today to ask questions on the subject of the government's abortion legislation. I propose to do that, but may I just say in passing, as you indicated yourself, the sub judice rule is a convention which is imposed voluntarily on the House and I intend to argue at three o'clock that there are higher values.

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. member for York Centre very well, and I expect that he will bring some very cogent arguments to his case, but we will hear it after Question Period.

Again I thank the hon. member for indicating to the Chair that this difficult matter was going to be raised. I would ask the hon. member to proceed with his other questions.

ABORTION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice.

Friday, the Government tabled its bill on abortion. My question is based on this legislation.

On all sides, doubts have been expressed about the constitutionality of the Bill. I would ask the Minister, in order to prevent a false start and a long, drawn out debate that might take years, and to avoid the inevitable court challenges which, in each case, will be linked to the fate of women like Dodd and Daigle, and he demands for urgent review by the Supreme Court of Canada, whether he is willing to take the step which, obviously, only he can take, namely enhance the status and even the legitimacy of the Bill by submitting it now to the Supreme Court of Canada.

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would advise my hon. friend that this course of action was considered. We felt it was our responsibility as legislators to grapple with this very difficult problem. We spent some time doing it and have come up with what we think is a reasonable solution to a very sensitive issue. We feel that it is up to Parliament to debate and decide on this matter and not, at this time, the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Kaplan: Could the minister explain what is lost by taking the time now to refer it to the Supreme Court of Canada, before all of the debate and controversy and litigation which will inevitably occur and which in every case will be tied around the fate of a particular pregnant woman with a demand for urgent review by courts of appeal in the land? Why put the country through that when this step which would add legitimacy and would add stature to the government's draft legislation could be considered now?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I think what is at stake here is the authority of Parliament to legislate vis-à-vis the authority of the Supreme Court to interpret. We feel it is important that the legislation go forward with the imprimatur of Parliament on it. We believe that there was a request for leadership from the public. We have given that leadership. The legislation we are bringing forward has considerable thought put into it, considerable consultation. We believe that it should be debated here in the House of Commons.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, that will be one of the subjects of discussion and as I indicated to the minister, a whole range of issues is avoided by proceeding now to have the constitutionality of the matter reviewed.

I want to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare about the issue of access. Is not the responsibility of the Government of Canada, which pays half of the cost of medicare and which is very proud of having developed a national standard health care service across the country, to assure that there is equal access in all parts of the country, whatever the abortion law of the country, and that women have the same system and the same opportunities available to them.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in taking the initiative that we have, the federal government spells out a context in which provincial governments can take decisions in areas which fall under provincial jurisdiction.

The Canada Health Act in no area spells out the specific procedures that must be provided in specific areas or in specific ways. For example, in the case of life threatening situations such as those involving cancer or involving heart disease, there is no requirement in the Canada Health Act that a province provide a specific service in a specific place.

This principle was well acknowledged by the then minister of justice of the day back in 1969 when abortion was last considered by this Parliament. The Leader of the Opposition, who was then minister of justice said this:

> The relationships and civil law between the patient and the doctor, between the patient and the nurse, between the doctor and the hospital, the nurse and the hospital, are relationships falling within the operation of provincial law, the civil law and the constitutional responsibility of the provinces—the subject of statutes which regulate hospitals and the professions. These are properly provincial matters—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Given that the courts have before struck down a bill of this Parliament, why does he want to put the country through months of agonizing debate, this House through months of agonizing debate, only to have the ultimate constitutionality of the law decided, with the details of some poor woman's personal life being dragged through the courts for months on end?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I would repeat the comment that I made. There has been a demand from the public and from the opposition for leadership in this matter. We have applied ourselves to the question. We have drafted a bill which we think is a reasonable solution which defines entitlement to abortion. It is based on health grounds. We do not say it is perfect. We say that it is the best that we can do. It is not your bill, it is not my bill, but it is a bill for the people of Canada. We have shown the leadership.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. A woman's decision to seek an abortion is always a painful and agonizing one. Often it is based on the lack of support in society to value and support women and their children. Where is the legislation that establishes a sound family policy for Canada? Where is the legislation to give women access to counselling, to child care, to contraception, to training, to equal economic opportunities and to support, when they do have children? In fact, where is the legislation to allow women to choose to be mothers as well as to choose not to be?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I fully share the feeling that I think the hon. member expresses, that abortion should be a last resort and not a first resort. One of the challenges for all of us as parliamentarians is to ensure that we have an infrastructure in place that makes it possible for mothers to carry their children to term.

A number of those provisions are in place today in terms of assistance for counselling, for example, and in terms of assistance to people who are in need of financial assistance. When I speak in the debate later during the debate, I hope to be able to add to that and to announce other initiatives we may be taking in order to provide assistance in giving mothers the sort of help that they need to take positive decisions.

The hon. member asked specifically about the question of child care. Indeed, as was indicated by the Prime Minister, the government is determined to put in place a national child care program during this Parliament.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

HEALTH CARE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is either for the Minister of National Health and Welfare or for the Minister of Justice.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare certainly knows that the Canada Health Act requires provinces, in order to be eligible for funding coming from the federal government, to meet five criteria. High amongst these are the questions of comprehensiveness and accessibility.

• (1430)

Both ministers also know that there are certain regions in this country which deny to women the right, confirmed by the Supreme Court, to have access to an abortion. With the proposed legislation that has been introduced, entailing as it does the possibility of Criminal Code sanctions, women in Canada are now concerned that this unfair access across Canada is going to become even more unfair.

Therefore, I want to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare, why does he not use the authority that the federal government does have under the Canada Health Act to make sure that all Canadian women have fully equal access to their rights in this domain right across Canada?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have a copy of the Canada Health Act in front of me. As the hon. member will know, in the preamble of the Canada Health Act, Parliament made it abundantly clear that the Canada Health Act was in no way designed to derogate the constitutional responsibilities of either level of government. The provisions of health services is constitutionally the primary responsibility of the provinces. In the Canada Health Act—

Mr. Broadbent: Primarily?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman asked a question, and I am trying to answer it. As the hon. gentleman will know, in the Canada Health Act no mention is made whatsoever of any specific procedure having to be provided in a specific way. For example, there is no requirement under the Canada Health Act that procedures which could help to save lives such as procedures dealing with cancer or with heart disease must be provided in a specific way by any of the provinces.

Is the hon. gentleman proposing that the federal government should invade an area of provincial constitutional jurisdiction and specify that in the case of specific services, provinces must provide those services in a specific way or the federal government will refuse to fund medicare?

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am proposing now, as I always would propose, that the federal government use only the authority that it has. Both the federal government and the provincial governments have jurisdictional authority in this domain. It is in the federal act that the words "comprehensiveness" and "accessibility" are used. Specific words could have been included to make particular operations included if the federal government had wanted to do so. I am not even asking the minister to do that.

The minister has alluded to the fact that operations for cancer, for example, are not put in the act. Certain hospitals across Canada have not said on principle that they will exclude cancer operations, but have specifically said that they will exclude abortions. They have made the decision to deny comprehensiveness and accessibility, going against what I would argue is the federal authority in terms of legislation.

Will the government show true leadership in this debate instead of hiding behind a past act, interpreted the way the minister wants? Either give it a broader interpretation or amend that act to provide the accessibility that all Canadian women ought to have.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is asking that we violate the Constitution of Canada to do what he would like us to do. Our obligation is to respect the Constitution of Canada—

Mr. Broadbent: No, I'm not. Didn't you hear the question?

Mr. Beatty: The hon. gentleman asked his question. Surely I am entitled to answer it Mr. Speaker. We have an obligation to respect the Constitution of Canada which gives the primary responsibility for the delivery of health services to the provinces. The hon. gentleman concedes the fact that nowhere in the Canada Health Act is any procedure, including life-saving procedures, required to be provided in a specific way by any province. What the hon. gentleman proposes is that we throw constitutionality to the wind—

Mr. Broadbent: Nonsense!

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, again the hon. gentleman should listen to the response. He asked that we ignore the constitutional responsibility of the provinces and of Ottawa, that we engage in an invasion of provincial jurisdiction. Doing so could threaten the very constitutionality of the Canada Health Act.

Mr. Broadbent: I will leave that minister's rhetoric aside. He knows I did not propose violating the Constitution. I say to the minister, refer my proposal to the Supreme Court. I will accept its decision if the minister will accept its decision.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my last question is directed to the Minister of Justice. According to the Supreme Court, Canadian women are entitled to unqualified access to abortion in all regions of this country. However, there are regions in this country that do not give Canadian women that right.

My question is, simply, why the government did not table amendments to the Canada Health Act, consistent with the Supreme Court's decision to give all Canadian women the same rights in all regions.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member asked the same question in English and in French. The answer is the same. We must all respect the Canadian Constitution.

MEMBER OF THE SENATE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Federal Business Development Bank and is about the issue that will not go away. On Friday, the minister for small business, on his kamikaze mission, said in the House of Commons that the Cogger-FBDB bills were quite small and would not necessarily be brought to the president's attention.

Apart from the fact that those bills totalled some $104,000, a relatively nice small amount, how can the minister then explain the internal memo of the Federal Business Development Bank which I have in hand, part of which says about Lapointe Rosenstein bills that this bill was signed by the president, the president approved payment of same, invoices were signed by the president and so on? How about that for information that was kept away from the president? How can the minister explain the actions of his colleague last Friday? Could he give us the latest version of the truth in this affair?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the president of the Federal Business Development Bank on Friday afternoon issued a statement which I am sure the hon. member must have received. This statement says: "The Federal Business Development Bank has thoroughly reviewed its records once again. These records do not indicate that Senator Michel Cogger did any work on mandates assigned to the Lapointe Rosenstein law firm after his appointment to the Senate". I think that takes care of the issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the Minister also read the statement. And since he read it, as he claims he did, he must know that the statement says: "These records do not indicate that Senator Michel Cogger did any work on mandates assigned to the Lapointe Rosenstein law firm after his appointment to the Senate". What about the contract awarded before his appointment to the Senate and completed afterwards? Did the senator work on those cases, yes or no? Could we have a straight answer, once and for all?

[English]

Mr.Andre: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the hon. member is asking because I think the Senator said in his statement to the House that before he was a Senator, as a member of a law firm, in fact he did do work on the file. But, as indicated by the president of the Federal Business Development Bank, he has no record of Senator Cogger doing any work on behalf of Lapointe Rosenstein after he became a Senator.

Mr. Boudria: Read it, that' not what it says.

Mr. Andre: That's exactly what it says. I will quote it again. "The Federal Business Development Bank has thoroughly reviewed its records once again. The records do not indicate that Senator Michel Cogger did any work on mandates assigned to the Lapointe Rosenstein law firm after his appointment to the Senate." That is pretty clear to anybody. I realize that if you have an appetite for spicy scandal, the bland truth is disappointing, but you are going to have to accept it.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, if the truth is bland, that is really all I think we are looking for here.

Last week, we were informed by the Solicitor General that the RCMP had begun looking into the recent allegations regarding Senator Cogger. My question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology. Has the minister provided to the RCMP the complete list of lawyers authorized to do legal work for the Federal Business Development Bank? If he has not, will he do so immediately, and table that list in the House at the same time?

• (1440)

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member will put that question on the Order Paper, I am sure we will try to find an answer.

I think the hon. member would have to admit he is engaging on what would constitute a witch hunt here and he is looking for—pardon me for mixing the metaphors—some further skeletons. I will co-operate in answering any questions he puts on the Order Paper, but I cannot be expected to have that information at question period.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question has to do with the same thing. This is a very ordinary list, an administratively used list in every FBDB office across the country.

On Friday we asked whether Senator Cogger or his firm have had any dealings with any government agency or department. We did not get an answer. Therefore, I ask again, and this time I direct my question to the Prime Minister, does the government have any knowledge now of Senator Cogger or his firm doing work for any other government agencies or departments after his being appointed to the Senate in May 1986?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all colleagues in the House will know that by the very nature of that question, it can only be answered on the Order Paper.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the honourable and distinguished Minister of National Revenue. Canadians are becoming more and more alarmed with their general tax guides. The 1988 general tax guide was more like a 22-page scavenger hunt to determine Canadians' abilities and federal and provincial tax payable. I want to ask the minister what he proposes to do to change the tax guide so that it is more simple for Canadians to fill out as they have done in the past and are unable, it seems, to do in the present. Is the 1989 tax guide going to be far easier to handle than the past one?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, with friends like that, who needs enemies?

It is true that over the last 20 years the tax guide and the system have become quite complex. This sounds like a set-up question and I was not aware my honourable friend was putting it. Since he did put it, I can assure the member that from last year to next year, we will be reducing the number of pages in the tax guide by some 15 per cent.

We have looked at every conventional method of simplifying the system, and I am happy to announce again that we are moving into the electronic age. Next year, for the first time in the history of this country, we are going to electronic filing which will lead us toward a paperless society within the next decade.

I can assure my hon. friend, all members of the House of Commons and Canadians as a whole that every effort is being made in consultation with interested groups and individuals to make the system even less complex, particularly compared to the one we inherited five years ago from the Liberals.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HEALTH CARE

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It is about the direction his government is taking on the abortion issue.

Every rational thinking person in this country knows that the key to reducing the number of abortions in this country is to reduce the number of unplanned pregnancies. Why does this government not take positive action?

First, the Family Planning Division at National Health and Welfare was disbanded, leaving only one full-time person in all of National Health and Welfare to work on family planning issues. Why did this government cut funding to Planned Parenthood by $61,000 in its first mandate? If it is really so concerned with the number of abortions, why does it not approach the issue by working toward preventing unplanned pregnancies?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the House that the hon. member's information is out of date. We have increased funding for Planned Parenthood. Indeed, the goal of this government is to provide positive alternatives to abortion. We believe that abortion should be a last resort and not a substitute for birth control. As a consequence, we will take any measure we can appropriately take to reduce the causes of abortion in Canada.

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, over all in the mandate of this government, the funding to planned parenthood has been reduced significantly, even though there has been a very slight increase this year.

Family planning, like family violence, is not solely a provincial responsibility. National Health and Welfare has a national clearing house on family violence. Why does it not have a national clearing house on family planning? Why is the federal government not playing the role that it could play in family planning education and have adequate funding for educational programs so that all people in Canada could work together to reduce in a positive way the unwanted pregnancies in this country?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, our approach is to do precisely that, to give Canadians a positive alternative to abortion and to ensure that information about contraception is widely available in Canada. The hon. member is wrong. We substantially increased funding for Planned Parenthood to disseminate this information. That is important. It should not be simply dismissed by the hon. member.

I think the onus is on all of us in the House of Commons, if we believe that we should be finding alternatives to abortion, to look for ways to disseminate information, to look for ways to give support to mothers, to look for ways to ensure that women are not driven into a situation where they believe that abortion is the only recourse that is open to them.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members the presence in the Gallery of a parliamentary delegation from Australia, led by the hon. Barry Cohen, member of Parliament.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I also wish to draw to the attention of hon. members the presence in the gallery of Mr. Vladimir Bulatov, Deputy of the Peoples' Congress of the U.S.S.R.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. At a recent meeting Canadian food processors indicated that the so-called level playing field established by the free trade agreement cannot and will not work under the present farm product marketing system. These people are experts with hands-on experience in the food processing and food industries. With this statement and all other recent happenings, does the Minister still say that the free trade agreement protects our farmers and their existing marketing system?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the free trade agreement speaks for itself. Clearly supply-management systems were in fact preserved under the free trade agreement, as the hon. member knows.

If things are so bad in the processing industry, I would like to ask the hon. member how come the processing industry has agreed to invest a further 15 per cent over last year in the processing and manufacturing of food products in Canada? It looks as if that tendency is going to be maintained over the next four or five years. I think that is a pretty positive signal.

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. The president of the Ontario Food Processors Association has spoken to us recently, and he disagrees with the statement that the minister has made. He speaks on behalf of 46 processors in the province of Ontario alone. His federal association has in the past had audiences with the minister and has presented briefs to the minister.

Has the minister reviewed those briefs? After reviewing them and those presentations, how does he say that the free trade agreement will continue to protect the food processing industry and Canadian farmers?

Mr. Mazankowski: I think the best vote of confidence is the fact that processors are indeed investing in more equipment and capital to the tune of 15 per cent more this year than last year. As a matter of fact, I quote the headline in the Financial Post of October 18, 1989. "Canada is reaping benefits from the trade deal, U.S. figures show". That applies to agriculture. That applies to the energy sector. That applies to the manufacturing sector. That applies to almost every sector across the country. That is why we are the leaders in the world in terms of economic growth, development and job creation.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration who, on Friday afternoon, announced $2 million as the special response to the crisis in the Newfoundland and Labrador fishery, where by her own admission, 3,400 fishermen and plant workers are affected.

• (1450)

I remind her that last year $6 million was available to 1,500 fishermen who were affected. In other words, this year the crisis is worse, the amount is less.

Does the minister not realize that if she holds to this course, there will be fishermen and plant workers on the Labrador coast who will be forced into bartering this year in order to survive? Will she give us a commitment now, if the government and unions can show that the need is greater than she has anticipated, that she will increase the amount in order to meet the need?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should point out that this is only one part of what we are doing in the fishery in Newfoundland. As the hon. member knows, we have a cabinet committee working on some of the problems of the fishery. I recognize the significance of the problem within Newfoundland. We will continue to come up with solutions as they are required.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the minister that the need is now. It is now November and it is getting pretty cold. People must have enough to survive for this winter. The Minister has created a catch-22 situation in the qualifying because in order to qualify, you must have 10 weeks of benefit period in the fishery only last year. The only way people qualified last year was through the special response feature that she had announced. That amounts to a catch-22 situation for fishermen and plant workers who want to qualify.

Will the minister modify the qualifications for her program this year and build in the flexibility that includes a long-term attachment to the fishery rather than simply insisting that people have 10 weeks of qualifying only in the fishery last year, because that creates a catch-22?

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, what we have done is design the program this year with the flexibility in it that we have always had so that it will define it directly for people who have an attachment to the fishery.

My officials in Newfoundland are working very closely with the workers and with the industries around the definitions and their interpretation. I will be in touch with them on a regular basis to ensure that the programs we have established meet the goals that they were intended to meet.

MEMBER OF THE SENATE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. He read the press release which indicated that the records of the FBDB did not show that Senator Cogger did any work. Since the cheques were sent to Senator Cogger and since Senator Cogger did the billing, has FBDB checked to make sure that Senator Cogger did not do the work?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the FBDB would have no way of knowing who in the firm did the work and it is not its responsibility. As I interpret the hon. member, and perhaps he might correct me if I am wrong, is the hon. member suggesting it is the responsibility of FBDB to ensure that in fact the funds paid in terms of legal work was not for work done by anybody who might be prohibited from doing so under Section 14? If that responsibility is evident in the act, perhaps he could point out the language that would impose this responsibility on the FBDB.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, the bill was sent July 5 from the senator to FBDB. The file indicates that the president of FBDB himself authorized the payment to the senator's firm. The letter was sent back to the senator. Is it not quite obvious and is it not a concern of this minister that his agency did not check to see whether or not Senator Cogger was indeed breaking the law of Canada?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the continuous repetition of these questions is probably good reason why these should be reserved to the Senate where the senator has asked for a special committee to be struck to look into it and those kinds of matters to be pursued.

I remind the hon. member that the invoice came from the law firm of Lapointe Rosenstein. The cheque from FBDB was paid to Lapointe Rosenstein. The comptroller checked with the officer in the company that had requested the legal service to see whether in fact it had been done. The president said yes, it had been done, the bill should be paid. The president has checked his records thoroughly and can find no evidence, as he said in a press release on Friday, that Senator Cogger undertook any of the legal work. I realize again that in this desperate search for a scandal, you leave no rock unturned, but I am afraid this happens to be the truth.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In the riding of Elk Island, a well known music producer has told me that the existing manufacturers' sales tax is crippling the music industry in western Canada. He informed me that under the present system, the federal government collects the sales tax before his products are sold. This seems unfair. He claims that the new GST may help. Is this in fact true and, if so, how will the proposed new GST system help the music industry, especially at a time when we are trying to diversify our economy in western Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made a very astute observation about the importance of the change from the existing sales tax to the proposed sales tax. There is no question, and there is widespread agreement that the existing tax is a bad tax, that it does hinder industry. It does hinder the diversification of industry and, as the hon. member has pointed out, it does so in western Canada and in his own riding of Elk Island.

What the new tax does do is remove all tax on inventory almost as soon as it is paid so that the taxpayers are now able to carry inventory free of the burden of sales tax. That is different from the existing tax where the sales tax is paid immediately by the individual company and that tax is carried right until the final sale is made by that company of its product. So there is a very major improvement in the operations of the sales tax system.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment. My riding is in the highest unemployment zone in Canada and it is primarily in the north, a fishing constituency.

In answering questions from the member for Labrador, the Minister of Employment either did not understand the nature of the questions being put by my friend or, more frightening, may have understood and chose to answer the way she did in any case.

I make a plea to the minister on behalf of the people in northern Newfoundland and in rural Newfoundland who have had three successive failures in the fishery. That fact can be substantiated by the Minister of Fisheries. It can be substantiated by many members who represent fishing constituencies throughout Atlantic Canada.

Does the minister realize that the regulations this year for qualifications under the special response program in fact say to fishermen that if you have had two disastrous years in a row, you do not qualify. The bottom line says to fishermen if you, as a result of natural consequences, not your fault, have two bad years in a row, the Government of Canada no longer considers you a fisherman. Sell your boat, destroy your gear, go on welfare or go into a forced resettlement program somewhere else in this country. Will the minister take a look at that program, for God's sake, and help people maintain a traditional way of life.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had read the announcement, he would see that we announced that there are specific criteria to determine who qualifies. The criteria are intended to provide assistance to bona fide fishing industry workers. Individuals unable to receive these special benefits but with proven attachment to the fishing industry will be able to request a review. We are doing everything we can to be flexible for the people with an attachment to the fishing industry.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the point. Does a farmer stop being a bona fide farmer because he has had two bad years in a row for reasons that have nothing to do with the farmer? No. The Government of Canada rightly assists the farmer and we applaud that. We are asking for the same consideration for fishermen.

The current rules say to a fisherman who had a disaster last year and a disaster again this year, you are no longer a fisherman, we cannot help you. I am saying, if you do not change those rules, you will force the resettlement of thousands of fishermen out of rural Canada.

Mr. Speaker: That is more of a statement than a question. The minister may want to rise.

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, we have been in constant touch with the provincial fishing industry and fishermen in Newfoundland. We have been helping people in the fishing industry every year when there has been a special need and we will continue to do so. I do not think that shouting around this Chamber is going to help them a whole lot either.

• (1500)

Mr. Speaker: I will take a single question from the hon. member for Brant and a single question from the hon. member for Gloucester.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The Department of National Defence is currently actively soliciting the NATO Alliance to locate a low level flight training centre at Goose Bay, Labrador.

At a time when a major effort is being made in Europe to reduce east–west tensions and when both alliances are undertaking confidence–building measures, as indeed are the two superpowers, does the minister actually believe that this is the time for Canada to be pushing for an expansion of NATO's military activities?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the member and the government disagree on even the membership in that alliance, so therefore I do not find it at all strange that the spokesman for defence in the New Democratic Party would say that we should not take part in training NATO pilots so that they are better able to defend not only their countries, but Canada.

We all welcome the actions and the discussions that are taking place in Europe. I say to the hon. member that there are more flights undertaken by Canadians in Germany than there are by other nations in Canada. It is an opportunity for Canada to add assistance to the alliance in which we both seek security. If we do as the hon. member suggests and not train pilots at low level, we will be putting those pilots, Canadians and others, at risk. The training is necessary.

The member is talking about NATO. Canada, as long as this Party happens to be the government, will be a member of NATO and will seek security in NATO.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Minister of Finance. It is really a question on which Canadians need some clarification.

The minister, in his technical documents and in statements made by government members, indicates that the goods and services tax, on the one hand, is revenue–neutral. But the gospel is being spread that the goods and services tax would also address the deficit problem in this country and reduce the debt.

The minister cannot have it both ways. I think Canadians deserve to know from the minister very directly if the goods and services tax is revenue–neutral, replacing the existing manufacturers' sales tax, or if the goods and services tax is going to reduce the deficit and pay down the debt.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that requires a two–part answer. The first part is that in the actual process of tax reform we established a principle in the White Paper of June, 1987, whereby we would not try to bring in extra tax revenues through the back door under the over–all umbrella of tax reform. In that sense, the GST does not contribute to an immediate reduction of the deficit.

However, in the last budget, as an example, we raised the sales taxes by about $2 billion, or close to 1 per cent in rate on the proposed tax. Those additional revenues are there in the 9 per cent proposed rate and those revenues will directly contribute to getting the deficit down.

In addition, as I pointed out on a number of occasions, the existing tax is subject to a good deal of tax avoidance. If we do not make a change in the tax about $2 billion is at risk. One of the reasons we are proceeding with the sales tax reform is to plug that loophole, a loophole which the Auditor General himself pointed out was there. That is another way we can contribute to deficit reduction by the introduction of the GST.

Mr. Speaker: That concludes Question Period.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I wish to advise the House that the business to be debated tomorrow will be C–43, an act respecting abortion.

PRIVILEGE

SUB JUDICE CONVENTION

Mr. Speaker: I indicated earlier in Question Period that I would hear argument on the point that the hon. member for York Centre raised. I would ask him, in arguing, to stay away from whatever evidence may or may not have been presented in the court room and to stay on the main issue, of which I think I have a pretty good picture in any event, but I certainly will hear the hon. member.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rose during Question Period to ask a question based on evidence, as you have noted, which arose this morning and was adduced under oath from a staff sergeant of the RCMP in the course of a criminal trial. I confess, I was not surprised to see Your Honour on your feet with some concern about the applicability of the sub judice rule. I am rising now to address the relevance of the sub judice rule and the place of it in our rules of procedure in the House in the hope and expectation that, since the Solicitor General is still in the House, if a finding is made by Your Honour in favour of the submission which I have to make I might be given an opportunity to ask my question and, equally important as you will see, that the Solicitor General be given an opportunity to answer the question.

In connection with the sub judice rule, I want to make two alternative arguments. In the first place I think there is a tendency which we can all understand for the pressure to exist in the House to distort the sub judice rule itself, and obviously unintentionally. I think on the government side there is always a tendency to attempt to stretch the sub judice rule to protect or cover the government from having to give explanations or answers about matters on which it would have to answer. I confess on the side of the opposition there is certainly a tendency to want to shrink the sub judice rule so that the government will be exposed to more areas in which questions can be asked than it otherwise would.

I would ask Your Honour to reconsider the specific questions that I asked this afternoon from that point of view. I want to make the submission to you, Your Honour, that properly applied the sub judice rule does not really protect or cover the government from any responsibility to answer the kinds of questions that I was asking.

It is true that the evidence to which I was referring was adduced from a staff sergeant of the RCMP at a criminal trial. But, Your Honour, the evidence which was adduced in the submission that I made to you is not material to the issues before the criminal court and, at the same time, it is extremely material to issues which are the proper subject of debate and discussion in this House. It is material to the question of whether the Solicitor General was truthful to the House when he said that the RCMP had laid the charges completely on their own. It is material to the proper functioning of the Government of Canada in relation to the RCMP, to the long-established tradition of independence of the RCMP. It is material to the responsibilities of the Minister of Justice, to whom I would have also directed questions, as to the obligation of the Government of Canada to operate in conformity with the laws of our country.

The charge, however it was obtained—and that was what the evidence of the staff sergeant was about—is there before the court. The material evidence about the conduct of the accused, the conduct of other witnesses and their responsibilities will be adduced, will be supported and will be challenged, and a determination will be made.

My first submission to you, Your Honour, and this is the closing of this point, is that the question of from where the charges came from, which is so material to us, so much our responsibility in this House of Commons to deal with, has less to so, or little to do, or little material do with the actual criminal case. Second, Your Honour—

Mr. Speaker: In order to assist the Chair, I take it the point you are making is that the question you want to ask has nothing to do with the guilt or innocence of any person or persons presently before that criminal court. It has to do with something else which is related to the administration of government. Is that your point?

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, that is correct. But I have an additional submission which I want to make because while I submit that and while I firmly believe it, as you have eloquently and directly put it yourself, I think there is a limit to the sub judice rule and I think we ought to frankly, on an occasion like this, discuss that limit.

• (1510)

If you were to determine, in spite of the submissions that I have just made and the summary which you have just given, that the issue of the process by which these charges were laid is somehow material to the criminal case now proceeding, I submit, Sir, that the sub judice rule has its own limits. And while I do not think it applies if Your Honour were to find that it does apply I want to argue that it should be suspended, and I will do that very briefly.

I would argue, in that event, that the rule should be suspended for the simple reason that there are higher values than a particular criminal case and in the event that we were to enter into the discussion which I am urging upon you and it affected the criminal case unfolding now, a judge might well have to find that an acquittal has to be entered.

I can recall in my own experience as a Solicitor General that there were statements made in the legislature of the province of Quebec during a court process, a criminal trial, in which an RCMP officer was the accused. Because of those statements, which the defence council for the RCMP officer raised, the trial judge decided, in the circumstances of what had happened in the legislature, to direct an acquittal.

I submit even if that were to happen as a result of the discussions which I am inviting you to permit—the questions and the answers—that it would be worth it because we are dealing in this case with the most fundamental questions for which a government is accountable. We are dealing here with a tradition of the RCMP. We are dealing here with a contradiction, a statement by the minister which could not have been clearer. I asked the question myself and the minister was categorical in the answer that he gave, and that answer is now contradicted under oath.

Think of what we do in this place. We are asking questions about whether a senator, Senator Cogger, should or should not be charged. That question is affected by the possibility of manipulation of the RCMP. If it were merely because a criminal case were ongoing or a number of criminal cases were ongoing that a government was prevented or protected month after month from having to answer a very fundamental questions, our democracy would be abused. That is the reason the sub judice rule is stated as it is, why it is a voluntary restraint, why there are times when it should be suspended and, Your Honour, I submit that, were you to find that it applied to the question I wanted to ask, this is such a case.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the argument that has just been made and, like the member who has just spoken, I understand and appreciate why Your Honour intervened during the Question Period today before making a judgment about the acceptability of a certain line of questioning. Because when it comes to a question of fundamental justice as it affects the rights of Canadians outside of this House all of us in this Chamber, although it is the law-making Chamber of the land, have to be careful to a very extreme degree in terms of what we do here. I just say that by way of preamble to my comments on the issue before us and any comments that I now make should also be seen in that light. My own concern is with those outside of this House who are involved in criminal proceedings particularly.

It seems to me that the sub judice convention to which you have referred does not apply in the particular case for the following reasons: the Canadian in question, who has now been charged with a criminal offence, Mr. Doug Small, is, without being precise about the wording of the law in question, being charged with the violation of the Criminal Code as it pertains to certain documents related to the budget leak.

The questions that I intended to raise, speaking for myself, and I presume which the member who has just spoken had planned to raise, had nothing to do strictly with that issue, nothing to do with whether or not Mr. Small was guilty of what he has been charged. What I was interested in raising today was another matter, namely, whether the testimony of Staff Sergeant Richard Jordan was accurate with reference to the responsibilities of the Solicitor General in the House of Commons, whether he was or was not doing his job in the proper fashion. Staff Sergeant Jordan, according to the Canadian Press reports coming out of the court proceedings, said that he had been pressured into delaying charges "to please elected officials".

As you will know, Mr. Speaker, if that turns out to be true, that is an extremely serious matter going to the root of the administration of justice in Canada. With that statement I do not think anyone in this House, on either side, would be in disagreement.

So the matter is one of considerable importance. I would argue that our raising questions about the ongoing application of the principles of justice and the administration of law in terms of the minister exercising or not exercising his responsibilities correctly is not pertinent to whether Mr. Small was guilty or innocent of the charges that have been brought against him.

That, in essence, is my point. I think the matter is extremely serious. There were many of us in the House at the time this budget leak took place who thought the government was acting in an inappropriate way and said so at that time. Questions were raised, answers were provided that, on the surface, one had to accept in accordance with one of the rules in the House. Now we have testimony in a court of law that is extremely damaging to the government in the sense that if it is accurate it should concern all Canadians. The implications are that the administration of justice in Canada is taking place in a partisan way, not to ensure that the law of Canada is applied in an equitable way but to ensure that the political agenda of the government of the day is adhered to.

That is extremely serious and if it continues for some period of time before the courts then the administration of justice in the country is at stake. It seems to me that we on the opposition side have a fundamental obligation to pursue this matter, not as to whether Mr. Small is guilty or innocent—the courts are looking after that—but to determine as soon as possible if there is political interference in the application of justice in this country. That to me seems to be the issue.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to enter into this discussion, however briefly, in view of the nature of the question before the House. I think we would all do well, as was referred to in Question Period, to briefly look at Citations 335 and 336 of Beauchesne which, under the heading, Sub Judice Convention, states:

> Members are expected to refrain from discussing matters that are before the courts or tribunals which are courts of record. The purpose of this sub juice convention is to protect the parties in a case awaiting or undergoing trial and persons who stand to be affected by the outcome of a judicial inquiry. It is a voluntary restraint imposed by the House upon itself in the interest of justice and fair play.

Section 336(1) states:

> The sub judice convention has been applied consistently in criminal cases.

Citation 336(2) says:

> The precedents in criminal cases are consistent in preventing reference to court cases before a judgment is rendered; however, the convention ceases to apply after the judgment is given.

It goes on to say:

> Nevertheless, the convention is applied again when an appeal is launched.

• (1520)

Reference has been made by my friend from York Centre to "the question of higher values", I believe he said. I say to the House, to my honourable friends who have argued this, that there can be no higher value at this time when the case is before the courts as we speak than the right of the individual who is being charged, and all those involved in the trial, to a fair trial. I do not think that we can in any way suggest that this very important convention be waived at this time because we have no way of knowing how anything said by anyone, either the questioner or the person being questioned, may affect the outcome of that trial.

I appreciate that the government is here to be held accountable, and we do not shirk from that. I appreciate it is the job of the members opposite to hold the government accountable. But I believe it is for the courts to decide what weight should be given to any evidence and any comments. Testimony, after all, before the courts, in any case, is sworn testimony. There will be a time and there will be a day when this matter can be pursued and at that time it may very well be that my hon. friends will find that that is the issue of the day.

The issue of the day for the defendants and the witnesses, all those involved in a trial, is the trial before the court at this time. I am sorry, I stand to be corrected, but to me the ability of a person to have a fair trial supersedes the right of any member of this House to endanger, within or outside the walls of this House, that fair trial.

I would submit to you that the rule has grown up under those circumstances. I think it is a very fair rule. I do not think that we should in any way tamper with it at this time because the right of an individual to a fair trial before the courts and not to have it affected by things said in this House is to me and to the government paramount.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice has read into the record Citation 335 of Beauchesne which says:

> Members are expected to refrain from discussing matters that are before the courts or tribunals which are courts of record. The purpose of this sub judice convention is to protect the parties in a case awaiting or undergoing trial and persons who stand to be affected by the outcome of a judicial inquiry.

I think we should ask what is the fundamental purpose of this convention? The citation gives us the answer. It is to protect the parties to the proceeding. We are dealing here with a criminal proceeding. Who are the parties in a criminal proceeding? Certainly, there is a party in the person of the accused, but is there another party in the person of the Crown. Certainly in the British and Canadian system of justice there is the convention that the Crown never wins and the Crown never loses. The duty of the Crown is to put forward before the court all the evidence that is relevant to the case.

So I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in reality in a criminal proceeding there is essentially only one party, and that is the accused. And if that is the case, then I submit that the kinds of questions intended to be asked by the member for York Centre could not, and were not intended, to prejudice in any way the ability of the accused in the case in question to get a fair trial. Instead they related directly to the administration of justice, to the responsibility of the government in that important area of government activity, in particular, the relationships between the relevant ministers, their senior advisers and the RCMP.

Now, if that is the case, then I submit that the questions intended to be asked by the member for York Centre were not the kinds of things intended to be covered by the precedent read into the record by the Minister of Justice because they were not intended to, in any way, affect the party to a criminal proceeding, namely, the accused. They are not intended, in any way, to prejudice, to in any way harm the ability of the accused to have a fair trial.

So I ask you, Sir, to make a distinction in applying the sub judice convention in criminal matters with respect to whether or not the questions relate to the accused, the conduct of the accused and so on, or whether they relate to collateral matters of the kind intended to be raised by the member for York Centre. I say to you if the latter is the case then the questions that the member for York Centre intended to ask certainly should be ruled in order.

Certainly there is no disagreement on either side of the House that questions should not be allowed that would prejudice the ability of the accused in a criminal case to get a fair trial. But, if it could be found that questions were not intended for that purpose and would not have that purpose, then I submit they should be permitted.

I respectfully submit that if the intention of the convention with respect to sub judice is to protect the accused, then there are certainly grounds for you to accept the questions intended to be asked by the member for York Centre and make the kind of distinction that I have placed in argument before you. I submit, therefore, that even accepting the various rulings on this matter as summarized by the citation in Beauchesne, it is certainly open to you to exercise your discretion and accept the questions which the member for York Centre wishes to ask about this very important matter.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on this matter. It was my intention in Question Period also to ask questions on this matter.

If I can refer to another place and another time, I was the vice chairperson of the Manitoba Police Commission in the seventies. We recognized that we had to make a distinction between matters that were before the courts and our obligations to investigate the actions, decision-making and policies of the various police forces in the province of Manitoba. Even when a matter was before the court, we decided that we could look into the actions of the police forces in the province of Manitoba.

I would submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that we are in exactly that same situation today. As my colleagues in the opposition and my Leader, the hon. member for Oshawa, have indicated, we are not looking at the specifics of the court case in regard to Mr. Small. What we want to ask questions about are the decision-making processes within the RCMP, and whether or not there was political interference with relation to that.

• (1530)

In addition, the line of questions that we had today, if we were allowed to pursue them, dealt with the answers that members of cabinet gave to this House. Again, I believe that that is the proper role of this House. We must have the ability to confront the contradictory statements made by ministers in this House. We must have the ability in a democracy to make ministers responsible to this House.

We also have to be in a position to be able to ask questions with regard to whether or not the RCMP is making its decision whether or not to charge an individual based on "the intention of pleasing elected officials". That is something completely separate from the court case. I believe that we must have that ability. We must be able to ask those questions, otherwise justice will not be served.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): I want to take a couple of moments to comment on this question of privilege before you, Mr. Speaker, because it is an important one.

Obviously, if we look back in parliamentary tradition and history, we can see that this issue is one that has been before all Commonwealth Parliaments. It is one that has always presented some difficulty for the Chair and for the House.

The reason for that is that we are dealing with an issue that goes to the fundamental rights and justice process that we want exercised in this country and in other countries as well. It has always been a very difficult issue.

If you look at the quotations in Beauchesne's that have already been referred to it would seem to be fairly straightforward, but we know by looking at precedents that there is always some discussion and debate around this issue.

If you go to Erskine May you find there are a lot of different ways in which the sub judice questions are looked at. There are some real distinctions made through there. At page 378 of Erskine May there are references stating that Parliament must always be allowed to proceed on legislation.

Therefore Parliament should be able to legislate on an issue that is before the courts. Otherwise, Parliament's hands would be tied by any issues that may be before the courts, and Parliament would not be able to act. Therefore Erskine May argues that in fact the sub judice provisions should not apply to legislation before the House.

It states the same sort of thing at page 429 of Erskine May as well.

One of the things that seems to come out quite regularly, if a person starts to read up on this subject, is that there are clear distinctions made concerning issues that are the subject of legislation, issues that are the subject of a civil court action, and issues that are part of a criminal court action. What we are dealing with here today is an issue that is before a criminal court.

I refer to page 214 of The Parliamentarian. It is an article by Philip Laundy who has long served this House and who recently took some time to work on a book which was recently published. At page 214 of that particular issue it states: "On the following day the Speaker ruled that no restriction ought to exist on the right of any member to put questions respecting any matter before the courts, particularly those relating to a civil matter unless and until that matter is at trial".

There is a distinct difference drawn in much of the discussion on this subject between an issue that is before the courts in the process of trial and an issue that is not in the courts in the process of trial. I would argue that in this case we have, first, a criminal case which is very much delineated in the various arguments on this issue. It is also before the courts at the moment and therefore comes under the jurisdiction of this particular sub judice convention.

I listened carefully to the arguments of the members who have spoken in favour of allowing those questions. As I look back to them the hon. member for York Centre said that the questions he wants to address are questions, not material to the court case, but rather material to the House and to the ministers.

The leader of the NDP argued much the same thing, saying that the real question they want to get at in the House of Commons is the question of whether or not there was political interference but not wanting in any way to prejudice the right of the accused to a fair and unbiased trial.

The House leader of the Liberal party made very similar arguments, that it would not affect the accused and that the purpose of the sub judice convention was to protect the accused.

I think in looking at that we have to take a couple of tracks. We first of all have to look at the rules and conventions that apply.

First, this is a case in a criminal court that is on trial at the moment. Therefore it receives very special attention in both Erskine May and Beauchesne's.

Second, it is criminal; it is not civil.

Third, we have to ask ourselves: Would these questions in any way impact on the trial before this court? I would like to argue that in fact it would. What is going to be happening through these questions is: in essence we will be questioning the integrity, honesty and veracity of the statements of a witness before this court. What could be more germane? What could have more impact on a trial than to have the credibility of a witness before a trial questioned?

This I believe would prejudice that trial and would have an impact on that trial in some way that would result in making a difference to that court case.

I would argue, as the government House leader has said, that the questions themselves are important, not ones that we as the government want to shirk away from in any way. But we do not want to be seen in any way influencing or having an impact on a criminal trial that is presently in process before a court. We believe that the answers to these questions were they to be put before this House would well impact on the credibility of a witness, would well impact possibly on that trial, and could make a significant difference.

We would argue, as has been argued previously, that the sub judice convention should apply here. We would be quite happy to deal with these questions because they are in some sense of a philosophical nature, as was described by the member for Churchill. We are prepared to deal with those questions at a time when they would not in any way impact on a criminal trial that is presently under way.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened very carefully to arguments which arise from a question that was put by the hon. member for York Centre during Question Period. Those who were in the chamber at that time and those who were watching will remember that I intervened reading certain procedural precedents which set out the general rule that there should not be reference in this chamber to criminal proceedings that are in process, as is the case in this particular matter.

I think it was appropriate—and I hope members will agree—to adjourn the matter until now. I have now listened to argument from a number of members and from both sides of the House.

Hon. members on both sides have said that this is a serious matter and does create difficulty, not just for Speakers but for the chamber.

I am going to ask the hon. member for York Centre if as quickly as he can he would bring to my chambers, perhaps later on today but certainly not later than tomorrow morning, a complete transcript of this morning's proceedings in the court room, or at least a transcript that covers on both sides the particular statement to which the hon. member for York Centre referred.

I will examine the precedents and the rulings of other Speakers very carefully. I shall report back to the House at the very earliest convenience.

• (1540)

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, may I just ask a question for a point of clarification. I am wondering if the documents that you have asked for from the member for York Centre will have a bearing on your ruling. I am wondering if we on this side of the House may not also have access to those documents and possibly a chance to make some arguments if it is necessary.

Mr. Speaker: The documents I am referring to would be the transcript of evidence in the criminal proceedings today. It is an open court proceeding and is available to any citizen. I am sure that hon. members can arrange to get me a copy. I would expect the hon. member for York Centre, of course, to supply his friends on the other side with a copy.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, we tend to be spoiled in this House by the immediacy with which transcripts are available. I know in court cases where I have been counsel it is difficult to have transcripts for the next day, but I will do my best and furnish the House with whatever I can by tomorrow morning.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize that there can be difficulties. It might be appropriate if the hon. member for York Centre could extend my compliments to the court reporters and ask if they would give the Speaker of the House of Commons some assistance in this case.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs. McDougall that Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, be read the third time and passed; and the amendment of Mr. Volpe (p. 5571).

Mr. Speaker: When the House rose at one o'clock the hon. member for Nunatsiaq had the floor. He has six minutes remaining, plus five minutes for questions and comments.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, statistics obtained from the Canada Employment Centre in Yellowknife by the federation suggested that 15 per cent of all UI claimants in the north had fewer than 20 weeks of insurable employment. Most northern claimants with fewer than 20 weeks of insurable employment were located in the predominantly aboriginal communities of the Northwest Territories.

Construction, a seasonal activity, is negatively affected. In the north construction is a very compressed season. Construction workers make up the single largest occupation group collecting unemployment insurance in the Northwest Territories. Close to 25 per cent of all the UI claimants are construction workers.

The change which increases the penalty for voluntary job leavers is going to penalize unfairly many people who are forced to leave jobs for family reasons that are beyond their control.

Many people in the north who are eligible for unemployment insurance benefits do not receive them. This is certainly true for many Inuit in the eastern Arctic. People do not even bother to apply because the forms are complex; they are written only in English or French; mail service is poor; and the system is difficult to understand. Inuktitut is the majority language in the central and eastern Arctic, but the forms are not available in that language. Many women working in arts and crafts, the carvers, and the hunters and trappers generally do not get on the unemployment insurance rolls.

Northerners, particularly in my constituency, also do not have access to the full service employment centres that southern Canadians take for granted. The Kitikmeot region, for example, has no Canada Employment and Immigration officer. At the recent fall general meeting of the Kitikmeot regional council, a resolution was passed requesting such a position. The resolution states that the Kitikmeot regional council requires this position to assist in the development of training and employment opportunities and to enhance the region's capabilities of getting resources allocated to these programs. I urge the government to respond positively to this resolution.

As I mentioned earlier, unemployment rates vary throughout the Northwest Territories, reflecting the fact that there are two economies within the Northwest Territories. In the more developed economies the wage economy is established and the rates of unemployment are relatively low. Yellowknife, for example, has an unemployment rate of about 5 per cent.

In the underdeveloped economies the situation is vastly and tragically different. These are the mainly aboriginal communities, some 46 of them, the smaller and more isolated ones. In the communities unemployment rates are high. They can be as much as 50 per cent or higher.

Half of the population of the Northwest Territories lives in these underdeveloped communities. Every year more than 500 young people reach the labour force age.

In the winter of 1989 the aboriginal unemployment rate was six times higher than the non-aboriginal rate. Unemployment was highest for young people aged 15 to 24. Regionally youth unemployment was 49 per cent in the Kitikmeot region, 34 per cent in the Baffin, 31 per cent in the Keewatin region, 28 per cent in the Inuvik, and 20 per cent in the Fort Smith region. These unemployment rates are staggering. They would never be permitted to go as high in southern Canada, yet they are a reality in the north and have been for some time. The government does not seem to be concerned at all.

The northern economy is not producing enough jobs to meet the demands of the number of people entering the wage economy. Communities do not have a base for employment.

In the underdeveloped communities education and skill levels are low and correspondingly so are average incomes. The dilemma facing aboriginal people in these communities, however, is that even if education and skill levels were developed higher, there is a lack of viable employment opportunities in their communities. We need economic development. We need more and better education, more and better training, educational training that is appropriate for the north, and training that supports the mixed economies of the underdeveloped communities that still rely a great deal on the traditional hunting and trapping activities.

Programs developed in the south by southerners most often do not work in the north. This view was recently echoed in the report last month of the Special Committee on the Northern Economy, a committee of the legislative assembly for the Northwest Territories. As this report points out, the north needs programs and policies that are tailor–made to the north's unique requirements. Many federal programs and transfer agreements do not respond to northern needs, either because they are poorly targeted, designed for other areas of the country and then adapted to the north, or because they contain too many strings.

The report states that in terms of economic development these federal programs and transfer agreements are often counterproductive. The report recommends that the federal transfer agreements and the programs be reviewed so that they support rather than work against economic development initiatives.

Canada employment programs are included on the list of programs requiring review. All adult education and training programs are recommended for review. A major restructuring is required.

Rather than finding ways to remove northerners from the unemployment insurance rolls, the government should be directing its efforts toward increasing employment opportunities and economic development in the north. Assistance in alleviating the northern housing crisis and providing more affordable day care would go a long way toward assisting people who are willing to work but cannot because of circumstances beyond their control.

Unemployment insurance is an important income support for many communities in the north. It puts food on the table. It helps people buy the equipment and supplies they need to hunt, trap, and fish which supplement their wages and provides additional food for their families.

In conclusion, the changes to the unemployment insurance system contained in this bill will force more people on to welfare and social assistance. The territorial and provincial governments will have this additional burden. The territorial government will have to absorb this burden at a time when the federal government is threatening to reduce the formula funding to the territorial government.

We have no assurance that significant training dollars will go to the north. It is very possible that the dollars saved by the government in reducing our northern workers' benefit entitlement period will be used to train southern workers who will subsequently come north to work.

This bill hurts the north and northern workers. For this reason I oppose it.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have an opportunity to stand and speak on third reading of this bill, a debate that seems to have been going on now for several months.

It is my view that Bill C–21 and the new approach to unemployment insurance that is part of this bill are going to be good for Canada. They are going to be good for Nova Scotia. In my opinion they are going to be good for the people of the South Shore whom I have the honour to represent in this House.

I find it amazing and have found it amazing during the short year that I have been a member of this House how there seems to be an approach frequently taken that if an idea emanates from the government in the opinion of those opposite it is automatically deemed to be a bad idea and an unacceptable one. I never understand why we cannot have a more constructive approach, not only to legislation but to the government of this country.

• (1550)

It seems that when a measure is brought forward that is the result of many years of study and deliberation, a measure that is long overdue in terms of updating Canada's unemployment insurance system, we hear nothing but doom and gloom and negativism from members on the other side or specious arguments such as the one I heard this morning from my hon. friend for Surrey North who said that this bill represents nothing but an attempt to harmonize Canada's unemployment insurance system with that of the United States. Of course that is nothing but balderdash and nonsense inasmuch as our systems are totally different and we in this country or at least on this side of the House believe it is the job of government to design, plan and implement programs that are in the interests of Canadians. That is what I believe this bill does.

I support this bill because I believe that what it does is move our system toward the 21st century in providing an active rather than a passive approach to unemployment. Our goal is to prepare people for jobs, to assist them in finding those jobs, and to make sure that those jobs exist when people are seeking them.

I must say that although job creation directly is not the purpose of Bill C–21, it is something that this government has a most enviable record at, having created over a million and a half jobs during the five years that we have been in power. We can look backward or we can suggest, as seems to be the aspirations of members opposite, that we should have a system that pays people to sit home. I do not think that is what Canadians want. It is certainly not what people in my part of Nova Scotia want.

What people in our area want is an opportunity to have meaningful, full-time employment that will not only provide them with the resources they need, the money they need to support their families and to maintain their lifestyle but which indeed will give them some personal satisfaction as well.

An unemployment insurance system is—and I think it is very well recognized in this bill—a safety net for people who find themselves in a circumstance of unemployment. Perhaps it is a temporary thing. Perhaps it is because we have a changing economy and a changing society and people have to be prepared to cope with the implications of those changes.

Change, after all, is a part of history. Change has been with us forever and will to be with us forever. What we need is the courage to face the challenge that comes with that change. I think this bill, in seeking to maintain that safety net while at the same time discouraging use of the funds by those who do not necessarily need it, is unquestionably a step in the right direction.

We are all aware of the economic and fiscal difficulties faced by the country and by the government. People say every day that the place to start in bringing down the deficit is for the government to restrain its own expenditures. One way the government can do that is by making sure that we use those funds, that we do that efficiently, effectively, and to the benefit of Canadians. That is one of the purposes of this bill which is a part of the economic program of the government.

I want to speak briefly in the time that remains on what I see as the impact of this legislation for the people of the South Shore of Nova Scotia. First and foremost I think they will benefit because of the additional funding that is going to be made available through programs of the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

We were delighted last Thursday when the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced that she had designated Shelburne County, Nova Scotia for a Community Futures Program. There have been people working in that area on the consultative committee in Shelburne to bring this day to fruition. Of course the victory that is represented by that designation is theirs as much as it is the minister's, but it is to the minister's credit that she recognized that need and responded to it.

One of the reasons that she is able to respond positively to that, as well as to the request for Inverness and Richmond counties in Nova Scotia for a Community Futures Program, is that the funding is going to be available to enhance community futures. That is one of the direct benefits that is resulting from this bill. Similarly, additional funding will go into the industrial adjustment service from which we on the South Shore have benefited so significantly through programs now being put in place in Port Mouton and in Lockeport.

I might say that I have found during my short stint as a member of Parliament to date that nothing serves the people better than a good working relationship between members of Parliament and public servants working in their area. We are extremely fortunate in the South Shore of Nova Scotia in that we have a man like Jim Brown heading up our CEIC office in Bridgewater who is now working to put together very effective industrial adjustment service programs which benefit our people. I deem it an honour and a privilege to work with people like Jim Brown. The result is to the benefit of the people in our area.

Second, I want to say that I am very pleased that this bill recognizes the unique situation of fishermen and preserves fishermen's benefits as they exist. I think that quite often people do not understand why fishermen are treated differently. Fishermen are the only self-employed individuals who participate in the unemployment insurance plan. It is because their resource is managed directly by government. It is the only resource that is, and fishermen find themselves from time to time having the fishery closed. They are not allowed to go to work as a direct result of a government decision. As a consequence since 1957 government has recognized this and fishermen have been participants within the plan.

People have often asked: "Why can't plant workers be a part of that as well?" After all, the employment opportunities of plant workers are directly related to whether or not the fishery is in operation. Of course, plant workers are employees; they are not self-employed. Therefore to open the door of opportunity to plant workers not to participate in the plan in the same way as all other employed workers in Canada would be inconsistent with the unemployment insurance system. Under Section 15(1) of the Charter it would open the door for all employed Canadians to want to be participants in the same way. Fishermen are in a unique circumstance and have to be recognized in that way.

Plant workers and other seasonal workers in the South Shore will also benefit from this bill. There is some concern that the increased entrance requirements may negatively impact people working in the fishing industry. This will not be the case in the South Shore because given the unemployment rates in our area there will be an increased entrance requirement of six weeks throughout the area.

The repeater clause is being removed. For members who may not be aware of it the repeater clause states that if you have drawn in the last year you have a penalty of six weeks applied to you should you wish to enter another claim. In fact we end up with a circumstance whereby although the entrance requirement is increased by six weeks, the six weeks is then taken away again by the removal of the repeater clause that would have put an additional six weeks in. The net result ends up being the same.

We will also benefit from the announcement the minister made last Friday with respect to the $3 million being made available under the job creation fund to assist Atlantic Canadians who are being impacted by the current fisheries downturn. In Nova Scotia, $400,000 of that fund is being targeted for our province.

Indeed should plant workers in our area find that they are caught by the downturn, those funds will be made available as they have in previous years in Newfoundland and New Brunswick. We very much welcome that announcement and thank the minister for it. I am sure that should those funds not prove to be satisfactory we can again look to the minister to recognize our need, as she has done so well to date.

In conclusion, I would just like to say that I think Bill C-21 is a long overdue step in the right direction of overhauling our unemployment insurance. I think all Canadians will ultimately benefit, particularly if we look at the change within the context of other excellent work being done by the government in terms of the growth of our economy and fiscal restraint. I believe Canadians will benefit. I believe Nova Scotians will benefit. I encourage all members of the House to support this excellent measure.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to add my comments to the debate on Bill C-21. This bill has demanded an awful lot of attention and an awful lot of time by members in this House and by various groups and individual Canadians across the country.

Our committee travelled across Canada visiting all 10 provinces, listening to groups and to individual Canadians. The input we received was good. As has been pointed out, it was not always complimentary to the government and not all people agreed with us.

Something that I felt was very, very positive was the input by members opposite, members of our committee and the groups that did make presentations. I felt that all of us on the committee benefited. We all learned. We were all challenged to think about our positions, and I think we all came out of it richer for the experience. There was a common element in every presentation we received in all of the debate. All presenters wanted the same thing. They wanted what is best for the Canadian people. We perhaps disagree as to how we can best achieve what is best, but we all have the interests of the Canadian people at heart.

We heard from many groups coast to coast. A personal disappointment I had was that we had very few representations from individuals. The reason I found this disappointing was that we had statistics and projections based on those statistics.

• (1600)

We had those projections done nationally, provincially, and regionally. But for the person who, through no fault of their own is unemployed, statistics are meaningless, for the individual unemployment means 100 per cent and the projections do not mean a thing.

