The elderly are also in a poor position to fight back against a government that is whittling away at their pensions. They cannot afford to hire an expert who can help them to file their forms and show them how to reduce their taxes. They are being cheated by this government's clawback scheme out of the pension they have paid for in the past. This is exactly what the Prime Minister promised not to do during the last election campaign. Indeed, in the presence of his mother, the Prime Minister promised that any government he would lead would improve pensions rather than degrade them.

• (1530)

The government swore during its election campaign that social benefits would not be jeopardized and that old age pensions were a sacred trust. Suddenly, after the election, statements about sacred trusts are being replaced by statements about the need to decrease the deficit. The government knew, or ought to have known, the state of the financial books at that time. Yet the government chose not to tell the Canadian people then. Now the government is stating that all Canadians, including seniors, have a responsibility to pay out of their own pockets to make up for this government's fiscal ineptitude. This, I submit, is a blatant breach of faith. The government has gone about breaking its word in a very insidious manner. This government claims that it is continuing the principle of universality but in reality it is cancelling it. It does not even have the courage to be honest with the Canadian people.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. Questions or comments?

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the hon. member for his remarks. In a very short period of time he has clearly demonstrated that he is a very perceptive analyst of the social programs and the social needs of this country. It is a pleasure to listen to him. I would have been quite prepared to continue listening for a longer period of time.

I would like to ask the hon. member, given his unique background as a medical doctor and his experience around the world, if he would be prepared to continue his comments in analysing the importance of social programs within the Canadian scene and comparing them elsewhere.

I would also be interested in hearing his comments about the effect on the credibility of the political process when the government now in power came to power by establishing one set of social programs and then breaking every promise it made.

Mr. Pagtakhan: I thank my hon. colleague. I would like to continue, indeed.

This government claims it is continuing the principle of universality but in reality it is cancelling it. Although it still sends old age pension cheques to everyone, it then pulls them back from the people. This is not universality. To be universal a social program must deliver benefits to everyone regardless of income in the target group. A universal old age pension, for example, must give net benefit to everyone over age 65. Old age pension benefits have been juggled several times over the years, but every adjustment left net pension in the hands of everyone, rich or poor.

A further consideration is that this government's global scheme will be costly and inefficient. Indeed, it is ridiculous that the government is trying to save money by clawing back but then spends money on all the people and paperwork necessary to collect the clawback.

The government continues to contend that universality has not been affected. In reality, the government is breaking the psychological barrier to whittling away universality. When a bedrock value in Canada like universal social programs is tampered with, it causes us to worry about what will be tampered with next.

Will the government tamper next with the health care program? In Bill C–28 this government has attacked the very principle which has made the people of our country secure and which has been the cornerstone of our social policy.

Thus I speak out against Bill C–28 and against this government's insidious attempt to abandon universality. Constituents of Winnipeg North speak up against this bill in defence of universality.

I call on the government to exercise a conscience, to withdraw this bill in the interest of all Canadians, in the interest of Canadian families, and in the interest of Canadian seniors.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–28 attacks the right of senior citizens. It attacks their pensions for which they worked very hard. It attacks family allowance and our families. It attacks the principle of the universality of social programs that we designed and implemented many years ago. Bill C–28 attacks the social contract of a self-respecting Canadian society that respects its senior citizens and its children.

[English]

This bill is a betrayal of the Prime Minister's promises made in the last election. I remind members of the promise made by the Prime Minister in Sydney, Nova Scotia during the last election campaign. He said: "As long as I am Prime Minister social programs, especially those for the elderly, will be improved, not diminished".

This Bill C-28 is a betrayal of what the Prime Minister once called a sacred trust.

Bill C-28 makes 59 different amendments to the Income Tax Act and is a Tory plan to end universality of our social programs and thereby penalize Canadians. Part 1.2 under clause 48 implements the clawback of family allowance, the clawback of old age security pensions. It will take from Canadian families $1.68 billion of their budgets in the next five years, or the government will clawback $500 million a year from our seniors and from our families.

The government in this bill proposes a threshold of $50,000 at which individuals will begin paying back their family allowances and old age security benefits. I remind the House that both these programs are only partially indexed above 3 per cent. The deindexing of the $50,000 threshold means that within 10 years close to one million Canadian families will start losing their family allowances and old age pensions. The clawback proposal would put a special tax on families with children and on seniors.

I mean by "a special tax" an inequitable tax and unfair tax because it does not apply to anyone else. You have to be a senior or have entitlements to family allowance to have this tax applied to you. It does not take very much logic to understand that this clawback is anti-family and anti-senior.

How can Canadians trust someone who in front of the cameras in the last election made a solemn promise to his mother—remember that one—never to touch universality. A few months later he turns his back on his own mother and abolishes universality. That is exactly what the Prime Minister said during the election, yet he reverses himself completely, publicly, and brings on this atrocious bill.

My leader said during the election: "Citizens of this country, working throughout a lifetime to help build Canada, have depended on the old age pension as a right of citizenship. They have spent a lifetime of being taxed and they have planned their future on the basis of that pension. It was part of the social contract in this country".

That is the commitment. The Mulroney government is breaking that life long contract and I say to it: "Shame".

• (1540)

Last September 23 the National Council of Welfare, in its last report, stated: "There is no question the clawback puts an end to universality". It went on: "A social program that delivers benefits to everyone and then collects them all back from some recipients is not universal".

The Prime Minister, when informed of this statement by the National Council of Welfare, said: "Well, it is just another comment. It is just another statement". I was upset and very shocked by the Prime Minister's back-handed type of comment to this very important National Council of Welfare report and his display of a certain amount of arrogance toward the council.

I wrote the Prime Minister a letter, dated September 14, 1989, and there has been no acknowledgement yet. I told him that I was upset and angry. I wanted him to give us some reasons why he was proceeding with this savage attack on families and seniors. No answer.

But we heard one of the most prominent of his back-benchers, the chairman of the finance committee who is going around the country on the GST at this time, speak the same language as the National Council of Welfare. Here are the words of Mr. Blenkarn, one Tory member, a prominent member in terms of finance, stated: "We have decided to eliminate universality and we do that in a—"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not wish to disturb the hon. member's debate, but he should recognize the hon. member as the hon. member for Mississauga South.

Mr. Gauthier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rompkey: For the time being.

Mr. Gauthier: For the time being I will recognize him as the member for Mississauga South, and I will go on to quote him again. He stated: "While the clawback may be unfair and sneaky it is there". That sounds like clear language from a member of that Tory caucus—the clawback as read.

The executive director of the Canadian Council of Social Development also stated: "Social programs aren't a sacred cow any more. They are a dead cow". Michael Walker, director of the Vancouver Fraser Institute, a right wing organization, stated: "This means we will get rid of universality gradually". Mr. Speaker, the Senior Citizens Federation of Canada, in a letter it wrote to the Prime Minister, stated: "We view this proposal as a serious breach of faith by our government, an insidious effort to undercut the social security programs that you have on numerous times stated are a sacred trust".

I ask: Is everybody wrong and this government and the Prime Minister the only ones who know what is right? These people are making it clear to Canadians that it is wrong to put into our social program network a clawback which takes back from the seniors and from families certain moneys to which they are entitled.

In the past five years the Conservatives have made it their policy to speak out of both sides of their mouth. What was sacred trust before the election is a broken promise after the election. Even the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, when he was the Minister of Health, stated on December 21, 1984: "All savings generated from any changes will be redistributed to social programs and will not be applied to deficit reduction". He also went on to say: "Benefits from old age pensions will be taxed no differently than any other form of income". That is a minister of the Crown speaking.

It does not make any sense that after an election in 1988 they come back and throw away all these promises, all these undertakings, all these commitments they make to Canadians. They did not say that during the election. No way, no way. They said different things and that is why I say they are two-tongued.

[Translation]

They talk out of both sides of their mouths!

I see you are about to rise, Mr. Speaker. I hope I have another question so I can finish my comments.

[English]

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I have a comment and a question for the hon. member. He has great experience in this House and as a parliamentarian. He has clearly demonstrated it in his remarks this afternoon. There is an enormous amount of cynicism and disenchantment among the electorate about politicians who make promises, say things, and then get into office and do exactly the opposite.

The member has articulated very well the fact, I believe, that the Prime Minister supported the policy of universality before the election and then appears to have blatantly reneged on that promise. I find this very difficult to accept and to understand, as I am sure the Canadian people do. I wonder if the hon. member is prepared to comment on that and on the cynicism that this creates among the Canadian electorate.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to that question by saying that a buck is a buck is a buck. Taxed as we are, it should not matter where the money comes from. But the progressiveness of our tax system under this government is changing. If you are a senior citizen, tax policies will be applied differently.

A person 40 years old earning $40,000 will be taxed a certain way, but a senior citizen in that same category income tax-wise will have to be paying taxes on his or her old age security pension.

I find that difficult to understand. I find that clawback proposal, putting a special tax on seniors and on families, to be totally inappropriate. We have a progressive tax system and we cannot start applying special taxes to seniors and to those who are entitled to family allowances. I think that is wrong.

Universality is a principle that the member should know well because his father, Paul Martin, when he was a member of this House was one of the proponents, one of the great defenders, who put in place in this country those social programs which you and I share today, including the old age security pension and health programs.

We have developed in this country over the years a great system of social programs. All Canadians have universal access on a non-profit basis. Whether you can afford it or not you will get fair, equitable and good treatment in our hospitals and in the health care system.

You will get a pension; it does not matter if you are from the east or the west, tall or short, fat or whatever, you get the same pension whether you are rich or poor. That is what is called universality. That is why the National Council of Welfare said in its report published in September:

There is no question that the clawback puts an end to universality—A social program that delivers benefits to everyone and then collects them all back from some recipients is not universal.

It appears to me that it is a very simple argument. Why is the government proposing today to tax seniors and family allowance recipients in a different manner than it taxes other people? I tell you that is wrong.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, normally when there is significant change in social policy governments come forward with a White Paper or a royal commission and say up front that they have decided to change the social contract within a country.

• (1550)

One of the things that surprises me is that this government is probably making one of the most significant changes in our social policy, certainly since the end of the Second World War, and it is doing so while at the same time trying to deny that it is taking place. But then again, I am beginning to understand that what the government says and what the government does are two entirely different things. It says it is going to improve the Unemployment Insurance Act when in fact it is diminishing the benefits available to a large number of people and starting the dismantling of the unemployment insurance system.

It is going to improve VIA Rail by doing away with half of it. Now it is introducing a fundamental change in the Canadian social security system without ever even acknowledging that this is what is taking place.

This bill deals with two fundamentalist aspects. One is the whole question of universality of social programs and the other is the credibility of this government, particularly the credibility of the Prime Minister. On both counts the government seems to be determined not to acknowledge that this is what is taking place.

I cannot help but think that much of what we are seeing in this legislation is outflowing from the free trade deal. During the debate on the free trade deal and the discussion during the 1988 election campaign, the government insisted over and over again that the free trade deal would not affect our social programs; that it would not affect our programs like unemployment insurance, health care, pensions and family allowances; that these were programs that would have no impact from the free trade deal. Yet, as soon as the free trade deal was ratified we found out that all these programs were under attack.

There is a harmonization taking place between the social programs in the United States and the social programs in Canada. This means that there is a fundamental change taking place in Canada. The United States has a free market concept even in the area of social programs, that is, the wealthy and the powerful can take care of themselves and then they set up a charity for those who fall between the cracks, those who are unprotected—the weak, the poor and the disadvantaged—and provide them with a few minimal crumbs.

Canada has taken a different approach. We have said there are some social benefits in this country that go to all citizens. We have outlined these. Pensions for the elderly is one area that I will come back to on a number of occasions. The concept is a universal program to which every elderly person based on their citizenship, not on their race, colour, creed, wealth, income, or anything else, is entitled. That is universality.

We have established family allowance, again quite unique from the United States. The United States has no universal family allowance program. We say that every child as a right of Canadian citizenship is entitled to receive family allowance. It is not dependent upon them being from Vancouver, Halifax or Yukon. It is not dependent upon their parents being educated or uneducated. It is not dependent upon their parents being multi-millionaires or are eking out a living. We have said that we have a concept of universality and this bill attacks those two programs.

Let us also take a look at our other universal programs in Canada. As sure as this government succeeds in doing away with universality of those two social programs, it will do away with the universality of other programs.

Let us take a look at them. First, our health care system. The concept is diametrically different from what it is in the United States. There is no universal health care, particularly hospital care, available to those in the United States.

In Canada there is. One of the fundamental rights of being a Canadian citizen is that one is entitled to health care as a universal program.

Education is a fundamental right. It is a universal program in Canada. We have universal unemployment insurance in Canada. The United States does not have any universal unemployment insurance program. What we see now is the government attacking these programs.

Before I go into detail about the pension and family allowance, I want to explain how it is starting to attack the universality of the other programs. Let me take as an example the health care system. The health care system in this country is deteriorating badly. In my own riding of Surrey North we have a crisis. The Surrey hospital is dramatically underfunded. The publicly elected board was suspended some time ago. The public has been kept from involvement in that hospital in order to cover up the difficulties that are emerging in the deterioration of health care. Clearly, part of that is the responsibility of the Vander Zalm government, but the federal Conservative government is also responsible. It has been systematically reducing the transfer payments for health care to the provinces. Last year it reduced it by 2 per cent. This year it has a companion bill to this piece of legislation that will reduce it by another 1 per cent. This is in spite of inflation in the area of health care.

There is a deterioration in the funding level for health care from this government and from the provincial government. In an area like Surrey North, which is one of the fastest growing areas in Canada, there simply is not the funds to maintain the services, let alone the expansion that is necessary in order to meet the growing population.

We have some very ludicrous situations happening in Surrey North. We built a hospital complex, but the two levels of government do not provide the funding for the staffing of it. We now have a situation where the people in Surrey North are disentitled to the universality of health care. They do not get the same health care as one gets in Vancouver or in Montreal or in Toronto. This is a method of eroding universal programs.

The same thing can be said in terms of the decision to opt for two—tiered health care systems. Within the province of British Columbia the government has been sending up trial balloons by proposing that perhaps there should be certain kinds of medical services available to those who can afford it. We now have private clinics springing up. Instead of having to wait for a public bed hospital one can go in and pay if one can pay the full cost.

Ms. Black: One system for the rich and another for the poor.

Mr. Karpoff: That is right. We are not getting universality but one system for the rich and another for the poor.

The same thing is happening in education, which is another universal program. We have a whole series of private educational facilities, even at the elementary level, springing up. As the funding for the public school system is kept down, the calibre and quality of the system deteriorates. Those who have money opt for a private system, particularly when it is funded 75 per cent or 80 per cent by public dollars and all they have to do is throw in the extra 20 per cent.

What we have in this bill is the beginning of the erosion of universality of our social programs. I think it is appropriate that we remind ourselves of the old story of the Arabs and the camel in the tent. The camel sticks his nose in the tent and says all he wants is for his nose to get warm. Of course, when you allow his nose in, then he puts his neck, his front quarters and his hind quarters in and then he forces you out of the tent. The Conservatives have learned that if they tried up front by a major policy decision to say that they were doing away with the concept of universality of social programs in Canada, there would be an uprising in this country, so they are going to do it incrementally, incrementally, incrementally.

Maybe the only Conservative who is honest and upright about this change is the hon. member for Mississauga South, otherwise known as the chairman of the finance committee of the House. He says clearly that it is eliminating universality and yes, it is unfair and yes, it is sneaky. But he is the only one that is willing to admit that yes, it is unfair and yes, it is sneaky. What is behind this bill is a sneaky attack on the major element of social programs in this country, that of universality.

One of the things that we should also continue to remember is that this is an attack on the credibility of the government and particularly the credibility of the Prime Minister. When you look at the statements of the Prime Minister, it is almost incomprehensible that we could be standing here in this House debating this type of a bill. In March, 1984 he said our position is simple and straightforward, we are in favour of universality in social programs and it shall not be touched. How do you get from that statement to this legislation if it is not a sneaky move?

Again, when he was talking to the seniors in October, 1988, during the election, he said: "Let me say a special word to the senior citizens. In the future Canada, we'll be doing more, not less, for all of you". Get the words, "we'll be doing more, not less, for all of you". He did not qualify that by saying for all of you earning under $50,000 or for all of you earning under $40,000 in 10 years. He said,"for all of you. As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada, social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved, not diminished by our government which is committed to social justice and fairness for Canadians". How do you get from that statement to today? Sneaky.

What we have here is not only an attack on seniors and families, but an attack on all of our social programs. Maybe the most unfortunate thing for Canada in the long run is that we have had an attack on the credibility of government. People are becoming not only sceptical, they are totally disillusioned. How can you accept a Prime Minister standing up and saying clearly, unequivocally, that we are going to increase programs for the elderly, for all people, and then bringing in a piece of legislation like this?

I want to touch briefly on the substance of the bill because I think the substance of the clawback system has been discussed in the House. I am sure others will deal with some of the technical parts of the bill. Basically we are saying that, because we are going to be only partially indexing the clawback system over the next few years, more and more seniors will lose all of their old age pensions. Who is to say next year that the government will not decide it is $40,000 maximum and the following year $30,000? Once the camel has its nose in the door of the tent, who is going to stop it? I say we stop it now.

If any people accept the statements of the Prime Minister as guarantees, then they are really living in fantasyland. Next year, why is it not going to be $40,000 or $30,000 as the threshold? Do you believe the Prime Minister because he says $50,000 is the limit? No. What we have is the beginning of the erosion of our universal system. They cannot even get the technical parts of it right. A family is not even considered a family unit. A one wage earner family is treated differently than a two wage earner family. At least if you are doing away with universality, get the technical parts of it right.

I want to just turn, in my last three or four minutes, to some of the alternatives. This change is being made in the name of deficit reduction. Everything that the Conservatives are doing, they say that it is because we need deficit reduction. There are many better ways to reduce the deficit, and I will just mention a couple of them.

All you have to do is increase the personal income tax rate for the highest income tax bracket by 1 per cent and you would gain the same amount of money that you would get in the clawback of family allowance and old age pensions. If you were a little bit brave and decided that you were going to increase the tax rate from 29 per cent to 32 per cent, you could in fact dramatically reduce the deficit by $2.5 million.

What we now have is, I think, a very quick sleight of hand taking place by the Conservatives. They are again protecting their friends in the wealthy group. If they raised the tax for all Canadians in wealthy groups, they would have to pay considerably more money than what they will lose in terms of the clawback on family allowance.

I just want to finish with one quick statement. Every organization, the seniors, people representing the Canadian Council of Social Development, have all been very, very clear that this is the end of universality. If the government really believes that it is best for Canada to do away with universal social programs, then at least conservatives should have the honesty and integrity to stand up in this House and say, "We believe that universal programs should be done away with and that is why we are bringing in this legislation."

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment my colleague from Surrey North on his comments. At the beginning of his remarks he made reference to the trade deal with the United States. How does he see the impact of the trade deal on the attack on our social programs in Canada today?

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, during the election and the trade debate in the fall of 1988, the government kept insisting that there was nothing in the free trade deal that was going to put pressure on the harmonization of social programs. Immediately the deal is consummated, we find that all of the social programs are being attacked, and they are being attacked in a manner that is going to bring them into harmony with the programs in the United States. They are reducing unemployment insurance. They are doing away with the universal old age pensions. They are scrapping universal family allowances. They are starting to erode our health care system so that we are going to end up with a patchwork health care system like the United States has.

They keep saying that, "we are just doing this because of the deficit", when the reality is that they knew that as soon as they consummated that deal, unless they started to harmonize our social programs, the United States had already served notice on them that it would bring forward actions to have our social programs deemed to be an unfair trade advantage, a subsidy under the free trade deal.

The government is not even willing to take the chance of going through that process and possibly losing at the end. It is taking the attitude that in case we lose, we might as well capitulate. We have seen that in fish. We did not even fight for it, we just gave up our whole processing industry in British Columbia. It is happening in steel.

One of the things they keep saying is that we are not doing it because of the free trade deal, we are doing it because of the deficit. A family that is earning over $100,000 is going to lose $270 per child by this clawback system. Let them keep their family allowance, tax it at a normal rate, but let us increase that marginal tax rate for the wealthy of 29 per cent to 32 per cent and that family would pay $2,250. This government has bought its rich friends another $2,000 in an unfair tax advantage.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment in view of the remarks of the member from Surrey North and the previous remarks made by my good friend from Ottawa—Vanier. There is always the danger as these speeches are made in the House of Commons that somebody in the gallery or listening on television may actually accept what is being said because it is not always directly contradicted. Anybody who reads the budget papers from April will know very clearly what the extent of this change is, though members have indicated to the contrary.

I want to record some of those facts before I put my question. There are 54,000 high income old age assistance recipients who would repay all of their benefits. This means that those people have incomes in excess of $77,000 net, after all the deductions, after they have taken off all of their preferential tax treatment.

It is so interesting to hear our friends from the socialist party get up in the House of Commons and object to the taxation of these people, to say that is wrong, that we are violating a sacred principle. What we are violating is a sacred cow. You cannot eat universality, you cannot wear it, you cannot put it in the bank. It is the obligation of the government to keep a sound treasury, to ensure that the nation is not bankrupt so that we can continue social programs. How ridiculous it is for members from a socialist party to stand in the chamber and defend people whose incomes exceed $77,000 a year and who are being asked to forgo a portion of the funds that they are getting from the public treasury.

I do not see why anyone would regard that as an unreasonable action, especially a member of a socialist party dedicated to the elimination of poverty, dedicated to helping those in need. Now they refuse to take from those who have in order to give something to those in need. Would you please answer that?

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the finance committee expressed it well. It is sneaky what you people are doing because what you are doing is in fact making sure that your rich friends do not pay fair taxes. You could reduce the deficit. All you have to do is increase the marginal tax rate by 1 per cent and wipe it out. I do not care whether the money comes from one source or another, let us tax them all fairly.

The question is, why do you guys not raise the tax for the wealthy right across the board by 2 per cent? Then you will have a fair tax system. What you guys have done is—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, thank you for recognizing me for debate on Bill C-28. I am sure that observers of the House, having seen the events of the last moments, would agree fully with a motion that I would like to move.

I give notice that at the next sitting of the House, immediately before the Order of the Day is called for resuming debate on the motion for second reading of Bill C-28, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, and on any other amendments proposed thereto, I will move that the debate shall not be further adjourned.

I am sure Canadians observing the last moments can fully understand why the government is serving notice.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell—VIA Rail; the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys—VIA Rail; the hon. member for Edmonton East—Banks—Alberta Business loans portfolio/Reversal of policy—Position of Minister.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-28, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat shocked and dismayed that the government would move so quickly to stifle debate on the bill before us today. It is a bill that is going to inflict unknown hardship on the elderly of this country and on those who worked to build this country to make it the great nation that it is today. To move so quickly to shut off debate on this contentious piece of legislation is not in the best interests of the people of Canada, and is taking away from the retirement of our seniors. It will inflict hardships on them that are not acceptable in today's society.

While I welcome the chance to add my voice to the torrent of those who are opposed to the bill, it is with regret that I rise to speak on this matter. Many people of this country believed the Prime Minister's claim that universality is a sacred trust. Further, I loathe seeing how his actions reflect on the respect that the people have for this House, for all members of Parliament and for the truth, as I am sure some of the members opposite are beginning to understand. The actions of the government in introducing this legislation reflect very poorly on all members, on Parliament itself, and on the very idea that this is an institution of truth and respect. Never before has the Prime Minister so blatantly stated one thing during a general election less than a year ago and done quite the opposite almost immediately thereafter.

In fact, on October 16, 1988, when in Summerside, he told the citizens of Summerside, P.E.I.:

> As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved and not diminished by our government.

When in Summerside, did the Prime Minister tell the truth? Did he go on to attempt to explain that he would introduce a clawback, a mechanism that would slowly eat away at the very social benefits he said he would improve? Of course not, because he knew the people of Summerside and the people of Canada would recognize the truth behind his words, that he fully intended to dismantle universality.

Did the Prime Minister of Canada tell the people of Summerside that if re-elected, the next budget he would bring in would shut down their town, that he would move the armed forces base, that he would close down half of the passenger rail service in this country, that he would attempt to make unemployment insurance unworkable? Did he say that he would remove the underpinnings of the orderly marketing systems, that he would trade away the very livelihoods of farm people behind closed doors, that he would close up a total of 14 military bases? No.

He spoke of the free trade agreement. He said that it would ensure our social programs. The truth was, he was assuring corporate America with the free trade agreement, that we would remove those social programs because our neighbours to the south had nothing to compare with them.

Did he speak of the huge national debt that his government had inflated in the last five years? Did he say the deficit had increased in the last two years from $28 billion in 1987 to $29 billion in 1988–89 and to $30.5 billion in 1989–90? Did he say that the free trade agreement would cost the government $10 billion in lost excise revenue in a year and that that money would have to come from somewhere? It is obvious that some of it will be coming from the scrapping of the universality of our social programs, from a new tax on nearly all goods and services.

Did he mention that his government in five years is responsible for 50 per cent of the national debt since Confederation? No. He and his Minister of Finance hid the truth like a candle under a basket until November 22. They knew the economic record they had created and they knew how dismal that record really was. They knew they would push interest rates up, that they would overvalue our dollar. Even now the Minister of Finance would rather go to court than lift the basket, and release those studies that a newspaper applied for under the Access to Information Act, acting in direct contravention of that act.

The government neglected to point out that as every year passes, pensions become less and less secure and social programs will be less and less universal. The threshold today is $50,000, as outlined in the legislation. By the year 2000, if the clawback is left as it is, it will have fallen to the equivalent of $35,000. It will affect almost 30 per cent of all families that receive family allowance; that is, if the government does not accelerate the rate of the clawback.

The Prime Minister said this would not happen. But look at recent history in the country. The finance minister said when the individual surtax was introduced that it was temporary. Now this bill will make it permanent and raise it from 3 per cent to 5 per cent. The government said the clawback will not be increased, the goods and services tax will not rise from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent like the present sales tax has under its stewardship. Yet taxes have increased 31 times under this government since September, 1984.

I remember on June 17, 1987, that the Minister of Finance told the country that when the new sales tax is introduced, the personal and corporate surtaxes will be removed. The Minister of Finance has introduced his sales tax so where is the bill to back up his 1987 statement? Where is the clause that removes, as promised, the temporary surtax? What does history show for the future, more of what we have seen since 1984? Does it show the clawback will not be accelerated, the general sales tax will not be accelerated, the once temporary surtax will not be accelerated? I think it shows quite the opposite, despite any assurance the government may offer at this point to the people of Canada.

The clawback is nothing more than a licensed theft. If a private corporation attempted to treat their old age pensions like this legislation is going to treat the old age security, they would be breaking the law. Canadians who paid tax in the early 1950s to 1971 paid a special surtax for their pensions. In fact, the 1979 tax guide stated: "All taxpayers whose taxable income is over $500 are subject to the old age security tax". To take this money back now on their old age security is the equivalent to theft, and the government wants to steal back some of that money. Just a little now, it says, as if that makes it okay.

What is being taken away is the very principle of universality, the principle that our tax system should be fair, a principle that is outlined in this bill and a principle that is depended on by scores of elderly here in Canada.

The chairman of the finance committee knows it. It is what he told his constituents. In a recent letter to one of his constituents he said:

> We have decided to eliminate universality, and we do that in a sense that by the clawback in both family allowance and old age pensions. As you know, it has been a Conservative philosophy for some time that distributions from state ought to go essentially to those in need. While the clawback may be unfair and sneaky it is there.

The clawback, like this government, is both unfair and sneaky, and the actions of the government are uncovering the candle of truth it tried to hide with its words. The government's actions admit what it did not say prior to November 21, 1988. It still will not admit that the government decided a long time ago to eliminate universality, to shut down VIA Rail, to undermine orderly marketing, to privatize unemployment insurance and to cutback universal medicare, and in so doing, change the Canada we have known for the last 122 years.

In that last 122 years since Confederation, Canada has developed as a nation of compassion, a caring nation, a nation that has cared for the elderly and less fortunate, a nation with a safety net that was available to society, a safety net that provided for health care so the elderly could live their retirement free of worry and want, a life of dignity. This bill will strip that dignity away from the elderly and the less fortunate of Canada, today and in the future. This bill is wrong, the clawback is wrong, the government is wrong.

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex. I think it is very important that we remember that what is happening here flies, as he said, in direct contradiction to the commitments this government made when it was out on the hustings looking for votes. There are a few aspects of the hon. member's remarks that I would like him to expand on a bit.

First, this government tries to persuade Canadians that one of its top priorities is to reinforce family life. I was wondering whether the member might comment on the effect of the particular approach they have taken to the clawback on the family allowances. A family with two incomes gets taxed in a much different way than a family with just one income, even if that income is at the same level. I would ask the member to comment on that.

Second, I would like to ask the member to comment on the fact that the government apparently sees this as a deficit reduction measure, a way to save money and deal with the fiscal problems of this country. I wonder if the member might comment on the justice that is involved in clawing back pensions and the family allowances as opposed to using other sources of revenue which the government might look to in order to solve its fiscal problems.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague for the question. Perhaps I should deal with the family allowance portion of his question first. I am sure that he has a similar situation in his riding as I do in mine. My riding is a predominantly rural riding.

Because of government policies over the last few years, the farm income has dropped dramatically to the point where many farm families have husbands and wives both who have to seek off-farm employment in order to keep the farm operational and in order to subsidize the farm income. Having a clawback apply to their family allowances hits them extremely hard, because the money that they anticipated putting away for their children's education, money that they anticipated would be available for them to buy clothes, to buy food and the finer things in life, will no longer be available to them. In effect, what is happening here is they are robbing Peter to pay Paul. I think this is wrong. The people who are having, for example, to work off their farms, moonlighting if you want to call it that, in order to make ends meet and have large incomes that are being used as subsidies, should not be subjected to this. It is very unfair that this should have to take place in society as we know it today.

In terms of the deficit reduction, I do not think it is at all fair that the government should try to fight the deficit on the backs of the elderly and the less advantaged of this country. As I mentioned a few moments earlier, Canada is looked upon as a caring nation, a nation that looks after the disadvantaged and the people who do not have the same opportunities in one region as they do in another. I think it is blatantly unfair of the government to make such a move as this to try to fight the deficit. The deficit has been increasing and will continue to increase as long as the balance of trade continues to slip, not in favour of Canada, but in favour of our trading partners. Therefore, it is blatantly unfair that the older and the less advantaged in this country should be burdened with having to fight a deficit such as this government is running today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, in rising I want to indicate again my unhappiness with the fact that during the speech which the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex just gave there was not a single minister of the Crown in this House. There is an obligation, it seems to me, Sir, that ministers of the Crown be—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order. There is a custom in this House not to say anything about the attendance of members. These ministers or members may be outside watching it on television, in the lobby or outside the lobby, or behind the curtain. I do see a minister in the House, but the hon. member should know.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, with great respect, I think that there is a tradition in this House that a minister be present in the chamber during discussion of government bills. That is the point I am trying to make. It seems to me, Sir, that that is an obligation.

We had a few minutes ago the spectacle of the Minister of National Health and Welfare waltzing into this House, standing up and indicating that he was going to move closure, then waltzing out again. I say, Mr. Speaker, that shows a contempt of Parliament unparalleled in our history. It is a shocking contempt when, after two days of debate on this bill, for the ninth time in this Parliament we have had notice of closure. No other Parliament in Canadian history has been so burdened with closure the way this Parliament has been under this Conservative administration, the fumbling and bumbling of which has resulted in this dreadful bill that we are debating today.

I can understand the Conservatives anxiety to rush the bill through because they do not want the people of Canada to hear how bad this bill is. They feel that if they can move closure on the bill and ramrod it through this Parliament, then there will not be speeches on the bill through which they as ministers will have to sit. The Conservatives know what we are saying is true. They do not want the Canadian people to listen to speeches that indicate the faults of this bill because Canadians might believe it and, the next time they get a chance, will vote this group out of office. Well they should, Mr. Speaker. There is ample reason for that on the basis of what we have heard today alone.

The Minister of Fisheries is mumbling things from his seat. I invite him to participate in this debate and make his voice heard. Perhaps tomorrow night at one o'clock in the morning he can tell us about it.

Mr. Siddon: Speak on the bill.

Mr. Milliken: I intend to turn to the bill.

I want to make certain points, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the clawback provisions of this bill because that, in my respectful submission, is the most important and evil part of the legislation. It affects Canada's seniors and I am going to deal with that aspect of it. I am not going to deal with the clawback of family allowances although, as I will say at the end, most of the comments I make on the one could be applied mutatis mutandis to the other. I will stick to the clawback of the pensions, and I want to say certain things about that which I think are important.

First, the question of a clawback, in my view, is manifestly unfair. Speaker after speaker on this side, of the few we have had on this debate, certainly, and those on the budget when it was debated, have indicated the unfairness of this provision. Our leader, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, in his initial address on this bill indicated his objection to this particular clawback arrangement.

I reiterate that one of the problems with the clawback is manifested by this example. I will indicate a suggestion to Your Honour and see if Your Honour does not agree with me that this bill is unfair in its application and in its treatment of the senior citizens of this country.

Take the position of a senior citizen residing in his own home, fully paid for—the Conservative dream I am sure. It is certainly the dream that we on this side of the House have espoused for Canadians—mortgage free, it is a valuable piece of real estate that is increasing in value every year. His income, including his old age pension, in our example is $50,000. Imagine if after a year or two this senior citizen becomes incapable of continuing to live alone in this home. The house is then put on the market and sold for, say, $300,000. If the person is living in Toronto, that would be easy. It would not be a very great home for $300,000 in the Toronto real estate market the way things have gone under this government.

The senior citizen sells the home, takes the $300,000 and invests the money at, say, 10 per cent. Then his income goes from $50,000 to $80,000. Clawback! That senior citizen loses the pension and moves into rental accommodation. Is that fair? Why should the senior citizen be penalized for moving into rental accommodation because the person is unable to continue to reside in his own home? Yet that is the effect of this legislation which the government has introduced.

Mr. Siddon: Check the facts.

Mr. Milliken: I have checked the facts with the hon. member for Etobicoke North, my colleague. He knows the facts and he is well aware of what is in this bill. If the Minister of Fisheries disagrees with my assessment he should make a speech because I am right, and he knows I am right on this point.

The clawback will set in and the senior will be deprived of the income from that pension. Mr. Speaker, you are a man of sense. You must agree that this particular provision is unfair, unreasonable and ought to be stricken from the bill.

In addition, I invite you to consider the costs of this particular system. The government says that universality is a sacred trust, pensions are a sacred trust so we do not want to breach our obligation to the electorate. They tried and there was such an outcry that the Prime Minister himself backed off and ordered the Minister of Finance to recant his heresy and withdraw the changes to the old age security pension that were introduced in the Parliament before this one.

Now instead of trying to do it by the front door, the Conservatives are doing it by the back door. Instead of taking away the pension, they say that they will give you the pension but they will tax it all back. That is what they are doing. That is what this is all about.

I want to take a look at the costs of this little proposal of theirs. I have taken a quick glance, with assistance, at the Estimates. I did a quick calculation. I went into the Estimates and I looked at the cost of administering the Department of National Revenue. I looked at the cost of the taxation branch which amounted to the pretty sizeable figure of $946 million. That is what it costs to administer the tax system in this country. That is for all the tax police. I took 80 per cent of that, because 80 per cent of the combined personal and corporate taxation is, in fact, personal taxes in this country. Eighty per cent of the $946 million yielded a total cost of $757 million to administer the income tax portion of our tax system.

That does not include—I want to stress this—the administrative superstructure of the Department of National Revenue; the minister and his car allowance, the deputy ministers and their allowances, the various administrative personnel at the top of the department who do not specifically assign any portion of their costs to this taxation branch. If you do that simple arithmetical calculation on budget figures, not on actuals, I think you will find the cost of raising a tax dollar in Canada is about 7.5 cents. For every dollar the government raises it pays out 7.5 cents to collect it.

Then I did a similar analysis for the cost of paying out the old age pension. The government administers pensions worth almost $12 billion per year according to the 1989–90 Estimates. The costs of administration of those pensions, again according to its Estimates and again without any of the superstructure of the Department of National Health and Welfare, amounted to about $56.35 million. So, the cost of paying out the money to the Government of Canada in the form of old age security pension cheques amounts to 2.1 cents for every dollar paid out.

Under this new scheme, the money is not taxed in once, it is taxed in twice, because the government is going to tax the money first, pay it out and then tax it all back. In fact, you have to double the cost of collection from 7.5 cents to 15 cents and add the 2 cents on for the payment out. You get about 17 cents for every old age security tax dollar that is dealt with in this double-barrelled system the government is proposing.

I know the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans will be working these figures out in his head and double checking my arithmetic.

Mr. Siddon: That's oversimplified.

Mr. Milliken: It may be oversimplified but I have not added in some costs that I cannot calculate. Perhaps the Minister could have the officials of the Department of Health and Welfare do the calculations, and I invite him to do so. I think if he calculated the cost of the loss of interest on the money during the time it is paid out and paid back he would find there is an additional cost. He should add in as well the cost of hiring the extra tax police we will have to hire in Canada to administer the new taxation laws because here we are adding another 84 pages or so to the Income Tax Act of Canada, which is already enormous. Everybody knows the Income Tax Act is too complicated, except the Minister of Finance and the people advising him, who seem to make it more complicated with every passing year, and obviously his supporters on the back-bench who talk about the virtues of tax simplification and do everything they can to make it more incomprehensible and complicated.

I say that in all those circumstances the minister has done nothing to improve the tax law. He is going to have to hire more people and those additional persons are going to drive up the costs I have referred to of 17 cents on the dollar. It is going to go up, it is not going to go down and the ministers of this government are well aware of that fact.

I think those are reasons enough to consider rejecting this unfair tax but, as I said at the outset, every single one of the comments I have made in relation to old age security could be applied to the family allowances. Without having done the calculation, I would wager with any of the ministers present that the costs of administration of that program are higher because the amount of money dispensed under it is lower, and I am sure that more people, based on the dollars spent, are working in that particular branch or area of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

I think that the difficulties I have outlined with this tax and the difficulties I have outlined with this clawback provision, its unfairness, its meanness, its nastiness, and its inability to adjust to the changing circumstances of Canada's seniors in the 1990s, all dictate to us as members of parliament that we ought to reject this tax and vote against this bill.

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment my colleague from Kingston and the Islands for his usual analytical, logical and lucid discourse here in the House this afternoon.