The basis of all productivity in Canada is the individual Canadian. Our people are the most valuable resources that we have available to us. The changes represented in this bill are, in my opinion, part of a nation-wide drive that is going to achieve a vital economic objective, better and wiser use of our human resources.

The drive for this improvement officially got under way last April with the announcement of outlines of the new Canadian labour force development strategy, a package of specific measures designed to make this country more competitive by improving our use of human skills and energy.

For some reason, Canadian business has not developed a climate of training that exists in many other industrialized countries. The Canadian labour market has simply not been putting enough effort into its own human resource development. In that sense, this strategy amounts to a war against waste, and to help win that war we are mobilizing, through Bill C-21, the potential of our unemployment insurance program to be a positive tool for training and for skill development.

Waste is happening at just about every stage in our labour market, starting with the job entry level itself. An unacceptable percentage of young Canadians lack the basic skills they need to fulfil their first jobs. The average high school dropout rate across this nation is 30 per cent, an unacceptable level. All this is on the eve of the 1990s, a decade in which every forecast tells us that most new jobs will require a minimum of 12 years of education.

Education and training issues are of course very complex. They are involving provincial jurisdictions and regional labour market needs and fast-changing skills. Ten years ago, who would have thought how important computer skills would be in a modern office.

The federal government is not solely responsible for developing a highly skilled and educated workforce. What we can do is to act as a facilitator. Through the labour force development strategy we have established a co-operative framework that will involve educators, the provinces, unions, employers, and individual Canadians as never before.

Under this strategy, we are putting $100 million of additional funding into basic entry level training, above and beyond the $484.4 million that we are spending in that area today.

These and other measures, many with the private sector in the lead role, are geared to increasing our ability to compete globally. But we will never completely succeed as long as there are unemployed Canadians who can't find work because they lack the right skills.

Section 26 of the Unemployment Insurance Act presently allows us to train people who are out of work. Today we are spending some $350 million out of a total $13 billion budget in unemployment insurance in exercising that option. We are going to double that allotment to $700 million. Here too, the plan calls for direct involvement by business and labour as sponsors and as actual operators of training programs. We will support and facilitate their initiatives.

We are also putting another $150 million into programs for people who face special difficulties getting back into the work force, and people who are on social assistance. Although I resent the implication that 45 makes you an older worker, Mr. Speaker, there are measures for older workers. That is another fact that is coming up and is very important. Any program, any institutionalized practice which discourages a capable Canadian from working simply because of a birth date is wasteful and discriminatory. The unemployment insurance program does that right now. As soon as Canadians turn 65, regardless of their ability or their ambition, it is as if they drop through a trap door. They cannot contribute and they cannot be covered. The proposed amendments will enable these older Canadians to remain eligible for unemployment insurance coverage as long as they choose to continue to work.

This and other measures proposed in Bill C–21 represent a new and intelligent application of this country's unemployment insurance system, an application that will give the system greater relevance and a long overdue developmental orientation. Let there be no doubt, unemployment insurance remains a vital stabilizing force in Canadian society. It will still be there when the mainstream of earnings is interrupted, helping individuals and communities ride out tough times. But it should now do more than pay someone not to work. It will also serve as a bridge back to employment and the creation of a more skilled workforce.

The problem with unemployment insurance in Canada is that it has almost become a disincentive to work, and has not done enough to help workers gain skills necessary to succeed. The features of the program which act as a disincentive to re-employment make the system far more costly than it needs to be. We are changing the system to correct these flaws and to unlock significant sums of money for more constructive use.

Unemployment insurance programs in every nation have a qualifying period, the number of weeks one must work in order to qualify for benefits. The Canadian qualifying period is dramatically shorter than that of West Germany, Japan, or most other industrialized countries. It now ranges from 10 to 14 weeks depending on the unemployment rate in the claimant's region. We are changing that to range from 10 to 20 weeks. As in the past, the actual rate that applies will depend on the employment conditions in the region in which the applicant lives. We are also reducing the duration of benefits in this bill. Again, it is not across the board, but in a pattern that is linked to the level of unemployment in each area.

Through Bill C–21 we also intend to change the way the system relates to people who quit their jobs voluntarily, without just cause, and with no other job to go to. I would like to be clear about the reasoning behind that. It is every Canadian's God-given right to tell the boss to go fly a kite on any day of the week. Perhaps that is an exaggeration. It is not a divine right, but it is certainly the right of any Canadian to exercise the option to work or not to work for whomever they want. Where the employee has a just cause for quitting that job he or she should have the ability to resort to unemployment insurance. Very few Canadians contributing to the unemployment insurance program would agree that they should pay for such a gesture where there is no just cause for quitting.

All members of our committee, and I am sure that all members of this House would agree that unsafe working conditions or sexual harassment are just cause. However, there are still others who have walked away without that cause. It is a small percentage, as has been pointed out, but it is still not a minor problem. Payments to people in this category are around the $1 billion level and climbing. Under the changes we propose, people in this category will henceforth face a delay in benefits of 7 to 12 weeks. We are stiffening the penalties for fraudulent use of the program. These changes are going to liberate about $1.3 billion which can be redeployed. This money will be used in constructive employment-oriented initiatives, initiatives which will involve all players in our labour market in a co-ordinated effort to mobilize and upgrade our human resources.

In the past, unemployment insurance has been compared to a web where claimants would get caught up, could not disentangle themselves and would become involved in a recurring cycle. I would like to suggest that UI is still going to provide an essential safety net for Canadians, but it will no longer be a web. The proposed changes to Bill C–21, in the context of the labour force development strategy, can go far beyond that. It can become a bridge to help individual Canadians and our labour market as a whole meet the competitive challenges that lie ahead. That is what we are proposing.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, this bill is another blow to the people of Atlantic Canada, New Brunswick, and particularly to the people of my riding. The Mulroney government has already created a very negative economic situation in Canada and in our area.

The Mulroney policy of raising interest rates, according to most experts, is leading our country towards a recession. The raising of taxes lowers disposable income and makes it more difficult for people to make ends meet. The cutting of VIA Rail is a disaster by any judgment. The loss of jobs in a deal in which the Prime Minister was stripped of his pants by a laughing Ronald Reagan. The threat to transfer payments to the provinces, which the provinces have an absolute right to rely on. That is another broken social contract.

The government is making it increasingly difficult for the people of Canada and the people of Miramichi to find and hold jobs, and at the same time it is reducing the protection that the government of Canada has offered to them during times of unemployment.

This is totally insensitive, cruel, and a betrayal. The effect on many people from Miramichi, and elsewhere in Canada, is that their purchasing power becomes less and less. They are going to have a harder time to make ends meet, to get ahead in life, to buy a house, to rear their children, to fulfil their dreams. In fact, Mr. Speaker, this government seems intent on destroying as many dreams as possible.

The Mulroney government is now cutting $1.3 billion from the unemployment insurance program to reallocate about $800 million to training programs and another $500 million to correct some inequities that the courts advised the government to correct. But in the process, it is also getting out of the UI program and leaving it to the workers and the employers. This is very scary because it is probably going to lead to the end of the UI program, especially in view of the free trade context. There could be pressure put on companies to sacrifice their contributions to the social contract that we have always had in this country.

The big argument that we heard from the government in favour of this savage bill is that it wants to put people to work and this is the reason it is going to put more money into training programs. Once again the Prime Minister says one thing and does another. I want to make it clear, and everybody knows it anyway, that we Liberals have been pushing the government for more training, agree with the principle of training. We cannot agree, however, that the government should take money that has been allocated to the unemployment insurance scheme, a social contract, and unilaterally break that contract to divert the money to other programs.

The UI program is for the purpose of training. The money should come from somewhere else for this new program, because here the Mulroney government is in fact picking the pockets of those most in need in order to improve its training programs. It is wrong. The Mulroney government is choosing with this bill to unilaterally break this contract and direct this money somewhere else. If it were done by a private company or by an individual, it would be called fraud. The Mulroney government is actually ready to perpetrate fraud over the UI fund, a fraud of $800 million from the pockets of Canadian workers. We have grown accustomed to this type of behaviour from the government.

If people want to benefit from those training programs, most of them will have to move to big centres like Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa, or the Prime Minister's favourite country, the U.S.A. For some people this is just fine. They will be happy with that. For others, parents with young families, single mothers or fathers, older workers, people who represent the majority in this country, it will not be easy. This is not what Canada is about. Every region and everyone in this beautiful country love their region because that is where they make their living and is, in most case, where their roots are.

Not all people in Canada are obsessed with material possessions, money, and so–called power and glory, as the Prime Minister seems to be. Many people in my area have much higher values, and this is part of the reason why they chose to make their living in New Brunswick.

The government's obsession with materialism is in fact going to lead just about all Canadians to live in big centres and fight like crazy for the so–called competitive edge. In the end, if no one stops the government, it is going to destroy the country.

Those who will be affected by this legislation will have to eat, in many cases, they will need help from somewhere. The provincial governments have to pick up the shortfall from the folly of this federal government. Where is the money going to come from? It has to come from the same pockets of the same taxpayers as the federal government gets its money from. Therefore, this government is simply shifting the burden from the national government to the individual provincial governments which are in no way equivalent to a federal government, do not have the resources, and the poorer the province, obviously the poorer the benefits the people are going to get.

The government has also devastated the benefits of fishermen and of other seasonal workers like lumbermen. There is no way that this can be called an equitable program because it is not based on equity. You have to understand, Mr. Speaker, that in a riding like mine, for instance, the main industries are seasonal. This is why we have an unemployment rate which is around 13 per cent officially. In reality, the unemployment rate is around 20 to 30 per cent in many communities, and this pertains all year round, but it goes as high as 40 and 50 per cent in the wintertime.

This is where the legislation does not make any sense. These people where real unemployment is so high will have to work longer periods to receive UI benefits. Where are they going to go to get that work? While the government thinks it is saving by gutting social programs, what it is actually doing is increasing costs of medical care, of lost production, of depression of the national spirit, and dissolving the will of people to fulfil their ambitions, to improve their lot, to make progress, and to contribute to the growth of the nation.

This country is rich in resources, both natural and human. This government has a great opportunity to develop these resources. Instead it is looking for ways and means to let others develop our country and its resources at the expense of our most precious resource, our people.

It is not too late for the government to take a different tack, to reorient itself to become a government of the people for the people and by the people. There is still time. There is still an opportunity to have this country achieve its full potential. Let us pursue that course rather than finding ways to turn back the hands of time to a bygone and discredited era of Toryism. We must vote against this very reactionary Tory bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On questions or comments, the Hon. Member for Northumberland.

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the comments of my colleague and the effects that this proposed bill that we are voting on today is going to have on his region of the country. I think everybody on this side of the House is extremely sympathetic to that. However, in fact it does affect every area of the country including my riding of Northumberland. I have had presentations made to me by many people and groups in the area.

I wanted to ask the member what his experience has been, because one of the groups that is particularly concerned in my riding is the municipal officials group. It is suggested, through statistics, that it is 2 per cent of the population that perhaps abuses the unemployment insurance system as it now exists.

Municipal officials in my riding are very concerned that the cuts proposed are going to raise the number of welfare cases in their municipalities by 50 per cent. For example, in Trenton, unemployment insurance now covers an average of 1,696 persons per year. That municipality feels it cannot support a 50 per cent rise in its welfare programs to pick up the slack from the unemployment cases.

Their other concern is that of the bulk of the recipients of unemployment insurance claims. Sixty–four per cent are in the 25 to 44 year age group, which is not the age group abusing the system. They are family people. They are people who very often live on wages below $25,000 a year. The disparity between men and women who will be affected in our area is as follows: 64 per cent are women versus 36 per cent male. I am wondering if the hon. member is hearing from municipal officials in his area on concerns about having to pick up the social safety net that the government is dumping on them through this bill.

• (1620)

Mr. Dionne: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. In the riding I represent we do not have any large cities. Large cities are generators of economic activity. The best we can do is two towns and a number of incorporated villages, and the rest of the riding is unincorporated area.

Those people who are going to be savaged by this government's attempt to rape the unemployment insurance scheme will find themselves in very dire straits when this bill is passed. The benefits are not going to be there. Of course, it is a great canard that the majority of people on welfare rip off the system. They do not. If the government is serious about having honesty and integrity in the system, there are better ways to do it than to try to gut the system itself.

In answer to the hon. member's question, the municipalities will have much more difficulty in providing welfare payments to people who have run out of unemployment insurance. They will have much more expense in caring for people who are suffering from depression, attempted suicides and all the rest that goes with that kind of Tory government.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I feel that only a short time is left in the debate on third reading of this bill, but I really must rise and state my strong opposition, and that of the people of my community, to what this bill intends to do, and that is to seriously damage and undermine our unemployment insurance system.

The government says that there has been ample time to debate this measure. The facts are quite to the contrary. There were only three days of debate on second reading. Second reading debate was cut off by government-imposed closure. The committee hearings lasted only four weeks. It is interesting that of the groups appearing before the committee 157 of 202 groups totally opposed Bill C-21. Report stage lasted only two days, and only two days have been allowed for third reading. This is again because of government-forced closure on the proceedings of the House with respect to Bill C-21.

If the government really believed that this bill was a good bill, if it really believed this bill was good for Canada, it would not have acted in this heartless and peremptory way to close off debate. The government is really trying to make it hard for Canadians to have their say through Parliament about just what this bill will do to them. The more Canadians look at this bill, the more it is clear why so many of them think that it is wrong our country.

What does this bill do? Basically, it forces working men and women in this country to pay more for unemployment insurance, but at the same time to get less. The bill lengthens waiting periods, it cuts benefit periods, and because the government contribution is going to be withdrawn, it will mean that workers and employers for that matter are going to pay higher premiums.

Why is the government operating in this way? It may be that the government has the idea that people on unemployment insurance are not really in trouble, and that if they really tried harder they could find jobs. The facts I think are quite the opposite. The experience in my own community, and the experience across Canada, is that people are on unemployment insurance because they do not have any meaningful alternative. If the jobs were there, they would be glad to go to work to support themselves and their families.

There might be another explanation, and that is linked with the government's free trade agreement with the United States. It is very interesting how this measure would bring our unemployment insurance system closer to that which is in existence in so many parts of the United States. The government talked about harmonization, the government talked about a level playing field, but I do not think Canadians expected or intended that this free trade agreement would result in pulling Canadian working men and women down to the lowest common denominator, down to the lowest level of benefit that is found in a number of the American states.

The government may well be trying to head off in this measure what could be challenges through the U.S. Trade Commission, what could well be very tough negotiations under the subsidy provisions of the free trade agreement which remain to be discussed. Surely this government should not be giving in before the battle has even started. This government should be willing to stand up for basic social programs in this country. In spite of American pressure it should be willing to stand up for the meaningful parts of the social contract, the fabric of this country.

What will be the result of this measure going into law? If we look at my own community, we will see that large numbers of people, perhaps thousands, will not have the protection they need when the key industry, the auto industry, in my community of Windsor goes into what is bound to be some sort of cyclical decline. The auto industry has been doing rather well for the past several years, but there are already signs of a downturn in that industry and this has been the experience over the years. There are periods of prosperity, of upward movement in the industry with higher or at least stable employment. This is followed by periods of downturn, of lower sales of automobiles, with resulting extensive layoffs of working men and women in my community and communities like it across this country.

The people who will be laid off when the auto industry goes into a downturn will not have any alternatives. It will not do the government any good to say there will be training programs available. There is no guarantee under this bill that there will be additional training programs available in my city of Windsor or any particular city, and no guarantee that people taking any added training programs will have jobs available to them as a result. In fact, in the city of Windsor, if the automobile industry and related industries are in a severe downturn, there simply are not any alternatives. Because of this cruel and heartless bill, when the auto industry enters into the downturn which many fear is very close, there will not be any alternative but food banks or municipal welfare. This will increase the burden on municipalities, provincial governments and the taxpayers who support them, basically all of us in this country. If this measure is in some way linked to the free trade agreement then certainly instead of using it to cut back benefits under the unemployment insurance program and lengthening periods required to be spent before qualifying for unemployment insurance, this bill should have provided what the Prime Minister promised. He promised a generous adjustment program for workers who would be losing their jobs because of the free trade agreement.

Not only does this measure contain nothing of the kind, it cuts back, undermines and takes away the kinds of benefits that we have already and which people will need increasingly as the negative effects of the government's free trade deal with the United States are felt in communities across this country, especially communities with some kind of industrial base.

The government through this bill has not only broken another promise in not providing a generous adjustment program, it has also broken its promise that it would not undermine but would instead strengthen basic social programs. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is typical of what this government has done, especially since being returned to office last fall. It has brought forward a measure to claw back, to cut the old age pension and family allowance for large numbers of Canadians. This is something that I predict will affect even larger numbers in years to come. It will cut back our basic rail passenger transportation service in its measures to cut VIA Rail. Now it is bringing forward this measure to seriously undermine our unemployment insurance system.

Lurking on the horizon is the horrendous goods and services tax, that grief and suffering tax, which will make every one of us in this country pay more for just about everything we buy, whether it is manufactured goods or services. Here we see the glimmerings of a less than secret agenda to drastically change this country and to drastically undermine the basic social fabric which has made us proud to be Canadians. Until now, our country has been one where individual initiative has had its place, where the market system has had its place, but also we have had a basic foundation of measures like our unemployment insurance program to make sure that no matter what happens people have the basis for a decent existence for themselves and their families.

As I have said, the secret agenda is becoming more and more evident. The agenda of this Conservative government is one of callousness, heartlessness, it is one of less and less concern for working people in this country.

I call upon all members of this House to defeat this bill when it comes up for final third reading vote in a very few minutes. If this bill is not defeated, if the Conservative majority listens to the demands and orders of its leadership, then there is no doubt in my mind, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Canada will not forget what is being done to them through this secret Conservative agenda which is becoming more and more evident and this Conservative government will be soundly defeated in the next election. But until that time, if this bill passes, then hundreds of thousands of Canadians who will lose their unemployment insurance benefits or have them severely cut back will have to go through a period of totally unnecessary suffering for themselves and their families.

This is wrong, Mr. Speaker, and I call upon this House to defeat this bill.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member who preceded me for his very impassioned plea that the government listen to this last minute effort to stop this piece of legislation which is going to be harmful to so many Canadians and particularly the people in Winnipeg.

Would my colleague comment on a situation, for example, where the unemployment rate in Winnipeg now stands at 8.5 per cent, up from 7.9 per cent last year. Winnipeg is now fourth out of eleven major Canadian cities as far as this unfortunate statistic is concerned.

In rural and northern Manitoba unemployment rates are even higher. Unemployment rates run from 27 per cent in villages in the Interlake area of Manitoba to 90 per cent on reserves and northern communities. Thousands of people are not even counted in the government's figures because they are chronically unemployed or have never had an opportunity to get a job.

When I listen to the government side speak I am reminded of what John Kenneth Galbraith said about Ronald Reagan. Ronald Reagan's economic strategy was based on the fact that he thought the rich did not work because they pay too many taxes and the poor did not work because they made too much money, so he stopped taxing the rich and started taxing the poor.

This bill is a variation of this thesis. The government has taken the strategy that the way to improve the condition of working people across the country is to give them less security, less assistance and to put them up against the wall.

If you take a vulnerable economy, Manitoba's, where so many people are hurt, it is hard to believe that this government thinks this strategy is going to be helpful in any way, shape or form.

Does he think Manitoba is going to be spared this awful legislation, or will they be hurt like people in his part of the country?

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I will give a very brief reply because I am very interested in hearing what the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester says about this matter.

I regret to say that the province of Manitoba and the city of Winnipeg in particular will not be spared the harmful effects of this very backward piece of legislation. It will be damaged just like the rest of the country and I hope the people of Manitoba will remember this when they next come to pass judgment on the Conservatives. Certainly if they remember it, and the effects of this legislation will be before them every day, then this government will not survive the next election.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, in 1984, the national unemployment rate was 11.6 per cent. In August 1989, unemployment had dropped to 7.4 per cent. Since 1984, this government has created 1,500,000 jobs. Ninety-six per cent or 1,300,000 were full-time jobs, while 200,000 were part-time jobs. Mr. Speaker, of these 1,500,000 jobs, 677,000 were filled by men and 878,000 by women.

Mr. Speaker, the new labour force development strategy involves reallocating $1.3 billion of the unemployment insurance budget to upgrading the labour force. A total of $1.8 billion will be allocated to the Canadian job strategy and training, to upgrade skill levels of workers across the country. In 1990, the government wants the labour force to be highly qualified in order to be competitive on international markets. In the past, our strength was derived from our natural resources, which were our only resource. Today, being competitive depends more on the skills of our workers.

Mr. Speaker, our competitors are improving productivity in the fields of technology, innovation, education and occupational training. Between 1990 and the year 2000, our workers will need a knowledge of and expertise in data processing, communications and robotics, as well as analytic skills. Canada's labour force must have the highest possible level of education. More Canadians are graduating from high school and more and more are becoming professionals. Unfortunately, an average of 30 per cent still drop out of high school.

Basic skills are a prerequisite for acquiring the most sophisticated professional skills. By the year 2000, 50 per cent of Canadian jobs will require more than five years of education and professional training beyond the secondary level. Every year, more than one million Canadians have trouble finding jobs because of their lack of skills.

Mr. Speaker, the government is committed to implementing a broad strategy to keep pace with developing markets in the 1990s. It intends to maintain the principal functions of our social security and income-support system. Mr. Speaker, the government intends to increase active measures to assist employment, as opposed to passive income maintenance. Changes in the unemployment insurance system's entrance criteria should also reduce work disincentives.

By 1994, the government intends to attract additional investment of $1.5 billion annually in training. It expects to reach that goal through private sector training and skills upgrading programs.

The labour force development strategy will be a catalyst for economic activity. An expanded community futures program and increased support for entrepreneurs and the Canadian job strategy are all factors that will help increase employment opportunities.

• (1640)

Of the $1.3 billion that will be reallocated, $500 million will be used to enhance unemployment insurance coverage for new parents and workers over 65, while $775 million will be spent on skills upgrading.

Mr. Speaker, the government has allocated $100 million to support training for newcomers to the labour force. These resources should help provide training for between 40,000 and 50,000 new arrivals on the labour market. Employers, especially small businesses, will be able to use this opportunity to meet their employment needs. Nearly 25 per cent of our businesses offer structured training. The private sector spends about $1.4 billion on this type of training. A recent survey by Statistics Canada revealed that 14 per cent of Canadian manufacturers were experiencing production problems because of a lack of skilled workers. The Canadian Manufacturers Association indicates that 36 per cent of its members are faced with a shortage of skilled labour, while the Canadian Federation of Independent Business has pointed out that 43 per cent of its members are unable to hire workers with the requisite skills.

In Canada, unemployment insurance benefits as a percentage of our gross domestic product are about 285 per cent of what they are in the United States. On the other hand, they are about 70 per cent below the level of spending on that item in Belgium. Since the scope of the Canadian system comes closer to that of the Belgian system, would it not be more accurate to say that we are harmonizing our unemployment system with the Belgian system, which is more generous?

As for harmonizing our system with the unemployment insurance system in the United States, that is out of the question, because the system would be far less generous and its overall impact would remain the same after the reform. Canada's unemployment insurance system is and will continue to be vastly superior to that of the United States. The changes proposed as part of the labour force development strategy constitute a policy that is made in Canada. It considers aspects that are typical of our country, including the seasonal nature of employment in certain regions.

Canada's unemployment insurance system is much broader and more comprehensive than the American system. The Canadian system provides income protection during maternity and sick leave. That is not the case under the American system. The Canadian system provides income protection for seasonal workers, which is not the case in the United States. The benefit period provided under the Canadian system is much longer than that provided in any American state.

Mr. Speaker, generally speaking, weekly benefits are higher in Canada than in the United States: 60 per cent of previous remuneration in Canada, as compared to 50 per cent in the United States. Extended benefits based on the regional unemployment rate are much higher in Canada than in the United States.

PRIVILEGE

BUDGET LEAK—RCMP TESTIMONY

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House that I have received, in appropriate form, a notice of an application on a question of privilege. The hon. member for Oshawa.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of the House the possibility, and I emphasize "the possibility", of a contempt of Parliament, which is an extremely serious matter as all members of the House would agree.

I am seeking a ruling from Your Honour as to whether or not a prima facie case can be made on this important subject. If so, I would be willing to move, at the end of my brief comments, the appropriate motion.

Your Honour, my concern arises from conflicting testimony. One set of testimony occurred before a court of law in this city yesterday. The other occurred before a committee of the House earlier this year.

Your Honour, on June 13 the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Mr. Norman Inkster, appeared before the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General. The bulk of the questions put to the Commissioner on that day concerned the investigation by the RCMP of the budget leak that took place in April of this year and the subsequent laying of charges against a number of individuals by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Members of the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party repeatedly asked the Commissioner about the possibility of political interference in that process. In reply to questions put by a New Democrat member of Parliament, the member for Victoria, the Commissioner of the RCMP said the following:

> The officer who investigated the case swore that he had reasonable and probable grounds to believe that a crime had been committed.

He went on to say:

> The atmosphere in which the investigation was conducted had no influence on the outcome of the investigation.

A third quote from a number of others that might be selected on the same subject, in reply to the member for Victoria the Commissioner stated:

> In all this investigation there has never been any political influence.

By the way, this evidence of Mr. Inkster was reported back to the House in a report on the Estimates for 1989-90. So it is a subject matter that has left the committee and is now before the House of Commons. Yesterday, in a court here in the city of Ottawa, Staff Sergeant Richard Jordan provided evidence that completely contradicted what Commissioner Inkster had to say. The court—

Mr. Speaker: I have allowed the hon. member to proceed and I think his point is made. It is not necessary for the Chair to go into what somebody did or did not say in the courtroom and I remind hon. members that that evidence may not even be concluded yet.

However, I have the point that the hon. member is making and I would ask him to continue his argument. He does not need to go into what was or was not said yesterday. The point that the hon. member is making is that both in the courtroom and as reported in the press there are statements which, at least allegedly, might be taken as contradictory to the statement which is on the public record, of course, made earlier by another member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to which the hon. member has referred. So I would ask the hon. member to conclude his remarks.

Mr. Broadbent: Of course I respect what you have had to say and I simply give one quote to make my point that there is a contradiction. Yesterday Staff Sergeant Richard Jordan stated:

> I did not lay these charges because I had formed the opinion that they were intended to please elected officials.

He said similar things that contradicted what Commissioner Inkster had to say. When he refused to lay such charges he was taken off the case.

My point, Your Honour, is this. Either there was a contempt of the court yesterday by Staff Sergeant Jordan, or there was contempt of Parliament earlier by Commissioner Inkster.

The very possibility of a contempt of Parliament is extremely serious, it does not need emphasis here in the House. Therefore, Your Honour, if you consider that I have a prima facie case I will move the appropriate motion to have this subject referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

• (1110)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, as I see this point of privilege by the hon. leader of the NDP, essentially we are up against the same issue we were up against yesterday and that is the question of sub judice.

We argued yesterday, and I do not want to go back through the Erskine May or the Beauchesne arguments because I think they are clearly on the record and I do not want to take the time of the House.

However, we have very serious concerns that in fact this whole issue is sub judice and will have an impact on the trial. I would like to take a couple of moments to read from a notice of motion which was to be filed on Monday, November 6, at ten o'clock. It is, of course, the motion calling for an order staying all proceedings against all of the accused in this matter.

The grounds of the motion are, and this is what I would like to refer to:

> 1. This proceeding is an abuse of the process of this court in that:
> (a) the charges against all of the accused have an improper motive in that the charge was laid and the proceedings continued in an attempt by the Executive to achieve political ends unrelated to the valid exercise of the criminal law power;

In fact then, one of the fundamental elements of the total basis of this trial is whether or not this trial was politically motivated or whether in fact it is a trial arising out of criminal actions. That is the very substance of this court case.

So I would argue that not only was the matter raised yesterday sub judice, and we await your ruling on that one, but that this reference as well to a committee hearing is also sub judice and any reference to that issue which reflects in any way on that trial in this House by way of debate, by way of a point of privilege, by way of a point of order, or by way of a question, would in fact be sub judice.

I want to argue in the strongest possible terms that we believe that this issue is sub judice and even to raise it in the guise of a question of privilege falls under the same guidelines.

We indicated yesterday that we have no political problem with answering those questions at an appropriate time. But we are very much concerned with in any way appearing to contribute to a mistrial in a case that is presently before a court in this particular province.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I admire the ingenuity of my friend from Oshawa in the argument that he has put forward. What I took from his submission is the tremendous importance that Parliament deal with the substantive and fundamental issues that were raised by the questions that I attempted to ask in the House yesterday.

I took it also to indicate the importance that some way be found through the voluntary restraint that we impose on ourselves in the form of the sub judice rule in cases like this where fundamental questions going to the root of the responsibility of the RCMP and of the government be dealt with. I understand the argument from the parliamentary secretary is that the question is really the same as that which was raised yesterday.

I make this intervention looking forward with anticipation to your ruling on the questions raised yesterday.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that the spokesman for the government, the parliamentary secretary, says that we should not be mentioning the matter of the Small case in any way in this House and yet he reads out and puts on the record a motion that led to the testimony yesterday of Staff Sergeant Jordan. I suggest that the parliamentary secretary cannot have it both ways.

I want to go on to say that what is on the record in Parliament, and can certainly be referred to in this House, are the words of Commissioner Inkster to the committee.

If, rather than the staff sergeant's words being stated in court, they had been made in an interview to the press or a speech before an audience, then I doubt very much if the parliamentary secretary would be attempting to say that we cannot go into the implications of the his words in light of the testimony by Commissioner Inkster, apparently contradicting those words, before a parliamentary committee.

So, I ask you to consider, Sir, from the parliamentary perspective, which perspective deals with the words of Commissioner Inkster, why it should make any difference whether the words of the staff sergeant were stated in court rather than to a journalist or to a meeting or to somebody whom he ran into in the street. In all these cases the issue, I submit, arises with respect to whether what was said in a parliamentary committee gives rise to the issue of contempt of Parliament.

So, I respectfully suggest to you, Sir, that we want to be sensitive to the whole matter of sub judice. However I repeat briefly what I said yesterday, it is for the purpose of protecting the accused and ensuring the accused a fair trial. It should not be for the purpose of enabling the government in any way to escape its responsibilities.

So, I submit to you, Sir, that I think there could well be a basis for you to look favourably on the request which has been made to you. I do, however, want to say that while I think there is a basis for this, if you accept the request and rule that there is a prima facie case of privilege, our practice does require that the motion ask that the matter be sent to the Standing Committee on Elections and Privileges. But aside from that, I think that there is a basis for your accepting the request that there is a prima facie case of privilege. I respectfully make that submission.

Mr. Speaker: I think I have heard sufficient on this. I take it the hon. member for Oshawa is prepared to move the appropriate motion if I should decide that way.

There are two issues involved in this application. One of them, of course, is the general issue of sub judice to which the hon. parliamentary secretary has referred. The other is the issue of a situation which is taking place in a committee. Under all the circumstances, I will reserve and I will try to come back to the House and deal with both this issue and yesterday's issue at the same time.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—CONFIGURATION OF ECONOMIC REGIONS

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present today the new distribution of economic regions for the purposes of the unemployment insurance program, which will permit the Government to offer a fairer treatment to those who are without work.

In August 1988, as Minister of State for Employment and Immigration, I announced to Parliament that my Department would undertake a complete review of the economic regions used under the unemployment insurance program.

We must recall that the admissibility of a claimant is determined partially by the region in which he or she lives. The number of work weeks necessary to qualify as well as the duration of benefits depend on the unemployment rate of the individual's region of residence. From this, Mr. Speaker, comes the importance of defining economic boundaries that best reflect the unemployment rate in each region. Since the last revision twelve years ago, many changes have occurred within the Canadian labour market.

• (1120)

[English]

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to briefly provide some background information, putting into perspective the reason for the new configuration of the economic regions. The essential goal we set for ourselves was based on the principle of equity that underlies our system of unemployment insurance benefits. The concept of regional differentiation introduced into the unemployment insurance program in 1971 recognized the fact that the various regions of the country did not all offer the same employment opportunities and stability. At that time the country was divided into 16 economic regions as used by Statistics Canada.

[Translation]

In 1977, the introduction of the variable eligibility requirement for extended benefits made the program more sensitive and fairer towards regions with varying degrees of unemployment. Because of this, boundary definitions became a determining factor in qualifying for unemployment insurance benefits.

In 1978, the number of regions increased to 48, with a revision of the system and a structural adjustment to the new realities of the country. Since then and especially since the last recession, the different regional economies have developed throughout the country. The regions defined in 1978 no longer fully meet the new socio–economic realites.

[English]

Labour markets change constantly depending on whether the number of key industries in a region is increasing or decreasing. They also undergo significant alterations as changes occur in population trends. We must take these fluctuations into account to deal fairly with the unemployed.

[Translation]

As the unemployment insurance program must closely match regional unemployment levels, it is important that the economic boundaries coincide with Canadian realities. We are talking about a fundamental question of justice and willingness to better serve our clientele. It is therefore essential that we define and set up the economic regions so as to reflect the regional variations affecting employment prospects.

Our Government wishes to promote equal opportunities, ensure a fair distribution of available resources and reach our clientele in an efficient manner no matter where they live in Canada. These are the principles that guided us in our study of the economic regions. We did not hesitate to do everything necessary for a serious, thorough study to reach our objectives.

Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that this study of the Canadian labour market is one of the most thorough and detailed since the 1960s. Certainly the task was complex. However, one type of geographic unit constitutes a distinct labour market: the large urban centre. Therefore, metropolitan census areas were separated from rural regions in creating the new economic regions. Our methodology is based on this urban/rural distinction.

In accordance with the new configuration that I have the pleasure to present today, the 48 regions which have existed since 1978 will henceforth be replaced by 62 new regions: 26 metropolitan and 36 rural.

[English]

The new configuration is in keeping with the objectives that the government has set for itself. All areas of the country are now divided into a much more homogeneous labour market. With the labour market defined by the new economic regions, we will be able to evaluate more fairly the employment opportunities that exist for unemployment insurance recipients in their areas.

[Translation]

Since rural regions and large urban centres are distinct, the unemployment rates in rural areas will be less affected by the economic activity of their neighboring metropolitan areas. The financial impact on the Government will be neutral and may change as unemployment rates change. This redistribution of economic regions was not dictated by financial reasons but by a desire to implement a just and equitable system which makes possible a more dependable calculation of regional unemployment rates.

Mr. Speaker, these new regional boundaries will take effect next January, at the same time as the measures announced by our Government last April, currently contained in Bill C-21.

As the new eligibility requirements and the amount to which recipients are entitled will vary with each 1 per cent change in the unemployment rate, it is necessary to implement better evaluation methods.

[English]

The new economic regions demonstrate our government's desire to deal as fairly as possible with those who need to use the safety net of unemployment insurance.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my first reaction to the government's statement this morning is to question why this report was delayed until today, the day after we had the final vote on Bill C-21 dealing with unemployment insurance. As you know, we have been debating that bill for the last several weeks. The government imposed closure. The final vote was last night and today we get the report of the government on the new unemployment insurance regions.

In order to understand Bill C-21 these new regions were very important, essential to a full understanding of that bill, because the bill implements new eligibility requirements and new benefit periods which are based on the regions in which you live. Yet the government has delayed this report to the day after we passed the bill.

This is typical of the government, which tries to hide information from the public and from Parliament so that we cannot have a full discussion. It is bad enough that the government imposed closure at all stages. We had one full day and two half days of debate on a very complicated and important bill at second reading. The government imposed closure once again at report stage and third reading and we did not get all the information that related to the bill until the day after the bill was completed.

I want to point out that, as the minister said, the last update on unemployment insurance regions was in 1978. But since about 1985-86 members on this side have been asking for an update of regions with respect to unemployment insurance. In particular, my colleague from Westmorland—Kent in New Brunswick has been asking for new regions. What we have heard this morning will not improve the situation.

The government says that the purpose of these new regions is equity and justice for the unemployed. Well, that will not be accomplished by the new map that the minister gives us this morning and I will explain why. It will not be accomplished because we have large numbers of unemployed in regions with low unemployment rates and under Bill C-21 it will be even more difficult for unemployed individuals in those regions to qualify for unemployment insurance.

Let me give you an example. In Toronto the unemployment rate is 3.4 per cent. That is the lowest in the country. It is virtually full employment. But there are still 68,000 individuals unemployed in the Toronto metropolitan region. In Newfoundland the unemployment rate was 17 per cent but the total number of unemployed was 41,000. In Nova Scotia the rate was 10.3 per cent but the total number of unemployed was 43,000. So we note that in Toronto, although there is an unemployment rate of 3.4 per cent, there are almost double the number of unemployed that there are in Newfoundland or in Nova Scotia. Under Bill C-21, because of the unemployment rate in Toronto, an individual will have to work for 20 weeks to qualify for unemployment insurance. They will have to wait for the maximum number of weeks to be qualified.

I point out that a report published this morning states that there are now 20,000 homeless people roaming the streets of Toronto and that 84,000 households depend on food banks. So the 3.4 per cent unemployment rate does not tell the whole story with respect to Toronto.

In Montreal the September unemployment rate was 8 per cent but there were 126,000 unemployed, which again goes way beyond the total number of unemployed in Newfoundland or in Nova Scotia. In Montreal, because of the unemployment rate, it will require 16 weeks of work to qualify while originally it had been ten weeks. In Vancouver the unemployment rate was 6.1 per cent in September but there were 51,000 unemployed.

• (1130)

To go back to Montreal, I raised this matter in the House in June when a report was published by the Montreal Commission for Economic Development. That commission pointed out that in 23 neighbourhoods in Montreal the unemployment rate was over 15 per cent, and in six neighbourhoods it was over 20 per cent. For example, the report pointed out that in Park Extension the unemployment rate was 21 per cent. In Plateau Mont Royal it was 18 per cent.

This new map which isolates the metropolitan regions so that they are hived off or separated from the rural regions may be a good thing for the rural region, but it does not answer the problem of equity. It does not answer the problem of justice because the new map has to be considered with the provisions of Bill C–21.

The minister in putting forward this map or this report this morning said that this is going to bring about equity and justice for the unemployed. I want to point out that in the last Parliament the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration in considering this matter stated: "Your committee supports the principle that the same treatment should be afforded claimants in all regions. A common program would provide more equitable and more compassionate treatment of disadvantaged persons in lower unemployment regions whose individual circumstances are not reflected by the regional unemployment rate".

The committee recommended a common entrance requirement of 10 weeks no matter where you live in Canada because individuals are affected by unemployment, not regions. The unemployed person in Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver, even though the unemployment rate may be lower than in the rural area, is just as hard hit as the person in the rural area. It is unfair to make this even worse by this new map that the minister has put forward today.

I referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration which stated that all unemployed claimants should be treated the same, and that we should have one common standard for the whole country. I also refer to the Forget Commission, a royal commission set up by the government in the last Parliament.

What did Mr. Forget in his royal commission say? The commission said "that the current program is perceived by many to be unfair, illogical and at variance with the principles of social insurance and overly complex. Different criteria are applied and different benefits are provided to individuals who are in similar circumstances. The entrance requirements are complicated and there are different benefit phases". It goes on to say "that the practice of basing eligibility on the local unemployment rate is unfair since that rate is a poor indicator of job opportunities".

Because of all those things this new map of unemployment regions put forward this morning may help in some rural areas, but it is going to worsen the situation for unemployed in the metropolitan regions.

Another reason why the report tabled by the minister this morning is not acceptable is that the government, according to the recent report of the Auditor General, has cut back on the resources to Statistics Canada. As a result of those cut-backs reports on labour market statistics are now questionable or unreliable. I pointed out in a question that I raised in this House on October 26 following the Auditor General's report where the Auditor General had said that the sample sizes of the labour force survey have been reduced due to recent budget cuts. Consequently, he said, the accuracy of the survey is now doubtful.

He pointed out that in 1986, 5,217 households were dropped from the survey. If you are going to cut back on the resources to Statistics Canada, how can Statistics Canada give us reliable and accurate information with respect to unemployment?

This report and this policy produced by the government this morning is not acceptable. It is more tinkering. It is more ad hockery. It is more of the politics of rhetoric. It is going to make it worse for the unemployed in the large cities of Canada.

We are going to ask that this report be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration so that it can be considered in detail vis-à-vis the new Bill C-21 which went through this House.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, what we have just heard this morning is one of the major aftershocks of the earthquake that hit not just the unemployed people of Canada, but hit all Canadian citizens in April with the introduction of Bill C-21. Is it not amazing that when it is convenient for the government it can act in so much haste?

This is not a crucial part of Bill C-21, but an absolutely fundamental part. The changes to the boundaries affect what happens in Bill C-21 so fundamentally that all should have been part and parcel of the same thing. The citizens of Canada should have been able to assess what was happening to their lives, to their families, to their children, to their jobs and to their possibilities of income security at the same time as Bill C-21 was being considered.

There has been haste when it suits the government. There has been closure at every stage. For all intents and purposes there was closure on the length of time that the committee was able to travel. There was closure at report stage and at third reading. But there has been tardiness, again when it suits the government, in the introduction of these fundamental changes to what goes on in the regions, and fundamental changes to the boundaries. That is—to repeat myself, and it bears repeating—fundamentally part of Bill C-21. There was tardiness because, again, the government, as it did with the impact study, did not want the Canadian public to know what the changes were or how they would impact upon them once Bill C-21 was put into effect.

What this has done is to really put into question everything the government has done. By implication, by guilt through association, it has put into doubt what the opposition has done as well because we were not able to do our job properly on the basis of having insufficient information to go on. It has also put into question the work that a tremendous number of people put in over the summer preparing briefs to present to the committee.

This is just another addition to the vile, I suppose is the best word to describe it, actions of this government in relation to its actions toward the unemployed. Yet the words it is couched in are: "based on the principle of equality that underlines our system". Our system was not all that great before the introduction of Bill C-21, but it sure as the dickens is not anywhere as equitable now, never mind the boundary changes.

Another rather interesting statement in the release this morning is and I think it is a direct quote, but if not it is at least a paraphrase: "The regions defined in 1977-78 are no longer appropriate to Canada's current socioeconomic realities. Labour markets change constantly—" Something to that effect was said. Yet some of the underlying rationale of the changes which were incorporated in Bill C-21 are based, according to the government, on something that happened in 1977. That was when it was discovered that if the length of time was extended that people had to work in order to qualify that all of a sudden, magically, they found the time. The government said that it discovered that going through the history in 1977. That was one of the underlying reasons the government made the changes which we find in Bill C-21.

We have an admission that what was current in 1977 is no longer current. What was relevant in 1977 is no longer relevant. I would suggest that that too throws into total question not only Bill C-21, not only the boundary changes, but the philosophy underlying the government's rationale for making these changes.

I conclude by saying that what we have here is another chapter in this government's admission that its system is failing, that its philosophy is not able to contribute to our society in the way that it promised. I suggest that Canadians should take note of what is happening here this morning. They should take note of the tardiness, the haste with which the government works when it suits.

They should bear in mind that the same things are going to apply, the same incompetence is going to apply, the same vile nature is going to apply in the matter of other things which the government is going to bring up, whether it is changes to VIA, the GST, or any other supposedly good-for-Canada measure which I am sure will be forthcoming from the government in the future.

Essentially, this kind of bill is called whistle blowing legislation. It can be used by employees, whether public or private, to ensure that they can act as policemen of the environment or any other law, edict or regulation, federal, provincial or local.

PETITIONS

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to present petitions from the city of North Bay, Ontario, containing the signatures of 1,900 citizens who believe passionately in the sanctity of human life from the moment of conception. They fervently oppose the taking of innocent human life through abortion.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to pass legislation that will protect life from conception. I wholeheartedly endorse that position.

• (1150)

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the pleasure to introduce petitions signed by 2,885 Albertans who ask the government to pass legislation that would protect the life of the unborn. I support such legislation.

OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, today I am tabling ten more petitions in the House on behalf of Canadians who object to the proposed 9 per cent goods and services tax, which will take effect on January 1, 1991, unless the Conservative Government heeds the advice of your petitioners and reverses its decision. Your petitioners say:

That the goods and services tax will increase the cost of living of Canadians. This universal tax will be hidden, and it will be impossible for the consumer to detect or monitor the tax.

That this new universal goods and services tax will create serious and unfair hardship for low- and middle-income Canadians. And finally,

That the tax will put a heavy financial burden on small business.

Your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Saint-Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege to table a petition on the goods and services tax.

[English]

This is a tax, according to these individuals, that really attacks the fundamental fabric of Canada. It will attack our 3.5 million to 5 million poor and single parents, particularly mothers. It will also have a negative impact on seniors, and on students who will be paying additional taxes for their education. They also point out the nightmare that will be caused for business people.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the tax is anti-family and anti-child, and they want the tax to be abolished.

[English]

VIA RAIL

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have the honour to present six petitions on behalf of petitioners from all western provinces who are very concerned about the cut-backs to the VIA Rail service, and who feel that the cuts of some $400 million over five years will result in a serious reduction of passenger railway service, threaten maintenance, safety and jobs.

They call upon Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade VIA equipment and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger service in Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition certified by the Clerk of Petitions.

This petition is from the community of Heart's Desire in my riding. The people in that area, it is no surprise to you, rely very heavily on unemployment insurance. They are very concerned about the withdrawing of the government's $2.9 billion from the insurance fund, leaving the financing of this crucial program to workers and employees.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject these cuts in the unemployment insurance system and to come up with a better system and a more effective regional development policy.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 in opposition to the government's proposed goods and services tax. The petition is signed by a great number of residents of the riding of Kingston and The Islands who are opposed to this tax and who call upon Parliament to reject any government proposal to introduce the tax in this House and to impose it unfairly and unjustly on the people of Canada.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by a number of residents of Burnaby and New Westminster, B.C., and Timmins, Ontario, in opposition to the government's proposed goods and services tax.

The petitioners request that Parliament reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and cause the government to cease with the proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I also have another in a long series of petitions on the subject of VIA Rail. Again, the petition has been certified as correct by the Clerk of Petitions.

It is signed by a large number of residents of British Columbia, Alberta and Manitoba, including two signatories from the community of Craigellachie, which was the site of the driving of the last spike in the construction of the trans-Canada railway. These citizens obviously hope that their community will not see the end of the railway that they played such an important part in establishing.

The petitioners call on Parliament to maintain VIA Rail, Canada's present national network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by students at the University of Calgary located in the riding of Calgary West.

The signatories are over 200 young men and women who care a great deal about the nature and the future of our country. They are asking Parliament to rescind its endorsement of the Meech Lake Accord, to sign a new agreement that will address the concerns of all regions, in fact to unify, not divide Canada, and to provide for popular ratification of all future constitutional amendments.

I know that Parliament will appreciate young people trying to do something positive for Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I also rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from residents of British Columbia who are very disappointed in this government's action in cutting parental leave benefits for adoptive parents in the UI legislation. They feel that the 15 weeks of adoptive benefits that we previously had were more in keeping with what adoptive parents need, and that a cut to 10 weeks does not adequately cover the needs of adoptive parents. They ask the government to reconsider and rescind this discriminatory and regressive measure. I am pleased to present this petition on their behalf. It is signed by 50 residents of British Columbia.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I, too, am delighted to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of a number of people from Kamloops, British Columbia, who are also concerned about the cuts that the government has made for adoptive parents from 15 weeks to 10 weeks. The feeling is that this is a very regressive step. They are asking the government to reconsider this matter to encourage people who have adopted children to provide that very quality time at the beginning of the relationship.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on another matter, again from Kamloops, British Columbia, I have a whole list of constituents who are depressed with the fact that the government seems to be so callous in the imposition of this goods and services tax. They are calling upon the government to see what this is going to do, particularly to those people living in the regions of Canada, and to go back to the drawing board and start over with some real tax reform.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a third petition regarding VIA Rail. Again, it is from western Canada.

Westerners are pointing out that they believe that the government's decision to curtail and reduce VIA Rail service across Canada is not a terribly thoughtful act. They are pointing out the environmental benefits of passenger rail service and are asking the government not only not to curtail VIA Rail, but in fact to invest and modernize VIA Rail, to encourage more people to take the train than at present.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of a number of producers from western Canada, farmers who are concerned about the direction that this government is taking with respect to agriculture in this country, particularly with respect to its dismantling of the Canadian Wheat Board and its removal of oats from the Canadian Wheat Board.

This petition calls for the government to reinstate oats under the Canadian Wheat Board and to give oats and barley the same protection under the Canadian Wheat Board Act that wheat presently has.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise with 12 petitions in hand from all parts of western Canada, northern British Columbia, Vancouver Island, the Lower Mainland, my riding of Mission—Coquitlam, Calgary, other parts of Alberta and from a number of communities in Ontario. The petitioners are appalled at the introduction of a goods and services tax that provides and ensures an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, while imposing even further taxes on average income earners. Pursuant to Section 36, I would like to present this petition.

• (1200)

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions. The first is from residents of the spruce capital, Prince George, in northern B.C., who have signed the petition urging the government to move quickly to ensure that the Forest Resource Development Agreement between the federal Government of Canada and the Province of British Columbia is signed to ensure that the replanting of our harvested lands takes place.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition signed by residents of British Columbia in communities like Lone Butte, Powell River, Coquitlam and Sechelt, who are expressing concern about a disappointment, as the member from Kamloops said, over this government's plans to introduce a goods and services tax. These petitioners call upon the government to bring in effective income tax measures that are fair and equitable to all Canadians.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions on the Order Paper be allowed to stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wish to inform the House that, because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 21 minutes beginning at one o'clock.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C-43, an Act respecting abortion, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, before we hear the Minister of Justice make his presentation on this very critical area, I would suggest that we give some thought to the following. Normally when the government introduces legislation, as it is doing today, the tradition has always been that the government would make its presentation, followed by a member of the opposition, then back to the government, and back and forth across the aisle with members speaking in favour of or against the legislation.

Recognizing that this is a special piece of legislation where there may be people speaking both in support or against from all sides of the House, I wonder whether the House would give some consideration to not following the usual course of having a speaker from the government and then from one of the opposition parties, but that we simply look at it in terms of speakers who are speaking for the legislation or against the legislation. In that manner a much more balanced debate would take place over the next few days. Perhaps we could even do it on a gender basis, with an effort being made to have men and women speaking on this in the first hours of the debate.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, we cannot agree to that proposal, basically because it would have to be well known prior to debate what the position of the individual speakers are, and I think that would be prejudicial to the debate.

I would like to just make one point. Is it possible for the House of Commons to provide some of us with additional copies of this bill because it is in great demand by the population? The House is only giving out up to one hundred copies of the bill per member. I wondered if we could resolve that by asking the House of Commons to make available reasonable amounts of copies to those members who request additional copies.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, may I first react to the comments of the official opposition whip. We too would favour publication of more of the bill simply because of the nature of the debate and the interest across the country in it.

If I may respond to my friend, the House leader for the NDP, let me say that we would have some concerns with that because, as has been mentioned, one does not necessarily know the position of particular members on the debate before they speak. Although we are treating this matter as a non-partisan issue, an issue that is bigger than any one party in the House, all the evidence that we are getting at this point clearly indicates that members of the NDP are taking a partisan position en bloc. Unless there was evidence that they too were going to have a free vote for their people, as we are, we would not at this point want to consider that suggestion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the parliamentary secretary have any comment to make on the request made by the member for Ottawa—Vanier?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, we too favour the proposal as put forward by the Whip of the Liberal party. I think it is a good one and I am sure all of us would agree with it.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the suggestion that additional copies be made. I think we all appreciate that copies of this bill will be in greater demand than a normal piece of legislation.

Just so my hon. friend the parliamentary secretary to the Government House Leader is aware, all of the members of the New Democratic caucus are of the same mind. They all, in fact, oppose the legislation. He can say what he likes, the fact is that we do oppose the legislation.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address a very sensitive and difficult issue, an issue which has moral, ethical, religious, and often very personal meaning for every Canadian. I am referring to the issue of abortion.

In a perfect world, abortion would not be necessary for any reason. We all know, however, that the world is not perfect and that abortions are sometimes necessary. For this reason, we must face the issue of abortion as best we can as individuals, as members of Parliament, and as a government. We must try to come up with a reasonable solution to this sensitive and difficult issue.

We believe that the bill now before the House for debate presents such a reasonable solution to the matter of abortion. The proposed new abortion law, which I will go into in a minute, is understandable, it is workable, and it is fair. It has, as its overriding objective, the balancing of interests, the rights and interests of women and society's interest in the protection of the foetus.

This proposed law will not satisfy partisans on either side of the issue. Only absolute positions would do that. I think you will agree, however, Mr. Speaker, that this proposed law succeeds in reflecting the different interests which are at stake in such a way that we believe is consistent with the requirements of the Charter of Rights as well as the needs of Canadians.

I would ask in the national interest that all Canadians stop to consider the strong personal views of their fellow Canadians before condemning this bill for not perfectly representing their own personal views.

As background I would point out that for many years it was a criminal act to procure an abortion in Canada. When the Criminal Code was revised in 1969 a new provision was enacted, Section 251, which provided that abortions could be legally obtained if certain conditions were met.

In 1982, we had the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. When that came into force included among the protections in the charter is a guarantee of the right of security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

In defence to a criminal charge laid against him, Dr. Henry Morgentaler challenged the validity of Section 251 of the Criminal Code as a violation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In January, 1988, the Supreme Court held that the guarantee of security of the person and the principles of fundamental justice were violated by Section 251. The Supreme Court found, moreover, that the law could not be saved as being a reasonable limit on such rights as provided for in Section 1 of the charter and ruled that Section 251 was unconstitutional. Canada was thus without a federal law to govern abortion.

[Translation]

The government started discussions and consultations immediately after the decision in the Morgentaler case.

However, three events forced us to postpone a decision on the approach to be taken.

First, during the summer of 1988, we tabled a resolution in the House for general consideration. Once again the House witnessed an impassioned debate. It was impossible to reach a consensus. No motions or amendments were passed. However, the debate and the vote proved how difficult it was to find a satisfatory solution.

• (1210)

Second, the fall election of 1988 obliged us to further postpone dealing with this issue. Finally, we decided to wait for the Supreme Court's decision in the Borowski case before going any further. In this case, Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court had to determine whether the foetus enjoyed the right to life guaranteed under Section 7 of the Charter and the equality rights provided under Section 15. The Supreme Court rejected the appeal last March.

Since Section 251 of the Criminal Code was no longer in effect, there was no case, according to the court.

[English]

The House will appreciate that while dealing with the impact of the Supreme Court's decision in Morgentaler or any legislation dealing with abortion was a matter of great importance, it was also one which demanded the most careful consideration, consultation, and many months of serious study and deliberation.

The work of the Law Reform Commission was carefully considered, and I congratulate the commission for its excellent work. I also want to thank the more than 150,000 Canadians who have taken the time to express their concern to me about this important matter. We believe that we have a reasonable solution to a very difficult issue.

Abortion is an issue which divides Canadians. There are no neutrals, everyone has an opinion. These differences of opinion are reflected in cabinet and in Parliament.

It appeared for a time that the very lack of consensus on this issue made new abortion legislation difficult, if not impossible, to achieve. However, the events of this past summer illustrated a clear need for a national position on the issue of entitlement to abortion and led many Canadians to realize that a balanced approach, recognizing the strongly-held views of all, was required.

I note in passing that the events which led to this reassessment, that is the applications for injunction, could have been made prior to the old abortion law being struck down. Indeed, there were such applications. However, coming as they did in the absence of any federal abortion law, court applications had the effect of crystallizing public demand for abortion legislation. Canadians will never be unanimous about what abortion law should be passed, but there is currently considerable consensus that some federal law should be enacted. Some legal mechanism regulating abortions is in order. As the government it is our duty to act, and through this proposed amendment to the Criminal Code the government is taking action.

We have decided to proceed using the criminal law powers of the federal government. In coming to this conclusion and decision we carefully canvassed all the options there were to address this issue. But only by using the criminal law power, however, can the federal government ensure a national approach to the issue of entitlement of abortion.

The federal government cannot directly regulate abortion or the conduct of individuals in any other way. The federal government cannot directly provide medical services, nor can it prevent court actions, such as applications for civil injunctions to prevent a woman from obtaining an abortion. These are matters within provincial jurisdiction. What we can do, and what we are doing, is proposing legislation which will establish a national standard for entitlement to abortion in Canada. It is worth noting, Mr. Speaker, that the Law Reform Commission and the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition have both endorsed the use by the federal government of the criminal law power to legislate on the abortion issue.