I would like him to turn that analytical mind of his to the following comment that I have leading to, I hope, a question, because he was in fact dealing with the clawback. One of the interesting things in the clawback is the $50,000 limit. If we look at the analysis behind that we see, and many members have spoken on this, an inherent unfairness or discrimination in the treatment of that net $50,000 figure, particularly if we are talking about a one-income family as opposed to a two-income family. We can see that as it is presently set up we have a situation where a two-income family, with each person earning under $50,000, would end up not being clawed back. I would ask my friend from Kingston and the Islands to comment on that and on the obvious inherent lack of fairness of that provision.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend from Scarborough West for his kind intervention. I know that he has had concerns in his riding with this problem. I know that seniors in Toronto are very concerned about these provisions. I have had the same difficulty in my riding so I know that the question he asks is based on sound experience. What is surprising to me, I guess, is that none of the Conservative members of this House have seen fit to criticize this measure. seniors in their ridings across this country, yet we have heard not a single murmur of disapproval. I guess it is fear of the Minister of Finance and his wrath that dissuades them from making these criticisms.

Mr. Gardiner: It's too bad you can't call them trained seals.

Mr. Milliken: Yes, as my hon. friend says, it is too bad they cannot be called trained seals, but it would be unparliamentary to refer to them in any such way.

I want to answer the question. In my view the suggestion that my friend made as to unfairness in the administration of this tax is manifest in the way that it will be applied to both single-income families and double-income families. My concern is that the single-income family that receives in excess of $70,000 will suffer the clawback, whereas the double-income family, neither member of which receives the $50,000, will be much better off because there will be no clawback. As a result, the double-income family will have a larger income.

I stress the unfairness of that. It is another example of what I was suggesting earlier in relation to the house sale because if there were two family members each earning $50,000, the household would have a net income of $100,000, without any clawback. However, if one member of the family was earning $80,000 and the other was earning nothing, the clawback would apply, and obviously that family would be much worse off than the other with the two incomes. It indicates, in my view again, a manifest unfairness that on any basis should result in rejection of this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak against Bill C–28. This bill does involve the clawback of old age security and of family allowance. It is an attack on the seniors of Canada and on the mothers of Canada.

I would first like to address the issue of the special tax on seniors. Fifty–eight per cent of Canadians over the age of 65 are women. These women, for the most part, belong to a generation characterized by low paid labour force participation and, therefore, low pension income. They have raised children and they have contributed over 40 years of valuable unpaid work to our society. Now the Conservative government is again attacking their pensions. The Tory government is saying to these women that their contributions over the years in building Canada, in making this country what it is, are not worthwhile.

I want to tell the Prime Minister that the contributions of which older women have made to this country are valuable. The last attack on seniors was the Prime Minister's attempt to de–index old age pensions. We saw then a powerful movement of seniors. They refused to give up their rights and they refused to be bled dry by this government. This proposed clawback of pensions is another angle that this government is taking to chip away at seniors' pension rights.

Although the government was not successful in de–indexing old age pensions, it did partially de–index family allowances in 1985. This bill constitutes another attack on the family allowance program in Canada. The government made family allowance worth less and less each year in terms of real spending power and now it will tax back what is left. It is just one of the many ways that this government is telling the women of Canada that bearing and raising children is not really important in our society.

It is amazing to me that on the one hand the government is almost attempting to force women to have children through threatened restrictions on abortion and recriminalization, through the slashing of family planning education, through the lack of commitment to research into safe and effective means of contraception, and on the other hand, it is taking away financial support from mothers who have children. Family allowance cheques are the only means of federal income support that goes specifically to mothers.

The universality of our carefully constructed social programs is in jeopardy. The old age security and family allowance programs are the victims of a free trade budget, one that seeks to harmonize our social programs with those of the United States. What we are now witnessing is the Americanization of our social programs and the end to universality.

We need to build a country in which the contributions of parents are recognized. We still live in a society in which women are expected to make personal sacrifices for their families. Women are far more likely to interrupt their paid work to take care of children. Close to 74 per cent of married women in a Statistics Canada survey cited family considerations as a reason for their first work interruption. Family considerations were a statistically negligible factor in the pattern of men's work interruptions. Women suffer financially for doing one of the most important jobs that there is in our society, that of raising the children. This government is making it more difficult for families with children to make ends meet. Women earn, on average, 66 per cent of what men earn in the paid labour force. Those with children need the supplementary income that the family allowance provides.

This government gives two arguments in favour of robbing seniors and mothers by plunging its greedy hands into the pockets of older people and children. I would like to deal with both of them. One argument is that we just cannot afford to treat people fairly. We just cannot afford universality, the Tories say. The Finance Minister sings his familiar tune about the deficit, about the strain on the public coffers. I ask the government why it is not taxing the large, profitable corporations in Canada that pay no tax rather than the seniors and the mothers of this country. I ask the government why it signed the free trade deal which is not only costing Canadians their jobs, but has also resulted in a loss of $2 billion in government revenues due to the lifting of tariffs.

I know that the money must come from somewhere, Mr. Speaker, but I disagree with the government's decision to milk it from seniors and from mothers. In this bill there is a provision for capital tax on large corporations, not an income tax. This tax is applied to capital at a rate of 0.175 per cent on corporate capital in excess of $10 million. I only wish that all Canadians had as good a deal. We need a minimum tax on corporate profits to catch all large, profitable corporations which currently pay no taxes.

The other lame argument is that only the rich are affected. This is untrue. When universality is corrupted everyone will suffer. What was once seen as a right becomes a privilege for the poor. Pensions and mothers' allowances become charities. And since the cut-off point is not fully indexed to the rate of inflation, every year poorer and poorer people are affected. Well-off seniors pay today, middle-income seniors pay tomorrow, and the next day it will be the poor seniors.

The average family income in Canada is about $45,000. Individuals with income $6,000 higher than the average family income will begin to lose their social benefits. As time passes, through inflation more and more Canadians will be caught in the Tory tax trap. The clawback will catch about 128,000 pensioners by 1990. In 20 years over one million pensioners will have to pay back their pensions. If inflation rises by 4.5 per cent next year, the cut-off figures rise by only 1.5 per cent. It does not take a great mathematician to see plainly that most seniors will one day be forced to give up their pensions.

It is not only today's seniors who must fight this outrageous attack on pensions. Those who will be paying most are today's young people who may have no Old Age Security pensions at all by the time they retire. A similar fate awaits mothers who are receiving family allowance. Already a pitiful sum, in 1990 14 per cent of families will have their family allowance clawed back. In 10 years this figure more than doubles to nearly 30 per cent of Canadian families.

The more Tory government that our nation has, the poorer average families in Canada can expect to be. The targeting of family allowance for clawback means that a family with children and an income of $70,000 a year will be paying more tax than a family without children with the same income. This demonstrates clearly the Tory commitment, or lack of commitment, to families and to children.

This bill has been formulated without consultation with seniors and without consultation with women. The government refused to meet earlier this year with representatives of more than 500 women's groups who came to Ottawa specifically to talk to the government. This government thinks it can just ignore seniors and just ignore women. It believes it can bring in severe and regressive economic policies without repercussions from those most affected, from those who are impoverished by them.

This government and this Prime Minister cannot be trusted. In 1984 the Prime Minister said: "We are in favour of universality in social programs and it shall not be touched". In 1988, before the election, the Prime Minister said: "Let me say a special word to the senior citizens. In future Canada will be doing more, not less, for all of you. As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada, social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved, not diminished by our government which is committed to social justice and fairness for Canadians".

This government promised not to touch social programs. It has no mandate to decimate social programs the way it is doing now. Before the last election this government promised free trade would not affect our social programs. The government has no mandate to Americanize our social programs. This is a despicable way of worming into a universal program and destroying it.

This is why I have risen today, along with my other New Democratic Party colleagues, to protest the passing of this bill. I will join my colleagues and other activists outside the House of Commons to put a stop to this attack on our social programs and to end this discrimination against mothers and against seniors.

Not even all the Conservatives ignore the effects of their actions on seniors and women. The Tory finance committee chairman wrote: "We have decided to eliminate universality. While the clawback may be unfair and sneaky, it is there". I ask government members to reconsider their unfairness to seniors and to women, to change their minds about dismantling our social programs, to realize once and for all that seniors and mothers should not be made to pay for Tory mismanagement of our economy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments, the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to my colleague from New Westminster—Burnaby who gave a very excellent speech on the impact that this bill is having and the shilly-shallying we are getting from the other side.

I have a quick question to the member and it has to do with universality, a lot of which we heard about today. The members opposite talk about the bank president who gets all of these benefits through our universal programs. I would like her to get up if she could and just comment on a definition of universality. What does it mean to us in Canada? What have we fought for in this country? What are the Conservatives doing to destroy universality?

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Prince George for his question. Universality, of course, means that all people in our society should be eligible for the social programs like family allowance and old age pensions. We know that if there were a fair tax system in this country then all income would be taxed at a rate fair to our citizens. If you were at a very high income level, yes, you would pay more in tax, but all of your income would be included. It seems rather bizarre that in this policy to claw back the family allowance and to claw back the old age pension, some families will be taxed at one level while other families without children will be taxed at another level.

The whole idea behind universality is that it is universal. There is no means testing. It has dignity for all of Canada's citizens. This, I fear, Mr. Speaker, is what we are losing with this proposal to claw back.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of introducing measures to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act to include coverage for producers who feed their own grain to their livestock.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise today in private members' business to discuss a proposal which I have before the House as Motion No. 310, which asks the government to consider the advisability of introducing measures to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act to include coverage for producers who feed their own grain to their livestock.

The reasoning behind this is that I and many other Canadians in the agricultural business feel that there has been a form of discrimination in the way that we have formulated our stabilization laws over the past 30 or 40 years.

At the outset let me say that I had intended that this legislation would cover all of the stabilization acts in the country, but there was apparently a drafting error in that I had intended the motion to include not only Western Grain Stabilization Act but also the Agricultural Stabilization Act. Since I cannot amend my own motion, subsequent speakers, I presume, will be so doing. For purposes of my opening remarks, I would like to consider that both forms of stabilization program be included in the discussion.

I think that 40 and 50 years ago in Canada, agricultural economists and policy-makers seemed to be of the opinion—and this was the era when I was very young—that they had to provide policies that would encourage producers to focus on the production of a few items instead of the broad range of family farm production. There was a tendency among the bureaucrats and some of the politicians of the day to encourage the concentration of production into a few commodities.

Since that time, both the agricultural community and even some of the bureaucrats have noted that there are some problems going in this direction, because one can go too far. What we are left with is a series of policies that still encourage the production of single crops, or very few crops, and the encouragement of specialization into a very few commodities being produced on any one particular farm.

This has created some problems, both at the farm level and in rural communities, because by going too far in this direction we have ended up with programs like the Agricultural Stabilization Act and the Western Grain Stabilization Act, which presume that everyone should be producing grain for sale and not for secondary production on their own farms. In other words, they are discouraging the secondary production at home and the adding of value to grain and forage production at the farm level.

The effects on the rural community have been quite noticeable. If we worked in a system that encouraged add-on and secondary production at the farm level, we would find that more people can be employed on fewer acres than is the case where you encouraged the specialization of grain production alone. Very few people on a great many acres is the result, and rural communities fade and die and, in fact, have disappeared on much of the prairies and other parts of Canada as well, but particularly on the prairies.

That has been encouraged in part by the view of stabilization that has been obtained since the early 1950s and which is reflected in the Agriculture Stabilization Act and in the Western Grain Stabilization Act. The result has been that we find some rather silly inequities.

During the past number of years there have been fairly large payouts under the Western Grain Stabilization Act and under the Agriculture Stabilization Act on grain because the grain market was very depressed. Those farmers who produced their grain for sale off the farm received relatively large subsidies to help offset the difference between the very low market price and their relatively high production costs. The result was that producers who were in grain only tended to get paid almost all of their production costs after the stabilization payments were received.

However, those producers who chose instead to feed all or part of their grain on the farm and engage in secondary production, which is good for the economy, better for the environment, and has a host of good social objectives tied to it, were in effect told by the signals from the law regarding stabilization payments that their type of production was no longer needed and was not appreciated. The effect was that they received less money for their grain production than their neighbour down the road.

There were ways around it that some enterprising individuals used. Some divided their cattle feeding, hog feeding, poultry or dairy operation from the grain producing sector and purchased it as a separate entity and made the grain production eligible thereby for stabilization payments. In general, people who fed their own grain were feeding relatively high cost grain in competition with feeders who were buying grain at the market price which was lower cost to the feeder who was purchasing the grain. His costs were actually lower than the cost to the person who was growing his own under those conditions. That set up an unfair situation which I think government policy should not be encouraging to continue.

A number of organizations have pointed out the unfairness of this from the UPA in Quebec, l'Union des producteurs Agricoles, and the Canadian Pork Council which represents all of the provincial marketing boards across the country. I could go through the rather long list of organizations that have indicated that changes to these stabilization programs are needed, including the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, the Christian Farmers Federation of Ontario, the Ontario Cattlemen's Association, the Ontario Chicken Producers Marketing Board, the Ontario Egg Producers Marketing Board, the Ontario Milk Marketing Board, the Ontario Pork Producers Marketing Board, the Ontario Sheep Marketing Agency, and the Ontario Turkey Producers Marketing Board, just to mention the groups in Ontario. National groups include the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the National Farmers' Union; regional groups include the Prairie Pools Incorporated and others that I have already mentioned.

Various academics have looked at the question and have concluded that the stabilization payments should include farm-fed grain.

Daryl Kraft, an economist from the University of Manitoba, recommended that in his March, 1988 study of the Income Stabilization and Eligibility of Farm-fed Grain. One of the options under the Grains 2000 report included a farm-fed grain option being part of the stabilization program. Indeed, the need for farm-fed grain being included in stabilization programs is universal enough that there is no argument needed to convince legislators who make up this House as private members that it is needed.

The cost disadvantages have been quantified by various studies. Whether the study by Daryl Kraft is used, or the study from the Ontario Park Producers Marketing Board, there are a variety of ranges of figures for the various commodities. Just to give you some idea of what sort of disadvantages this particular administration of the stabilization programs can produce, Mr. Speaker, I suggest you look at the figures provided by the Ontario Pork Producers Marketing Board. They estimated that producers who grow their own feed are at a disadvantage compared to producers who buy feed of about $6.30 per hog or 7.7 per cent of their cash costs. They state that the economics of the situation will dictate a move both away from land based operations and towards large integrators who buy their feed, or even to a movement of hog production completely out of the province. That is the problem.

A similar distortion exists in the poultry industry, in the dairy industry, and in the beef industry. It is there. I will not go on boring you with a series of numbers, Mr. Speaker, I have some that would show that in the cattle industry the losses per head are much larger than with pork.

The only thing that has held back legislators and administrators up to this point was that previous to three or four years ago they could not see any workable way of administering this kind of a program. I submit that there are now several provinces that have been experimenting with programs to pay producers under slightly different programs. The administrative procedures that they have come up with would work in administering the stabilization acts that I mentioned in my remarks.

The province of Alberta has provided a system whereby it has attempted to pay the so-called Crow benefit to producers. I do not agree with the payment of that benefit as a matter of policy, but Alberta has created an administrative procedure which is possible to copy. It has simply computed the conversion factors for grains into beef, into litres of milk, into dozens of eggs, into pounds of poultry meat and decided that if the farm can show that it has produced x number of pounds of production of those commodities it will simply apply a mathematical formula to that and arrive at a presumption of how much farm-fed grain must have been consumed on that farm in order to have that level of production. It deducts any feed purchases from that and the difference is a farm-fed grain. The subsidy is paid on the basis of the tonnes of grain that are produced from that formula.

The formula is there. The administration has been tried in Alberta and is now being copied under similar programs in Saskatchewan and in Manitoba. That formula could be applied under the Agricultural Stabilization Act and under the Western Grain Stabilization Act to provide a payment for farm-fed grains, with the result that there would be no discouragement on the part of government programs. There would no longer be discrimination against those producers who chose to feed livestock, or poultry, or dairy cattle on the farm. It would stop being an impediment to the continuation of secondary production at the farm level. It would permit those communities where the individuals so wish to engage in value-added production at the farm and in their own communities.

This has good implications for the social fabric of those rural communities, and also for the total environment for all of us, because it would tend to disperse livestock production, making not only the accompanying smells easier to deal with, but the accompanying by-products and manure easier to dispose of and more available and useful to the soil for incorporation to continue the production cycle.

It has the advantage of being acceptable in a social context, in an environmental context, and I believe, since it has all these things going for it, that it is also high time that it was acceptable in a political context. The House, as private members, should approve the motion as it should be amended and recommend it for immediate action to the government.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, Canada's grain industry has been faced with a number of economic pressures in recent years. World grain subsidy battles, heavy debt loads, and drought have created hardships for agriculture and rural Canada. The agricultural trade environment is changing rapidly. In dealing with these facts, we have relied to a large extent on ad hoc government support programs. Farmers clearly need the assistance to improve their long-term financial stability.

Farmers across the country agree, as well, that there has to be a better way than the ad hoc methods that we have fallen back on over the last few years. There is also a general agreement that whatever we do, it must be consistent with our international efforts to reform agricultural subsidies.

In recent years support programs have paid out very large amounts. Crop insurance payments last year were close to $1 billion. The Special Canadian Grains Program paid $2.1 billion in two years to offset low grain prices brought on by those international subsidy wars. Payments under the Special Canadian Grains Program were made on a wide variety of crops, and farm-fed grain was included.

This year, the Canadian crop drought assistance program paid out $850 million to help farmers who suffered drought losses in 1988. We have in that drought program a graphic illustration that no matter how you design an emergency program, there will be perceived inadequacies and cries of unfairness. The administrators of ad hoc programs have to develop artificial criteria, criteria outside of the market-place and, therefore, unreal. They have to draw lines. Some individuals find themselves on the wrong side of the line. If the lines are moved, adjusted, or redrawn, there are still an equal number of people who find themselves on the wrong side of the line who may harbour feelings of unfairness.

Ad hoc programs, like special grains 1 and 2 and the crop drought assistance program, as well as the contributory programs, like crop insurance and WGSA, have delivered huge sums of money which have helped to keep the prairie grain sector afloat over the past several years. Indeed, the recent Economic Council of Canada report, which is entitled "Canadian Prairie Farming, 1960–2000" at page 8 states:

> In the wake of the sharp decline in world grain prices and of the international grain price war, the Canadian government provided additional support to prairie farmers. In 1987, direct payments under the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Special Canadian Grains Program amounted to $2.2 billion, or roughly $17,000 per prairie farmer. Direct and indirect payments under numerous other federal and provincial farm programs added roughly another $1.8 billion, bringing the total up to $4 billion, or about $31,000 per farmer. Thus, during the most recent years, government support accounted for nearly all of the net farm income on prairie farms.

There is no question that that historic level of support was entirely justified. One would hate to imagine the state of rural Canada without those programs.

The fact is that emergency programs cannot possibly be fine Tuned down to the point where they are deemed to be absolutely fair for every single producer. It is simply not possible to reach perfect fairness and equity between individuals under ad hockery, any more than it is possible to have perfect fairness and equity between producers in-sofar as the effects of weather or climate are concerned.

The bottom line is that we must develop better long-term programs for Canadian agriculture, programs like enhanced crop insurance, programs like a contributory income assurance plan so that participating producers can exercise some independence of judgment and tailor safety net programs to suit their own needs, programs that work so that ad hoc, emergency type programs will not be needed in the future. That is the desire of this government and of the farm community generally. We look forward, with anticipation, to seeing the results of the current agricultural policy review.

The issue we are discussing today, inclusion of farm-fed grain in the western grain stabilization program, is not new. Western Canadians have argued that farm-fed grain should be included. The western grain stabilization program provides protection to farmers based on the amount of grain they sell. If they feed their grain on their own farm, they do not have the eligible grain sales necessary to contribute levies to WGS and ultimately to receive payments. This inequity is a major cause of concern to farmers. Large payments through the program in recent years have heightened awareness of the situation. Farmers in other parts of the country want changes too. For instance, maritime farmers who feed a major portion of the grain they produce to livestock want stabilization; so do Quebec and Ontario producers.

The matter of inclusion of farm-fed grains was discussed by the agriculture committee of this House in January of 1986. In the report that was filed by that committee, farm-fed grain was considered and this statement was made:

> It should be only for the final products marketed that the producer receives market risk protection under the WGSA or the ASA. In the case of livestock producers, they face the livestock market but not the grain market risk. Treating livestock producers as grain producers means the grain may be covered in the raw form and again as it goes into the final product.

There was mention of a possible double benefit, depending on conditions. There was also mention made by the committee benefit and, of course, of verification of sales, to say nothing of the cost. The recommendation at that time was that undesignated sales remain ineligible under the WGSA.

Nonetheless, with farmers in all agricultural regions of the country asking for change, it is clear that a broad look has to be given to this issue. That is exactly what is being done. A major review of grain income stabilization began over a year ago. This review is examining options for a national stabilization program for all farmers. It is an attempt to treat all farmers in an equitable way.

The review process began in the summer of 1988, when representatives of government met with farm leaders in all regions. Through these meetings, government was provided with guidelines which were used to develop options for a new stabilization scheme. A number of options for stabilization were subsequently developed by Agriculture Canada's national grains bureau in Winnipeg. These options were presented to farm leaders who met again in Winnipeg last January. The farm leaders indicated they would continue to discuss options for grain stabilization with their members.

One message that came through clearly in these meetings was that the farm groups favour a national approach to grain stabilization. They want that approach to be as fair as possible to all producers, and they want the issues of eligibility and production neutrality addressed. The process has been productive and it continues.

In the meantime it should be understood that this government has already taken some steps to provide better income stabilization for farmers. Of course, further reforms are being looked at, but I think we should outline the progress that has been made. This government, back in 1984, made a commitment to improve the WGSA and that commitment was met. In February of 1985, the act was amended to allow for timely interim payments to be made before the end of the crop year, in time to assist farmers with their spring seeding expenses. Since the amendment, interim payments totalling about $2.4 billion have been made.

Significant improvements were also made to the WGSA in 1988, amendments designed to encourage greater participation in the program and to put it on firm financial ground. These included a $750 million federal write-down of the WGSA's deficit. Without this write-down, the future of the program was in doubt. Nine crops were added to the list of crops eligible for contribution. Amendments also raised levies in the jointly funded program. To encourage more farmers to join, a 10 per cent penalty for rejoining producers was removed.

These changes to WGSA were made as part of this government's strategy to strengthen and improve the safety net system for grain farmers.

We are currently involved in a review of every facet of Canadian agricultural policy. Grain stabilization is just one area that this government is looking at with a view to the future.

In closing, I want to commend the member for Mackenzie for again raising the matter of farm-fed grains. It is an old problem but one that ought not to be overlooked. It is a difficult problem. It is being examined and hopefully can be addressed in the over-all policy.

Finally, I want to say a word about Bill C-36, the advance payment for stored grains legislation. We all know that Canada faces a very difficult national debt problem and the interest payments to service that debt, created by past governments, are choking the ability of governments today to be able to deliver the programs that farmers need. In order to cope with that deficit, an interest payment problem, all departments of government were asked in the budget this spring to make some sacrifice in the national interest. One of the things that agriculture was asked to give up was the interest fee provision for advance payments.

Many of my constituents are now telling me that they recognize the fact that the budgetary decision had to be made. Some may not like it but they do understand it. What they cannot now understand is the failure of this House of Commons to effect speedy passage of Bill C-36 in order that cash advances can be drawn.

This government is ready, willing and able to effect speedy passage of Bill C-36. I urge my fellow members and colleagues to support speedy passage in order that those farmers who wish to take out cash advances on farm stored grain can do so.

It seems to me at this point that the stalling of that legislation, for whatever reason, partisan or otherwise, is not in the best interest of producers. I urge my hon. colleagues to co-operate with this government and with the farm community in this regard by co-operating in regard to Bill C-36.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to join in this debate. I certainly hope that I do not follow the habit of the previous speaker who forgot what he was talking about half way through his speech. The NDP is asking us to support the motion that the government should consider the advisability of introducing measures to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act to cover what we commonly call the farm-fed program.

When the member spoke he turned his attention to Bill C-36. The government has continually used Question Period to ask itself why the opposition is opposing it. Perhaps if the government looked at what it is trying to do, it would find that the opposition has some very good reasons for opposing that legislation. I am not going to take the time of the House to review what is already well-tread ground, but will simply state that there is every reason not to turn over to the government right now our support for Bill C-36, and we will continue to oppose it until the government agrees to our amendments.

The issue of helping out the family farm is one that has been very much on the minds of western Canadian politicians for some time now, and I can only add my own voice to our concern. You begin to say to yourself, how is it that the family farm got into so much trouble? I think we have to turn ourselves back to the strategy followed by this government for the last five years.

The most important cornerstone of the present strategy of the current Conservative government is to try to force the farmers into an international market in which they cannot compete. What we are seeing, for example, in the free trade legislation, is one measure after another by the Americans to undercut the family farm. We see the pork producers in western Canada under tremendous strain. We see that the provincial government of Alberta has had to bail out one producer while another producer in another community was laying off people.

We have seen the farmers in Quebec complain about new regulations under free trade. We have seen the concern by the dairy producers. In fact, the Deputy Prime Minister has had to strike a special committee to try to untangle the mess that has been created by a combination of free trade legislation and GATT rulings.

We are also beginning to see more problems in the poultry industry as a result of measures not taken by this government. Once the farmers in that particular sector of the agricultural industry see that they are going to be under equal stress, I think will have the makings of a major revolt against current Conservative policies.

As many will remember, this is the party of Diefenbaker. This is the party which stood originally for the western Canadian farmer. Once again, we see them abandoning the very constituency that they used to build their power base in Canada. That is why the Reform Party continues to remind western Canadians that the Conservative party no longer represents the interests of the farmer and of people in Alberta. I think we will see one vote after another until this party changes its strategy and begins to listen to the opposition from all three parties on this side of this House. This government will be in considerable difficulty there.

There was an article in The Winnipeg Free Press recently about the stress on the family farm. For example, as the push comes on the farmer from the bank, from the lack of price support and so forth, at least one person if not both people are forced from their farm to take part-time work. In rural areas in western Canada women in particular are being forced to leave their traditional roles, sometimes against their will, to take on other roles in the community. I think that should be studied by the House. I hope that the agricultural committee will take on some initiative in assessing just how the family farm is being pushed around by this government.

The stress is also felt by the very fact that so many western Canadians spend their winters and their falls undertaking special seminars. For example, next week in Brandon, Manitoba, for the second time, the weekly newspapers across Manitoba are sponsoring a seminar to talk about stresses on farms to see what they can do to change the present regime.

Our party supports the motion, as I stated at the outset, but there is some difficulty. Perhaps, if the government had listened to the opposition back when it was discussed in the agriculture committee in 1986 as the previous member stated, we would have been able to come to some agreement on how to best monitor the farm-fed issue.

We must set up some regulatory regime which does not overwhelm the farmer but somehow sets out a control mechanism so farmers can begin to act more independently while there is a true costing arrangement and a true stabilization process involved that does not cause the government to have to expand its workforce or cause farming families to have to increase their paper load.

It is not clear from the motion that its movers understand fully just how complicated it is from this point of view. I can only hope that as this debate continues through the House in the coming months we will be able to clarify the best ways of helping the farmers out on this particular issue.

Farm-fed grains are currently not included under the Western Grain Stabilization Act. The Grains 2000 study which this government is supposedly using to formulate agricultural policy in this area has recommended that farm-fed grain be included under the Western Grain Stabilization Act. Those policy makers who are examining the move to a tripartite system for crop insurance and income stabilization programs feel that farm-fed grains should come under the act. Mixed farmers would certainly appreciate a little help as they try to deal with the economic hardship caused for the most part by the misguided economic and agricultural policies of this government.

By adopting this motion we will create the opportunity to help mixed farmers with their immediate problem. By allowing them to receive a benefit for farm-fed grain, they will be able to keep their herds at a level that is dictated by a market need instead of a financial crisis which they are all in. The reality is that there will be no help coming from the Progressive Conservative government and its Prime Minister.

In particular, I hold responsible the Deputy Prime Minister who should know better, given his criticism of governments dating back to the mid-1970s. The Western Grain Stabilization Act no longer serves the western grain economy. Its only reason for existing is to serve the crass political manoeuvring of a government known for its intellectual corruption as much as for its lack of compassion.

So far this year there has been no payment from the Western Grain Stabilization Act. It is unlikely that there will be any payments later this year. Last year, before the election, the western grain stabilization program made record payouts to farmers. When we consider how the government this year is claiming to be so cash short, it is odd to remember just how easily it was able to find moneys last year, whether we are talking about this particular piece of legislation or the western diversification fund. After the election, it was discovered, lo and behold, that the government used the wrong formula and overpaid the farmers who received benefits from the program. Surprise, surprise.

The government sent out notices telling the farmers that they had to pay back all the excess funds. This is the new Tory philosophy: they do not have to buy votes; they only have to rent them.

This government must come to its senses: stop playing the cat and mouse game with farmers and start coming up with policies that will help strengthen our farm sector. In this vein we support the motion.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, indeed it is a pleasure to stand in the House and actually whole-heartedly endorse and support the motion by the hon. member for Mackenzie, my colleague from Saskatchewan.

I was not quite sure, in listening to the remarks from the member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia speaking on behalf of the government, whether in fact government members intended to support this particular motion. I got the distinct impression that they were not going to and find that very disappointing.

Not only did I find his remarks disappointing in that he implied there would not be support coming from the government, I was also disappointed that he never dealt with the substance of the hon. member's motion. Rather, he dragged red herrings across the trail of the debate by dealing with issues like the drought payment, trying to cover up the government's poor track record with respect to that program, and dragging out again the issue of the advance payments.

As farmers very well know, it was 152 days from the time the government did not provide the money in the budget to cover those payments until it introduced an acceptable bill. Since then the opposition has been debating for about 20 hours. I found it very unfortunate that the member tried to use that particular argument in the context of this debate.

What I really found unfortunate is that it appeared that the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia at a very fundamental level did not understand what the hon. member for Mackenzie in fact was saying, that the livestock producer who uses farm-fed grain is discriminated against under the present system. The member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia implied that while the producer of farm-fed grain might not be covered under the grain stabilization program, that farmer, however, would then become eligible for coverage under the livestock stabilization program to compensate for that.

That is not the case because the livestock stabilization program uses the market value of that grain in computing the formulas on which the payouts under the program are based. The problem is that the market value does not include the value that people who are eligible for stabilization get from the grain stabilization program. The amount that people get under grain stabilization is not part of that market price. Therefore it does not get figured into the formula to arrive at the payout levels of the livestock stabilization program. I think it is a very clear case of livestock producers who feed their own grain being discriminated against.

It is very unfortunate that the member perhaps has based the opposition of the government to this particular motion on something that is not even factual and a complete misunderstanding of the situation.

The second argument that the member used was that as a result of some past discussions on the subject it has been deemed to be administratively difficult or impossible to arrive at a fair formula for a fairer system for administering the inclusion of farm-fed grains. Again, the member could not have been listening to the hon. member for Mackenzie, because he explained in some detail how the government of Alberta, followed now by the governments of Saskatchewan and Manitoba, in fact has evolved a very workable system to incorporate the very features into provincial programs that he is calling for at the federal level to be included in the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Agricultural Stabilization Act.

I think the member for Mackenzie dealt very well with the question of administration. It always seems a little ironic to me that we are dealing with a situation where I understand there are 400 planners in the Department of Agriculture. I am not saying those people do not do good work or that they are not good people. I presume they are.

There are 400 planners in that department, and it always seems a little ironic to me that something that can be understood by most farmers, and was eloquently outlined here by the member for Mackenzie, should be something that 400 planners cannot manage to incorporate into a government program.

I guess those are the same 400 planners who are holding jobs that probably pay $30,000, $40,000, or $50,000 a year and who shortly are going to release a document on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture saying that farmers should be less dependent on government handouts. When you consider the source of that kind of wisdom you sometimes must wonder about the equity of what we are dealing with.

The other point that the member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia raised in suggesting that perhaps he would not be supporting this legislation was that somehow or other it ran afoul of international trade laws and that since we are having so many problems in other areas perhaps this would simply compound that.

I think that is really unfortunate because the grain stabilization bill and the Agricultural Stabilization Act are specifically dealt with I believe in the free trade agreement with the United States and, as well, are fully concurrent with the GATT regime.

Therefore to enhance the agriculture industry through this particular measure would in fact be utilizing a mechanism that is recognized in the international community and would show some leadership in the international field by developing a way to support integrated farming operations through a support program which does not distort trade in the international arena.

I hope we have not heard the last word on the intentions of members opposite because I would very much like to plead with them to support this particular initiative. I think the member for Mackenzie has introduced many good ideas on agricultural programs into the House through the years. I think his contribution here needs to be recognized for giving leadership not necessarily on a partisan basis but for offering a very progressive and forward looking perspective on agricultural questions. I think he is respected by farm organizations from coast to coast, as well as by members opposite. It seems to me that on something that makes as much sense as this it only seems right to support the hon. member.

This is a votable motion with five hours of debate. One of the objectives of introducing that kind of system into this House, the private members' system, is to allow private members some input into the general direction of government policy, the policy if you will of this House. Even though we are engaging in a major agricultural review at this time, I think this would be a clear direction from all sides in this House that this is a direction in which we would like to see agriculture go in this country.

I would also like to indicate briefly a few of my own reasons for supporting this motion. I agree with the hon. member that the whole trend toward specialization as opposed to mixed farming is in many ways a dead end. It is a dead end socially. It is a dead end environmentally. It is a dead end economically. I think that is becoming more and more evident to more and more farmers, certainly to policy makers and to the public at large.

I think we have to do everything we can to maintain the family size unit, the average size farm, the smaller farm in this country. We are losing farmers so fast it is getting hard to count them.

We look at alarming statistics such as in our own province of Saskatchewan where they say that the average farm is about 1,000 acres. However, those statistics do not say that only 14,000 farms are 1,000 acres or bigger, while 39,000 farms are under 1,000 acres in size. That means there are only 14,000 farms which are considered to be commercially viable, while 39,000 farms are vulnerable if they are based entirely on grain production. In our province we are experiencing not only farm loss but a general population loss.

I think this kind of initiative is most timely but in fact might well be too late for a lot of people. I think as well that when the government talks about sustainable agriculture it behoves us to start looking at these kinds of initiatives very seriously. We are obviously mining our soil at a rate that we cannot maintain, and we cannot close our eyes to this situation forever.

I have farmed for the last 14 years, and family and neighbours farm as well. Short-term economics have been pressing in on us and probably causing us to adopt some practices we would rather not accept, but I would certainly like to see us take seriously the whole issue of soil conservation, of stewardship of the land and of our resources.

Having said that, I would like in closing to move the amendment that the hon. member intended to be a part of this bill but which through the drafting did not appear. I move:

> That the motion be amended by adding after the words "Western Grain Stabilization Act" the following:
> and Agricultural Stabilization Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On debate, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by expressing my gratitude for the opportunity to participate today and by saying that I very much enjoyed the time which I was able to spend on the Standing Committee on Agriculture with the hon. member for Mackenzie. I always found his contribution in committee to be thought provoking and invaluable. Certainly I listened with care to his remarks again today and found them to be equally enjoyable.

I am also pleased to note the amendment which has just been moved, Mr. Speaker, because I think, as all of us in this House understand, it is exceedingly important that issues such as farm-fed grain be addressed on a national basis. There are unfortunately so many problems in agriculture today that to try to address them on a regional basis would not do justice to the nature of the motion before the House. I believe the amendment which has been moved is certainly an appropriate one. I would have been distressed had the proposal been only to look at the western Canadian stabilization program and not the Agricultural Stabilization Act.

Mr. Speaker, as I think you know, the whole issue of farm-fed grain is one of many of considerable importance which is currently being addressed by the federal government and its representatives in co-operation with provincial governments and with farm leaders throughout the country. There have been a number of meetings, the objective of which is to try to add to the degree of stability which unfortunately is not always present in agriculture. Quite clearly it has not been present in the last two or three years.

I have looked forward with some anticipation to the results of those meetings because, although I am very proud as a member of this government of the amount of financial assistance which we have been able to provide to Canadian agriculture since 1984—and I think most people in this House who remember understand that there has been a record amount of such financial assistance—I continue to be frustrated and troubled by the fact that ad hoc programs are never fully adequate for the needs of those who are participants in them.

Unfortunately it is virtually impossible to devise ad hoc programs in such a way that they are always equitable or at least perceived to be equitable. Certainly, without doubt, while the drought program for 1988 is providing a much needed $850 million to Canadian farm producers, it has created a great amount of administrative difficulty due to the fact that we are dealing in many cases with inadequate documentation of crop reduction.

I truly hope that one of the results of the meetings which have been taking place in the last few months will be fewer programs in agriculture, less dependence on ad hoc programs, and that with the type of insurance programs in place the farm community will be able to determine well in advance what its rights are and what the level of protection will be, much in the same way that an urban resident is able to take out fire insurance on a house or something of that nature. We need that kind of stability.

There is no question that there is a difficulty within the western grain stabilization program and with agricultural stabilization at the moment in that people who do feed grain on the farm—and that is some 30 per cent of all grain production in the country or about one-half of the cereals if you exclude wheat from that calculation—are not eligible to participate in the western grain stabilization program, to use that as an example.

Consequently there is a feeling of frustration and unfortunately what happens is that very often farmers reorganize their business so that in a sense there will be two businesses. They split their operations so that family members in one case can produce grain and sell it to another family member in order to enhance their likelihood of being able to participate in the western grain stabilization program. That has been a problem and continues to be a problem. I know it is one of the areas of concern of those who participate in those meetings to which I have already referred and which they will certainly be addressing.

The difficulty with this program is not unique to western Canada. The concerns are there in the maritimes and other parts of Canada as well.

However, finding a solution to this problem is not simply a matter of adding farm-fed grain to the stabilization programs, whether it be the Western Grain Stabilization Act or the Agricultural Stabilization Act. In fact, in so doing we might be in some danger of creating another set of inequities to replace those which are currently there.

For example, some dairy producers already have the cost of producing grain built into their milk prices. To make such grain eligible for grain stabilization payments as well could amount to duplication and of course would be inequitable to other producers.

The main motion deals specifically with the idea of including farm-fed grain in the western grain stabilization program. I think there are two or three points that need to be addressed, because it certainly is something that the committee on which I had the honour to serve as chairman back in 1986 spent a lot of time addressing. As a previous colleague has already indicated, however, we were not able to resolve some of the problems which were then before us.