[Translation]

Under the proposed legislation, any woman seeking an abortion will have to consult a medical practitioner. Abortion is a medical act that requires specialized knowledge. Consequently, abortion can only be practised by a person with the requisite medical qualifications, and only on health grounds. If the medical practitioner is of the opinion that the pregnancy would threaten the life or health of a woman, an abortion will be induced. The legislation does not provide what some people refer to as abortion on demand. The term "health" is broadly defined to include mental, physical and psychological health. The medical practitioner must determine, in accordance with generally accepted standards of the medical profession, whether there are health reasons to justify an abortion.

[English]

This legislation is fair to women for it enables women to consult the doctor of their own choice. It also removes the impediments which cause delays in obtaining lawful abortions under the old Section 251 and ultimately led to the section being struck down by the Supreme Court as being unconstitutional.

This legislation is also fair to the doctor. It requires the physician to apply normal medical standards and principles in making a determination as to whether any of the health grounds exist, and it also allows the physician to make that determination without onerous administrative obligations that could cause delay.

I would also say that doctors who, in the exercise of their medical judgment according to the standards of their profession, determine that a woman's health or life is threatened by a pregnancy, have no reason to fear potential criminal consequences of the legislation. We believe that this law is a reasonable solution which is sensitive to the differences of opinions among Canadians.

Under the proposed legislation, abortions may only be lawfully induced if they are performed by or under the direction of a medical practitioner. This provision obviously applies to abortions induced by medical practitioners, by drugs, or mechanical means. This provision also applies to abortions induced by persons acting under the direction of medical practitioners.

The bill does not apply to a drug, a device, or other means such as an a IUD or a "morning-after" pill that is likely to prevent the implantation of a fertilized ovum. Preventing implantation is not considered by the medical profession to be an abortion, and neither was it so considered under the old law.

It is well established that only doctors can practise medicine. However, it is conceivable that in certain cases a nurse or a medical technician may be called upon to act in this regard. Nurses, in these circumstances, are accountable to the physician. The section applies to any person who intentionally and knowingly induces an illegal abortion, whether it be the woman, a doctor, or anyone else inducing the abortion.

I might mention that in rendering persons subject to liability under the Criminal Code, the government wishes to emphasize society's interest in protecting the foetus and the necessity of medical supervision when an abortion is induced. Criminal liability should be imposed on all persons who act outside of the law.

• (1220)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your attention to Clause 288 of the proposed legislation.

The purpose of this clause is to prevent persons lacking the required qualifications from supplying women with drugs or other noxious things to induce an abortion.

Its intent is also to prohibit such persons from supplying or procuring drugs or other noxious things.

[English]

I want to address some charter issues, if I can, Mr. Speaker. We are confident that this bill responds to the concern expressed by the Supreme Court in the Morgentaler decision. First, the bill creates no legally imposed delays or obstacles to obtaining a legal abortion, other than the necessity to consult other doctors. Under this legislation, a single doctor can reach the opinion that a woman's life or health would likely be threatened based on a normal consultation. Furthermore, there are no therapeutic abortion committees or accredited hospitals required. Unlike the old law, the same doctor who originally sees the patient may also perform the abortion.

Second, with this legislation, stress on the woman and the doctor is minimized. The doctor-patient relationship is respected and the normal medical standards are to be applied.

Third, health is now defined to include the consideration of physical, mental and psychological factors.

Fourth, the bill does as much as it can to ensure that lawful abortions are possible in all areas of the country including remote and rural areas.

Fifth, the clarification that preventing the implantation of a fertilized ovum is not considered to be an abortion and is not subject to the proposed legislation will make it clear that the state will not interfere with the rights and interests of the woman in any way that contradicts the Morgentaler decision.

Finally, there is a clear policy decision to protect the interests of the foetus throughout pregnancy because a woman can only obtain an abortion if her health or life are threatened.

There have been four issues raised during the early consideration of this bill by the public and by the media. Those are namely the question of access, the possibility of third-party criminal charges, the possibility of injunctions and the responsibility of doctors. On the issue of access there are separate questions that I do not think should be confused. First, this bill is based on the principle that the legislation must not contain any unfair or unnecessary obstacles to lawful abortions throughout the country. I submit that this bill contains no such obstacles. It is based on the principle of fairness and equality. Second, what the bill cannot do, and what the federal government cannot legally do, is to regulate the practice of medicine or the provision of medical services including access to abortion services. This is clearly under provincial jurisdiction. Our criminal law power is based on an authority to prohibit and there is no reasonable way to use this authority in a positive way to guarantee access.

On this particular issue, I would like to quote the Right Hon. Leader of the Official Opposition who on April 28, 1969 as reported at page 8059 of Hansard stated:

> The hon. member suggests there is a constitutional aspect to this as well. The relationships in civil law between the patient and the doctor, between the patient and the nurse, between the doctor and the hospital, the nurse and the hospital, are relationships falling within the operation of provincial law, the civil law and the constitutional responsibility of the provinces—the subject of statutes which regulate hospitals and the professions. These are properly provincial matters, and this is another reason not to trespass on any of these civil relationships which may be accessory but which are not directly affected by this legislation.

The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition was speaking to the original amendments to the Criminal Code of that day, that is Section 251. The principle still applies. Moreover, we would point out that in the exercise of their jurisdiction the provinces must respect the constitutional rights of women and doctors.

Another issue that has arisen is how this legislation will be policed. It is clear, as before, that the prosecutorial authority will rest with the provincial Attorneys General. I am confident that they and the police will act responsibly, as they have in the past, and in full respect of the Charter of Rights and all of the protections of our criminal justice system, including the presumption of innocence. Furthermore, I am confident that there will be no harassment or deprivation of civil liberties as this would not be tolerated by the Attorneys General or by the courts.

As has been pointed out, individuals can attempt to lay charges under this or almost any provision of the Criminal Code. In this context, that possibility may sound worrisome but we must remember the reason for it. It is a very profound democratic belief that, in most cases, individuals can undertake private prosecutions. However, this is subject to the controlling powers of the courts or the Attorneys General who will ensure that these rights are not abused. In this situation, a private person can only proceed if a justice agrees that the matter should proceed to court and if it is not stayed by the provincial Attorney General. There is no history of numerous fraudulent or malicious prosecutions in this area, and no reason to believe that there will be under this legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the government does not think the courts will be inundated with third party criminal charges under the new legislation.

We don't think that will happen. This is a very sensitive matter, and proceedings are likely to involve problems with evidence and other difficulties.

Furthermore, the provincial attorneys general have the power to stay prosecutions that are not in the public interest.

[English]

It is important to make the distinction that this is not the same issue as whether civil injunctions will remain possible. As a federal government, we cannot legislate directly in this area, but in this legislation, Parliament will have legislated on matters central to a woman's entitlement to have an abortion, and any civil injunction would have to take that into account. Specifically, it should not be questioned under civil law that a woman has the freedom to have an abortion, if a medical practitioner has reached the opinion that her life or health is threatened as defined in this bill.

I would like to address the role of medical practitioners in this legislation. There may be some concern that they are subject to criminal liability, and indeed they are unfairly given undue responsibility in this legislation. However, doctors have onerous responsibilities in relation to decisions on abortion, but I would like to point out why and how this legislation adds to these responsibilities only in the most reasonable way possible.

First, the government has decided that there should be legislation and that it should balance the rights of the woman and society's interests in the protection of the foetus. To do this, the federal government must legislate under its criminal law power in order to establish this balance in a way that applies across the country.

In looking at how to legislate, the government decided, first, that abortion is a medical act and that doctors must perform or direct that act. Second, that if the balancing mechanism were to reflect the interests of the woman through a health determination, again doctors must make that determination. No one else could.

Having so reasoned, the government then ensured that the responsibilities of the doctor would resemble, as closely as possible, the responsibilities that he or she already exercises and that no extraneous administrative procedures or outside opinions would be required by the legislation. The doctor is as free as possible to decide on whether or not to induce an abortion, how and where to do so, and whether or not to seek outside opinions for medical reasons. In making his or her decision the doctor would do so in accordance with generally accepted medical standards. All that is added by the proposed legislation is a provision for criminal liability if the legislation is not followed.

This is mainly aimed at persons who are not medical practitioners but carry out abortions in unsanitary and unsafe conditions. Medical practitioners are only liable under the proposed legislation if they do not in good faith apply the health standards.

Here is the question. Should someone else, such as a judge or a committee, be added to determine the balance, to take this responsibility? I think this would clearly be unwise because all these decisions are medical.

Moreover, any additional procedures and procedural requirements would add delay and would immeasurably add to the stress on the woman and on the doctor–patient relationship and thereby violate the charter. Clearly this result would be worse for the doctor and for the woman and of no benefit to society. We have every confidence that the doctors of Canada and women will carry out their responsibilities fully and in good faith.

After tabling this legislation last Friday, I returned to Orillia late Friday evening because I wanted to find out just how my constituents would react to this bill. I deliberately moved on Saturday through the market, the bank, up the main street, through the mall. I went to a fiftieth wedding anniversary and a hockey banquet. On Sunday I went out to a rural church where it was the hundredth anniversary of Orillia Central Presbyterian Church. I was engaged by the people of my riding vis-à-vis this bill.

I did not know when I went home just exactly what the reaction would be. Certainly I had seen the reaction from certain parties on either side of the spectrum. But I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there was overwhelming support from the people I represent. It is not that there were not people on either side who objected to the bill but there was overwhelming support in my area as I was approached from people of all ages and all economic and social backgrounds.

They realize that a compromise was necessary, and they encouraged me to go forward. And we are going forward.

[Translation]

Canadians would prefer to see the need for abortions disappear.

However, we all agree that abortion has been practised in the past, is still being practised today and will continue to be in the future, irrespective of any legislation the government may pass.

[English]

Several weeks ago one of my constituents, a doctor, wrote to me about this issue. The doctor in this instance is not pro-choice, but as a result of his medical practice in my home town of Orillia he has come to see the necessity of regulating access to abortion. This constituent in a letter to me and also in person relayed the experience he had as a young medical practitioner working in the emergency department of a Toronto hospital before the enactment of section 251. A young woman was brought in, and as it turned out she soon died, as a result of an unlawful abortion which was poorly done. That tragic story, which was a story that took place all over Canada, must not be repeated.

It is our responsibility as a government, it is our responsibility as a Parliament to ensure in so far as possible that abortion legislation reflects social needs and at the same time respects the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I believe that this bill achieves those objectives. I also believe that the matter of entitlement to abortion is one which must be determined by Parliament and not by the courts. It is up to us to try to resolve this issue. That is why the government has introduced this bill.

Abortion is an intensely personal issue. It is one that is not readily susceptible to compromise, much less consensus. Nevertheless, Canadians must appreciate that there are strong differences of opinion among individuals and when those differences of opinion occur it is up to the law to balance the diverging views. That is what we have sought to do.

We are not asking Canadians to change their view as to what they think is right. We are asking Canadians to respect the views of others and to respect this new law.

In approaching this sensitive and difficult issue the government took into account all the views of the Canadian people and balanced those views in a reasonable and workable way. We would not support any amendments that did not take a similar approach and respect the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We cannot turn back the clock to a time when women's lives were threatened because they could not attain a legal abortion. The law must determine entitlement to abortion. At the same time we must ensure that a mechanism exists to support society's interest in protecting the foetus as well as the rights of women.

We believe that the legislation we have introduced protects these vital interests in a way that will be acceptable to the majority of Canadians. That is our objective.

[Translation]

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are now at the second reading stage of this Bill, and normally, this is a time when Members speak out in favour of or against the principle of a bill. When the Minister introduced the Bill today, he mentioned studies, consultations and other work that had been done on the government side to prepare for this moment. We on this side have had only three days since legislation was tabled in the House proposing a solution that was unexpected, to say the least, to the abortion problem. I trust the House will realize that we on this side still have to consult our caucus and that we have not yet had our national caucus. Nevertheless, I am prepared to give a preliminary response to the legislation and the system proposed by the government to deal with the abortion issue.

[English]

I certainly agree with the minister that there are few issues that are as serious, that touch as many Canadians as profoundly. Some people may compare this debate in its intensity to the debate on capital punishment, but capital punishment is something very remote from the lives of all Canadians.

Abortion, pregnancy, its termination, the considerations that bear on it are immediate and, if anything, the abortion debate has the additional intensity that comes with its relevance to every family and relevance to every person in our society.

For members of Parliament it is more intense because we literally walk through the debate as we come to Parliament Hill every day, pressed as we are in the streets and in the park in front of Parliament Hill by strongly held views from lobbyists, pro and con, who besiege us as we reach our office where we are inundated with mail and telephone calls and invitations to meetings dealing with two strongly held alternatives on how the problem of abortion should be addressed.

Certainly there is a new element in the debate which I as one who has been here for over 20 years have to observe. On the side which calls itself pro-choice, there is an increasing sense of the legitimacy and the ethical foundation of their position. I hope members of the House are taking note of that.

• (1240)

These individuals in the past certainly pressed their case with intensity. They have a very strong sense which I think needs to be recognized from their point of view of having an unwanted child. Not being able to control fertility is a serious ethical issue. Their commitment not to want to bring an unwanted child into the world has to be considered from the same perspective as one considers the point of view strongly held from the other side that a human being is created at conception and that the abortion policy of the country has to be founded on that.

One of the arguments that I have had some difficulty with is the argument that as a man I am not entitled to deal with the issue and that as a chamber filled with mostly men this issue cannot be dealt with by us. It is a serious argument but when one looks at the consequences of not having a national policy on abortion established in this chamber, one has to come to the conclusions that whatever our shortcomings as individuals in this House, whether we are elected men or elected women, we are elected by all the people of Canada, men and women. And if this issue is not addressed, if a national policy is not established, and a good policy, we are going to have a continuation of situations like the Dodd case and the Daigle case. We will see headliners like the one on the front page report this morning from Nova Scotia about how Dr. Morgentaler is being stopped in the province of Nova Scotia, where a different policy would prevail that applies in any other part of the country if the law he was challenging is held to be valid.

I think this is the place to establish a national policy on abortion. One of my criticisms of the legislation that I will come to in a moment is particularly with the policy expressed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, which is that the government is not prepared to have Parliament bring forward a full policy on the subject of abortion.

When the Morgentaler decision in the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the abortion provisions of the Criminal Code, the opposition under the leadership of the member for Vancouver Quadra was very quick to respond. Within hours we were on our feet in the House calling on the government to bring forward legislation and to bring it forward on an urgent basis.

We said that the legislation should respect the finding of the Supreme Court of Canada as to the rights of a woman, as to the interests of the foetus. In fact the Governor General-elect who was then the Minister of Justice indicated that the government would respond rapidly and that the legislation would bear more or less on the lines which my leader and I in our questions and in comments to the media indicated our caucus would support.

At the same time we made it clear that for us this would be a free vote. Members of our caucus would not be pressured or constrained to create a unanimous, monolithic party position. We considered the issue to be that important.

Now I want to turn to the actual legislation proposed by the government and deal first with my grave concern about its constitutionality. This is legislation which we know will be challenged as to its constitutionality, but it seems nowadays that all legislation is challenged as to its constitutionality.

What concerns me more about this legislation is that the challenges that we know are coming may well be valid in my opinion. Second, these challenges to this bill if enacted in its present form will in every case involve an unfortunate pregnant woman, either going to court herself or being forced into court by a man—her husband, her boyfriend, her ex-husband, her ex-boyfriend—in the ways we have seen in the Daigle and Dodd cases. This is extremely unfortunate and I feel that it is wrong to subject the country to a validation of this legislation in that format.

I suggest that the government rely on a power available only to it under the Supreme Court of Canada Act to take this legislation now in its form as a bill to the Supreme Court of Canada to have its constitutionality validated.

I want to refer to some arguments on that subject. First, I want to refer to a textbook on references to the Supreme Court of Canada which sets out the legislation and refer to the statement made by the distinguished author, Peter Hogg, at page 181:

A balanced assessment of the reference procedure must acknowledge its utility as a means of securing an answer to a constitutional question—the reference procedure has been used mainly in constitutional cases.

And this is one:

This is because it enables a government to obtain an early and (for practical purposes) authoritative ruling on the constitutionality of a legislative programme. Sometimes questions of law are referred in advance of the drafting of legislation; sometimes draft legislation is referred before it is enacted.

I have another quote, but I want to indicate here that I would not have favoured going to the Supreme Court of Canada with an idea or with a question. I do not think that that would have been appropriate. I think we have a job to do here in the House of Commons, to make our minds up about the form in which the legislation should be presented.

I disagree with the Minister of Justice who indicated at a press conference yesterday that a reference would be undesirable in this case but gave no reasons why it would be undesirable. I have the transcript of what he said in the House yesterday. He said, as reported at page 5594 of Hansard:

We feel it is important that the legislation go forward with the imprimatur of Parliament on it. We believe that there was a request for leadership from the public.

I concede that, but for the reasons I have indicated I think a great deal of public good will be achieved by referring the legislation before we proceed with a difficult debate and before we get into the hot arguments on one side and the other that we know will be coming.

I want to refer to another authority on references, Barry Strayer, now on the bench, and his book on the Constitution. At page 281 he said:

The disruptive effect of continuing uncertainty, and the probability of much longer delays before the issues would otherwise have reached the Supreme Court by ordinary appeal, made the reference device a valuable means of clarifying the situation.

Remember that in the Daigle case we were dealing with a pregnant woman who was urging the Supreme Court of Canada to come back from summer holidays to hear her case early because of the urgency of the situation. I predict that this is the sort of circumstance the minister will visit on the country if he refuses to have the constitutionality of the bill established at this point.

The authority continues at page 281:

A There will also be situations where speedy determination is more of a necessity than a convenience.

And he goes on:

A reference may also provide relief where a private citizen would not find it convenient to take a constitutional case to the higher courts.

If a statute is held invalid, numerous citizens will be relieved from compliance with legislation which it was not practical for them to contest individually.

That is the case we are dealing with here. I want to urge the government to reconsider its refusal to have the constitutionality of this legislation tested and, if valid, approved at this point.

From the point of view of the support of the legislation I understand the cabinet supports this legislation. I suggest that endorsement by the Supreme Court of Canada will add stature and will add legitimacy which will assist and facilitate moving the legislation forward and getting it enacted.

I have difficulties with the constitutionality of the legislation for two important reasons: first, the constraint which the legislation contains on women's right; second, the failure of the legislation to recognize the interests of the foetus.

The Minister of Justice indicates that in his opinion the rights of women are fully protected in this legislation. I want to suggest to him that the way this legislation would work is to have two phases for an abortion. In phase one there will need to be a legal determination about the necessity or justification for the abortion. In phase two the abortion will be performed. It will normally be the case. The legislation contemplates that phase one and phase two are presided over by the same person, the doctor. There is no doubt that there are two phases and getting through phase one is a condition that a woman has to be subjected to, outside determination, before she is entitled to move into phase two and have her abortion. We know the Supreme Court of Canada was convinced in the conclusions that it reached, and from the evidence that it believed in its decision, that that determination was not easily obtainable in all parts of our country. It was a lot like having to find a therapeutic abortion committee. In some parts of the country there was not one.

• (1250)

It was a lot like making an appointment to appear before them to give the arguments. There are places in our country where a woman will not be able to obtain the judgment of a doctor, which is required in this new legislation. Because of the absence of that opportunity to have a judgment on the question of health, I believe the legislation is at least suspect, if not deficient, on constitutional grounds.

Mr. Justice Dickson pointed out:

> The law has long recognized that the human body ought to be protected from interference by others.

That is the way this determination can be seen. Mr. Justice Beetz noted:

> A pregnant woman's person cannot be said to be secure if when her life or health is in danger, she is faced with a rule of criminal law—

That is what we are talking about here, and the minister admits it:

> —which precludes her from obtaining effective and timely treatment.

I feel that the reservations and the process established constraining the rights of a woman, recognized by the Supreme Court of Canada, may invalidate this legislation.

On the other side of it, the Supreme Court of Canada recognized clearly that the interests of the foetus could be protected by the legislation that it invited Parliament to bring forward. Where is that protection? I do not see it in this legislation.

I do not see a clear statement, that at any point in the pregnancy the interests of the foetus should be recognized. I would remind the House of statements made by the Supreme Court of Canada in the decision, statements with which I and my leader agree, which we urge that the legislation reflect. Mr. Justice Beetz pointed out:

> —that there would be a point in time at which the state interest in the foetus would become compelling. From this point in time, Parliament would be entitled to limit abortions to those required for therapeutic reasons and therefore require an independent opinion as to the health exception.

The consideration which would justify an abortion being performed in the first week or in the first month, under this legislation, is exactly the same in this legislation as the consideration which would apply in the latest stages of a pregnancy. The legislation sets out no differences in the health considerations of the woman which the doctor is to take account of. There is no requirement that the foetus interests be given any weight at all.

Madam Justice Bertha Wilson pointed out in the same judgment:

> The precise point in the development of the foetus at which the state's interest in its protection becomes "compelling"—

She left that to the informed judgment of the legislature. She continued:

> —which is in a position to receive guidance on the subject from all the relevant disciplines. It seems to me, however, that it might fall somewhere in the second trimester.

Could there be a clearer invitation from the Supreme Court of Canada to consider and develop an informed judgment about what is the the proper point at which that consideration should be given weight? There is nothing about that in the legislation.

This legislation is not informed by the kind of consideration that the Supreme Court of Canada invited us to engage in. Therefore it cannot be called right to life legislation. I know members of the government party will want to call it that but they cannot. It does not develop a concept about the emergence of a foetus, of a human being, and a requirement that that be respected. There is not a word about it in the legislation. For the minister to call this a balanced bill which reflects two points of view is wrong.

He calls for a compromise. I do not see a compromise in this legislation. As I said in the press conference the other day, I see a subtle form of fraud in which the legislation invites women, as I said last week: "Ladies, here it is. All you have to do is find the right doctor. All you have to do is give the right reasons, and what have you got to complain about?"

That is an insulting and humiliating position to deliver to the women of this country. To call it a compromise is misleading. It is a cop-out. It is a failure, really, to address or respect a fundamental difference of views within Canadian society. It is a way of getting around it by copping out, which I think is really more a fraud or a farce than putting water in the wine or compromising in any sense of the word.

It reminds me of the old days when condoms used to be sold in drug stores with the slogan on the side of them: "Not to be used for birth control purposes". I have forgotten the exact language, but it was stated that it was supposed to be used just to prevent communicable sexual diseases. That was a farce. I think we recognized it as a farce.

I am suggesting to the government that the legislation it is proposing is an invitation to the same type of mockery and contempt for the law as was the case back in the days when that legend appeared on the side of every condom that was sold in our country. I do not think that legislation on such a serious subject should be brought forward in a spirit of complicity or in a spirit of fraud. These are the reservations that I have on constitutional grounds about this legislation.

I have other reservations about it. I am glad the Minister of National Health and Welfare is here because I want to quote him. This legislation does not deal adequately with access. This legislation may establish a framework for obtaining an abortion. It does not provide—and there is no companion policy which provides it—that wherever in the country a woman seeks an abortion she shall have the same treatment at a level as is available everywhere else in the country.

This is an issue that is larger than simply the abortion issue. This is the difference between the Liberal way of looking at Canada and the Conservative way of looking at Canada. On this side of the House we feel that the government has a responsibility to provide a large measure of national leadership. We believe it is our job in this place to build up and reinforce Canadian identity through the creation, development, and strengthening of a set of values that we as Canadians believe in, to strengthen them and give them extra meaning, to give them extra definition every day.

On the opposite side of the House, those members do not see the responsibility of the federal government that way at all. They look at this piece of legislation, look at the Constitution, and see that health care is a provincial problem. They say: "Let us pass the buck to them. Let us not try in our way through whatever lawful means at our disposal to assure that women receive equal treatment across the country".

This is what the Minister of Justice said to the Canadian people and to the women of this country last week in his press conference. I have a quote from the transcript:

"It is the responsibility of the Government of Prince Edward Island to determine whether or not the women of Prince Edward Island should have to go to Halifax for an abortion".

• (1300)

It reminds me a little bit of the lotteries legislation. The federal government passed lotteries legislation and provinces could or could not have a lottery; it was up to them to decide. That is where the government places its responsibility for the national health care program of Canada.

We on this side of the House do not see national health care like a lottery. We think of it as one of the greatest sources of pride and unity in our country. We do not hesitate to do what we can do as a Parliament to get this legislation and policy implemented across this country so that whatever the abortion policy is, it will be available to women across the country on an equal basis and not on a totally differential basis from one part of the country to the other.

I know that the Minister of National Health and Welfare spoke about the Constitution of Canada yesterday. He said in the House of Commons, as reported at page 5596 of Hansard:

> We have an obligation to respect the Constitution of Canada which gives the primary responsibility for the delivery of health services to the provinces. The hon. gentleman concedes the fact that nowhere in the Canada Health Act is any procedure, including life-saving procedures, required to be provided in a specific way by any province. What the hon. member proposes is that we throw constitutionality to the wind—that we engage in an invasion of provincial jurisdiction.

I have news for the Conservatives. It was the national Government of Canada that created the national health care system of Canada. We invaded the provincial jurisdiction by the perfectly legitimate means of federal spending power and federal leadership to create a program which is one of the great sources of national unity and pride in our country.

I know because the Conservatives voted against it back in the 1960s that if it was proposed again or if they were the government at the time, we would not have a national health care program in our country. We have it because the federal government, then a Liberal government, saw a responsibility to provide leadership.

Just a few years ago we were constrained to ban extra billing as a national government. I know that if the present Minister of National Health and Welfare saw extra billing developing across this country, fragmenting the plan, tending toward two systems of health care, one for the rich and one for the poor—

Mr. Lewis: We voted for it.

Mr. Kaplan: They say they voted for it. I will grant them that they voted for it, but I ask them this. Would they have introduced it? Would the government opposite that talks today about how abortion access legislation invades provincial jurisdiction have invaded it as we did to ban extra billing through a perfectly legitimate means, the use of a real federal power? I am suggesting to the members opposite that the abortion policy, whatever it is, should not be left totally to the provinces so that if, in a particular province, a determination is made that women who want abortions should have to go to Halifax, then that is fine with them.

The minister told an anecdote or two about his own riding. I heard of a case last week of a woman flying on an Air Canada flight from Ottawa to Charlottetown who passed out on the airplane. One of the stewardesses is a friend of mine and told me that when the crew revived her, she said that she had come to Ottawa to have an abortion, she could not afford to stay overnight in a hotel here in Ottawa the way the doctor told her to do, so she headed back and she passed out on the airplane. That is fine for the Minister of Justice, I gather.

Mr. Lewis: I object to that.

Mr. Kaplan: He says that if the Government of Prince Edward Island—

Mr. Lewis: Jeez, you're sleazy. That's a sleazy way to put it.

Mr. Kaplan: This is exactly what the minister said. If the Government of Prince Edward Island decides that the women of Prince Edward Island should go to Halifax for an abortion, that is up to them. That is not the way we look at national health care in this country and we urge the government, we insist that the government find a method, and we can suggest many, of assuring not only that there is a framework about when abortions are legal, how to balance, as we argue they should, the rights of a woman and the emerging interests of the foetus, but also to establish equal access across this country, something that must be done. Even from the point of view that I mentioned earlier, the Supreme Court of Canada would enhance the constitutionality of this measure if it could be assured that not only the framework would be presented as the government has proposed, but that there would be equal access under it. The Morgentaler case discredited and condemned the earlier legislation partly because it did not provide equal access, even though the question of access under the Constitution, as I concede, is primarily a provincial matter.

I want to deal quickly with a few other points. This announcement by the government and this presentation of legislation is also deficient in failing to provide a family policy. Very often, the choice of an abortion for a woman from her personal point of view is no choice at all because of the pressures of economic necessity, the social conditions in our society, the absence of comprehensive day care and the absence of adequate support for single women with children.

It is not good enough for the government to talk about provincial responsibility in this matter. The Conservatives did not talk about provincial responsibility when they promised the day care program to the people of Canada. That is done within provincial jurisdiction under the spending program, but the Conservatives did not hesitate to announce that they would have comprehensive day care, that they would create hundreds of thousands of day care spaces across the country. Right after the election, it was not the Constitution that stopped them from doing it. They changed their minds and did not do it.

The introduction of a program on limitations on abortion has to recognize this fundamental fact. If as the Minister of Justice said in his remarks, the decision for an abortion does not belong to a woman alone because a woman's rights and interests are balanced with the state's interests in the protection of the foetus, if the state has an interest in protecting the foetus, it cannot put the whole burden of bearing the child and looking after the child on the woman or on the provincial governments to decide what level of programs they want to have. There is a larger national responsibility there.

If it is fair to have restrictions on the right of abortion—and I am not arguing against that—it is also necessary to offer programs and real support for women who decide to carry the child and make the decision to proceed with the birth and raising the child. Much more needs to be offered to make this fair legislation on the side of a family policy which will really help women.

I heard it put very well a few weeks ago by someone who was noting the tremendous evolution of the rights of women. They are far from being equal, but a tremendous evolution has taken place over the last few years in which women have more and more opportunities for jobs and for employment outside the home. Then this person said, "Isn't it time that we tried to improve the working conditions of parenting?" It is time that we tried to improve the working conditions of parenting.

It is a fundamental responsibility of the government, when introducing abortion legislation, restrictions on abortion which in principle we support, to have family programs accompany them, measures to improve the working conditions of parenting, to put it in a phrase that I think is particularly apt.

In conclusion, I want to address the free vote aspect of this issue. This is a free vote, and a number of members characterized their approach to this as a vote on the basis of their conscience. I want to at least give those members who argue that their consciences are the sole determinant of what their vote is going to be something to think about.

• (1310)

In a pluralistic and multicultural society like Canada, there is a larger perspective on national issues than one's own conscience. One cannot vote against one's conscience but I submit that in a pluralistic society, one should seek to find a position which reflects not only his own conscience as a member of Parliament but the consciences of the people who support that member and have voted for him or voted against him, but from whose constituency he has come to Ottawa to vote.

I mentioned at the outset an ethical position opposed to abortion and an ethical position in favour of a free choice on abortion in the interests of family planning. Those are both moral and ethical positions. I think what needs to be done is to find a framework, to find legislation which reflects the morality of Canadian society as a whole.

Whether those who strenuously oppose abortion in all circumstances can control enough of the votes in the House of Commons to determine the legislation or not, they should not do so. They should vote in a way, in my submission, which reflects the cross-spectrum of ethical positions which are held on this very important question of life and of children.

It is not an easy balance to strike, but I suggest that this legislation does not even attempt to do it. This legislation, far from trying to reflect the morality of Canadian society, basically tries to bypass it, tries to find a way that by putting water in the wine of both sides, the two sides can live with the legislation. Is that really good enough? Is there not right in the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada the outline of a position which reflects the strong view that a woman's health and liberty requires that she have the decision-making power but at the same time recognizes the emerging interests of the foetus and invites the Parliament of Canada to come to grips with that, to define it and to give it legislative sanction? That is not done by this legislation. While, as I indicated at the outset—on our side, we intend to consider the matter in caucus. Since our basic position is that this is a free vote, we will consider the matter, and the government will have our reply before the vote is taken.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 1.21 p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

ANNIVERSARY OF FOUNDING OF SIKHISM

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, several Sikh temples in Toronto and elsewhere in Canada this weekend are commemorating the anniversary of the Guru Nanok, the founder of Sikhism.

By his very example, the Guru Nanok taught pacifism, tolerance, respect for others, co-operation, discipline and moderation; qualities I am sure that hon. members will agree are the hallmark of progressive, enlightened civilizations. Born into a world of strife; religious, racial and class antagonism; political and gender discrimination; the Guru Nanok sought to establish harmony and community among adherents of perceived rival religious groups.

He worked for equality among classes and between men and women, preferring to see individuals emerge by dint of unbridled energy and natural talent and driven by altruistic duty to community.

The Canadian community is enriched by the disciples to this monotheistic creed and welcomes their contribution and role to the development of our great nation.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to point out the environmental leadership shown by Les Teintureries Élite Ltée of Drummondville. This company has just taken some concrete action by starting to build a waste water pre-treatment plant.

Mr. Speaker, this is the first textile mill in Quebec to acquire such a system.

Furthermore, they will receive no government subsidies for this project costing over one million dollars.

By acquiring the necessary equipment to treat its waste water before discharging it, this company is helping to protect the local environment and clean up our rivers and streams.

I am proud of the initiative shown by this family business which employs over 160 people and of its main spokesman, Lucien Morissette, for his role in preserving our environment. I trust that others will follow his example.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada is not only stalling on the Innu Labrador land claims, and also those in Quebec, but is trying to drive the Innu off the land before there is a decision. The caribou and other game are being chased away by low level flights. The Innu children are being terrified so they are unwilling to stay on the land.

The government claims that there are no permanent residents when it knows there are at least 1,500 who spend half the year or more there following their ancestral way of life and protecting their children from urban destruction.

They say, "Tell us where you are camped and we'll avoid you", but when the Innu tell them they do not avoid them because they use the same river valleys that the Innu use. When the commanding officer visited them the planes overflew them the next week.

The government has now published an environmental impact study that does not even give the location of the proposed bombing ranges which it claims are environmentally harmless.

The government spent $6 million on this study and is trying to prevent members of Parliament and Innu support groups from getting copies of it. There is no reading station for this study for all the people east of Montreal and the translation into the Innu language is being delayed although that is the most important language to be used in the study by the people who live there.

I call on the government to give at least $.25 million to the Innu study of this environmental impact statement so that it will be a little bit more fair than it has been.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, Alberta must diversify its economy. One way to do this is to maximize the economic potential of our forestry sector. In Alberta a successful pulp and paper industry will create as many jobs as the energy boom of the 1970s.

While this economic growth is valuable, it is also important to recognize that our natural environment is limited in its capacity to sustain this growth. Both our economy and our environment are important. Recent announcements by industry have demonstrated its commitment to responsible development through investments in new environmental technology. This is a positive step.

Our challenge is to find a balance between greatly needed economic growth and responsible and reasonable consideration for the protection of our environment. Let's work together to support the concept of sustainable economic development. Let's work together to build a better future for our children. Let's work together for a better Canada.

MR. HAROLD MILLER

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding Newfoundlander. On November 6, 1987, on a dark stormy night in the Atlantic, a crew member of the vessel Atlantic Elizabeth fell overboard, lost consciousness and was only saved from drowning by a shipmate who, at great risk to his own life, recovered the drowning sailor in heavy seas.

Nine years previously, on November 20, the Danish trawler Remoy, with a ship's company of 12, ran aground in Labrador on a dark stormy night with winds at 100 kilometres an hour and a temperature of minus 23 degrees centigrade. Three men voluteered to go to their rescue and through a death-defying feat of seamanship and courage they successfully and miraculously achieved the rescue in less than 12 hours after the Remoy ran aground.

One of the three brave men involved in this incident was the man who also rescued his drowning crew member nine years ago. Mr. Speaker, I speak of Mr. Harold Miller of Burgoyne's Cove in my riding. He was awarded the Cross of Valour for his 1978 incredible act of bravery at the age of 22 years, and for his 1986 repeated act of courage he was awarded the Medal of Bravery.

Nine hundred and fifty-eight people have received the Medal of Bravery. Fifteen people have been awarded the Cross of Valour. Mr. Miller is the only Canadian who has the extraordinary distinction of having been awarded both.

I am proud to have Mr. Miller as a constituent. On behalf of all Canadians I thank him and I would ask that my colleagues on all sides of the House join me in extending our congratulations to him.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

KOREAN WAR

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria—Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, Canada's participation in the First and Second World Wars has been well documented by our own Department of Veterans Affairs and by the private film companies across Canada.

Until now not very much has been produced on our country's participation in the Korean War between 1950 and 1953. As a matter of fact, within only the past few years we were all referring to that war as the "Korean conflict".

Today that has all changed. Our Korean veterans are Canada's youngest veterans and, thanks to the War Amputations of Canada and its chief executive officer, Mr. Chadderton, we now have the latest of their "Never Again" series of films called "Korea—Canada's Forgotten War".

This film shows viewers of the battle areas and the monuments to those who died in Korea. These are all part of our nation's history and, I am sorry to say, a war that up until now Canadians knew very little about.

This film, along with others produced by the War Amputations of Canada, expresses to all Canadians the thought on our minds during this particular time of the year: "In a war everyone suffers. We must never let it happen again."

This film will be shown on television across Canada on November 11. I urge all members and all Canadians to watch it in their homes with their families.

PAY EQUITY PROGRAM

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, a study released yesterday by the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives shows that even though women make up fully 73 per cent of the bank's full-time workforce, women in banking make only 56 cents for every dollar earned by male bank employees.

This government claims to care about employment equity and fair employment practices for women, yet it neglects to apply these principles to disadvantaged women under its own jurisdiction.

Pay equity is an essential component of any employment equity program. Four provincial jurisdictions already have pay equity programs while the federal government fails to act.

A number of groups working for equality, like NAC and the Employment Equity Coalition, have urged the government to amend its broadly flawed Employment Equity Act to include pay equity measures. They also urge the government to amend the legislation to include targets and timetables and an effective enforcement mechanism.

On their behalf I call on this government to amend the Employment Equity Act as soon as possible in order to give the women of Canada fair wages for their work.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the residents of northern Nova Scotia have been fighting for a long time to get Nova Scotia CBC television reception for their area. Currently only New Brunswick and P.E.I. signals reach this area, leaving northern Nova Scotia out of the mainstream of Nova Scotia business and provincial news broadcasts.

At a recent parliamentary committee the new chairman of the CRTC, Mr. Keith Spicer, agreed to research this problem to see if there was any solution. For many years the people of this area have been making the same request of the CBC and it is time the question was resolved.

• (1410)

I urge the new chairman to support this ongoing request for equal coverage. I appreciate his efforts to resolve the problem and look forward to a positive conclusion.

PAY EQUITY PROGRAM

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): I rise today, Mr. Speaker, to express great disappointment in the state of gender equality in this country. As far as ending the wage gap between men and women is concerned, we still have a great deal of work ahead of us.

A study published today points out that women employed in Canadian banks make only 56 cents for every dollar paid to male employees. While women outnumber male bank workers 70 to one, there are virtually no women in banks' upper management.

The dinosaur of inequality is alive and well and thriving in Canada. In fact we can see that our efforts to eradicate the wage gap have been unsuccessful in far too many sectors. Unquestionably banks are simply a symptom of a much wider problem.

I challenge this government to examine the findings of this study to see where it has gone wrong, to address the problems of unfair employment practices in all sectors, but most particularly in the area of wage parity and wage equity, and finally put the dinosaur of discrimination to rest for good.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Mr. Speaker, modern chiropractic is the third largest primary contact health care profession in North America. The Canadian Chiropractic Association represents 2,600 practising chiropractors and each province has a representative association. The Canadian Memorial Chiropractic College in Toronto is fully accredited to international standards and has a combined enrolment of about 600.

Chiropractors pioneered the holistic approach to health care. They focus on the spine in relation to the total body and specialize in the understanding and treatment of its component bone structures, muscles and nerves. As partners in health care, they employ specialized diagnosis and support research into causes and treatment of back pain. Chiropractic is cost effective. Chiropractors are now recognized as prime contact practitioners and play an integrated part in comprehensive health services.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AREAS

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, on October 27 the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas was made public. At the request of the Minister of Finance, its mandate was changed in mid-term from revenue neutral to a deficit cutting measure.

If the recommendations are implemented as proposed it would mean the loss of $150 million in revenue for northern Canada and $5 million for 75 towns in northern Ontario, not to mention those that should have qualified in the first place.

I strongly urge the minister to totally ignore the recommendations of the committee, as it would create financial hardships in areas which are already underserviced. It would be a terrible blow to the morale of northern Ontarians who wholeheartedly strive to improve the quality of life in remote areas.

Moreover, we should be compensated for our efforts to bring prosperity in developing the natural resources which indeed do supply southern Ontario and the rest of Canada with forestry and mining products.

WESTERN DIVERSIFICATION PROGRAM

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, the western diversification program is helping entrepreneurs in western Canada. Last Friday I was privileged to officially announce, not grants but repayable contributions for four projects in the Red Deer area. All four of these projects are commendable, all will provide employment and improve or expand available services. One deserves special mention.

Every municipality in Canada should be aware that a Red Deer company has the North American rights for a process marketed under the name of Bomego-Dano. This process will take municipal waste; garbage and sewage, and treat it, recycle metals and glass and convert the bulk of the remainder to marketable humus material. The need for large, wasteful landfill areas can be dramatically reduced.

All politicians talk of the environment. Here is a process to do something to improve it and the western diversification program is helping.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, this morning the Minister of Agriculture released the government's white paper on agricultural policy. While the white paper is said to be for discussion only and not an indication of government policy, farmers will nonetheless be disappointed.

The biggest problem faced by the agricultural industry at the moment is farm debt. Billions of dollars are owed by Canadian farmers at a time of low prices, drought and unfair competition in the vital export market. Despite these facts, the white paper has virtually nothing to say about how the government intends to lead the effort to solve the farm debt crisis.

The Farm Credit Corporation holds hundreds of thousands of acres of Saskatchewan farm land. The Farm Credit Corporation policy continues to drive many farm families off their farms. Surely farmers and all Canadians deserve to know what the government intends to do to stabilize farm land ownership. Is it the government's intention to continue to sit idly by while the Farm Credit Corporation and other financial institutions force countless farm families to lose their livelihoods and their homes?

POINT OF ORDER

SUB JUDICE CONVENTION—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The Chair would ask the indulgence of the House to render a decision on the matter raised yesterday by the hon. member for York Centre relating to the sub judice convention. I realize that this is an unusual time of the day but my decision will, in any case, impact on Question Period and I believe I should inform the House before the Question Period begins.

I should also advise that whatever time is taken to give this ruling will be extended and the Question Period will be the usual 45 minutes in length.

Yesterday the hon. member for York Centre rose to ask a question which was based on statements made by a staff sergeant of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in a court of criminal law relating to the budget leak of April, 1989. I said at the time that I appreciated the courtesy of the hon. member for York Centre in advising the Chair that he was going to rise on the question, and as hon. members will remember, I decided that it was not appropriate to proceed at that time. I expressed reservations because the matter was before a court of justice and the hon. member and others agreed to pursue a point of order after Question Period and present their argument that the sub judice convention should not apply in this particular case. I want to thank again the hon. member for York Centre and others for their co-operation on this delicate but important question.

I should first explain the issue that is of concern to the hon. member so that all hon. members and the public will fully understand the context in which this matter arises. It is alleged by the hon. member for York Centre that according to a sworn statement by a witness in a court of criminal law to the effect that the independent responsibility of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to lay charges in criminal cases has been interfered with and the hon. member for York Centre wished to put questions to the Solicitor General and wished to have the Solicitor General answer to that specific allegation.

Against this desire to enquire further, the hon. member is confronted by the convention of this House that, and I quote: "Members are expected to refrain from discussing matters that are before the courts". I might emphasize that that is much more severely applied in the question of a criminal trial. The reason for this convention is to protect those persons who are undergoing trial and stand to be affected by whatever the outcome of the trial is. I point out that it is also because the trial may be affected by an exchange of debate in this place.

Yesterday the hon. member for York Centre argued that the convention should be suspended because the process by which charges were laid is, and I quote the hon. member, "not material to the criminal case now proceeding".

Speaker's Ruling

[Translation]

The Chair has also heard the arguments of the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) and the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Lewis). The Hon. Members for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) and Churchill (Mr. Murphy), as well as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader, also expressed their opinion on this subject.

• (1420)

[English]

I have now since yesterday, reviewed all of the comments offered. I have also reviewed the transcript of the court proceedings, at least up until, I take it, close of court yesterday. My research delved into all of the precedents referred to in citation 336 of Beauchesne's fifth edition and also the report of the Special Committee on the Rights and Immunities of Members tabled in the House on April 29, 1977, which commented at length on the sub judice convention. I point out that while that report was submitted to the House it was never adopted by the House, but I have read the report in its entirety and most of the appendices attached thereto.

The precedents and rulings found in citation 336 of Beauchesne are very convincing. My predecessors, in cases of criminal proceedings, have applied the convention consistently. The British practice which was referred to by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader is based on a very specific resolution adopted by the British House of Commons on July 23, 1963. That resolution in the British House gives their Speaker clear guidelines and specific authority. The Canadian House has never pronounced itself in such clear terms and I say to the hon. member for York Centre that I realize that he was recognizing that fact, at least to some degree, in his argument yesterday.

The committee did, however, comment on the role of the Speaker at page 1.11 of its report tabled in the House on April 29, 1977. It said:

> Your committee has given consideration to the role of the Speaker in the application of the convention. It is submitted that while there can be no substitute for the discretion of the Chair in the last resort, all Members of the House should share the responsibility of exercising restraint when it seems called for.

Speaker's Ruling

Beauchesne's fifth edition, citation 339, comments on this part of the report and adds that the Speaker should remain the final arbiter.

In the present criminal case of Regina v. Normand Belisle, John Appleby and Douglas Small the defence has put forward a motion for an order staying all proceedings, claiming that there has been an abuse of process. I repeat, the defence has put forward this motion.

A witness has been heard, or at least partially heard, and that specific matter as to what that witness testified and what flows from it has yet to be decided by the court. This obviously is an important step for the defence with considerable consequences for the accused, whatever the court may eventually decide. The issue the hon. member and other hon. members wish to raise in the House is the same issue the court is seized of and which that court must decide.

However, the hon. member for York Centre and others wish to raise the matter in questions to the Solicitor General. The Chair has some difficulty in accepting the argument of the hon. member for York Centre that such questions would not be material to the criminal proceedings under way where, as I have remarked, the present testimony is in support of a defence motion.

As a consequence, the Chair is unable to accept the argument that somehow the proceedings in this criminal trial can be split into that part to which the convention of sub judice applies and another part where it does not apply.

There is no doubt that the House has a fundamental right to consider matters of public interest, but by our convention on matters before the courts the Chair has the duty to balance that legitimate right of the House with the rights and interests of the ordinary citizen undergoing the trial.

Therefore, after reflection on the matter and in the light of the decisions taken by previous Speakers, I have decided that the sub judice convention should apply in this case for the time being. The hon. member for York Centre will have further opportunities to pursue any related issues he may wish, and I include along with the hon. member for York Centre other hon. members, when the trial is over.

I will also take this opportunity to rule on the question of privilege raised earlier this morning by the hon. member for Oshawa. The hon. member claimed that the evidence given at the criminal trial yesterday by Staff Sergeant Jordan of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is at variance with evidence given by the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police before the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General in June of this year. Consequently, it was argued that there has been a contempt of this House, or that a contempt of this House may have occurred.

I listened carefully to the arguments that were made and I reserved because the matter appeared on the surface to be linked to the point of order on which I have just ruled. On reflection, however, and in keeping with the House practice, I must find that there is no prima facie evidence of a contempt. There appears to be a discrepancy with respect to certain things that were said in two different places, but it is clearly up to the standing committee to pursue this matter if it so chooses. The committee is the competent body to review evidence given before it and should report to the House if it finds any breach of its authority. I must say to the hon. member for Oshawa that it would at least be premature for the Chair to rule now on this matter.

[Translation]

These matters are important and often very complex. They are sometimes even difficult for the Chair.

I wish to again express my gratitude to the Hon. Members concerned for their cooperation and their patience.

[English]

I also want to express my appreciation for the very helpful and dignified way these arguments were brought to the Chair both yesterday and today. I think we also appreciate the very hard work which was done by our Table Officers last night and early this morning in order to assist the Chair to be able to return and give this ruling as expeditiously as possible.

It may well be that, given the fact that there was a committee report in 1977, hon. members will want to look at this matter further. I, of course, invite them to do so and in that respect I am very much the servant of this place.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, we have noted your judgment and the words for the time being and we reserve our right, of course, to pursue this matter when the judgment is rendered by the court on the issue of political interference with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

MEMBER OF THE SENATE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and concerns the activities of the Senator Michel Cogger, who just stated in the Senate that he wants his inquiry before the Senate postponed until there has been a police investigation.

My question does not concern the operations that attracted the attention of the RCMP last week but a case of which the RCMP and the government have been aware since last January.

Mr. Speaker, I have a copy of a bill for $110,000 and dated February 1, 1988, sent by Senator Cogger to a company called GigaMos. According to the bill, this amount was in payment for, and I quote: "General, corporate and governement relations consulting fees from December 1986 to date, including more specifically: intensive representations—numerous telephone conversations, meetings and discussions with, among other people, Charles McMillan, adviser, and Bernard A. Roy, Principal Secretary to the Prime Minister of Canada".

Could the Solicitor General inform the House whether the RCMP, which has been aware of this matter for ten months, has conducted an investigation to find out whether Senator Cogger violated the provisions of Section 124 of the Criminal Code, and if so, what the results were of this investigation?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member ought to know that it is not customary for the Solicitor General, whoever he may be, to comment on investigations that may or may not have been conducted by the RCMP. I think we should respect the work done by the RCMP and let them do their job.

If the Hon. Member has any charges to make of any comments, he should go to the RCMP himself and give them the facts that were brought to his attention.

• (1430)

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I think the Solicitor General should take a look at this bill for services rendered by the senator and draw his own conclusions. In any case,—

[English]

I want to put a question to the Prime Minister. We are talking about the way in which the Prime Minister's office deals with the senator who just happens to be a law school friend of the Prime Minister and who was his leadership campaign chairman and co-chairman of the 1988 campaign.

I want to know from the Prime Minister whether he was made aware at that time that Senator Cogger was lobbying his principal secretary on behalf of GigaMos Corporation, and whether the Prime Minister was aware that Senator Cogger intended, and later submitted a bill, to GigaMos Corporation for $110,000?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe that this information came to light during the course of the last year. It was made public many months ago, during the course of a civil trial in Montreal. It was commented upon by the principals at the time. There was a list of witnesses who were called or were to have been called. A judgment has already been rendered by the superior court of Quebec.

I think that the matter has been disposed of, but if there is an appeal, so be it.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The senator was not party to that action. He was involved by way of evidence introduced in that action, which was a civil action.

I am talking about the way that the Prime Minister deals with a senator who just happens to be a long-time friend and a long-time political associate. Can we have the assurance of the Prime Minister that he will advise the House of whether he was made aware of the entreaties and lobbying of Senator Cogger with his principal secretary, for a fee? Can we have the assurance of the Prime Minister that in relation to matters currently under investigation by the RCMP concerning Senator Cogger—and we have not been able to obtain from the Solicitor General whether the events of 10 months ago were ever investigated—in the current context that RCMP officers conducting the investigation will not be subjected to political pressure from the government?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General has already responded that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is quite properly initiating its own inquiry into this matter and, no doubt, will do whatever it deems appropriate, as it always does in the course of these matters—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nunziata: Depending on who the defendant is.

Mr. Mulroney: Only the Liberals would suggest that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police has been manipulated for partisan purposes.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Only a Liberal would suggest that. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, I think I could be certain of one thing. I will take the reputation for independence and incorruptibility of the RCMP above the Liberal Party 10 times out of 10.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister a question about the damage control program relating to Senator Cogger.

The Prime Minister will be aware of Senator Cogger's statement made in the other place earlier today. Yet on November 3, while the Prime Minister was fully aware that an RCMP investigation was going on into the activities of Senator Cogger, the Prime Minister said the following: "An allegation has been made against him"—that is the senator—"and he has denied it. Not only has he denied it, he has invited the Senate to examine his conduct. What could be more forthcoming than that? I think it is the proper way to proceed".

In light of the Prime Minister's feeling that a Senate inquiry was the proper way to proceed while the RCMP was doing its work, I would like to ask him what has changed. Why is it that the senator is no longer prepared, or in favour, of having the inquiry which was considered the proper way to proceed three days ago?

Mr. Epp: That is not what he said.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): That is not what the senator said at all. Moreover, my friend says that the senator invited the Senate to examine his conduct, which he did. I thought that was an entirely appropriate thing to do.

The senator has advised the public that subsequent to his request for this kind of an inquiry he was informed via the Solicitor General in the House that the RCMP was going to conduct an independent investigation. As I read the senator's statement today, all he is saying is inasmuch as the RCMP has decided to initiate its own independent investigation, let it pursue that investigation to its end and hold in abeyance the Senate inquiry until such time as the RCMP has reported.

What could be more forthcoming and more objectively honest than that?

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, could the Prime Minister then tell the House what he knows about the RCMP investigation that we do not?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I do not know a single thing about the RCMP investigation, except for the fact that one was acknowledged by the Solicitor General. All I know is that the RCMP—

Mr. Boudria: You just said there was one.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to give an answer to an important question. I have been asked the question; I have responded to it fully. The Opposition asks important questions that could have damaging effects on members' reputations. They presume not innocence, but guilt. When I rise, pursuant to their request, to re-establish the facts, they try to shout me down. That is a denial of justice.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Fisheries concerning the announcement yesterday that Canada would accept the ruling of the binational panel on west coast salmon and herring.

On October 23, the Minister for International Trade stated in the House that financial compensation to the Americans is "an option that is being looked at". This is the route that both the industry workers and the fisheries council in British Columbia have agreed is the only acceptable response to the decision of the panel on west coast salmon and herring. Has the minister eliminated this option as a way of complying with the ruling?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I believe my statement, made jointly with the Minister for International Trade yesterday, speaks for itself.

Canada is assured that the findings of the free trade panel, the first one commissioned under the historic free trade agreement, can be supported by Canada because we are satisfied that our conservation and management requirements will be met, while permitting some small part of the Pacific salmon or herring catch to be exported only on conditions equivalent to those we require to manage all fish landed in the west coast fisheries.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, according to press reports yesterday the government has accepted the free trade panel's decision ensuring American exploitation of our fishery resource. Will the minister explain how he could reach such a decision, given the fact that there is no implementation plan in place? How does the minister plan to monitor the repercussions of this ludicrous decision?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, this is an important question. Canada will ensure the integrity of our management system to properly conserve this important Canadian resource.

If the hon. member would read, I believe it is, section 718 of the panel report, he would find that the panel gives Canada broad latitude within which to establish a range of management measures to ensure that fish caught in Canada will be counted by Canadians in a fail-safe way before being exported.

• (1440)

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, the minister did not say how he is going to count the ones that are being exported.

The minister and his colleague, the Minister for International Trade, have said repeatedly that no jobs—and this is a direct quotation from this minister—"historically established" would be lost as a result of any decision under the GATT or the free trade agreement.

Will the minister now guarantee to this House, and to industry workers concerned, that no Canadian fish processing jobs will be lost as a result of his government's cave-in to the U.S.?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and his party continue to promote the myth that this set of management requirements has something to do with protecting jobs. That matter was resolved many months ago when Canada accepted a GATT panel's finding that we had to play by the rules of international trade if we wished to trade in the international market-place.

I can assure the hon. member that in the five years this government has been in office there have been year over year more processing jobs in the Pacific coast fishing industry than in each previous year. In an era of liberalized trade where we will have access to more foreign markets, not less, by playing by the rules of international trade, there will indeed be increasing employment in British Columbia for fishermen and process workers.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the members' attention the presence in the gallery of Her Excellency Corazon Aquino, President of the Republic of the Philippines.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to address my question to the Minister of Fisheries and say to him first that he has nothing but a record of negligence and surrender in defending the interests of the fishing industry of this country.

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. member feels very strongly about this, but he seems to be going a little bit beyond an appropriate preamble. Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me put a question to this minister, so-called.

The fact of the matter is that he has now surrendered the sovereign right of Canada to manage its own resource.

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): It is too bad their brain power does not match their voice level.

Mr. Speaker, the question to the hon. minister is this. In this case, can the minister tell us, now that the precedent has been set and we have lost control over the management of that vital resource, how we are going to protect the interest of the east coast fishery, which is now vulnerable under Article 1205 of the free trade agreement and will now be subject to the same attack by the Americans to take away the right of Canadians to preserve, conserve, and process their fish on their own shores?

Mr. Siddon: First of all, Mr. Speaker, it is rather strange the hon. member would talk about negligence when he has neglected to concede that Canada has been a big victor, that we have realized great gains as a result of the free trade agreement with tens of thousands of jobs being created in Canada. I think he should begin to tell Canadians the truth in that respect. Tens of thousands of new jobs have been created in western Canada as a result of the free trade agreement.