For example, to include farm-fed grain in the Western Grain Stabilization Act would require a fundamental change, and that is a change in the basic structure of the program itself. The WGSA, as most members of this House know, would have to then become a production based program rather than a program based on recognized commercial grain sales.

As already indicated this would present its own set of issues. For instance, the collection of good yield data would be essential to a production based program. Certainly the need for that yield data is there, but it is readily apparent from the drought program that crop insurance statistics by themselves are not sufficient to provide that data.

Unless a reliable set of individual yield histories were available, stabilization payments might then have to be based on regional yield averages. One of the problems with those averages is that there are differences. There are inequities. Producers with yields below the regional average would be overcompensated, while the other half of the farmers with production statistics above the average would be penalized. Also, such a program could result in payouts at a time when livestock returns are adequate or even at a peak.

Changing the WGSA into a production based program would also remove the protection that farmers now have from reduced marketings because of reduced export opportunities. Currently, if delivery opportunities are reduced, lower marketings can result and the lower net cash flow can then trigger payments under WGSA. If WGSA were to become production based it would not respond as readily to fluctuations in marketings.

Aside from these considerations it must also be understood that including farm-fed grain in WGSA would add to the cost of the program, This is a program to which the farmer contributes as well as the federal government. That would add to the farmer's cost at a time when, as we all know too well, cash flow is far less than adequate particularly in western Canada.

Unfortunately crops in my own constituency of Brandon—Souris are worse even in 1989 than they were in 1988. Consequently we are not in a position to be able to afford additional payments at this time.

Other options have been discussed from time to time that I think are important and should be noted. Some have suggested including the cost of grain production in livestock stabilization programs. At the present time livestock price support typically includes the market price of grain and calculations to determine support but not the cost of producing the grain.

Dairy support programs include grain production costs to a degree. Support calculations which include the cost of grain production would result in higher livestock support prices when costs of producing grain increase. This could provide an incentive to farmers to produce both grain and livestock to be eligible for grain stabilization programs. However, it would work against producers who buy feed for their livestock.

Another option which has been considered is jointly stabilizing grain and livestock revenues by stabilizing combined net revenue from the two enterprises. This type of program would have to be operated at the farm level in order to take into account differences in the importance of each enterprise. In the case of a mixed farm operation where the returns are more stable, lower levy rates could be applied.

The government is currently examining options for grain safety net programs and I look forward to that. Farmers involved in the review process agree that this issue must be dealt with on a national scale. Inclusion of farm-fed grain in stabilization programs was, in fact, one of the issues reviewed by the Standing Committee on Agriculture, as we have already noted. This was also raised in meetings with farm leaders last year and again during the course of the last few months.

This review, which is currently under way, will be looking at many issues other than just farm-fed grain. I do hope that one of the results of the review will be the creation of a comprehensive safety net program of which, I would assume, the Western Grain Stabilization Act may be a part. I would assume that crop insurance and the red meat stabilization programs, of which I think we are appropriately proud, would be a part as well.

In reviewing all of these programs, I hope that the House would agree that it is important in the end to try to include each of the areas of deficiency that we have identified—and farm-fed grain is only one of many—so that the final result of these meetings with the farm leaders and with the provinces will be a type of comprehensive farm insurance program in which farmers can ensure from year to year that they have a relatively stable income and that their incomes will not be subject to the fluctuations in marketing and prices as it has been in the past. And, if it is possible to include farm-fed grain as part of that package, then certainly I think all members of the House would agree that that would be a worthy objective as well.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I call upon the hon. member for Red Deer, I have examined the amendment and, although I have some reservation, I will give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt and we will accept the motion.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity this evening to respond to the private member's motion on inclusion of farm-fed grain in the western grain stabilization program. Before I begin my speech, Mr. Speaker, may I ask you a question? In light of the hour on the clock, will I have an opportunity to continue my remarks later, or should I talk very rapidly at this point?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have nine minutes remaining in his speech when we finish at six o'clock. If he does not hurry, he will lose that.

Mr. Fee: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In my opinion, there are a number of reasons why including farm-fed grain in the western grain stabilization program is not practical. I would like to outline some of those reasons for you.

First of all, the amendment you have just accepted is an improvement over the original motion. The Western Grain Stabilization Act is a program which applies only to farmers in the Canadian Wheat Board designated areas of western Canada. Grain stabilization concerns farmers in all regions of Canada and if we look, as the original motion did, at one region only, it would not be in the best interests of producers because it would address the issue in too narrow a context.

I still have a very real concern that by adding farm-fed grain to the Western Grain Stabilization Act, we would perhaps be creating more inequities than those that already exist. This proposed change to the Western Grain Stabilization Act would involve a major, fundamental change to the program. Including farm-fed grain in the western grain stabilization program would mean changing the basic structure of the program.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have nine minutes remaining the next time the bill appears in the House.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the Order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

• (1800)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, in the House of Commons some time ago, I raised the issue with the government about VIA Rail and the cut-backs that were forced upon the constituency that I have the honour and privilege to represent.

The government has shut down 40 per cent of the rail lines between Ottawa and Montreal. It has also shut down 25 per cent of the lines between Ottawa and Toronto. Many people in the constituency that I represent use VIA Rail to go to work. They use it to commute between Alexandria and Montreal, and elsewhere. I feel that it is unfair that these people are now being deprived of this essential service.

The government says that it cannot afford VIA Rail any more. Why could it so much afford it during the election campaign? Why was the Prime Minister, during the election campaign, standing on a train platform in Actonvale, Quebec, saying to the people of that part of the country that VIA Rail was there to stay and that the Prime Minister had seen to it that train service was restored?

The Financial Post of September 14, 1989 identified one of the reasons why VIA Rail is in the present deficit situation. It talks about the fact that CN Rail is recording a profit and VIA Rail is recording a loss. Both are Crown corporations and one corporation is dependent on the other for the use of its track. It says:

> In CN's case this is particularly galling, since the railway claims to be operating at a profit—"a business as well as a responsibility" is one of its slogans. Yet on closer examination it will be seen that for most of its life span VIA, has been one of CN's top two customers, the other being grain transport which is also heavily subsidized.
> What we have, then, is a hat-and-shell game in which one public corporation, claiming a profit, is dependent on another which runs at a loss.

The problem now appears to be that my constituents are losing a service because CN Rail and CP Rail in some measure charge much too much for that track fee.

I had another problem in the constituency that I represent in regard to rail transport. It is the fact that the residents of my province commute to Montreal using passenger train. The government member who will be charged with responding to this will say, "Yes, but commuter rail is the responsibility of the province." I disagree.

Which province is going to be responsible for taking commuters from Alexandria, Ontario, to Montreal, Quebec, the Government of Ontario, when 90 per cent of the track is located in Quebec, or the Government of Quebec taking Ontarians to work in another province? Both, of course, are going to claim that it is not their responsibility and that the responsibility belongs elsewhere.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is clear the Government must help provide transportation for passengers who travel from one province to another to go to work. In fact, a precedent has already been set by the fact that the National Capital Commission annually pays $974,000 to the Outaouais Regional Community Transit Commission and $608,000 to the Ottawa-Carleton Regional Transit Commission.

These subsidies by the NCC, a federal government agency, acknowledge the need for passengers to commute from one province to another to get to work.

Mr. Speaker, I say to the Conservative Government that the Minister is not on track on this issue. It is high time the Government remembered that Canadians want to keep their railways and want to keep VIA Rail.

[English]

I say to the government that this plan should be derailed and should be derailed immediately. The minister has told us that we are going to have a royal commission of inquiry to study whether or not we should have shut down VIA Rail when we already did. I say that that is putting the caboose before the engine.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has made mention of what we campaigned on last year during the election campaign. I would like to tell him that we did promise Canadians during the election campaign that we would take responsibility for fiscal management of the affairs of Canada. I feel that the action we have taken in this last couple of weeks is a very position step in that direction.

I would like to offer to the hon. member some views on the government's decision on VIA's five-year corporate plan. The government's decision maintains a national, affordable, sustainable network of all rail passenger services, while at the same time being financially responsible. We do not have unlimited resources from the general treasury to pour into rail passenger service.

The government determined that Canadian taxpayers can simply no longer afford to spend so much on VIA when it offers such a low return on the ridership and revenues. VIA's ridership has dropped by 20 per cent since 1981. Its cost recovery continues to hover around 30 per cent. The corporation required an unprecedented $641 million in subsidies in 1988 alone, or an average of $100 for every person who boarded the train.

The government had to act, and having decided on VIA's corporate plan, chose to use the powers of the Governor in Council to act quickly. Delay would have cost the Canadian taxpayers further millions of dollars which, quite frankly, we cannot afford. The decision was not taken lightly and was taken only after careful deliberation and consideration of the representations received from individual Canadians, provincial ministers, mayors and other representatives of municipalities and numerous other groups. Close attention was paid to all other concerns and suggestions.

The national network that we envisage strikes the best balance between the real transportation needs of Canada and its fiscal realities.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister of Transport what I feel is a very important question and that is, following the cancellation of VIA service in eastern Nova Scotia between Truro and Sydney, was it not natural to assume that freight service would follow, and that the rail would be abandoned. The minister stated that this was not so much a question for him or for the government but for the NTA, that the NTA, under the National Transportation Act, had jurisdiction in deciding what rail lines were to be abandoned. He completely neglected to give me an unequivocal promise that that rail line would not be abandoned.

The minister, by not giving an unequivocal answer, has abandoned his responsibility as Minister of Transport to maintain a comprehensive transportation policy in this country. It is very important that areas such as mine know what the government is going to do, regardless of whether it is the responsibility of the National Transportation Act or not. It is the government's responsibility to maintain the services.

It is vital because many people in this country presume that because rail passenger service has been cancelled, rail freight service is to follow and those that lost passenger service will lose rail service completely and those rail lines will be abandoned. In Cape Breton, which needs industry badly, we are now facing the prospect of prospective investors saying there is not going to be a railroad that because there is no passenger service, ultimately it is only a matter of time before there is not going to be freight service. The minister would not state to the contrary.

It is made additionally difficult because the government appointed the president of CN to be president of VIA and asked that president of VIA, who was also president of CN, to do a study as to the rail feasibility for passenger lines in Canada. He decided which lines were to be closed and that recommendation was then given to the government. The president of VIA, by closing the VIA service in many parts of Canada, helped to make his case as president of CN for the abandonment of those particular lines. It is just not acceptable.

Also, unless we get an unequivocal statement from the government that rail lines in this country are going to be kept open, then we are inviting CN to downgrade the service to help them make its case for that particular rail abandonment. It has been done in other areas. It has been brought up at hearings that CN will intentionally reduce the service to make that service look as bad as possible to make its case for rail abandonment. It does not want many rail lines in Atlantic Canada, if it wants any rail lines at all. We cannot give it that opportunity. It is important that the government says that rail lines in eastern Nova Scotia will not be abandoned, that the service from Halifax to Sydney will continue. Then we will have CN making the best of that line, making as economic use as possible of that line, and maintaining that line.

CN has already entered into an arrangement to ship containers from Halifax to St. John's directly, thereby cutting down the container traffic from North Sydney to Newfoundland by 75 per cent, thereby starting to make its case. It buys rails from Sydney Steel Corporation. Imagine buying rails from a steel plant that may not have a railroad to ship those rails out on. Some people say, well, you can ship them by water. If you could ship them by water as cheaply as CN can on its track, then of course we would have done it before. But, of course, it uses those rails at intermittent spots across the country. Shipping to one particular location means extra handling and extra costs for it.

We have coal shipments in Cape Breton to clients whom we badly need to maintain a very struggling economy. Each coal car contains 100 tonnes. For each coal car, we would need four eighteen-wheel trucks to carry that same amount of coal. One of my constituents counted at a crossing 54 coal cars. That would mean 216 18-wheel trucks on the highways. Imagine what that would do to the tourist industry when the train goes through the centre of the island without much recognition whatsoever?

It is important that that rail line be maintained in Cape Breton and eastern Nova Scotia. It is vital that the government make a commitment and recognize the importance of maintaining that rail line. There should be no more backsliding. There cannot be any more dilly-dallying on the part of the government. We must draw the line for Canada and say to the people of Cape Breton and eastern Nova Scotia that the government is the government of all of Canada and not just of the areas that are numerous in population. There is a Canada outside the main metropolitan areas. It is important that this government recognize that.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys has raised concerns regarding the possible branch line abandonment that the government has announced in its plan for the restructured rail passenger network. I can appreciate the concerns that he has raised here today and on other occasions. I also want to assure him that the government appreciates the concerns because we have to represent all areas of the country.

As the House knows, it is for the National Transportation Agency to rule on the requests for branch line abandonment for CN and CP which are currently before the agency. They have to give due notice of their intentions.

The National Transportation Act of 1987 lays out the matters at which the agency must look in making its decision. The act does not call in any way for a line to be abandoned just because VIA Rail is no longer using the line.

I would remind members that in the fall of last year, the Minister of Transport asked the National Transportation Agency to seek the views of the provinces with regard to the criteria that it should be using for branch line abandonment and its concept of a basic rail network. I can assure the House that all proposals for branch line abandonment will be considered very carefully as the law requires.

The hon. member has also made the implication in his remarks that the president of CN, in functioning as VIA's chief executive officer, might have conflicting objectives in respect to branch line abandonment. I can assure him that this is not the case. In hearings today before the transport committee, we heard that it is a very small portion of CN's revenue that comes by way of VIA Rail. There is that myth that a large portion of its revenue is from VIA. That is not the case. He gave the figures before the committee today.

In either his capacity as President of CN or as the chief executive officer of VIA or CN, the ownership of the rail line is not an issue in the government's decision to maintain a sustainable and an affordable national rail transportation network.

ALBERTA BUSINESS LOANS PORTFOLIO/REVERSAL OF POLICY—POSITION OF THE MINISTER

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, on June 16 of this year, I put a question to the hon. Minister of Finance, concerning business loans by the chartered banks in Alberta. At that time, I noted that business loans by Canada's chartered banks had declined by 50 per cent in Alberta from 1982 to 1988. They dropped from an annual average of $18.1 billion in 1982 to $9.1 billion in 1988. I noted as well that given average dollars invested per new job created figures for Alberta, that collapse of bank business financing in Alberta cost the people of that province somewhere between 100,000 and 140,000 jobs.

Two related elements make this abandoning of Alberta businesses by Canada's chartered banks all the more strange. First, indigenous financial institutions in Alberta actually increased their assets base in the province during the same period, again 1982 to 1988, in which the bank's assets were dropping like crab apples in the fall. Local credit unions saw their assets rise by 22 per cent. Trust companies' assets went up by 30 percent. Incredibly, mortgage companies' assets shot up by 147 per cent, and Alberta Treasury Branches', the Alberta peoples' nationalized bank, its assets skyrocketed by a whopping 167 per cent.

Second, at the same time as the chartered banks business loans in Alberta declined by 50 per cent and their total assets declined by 13 per cent, their total liabilities actually went up by 27 per cent and the value of personal savings held by those banks in Alberta went up by a very healthy 41 per cent. So at precisely the same time that business loans had been declining absolutely and as a percentage of total assets, personal savings have been rising absolutely and as a percentage of total liabilities.

To those familiar with classic capitalist economic theory which holds that banks and such similar financial institutions exist primarily to marshall the savings of individuals in a community and then put those savings to productive use in wealth-creating investment, these diametrically opposite trends must be deeply puzzling, especially during a period in which other locally-based financial institutions, including again, the province's very own nationalized bank, experienced healthy and in some instances, very healthy increases in their assets.

The Minister of Finance, in responding to these facts last June, offered two related explanations. First, he said that it was just a matter of bank business loans reflecting the adjustment in Alberta's economy as it tumbled from the boom-time highs of 1982 to the more sober and appropriate levels of 1988 and second, that it was the fault of the NEP. I will deal with each argument.

To take the second point first, the facts are that the banks, abandonment of their Alberta business assets accelerated after the revoking of the NEP in 1985. Bank business loans in Alberta dropped by 6.2 per cent from 1982 to 1983; by 7.2 per cent from 1983 to 1984; and by 5.4 per cent from 1984 to 1985. Then the NEP was removed. Immediately the banks responded. Business loans dropped like a rock from 1985 to 1986, a plunge of 13 per cent, more than double the previous year's rate of decline. Then from 1986 to 1987, the crash accelerated further, reaching a dizzying 18 per cent drop. Things moderated only slightly from 1987 to 1988 when bank business loans dropped only another 14.4 per cent.

If one wishes to involve the NEP at all, the only reasonable conclusion one can draw from the data is that the NEP, while it was in place, served to moderate the chartered banks' abandonment of Alberta businesses.

The other argument which can be stated, that Alberta has simply been put back in its proper place is, on the face of it, a more reasonable argument. Again, it requires ignoring the record of other locally based financially institutions in the province, but let us for the moment adopt that indulgent ignorance and examine the thesis.

In 1982, the chartered banks had $18.1 billion tied up in business loans in Alberta. That same year, Alberta's GDP at market price was $59.9 billion. By 1988, bank business loans had plummeted to $9.1 billion, for a 50 per cent drop. But Alberta's GDP had risen by almost 20 per cent over the same period up to $63.3 billion. Again, those who advance the thesis that the banks' business loans in Alberta are simply a lock-step puppet of the province's GDP will have to seek support for their thesis from sources other than the available data.

Wait, I hear the cry coming from across the floor. That is not what we said. We said you have to look at Alberta's business loans in light of Alberta's GDP, in light of the national GDP. Got that? Right, Mr. Speaker. Ignore the province's growing savings. Ignore the province's growing GDP. Look instead at what happened to Alberta's GDP as a percentage of the national GDP. Okay, fine. Let us look at what happened.

In 1982, at the same time as Alberta accounted for 14.1 per cent of Canada's GDP, it received 25.3 per cent of the chartered banks' business loans. By 1988, Alberta accounted for only 10.5 per cent of Canada's GDP, a drop of 3.6 per cent. But over the same period, Alberta's share of the banks' business loans dropped to 11.2 per cent, a plunge of 14.1 per cent. Alberta's GDP share drops 3.6 points so its business loans share drops 14.1 points.

Look at it in this way. Express bank business loans as a ratio of GDP. In 1982, that ratio stood at 1 to 2.91; that is, $1 of bank business loans for every $2.91 of GDP. By 1988, that ratio had widened to 1 to 6.93; $1 of bank business loans for every $6.93 of GDP. That is some adjustment over six year.

Again, I would simply ask the government, why did you let it happen? Why did you not do something to staunch this appalling haemorrhage of bank finance capital out of Alberta businesses? While we are at it let me pose as well the following question: Canadians' total personal savings on deposit with Canadian chartered banks rose from $98.9 billion in 1982 to $150.3 billion in 1988, a rise of a little more than 50 per cent. Even expressed in constant 1981 dollars, that is still a rise of 17 per cent, a very healthy trend. Over the same period the total of Canadian chartered banks business loans outstanding in Canada rose all but imperceptibly from $71.6 billion in 1982 to $72.8 billion in 1988. In constant 1981 dollars, that is actually a decline of more than 20 per cent in bank business loans. Again, that is savings up, business loans down.

I would therefore ask the government, is it at all alarmed at this trend which, once again, flies in the face of classic caplitalist economics? Having abandoned Alberta businesses to their fate, will the government nonetheless see what it can do to encourage a somewhat less tight-fisted attitude on the part of the banks toward Canadian business in general?

And what the heck, Mr. Speaker, maybe just one more time, the government could explain why it is necessary to exempt Canada's chartered banks from the GST.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it always makes me smile when I see a Member of the New Democratic Party speaking for the corporate sector, when he criticizes them for the rest of the day and in fact the rest of the year. The Hon. Member for Edmonton East (Mr. Harvey) pointed out that the bank business loans portfolio in Alberta declined 50 per cent between 1982 and 1988, and his conclusion was that the banks are depriving Albertan businesses of the credit they need to expand.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that the bank business loans portfolio in Alberta declined between 1982 and 1988.

What we must understand is that this decline was not caused by the banks, as the Hon. Member said, "throwing half of their business loans overboard". There were several financial factors that influenced the banks.

I believe the most important factor was that 1982, the first year of the period we are considering, in addition to being a year of transition—the previous years had been years of growth while those that followed immediately afterwards showed a drop in activity—was practically a record year for the resource sector in Canada and especially in Alberta. There are two reasons for this. First, thanks to very high prices in the industry, the resource sector was growing at an unprecedented rate. Second, 1982 was the year when Canadianization of the resource industry was made a priority. As a result of these two factors, funds borrowed from banks by the resource sector across Canada in 1982 totalled $10.8 billion, which was 14 per cent of total business loans. In 1988, the corresponding figures were, respectively, $5.6 billion and 7 per cent.

Because of the important role played by the resource sector in Alberta's economy, the province's share of total business loans in 1982 rose to 25 per cent, twice the province's share of the GDP. Alberta's share of total business loans in 1988 was 11 per cent, which is closer to its present share of 12 per cent.

The second factor to be considered when we look at bank loans to businesses in Alberta is that the 1980s were a difficult period for the resource sector in Canada, and that understandably, the impact of these problems was particularly severe in Alberta. Because of large loans contracted during the years of rapid growth immediately preceding 1982, many businesses were reorganized, downsized, amalgamated or simply closed down. From 1982 to 1988, non-recovered bank loans in the resource sector, and especially in Alberta, totalled several billion dollars. Following a period of restructuring, the sector has now gained strength.

Another factor we cannot overlook is that many businesses are now resorting to other types of financing. Since 1982, for instance, the use of bank acceptances and securities issues has increased.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I think we can say that the figures submitted by the Hon. Member for Edmonton East are not a reflection of cynical or discriminatory practices. Furthermore, we have every reason to believe that the banks, like other financial institutions, are developing opportunities for business loans as vigorously in Alberta as they are in the rest of the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

CALIFORNIA EARTHQUAKE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, millions of Canadians over the last few hours have been watching with horror the results of yesterday's disastrous earthquake in California.

We realize that in the days and months that lie ahead Californians will be faced with a monumental clean up effort. We want those involved to know that they have the encouragement and support of all Canadians. Our sympathies lie with all Americans suffering as a result of this tragedy.

Through the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the President and the American Government were able to respond to this tragedy within a few minutes. This tragedy would have been even more devastating had it had not been for the established support systems and the thousands of ordinary and trained civilians prepared to respond quickly.

Mr. Speaker, today Canadians need some answers. What kind of emergency measures organization do we have? Do we have trained emergency personnel? Do we have strong municipal infrastructures?

Specifically, would we be able to respond to a disaster in any region of Canada with the same speed and expertise as the Americans have shown in the past few hours?

PERSON'S CASE

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, 60 years ago today, on October 18, 1929, the women of Canada were formally recognized as persons by the British Privy Council. The Person's Case, as it has become to be known, is the chronicle of the efforts of five courageous Alberta women who persevered against a host of legal and social obstacles to win acknowledgement that Canadian women are indeed persons and are therefore eligible to be summoned to the Senate.

Last week six Canadians were honoured by our government for their dedication to the principles of equality and the individual's right to self-determination.

I congratulate this year's recipients: Kay Armstrong of Saanichton, British Columbia; the Honourable Ellen Fairclough of Hamilton; Dorothy Inglis of St. John's; Helen Levine of Ottawa; Alphonsine Par-Howlett of Westmount, Quebec; and Caroline Robins of Saskatoon.

Their efforts reinforce the significance and the relevance of the Person's Case as an important episode in Canadian history.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the House and the government to an effect that the VIA Rail cuts are having on a particular group of people, a group whose needs have not received that much attention in the entire debate about the VIA Rail cuts.

I am talking about people who have cottages on the CN main line from Winnipeg to Farlane. These are people who used to be served by a special train on the weekends through the summer and who some years ago had that service incorporated into the Winnipeg—Capreol line.

The service of the Winnipeg—Capreol line as a result of the government's proposals is now to be incorporated into the transcontinental service. Some remote communities like Rice Lake and Winnitoba have absolutely no road service whatsoever. The needs of these communities cannot be met in any other way except by a train that stops at all those places and goes down at times when people normally want to go to their cottages.

The transcontinental train will not do that. It will leave on a Saturday night and come back on a Monday morning, which is totally useless.

Mr. Speaker, the forest fire that swept through that country a year ago was less of a threat to those peoples' investments than this government is proving to be.

WOMEN

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, on October 18, 1929, the women of Canada obtained legal status as persons. Their long legal and political struggle opened the way for a host of initiatives to promote the status of women in Canada. One of these and perhaps the most important one was the appointment in 1970 of the Royal Commission of Inquiry on the Status of Women, which contributed toward achieving full equality of men and women in this country.

The federal Government's commitment at the time, which was to enable Canadian women to realize their ambitions and their full potential, is still appropriate today, and the Government fully subscribes to that commitment. It was in this perspective that the Government published a document entitled Dimensions of Equality, which appeared in 1986 and was subsequently reprinted. The document contains a federal work plan for women's equality. Mr. Speaker, the anniversary we are commemorating today must remain forever inscribed in the memory of all Canadians, as a tribute not only to our pioneers but also to all those women who proudly followed in their footsteps.

SENATE REFORM

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, democracy is not about singulars or plurals or contrived technicalities. It is about a principle and a belief in a spirit that goes beyond partisan politics and personal agendas.

On Monday night 600,000 Albertans marched to the polls in the belief that Parliament must be fully democratic, not half democratic. It is no longer a matter of claiming to support democracy or claiming to support Senate reform. Senate reform has already begun. Either we in this House are fighting for it or we are fighting against it.

I urge the Prime Minister to join in this movement by confirming without delay Stan Waters' election to the Senate of Canada. This is a minimum test of his willingness to listen to Alberta. Other tests will come later as Albertans wait for action on the constitutional and fiscal policies on which they have sent a clear message.

Mr. Speaker, make no mistake. If the Prime Minister and his party ignore this election, they will make Mr. Waters a symbol and it will be my party that benefits. If they accept this election and act, Mr. Waters will be a senator and we all will gain.

SENATE REFORM

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, once again an idea that will revolutionize Confederation has come from the west. After decades of academic discussions and government reports, Senate reform is becoming a reality.

Whether this government will take heed of this fact or not is the only question left. Yesterday we saw in this House a government led by the famous Deputy Prime Minister from Alberta, in complete disarray. It is obvious it does not know what to do. While that is not a surprise it brings the issue of Senate reform into urgent focus.

The west has constitutional needs that must be addressed. We have been patient, but patience has not advanced the cause of Senate reform one bit.

Because of the success of the Alberta Senate election Manitoba is now considering using the election process to nominate senators. I am proud to say that the Liberal party in Manitoba has been on record for many years endorsing the Triple E Senate proposal. This government should stop wondering what to do and accept the will of the Alberta electorate.

• (1410)

There is nothing more powerful than an idea whose time has come. Senate reform is here. It is happening whether the Conservative party wants it or not.

AUTOMOBILE LEASING INDUSTRY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, independent car dealers from across Canada have established an excellent record of service to Canadian customers. In a business in which there is real competition, automobile dealers have served Canadian transportation needs by both selling and leasing cars to the satisfaction of their customers.

Over the past few years we have seen a quiet but persistent pressure from chartered banks in this country to allow them to enter the automobile leasing field. These banks wish to deal directly with customers for lease requirements. The pressures a large financial institution would place into the automobile leasing industry would have a negative effect and be totally unfair to the large investments dealers have made.

Banks must not be allowed to enter the automobile leasing business. I will continue to stand up for the car dealers across Canada and urge this House to oppose the intrusion into the car business by the banks of Canada.

PERSON'S CASE

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the sixtieth anniversary of the Person's Case; 60 years ago today women became persons under Canadian law. It is ironic that today the Conservative government is threatening to take away women's legal rights. A new law on abortion will open the floodgates to invasive legal cases such as the Daigle case. A new law will provide a basis for a series of court challenges just at the time when the Supreme Court is shutting down current legal avenues available.

We will once again see women dragged before the courts and publicly humiliated. In 1989 we are facing another legal equality crisis. Raising the legal status of the foetus over the legal rights of women to make decisions about our own bodies would be a giant step backward for women's legal equality. Women will not be persons unless we have legal control over our own bodies and our own lives.

DENE THA' BAND

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, today is a very special day for Chief Harry Chonkolay of the Dene Tha' Band in northwestern Alberta. Today Chief Chonkolay will be appointed to the Order of Canada to commemorate 50 years as chief of that band.

Harry Chonkolay was elected chief of the band on June 17, 1938. During the 51 years he has served as chief, the band has seen many changes from its traditional way of life. He has given valuable and inspirational leadership to his people in their transition from a hunting and trapping society to one in step with modern times.

Chief Chonkolay has always stressed the importance of education and at the same time promoted the traditional values of his people, their language and their culture. He has served his people with integrity, dignity and dedication.

All one has to do is spend a few minutes with this man to recognize the wisdom and knowledge that he has obtained during his years as chief of the Dene Tha' Band.

This remarkable man is visiting us here today in the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in 1986 the Department of the Environment wrote a pamphlet for public information entitled Storm Warning. It was suppressed by the then Minister of the Environment, Mr. McMillan, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare. When Storm Warning was finally released, its message was ignored.

Here is a sample of the message in Storm Warning:

> Even the most careful person can be exposed to toxic substances through the food chain.

In Storm Warning the various threats to health posed by toxic chemicals in the Great Lakes region are set out. Last week, three years later, the present minister of health announced that he wants a health study into toxic contamination in the Great Lakes region.

Instead of proceeding in 1986 to take preventive measures, three years later the government proceeds with a study which could delay action until its completion in 1994. When the health of Canadians is in danger, and despite earlier warnings, this government wasted three years before acting. What a sham.

WOMEN

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, 60 years ago today, Canadian women won a major battle in their struggle to augment their political rights.

Today marks the anniversary of what is referred to as the person's case. Because of this historic ruling, Canadian women were legally recognized as persons. They also obtained the right to be appointed to the Senate.

Full political rights for women did not become a reality without a hard struggle by groups of Canadian women, and especially one particular group, later referred to as the Famous Five. They were: Emily Murphy, Nellie McClung, Louise McKinney, Irene Parlby and Henrietta Muir Edwards.

Thanks to their courage and determination, the lives of all Canadian women have been enriched.

As was the case with much of the history of Canadian women, the person's case was forgotten for 50 years. In honor of the Famous Five, the Persons Award was established in 1979 to acknowledge exceptional contributions toward improving the status of Canadian women.

Last week, the Governor General gave the Persons Award to six women whose commitment to defending the rights of women and improving the status of women has been a source of inspiration for us all.

On this anniversary, I ask you to join me—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member but her time has expired.

[English]

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I hope you will allow me a certain latitude in the rules to express our deep concern and sympathy to the people of San Francisco and the Bay area as a result of the severe earthquake that struck last night.

We would encourage our government to give whatever help we can practically render to our good neighbours.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

The provincial Finance Ministers have declared that a new federal sales tax on top of their provincial taxes would be terribly complex and impossible to administer. The federal Minister of Finance has accused the provincial Ministers of indulging in petty politics. He said, and I quote: "I know better than they do what the effects of this tax will be". That was a very modest statement by our Finance Minister.

Mr. Speaker, in this connection, I would like to quote from a document entitled Sales Tax Reform, published under the authority of the Hon. Michael H. Wilson, Minister of Finance.

I quote at page 48: "Without a common base, little tax simplification would be possible—the system could become more complex—this layer of complexity would be compounded and spread across the country—if all governments were to have different tax bases, the system would be a national tax in name only. Effectively, it would be unworkable."

I mention this because it is exactly what the provincial Finance Ministers said yesterday.

How can the federal Minister accuse the provinces of petty politics when they are only repeating what he himself said in a document he tabled in the House of Commons?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, while I do not have that page 54 in front of me here—

Mr. Gauthier: You wrote it.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —I think the quote the hon. member is referring to is that if you are going to have a national sales tax you have to have a common tax base, but the point of the matter is that my first choice had been a national sales tax. We have been working on that since early 1987 to try to achieve a national sales tax. Unfortunately that was not achievable.

Mr. Gauthier: Because you failed.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): We have decided that we must go ahead. Because the existing federal sales tax on manufactured products is not working, as my friend I am sure would agree, we must change to a goods and services type of tax.

• (1420)

The point that I am making—and I have done this on many occasions—is that if the provinces want to come together and put forward a proposal that they can agree on, that the premiers agree on, we will talk with them.

Until they are off the wicket of simply opposing, simply saying that this tax is not good enough, this proposal is not good enough, without taking the responsibility of putting forward an alternative that we can talk about, there is nothing for us to meet and to talk about.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the provincial ministers of finance were saying yesterday only what the minister in his document to Parliament had said quite categorically on June 19, 1987.

We have in this House, of course, a trade minister who has not read the trade deal. We have a fisheries minister who has not read the decision on salmon and herring. We now have the Minister of Finance who does not remember what he put in his document. I would be glad to let him have a copy so he can remember exactly what he said.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Pass the document over, John.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I can say parenthetically that no wonder we have a government that does not really worry about putting a 9 per cent tax on reading. None of them read.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I want to again quote the Minister of Finance from last night. He said that his counterparts, the provincial finance ministers, are "trying to cloud the issue so they could increase their own taxes". Those were his words.

Where does the man who has increased taxes in this country 31 times since he became minister, who is now trying to impose a 9 per cent tax on everything that moves, get off by telling the provincial ministers of finance that they are now trying to increase taxes?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, just in response to the cheap shot that the hon. member took—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —I have read that document precisely as I have read every other document that has been put out under my signature. When the hon. member reminds me of something that was put out two and one-half years ago, no, I do not remember every word of that.

The hon. member has raised a specific question about the provinces wanting to use this as a way of hiding their own intentions of raising taxes. That is very clear. They are making it quite clear that they want to raise taxes and they are going to use, they say, the GST as a reason for doing it. Mr. Speaker, I can be quite categoric. There will not be a reason for the provinces to raise their taxes based on the goods and services tax, based on the way they are raising taxes today.

We have been quite up front about raising taxes, but we have also been very up front about controlling government spending. We have a government spending record where we have increased government program spending by 3.6 per cent. No other province over the same five-year period has a spending record as good as that. The average of the provinces is a 6.4 per cent increase compared with our 3.6 per cent increase. The province of Ontario had a 9.5 per cent increase. This is an example of how well we are controlling spending on this side of the House.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it is a flagrant example of the pot calling the kettle black. Tax up front? An invisible tax, secret from the consumers of Canada.

The Minister of Finance said last night, and I want to quote him again: "Provincial ministers of finance are trying to set themselves up to raise taxes, and they shouldn't do it". "They shouldn't do it", he says. Then in a pious way he said: "We all serve one taxpayer and they are trying to set up that one taxpayer so that they can increase taxes". Those were his words.

This man who is trying to make a tax grab in the amount of $29 billion, a larger tax grab than all the provincial income taxes put together, all the territorial taxes together, is accusing his provincial counterparts of a tax grab. This man who is going to force on the people of Newfoundland a total over-all sales tax rate of up to 26 per cent is saying that other people are trying to raise taxes.

If this Minister of Finance really believes that it is wrong for his provincial counterparts to raise taxes as he said last night, why is it not wrong for him to impose the largest tax grab in Canadian history? If they shouldn't do it, why should he do it?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me be quite categoric. This goods and services tax is replacing an existing tax.

Mr. Gauthier: Nonsense.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): He says "nonsense", and he is saying that I have not read the document. Maybe he should read the document once or twice.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): How about revenue neutral?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Would you like to just listen to the answer?

Some $24 billion dollars will be raised from this tax; $18.5 billion will be used to replace the revenues from the existing tax; $5.5 billion will be put back into the tax system through a goods and services tax credit, through the reduction in the middle income tax rate, and through the automatic indexing that is required under the terms of existing Canadian law, so it is not the tax grab that the hon. member refers to.

The point that I was making is that for the provinces to use the goods and services tax as an excuse for raising their taxes is unwarranted, because there will not be a reason based on the goods and services tax for them to increase their taxes. They should not use that as a basis for them to raise their own taxes.

The other misinformation the right hon. leader of the opposition is using is to say that Newfoundland will have to go to a 26 per cent sales tax. That is nonsense. There is categorically no reason absolutely whatsoever. If Mr. Kitchen wants to discuss that with me, I would suggest he give me a phone call and find out the true facts as to what the impact of the sales tax will be before he makes those unwarranted statements.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, today the situation is as honeless as ever. The Minister of Finance is trying to tell us that he is right and everybody else is wrong. Yesterday, the provinces said: "Unacceptable". They will have no part of it. I want to ask the Minister of Finance, who supposedly is part of a government of national reconciliation and is now about to carry off a unilateral coup unique in Canada's history and in our tax system, what justification he has for introducing this tax, when all provincial ministers are telling him they want no part of it and when the Canadian public says he is wrong? Who supports the Ministerof Finance, aside from a few backbenchers who won't listen to their constituents?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it absolutely clear that there is no basis for the provinces to raise their taxes. That is quite clear, if they use the GST as an excuse to raise their own taxes.

Now the hon. member is saying: "Are we doing something unilateral"? We spent two years of consultations with officials, with the ministers, talking about a proposed national sales tax. The provinces do not want that national sales tax. It is quite clear from the display of comments that we heard at the premiers' meeting in August and at the finance ministers' meeting yesterday that the provinces do not want to participate.

• (1430)

The federal government must move ahead, because all sides of this House agree, and if hon. members opposite have forgotten, Liberals and New Democrats signed the finance committee report twice in the last Parliament saying that we have to move to a new sales tax. I will remind the member from Ottawa—Vanier of his comments. We must move to this tax. The provinces do not have to move to the tax. That is why we have to move ahead, and the provinces know that.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, there is a consensus at least on one thing among Canadians, among all provincial Ministers and all members on this side of the House, and that is that the Minister of Finance didn't do his homework. Canadians want taxes that are visible, neutral and fair. Unfortunately, the proposals presented by the Minister of Finance do not pass that test. Consequently, I would ask the Minister of Finance, considering the unanimous rejection of his proposals, whether he has the courage to withdraw them immediately.

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. We have put forward a technical paper for further consultation. The finance committee is holding hearings right now. We are having consultations with various groups that want to meet with us to see whether there are ways of improving the document. But for him to suggest that we are going to withdraw this, I say to the leader of the Liberal party, where are you on this debate?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Oh, yes, they say: We are against it. But ask us to put up an alternative? Oh, no, we would not sully our hands by putting up an alternative. All we are going to do is—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I say to the Leader of the Opposition, get into the ballgame. Put some facts on the table and quit just opposing.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has made a statement that not only would the provincial treasurers, without exception, disagree with but all Canadians who have been following this tax debate, except his own back-benchers, will disagree with it.

He has just said that provinces do not have to worry about a negative impact because of this tax. He knows that this reduction in income tax that he has just alluded to is going to cost the provinces. The impact on inflation is going to cost the provinces. Allowing for some increases in wages and salaries related to inflation is going to cost the provinces.

According to figures that have been produced, Manitoba claims it will cost it $70 million, New Brunswick $145 million, Newfoundland $85 million. We heard from the Minister of Finance for Newfoundland today, saying that the only way he could cope with it is to cut services in an already poor province, or increase taxes. He said it is going to go up to a net effect of a 25 per cent sales tax.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance why he is putting this unfair burden particularly on the poorer provinces of Canada?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is no unfair burden being put upon poorer provinces of this country. As I have said before and I will repeat again, they will not be negatively affected by the introduction of a goods and services tax.

Further to that, the poorer provinces of the country, because they have proportionately more low-income people, will get a greater share of the goods and services tax credit. That works out to $275 per adult, $100 per child, and it works out for residents over-all to $170 per capita in the GST credit. The province of Newfoundland will be a proportionately greater recipient of that than say the province of Ontario.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I do not need to remind the Minister of Finance, but I will. This government has already, in terms of the poorer provinces, cut back on regional development programs, cut back on health transfer payments, cut back on VIA Rail, which is particularly bad for the lower income provinces, and now a GST impact that he has not denied. I challenge him to produce his own figures. Because of its impact on inflation, because of the income tax change, he is hitting the provinces again. If you consider almost every aspect of this government's policy, including the GST, it is the poorest provinces in Canada that are getting it in the neck, and I want the Minister of Finance to justify that.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is hard to justify something that is not happening. I have said that the poorer provinces will be proportionately greater beneficiaries of the goods and services tax credit. Equalization payments during our term of office have increased a good deal faster than the rate of growth of normal federal-provincial transfers.

The poorer provinces of this country receive 40 per cent to 55 per cent of their revenues, depending on the province, directly from the Government of Canada. That is something that clearly demonstrates the ongoing support which this government has for the poorer provinces of this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance suggested a few minutes ago that this new sales tax would have no negative impact on the provinces, specifically the poor provinces. He said so, but everyone else says the opposite! Not only the Opposition but all the provinces and experts outside the Government!

If the finance minister does not agree, would he give the House of Commons the figures which tell a different story? That is the challenge I make to the Minister of Finance.

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is using figures I have not seen. I presume, from what he has said, that they have just been released. I am going to have a look at those figures and I will be in a position to comment on them after I have seen how the provinces have developed those figures.

It is clear in the economic analysis that has been done by the Government of Canada that the Atlantic provinces, the prairie provinces and British Columbia have an economic benefit. The economic impact is greater for them than for the national average, but all provinces, including the provinces of Québec and Ontario, benefit from the introduction of this tax, but it is the provinces that are farther away from central Canada that have the greatest proportion of benefit.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. Yesterday the minister told the House that his government would wait 30 days before announcing whether it will accept Monday's free trade panel ruling on landing requirements for west coast salmon and herring. Yet in his press release he declared that the panel accepted the legitimacy of Canada's position on the use of these landing requirements, even though the panel obliges Canada to permit over-the-side sales of unprocessed fish, something which the landing requirements were put in place to prevent.

If the minister considers this sell-out a victory for Canada, why is he now saying he will take 30 days to review the decision? Otherwise, will he stand up now for Canadian jobs and reject this ruling?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it happens to be the opposition members who have been using the term "victory" to describe this panel finding. In fact, if the hon. member and his leader would read the finding—because I think perhaps they could use some reading lessons—they would learn that in no less than 10 places in this document, Canada's sovereignty under Canadian fisheries legislation is fully accepted as the primary means of managing and conserving our fishery stocks, which is precisely what I said yesterday.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): My supplementary question is for the same minister. So it is not a victory. We are clear about that.

How does the minister reconcile this answer with statements by the government leader in the Senate that, "the government accepts the finding and intends to work within the context of that finding", and by U.S. trade representative Carla Hills, who said yesterday, "We fully expect Canada will promptly comply with the panel ruling"? Who speaks for the government on this issue? Is it the minister of fisheries, is it the Senate government leader, or is it Carla Hills?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that it is the Government of Canada that speaks for Canada on this issue. The government received this panel report on Monday. Under the Free Trade Agreement, there is provision to review it and analyse it over a 30-day period before taking a position.

If the hon. member will check the transcripts of the government Leader in the Senate, I believe he will find that the government leader in the other place will be clarifying his statement and correcting it because the government has not yet decided what position will be taken in the disposition of this report.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, the minister of fisheries must be a slow reader if it takes 30 days.

Yesterday the minister told this House the panel finding "clearly recognizes Canada's right to management of fish stocks—. in accordance with our sovereign rights". What he does not say is that those rights extend only as far as the United States permits.

Mr. Epp: You're reading, Coline.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Yes, Mr. Speaker, one has to read because one wants to remember what is being said in this House. The Minister of Finance sometimes forgets.

On the west coast, you have the U.S. telling us that our conservation for herring and salmon is a restrictive trade. On the east coast, the U.S. is passing legislation to conserve its lobster fishery against our own lobster fishing industries.

I ask the minister, where is the victory in being accorded a sovereign right when it cannot be used to keep jobs in Canada—and they laugh over there—or to stop the U.S. from controlling our natural resources which are so important to our jobs here in Canada? This is a laughing matter to those people over there.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, here we have another member of the opposition who does not read. If the hon. member would search her memory channels she would learn that it was the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade talks which decided that our old processing regulations were discriminatory in that they wanted special treatment for the Canadian industry that was denied the American industry. Because we export 80 per cent of the fish, particularly that from her own constituency, to the United States, we have to play by those rules. But I must say that this panel finding, the consensus of a panel on which three Canadians sit, suggests that the sovereignty of Canada's right to manage and conserve the fishery stocks of Canada takes precedence over all other considerations.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, the minister does not understand. We have agreed, we have a sovereign right to our natural resources. Surely free trade did not take that away from us.

I am saying that that minister does not understand that there are no countermeasures for what they are telling us is a restrictive trade. In the lobster area, the impending legislation before the U.S. government is going to be a restrictive trade.

What countermeasures, aside from diplomatic talks, is the minister going to present to the U.S. to protect the many thousands of lobster fishermen who begin their season with a complicated free trade agreement which has no countermeasures for us to resolve that dispute?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know, and if she does not, perhaps she should pick up a newspaper and read, that the—

Mr. Peterson: How condescending. What a pompous approach.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Will the Minister proceed?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South West Nova knows full well that there is proposed legislation before the U.S. Congress and House which would extend, in an extra-territorial fashion, United States conservation considerations and make them applicable to Canadian lobsters being exported to the United States. The hon. member knows that Canada has strongly protested any such proposed legislation because it would intrude upon our sovereignty to manage our lobster fishery according to our criteria, and it would violate in fact the principle of the free trade agreement.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Yesterday, the minister touted Canada's great success in that the free trade panel, he claims, upholds Canada's sovereign right to control our own resource as long as we let the Americans tell us how many of our fish we can land.

I have been concerned about our status as a sovereign nation under the free trade deal, but I was very surprised to learn that a minister of the Crown shared my concerns.

The government has had the preliminary report in hand for 33 days, 27 days remain. In the time coming, is the minister confident that he can come up with a plan for landing, identifying and counting 80 per cent or 90 per cent, or whatever percentage, of each of the continual many runs of salmon of each of the species?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, certainly I am absolutely confident that we can do that because that is my responsibility under Canadian fisheries legislation.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Siddon: In fact, Mr. Speaker, we still have about 27 days to carefully read this report. If the hon. member would read paragraph 7.40, for example, he would find that the Canadian prerogative takes proportion over any percentage of fish which might be accessed by sea by the Americans in that it it says, and I quote: "Though any such proportion would have to be determined on the basis of the actual data and management needs of each fishery or group of related fisheries, the panel was of the view that the 10 to 20 per cent range referred to earlier could provide appropriate guidance". So, the numbers of 10 to 20 per cent are subject to our conservation and management requirements.

EMERGENCY MEASURES

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence in his capacity as lead minister for emergency preparedness. In view of the terrible disaster yesterday in San Francisco, can the minister explain why, in 1986, his government cut back on a 12-year earthquake prediction research program within Energy, Mines and Resources?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think all members of the House would want to express sympathy to the families of those people in northern California who lost their lives, as well as to the other families who are there.

With regard to the hon. member's question, throughout government we have taken efforts to constrain spending and to bring about a rational approach to spending by the departments, particularly the departments to which the member refers.

With respect to emergency preparedness, I can inform the hon. member that next week, Tuesday through Thursday, in co-operation with the Government of British Columbia, there will be an emergency preparedness symposium held in British Columbia. I see the leader of the New Democratic Party laughing, Mr. Speaker. I would suggest that he knows, and his colleagues know, that the municipal and provincial governments have lead roles in emergency preparedness. They are the first on the ground. They are the first to react. We co-operate with them as a national government. We provide the expertise that we can provide. We have a training program and provinces have training programs. Located just some 30 miles from where the hon. member sits is one of the best emergency preparedness training programs for municipal and provincial bodies at Arnprior, supported by Emergency Preparedness Canada.

EAST GERMAN REFUGEES

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. For over 200 years, German speaking people have emigrated to Canada, making them the third largest ethnic and language group in Canada behind the English and French. In view of recent events with the thousands of people leaving East Germany and that many Canadians of German origin are anxious and willing to help some of these people come to Canada, is the Government of Canada prepared to open our doors to some of these East German refugees?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think that all of us in this House have been touched by what we have seen in East Germany in recent weeks and months.

My officials and I have been in contact with the representatives of the German Canadian community. I will be meeting with the German Canadian Congress on October 26 and we will be discussing with them how the German Canadian community might assist with East Germans who may want to come to Canada.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question today is for the Minister of Justice.

As he knows, last week, at least 500 elected municipal officials met in Montreal at an international conference to discuss crime prevention. They raised the idea that prevention is at least as important as repression.

At the end of the conference, they issued a statement criticizing the federal government both for its lack of support for prevention projects and for its lack of leadership.

I ask the Minister of Justice how he will answer.

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my colleague's comments. I was at the very same conference.

The federal government has been very actively involved in crime prevention. We are conducting surveys and studies. We are getting information on crime prevention policies and comparing these with the ones that exist in Europe, Australia and the United States. We were an active partner in the planning of the very conference that my friend was at.

We have provided the national drug strategy, the proceeds of crime legislation. All of these are part of an ongoing program of crime prevention which we think, according to the latest statistics, is succeeding.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, despite the Minister's statement, as he must know, the Canadians who were at the conference saw that the federal Government's participation was much less than that of other countries, especially from Europe.

I want to ask the Minister, since the Government transferred responsibility for prevention from the Solicitor General to Justice without transferring any funding, why not increase the funding, restore the funding that the Solicitor General had for prevention, instead of transferring responsibilities with no transfer of funding.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I reject that categorically. We organized the convention. We had most of the displays there from Health and Welfare and Solicitor General. The Solicitor General and I were both there and participated in the program. There was hardly any participation or displays from the municipalities. We were there. We were there in spades.

HEALTH AND SAFETY

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, for an investment of $10 million a year, the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety has provided cost–free, unbiased, impartial information for a decade, and in the process, has saved the Government of Canada hundreds of millions of dollars a year in health care costs. Certainly what we are dealing with here is an ounce of prevention for a pound of cure. In fact, it is a good business practice.

My question is for the Minister of Labour. Why is this government gambling with a good investment of Canadian taxpayers' dollars?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer the hon. member that the Government of Canada takes no chances with the wonderful work done over the years by the Centre for Occupational Health and Safety. A while ago, in accordance with the director of the centre, we asked that a plan for financing the centre from non–government sources be drawn up, since the government has invested $60 million in this centre over the last 10 years. And I am very pleased to tell the hon. member opposite that about two weeks ago, the Board of the Centre rejected as inapplicable the plan submitted to it by the Director and asked a task force from the centre to prepare another plan to present to the Minister of Labour for meeting the objective we set for the Centre, namely to continue its excellent work but with funds from sources outside the federal treasury.

[English]

Mr. Keyes: Mr. Speaker, I heard the minister say, "absolutely no risk", and yet this occupational health and safety centre, internationally recognized, has been built on trust between government, business and labour, and under a deal where they are going to find financing privately, labour has threatened to withdraw its service. There is risk, I want to remind the minister.

Given that for a decade, the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety has paid for itself hundreds of times over, and given the potential of increased health care costs and losses in productivity, will the minister reinstate funding and admit that he has made a mistake?

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no risk that the centre will be closed because there are ample opportunities for the centre to find financing in the market-place. There are all kinds of avenues that have been considered by the council of governors and the proof of the pudding is in the fact that they have agreed to prepare a plan themselves to present to the Minister of Labour indicating that the plan can find the financing from other than the treasury of the federal government.

CHILD CARE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, child care workers in Manitoba staged a day of protest outlining their anger at their status under the Tory government of that province.

Today is Person's Day, and is significant in that a woman's status and equality are very much dependent on her economic freedoms. Economic freedoms depend on the availability of safe, quality, affordable child care.

Would the Minister of Finance acknowledge that the Status of Women depends on the federal government and take the lead in supporting child care by providing adequate funding?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member well knows, the federal government shares in the funding of child care through the Canada Assistance Plan, an open-ended plan that the provinces can take up as they see fit. We are always there with them in providing that operating funding.

Having said that, we did have child care legislation in this Chamber. It was held up in the other place and did not pass. Since that time, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Health and Welfare and I have all been working very hard in assuring Canadians that we will have new child care legislation in this country. But I would encourage the provinces, in the meantime, to use the Canada Assistance Plan.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the fact that she now speaks on behalf of the Minister of Finance, possibly on this 60th anniversary of Person's Day, a day that is important to both of us as women, the minister responsible for the Status of Women might be prepared to finally go on the record in cabinet and publicly in support of additional funding for much needed child care.

• (1500)

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, I think that every member in this House knows how much I care about this issue, whether it is Person's Day or not. As a member of this government, I can say we worked very hard on the legislation the last time. I was very proud of that legislation. If we had not run into problems in the other place from those people, we would have child care in place in Canada today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will close Question Period with one question from the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond and one question from the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the same minister. I can inform the House that Canadians are not overly impressed with the concern that this government is showing with regards to the child care issue.

Child care workers in this country earn 30 per cent less than the average industrial wage, 50 per cent less than a teacher at the elementary level and 30 per cent less than animal care workers on government farms.

Will the minister inform the House what leadership role the Government of Canada is taking to ensure that the remuneration for child care workers in this country is increased, thereby adding significantly to the quality of child care which I believe is the objective of all members of this House.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it certainly is a primary objective of this minister and of this government. He knows full well that the issue he is talking about, which I think is a very important one for the workers themselves and for the children of Canada, is a provincial jurisdiction.

FISHERIES

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The minister is well aware of the serious situation concerning the huge increase in lamprey eels in the Great Lakes. I contacted him, and I know of others who have also contacted him. It is serious as far as the tourist industry, the sports fishing and commercial fishing industries are concerned.

I am wondering if the minister has been able to get any funds to look after this very serious situation.

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the members of the House will be pleased to learn that Canada is increasing substantially its contribution to the work of the Great Lakes Fisheries Commission. The Great Lakes Fisheries Commission was created in 1955 because of the heavy decimation of the Great Lakes fish stocks by the sea lamprey. In 1990, Canada and the United States will be jointly funding this work to the tune of $11.5 million. The Canadian share is being increased by 40 per cent.

I am pleased to report that the work of the hon. member for Parry Sound—Muskoka and other members from the Great Lakes area in all parts of this House have enabled us to make this very important contribution to a very worthy program.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PETITIONS

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty to table a petition signed by several constituents. message to the government to the effect that the present manufacturers' sales tax has already been increased by the federal government from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent in less than five years, that the Conservative federal government wants to impose on Canadians a new general 9 per cent tax on goods and services, that this tax will be hidden from Canadians and will be applied virtually to everything they buy, that the imposition of this new general goods and services tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-income Canadians and that the imposition of this tax will create an onerous burden on small businesses. Wherefore, the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon this Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

PROPOSED NATO TRAINING CENTRE

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of almost 2,000 people in the community of Happy Valley—Goose Bay, Labrador. You will understand that out of a population of 8,000, that is a sizeable portion of the adult population.

Their prayer is that Parliament will do everything within its power to help the Canadian forces base at Happy Valley—Goose Bay, Labrador, become a NATO training centre.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a further petition on behalf of some 700 fishermen in Labrador, who reject the cuts in unemployment insurance and propose more meaningful reforms. They call upon the Parliament of Canada to support them, particularly in regard to the extension of the benefit period on the Labrador coast until the end of June, and to concentrate on a labour force development strategy combined with a full employment policy and an effective regional development policy.

PROTECTION OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table a petition signed by 2,500 people from the federal riding of Beauce who ask the Government to continue to be concerned about the problem of the ozone layer and pollution in general in Canada and to protect the forests and wildlife.

With pleasure I table this petition from people in Beauce.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock) Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present 66 petitions, accounting for over 1,500 names, circulated by an organization called "Give Life, Canada", from Lower Sackville, Nova Scotia. These names have been submitted from all over British Columbia. The petition reads in part: "At the present time there is no law in Canada protecting the life of a pre-born child from conception to birth. We, the undersigned, believe in the sanctity of human life from the moment of conception and believe that human life is a gift given by God and that it is unique and special. We believe that there is a need for a just law which safeguards the right to life of the pre-born to be protected through their growth process to birth." It contains several other points, and it goes on to say: "Wherefore, the undersigned humbly and pray and call upon Parliament to formulate and legislate a law to protect life from conception, a law which seeks to save the life of both mother and child".

VIA RAIL

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under Standing Order 36 to present two petitions on behalf of the constituents of Lambton—Middlesex. They are exercising their ancient right to petition the government to maintain and upgrade VIA services across Canada and to offer the Canadian people an alternative to highway congestion and airport delays.

OPPOSITION TO BILL 178

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition certified correct as to form and content from citizens in Ernestown Township, who call upon the government to exercise its constitutional right and disallow Quebec's Bill 178.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of presenting today a petition on behalf of residents of two apartment buildings in Ottawa West, which are largely occupied by retired senior citizens of this community. The petitioners object to the imposition of the new goods and services tax which will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-income Canadians and an onerous burden on small business. The petitioners pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorald): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of some of my constituents with regard to the goods and services tax. This despicable tax is opposed by the signatories on this petition, as we in the Liberal party also oppose it. We would hope that the Conservative government would come to its senses and do the right thing by withdrawing this tax or even the thought of imposing this tax on Canadians.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of the residents of Parkdale—High Park who object to the Conservative government imposing on Canadian taxpayers at least 31 new taxes or tax increases.

The petitioners object to the present government increasing the federal manufacturers' sales tax from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent. They also object to the government's imposition of the new general 9 per cent tax on goods and services, and stress that this will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle income—Canadians. They are also stressing that the imposition of this tax will create an onerous burden on small business. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition to present on behalf of Canadians. They are objecting to the elimination of VIA Rail's existing routes and thousands of jobs. The petitioners are complaining that the rail passenger service is the safest and most environmentally friendly mode of travel and should not be cut. They call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada not cancel, in whole or in part, rail passenger services in Canada.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to present a petition signed by more than 1,000 citizens, most of whom live in the riding of Carleton—Gloucester.

[English]

This petition is against the goods and services tax as proposed by the present government. It gives me pleasure to support this petition.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties. I think you would find that there would be unanimous agreement, after all the petitions have been submitted, to revert to Statements by Ministers in order that the Hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration may make a statement, and to allow the opposition parties to reply.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): We will finish with the presentation of petitions and then revert to the statement of the hon. minister.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition signed by the people of Montreal with respect to the discontinuance of VIA Rail lines between Montreal and Toronto and Toronto to Windsor in what is commonly referred to as "the corridor". They petition the government to rethink its position with respect to VIA Rail, and to come to its senses and provide passenger train service for people who require it.

RCMP DRESS CODE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, I have the duty, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present to the House a petition duly certified by the clerk of petitions and signed by 152 of my constituents.

The petition deals with the preservation of the distinctive heritage and tradition of the RCMP uniform.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and duty, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present to the House a petition on behalf of 95 constituents on Queenston Road in Hamilton. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon the government to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I also have the duty to present a petition, duly certified by the clerk of petitions, which calls upon the government to live up to its original pledge to support VIA Rail, to abandon plans for further cuts to VIA's budget and to provide the necessary resources to allow VIA to operate as a modern, effective transportation company, rather than a museum.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure, in accordance with Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of citizens across Canada objecting to the government's cut in VIA Rail. I can attest to the propriety of this petition as to form and content and it is a pleasure to present it.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the privilege of presenting in the House today a petition on behalf of Canadians who object to the cuts at VIA Rail.

Mme Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and the privilege of tabling 17 petitions from Canadians from l'Île-Perrot to Repentigny, in which the petitioners object to the universal tax on goods and services, a tax that would result in serious hardship and be unfair to low and middle income Canadians.

[English]

I also have six additional petitions from Canadians who are worried and are asking the government to withdraw the tax which will be hidden and will be applied to virtually everything they buy.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): It is an honour to present to this House a petition containing hundreds of names. It calls upon this government to rescind its action with respect to VIA Rail. These hundreds of names are in addition to the thousands and thousands that have been presented to this House so far.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Also, Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present to this House petitions from people in my home city of London asking the Minister of National Defence and this government to reverse their action in closing CFB London.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise today to present a petition duly endorsed by the clerk of petitions. It is a petition signed by a number of producers from western Canada who are concerned with the government's handling of the Canadian Wheat Board. In particular, they are very concerned about and critical of the fact that oats was removed from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board without prior consultation with the Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee or with major farm organizations in western Canada.

They are concerned about the future of marketing boards and believe that orderly marketing of farm products should not be weakened but, in fact, strengthened. They therefore petition the House and the government to place oats and barley under the Canadian Wheat Board Act and give them the same protection as wheat.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36, this petition has been duly certified, and it is now my duty and, in fact, a great pleasure to present the views of hundreds of Canadians who strenuously object to the proposed goods and services tax which constitutes an unprecedented attack on the incomes of Canadians by obliging them to pay higher taxes and increasing inflation, interest and unemployment rates.

[English]

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to respond to the call of constituents who avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right to present a grievance with respect to VIA Rail. They state that the Government of Canada has decided to eliminate many of VIA Rail's existing routes and thousands of jobs, with which I agree. They state that the people of Canada deserve a high quality passenger rail service including modernized equipment and a rapid rail system throughout the corridor, that annual subsidies provided by the Government of Canada to VIA Rail are not disproportionate to subsidies required for a highway infrastructure and airports, that several rural communities rely exclusively on rail passenger service, and that the tourism industry in Canada relies on rail passenger service. It is environmentally friendly and therefore the petitioners ask the Government of Canada not to cancel part of VIA Rail.

• (1520)

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to stand here and present a petition with over 100 signatures with regard to the goods and services tax. These petitioners all reside in my constituency of Nepean and they are strongly opposed to the new goods and services tax that this government is proposing.

The feel it will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle income Canadians and they ask this government to rescind its decision and not move ahead with the GST.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): In addition, Madam Speaker, I have a petition with regard to the clawback and it signed by 50 senior citizens in my riding of Nepean. These seniors are very concerned with this proposal of the government and how it will hurt them in their retirement years. They ask the Government of Canada to abolish the clawback of the old age security and reaffirm its commitment to universality.

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): In addition, Madam Speaker, I have a petition on VIA Rail signed by 155 petitioners, also in my riding of Nepean, who are very concerned with the government's cut-back of VIA Rail. They ask that the government rescind its decision, and they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada not to cancel, in whole or in part, the rail passenger services in Canada.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I have a petition, certified correct, pursuant to Standing Order 36, from many Canadians who want VIA Rail service improved and expanded. These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada not to cancel, in whole or in part, rail passenger service in Canada.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Madam Speaker, I have the honour of presenting to the House of Commons six petitions from residents of my constituency, totalling 205 names and stating that at the present time there is no law in Canada protecting the life of the pre-born child from conception to birth. They call upon Parliament to formally legislate a law to protect life from conception, a law which seeks to save the life of both mother and child.

OPPOSITION TO BILL 178

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): I also have a second petition with 36 names which opposes Quebec's Bill 178 and asks Parliament to pass a resolution of the House of Commons urging the Governor General in Council to give full force and effect to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and by the exercise of this constitutional power, to disallow Bill 178 in the province of Quebec.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, it is my honour, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by thousands of constituents in my riding of Cape Breton Highlands—Canso who decry the fact that currently there is no legislation to protect the unborn.

To express the depth of their concern, they want Parliament to know that they are anxious for a new law to be put in place which will protect the unborn from the moment of conception onward and urge Parliament to introduce this legislation as soon as possible.

I want to underline the depth of their feeling on this issue. There are thousands of names on this petition and it is the second series of petitions which we have on this question.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 with a petition on the subject of VIA Rail. It is one of a long series of petitions on the same subject from my constituency. This one is signed by constituents of mine from Revelstoke and Castlegar, British Columbia. There are a number of other signatures from persons as far afield as Nanaimo, B.C.; Calgary, Alberta; Hamilton, Ontario; and Aldergrove, British Columbia; who were passengers on the VIA Rail system, on an over-crowded Canadian line of the VIA Rail system, when they signed these petitions.

The petitioners object strongly to the proposed cuts to the VIA Rail budget and ask in particular that Parliament act to maintain VIA Rail's present national network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain a national mandate for passenger service.

FOREST RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I also have a second petition, this time on the subject of the Forest Resource Development Agreement. Half of the petitioners are constituents of Kootenay West—Revelstoke and the other half of the signatories come from the riding of Prince George—Peace River, the constituency of the minister responsible for forests.

In this petition the undersigned state they encourage the Parliament of Canada to renew this important agreement with British Columbia and thereby provide for a renewed commitment to restocking our forest land, advancing forestry research, promoting silviculture and assisting the forest industry in developing the new products and markets that will provide us with forestry jobs of the future.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, by persons across Canada who object to the government's policy of cutting VIA Rail. They indicate in their petition that these cuts are unfair, that it is a policy that is not to be countenanced in Canada because it destroys one of the very basic industries upon which our country was founded. They call upon Parliament to reject any cuts in VIA Rail and for the government to avoid any cancellation of any train service across this country.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present several copies of the same petition signed by Albertans from Medicine Hat, Redcliff, Grande Prairie, Beaver-Lodge, Sexsmith, Winterburn, St. Albert, Stony Plain, Sherwood Park, Fort Saskatchewan, Ponoka, Lacombe, Wetaskiwin and, of course, the great metropolis of Edmonton. The petitioners call on the government to support VIA Rail, to abandon plans for cut-backs and to provide the necessary resources to allow VIA to operate as a modern effective transportation company.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I rise to present a petition on the issue of VIA Rail and the cuts to VIA Rail. It is signed by 60 people living throughout Canada who were on the train when we were doing our cross-country task force and agree that together they would like to see that the VIA Rail cut-backs be changed, that existing routes and thousands of jobs not be eliminated. Canada deserves a high quality of passenger rail service including modernized equipment and a rapid rail system. They agree that the rail passenger system is the safest and most environmentally friendly mode of travel.

They ask that Parliament reconsider this decision and support VIA Rail.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, I too rise today to add even more names to the list of Canadians who are requesting that the government rescind its decision on the changes to VIA Rail.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I present petitions today signed by constituents in my riding of Northumberland. They come from the villages of Colbourne and Campbellford and for the most part represent farmers and small business people. They want the government to understand that they are not wealthy Canadians, that they do not have margins of profit that can sustain the proposed goods and services tax. They want the government to know that they will have to go out of business if this tax goes through. They urge the government to withdraw in its entirety the goods and services tax proposed.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition by a number of people in the towns of Simcoe and Brantford who are very concerned about the way VIA Rail is going to be cut in their towns.

They pray that this government to cancel these cuts from VIA Rail.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I once again rise in the House on behalf of 4,577 petitioners who signed 154 duly certified petitions. Your petitioners, residents of the riding of Hull—Aylmer, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the Conservative government's proposed goods and services tax, a tax that is invisible, regressive, complex and unfair to all Canadians.

[English]

VIA RAIL

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to lodge with you a petition requesting the government to change its decision on VIA Rail and to reinstate this most vital service to all Canadians, particularly to the people in my riding.

• (1530)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): As was agreed earlier, we will now revert to Statements by Ministers and recognize the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Statements by Ministers

IMMIGRATION

ANNOUNCEMENT OF 1990 PLAN

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the unanimous consent for me to make a statement this afternoon.

I want to point out that the decision to increase planned immigration to Canada in 1990 from 165,000 to 175,000 immigrants as per the reports I tabled, an increase of 15,000 over the previous year's planning range, is a decision that is in keeping with the blueprint outlined in the Speech from the Throne.

The 1990 level was determined after consultations with provincial and territorial governments, as well as with non- governmental organizations, and represents a consensus which has emerged during our consultation process of the past several years.

The immigration levels this government has established, Madam Speaker, reflect a constantly evolving balance among many elements—family reunification, protection of genuine refugees, as well as labour market needs. All of these factors must be carefully weighed before we determine what level is best for Canada and the people who settle here.

We are now about to begin a series of consultations with government and service organizations to establish a longer-term plan for immigration levels and the balance among all of these categories.

Family reunification remains the cornerstone of the current immigration program and in 1990 Canada plans to admit 61,000 immigrants with close relatives in Canada—spouses, unmarried dependents and older parents.

[English]

This is 4,000 more than the 1989 target and reflects the expected demand of sponsorships for relatives of people now living in Canada under the expansion to the family class that we had introduced earlier.

Also in 1990 about 13,000 refugees will be admitted from abroad under government sponsorship. Within this global target the number accepted from Southeast Asia puts us on track to meeting the commitment that I announced in Geneva this summer to resettle 16,000 Southeast Asian refugees by 1992.

In 1990 we expect the private sector will sponsor the admission of some 13,000 refugees also as a continued expression of its commitment. In all, Canada will resettle some 26,000 refugees during 1990. Another 7,000 people are expected to be landed as refugees during 1990 after having been examined under our new refugee determination system.

Finally, 3,000 to 6,000 people with family ties to Canada will be admitted under special humanitarian measures.

These increased immigration figures reflect a broad consensus that emerged through consultations among national non-governmental organizations and regional, local and community groups over the past few years.

As all members of this House are aware, our immigration levels have increased every year since this government came into office. Immigration is currently around the post-war annual average.

But Canada needs to plan its immigration levels for more than a single year at a time, since levels decisions have an impact on many federal and provincial government departments as well as on agencies that help immigrants settle in Canada.

It is now time to re-evaluate the situation and prepare a comprehensive plan for the 1991-1995 period.

[English]

In preparing this plan, we will ask our consultative partners to take into consideration demographic movements, Canada's current and projected population size, where people choose to live, and related social and economic trends. The motivation behind the extensive consultations that I am launching in November 1989 is to continue to March 1990.

In expanding our consultations we will draw on a wider range of views in formulating immigration policy for the medium term. I intend to be personally involved in these consultations, because I want to emphasize that I attach considerable importance to this exercise.

We will ask experts on economic, social and demographic trends in immigration to contribute up to date information and data to our discussions. We will invite representatives from all levels of government, as well as from business, labour, health, social services and education, to make their views known in a series of multi-disciplinary dialogues.

One of the objectives of these consultations is to dispel myths about the effects that immigration has on Canada and to develop a broader dialogue on immigration.

[Translation]

I am sure that this dialogue will convince us even more that immigrants make a valuable contribution to Canada, that they enrich our society and our economy and that they help us maintain our tradition of tolerance which is envied by all.

[English]

I am confident that this exchange of views and information will assist the government in formulating the specific number and mix of immigrants that Canada should plan to admit during the 1991-1995 period in accordance with the government's general intention to increase immigration levels. I am looking forward to a constructive dialogue on the impacts of immigration, an important component of the economic and social development of our country.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased on behalf of my colleague, the associate critic on immigration, the member of Parliament for Scarborough West, and my colleagues in the Liberal party to respond to what in essence was a very poor, unimaginative and uncreative blueprint if one can call it that. I say that for four reasons.

First, the increase in the announced levels for next year is only marginal and substantial at the very best. Not only does it keep with the past increases—for instance, last year it was 25,000—but it loses its impact particularly at a time when all the so-called experts are calling for an additional number of immigrants into Canada, and a substantial number.

Therefore it does not address the world realities or the needs of Canada because we have an ageing population and a dwindling birth rate. We have an out-migration of some 70,000 people a year and therefore we need to constructively and positively harness energies and engage Canadians in a debate on how we face this looming crisis of population and population decline in this country.

We do not need a short-term five-year plan. What we need is long-term vision that will try to harness the viewpoints of all Canadians. What I would suggest to the minister is to appoint a royal commission so that it may once and for all try to tap into the views and the feelings of all Canadians, of all Canadian groups and entities from all regions of this country; so that we may look at immigration positively as opposed to leaving the important decisions for the year 2000, only to be faced with insurmountable challenges at that particular time which will only perhaps incite some kind of backlash across this country.

The second problem with these announced immigration levels is the issue of family class within the Tory agenda of immigration. Under successive Liberal governments the family class and assisted family class levels comprised approximately 50 per cent of our over-all immigration policy. It was clearly a cornerstone of Liberal immigration policy.

Under five successive years of Tory administration, we have seen the family class levels slip. Last year it was at 32 per cent; this year it is at 36 per cent. Business as usual.

What we are seeing is that the difference between the traditional levels of 50 per cent and some mid-30 range is causing a great deal of frustration among the many Canadian families we meet every week in our constituency offices, because they cannot sponsor quickly enough or successfully enough family reunification programs.

Therefore I reiterate that the Tories have failed to upgrade the family class level to its proper and traditional place, something that Canadians from coast to coast have been articulating and have been asking this government to do.

The third area is on the question of refugees. We have seen from our own documents that private sponsorship in the last number of years has doubled. It has gone from 6,000 a couple of years ago to 10,000 this year to 13,000 next year. At the same time, we have seen government levels stay the same. They have basically been the status quo.

What we are seeing, of course, is a shift away from a strong government commitment to one of a greater community commitment. While the community commitment ought to be there, we are also saying that the government commitment should increase proportionately, because otherwise there would simply be a one-sided commitment and what we need is a two-prong approach.

Another matter dealing with refugees was the curious aspect that neither in the minister's response nor in her documents does she talk about the refugee backlog, which is an absolute mess and nightmare from the word go. There are over 100,000 people in the backlog, some 85,000 claimants all told. Up until a couple of weeks ago only 57 claims had been finally processed. Those people cannot afford to wait two, three or four years for that backlog to be cleared. Canada cannot afford to go through this expensive and time consuming exercise. What we need is a minister to recognize that there is a grey area between her black and white view of immigration, that there is a compromise solution that offers a win-win solution.

The fourth item is that this blueprint ignores the international realities and world opinion. For instance, the Prime Minister travelled to Singapore just a few days ago and he was criticized, justifiably so, for promoting a very selective immigration policy in that part of the world that "skimmed the cream", that allowed rich business immigrants to immigrate without balancing with family class, without balancing with refugees from that part of the world. The minister did not address this feature. She failed to address the other feature of business immigration, that is say, to ensure that the business proposals by which they are approved are in fact being realized in this country.

On the international stage the minister also failed to make any mention about the historical developments in eastern Europe, particularly the question of East German migration and particularly since she has had discussions with the Canadian German community in this country. We allowed special movements in 1956 from Hungary of 37,000; in 1968, 12,000 Czechoslovakians; and in 1982, 10,000 Polish citizens. There is not one mention about Canada being in touch with the movements in eastern Europe vis-à-vis immigration.

Finally, I also would like to simply and quickly address a comment made by the Prime Minister whereby he suggested that there are "racist tendencies" in some Canadians about refugees and immigration. This is the same Prime Minister who announced a national crisis and called a national emergency session of Parliament over a couple of hundred refugee claimants who landed in eastern Canada. That lecture is misguided and, if there is any tolerance, understanding, or education, it ought to start with the Prime Minister and the government.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity and I thank the House for agreeing to make it possible for the statement and the replies, because the minister's report shows a consistently anti-democratic bias throughout.

She restricted both the total increase in immigration and the annual consultation, while the government cuts back on adjustment programs for immigrants. She is restricting family reunification as a proportion, while expanding the brain drain. She restricts refugees from police states and death squads in Central America so as to increase economic migrants from eastern Europe.

In Canada, the minister is sweeping nearly 100,000 refugee claimants of the old backlog under the rug by denying them right of counsel and using specially distorted guidelines for so-called humanitarian review. Furthermore, she refuses to say what she will do with the 7,500 in the new refugee backlog for 1989.

The increase of only 10,000 or 15,000 total immigration flies against the unanimous recommendations of the Tory led committee on labour, employment and immigration in 1985. Holding back the demographic study that was promised for 1988 and excluding many immigrant support groups from the consultation enables her to run her program through with sham consultation.

While her colleagues reduce opportunities for immigrants, especially women, to learn English or French as a second language, by cancelling the citizenship instruction and language training program she cuts back job training opportunities for immigrants as well as Canadian born workers.

While increasing the target for family reunification, which is the cornerstone of her immigration policy, by only 7 per cent, she boosts the business immigrants and families of selected workers by 21 per cent and the retirees by 50 per cent. This goes with increasing delays in family class applications as immigration staff is transferred to business immigration.

The anti-democratic bias shows most in the minister's overseas refugee plan. She is increasing the level for eastern Europe and reducing the level for Latin America. She hides almost 4,000 questionable refugees from eastern Europe by not including them in her totals. They are the designated class who need not show a well-founded fear of persecution. Yet, eastern Europe is becoming more free, as she herself acknowledges, while the death squad killings increase in Guatemala, El Salvador and Chile. She claims that private sponsorships for Central America have declined, although she knows that the reason why sponsorships have declined is that her overseas consular officers have delayed interviews and applications.

Finally, the Minister predicts only 7,000 to be landed annually of those who claim refugee status while in Canada since January 1, 1989. This is shocking. After more than nine months the immigration and refugee board has already granted refugee status to 3,049, while 7,555 have not yet received decisions in their cases. Most of them have not even had their cases opened. So does the Minister plan to deport over 4,500 of them and any more that come before December 31, without giving them any hearing at all on their claims?

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, Question No. 142 will be answered today.