Had the hon. member read the free trade panel report, and if he had consulted Section 716 in particular very carefully, he would have realized that Canada has sacrificed nothing in regard to our sovereign right to manage our fish stocks, and that prerogative remains solely with the Government of Canada and with the Minister of Fisheries, as reflected in the free trade panel report.

CANADA–U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, while we are dealing with the question of that Minister's negligence, I would like to ask the Prime Minister about another serious omission by one of his ministers.

This morning Mr. Halliday, the chief negotiator on the subsidy rounds of negotiations under the FTA, admitted that he has received no instructions whatsoever from the Minister for International Trade indicating what subjects should or should not be negotiated by Canada. In other words, everything is up for grabs—regional programs, our agricultural programs, our health programs, our social programs. They are all subject to the negotiation because we have a negligent minister not giving instructions.

Will the Prime Minister forthwith take action to correct that serious omission, issue guidelines clearly indicating what the guidelines are for our chief negotiator and state today in the House that the crucial programs affecting regional development, agriculture, unemployment insurance and social programs will not be negotiated in this round of the free trade deal?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We have all learned long ago, Mr. Speaker, that when the hon. member has nothing to say he engages in abuse. He is now seeking to abuse a public servant who appeared before the committee. The public servant made it quite clear in his testimony to that committee that we are in a very preliminary stage of discussion with the United States, that there will not be the beginning of those kinds of bilateral discussions until the conclusion of the MTN round. The hon. member knows that. If he would pay more attention to the facts and less time trying to create false fears in the country, we would all be better served.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): My question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Press reports indicate that Congressman Dan Rostenkowski, the chairman of an important trade committee in the United States Congress, has asked the International Trade Commission to gather data on subsidies paid to Canadian Durum wheat producers. Surely, this constitutes harassment by the United States administration and Congress.

What action is the Minister going to take to respond and take action to stop this harassment by the United States Congress and administration? He brought out a paper this morning entitled Growing Together. He did not reveal how he was going to stop this harassment by the United States government.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, under the U.S. trade law they have the right to examine these kinds of issues. Canada is very confident that the results of that investigation will clearly demonstrate that U.S. producers are subsidized to a greater extent than Canadian producers. That has been confirmed under the free trade agreement and ratified both by the Secretary of Agriculture and myself.

Mr. Foster: When the free trade deal passed the House of Commons, the government turned down an amendment which would have given Canadian agriculture producers and other producers in this country the same kind of tools that the United States administration and producers have. That is to say, they could have a government agency like the International Trade Commission gather data and monitor exports so as to harass them.

Is the Minister willing to take action or bring in similar legislation to that provided to the United States producers where they can simply ask a government agency to start to gather information and to monitor a situation so as to harass those producers?

Mr. Mazankowski: I find it incredible. I do not know what this member has against success. If he looked at page 28 of Growing Together, he would find that the United States is now one of the top five agriculture markets that Canada has. That is the record that we have and that is going to continue. It is being augmented by the free trade agreement. Why does he want to condemn our best customer?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Mr. Speaker, in the summer of 1988, some very serious charges of influence peddling were brought against the former Member for Chambly, Mr. Richard Grisé. However, search warrants were not issued until November 21, several months later. Considering very serious charges of political interference in a recent case, I would now like to ask the Solicitor General whether he could inform the House today about the reasons for postponing action until November 21, in a case of that magnitude.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that despite statements that were made earlier, the RCMP is an honourable police force that acts without political interference. I would like to refer to what the RCMP Commissioner said himself in June before a committee of this House. He was very emphatic about this. And I believe that in order to protect the integrity of this police force, we must let them do their job and conduct their investigation as they see fit, with the utmost integrity. That is how a police force should founction in a country like Canada.

[English]

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the point. We in this country want to allow the RCMP to do their job without political interference. That is the purpose of this motion, without suggestions that charges were a fragile construction to bring about prosecution.

My supplementary question is this. In light of the very, very grave concerns that have been raised recently with respect to possible political interference in the operations of the RCMP, I want to ask the Solicitor General whether he is prepared to review the record in the case of Richard Grisé and to very carefully examine why there was a delay from the summer of 1988 until November 21, the day of the election before search warrants were issued. Will he assure that there was no political interference?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I fail to see why the Hon. Member chooses to ignore what the RCMP Commissioner said. The Commissioner is not just anyone. He is in charge of RCMP operations. Does the Hon. Member refuse to believe the RCMP Commissioner when he says before a committee of this House that there is absolutely no interference? Well, I do believe the Commissioner when he says that.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. This morning the minister released a discussion paper entitled Growing Together which was described as the most comprehensive agriculture review ever undertaken in Canada.

It is fine to speak of change, but the farmers of Canada need to know that the government is truly committed to a new agricultural policy. How does the minister now intend to proceed in translating the principles of this report into much needed agricultural programs?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, what has been tabled today is the beginning of a process and not the end of a process. It is inviting all stakeholders in the agriculture and agri-food industry to participate and work together to develop some solutions to some very important issues that confront agriculture, not only today, but indeed in the future. We have changes in the global trading community. We have changing consumer demands, changing emphasis on food safety and environmental considerations, and the need for adequate safety net systems. What is proposed here is a national agricultural conference which will take place in Ottawa on December 11 and 12. At this time all stakeholders will meet to review some of the very important issues that are outlined in this document.

Together we can build a stronger, more durable and more vibrant agricultural industry.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Recently, the chairman of the finance committee, the member for Mississauga South, wrote a letter in reference to the manufacturers' sales tax to a Mr. Conway in Point Claire, Quebec. It states:

> You will appreciate that we have been stealing money from the consumers—with the federal sales tax. This year we will be stealing $17.3 billion without most people knowing about it.

Does the government agree with this characterization of the MST? If so, is it guilty of aiding and abetting, having raised the MST four times since 1984?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for drawing the attention of the House to one of the finer letters of the member—and one of the more moderate.

What I think the member was trying to say, perhaps in his own inimitable fashion, was that Canada is the only country with a manufacturers' sales tax, that there are 48 of our leading competitors who have the equivalent of the GST, and it is time we moved into the next century and got a GST rather than the old MST.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister accepts the vocabulary of the member for Mississauga South, I am sure he will accept his characterization of the GST. He stated:

> We may have been gouging and screwing you. Now you know we are gouging and screwing you.
>
> Perhaps if some people know that they are being gouged and screwed they will make less demands on government.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Martin (LaSalle–Émard): Mr. Speaker, I hope my mother isn't watching.

Mr. Speaker: I think your mother hopes you will stop reading.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Prime Minister is this. Does he agree with this rather succinct and concise description of his government's economic policy?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as my mother watches this I wouldn't even touch that with a ten-foot pole.

But I know my hon. friend from Lasalle—Émard will want to thank the member for Mississauga South for having provided him with some of his finer lines.

I think the very distinguished chairman of the finance committee of the House has been effective to the point where he has obscured some of the members of this cabinet, and that is pretty tough to do.

I think the member in his own inimitable fashion has been an outstanding member and chairman, but he expresses his enthusiasm in ways rather more vigorous and descriptive than some of us would like.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that he has made the comment that the goods and services tax is in effect in some 45 countries around the world—

Some Hon. Members: Forty-eight.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): I am just quoting the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, who said 45.

Some Hon. Members: Forty-eight.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): My question is this. One of the countries that does not have a goods and services tax is the United States of America.

• (1500)

I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he can explain to us now why he is not prepared to withdraw this tax, in view of the fact that the 10 premiers he will be meeting over the next couple of days have already indicated their opposition to the tax, and in view of the fact that our major trading partner, the United States, has not seen fit to impose a goods and services tax?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a sovereign nation and we impose the tax policies that we deem to be in Canada's national interest.

The fact that the United States does not have the tax does not impact in any way. The needs of Canada are entirely different. Our desire is to maintain the unique social programs, our regional development programs, medicare—all of the things on which we campaigned and were strongly re-elected. The GST will help us do that well into the next century. We want to do more for the people of Canada and this tax instrument is more modern, more effective and more just.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I guess it is important that we can say that the GST is in 48 other countries, but it does not matter whether the United States has it or not.

In view of the fact that we are dealing with economic matters at the First Ministers' Conference, and in view of the fact that the premiers across the country—if we are going to talk about the sovereignty of Canada—have all opposed the goods and services tax, will the Prime Minister indicate today to the House whether or not he is going to withdraw the proposal that is presently before the Standing Committee on Finance and allow for open and fruitful discussion at the economic meeting with the first ministers of Canada?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, first, the member wants us run by the Americans, then he wants us run by the provinces. We will speak for Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: His good friend and former colleague, the Premier of New Brunswick, said at the premiers' conference in Quebec City in August that it would be the height of irresponsibility if the premiers came together for a couple of days and failed to come up with an alternative to the goods and services tax; it would be extremely irresponsible if all they did was try and denigrate the federal initiative. Premier McKenna was absolutely right. All they did was denigrate the federal level. They came up with no alternative.

We have an alternative. We believe it is very much in Canada's interests. We are stopping the negative and destructive attitude of penalizing production in Canada, penalizing the creation of jobs and we are trying to make Canada a much more competitive nation. I know at the end of the day my distinguished colleague from New Brunswick will applaud the Government of Canada.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Honey producers in the riding of Elk Island depend on the tripartite stabilization program to ensure the success of their operations. While they realize that this program involves not only the federal government but also provincial governments, they are hoping for a payment fairly soon. These people are important.

When can the honey producers expect the payment?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can advise my hon. colleague that there will be a payment made under the national tripartite stabilization program for honey. It will be in the equivalent of 8.8 cents a pound. The amount across the country will yield some $5 million, more or less. The cheques are in the process of being issued now, so he can deliver the good news to his constituents in Elk Island this afternoon or this weekend.

DRYDEN INQUIRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Canadians have been watching with interest as the drama around the Dryden inquiry has unfolded during its first phase.

News reports now have it that Justice Moshansky is recommending that the Government of Canada revise its regulations on de-icing of commercial airplanes to make de-icing mandatory rather than being left to the discretion of the pilot who may be subject to undue pressure to be on time in order to keep the company schedule.

Does the minister agree with this proposal and, if so, when will these regulations come into effect?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Justice Moshansky has not yet tabled his report, and I have not received a copy. When it will be done, I will consider the report and make it public. It is not a fact yet.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, the minister should be aware, as most of us commute to Ottawa by plane are, that we are well into the icing season.

Regardless of whether or not he has received that recommendation specifically from the justice involved, will he take immediate steps to implement the concept of the recommendation and ensure that de-icing is mandatory, not something that is left to the whim of the pilot?

[Translation]

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, when the report is tabled by Judge Moshansky and I receive the report, I will consider its recommendations, and as the government usually does in a case like this, we will act on those recommendations, and of course we cannot do so until we receive the report.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. Today, mayors of the Quebec-Windsor corridor representing some 14 million Canadians who have shown that they want, need and use VIA Rail, appeared before the transportation committee. They told us that VIA Rail is part of the solution, not part of the problem to the transportation needs of this country.

If the minister does not wish to eliminate passenger rail service in this country, and if he does not want the public to see his Royal Commission on Transportation as simply performing an autopsy on VIA, will the minister cede to the mayors' common-sense request for an immediate moratorium on all cuts to VIA Rail until such time as the royal commission has presented its findings?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I met the mayors just before Question Period and it was interesting. They had three proposals. The first was to consider if the decision is made what we would do with the equipment. I said I would consider their proposal. The second was to deal with the royal commission and to have a voice at the royal commission and I gave the same answer. The third one was the moratorium. The moratorium represents $200 million and I told the mayors that I don't have that money.

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, today we have been given reports that at this very moment VIA is preparing to sell off one-third of its passenger car fleet, some 260 cars. I am wondering how the minister can stand idly by and watch VIA rolling stock and the Canadian taxpayers' investment being squandered away.

Will the minister call upon VIA Rail to stop committing slow suicide today, and not sell off its cars until we know for sure whether or not we will need them?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval) Mr. Speaker, if my friend would well understand what I said before, I said that it was one of the proposals made by the mayors. I said that I would get in touch with VIA Rail to see exactly where it is on this subject. I said also that I would consider the proposal. I think that is the answer the member wants.

EAST GERMANY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Immigration and it concerns the continuing mass exodus of East Germans to the West.

A month ago in the House in response to a question that I posed, the minister promised on a priority basis to deal with the German Canadian community in signing a master agreement through which to sponsor East Germans. On October 26 the minister, in a meeting with the Canadian German Congress, flatly refused this request.

Why has the government refused to support such a comprehensive group sponsorship package by the German Canadian community when it enjoys overwhelming support throughout Canada and when the community is prepared to take full responsibility for it?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when I met with the German Canadian Congress I expressed to them, as I would express in the House today, our interest in helping in any way we can with the situation of the East Germans who are leaving East Germany.

As the hon. member knows, these people automatically have citizenship in West Germany which is what most of them are seeking. We are prepared to help in any way we can. I have offered and discussed with the German Canadian Congress a master agreement to help bring East Germans here. We will pull out all the stops to help the Canadian German Congress and the East Germans who think they would like to live in Canada.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is I do not know where she is pulling out all the stops, because no one has seen the stops yet.

The minister has told the Canadian German Congress that she is only going to be interested in helping independent applications, which is no help because that is part of the criteria anyway. Given that previous governments in historical movements in eastern Europe, be it in Hungary, Poland or Czechoslovakia, have permitted thousands of migrants to come to Canada, why has her immigration policy completely ignored the historical movements going on in eastern Europe today, ignored the pleas and requests of the Canadian German community, and ignored and refused to be a relevant player in the unfolding drama in eastern Europe? Why, Madam Minister?

• (1510)

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, I think that our government has been quite the reverse on the events that are going on in eastern Europe, whether it is in East Germany, Poland, Hungary or in other countries.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Prime Minister, and myself have all been very active in putting forward things that Canada can be doing to help. That includes immigration and it includes all of eastern Europe, not just East Germany.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Agriculture who tabled a document this morning outlining a review of Canadian agricultural policy that does not address the main problem facing rural Canada, notably unsustainable farm debt.

Why did the minister choose to ignore this growing problem, especially since the immediate impact of his market-driven policy paper that he advocates would make the debt problem even worse?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that we have not overlooked the problem nor do we intend to in the future.

What is a fact is that farm arrears have been reduced this year over last year by 21 per cent. Farm bankruptcies have dropped by 41 per cent in 1989 versus 1984. So there is progress.

In September, we placed a moratorium on foreclosures. In January 1985, we put an $80 million, 4 per cent interest rate reduction program into effect. In 1985, we introduced shared risk mortgages. We established the Farm Debt Review Boards. Well over 6,000 accounts have been handled, 75 per cent successfully.

The commodity base loan program was brought in as well in 1986. In December, 1987, a total of $360 million was conveyed to the Farm Debt Review Board, again to assist this very serious problem.

In July, 1988, $400 million was plugged into the Farm Credit Corporation. We have a tremendous record and we will continue to do more in this regard.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, given that the Farm Credit Corporation is behaving more and more like the banks with more foreclosures thus creating more downward pressure on land prices which creates more foreclosures again because the debt to equity ratio goes down, can the minister explain why he supports the continuation of this kind of policy when it simply is not working?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I will take that as a representation because it is obvious the NDP does not want the Farm Credit Corporation to be an instrument of farm policy. I will certainly take that into consideration.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties relating to government business for the remainder of this week. I think you will find that there is unanimous consent for the following arrangements. I move the following motion:

That, on Wednesday, November 8, the House, as its first order of business under Government Orders will resume second reading consideration of Bill C-43, an act respecting abortion; that at 6:00 o'clock p.m., this debate will be adjourned to another sitting day so that the House can then move to resume and complete third reading consideration of Bill C-20, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act; that any recorded divisions demanded to dispose of the third reading stage of Bill C-20 will be deferred automatically to 12:00 o'clock noon on Thursday, November 9, 1989 and that the hours of sitting for that day shall be extended by the amount of time taken for any such deferred division;

That, on Thursday, November 9, 1989, the hours of sitting and business of the House shall be as set out in the Standing Orders in relation to a Friday sitting day;

That Thursday, November 9, 1989, be designed an allotted day; and

That, when the House adjourns on Thursday, November 9, 1989, it shall stand adjourned until 11.00 o'clock a.m., Monday, November 20, 1989.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. government House leader have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I indeed can confirm that there have been negotiations and that we have agreed to the motion, but you can take the opposition's word that I do not think we have to put into the motion that Thursday, November 9, be designated an allotted day for a motion which shall not come to a vote. We would like to see that withdrawn from this motion. That it not come to a vote, Mr. Speaker, you can have my word and the word of this caucus, if it is our day, we will decide that.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to add another point to the very important point made by my colleague, the Chief Whip. It should be understood that the time taken for any division on Thursday noon must be added to the Opposition Day time. In other words, the time for the division should not reduce the time otherwise available for an Opposition Day.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, this motion was agreed to by all three parties. Unfortunately, and this will not happen again, it is not initialled by all three parties. I agree to both the suggestions of my colleagues opposite.

Mr. Speaker: By unanimous consent, Mr. Lewis moves:

That, on Wednesday, November 8, 1989, the House, as its first order of business under Government Orders, will resume second reading consideration of Bill C-43, An Act respecting abortion; that at 6.00 o'clock p.m, this debate will be adjourned to another sitting day so that the House can then move to resume and complete third reading consideration of Bill C-20, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act; that any recorded divisions demanded to dispose of the third reading stage of Bill C-20 will be deferred automatically to 12.00 o'clock noon on Thursday, November 9, 1989 and that the hours of sitting for that day shall be extended by the amount of time taken for any such deferred division;

That, on Thursday, November 9, 1989, the hours of sitting and business of the House shall be as set out in the Standing Orders in relation to a Friday sitting day;

That Thursday, November 9, 1989, be designated an allotted day; and

That, when the House adjourns on Thursday, November 9, 1989, it shall stand adjourned until 11.00 o'clock a.m., Monday, November 20, 1989.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis that Bill C–43, an Act respecting abortion, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak against Bill C–43. This is an act to recriminalize abortion.

I feel that this bill is the very height of government hypocrisy. The bill would jail medical doctors for two years for performing a medical service, unless vaguely defined health criteria enshrined in criminal law are met. Women are also liable for criminal penalties under Section 21 of the Criminal Code for aiding and abetting in the commission of a crime. Abortion under circumstances described by several Supreme Court justices as valid reasons to have an abortion will now be one such criminal offence.

I understand the pressure that the government is under. Some people have called for criminal legislation in this area. The Leader of the Official Opposition, the Leader of the Liberal Party, has called for criminal legislation in this area. Several ministers and backbenchers have called for criminalization on abortion.

Some think that this bill should be a free vote because they say that it is a matter of conscience for the members of this House of Commons to decide. I believe that it is a matter of conscience for each individual woman to decide, not for the members of this House.

The Minister of Justice in his justifications for this bill said this legislation would prevent people who are not doctors from performing an abortion. This is an example of the hypocrisy that I have spoken about.

The Criminal Code already deals with the performance of surgical procedures. No one can practise medicine in Canada without a licence. There already are penalties in the Criminal Code.

The Minister of Justice was quoted in The Globe and Mail on November 4 as saying that a deliberate decision was made to legislate by an amendment to the Criminal Code. Only by using the criminal law power can the federal government ensure a national approach to the question of abortion.

This bill does not provide a national approach to the issue. It allows provinces to pass restrictive laws to block access to abortion services just as we now see happening in the province of Nova Scotia. It does not set a national standard for accessibility.

The federal government sets standards for accessibility for other medical procedures through the Canada Health Act. The Minister of Justice cannot get away with saying that accessibility to health services is not a federal matter. The Canada Health Act is a federal statute that guarantees accessibility to medical services under threat of partial or complete withdrawal of federal funding for health care to the provinces. The Canada Health Act has already been used to guarantee that Canadians across this country could not be extra billed. The only national standard that this bill sets is the threat of criminal charges being brought against Canadian doctors for performing an abortion.

• (1520)

In the province of Prince Edward Island no abortion has been legally performed since 1982. Women from that province must go to Nova Scotia or another province to obtain an abortion. The Morgentaler clinic in Montreal has served women from as far away as Newfoundland. In Newfoundland there is only one doctor who is willing and allowed by a hospital board to perform abortions. When this doctor is ill or away on vacation no safe medical abortions are available in the province of Newfoundland.

Access to clinics in cities are physically blocked by protesters who harass women in an attempt to intimidate them. Women who have made probably the most difficult and the most agonizing personal decision of their lives are the targets of verbal abuse.

Those who say that there is already abortion on demand in Canada or that this law stands for something called abortion on demand are ignorant of the lengths that many Canadian women must go to to obtain an abortion in this country. Even in provinces where access to abortion services are a lesser problem, we still see women forced to go to the United States. Not every woman in Canada lives in Toronto, Vancouver, or Montreal. Rural women have a very difficult time finding access to abortion services. If the doctor closest to them refuses, the woman must search further and further until she finds a doctor who will.

There is a serious problem of access in Canada, a problem this government has chosen to intensify rather than to address. Under this new law, women will have to shop around for a doctor who will brave the threat of criminal sanctions. At this point some doctors do not seem to believe that they will be charged for performing such a medical service because it really does seem to be an unbelievable thing that they could be. But we have seen under the old abortion law that several doctors were criminally charged for performing abortions. We have already heard the threats of the anti-choice extremists to charge doctors under this new law. The threat of being charged may keep some doctors from performing abortions, and access to a very needed health service may, in fact, be diminished.

This bill, if passed into law, will open the floodgate to a series of third party interventions. Disgruntled ex-boyfriends may lay an information that would bring criminal charges against doctors, and an aiding and abetting charge against women; anti-choice hospital personnel could charge doctors. There is no end to the legal lengths a certain faction of the anti-choice movement will go.

In the United States, a woman who was terminally ill and pregnant, decided, along with her husband and with her doctor, to wait a further two weeks before undergoing a Caesarean section because she knew and her doctor knew that the foetus would have a better change of survival at a more advanced gestational age. A third party court intervention led a judge to order an immediate Caesarean section against this woman's will. The foetus died within two hours and the woman died two days later. Third party interventions rob women of their dignity and of the right to make a decision about their own future. This is based on religious and philosophical principles that most of the population here in Canada do not share. We must not hand a new legal tool to this extreme faction of the anti-choice movement. We cannot stand idly by and let what is currently happening in the United States happen here in Canada.

I am concerned about the criminal aspect of the bill and its implications for third party interventions and access. I add to that my disagreement with the conditions that it imposes on women.

I have three children, and giving birth was a joyous experience for me. It has been my most fulfilling life experience. But I was fortunate. I have a supportive husband. We were ready and prepared to have children. We were able to provide for their care. It was my choice to become a mother. I know what pregnancy is, and I know what childbirth is. It is not easy, and it is not simple. It is simply not inconvenient as some MPs in this House would suggest.

Some women choose not to bear children. A woman who makes this decision is not frivolous. To say this negates the value of motherhood. Motherhood is not to be taken lightly. It is not to be entered into by mistake or by force. Motherhood is a serious responsibility. Women who choose not to undertake it are not frivolous. Women are people of integrity. Women make careful and thoughtful decisions based on their own personal circumstances that we here do not have the right or the ability to prejudge.

Many women each year still die in childbirth. The question is not whether the doctor alone believes the woman's health is likely to suffer because of a pregnancy, it must be the woman's choice whether or not she decides that she should have a child.

The Minister of Justice has been using the language of choice when discussing this bill. There is no choice for women involved in this bill. The minister is being hypocritical when he uses the language of choice in relation to this bill which makes abortion the doctor's decision based on health criteria, not the women's choice based on her own personal criteria.

The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, Brian Dickson, said in the 1988 Morgentaler judgment, and I quote: "Forcing a woman by threat of criminal sanction to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus a violation of security of the person". Chief Justice Dickson was not talking about meeting the state's health criteria to have an abortion. He did not say the woman should have to be measured against some standard that largely male politicians here will set up in order to have an abortion.

Madam Justice Bertha Wilson said that liberty in a free and democratic society does not require the state to approve the personal decisions made by its citizens. It does, however, require the state to respect them. The question then becomes whether the decision of a woman to terminate her pregnancy falls within this class of protected decisions. I have no doubt that it does. This decision is one that will have profound psychological, economic and social consequences for the pregnant woman. The circumstances giving rise to it can be complex and varied and there may be, and usually are, powerful considerations militating in opposite directions. It is a decision that deeply reflects the way the woman thinks about herself and her relationship to others and to society at large. It is not just a medical decision. It is a profound social and ethical one as well. The response to it will be the response of the whole person.

I would have hoped that in drafting this bill the conservative cabinet would have given more serious consideration to these words of wisdom. I believe if they had there would be no such bills in front of us today.

How far is this government going to take legislating state controls over a woman's body and personal decisions? What other aspects of women's personal lives are going to be left up to the state, the courts, and the medical profession to decide?

Canadians have varying moral, philosophical and religious beliefs about abortion. There is no reason for the state to impose what is, in fact, a minority moral belief about the equal status of the embryo or foetus upon all Canadian women. It is their own moral decision to make.

The church and the state are separate entities in modern Canadian society. They must remain separate. In Ireland and Brazil abortion is illegal, yet these two countries have a much higher abortion rate than we do here in Canada where abortion, prior to the passing of this bill, is still legal. The Minister of Justice said that this bill was not designed to reduce abortions. I do not understand this government. I do not understand why any government would put a health service in the Criminal Code.

This bill does not reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies. It does not improve access for women across Canada. What is this bill meant to accomplish? What is it meant to do? There seems to be only one answer to that question. It seems that it is meant to quell the call for federal action on abortion. This government will now be able to say that it has dealt with the difficult issue of abortion.

What we should all be working for is to reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies in Canada. Bringing in restrictive legislation does not do this. Many people imagine that every sexually active person is completely knowledgeable about various methods of contraception, their effectiveness and the risks. Nothing could be further from the truth.

A 1987 Gallup poll showed that only 46 per cent of Canadians felt that they had adequate access to family planning information services. There was a great regional disparity in these findings, with only one-third of Atlantic Canadians reporting sufficient access to these services and to this information. Young people are at great risk of having misinformation about effective birth control and the risks of pregnancy. One 1986 Canadian study of teenagers has shown that only about one-half of sexually active teenagers always use contraception. The 1986 research discusses how one in six women in Ontario will become pregnant before she reaches the age of 20.

Only half the schools in Canada offered sex education in 1984. A 1982 study showed that only 57 per cent of medical doctors were prepared to provide teenagers with birth control resources. Planned Parenthood states that many parents do not feel prepared to provide thorough sexuality education for their children. Research indicates that the provision of reproductive health services and sex education reduce the number of teenage pregnancies.

According to a 1984 Gallup poll, 83 per cent of Canadians do support sex education in our schools, and half say the current level of school sex education is not adequate. Teenage women are not physically or emotionally prepared for pregnancy. Teenage mothers and their children experience a higher rate of mortality and of morbidity. It is cruel to deal with unwanted pregnancies simply by wrenching new born babies away from these young women. The key, clearly, is prevention. Not enough is being done in this area.

In 1977 the family planning division at Health and Welfare Canada was disbanded. There is now only one full-time staff person in that huge department to work on family planning issues. Funding to Planned Parenthood was cut by $61,000 during this government's first mandate. In 1984, Planned Parenthood received $200,000 from the federal government, down from $447,000 in 1979. By 1988, Planned Parenthood was receiving only $139,000, a decrease of $61,000, not even taking inflation into account.

I questioned the Minister of National Health and Welfare about this in the House yesterday and he replied that Planned Parenthood funding had been increased for 1989 to $146,000. I am no mathematician, Mr. Speaker, and obviously the minister is not either, because this still represents a substantial long-term decrease in funding to Planned Parenthood of $54,000.

First the Liberals axed family planning, and then the Tories axed it, so that there is now an inadequate sum to address the desperate need for family planning education in this country. If this government were at all imaginative and serious about preventing unwanted pregnancies, it would consider the establishment of mobile family planning units that would visit schools and communities to disseminate birth control and sexuality information.

It could expand the role that Health and Welfare Canada plays in family planning education. This government could consider placing family planning ads on our television networks. Why in all of this discussion about recriminalizing abortion do we not hear one meaningful word from the government on family planning education?

Why is this government bringing in a restrictive criminal bill on abortion and not doing a single thing to reduce the numbers of unwanted pregnancies? Why cannot the government understand that the humane and the compassionate way to deal with the abortion issue is through progressive policies such as family planning education and not through punitive criminal legislation?

Another issue closely related to family planning education is research into the safe and effective means of contraception. The effectiveness of commonly available contraceptive devices leaves much to be desired.

A Canadian study of women experiencing unwanted pregnancies has shown that a full 64 per cent were using some form of birth control when they became pregnant. Part of the problem is a lack of knowledge about effective birth control. Many of the methods being used were not as effective as others such as condoms alone or the rhythm method.

Some 15 per cent were on the pill when they became pregnant. Although this is one of the most highly effective methods available, it is not 100 per cent effective for the typical user. The two most reliable forms of contraception, the birth control pill and sterilization, are also among those that pose the most health risks or that require a commitment to permanent infertility. Sterilization is obviously not an option for most teenagers or for any young man or young woman who is planning to have a family in the later stage of their life.

Celibacy has been touted as an answer to unwanted pregnancy. To think that married couples will not have sexual intercourse unless they are completely prepared to bring a child into this world is really preposterous. To think that teenagers inundated with sexual messages from the media will suddenly take to perhaps a decade of celibacy is also naive.

Sexuality is a part of the human existence. It is neither realistic nor healthy to try to force asexuality on adults and teenagers unless they are prepared to have children. Rather, the answer lies in effective contraception, safe contraception, and the services and education that will allow all sexually active people to avail themselves of these.

This government should make the funding into research of safe, effective contraception for men and women a priority. Along with failed birth control and inadequate information about birth control is the matter of women who want to have children but are held back because of social and economic factors. I have heard here and around these halls that socio-economic factors are not a reason to have an abortion. Now the government wants to entrench this dubious principle into criminal law.

Instead of outlawing these reasons why do we not work to eliminate them? Why expect women to plunge their families into poverty by having more children? Why not try to prevent the unwanted pregnancies and to eliminate the socio-economic conditions that lead women to forgo pregnancy that may very well otherwise be wanted?

According to the National Council on Welfare, almost one in five Canadian children is living below the poverty line today. The government proposes no action on this other than to force poor women to bear more children. One frequent result of poverty during pregnancy is low birth weight, which often leads to further medical complications.

According to the Quebec Corporation of Physicians babies born in certain Montreal and Quebec City neighbourhoods are as likely to be underweight at birth as those in underdeveloped countries. A recent Canadian study indicates that the child mortality rate is twice as high among families at the lowest income level than among those at the highest.

• (1540)

An Ontario study found that being on welfare is one of the strongest predictors of chronic health problems among children. Children are the largest group of users of food banks. A Calgary study of 132 public schools found that 46 reported significant problems with children coming to school hungry. Nutrition has led to success in school. Poor nutrition may lead to an inability to concentrate and poor vision.

Almost two-thirds of single parent families headed by women are living below the poverty line. A Planned Parenthood document states that for many women early parenting leads to poverty, poor health, a breakdown of current or future marriages and a lower level of formal education. It is hypocritical of the government to bring in a bill that criminalizes abortion for socio-economic reasons while the same government contributes to adverse socio-economic conditions for women through regressive economic policies.

The poverty rate for two parent families headed by a person under age 25 was 30 per cent in 1986. Two parents do not guarantee that a child will not grow up in poverty. The Canadian Council on Social Development states that even if both spouses were employed at the minimum they could earn only 92 per cent of the poverty line income in 1986. Currently the federal minimum wage of $4 an hour is the lowest in Canada.

Poverty is a serious problem in Canada. Raising a child exacerbates the poverty a family may be experiencing or may contribute to poverty. We need to build a society in which children do not mean poverty to a woman or a family, a world in which children are not poor or hungry. The federal government can do much in the area of removing the economic barriers women face when considering whether or not to have a child, but this government seems to simply refuse to focus on economic strategies, on full employment, and adequate service. Instead it offers women regressive taxation and cut-backs. It has no compassion for the poor. This government's actions have been appalling.

It is the height of hypocrisy to make abortion for socio-economic reasons a crime and yet do nothing to eliminate the economic reasons why women feel that they have no other choice but an abortion in some instances. In fact, this government has exacerbated the problem of poverty in Canada by costing people their jobs with the trade deal and tossing thousands of people on welfare through its cut-backs to unemployment insurance and its taxation of the poor and the homeless with the new goods and services tax.

There are many things that this government has the power to do for women and especially for mothers. It could reindex and raise the family allowance. Instead it has dealt motherhood a blow by deindexing it and now it is clawing it back.

This government could expand the Canada Student Loans Program and the Canadian Jobs Strategy, making them more flexible and accessible for parents and young people. These are initial expenses that pay for themselves in the long run with a skilled workforce and a healthier economy. Language training and literacy should be a component of CJS. This would give many young women with small children a second chance to get the kind of education and employment that will allow them to feed their families.

The government could raise the minimum wage. How does the government expect women earning $4 an hour to be able to raise children? The government could also implement mandatory pay equity, employment equity with goals and with timetables, rather than let women be economically penalized simply because they are women.

In our society women still bear the brunt of child rearing. Whether she has a spouse or not, a woman is usually expected to fulfil the demanding task of caring for and raising our children. Through inadequate or non-existing child support payments, women are often the only financial support as well as emotional and moral support of their families.

Women need to know that if they have a child they will not have to give up their job and livelihood, will not have to plunge themselves and their families into poverty, and that there is a support system in place which recognizes that many workers are also parents. In a 1988 survey 21,000 Canadian women said they were not paid labour force participants because they could not find subsidized child care. This government's policies are keeping women at home and keeping women in poverty.

The government came up with an inadequate strategy to deal with the ongoing child care crisis and then it abandoned even that. This government has shown no commitment to the children of Canada. Instead of recriminalizing abortion it should improve the situation for children and for parents in Canada. Instead of making hypocritical promises during the election campaign and breaking them after the election, this government should take positive action.

Canada's system of parental leave lags far behind that of most European countries. A pregnant woman in Canada must be employed in a UI insurable job between 10 and 20 weeks, depending on the regional rate of unemployment, to qualify for only 15 weeks of maternity leave with benefits equalling a maximum of 60 per cent of her insurable earnings.

A man or woman who is a new natural or adoptive parent and has met the qualifying criteria may take a 10-week parental leave at a maximum of 60 per cent of their insurable earnings to care for the infant, providing that the parent lives in a province or works for an employer who allows for this length of parental leave. The government cut parental leave for adoptive parents by five weeks this year. At the same time as the Conservatives are recriminalizing abortion, they are making it more difficult for adoptions to go through. This is yet another example of the hypocrisy. There is usually a specified time that an adoptive parent must commit to stay at home with their new child. The government is imposing a financial burden on adoptive parents which may deter the adoption process.

Why does the government not expand parental leave to at least 24 weeks as a short-term goal with a view to further expansion and negotiate with the provinces to amend their labour codes to allow for parental leave?

We must also look into other ways in which workers with family responsibilities can be accommodated. We must take effective steps to make Canada a place in which children are welcome, in which children are an important and treasured part of our society. We cannot continue to carry on this government's course of ignoring children's needs: food, shelter and child care. Parents should be able to spend the time they need with their children without depriving themselves or depriving their families. It has become so expensive to live that if a child has two parents usually both of them must work outside the home. Employers and government must recognize that workers have families and the economy must be restructured to take this fact into account.

Our social system requires women to be the primary care givers of children yet provides almost no support for pregnant women and new mothers. Women at a family life conference spoke of the inability of a blind mother of four to receive homemaker services. Support services must be accessible to all women. Support services pay for themselves in terms of healthy families and well adjusted individuals.

Sexually transmitted diseases may lead to infertility, birth defects, or even death. Health and Welfare Canada estimates that the cost of treating STDs in 1983 was $220 million. The direct cost of treating AIDS in 1985 was an estimated $192.6 million. This does not take into account the personal and social costs of these diseases. Half of all ectopic pregnancies which require emergency surgery to remove a fertilized ovum which is lost in a Fallopian tube is the result of a sexually transmitted disease. A government claiming to care about both foetuses and women should surely try to prevent STDs through education and accessible services. Governments should be involved in health protection and promotion, not in restricting reproductive choice for women.

The April 1989 federal budget cut $2 million from the Secretary of State women's program. Many of the groups funded through the program were involved in sharing information about issues, particularly issues affecting women including reproductive health. These groups have had their funding chopped by 15 per cent. The federal government cannot continue to evade its responsibilities in the area of health by claiming that it is a provincial matter. If health is only a provincial matter, why do we have a federal health statute guaranteeing accessibility and comprehensiveness among other things? That is what the Canada Health Act does.

If health is only a provincial concern, why does the federal government maintain a funding lever where health care provision is concerned? If health is a provincial matter, why do we have a federal Department of National Health and Welfare with a health promotion branch? The federal government should enforce the standards in the Canada Health Act to ensure access to adequate services which promote reproductive health and choice for all Canadians.

The abortion issue has centred around the ethics of abortion itself. What really needs to be discussed, however, is the ethics of a government that is prepared to restrict access to abortion but not prepared in any real way to address the reasons abortion takes place. The government's policies lead to economic hardship, inadequate planning, education and services, and environmental reproductive hazards. This government has shown concern for women and children. It is a government that sees abortion as a political issue, not a human issue, and is unwilling to look at ways to prevent unwanted pregnancies.

Prevention and support are the keys to creating real choices for women. Restricting abortion limits choice without addressing any of the reasons abortions occur. This abortion bill would reduce access to abortion, not reduce the numbers of unwanted pregnancies and abortions. It makes it more difficult to obtain an abortion, but it does nothing in the area of prevention. This bill also sets a precedent for handling unwanted pregnancies through criminal sanction rather than positive action. To me this bill says that women are not to be trusted. It says that women are not people of integrity, that they cannot be trusted to make their own decisions around their own personal lives for themselves.

The abortion bill does one more thing. It shows Canadians this government's hypocrisy around this issue. This bill does not ensure equal access for the women in all regions of Canada—the women in Prince Edward Island, the women in the north, the women in the rural areas of my home province of British Columbia, or the women in the Atlantic provinces and Newfoundland.

It does nothing to improve access for these women. They must still travel to large urban centres like Montreal. They must pay the expenses of getting there. What does this say to women in Canada who are poor, who cannot afford to travel? What is the option for them when there is no access to abortion services in their own area? It does not work toward reducing the number of unwanted pregnancies. Criminalization will not prevent unwanted pregnancies. It does not make Canada a supportive society for women and children.

This issue is the fundamental emancipation and equality issue for the women of this country. This is the issue that the women of Canada look toward, whether or not they have ever considered for themselves the option of abortion, whether or not they have ever considered yet for themselves in their lives whether or not to have children. They view this issue as the fundamental issue that states that they are equal people in our society.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Black: I urge members on both sides of this House: "speak to your mothers, speak to your sisters, speak to your daughters, speak to your wives. They understand this issue. They know. We know. Women know. We are people who can be trusted". I urge people on both sides of the House to vote in opposition to this bill for all women in Canada.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt the debate but there have been discussions among the three parties and I would like to have consent to move the following motion:

That when the House adjourns on Wednesday, November 29, 1989 it shall stand adjourned until Monday, December 4, 1989 at 11 a.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have leave of the House to introduce the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I just want to take this opportunity, on behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party, to thank my hon. friends for their generosity in setting aside these two days, the time of which will be made up I might add in terms of House time, to allow us to plan for our convention.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will resume debate with the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my voice today in a debate which over the course of the past year has bitterly divided citizens' groups, medical associations, the judiciary and Parliament itself. It has been a fierce and an emotional argument, an argument which has displayed the lives and experiences of individual Canadians across the front pages of newspapers and on the screens of millions of television sets throughout the country.

In the search for a solution to the abortion question, the public spotlight has sacrificed the privacy of everyone caught in the way, dissecting their experiences, emotions and entitlements. The rationale was that we were searching for a kernel of truth that would indicate clearly what was right and what was wrong. That is not the way in which an issue of this importance should be resolved. Sensationalizing individual lives cannot possibly provide the thoughtfulness, wisdom and judgment necessary to develop a bill which respects the rights of all Canadians, especially when those rights come into conflict with one another.

[Translation]

These rights relate to some very intimate matters. It is embarrassing for the people concerned and offensive for the rest of us to see these lives paraded in public. These are not issues that should be judged in a media trial.

It is not strictly a matter for the courts, either. However, there is ample evidence that in the absence of any initiative by Parliament, people will keep taking these matters before the courts.

Of course this kind of situation is unacceptable. It is not up to the courts to set policy, since the courts are not accountable to Canadians at election time. Clearly, it is up to our elected representatives to lead the way in this respect.

It is a role we have a duty to fulfil.

[English]

Many Canadians have very strong beliefs about whether abortion is right or wrong. In an issue which is so close to the hearts of each of us, we should not be surprised that some feel that it is their moral imperative to declare their stance as the only acceptable perspective in a caring world. When beliefs are held this deeply, they say there can be no concession.

I believe that we must search for common ground. Compromise is very difficult when groups cannot even agree to use the same vocabulary. When we politicize language itself we take away its meaning. Words no longer serve as tools to build understanding. They become weapons to discredit the views of others.

People who call themselves pro–choice in no way consider themselves to be anti–life. They feel that a woman's fundamental right to choose has been denied. It must now, when the right of women to determine their own futures is finally being recognized, be affirmed. And those who say they are pro–life flatly reject any claim that they are anti–choice. On the contrary, their entire effort has been to support the rights of those who cannot make their choices known because they do not yet have a voice.

We should not be surprised that the proposed legislation has not been endorsed by either pro–choice or pro–life groups because it does not use either's vocabulary.

• (1600)

[Translation]

There are few if any moral issues on which a consensus can be reached. However, the abortion isssue is stressful for each and everyone of us because it seems to call for a decision that negates one essential human value while benefiting another.

We should not be surprised at the intensity and bitterness of this debate. The fact that democracy encourages protest in our search for the truth is one of its strong points. However, it does not encourage protest for protest's sake. It tends to promote debate and argument so that we can finally agree on what is best for society.

[English]

We have been elected by Canadians to choose the course which best balances the rights of everyone concerned. We do not seek to disguise the fact that the bill is a compromise. It is a proposal which accepts the validity of opposing points of view. It recognizes that while abortion must always be a last resort, probably there will always be instances where it is necessary. Each case must be considered separately. We have provided room for that consideration in this legislation.

Over the years my position has been pro-life. I cannot pretend that each word of this legislation is exactly what I would have written in an ideal world, but I do believe that if we want legislation at all, we must compromise. Building on compromise, we must show tolerance. We must try to understand opinions which are different from our own. I do not mean that we have to agree completely, but rather that more than one opinion must be reflected in the law.

Society's values change with time and our laws change with them. The one constant must be our respect for one another. The social contract which guides our conduct with one another is not based on a principle of winner take all.

Twenty-two months ago the Supreme Court, interpreting the Charter of Rights, struck down the previous law on abortion. It recognized that society must choose among competing rights. But the country was left without a framework for making that choice.

The government on Friday, after much soul searching and compromise, tabled this bill. Some people have already declared their opposition. But what is their alternative, to have no law, as we have had for the last 22 months; to leave a policy vacuum, where depending on your point of view, everything or nothing is acceptable?

[Translation]

Obviously, we have a duty to specify the kind of context in which women and their doctors can make such sensitive decisions. The bill before the House today represents the best attempt at a compromise we have seen so far.

We have looked at other options. Some people felt that we could use the provisions of the Canada Health Act.

[English]

We have been asked to use the Canada Health Act in two ways. On the one hand, there are advocates of abortion rights who are concerned about the availability of abortion services. They would like us to financially penalize those provinces which do not provide unrestricted services.

The leader of the NDP argued for that approach yesterday. He made the case for invoking the Canada Health Act on abortion, but was not prepared to argue that the federal government should attempt to dictate how services that may be crucial to the very survival of patients, such as neurosurgery, cancer treatment, or heart surgery, should be delivered. Abortion would apparently be the only case where such a weapon would be used.

On the other hand, the pro-life groups have stated that the federal government should use the Canada Health Act to deny payments to provinces which provide abortion services.

Neither of these two alternatives is consistent with current constitutional practice in Canada. The provision of health services is primarily a matter of provincial jurisdiction. According to the Constitution, the provinces are responsible for the operation and delivery of the health care services which all Canadians cherish.

That fact was recognized when Parliament legislated on this issue in 1969. The then Minister of Justice who is today the Leader of the Opposition, described the role of the provinces clearly. He said this:

> The relationships in civil law between the patient and the doctor, between the patient and the nurse, between the doctor and the hospital, the nurse and the hospital, are relationships falling within the operation of provincial law, the civil law, and the constitutional responsibility of the provinces—the subject of statutes which regulate hospitals and professions. These are properly provincial matters.

[Translation]

The Canada Health Act respects provincial jurisdiction in health matters and recognizes the fact that our provincial health systems have evolved in ways that are characteristic of each province.

The Act's criteria provide general guidelines, deliberately leaving the provinces with a certain latitude in deciding how they are to be applied, so that they can make decisions based on local priorities and capabilities.

[English]

If you read the Canada Health Act, Mr. Speaker, you will find that it does not list specific medical services, whether they be cancer treatment, heart surgery or abortion services. The provinces, in conjunction with the medical profession, are responsible for deciding what is medically necessary. The provinces licence medical practitioners and regulate medical institutions such as hospitals. They also decide how best to organize the service and provide access.

The bottom line is that the federal government cannot dictate policies in areas of provincial jurisdiction. It would be an invasion of the provinces' role in Confederation. As the House will know, the constitutionality of the Canada Health Act is currently being challenged. We believe that the act will survive, however, because it respects provincial jurisdiction as it is currently written.

It is only through the criminal power that Parliament can regulate abortion on a national basis. The proposed legislation will give the provinces the guidance they have requested on the legal framework for abortion.

I expect that with the provision of this new legal framework, provincial governments will respect both the letter and the spirit of the law and will arrange for access to all medically necessary services. The federal government will encourage consistency in their responses, recognizing varying provincial circumstances.

Some people have proposed a gestationally based alternative which would divide pregnancy into two or three stages, permitting abortion in the early period and limiting it near the end. The problem is, the boundary line between stages is very difficult to define and it changes with advances in technology. The notion of foetal viability has evolved significantly in the last five years. Finally, the government's legislation, unlike a gestational approach, recognizes society's interest in the foetus right from the earliest stages.

That is the rationale for the the legislation before the House. We believe that it is moderate and reasonable and that it deserves the support of Canadians. But there are other issues that Parliament must also address. Each year, about 360,000 children are born in Canada. About 65,000 abortions take place. Over half of them are performed on women under the age of 25. Our challenge is to put in place policies that support Canadian families and that eliminate the causes of such high numbers of abortions.

Most of the women who undergo these abortions know firsthand of the agonizing choice that is being made to prevent a baby from being born. They do not take the decision lightly. They know that abortion must never be seen as just another form of birth control. Our priority must be to educate young people to be responsible and also to eliminate the economic, social and personal injustices which encourage such a choice.

In the past, policies have been ad hoc and have looked at these issues in isolation from each other. I believe it is time for our country to take a much more comprehensive approach to sexual health, family planning and how we raise our children. The goal must be to help Canadians make informed choices which will create strong and stable families.

One key element was put in place a few days ago when the Prime Minister announced the Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies. Too many Canadian families would like to have children but cannot. The royal commission has been asked to study the causes, treatment and prevention of male and female infertility, reversals of sterilization and a host of other reproductive health issues.

We want Canadians to have the widest possible range of options in deciding whether and when they will have children.

[Translation]

We are also taking steps to help families that already have children. We want to fight family violence and child sexual abuse. We want to improve daycare services and help Canadian families get out of the poverty trap.

We are taking these steps to make the family a healthy environment for the child and to correct certain situations that make women consider abortion as a last resort.

• (1610)

[English]

We also have to look for more effective ways to help women avoid unwanted pregnancies and to cope with these pregnancies when they occur.

In 1977 the federal government of the day agreed with the provinces that the provision of birth control services is primarily a provincial responsibility. Services which were previously delivered by the Family Planning Division of the Department of National Health and Welfare would in the future be provided by them. However, there is a key role which is left for the federal government to play in sponsoring research and providing financial assistance to national organizations involved in the field.

I have asked that the Department of National Health and Welfare earmark a minimum of $500,000 a year over the next three years for research into family planning issues, including contraception and problems in fertility. We also need better information and education. Recognizing that the nature of the problem changes from community to community, we will continue to give sustaining grants to two national organizations, Planned Parenthood of Canada and Serena Canada, to educate, promote and support family planning which is sensitive to the varying needs of different communities.

Another way to reduce the number of abortions performed in this country is to encourage more adoptions. There are thousands of would-be parents who are unable to have their own children and would provide loving homes. We need to encourage more pregnant women to consider adoption as an alternative.

As a result, the federal government plans to sponsor and fund a study to identify factors that could make adoption more appealing to young single mothers. I plan shortly to issue a call for proposals to conduct this study. I hope that it will point to solutions that place more babies into the homes of Canadians who are otherwise unable to fulfil their aspirations to be caring parents.

Through our health promotion contributions program, we will continue to fund proposals for community-based projects which will help adolescents lead responsible reproductive lives.

[Translation]

A lack of accessible and affordable resources to deal with matters concerning health, reproduction and sexuality has been obvious for some time. Although community organizations, local agencies and provincial departments continue to create new facilities and purchase new equipment, the lack of co-ordination and communication between agencies often leads to duplication and unnecessary spending.

[English]

In my opinion, we have an urgent need for balanced and clearly explained information on human sexuality. As a result, we are giving Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada $264,000 toward the development of a national resource centre on reproductive health and human sexuality to provide that information co-ordination.

As I mentioned earlier, each year there are about 360,000 pregnancies brought to term in Canada. But not all the mothers and fathers have the resources which they need to help them develop their knowledge and skills to be good parents. We are in the process of launching two national programs designed to help new parents. The first, the post-partum parent support program, helps new mothers, their partners and other members of the family cope with the arrival of a new child. The second is aimed at the 150,000 young, single, low-income parents we have in Canada, many of whom feel isolated from support and some of whom lack confidence in their ability to raise a child well. This program, which we are undertaking in co-operation with the provinces, will give parents accurate information on their children's health, safety, development and behaviour. We hope to prevent further unplanned pregnancies by making sure people understand the choices open to them in choosing whether to have children.

In an age characterized by the spread of the AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases, over-population, child abuse and unwanted pregnancy, we must educate ourselves, provide better and more accessible birth control information and methods and revolutionize the way in which we approach the sexual education of our young.

The issue of abortion cuts to the root of deeply held moral conviction about the meaning of human life and the control of life and death by the instruments of modern technology. As yet, no consensus exists in North America on these issues.

It is tempting on such questions to refuse to consider any significant compromise. That is the position taken by the spokespersons for some organized groups well before they ever saw the bill. Members have that option and some have already said that they will exercise it. Their actions will be applauded by the groups which reject any compromise. To follow that course, however, is to leave without a voice the majority of Canadians who do not belong to such groups and who expect this Parliament to show leadership in building a consensus.

They believe that Canadian women and their doctors have the right to know when abortions may be performed and when they may not. They believe that the private lives of Canadians should not be fought out the media and in the courts. Most important, they believe that it is our responsibility as elected representatives to set the policy, not to leave it to the judges to set by default.

The bill before us today represents a moderate and balanced compromise to an ethical conundrum. Its alternative is stalemate and a legal vacuum. I urge members to consider this legislation carefully, to accept our responsibility to provide the leadership which Canadians are demanding and to support this bill.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I applaud the list of efforts the federal government is planning for the support of women and wonder when we will begin to see them coming into actual fact. The minister can rest assured that we will be watching to ensure that they do become fact and are not just another empty announcement.

The Minister of Finance, during the speech delivered by my colleague, the hon. member from New Westminster—Burnaby, said in a heckle that only the NDP would bring free trade into the abortion issue. That to me suggests that the hon. member still fails to understand that abortion and the attendant control over women and their bodies is an economic issue that has been inflamed throughout history in order to maintain economic control over women.

The minister referred to my leader's request that access to abortion be regulated by the Canada Health Act. He said that neurosurgery, heart and cancer treatment is not regulated under the Canada Health Act, and so suggested that access to abortion should not be as well.

I would suggest that neurosurgery, heart and cancer treatment is denied because of lack of facilities, not because of someone's moral opinion. I would suggest also that if a whole province refused to do or pay for heart surgery, then the minister and his government would have much to say under the Canada Health Act about that.

I would appreciate it very much if the minister would respond to this question. If a province refused to pay for or facilitate heart surgery, would he, under the Canada Health Act, intervene?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I would first of all make one minor correction to the reference to me that was made by the hon. member when she referred to me as the Minister of Finance. I have been here now some 17 years and the great achievement of my political career will be if I can spend my whole career here without ever becoming Minister of Finance. I am sure the Minister of Finance would agree that it would be in the public interest that that be avoided as well.

The hon. member tries to argue again, as her leader did yesterday, that the federal government should refuse to fund medicare services provided in the provinces if they refuse to provide the level of service for abortion which the hon. member would like to see. She does not indicate whether she believes the federal government should be dictating, in the case of these other services she mentioned such as cancer treatment where the very survival of the patient depends upon it, that that treatment should be provided or that it should be provided in a particular way. She does not indicate, in the case of neurosurgery or in the case of heart disease or a whole range of other areas, that the federal government should intervene to require that these services be provided. Look at an issue, for example, related to reproduction. A number of the provinces right now are looking at the question of midwifery. It is an area which is left to provincial jurisdiction. Would the hon. member argue that the federal government should set one policy which would apply from one coast to another which would give women the choice of whether or not they wanted to go to a midwife to deliver a child? No, she says, she would not want to do that.

• (1620)

Indeed, what the NDP is asking for is that any medical services which are provided by provinces, the sole instance in which they ask for federal intervention with us using a financial weapon against the provinces is to require the provinces to increase services on abortion; not in any other instances, they say, solely in the case of abortion. Such an approach would be unconstitutional.

I would invite the hon. member to read the Canada Health Act and she will recognize the fact if she does that the Canada Health Act was deliberately designed by the government of the day, which was a Liberal government, voted on and supported by Parliament, by all of the parties, to ensure that the constitutional rights of all jurisdictions were respected.

Finally, she takes umbrage at the reference I made from this side of the House at the time the member for New Westminster—Burnaby was giving her oration when she tried to attribute the high rate of abortion in Canada to the free trade agreement. I repeat, only the NDP would attempt to so partisanize debate on abortion that they would drag the free trade agreement in and try to blame that for the high rate of abortion in Canada.

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to the minister and his comments about the attempts that he said that his government was going to make with respect to education of the public. I wonder if the minister would be kind enough to help with the education of the public at the present time.

I would like to pose two questions. Precisely what is the purpose of banning abortion? What do I mean by that question? Surely we have to ask ourselves what is an abortion. That has to be the fundamental question asked of this House and it can only be after we have come to grips with that question and with the answer to it that we decide whether or not abortion should be allowed.

The government obviously has brought forward a bill which clearly makes abortion illegal in this country unless certain circumstances apply. I would like to know on what rationale that decision is based, and if in fact it is based on some rationale to protect foetal rights at some point, what foetal rights? Why do they need protection?

Of course, my position is clear and I will be making it abundantly clear when I speak on this bill, and that is that life begins at conception. I would just like to know how we can discuss the issue of abortion and banning abortion without talking about what abortion is and putting a definition.

My second question concerns subclause 3 of clause 287 as proposed, which deals with various drugs. I am asking the minister if he and his government have discussed whether or not that section would include such drugs as RU–486 which is presently being manufactured in France and whether or not that drug would be excluded under clause 3.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, any attempt to have that drug used in Canada would require that an application be made to the Department of National Health and Welfare for approval. The intention of the legislation was to ensure that such things as birth control devices, intra–uterine devices, so–called morning–after pills, were permitted but not to allow other means of inducing abortion in Canada except as permitted by the law. No application has been made at the present time for such a pill to be marketed in Canada.

It is not our intention to ban abortion in Canada and I think that it is important, as we discuss this issue, to have an understanding of what this bill is designed to do. The goal is not to ban abortion but rather to set the framework in which decisions can be taken as to when abortion will be permitted in Canada.

One of the fundamental decisions that we take is that it is essentially a health matter to be decided between the woman and her doctor. We have made it clear that we do see competing rights here, that we believe the society does have an interest in the unborn child. But we believe as well that when the health of the mother is threatened, the woman in question and the doctor should have the right to have and perform an abortion in that instance. By setting this framework, we believe that we help to give a clear sense of direction to the women of Canada and also to the doctors in Canada as to when abortion will be permitted and when it will not, and we attempt to balance these competing rights.

I think there probably is no one in this House who believes in the issue as foetal rights, as the hon. member does, who would not recognize the fact that what we are dealing with foetus versus the rights of the woman in question. The goal of this bill is to try to strike a balance between those rights and to give a clear indication as to when it is appropriate that abortion should be permitted in Canada.

Finally, I would welcome an indication from the hon. member as to whether he supports the position that was taken by his party spokesman earlier in favour of using the Canada Health Act to intervene against the provinces, to withhold money from the provinces if they do not expand abortion services in Canada. Was the hon. member who spoke earlier speaking on behalf of his party in that regard?

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis that Bill C-43, an act respecting abortion, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, abortion is a complex issue, perhaps the most complex issue to be faced by this House in the current session or any other session of our long parliamentary history. It is fraught with emotional arguments on both sides and it is crucial that we respect the views of both sides in so far as they have an inalienable right to hold and express such views. It is an issue that must be faced and dealt with in our pluralistic society with both honesty and integrity. This bill is not the answer.

This bill gives the false impression that politicians are not honest, because this bill is not honest. On the one hand, it says abortion is prohibited throughout pregnancy. On the other, it creates a loophole which effectively allows for any and all abortions. Now, some will say, why argue? The actual effect of this bill once passed into law is that anyone who wants an abortion will get one.

The two proposed amendments to Section 287 and Section 288 of the Code make all abortions illegal in Canada, except in cases where a physician is of the opinion that the woman's physical, mental and, and I believe or, psychological health is endangered by the continuance of the pregnancy. In any other circumstance, it is a criminal offence punishable by up to two years imprisonment for anyone to induce an abortion, including self-inducement of an abortion by a female person. In addition, no person can lawfully supply or procure a drug or other noxious thing, or an instrument or thing, for the purposes of inducing an abortion, which again would include the pregnant woman in cases of self-inducement.

From a legal perspective, this bill would not survive a constitutional challenge, as far as I am concerned, in the Supreme Court, in light of the Morgantaler decision. It certainly does not respect Madam Justice Wilson's judgment on the right to "liberty of the person" to choose for herself what happens to her body. Nor does it respect the judgments of Justices Dickens, Lamer, Betz with regard to the security of the person under Section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

• (1630)

The right to security of the person includes a right of access to medical treatment and protection from significant delays in seeking medical treatment. Replacing the requirement of hospital committees to that of only one physician does not change the issue of access since there is absolutely no guarantee that all physicians in Canada would apply the same standard criteria in assessing the health of a pregnant person.

There is also no guarantee that a physician's moral and religious values will not dictate his or her assessment of the need for an abortion. There are no standards or guidelines for all of Canada's physicians to follow, except for, and I quote: "generally accepted standards of the medical profession". Whatever that may mean, they can and do differ from province to province and from territory to province.

As a result of such legislation women certainly do not have equal access before the law, and nor is the law applied equally to all as is required by Section 15.

The interesting thing is that the government had an opportunity to do something here. It is likely that the Supreme Court would accept legislation that would ban abortions after 22 weeks of pregnancy except for medical reasons dictated by the expectant mother's condition or that of the unborn child. Indeed, this has been recommended by both the Law Reform Commission of Canada and the Canadian Medical Association. But this is not what the government has given us. Anyone who wants one can get one. That I submit is not the effect of this bill, even if that is its intention.

The question of access, as we have seen, is not addressed. Indeed, it appears that because the bill is silent on access this crucial issue will be thrown back to the provinces and territories, creating 12 different scenarios at a minimum.

I think the thing that is perhaps the most abhorrent about this legislation is that to secure an abortion women in most cases will have to lie. They will have to fabricate a situation for their doctors to ensure that they fall within the definition of a threat to health; physical, mental, or psychological health. What does that mean? What does it mean medically, and what does it mean practically?

This bill places the onus for the decision squarely with the doctors. Although the Minister of Justice this morning and the Minister of National Health and Welfare this afternoon, in discussing the bill both spoke of a decision between a woman and her doctor, the bill does not say that. The concept of consultation is intrinsic to the woman's right to choose. Clearly she can accept or reject a doctor's recommendation. No one is suggesting anything other than that. But to leave her out of the specifics of the legislation implies a denial of her right to be a full participant in that decision.

The legislation raises more questions. Does it meet the requirements of the security of the person delineated by Section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms? Does it meet the minimum requirements relating to time again set down by the Morgentaler decision? What about women living in remote rural areas whose only access may be a doctor who, as would be his or her right, does not choose to perform abortions? The legislation does not even address this situation.

What about women who convince a doctor that their mental, psychological, or physical health will be impaired by bearing a child? In particular, if they insist that it is their mental or psychological health that is in danger, will this contention, true or false, entered into their permanent medical records come back to haunt them at some future date? The ramifications for the female population of the process may indeed be more detrimental to their health than pregnancy or abortion.

The vast majority of people find abortion abhorrent, and so it is. It goes against every human inclination to protect the helpless. But it is equally abhorrent to the majority of Canadians to force a woman to bear a child when she finds the situation untenable. Few people quarrel with abortion in the context of rape or incest, but there are other situations equally tragic for women; the mother who has neither the financial nor emotional resources to support another child, the teenager frightened out of countenance and unable to cope with the responsibility and equally unable to seek support from her family, the abused wife with nowhere to turn, the woman who does not see parenthood as an option, the woman who is responsible in her sexual life but whose contraception failed. We do not live in rose-covered cottages.

We do not live in ideal situations and far, far too many Canadian women and their children live lives of quiet desperation. Some people just say "Well, that's tough. You made your bed, you must lie in it", or "You made your choice when you became sexually active". There is not much compassion there and there is not really very much common sense either.

If abortion is banned it will not cease. Personally, I am not excessively worried that women will resort to butchers because Canadian doctors are too compassionate to let that happen. But normally law-abiding women and equally law-abiding doctors will flout any flat ban by the thousands. Can anyone turn their back to the woman who faces an alcoholic husband who is demanding his so-called marital rights on the night he gets his pay cheque and say "You made your choice and you must live with it"?

These would be bad laws as this bill will be a bad law. This bill is a bad law because it tacitly invites women and doctors to bend the facts to fit the legislation. If the intent of the law is to ban abortion then the intent is thwarted. If the intent is to allow abortion then the government should say so. Women do not want their rights surreptitiously through the back door. Neither do those Canadians who hold the view that abortion is totally unacceptable deserve to be tricked into thinking, presupposing the trick worked, that this bill stops abortion. This bill is not balanced, it is not compromise. It is sham and Canadians recognize sham.

Since the abortion law was struck down last year, there has been no perceptible increase in abortions. Women do not make these decisions lightly. The agony that all fair-minded people go through in considering the rights of the woman vis-à-vis the rights of the foetus is small, compared to the agony faced by the vast majority of women when they decide they cannot continue their pregnancies. This is a private personal and tragic situation in which parliamentarians, interest groups and the media really should not be able to meddle because the answer, the solution, is not and never has been found in legislation, and certainly not in criminal legislation.

Yes, we have a collective responsibility to act and yes, there is a societal right here, but it is being obscured by the emotion of the debate. What we must act on are long-term solutions and the only real way to create real choice is to create the situation where child-bearing and child-rearing are freely chosen and widely supported, supported by concrete actions and not merely pious do-nothing lip service.

This bill does not even attempt to address the long term, but worst of all, there is no sign of any companion legislation to help to minimize the need for abortion, to create a real freedom of choice for women and men.

There are three basic ingredients to a long-term solution. The first is massive education, not small programs, a little bit here, a little bit there. As a society and a country we have never faced squarely the matters of sexuality and responsibility. We are a nation of ostriches, burying our heads in the sand in these days of fatal sexually-transmitted diseases and unwanted pregnancies. The just say no theory is weak to the point of irresponsibility. Federal and provincial governments must work together now to educate the population.

The Hon. Minister of Health espoused some of this idea in his speech. I say to him that women and children need more than words. Five hundred thousand dollars here and $264,000 there is a pittance, it is not enough. If we are going to put our money where our mouths allegedly are, it has to be substantial money that makes substantial change. The women and children of Canada do not need budget cuts and they certainly do not need the GST.

The second is the development of safe, adequate and affordable contraception. Again our society is remiss. We place the responsibility for contraception heavily on the female but provide methods that either seriously jeopardize a woman's health or have a failure rate that no odds-maker would depend on. Sadly, there is no move of any significance on the part of this government in this direction. Rather, we have seen cuts, cuts and more cuts.

The third is a concerted effort to make this country truly supportive of families, of mothers and of their children. What support is there for the pregnant 14-year-old scared out of her mind, for the abused wife, for the woman on welfare who cannot scrape together a decent living for her family, for the one million children in Canada who live in poverty and must depend on food banks, for the physically abused child, for the emotionally abused child and for the sexually abused child?

• (1640)

What about the 70 per cent of child support orders in this country that go unenforced? Above all, what about child care? Where is the child care legislation that would provide not just support, but the intention of a new dawn in caring about families in this country?

If anyone thinks that these matters are unrelated to the abortion issue, then we have even more ostriches than we originally thought. If this were a perfect world—and my colleague the Minister of Justice said that earlier today—a world without violence and without fear, abortion would not be the issue it is today.

If this government were committed to achieving a better level of social justice, a decent standard of living and some alleviation of the plight of the poor, we would be on the road to solving this complex and terrible problem. Instead, we have a bill that insults the intelligence of both sides, that forces women to lie, that institutionalizes hypocrisy. It is just not good enough.

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from the Liberal party for her comments today. She and I share the same critic responsibilities for our respective parties and it is a pleasure to be in the House together.

I have a couple of questions for the member. She is from a region of Canada where the access problem is very difficult and where women travel distances and have great difficulty in finding doctors or facilities that perform abortion. I wonder if she could comment on that and on some of the women in rural areas of Atlantic Canada who have great difficulty in accessing services for safe abortion.

Also, could she comment on what this does to women who do not have money, women who are poor? What do they do when they need access to a safe abortion? How do they get to the area of the country that will provide such a service?

My second question deals with her comments relating to the Law reform Commission and the issue of gestational limits. I have a fundamental belief that gestational limits indeed are wrong. From her comments I understood that she might perhaps support the concept of the Law Reform Commission.

I have a friend who was five and one-half months pregnant this summer with a third child, very much a wanted child. My friend was diagnosed with a very aggressive form of cancer. She was told by her doctor that she must undergo an abortion in an attempt to save her life. I know how difficult this was for my friend because she shared this pain with me.

I am opposed to gestational limits because my friend and other women in situations like that would then be forced to go through another process or another board or another medical opinion. Would she just comment on the concept of gestational limits as well?

Ms. Clancy: I thank my hon. colleague, the other critic for status of women. Indeed we do share many of the same views on this.

Just to comment on the gestational approach, we do not have legislation in front of us that reflects it, but I certainly find it to be possibly the legislation that might come closest to the compromise that many of us desire. In any legislation that reflected the gestational view, I would not see a situation such as the one of the woman five and a half months pregnant and needing an abortion due to a serious threat to life to be a drawback.

I do not think the Supreme Court would allow us to legislate a problem with time. That is already covered in Morgentaler. I think the gestational approach merely reflects what is the actual situation in medical practice in this country. Certainly the decision of a woman and her doctor at a later point would obviously reflect what is already medical practice in this country.

On the first question with regard to access, we note that in Alberta, for example, access, especially in the north, continues to be a problem. Access in Saskatchewan is very poor with the few centres which provide abortion restricting their services to local women. In Manitoba access is concentrated in Winnipeg. Many New Brunswick women, especially from the North Shore, must travel to the United States or Montreal to access an abortion.

In Nova Scotia over 80 per cent of the province's abortions are performed at one hospital in Halifax. In Prince Edward Island women must travel outside of P.E.I. to obtain abortions as no hospital there will perform them. In Newfoundland, St. John's General Hospital is the only one that provides abortions on a regular basis and access is dependent on a particular doctor at a particular time.

The answer is that poor women are in a worse bind. If I may, and I mean no levity at this whatsoever, in Atlantic Canada where the preferred means of travel of the poor is the train, we have another problem as well. Women who wish to come from northern New Brunswick and the rural areas of Nova Scotia have depended upon the train and that has been taken away from them, how or will be taken away from them. How they are going to afford to get to the regional centres where they can access an abortion, I do not know, but I do know that this bill does not help them.

Mr. Friesen: I have a question. Given the context of the Charter of Rights and a mother going to a doctor requesting an abortion, does the member feel that the doctor, on a woman's request, is obligated to provide that abortion?

Ms. Clancy: I said quite clearly that a doctor obviously has a right to preferred areas of practice. Some doctors will choose not to perform an abortion, and that is certainly the right of the individual doctor. But it is incumbent upon us, and indeed I believe that this House was certainly given a very broad hint by the Supreme Court of Canada, to look at improving access in a manner that we can control. I am not suggesting that I or the hon. member or a posse from the House of Commons should seek out doctors across the country and put guns to their heads and say "you will perform abortions". That is ridiculous. Access can be answered in manners other than that. Among other things, it can be answered through the Canada Health Act.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, as you might detect, I was thinking that we would probably be dealing with this issue a little later. As a matter of fact, I had in mind speaking on this bill tomorrow but the opportunity presented itself this afternoon and I thought I would use it to speak on this bill in the House of Commons.

I see the member across the way, the Minister of Energy, the former minister of health. I must say that his present portfolio presents a little less of a problem to him than if he were the minister of health at this particular time. Having read this bill, I can tell that the Minister of Energy certainly did not write it. I sympathize with the Minister of Energy and others who, like myself, want a bill which protects human life, as this bill does not. However, unlike the Minister of Energy, I am not constrained by the fact that I am a member of the cabinet and, therefore, will be able to vote in a manner which is more consistent with my conscience rather than a discipline which is imposed.

I do not say that in a light-hearted way or in any way to make fun of the position in which some of our colleagues find themselves as a result of being in cabinet. I suppose every member of this House wants to be in cabinet at some point, but I am sure there are moments like this when members of cabinet find that being there has its difficult moments as well. I make those comments for that reason. I do not want any member to think that my comments should be interpreted otherwise, particularly not when I speak on such a very important issue as this, and when I address some of the remarks to the Minister of Energy, whom I respect immensely for the position which I believe he has on this issue.

• (1650)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, as I said in July 1988, when I made my speech in the House of Commons, I have changed my mind on this issue, and I announced this change in my views in April 1988. I realized that for any politician, changing ones stand is not always very popular and is even quite controversial. Even more so if ones says so in public. And that is what I did at the time. I changed my mind on the abortion issue, simply because I could no longer live with the position I had taken, and when I say that, I am not referring to outside pressure but to pressure from within. In other words, my conscience would no longer let me live with the position I had taken at the time. Since April 1988, Mr. Speaker, I have tried to explain to my colleagues in this House and to any Canadians who cared to listen that the only bill that should be passed by this Parliament and this House should respect and protect life before and after birth.

In 1959, before the United Nations, Canada justified the importance of our participation in the Declaration of the Rights of the Child. At the time, Mr. Speaker, we as Canadians told the nations of the world that the child not yet born needed special protection, and that the handicapped child should be given special protection and care before and after birth. Today, in 1989, some people say: If a child is going to be handicapped, that is grounds for having an abortion and preventing that child from being born. I keep wondering what happened to us in the last thirty years that made us give up all those values we had acquired since the age of Hippocrates and even before then—Hippocrates said that a doctor had no right to suggest or give medication that would result in the death of a patient, and he even said that one should never offer a woman a pessary to induce abortion. Since that time and even before then, since the time of Hippocrates, that great Greek physician, we as a society have taken the position that we should protect human life, the life of the child yet to be born and the life of any person. And now we are qualifying that position, when we say that if the child yet to be born will be handicapped, we should not allow it to live.

I think we have reached a sorry stage in the history of human civilization. Incidentally, this is not a typically Canadian problem. It is a problem the world over. I keep thinking that we are very regressive in the way we look at things, and I find this very sad.

[English]

The bill that we have before us today is deficient in a number of ways and I will spend the next few minutes expressing the amendments that I would like to see to this bill in order to make it acceptable.

First this bill states, in its first sentence, that abortion is wrong. In other words, "Every person who induces an abortion—is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment". This, of course, makes the clear statement that abortion is a criminal offence and should be treated as a crime.

However, the bill is deficient as it goes along. First of all, we are discussing here a term of imprisonment not to exceed two years. I would submit to my colleagues in the House of Commons that if we are to consider abortion to be a crime, a term of two years does not reflect the fact that it is a crime. I believe that that penalty should be stricter and should reflect the seriousness of that statement.

Criminal law does two things; one, it punishes a guilty individual or an individual who behaves in a way unacceptable to society as a whole and, second, it makes a statement of where we stand in that society. It makes a statement of what we think is right and what we think is wrong. If we are to consider abortion to be a crime, which this bill does, then surely the punishment should reflect that. That sentence of the bill continues:

> —unless the abortion is induced by or under the direction of a medical practitioner—

I will speak in a few moments on when I think abortion should be permitted which, as some of my colleagues may have detected by now, is not very often. In any case, before we get to that point, I do not believe that an abortion should ever be induced, on the few occasions where they should be, by anyone other than a doctor. Where the sentence says "induced—under the direction of" I believe that an amendment would be necessary to the bill.

The other deficiency that I see in this bill is that the next sentence continues and says:

> —a medical practitioner who is of the opinion that,—

It describes when the abortion should be performed. I think that bill should be amended to say, starting with the same sentence, "—unless the abortion is induced by a medical practitioner having received the opinion of two other medical practitioners stating that the abortion is necessary".

In other words, I do not believe that Henry Morgentaler should say: "Abortion is necessary for this woman and, by the way, I will do it right now." I do think that the medical practitioner should be giving an independent opinion. As a matter of fact, I think there should be two of them.

I want to read further because my time is close to ending. The sentence of the bill continues:

> —if the abortion were not induced, the health or life of the female person would be likely to be threatened.

I think that that should be changed to say only: "the life of the female person would likely be threatened". The word "health" in the previous section of the Criminal Code was completely bent out of shape from its original meaning and we are inviting that by putting it in the bill this time again.

I would like to have commented quite a bit more about this bill. I hope to have the opportunity to offer some of the amendments which I think would go a long way toward making this bill a bill which will protect human life from the time of conception.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CANADIAN OWNERSHIP

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should ensure that key communications tools, such as radio and television broadcasting, remain in Canadian hands.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on behalf of the New Democratic Party as our party's communications and culture critic to present this very important motion to the House.

While this motion addresses the question of control or ownership of communications tools, it gives us in the House an opportunity to address the issue of foreign control over our culture and what we can do about it.

The issues of communications broadcasting, control of culture and our cultural independence are issues that will be among the key issues of the 1990s. They, the environment and other issues, will be the issues we will have to deal with in a decade because we are going to see change very rapidly. We are going to see new technologies. We are already seeing that in communications and the effect it has on our culture.

Here is the problem. Recently, one of my assistants went into a video store in Ottawa and looked at the foreign film section where he found not one but several Canadian films including Grey Fox, The Decline of the American Empire and other films. I think this symbolizes why this debate is so important. They are not foreign films. They are Canadian films.

As John Gray, the noted playwright and performer from Vancouver has written, and I quote: "Increasingly, American mass culture is being seen by Canadians as normal culture and Canadian mass culture as abnormal culture. Canadian artists have moved to the fringes of our own country". I think he puts it very well.

Karl Deutsch, in a famous thesis, has written that the test of nationhood is that more communications take place within a country than between that country and another. In many ways Canada is failing its test. I will continue my speech after the interruption from the Senate.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[Translation]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate Chamber, the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following Bills:

Bill S-2, an Act to implement conventions between Canada and the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg and Canada and the Polish People's Republic and an agreement between Canada and Papua New Guinea for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.—Chapter 20.

Bill S-5, an Act to authorize the Safeguard Life Assurance Company to be continued as a corporation under the laws of the Province of Quebec.

Bill C-42, an Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1990.—Chapter 21.

COMMUNICATIONS

CANADIAN OWNERSHIP

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Waddell:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should ensure that key communications tools, such as radio and television broadcasting, remain in Canadian hands.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying before the interruption, many of our important cultural industries are foreign controlled and many others, such as private television stations, are controlled by Canadian corporations, but they merely serve as conduits for American cultural material. In other words, the majority of programs are American.

Look at the situation in our country—3 per cent of film profits stay in Canada; 97 per cent of film distribution is done by American and international companies. Of video cassette sales, 3 per cent are Canadian. Canadian publishers own 30 per cent of our market. Seventy-eight per cent of magazines sold in Canada are foreign; the rest are Canadian. There are more hours of U.S. newscasts available on Canadian television than there are Canadian newscasts.

In a newspaper ad last year the Friends of Canadian Broadcasting spoke of a typical Canadian child. This child spends over 80 per cent of her television time watching American programs. She spends as much time watching American programming as she does attending school.

The average teenager in this country spends about 24 hours a week watching television. The majority of that time for Anglophones, about 80 per cent, is spent watching foreign programming, and for Francophones about 50 per cent. Now our people have to be open to the world. We live in a global village as Marshall McLuhan, the great Canadian communicator, said. But we also have to have our people see Canada. As I said, Karl Deutsch said part of the role of keeping a nation together is that we can communicate with each other. We have a vigorous country and we have to be showing each other what other parts of the country are like. We also have a vigorous Canadian artistic community that is looking for opportunities to perform and to show their cultural creations to Canadians.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, we need vigorous government measures both to encourage the development of Canadian domestic industries and structural changes to limit foreign controls over our markets in broadcasting, telecommunications, publishing and so on.

A government in the past introduced a number of measures of this type, such as Bill C–54, in the mid–1970s to protect our publishing industry. It worked. There was an outcry at that. There was a lot of reaction by the Americans, but we held strong. But you need a government that has a lot of courage. That is not something that has been apparent with this particular government.

The Mulroney government has been indifferent to goals, sometimes hostile to these goals of Canadianizing our culture. I will give you some examples. The first example is the free trade deal. It was not supposed to affect Canadian culture. Do you recall the pamphlet that was put out at the time of the last election campaign? It was entitled "What's the big deal on free trade?" by Rick Salutin and Terry Mosher. I will just quote one of the pages because I think it puts it better than I can. The headline is, "I don't care much about Canadian culture. I watch a lot of American TV." And it goes on to talk about the problem there. It states:

> Wait a minute. What's this got to do with Canadian popular singers?
> After this deal, there won't be any new ones. The U.S. record companies up here who help Canadians get started, will close and move back to the States. Canadians who want recording careers will have to go down there like they used to do, and they'll have to sound like Americans if they want to make it.
>
> I heard the deal says we have a right to support our culture.
>
> It says that. But get this. If our policies to support our culture cost the Americans money here in Canada, then they can penalize us through their trade laws!
>
> Come again?
>
> For instance, let's say our government does something to help Canadian writers or Canadian recording companies.

• (1720)

Let me add to that, or Canadian film makers, which they had proposed to do before the deal.

> All the Americans have to do is say that they lost some record or book sales in Canada, because of those policies. The U.S. gets the right to halt our fish or grain or manufactured goods from going to the States, until we stop helping our own artists.
> That's ridiculous. It's our country and our culture. What can our government do to them if they act that way?
>
> Nothing. Our government has already agreed to it. It's in the deal.

That puts it very well. That is the problem in the trade deal. The fact is, if I can be more technical, the Americans can take measures of equivalent commercial effect if we interfere in their broadcasting, or in their film distribution, or in their magazine policies in Canada. That is giving up a lot of our sovereignty. That is one of the reasons that we have to change this trade deal.

The government has abandoned its film distribution policy. In contrast to the Broadcasting Act the government has rejected the key recommendations of the Standing Committee on broadcasting to protect the Canadian market. I will come back to that in a moment.

The Prime Minister himself recently has had meetings with the big international publisher, Robert Maxwell, over newspapers. I predict that we could easily become a satellite of not only other countries but of big communications multinationals once people like Rupert Murdoch and Robert Maxwell get control of Canadian newspapers.

All the Canadian government has to do is drop the 30 per cent requirement. I think it is 30 per cent, which is the limit of foreign ownership in newspapers. Once the government drops that then even our newspapers will be taken over. So look out The Globe and Mail, The Toronto Star, Southams, and some of those other people who treat us politicians so well.

The government has applied the Baie Comeau policy inconsistently. The Baie Comeau policy is a policy that states if there are takeovers in the United States of companies that have subsidiaries in Canada, then the Canadian companies have to be put up for sale to Canadians. In the New American Libraries case the government said, "We will just ignore and forget about that policy."

Let me give you a response to that the government should take. We believe in the New Democratic Party that there are Canadian firms that produce the overwhelming majority of Canadian cultural products, that we have a viable industry and that it is worth encouraging. We have to protect our culture.

People generally believe in an open-market system. In this world, as I have said, it is an open world. But even the most sophisticated countries, including the States, protect their own culture. We could get really steamrolled by the American steamroller, if you like.

In film distribution Jack Valenti of the American film industry, the great lobbyist, a friend of the president, came to Toronto last week and threatened Canadians. Basically he said, "You had better listen to us." They were bully-boy tactics from the American film industry, so that the Americans can still control 98 per cent of film distribution in Canada.

I introduced a bill which would make structural changes in this market. It would require that we change the current situation. In other words, we would give a slice of the market—I think it is about 15 per cent—to Canadian distribution companies. That is really radical. That is what we propose to do. This government backed away from it, tore up the bill and simply backed away in the face of the American threat.

We have to fund the public broadcasters adequately, the CBC in particular. This government has cut back since it came to power in 1984. In its first four years it cut back from its budget to the CBC of about $970 million to about $770 million to the CBC. We have seen another $140 million in cutbacks. The new management has great plans for the CBC. But we are still facing the possibility of cutting regional programming, cutting news, putting commercials on The National, and so on. We need a five-year plan for the CBC so that it has adequate funding and so that there is no political interference in the CBC, as we could have now when the managers have to ask for more money.

In book publishing, we need a vigorous enforcement of the Baie Comeau policy. We need distinctive Canadian laws on concentration of ownership in the mass media. We cannot let the mass media be owned by just a few people. We have to insist that they remain in Canadian hands.

On television programming, the CBC should be encouraged to produce 95 per cent Canadian content in drama. The private sector must produce 50 per cent Canadian content in prime time between seven o'clock and eleven o'clock. If the private sector does not do it, then we take the licenses away and we get other Canadians who will do it, who will be pleased to get into the private market.

In telecommunications, the Conservatives, supported I might say by the Liberals sometimes, are extending the realm of what we call "in hand services", Call-Net. The Call-Net case is a good example. They are starting to open the door to American giant telephone companies.

We need to maintain a distinctive Canadian phone system. Bill C-41, a new bill, will have, first, Canadian control over the Prairie telephone companies. We know what this government will do. It will deregulate it and telephone rates in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta will shoot up for the average person. That has to be stopped.

We need a status of the artists legislation in this country to support Canadian artists, to give them access to social services and at the same time to consider their particular tax situation. It was done in Quebec. It can be done in Canada as a whole.

[Translation]

There is also a problem in Quebec. The French network, especially the CBC's French network, must produce more programs than the English network, but with a smaller budget. Therefore, we see fewer and fewer quality television dramas in French. I am quoting Quebec's creative community. The coalition for the defence of the CBC's French services came to testify and told us that they were forced to work in the studio because outdoor settings cost too much.

It takes money and resources to rival Dallas. The CBC must have resources if it is to protect and promote francophone culture.

[English]

So we have to upgrade Radio-Canada as well.

I will conclude with this. I have talked about the intent of the motion, which is to deal with the Canadianization of key communications tools, radio and television. It is important that they remain in Canadian hands.

Herbert Marcuse, the deceased philosopher of the 1960s and 1970s, writing in Eros and Civilization had this to say about culture and art: "Art in its privileged connection to the unconscious is able to express and evoke thoughts, feelings and desires otherwise denied expression". The artist, as Marshall McLuhan said, really looks to the future. The rest of us live in a rear view mirror society. The artist in many ways is in the future.

• (1730)

The Canadian artist is in fact setting the stage for the future direction of Canadian society. That is why we have to let our people see Canadian artists and appreciate Canadian artists, whether it is theatre, film, dance, writing, publishing, or journalism. They are all in their own way Canadian artists. We have to make this available to Canadians.

We know in Canada that the public network, the CBC, is underfunded and cannot live up to Canadian content requirements. We know that the private sector is in fact not doing its job. That is what the Caplan-Sauvageau report said. We have to encourage it. This government has backed away in every instance from that.

A country where video stores advertise Canadian videos as foreign films better pull up its socks in terms of culture. This is a highly competitive world in culture as in every other matter. We have to take measures, as I have outlined here, in broadcasting, telecommunications, in the status of the artist, and in other ways to protect Canadian artists and Canadian culture and allow Canadians to communicate between themselves in this great country.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, this motion speaks to keeping tools of communication, that is radio and television, in Canadian hands. That is the text we were presented with in speaking to the motion of my colleague. I would suggest that it goes further into other areas of serious concern, and the first I would suggest is that of our artists.

It must be recognized in today's society—and the minister pointed that out most succinctly this morning—that if we do not recognize the status of the artists in Canadian society and give them their due respect and acknowledge through concrete earning power their right and place in society, we will never be able to promote who we are and what we are through the voice of the distinctive Canadian artistic talent that does express who we are in our society. I think it leaves us impoverished in many ways.

As Canadians we truly live in a culturally occupied country. Some 80 per cent of our publishing industry is in foreign hands, 97 per cent of films shown in Canada are foreign, 85 per cent of records and tapes are based on imported master tapes. In broadcasting, 71 per cent of all programs viewed by English speaking Canadians on television are produced by Americans. The figure is much lower in French speaking Canada, but as globalization takes place that will be impacted too.

Indeed, defining and enhancing Canadian culture goes far beyond radio and television. School books, audio-visual documents, videos, literary and general works, scholarly and specialized books and magazines are also key, everyday tools used to train and educate new generations of Canadians. They shape our collective imagination, build the myths that frame our destinies, develop our perceptions, attitudes, beliefs and behaviour, and influence our way of living. That is not to leave aside the whole culture of sports: Canadian football, rugby, soccer, lacrosse, and our two new baseball teams are making baseball viewing the fastest growing sport on our television sets, and of course there is Hockey Night in Canada. Without it, what would Saturday night in Canada be like for tens of thousands of Canadians? That is all part of the culture of Canada.

I believe they can be powerful means of asserting national unity and national identity, if we would have access to those cultural skills as portrayed in a variety of ways in our theatres, on our screens, and in our libraries.

The former publisher of Saturday Night, John MacFarlane, has said it so well: "It is important as a country to make the distinction between importing merchandise and importing culture. Wearing foreign shoes and driving foreign cars won't make us any less Canadian, but without our own culture, we're nothing more than a colony".

The Tories used to believe this too. In 1932, Prime Minister Bennett when introducing the first Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act stated: "This country must be assured of complete control of broadcasting from Canadian sources, free from foreign interference or influence. Without such controls, radio broadcasting can never become a great agency for communication of matters of national concern and for the diffusion of national thought and ideals, and without such control, it can never be the agency by which national consciousness may be fostered and sustained and national unity still further strengthened".

I am going to have to ask my colleague to take over, please.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Whatever happened to that strong Tory voice? Did Mr. Bennett's worst fears come true? Because, despite this firm conviction, foreign companies were able obtain an advantageous position in Canadian broadcasting?

In 1968, a new Broadcasting Act was introduced which clearly stated that the Canadian broadcasting system must be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians so as to safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada.

As a result, through the courageous Liberal Canadian public policy enacted between 1969 and 1973, foreign firms divested themselves of interest in 55 cable broadcast firms, 13 television stations, 10 radio stations, and one short wave transmitting station. Canadian buy-back transitions totalled almost $150 million. These events benefited the entire Canadian economy with broadcast earnings jumping by 700 per cent and before tax profits by 550 per cent between 1968 and 1973. The number of jobs available to Canadians also doubled. Today these Canadian firms are among the healthiest and most profitable in the country, using the cutting edge of technology and breaking new frontiers.

This government has said it is in favour of increasing Canadian control of our key cultural tools. I believe we must go even further than the motion of the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, for if we look at the government's record it is not encouraging. It has failed to include within a new broadcasting bill an 80 per cent Canadian ownership, a requirement which was recommended by both the Caplan-Sauvageau report and the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture. As a result, I will be introducing an amendment that will provide for 80 per cent Canadian ownership requirement, which I hope this government will have the vision to accept.

It also caved in to the American scorched earth threats on book publishing, the most blatant example being the purchase of Ginn and Company, without full control being divested to Canadians. Canadians have 51 per cent equity but major decisions can be vetoed by the majority shareholders, the Americas. Many of our national cultural Crown corporations do not even require board members to be Canadian citizens. This I hope to remedy soon through a Private Member's Bill.

In conclusion, broadcasting and the daily press in Canada have almost entirely been controlled by Canadian owned firms. Through the years the goal of Canadian ownership has been continually upheld.

A 1985 film industry task force concluded that in sectors where foreign domination remains strong, publishing and film, Canadian works distributed by indigenous companies are confined to a marginal position in the market. These same Canadian companies are constantly troubled by problems of undercapitalization and financial instability which prevent them from responding to the social, economic and cultural needs of the country. Therefore control of the communications industry is the bedrock of Canadian cultural sovereignty.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before recoginizing the next speaker, I would simply like to point out that, since House did not object, I assumed that the Hon. Member for Prince Edward—Hastings (Mr. Vanclief) could speak when not in his seat. I think parliamentary tolerance allows it.

Having said that, I now recognize the Hon. Member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup (Mr. Plourde).

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Hon. Member for Port Moody—Coquitlam on a point of order.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I know that the Hon. Member for Mount Royal (Mrs. Finestone), my colleague and cultural affairs critic of the Liberal Party, is sick today. Should she come back to the House, she could perhaps spend a few more minutes on another speech.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The chair is in the hands of the House. The Hon. Member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup.

Mr. André Plourde (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, I only hope that the Hon. Member for Port Moody—Coquitlam (Mr. Waddell) did not put a curse on us with his Motion No. 178, for I am anxious to make my remarks without choking.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian ownership of radio and television broadcasting in this country has been an issue of great concern for all Canadian governments ever since the first Canadian broadcasting legislation was introduced by a Conservative Government in 1932. Under that legislation, the radiobroadcasting spectrum was considered as being in the public domain and subjected to regulations in the public interest.

When he introduced the original radiobroadcasting legislation, the then Prime Minister R.B. Bennett stated, and I quote:

> First of all, this country must be assured of complete Canadian control of broadcasting from Canadian sources, free from foreign interference of influence. Without such control radio broadcasting can never become a great agency for the communication of matters of national concern and for the diffusion of national thought and ideals, and without such control it can never be the agency by which national consciousness may be fostered and sustained and national unity still further strengthened.

These remarks may be even more fitting today than they were in 1932. The Legislator has tried, in the Canadian radiobroadcasting legislation, to keep up with the times.

As a reflection of the changes is media ownership Paragraph 3 (b) of the Broadcasting Act of 1968 which is still in force today provides that the Canadian broadcasting system should be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians so as to safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada.

An order is council containing the directives issued to the CRTC concerning the ability of some Canadian corporations to hold a broadcasting licence has further defined this section of the Act.

The motion under consideration today refers to the key communication tools of broadcasting companies operating in Canada. We are not dealing here with broadcasting companies which broadcast in countries other than Canada and whose signal Canadians can receive. This is altogether a different issue.

Clearly the Canadian Government could neither ensure that Canadians own and control broadcasting undertakings outside the country nor require that the latter hold a licence to broadcast programs aimed at Canadians.

The Government broadcasting policy is not to restrict access to foreign programs, but rather to ensure that the Canadian broadcasting system offers a satisfactory choice of high quality Canadian programs.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation introduced by this Government proceeds along those lines.

First, the Bill reconfirms the principle that the radio spectrum is public property and must be regulated in the interests of all Canadians.

It further states that the broadcasting system provides through its programming a public service essential to the maintainance and enhancement of national identity and cultural sovereignty.

Second, the legislation uses the wording of the 1968 Act, which provides that the Canadian broadcasting system should be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians.

Third, concerning the increasing use of non-Canadian programs in our broadcasting system, the legislation expressly empowers the CRTC to regulate the provision of programming services, even from foreign sources, by broadcasting undertakings.

Under that paragraph, Mr. Speaker, it would be the Commission's duty to strike the most appropriate balance between Canadian and foreign programs. In my view, this is an approach that a majority of Canadians would support.

The definition of "effectively owned and controlled by Canadians" would still be determined by the Governor in Council. This provides the Government with the flexibility needed to specify what is a Canadian corporation under the Act.

The current direction concerning Canadian corporations eligible to hold a broadcasting licence are contained in eight paragraphs covering two pages. However, the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture in June 1989 recommended that the direction be made more specific, in terms especially of the provisions concerning paid-up capital.

To show how complex that kind of regulations can be, I would like to read into the record parts of the current direction, which was drafted to be as specific as possible. The direction starts at Section 2, and I quote:

> The Canadian Radio Television and Telecommunications Commission is herby directed that, on and after January 12, 1971, broadcasting licences may not be issued and renewals of broadcasting licences may not be guaranteed to applicants of the classes described in Section 3.
> Section 3. The classes referred to in section 2 are as follows:
> (a) persons who are not Canadian citizens or eligible Canadian corporations; and
> (b) governments of countries other than Canada or of political subdivisions of countries other than Canada and agents of such governments.
>
> Section 4. For the purposes of this Direction, an "eligible Canadian corporation" is a corporation
> (a) that is incorporated under the laws of Canada or a province,
> (b) of which the chairman or other presiding officer and each of the directors or other similar officers are Canadians citizens, and
> (c) of which, if it is corporation having share capital, at least four-fifths of the shares having full voting rights under all circumstances and shares representing in the aggregate at least four-fifths of the paid-up capital are beneficially owned by Canadian citizens or by corporations other than corporations that are controlled directly or indirectly by citizens or subjects of a country other than Canada.
>
> Except that, in any case where, in the opinion of the Commission, notwithstanding that the corporation is one to which subparagraphs (a) to (c) apply, the corporation is effectively owned or controlled either directly or indirectly and either through the holding of shares of the corporation or any other corporation or through the holding of a significant portion of the outstanding debt of the corporation or in any other manner whatever, by or on behalf of any person, body or authority of a class described in section 3, the corporation shall be deemed not to be an eligible Canadian corporation.

• (1750)

The Governement has already stated its intention, Mr. Speaker, in the Broadcasting Bill to keep the legislative and regulatory provisions concerning Canadian ownership of the electronic media in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, broadcasting is perhaps the most important of our cultural industries. This legislation is part of the Government's commitment to protect and strengthen Canadian cultural sovereignty.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part, however briefly, in this debate on the motion introduced by our NDP colleague, which read as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should ensure that key communications tools, such as radio and television broadcasting, remain in Canadian hands.

[English]

Not only should those vital instruments remain in Canadian hands but, as my distinguished colleague from Mount Royal said so eloquently, it is important that those institutions in fact be controlled by Canadians. Situations such as these have happened in the past; for instance, in the book publishing industry where Americans bought minority shares but got majority votes in terms of decisions in the case of that industry, which is not appropriate for our country.

If we speak of the big screen, of movie theatres, there is something rather interesting that happens. It has been said before—and I believe my colleague from Mount Royal mentioned this as well—that some 3 per cent of the screen time is presently Canadian and the rest of course is foreign, most of it being American.

I was at a meeting of the Canada–U.S. Interparliamentary Group some two years ago. It was the Americans' turn to have the meeting and it was in Key West, Florida. I see my colleague across the way from Burlington who was also at the meeting. We were all discussing this issue with American legislators, congressmen and senators. They had been lobbied extensively before coming to the meeting by Jack Valenti. That was obvious. They even admitted to that in discussions that we had.

It was interesting that they all came into that meeting feeling how unfair Canadians were because we were restricting the Americans in their opportunity to invest in and to work in this field in Canada in a way that was unhindered, and that we should not put those unfair road blocks there, according to the senators and congressmen who had just been lobbied by Mr. Valenti.

In discussing this with them we asked one American congressman how he would feel if he watched film after film and never saw a place in his own country, never saw a scene where he had actually been in the country where he had lived all his life and where he was born. We asked: "Would you, as Americans, accept that?"

They said: "Of course not. That would be intolerable. We would not accept having only films from England in the United States. That just would not do".

We said: "Did it ever occur to you that 3 per cent of what we see in Canada is ours, only 3 per cent, and Jack Valenti is telling you that that is too much?"

They looked at it and said: "Maybe if you put it that way, I suppose it is worth looking at again."

What this tells me, apart from the fact that Mr. Valenti and others are extremely powerful lobbyists in the United States, is that they do not exactly give a straight bill of goods to American legislators. They do not represent the true facts to them. Therefore, often the only view that the American senator and congressman have of our country is that presented to them by these lobbyists with their own vested interests trying to control the whole industry.

We are not talking about something small here. We are talking about a $6 billion industry. We are talking about a lot of money. Therefore it is quite easy for lobbyists on the part of that industry to put out very glossy brochures and very effective and dramatic examples of some effort that we may have done to protect our Canadian culture and to exaggerate, way out of proportion and in very dramatic ways, to show their own government officials how we as Canadians according to them are unfair.

The only unfairness is the unfairness to our own citizens that we do not protect our culture enough in this country, and that we must be very vigilant in that regard. We must protect both the Canadian content itself and, not as some have said, just the container. We must protect the ownership of the industry. We must protect the availability of programming to Canadians. We must ensure that the decision-making ability remains Canadian as well.

Since I do not want this item to be talked out, I would like to see it voted in the affirmative. I will, at this point, terminate my remarks. Hopefully, we could vote on this item immediately.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We still have some time left. Are other Hon. Members seeking the floor? The Hon. Member for Laurentides (Mr. Vien).

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, you are aware of the significance which both French and English speaking Canadians attach to the issue of cultural sovereignty. As could be seen throughout the public debate on free trade, it is vital and the very foundation of our great country.

During the last election campaign our government made a firm commitment to the people of Canada, assuring them that our cultural legacy would no go on the auction block. The motion before the House has to do with the cultural sovereignty issue. Government directives concerning Canadian control over the ownership of broadcasting companies are aimed at ensuring that our means of communication reflect our history, our culture, and our projects for the future.

Our determination to strengthen the rules applicable to Canadian control over broadcasting companies can be explained in part by the evolution of our society. Among other things, I have in mind economic development as it relates to regional disparities, the demographic trends of both linguistic communities and our multi-ethnic components, scientific progress—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member for Laurentides but the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

• (1800)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on October 20, I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration to implement a special program to replace the 6,000 quality jobs lost in Montreal since the beginning of 1989, but the minister did not give me an adequate response.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it was reported in an article which appeared in the October 14, 1989 issue of La Presse that, and I quote: "In the first nine months of the year, Montreal companies have issued 83 permanent mass lay-off notices involving the loss of some 6,000 jobs. In the same period last year, they issued 76 notices of their intention to lay-off 5,000 workers. This represents an increase of 18 per cent."

[English]

Each time that we raise this issue with the government, it proudly announces how many jobs have been created since 1984 when this government came to power. On October 20 the minister told us that 160,000 jobs have been created in Montreal since 1984, but of course she never tells us the nature of these jobs or where they are to be found, what kind of jobs and in what firms.

On the other hand, I would like to put on record with the minister and the government where the 6,000 jobs have been lost since the beginning of this year.

Since this year the following job losses have been announced in Montreal: Gillette, 590 jobs; Weston Foods, 360 jobs; Allergan Pharmaceutical, 62 jobs; Kraft Foods, 290 jobs; Warnaco Corporation, 140 jobs; Central Guarantee Trust, 30 jobs; Simpson's, 1,100 jobs; Forsythe Shirts, 50 jobs; Canadian Marconi, 300 jobs. Geoffrion-Leclerc, 300 jobs; Northern Telecom, 250 jobs; Compagnie un Belage Summerville, 180 jobs; Hostess, Frito-Lay Corporation, 110 jobs, La Belle Fermiere, 80 jobs; Rothman's Benson and Hedges, 239 jobs; Montreal Vickers, 380 jobs; Progress Corporation, 75 jobs; Johnson and Johnson, 86 jobs; M. A. N. Ashton Inc., 250 jobs; Leviton Manufacturing of Canada, 175 jobs; Lawson Martin, 85 jobs; Unisys, 230 jobs; Domtar, 500 jobs; VIA Rail, 913 jobs; and Eastern Airlines, 200 jobs.

In June the Economic Development Commission of Montreal published a report indicating that the unemployment rate in 23 Montreal neighbourhoods is over 15 per cent while in six neighbourhoods it is over 20 per cent. We also have articles that I could quote from Le Devoir of Montreal pointing out that one out of five Montrealers are suffering from hunger. At a recent meeting in Montreal to mark World Hunger Day the different associations that work with the hungry and with the poor in Montreal were able to verify those figures.

The Minister of Finance predicts an unemployment rate of 8.5 per cent in 1990, the Bank of Montreal predicts an unemployment rate of 9 per cent in 1990, and Jim Frank of the Conference Board of Canada has warned us that a risk of recession will be higher in 1990 than at any time since 1982. If we put all those things together the situation is serious.

• (1805)

As I said at the beginning, the parliamentary secretary who is here to answer me this evening will probably cite the same sort of figures that the minister did on October 20. He will say how thousands of jobs are created, but he will not tell us what kinds of jobs those are. He will not tell us in what firms those jobs are to be found, nor will he tell us that most of those jobs are minimum wage, non-union, part-time or temporary jobs; in other words, not the quality type of jobs that were lost, which were enumerated in a long list that I put before the House.

The Social Planning Council of Greater Toronto—and there are not similar figures for Montreal—recently pointed out that 90 per cent of the new jobs in Toronto were in the low paying service sector. Once again I appeal to the government. I appeal to these fine gentlemen opposite because I know they have good hearts to consider the 6,000 employees who have lost their jobs in Montreal since the beginning of the year. I appeal to them to take specific steps to replace those jobs with quality jobs; not low paying service jobs but quality jobs.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the metropolitan area of Montreal, with its population of 2.9 million, a labour force of 1.5 million, and its diversified activities and infrastructure, constitutes one of the major forces impacting the Canadian economy. Montreal accounts for 11.3 per cent of the population of Canada and 11.7 per cent of its labour force. It is also the hub of Quebec's economic, social and cultural life and its major urban area.

As for the over-all employment situation, there have been significant improvements over the past five years, especially compared to the experience during the 1980 to 1984 period. In the four years up to August 1984 employment in Montreal declined by 20,000. I wish I had the list to read out in the way the member did. The unemployment rate climbed by 2.3 per cent.

In marked contrast, there were 160,000 more people employed in Montreal in September 1989 than there had been when this government took office in September 1984. Despite vigorous growth in the labour force there are some 38,000 fewer unemployed and the unemployment rate is 3.3 percentage points lower than five years ago. In the last year alone employment is up by 10,000. Unemployment is down by 12,000 and the unemployment rate has dropped to 8 per cent.

Since 1985 there have been a lot of joint actions by various levels of government on the economic situation in Montreal. This includes two major initiatives on the part of the federal government. In 1985 there was the creation of the ministerial committee on the development of the Montreal region to advise the government on how to consolidate Montreal's role as a centre for development. In 1986 there was the creation of the committee for the economic recovery and revitalization of employment in east end Montreal. There have also been concrete initiatives by the federal government, especially Employment and Immigration Canada, to help Montreal. The following are some examples of that.

In 1988-89 Employment and Immigration Canada invested $87 million in the city of Montreal through programs under the Canadian Jobs Strategy. A total of 29,500 people participated in Canadian Jobs Strategy activities in Montreal.

Since the beginning of this year Employment and Immigration Canada has completed 20 agreements under the industrial adjustment service at a cost to EIC of $127,083. A further 29 new agreements have been signed this year with a commitment of $280,000 in funding by EIC. The Industrial Adjustment Service Agreements also involve spending by the province and the private sector so that the total expenditures in Montreal under the completed and new agreements is expected to exceed $1.3 million.

Adjournment Debate

The Hon. Member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre (Mr. Laporte) has the floor.

[English]

AGRICULTURE—REMOVAL OF OATS FROM CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—RESULTS OF DECIMA POLL

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rose in the House on May 4 last to question the Minister of Agriculture with respect to the future of the Canadian Wheat Board, particularly with respect to oats under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board which at that time had not yet been removed.

My question to the minister was this: If it could be demonstrated that a large majority of producers in western Canada did not want oats removed from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board, would the minister heed those wishes and in fact would the minister allow the producers in western Canada to decide the future of their own Canadian Wheat Board?

The minister did not answer my question. Instead, he simply went on to state that there had been ongoing consultations.

In the supplementary part of the question he again did not answer but outlined some of the groups which had been consulted. These included, as reported in Hansard, the United Grain Growers Association, the Canadian Western Wheat Growers Association, the Western Barley Growers Association, the Prairie Canola Growers Association, the Alberta Pork Producers Development Board, the Alberta Sheep and Wool Commission, the Cattlemen's Association, the Manitoba Farm Business Association, the Manitoba Hog Producers Marketing Board, the Saskatchewan Marketing Board, the Government of Manitoba, the Government of Alberta and the Government of Saskatchewan.

It is all very well to have consulted these groups, but I am wondering what o these groups have to do with the future of oats under the Canadian Wheat Board.

With respect to the United Grain Growers and with respect to the Canadian Wheat Growers Association, it is valid to consult those groups because they in fact have oats producers with them. But I would like to know what the Alberta Sheep and Wool Commission has to do with the production of oats in western Canada.

Further, what does the Cattlemen's Association, the Manitoba Farm Business Association, the Manitoba Hog Producers Marketing Board and the Saskatchewan Marketing Board have to do with it? They do not grow oats. What does the Western Barley Growers Association and the Prairie Canola Growers Association have to do with it? They do not represent oats producers; they represent other commodities.

Mr. Speaker, what the minister failed to point out was that there had been a Decima poll that had just been completed at that time. The minister knew about it. That poll pointed out that well over 70 per cent of producers in western Canada felt that they had not been consulted on the oats issue. Furthermore, fully two–thirds of producers in western Canada wanted to have oats remain under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board.

What the minister failed to point out was that the prairie wheat pools were not consulted, specifically the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool which is probably the largest individual farm organization in the country and which opposed the removal of oats.

The minister did not indicate that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture actually passed a resolution at its last convention saying that oats should not be removed without a vote by the producers in western Canada. The minister did not even point out the fact that the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board had not been consulted. The Minister for Grains and Oilseeds has pointed out that he had no obligation to consult with the advisory committee of the Canadian Wheat Board. The advisory committee of the Canadian Wheat Board is a democratically elected body representing some 140,000 permit book holders in western Canada. It is there to advise the wheat board.

It is true that the minister does not have to consult with the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board, but there is no obligation for him to consult with the Alberta Sheep and Wool Commission either. I would think it is much more logical to consult with the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board than it is to consult with the Alberta Sheep and Wool Commission with respect to the removal of oats from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board.

The reason there was no consultation with these other groups that I have mentioned is that they were opposed to the removal of oats from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. The government consulted only with those groups that agreed with its position and certainly not groups germane to the issue at hand, namely, the future of the Canadian Wheat Board.

I again would ask: Why does not the government allow the permit book holders in western Canada to decide the fate and the future of their own wheat board? It is a wheat board that is funded by producers, funded by farmers who are members of the Canadian Wheat Board. They should be deciding the future of that wheat board.

• (1815)

If the member who is going to respond on behalf of the government is simply going to spout some rhetoric and not answer the question, he need not bother, because farmers in western Canada are concerned about their future way of life. They see their way of life eroding and they see the Canadian Wheat Board as an integral part of that way of life.

I again ask this government, will it not allow the producers, the members, the permit book holders in western Canada, those 140,000 farmers, to decide their own fate and to decide the future of the Canadian Wheat Board?

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to confirm this government's commitment to consultation when making policy decisions. The commitment was met again when farm groups told us they wanted the responsibility for marketing oats transferred from the Canadian Wheat Board to the private individuals and co-operative companies.

We talked to farmers and farm groups about marketing oats for three years. As well as talking to producers and their organizations, we talked to traders, processors and provincial governments. We were told by many groups that they wanted the change in marketing. These groups included the United Grain Growers, the Western Canadian Wheat Growers Association, the Western Barley Growers Association, the Prairie Canola Growers Association, Alberta Pork Producers Development Corporation, the Alberta Sheep and Wool Commission, the Prairie Cattlemen's Association, the Manitoba Farm Business Association, the Manitoba Hog Producers Marketing Board, the Saskatchewan Pork Producers Marketing Board and the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. So you can see the extent of our consultations.

In 1988-89 oats ranked sixth in value among the Canadian export crops and accounted for 4 per cent of the Canadian Wheat Board export sales. This was the peak year for Canadian oats exports because of the drought-reduced crop in the U.S.

Oats is a special crop sold in small quantities with specific quality requirements for human food and racehorse feed. Private traders have the flexibility both to pursue niche markets and to handle bulk sales of feed oats. This flexibility means oats producers will have a marketing system suited to their needs.

The change in the marketing does not affect the quotas, grading and weighing of oats handled by the elevator system. Grain companies and co-operatives will be able to offer pooled price options to producers as they do now with many other special crops. The change in oats marketing is not related to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement or any other international trade discussion. The decision was based on the merits of the product itself.

The U.S. demand for food oats is growing and Canada's reputation for producing high quality oats means new opportunities for Canadian oats producers. The new system is already providing increased opportunities for oats processing facilities on the prairies.

Can-Oat Milling Inc. recently introduced the building of an oats processing plant near Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, while Con-Agra and Westglen Mills are building a plant near Barrhead, Alberta, as a joint venture. Oats producers will be able to capture premiums offered in these markets.

I am confident this change to the marketing system is the best in the long-term interests of the producers.

THE SENATE

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, it pleases me to rise tonight under Standing Orders 37 and 38 to question the government on a vital matter of political reform.

The House will recall that I raised, on October 30, the issue of the Alberta vacancy in the Senate. The Prime Minister had no answer, indeed seemed unprepared for the question, so I trust the government will have some kind of reply now.

Two years ago this seat became vacant with the resignation of Senator Cameron. It has been vacant since. The House will know how senators have traditionally been appointed and we are seeing some of the consequences of that now with Senator Cogger.

Since the early 1980s there has been a determined move to reform the Senate of Canada. It began in Alberta but since the advent of my party it has grown rapidly. It now is the position of all governments in western Canada, most in eastern Canada, and is gaining a foothold in parts of central Canada. This, of course, is the Triple-E movement. It is enshrined in the legal text of a constitutional amendment drawn up by a reform party sponsored task force and presented to the western premiers in May of 1988.

The idea is to make the Senate elected with an effective veto power over federal legislation and with equal representation from each province. Australia has such a Senate in a parliamentary system like ours and it has served to lessen the regional transfers and regional tensions that have characterized our federal system. In Canada, due to its undemocratic nature, the Senate has lacked the moral authority to fulfil the role of regional representation given it by the Fathers of Confederation.

It is truly unbelievable that in 1989 one quarter of the seats in the Parliament of Canada remain unelected. Indeed, many are reserved for patronage appointments of the worst kind. The irony of this is not lost on the Canadian voter as he gazes in disbelief at our Prime Minister pontificating about democracy on the international stage.

The Prime Minister decided to appoint senators from provincial lists under the terms of the unratified Meech Lake Accord. It is interesting to note that just yesterday, Premier Getty announced that he will rethink his position on Meech Lake if the Prime Minister continues to waver on appointing Mr. Waters. The Prime Minister and others did not count on the strength of the tide for Senate reform sweeping the west. And, as any sincere Senate reformer knows, electing senators is the essence of any reform and certainly not an item for negotiation.