FUNDS DERIVED FROM DRUG MONEY TURNED OVER TO CANADIAN AMBASSADOR IN WASHINGTON

Question No. 142—Mr. Kaplan:

Has the United States Drug Enforcement Administration turned over any funds derived from drug money forfeitures to the Canadian ambassador in Washington and, if so (a) what amount (b) to what use is it the intention of the government to put the money?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): On Thursday September 21, 1989, at a presentation ceremony held in Washington, Canadian Ambassador Burney accepted a cheque for $US 1,000,000.00 from US Attorney General Thornburgh. These monies represent the Canadian share of $US 5,000,000.00 forfeited from money laundered in the Polar Cap Case and was provided to Canada pursuant to a bilateral Memorandum of Understanding signed on September 7, 1989.

The cheque was forwarded to the Department of External Affairs and deposited to the Miscellaneous Revenue Account of the Consolidated Revenue Fund on Monday October 2, 1989.

The House resumed from Tuesday, October 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-28, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, yesterday as we debated this bill, we had an agreement to split our time into 10 minutes and 5 minutes for questions. I am wondering if we could have the consent of the two opposition parties to maintain the same agreement for today.

• (1550)

Mr. Gauthier: No problem, Madam Speaker. For today, we agree to maintain the arrangement of 10 minutes for speeches and 5 minutes for questions.

[English]

Ms. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, no, we do not have agreement on this side. Our members would like to have the full time.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to take part in this debate and to speak in support of this important and timely bill.

In my remarks this afternoon I want to direct the attention of the House to an examination of the package of measures in Bill C-28 as a whole. Indeed, I would like to look at the bill in the context of our budgetary and economic policy as a whole. In that context, I want to affirm that the policy set out in this bill is a reasonable one, a fair one and, not least, a necessary one.

When I say the measures in this bill are reasonable, I mean they are appropriate to the economic circumstances we are in. We are in a serious situation, particularly with respect to the growing public debt, and the measures that address the problem. To demonstrate what I mean, let us examine just two of them: first, the surtaxes. I believe it is reasonable to expect all taxpayers to bear some of the burden of deficit reduction, since the deficit is a problem that affects everyone. That is why we have proposed to increase the federal surtax by 2 percentage points, from 3 per cent to 5 per cent, effective July 1, 1989.

The new high income surtax of 3 per cent will be levied on people with incomes over $70,000. In addition to the general surtax this will ensure that the burden of deficit reduction falls most heavily on those who are best able to carry it.

Second, the large corporations tax. I believe it is reasonable to expect all large corporations in Canada to pay a fair share of federal tax and thus help contribute to the deficit reduction effort. This new tax will only apply on capital in excess of $10 million and thus smaller businesses are not subject to this tax. The budget papers show that about 3,600 large corporations, accounting for approximately three-quarters of the total corporate capital employed in Canada, will be subject to this tax.

I am satisfied that when this bill is examined in committee, the members of the committee will find that the policy it implements is a reasonable one like the two specific provisions I have just noted.

My second concern and a constant concern of the government is with fairness. We want to ensure that the impact of our policies will place the greater burden on those who are better able to carry it, and we want to ensure that everyone who is able is helping solve our common problems. A number of the measures in this bill contribute to the fairness of the package. The two measures I have just mentioned, for example, ensure that those with higher incomes do contribute a fair share.

Other measures demonstrate the government's commitment to targeting assistance to those who need it most. To increase the fairness of the system we are targeting more assistance to lower-income Canadians by doubling the refundable sales tax credits for adults and children and by raising the income threshold so more people will qualify for the full credit. For those who receive the full credit, these measures will more than compensate for the federal sales tax increases that were announced in the April budget.

A second example of a measure designed to increase the fairness of the income tax system is our proposal to ensure that Canadians with incomes over $50,000 a year repay the benefits received under the family allowance and the old age security programs. The proposal respects the principle of universality in social programs, which this government fully accepts, by ensuring that all eligible persons continue to receive these payments.

The programs remain untouched because the amount of repayment does not depend on the status of the individual but on his or her income and is administered through the personal income tax system. Of course these benefits are already subject to personal income tax and, therefore, are already being partially repaid at progressive rates by all taxpayers. Lower and middle income Canadians who receive these benefits will not be affected by this measure, and those whose incomes drop below the threshold will continue to enjoy full benefits. The $50,000 threshold is indexed on the same basis as other indexed brackets and thresholds in the tax system. As well, the level of the threshold will be reviewed periodically and adjusted as appropriate.

Other measures also improve the fairness of the system. I want to draw attention to the new deductions in respect of part-time attendant care for the working disabled and to the new drought relief tax deferral for cattle farmers who have had to reduce the size of their breeding herds because of the drought. These provisions are designed to assist those with special needs and will continue to enhance the over-all fairness of the tax system.

To have a fair tax system we must have a fair tax base. Therefore a number of measures are included in this bill to make the tax base more equitable. An example is our proposal to tax accrued investment income on an annual basis. This will help ensure that those who invest in contracts and pay income annually and those who choose to invest in compound instruments will be taxed on a comparable basis.

Measures relating to the taxation of leasing profits will ensure that the leasing industry bears its fair share of tax and will help curtail the use of leasing as an after tax financing mechanism. At the same time we were careful to ensure that these proposals will not interfere with the legitimate use of leasing.

Finally, I want to draw attention to a third characteristic of the measures in this bill. I believe they are reasonable and they make the system more fair. They are also necessary. They accept the reality of constraints imposed by a growing public debt and demonstrate that this government is acting effectively to face the many challenges that we face as a result. The debt is large, and is growing as we speak. By this time tomorrow the debt will be larger by more than $80 million. Two weeks from now it will have grown by another $1 billion.

The main reason for this dramatic rate of growth is that the interest payments on the debt are increasing rapidly. Only 20 years ago, just 12 cents of every dollar taxpayers sent to Ottawa went to interest payments. By 1984, that figure had already grown to 32 cents, and this year it is over 35 cents.

The debt is a major obstacle to building the kind of future we want for ourselves and for our children. But this does not have to happen. This does not have to be the legacy by which future generations of Canadians remember us. We can and we must stop borrowing from our children and their futures. We must all realize that it is too easy to borrow from future generations. They cannot speak in this debate. They are not here to vote on this legislation. But they are the ones who would face the consequences if we did not act. So we, in this House—all of its members—must speak for them. We must act on their behalf by taking the necessary actions now to reduce the deficit and control the growth of the debt. We must start paying our own way.

This is exactly what our government has been trying to do from the first day that we took office. From day one we recognized how serious the debt problem really was and we have been acting responsibly to bring it under control.

In this budget, which this bill will help implement, the Minister of Finance proved he is not complacent. He introduced a careful balance of expenditure and revenue measures to deal with the debt. These debt control measures will cut more than $5 billion from the projected deficit this year and $9 billion next year. The budget measures will cut the annual deficit in half, to $15 billion by the year 1993–94. These are reasonable measures. They are fair measures and they are necessary measures which recognize that deficit reduction has a greater purpose. It provides more flexibility for the government to ensure that the programs Canadians value can be maintained; it means that Canadians have greater confidence in their economy and their future; it holds out on the promise of sustained economic growth, improved competitiveness and the creation of productive jobs; and it is an essential pre-condition for an increasing prosperous and compassionate Canada.

In summary, Madam Speaker, I believe the measures in Bill C-28 are an integral part of the reasonable, fair and necessary economic policy set out by this government at the beginning of its term in office which we have followed consistently since that time.

Mr. Butland: Madam Speaker, I think rubbish and nonsense are euphemisms for pure unadulterated garbage. The member did not mention the word clawback. I believe it was invented by the Conservative government and it is a very appropriate term. She should have noted that $50,000 now will certainly not be $50,000 in five years, ten years and 20 years. Does the hon. member agree with the finance committee chairman's statement that this is a pernicious, sneaky attack on universality? It is the end of universality as we know it. Does she not accept the fact that it will affect several thousand seniors now but as many as one million in 20 years from now? Does she not agree that this is effectively the end of universality as we know it?

Mrs. Feltham: Madam Speaker, maybe the gentleman does know what rubbish is all about, but when I speak I am sincere in saying that what this government is doing is necessary to protect our seniors now and in the future. Universality is not being threatened.

As I stated in my speech, old age security payments are in place. They will stay in place when seniors receive their cheque every month. They can spend that. There is no limit as far as whether they have to return so much on a certain month. We will be dealing with this in the income tax legislation, as we have done with all other issues, to ensure that seniors in the future do receive what is necessary for a good living.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, the speech just given by the hon. member for Wild Rose was absolutely incredible. In the course of her statement she indicated that this government had concentrated its efforts on deficit reduction.

Would she not agree with me that this government is obviously a colossal flop when it comes to deficit reduction? The Minister of Finance in his first budget in 1984 indicated that the deficit this financial year would be $16 billion dollars and it is $30 billion. Also he indicated that he was going to reduce the deficit and, in fact, the national debt has doubled in four years of economic mismanagement by this government. She has the gall to stand on her feet and suggest that this government's policy has been deficit reduction from day one.

Would the hon. member not agree with me that if that has been the policy that it has been a total and complete flop?

Mrs. Feltham: Madam Speaker, no, I will not agree with the hon. member that what the government has done is a total flop. I would assume that if you understand anything about finances, and being one of the members of the Liberal Party, you must realize the legacy you left to us. The interest that we pay each year on the debt, with the additional amount every year and compiling that amount, makes the debt that we have today an inheritance from your government.

Mr. Mayer: Just a comment, Madam Speaker. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands gets up and talks about what has gone on. Some of us were in this place when the hon. member's party was the government. We had interest rates of 22 per cent, 23 per cent, 25 per cent. We had an inflation rate at 11 per cent and 12 per cent.

If the member wants to talk about seniors, one of the most pernicious things that any senior citizen has to deal with is inflation. If we are talking about managing the economy, surely to goodness in terms of dealing with the seniors, which is one of the things he talked about, one of the things that we can do for seniors is to provide a stable economic environment so that when they get into their retirement years, some of that stability is there in the form of stable interest rates and reasonable inflation rates.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I must admit I am fascinated by the hon. minister's argument that it is okay to poke a person in the right eye now, because someone used to poke him in the left eye.

I must thank the hon. member for her vigorous and stimulating defence of the government's policy in this regard.

I must confess, however, that when listening I was reminded of the words of Humpty Dumpty in Lewis Carroll's Alice in Wonderland who said at one point—I believe I can recall this—"When I use a word, it means precisely what I intend it to mean, neither more nor less". I was reminded of this in the member's use of the term "universality".

I would like to ask the member if her understanding of universality is the same as mine, which is to say that a universal program is a program that is available, without any hindrance, to all Canadians. Or in her use of the term, does it mean that it is in some way means-tested, as will be the case with the old age security program and the family allowance program, given the passage of this bill?

Mrs. Feltham: Madam Speaker, I think I have already answered that question. I stated earlier that all eligible seniors will receive the old age pension. Old age security is not something that will be determined to any one person by the amount of money he or she has at this time. Seniors will receive a cheque every month. The old age security cheque will not be discontinued because someone has an excess amount of money. People will receive those cheques.

The income tax department will look at the amount of money that a person has. If he or she can be taxed on an amount over $50,000, then, on a percentage basis, some of that money will be returned to the government.

I must also answer to the questioner, that when talking to the seniors in my riding, they are in agreement that the future generation and young people now need some of that money and they are very glad to share it with them.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and speak on this particular bill and to talk about the ramifications of this legislation. As one looks through and sees the size of this bill, one realizes right away that it is a far-reaching bill which deals with all sorts of things: income tax, federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, post-secondary education, old age security, and so on.

I think it reaches furthest into the pocketbooks of Canadians. It reaches furthest into the pocketbooks of the elderly and the young, the unemployed, the sick, and the students of this country. I feel badly about it too. I really do. I think it is a shock and a shame that this government would foist this type of legislation upon Canadians.

The clawback in particular is a breach of the Prime Minister's so-called sacred trust, a thing that would never happen. But the clawback is happening and is being implemented in this legislation. It is a shame because it is a direct attack on the elderly of Canada. They are the people who paid their way and supported this country and this government, and now they are repaid with a clawback.

The principle of universality has been destroyed by this legislation. It is shocking to say the least. If I can quote the Canadian Council on Social Development which said, back in April of this year, that by taking back the entire family allowance from 368,000 families and all of the old age security from 54,000 seniors and reducing these benefits for many more, the government is eroding the fundamental principle of universality which recognizes our collective responsibility for caring for children and for the elderly.

That is a shocking indictment of this government and what it has done. The clawback of family allowance will take up $1.68 billion from family budgets over the next five years, roughly $500 million a year by the year 1991. Those are families, in most cases, which cannot afford this loss and this reduction. Of course, the government will tell us that it will give it back, that it will have all of these fancy programs and ways to restore some of the money, but I say to you that it should not be taken in the first place. It should not have to be put back.

Some things are sacred. Some things ought not to be touched. Obviously we have to maintain that principle of universality. The party that I have the pleasure of working with and the riding that I have the pleasure of representing firmly believes that we should maintain the principle of universality.

I am also concerned about the effects of this legislation on higher education. Again, the Canadian Association of University Teachers said:

> Higher education is, in fact, an investment as much as an expenditure. The Finance Minister talked in his budget about the effect on future generations. The effect of failing to compete with the Americans, the Japanese and many European countries in educational investment will be to ensure a future for our youth as hamburger flippers rather than as meaningful participants in the technological era that is upon us.

What is the effect of this legislation and the effect of stopping the movement of funds to higher education to the universities in our community? I happen to have one and my hon. friend from Beausejour has another. I can tell you from talking to the presidents of those universities that they have had to cut back on programs and cut back on some of the education that their students are receiving. It is in large measure because this government is not fulfilling its obligation to higher education.

I also want to talk about the UI cuts in Bill C-21, and the effects of those cuts which are covered here in this legislation. Moncton was lucky, quite frankly, and had the legislative committee in that riding. We heard from a number of people who had concerns, but the impression that one is left with is that the committee wasted its time, that nothing really had any impact on what the government intended to do.

There is no guarantee that the UI program which has set up a training budget will see training done in New Brunswick. There is no guarantee that there will be any jobs once people are retrained. The government is taking money out of the pockets of New Brunswickers, and the unemployed who have contributed their funds to the unemployment insurance fund will end up in Ontario in Quebec and out west where the high-tech industries are looking for retraining in doing jobs. The effect of this legislation is to take money out of Atlantic Canada, out of New Brunswick, and put it where it is really not needed for retraining people, where there is an abundance of jobs and work.

Mr. Robichaud: It is a resettlement program.

Mr. Rideout: It will force the people of Atlantic Canada and New Brunswick to move and to live in such places as Toronto, heaven forbid. This government hammers away at the people of Atlantic Canada. I think it is absolutely essential that there be an amendment to this legislation which would see the money that is taken from the workers of New Brunswick stays in New Brunswick for retraining and that there is new job creation and new opportunities for which these people can be retrained.

• (1620)

It was interesting that cabinet ministers from the New Brunswick government were not allowed to speak or to give their views at the hearings because somebody suggested that they may be grandstanding. The Hon. Russ King, Minister of Advanced Education in New Brunswick, spoke of the problem of illiteracy in New Brunswick and that because of the changes in the UI, people would have to give it up if they wanted to get training to improve themselves. They are in a Catch-22 situation because if they are illiterate, want to improve themselves and try to do something in a particular area it is going to cost them their UI. That will cost them the opportunity to be retrained, which is the focus of this legislation.

Needless to say, the changes in qualification times have very serious adverse effects on an area like New Brunswick. I know from discussions with my colleague from Beausejour that the seasonal workers in his riding, as well as in my own, are being very adversely affected by the UI changes.

What we have to look at in all of this is the ripple effect that this type of legislation has, with all the changes that have been put upon the people in the regions. There is less money for seniors. There is downgrading of education and health facilities in Atlantic Canada; changes to UI in effect hitting the people who can least afford it; losses of VIA Rail jobs and losses of VIA Rail passenger service in Atlantic Canada.

In my own riding the closure of the CNR shops is putting 1,200 people out of work. Now we have the allusion from a recent transport committee meeting that perhaps the Atlantic region is going to be closed and another 2,500 jobs will be lost to the Moncton riding. All of these things spill over the whole economy and have an adverse affect on the citizens of that economy.

This is bad legislation. It is hardship legislation. It is legislation that is going to be felt by Atlantic Canadians for a long time.

I think it is particularly interesting to look at the social benefits that this type of legislation is adversely affecting, particularly with the clawback. We look at the Prime Minister's campaign promise, and appropriately it was in Summerside, P.E.I. where they are really thrilled about the promises from the Prime Minister. He said: "As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved not diminished by our government."

What a commitment, and here is the proof of the commitment. You can see that the commitment was nothing but hollow and really negative as far as a commitment to seniors in Atlantic Canada and in my riding is concerned.

In conclusion, the clawback is adverse, and the whole approach of this government as far as privatization is concerned, closing the bases, closing VIA Rail passenger service, all points to one thing. This government suffers from a rare disease called "deficititis". It is fighting the deficit on the backs of those who can least afford it, our seniors, the people who depend on a national rail service, the people in communities with military bases, and the people particularly in the regions who depend on a national, equitable UI system. This bill should be withdrawn.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, as this debate on Bill C–28 continues and we hear from members of the opposition, I always feel the compulsion to rise in the House of Commons to put the facts on record in case anybody is actually listening to the ramblings of the hon. members opposite, particularly with respect to the change in the old age assistance taxation. They speak of the elderly, those who are in dire straits and need help, but what they never mention is the exact method of taxation, the fact that only those who receive old age assistance and whose incomes exceed $77,000 a year will be asked to pay back that part of the old age assistance which is not already taxed. In the case of an individual making over $77,000, I think it probably amounts to $1,500 or less which he or she is being asked to contribute.

Apparently, the hon. members want those people to keep that money, possibly at the expense of other Canadians who are really in dire need and need maintenance programs, special help and assistance, which this government is providing. They say in defence of their position, that we are breaching the golden rule of universality. I have said here, and I will say it again: you cannot eat universality, you cannot wear it, you cannot put it in the bank, you cannot improve your lifestyle with the concept of universality. Many think it is a sacred cow rather than a sacred trust.

The government has taken those steps to insure that Canada remains solvent, to insure that Canada, as a nation, is able to provide benefits to those in need. Yes, at the expense of those not in need. Yes, at the expense of people with incomes of $77,000 and more.

Does the hon. member disagree with the policy that takes money from people with incomes of $77,000 and gives it to those with no income or little income, who are really in need? Is he against that policy?

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rideout: Madam Speaker, in a nutshell I disagree with any program and any piece of legislation that has the effect of taking money out of Atlantic Canada and putting it someplace where it is not needed. That is what my hon. friend is suggesting that we should do.

Sure he suggests that we should cut VIA so there are no passenger rail services in Atlantic Canada. He suggests that we should take all of the training money like UI and send it to Toronto—to Ontario—and to Montreal where it is not needed. That is what I am opposed to, and I will continue to fight that type of legislation. I am surprised that my hon. friend could support such terrible legislation for Atlantic Canadians.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, the member opposite says that rich Canadians should not receive government benefits, that universality should not be directed toward rich Canadians. Well, his Prime Minister is a rich Canadian. In fact, he earns over $100,000 a year perhaps $140,000 a year. He is at the public trough. He has four children.

I would like to ask the hon. member, through my colleague, whether he believes that the Prime Minister of Canada is paying back, for example, the family allowance that he is receiving for his four children? He is a wealthy Canadian.

The bottom line is that senior citizens have a legal right to the old age security, and this government does not have the legal right or the moral right to take back what these people are entitled to, especially when the Prime Minister across the way is whistling and blowing at the same time. If he really believes that rich Canadians should not be receiving government benefits, why doesn't he give back to the people of Canada the family allowance that he receives every month?

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise in this House today representing the views and concerns of the people of Haldimand—Norfolk and to discuss Bill C-28.

I had the pleasure last week of talking to some senior citizens about this bill. I know the bill deals with a lot of different issues, but I want to centre on that one issue. The bill makes 59 different amendments to the Income Tax Act, and I cannot deal with them all. So I want to relate to you some of the experiences I had talking with senior citizens about what they felt about the whole clawback.

This government calls this bill tax reform. But I say it is nothing but a sham. It is a disguised way of increasing taxes and it is a way of increasing taxes on senior citizens, on those who least can afford it.

We hear the gibberish across the way, by the Conservatives, who keep talking about budget deficits and cutting back on the budget deficit and bringing down taxes. That is what they said prior to the election. They said our taxes would go down. Unfortunately, what they did not say was that the Conservative government, since 1984, has increased taxes some 31 times. I do not think that most Canadians, especially the senior citizens I talked to this week, feel badly about paying their fair share. Unfortunately, what we are seeing is a government that consistently attacks the same people, those who are least able to attack back.

I want to first look at the budget and at Bill C-28. I want to talk about what the finance minister has been saying about budgets. The finance minister indicated that this cut-back will affect only seniors with an annual income of $50,000 or more. Today, it may be $50,000 but what about tomorrow, what about next year?

We have already seen examples of the government making commitments and then breaking its promises. It could be $40,000. It could be $30,000. There is no commitment yet by this government to say specifically that it will keep the clawback at $50,000.

The government says that this program will still have universality. What the government is not admitting is that along with the pension cheque or the family allowance cheque, it is also sending out tax invoices. It is also taxing these people back. Granted, these people will still receive benefits and it is universality in that sense, but the government is taking it back underhandedly in other ways. I think that is wrong. Senior citizens, quite frankly, recognize that fact and are not prepared to put up with it. It is not universality.

Seniors can hardly believe that this is taking place because of what the Prime Minister has said in the past. He said: "As long as I am Prime Minister, social programs, especially those for the elderly, will be improved, not diminished". I had a hard time explaining what he meant by that on behalf of the Prime Minister when I spoke with seniors in my riding. They could not understand how a Prime Minister who made that promise could then bring in legislation like Bill C–28 which directly takes away their income.

What these cuts mean is that some people at 75 years of age will pay a higher tax on their income than a 35 year old person with the same income. That is not right. Seniors want to know why that is the case. Using the finance minister's own formula, a 45 year old couple who now earns $28,000 a year will have to pay tax on their old age pensions when they retire. The people recognize that.

A 55 year old Canadian who is today earning $25,000 will have his old age pension completely taxed back at the age of 80. In 20 years, over two million Canadian seniors will have to pay tax on their old age pensions.

The President of the National Senior Citizens and Pensioners Association, an organization of seniors groups which represents half a million Canadian seniors, stated recently that seniors have been betrayed and misled by this government. That same point of view was echoed by many seniors in my riding. The president said that he views this proposal as a serious breach of faith by our government and an insidious effort to undercut the social security programs that on numerous times have been stated a sacred trust.

The coalition of Quebec seniors said that the pension clawback is discriminatory on the basis of age, unfair and contrary to the Charter of Rights and that it creates a steeper tax rate for seniors than for others at similar levels. Seniors who, with great difficulty have succeeded over the years in saving for their retirement, are being penalized.

That same feeling was echoed by many seniors in my riding. This government seems to be saying that Canadians should not count on the sacred social contract, that the sacred contract is no longer there. Do not count on having a family allowance, do not count on having a pension when one reaches retirement.

Many seniors in my riding kept asking, "Didn't we pay into this? Didn't we throughout our lives pay into this? Why do we now not have the ability to get it back?" They cannot understand. They keep hoping that there must be some legal technicality that can help them out of this situation. They said that they fairly, and with the understanding they would get something back, paid into this, but now they are not receiving anything back. They want to know from this government why. Quite frankly, I agree with them. I do not know why. I ask the government, why is it now that it is taking away the pensions of our seniors?

I feel it is important that everyone pay his fair share of taxes. However, it should not be just the large corporations, richer Canadians, who are able to sneak around the tax system. Seniors asked me this past week why it is that large corporations over the years, especially in the last five years, have been able to evade taxes and why it is that they are being singled out as the ones who have to pay.

This proposal means that a senior with an income of $70,000 per year will be taxed differently than someone younger. That is not fair. Seniors want an answer from this government as to why that is. To date in this debate, I do not think we have heard anything from this government.

In conclusion, I want to point out the views of the seniors in my riding to whom I spoke in Simcoe this past week, seniors who say that over the years, they have fought for Canada in different wars, they have paid their taxes fair and square. They decided that they would go into this program and in fact they paid into this program, and they want their money out of the program now. They call upon this government to take a few moments and explain to them why it is that they are now the ones who are being pressured to bring down this government's debt which it has doubled since 1984.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, again I feel compelled to respond by way of a comment on Bill C–28. As you know, Act of Canada, but opposition members seem to focus in on the clause which enacts the new Section 180.2 with respect to old age assistance. Again, for reasons I have already explained, I think facts should be put on the record.

Let me start this time, for the benefit of hon. members, with this fact. There are three million recipients of old age assistance in Canada. Of those three million recipients, 2,633,000 or 87.8 per cent will pay no tax at all under this new provision. Another almost 200,000 more will pay no tax. When we come to tax, 32,000 recipients will have their old age assistance, the amount of money given to them by the Government of Canada from the national treasury taxed back under this provision. Those 32,000 people have incomes in excess of $100,000. The government is asking people with incomes in excess of $100,000, 32,000 of them, to pay back their old age assistance payments which came from the treasury of the Government of Canada and from the taxpayers of Canada.

That is not even all that bad because it is already taxed back in the normal course a great proportion of the amount they received as part of the normal taxation system. I say to the hon. member, I do not see what the problem is. Does the hon. member believe that those 32,000 people earning over $100,000 a year should keep that money at the expense of other Canadians who need help from the Government of Canada? Is that what he thinks?

Mr. Speller: Madam Speaker, that is a ridiculous argument. I challenge the member to go back to his own riding, speak to the senior citizens, and ask them what they feel. Ask them if they feel that it is fair that this government takes away a program that was a sacred trust, that this Prime Minister had told them was a sacred trust. I challenge him to go back to the senior citizens in his riding and ask them. Have you been there? Have you asked them? Have you seen them? Have you talked to them? Have you asked them how they feel?

Mr. Crosby: You show me a $100,000 income earner and I will talk to him.

Mr. Speller: Madam Speaker, that is ridiculous. I spoke with the seniors in my riding. They want to hear why this government broke its promise. This government promised them that these programs would be sacred but instead took them away from them. They want to know why this government continues to make promises that are broken.

Mr. Parent: Madam Speaker, I did listen to the entire speech made by my hon. colleague. Unless I missed it, I might put this question about this despicable move that the government is making to take money back from the old age pensioners. Is it the hon. member's understanding that this $60,000, $50,000 or $70,000 is going to remain static or is this amount going to be increased every year as the inflationary rate diminishes the real value of the dollar? What I am asking is if indeed this amount which is today set at $50,000 will be worth $42,000 or $30,000 in the years to come? I wonder if the hon. member could address that question.

Mr. Speller: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. He is absolutely right. I thank him for his insight. In fact, this government has made no commitment whatsoever to keep it the same. In fact, over the next few years, that figure, because of inflation, will drop and so you are absolutely right.

These people who will be earning $35,000 during the next few years will have it taxed back. Seniors recognize this. Seniors come to me and I am sure they come to the hon. member and ask why the government is not promising something. They do not believe its promises anyway but they say there must be something to this. If the government is not making a correction here, then we have something to worry about in the years to come.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, it is not with a great deal of pleasure that I feel compelled to stand up and speak in this debate. The actions of the government deserve to be rejected by all Canadians as the changes in Bill C–28, in fact, damage one of the most important constituents we have in this country.

In beginning my own contribution to this debate, I was thinking about how the government finds itself in the position where all of a sudden it has to turn on senior citizens in order to increase its revenue base. The government in 1984 was full of promise, full of national debate, full of lots of vigour towards changing the Canadian way. How did it change the Canadian way?

First of all, the Conservatives turned to all their friends at high income levels and said, "We are going to give you a tax cut. We are going to reduce the amount of money you have to pay in taxes. We are going to allow you capital gains tax free."

Then they went to the corporate world and said, "Don't worry, we are going to reduce your taxes." All of a sudden, a recently created deficit of about $100 billion suddenly blossomed until right now we face the awful spectre of a $350 billion accumulated deficit within the next two to three years.

They then realized that they had a choice. They could go back to their friends and companions and say, "We have made a mistake. We have to start taxing capital gains. We have to start taxing corporations like we do individual families. We have to go back to high income earners. We have to take money back from you." No, they are traumatized by going back to tax these people. Or else they could go back into their revenue base and somehow or another pull back on expenditures. Every minister sits around the table and says, "Not me, not me" except, of course, for the Minister of Transport. He is very easy that way. He will let you take away VIA Rail. All the other ministers are protecting their own bailiwicks.

So we have a government which is both bankrupt in money and in ideas. Its solution is to increase taxation on seniors. People on the other side of the House refuse to look at it in that simple way. They are increasing the rate of taxation among seniors in this country.

People again say, "Well, listen, why not tax the people who are making all this money?" First of all, you have to remember that the support one Liberal government after another built up for universal programs in this country was based on that very premise, that they were universal. It means you had access to these programs no matter what your income level. It means that the average middle-class family, making somewhere between $40,000 and $100,000 a year, with two people working, feels secure, whether we are talking about medicare or about looking forward to their pensions. They felt that they were going to be looked after. One of the ways of keeping a generous coalition going in a country such as Canada is by making sure that the middle class feels they have a stake in the system.

This government, in its own cruel and miserable way, is taking away the middle class. It is going to make the middle class feel insecure. It is going to make the middle class feel as if it is not going to have a stake in the system.

When you do not have a stake in the system, what happens? You begin to pull away your own support. When you do not get a service from the government, why do you pay taxes? One of the great issues in local politics in this country is the issue of policing, and one of the most difficult things to do is to make sure the middle class feels well policed so that the police can then turn around and use resources in poor areas.

It is the same thing with pensions. Why should a person paying a lot of taxes who is not getting a benefit from the pension system support somebody with less income? The answer is that they will not do it. This government understands it the same way that Margaret Thatcher understood it in England. You pull away the middle class, you privatize it, you make it feel like it can look after itself and you dismiss the poor with the back of your hand. We are going through the same process right now.

This bill has to be fought and opposed because it poses a threat, not only to working poor in this country, but to the middle class. If we want to continue as a country with national programs, we need people who pay taxes. We all know as politicians that people are upset with the high tax rate. We have to give those people an opportunity to see and to understand that the system is working for them.

We in the Manitoba caucus, the hon. members for Winnipeg North, St. Boniface, Winnipeg South Centre and Winnipeg—St. James, had a one-day seminar on pension reform last June. We were surprised by the number of groups which stepped forward to outline the problems of the pension system in Canada. It is not only a question of the clawback but also several other problems that have to be reformed.

In my own constituency, and I do not have to tell members who have been in the House for a long time that the former member for Winnipeg North Centre built a reputation for fighting for the poor of our constituency. Through one speech after another, he made the pensioners in Canada realize that the Government of Canada had to make a commitment to them and had to live up to that commitment. Since then, people on Selkirk Avenue, Main Street, Portage Avenue and Pritchard Avenue in Winnipeg understand that the role of the federal government is to protect their pensions and to enhance their lifestyle.

They are now joined in Winnipeg North Centre by a new group of elderly who are not aged 65 but are aged 55. They are middle class families who come in from the suburbs and who need protection and income support. The neighbourhoods in Winnipeg North Centre will be transformed by older people such as these making a commitment to one of the oldest and poorest constituencies in this country. It is one that needs to be regenerated. These people have to work together and they have to feel they have a stake in the system. When you take money away unnecessarily, people lose their reason for supporting the system.

People often make light of the fact that the degeneration of income or the lack of an income base is only affected with the first 3 per cent. One of the demographic changes we have in this country is the number of people who live well past 65. For example, in Winnipeg North Centre, the people who come into the senior citizens' residences are often aged 81. They begin their life as seniors at age 81. They live to their mid-eighties. Let us say they live to the age of 85. Stop and think about it; you have your old age pension for 20 years and for each one of those years the government does not protect 3 per cent of your income. What is the erosion in your buying power for 20 years at 3 per cent per year accumulative? You have to realize that you will take a huge reduction in your living standard.

The minister from Manitoba, the minister responsible for western diversification, stood up earlier to remind the House of high interest rates back in the early eighties and pointed his finger across the floor saying he cannot believe that those on this side of the House were even worried about inflation nowadays, given what we did to the country. I would like to remind that member that the reality of inflation is that it can break out upon us at any time. It is not limited to that government or this government. The people who understand this better than anyone else are the seniors. The ravages of inflation haunt them because their income level is unprotected and that lack of protection is furthered by the government's action. On that particular item, I join my caucus in strongly opposing the government.

On a second issue, the government has again failed in this legislation to address the question of fair taxation in the corporate world. While I do not join my friends in the NDP in ranting and raving against the corporate world, I do think there is a frustration in the middle management in Canada, people working in all-Canadian firms, who cannot see fair taxation in the corporate world. International corporations, because of the financing, marketing and the legal structures, are able to move capital and tax dollars out of Canada. Until this government is willing to bring into the House legislation which addresses this issue of lost income, lost taxation, we will continue to find ourselves in the corner, having insufficient money to help those Canadians who need help the most.

There are two major faults with this piece of legislation; its inability to protect seniors at all income levels and to understand their needs for income protection far into the future, and the refusal of the government to deal with corporations and the extraction of proper corporate taxation rates that will enhance the revenue base of the federal government.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, this bill marks one of the most significant changes in social policy in Canada in the last several decades. In sum, it eliminates the universal nature of two important social programs.

In the few minutes that I have today, I would like to focus on several aspects. I would like to focus on the government's recent promises concerning social programs, what the clawback is and how it works, what the government claims about the clawback, how the clawback will attack not just the rich, but ordinary Canadians everywhere in a very short time, and some alternatives the government could have considered.

Let us begin by looking at the government's promises about social programs. Most Canadians remember the Prime Minister's sombre assurance that social programs were a "sacred trust". Others remember this government assuring Canadians that it would improve social programs in general and improve the lot of seniors in particular. Let me remind people of two of these solemn assurances.

One is reported by the Canadian Press on March 7, 1984, when the Prime Minister said:

> Our position is simple and straightforward. We are in favour of universality in social programs and it shall not be touched.

Again, on October 15, 1988, speaking to seniors in Summerside, Prince Edward Island, the Prime Minister said:

> Let me say a special word to the senior citizens. In the future Canada will be doing more, not less, for all of you.

He said this. I am not making this up.

> As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada, social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved, not diminished by our government which is committed to social justice and fairness for Canadians.

Especially for the elderly, note.

So what about this bill? We are not talking small potatoes here, much as the government would like you to believe that we are. We are talking about a dramatic shift in the direction of this country. We are talking about ending the universality of social programs in Canada.

And we are talking especially about literally stealing the pension savings of older Canadians. I quote, because he stated it so much better than I could, from a letter by Mr. David Wilson of Winnipeg to that city's Winnipeg Free Press. He writes in part:

> The old age security program was initiated in the early 1950s as a contributory program which paid for itself, with each year's payments funded by matching contributions. A special tax was created for this purpose, and each time the pension was raised the tax was raised as well. Up to 1972 this line was included on the income tax form: "Old age security—4 per cent of taxable income—maximum $240." It is also very likely that we continued to pay this tax after 1971, but it was not a separate item on the income tax forms.
> The federal government has now ruled that the old age security pension can be taxed away from pensioners who have paid for it.

Not only is this a betrayal of what was previously deemed a sacred trust by this government, it is a theft from the very seniors who paid into the program for so many years.

We will get to the details of how the bill will work in a moment, but given that there is such a shift, such a substantial change in policy, would you not expect an honest government, a government that is straightforward with its people, to have a national discussion about this? Then, after, the pros and cons have been discussed, announce to the people of Canada what steps it plans to take? But no, this government's long suit is neither honesty nor openness. The announcement of this shift was made among an avalanche of bad news announcements in the budget, and there had been no substantial public consultation beforehand. Indeed, the Tory chairman of the finance committee admits this, even if the PM won't.

In a wonderfully candid moment, the chairman wrote to a resident of Edmonton. In his letter to Mr. William Daly, a 61-year old resident of Edmonton he said:

> We have decided to eliminate universality and we do that in a sense by the clawback in both family allowance and the old age pension.

How admirably honest. Even if the government is not, obviously members of it are. He continues:

> As you know, it has been a Conservative philosophy for some time that distributions from the state ought to go essentially to those in need. While the clawback may be unfair and sneaky, it is there.

An admirable honesty, wholly uncharacteristic of his benchmates.

As we had graphically demonstrated for us earlier this afternoon, the term "universality" is sometimes misunderstood. Perhaps it might be helpful to describe what is generally meant when we say a program is universal. Simply put, a universal program is one that delivers benefits to all Canadians, regardless of income. Why do this? Why not discriminate on the basis of income? The reasons change as one moves from program to program, but for the family allowance those reasons are principally two.

First, universality is the recognition by the Canadian people through their government of the contribution that parents at all income levels make to raising Canada's future citizens. Second, it also recognizes in some small way that extra expenses are incurred by parents for raising children that childless couples and single people do not have.

As for the universality of the old age security program, that recognizes the contribution that all elderly Canadians, whatever their financial circumstances, have made to our society.

Now, it is true that although these two programs currently deliver the same monthly cheque to all their recipients, family allowance and OAS do not now provide the same benefit to all beneficiaries. This is because the benefits from both those programs are counted as taxable income. As a result many families and pensioners pay federal and provincial income tax on those benefits and, consequently, benefits after taxes of these programs are highest for lower income beneficiaries and lowest for higher income beneficiaries. Every recipient now gets some meaningful benefit.

In fact tax filers in the top income bracket still end up with a substantial 55 per cent of the benefits, a situation due mainly to the grotesque distortions introduced into the income tax system by successive Liberal and Conservative governments.

However, under the new scheme above a certain income level higher income families and pensioners will have to pay back 100 per cent—the entire shot—of the benefits they received over the course of the previous year. The government has taken great pains to suggest that this is no big deal, that it will not affect many people at all.

We have heard that in the questions and comments following the remarks of previous speakers. And, according to the Budget Papers, on page 9, the clawback of family allowance and old age security payments will have a minimal effect on individual Canadians and families.

The finance minister claims, for example, that only 4.3 per cent of seniors will be paying back any part or all of their pensions, with 54,000 individuals paying back all of their OAS and 74,000 paying back a part of it. On family allowances he claims that only 14 per cent of families will be affected, with 368,000 paying back all of their family allowance and 167,000 paying back a part of it. Thanks to normal inflation, these numbers in both cases will go up rapidly year by year so that more and more retirees will end up repaying their pensions and more and more families will repay all their family allowance.