Premier Getty in Alberta wisely agreed to be guided by the electorate in submitting his choice to the Prime Minister. In August of this year, the Alberta legislature passed the Senatorial Selection Act to provide a legislative framework for the Premier's advice to the Prime Minister.

Hon. members will know clearly what happened. Despite the shrill warning of a few Tory MPs, Albertans went to the polls en masse on October 16 and voted overwhelmingly for Lieutenant-General Stanley C. Waters, the Reform Party candidate who garnered over 40 per cent of the votes. Liberal, PC, and Independent candidates trailed far behind. The NDP chose not to field a candidate. It is apparently the NDP view that socialism is ideologically incompatible with regional representation.

On October 19, Premier Getty submitted the list of candidates and their vote totals to the Prime Minister in order to satisfy the provisions of both the Meech Lake Accord and the Senatorial Selection Act. So that brings us to today. What is the Prime Minister to do? It is clear there are only two choices: first, he could appoint immediately the clear choice of Albertans, or second, use some other criteria.

I want to review, if I could, three of the red herrings used to argue against Mr. Waters' appointment to the Senate. The first is that the appointment should be delayed until the Meech Lake Accord is finished dying and wreaking its havoc upon federal-provincial relations in this country. This in no way prevents Albertans' clear choice being appointed to a seat that is vacant now.

The second argument is that Mr. Waters is politically unsuited to the position. Indeed, in the eyes of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, he should not be appointed because of his political views. Of course, it is precisely these political views upon which Mr. Waters was elected. Albertans had the option of the PC and turned it down. They wanted a candidate from a party to fight Meech Lake, enforced bilingualism but most of all to fight the goods and services tax and the reckless spending of this government. These views are not widely shared, perhaps, in Ottawa but that is the representation that Albertans want.

This is not only an undemocratic argument; it is also dangerous and untrue. Mr. Waters is a forthright man who shoots from the hip. Under the Trudeau administration, he was commander of the Canadian Army. Since retiring from the Forces, he has been one of Alberta's most prominent businessmen and, indeed, was a very prominent Tory until Preston Manning arrived on the scene. The External Affairs Minister's comments about Mr. Waters' views possibly say more about his own attitude to fiscal conservatives in his own party than they do about Mr. Waters.

Finally there is the argument that this series of events has somehow violated the Canadian Constitution. Let me make my party's position clear here. Under the Constitution Act, 1867, Section 24, it is the Governor General who appoints senators and the Governor General is free to do as he or she pleases. Now we know that the Governor General, by convention, takes advice from the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister may choose to recommend Mr. Waters or anyone else. That is his choice.

I would remind the government, however, that a constitution operates not only according to the letter of the law but also according to a series of conventions, the intention of which is to ensure that the democratic will prevails. Clearly, the Prime Minister has the technical authority to do what he wants, but the political culture of our country clearly says that the right thing to do is to appoint Mr. Waters and appoint him now. If he denies democracy or delays it, it will be clear where he stands with regard to the views of Albertans and their basic right to representation. I trust that whoever answers my question will shed some light on where the government really stands on this issue and Senate reform generally. The government has been suspiciously quiet about where it stands on every one of the three Es in the reform proposal. In both the debate over Meech Lake and over Mr. Waters it is becoming increasingly suggested by Canadians that the government is really trying to block Senate reform in almost any form. Perhaps this is what Premier Getty is beginning to suspect. It seems as though he is definitely concerned about that. Nothing radical is happening here. It is just a start. After 122 years, surely westerners are entitled to that.

• (1825)

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in an exchange with the Prime Minister on October 30, the member for Beaver River asked whether Canadians can expect to hear of the appointment of Stan Waters to the Senate of Canada.

As the hon. member is probably aware, Premier Getty wrote to the Prime Minister last October 19 while the Prime Minister was out of the country. In his response to the question last Monday, the Prime Minister indicated that he had not yet had an opportunity to consider the matter. Senate appointments remain the Prime Minister's prerogative. It is only reasonable that he have the time to do so.

The hon. member raised a second issue last Monday. She said, "It is not a matter of when but it is a matter of why not reform the Senate". I would like to take this opportunity to respond on behalf of the government.

In August, 1986, all premiers agreed to defer Senate reform to a second round of constitutional discussions when all governments would once again be present at the constitutional table. Once proclaimed, the Meech Lake Accord will guarantee that Senate reform will be a priority agenda item on future annual constitutional conferences by the First Ministers. The Government of Canada is committed to fundamental Senate reform. The Prime Minister has promised to table a proposal for an elected Senate in the first constitutional conference provided by the Meech Lake Accord.

In the meantime, to reflect the federal government's commitment to pursue this important issue, earlier this year Senator Murray carried out a round of informal bilateral consultations on Senate reform with all provincial governments. So, we share the hon. member's belief that there should be fundamental reform of the Senate. That being said, questions have been raised about Alberta's Senate election initiative.

As I see it, Alberta's initiative raises issues that go well beyond filling one Senate vacancy. It touches on the role of one of our two Houses of Parliament and the broad question of how we should go about reforming the Senate. Some commentators noted that a precedent could be created here. Some have said that this is a good precedent, and that they hope other provinces will adopt Alberta's process. Others, including Alberta Intergovernmental Affairs Minister, James Horsman, have said that they do not favour creating an elected Senate in a piecemeal way. Speaking in the legislative assembly last July 26, Mr. Horsman said that a danger inherent in Alberta's proposal was that: "if every province were to do this we could by about 2020 have entrenched in the Constitution of Canada an elected Senate with its current powers".

Mr. Horsman went on to say that no government in Canada would want to see that happen.

Mr. Horsman raised a legitimate concern. Would there not be implications for relations between the two Houses of Parliament if the Senate became an elected body with its current powers which are virtually equal to those of this House and remain untouched? It is a good question.

What would it mean if Ontario decided to elect Senators to fill its three current vacancies, and eventually Ontario and Quebec elected all 48 of their Senators? Having done this and entrenched their supremacy, what incentive would Ontario and Quebec have to talk about Senate representation and powers?

These are all legitimate questions that merit consideration in light of the national implications of this Alberta innovation. Senate reform is very important to the future of the federation. The federal government is committed to its pursuit following ratification of the Meech Lake Accord. However, it is a complex issue which raises a number of questions that might best be addressed together rather than one at a time as part of an effort to achieve reform in a piecemeal way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 o'clock p.m.

ALLEGED UTTERANCES OF MEMBER FROM ST. LEONARD

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, there was a time when people got elected on the basis that Heaven was blue, hell was red. It now appears that, as claimed by the Liberal Member for Saint-Léonard (Mr. Gagliano): "God is a Liberal, and his son is a Christian."

Well now, Mr. Speaker, he is lucky that ridicule never killed anyone, otherwise there would be new elections in Saint-Léonard.

It is almost unbelievable that in 1989 people would utter such absurdities in order to get votes, and that hundreds of Liberals would pay to come and hear them.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, if the Liberals now believe that God is a Liberal and his son is a Christian, well let the son come to the House of Commons and we will see to it that he drops down into hell!

AIR DISASTER

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, on June 23, 1985, 329 innocent civilians, mostly Canadians, lost their lives as a result of a terrorist bomb explosion aboard flight 182 from Montreal to Bombay via London.

Extensive media research prominently broadcast on TV and radio has shown that this heinous crime was preventable. There were eight warnings, including a test explosion that pointed to this impending disaster. Yet nothing was done.

Even though an official Indian government inquiry decided that a bomb had been placed on board, Canada has refused to address this matter.

Canadians have been clamouring for a public inquiry. Within the cities of Ottawa and Nepean, 700 friends and relatives of victims have signed a petition for an inquiry.

Last year, an identical terrorist bombing destroyed a Pan American passenger jet in Britain. Recommendations from the Canadian investigation could have averted this additional tragedy.

It is high time this government began the task of looking into this disaster. I strongly call upon Parliament to give Canadians a commitment to hold a royal commission of inquiry into all facts surrounding the Air India disaster of 1985.

This government should get out from under its rock and begin to take some responsibility to prevent these atrocities from ever occurring again.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the member for South Shore gets up in the House from time to time to claim that his riding has the biggest, fattest lobsters and the biggest, greenest Christmas trees in the whole world.

I would like to take exception to that. In any case, lobsters and Christmas trees are one thing, but there can be no doubt about blueberries. My riding has the biggest blueberries in the country. In fact, we have the biggest pickers, the best producers, the best processors and the largest shippers of fresh blueberries.

The industry is well organized and at the leading edge of technology in this field, but requires some assistance from two areas of the federal government. First, the Day Haul Program from Canada Employment has been crucial to their industry. I urge the minister to maintain this program.

The producers need help in research, development and insect control. I will be asking for help from the appropriate departments in this regard.

RADIO-CANADA

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the CBC's decision not to broadcast the public affairs radio program Ontario 30 on CBOF-Ottawa any longer is unacceptable. In so doing, the Crown corporation proves that it is indifferent to Ontario's French-speaking community.

Ontario 30 was a link between the various French communities in Ontario. In fact, it was the only French media program to cover all of Ontario. This management decision to end Ontario 30 in Ottawa, the national capital, is one that I regret. It will only further isolate Ontario's francophones. I therefore ask the Minister of Communications (Mr. Masse)—and I see his Parliamentary Secretary here today—to intervene with the CBC on our behalf, to show that the CBC really meets the needs of the French-speaking minorities outside Québec.

NATIONAL BURNS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to urge all members of the House and, indeed, all Canadians to acknowledge and lend their support in the recognition of National Burns Awareness Week.

Burn injuries are one of the leading causes of accidental death in Canada. Children, the elderly and disabled Canadians are the most likely to suffer severe burns. Many could be prevented by the use of smoke detectors, home escape plans and generally through increased public awareness and proper education.

For example, the execution of the "stop, drop and roll" procedure can mean the difference between a minor injury and a fatal one.

The Shriners of North America and the Canadian Association of Fire Chiefs have addressed this problem, and through their efforts, the week of February 4 to 10, beginning in 1990, is being recognized as National Burns Awareness Week.

I commend the efforts of these organizations to all Canadians and strongly urge that they support their work. I also know that the appropriate ministers, in particular, will want to lend their support in recognition of National Burns Awareness Week.

AIR DISASTER

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise to remind all members that this House endorsed unanimously a resolution on September 12, 1983 condemning the Soviet Union for its attack on a Korean civil airliner and the resultant death of 269 innocent people.

To date, there has been no apology or compensation forthcoming to the 10 Canadian families who lost loved ones in this incident, despite the passage of six years.

• (1410)

Given the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has stated with some regularity a consistent position, and I quote from a letter of September 29, 1988, "Canada continues to hold the Soviet Union liable for damages resulting from the downing of KAL-007", I would encourage the Prime Minister to raise this issue with Mr. Gorbachev in his upcoming visit to the Soviet Union. I would ask that the Prime Minister take this opportunity to seek a formal apology and appropriate compensation.

HEALTH

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I had the pleasure of taking part in the opening of the new hypertension unit at the Ottawa Civic Hospital. This revolutionary unit is designed to investigate the causes and treatment of hypertension, a major cause of disability and death in Canadians.

The unit was established through the co-operation of the hospital, government and private participants, and members of the medical community. Major funding was obtained from Sandoz pharmaceutical company as a direct result of Bill C-22, the Drug Patent Act.

This is only one example of the millions of dollars being put into medical research in Canada by the pharmaceutical companies, as promised by them as a result of Bill C–22.

This success story will be repeated all over Canada due to the foresight of this government in passing strong and progressive legislation such as the Drug Patent Act.

FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, at tomorrow's First Ministers' Conference the leaders of the Yukon and Northwest Territories governments will have official observer status. Despite requests from the territorial governments for full participant status, the federal government has not seen fit to give northerners the voice they are entitled to at these national conferences.

In a media interview in Yellowknife in September, 1988, the Prime Minister committed himself to working on a formula that would allow the territorial leaders and territorial ministers, and I quote:

> —better input in the decision–making process, better presence, better chance to speak out on behalf of the territories and people in the territories.

In the 14 months since the Prime Minister made that commitment we have seen no progress on the status of the territorial government leaders at First Ministers' Conferences.

Simply having the right to make an opening statement is not good enough for the territorial leaders. It is not good enough for the people of the north who see their democratically–elected leaders shut out of the room during subsequent discussions.

This government continues to deny northerners their right to be represented in these critical national discussions which affect them in all areas whether constitutional or economic.

I urge the Prime Minister to take the concerns of the people of the north seriously and allow the two leaders of the two territories to take part in all discussions of the first ministers, as he indicated he would in September, 1988, in Yellowknife.

EAST GERMANY

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we heard that the cabinet of the German Democratic Republic resigned and issued a call for democratic elections of a ruling body.

This occurs following the growing exodus of people from East Germany.

By their actions yesterday, the leaders of East Germany are responding to the will of their people. We applaud the actions of East German leaders and hope that genuine steps to democracy, so well illustrated in the last week, continue in the German Democratic Republic, and that true democratic reform is peacefully accomplished in that country.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the so–called DND environmental impact statement regarding NATO flights over Innu territory completely, and one would have to assume deliberately, ignore the devastating impact these flights have on the Innu people.

This morning the Innu filed a legal action against the Government of Canada in order to stop the low level flights and prevent the establishment of a NATO base in Nitassinan. That the Innu should have to resort to this to see their rights protected is a sad statement indeed.

The Canadian government is wasting an enormous amount of money and time trying to justify the unjustifiable. Not only does its proposed base threaten the Innu people, it also represents part of NATO's FOFA strategy which is now more irrelevant than ever, given the changes taking place in Europe. Instead the government should put its efforts and resources into responding imaginatively to Soviet initiatives in Arctic security.

Gorbachev's Murmansk proposal continues to go unanswered. It is time the Prime Minister woke up and responded in a concrete and positive way. Let us see that happen when the Prime Minister visits the Soviet Union later this month.

Canada is uniquely situated geo–politically to promote disarmament in the Arctic. Let us take up our responsibility and develop policies based on common security principles rather than on confrontation and threat. Let us end the destructive and senseless flights over Innu land.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe met on the environment and just concluded its work in Sophia. Thirty-four of the 35 delegations attending agreed to a plan of action on the transboundary effects of industrial accidents, the management of hazardous wastes, and the protection and use of transboundary watercourses and international lakes.

Pollution in the Canadian Arctic and its sources in Europe was raised, but it was unfortunate that Ottawa did not instruct the Canadian delegation to use this international forum to raise as well North American transboundary issues, namely, acid rain and transboundary air pollutants that damage ecosystems and economies. We missed an opportunity to send a strong signal to the U.S., through the U.S. delegation in Sophia.

Transboundary issues remain a high priority on our bilateral agenda, but we also must take every opportunity to raise our concerns in multilateral fora where the environment is on the agenda. We urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs not to let such opportunities slip by in future.

ENERGY

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, a successful Alberta economy depends on a successful energy industry. Oil and gas development accounts for hundreds of thousands of jobs.

In the riding of Elk Island this influence is demonstrated by the presence of the Strathcona refineries. The energy industry depends on export markets. The Pacific Rim market is an important market for Alberta energy. We must continue to supply this crucial market through dependable and environmentally safe marine tanker shipments.

Let us work together to support Alberta's energy sector. Let us work together to build a stronger economy in western Canada.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, the Toronto Labour Council, the Toronto Action Committee on the Status of Women, the Toronto Social Planning Council, Coalition of Visible Minorities and Immigrant Women have recently produced a study on the economic and working conditions that presently exist in the city of Toronto. They have found that these conditions are changing dramatically.

Increased part-time work, temporary work and shift work has meant decreased wages and benefits and less job security for many workers. They also found that in the last three months alone plant closings have cost some 2,500 jobs in the city of Toronto. This study also found that Toronto has a generation of young people who are growing up in the city and who may never be able to live there.

This government should be setting an example as well by initiating programs that will offset the devastating impact of the free trade agreement, cutbacks to VIA Rail, slashing of unemployment insurance programs, and if they get away with it, the GST.

Rather than being a part of the solution, this government is creating the problem. It is high time it began acting in the best interests of Canadian families, rather than big business friends.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in an interview last night on the television program The Fifth Estate, the Minister of Finance was asked about the position of the provinces on his goods and services tax.

This is what the minister said of the provincial positions, and I cite him from the transcript: "They've agreed. Behind closed doors they'll say, ' you got to go ahead with this, Mike'. No question of that".

I would like to give the minister an opportunity to back that statement up. I invite him to give the House of Commons the names of the premiers who agree with his version of the goods and services tax. If there are any, why has he not given the House those names before?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): I am glad the hon. member is watching my performances on television.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I was referring in my response to a question put to me by Mr. Malling, whereby I indicated that we had been discussing with the provincial financial ministers for some two years the design of the goods and services tax. At that point we hadn't called it a goods and services tax, but it is essentially the same structure that was being discussed during the meetings.

• (1420)

One finance minister made it quite clear that he disagreed with a consumption tax, and that is Alberta. It does not have one. I think it is quite clear why it has taken that position.

During the course of these meetings with the finance ministers they were quite in agreement with the fact that we had to change the federal sales tax, for reasons that I have expressed in this House on a number of occasions. During that period of time none of them were saying we should not be changing this FST into something like the goods and services tax.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I want to tell the minister that I watched him last night because I like sitcoms.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, just before the opening of the important First Ministers' Conference, the Minister of Finance accused the provincial premiers of hypocrisy.

Mr. Speaker, the provincial premiers have all said many times that they are against the goods and services tax. But last night, the Minister of Finance said:

> In private, they say they agree, but they do not want to share the blame. They want to get on board later, when the train is already rolling.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that at the conference which starts tomorrow, the premiers will have comments on the Finance Minister's television program.

Can he give us—and again, I give him the opportunity to do so—the names of these provincial premiers who told him that they would take part in his goods and services tax?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I can understand the Leader of the Opposition being interested in sitcoms. I, unfortunately, have not achieved the heights that he has of being a star of a sitcom every day in the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I appreciate that the ratings are not quite as high as Bill Cosby, but he can work on that.

Mr. Speaker: I dare say we could do something to put the ratings up around here. I will let the hon. minister do that.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do the best I can.

I think I have responded to that question. We have on many occasions sat down with the provincial finance ministers, as well as the officials. Their need is not as great as ours in terms of reforming the sales tax system.

We have a sales tax that penalizes our exports, that provides imports with a one-third tax advantage relative to Canadian producers. The existing tax is prone to considerable tax avoidance.

If I asked the hon. member, would he be in support of keeping that sales tax in place, I am sure that if he were objective—possibly he will be after December 31—he would say, "Absolutely not, Mike, you had better get on with changing it as well".

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, those answers of the minister have already cost us half our ratings in the House of Commons.

My final question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. He looks as if he wants to participate in some constructive way.

All the premiers to whom I have spoken have told me something quite different from the statements made last evening by the Minister of Finance. They have told me that the Minister of Finance never, ever discussed with his provincial counterparts a formal proposal for provincial participation in the goods and services tax.

Does the Prime Minister intend to put such a proposal on the table at the First Ministers' Conference? Or is he content to move ahead with a proposal that will see Canada as the only country in the world with 10 separate retail sales taxes?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, if we continue with this federal sales tax, we will be the only country in the world that has a manufacturers' sales tax. We will be the only country in the world that through its tax system will deliberately tax exports to a greater extent than others and—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Oh, come on, Mike.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Leader of the Opposition to have some patience for the answer. We would be the only country in the world that penalizes our exports in the way that this tax does. We would be the only country in the world that gives our imports a tax advantage relative—

Some Hon. Members: Name one premier.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I thought I responded to that question in my first answer.

What I said in my first answer was that there was one finance minister who has said all along that he was not in favour. At no time did the other finance ministers say that they disagree with the fact that, (a) we have to change from the existing tax and (b) that the proposal that we had on the table, the national sales tax, the basic structure of which has been repeated in the goods and services tax, is the right way to go.

It was quite clear to me that they did not have the sense of urgency, the need to replace their sales taxes. That is why we decided to move forward with the goods and services tax that we believe is absolutely the right way to go for Canada.

FINANCE

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is of course aware there will be a very important conference on the economy on Thursday and Friday this week. We all know about the tensions that exist in this respect.

My question to the Minister of Finance is this: Considering the importance of this conference, and it is common knowledge that all the provinces are opposed to his proposals on the GST, is the Minister prepared to contribute towards a sensible and honourable dialogue with his provincial colleagues by withdrawing the proposed GST?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member refers to or believes is healthy. I think that the approach that we are taking to bring in a goods and services tax is a clear way to improve the health of this economy. That is precisely the reason we are going ahead with it.

I have made it quite clear that if the premiers or the finance ministers, supported by the premiers, can agree on a specific proposal, yes we are prepared to sit down and discuss that with them.

At the August meeting of the premiers and made no attempt whatsoever to even consider alternatives.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the government plans to go ahead no matter what. I would ask the finance minister to comment again on his statement last night when he said in response to a question, "There's basically one exemption and that's groceries".

My question to the Minister of Finance today is this. Is he prepared to commit on behalf of his government that when the Conservative majority in this House rams through the GST against the will of the premiers, against the will of Canadians, that his government will not impose a tax either on groceries or existing housing because there are a few other exemptions?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, that is a continuation of the line of questioning that he and his colleagues have been using since September of this year.

I have made it very clear that I am not going to make statements that are going to preclude the attention and the considerations that the finance committee is going to be having, the finance committee of which he is a member.

We have indicated that we want to listen to what the finance committee has to say and draw our conclusions accordingly. But clearly, the proposal that is on the table to which we have indicated a very strong attachment, does not provide for either of those two things in its make-up.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question, too is to the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance knows, without exception, all the premiers have opposed the tax.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): What have they proposed?

Mr. Broadbent: He knows also that there is Joe going again. Calm down over there, Joe. I hope our foreign policy is in better control, Your Honour.

• (1430)

Since the First Ministers are here in town, and since the Government of Canada and the premiers ought to obtain maximum co-operation on such a matter, I want to ask the minister this, considering that he said: "Behind closed doors, they'll say, 'You got to go ahead with this'. No question of that. With reference to the tax, they do not want to share the heat, they want to come in later." Will the minister either tell the House of Commons and the people of Canada the name of one premier who said that, or do the right thing and withdraw his comment entirely?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): I think that I have responded to that question in response to the Leader of the Opposition. In those comments on the TV program that was aired last night I was referring to the fact that the finance ministers, federal and provincial, had sat around the table for two years discussing a proposal on sales tax reform, which is the same structure as the goods and services tax. The goods and services tax is a federal only proposal. The other proposal, a national sales tax, is federal-provincial, but all the other elements are essentially the same as what we have been discussing with the provinces.

With the exception of one finance minister, at no time did others say: "Look, we had better stop discussing this". It became quite clear in the way the discussion was going that we were not going to reach a resolution of this; that there was not the need on the part of the provinces to change their sales tax. There was a very clear need on the part of the federal government. That is why we decided to proceed as we have.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding what the minister has said, he still has not answered the question. It is a very serious accusation, I say to the minister, to tell the people of Canada that all the premiers are systematically misleading the public. The premiers have come out strongly with the large majority of Canadians in opposition to the tax. The Minister of Finance has said, and these are his words: "You got to go ahead with this".

Can he name one minister of finance or one premier and, if so, which province, has told him to go ahead with it? Who is saying that in private, but is saying something contrary to the people of Canada? As Minister of Finance, he has a reputation to uphold, and if he is going to hurl abuse at the premiers, he has got to document that.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear in the context of this that what I was referring to is the fact that we have to go ahead with the replacement of the existing federal sales tax to the goods and services tax. That is precisely the position that the New Democratic Party is stating, and you have said on many occasions—

Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party is shaking his head. I can show different occasions on which his party, people speaking on behalf of his party, his finance critic from the last Parliament—

Mr. Broadbent: Which premier, Mike?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre):—was saying that it is important. The member from Regina as well is saying that the existing federal sales tax is a mess, it must be changed, and on this basis we have got to get on with it.

People have been talking about making a change in this tax for 50 years. This is a government that is going to get on with that job.

[Translation]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, last night the Minister of Finance said that Canada's provincial Premiers had expressed their support for the concept of a GST, but he refuses to repeat that statement here in the House of Commons. The Minister of Finance should speak frankly and honestly here in the House of Commons and before all Canadians. I repeat: Will the Minister of Finance name one Premier who agrees with him on this issue? If he cannot, he should say so and withdraw his comments immediately.

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think the context is quite clear in the program that was aired last night that I was referring to the provinces and, in particular, the meetings that I have been having with the finance ministers. I will be quite precise with the finance ministers and with my comments about the finance ministers.

One finance minister has said that he absolutely disagrees with sales taxes and that is quite clear. It is the province of Alberta. It has made that known publicly on many occasions. But for two years I sat at the table with other provinces represented by their finance ministers and at no time did people say that we should stop talking about this.

Mr. Broadbent: Did they say go ahead with it?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): They agreed with the fact that we had to go ahead with the change from the federal sales tax to something like the goods and services tax and that is precisely what we are doing.

MEMBER OF THE SENATE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. We are wondering what can be made of the about-face of the Prime Minister on the Cogger affair that, to quote him, it was both forthcoming and proper for the Senate to hold hearings, and forthcoming and proper for the Senate not to hold them, both statements having been made after it became clear that the RCMP was seized of the matter.

My question for the Deputy Prime Minister is, bearing in mind that there were valid concerns about the conduct of departments and agencies in relation to Senator Cogger, as well as things done by the senator which may not amount to criminal activity but which are nonetheless unacceptable and worthy of being examined by the Senate, will the government not agree that the Senate should proceed to do its work and to do it in its own time frame?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, far be it from me to make a decision in the other place. I am sure that they can make their decisions on their own, and as they will.

I remind the hon. member that there is an RCMP investigation into this. It was the senator himself who asked for the Senate to set up a proper mechanism to hear this particular issue and it will decide in a normal manner. I am not sure what is so bothersome to the hon. member about that process.

Mr. Kaplan: I am glad to hear that the government is prepared to recognize the responsibility of the Senate in the matter and for its own timing.

Let me ask the Deputy Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: I am having a little difficulty understanding on what basis the hon. member is asking the government in this place about what the Senate is or is not doing. It may be a very interesting inquiry, and often is, but I do not know that it has anything to do with the administration of government. I will hear the hon. member's question.

Mr. Kaplan: The Senate has a representative in the cabinet who has taken a position on this matter on behalf of the government. I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister, in the light of what I gather is another flip-flop today from what the Prime Minister was saying yesterday, will the government instruct its minister, the Government Leader in the Senate, not to take a position against the Senate holding hearings and holding hearings in its own time frame?

Mr. Mazankowski: Sir, I am sure the Government Leader in the Senate will act in accordance with the customary practices that are normal. I really find it quite strange that the hon. member is troubled by this.

The opposition raised this issue on the floor of the House, action has been taken, they are still not satisfied. What more do they want?

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment. Yesterday, four respected social agencies from metropolitan Toronto, the Metro Labour Council, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, the Social Planning Council and the Coalition of Visible Minorities and Immigrant Women released a report to the Toronto city council calling for a city agency to address the growth of part-time jobs at the expense of full-time jobs, the growth of unemployment and to meet the need for job adjustment programs.

Given that these needs are the direct outcome of her government's policies, why is the minister ignoring these deplorable conditions in metro Toronto, and why does she remain inactive in the face of worsening social economic conditions in Toronto?

• (1440)

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, as usual, is way off base.

The government firmly believes—and I think he should listen to this—that the best response to poverty is two-fold. First is the creation of jobs that people can have to work at, and I remind him that the unemployment rate in Toronto is as low as it has ever been. The second is the training and the ability for people to take those jobs.

That is what we are doing through our labour force strategy and the Canadian Jobs Strategy where we have targeted particularly people in need. Through the programs that we have for people on social assistance, which was a program of this government, that is directed at those people who have the most needs.

It is our job as a government, and the member's job as a representative of the people of Toronto, to stand up in this House and say yes, that is what we need, and that is what is happening.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the minister that as a former educator I long ago learned the art of listening. It is something that she might have done because if she had learned to listen she would have heard some of the horror stories about the outcome of her UI legislation. In fact, the economic regions outlined yesterday are going to make matters worse for the unemployed, particularly in major centres like Montreal and Toronto.

In view of the fact that there are over 74,000 unemployed in the city of Toronto, that there has been a job loss of over 2,400 full-time jobs in the course of the last three months alone, and that there are over 80,000 persons swelling the ranks of those who depend on food banks in the City of Toronto, largely as a result of her government's policies, and in view of the fact that the social planning council has already predicted an increase of over $10 million in costs on the welfare rolls, what steps will the minister take to discharge her responsibilities to the residents of Toronto, or is she content to shift the burden on to the municipalities that cannot afford to play the role that rightly belongs to her and her government?

Mrs. McDougall: I would like to remind the hon. member of two things. First, in terms of the social assistance that is provided through municipalities, as he knows, 50 per cent is paid by the federal government. It is not in our interest, nor would we want to increase those numbers.

Second, I ran for public office in the city of Toronto because of the state the economy was driven to by the party that he represents when people in Toronto were forced to sell their houses, when they lost their businesses, when they lost their jobs—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I have with me today an economic analysis by the Tourism Industry Association of Canada regarding the impact of the proposed goods and services tax.

The analysis states that under the proposed goods and services tax, tourism is slated to lose $1.2 billion a year and at least 30,000 Canadian jobs. Another analysis by the Tourism Research Institute of Canada states that under stage two the GST will lower employment in the service sector by 48,000 jobs. A third report by the hotel industry of British Columbia indicates a deterioration in the travel deficit by about $348 million.

My question to the Minister of Finance is in relation to the evidence in front of him. How can the minister say that these tax measures are good for Canada when at least—I say at least— 30,000 tourism jobs are on the line and there will be an economic loss in tourism activity of over $2 billion?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, I regret to say, has got his figures wrong. The report that he is quoting states that the phenomenal rate of growth of tourism in this country will level off somewhat briefly but it will continue. Therefore, the job losses that he is suggesting are totally fictional.

The second thing is that western Canada above all is experiencing an absolute boom in tourism in Alberta, British Columbia and the prairies. Through the operation of the GST we are now going to be giving input tax credits, something the industry has never had before. They pay the 13.5 per cent, do not get a tax credit back for it, so the costs of doing business will go down. Plus, we are bring 4,000 travel agents from all over Europe to see western Canada in about three month's time.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, the minister has in fact confirmed that the jobs that could have been produced without the GST will not be produced with the GST. He has in fact confirmed that Canada's $2 billion a year travel deficit will now increase by another $348 million a year.

An Hon. Member: Question?

Mr. MacWilliam: Sorry, my question to the minister— Mr. Speaker, I was wrapped up in my statement.

Mr. Speaker: So was I. The hon. member will put his question.

Mr. MacWilliam: Thank you for the latitude, Mr. Speaker, I was so involved in the statement that I forgot the question.

My question to the minister is, does he not recognize that in fact that $348 million additional loss in Canada's trade deficit is going to increase the over-all trade deficit that Canada now experiences of some $2 billion a year?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, no, I will not agree with that. I will tell the hon. member that when he asks a question again to make sure that he reads the conference report very carefully, and that he make sure he reads the amendments to the original report that have been done giving the exemptions we have put in place.

We are exempting foreign tourists from the GST on accommodation and on products that they buy. We are the only country with a GST that will exempt accommodation.

FOREIGN AID

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, although we on this side of the House are very pleased that Mrs. Aquino leaves this country with a firm commitment from the Canadian Government for assistance totalling $125 million and also that she found the time to lay a wreath at the Cenotaph, we wonder, now that we are getting ready to welcome Mr. Lech Walesa to Ottawa, whether the government is prepared to do as much for Poland as it did for the Philippines, considering that so far, countries like Germany and France have been far more generous to Poland than the Canadian Goverment has been.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has co-operated with other countries, thereby showing a profound interest in the changes that are taking place in Poland and also in Hungary. We want to make a substantial contribution to these reforms and do so financially, but also by offering Canadian aid and expertise, in order to promote development in that part of the world. We are considering other ways in which Canada could continue to play an important part in Poland's growing reforms. Here in Canada, we have a number of Canadian citizens of Polish origin who are in a very good position to establish close links between Canada and Poland. This is a very important moment in our history.

[English]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the minister that obviously words are important but actions are even more important.

Does the minister realize that indeed Poland needs food and more money now. Will the government ensure that food will reach Poland in time for Christmas? Will the government revisit the very modest offer to Poland of a possible $20 million revolving credit to be negotiated within a very strict time frame and contingent upon an agreement with the International Monetary Fund?

• (1450)

Can we do better, and will we do better?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I suppose one of the realities of the parliamentary system is that any action the government takes will be described as too modest by the opposition. Even allowing that, there is no question that the needs of Poland, and indeed of Hungary, are very great. Canada participated very actively in the discussions flowing from the meeting with the Group of 7 in Paris. We have made an announcement of some of the aid that will be available from Canada, both financial aid and aid in expertise in other ways, and the question of rescheduling, as my colleague indicates.

The question is whether we are prepared to consider, along with the rest of the world, doing more. The answer of course is yes. We are prepared to consider that. We will be ensuring that the activities that Canada takes will be in conjunction with other countries interested in encouraging solid, permanent reforms in Poland.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICES

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Employees of Correctional Service Canada have been on strike since October 30. I may add that they have had no wage increases since the end of 1986 and that their collective agreement expired in December 1987.

Mr. Speaker, this strike threatens the safety of employees who work in detention centres as well as the safety of inmates and the safety of the public, and it is particularly disturbing for Canadians and Members of this House who have detention centres in their ridings.

This morning, Mr. Speaker, we heard that the parties had resumed negotiations. Could the President of the Treasury Board inform the House today about what he intends to do to keep the parties at the negotiating table so that a settlement can be reached as soon as possible?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as I said last Friday in the House, the government has always been willing to return to the negotiating table. In fact, following discussions we had with the unions, an agreement was reached to return to the table as of 2 p.m. today.

Mr. Speaker, I think concrete offers may be discussed at the negotiating table, and without wishing to prejudge events, I may say we are confident that the dispute, which has been going on for more than 10 days, will be setttled in a matter of hours.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I would like to ask the minister about one tragic aspect of VIA Rail's cut-backs, the impact on Canada's disabled community.

The minister knows full well that many disabled Canadians have no other form of transportation. Buses are inaccessible, air travel is too expensive. I am sure that members opposite know about that. In the face of this, the minister lays off key personnel and cuts back services and routes.

Is this the response that the minister has to the transportation difficulties faced by Canada's disabled community?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my colleague should know that we continue to provide services across the country, from Vancouver to Halifax. VIA Rail services will be provided, particularly in the corridor, with frequency where there are the most disabled people, and will be as accessible as in the past.

At the same time, the Department of Transport with the bus industry is investigating new buses and bus services which will also provide to the handicapped people facilities that they did not have in the past.

I understand that in the routes which have been cut, it will perhaps be more difficult, but I also know that the handicapped people understand that the finances of this country have to be managed and they agree with what the government has done with VIA Rail cuts.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, I must question the sincerity of the minister. More than a year after Parliament—

Mr. Speaker: I know the hon. member probably did not mean what he said, but one does not here question the sincerity of other hon. members. I know he will want to put his question.

Some Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw. But the facts remain, unfortunately, for the minister.

The disabled get nothing but inaction from this government. More than a year after Parliament amended the National Transportation Act to enhance accessibility of federally regulated transportation to the disabled, the National Transportation Agency has still not acted to put these amendments into effect.

Why has the minister not urged the National Transportation Agency to act on this legislation, or did the minister intentionally remain silent so as to give VIA Rail false grounds to cut personnel service for disabled Canadians?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I hope that my friend knows that the National Transportation Agency is a body independent of the minister. They can make the decision and they can apply their decision. Perhaps it was a fact when the hon. member's party was in in power, but it is not a fact on this side of the House to overrule what is done by the National Transportation Agency.

I want to say very sincerely to my friend that I was Secretary of State for two years and today it is true that with the present Secretary of State, disabled people have never been as well served as they are today.

EXTERNAL AID

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since so many people are now leaving East Germany to find a new home in West Germany, could the Minister inform the House whether the Government will offer assistance to the West German Government, and if so, how does he intend to proceed?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I just received a request for assistance from the government of the Federal Republic of Germany, asking Canada to provide temporary residence in this country for refugees who have just left the Democratic Republic of Germany. We indicated in our reply that we were willing to help.

[English]

I received a request yesterday from the West German government asking if on our military bases in West Germany there might be barracks or other space available to provide temporary housing to aid the West German government in responding to the flow of refugees from East Germany.

After consultation with my colleague, the Minister of National Defence and our commanding officers in Germany, we have replied today, the day after the request, indicating that Canada is prepared to co-operate, prepared to make barracks space and other help available to help the West German government accommodate the refugees from East Germany.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the Prime Minister. Let me begin, first of all, by thanking the Prime Minister, the leader of my party and the Leader of the Official Opposition for the very excellent manner in which they have defended Meech Lake. I want to thank them very much.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is why is it then that only the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Transport, along with his colleagues from Quebec, have tried to broaden the understanding of the accord? When will the rest of the cabinet fan out across the country dialoguing with Canadians to inform them that the accord is a good deal for Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the hon. member has tarnished what was a very excellent introductory remark, which I associate myself with, with the unfortunate interpretation which I think is totally inaccurate and totally wrong.

In fact, all ministers of the Crown have been speaking out in support of Meech Lake. If the hon. member has not heard any of the excellent speeches, I would invite him to read the speech made by the Associate Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who made a very excellent speech on the issue of Meech Lake and about Canada. If you want to read a very thought-provoking speech about her image of Canada, I would invite the hon. member to take a look at it and that will give him some idea of how we feel about Meech Lake.

• (1500)

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same Minister and I want to tell him that one swallow does not a summer make. I would ask the Deputy Minister to tell us when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will make an impassioned plea for the accord in Manitoba, to the Minister of National Defence in Saskatchewan, to the Deputy Prime Minister in Alberta, and to the Ministers of Fisheries and Forestry in British Columbia?

Mr. Mazankowski Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member mentioned the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, because both he and other cabinet colleagues from Manitoba and all caucus members from Manitoba, at least from this party, made very strong representations at the Meech Lake hearings that were conducted in the province of Manitoba. The only people who were conspicuous by their absence were the members of the New Democratic Party. Where were they?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Atlantic Canadians live in daily fear that declining fish quotas will mean the closure of fish plants and the loss of thousands of jobs for fishermen and fish plant workers. This fear is compounded by the Government's acceptance of the free trade panel ruling allowing American processors access to west coast salmon and herring.

Before accepting this panel ruling, has the Minister obtained a legal analysis from his officials assuring that this ruling cannot be used as a precedent by U.S. processors to obtain similar access to our east coast fish stocks? If so, will he undertake to make this information available to the House?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that the panel was struck to inquire into landing regulations which this Government introduced in order to better manage and conserve our west coast salmon and herring stock. As I indicated in this House yesterday, the panel findings upheld Canada's sole jurisdiction in determining management requirements to conserve our west coast salmon and herring stocks. I will expect in time, if that question ever arose, a similar interpretation would be placed on its application with regard to all of Canada's fisheries.

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of Fisheries seriously expect Atlantic Canadians to believe that American processors in need of scarce raw product will not use this ruling to obtain access to our east coast fish stock under the FTA? Now that his Government has capitulated to the U.S. and accepted this ruling on the west coast, does he actually believe that he will be able to resist pressures on the east coast?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, the answer, of course, is yes. We believe that the measures we are taking with regard to our trading relations with other countries, particularly the United States in this case, will guarantee the future security of the Atlantic fishing industry, in fact all of Canada's fishing industry, because our fishing industry is an export-dependent industry. We must therefore play by the fair rules of trade and ensure our own fishermen maximum dollar for their resource by allowing them to trade and to export in a free trade arrangement with the United States.

Mr. Speaker: A single question from the hon. member for Edmonton East, and a single question from the hon. member for Wild Rose. That will conclude Question Period.

CARBON DIOXIDE EMISSIONS

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Yesterday in The Netherlands, Canada joined most other industrialized countries in agreeing to stabilize carbon dioxide emissions by the year 2000, even though the Environment Minister is quoted as saying: "We would like to have signed something a little stronger". Also yesterday, the Minister of Energy introduced two bills to approve federal government participation in Hibernia and OSLO, two projects which will produce another 20 to 35 million tonnes a year of carbon dioxide emissions. Will the government establish new programs, such as increased support for fuel ethanol and conservation measures, that would reduce CO_2 emissions by an amount equal to the 20 to 35 megatons a year by which Hibernia and OSLO will increase CO_2 emissions?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is right when he quotes the Minister of the Environment as saying that Canada would like to have seen something a little more substantial coming out of the conference in The Netherlands, but Canada's position will remain such that we will keep pressing both at the international and at the national level, in the various responsibilities that we have, to address the question of CO_2.

On the question of OSLO and Hibernia, I find it interesting what the hon. member has asked because these bills were tabled yesterday and received first reading. The NDP is opposed to OSLO.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Wrong. Absolutely wrong.

Mr. Epp: New Democrats are opposed to OSLO on the basis that it is going to create the difficulties the member mentioned in his question. They are opposed to having energy self-sufficiency. They are opposed to development in Alberta. They are opposed to Hibernia. I guess they want the unemployment in Newfoundland. They do not want the industrial benefits in Newfoundland. I am simply saying, you want all the benefits but you do not want to take any of the responsibility.

TOURISM INDUSTRY

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, a significant number of my constituents involved in the tourist industry are concerned about recent actions affecting their industry, namely environmental restrictions in national parks, cuts to VIA Rail, and the effects of the proposed GST on their highly concentrated service sector industry.

My question is for the Hon. Minister of Finance. Will the minister commission a study which will determine the long-term effects that the GST will have on the tourist industry, especially in western Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to answer my hon. friend's question. First, tourism is probably the most environmentally friendly industry in the country, and sustainable development is usually enhanced by tourism more than by any other industry.

Second, in terms of VIA Rail, we are maintaining the high volume routes in western Canada, and we are also opening an opportunity which was not there before for the private sector to move in to providing passenger rail service for tourists in the future.

In terms of a study, we have had the Conference Board study. We are going to be doing a price-value study. We are also doing a major study of the U.S. market. What it is showing us is that tourism in Alberta, British Columbia in particular, and the west is growing by leaps and bounds and will continue to do so.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Deputy Prime Minister on a point of order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TWENTY-FOURTH ANNIVERSARY OF ELECTION

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It has been drawn to my attention that there are four hon. members who are today celebrating their twenty-fourth anniversary of their election to this great institution, the House of Commons of Canada. They are the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, the hon. member for Victoria—Haliburton and of course our own hon. member for Annapolis Valley-Hants, who I know we all agree has added a lot of colour and zest to this institution.

Twenty-four years of service as the people's representative in this place is indeed something to celebrate. Their long-standing service is indeed a tribute to the excellent representation which they have provided to their constituents. Having gone through eight elections, it clearly is a demonstration that they have the confidence of the people whom they represent. I am sure I can speak for all members, I know I speak for the members of our party, when I say that all four hon. members are held in very high regard. They have contributed significantly to this institution. They have debated vigorously. They have defended their interests and the things that they believe in. But most of all, they have defended the interests of their constituents, and that is obviously why they have been sent here to represent their people on eight consecutive occasions.

On behalf of my colleagues in government and the members of the Progressive Conservative Party, I want to extend our sincerest and heartiest congratulations to all four members. It is our hope and our wish that they will continue to be with us for many, many more years and contribute in the excellent way they have in the past.

• (1510)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Official Opposition I am pleased to join in the tribute being paid today to four hon. members of this House who are celebrating the twenty-fourth anniversary of their first election to the House of Commons.

It is an honour to serve in the House of Commons even for a very limited period, but it is a signal honour to have served as long as the hon. members about whom we are talking way that they have served their constituents, it is a tribute to them for the way they have worked in this House. Their service has obviously been well recognized by their constituents and the applause today indicates how they are held in high regard by members on all sides of this House of Commons.

I am delighted on my own behalf and on behalf of all the members of the Official Opposition to pay tribute to four members of this House who are today celebrating a very important anniversary.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party I rise to join with my colleagues in congratulating the senior members of the House who are continuing to serve their constituents well. I want to say on behalf of my colleagues who have worked with the four members in the past in this Chamber or in committee, we have always respected their hard work and the contribution they have made on behalf of their constituents.

I think it is the case that no matter what the party tendency for votes might be in a particular constituency, for a man or a woman to serve for this period of time in the House of Commons must mean that he or she has brought a particular contribution to that constituency or the member simply would not have been re-elected so many times. I say that as a New Democrat.

As an individual to my two Liberal and Conservative colleagues, let me congratulate them on their past work.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I wish them well in the years ahead, but I hope all four will be defeated by a New Democrat in the next election.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for giving me this moment. Prime Minister for his very kind remarks today, as well as the House Leader of the Official Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I can say that it was my absolute desire to be a member of this House from the age of 14 years on and I am very, very grateful to the people in the Ottawa Valley riding of Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke who have given me the opportunity to fulfil that desire.

There is more to it than the work in debates and so on that goes on around here. There are some very fine friendships formed. I want to say that I have made some tremendous friendships across the floor of this House, as have my other three colleagues, and we have seen some very fine people come and go from this place. As members of Parliament are raked over the coals from time to time, and almost daily, I suppose, we know among ourselves that there are some very fine people who go through this place and they are here for very dedicated reasons.

I recall very well, 24 years ago today, when I started out to visit all the polls early in the morning. The sun was shining, it was a great fall day, and by three o'clock in the afternoon I had my car in the garage putting on snow tires. Seriously, I simply want to say that there is no challenge and no amount of dedication that is too great on the part of any member of this House. It is our determination and sincerity collectively that we must work toward all good causes, for the future of Canada and on behalf of all Canadians. The more that we recall individually and collectively that we are here to support, promote and assist the people of this nation, the greater this institution will be recognized from coast to coast and from north to south in this country.

I want to thank those people who have been very good friends of all of us in this House. I particularly want to congratulate the hon. member for Victoria—Haliburton who represents the riding in which I was born and who represented my father and mother and my family personally over the years.

The hon. member for Annapolis Valley–Hants has been a very distinguished member of this House and has represented his people well. It has been a great privilege to have known him and to associate with him. Of course, the hon. member for Notre–Dame de–Grâce is a very dedicated and hard working person in this House.

Among all these very dedicated people and highly respected members of this House there is no–one greater than the present Speaker of this House of Commons, and I thank you for that.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. W. C. Scott (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to share the sentiments that have been expressed by my colleague. I have enjoyed this place immensely and the friendships that have been created here over the years.

Television was not here when we first arrived. I know that some people watching at home probably wonder what kind of a zoo we were really running here.

But I want to say that when we get behind the curtains and think about the great country we have, and how we are doing something to improve life and the quality of life we have here, of which a great many people throughout the world are very envious, it makes you think it is a pretty sane place here.

It is certainly a pleasure to be here. I represent a riding in the heart of Ontario—I call it the core of Ontario—which the hon. member for Renfrew briefly described a moment ago.

We have a great place to live, we have a great country to be proud of. I wish you all the very best. We will all work for the good of our country, a country that is the envy of the world.

As we pass legislation in this place with this bickering and carrying on, I know it is very, very hard for people watching to understand. But what makes it all great is the spirit and understanding we have here as we work together. It is a pleasure to join with my friends today on this very special occasion. I am proud to be a member of the House of Commons and I am proud of our country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I was awfully glad that my good friend the Deputy Prime Minister stood because I did not know who was going to stand to recognize us here. We had on these little boutonnieres, and I am not a great flower man. I was really very glad the Deputy Prime Minister did catch your eye, Mr. Speaker, to recognize my colleagues in the House who were elected on November 8, 1965. I am not going to make a long speech but my mommy told me years ago to be prepared. I knew that something might happen today once I got the flower in my lapel. I received an ode from my best supporter and I think the other three members will share some of the thoughts that came through the fax machine today.

My good colleague, the member for Victoria—Haliburton, mentioned the humanity shown here, and I know this seems trite perhaps for the outside world and even some members, but this used to be a much more human place before we all got too busy with so many things, with computers and fax machines. I am wearing the boutonniere because I knew the date was coming, but it was yesterday when my friend from Renfrew slipped behind the curtain and said, "Pat, tomorrow is a little anniversary". He gave me a great big boutonniere that I still have here in my desk. I had almost forgotten about it, but the hon. member confessed, in the humility that sometimes overcomes this place, that: "I am going to wear a red ribbon tomorrow but for you I have a pale blue one. I could not get royal blue but at least it is blue". I notice my friend is wearing the same thing. I obviously want to thank the people in my riding. Nova Scotia, Ontario, and Quebec are represented by the four being honoured here today. It has been a fantastic experience. I really do not know if the time goes more quickly if you are in opposition or if you are in government. Different ratios apply.

This morning over the fax I got something I would like to read. Having thanked my riding in public and all the people who sent me here, I also thank my great friend, the Hon. Member from Oshawa who is a cigar smoker, in spite of one of his colleagues. I am still a cigar smoker in spite of some edicts from the Chair. I have to watch where I do it now. But here is what came through the fax. It is called an ode:

> A score and four years ago was a very important date cos there was an election on November 8. Through these 24 years there's still fire in the belly even though some constituents quiver as a bowl of jelly
> Many issues have caught your attention, only a few will we mention: Greenwood and VIA, Scott's Bay and Meech, Doug Small and legions, and Harbourville Beach
> Leadership contests, and presidential ones too, French immersion and committees. Is there anything you wouldn't try to do? Through tears and laughter, fun and some pain, I'm sure we'd do it all over again
> But for this moment in time in our great nation, I send you love and my congratulations on 24 years of work and fun. Lookout world, he's just begun

Mr. Speaker and colleagues, I want to thank you for everything.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have both the honour and the duty to present a petition which contains hundreds of names from constituents of mine in the federal riding of Brant who decry the cutbacks of VIA Rail. The petition states, we the undersigned call upon the government to live up to its original pledge to support VIA Rail and to abandon plans for further cuts to VIA's budget, and to provide the necessary resources to allow VIA Rail to operate as a modern effective transportation company rather than as a museum.

EXTRADITION

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, it was in July, 1985, that Charles Ng, wanted to stand trial for 13 brutal murders in the United States, entered our country, was before our courts and is in our institutions now. We have learned recently that his lawyer is appealing the extradition signing of the justice minister and we are about to see another line of appeals before our appeal system federally, including the Supreme Court of Canada.

These 899 petitioners are urging the Canadian government to streamline its extradition laws so that Canada does not become a haven to escape American justice for these wanted convicts from the United States. This brings the total to 92,746 such petitions entered into the House of Commons from Canadians coast to coast.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and responsibility to table petitions signed by hundreds of citizens in the Sudbury basin, such places as North Bay, Chelmsford, Blezard Valley, Val-Thérèse, St. Charles, Copper Cliff, Azilda, Lively, Naughton, Whitefish, Falconbridge, Skead, Sturgeon Falls, Dowling, Coniston, Markstay, Sudbury, Garson, Capreol, Val Caron, Hanmer and Wanapitei.

• (1530)

These hundreds of citizens who have signed these petitions point out that the government's proposed goods and services tax is a regressive tax. They reject it on the basis of regressivity.

The petitioners therefore call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax. They also ask Parliament to ensure that if and when there is broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax it not be the opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege today to table 68 petitions which have been certified correct by the clerk.

These 68 petitions contain the signatures of 1,443 residents from Thunder Bay, Nipigon, Kakabeka Falls, Dorion, Red Rock and other small communities in northern Ontario. The petitioners want to impress upon this House their strong opposition to the government's proposed goods and services tax.

The increased burden of taxation placed on the middle income people of this country is just so repressive and so domineering that they need some assistance, and they ask this House for its help.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, this is a duly certified petition that I am honoured to present to the House on behalf of individuals living in Hamilton, Toronto, Woodbridge, and other regions around metro Toronto who wish to express their strong and deeply felt opposition to the proposed general sales tax.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a certified presentation signed by residents of the community of Arviat in my constituency. These citizens of the Keewatin region of the Northwest Territories call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax which will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle income groups.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of several hundred petitioners from Prince Edward Island to present three petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36, asking this Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax in the name of all Canadians.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I also have a number of signed petitions which are against the goods and services tax. These are in addition to the 30,000 cards that I gave to the Minister of the Finance last week.

These people are from the communities of Brandon, Oxford House, Leaf Rapids, Deloraine, Ilford, Yorkton, Saskatchewan, Pickertonei, Dauphin, Winnipeg, Lac Brochel, Moose Lake, Wekusko, Nelson House, Lac du Bonnet, Gillam, Cranberry Portage, The Pas, Bird, Wabowden, Flin Flon, Split Lake, Thompson, South Indian Lake, Tadoule Lake, Sundance, Pukatwagan, Denare Beach, Saskatchewan, Hudson Bay, Saskatchewan, Cross Lake, Easterville, Sherridon, Wanless, Waterhen, Bissett, Snow Lake, Creighton, Saskatchewan, Thornhill and Winkler.

Just to prove how unpopular it is there are also people from Nashville, Tennessee, U.S.A. who reject the government's proposal.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty to table today 15 more petitions that object strongly to the government's proposal to impose on Canadians a new goods and services tax.

I have never been witness to such a display of discontent with a government proposal on the part of the people of my riding.

These petitions state that the Conservative government has imposed upon Canadian taxpayers at least 31 new taxes or tax increases since taking power in 1984. At the present the federal manufacturers' sales tax has already been increased by this same government from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent. The Conservative federal government wants to impose on Canadians a new general 9 per cent tax on goods and services, which will be hidden from Canadians and will be applied to virtually everything they buy.

The imposition of this new general goods and services tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to lower and middle income Canadians. The imposition of this tax will create an onerous burden on small business. This proposal will hit Canadians with higher taxes, higher inflation, higher interest rates, and higher unemployment.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax of the Tories.

[Translation]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present to the House ten petitions signed by residents of my riding of York West in Toronto.

[English]

As my colleagues from all parts of the House would confirm, these are petitions coming from average Canadians on real streets, living in real neighbourhoods, in all parts of the country including my riding of York West.

They are petitioning against yet another new tax. Since 1984, this is the thirtieth change or new imposed tax. The goods and services tax is definitely the most regressive tax hitting not only average Canadian families but also Canadian small businesses.

Mr. Speaker: I urge hon. members to present their petitions, and I think everybody understands the rules.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I would like to present these petitions and request that the goods and services tax be flatly rejected. It will be by this side of the House.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present petitions from the cities of Hamilton, Thunder Bay and St. Catharines, Ontario, with 1,453 signatures.

The petitioners are united in their abhorrence of the taking of precious human life through abortion and believe in the rights of all unborn children. They call upon Parliament to pass legislation that will protect life from conception.

I fully support them in their endeavour to protect future generations of Canadians.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present the following petitions which have been certified by the clerk of petitions.

The first group of 26 petitions contains the signatures of 768 residents of Sarnia, Ontario. In fact, the people of Sarnia, Ontario think this is such an important tax to oppose that they themselves have come here. There are two representatives from Sarnia in the House watching these petitions being presented on their behalf. I commend them for showing such an interest in opposition to the government.

The second group of 12 petitions contain the signatures of 201 residents of Edmonton, Calgary, Vancouver, Saskatoon, Princeton, British Columbia and of Collingwood, Stratford and Toronto, Ontario. These citizens humbly call upon the government to withdraw its proposal for a regressive and inflationary goods and services tax.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and privilege to present to this House, pursuant to Standing Order 36, petitions certified correct as to both form and content from residents of Eglinton—Lawrence and other ridings in the area of greater metropolitan Toronto.

They call upon this government and this Parliament to fight vigorously for the withdrawal of the proposed goods and services tax which they see as the most regressive form of taxation addressing itself in a particularly pernicious fashion to the aged, the young, and the unemployed.

To those I will add another additional 800 stubs sent in by clients of McDonald's on Avenue Road and on Yonge Street. They are clearly directed to the Minister of Finance and I can tell you as much because of the refinement of the language.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, again I rise as spokesman for 1,196 people who signed three certified petitions from residents of the riding of Hull—Aylmer who call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax proposed by the Conservative government, a tax which is complicated and unfair to all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, it is a special pleasure for me to be able to present a petition signed by over 2,000 Calgarians humbly praying that Parliament may be pleased to reject the GST.

The reason this is such a special pleasure for me is that all these signatures were collected by one woman, a Ms. Heidemarie Meding, a single mother and student in Calgary. She collected them during the summer and early fall and gave them to me at the anti-GST rally held in Edmonton on the evening of Monday, October 2, a rally I am certain everyone in this House is familiar with.

My congratulations to Ms. Meding, and here are the names.

Mr. Speaker: We are certainly familiar with it now, but I would ask hon. members to stay within the rule.

• (1540)

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I too have the honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36, which has been certified correct as to form and content.

The petitioners state that a tax on goods and services is an aggressive tax that hits low and middle income earners the hardest. Canadians are already overtaxed and a further tax burden could adversely affect the economy.

Therefore, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to abolish plans to implement the 9 per cent tax on goods and services.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure and the honour to present petitions on behalf of hundreds of my constituents.

These petitions have been certified correct as to form and content and relate to the GST. I will not go through the litany of complaints against the GST because Your Honour has already heard the complaints from other petitions presented in the House this afternoon.

The petitioners believe that the GST is very, very bad legislation and is not in the interest of this country. They ask this House to reject the tax.

OPPOSITION TO BILL 178

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty, responsibility and pleasure to present another petition. It too has been certified correct as to content and form.

This petition relates to national unity. The petitioners are concerned not only about national unity but minority rights in Canada. They are concerned about the future of Canada. They are particularly concerned about the effects of legislation in the province of Quebec known as Bill 178, which they believe is contrary to the provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedom.

The petitioners believe sincerely that this bill is a mistake and is not in the best interests of this country which we all love so much.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition under Standing Order 36 on behalf of residents of Burns Lake, Francis Lake, Grand Isle, Whitehorse, Kelowna, Vancouver, Fort St. John, Kamloops, Fruitvale, Trail, Osoyoos, Rock Creek, Castlegar, and the list goes on and on.

The petitioners are residents of all sorts of western Canadian communities and point out a whole set of concerns against the goods and services tax. They are asking the Government of Canada to come to its senses and drop the whole matter.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have another petition on another matter, signed by a number of westerners again, asking the government to reconsider its decision to curtail VIA service and suggesting that the government improve and modernize VIA service, particularly because of its environmentally sound way of transporting large numbers of people.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by 35 electors from Kingston and the Islands who object to the government's goods and services tax and call upon Parliament to reject the tax as being unfair and inequitable.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition, duly certified by the clerk.

This petition is from my constituents in Bridge Cove, Red Head Cove and Petrie on Random Island. The petitioners are concerned about Bill C–21 and the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

They are particularly concerned that the Government of Canada is withdrawing its contribution of $2.9 billion to the unemployment insurance fund and leaving the financing to the workers and employers. They are also concerned about some of the other negative effects it will have on them, particularly the job development strategy which essentially will preclude them from building infrastructure in their community to seek employment.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to propose more meaningful reforms and in particular to call upon the government to come up with an effective regional development policy.

OPPOSITION TO BILL 178

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and responsibility to present two petitions signed in the main by residents of the Gabriola Island and Nanaimo in my riding. This petition is presented under Standing Order 36 and has been certified proper.

The petitioners state that the Constitution of Canada, pursuant to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, guarantees to all Canadians the right to freedom of expression.

Whereas the government of the province of Quebec has abridged that right by enacting legislation, Bill 178, restricting the right to freedom of expression in the English language, the petitioners pray that this Parliament pass a resolution of the House of Commons urging the Governor General in Council to give full force and effect to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms by the exercise of its constitutional power of disallowance with respect to Bill 178 of the province of Quebec.

VIA RAIL

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I have two other petitions signed by Duncan area residents. In this case the petitioners are calling upon the government to live up to its original pledge to support VIA Rail, to abandon plans for further cuts to VIA's budget, and to provide the necessary resources to allow VIA to operate as a "modern, effective transportation company rather than a museum".

OLD AGE SECURITY

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I also have the pleasure to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from my constituency. The residents are from the royal city of New Westminster in British Columbia. The petitioners are concerned about the pay back of old age security benefits. They feel that this is an attack on universality, and a betrayal of commitments made by the government to seniors in Canada. They suggest that all high income Canadians should pay their fair share of taxes.

The petitioners call upon this Parliament to reject the government's policy to initiate inequitable and unjust clawback of old age security benefits.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition on behalf of a number of producers from western Canada who are concerned about the removal of oats from the Canadian Wheat Board.

The petitioners are concerned because they do not feel that they were properly consulted prior to this decision by the government, nor did the government consult the Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee or the major farm organizations in western Canada. They are concerned about the future of orderly marketing in this country.

The petitioners call upon the government to place oats and barley under the Wheat Board Act with the same protection that wheat now presently has so that farmers will be protected in future.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and privilege to present 17 petitions containing the names of 505 residents of Stormont—Dundas.

These residents of Cornwall, Long Sault, Morewood, Chrysler, Winchester, Chesterville, South Mountain, Iroquois, Morrisburg, Brinston, Williamsburg, Ingleside, Moose Creek, Avonmore, Berwick, Lunenburg and Williamstown believe that the Conservative government's proposed 9 per cent goods and services tax is totally unacceptable as it will cause serious and unfair hardship for low and middle income Canadians and will create an onerous burden on small businesses.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon this House to reject the proposed 9 per cent goods and services tax.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty and pleasure to present to this House nine petitions signed by over 300 individuals from the riding of Dartmouth who are opposed to the proposed goods and services tax of this government.

The petitioners are opposed to it because it is a hidden tax, one that they say is unfair, will be a major burden on small business and an unprecedented tax grab. They believe it will cause higher inflation, higher interest rates, and higher unemployment.

The petitioners call upon this government to reject this proposed tax.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. P–14 standing in the name of the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley.

FORESTRY AGREEMENTS

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of the federal criteria for new forestry agreements with the provinces.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, the release of these criteria prior to the completion of the federal–provincial agreements will be detrimental to the future conduct of the federal–provincial relations, and for this reason I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I think the appropriate move at this point would be to transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. David Berger (Saint–Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I gave you notice earlier today of my intention to ask leave at this time to move, pursuant to Standing Order 52, the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing an important matter requiring urgent consideration; namely, the Meech Lake Accord.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Members of the Conservative Government and the Prime Minister himself keep repeating that the Meech Lake Accord is identical to the five demands of the Government of Quebec. It is the duty of the House, Mr. Speaker, to remind Canadians that these are two different things and to ask the first ministers to pursue their efforts to meet the demands of the Government of Quebec while respecting the national interest.

[English]

To say that it is Meech Lake or nothing else, take it or leave it, is unacceptable. Canadians want the first ministers to do their duty to the country. The first ministers should know that this House also wants them to do their duty to the country.

[Translation]

Just because a particular proposal has encountered some opposition does not meet the country will end. Indeed, a public opinion poll released today shows that most Canadians and most Quebecers believe that the Meech Lake Accord should be changed. In Quebec, 52 per cent are in favour of amending it, compared to 39 per cent who want it accepted as is.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the first ministers must respect the will of the Canadian people and Members of this House should have the opportunity to debate this urgent matter. Thank you for your consideration, Mr. Speaker.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for giving me advance notice of his request, under the circumstances. I listened carefully to the Hon. Member's request, but I must say that an emergency debate is certainly not appropriate at this time. Of course, this is a very important subject for all Canadians and I thank the Hon. Member for raising it.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, November 7, consideration of motion of Mr. Lewis that Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the last time I spoke in this place on the issue before us, I began by saying that I speak on behalf of those women who have been faced with bearing a child not of their choosing. Today, once again, I rise on behalf of those same women.

Since I first uttered those words we have had no law in this country regarding abortion. In the view of many women including myself the absence of legislation appeared to respect what I believe, that the judgment of women faced with a difficult decision and their capacity to make a better decision than anyone in this chamber on their behalf was respected in that environment.

In my own mind I have always taken it for granted that as a part of the process of a woman making that decision, she would seek the advice and the consultation that she requires with the father of the child and with her family, or she may choose not to seek it but that she would seek medical advice.

Whatever discussions she chose to have or not to have, ultimately it would be her decision. But as time passed it became clear that the situation for women was not more stable in the absence of legislation but indeed the reverse. Some provincial governments took action against the interests of women. The number and intensity of civil actions increased.

In my earlier speech as well, I reminded the House that I am not a minister of God, I am a minister of the Crown, and I continue to take those responsibilities as a minister of the Crown very seriously. In light of this new situation, what is my responsibility as a legislator, along with that of my cabinet colleagues?

We have heard some discussion in this chamber around when life begins. I pointed out then that society and religion over the centuries have had differing views including such things as that the soul enters an unborn baby boy after 40 days and a girl after 80 days, that the soul enters the unborn child at the time of quickening when the woman feels the foetus moving for the first time. We as parliamentarians are not the ones to determine that, and certainly the woman bearing the child is far better qualified after seeking her own religious counsel.

As a legislator my objective in this process was that we provide a stable legislative framework whereby a woman would have entitlement to the medical services she requires when faced with this profound decision. This required first of all an examination of the federal powers in this regard. They are more limited than I would like. Under the Canada Health Act, which at first glance to many of us seemed the most appropriate vehicle, the Government of Canada is not in a position to specify abortion as a required service. My colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has gone into his role and that of the Canada Health Act in some detail, and I will not repeat his arguments. I am sure he would agree that we examined exhaustively this possibility.

Second, if we are to have legislation there will of course be sanctions. What will they be? Many women, including myself, wanted legislation outside the Criminal Code. Once again we had few models. One of them was the Narcotics Act. Even there the sanctions remain criminal sanctions, so where is the advantage to women in that?

Once again, after lengthy discussion our conclusion was that our powers were limited to the Criminal Code. This is not a happy conclusion for me, not by a long way. But what we were able to define was that only the person who induces an abortion outside the law should have sanctions applied. This means that women are protected from the fear of prosecution except under very unusual circumstances and that is an improvement over the former law, albeit a marginal one, for women.

For medical practitioners they are not any more at risk of prosecution than they are under the criminal provisions that guide their behaviour in other aspects of their daily practice. Doctors and others with medical responsibility will in the future, as they have in the past, apply high standards of medical ethics to the role that they are called upon to play.

The thrust of this legislation then is to define abortion as a medical act. Based on a definition of health and wellness, it entitles women to abortion under a wide variety of circumstances. In my view this will assist in providing the stable legislative and societal framework which I was seeking.

Sadly, as a federal government we cannot guarantee access, something that women have been asking us to do. What we have done is ensure, to the extent possible, that provinces take their responsibility in this issue seriously and that they live up to their jurisdictional responsibilities in that regard. For women, this may mean that they must continue to press for the right to choice in other venues. I know that they will do that and I support their efforts.

Let me say to them, as I have had to conclude myself, that we do not live in a country where the public supports a woman's capacity to choose totally without some societal rules. That is certainly true of this chamber. It is also true of the wider nation. I reach this conclusion based on many, many telephone calls and letters and personal conversations over these past months. Out of all those opinions put forward, and there were many variations I would grant, if there was a consensus at all it was that this is a matter for a woman and her doctor.

I would remind the House that when the last motion on this issue was before the Chamber, a few people, including myself, supported an amendment—in fact it was the amendment that I was speaking to at that time—that says that such legislation should prohibit the performance of an abortion except when performed by a qualified medical practitioner.

I would also remind the House that essentially this is what we are being asked to support with this bill with more clarity and therefore, the stability that I seek. Some day perhaps, in a more perfect world, public attitudes and the vehicles through which we must act will respect the sensitivity and judgment of women as I do. That day is not today. I therefore support this bill and participated, as others did, in its authorship. We all approached this with respect and sensitivity.

I would urge those members of this Chamber who want to provide the framework for women, in the world as it is and not in the world as we would like it to be, to find it in their hearts to support this motion. We all in this Chamber hold our principles very high. We are here as parliamentarians to stand up for what we believe, but also to seek consensus and to respect the common will. I know that on an issue of this importance members will seek to do so in a spirit of sensitivity and goodwill.

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate how difficult this issue is for the minister. I also appreciate that she spoke almost two years ago in the House. I had the opportunity to go back and read her speech very carefully and I was quite moved by it.

I listened very carefully to what the minister who is responsible for the status of women had to say today. I am pleased that she is here and that she is prepared to take part in the debate.

The minister mentioned that this new criminal legislation will provide a stable legal framework for the women of Canada. My contention is that there is no need for criminal legislation in this area. I do not understand how this is an improvement for women over the situation that we have right now where there is no legislation and, in particular, no criminal legislation. So I ask how this would create a more stable situation than the one that we have right now.

I also listened very carefully when the minister spoke about access. We both recognize that access is a problem and she contends that the problem is with provincial jurisdictions. She has urged women to work in other venues, I think was the way she put it. I know that they will work in those other venues but I think that they will continue to work for access in this venue. There is a variety of legal opinions about the Canada Health Act and the ability of the government to provide for access under the act. Some very prominent lawyers feel that that is, of course, available to the federal government.

I ask in particular for her comments about a stable legal framework and how that is an improvement over the situation now without any criminal legislation.

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, I think that what we have in the present situation where we have an absence of legislation, and I have certainly thought about this very carefully, is that with an absence of legislation, with abortion not defined as a medical act, there is more reason for other jurisdictions to say that it does not fall under their jurisdiction to provide a service. I think providing entitlement, as we have, and pronouncing it in the national interest and as the will of Parliament as a medical act gives comfort to women as they seek that access through other jurisdictions. As I have said, I would certainly support them in doing that.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I too rise to thank the minister for taking part in this debate. Further to the comments of the hon. member from New Westminster—Burnaby, now that we have some jurisprudence established as a result of the Chantal Daigle case, and guidelines that would limit court challenges, how does she view us not being faced with many tests in the future, based on the new legislation, which will again drag women through the courts on this issue?

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, in the past there have been civil actions, both under the old Criminal Code provisions and also in a world in which there was not legislation. We are here to legislate, that is our job as parliamentarians. In fact, we were essentially directed by the court to legislate. Legislation that has the will of Parliament behind it will provide a more stable framework. That stability does come from the two venues that I talked about; first of all, the entitlement that therefore should lead to a position in the provinces whereby access can be provided with the backing of Parliament and, second, although I recognize that there will be civil suits, no doubt, again I think that they will be lessened in an atmosphere when Parliament has spoken as well as the courts.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. minister for her response, although I may not share her view. I would like to ask two questions. One, how will that help the women of Prince Edward Island? Second, yesterday I had the opportunity to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question with regard to federal government "interference" in the provinces on the question of access. I asked him if the government would not consider intervention if a whole province refused, for example, to undertake open heart surgery, heart surgery or cancer treatment. The federal government would have something to say under the Health Act. The minister did not choose to answer my specific question. I wonder if this minister could possibly answer.

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, I would not, in any way, try to interfere with the prerogatives of my colleague under the Canada Health Act. I do believe that with the kind of legislation that we are presenting today it will be more difficult for a province, within its own jurisdiction, to justify to the women of that province that it is not prepared to provide access.

Throughout the country now we do see people seeking medical services in other provinces for particular reasons because of the kind of expertise that builds up in particular areas. So, I think that it would be very rare for the Minister of National Health and Welfare to suggest that every province has to provide every medical service to the ultimate of its sophistication. Our job is to ensure that under the Canada Health Act, we have a universal and accessible system with the principles as outlined in the act.

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I have a question. As I read the legislation, it appears to place the onus of responsibility on the doctor. There has been a great deal of concern expressed to me since the legislation was introduced last Friday that under certain circumstances many doctors may feel extremely reluctant to perform that kind of operation on a woman in case of litigation. A young woman may go and see a doctor who happens to hold a pro-life position and the doctor will refuse to perform that operation. That young woman may then go to another doctor who may feel, under another set of circumstances, that such an operation is indeed justified. What happens to that second doctor under these circumstances? Would that not lead to other litigation in the courts and the Chantal Daigle case all over again?

• (1610)

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, I think that that is reaching very hard into the kinds of behaviour that people show. That is why I said in my statement that both women and medical practitioners must exercise their judgment in this case. No one can force a doctor or anyone else to perform an operation that that doctor does not want to perform. That will not change under this legislation. It did not change when there was no law. So if a woman seeks to exercise her choice under the bill that we have presented, then medical practice, which has standards from its own association regarding the performance of any kind of surgery will be there to support the doctor that the woman seeks out.

I would also say that this is not new either. The medical association has established standards of practice. This will give it the legislative framework which essentially supports standards of practice and we have to rely on behaviour and judgment.

I come to this House saying that women have judgment. I believe that doctors have judgment and that they have the capacity and the ability to choose. I have always argued that those are the important reasons to give women choice. I have not altered my opinion. I think that within the legislation we have provided they will be able to do that better than they can without a law.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before I get into the substance of the matter, I have to say at the outset that this government has been totally negligent in waiting so long to bring forth this legislation. It has been nearly two years since the Supreme Court of Canada declared the previous law unconstitutional. Since then we have had nothing but procrastination and delay. This government has dilly-dallied, refusing to face up to its responsibilities and, of course, allowing the type of judicial chaos we had during the summer.

Suddenly the minister is trying to rush it through this House. I want to tell him that we will try to be as constructive as we can, but we do not accept the cavalier attitude that the government has shown towards Parliament in dealing with the issue, nor do I believe the people of Canada appreciate that attitude.

[Translation]

Following the Supreme Court's decision, the Government had promised on many occasions that it would introduce a bill at its earliest convenience, to use the very expression used by Ray Hnatyshyn, the predecessor of the current Minister of Justice, who apparently is in line for the job of next Governor General of Canada. But this Government has produced nothing except, in July 1988, a multiple choice questionnaire which has lead us nowhere.

It has been totally inexcusable for the government to leave this matter on hold for nearly two years. Finally, we have now a bill in a context where all Members can consider the situation very closely.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, we are faced with a very sensitive moral dilemma. It is a dilemma which, on the one hand, has an impact on the life of every individual, and on the other hand, has major social consequences for our country. No woman could decide lightly to have an abortion. A woman could only consider it with a lot of anxiety and suffering as a last recourse solution. There is no one here who would trade places with a woman faced with such a decision. I suggest that for those of us who are not women this situation is just impossible to fanthom. The fact remains that in the real world, thousands of Canadian women must face this decision.

[English]

Analysing the situation, there could be no more difficult issue for those of us elected by our constituents than to respond to this issue on a national basis. It is not the responsibility of the legislatures. I do not believe it is primarily the responsibility of the courts. It is the responsibility of members of Parliament.

Within our society there are two diametrically opposite and opposed views on abortion. I can appreciate completely the strength, honesty, and commitment of the convictions of both the pro-life and pro-choice advocates. One group of Canadians believes fundamentally that it is a question of the sanctity of life, the protection of life. The other group believes, also fundamentally, that it is a question of a woman's control over her own body, it is a question of personal liberty and security of her person.

There is no way that these two views can be reconciled philosophically. There is no way these two opposing views can be reconciled theologically or indeed politically. Speaking frankly, we will never reach a consensus on this issue in the House of Commons or in the country. We can reach only an accommodation at best.

So what is our duty here? How do we approach the matter? It is our duty, as legislators, to attempt to find that uneasy accommodation between those two points of view. As I have indicated, in arriving at a judgment, the Liberal caucus members are free to vote as they see fit. This is not a partisan matter and we will not treat it in a partisan fashion.

In a pluralistic society such as we have in Canada, with a separation of church and state, no official religion, with a wide variety of moral views, with a growing variety of cultural traditions, a wide spectrum of religious upbringing, our responsibility as legislators is somehow to seek the common good. Our duty is to seek the best equilibrium we can between the two polarized and competing views on the subject of abortion, between two irreconcilable views on abortion.

I come to the subject with a strong conviction that my duty, and I believe our duty, is not to impose our own beliefs rigidly on the views of others who may strongly disagree. Each of us has the right to his own moral perspective. Each of us has the right to express that view clearly. Each of us has the right to try to convince others of his point of view. On the other hand, each of us has a duty to listen to the other point of view.

I believe, therefore, that as members of Parliament, as legislators, we have the responsibility not only not to impose our personal views on a final legislative decision in this type of community in which we live but not to allow our own personal views, no matter how deeply held, and no matter on which side of the issue they may be, to be the sole criterion by which we judge this legislation. An equally important standard in our pluralistic community must be to evaluate this legislation as to whether or not it is the best available accommodation in moving toward the common good.

I do not believe that the majority of Canadians would agree that we should prohibit all abortions. I do not believe that that is where the country is. On the other hand, I do not believe that the majority of Canadians would agree that we should not exercise some control over abortions, particularly in the later stages of pregnancy as suggested by the Supreme Court of Canada.

• (1620)

I have read the Supreme Court judgment. I have lived with this issue for 20 years. I am willing to admit that this legislation perhaps does not fully respond to the test I have just outlined as set forth by the Supreme Court. There may be better words to describe what we are trying to achieve. By removing the requirement in the earlier legislation for therapeutic abortion committees in accredited hospitals, which the Supreme Court found to be impediments to a woman's rights, I believe that the proposed legislation is a serious effort to find the accommodation necessary to resolve the issue in Parliament. At the very least, it deserves further scrutiny by the committee. That is why I propose to vote to allow it to proceed to committee.

[Translation]

Because I feel that this Bill should be further examined and discussed in committee. It is not possible here in the House to consider all its details, its implications and all the advice, either legal or medical.

The basic question about this Bill is whether it is likely to be approved by the Supreme Court judges. Is the Bill consistent with the principles of our Charter of Rights? Is it Charterproof, a legal expression which is not easily translated, or do we run the risk of seeing the Supreme Court rule at the very first opportunity that it is unconstitutional, with the instruction to go back to the training board or, even worse, to give up altogether?

Whatever the ruling of the Supreme Court on this issue, it is now our responsibility, as legislators, to convey to it the views of Parliament. These judges must know how the Members of the House feel collectively before ruling on individual cases.

[English]

Many observers have pointed out, and those of us in Parliament who have read the judgments know, that the judges gave Parliament a great deal of advice as to how the new law should be framed. Not all of that advice has been followed by the minister. For example, with regard to the retention of criminal liability on the part of a woman who obtains an abortion, Chief Justice Dickson stated in the Morgentaler judgment: "Forcing a woman by threat of criminal sanction to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations is a profound interference with a woman's body".

Nor was the advice of Madam Justice Wilson followed with regard to the question of gestational limits and foetal rights. She said: "The precise point in the development of the foetus at which the state's interest in its protection becomes compelling I leave to the informed judgment of the legislature which is in a position to receive guidance on the subject from all the relevant disciplines. It seems to me, however, that it might fall somewhere in the second trimester".

As my colleague for York Centre has said, could there be a clearer invitation to the government to provide such limitations? Here again we are, of course, as legislators, free to interpret the collective wisdom of the court. Certainly we have a duty to respond to the current situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would not want to prejudge how a committee of the House will approach its work, but it will certainly want to examine all the aspects of the issue in a very detailed fashion and listen attentively to the widest possible variety of opinions and views.

In my opinion, the House committee should also deal with the more general issue of access to adequate and secure medical procedures. I don't think that Parliament could simply sherk that decision and leave it to the provinces, although they clearly have jurisdiction in health matters. Of course, we must respect the jurisdictions of the various levels of governments. I have noted how quickly the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lewis) and his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Beatty) have quoted the statements I made on this subject when I was minister of Justice.

They have discharged their duty. But there is more to this than just respecting individual jurisdictions.

[English]

I do not believe that respecting jurisdiction precludes co-operation and discussion between the two levels of government. I urge the minister and his colleague, the minister of health particularly, to take the lead, to use their influence rather than simply washing their hands of the whole question. As was pointed out, previous federal governments have taken action, for example, when they felt certain provinces were not respecting the Canada Health Act with regard to extra billing.

Family planning and reproduction counselling should be a priority of any government in combating the necessity of abortion. Everyone would agree that it is deplorable that we have a situation where any woman feels compelled to consider an abortion for economic reasons. Naturally we will study the proposals mentioned yesterday by the minister of health with regard to research into family planning, planned parenthood, adoption, education and other reproductive health issues.

The minister confirms that there are 150,000 young, single, low-income parents in need of assistance. If we want to take away economic reasons for abortion, we have to ensure that children brought into this world are properly cared for. I am entitled, I think, as is every member of Parliament, to ask this government, where is that child care program that it has been promising for five years? Where are the proposals to eliminate poverty? Where are the proposals to help women who chose to have children in difficult economic circumstances? Until this government gets really serious about these issues, I am afraid that many women with low incomes will continue to be forced to consider abortion as an alternative.

I want to ask members of the House to go through this process of determining where we would be if we rejected this particular effort at accommodation introduced by the Minister of Justice. I listened very carefully to his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and listened to how she reconciled her own views with the current legislation. I look around at members of the House. I happen to know most of the members here and I know who holds one view and who holds the other. I said at the outset that despite the deep convictions we all share on a personal basis, as a result of our own personal religious convictions, moral upbringing and family influence, it is is not our personal views that are at issue, it is our views as legislators.

Let us take a look at this issue from both sides. Suppose I were strong pro-choice. Sensing the mood of the country, sensing the mood particularly of this House, I would feel that there would inevitably need to be some control reflecting the collective view of a majority of members and also reflecting the majority of Canadians, that there has to be some law or some control.

All right, from the pro-choice point of view, what would I say? I would say if there is going to be a law, maybe this is the best law we are going to get. After all, it does leave the decision to a woman and her doctor.

If, on the other hand, I were strong pro-life and I considered the same mood of the country and the same mood of this House, I would ask myself; what happens if this legislation is defeated? First of all, we are back to no law so we are back to abortion on demand as we have now. If those who hold a strong pro-life position want to defeat this law and are successful, we are back to abortion on demand. Or would I want the trimester solution as suggested by the Supreme Court, particularly with freedom of choice during that first trimester as suggested very strongly in the judgment of Madam Bertha Wilson? Maybe I come to the same conclusion. Maybe I say from my point of view that this is the best law I am going to get where the "life or the health of the mother is threatened". The earlier words used to be "in jeopardy". I do not believe that the further definition of "health" really changes matters from the earlier legislation. That is a matter for determination by a doctor. I do not think doctors have come any closer to defining the word "health" now than they were able to do some years ago.

• (1630)

Where the life or the health of the mother is threatened, I cannot conceive, law or no law, of any judge or jury convicting a doctor or a woman where the doctor testified under oath that in his judgment the life or health of that woman was affected and that the abortion was necessary to meet the situation. Nor has there been a conviction in this country on those issues for many, many years, or in the United States, Australia or Great Britain.

I would say again, from a pro-life point of view, maybe this is the best law we can achieve in the circumstances.

You might say that is not a very theological position to take; that it is not a very philosophical position to take; it does not reflect too much of a moral impulse. If one has a view one way or the other, which each one of us does, then examine this piece of legislation from the process that I have described and let us come to the conclusion, I believe, that this may be the best result we are going to get. That is why I am prepared to see this bill go through second reading to committee.

I am prepared to listen to the arguments of the government as to how this bill meets the tests put forward by the Supreme Court under the Charter. I would hope that the minister, who will appear before that committee with his officials and whatever other outside counsel he deems to retain, will satisfy members of the House. I also hope the government is prepared to listen carefully to arguments put forward by those who may not share his confidence in the constitutionality of the bill, who may not share his confidence that the bill meets those tests. He may, I hope, want to look constructively at amendments that may be put in committee. Undoubtedly, there will be counsel from across the country who will state their views to the committee. I hope he will allow the widest range of good medical, judicial and legal advice to have a fair hearing before the committee.

None of us individually possesses the absolute wisdom to solve this problem. I dare say, without any fear of being in contempt of the House, that collectively we do not have the absolute wisdom to solve this problem. I believe we will come nearer to that wisdom if throughout this debate we listen in a spirit of tolerance and respect to the views of all members who choose to speak.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in strong opposition to this bill. This bill recriminalizes abortion by making it a criminal offence for even a doctor to perform an abortion, except in certain circumstances where the life or the health of the woman is threatened. It must be understood that the doctor is the one who has to make that determination; the woman no longer has the right to make that determination. This bill narrows and limits the circumstances under which a woman may seek an abortion and under which a doctor may legally perform an abortion.

I think we should look at some of the background of the introduction of this legislation. It was precipitated by the January 1988 Supreme Court decision concerning Section 251 of the Criminal Code. In order to understand why the Supreme Court made its decision to disallow Section 251 we must look at some of the statements made at that time.

Justice Wilson stated: "The right to reproduce or not to reproduce, which is the issue in this case, is one such right and is properly perceived as an integral part of a modern woman's struggle to assert her dignity and her worth as a human being". This legislation does not assert her worth and dignity as a human being.

Justice Dickson stated that by interfering with bodily integrity, forcing a woman by threat of criminal sanction to carry a foetus to term, unless she meets criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations, is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus is an impingement on security of person.

This bill still carries a sanction of criminal law. The sanction is shifted from the woman to the doctor. If the doctor performed it illegally, then the woman is also liable as an accessory to a crime.

Since January 1988 there has been no criminal law restricting abortion. There has been no criminal law for nearly two years. I think this House must acknowledge that during this period, women, as they always have, have acted responsibly. They have demonstrated that there is no need for criminal legislation and that is the situation that should remain.

This bill makes a decision to have an abortion not a decision of the woman but the decision of a doctor. The doctor's decision is not based on normal, medical questions. It is restricted to that of health and health even more widely defined is not the only reason a woman seeks an abortion in this country.

Furthermore, the doctor is restricted to doing it within accepted, as they say, generally accepted medical standards. In Canada, they may vary from region to region and from community to community. That means that there is not equal access. The doctor's decision is not going to be taken based on normal circumstances within the medical profession because it will be against the backdrop of criminal sanction and possible legal action and charges.

We should not underestimate the pressure that doctor will be under from anti-choice activists who will initiate third party prosecutions and even attempt to entrap a doctor into agreeing to perform an abortion for the sole purposes of being able to lay a criminal charge against that doctor.

It will put the doctors in a difficult spot, and they will start to restrict access to abortion. It will also force women into misleading the doctor about their emotional or psychological health in order to secure an abortion. This breaks down the relationship between the woman and her doctor and is very degrading to the woman. She must present herself as someone who is weak, fragile and whose psychological health is in jeopardy in order to obtain an abortion. It may be that the real motivating factors are socioeconomic, age or various other personal legitimate reasons.

It is important to understand that this decision to have an abortion will not be based on the woman's wishes, her desires, her own priorities and aspirations. The woman's own thoughts or feelings about her physical, mental or psychological health are now going to be irrelevant. It is a doctor's opinion that counts.

I think that the people who are supporting this bill had better really look at it. This bill clearly restricts abortions for circumstances of rape, incest, deformed foetuses, socioeconomic reasons, age, family dynamics, family planning or a host of other reasons for which women may come to the proper conclusion that she wishes to terminate her pregnancy. This legislation is based on a whole concept about women and their competence to make valid judgments about which I cannot agree.

• (1640)

For those who oppose abortion under any circumstances based on their own moral convictions, although I do not agree with it I can understand it and respect it. But this position and this bill is not based on those sets of principles. This bill is based on the concept that we in this House can prejudge and make a better decision, more rational, more moral, more competent than the woman's decision on her own, and that we can do it without knowing and understanding all the circumstances that that woman is going to be in at that point in time.

One of my real pleasures in life has been watching a number of young women, including my own daughter, grow from infancy into young adults. They are now mature, competent, sensitive people with tremendous personal integrity. I have more confidence that they can and will make a far better decision about their reproductive choice, particularly when they know all the facts, than decisions now being predetermined for them by people like the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Health and, yes, even the Prime Minister.

It was previously mentioned that there is respect for the sensitivity and judgment of women. But the minister who said that said "today is not the day that that is going to come about". Well, I will tell her today is the day that I have confidence in the sensitivity and judgment of women.

One would wonder if this type of bill based on this concept about women would be before this House if this House were made up of 255 women and 40 men instead of its present make-up of 255 men and 40 women.

The decision that a woman makes to have an abortion is an intensely personal issue. It is a difficult issue. It is not done frivolously and not done without due consideration, but is a decision often coming with agonizing cross-currents and feelings. The decision to have an abortion is a private issue that should not be subject to possible public and legal scrutiny, and certainly not subject to the possible criminal prosecution of the woman's doctor or herself.

I, for one, have a tremendous belief and faith in Canadian women. They will and always have made the best and right decision respecting their reproductive choice. This Parliament has no right to think that it can make a more competent and better decision.

This bill which recriminalizes abortion is an attempt to please anti-choice people and, like most appeasements, it simply creates more problems than it solves. It is not a law designed for women or to protect women's rights or dignity. It is not even a law that is designed to somehow protect or bow to the rights of the foetus. This law is simply a law designed by lawyers for lawyers. One can almost hear the lawyers saying: "Hi ho, hi ho, it's off to court we go," because that is what this bill is going to do. It is going to rebring the matter both on a constitutional basis and on a case-by-case basis back before the courts. It will expose women, their personal lives, their struggles, their agonizing decisions to the public. It should not be allowed to happen.

I also want to talk a bit about who in fact is going to be affected by this legislation. My background is in social services and health care. I have worked with the poor. I have worked with teenage street kids, and the disadvantaged. I can remember when abortion was not legal. I have known poor women, disadvantaged women who have died seeking illegal abortions.

I want to tell you that any and all attempts to restrict abortions affect only poor women, women who are disadvantaged, young teenage women and women living in isolated areas. Even before abortion was legal in this country, wealthy women always could get abortions. They could go to another country. They knew medical practitioners who were willing to perform abortions, or to do D and Cs on the pretext that they were doing some type of a medical examination. Wealthy, powerful women have always been able to get abortions.

We in Canada had the classic case of sanctimonious hypocrisy when a former member of this House, the member from the Yukon, spoke partially against allowing women to have an abortion while at the same time he was paying for a woman to go to the United States to have an abortion. It has always been this way. The wealthy and the powerful will obtain abortions based on their wishes, their needs, their desires, their choices.

Canadian women can go across the border from Vancouver to Seattle, from Winnipeg to St. Paul, from Toronto to Buffalo. Those who have money and power are not going to be affected by this or any other abortion legislation. However, women who are poor, who cannot afford to travel, young women in particular who are both poor and powerless, and do not know the system and have no financial resources on knowledge, are the ones who are going to be restricted. Women in isolated and remote areas are the ones who will suffer.

This bill also falls short in that it does not do a number of the things that this government should be doing. This bill will not ensure women the right to access to full medical care, including abortions. We must remember that Prince Edward Island allows no abortion, Newfoundland allows almost none, and many areas in British Columbia also restrict abortions. The government should be ensuring through the Health Act that its program criteria, which includes such things as comprehensiveness, universality and accessibility are enforced.

The Health Act universality is defined as "the health care insurance plan of the province must entitle 100 per cent of all insured person of the province to insured health services, provided for by the plan". The government should enforce this immediately. Accessibility, in terms of health services, is defined on uniform terms of conditions on a basis that does not impede or preclude, either directly or indirectly, access to those services. The government could be initiating legislation and governmental actions that would assure women right across Canada that they have full access to all types of medical care, including care to terminate an unwanted pregnancy.

There are other things that the government should be doing which relate to family planning. I strenuously object to people who are opposed to such things as abortion. They are also the ones who are opposed to family planning. They are the ones who are responsible for a cut-back in family planning funds from 1984 to the present. In fact, going back further, this started under the previous Liberal government. In 1979 there was $447,000 being spent on family planning. In 1984 this was reduced to $200,000. By 1988 it was reduced to $139,000. The government thinks it should be congratulated for increasing the funding this year by a measly $7,000, bringing it back up to $147,000.

Income-support programs that are meaningful must be put in place for all women in Canada. Yet we have an erosion of UIC. Income-assistance rates in this country are deplorable. Every study shows that they are significantly below the poverty line. Most mothers on welfare can only afford to feed their children between two and three weeks of a month. Minimum wages for women are only 66 per cent of those for men. In the banks we find that they are only 56 per cent of those for men.

• (1650)

This government has got to do something meaningful about the real wage rates for women. We have heard about day care. The fact that there is no universal, adequate, accessible, affordable day care scheme in this country puts women under a tremendous amount of pressure if they are the sole breadwinner, or even one of the main breadwinners within a family and they have to make a decision whether they wish to continue with their pregnancy. We have reduced the benefits for adoptive parents. The whole area of poverty is a major reason why women seek abortions. Yet in Canada we do nothing about the 1.2 million children who now live in poverty.

I want to close by saying a couple of things. There were two things that I had hoped would happen when this bill was brought forward. First, I hoped that it would ensure access to all medical services, including medical services to terminate an abortion. It has not done so. Second, it has restricted and recriminalized abortion.

I am convinced that the women of Canada are quite competent on their own, in consultation with their doctor—not a doctor who is under threat of criminal sanction—to make that decision. I think that this House should also express its confidence in Canadian women.

Mr Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to the member's speech. He said at one point that under this legislation the decision would not be made by a woman, but by a doctor. I wonder if the member could tell me in what medical circumstances that would not be the case.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I could tell you all sorts of circumstances. In this particular one that we are facing, a woman may decide that she wishes to have an abortion. She may feel that her psychological health is in jeopardy. That is totally irrelevant in this legislation. It is the doctor who is going to make that decision. But he is going to do it based on a restrictive definition of health and under threat of criminal sanction.

There are all sorts of things that are within the medical field that a person must decide if they wish to have it done. The doctor then makes the decision with respect to is it medically competent, is there any medical problem that is going to occur if that procedure is done? Then they will go ahead and do it. That is not the circumstances here. The doctor is not free to say: "Listen, I can medically perform this abortion, with no medical consequences for the woman, no threat to her health. In fact, it may even be better for her health", but he is not going to be allowed to. Maybe it is simply because the woman says: "I am 15 years old. I do not wish to be a 15 year old mother." He is not allowed to perform an abortion in that circumstance.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I have a question as well. First of all I want to say that I appreciate the remarks made by the hon. member for Surrey North. I, too, believe in the competence of women. I, too, believe in the integrity of women. I have felt for a long, long time that something as delicate and complex and personal as abortion, an issue as difficult as that, can be better decided, if I can put it that way, upon by the woman than by the state. I have always felt that women are people of integrity, that they do not take this issue lightly. There are those people who are on the so-called pro-choice side who are called pro-abortion. I have known and worked with many women who describe themselves as pro-choice, and I do not think they are pro-abortion. I do not think that any woman in this country, at least the women that I know, like to have an abortion. It is an enormously difficult decision to make.

There is this difficult area in the proposed legislation leaving it to the woman and the doctor. The hon. member for Surrey North believes that it is wrong to give a doctor a choice in the matter, that that is something that should be left up to the woman. My question really relates to whether he believes that this bill, if passed, is going to lead to a lot of dishonesty.

Given the criteria proposed in the bill, are women going to be going into doctors' offices because they want an abortion, whether it is on economic grounds or on any grounds, and telling fibs, little white lies so that they can beat the game, beat the criteria and have the abortion that they want? If that is the case, that is very disturbing. A woman, it seems to me, should be able to come to this issue honestly, forthrightly and ask her doctor whether she can have one without resorting to fibs. Could the hon. member answer that question.

Mr. Karpoff: In the main part of my speech, I raised that as one of the real issues. A woman is going to have to present her circumstances in a particular frame of reference. She is going to have to be less than forthright with her doctor. A couple of things that I said about it was that it will destroy the doctor/patient relationship. It will also detract from the dignity of that woman. It forces her into being less than forthright. I know that most women when they are presented with that will find ways of presenting their situation in a manner that the doctor is not going to be able to make any decision.

When I was working in social work, administrators would say to me that this is what the policy says. I would say that you cannot give me a policy where I cannot take an individual case and force you to make an exception to that policy because I present the facts of the case.

My concern is that disadvantaged women are often the ones who are not sophisticated in law. They do not know what the legislation says. They are maybe not as articulate as some woman lawyer going in and asking. They are not as experienced in dealing with a medical person. They are not going to present their situation in a manner that is going to allow the doctor to form an opinion that an abortion is warranted.

This is particularly true of young women. What 15 year old will understand the subtleties of this legislation, that she has got to say not that this may be detrimental to her health, but threatening to her health? There is quite a difference between what is detrimental and what is threatening. Could she understand what is psychological health or mental health? She may consciously try to present that situation. Yes, there is going to be dishonesty. More important, it is going to deny women the right to have an abortion who should have that right. A 15 year old girl should not be forced to lie to her doctor in order to get an abortion.

Mrs. Dobbie: I would just like to ask the member why he thinks a woman would not be able to consult a second doctor to get a second opinion. The legislation, in my opinion, does nothing to bar a woman from seeking a second opinion, and seeking the services of another doctor if the first doctor she consults does not agree that the abortion is necessary.

Mr. Karpoff: Let us take the case of the 15 year old girl. If she goes to six doctors in a row, she is still 15. If the doctors apply this legislation the way it is intended, she will not get an abortion. If I was a doctor and a woman went to one doctor and he said there is no medical ground, her health is not being threatened, I would be very leery to then perform an abortion because one doctor has already expressed an opinion under which I could be criminally charged. The doctor has already expressed that opinion by refusing to do the abortion on the basis that there are no medical grounds. That will happen. Any people who think that that is not going to happen are kidding themselves. Some people are thinking that the doctor and the woman are going to go quietly in the corner and wink at each other and then perform the abortion on demand. That is not what is going to happen.

Ms. Black: I would like to thank my colleague for Surrey North for his comments today. I know that he worked a long time in the social services field in British Columbia and had experiences with women in British Columbia before there was any access to abortion that were very painful for him to witness as a social worker. I know that his comments came from his experience in that area. I know that his comments were from his heart and were, in some cases, very painful for him to bring forward in this place today.

I want to ask him to comment specifically, on young girls, children who are having children. We know from statistics that Stats Canada provides for us that there are almost 50,000 children in care in Canada. The majority of these kids have come from poor families, families that in many cases are below the poverty line.

I wonder if my colleague could address some of the reasons that this criminal legislation is particularly wrong when this government has taken no effective action to address the issues of poverty in this country, and particularly the heart-breaking issue of child poverty.

Mr. Karpoff: There are many issues that are related to this. I just want to use the example of the young mother with two children who is desperately struggling to keep herself and those two children going, who is having difficulty feeding them, and then all of a sudden is faced with an unwanted pregnancy.

This legislation does not allow her, based on family planning reasons, on socio-economic reasons, or for personal reasons that are entirely different to have an abortion. If she is forced then to have a third child, what I have seen over and over again is that six months later we have all three kids in care. The total family has broken down.

What we should be doing is allowing her to make that decision, More important, we should be providing her with enough income so she can support those two children, and enough income so that if she wishes to she may have that third child and be able to support that child in a standard of living that is suitable for Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead (Mr. Gérin).

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of taking part in the debate on abortion during the previous Parliament, a little over two years ago, and today I notice a difference in the views expressed by Hon. Members in this House. There is a difference between the positions taken by Members who have just been re-elected and who took part in the previous debate, and those newly elected Members, like the Hon. Member for Surrey North (Mr. Karpoff), because when we had this important debate in 1986, we had to vote on seven different resolutions. We expressed our own personal convictions with respect to each of these resolutions, without seeking a compromise. For us, it was a matter of conscience, principle, upbringing and education, and we voted accordingly. We were never able to get a majority in this House. Never, which is not surprising because there is more to this debate than pro-life and pro-choice. There are any number of variations between these two extremes, and I will get back to this later on. However, and if we all vote according to our own concerns, we will never reach a consensus and we will never produce a piece of legislation.

I want to congratulate the Prime Minister who, despite the problems of reaching a consensus in this House, has again told his caucus that Progressive Conservative Members may consider this a free vote. And I hope that the leaders of the opposition parties—it was a pleasure to listen to the pragmatic speech given by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner)—and I hope that the New Democratic Party will also ask its Members to vote according to their conscience, to be pragmatic and to be willing to seek a compromise. That is the only way we will succeed.

So it is a free vote, Mr. Speaker. But am I really completely free? Am I really free to vote any way I like? No, I am not. I have my conscience, I have my upbringing and education, and I have the religious values I was taught. I have my constituents in Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead who are very interested in this matter, who write letters and send petitions and come to my riding office, who call me up and let me know what they think, one way or another. There are also the people of Quebec and Canada who are concerned about this matter. But I also know that Canadians want their elected representatives to come up with a solution and produce legislation. In view of the legal vacuum that currently exists, they want us here in the House to reach an agreement and produce legislation that, although it will obviously not reflect every Canadian's personal position, will reach a compromise.

Mr. Speaker, I am a lawyer by profession, and I have worked in criminal law and as a defence lawyer. Unlike what the Hon. Member said, Mr. Speaker, I always felt this was not a law for lawyers. I always thought that criminalizing abortion would not deal with the problems underlying the whole situation around abortion. Economic factors, professional factors, women's careers, for instance, and various family constraints are all reasons why women may at some time consider interrupting their pregnancy. Making abortion a crime will not set a greater value on life. It will not deal with the various things that must be done to convince women to continue their pregnancy, to have children and give the most precious gift there is, the gift of life.

During the last debate, I voted against the motions that were tabled because I did not want to criminalize abortion. I said that was no way to deal with the situation. I said we had to provide financial help to women who want to have a child but can't afford to because they do not have the financial resources. We all know women in our towns and villages who would like to have a larger family but just can't afford it. We need measures to promote adoption, measures to provide assistance at all levels, and we need a genuine family policy.

Instead of talking about abortion, I would have much preferred to discuss ways of providing for a genuine family policy in this country that would make it possible to deal with all these problems. I think Canadians would much rather hear us talk about that than about abortion or the chances of it being criminalized.

We will not solve the problem by forcing a woman to bring her pregnancy to term. Certainly not. Making abortion a crime will not solve the problem. It is by taking steps to support pregnant women. It is in this sense that I consider myself now and always definitely Pro-Life. I want to encourage life by all possible means.

• (1710)

As a lawyer, I can tell you that the bill will criminalize a situation which, from the practical point of view, will never occur, except under extreme circumstances which any way would deserve a penalty, either under the Criminal Code or otherwise.

In a most interesting article, well informed La Presse Editor Alain Dubuc stated, and I quote: "The Bill defines abortion as a crime; yet, its application is so loose that it clearly supports abortion on demand." He added: "This clearly indicates a greater concern for ideas than for the concrete problems of women." Further: "In short, let us strike a balance between humanism and militantism". And finally: "All this means that abortion may be a crime, but no abortion performed by a physician in Canada will be a criminal act!" And I trust that is what is going to happen.

Let us have a look at the Bill which is so clear that most Canadian men and women will understand it easily:

> Every person who induces an abortion on a female person is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years—

First of all, I wish to emphasize the fact that under the present abortion legislation, that person would be liable to imprisonment for life. This Bill adopts the least severe penalty under the Criminal Code, namely two years. There are penalties of five, ten and twenty years. There are different categories. In that respect, the Bill criminalizes abortion. I do not agree that it should become a crime, but it is the least serious criminal act referred to in Canada's Criminal Code.

> Every person who induces an abortion on a female person—

This, of course, excludes the woman herself. Under the old statute a woman could be sent to jail for life. In this instance, for all practical purposes the woman is excluded. The physician might be put behind bars to serve a relatively short sentence. That is a very big advantage.

Should I be offended because this medical act must be approved by a physician? No, not at all. Indeed I fail to see how an abortion could be performed by someone other than a physician. Even if we did not legislate the physician would still have to give his opinion. I do not see how a physician could be forced to induce an abortion if he happens to be against that medical act. We saw that in the Daigle-Tremblay case last summer. A number of Quebec physicians expressed the view that after so many weeks they would not have performed that abortion, even though the legislation had been struck down at the time. There was no law. If no physician is prepared to do it, we are back to square one. There has to be a physician to induce an abortion. Whether or not the bill says the advice of a physician is required, in practical terms it is exactly the same thing.

Here is how health is defined:

> Every person who induces an abortion on a female person—unless the abortion is induced by or under the direction of a medical practicioner who is of the opinion that, if the abortion were not induced, the health or life of the female person would be likely to be threatened.

Then we have the definition of health. That is what we learned from the Supreme Court in the Morgentaler case. Health means "physical, mental and psychological health". The woman's psychological health. Let me go back to the measures I mentioned earlier.

Today, the psychological health of many pregnant women in Canada is affected, because those economic measures do not exist, because there is no genuine family policy, because adoption proceedings have not been made any easier, and because a host of other measures that many Canadian women would have liked to see have not materialized. This may be one of the reasons why the psychological health of certain women who want an abortion is affected.

If we as parliamentarians got to work and considered a number of measures to promote life, to promote births and pregnancies, maybe we would not need this legislation which criminalizes abortion.

In Coaticook, where I come from, Mayor André Langevin and his town council said: We are going to do what we can. So the mayor offers $1,000 for every child born in this town. This decision was very well received by the community, It created a new interest. This modest initiative by a small Canadian town may not change much for the time being, but it may have a snowball effect. I saw this as a signal to the rest of Canada that we must sit down and give some serious thought to promoting life and children in this country.

This legislation is absolutely necessary. I can do without a replay of the circus we saw last summer, and I am referring to Daigle–Tremblay and the Dodd case in Toronto.

I would like to quote from an excellent article by Lysiane Gagnon in the newspaper La Presse, which pretty well reflects my concerns and my position on this legislation.

She says, and I quote:

> There is an ideological perspective and a pragmatic perspective.
>
> However, ideology doesn't stand a chance when we take a pragmatic look at the Bill. The proposed legislation practically allows abortion on demand, and ideological arguments do not hold up against an analysis of the realities.
>
> The concept of psychological health is the key element that would allow abortion for socio–economic reasons, in cases of rape or incest, and in fact for any other reason a woman might have for not wanting to be pregnant, because obviously, a woman who does not want a child will be under mental stress if she is forced to have one.
> Those Canadians who are ready to mount the barricades and fight recriminalization of abortion should remember that the most violent reactions occurred at a time when abortion was in a legal vacuum, after the Supreme Court decision which rendered the previous legislation null and void. It was last summer, when abortion was not considered a crime by the legislator, that we had that infamous legal circus. Under this legislation, the Daigle–Tremblay case would never have happened.

Mr. Speaker, this legilsation is absolutely necessary. Am I pro–life, am I pro–choice? In medio stat virtus. Virtue is equidistant from two extremes, which applies to many situations and also to this one.

Some are opposed to abortion in all cases without exception. Some would allow it in case of rape or incest. Some would allow it for a 13– or 14–year–old girl. Some would allow it in the first 10, 12, 14, 16 or 20 weeks of pregnancy. Recently, I even heard Dr. Augustin Roy say that we should set the limit at 22 weeks.

Some say the woman should see one doctor while others would like a second opinion or a therapeutic committee.

Mr. Speaker, some are in favor of abortion in all cases without exception. The possibilities are endless. There is such a wide range of situations that, if you tried to list them all, you would still be at it tomorrow morning.

We should not crystalize the debate thus allowing the Pro–Life and Pro–Choice groups to corner us into one or the other of those two extreme situations. There are many other things besides that. Indeed perhaps the two groups Pro–Life and Pro–Choice who are lobbying extensively prevent us from realizing what measures we should take to solve the problem in the first place. On an issue like this there are as many opinions as there are heads!

• (1720)

Mr. Speaker, some people call this a hypocritical legislation, but I for one think it is a fair compromise. It is a compromise which is not made against my conscience, which is not made against the basic principles I live by and which were given to me by my family, by those who educated me, and by all those with whom I came in contact during my life.

They say it could be improved. Of course it could. The same thing is being said about Meech Lake these days. However in some cases the word is leave well enough alone, and seek a consensus. That is not easy, considering there are 295 Members from every region of the country, each with his or her own views.

Setting pure ideology aside, one must be practical. So, Mr. Speaker, although I entertain reservations about some provisions, even if I have reservations about criminalizing, however lenient it may be, there is no doubt in my mind that as Member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead I must support and vote in favour of this bill. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that the legislative committee will have to give serious consideration to this measure and improve it if possible. But basically I agree with the principles and the way this bill has been drafted.

[English]

Ms. Black: I thank the member opposite on the government side for his comments today. He showed great sensitivity to women and to how they feel about this particular issue. Most women in Canada view this issue of abortion and right to reproductive choice and freedom as the key indicator of women's emancipation, women's freedom in Canada.

More than 50 per cent of our population are women and they think of this issue as one where you cannot be a little bit pregnant, you also cannot be a little bit held under the Criminal Code. You are a full and equal citizen in this country, a citizen who is able to make her own decision under her own priorities and concerns, and not under the criteria established by a criminal law.

The member indicated that this was the best kind of a compromise that we could achieve in Canada around the issue of abortion. He also indicated that this bill would prevent the horror that we witnessed this summer with the Daigle case where we saw the very private details of a woman's life displayed across the media of this country. We saw her pain and her suffering as she struggled with this issue herself. We saw the courts in Quebec obstructing her and in some ways harassing her as she went through a terrible time.

I wonder how the member feels this criminal legislation will prevent that kind of spectacle again. It is my understanding that the injunctions that were held over Miss Daigle were done under civil law. This is criminal law that we are discussing here in the Chamber today. My understanding is that criminal law will not prevent civil injunction. In fact, one of my big concerns with this legislation is that we are handing another legal tool to the small majority of people in the Canadian population who would use any means and we have seen what they have done over many months to prevent a woman from exercising her own choice on her own reproductive health and the choice that she makes about becoming a mother. I would ask the member how he sees this criminal legislation preventing civil injunctions. How does he see this criminal legislation improving the situation for women in Canada? I simply do not believe that it does. I believe that it will diminish access and make the situation worse for women in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Last summer, when the Supreme Court considered the court injunction in the Chantal Daigle case, it took not more than 30 minutes or three-quarters of an hour, I believe, to hand down its decision. One cannot request a court injunction on those grounds. That was established at a time when there was no legislation on abortion. So I imagine that answers your question, if in addition to the Supreme Court decision, whose reasons have yet to be published, we have this legislation as well. I think this is particularly important, because I believe that NDP Members, generally speaking, are in favour of having no legislation at all. They would prefer to leave it up to the woman, but now they will have to vote—I hope it will be a free vote for them as well—and I hope that women Members in the NDP caucus will demand a free vote and that when they do vote, they will consider this short quote, my last one by the same Lysiane Gagnon. I think she will appreciate this, and I hope she will return the favour in her next article:

"Instead of arguing about the semantics of the issue, feminists groups should set up effective lobbies to meet Members of Parliament and try and increase support for this Bill which, considering the realities, is the most progressive piece of legislation we could have. In any case, the Pro-Life lobbies won't waste any time".

[English]

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I find the member's comments very interesting. I think that he has thought them through a great deal. I certainly appreciate his sensitivity and his wish to make it as free and easy for a woman to terminate a pregnancy. I am quite intrigued that, as a lawyer, his interpretation of the bill is that if a woman sought an abortion, did not qualify for it on the grounds of a threat to medical health and was turned down, that would be psychologically hard on her and, therefore, her psychological health would be under threat and now she would be entitled to it.

Basically, what the member is saying is that every woman under this legislation is entitled to abortion. First, I would like the member to tell me if the concept that is used is that she is denied, she is now psychologically upset about it, and therefore now she is entitled—the chicken and egg situation—under what circumstances does he see a woman would not be able to get an abortion? Are there any? If there aren't any, why is the bill not simply amended by using the words that state that "unless the abortion is induced or performed by or under the direction of a medical practitioner"—period, and striking out the rest of it altogether?

If we are saying that that is what the intent is, and some people over there seem to be kidding themselves that that is what the intent is and what the end result is going to be, then why do we not just cut the bill off and strike out all the words about health and life and threats and just say as long as it is performed under the supervision of a medical practitioner, period?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Thank you for your question. However, I already answered most of the question at the beginning of my speech when I said that in 1986, I voted on seven different motions. Since I found none were acceptable, I voted against all seven.