The way the system works is that the income level at which the clawback starts will move upwards according to the same deindexing formula that exists in the tax system; in other words inflation minus 3 per cent and that is the key, Mr. Speaker. This means that if you assume an inflation rate of 4.5 per cent the income limit will move up by only 1.5 per cent in that year, 4.5 per cent minus 3 per cent. That is not indexing, and that means that inflation will erode the clawback floor.

A worker earning $40,000 a year and watching his or her income rise with inflation would be earning enough to put his or her income over the clawback level for family allowances by 1997. For retirees, the clawback is more complex and phases in more slowly, but a simple rule of thumb is that a worker earning $28,000, that is roughly the average industrial wage, will be hit by the clawback by the time he or she retires.

This assumes that income keeps pace with inflation and that retirement income is 70 per cent of pre-retirement income. Once again the government accomplished this by not fully indexing the trigger figure of $50,000. Over time, through inflation, more and more of us will be caught.

Here are some other examples. A 30 year old making $30,000 will have part of her OAS pension clawed back when she retires at 65. The same is true for 35 year olds making $35,000, 40 year olds making $40,000, and 45 year olds making $45,000 a year. All told the clawback will catch about 128,000 Canadian pensioners in 1990. In 20 years that will rise to over one million Canadian pensioners.

In regard to family allowance a similar pattern applies. Assume that you are presently 23 years old and that you are making just over $25,000 a year. If you have children in five years and you never make more than that income, adjusted for inflation you will be losing part of the family allowance payment by the time your child is 18.

In 1990 roughly 14 per cent of families will have their family allowance subjected to the clawback. In 10 years that will rise to nearly 30 per cent. The proportion of families affected by the clawback will more than double within 10 years.

These examples are based on very conservative estimates of income growth and, no doubt, understate the case, I should point out.

The point is that the clawback does not maintain the principle of universality as Mulroney and Wilson contend. It marks the steady erosion of our social programs down to a much lower common denominator. Henceforth all social programs will be for the poor only. They will be targeted to those in need or deemed to be in need and thereby made selective, not universal. The clawback will move our pension system closer to that of the U.S. There, workers are covered by contributory pensions like our CPP or by means tested programs like our GSI, but not by a universal pension program like our OAS. No pension exists in the U.S. as a right of citizenship for those over 65.

This point is central: it has been Michael Wilson's mission as finance minister to shatter the universality barrier. Once that principle is gone, then it is a very simple matter to refine the clawback even further and make the program more and more selective by taxing back higher and higher levels of benefits.

The National Council on Welfare issued an excellent report in September 1989 entitled The 1989 Budget and Social Policy. It highlights some of the very damaging effects that this policy will have.

I have mentioned a few. I would like to refer to its report in a little more detail to outline a few more. First, the clawback will erode the principle of horizontal equity. One of the reasons for paying child benefits to all families including the better-off is to recognize their additional financial burden in raising children as compared with childless couples and single persons at the same level of income.

This is known as the principle of horizontal equity. After the clawback the only benefit available to all higher income parents will be the $66 per child non-refundable child tax credit. Clearly removing family allowances from better-off families will put them at a greater disadvantage vis-à-vis childless couples and singles who have the same income but no child rearing expenses.

Second, the clawback will discriminate against one-earner families. A one-earner family with an income of $56,000 and two children will have to return 100 per cent of its family allowance benefits to the federal government once the clawback is fully phased in, in 1991. However a two-earner couple with two children in which one spouse earns $45,000 and the other spouse $35,000, for a joint income of $80,000, will not have to pay the clawback because the higher income parents' net income is under the $50,000. Instead, the family will be subject only to the normal rate of taxation on its family allowances returning about 45 per cent of its benefits to the federal and provincial governments. The clawback is both unjust and illogical. The one-earner couple at $56,000 will pay back all of its family allowance. The two-earnercouple earning $80,000, $24,000 more, gets to keep over half of its family allowance.

Third, the clawback will add to the complexity of the child benefits system. Over the past four years the Minister of Finance has further complicated an already complex child benefit system. In brief, the non-refundable child tax credit which replaced the children's tax exemption in 1988 is $66 for each of the first two children and $132 for the third and subsequent children. Families with incomes under $16,000 now receive their refundable child tax credit in two instalments while other families continue to get it only once a year. Children under age seven qualify for a $200 supplement to the refundable child tax credit in 1989 so there are now two rates. It is $565 for children over seven and $765 for those under seven. Parents with receipted child care expenses can claim a maximum $4,000 child deduction for each child under seven, but only up to $2,000 for children aged seven through fourteen.

Last, family allowances and both the refundable and non-refundable child tax credits are now indexed only by the amount of inflation over 3 per cent a year. Confused? The Lord knows I am, and I assume many of the parents of this country are.

Fourth, before the clawback there were two types of families receiving family allowances. Families too poor to owe income tax kept all of their family allowances while those which pay tax kept part of their family allowances and returned the rest to federal and provincial governments in the form of income taxes paid on their benefits.

After the clawback there will be four types of families receiving the family allowance. There will be families which keep all their family allowances because they are too poor to owe income tax. There will be those which keep part of their family allowance because they pay regular income taxes on their benefits. There will be those who keep part of their family allowance because they pay both regular income taxes and the clawback on their benefits. There will be those which will have to pay back all of their family allowances through the clawback.

This is part of what we have had heralded for us as a simpler and more easily understood tax system. This attack on universality is at very least ill-conceived, but it is more than that, and it is worse than that. There are a number of very important questions which need to be raised about this issue. For example, why should an individual be entitled to receive $100,000 in capital gains tax-free but lose the $4,000 he or she gets in OAS simply because it was paid as a universal social benefit? Family allowances and old age security are already taxed in Canada. Why should a special tax be levied on children and on the elderly?

What will "the unique identity of Canada" mean in a few years when our social programs exist only to serve those in need? Will not our social programs be just like those in the U.S., leaner and meaner as all means tested programs are? How long will the population support the maintenance of social programs from which they are effectively excluded as beneficiaries? Will "need" be redefined downwards as it has been in Britain and in the U.S. and as it has been already with our UI and our welfare programs provincially?

If the essence of universality is destroyed through the back door, what is to protect medicare from attack? Will Canada's sick have to prove they are also "in need" to have access to our health care system? When did Canadians vote for having means tested family allowance and old age security programs? When was that put to them in any honesty at all?

Again, remember what the Prime Minister has said, defending the attempted deindexation of pensions in 1985. In Hansard, at page 5774 for that year, he said:

> There is not a single elderly person in this country today who has been impacted unfavourably by this budget.

We will pass over that. Referring to the member asking the question, he said:

> I have given him full responses to assure him that the commitment of this government to the elderly and the integrity of social programs is unrivalled and unsurpassed by any other party in the House and certainly is no less than anyone else's.

Or, how about the hon. member who chairs the finance committee, who said: "They", which is to say seniors, "live at a slower pace and they don't spend money in the same sense that you and I do. Older people don't wear out their clothes. They have plenty of money but they don't like to spend it".

Mr. Blenkarn apparently has forgotten that 42.7 per cent of single pensioners live below the poverty line in Canada, but we will let that pass as well.

I think actually in that statement from Mr. Blenkarn, which I quoted earlier, he got it right. This government is, in his words, sneaky. It simply cannot be trusted to do what it says it is going to do.

I know the Prime Minister tries valiantly to paint the picture that he really cares about seniors and families in Canada, and his government has no alternative but to eliminate universality in social programs. That is the cry, the justification: "The deficit made us do it". What utter bunk. The alternatives are staring us in the face.

Just imagine raising additional money by attacking social programs, asking someone with a $100,000 income to forgo $270 per child in current family allowances, instead of introducing a fourth marginal tax rate of 32 per cent for high income earners, which would raise some $2,000 each or $300 million a year.

Imagine setting up a system that will lead Canadians to fight against Canadians instead of reducing the interest rate by 2 per cent, which would raise an additional $3.5 billion a year.

In conclusion, I entered this debate principally to voice the feelings of disgust and rage that I know characterize seniors in my riding and that I feel safe in assuming characterize seniors across this country. They know that this clawback provision, this bill in its entirety, is unjust. They are telling that to the government. The only question before the House is whether or not the government will have the guts to listen.

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, with a great deal of trepidation I will ask the member a question. Going through the legislation I noticed the changes in the rules dealing with the surtax. This was brought to my attention by several constituents who were concerned that the government had very quietly changed its opinion as to what to do with the surtax. The temporary 3 per cent surtax on personal income taxes was imposed in 1986. In the 1987 budget the Minister of Finance promised that when the new sales tax was introduced the personal and corporate income taxes would be removed. That is a quotation from the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons on June 18, 1987.

Now the minister has made the personal income surtaxes a permanent feature of the income tax system. Before the GST technical paper was released the Minister of Finance had promised to remove the surtax as part of the GST package, but that promise has been broken and the surtaxes are now a permanent tax on all Canadians.

The increase in the surtax from 3 per cent to 5 per cent will take another $1.1 billion out of Canadians' incomes, or an average of more than $100 per Canadian family. The surtaxes, in my opinion, defeat the minister's own stated objectives of tax reform. One of the government's objectives of stage one of tax reform was to lower personal income tax rates. The top marginal tax rate was lowered from 34 per cent to 29 per cent. However the imposition of the surtaxes on all Canadians has pushed the marginal tax rates back up to close to what they were before tax reform started.

The minister sold tax reform to Canadians by telling them that they would get lower personal income tax rates but would pay more sales tax. Canadians have the sales tax increases all right but not any of the savings as promised. I would just like to ask my friend what he thinks about the government reneging on its original promise to drop the surtax as it introduced the GST.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I would like to say that it took me completely by surprise, but I realize that in this House we are honourable and must tell the truth so I cannot say that.

If I were to take every broken promise uttered by this government and record it in Hansard, I would have enough Hansard to wallpaper my home back in Edmonton. So, is it a surprise? No. Is it characteristic of this government? Yes. Do I expect it to be the last broken promise? No. Do I expect that in breaking these promises the government is going to change its spots and in fact start benefiting ordinary Canadians? No. Do I expect that it will continue its assumed mandate of altering the taxation system to make it ever more unfair, ever more oppressive of ordinary middle and low income Canadians in the interests of high income Canadians? Yes. And, by the way, I would be really cautious about defending high income Canadians if I were the hon. member, because they have more than enough defenders across the way. They suffer an embarrassment of riches in this regard too. I think I will let it go there.

Ms. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I want to make a couple of comments and ask for a couple of remarks from the very eloquent member who just spoke, who I am honoured to say is a colleague of mine.

Two or three years ago in the last Parliament we debated the cut-backs and erosion of social programs, particularly the family allowance and the old age pension, when the government at that time was deindexing. I was struck at the time by the fact that the senior citizens across the country organized and were able to change policy. However children have no vote and they really have no voice so it is much more difficult to organize.

The deindexation of the old age pension was stopped. The deindexation of the family allowance went forward. I am glad to hear the hon. member speak so eloquently on behalf of children in the country. I would remind him that when the family allowance was first brought in by the members of this party, largely, and by social democrats and others across the country, the intent was that it would grow and would gradually become a way of subsidizing the real cost of child rearing in this country. It was based on the philosophy that children belong to all of us.

I do not happen to have children, but I feel I have just as much responsibility, if not more, to pay taxes for the cost of rearing Canada's children. It is very, very unfair, therefore, to hit the parents who have the high costs of raising children with the high cost of housing, clothing, education, and so on, regardless of their income. It is very unfair to be taking this back only from them and not taking it out of general tax revenues.

Another point that has come into this debate in the past is the fact that the family allowance usually goes to mothers. It is often the only cheque that the woman, even of well-to-do families, receives in her own name. We heard some very eloquent statements from women on that aspect.

A further point that I think has come into the argument from time to time, and he perhaps touched on it, is that this is really doing away with universality. I would go further and say that it is doing away with a floor of social security in this country altogether. As social policy analysts have said, "if you do not have the middle class involved in some of the benefits from social programs, you lose political support and pretty soon the programs are coming down with tougher means tests and there is a great stigma on the kind of programs that go to people; we would be back to a dog eat dog society".

Perhaps my hon. colleague would care to comment.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Me too, Madam Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on behalf of the senior citizens in my riding and on behalf of families and their children.

I will now address to Bill C–28, an act to amend the Income Tax Act.

[English]

Bill C–28 makes 59 different amendments to the Income Tax Act, implementing many of the 1989 budget provisions.

Madam Speaker, to me, these changes in the Income Tax Act are an attack on universality, on senior citizens and on our families.

As of financial year 1990–91, the government will effectively put an end to the universality of social benefits in Canada. People who paid a special tax before 1971 to help pay for old age security benefits received the assurance of Parliament, when the tax reform was passed in 1971, that they would continue to be entitled to old age security benefits.

Last year, during the election campaign, the Prime Minister said repeatedly that he would not tamper with old age security pensions. He also said: "As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada, social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved, not diminished by our government". That is the promise the Prime Minister made, the promise the whole country heard during the televised debate. At one point he even brought along his mother, repeating his promise that he would protect old age security pensions and would never tamper with them.

Incredibly, since the 1988 election the Tories have yet to keep a single promise they made to Canadians. They never mentioned this during the campaign. Never! They were playing a very different tune, which is why I say we cannot trust them.

Bill C–28 is an attack on the rights of senior citizens. It is an attack on the pensions they deserve. This Bill is an attack on family allowances and on our families.

This Bill is an attack on the principle of universality of the social programs we designed and implemented many years ago.

Madam Speaker, this bill is a complete denial of the promises the Prime Minister made during the last election campaign, as I said earlier. I would like to recall, for the benefit of hon. members, the promise the Prime Minister made in Sydney, Nova Scotia, during the last election campaign. He said: "As long as I am Prime Minister, social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved, not diminished".

Bill C–28 is a betrayal of what the Prime Minister once called a sacred trust.

This is what my Liberal party leader had to say during the election campaign: "The men and women of Canada who worked all their lives to build this country counted on the old age security pension as one of their rights as Canadian citizens. They paid taxes all their lives. They planned their future on the basis of this pension. It is part of the social contract in Canada."

[English]

Bill C–28 makes 59 different amendments. Part I.2 of clause 48 of this bill implements the clawback of family allowances and old age security pensions. The amount of the repayment is equal to 15 per cent of the taxpayer's net income over $50,000. The clawback of the family allowance will take $1.686 billion out of family budgets in the next five years, or $500 million a year by 1991.

Within 10 years close to one million Canadian families who currently receive family allowances or old age pensions will begin to lose their benefits due to the partial indexing of the $50,000 threshold.

The $50,000 threshold at which individuals begin paying their family allowance and old age security benefits is only partially indexed. This deindexation of the $50,000 threshold means that within 10 years close to one million Canadians will start losing their family allowances and the old age pensions. The clawback proposal would put a special tax on families with children and on seniors, a tax that does not apply to anyone else. In this way the clawback is anti-family and anti-senior.

The National Council on Welfare in a press release dated September 13, 1989 stated:

> The federal government should abandon its proposed "clawback" of family allowances and Old Age Security pensions.
> The move away from universal benefits is the most significant change in social policy in a generation, yet it was announced by the Minister of Finance in the budget speech with no prior consultation.
> In the case of seniors, the federal government had publicly rejected the idea of a clawback or surtax on old age pensions as late as January 1985 on the grounds that it would "seriously disrupt" the retirement income system—the clawback changes the rules of the game without their consent. The elderly have already paid for their old age pensions through a lifetime of paying income taxes.
> In the case of parents, the clawback discriminates against one earner families because it is based on individual net income. A one earner family with two children and a net income of $56,000 would lose all its family allowance benefits. A two earner couple where one spouse earns $45,000 and the other $35,000 would escape the clawback despite their combined income of $80,000.

Second, I would like to read from a letter dated June 23, 1989, which was sent to the Prime Minister from from Les Batterson, president of the Senior Citizens Federation. It stated:

> Our position is that the tax-back is age biased, grossly inequitable and has serious implications with regard to universality.
> We view this proposal as a serious breach of faith by our government and an insidious effort to undercut the social security programs that you have on numerous times stated are a sacred trust.
> We also are aware that we had previous deficits as serious as the present one and the government of the day did not tax back pensions to which Canadians had every reason to believe they had a genuine right.

The Coalition of Quebec Seniors in a letter to the Minister of Finance dated May 24, 1989 stated:

> As the clawback begins to affect increasing numbers of individuals, there can be no doubt that the net effect will be a gradual reduction of the principle of universality.
> We consider further that a special tax which is only directed at seniors is discrimination on the basis of age, unfair, and contrary to the Charter of Rights.
> Your proposal creates a steeper tax rate for seniors than for others at similar income levels. Seniors who with great difficulty have succeeded over the years in saving for their retirement are being penalized.

• (1730)

Madam Speaker, thank you for giving me this opportunity to speak on behalf of the senior citizens, the families and the young people in my riding.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for his very eloquent speech on the harm this bill will do to seniors in our country. He also reminded the government of principles which it seems to have forgotten: universality, equity and keeping prior commitments.

[English]

I would like to respond to a comment which was made repeatedly by my colleague opposite, the member for Halifax West. The argument that we hear repeatedly advanced on the other side of the House about the clawback measure, in particular, and the tax back on the family allowance, is that it is designed to tax the rich in order to give more money to the poor. I would like to ask, where is the money going to the poor? Everybody is being taxed more. The goods and services tax will be regressive. It will tax the poor citizens of this country, especially those in Atlantic Canada, proportionately more than it will tax the rich.

A whole litany of consumption taxes are being raised which we know will affect those with modest means much more than those with higher incomes. This line that we hear from the government is simply sophistry and designed to confuse what is really a tax grab from those people who are unable to avoid the tax.

The people who do not get taxed in this society are those who have the money to pay for tax lawyers, accountants, or who are members of large corporations that can avoid the tax. Let us face it, the government is unwilling to put in measures to obtain tax revenue from those who have it because it is much easier to tax those who, for various reasons, cannot avoid the tax.

The idea that this tax on old age security is a way of somehow making the system more fair is nonsense. Perhaps my colleague would like to comment on that in the time that remains.

Mr. Bellemare: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the comments of my colleague from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso. I think that we are talking about basic principles. And if the principle of universal social programs was established some time ago, we must stick to it, because a few years ago, senior citizens were much younger. They were then careful to put money aside, to invest well and all of a sudden, when they are retired and unable to react financially or politically or in any other way towards the government, they are hit in the pocketbook.

I think that if we want to raise taxes, if we must raise taxes, it is all right to raise taxes, then this must be done according to people's income and not because they get money from some source or another or in one way or another.

People must be taxed on their total income and not a particular aspect of it, like the amounts given under our social contract, family allowances or old age pensions. That is contrary to the principle of universality, Madam Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise to discuss the bill proposed by the government. When I was glancing through the government report, one thing came to mind. It has been the argument of the government that one of the main reasons why it has to cut programs and projects that cater to people who are in need is because of the deficit.

Over the weekend, I was glancing at some documentation published by Statistics Canada, and also some documents published by different well-respected agencies.

In my view, to reduce the deficit, you just do not launch an assault on those who are keeping the economy rolling. Unfortunately, over the past five years the government has been panicking, and as a result it has been reactionary. It has launched an assault on middle income Canadians who are, to a large extent, the engine of the economy in this country.

Over the past 20 years we have seen a drastic decline in the manufacturing sector and a drastic increase in the service sector. I might add that this is the source of the problem in Canada and that is why the government is in a panic situation. If we were to increase the level of productivity, we would not be in this situation.

In the 1970s the manufacturing sector in Canada employed approximately 31 per cent of the workforce. In 1989–1990, it employs approximately 25 per cent of the workforce. This will decline to approximately 20 per cent of the workforce by the year 2000.

In the 1970s the service sector employed about 36 per cent of the labour force; by the year 2000, it will employ approximately 53 per cent. So there is a massive shift of the labour force from the industrial sector to the financial sector or the service sector.

This has caused a panic. Why? Because in the service sector more emphasis has to be put on education, and a more educated workforce is required to carry on with the tasks. According to a Globe and Mail report published on September 5, 1989, we cannot take pride in the fact that we are doing enough in the area of education in order to tackle the deficit.

The report states that more than 22 per cent of Canadians over the age of 15 are not currently enrolled in any kind of educational system or they are considered to be functionally illiterate. Furthermore, approximately 30 per cent of Canadian students who enter secondary education leave without getting a diploma. In comparison, Germany has about 14 per cent. Only 72 per cent of Canadians at age 17 are still enrolled in some form of formal education, compared to 94 per cent in Japan. If we want to compare ourselves to our friends in the south, the worker in the United States has at least one year more of education than the Canadian worker.

The shocking thing is that per capita Japan has four times as many engineers as Canada, but we have 20 times as many lawyers as Japan. Probably that is the problem, we have too many lawyers not have enough engineers.

It was quite disappointing to see a decline in the area of investment for education. Last year there was approximately an 1.8 per cent increase in the area of education, and when we compare that to the years between 1985 and 1989, we only had an increase of about 2.3 per cent, which was well below the consumer price index of 4.2 per cent. Frankly, that is where the problem is.

We do not have an agenda for the future. We seem to be panicking. We seem to be pushing all the buttons at the same time when we do have the answer. We are all talking about the answer. The Prime Minister has been speaking for the past goodness knows how many years about the need for a better educational system, the need for standards, the need for more research and development, and the need for industry and private sector involvement. We are all saying a lot, but the government is not doing anything about it. That is what needs to be done. By investing more in the area of educational research and development, I can assure you that the train will start moving.

What we are doing is putting on all the brakes at the same time. We are increasing taxes. We do not have any other source of revenue except taxes as it is right now, and as a result we are going into the pockets of those who cannot help themselves. Unfortunately, in this particular case, it is our seniors, it is the middle-income earners.

I will challenge the minister in three years to tell me that one of the main reasons why they introduced the goods and services tax is to reduce the deficit. He should say that and he should tell Canadians that that is the main reason why it was introduced.

Who are the people who will be affected the most by this? It is the middle and low-income Canadians. It is quite unfortunate that the government has to claw back from those people who have built this country, who put in the infrastructure of this country. We have worked extremely hard in the Liberal party in the past 50, 60 and 70 years to build a middle-income group and to help those who need it. We introduced the social programs with the support of some of our colleagues in this House. We have them in place. Over the past four years, we have seen an assault that this country has never seen in its history.

This is a very, very sad thing to do. I have been to approximately 30 different town hall meetings in my riding with senior citizen groups. These people have attacked the government for its initiative to tax them and to take away their money. After all, it is the senior citizens' money.

Nobody could have put it better than a senior citizen in an article published in Today's Seniors of September 19, 1989. He said: "Having diligently saved for my retirement, it is most discouraging to find that instead of the enjoyment of the life I have saved for I will be contributing to bail out this spendthrift government." That is true.

Another senior said: "For the first time in my life I am frightened of the future." We are frightened of the future. Unless this government sets a proper agenda for the people of Canada, unless the government communicates the proper vision for Canada, unless the government stops looking at other means and ways than taxation then we are frightened of the future. I want to give the chance to some of my colleagues to address this particular bill, but I am frightened by what I see. I hope my colleagues from across the floor will also speak out on this issue.

Our senior citizens are hopeless. They need the support of all of us.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise in my place and participate in the debate on Bill C-28. I want to add my voice to those of my colleagues in this House who have, in as profound a way as they could, drawn the attention of the House to the enormous betrayal that is represented by the piece of legislation put before Parliament, the quite profound disillusionment that Canadians feel at seeing the 59 amendments contained within this bill.

Bill C-28 is not a bill that deals merely in dollars and cents, although ultimately that is the impact, one of dollars and cents. It is not a bill that is primarily financial in nature, although Canadians will count and be able to count in quite dramatic ways the dollars and cents lifted out of their pockets, the decrease in their spending power, but the bill is ultimately not about money. This bill is ultimately about what kind of Canada we are going to live in during the 1990s and beyond. That is really what the bill is about.

We see increasingly in this country quite strong signs of renewed intolerance, renewed lack of understanding, lack of sensitivity. We are seeing a different kind of Canada emerge through the latter part of the 1980s, and it is interesting, through the five or six years that this Conservative administration has been the Government of Canada. In the House of Commons we frequently see members stand up with tens of thousands of names on petitions protesting the fact that a distinguished, honourable and decent human being who wants to be an RCMP officer cannot because religious requirements are such that he must wear a turban. That says something rather disheartening about what this country is coming to. We see a chairman of a standing committee of this House describe the contributions of Canadians from a particular region to the work of that committee as not worth hearing. That says something rather disquieting about this House and this country.

There was a time not so long ago when those kinds of petitions—referring to turbans—or those kinds of comments from a distinguished parliamentarian just would not have been heard. But we are living in a different kind of country. Tolerance is disappearing.

Wrapped up in the 59 amendments to Bill C-28, wrapped up in the whole notion of clawback, wrapped up in the whole effort to pick the pockets of those least able to defend themselves, children and our senior citizens, is an example set by the government of that intolerance, that lack of caring, that insensitivity, that evolution of a new kind of Canada.

What kind of Canada is it? It is a Canada exemplified by those examples I cited, a Canada where citizens are taught to say I am okay, Jack, and that is all that matters. I can cut it. I have a roof over my head. I have bread and butter on the table and I am okay and it really doesn't matter a damn how my neighbour is. The same kind of mentality says you can define or defend culture on the basis of whether or not an RCMP officer, duly trained, properly equipped, is less an officer because he wears a turban for religious purposes. Intolerance!

That is what Bill C-28 is, a mean-spirited bill. It is intolerable. It says that the concept of universality does not matter any more. It says that the Prime Minister's commitment to a sharing, caring, tolerant Canada doesn't matter any more. It says that the collection of values that have bound us together through all of these decades even within our diversity do not matter any more. It says that we are a different kind of country.

Canadians who are concerned about the clawback, Canadians who oppose clawing back those pension benefits from senior citizens acquired over a lifetime, do not oppose it just because we feel that a contract is a contract. That happens to be one good argument that somebody who paid all his life in the expectation of receiving "x" number of dollars ought to receive it because a contract was made and ought not to be broken. That is not the only reason you defend somebody who has a high income in his or her senior years and say that pension ought not to be taken away.

We do not defend the family allowance moneys being clawed back thereby taking from children, because, we say, even though somebody has a reasonably good family income he or she ought to get paid every cent. We all know the family allowances are already taxed back now up to 30 per cent under the income tax system. That is not the reason we are defending, as the government would have us believe, the well-to-do in this society.

The reason we oppose the clawback, the reason we want social programs to remain universal, is that we know in this party and we have historically known in this country—indeed the Conservative Party across the way used to know or at least pretended to know—that a social program targeted only to the poorest of those among us is going to be a damn poor program. That is the reason we stand and oppose this bill. Because all senior citizens in Canada who have followed this debate know, including the poorest of Canada's seniors, that if you claw back the benefits of Canada's upper-income senior citizens and you claw back out of homes the family allowances of Canada's upper or middle-income people then you have clawed away a large part of the notion of sharing and caring in this country and you are ghettoizing through our social programs those people who are the poorest among us. You are saying that you are designing a program that will only apply to the poor. That is exactly what you are saying. And do you know what happens when you do that? At one point in time those poorest people, the only ones who are going to get social benefits, become like the RCMP officer with the turban. An intolerant, indifferent, uncaring, so-called majority says: "It is not in my best interest any more. I do not want to pay for it. And there sure as hell should not be a social program at all in this country".

That is precisely what is wrong with the Tory mentality. It is a mentality that invites Canadians to say that if you can find within your own financial means a way of looking after yourself, a way of providing for yourself and your family so that you do not need any additional assistance whatsoever, you do not want to participate in the social program. The logical extension is, Madam

Speaker, at the end of the day why should you pay in for social programs?

Mrs. Dobbie: You wouldn't know logic if it jumped up and hit you on the face.

Mr. Tobin: My friend opposite states that I would not know logic if it jumped up and hit me on the face. I say to my friend opposite, that if this member opposite had the courage, had the integrity of a basic human being, this member opposite would not stand and applaud like a trained seal for a Prime Minister who has lied outright, repeatedly, to the people of Canada. That is the bottom line.

Mrs. Dobbie: Withdraw and apologize.

Mr. Tobin: Madam Speaker, I understand that in parliamentary tradition I cannot use that word. So, for the sake of not having my speech interrupted by a trained, spineless seal, which is parliamentary, I want to withdraw the word "lied".

Mr. Edwards: And apologize.

Mr. Tobin: Apologize? You want me to apologize to the senior citizens of Canada for a Prime Minister who committed to them that their social programs would not be touched and then robbed their pockets? I cannot apologize for the Prime Minister. He has to apologize for himself. You want me to apologize for a Prime Minister who brought his mother, a senior citizen, on a stage and said, "My mother is a senior citizen. I would no more abandon her than senior citizens of the country". I cannot apologize for that act of betrayal. That is up to the Prime Minister.

I am concerned that Canadians understand that what is at stake here today is not taking substantial dollars out of the pockets of some Canadians. What is at stake here today is whether or not we in this country are going to continue to have social programs universally available, and as a consequence, always available to those who need it the most. That is what is at stake.

For those who believe that in this Canada we ought not to emulate and try to replicate that nation to the south where it is dog eat dog, where it is a fact of life that you get the health care you can pay for; no more, no less; where it is perfectly acceptable to see your neighbour in the gutter as long as you have done all right and saved your pennies. For those who believe that a country like Canada, as large as it is, and as sparsely populated as it is, can only survive when citizenship has attached to it some common meaning no matter where you live and what your circumstance, then we have to maintain our social programs.

This government, had it any idea that a nation's heartbeat, a nation's soul, a nation's conscience cannot be defined like pieces on a Monopoly board, it would withdraw this bill because for the few pennies the government is putting back in the Minister of Finance's coffers, it is ripping the heart and soul out of Canada. The government is asking us to become a nation of intolerant, indifferent, selfish, mean-spirited citizens. That is not in the fibre of this country. It will not be accepted by the people of Canada. Had this government the courage of its words and commitments, it would withdraw this bill.

The people of Canada will not forget this bloody betrayal of our basic values and beliefs by this government.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Questions or comments. The hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, I would like to put a question or two to my friend and colleague. I believe, as he does, that Canadians are fair-minded people, that they understand the need for the Government of Canada, indeed all governments, to tax in order to ensure certain programs and benefits and in order to improve the quality of life for all Canadians.

In so doing, I believe, and I am sure the member agrees, that any system of taxation has to be perceived to be fair to all Canadians, whether you are a rich stockbroker on Bay Street or a single mother or father on welfare in Metropolitan Toronto.

I would like to ask the member whether he really believes—and he has been in the House now for a considerable period of time—that this government over the last five years has been fair with its economic policies? The member has enunciated our concerns with respect to the so-called clawback provisions, the attempt to de-index senior citizen pensions. Can he indicate to me how this government could possibly conceive it or believe it to be fair to clawback seniorcitizen pensions on the one hand and to allow rich investors on Bay Street to claim capital gains? Where is the justice? Where is the fairness? Where is the equity in that type of economic policy?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. I am sure he will find a way to answer that question at the next sitting of the House.

It being 6 p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6 p.m.

Ms. Mitchell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, would that we had a Kingsway.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I must indicate to her that I feel very much of the same sentiment.

Ms. Mitchell: Yes, I realize that you do, Mr. Speaker, and wish only that we had power to change some boundaries.

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition from a number of constituents, most of them from my riding of Vancouver East, protesting very strongly the cuts to VIA Rail services which they believe are essential for many Canadians, rail service having been a part of Canada for more than 100 years. These reductions could eliminate a third of our national passenger railway system or more, as we know now.

The undersigned petitioners call upon Parliament to maintain the VIA network, upgrade VIA equipment, and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger service.

OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from voters in Windsor—

[English]

They are outraged that the government is proposing a goods and services tax, a vicious and nasty tax, and they call on Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

OPPOSITION TO BILL 178

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition, certified correct in form and content, from citizens of Bath and vicinity who call upon the government to exercise its constitutional right and disallow Quebec's language Bill 178.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, it is my duty to table in the House a petition criticizing this Government for its arrogance in wanting to impose an additional tax on Canadians, a goods and services sales tax.

[English]

The people who have signed this petition make it quite clear that they disagree with the goods and services tax, would like it to be dropped from the agenda, and implore the House to call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions dealing with subjects that are as important for my constituents and those in other ridings. The petitioners oppose the planned goods and services tax. The petitioners feel that the Government proposing this tax is probably making a bad decision for Canadians and they ask Parliament to reject the planned goods and services tax.

[English]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Madam Speaker, the second petition that I have is on another very important subject and that is VIA Rail.

Whereas the Government of Canada has decided to eliminate many of VIA Rail's existing routes and thousands of jobs; and whereas the rail passenger mode is the safest and the most environmentally friendly mode of travel, the petitioners humbly ask the House of Commons to ask the government not to cancel in whole or in part rail passenger services in Canada.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I have a petition that I want to present on behalf of over 100 residents of Halifax West and Halifax—Erie.

I want to stress their ancient right to petition the House of Commons, because in this petition they ask the House to consider recommending disallowance of Bill 178 which was enacted by the province of Quebec.

REVISION OF EXTRADITION LAWS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, I have the honour this morning to present two petitions that have been certified correct as to form and content.

The first one represents the signatures of 1,327 central Albertans who call upon Parliament to revise the laws of Canada relating to extradition to allow the justice minister of Canada to extradite alleged or convicted criminals at any time after their apprehension in Canada, even during their period of incarceration for crimes committed in Canada.

If my arithmetic is correct, this brings the total to 83,438 signatures on the same petition.

RCMP DRESS CODE

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, the second petition I have is signed by approximately 100 residents from the town of Rocky Mountain House who call upon Parliament to preserve the distinctive heritage, tradition and uniform of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, today I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by the residents of Hamilton Mountain. The petitioners have spoken out overwhelmingly against the Conservative government's proposed 9 per cent goods and services tax. They believe that it places an unnecessary additional burden on low and middle income Canadians.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon this House to reject the Conservative government's 9 per cent goods and services tax proposal.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I have the duty as a member of Parliament, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present to this House a petition signed by some members of my riding who urge the Governor General in Council to exercise its constitutional powers with respect to Bill 178 of the province of Quebec and disallow the bill.

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I too stand in the House this morning, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to file a petition with 180 signatures from people from various cities in rural areas of Ontario.

These people are very concerned with the elimination of the rail passenger mode in Canada. They feel that it is the safest and most environmentally friendly way of travelling.

Whereas, since 1883 rail passenger service has been an integral part of Canada's public transportation network, they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada not to cancel in whole or in part rail services in Canada.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege to present a petition on behalf of our Lady of Fatima's 50-Plus Friendship Club.

They asked me to present this petition to object to the onerous burden placed upon them as the goods and services tax will be applied on virtually everything they buy.

[Translation]

I also have the honour to present to you three more petitions telling us that this new universal goods and services tax will cause serious and unfair hardships for Canadians on low and moderate incomes. The signers of these petitions ask us to demand that the Government reject this tax.

[English]

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of a number of producers from western Canada who are concerned about the government's handling of the Canadian Wheat Board, particularly the removal of oats from the Canadian Wheat Board on August 1, 1989.

They indicate that the decision was made without prior consultation with the Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee or the major farm organizations in western Canada.

They also indicate that farm marketing boards are a structure developed by farmers, are essential to the orderly marketing of farm products, and should not be weakened but strengthened.

They therefore call on this government to replace oats under the Canadian Wheat Board and to give oats and barley the same protection under the Canadian Wheat Board as wheat.

RCMP DRESS CODE

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present two petitions this morning.

The first is from some 400 residents of Lloydminster, on both sides of the border and the surrounding area, who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to preserve the distinctive heritage and tradition of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police by retaining uniformity of dress code with all the recognizable colour and trappings that have such great historical value to this country.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I have a further petition signed by over 1,000 residents of the province of Saskatchewan who call upon Parliament to formulate and legislate a law to protect life from conception, a law which seeks to save the life of both mother and child.

OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I have the honour of presenting two petitions this morning.

[English]

First, with respect to the goods and services tax that is proposed, there are signatures of many of my constituents who object to this regressive and unfair tax.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Second, again I have a large number of signatures of constituents who are objecting to the proposed clawback of old age security benefits.

The petitioners feel that they have paid for their old age security benefits since 1952 and that the government should withdraw this proposal.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, I ask that all the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Before putting the motion in the name of the hon. member for Beauséjour, since today is an allotted day, pursuant to special order the House will go through the usual procedures to consider and dispose of the supply bill.

In view of recent practices, do hon. members agree that the bill be distributed now?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—FISHERIES

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour) moved:

That this House condemn the governments's mismanagement, lack of leadership, incompetence and negligence that has placed Canada's fishing communities and worders in unparalleled jeopardy.

He said: Madam Speaker, thank you for giving me this opportunity to start the debate on the motion you just read, which is in my name, and perhaps may read it again:

That this House condemn the governments's mismanagement, lack of leadership, incompetence and negligence that has placed Canada's fishing communitites and workers in unparalleled jeopardy.

Madam Speaker, I also want to take this opportunity to point to the many shortcomings in this Government's policies where the interests of the fishing communities on the West Coast, the Great Lakes and the East Coast are concerned. I would like to start by discussing the problems on the West Coast, especially those problems that will arise as a of the decision by the binational panel on Pacific salmon and herring, landings. Many jobs are at stake. Jobs are in jeopardy and jobs will be lost. On November 17, the Minister said in Richmond, and perhaps I may recall his words:

[English]

"I give my assurances that these jobs are safe".

He wanted to reassure these people by saying that no jobs would be lost as result of the FTA.

[English]

As my colleague the member for Winnipeg South Centre remarked on June 15, the Conservative government could have protected the west coast fishery by not putting it and all these jobs on the free trade bargaining table.

Today I wish to demonstrate to this House, to the thousands of people who are listening in the fishery industry, and to Canadians in general how this government put our west coast jobs at risk, as well as jobs on the east coast.

Article 1801 states:

> Disputes arising under both this agreement and General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and agreements negotiated thereunder may be settled in either forum, according to the rules of that forum, at the discretion of the complaining party.

In other words, the U.S. has the choice to challenge any trade practice in either the GATT or the free trade agreement. Naturally it will choose whichever forum is to its advantage.