• (1730)

Since 1986, I have come to the conclusion that we must reach a compromise that takes into account the basic principles of my philosophy, and those basic principles are reflected in this Bill. Fine, in your case, you may wish to see a limit of 17 weeks and 3 days, but you may get only 6 or 7 Members to vote in favour of your proposal, and you will never get that kind of legislation through the House. And by the end of the debate, we still wouldn't have any legislation, while the vast majority of Canadians not only want legislation, they want their Members to produce specific provisions in the form of a bill. So there is a lot of truth in what you say, but you want a bill that is a perfect reflection of your ideas and concerns. However, we must go beyond this desire for perfection which will never get a consensus in this House and produce something that will be acceptable to you just the same and which will help give Canadians what they want most, which is legislation that reflects all the basic principles you support.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to rise to speak on Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion.

My leader, the right hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, has already indicated that there will be a free vote within the Liberal party because this is a non–partisan issue.

I must state at the outset that this bill is a grave disappointment and I cannot support it as it is. However, like my leader, I will support it going to a legislative committee so that amendments may be heard from all disciplines, so that we may seek clarification and improvements, so that we may examine the need to delineate the services that the women of our country need.

This issue, indeed, is most crucial and complex. It has been intensely debated for almost two years now and has even led to civil strife.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare, yesterday, in debating this issue indicated: "Sensationalizing individual lives cannot possibly provide the thoughtfulness, wisdom and judgment necessary to develop a bill which respects the rights of all Canadians, especially when those rights come into conflict with one another". I agree.

However, I must state that this government has delayed presenting legislation on abortion to this House for an unacceptably long period of time. The bill that we now have, as is, has not clarified anything. At best, it has only clarified issues vaguely. It does not protect Canadians in the womb of their mothers nor the mothers themselves.

Let us remind ourselves that once we members of Parliament were in the womb of our mothers. Had they aborted us we would not be here to be able to debate this fundamental issue.

This government states that Bill C–43 strikes a balance between the right of women to personal freedom and privacy and the state's interest in protecting the right of the unborn to life, that this bill is a balanced approach. This is not true. How can it be a balance when it compromises both rights?

This bill does nothing to protect the life of the unborn. It does not promote the value and dignity of human life, nor does it address the rightful concerns of women.

The bill states that abortion is prohibited unless a woman's health is in danger, but health is defined in such a broad and unverifiable way that this bill will basically allow abortion on demand. The bill sets no limits on the threat to health necessary to warrant abortion. A doctor will be able to perform a legal abortion for a woman once he forms the opinion that her life or her physical, mental, or psychological health would likely be threatened if the abortion were not performed. The proposed laws will not require the doctor to consult other doctors or to carry out the procedure in licensed premises, clinic, or hospital.

As a medical doctor myself by professional background, I must point out that this puts the medical profession in an inappropriate situation. Basically the medical profession will be delegated a task of writing parts of Canada's criminal law. It is not the duty of a physician in practice to be a legislator. The duty of a physician is not to solve the social and economic problems of society through performing abortions, but to protect the life of the unborn, a foetus' right to life.

It might seem that a pregnant woman has the right to abort since legal proscription of abortion seems to interfere with personal liberty. But I must submit that unrestricted personal freedom is not always possible.

It is acknowledged that the freedom of one person is limited by the personal freedom of other people. That is why we have in our Canadian Constitution a provision to that effect.

All seven Supreme Court judges stated in last year's ruling on this issue that the state has a valid interest in the protection of the foetus. The test is whether in exercising that interest Parliament imposes reasonable, demonstrably justified limits on a woman's constitutional right to security of the person, and whether those limits accord with fundamental principles of justice. The ruling of the Supreme Court in fact tells us that we in Parliament have a solemn duty to pass legislation on this issue.

Human dignity includes the right to the free development of one's personality which allows each individual to act on his or her personal moral convictions. But, conversely, human life and dignity have to be respected by anyone making use of his or her own right to act freely.

Thus the freedom to have an abortion must be limited to the extent that such an action encroaches on the rights of others, on the right of the unborn in the womb of his or her mother. Before discussing this further, I must point out that there is a possible encroachment on the rights of the person who makes use of her right to privacy by procuring an abortion.

Abortion may endanger the life and the health of the pregnant woman. Complications which can arise from abortion include perforation of the uterus and other physical damage. There is also a high incidence of post-abortion mental health problems, the symptoms of which include feelings of guilt, depression, drug dependencies, and even suicide attempts. Thus from the point of view of the mother's physical and mental health, in almost all situations it is to the woman's advantage to carry a pregnancy to term rather than to abort it.

Hence to preserve a woman's life or health, the woman's personal liberty to decide the fate of the unborn life may be restricted. Obviously it is necessary to prohibit destruction of unborn life, not only to protect the woman, not only to protect the mother, but also to save the unborn child himself or herself.

If unborn life were considered less worthy of protection than born life, this could lead to a decrease in the protection of born life itself. Just as a differentiation between born and unborn life is made, so a differentiation between life worthy of a right to live and life without such a right could be made.

• (1740)

Such differentiation has been made in the past. And we are all aware of the horrible results. Despite this, there are still people in certain parts of the world who consider abortion to be an accepted means of birth control. This, I submit, is reprehensible. This cannot be condoned and it is the responsibility of the state to prevent this.

Medical science has established that a foetus has its own body organs, has its own genetic code and is capable of full life after birth if allowed to fully develop in the mother's womb. When others argue that the stage of viability of the foetus be the criterion for abortion, then I submit that viability of the foetus is threatened, not because of the fault of the foetus, but because of the intervention of men and women who induce abortion.

How then can the foetus defend himself or herself against such an argument? We who can speak, who can feel, who have been given life, must now speak for those who cannot speak for themselves. From the moment of conception an individual will increase in size, will increase in the degree of development, but he or she remains essentially the same individual from conception until death.

Regardless of personal inconvenience or personal preference, a physician, including myself because of my medical background, or even a prospective mother should not be able to take the life of the unborn child at will. If there is genuine threat to the life of the pregnant mother, all medical attempts must be made to save the lives, not of one, but to save the lives of both. Fortunately, from the medical point of view, carrying a pregnancy to term usually poses no such threat to the pregnant woman. Normally there is no competition for life between a mother and her unborn child. What is good for the health of the mother is good for the foetus and carrying a baby to term is usually in the best interests of not only the woman herself, of her family, but also of society as a whole.

Already there exist laws which indirectly protect the foetus. In penal law, it is a criminal offence for a third person to attack a foetus against the will of the pregnant woman. Also, harsher penalties are levelled against the murderer of a pregnant woman. Protection of the foetus through the protection of a pregnant woman is reflected in labour law. Yes, there exists legal protection of the foetus in penal, administrative, labour and civil laws. As members of Parliament it is our duty to pass appropriate legislation to protect the unborn child.

Some people will suggest that even if aborting a foetus is not a physical or mental health imperative, it should nonetheless be allowed as an economic imperative. I disagree most strongly but politely with the idea that we can ever put an economic price tag on human life. We should support, instead, improved programs for pregnant women and improved programs for new born babies and older children. We should facilitate adoptions and we must encourage men to be more responsible for birth control and, in the event of pregnancy, more responsible in terms of child support. If a child is unwanted by the mother this does not mean that the child is unwanted. A child will be wanted by the father or by the grandparents or by thousands of childless couples trying to adopt.

The mother has the opportunity of giving a lifetime of happiness to individuals unable to have their own children, who will love and cherish the adopted child as if he or she were their own.

Some will say that induced, non-therapeutic abortions will take place even if they are only allowed on therapeutic grounds, and that they will then take place in unsanitary and unsafe conditions at exorbitant prices.

As a medical doctor by background, I am deeply concerned indeed. I believe if we are interested in saving the lives of the unborn we should not be making it cheaper and safer to terminate their lives.

Pregnancy is not a disease. It is a natural and wonderful gift of life. We must use all methods to reduce the number of abortions, not only legal methods. These methods include better education and better support services such as day care, counselling services and adequate housing for the poor. We must identify the bases of why we ask for abortion. When we have identified the causes, then we as a government, as a society, must provide the necessary societal solutions. The government must exercise federal leadership to the extent that when a therapeutic procedure of any kind is indicated, those medical services must be available to all Canadians in every corner of this country. But on an issue of fundamental values, first and foremost the right to life, we must not hesitate to legislate in the interests of society.

Just because people will drink and drive regardless of legislation does not mean that we should not legislate. Just because some induced non-therapeutic abortions will take place regardless of legislation to the contrary does not mean that we should not legislate. That a law will be broken, is no argument against enacting such a law.

Some people will suggest that a child should not be born into poverty or a bad family, that such a life is not worth living. The adoption choice aside, is it not presumptuous for us to judge what kind of life is worth living and what kind is not? The issue of abortion involves two lives, not just one, and both lives must be protected whenever possible. Medical science has proven that life is a continuum from conception till death, and to arbitrarily extinguish life at any point along this continuum shows a contempt for human life itself.

Yesterday the Minister of National Health and Welfare stated that our societal values change with time. I agree that some societal attitudes may change with time. I submit and add that life and its protection are eternal values that do not change and ought not to change with time. In an enlightened society such as ours, it should be legally acknowledged that life cannot be surrendered, that a bad law can be amended. True, a bad law is worse than no law, but it is no excuse for not enacting a good law.

Let us send this bill to committee for further study, to test the constitutionality and other aspects that we would like to raise. We cannot allow this bill as is. It will lead to a legal conundrum. It will be an invitation to abuse and a prescription for disrespect for the rule of law.

It is not sufficient to focus only on the political and legal ramifications of abortion policies.

Canada should make childbirth a more attractive alternative. Any society that prohibits abortion and does not care for the needs and distress of the mother, child and family after birth, is hypocritical. By legislating to protect unborn human life, the dignity of all Canadians and indeed the dignity of all human beings will be affirmed.

Those who are protected at the most vulnerable moment of their lives will thank us for the courageous and principled stand we take, and our country will have benefited from our faith in the inherent worth and dignity of all human life. Canada must continue to care for people, for life, when it begins. I resolutely believe that my constituents in Winnipeg North, in fact all Canadians, believe in the sanctity of life. I am confident they will be with me when I exercise my solemn duty to vote to reflect the collective conscience of Canadians.

• (1750)

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to tell the member how much I appreciated his remarks. I think that they were sensitive and well thought out, and I certainly agree with the body of them.

A few minutes ago when the member for Surrey North was speaking, he mentioned that the problem with this legislation was that the decision would not be made by a woman but by a doctor. I asked him whether there were any other medical cases where the patient decided what the treatment should be rather than the doctor. He answered: "Yes, lots of them".

Now since the member for Winnipeg North is a medical doctor, I would like to ask him if he agrees that there are many cases where the patient decides rather than the doctor what the treatment should be.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I thought following my election to Parliament that I would not be giving any more medical opinion. Of course, I alluded to that in my speech. In response to the hon. member, the answer is no. The medical doctor, by the medical act, makes the decision whether or not to treat. If he or she does this in great error, he or she, as a physician, is subject to the medical malpractice suit.

My concern, in fact, about this bill is that because there are no limits it is possible that a physician, because of his philosophical conviction, may do other than what medical practice usually allows a physician to do. I am still a member of the medical profession, although I am on leave of absence from the university. I find it difficult that the Canadian Medical Association has taken a position by a vote during a convention that performing abortion ought to be left to the decision of the woman and the doctor, as though that is the ultimate criterion for care of the unborn child, for care of the pregnant woman.

It is established medical practice that the criteria for treatment of almost all conditions, with very few exceptions, are based on scientific evidence. It is never based on a popular vote. It is because of that that I am concerned that the absence of strict limits of how even my own medical colleague would interpret the provision law. The absence of that certainty would not let me support this bill as is, and I would like clarification during debate at the committee level.

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, I too listened carefully to the member's comments today, and I know that he speaks with true conviction. I respect his conviction and I certainly respect his right to hold the views that he holds. I have some empathy with his position.

The member is a medical doctor and he spoke about women who are pregnant, under a variety of situations, seeing their doctor. He talked, in particular, about a woman who may be pregnant and may be suicidal. He seemed to indicate that that was not what he would consider as grounds for an abortion.

He also mentioned other countries and what the laws were there. I would just mention that in Ireland, where abortion is totally illegal and totally outlawed, the abortion rate in fact is higher than the abortion rate in Canada.

But I would ask him as a parliamentarian and as a medical doctor, under this law that we are debating here today, if a pregnant woman was to see him requesting an abortion under what circumstances would he approve that request?

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I am really being challenged to exercise my medical judgment and I will do that.

It is given that when a physician approaches a patient and then wants to prescribe a treatment, the ultimate challenge to that physician is to save the life of that patient from an illness. In so doing, the physician has to examine alternatives of therapy, including counselling for example, including other modes of therapy that are not of a surgical nature. When a physician makes only one treatment approach, if we can even call it that, of aborting 100 women that come to my clinic so that when they leave they have all had abortions, well, I submit that that physician will be challenged through peer review by our colleagues, because the real treatment likely is not being practised.

Before I answer directly the specific question posed, let me clarify. For example, let us say the psychological health of the woman is in danger. What do we mean by that? Is it because one has a discomfort and, therefore, one would have an abortion? Well, if a physician does that, then he or she is not doing a proper job, because the therapy for depression is not abortion. The therapy likely will be counselling and other modes of therapy that do not have to terminate the life of that unborn. That is why only when the life of the mother is seriously threatened, gravely threatened, in the history of medical practice abortion is an accepted alternative, because in trying to save the lives of both, one has to give way, but not only for simple convenience.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that many colleagues will join me in congratulating the member for his speech. It is not often in this chamber, perhaps not often enough, that we can have this kind of debate, all speak from the heart, agreeing or disagreeing with each other regardless of party line.

I want to congratulate the member for the dimension he is bringing to the debate as a medical doctor. I know he did not think he was going to practise medicine upon his arrival on Parliament Hill, but I am going to ask him another question in regard to that. I hope the member puts up with that.

Some members had an opportunity of hearing Professor Peter Day from the University of British Columbia, who came to speak to a number of MPs on the value of abortion as a medical treatment, if you wish. That is really a follow up to the answer that my colleague has just given.

It was suggested to those members of Parliament who attended that very excellent talk a couple of months ago that in fact there was no record anywhere in the medical profession which proved that abortion was in fact a valuable medical treatment.

Dr. Day even went so far as to add that it was rather unusual, and perhaps unique to abortion, that prior to using that medical treatment—I will call it that loosely for the purposes of this discussion—no experimentation had been done, as we do, for instance, when we experiment with a new kind of drug or a new kind of treatment. We will study that on either other life forms first or we will select a few individuals and study what the benefit is of a treatment, then evaluate that and decide whether we want to apply that treatment to society as a whole.

I want to ask my colleague, in his professional opinion, if he knows of any such studies that actually demonstrate that there is such a benefit from abortion as a medical treatment. Again, I am using that term. It has come to my attention that, in fact, there was no proof that abortion was ever a good medical treatment. I want him to comment on that.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I thought my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Saint-Henri—Westmount, who is a lawyer would give me legal advice before I continue to give medical opinion in Parliament. But because we have parliamentary immunity, I can do so. I must say, however, in all seriousness that I still maintain my medical licence.

In response to the question, there has not been any study, nor could a study ever be done in a controlled scientific fashion to test the hypothesis whether abortion will be a valuable therapeutic procedure for psychological problem that may be related to pregnancy. But there are well established scientific and medical principles. The first principle is do no harm. Now, the Hippocratic principle is a very valuable one. What it tells us is that if we cannot prove that a treatment procedure is valuable, we have to accept that it ought not to do harm. Evidence has shown that in fact, abortion has induced psychological trauma in women. There is no proof that abortion is a valuable therapy for psychological problems.

In response to the question, even on medical grounds, we cannot allow abortion as a therapeutic procedure on just the request of a woman for psychological, emotional or economic difficulties, with all respect for the concerns of the women who truly may be in distress. But I would like to see alternative forms of therapy like counselling be provided by government and an assurance that societal help will be offered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 6 o'clock p.m., pursuant to an order adopted on Tuesday, November 7, 1989, the House can now move to resume and complete third reading consideration of Bill C-20, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, October 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C-20, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and Excise Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate, and I wish to do so only briefly. As you will know, Mr. Speaker, my colleagues in the Liberal caucus and I, as well as my colleague for Ottawa South, will be speaking more extensively later on this bill. We have rejected this bill and do not feel that it is in the best interest of Canadians. The member for Ottawa South will describe in a far more eloquent way than I can how wrong this bill is for our country.

We are discussing this bill at the same time as the Prime Minister brings us his so-called tax reform. It is very important to discuss these two issues at the same time because the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance keep telling us that some of the taxes we have right now are unfair, that they are wrong. We have at present a 13.5 per cent federal excise tax. That 13.5 per cent is applied right now by the government but under existing legislation, that rate is only 12 per cent. Of course, through the motion of Ways and Means and so on, that 12 per cent has been increased to 13.5 per cent. This bill today would formally place that into effect.

What is interesting, and I am sure you will be interested in this, Mr. Speaker, is that this federal excise tax has been qualified by the Minister of Finance as being a silent killer of jobs. It was a silent killer of jobs when it was 12 per cent, so what does the government propose to do with the 12 per cent silent killer of jobs? Increase it to 13.5 per cent.

Mr. Walker: Amazing.

Mr. Boudria: Amazing indeed. Perhaps the Minister of Finance can explain this to us later. I know he is paying very close attention to my speech, I can tell from looking across the way. Later he will want to react to this and tell us how increasing a silent killer of jobs from 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent is going to make things any better. I challenge the minister to rise right now in his place. I know he will not do it. I know the Minister of Finance will not answer these questions that I am asking, otherwise he could rise immediately in his seat and discuss this with us.

Some Hon. Members: He is afraid.

Mr. Boudria: That's it, my colleagues say he is afraid and that is why he is not reacting. I know that that is the case.

To make matters worse, this silent killer of jobs which has increased now to 13.5 per cent was only 9 per cent when the Conservatives took office. The Conservatives are proposing was the appropriate rate, why did they not leave it there to start with? Why did they bring it up to 12 per cent, and by the way it took three tries to bring it there. They brought the tax from 9 per cent to 10 per cent and so on and then to 12 per cent, and today to 13.5 per cent. This is the fourth time since the Conservatives have been in power that they have increased the federal excise tax, making it 13.5 per cent. It was 9 per cent in the beginning, as I said awhile ago.

Being the objective person that you are, Mr. Speaker, you will no doubt be very upset, as I am, to see that the government is doing this. The government, for instance, is telling us that the proposed tax of 9 per cent will be much fairer. Right, the tax will be much fairer. We have a 13.5 per cent tax now, which is unfair according to the minister, but that 13.5 per cent unfair tax is only really 7 per cent at the retail level. We are going to take taxation at 7 per cent at the retail level and increase it to 9 per cent with the proposed goods and services tax and that is supposed to make it better. Well I have some difficulty understanding how any of this will be better.

Bill C–20, that we are discussing today also proposes to entrench the fact that we now have an 11 per cent tax on telecommunications services and programs.

I represent a rural constituency and I am sure you are familiar with my riding as you drive through it coming from your own constituency to Ottawa. I am sure that you have noted, Mr. Speaker, that the riding that I represent is rural. In this rural riding, a tax on telecommunications services is a tax on an essential service.

The government has said that there is no problem because distance rates. I ask you, if you live in a rural area the basic telephone rate is about $6 a month; it is the long distance rates that are expensive and the people have to phone long distance to their doctors, the hospitals, the ambulances and everything else. I can tell that you agree with me about how unfortunate and how unfair the taxes are, Madam Speaker.

The tax on alcoholic beverages is increased from 18 per cent to 19 per cent. That is enough to drive someone to drink, I tell you. Those sin taxes are included in this bill and I suppose it is fashionable to accept that there is always a certain measure of increase in those so–called sin taxes in every budget, but we should remember that just as it is easier to tax those sin items, cigarettes and alcohol and so forth, we should remember that the taxing of any item has an inflationary impact, no matter how you cut it.

There are a number of other items which I feel are particularly objectionable in this bill and I want to urge all my colleagues on both sides of the House to vote against this bill. One of these measures which is particularly objectionable is the increase from 8 per cent to 9 per cent on the tax on construction materials.

There is an acute housing shortage in this country and we have been bringing this to the attention of the minister responsible for housing—and I use the word "responsible" loosely—questioning about what measures the government can undertake to make housing more affordable, particularly in large downtown areas. The government stands there pretending to be interested, sometimes announcing a grant to assist in building, I do not know, 50 homes in Toronto or something. I am sure it helps, every little bit helps, but the real assistance, surely, is to organize our taxation in such a way that it does not penalize people who want to buy a home. So what do we do to those poor people who are trying to find a place to live? We increase the tax on their houses, the tax on construction materials. Shame on the government.

• (1810)

I say to the minister that he should rise immediately in the House and withdraw this bill. I know he will not do it. The Minister of Finance just will not bring himself to rise immediately in the House, as I am suggesting.

To make matters even worse for my constituents living in rural Canada who commute to various cities to go to work, this bill will increase the excise tax on gasoline. I remember the Conservatives across the way would complain when they were in opposition, because they said that the previous Liberal government had increased taxes on gasoline. Of course, we remember that most of the increases in the early 1980s were due to increases in the actual price of the product as opposed to increases in taxes, but no matter.

Every budget since this government came to power in 1984, and a sad day it was in 1984 I might add, has increased the excise tax on gasoline. This tax alone, this latest increase, will add $660 million to the burden my constituents and your constituents, Madam Speaker, and all Canadian citizens have to pay to this government across the way.

I know the bill contains a fuel tax rebate to some primary producers in respect to sales tax on gasoline and highway diesel fuel for off–highway production purposes and that it is extended for one year to December 31, 1990, pending the so-called sales tax reform. The bill also contains some minor technical amendments relating to the so-called burden of proof under the Excise Act for the marketing of tobacco products and the penalties for selling or possessing illegal tobacco products.

There is also in this bill the imposition of a sales tax on laundry detergent. I say we will not get clean government with strategies like that, taxing detergent. It would seem that things have to be cleaned up across the way but that is the last thing they should be taxing.

The long and the short of it is that we just cannot trust the government across the way in the area of taxation. It is difficult for us to imagine that we could not trust the government across the way. I am saddened to tell you this, Madam Speaker, as you can tell.

Let me give some examples of reasons why I say this. All of these bills are presented to us as sort of the last cleaning up of our taxation system before tax reform is implemented. But here are some promises that the Conservative government made, and more particularly, the Minister of Finance. I invite him to respond to this later, if what I am telling him is inaccurate. I think that what I say will remain unchallenged by the minister. He will not respond to this.

On October 8, 1988, he said to The Toronto Star, a very reliable source of information, "The bottom line is that the GST will not be used to raise revenues of the Government of Canada". In other words, it would be revenue neutral.

On CTV National News, Friday, June 19, 1987, the Minister of Finance said, "again, what we are trying to do is be using your words, revenue neutral in the second stage as well". You probably remember, as I do, that the government proposed to us a first copy or white paper or draft of what it proposed to include in the second stage of tax reform. What was one of the first sentences in the document? It was something that this proposal is presented in order to reduce the deficit of the Government of Canada. I ask, how does a revenue neutral tax reduce the deficit any quicker than the previous tax? I still have not received that explanation from the Minister of Finance. I challenge him to respond to this. I know he has not responded to any of the questions I have asked in the last 15 minutes.

Mr. Walker: He is not interested.

Mr. Boudria: I guess he is just not interested. The bill we are dealing with today is all about the invisible taxes, those kinds that are the silent killers of jobs. Those are the ones included in Bill C-20. We are making the silent killers of jobs just a little bit worse today by adopting this bill if that is what we do. In the unlikely event that we approve this bill later, that would be the ultimate result.

[Translation]

On June 18, 1987, Madam Speaker, referring to the Low visible of this new value added tax was going to be, the Minister stated, and I quote:

> Sales tax reform will eliminate the hidden tax in the prices consumers pay.

This is an excerpt from the House of Commons Debates of June 18, 1987.

Then, on June 22, 1989, some two years and four days later—you know what difference two years can make, Madam Speaker. Please note that an election had taken place in the meantime, but this suppose is only a mere coincidence. I am sure it did not influence the Minister's opinion in any way.

The Minister said—I am pleased to see the Hon. Member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead (Mr. Gérin) across the floor, for I have something to say to him later.

Mr. Gérin: That is not what you said!

Mr. Boudria: Then on June 22, 1989, we were told, and I quote:

> Our legal advice is that we do not have the legal right to require a retailer to impose the tax extra to pricing, or to include it in the pricing.

Another contradiction! Again, when can we believe the government opposite, Madam Speaker?

Personally, I am sorry to say, I have come to the conclusion that we just cannot believe the government opposite any more, and that the Canadian people were duped by the Tories during the last election campaign.

[English]

This leads me to believe, very sadly I might add, that this Bill C-20 should be defeated. I say to all my colleagues across the way, all the ones who can think objectively in this debate as I know they should be able to do, defeat this bill and vote against it, because this bill is a silent killer of jobs. The Minister of Finance said so himself. If the Minister of Finance disagrees with what I said just now, let him rise immediately in his seat and state so right at this moment.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Madam Speaker, my colleague just made a good speech about people who he says mislead others. WonderBra-Canadelle has been in Lac Mégantic in my riding for a very long time and gives work to many people. This company is also in Rivière-du-Loup and employs many there. This company was also in the riding of my friend opposite and at some point, it changed its operations and decided to shut its plant in my hon. friend's riding and to expand its plants elsewhere, for the sake of greater productivity and competitiveness. The company has invested a million dollars in Lac Mégantic. If you knew how angry the company president was when he called me! He said to me: "Who is this Liberal Member to blame it on free trade? Free trade has nothing to do with it. He is completely mixed up! This Liberal MP is trying to confuse Canadians, to mislead Canadians by doing that." I think that he sent him a letter or phoned him.

• (1820)

But the Hon. Member did not write or make a public statement saying that he had just made another mistake, and it happened in his own riding. You know, Madam Speaker, I listened to his speech. It is fun to point one's finger and say, "You misled people, you misled people!" No, we misled no one. The president of the company himself, Mr. Létourneau, accuses you of misleading your constituents and Canadians in general. Canadelle-WonderBra has greatly increased its staff as a result of free trade, with freer movement of goods. This company is in an excellent position. So be careful with your accusations! Watch out for those accusations which are completely gratuitous and try, sir, to be objective and impartial. With this Bill in particular, strive for that impartiality which is absolutely necessary for the men and women of today who are called upon to govern the country.

Mr. Boudria: It is hard not to answer that, Madam Speaker. Of course, it will be very easy to disagree totally with my friend opposite.

First, he, more than others, should know that Canadelle, when it shut down in my riding, cost 100 women their jobs. I certainly have no apologies to make to Mr. Létourneau who has just closed a plant in our area and cost my constituents their jobs. If anyone should apologize, it is he—he should come to my riding and publicly say he is sorry to my constituents whom he hired until two months ago, telling them that there were jobs for them, knowing that he would lay them off two months later.

Mr. Gérin: Three hundred jobs in Québec!

Mr. Boudria: Now, Madam Speaker, I want to tell my colleague from Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead (Mr. Gérin) that he also must know that Canadelle, an American company 100 per cent owned by Sara Lee of Chicago, bought out its only competitor in Canada, Daisy Fresh, or what was for all practical purposes its only competitor. So Canadelle has almost cornered the market. This company has the whole market to itself in Canada.

Investment Canada's criteria are such—

Mr. Gérin: A wonderful company!

Mr. Boudria: Investment Canada's criteria, Madam Speaker, are such that the Government of Canada must not allow a competitor to acquire a Canadian company if it eliminates competition. What did the Conservative Government do? It let Canadelle buy out its competitor and there is only one company left in Canada. What do we see today? We see plants close in my riding.

I must tell the Tory Member opposite and other Conservative Members who will listen that as I speak now, there are women in Hawkesbury who are losing their jobs because of this Government's policies. If apologies are in order, the Conservatives whose policies force my constituents out of their jobs should apologize.

I see the Hon. Member opposite, the Minister— At least she no doubt sympathizes with the 95 women in my constituency who are losing their jobs before Christmas.

Mr. Gérin: She is not Minister!

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I must tell you that the matter is not funny.

I think I just recognized an Hon. Member who is not a Minister as being one. I wish she becomes a Minister some day. Perhaps she would be more qualified than those who are now in office—that would not be difficult.

I would like to suggest to her that there are hard times in Hawkesbury, in my constituency.

On December 1st, 1982, 20 per cent of constituents in that community lost their jobs. That was because of a pulp and paper mill.

Mr. Pronovost: Getting a new Member of Parliament is the only solution.

Mr. Boudria: I must tell the Hon. Member for Shawinigan that this is not funny.

I would like to suggest to the Hon. Member opposite that at that time in 1982, 20 per cent of constituents in that area lost their jobs. This no doubt was one of the saddest periods in the history of that community. And now, in 1989, when the rest of Ontario is booming, we are hit once more, with that many constituents losing their jobs. And to add insult to injury, it seems those famous corporations have a knack making such announcements before Christmas, as if this was not sad enough. At least they could show a little more sensitivity when choosing the timing.

Anyway, this is my answer to the Hon. Member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead.

[English]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, first I wish to express my gratitude to my colleague from the New Democratic Party who has enabled me to go next in the speaking order. Even as I stand here, I am sure that hundreds of my constituents are beginning to gather out in Ottawa South where they hope to hear the truth about the goods and services tax and to express their discontent and displeasure about it.

I wish to speak on Bill C–20 with reference to a very particular problem in it. I will resist the urge to go into many of my concerns about the tax that is proposed to replace the existing Excise Tax Act, namely the goods and services tax. My concern relates specifically to clause 8 of the bill. I must say at first glance it appears that the proposal in this bill is just to make a few simple changes to the Excise Tax Act, albeit important ones as it involves increasing the rate at which the tax is imposed on various items.

In clause 8 there is a provision that would shift the federal sales tax on laundry detergents from the manufacturing level to the wholesale level, effective January 1, 1990. While this bill and this clause in particular were examined by the legislative committee, I am of the view, having reviewed the proceedings of the legislative committee, that this review unfortunately did not fully address some key problems which ultimately will serve to cause distortions in this industry.

In the first place, I believe that this shift would cause some significant administrative and legal problems as a matter of enforcement of the act, as well as administrative and financial problems for those involved in the distribution chain with respect to this product.

Moreover, some of these complexities would be imposed only one year before the goods and services tax is to be implemented. We all know of the potential complexities and difficulties that are faced with that. It makes one wonder why a mere year before the imposition of the new tax we are changing significantly the application of the old tax to the laundry detergent sector.

As I understand the laundry detergent industry, clause 8 appears to discriminate in favour of one firm in Canada at the expense of others, fundamentally affecting the competitive environment for this product. To be specific, it appears that the firm Proctor and Gamble has been given a hand by the government when it could very well have tended to its own affairs in the current legal framework.

What is even more disconcerting is that it appears that this matter should have been elaborated upon in the legislative committee. For some reason it was not. Clause 8 in Bill C–20 has the effect of interfering in the marketplace where presumably the marketplace has the ability to sort itself out.

Generally, tax shifts of this type are determined through consultation with the relevant industry, usually at the request of the majority of the industry in Canada. It concerns me that the majority of the industry does not concur with the approach the government is taking in this specific case.

Pet litter, video cassettes and automobiles are all examples of cases in which such shifts have occurred in the past, where the majority of the industry in question has made the request to shift the tax to a different level in the production distribution chain. This majority request scenario usually benefited Canadian manufactured goods versus imported goods. The following points should be considered before we proceed any further with this bill: first, it is patently unfair to make this move since it benefits one manufacturer and discriminates against others. It therefore puts the government in the position of helping one manufacturer over others. Second, it is in effect for only one year, assuming that the goods and services tax is in fact enacted by this House and implemented as of January 1, 1991, which we have all read about in the newspapers.

• (1830)

Likely, therefore, the legal problems for the government and the industry during this year will just compound the difficulties to be faced with preparation for the implementation of GST. Next, the financial return to the government, as I understand it, is insignificant. Finally, finance has apparently elected not to provide in the bill a definition of laundry detergent but has decided to leave that matter up to Revenue Canada to administer.

The proposal moreover has the appearance of being politically motivated rather than being a fiscal proposal consistent with other fiscal measures. For these reasons, I move the following amendment to the motion which is before us:

> That the motion be amended by striking out all of the words after the word "that" and substituting the following:
>
> "Bill C-20, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to a legislative committee for reconsideration of Clause 8 (1)."

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Sparrow): Debate is on the amendment. The hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to be able to rise today and speak to the motion before us. Essentially the essence of the bill is the increase in excise tax. As we know, every Conservative budget since 1984 has made plentiful use of the consumption tax and used increases as a source of new revenue. We, the New Democratic Party, have estimated that the Conservatives have added more than $900 to the tax burden of the average Canadian family between the years 1984 and 1988 through increases to the sales and excise tax alone.

In addition, a central tentative tax reform has been to further increase the role that consumption taxes play in our system over all. The 1989 budget contributed significantly to this trend and the move toward the implementation of the goods and services tax continues that contribution. First of all, the Conservative government increased the federal manufacturers' sales tax on assorted items on many occasions through this period of time. As we have heard expressed in this House on numerous occasions and as I have heard expressed in my own constituency during public hearings that I held, this government came into power in 1984 with a manufacturers' sales tax at 9 per cent. That manufacturers' sales tax has been increased a number of times to the point where it was at 12 per cent prior to the introduction of the bill that is in front of us today.

This bill, despite all of the words the Minister of Finance has used to describe the manufacturers' sales tax, killer of jobs being the most prevalent that he has used, despite all of these things that manufacturers' sales tax is being increased in this bill from 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent. It is a bad tax being compounded by being increased to further add to the costs of our manufacturers and of our consumers.

The other changes that are proposed in this legislation that is in front of us are an increase in the sales tax on construction materials and equipment for buildings from 8 per cent to 9 per cent beginning January 1, 1990; an increase in sales tax on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products from 18 per cent to 19 per cent, already begun the day after the budget was presented on April 28, 1989; an increase in the sales tax on telecommunications and programming services from 10 per cent to 11 per cent beginning on June 1, 1989; and an increase in the sales tax on all other goods, the manufacturers' sales tax that I referred to goes from 12 to 13.5 per cent which began on June 1, 1989. Despite this legislation still being in front of us, that increase has been implemented already.

I think that this has to be taken in an over-all context as we look at what is happening to our economy as a whole and the various pieces and how they fit into it. This government has been attacking the consumer and the individual member of our economic society with little tax increases here and little tax increases there and the over-all impact has been significant.

A couple of things that are of considerable concern to me are the agriculture sector and the northern economy. We have to look at not just this excise bill but the possible implementation of the goods and services tax and the other matters that this government has recently been, in a sense, foisting upon the people of Canada.

I particularly, at this point in the evening, want to draw the attention of the members of the House to the people who live in the northern part of Canada, the people who have been living in areas designated for the northern tax allowance. Those areas include substantial parts of northern Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia.

A task force recently reported to the finance minister. This task force recommended very strongly that the boundaries for the northern tax allowance, the benefit program for people who live in northern and isolated communities, be moved north so that we disentitle from that tax benefit a large number of those Canadians in Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba and British Columbia as well as many people in the Atlantic provinces and the northern part of Quebec and Ontario. In Saskatchewan alone, if the recommendations of that task force report are accepted, 150 communities will lose benefits under the northern and isolated posts tax allowance program.

I have called upon the Minister of Finance to reject the recommendations in that report for a number of reasons. These reasons include the fact that the northern and isolated tax benefits program recognized that people who live in these communities have an unfair burden to carry because of their distance from the manufacturing sectors, from the distribution sectors of our country.

• (1840)

I think particularly of people in communities in my constituency who live some distance from those points. They are paying a considerable amount extra as it is for the goods and services they purchase. This bill before us today increases the cost to those people at a higher rate than it would to the people who live in Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal. I think it is going to be tough enough on people who live in Montreal, Vancouver, and Edmonton to pay the extra costs that this excise tax bill will impose on them. Add to that the burden that is going to be carried when the northern people have to pay the new 9 per cent tax, when that is implemented, and then remove the benefit which equalizes them with the larger urban centres. We see that it is a very disproportionate burden that these people are going to have to pay. These are people who are working, raising families, trying to make a living in communities that are a considerable distance from the large urban centres.

Many of them are there because that is their home, that is where they want to be and that is the quality of life that they want for their children. They are close to other family members and, as a result of the removal of their tax benefits and the imposition of these new taxes, it is more and more difficult for these people to live in the same world and society that is being lived in by those members of the House from the larger urban centres, particularly the Minister of Finance from downtown Toronto. People who live there cannot understand what it is like to have to get up on a 40 below January morning and have to drive 50 miles in order to get to the place where you are going to earn your living that day. It is a situation that I consider to be quite intolerable.

The northern tax benefit program was one that I considered to be not quite as fair as it could be. I have had many opportunities to discuss that program with the chairperson of the northern tax program prior to writing his report. We discussed quite a number of things including the fact that the existing program was unfair to a number of those people in the communities. We were looking at ways to make that program much fairer for the individuals who live there.

I can think of many different scenarios that were presented to the chairperson of the task force that would make the program more fair for those people who living there. Instead, what was it that the task force did? On the advice and direction of the Minister of Finance the task force decided that it had to cut the costs of the government and foist those costs on the people who live in the northern part of Canada. We estimate $100 to $150 million will be coming out of the economy from the northern and isolated communities because of the recommendations of this task force report. That will be $150 million going to the coffers of the government from northern residents all at once and on a yearly basis. I think it is an appalling situation that has to be corrected immediately. The only way to correct it is to reject the recommendations of that task force.

Those people who came before the task force said that it is an unfair tax and proposed different ways to deal with it. The chairperson of the task force decided that instead of dealing with this in a fair manner, he would simply move the boundaries north in order to get away from the squabbles and arguments that were occurring in some of these communities. They wanted to set it up so that it would be far enough away from the population so that there would not be much fighting over where the boundary line is.

In terms of neighbours, you are talking about two people who live in a community, two people who have separate properties and put a fence down the property line. One person decides that that fence is in the wrong place and starts to argue over where that fence should be. This government is proposing to expropriate the land, pull down the fence and force those people to live under rules which no longer apply to them. It is a situation that creates a worse unfairness than that which existed before, and that has to be corrected. It is not going to be corrected at all when we have to deal with legislation like that which is in front of us today which calls for the continued increased in taxes.

I might indicate that under all the circumstances that we see here the average northern family in Canada can look at increased costs of $710 a year as a result of the budget this year of the Minister of Finance, and $1,000 after the tax reform of the government has been implemented by 1991.

It reminds me of a story that I heard recently about a young fellow by the name of Brian who was going to school. The teacher found young Brian out in the schoolyard just a hammerin' on one of his schoolmates. The teacher said to young Brian: "Why are you pounding on your friend? You have him down. Why are you hitting him when he is down?" Young Brian looked up at his teacher and said: "Well, that is what I got him down for, teacher".

That is exactly what this government is trying do to people of the north. It has them down and is continuing to hammer at them; first of all with excise tax increases, second with the removal of tax benefits that equalizes their ability to live in the north and, finally, with the goods and services tax. Hit them when they are down. That is exactly what this government is attempting to do here.

We can look at what the excise tax means to the people of the north. There is a 10 per cent telecommunications tax. If there is anything that technology in this country is doing, it is improving the ability of northern Canadians to communicate for health purposes, for business purposes, and for many other purposes that make life a little easier in the north. No sooner is the technology available to assist northern Canadians to live their lives better than the government comes along and puts on a new tax that makes it more expensive for them to utilize those new technologies.

We can also look at building materials. This excise tax bill increases the cost of construction in the north, a direct cost on something that is already very expensive. We know that people in the northern communities, the Indian and Métis communities, or just any of the communities in northern Saskatchewan, Manitoba, British Columbia, and other parts of the country, the costs of construction and the costs of living are much higher than anywhere else. This government comes along and says that it is going to make it more costly for them to live there and is doing absolutely nothing to try to equalize those costs through the tax benefit program that is being removed.

There are quite a number of things that I would like to say. I could go on and talk about the goods and services tax. Before I conclude today, I should mention briefly that witnesses appearing before the finance committee talking about the cost of living in the north indicated that it is possible that the implementation of the goods and services tax could cost northern Canadians as much as 26 to 30 per cent more for their goods because of the way in which the tax will be calculated on transportation and the handling of goods that are going up to the north.

We are talking about things that are not taxed and will not be taxed under the existing legislation. Food in the north will actually be taxed because it has to be transported to the north. That transportation will be taxed, as you are very much aware, Madam Speaker. That is not going to be subject to the rebate program that the government has been talking about.

The government is forcing Canadians not just to think about tightening their belts, not just to plan to tighten their belts, but is forcing them to actually tighten their belts themselves. The member for Mississauga South, who is the chairperson of the finance committee, was quoted yesterday in this House as talking in a letter about the government stealing money from Canadians. There is no question that this forced belt-tightening by this government is taking money out of people's pockets. They are taking away the disposable income from people in rural and northern Canada, the disposable income that is so important to stimulate those economies. We have incredible amounts of difficulty in the north and in rural parts of Canada, a lot of which has to do with no disposable income. The price at the farm gate is insufficient to provide disposable income for the agriculture sector. Therefore, there are no extra funds to maintain and build small town Canada. The same applies to northern and isolated communities. This government is forcing that upon us, and there is no recourse for the people in these parts of the country.

• (1850)

The New Democrats have long recognized the inequalities in the existing sales tax system. There is no question. The Minister of Finance points it out day after day in the House here that we want reform of the sales tax system in this country. Unlike the Conservative government opposite, our reform objective is to limit the role consumption taxes will play in our system, not to heighten it further. The economy can ill afford the possibility of higher interest rates which will be caused by these sales tax increases.

The sales tax increases will add to the inflationary pressures that we feel. As a result, the interest rates in the country will go up. Again, in the rural and northern parts of the country, there is no question, interest rates have to be dealt with by this government quickly and in an appropriate fashion for those communities.

I look forward to other opportunities when I can discuss the goods and services tax in particular. In a previous speech in this Chamber on October 7, I mentioned that I held public hearings of my own in my constituency. Residents of the community came and presented their concerns about the goods and services tax. I have since written a report, and presented it on behalf of my community and my constituency to the members of the finance committee. I look forward to the opportunity to discuss the results of that hearing and the recommendations in that report with members opposite in this Chamber at another time.

Mr. Althouse: Would the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake care to briefly tell us some of the things that his constituents were telling him about the goods and services tax.

Mr. Taylor: I appreciate the opportunity the member for Mackenzie has given me.

We had representations from almost every sector of our economy. We had representations from the farm community, the business community, the charitable organization sector, the tourism sector and the service sector. Many individuals, groups and organizations came before us. The public hearing was shared and co-chaired by a member of the legislative assembly in the urban part of my constituency, Mr. Doug Anguish, a previous member of this House. Members of the community came before us and presented their concerns.

One of the particular concerns that struck me was the effect that the goods and services tax will have on the charitable organizations in our community, not the charitable organizations that may in fact get a 50 per cent rebate on some of their costs, but the ones that will not be eligible for rebates at all. One in particular the member for Mackenzie might be interested in is the Agricultural Society, the organization that puts on and sponsors our annual summer fair. It brings in numerous people from throughout the country to display their agricultural products, their livestock, their poultry, as well as participate in the midway and the fun and games that go along with a country fair.

The Agricultural Society or the Exhibition Association, as they are called now, came before us and indicated that the goods and services tax is going to be applied to admission cost. In a sense, this will deter people from coming to the fair.

The tax will be applied to the sale of lottery tickets. Saskatchewan already applies a tax to lotteries. We call it "the tax on dreams". The people of Saskatchewan are turning their backs on the provincial government because of this 10 per cent extra tax on lotteries. Can you imagine what will happen when there is another 9 per cent added to the cost of this so-called tax on dreams?

That affects the Exhibition Association and the running of our fair in that the fair organization makes money by renting stalls to charitable groups and organizations for the sale of raffle tickets. One organization will be raffling a crocheted item, another one maybe a large quilt that has been made by a large number of people. The funds raised by these raffles are used for community events. The cost of those raffle tickets in Saskatchewan has more and more reduced the sales of them. The charitable organizations putting on those raffles are no longer coming to the fair and renting the stalls.

The addition of the goods and services tax means that the revenue base that is available to the Exhibition Association is less. It will not be long before we find that the Exhibition Association no longer has the revenues it needs to provide that fair which brings tens of thousands of people to our community in the Battlefords for those fair days. That is money that is not going to be spent in our community on other things like restaurant food or hotel rooms, all of which will be subject to tax which were not taxed before.

I want to raise briefly one other example. I am looking forward to quite a large block of time offered in this House to discuss this matter more fully. The North Battleford City Kinsman Band, an organization that is sponsored in part by a local community group which provides music lessons for young children in our community, is going to have to raise an additional 8.7 per cent in operating funds just to survive from year to year because of the imposition of the goods and services tax. This is a horrible situation.

This band, the number one marching band in Canada right now, as a result of Canada-wide competitions may not exist, according to the bandmaster and the band's parent association, in three years time because of this goods and services tax forcing the cost of music lessons up, increasing the costs that parents have to pay to have those kids in that group. It does not qualify under the charitable provisions of the goods and services tax for any rebate whatsoever.

People from many other sectors talked to us including tourism, hospitality and agriculture. I look forward to talking about those sectors at another time.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, it is always an honour to get up and speak to this house as the member from Nunatsiaq, the good land, the beautiful land. Before the end of the Thirty-fourth Parliament I intend to ensure that all members know more about the area I come from. Hopefully, some of them will be able to come up to see for themselves, as my colleagues from my party had the good sense to do over the course of the summer. I invite anybody who is willing to come there to see for themselves not only the beauty of the land, but also the way people live up north and how hard it is to live there with the cost of living being as high as it is. I would like to touch on that during the course of my speech addressing the bill on excise tax.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-20, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Tax. This bill implements certain changes announced in the budget of last April concerning excise taxes and duties on tobacco products and gasoline and increasing sales tax rates pending the implementation of the goods and services tax.

• (1900)

Last June, at second reading of this bill, the Minister of State for Finance said: "The measures taken in the April budget were carefully chosen to ensure a balanced approach that takes regional situations into account and that imposes the heaviest burden on those who are most able to bear it". On behalf of northerners I would like to challenge that statement.

In referring to the federal sales tax as the centrepiece of another government strategy to strengthen Canada's economy and preserve essential programs, the minister said: "The sales tax will result in significant gains for economic production in all sectors of the economy and all regions of Canada". Again, on behalf of northern regions of this country, I challenge that statement as well.

A budgetary measure which is being implemented with this bill is an across-the-board increase in the existing federal sales tax rates in advance of the goods and services tax. The federal sales tax rate increases are, according to the government, a revenue bridge to the new goods and services tax.

What are these rate increases? There is a 1.5 per cent increase in the general sales tax rate from 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent effective June 1, 1989. Effective April 28, 1989, there was a 1 per cent increase to 19 per cent for alcohol and tobacco products. Effective June 1, 1989, the federal sales tax rate on telecommunications and telecommunication programming services was 11 per cent. On January 1, 1990, the federal sales tax rate on construction materials goes up to 9 per cent. All together these measures will contribute to about $1 billion in 1989 and $2 billion in 1990 toward reducing the deficit.

Excise duties on cigarettes as well as federal sales taxes are raised so that the federal revenue from a carton of cigarettes is increased to $4. This bill also implements increases in excise taxes on gasoline and aviation gas. Effective April 28 the excise taxes on gasoline rose by 1 cent per litre. They will rise again on January 1, 1990, by an additional 1 cent per litre.

The tax increases which are being given effect by this bill have negative effects on the north and northerners. There is a program at the present time under which primary producers such as farmers, fishermen, loggers, miners, hunters and trappers receive rebates on federal sales and excise taxes on motor vehicle fuels. Hunters and trappers currently receive a rebate of 5 cents per litre of gasoline. After December 31 of this year hunters and trappers will no longer receive rebates for the excise tax.

On April 28 hunters and trappers had to pay an additional 1 cent per litre in excise tax on gasoline. On December 31, they will lose the rebate on the excise tax and on January 1, 1990, they will have to pay an additional 1 cent per litre on their gasoline.

The hunters and trappers of the north are among the poorest citizens of this country. They hunt and trap to feed and clothe their families. These tax increases on the fuel they need to assist them in providing for their families is going to impair their ability to do so.

As a general comment, the increase in gasoline and aviation fuel excise taxes also has a disproportionate impact on the north because of the higher usage of aviation fuel for transportation in the north. The increase in the telecommunication tax also affects northern residents in a disproportionate manner. Because of the great distances in the north we use fax machines to compensate for the poor mail service and we have to call longer distances by telephone.

Sales tax increases, as the government knows, are regressive taxes. Lower income Canadians feel the impact of sales tax increases more than higher income Canadians. Yet it was this government in the previous Parliament that increased the federal sales tax from 9 per cent to 12 per cent. In last April's budget, the government raised the federal sales tax to 13.5 per cent. Now it wants to replace the federal sales tax with the goods and services tax in 1991.

• (1905)

The new goods and services tax is to be applied at the rate of 9 per cent to a broad range of goods and services that have never been taxed before. The government argues that since the rate will be reduced from 13.5 per cent to 9 per cent Canadians will be better off. The government does not want Canadians to remember that it was the government which raised the existing federal sales tax from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent since it was elected in 1984. There is no guarantee, furthermore, that the savings from reducing the tax will be passed on to the consumer. Also, many more goods and services are going to be taxed than before.

When the Finance Committee heard from northerners in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories they heard that northerners do not want this tax. It will impact on northerners more than those on any other part of the country because of the high freight and transportation costs in the north, and the fact that northern costs of living are the highest in the country.

One of the other examples that I would like to use is the proposed 32 per cent increase in postal rates. This increase was supposed to be on November 13 of this year. However, because of the objection of members of Parliament as well as other leaders from the north, Canada Post decided that it could postpone raising the postal rates until January 31, 1990. January 31, 1990 is in three months, and Canada Post considers that it is doing us a favour by giving us an extra three months to try to come up with alternatives to combat the 32 per cent postal rate increase on food, on produce that is sent up to the north.

It is all very well to think that we get a breathing space of three months. However, one must be aware that in those three months falls the month of December in which the government basically stops operating. It is the Christmas month. People want to be with their families.

They want to go home for the Christmas holidays. Their minds are on Christmas and they are reflecting on the past year and not necessarily on whether they should be meeting to address the concerns of a few thousand people in the north. Those few thousand people in the north are going to feel the effects of that 32 per cent rate increase on January 31. Yet the people at Canada Post or the minister responsible for Canada Post do not seem to care very much about what will happen when that rate increase goes into effect.

We know what is going to happen. People are going to feel that they can do without that extra cucumber or orange or milk and use substitutes instead. Here it is taken for granted that you can go to any grocery store and buy any one of those things I just mentioned to feed your family so that you have good nutrition. People in the north do not have the luxury of being able to jump in the car and drive to the nearest supermarket to buy oranges, apples, celery or all those other good nutritional foods that accompany what your main meal might be. I must admit that we do have some good food up north in terms of caribou, seal, whale, walrus, whatever. However, we now know that we need that produce to make sure our kids stay healthy.

On January 31, we are going to feel the effects of this 32 per cent rate increase. If there was a 32 per cent rate increase down here there would be chaos in members' ridings. Everybody would be screaming bloody murder from all areas across Canada. I talk about screaming bloody murder because people would not accept a 32 per cent rate increase down here. They would never allow it, never mind a 10 per cent or a 5 per cent rate increase on postal services on which the lifeline of the north depends.

The Ottawa Citizen on Wednesday said: "Northerners Lifeline Goes on Block". It is very true. It is the lifeline that is going on the block. What will happen is that people will go without.

Just by way of example of this happening, earlier in the year there was a report that mothers from Broughton Island had some PCBs in their milk. One mother decided that she should not be feeding her baby on her milk. Because she could not afford the milk that was in the store, she bought Coffeemate. How much nutritional value does Coffeemate have? That is what will happen to the people up north with this increase of 32 per cent added on to the 9 per cent goods and services tax. Added on to that is the fact that unemployment insurance benefits are now going to decrease by three weeks from 42 weeks to 39 weeks for those who work 10 weeks or less, and for those who work 18 weeks or less from 50 weeks to 47 weeks.

With all that, we are not going to be able to afford to buy any store bought goods. We can hardly afford to buy them now. Earlier in the summer we heard on national radio that one of the members from our party went into a store in the Iquluit, looked at a turkey, and could not believe that that turkey cost $70. Here you can go into any store and buy the same turkey for about $25. No wonder we do not really have Thanksgiving. To give thanks for Thanksgiving you have to spend so many dollars just for the turkey, without the trimmings. It is always an honour for me to address the House and try to teach the members a little bit more about the north. I hope that before the end of this Parliament a lot of members will be more knowledgeable about the north.

In the Throne Speech earlier this year in April the north was mentioned quite prominently. At that time my remark was, "Great, we were mentioned quite prominently". I figured that we were sort of being handled with a velvet glove before the hammer came down. It seems that this has been the case today.

In conclusion, I would just like to take this opportunity to say that there has to be some recognition that the north is a very unique area where special concerns have to be addressed in terms of the economy, how the people live and where the cost of living is two to three times higher than here.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise, not entirely unmindful of the consternation this may cause in the breasts of some members, to participate briefly in the debate tonight. In the form of something of a protest. I understand the question before the House at the moment is and seconded by members of the Liberal Party. It takes the form of a six-month hoist.

Mr. Boudria: It's a reference to committee.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): It is not a hoist? I am sorry then. My objection remains. It is simply this. The hoist amendment and the referral amendment are in essence boring. It is these boring dilatory formulations with which this House has been afflicted on several questions now during this session.

I, for one, would like to take this opportunity to urge my friends in the Liberal Party if they are going to continue to propose dilatory motions at various readings to move more into reasoned amendments. Reasoned amendments have about them the advantage of a certain political joie de vivre in that they are almost without exception the opportunity to propose exactly why it is that the bill before the House is execrable and ought not to be proceeded with. This lends to the debate in such instances a certain focus—

Mr. Walker: Slow down. We can't keep up with you. What was that word?

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Am I to put up with this harassment, Madam Speaker?

If I may be allowed to proceed, I would only say and emphasize, if I may, that the reasoned amendment is a course that I would commend to my Liberal friends in the House. This one, for example, was perfectly susceptible to a reasoned amendment dealing with the increase in the manufacturers sales tax from 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent. It was the perfect opportunity to place a substantive objection before the House in the form of a reasoned amendment and thereby stimulate, as is to be hoped, some reasonable, intelligent, even dare I say it, passionate debate on that question. But, no, once again we have the tepid, flaccid, in most respects pointless dilatory motion to refer to a committee. I ask you, Madam Speaker: in the array of devices available to a parliamentarian in this House, there are few that could be deemed more boring. It is unfortunate that this is the sort of material given by the Liberal caucus to this House for this House to deal with.

• (1920)

Having said that, I would just say, of course we will support this dilatory motion, because it is—

Mr. Boudria: It is not a dilatory motion.

Mr. Peterson: It is a hoist.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): The Liberals cannot agree among themselves. I will grant them that it makes it somewhat less boring.

Mr. Walker: It is a reference.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Now it is a reference. This is getting better all the time.

In conclusion, I would just say that we will support the motion because it is implicitly, at least, a rejection of the bill. That is to its credit. That is all that is to its credit, but it is to its credit.

I think I can safely say on behalf of all of my colleagues here that the bill before the House enjoys no support in this caucus. I assume it enjoys none in that caucus. Perhaps now we can get to the vote.

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, perhaps since you are also from Alberta, you can just translate what we have just heard so we can better understand what took place.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Sparrow): I might have just as much difficulty as you.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, for the benefit of our colleague who was commenting on a subject which he obviously had not seen or heard, perhaps I could take this opportunity to read the amendment to him so that in the future he will at least know what it was that he was talking about earlier tonight.

Effectively, the motion we moved earlier tonight was the following:

> That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following:
> > That Bill C-20, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to a legislative committee for reconsideration of Clause 8(1)

I just want my colleague to know what it was that he made his speech about. It is always nice to go back home and be able to explain to one's constituents just what one was saying.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I thank my friend for that kind elucidation, although I must say the point remains. The motion lacks the pith and passion that might otherwise be present in a proper reasoned amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Sparrow): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Sparrow): The question is on the amendment.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Sparrow): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Sparrow): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Sparrow): In my opinion the nays have it.