If the U.S. chooses to challenge under GATT rules, the free trade agreement clearly states in article 408 that Canada cannot use export taxes to protect domestic industries such as the west coast fisheries. It reads as follows:

> Neither party shall maintain or introduce any tax, duty, or charge on the export of any good to the territory of the other party, unless such tax, duty, or charge is also maintained or introduced on such good when destined for domestic consumption.

Export taxes to protect domestic industries have been a recognized practice under the GATT. As my colleague from Winnipeg South Centre said on June 15, it is perfectly legitimate to use an export tax so that non-processed fish from Canada is subject to a higher tax. However, the government has decided that we could do without this unique and potent remedy. This is sheer stupidity.

The next time we hear this government saying that it is through no fault of its own that the GATT rules apply, we will know that it is not telling the whole truth. They have castrated the GATT rules by removing the most effective remedy, the only one that could have helped Canada protect those jobs in the west coast fishing industry.

To summarize, this government has signed a deal which gives the United States of America the right to choose its weapon, the free trade agreement or the GATT. If the U.S. chooses the GATT, this government has chosen to abandon the only GATT consistent remedy of any significance, the right to impose an export tax. This has led to the free trade panel ruling by which Canada has lost its power to impose processing and landing requirements. This means that Canadians will lose jobs and that Canada can no longer establish job creating policies for Canadians.

We have not even started to speak about conserving our resource. With this ruling we can no longer take measures of conservation. This ruling says that we cannot apply landing requirements to 10 per cent or 20 per cent, that part of the fisheries which will be exported. How are we to determine just what is 10 per cent or 20 per cent? We will find out after the fact when it will be too late.

As I stated earlier, in 1987 the minister of fisheries said that he would save those jobs. Two days ago he said that he did know how many jobs would be lost. On the one hand he says that it is a victory for Canada, and on the other hand he says that he is going to take 30 days to consider. Then his colleague in the Senate, the government leader in the Upper House, Senator Lowell Murray, contradicts the minister and says that the government accepts the finding and intends to work within the context of that finding.

Confusion is the major problem in the fisheries. There is confusion from this government. We do not know who leads the fisheries. When we talk about overfishing, it is External Affairs; when we talk about free trade, it is the Minister for International Trade; and then, the leader in the Senate intervenes once in awhile. Who is in charge?

Some Hon. Members: Nobody.

Mr. Robichaud: Madam Speaker, this is not the only instance where the Conservative Government failed to take a firm stand on defending our interests in the fisheries industry. The case of drift net fishing on the West Coast is another example. The Americans have the same problem but have taken a much firmer stand and obtained far better results.

If we look at the Great Lakes fisheries, it's the same story. The Great Lakes fisheries also have problems like water pollution and acid rain which affect the quality of the fish.

Madam Speaker, you will agree that the Government has been guilty of mismanagement as far as the West Coast and Great Lakes fisheries are concerned.

I would now like to look at the situation on the Atlantic coast. The problems facing the Atlantic Provinces do not concern just one minister. In fact, the entire Cabinet is responsible.

All this started a while ago. More than 1,200 jobs were cut at the CN workshops. The Tories are now going to make cuts in VIA Rail, and we will lose hundreds of jobs. The Tories have refused to take part in a joint program with the provinces for improving existing municipal infrastructures.

The Conservatives are going to make cuts in the Unemployment Insurance Program, after we were given the assurance there would no cuts. The Tories are going to make more cutbacks and close bases, especially the base at Summerside. Thousands of jobs will be lost.

Now they are asking us to approve a 9 per cent tax on goods and services. And as if that were not enough, on top of it all, they refuse to acknolwedge there is a crisis in the fisheries industry. This is simply too much! When fishermen, plant owners and workers and all the people who depend on the fisheries industry call for help, the Government, through the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, says that this year is a good year, that things aren't that bad and that the fishermen are pretty well off!

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans, with the approval of its Minister, has the gall to publish a document that describes the current situation as the best we ever had. This is utterly absurd!

Madam Speaker, the Minister is aware of the fact that a number of fish stocks are in danger of disappearing. First of all, our northern cod, and there is also the crab in the Gulf and the lobster situation.

The preliminary report prepared by Dr. Harris suggests various ways of dealing with a crisis that is imminent, a fact that the Minister refuses to acknowledge. Furthermore, the Minister keeps repeating there is surplus capacity on the East Coast and that the number of vessels has doubled since 1986. What he does not say is that the Tories allowed this surplus capacity to build up. They do not say that all the decisions since 1984 were made by the Tories. This Government must take the blame for the surplus capacity.

[English]

This government does not know what it is doing. Here is another example of confusion. On May 11, the Minister for International Trade hinted at help for fishermen, communities, and plant workers, and told reporters that the impact of further cuts would be comparable to last year's drought on western and Ontario farmers, who had been promised a $1 billion aid program.

The same day the Minister of Fisheries said: "We will be deciding on a comprehensive way of dealing with the problem". Then the Secretary of State for External Affairs commented that it is a very serious problem.

How is that, Madam Speaker, from a government that says fishermen are having a good year, as the Minister for Fisheries insisted on October 2 in this House? The same minister is now saying that there is no real emergency, there is no need for an aid package, and that existing programs are adequate. You will hear from my colleagues from Atlantic Canada who will tell this House how inadequate those programs are, Madam Speaker.

This government is showing a sense of irresponsibility, especially when it comes to the well-being of Canadians and especially Atlantic Canadians.

This government is trying to convince Canadians that the problems are not as serious as they are in reality. We know that in late December, when we are out of this House, reductions in cod quotas will be announced. These reductions will mean a loss of revenue for the fishermen. It will mean a loss of jobs for the plant workers. Communities that depend on those stocks will lose their economic base. What does this government, this minister, do? He turns a deaf ear. He is not prepared to come to the rescue.

Unemployment is also a very good example of the short-sightedness of this government. The Minister of Employment and Immigration wants to retrain the unemployed in Atlantic Canada. I have been saying that it makes no sense because there are no other jobs to retrain for, and that consequently the people we retrain will have to leave the area. This is a massive relocation program, that is what it is.

This program has been questioned, not only by the members of the opposition, but also by the Minister of Fisheries who, on May 12, in an interview with the Chronicle-Herald was quoted as saying: "It's tough in Atlantic Canada to talk about retraining or restructuring entire communities. You can't treat it", speaking about the fishing industry, "like a bolt factory closing in Toronto". That is exactly what we have been saying, the types of training programs that are proposed will not do the job.

The numbers do not lie. There is a problem in the fishery. What is lacking is a government with the necessary courage to address the problem right away, not wait until later on. In this crisis we must remember the fishermen, the plant workers, the small fishing communities. They do not have the strength or the capacity of the bigger corporations. At least one-third of the labour force in Nova Scotia's small fishing communities, which amount to about 150,000 people, are employed in the fishing industry.

Overfishing is also a plague. How can we ask our own fishermen to make sacrifices when some countries, some members of the European community overfish to the tune of ten times their allocated quotas. Canadians are asking for an end to this overfishing. They are asking that we extend our jurisdiction so that we can control those stocks. All Atlantic Canadians are asking the government to take some kind of action, and still this government refuses to act.

Finally, I come back to the beginning. In addition to all the problems that this government does not want to deal with, we must add the possibility that the Americans will want to access our east coast just like they are doing on the west coast. It is only a matter of time. They will access it either through recent legislation, as in the case of lobsters, or through GATT, since this government has stripped GATT of any remedy. There is no stopping the U.S. It is only a question of time.

Madam Speaker, of course I would have liked to spend some more time on the problems in my riding and the entire province of New Brunswick, such as the decline in crab stocks, lobster prices and lobster catches, and also, if I may digress somewhat, on the economic policies of this Government which go against the interests of our fishermen, and I am referring to the Government's policy of high interest rates which keeps the Canadian dollar at a relatively high level compared to the US dollar and makes our exports less competitive. That is exactly what is happening to our lobster. We can't sell it. Our fishermen had to catch it and sell it for practically nothing: $1.50 a pound. And the Minister and the Government still refuse to act.

Madam Speaker, my colleagues will describe these problems in detail when they speak later on, and I am sure the people of Beauséjour will recognize the situations and will conclude, as I have concluded, that although we cannot do much about the vagaries of mother nature, in some areas it is possible to find solutions and to take action, something this Government has refused to do.

Madam Speaker, what fishermen and workers in the fisheries industry want is a minister who understands them, a minister who goes out and meets and talks to them and listens, so he will be better able to defend the interests of these communities. The people in the Atlantic provinces, the fishermen and the workers, will not tolerate being ignored by this Government.

And so, Madam Speaker, I repeat my motion:

[English]

> That this House condemn the government's mismanagement, lack of leadership, incompetence and negligence that has placed Canada's fishing communities and workers in unparalleled jeopardy.

Mr. Rompkey: Madam Speaker, I want to compliment my colleague on this motion today. This is a very serious topic. I have some questions for him. The questions arise from the statement issued by the Government of Newfoundland that said that they had presented their case to the Government of Canada and received no reaction whatsoever. As a result of the interim report, the Harris report, the province indicates that the total allowable catch is down to 190,000 tonnes in the coming year and that they are facing a resource crisis.

They presented that case to the Government of Canada, and the statement the premier issued recently states that the federal government has indicated that it could not arrive at an acceptable reconciliation of the estimates of the magnitude of the problem because the federal panel of inquiry, the Harris panel, has not submitted its final report. They could not do anything because it has not submitted its final report. Are they not hiding their heads in the sand? Are they not refusing to deal with reality, to deal with probably the greatest crisis that the Atlantic provinces have ever seen? Doesn't the hon. member think that the requests of the government of Newfoundland should be acceded to?

What they are saying is this, and I quote from the executive report of the summary: "The problems we are facing in 1990 are a direct result of the resource crisis". This document from the Government of Newfoundland states: "It is not acceptable to say that it has been caused by unwarranted expansions. Neither is it acceptable to say that it has been caused by structural or cyclical factors such as weak markets or a strong dollar. The problem has been precipitated by a resource crisis, but it requires more than a resource solution. There must be resource management. There must be measures to increase the scientific assessment. There must be measures to control and eliminate foreign overfishing". "However", it states, "the response of governments must go beyond resource measures. It must include structural, economic development and diversification". Let me repeat that. "It must include structural, economic development and diversification. Such diversification is needed to fill the vacuum left by a substantially reduced fishing industry".

I want to ask my hon. colleague, does he not think that in view of the fact that we have the initial report and we know the resource is going to be less this year than last year, and in view of the request for structural alternatives to the economy for alternative employment for those fishermen and plant workers that are going to be affected, it is about time that this government acted?

Mr. Robichaud: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the Hon. Member for his question and comments, and of course I agree with the points he mentioned.

[English]

Once again this is an example of the lack of leadership of this government, the lack of commitment of this government to the people of Atlantic Canada, and the lack of commitment to the fishing communities of Atlantic Canada. When we say there must be major changes, we must pay particular attention to the problems. What does this government do? It cuts the sub-agreements on different sectors of the economy.

We have seen the government cut into ACOA which was supposed to do wonders for Atlantic Canada. We were supposed to receive $1 billion over five years and this was supposed to be new money, over and above what was already there. What have we seen? We have seen the period for the $1 billion extended to over seven years. We have also seen the government going to the ACOA fund to fund the sub-agreements which were funded separately.

This government has absolutely no sense of responsibility. It has no commitment to the region, to Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, I was interested in the remarks that the member for Beauséjour made about the problem posed by unprocessed fish leaving Canada and being processed in other places, particularly in the United States of America. That happens on the Atlantic coast as well as the Pacific coast. The solution that the member mentioned was an export tax. As I understand his presentation, we should have kept the ability to put export taxes on unprocessed fish leaving Canada.

What I want to comment on so everybody will know, is that the people who are exporting that unprocessed fish out of Canada are Canadians. I want to know whether the member has spoken to those Canadian fishermen and fish brokers and told them that he thinks there should be an export tax on the products that they are exporting. I wonder if he has discussed it with them and has their consent to that kind of tax imposition.

I would also like to know what the member has to say about the possible repercussions of imposing such a tax. Is it not possible that the people in the countries that are adversely affected by such a tax might look at our situation and perhaps take retaliatory action? What is he going to do if that action is taken? What is he going to do if fish products from Canada are banned or taxed in some other way? Now, reflecting on these two points, I want to ask the member, does he still think export taxes solve problems?

Mr. Robichaud: I would say that the first task of an export tax would be to protect Canadian jobs. That is why it was there. We were never challenged, before the free trade agreement, on the west coast for our processing. Yes, the action was taken before the deal was signed. But in the deal we gave away the only action we could take against the Americans. We gave away our right to use an export tax.

I may turn the question back to the member. Has he got anything against protecting Canadian jobs? What has he got against that? This is exactly what we would be doing with export taxes.

Mrs. Gaffney: Madam Speaker, I listened to my colleague, the member for Beauséjour, give what I consider to be a very concerned speech on behalf of not only the constituents in his riding of Beauséjour, but all of Atlantic Canada and the western fishing industry. I watched the minister across the aisle and I saw the smirks and the smiles. It really bothers me.

I would like the member for Beauséjour to tell me, who lives in inland Canada, and whose constituents do not rely on the fishing industry, what an average fishing family in his riding makes. What kind of problems do they have to attend to with regard to the environment, the elements of the weather, and the periods of unemployment? I would like to hear comments from the member on these.

[Translation]

Mr. Robichaud: Madam Speaker, a document published by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans mentioned the average income of fishermen, and allowing for unemployment insurance, the figure was well below $20,000. The document added that this figure had gone up since 1984. But Madam Speaker, is a salary of less than $20,000 enough for a whole family? People living in the Atlantic region may be at some distance from the focus of activity in Canada, from the more prosperous central region, but we still have to pay the same prices for food and all our services and all the goods we buy that are produced here in Central Canada, which makes the situation even harder for us, and it will get even worse when this Government decides to impose a 9 per cent tax on everything sold in this country. This will hit us hard.

[English]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I am pleased that the hon. member for Beauséjour initiated this important debate in the House of Commons today. It is not that I agree with the stark language of the motion, but I think this is a very important subject which is too often ignored in the House of Commons and across the nation. It is of extreme importance to the people of Atlantic and Pacific Coast Canada and the inland waters where commercial fisheries are also important.

I want to say to my colleague, the hon. member for Nepean, that she or her party have no monopoly on concern.

We take our responsibilities to the fishermen and the fishing communities of Canada extremely seriously.

At the present time there are a number of troubles in the Atlantic Canadian fishery, most not of the making of governments, but due to other circumstances over which we should exercise a different kind of control perhaps than we have in the past, but there are a number of troubles which must be addressed and this debate will give us a chance to discuss them.

These difficulties have to be discussed in a sensitive and caring fashion because they pose a great amount of anxiety and worry for the people who depend on the fishery and, indeed, if they are not addressed there could be genuine areas of hardship in the months ahead.

I want to take part of my time to point out that there is no crisis in the fishery. The crisis emanates from those who would exaggerate alarm and suggest that, contrary to the fact, throughout Canada there is some kind of great chaos when indeed the opposite is true, and the management of Canada's fisheries is sound.

There is no government before us in recent times that has devoted more effort to enriching and improving our vital fisheries resources. No government before us has ever considered the state of the fisheries as carefully, no government has ever included fisheries as high on the priority list of cabinet.

The record of this government in the area of fisheries is one of responsible, intelligent and sensitive management of an important and valued resource. The government knows, and everyone should know, there are no shortcuts to managing a healthy, natural resource so that sustainable development becomes a reality, not just a goal to which lip service is paid when it is convenient.

This government has taken strong measures to keep the fisheries vital and in consequence we have had years of unprecedented growth, a thriving industry, and maximum profits up to the end of 1988. The fishery is changing and we have to recognize that the fishery has undergone cyclic change many times through its history, and that change is also part of reality. New fishing technologies, shifts in the environmental conditions globally, market forces, the unpredictability of nature, the supply of fish from other sources in other lands, all these factors have contributed to the state of flux and, therefore, the state of anxiety on the part of Canadian fisheries, particularly in Atlantic Canada.

We are honestly and intelligently addressing that change. This means we are taking an objective look at the state of our fisheries to ensure that vision and reality merge to provide a healthy resource for today and for generations to come.

To do this we must explore, develop and adopt policies which can maintain a viable and productive resource for the future. This government does not endorse benign neglect when it comes to renewable resources. This government, unlike hon. members opposite sometimes, does not endorse merely taking short-term measures when we expect a long-term steady gain and improvement in the fishery. It just does not work that way.

Scientific research, consultation among all players, and judicious management of fish stocks are the keys to a prosperous resource. This takes time and special expertise. Putting all this together is what constitutes an intelligent management of the resource.

The fact is that conservation and the need to avoid overfishing involves difficult choices. We have an overarching commitment to resource management and to sustaining economic utilization of a well-managed fishery. In this regard, Canada stands at the top of the list among nations when it comes to the refinement of methodology for stock assessment, the establishment of quotas, and devising an effective protective process for living within those quotas that amounts to sound management decisions.

I am pleased to say that all in all, the professionalism of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the sometimes cautious but realistic way in which we have managed stocks has led to many significant gains for the industry.

Let us examine some of the facts. For Atlantic Canada alone, from 1983 to 1988, landings of all fish species increased by 200,000 tonnes to 1.3 million tonnes over that period of only five years. Total added value increased by $400 million to over $1 billion during the same period. The total value of processed fish products increased by three-quarters of a billion to $2.2 billion in 1988. Our management program has resulted in more than two and one-half times as much cod in the sea now than there was when we took over management of the fisheries.

In Scotia-Fundy, lobster landings have more tripled, from 5,133 tonnes in 1978 to 15,335 tonnes in 1987. The landed value of lobster increased more than five times, from $28 million in 1983 to $143 million in 1988. In the scallop industry, which is again showing strong returns this year, it looks like this year's catch will exceed last year's record levels and there are still three months of fishing left.

This year's bluefin tuna fishery in Atlantic Canada has turned into a bumper year. Our inshore fishermen have landed nearly $10 million worth of tuna since the middle of August. We, for the first time in memory, will use the full Canadian quota. Canada is developing a name for itself as a supplier of high-quality tuna to the international marketplace.

The success has not been limited to one coast alone. In the Pacific we have had the largest sockeye salmon run this year, in 85 years. We have rebuilt the stocks in the herring fishery from 13,000 tonnes in 1986 to 35,000 tonnes today. For the continued growth of all our fisheries, we have instituted a national habitat policy, a model for the world to emulate, which provides certainty in the growth of the industry and a balance among competing interests for development. We have had ongoing success with our program of enterprise allocations and we are introducing individual vessel quotas on an experimental basis at the present time in Atlantic Canada.

Now I ask you, does all this not suggest something other than gross mismanagement as the opposition charges?

I want to take a few minutes here then to describe, in more detail, the current situation in the Atlantic fishery, a situation which is very complex and is not amenable to a quick fix, short-term approach which the hon. members opposite are wont to put forward.

The fact is that, based on our professional scientific assessments, we have been able to develop and enlarge the potential of the Atlantic fishery enormously. In recent years we have experienced very strong gains, but new factors and pressures, the wild cards, if you will, have had different effects on the Atlantic fishery.

These include the impact of technology on the resource; that is, the improved boats and techniques of fishermen and the capacity that is accumulated with that, and the real effect of a changing environment in the northwest Atlantic on the quality and the accuracy of our predicative techniques.

Combine this with the fact that healthy profits of the last two years have been eroded by global market changes, by shifts in exchange rates and by significant declines in prices, and you begin to understand the new context in which the fishery must be managed for the future.

This is the context, this ever-changing environment, the entire environment, markets, the resource base, the capacity, the technology, and the effect it has on people. It is this context, that of change, that we must manage.

We have taken already a number of important concrete steps. In the almost four years that I have been Minister of Fisheries, I have met close to three dozen times with my Atlantic fisheries colleagues. I meet regularly with industry and a host of advisory groups. We have availed ourselves of all the expertise and resources at our disposal to explore every dimension of this issue. We have brought initiatives forward which were endorsed at the First Ministers' Conference in November, 1986. I visited Atlantic Canada in the summer of 1986, as I do each summer. I walked the wharfs, went to see the fishermen, and witnessed a deterioration in the northern cod inshore fishery. So I took specific measures, starting in the summer of 1986, to change the fishing practices of the offshore fleet, to reduce quotas, to reduce the wastage by discards at sea, and to require observers on all domestic vessels fishing in that offshore fishery.

We went further. We appointed the independent Alverson Commission of eminent international scientists to review our own scientific methodology so that we might be sure we had it right. That, coupled with new enforcement initiatives, helicopter patrols and much increased fines under the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, have all contributed to an updated and more effective means of assessing the northern cod stocks which are such an important and fundamental part of the Atlantic fishery. This gives some of the background to the problem that faces us today.

However, in light of declining quotas and changing world market conditions we have had to take additional measures. I want to describe four special initiatives we have taken. The first is the establishment of a special committee of senior ministers, chaired by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to develop and co-ordinate the government's response on the state of the northern cod fishery and other Atlantic fisheries issues. Through this committee, cabinet is reviewing the adequacy of existing programs to help communities that might be affected by all the factors I have just described, and is poised to act quickly upon the solutions best suited to the task. I am pleased that my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration and other members of that committee are coming up with some very interesting and innovative ideas as to how to deal with this. I will leave it to my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, to describe later today how we will address some of these social conditions and how we will look, over the next few months, to special assistance for the fishermen of the Newfoundland region, as we have done for areas within the fishery where important social assistance was required.

I recognize, as does this government, that from time to time there are problems in the fishery. Lord knows, that is the nature of my existence. There is not a new morning that dawns but what there are one or more new problems to be addressed. Some of these are large problems, some are smaller, and more localized. This government is addressing all these problems, working with the industry and all of those affected to provide appropriate solutions for fishermen and their families in fishing communities throughout Atlantic Canada. I assure them that the Prime Minister and all of the ministers of this government are deeply concerned. That is why the government is devoting significant resources to deal with the problem.

The Harris Panel, a second initiative on northern cod, is again examining all the scientific techniques used in the stock assessment process. By the end of the year, I look forward to receiving the final report of the Harris Panel, which will give us input to the quota-setting process for 1990.

Third, a Scotia-Fundy task force, which I recently established, is exploring all aspects of fishing and fish processing in the Scotia-Fundy area, where we have far too little added value. We are exporting too much raw fish, with the consent and encouragement, very often, of local government. We have to change that; we have to deal with the over-capacity in the Scotia-Fundy fishery. That is why I have asked for this special Scotia-Fundy task force to meet with fishermen, travel to communities, and report back to the special cabinet committee.

Finally, we have made foreign overfishing a government priority of the highest order, as reflected in the Throne Speech of last spring. Foreign overfishing in the Atlantic, on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks, and also foreign overfishing on the Pacific by the indiscriminate use of high seas drift nets threaten to endanger international high sea fish stocks on a global scale. It is this overfishing, which is wreaking havoc on the life cycle of the northwest Atlantic fishery. It is depleting the straddling stocks that live both within and beyond our jurisdiction.

The European community has abstained from supporting the quotas set out by the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization, a voluntary international body that regulates fishing quotas, and will go ahead and set their own quotas outside Canada's 200-mile limit, if all Canadians do not stand up and express their outrage, as we have been doing in various forums, for the past six months.

I have travelled abroad, as have other ministers, in the United States and Europe, giving this message that we must halt this intolerable practice of overfishing Canadian groundfish stocks.

In the meetings of the OECD in July, the Prime Minister raised these overfishing problems directly and forcefully. A new campaign launched last week by my colleague, the Minister of International Trade, takes our case directly and forcefully to the European people, appealing to their sensitivity and concern for global environmental practices, which threaten the very future of the living resources on which we depend.

All these honest efforts to deal with the changing realities of the Atlantic fishery are proof of our concern and commitment to the well-being of our fishing communities and our resource, the backbone of the economy.

That is not all. We have added $3 million to our scientific program of stock assessment on northern cod, an increase of 80 per cent over last year. We will be providing additional funds for aerial surveillance and enforcement. I hope to have details forthcoming in a few weeks on the new surveillance program that we will be initiating on both coasts. As well, over the next few months, I will announce an aquaculture strategy which will bring a new dimension and untold benefit to the coastal regions of Canada.

We can talk about incompetence and mismanagement, but overfishing is not practised by the Government of Canada or ministers. It is practised by fishermen, whether foreign or Canadian. We must end this wastage of the resource and the inaccuracy it introduces to our scientific stock assessment process.

We must bring it under control by introducing amendments to the Fisheries Act which will significantly increase fines for infractions committed under our Canadian fisheries legislation. Fines, which are presently limited to $5,000, must be raised to more realistic levels commensurate with the magnitude of the benefit to be gained from crimes against the fishery.

I seek the co-operation of members on all sides of the House to support the speedy passage of this package of initiatives, which I hope to bring to the House soon.

I would like to take time to deal with the Pacific fishery and the recent free trade panel decision which Canada has not yet accepted. I see that my time is running to an end but I want to assure Canadians and members of this House that, first of all, we are examining this FTA panel report very carefully. We have never claimed it to be a victory. I do not know why the press and the opposition persist in using the word "victory" or "win" to describe it, although there is much editorial opinion to that effect.

The headline in The Vancouver Province yesterday stated that it is a net gain for Canada. The Ottawa Citizen yesterday stated, "Fish trade ruling pragmatic." Yesterday's Montreal Gazette said of the free trade panel ruling:

> Chalk up one success for the Canada–U.S. free trade deal—the panel decision, which is non–binding, seems to be a good one in principle. And there seems to be no reason to think Canada would have got a better deal from a GATT panel if the dispute had been resolved there.

I am not coming to that conclusion. We have taken note of the facts and the decision of the free trade panel on which three of the five members were Canadians. The sovereignty of Canada takes precedence over all other factors in terms of ensuring that we have the scientific data, the necessary information, biological information, weight and size information which we must use as a basis for managing the fishery.

Therefore, in establishing whether or not some quantity of fish might be allowed to be exported by sea, the Minister of Fisheries, under Canadian fisheries legislation, will have the final say to ensure that all means of transport, all means of taking fish from our fishing grounds are subject to full management control in accordance with our scientific objectives. That was the purpose of the new landing requirements that we brought into effect last May, I believe, it was. Those regulations were brought in to replace discriminatory protectionist measures restricting the export of unprocessed salmon and herring which were found unacceptable by the international General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs council because they gave Canada protection that our American neighbours did not enjoy. We have dismantled those regulations, because as a fish exporting nation, our markets must remain open. Eighty per cent of our fisheries production goes into international markets. For members to suggest trade restriction or protectionist practices as the way to protect jobs in Canada is to ignore the fact that those jobs are never secure unless the markets to which the fish is destined remain open.

Mr. Baker: Madam Speaker, I have one question for the Minister of Fisheries. It relates to what he was talking about, quotas and Canadian jurisdiction.

National Sea Products recently came to this government, because this government is a shareholder in that company, and said that they were soon going to announce the closure of two more fish plants, one in Newfoundland and one in Cape Breton, because of reduced quotas. Those fish plants would likely be either Canso or Louisburg. They also said that if it were Canso, it would mean the loss of 700 jobs inside the plant, plus eight trawlers tied up. In the case of St. John's, Newfoundland, the other plant mentioned, 450 inshore workers would lose their jobs and several trawlers tied up in Newfoundland.

How can the minister allow a reduction in quotas to these Canadian companies, with announcements coming of more lay–offs in the fisheries in Newfoundland and in Nova Scotia, when he has allotted to the Japanese 3,000 metric tonnes of red fish inside our 200–mile zone right now; 5,000 metric tonnes of halibut inside our our 200–mile zone right now; and, for the Russians, cod inside our 200–mile zone right now—red fish and halibut to 12,000 metric tonnes. That is 20,000 metric tonnes of fish, the very fish that is processed in those two plants in St. John's, and in Canso. Why does the minister not kick the foreigners out of our waters instead of kicking Canadians out of their jobs?

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the drama in his question. That is the member's style. But he has a clever way of manipulating numbers to his own advantage.

I think the hon. member knows, but probably would not want to tell the House himself, that we do not make any stocks available to foreign fishing vessels within our 200–mile economic limit, unless they are surplus to the requirements of the Canadian industry, whether it be inshore or offshore. Now hold your seat, my friend. We do not make non–surplus stocks available. Canadian fishing companies always have first option to access those stocks.

The only fishery by foreign vessels within Canadian waters is for surplus fish that the Canadian companies, the Canadian fishermen, the Canadian markets, and our export markets are not interested in. I want to point out to the hon. member who sat as a member of a government for several years that ignored the problem of foreign fishing in our zone, that, in fact, his government allowed the European Community to harvest 10,000 tonnes of prime cod stocks and other prime groundfish stocks in our waters and allowed the French fleet to fish within the Gulf of St. Lawrence to a level of 17,000 tonnes over and above the needs of St. Pierre and Miquelon. We have ended those practices. We have eliminated the 17,000 tonnes of fishing by the French metropolitan fleet and we have removed all fishing by European nations from within our waters on the non– surplus stocks, which are necessary for our own fishing fleets.

The Hon. Member knows that. I wish he would stop alarming the people of his area by suggesting that somehow foreign overfishing is the heart of the problem within the 200-mile zone. We have fixed that. We brought in helicopter surveillance. We brought in fines up to $750,000 for offences by foreign vessels within our waters. The Liberal government did not have the courage to do that. We ended the long-term agreement with the European community. We ended the agreement that the Liberals had perpetuated from 1972 allowing the French trawlers within our waters. We have found a means of solving once and for all the boundary problem around St. Pierre and Miquelon which will bring untold benefit, when it is finally resolved, to the fishermen of Newfoundland. The hon. member has the gall to get up and condemn this government when it was the Liberal government that caused these problems.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, the minister spent a fair amount of time talking about the management of the resource which is at the heart of a healthy industry, if we have the capacity to manage the resource in perpetuity. I wonder if he would tell the House how the recent judgment made by the FTA panel enables Canada to protect the jobs of Canadians and manage the resource in such a way that in perpetuity we will have a resource that we can count on for Canadian jobs. He might also want to comment on the virtue of an export tax on the product.

Mr. Siddon: Madam Speaker, there is some confusion about the purpose for which the new landing requirements were introduced earlier this year. For many years there was an export restriction on unprocessed sockeye and pink salmon and herring from the west coast of Canada, but no such restriction on the other species of salmon, chinook, the coho and the chum species. These are very important, not only to our commercial fishery on the west coast, but they are a prized fish within the five species of salmon. This is also a very important sport fishery, and a recreational interest to Canadians.

In March 1987, Canada accepted the findings of the GATT panel that the old export restrictions gave Canada certain protection which was not in the nature of a fair-trade practice. We removed those and brought in last May, new requirements that all salmon and herring caught on the Pacific coast be landed at registered landing stations to be counted, graded, weighed, and sampled from a biological perspective so that we would have more effective control. We need good records and accurate information on which to base the scientific estimates and the establishment of quotas.

This set of landing regulations has been upheld with a slight modification in recognition of the paramountcy of Canada in deciding the way in which we should regulate the export of our fish. This relates to the possibility of some fishermen taking their fish directly to U.S. processing ports, rather than bringing it to shore in Canada first. The panel report found that a small proportion of the fish might be allowed to be shipped directly, as is often done in Atlantic Canada. That has been done with other species on the Pacific coast. We oppose the notion that we should not have control of 100 per cent of the species landed. The FTA panel agreed with Canada's position that a state could not be obliged to make its fisheries conservation and management regime dependent on co-operation with another state.

That overrides and gives to the Minister of Fisheries the authority to be the final say as to whether any fish should be allowed to be shipped by sea. I can assure this House of our interest in conservation and long-term stable management of the salmon resource, which we built up to record levels of production from a very low point in 1913 when we had a great slide on the Fraser Canyon. We will use the powers of the Fisheries Act, the Fish Inspection Act, and the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act to ensure that the resource is well managed by having full access to the necessary scientific information no matter what means of transport when fish is sold from Canada.

I should point out that many experts and some representatives of the Pacific coast fishing industry welcome this decision because it gives them a choice as fishermen to get the highest price for their fish. They are not forced to sell to a cartel of a certain small number of processing plants in Canada. A very prominent former Royal commissioner and candidate for the Liberal Party said only yesterday, and I would like to quote Dr. Peter

Pearse: "Fishermen should be allowed to sell their catch wherever they can get the highest price. If fishermen can get more value out of them and pay a higher price than domestic processors we won't get the maximum value out of the fish by processing them at home."

In answer to my hon. colleague from Surrey—White Rock, I just want to say that we are confident that the panel report—I am not in any way fettering the powers of Canada and the Minister of Fisheries—is going to prove, if we accept it, to be an improvement, notwithstanding the fact that we would prefer to have 100 per cent landing of our fish at Canadian ports.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, I shall start with a question which the minister in his good time may answer. I think the minister would agree that what the panel really decided was that our regulations. as they now stand, are contrary to the free trade act regulations.

If we want to submit a new regulation it would then have to go through the process again. If we said we need 95 per cent or 90 per cent or even 60 per cent to manage the resource, that would have to be again adjudicated to see whether or not they agreed this was a proper percentage. In all likelihood there would be different people on the panel. I do not think we are in a very safe position having the minister read from the body of the report. It is the recommendation or conclusion of the report that counts, not the discussion in the body of the report. I have read the report, and the conclusion as well.

I take no pleasure at all in supporting the Liberal Party's motion at this time—more in sorrow than in trying to get political advantage from criticizing. I have been personally aware, having lived on the west coast in Nanaimo all my life, of mismanagement, lack of leadership, incompetence, and negligence with respect to the fishing industry for the last 50 years of my life. Not only has it placed the Canadian fishing communities in unparalleled jeopardy, but it threatens the long-term protection of an invaluable sustainable resource.

It is not something that has been done deliberately or through lack of knowledge, but rather often through use of the wrong knowledge. I can recall some 40 years ago when I discussed with a fisherman on the west coast advice coming from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to the effect that herring was totally unlimited. It was impossible to overfish that resource. And the fishermen knew better. They were warning these officials that they were taking too much herring out of the water. Of course the officials, the experts, knew better. I think it was just three years after that before they had to impose controls because they were seriously depleting the herring resource.

The minister quoted examples this morning of individual successes and said, "Doesn't this prove that there has been proper management in the last five years". The minister knows better than that. If there is proper management, it had to go back more than five years in order to rebuild some of the runs that were so seriously damaged, at least on the west coast. It goes back a lot further than that.

Nevertheless, using as examples a few successes and omitting to mention all of the failures makes me wonder whether it is good luck or good management. The minister, for example, did not mention the serious depletion of the halibut resources on the west coast, and I have heard halibut resources on the east coast talked about here. He has not mentioned serious depletions of other species on the west coast where I understand his own ministry is likely to impose total closure for at least one year, and I am not sure how many more years. That is not known yet, as I understand. We will wait until that happens.

There is serious depletion of some species on the west coast and there certainly is on the east coast. I was at Lockeport. I took the time to go there and listen to some of those people who have lost their jobs. Twenty odd million dollars of provincial and federal money was put in that processing plant which was closed down through lack of product at the same time as we are shipping roundfish to the States and, as the other members have told us about, to Europe as well. Fishermen are coming over and taking it.

The minister has said that we must get together and continue to express our outrage internationally at what is happening to our fish stocks. Those expressions of outrage, along with 80 cents, will get you a cup of coffee in the parliamentary cafeteria. That is about all it has achieved to date. We have not achieved any co-operation internationally in looking after our very valuable resource.

To come perhaps a little more up to date with respect to what has happened recently, the minister said that Canada accepted the GATT ruling in March of 1987. I believe he would like to make that March of 1988. I do not think I have his attention right now, but it was actually in March of 1988 rather than 1987 that Canada accepted the GATT ruling.

It was in April of 1986 that the American fish processors first complained about Canada's actions which affect the fisheries, the fact that we were not allowing the export of our product and yet we were importing some of their product. At the time, it was calculated if it were reduced to dollars, the total claim for damage would be in the neighbourhood of $3 million.

In September of 1986, American trade negotiators complained to GATT. In November of 1987, a GATT panel upheld the American complaint and referred it to the full GATT council.

The minister took this seriously because in the same month, the same minister is quoted in Hansard as saying that many members of GATT use export controls to ensure adequate supply of raw materials for their own domestic industries. He believed and speculated that representatives of nations who sat on the GATT panel used such export controls, and what we have here is a panel recommendation which will, in all likelihood, be overturned by the GATT council of which we are a member. We will be opposing that recommendation when it reaches the GATT council.

I can find nothing that tells me that the minister and the government did actually oppose those recommendations at the GATT council. Perhaps I can be corrected on that. I would hope that the minister can assure me that Canada did actually protest it. As I say, to the best of my knowledge, I have seen nothing to that effect.

It would appear as though Canada decided to roll over and play dead with respect to the GATT decision. We could have objected. We could have vetoed it, but we decided to accept it because we had a solution.

Before the final ruling of the GATT council in March of 1988 supposed to do everything to protect Canada. If it was going to protect Canada, it had to hurt the United States, and you know very well that the United States was not in it to get hurt. It was in it to get even. Getting even was its goal and getting even is what it has achieved.

In any case, on March 21, 1988, the same minister and the then Minister for International Trade announced that Canada will not veto the GATT ruling. The GATT council accepted the panel report on March 21, 1988. I have the minister's attention now, I think. Earlier he said March of 1987.

On April 25, 1989, under U.S. pressure to abandon the processing requirements for B.C., the Minister for International Trade ignored the recommendations of the fishing industry working group representing all sectors of the B.C. industry and announced that the government will proceed with a landing requirement for B.C. salmon and herring. All the new regulations require that fish be brought to shore at a licensed landing station before they can be exported unprocessed.

I said earlier that the extent of the damage with respect to the first complaint was calculated to be some $3 million. We are talking about an industry with gross revenues, three years ago—and the minister himself has said that this is a record year in the past nine decades—of $747 million. That was in 1986. We do not have the figures for 1989, but they have to be over $1 billion. We are talking about a big industry; $573 million of $747 million is generated by export sales, a very important industry from the point of view of exports. If we are looking at a $3 million penalty, it would be very easy to swallow to maintain the long-term future of such an industry. It had an annual payroll, again three years ago, of $125 million; $79 million paid annually in taxes. It is important that we do maintain this industry. Employment is important, but the long range perpetuation of the resource is of even greater importance. It is the fourth largest industry in B.C.

When it comes to employment, I think it is significant that most of the employees in the processing industry are women, many of whom are native women or members of visible minorities.

The processing requirements, the industry argues, the union argue, and the opposition generally argues, were necessary to ensure proper conservation and management of the fish stocks. It is impossible to accomplish that if the product, the roundfish, is sold to U.S. processors.

The minister talked about the free trade panel upholding our sovereignty. As I suggested yesterday, I did not know that our sovereignty was under question, but obviously it is. The answer is, yes, we are a sovereign nation, as long as we let the Americans tell us what proportion of our product should be exported in round.

Mr. Siddon: There were three Canadians on that panel.

Mr. Stupich: I am told that there were three Canadians on the panel.

It is also important, since the member raised that question, that Canada could have asked for further hearings with the passing of one of the Canadian members of that panel and his replacement with another member, to hear additional evidence which was accumulated since that time. There was a strike and we had certain information. Canada chose not to ask for those additional hearings. We let it go through.

I have yet to see a copy of the preliminary report. All I have seen is the American summary of it in Inside U.S. Trade, which was published September 15, the day the report was first talked about up here, and the day I was criticized for making it public. The Minister was not reading, the government was not reading, they did not know it was in the public papers. However, we found out by reading public papers what the preliminary report was. We have yet to see a copy of it. I assume it is similar, if not the same, because no one has suggested there have been any changes. We could have tried to get changes, but we chose not to. Presumably, the minister or his ministry, or somebody, must have some kind of solution in mind. The solution is not to let the Americans tell us what proportion of the fish can be sold over the side of the boat to other boats, to other processors.

The landing requirements refer to all five species of salmon. I have seen one figure that we are talking about, possibly some 1,200 separate runs of salmon up the—

Mr. Siddon: It is 4,500.

Mr. Stupich: The minister says it is 4,500. I am glad to have the figure. I was looking for it and I could not even find the 1,200 figure this morning. There are 4,500 runs of salmon that do not all go up the rivers the same day. They go in different periods. If you are going to get sufficient escapement of each of those 4,500 runs, you have to make sure that that is happening on a day-to-day basis. We know what fish are being landed in British Columbia promptly. Even before they are landed, we know what is happening. We know where the B.C. fishermen are landing. We know the figures and the species. We do not know the runs, we cannot identify them, except that we know what days they are coming.

We will not have that kind of knowledge even if everybody plays fair. I have seen a suggestion in one of the papers this morning from one of the processing industry people asking how we can keep track of individual sales from a fish boat to an American packer if we do not bother to keep records, if they forget to tell somebody that they caught these fish and do not bother to say where they got them from, how many they caught, and what species they were. If we do not get that information, we cannot keep track of it.

How are we going to know early in the fishing season how much is going to be 20 per cent? If the minister had estimated at the beginning of the 1989 fishing season—and I think he has already said that that is the best sockeye run in some 84 or 87 years—what 20 per cent would be he would have been 100 per cent out because that much more sockeye showed up than he expected, so there would have been only 10 per cent, which is better for us.

But suppose the estimates were the other way around. Suppose they were only half as many came back as were expected. It would have meant a serious depletion of the early runs to the extent that they could have been so weakened that they would have been wiped out. That is serious. We have no idea when each one of the 4,500 runs is going to go up the rivers and which river each one is going up. We have no idea unless we are keeping track of those fish on a day-to-day basis.

It is important for conservation that we have that control. There is a solution. Both the industry and the union are proposing the same solution, namely, that we insist on landing 100 per cent of our salmon in B.C. Let us negotiate the penalty. There would be a penalty because it is going to cost the American processors—if they want to buy 10 per cent or 11 per cent of our fish, even up to 20 per cent—a couple of cents a pound to truck those fish from our landing stations down to their processing stations. It is very little per fish, very little for 10 per cent of the total cash, when you look at an industry that this year was worth over $1 billion.

The minister and his department have now had 34 days because they had the preliminary report. They must have had it on the same day as U.S. Inside Trade printed it, or earlier.

Mr. Siddon: You are assuming it is the same.

Mr. Stupich: The minister interjects by saying I am assuming it is the same. In light of his lack of any comments to the contrary up to this point and in light of the fact that the government did not ask for any further hearings even though there was a new member on the panel, I think it is a fairly safe assumption. If the minister cares to tell me that it is not the same, I will not accept that. If he says it is not similar, then I would be pleased to hear it. I would like to hear what the differences are. Maybe we can approach Inside U.S. Trade and ask for a copy of the preliminary report on which it based this summary so we will know exactly what was in it. We seem to have precious little luck in trying to get it out of any government circle here in Ottawa.

I will admit we got the final one. We could not find out when we were going to get it, how we were going to get it, or where we were going to get it but we were told it would be released on Monday. That was as much as we could get.

Although the press got copies of the press release from the trade minister's office and from the Minister of Fisheries' office, we had a great deal of difficulty even getting a copy of that press release. We finally got one by fax from a member of the press gallery. There are ways of getting these things if one works at it hard enough.

Employment is important. As I said, there are mainly women in the processing industry, mainly native workers and visible minorities, immigrant women or second generation immigrant women. The government talks about all the jobs that are being created by free trade. I am talking about some 15,000 part-time jobs in the height of the season that could be lost. This is the beginning.

If the Americans say they will let us limit the export to 10 per cent of roundfish this year, what is to stop them from coming back next year and saying it has to be 15, and year by year changing it? Nothing at all. There is nothing in the deal. We are not signing a contract that it is going to be 10, 11 or 12 per cent, or whatever figure, from now until the end of the free trade agreement. We are simply saying that for today that is the rule. There is nothing stopping them from changing that.

It could mean wiping out the fishing and the processing industries in B.C. and the subsequent loss of all those jobs. All the jobs that free trade creates, such as making and serving coffee in the tourism industry, is not going to help the people in the communities that are going to be totally shut down because fishing is the only source of employment in those communities. It is a serious matter.

The government has, up to this point, abandoned the fishing industry on the west coast. It made a deal for the east coast. That deal, as I think I said yesterday, is not worth the paper it is written on. That deal will not stand up long under attack if the Americans decide to go after it.

There is a solution, and I have pointed out the details of that solution. The minister acknowledged that he was aware of that solution. He knows that the industry supports it and he knows that the union supports it officially, because he was nodding as I was describing the possible way to resolve the situation, a way that would maintain employment. The minister has said in the past that it is important to maintain historic jobs, I think were his words. Another time he said he did not mean the same jobs. He said he would not allow jobs historically established to be threatened.

I do not know what other kinds of jobs there could be other than the jobs in the processing industry which have been historically established. The minister made it quite clear that what he had in mind was preserving the historically established jobs. He can do that with the solution I described.

Even with every possible control, even by catching every fish and knowing exactly what run each one comes from, we still cannot be perfect, but at least we will know how many fish come back in a season. We can ensure the optimum escapement on a day-to-day basis if we know what is happening on a day-to-day basis. The only way we can know that is by insisting that 100 per cent of our resource is caught and landed in British Columbia so that we can count it, identify it and grade it. Then we will know.

I am concerned, as I have said, and as the Leader of the New Democratic Party has said, that it is not just fish. If the Americans say that they have access to our fish resource, that we cannot deny them the right to come into this country and buy them, how can we possibly maintain our position with respect to round logs? How can Ontario possibly retain its position with respect to mineral ores which the province of Ontario now says have to be processed to some extent before they are shipped out? This is one renewable resource, and certainly B.C. timber and timber from other provinces is another. Are they not in as much jeopardy as are the fish resources, particularly on the west coast and eventually the east coast, if we accept this meekly?

I urge the minister to accept the solution proposed by the fisheries industry council and by the fishermen's union.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, while I enjoyed listening to the member from Nanaimo, I do have a few comments I would like to make, and perhaps I will ask a question or two. First of all, he pointed out that it was mainly minorities and women who worked in fish canneries, as though there was something wrong with working in a fish cannery in the first place and they had been relegated to second class status.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Friesen: Here is the noble NDP shouting us down again. I remember that when I worked in fish canneries, the people working there were mainly from minorities. I was one of those who was from a minority group working in the fish cannery.

I noticed that the hon. member said the government should treat this decision on the FTA with caution. At the same time, the minister is criticized for saying that there are 30 days in which to make a decision. Now, the member cannot have it both ways. He cannot say decide today, but be cautious. We can count on it, for sure, that if the minister made a decision today, he would be criticized for not being cautious, for being hasty. Somehow, the member wants it both ways.

Well, now the NDP are taking coaching lessons from the hon. member from Newfoundland. It needs all the help it can get, even from the member from Newfoundland.

• (1250)

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Even from where?

Mr. Friesen: From this member here, the member from Newfoundland. What is his riding?

Mr. Simmons: Which one?

Mr. Friesen: He represents all of Newfoundland.

The other thing that I want to talk about is the member's oversimplification of the change that has taken place in the industry. He pointed out that he grew up in British Columbia as I did. He has lived there a little longer than I have. I hope to catch up to him some day if normal events take their course.

He pointed out that in the early days of fishing, there was unlimited access to the resource. You could pretty well go fishing at will. I remember those days when the fishing industry was shut down mainly on weekends. The rest of the time it was open. I remember the days when you could pretty well on a Monday walk across the Fraser River on the gillnetters that were fishing the river at that time.

I guess he is suggesting that because you could fish constantly 50 years ago and you cannot fish constantly today that somehow there has been a depletion of the resource and that is a sign of mismanagement. If he will do only one thing and that is check the tonnage figures of the total catch of the 1930s and 1940s and compare them with the figures for the 1970s and 1980s, I think the member from Nanaimo will agree that there has been a steady progression in the increase of tonnage. Just because there is not constant and daily fishing and it is not open season in the fishing industry does not mean that the resource has been depleted. Maybe it is a sign of careful management rather than depletion.

For example, does he not agree that there has been a change in technology? In the days that he harkens to of the 1930s and 1940s in the fishing industry, fishing was restricted mostly to gillnetters of about 30 feet long. There was no sonar, there was no radar, there was no radio to speak of, none of the high technology. There were no seiners out there, no trollers out there of any size or consequence.

Today, the fish do not stand a chance when you have the kind of technology that can track them all over the place. There has been a change in technology on the fishing side of it. There has also been a change in technology on the processing and marketing side of it. In the days when he and I worked in the industry, it was all canning.

Mr. Tobin: Question!

Mr. Friesen: It doesn't have to be a question, it could be comments.

Mr. Simmons: Well, get to either one or the other.

Mr. Friesen: In those days, it had to be canned immediately. Today, if the processing plants cannot keep up with the catch coming into port, they can freeze it and can it a little later on, as we saw on television the other night when the worker was interviewed regarding her opinion on the FTA decision.

There is also a different market where the fish are quick frozen today and then flown to Europe. The whole industry has changed.

I would like to ask the member if he does not accept the notion that maybe he oversimplified the problem by saying that just because things today are not the way they used to be, there has been a depletion of the resource and a mismanagement of the resource. Would he not accept the fact that the increase in total tonnage that we have seen is a result of the successful management begun in the government previous to ours in the Salmonid Enhancement Program and enhanced by this Minister of Fisheries when he doubled investment in the Salmonid Enhancement Program several years ago? He doubled the commitment to make sure of the future of the resource. Would he not kindly agree that he oversimplified the case when he spoke earlier?

Mr. Stupich: Madam Speaker, I was afraid that the member would not leave me any time at all for a response.

First, with respect to women working in the canneries, either I was not speaking clearly or the member was not listening, but my point was that in the small communities that I said were going to closed down totally without these small canneries and I know that they are closing anyway, there are mainly women working in them because that is the only opportunity for employment for people in those communities. It is not a case of demeaning the role that they are playing.

With respect to my advising caution, I do not recall using that word. I did suggest to the minister what the Canadian reaction should be, but I would say to the member that it is not three days that have gone by, the minister has had the report in his hand for 36 days, and there are only 26 days left.

With respect to depletion of resources, the point that I was trying to make, and again I think the member may have been distracted, is that there has been an increase with some species. There has been a serious diminishment in the quantity of the resource for many other species. Can you say that we are good managers of some species because they happen to be the ones that have increased, and say that we are good managers of the others that are being wiped out? Would the member say that maybe there was some good fortune? Also, the member knows that there was a serious incident on the Fraser River that has taken quite some time, the most important run of all.

Yes, there has been good management. I accepted that. I mentioned that, but I said that in some instances, unfortunately we rely on the opinion of experts who do not always know and who do not, at least in my experience, listen to the fishermen who are out there.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, my colleagues on the other side of the House, my colleague on this side of the House and the member who just spoke have been focusing on the situation on the west coast.

One of the reasons we in this party put down the motion in the name of the hon. member for Beauséjour, the fisheries critic for the official opposition, was that we have been alarmed by an attitude of the minister of fisheries who insists on telling us that the fishery is in great shape, the catch has been bountiful, profits have been high.

I want to tell the minister of fisheries, who is in the House, that in my riding of Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, on the Baie Verte Peninsula, and in the Bay of Islands area, the entire west coast of the province, there are 1,200 fishermen this year who have found the fishery so poor that they have not even earned enough insurable weeks of earnings to qualify for unemployment insurance. When we have asked, for a response program for those primary producers, the same as the government has, rightly and with our applause, responded to the plight of primary producers called farmers, so far, all we have heard is that the fishery is in good shape.

Not in anger but in desperation, I take this opportunity to say to the minister that these people are in desperate shape. He knows they cannot qualify for unemployment insurance, until November 15. He knows that the social welfare program does not kick in until the end of that qualifying period, and he knows that right now there is a shortage of bread and butter on the table. That is not an exaggeration.

I use this opportunity to ask the minister of fisheries to get together with the Minister of Employment and Immigration to give us this year a response to a desperate human plight, a response that cannot wait until a week or two before Christmas, one that needs to be dealt with now. I make that plea in the name of all of those fishermen, and fish plant workers, primarily women, who today have no income and no prospect of income as we enter the Christmas season, until some time perhaps nearing the new year. Let us not leave them hanging high and dry, hungry and cold again this year, please.

COMMITTEE SYSTEM

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, yesterday afternoon there was a legislative committee meeting to study Bill C-13. This bill aims to privatize two crown corporations, Nordion International and Theratronics International which produce products that relate to the treatment of cancer. During this meeting we had yet another example of the dictatorial attitude of this government and its obvious interference with the committee system of the House of Commons.

Following the meeting the committee went in camera to discuss the agenda for future meetings. At a previous meeting it was agreed that each party would submit a list of witnesses and from these lists we would put together a program for the future. My office had made many calls to line up possible witnesses, such as the Canadian Cancer Society.

Shortly into this steering committee meeting the conservative member for Louis—Hebert abruptly moved a motion that no further witnesses be called and that the committee report back to the House by Friday. This act by the government destroys the committee system of this Parliament and clearly indicates that we have an executive type of government and not a Parliament that is allowed to function in the interests of Canadians.

This government does not care about the democratic process because it does not know how to manage power in a democratic situation.

Recently we heard the Prime Minister make presidential style announcements from Los Angeles and the Far East instead of in this House of Commons. This Tory government has obviously decided that the parliamentary process is a nuisance to its dictatorial desires. The truth is that this Tory government has become a nuisance to the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member's time has expired.

RADIO CANADA

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the Government has said many times that it is in favour of bilingualism in Canada.

Why does it not follow up the request of Northerners who want access to the CBC's French programming?

In the past several years, the Yukon Francophone Association and the Francophone Cultural Federation of the Northwest Territories have met the Secretary of State and the former President of the CBC on various occasions. They made a proposal to install and maintain affordable broadcasting services.

In 1987, the CRTC said that of all regions, the least well served, even in the CBC's opinion, is the North.

I ask the Minister to have the Government keep its promises for once.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the time seems right to me, on the occasion of National Universities Week, sponsored by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, to remember the importance of our post-secondary educational institutions in pursuing our goals of excellence.

If we want to remain competitive internationally, we will have to rely more and more on our valuable pool of talent just waiting to be put to use.

Mr. Speaker, we have everything it takes to build a strong, dynamic and prosperous country and I am convinced that the present Government will continue its efforts so that Canadians can have access to a post-secondary educational system based on excellence and equal opportunity.

In closing, let me wish all Abitibi—Témiscamingue university students good luck and happy studies. I strongly hope that one day they will be able to use their vast talents and abilities for the benefit of our great, beautiful region.

IMMIGRATION LEVELS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced yesterday that Canada's immigration level for refugees would remain unchanged at 13,000. She increased the refugee quota for eastern Europe to 3,500 although she knows that most of the east Europeans accepted by Canada are not refugees but what the minister usually calls economic migrants. Yet for Latin America where human rights violations and death squads are escalating, the minister cut that quota from 3,400 to 3,000.

The Prime Minister's wife, while visiting a refugee camp in Asia, promised an increase in the refugee quota there which the Minister had already promised at Geneva. However, the Minister knows that labour unions, co-ops and church activists in Latin America who risk their lives coming to meet our visa officers are too often rejected as not being desirable immigrants or because the quota is filled. Therefore, they try to enter Canada to get a fairer hearing.

I call on the minister to increase the 1990 Latin America quota to 4,000 and the world quota to 15,000.

POLLUTION

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, just one hour ago water intakes were reopened again by the town of Wallaceburg and Walpole Island First Nation, after yet another chemical spill into the St. Clair River.

I cannot begin to describe the frustration and anger felt by residents living downstream from Sarnia's chemical valley.

This government has abandoned us. A pipeline to bring clean water from Lake Huron was denied federal money. The Conservatives said: "It's not their problem".

It is ironic too that yesterday the Federal Court denied Walpole council's injunction to stop a dredging project.

Aided and abetted by the Ministers of Environment and Indian Affairs, the decision says economics outweigh environment and long term health.

A 150-foot dredge continues digging 24 hours a day then dumping 50,000 cubic metres of potentially hazardous sediment into Lake St. Clair.

In my riding we wonder where the federal government's priorities are as we wait in fear, held hostage to the constant threat of chemical spills, while this duly elected federal government says: "It's not their problem."

POLLUTION

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, for my riding of Sarnia-Lambton and others bordering the Great Lakes, the recent commitment of $125 million in new federal government funds to help clean up and preserve the Great Lakes is a much welcomed announcement.

The doubling of federal funds, I believe, constitutes an important step forward in our long-term effort to protect this vital ecosystem.

Today, the Great Lakes provide drinking water, recreation, and to a very significant extent, the economic underpinnings for some 35 million Canadians and Americans.

In the wake of this new action plan, there still remains much to do on many levels. Environmental issues and concerns are not simple problems which can be addressed unilaterally or through a single program or initiative.

While I do recognize that a lot of work has already been done at the provincial and municipal level, much more must be done. Certainly, both have an integral role to play in the upgrading of the current sewage treatment and drainage systems.

At the same time, I call on individual Canadians to actively participate in the clean-up initiative. They too have a vital role to play. Every one of us can and must make a better accounting of what type of waste and by-products we are discharging into the environment. For this to work, Canadians must be part of the solution, not the problem.

In the end, by all of us working together in a constructive and concerted fashion, I strongly believe that we can protect and upgrade our Great Lakes.

DROUGHT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the deadline for appeals under the Canadian Crop Drought Assistance Program has now passed and the producer review committees are looking at those appeals. There are more than 200 in the province of Saskatchewan alone.

The whole program is a farce and the rural municipalities across the prairies are being forced to carry the load for the federal government and they are now reacting.

Earlier this month, the rural municipality of Douglas in The Battlefords—Meadow Lake constituency passed a resolution critical of that program. I would like to read that into the record. It states: "That we express our dissatisfaction with the CCDAP because it does not recognize lands and producers that should receive assistance due to the actual drought, and it does allocate assistance to lands that do not individually qualify but by the fact that they just happen to fall within certain township boundaries. Furthermore, that the Producer Review Committees allow and allot adjustments of payments to farmers who appeal on an individual rather than a township basis, also that disclosure of past farm financial records be waived".

I call on other Saskatchewan rural municipalities to add their voices to the growing list of groups opposed to this very flawed program.

CO-OPERATIVES

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, this week we observe National Co-operative Week. The purpose of this annual event is to remind Canadians of the role co-operatives have played and continue to play on our society and our economy.

All together Canadian co-ops have some $70 billion in assets and conduct about $14 billion in annual business. Twelve million Canadians are members of one or more co-ops. Co-ops are good citizens. They are involved in such things as famine relief overseas and helping the needy at home.

Co-ops are major players in the grain trade, the dairy industry and the poultry sector. They are also involved in almost every other part of the economy from Inuit handicrafts to computer software.

Our government created the co-operative secretariat in 1987 to act as a focal point for the government's role in the sector. Then we set up the advisory committee that gives co-ops an opportunity to advise the government on the potential impact of government policies on co-operatives.

We have also set up an interdepartmental committee to ensure that all government departments are aware of the concerns of the co-op sector and to take them into account in drafting new policies.

I am sure I speak for all members of Parliament when I offer my best wishes to the Canadian co-op sector.

LE VILLAGE QUÉBECOIS D'ANTAN

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, another successful season has just ended at Le Village québécois d'antan, an historic site in Drummondville, that gives us a taste of daily life in Quebec between 1840 and 1910. Now over ten years old, Le Village received 180,000 visitors in 1988-89. During the summer, when Le Village is open to the public, 102,000 tourists visited this centre which is unique in Quebec. This was 11 per cent more than last summer, with admission fees raising nearly $600,000 for Le Village.

Mr. Speaker, the charm and hospitality of Le Village québécois d'antan are a household word. Many Canadian, American and foreign directors come here to make film sequences. The success of this venture is due to the tireless dedication of a group of employees and volunteers, under the direction of Mr. Claude Verrier.

RIDEAU CARLETON RACEWAY

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the Rideau Carleton Raceway which is located in Carleton—Gloucester, will close down if the federal government's goods and services tax is passed as proposed. That promise was made by Dr. Roly Armitage, the president and general manager of the race track.

We all know that horse racing is a popular recreation that attracts 200,000 fans a year at the Rideau Carleton Raceway alone, which employs over 250 persons and which encourages local industries.

The total annual net profit of all race tracks in Canada is $7.4 million, and the government is already taxing them $19.2 million, through a complicated taxing system.

POLLUTION OF THE SEAS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, at noon yesterday in Copenhagen, representatives of the parliaments of 16 countries adopted a far-reaching document on the prevention of pollution of the seas.

Canada was represented by all parties in this House and we undertook to urge the Government of Canada to establish environmental protection as a priority, to strengthen our national efforts in the battles against marine pollution and to express this through legislated plans which contain short and long-term targets and timetables, including a goal of zero discharge of persistent and bio-accumulative pollutants; a free and public release of information on all point sources of pollution; to strengthen our co-operation within existing and developed conventions; to comply with the adopted recommendations of the Nordic Council's International Conference on Pollution of the Seas, which ended yesterday, including a demonstration of political will and the provision of economic funds to achieve these purposes.

At the urging of the Canadian all-party delegation, some eight amendments to the international document were accepted, including, for the first time, the protection of our fragile Arctic Ocean and seas.

BROCK UNIVERSITY ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, as members of the House know, this is National Universities Week in Canada. Today, I would like to particularly congratulate Brock University of St. Catharines as it begins its twenty-fifth anniversary celebrations.

From its inception in 1964, Brock has contributed greatly to the educational, cultural and economic life of the Niagara Peninsula. Individuals associated with Brock can be found involving themselves in all aspects of life in our communities, helping them to become better places to live.

As they celebrate their silver anniversary, I congratulate President Terry White, students, faculty and staff, as they continue to make Brock University a cornerstone of our communities.

INTERNATIONAL SAVINGS AND CREDIT CO-OPERATIVE DAY

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, today we celebrate international savings and credit co-operative day. Canada's credit unions go back to 1900, when Alphonse Desjardins founded the Caisse populaire de Lévis with 130 members. Since then, the Fédération des caisses populaires Desjardins has become Canada's sixth most important financial institution. It has over 4 million members and nearly $40 billion in assets.

Today, there are credit unions in every province and in almost all communities in this country. Each one is an independent agency that belongs to its members and is managed by them. In addition to their economic role, credit unions, like other co-operatives, play a vital social role in the communities they serve. Through the Co-operative Secretariat and the Interdepartmental Advisory Committee on Co-operatives, the Government works together with all co-operatives to ensure that its policies and programs do not have a negative impact on this sector. Congratulations and keep up the good work!

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I stand today in accordance with Standing Order 31 to make an appeal to the Prime Minister to show some leadership and direction in reference to an issue which is having deep-rooted effects on the unity of our country. I am speaking, of course, of the French-English language issue.

On December 19, 1988, Mr. Mulroney said: "We showed leadership with Bill C-72 and the Meech Lake Accord."

As the Prime Minister knows, the Meech Lake Accord is now floundering in most parts of Canada. More and more Canadians feel that it is time the Prime Minister renewed his commitment and showed some renewed leadership.

I urge the Prime Minister to make an immediate appeal to the Premier of Quebec to protect the rights of minorities wherever they are and encourage Mr. Bourassa to introduce new legislation immediately which will be in keeping with the Supreme Court's decision and the Quebec Charter of Rights, before the effect that Bill 178 is having on the minds of many Canadians becomes irreversible.

COMMITTEE SYSTEM

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Standing Committee on Transport, my colleagues and I witnessed a startling abuse of the committee system on this very day. The Federation of Canadian Municipalities submitted that the Standing Committee travel this country to hear the views of Canadians on VIA Rail.

Well, a colleague of mine moved a motion that we do precisely that, travel the country. All this prompted a flurry of activity at the clerk's table as Conservative members, new bodies, whom I have never seen at a meeting of the committee and who have not heard a single scrap of evidence, sat in and ultimately defeated the motion.

While procedurally correct, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this action by some government members was morally irresponsible, and only demonstrates further that this government is doing what it wants and when it wants not giving Canadians their right, at the very least, to be heard.

SMALL BUSINESS JOB CREATION

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, since 1984, over 1.5 million new jobs have been created in Canada. The largest source of these new jobs has been the small business community. The government has recognized its contribution in several key ways. The lifetime capital gains exemption of $500,000 for investment in small business shares has been accelerated; RRSP regulations have been relaxed to allow more flexibility; government procurement policies are being revised to simplify the supplier registration process and to improve the participation of western and Atlantic firms.

The Ministry for International Trade is working hard to expand Canada's export markets, creating new and secure jobs in our export-driven economy. Tourism, one of the largest generators of small business jobs, is being promoted throughout the world by our government. The success of western diversification and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency cannot be overlooked in our efforts to develop small business.

The record is clear, 1.5 million new jobs and a healthy small business sector. Our policies are working, in every sense of the word.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ATLANTIC REGION

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, now known in the Atlantic as "Mike, the spike," because he has driven the final nail into the container in which the Atlantic provinces are going to be shipped out.

The first nail was the complete mismanagement of the fish stocks leading to massive layoffs. The second nail was the wiping out of VIA Rail. The third nail was the gutting of the unemployment insurance system.

Isn't the policy of the government for the Atlantic area really a resettlement policy? Isn't the goods and services tax which will savage the economy of the Atlantic area just the last nail in the box in which the government is going to ship us out? In fact, isn't that the reason why Tory support has plummeted in the Atlantic provinces to 17 per cent while Liberal support has climbed to 61 per cent?

• (1420)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am obviously concerned about the economy in Atlantic Canada, as we all are on this side of the House. But I do not think it serves anybody any useful purpose to listen to the types of exaggeration that the hon. member has mentioned here.

We have brought about some changes in our fiscal policy because of the very important concern that we, and many, many Canadians have about the size of our deficit and the size of our government debt. We must get this under control and we are trying to do this in the most balanced way possible.

If the hon. member is honest with himself, he will see that the application of the changes to VIA Rail, unemployment insurance, and the goods and services tax as well, the impact is either greater in the negative sense in other parts of the country, or more positive in Atlantic Canada—in the case of the goods and services—than is the case with Ontario and Quebec. Atlantic Canada will benefit more from the goods and services tax introduction than will the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, the people of the Atlantic do not believe that and neither do they believe the models that are being used. They are inaccurate and they do not apply to the regions of this country.

I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Why is it that he has called the Newfoundland Minister of Finance deceitful when he suggested that Newfoundland would have to raise its sales tax to 25 per cent from 12 per cent? The federal minister says he is deceitful, just playing politics. Of course, that is the same attitude of the chairman of the finance committee now known in Newfoundland as"Chairman Blaggard" who said that it was not worthwhile going to the Atlantic in the first place.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Rompkey: They are spending two and a half hours in each province. The Conservative members on the committee have been called rude, ignorant, belligerent. Instead of calling the Newfoundland Minister of Finance deceitful—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Minister.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I used that adjective in anything that I said about the Newfoundland Minister of Finance. What I did say is that I think that it is quite wrong for him to suggest that the sales tax rate has to go to 26 per cent in the province of Newfoundland simply because of the goods and services tax.

The numbers that we have on the impact of the goods and services tax on the provinces will be positive to their fiscal position. I say it is quite wrong for any province to say that it going to have to increase its sales tax because of the introduction of the goods and services tax. I suggested in the House that if the hon. member from Newfoundland wished to discuss this with me, if he has any questions I would be happy to talk to him.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, 12 and 9 in any mathematics comes to 21, as far as I am concerned.

Groups from the Atlantic have pointed out that the goods and services tax in our area will actually be 10 per cent because we buy everything we get from central Canada and we have to transport it over long distances. In P.E.I. it will be disastrous for the tourism industry and the potato industry.

I want to ask the minister again, will he listen to this final cry from the Atlantic provinces, and will he now do away with this goods and services tax which will destroy an already crippled economy?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite clear that this government is committed to moving ahead with a change in the sales tax system in this country. We are doing something that has waited for many, many years to do.

The Minister of Finance in 1981, who sits in the other place now, tried to make a change. It did not work. The change did not work, but this change is a change that is consistent with what is being done in 48 other countries.

I want to just draw to the hon. member's attention that he said this would be disastrous for the potato industry. We had the Nova Scotia Federation of Agriculture saying, when asked by a Liberal member if it wanted the government to scrap the GST, "No, absolutely not, then we would be stuck with the existing manufacturers' sales tax. We think that the GST will be good for Canada".

Mr. Rompkey: That's not what they said in P.E.I.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I raise that point because the impact on the agricultural sector I think is a positive impact whether it is Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan or Ontario. It is important that we do not put out misleading information when clearly many people in the agricultural sector say that moving from the old tax to the new tax is a good thing for Canada.

SOUTH AFRICAN FOREIGN DEBT

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, on my way in to Question Period I received a wire that says that South Africa has reached an agreement with western banks to reschedule part of its foreign debt, a deal that frustrates plans by Commonwealth leaders to try to influence that rescheduling and increase economic pressure for apartheid reform in the country.

Zambian President Kaunda called the banks "bloodsuckers". Our Prime Minister said that South Africa's economic problems have not ended. "The best is still there. It has to be paid for and has to be financed."

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. To what extent were our Prime Minister and the Canadian banks involved in the rescheduling of this $20 billion debt of South Africa, of which we picked up $8 billion, while at the same time saying that sanctions work?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I can inform the Hon. Member that the measures taken by the Commonwealth in 1985 have had a snowball effect. Other countries have also started enforcing sanctions against South Africa. We are on the right track. Although there are still some mechanisms that prevent apartheid from being dismantled, I think there are some promising signs in South Africa. However, we will continue to enforce sanctions until apartheid is completely dismantled, and that is a promise, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, Canada is being embarrassed at the Commonwealth Conference because of contradictory statements made by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The Secretary of State says that further sanctions on South Africa at this time will not have any effect. Then we have the Prime Minister saying that it is because of sanctions that changes seem to be taking place.

What is the government's position on sanctions? Do they work or don't they? If they do, why has the government chosen at this time, when there is pressure on the South African economy, to freeze further sanctions?

Mrs. Landry: Mr. Speaker, this government has only one position. It will keep putting pressure on until apartheid is dismantled. That is our position.

I would like to quote from statements that were made by the Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs yesterday in the Commonwealth meeting. He is referring to his meeting with Rev. Alan Boesack and he stated:

"Because there have been confusing press reports I should make it clear that at no time did Mr. Boesack suggest it would be appropriate to relax Commonwealth pressure on South Africa now. He believes it is essential that pressure be maintained and that the mere promise of reform should not be rewarded by any relaxation of pressure."

That is our position. We are continuing to put pressure on until apartheid is dismantled.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. I doubt that the minister can deny that the amendments to the Railway Act which he announced today run roughshod over the spirit of the Supreme Court decision which explicitly recognized the Crown immunity of the three prairie phone systems. I would like to remind the minister that on August 14, the minister promised to consult with the provinces to evaluate the consequences of that decision.

Why then, rather than consulting with the provinces, is he holding a gun to their head by stripping away this immunity which the Supreme Court clearly recognized? Is this his idea of fostering national unity?

• (1430)

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court's decision with respect to AGT is very clear and specific. It makes the Canadian Government responsible for telecommunications. However, the decision raises the point of Crown immunity, and the bill tabled today puts all telephone companies in Canada on the same footing.

[English]

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister. There might be some of his back-benchers who are happy with that answer, but the reason the government can expect such a fight on this issue is that all kinds of studies, including one done by Bud Sherman for his own department, clearly indicated that the local phone rates will go up between 50 per cent and 131 per cent if these companies lose the ability to cross-subsidize from long distance rates.

Why should the senior citizens of Vegreville, the ranchers in High River, the small business people in Steinbach, and the welfare mothers in Prince Albert have to pay more so that Conrad Black and Ted Rogers can get richer?

[Translation]

Mr. Masse: Mr. Speaker, I would like to stress that today, the CRTC is responsible for 70 per cent of Canada's telephone users, and that since 1983, no increases have been approved for local networks. In fact, the only place in Canada where there was an increase was in Manitoba.

[English]

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, this policy represents one of the most massive attempts to centralize control over a major portion of Canadian life into the hands of the federal government since the Second World War. It strips western provincial governments of their regulatory authority, and it was done without any effective consultation. Indeed it was done in the teeth of substantial and sustained provincial opposition.

Will the minister now admit what all western Canadians can see, that this policy is nothing less than the biggest federal raid on the jurisdiction and regulatory authority of the provinces since the NEP?

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Masse: Mr. Speaker, after the Supreme Court released its decision, I met all my provincial counterparts who were available. We discussed these issues, and today the Government has released its policy.

LAND CLAIMS

Mr. John MacDougall (Timiskaming:) Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Earlier today the Supreme Court granted leave for appeal to the Temagami Indian Band on a land claim for 125 townships which dates back to 1973. The Ontario Supreme Court has rejected the land claim twice.

Can the minister tell this House and the riding of Timiskaming what exactly will happen next with regard to the Supreme Court and when possibly leave would be given?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, leave has been granted by the Supreme Court for the applicants to appeal. At the present time the federal government is not a party to the action.

I will have my officials review the judgment to see if if there is a position for the federal government to take, but at the present time there has been no decision as to whether or not to intervene.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Two weeks ago Canadians were told that an non-partisan, expert royal commission on transportation would be appointed to examine Canada's transportation infrastructure. Canadians will understandably be suspicious of a commission comprised of three former Conservative politicians, including the chairman of the royal commission.

Why did the Prime Minister find room in his royal commission for the participation of two former provincial Conservative cabinet ministers and a former Conservative MP but could not find room in the royal commission for a representative of the Canadian Federation of Municipalities which represents Canadian towns and provinces right across the country and is on the front lines in determining the severe impact of the VIA cuts?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the political affiliation is of most of the members of this commission.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peterson: We will tell you.

Mr. Allmand: How can you keep a straight face, Don?

Mr. Mazankowski: I might ask the hon. member in a rhetorical way whether he is concerned about the appointment of Mr. William Patrick Kelly, a very distinguished public servant who has served this country in labour and industry in a most exemplary fashion.

Some Hon. Members: hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Is he complaining about John Forbes Helliwell, a professor and head of the Department of Economics at UBC?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Is he concerned about Marc Gaudry, a professor of Economics at the University of Montreal?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Is he concerned about James D. McNiven, who is currently the Dean of the Faculty of Management at Dalhousie University?

Some Hon. Members: hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Is he concerned about Marie-Josée Drouin, an economist who has been an executive director of the Hudson Institute of Canada since 1978?

Is he concerned with appointments from the board of Concordia University, the Research Institute for International Change at Columbia University, or the Canadian Bank of Commerce?

Is he concerned about Maurice LeClair who was the former president and chief executive officer of CNR?

If he finds exception with all those, then he better go back to the drawing boards.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, what we are concerned about is the government that promises to maintain VIA Rail before and during an election, dumps it after an election, and establishes a royal commission after the fact. We are concerned with nonsense being spewed across the way. And, yes, we are concerned about a royal commission that has room for three former Conservative politicians, for three card carrying members of the Conservative party, but no room for a single representative from the Canadian Federation of Municipalities. You are damn right we are concerned that justice is not being done in this country on this issue.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I asked the Deputy Prime Minister a straightforward question.

Given that the Canadian Federation of Municipalities represents every community and every region in every province of Canada where some two million Canadians are being displaced, why was there not a single seat for that important body on this royal commission?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I think the royal commission, if the hon. member reflects, represents a broad section of Canadians from coast to coast. They are very competent people.

If the member has something to say about the former provincial treasury of the government of the province of Alberta, he should stand up and say so.

Mr. Tobin: I just did.

Mr. Mazankowski: He should tell the House what you have against him, a very distinguished public servant, a very distinguished lawyer, a loyal Canadian and an outstanding Albertan.

TRADE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. The general manager of the Ontario Pork Producers Board states that the powerful mid-west pork lobby in the United States now views that almost anything Canadian pork producers do, including going to work in the morning, makes them guilty and subject to yet more countervail duties.

Now that pork producers have been advised to start their own funds in order to pay this duty themselves, what is the minister going to do to live up to his promise to create greater access to the U.S. market, a promise that was made by the free trade agreement but which is obviously not being lived up to?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to answer that question because just this morning it has been reported by the agriculture department of the United States that in the area of Canadian vegetables there is an anticipated increase of 80 per cent from today's levels to be exported to the United States. That is a pretty good figure.

Mr. Gauthier: Pork!

Mr. Mazankowski: He was also talking about agriculture.

Some Hon. Members: Pork, oink-oink!

Mr. Tobin: Not the kind you find in the patronage barrel

Mr. Mazankowski: I have a lot of respect for the hon. member. He is not heckling, by the way.

I listened to his question very carefully. He talked about pork and he talked about agricultural products and asked what we were going to do about access. I just pointed out that the access in the area of vegetables would increase, according to an American observer in the agricultural industry, by 80 per cent.

With respect to pork, the hon. members knows, and he and I

With respect to pork the hon. member knows—he and I have had discussions about this—that we have taken action under the provisions of section 19 of the free trade agreement which provides for an objective disputes resolving mechanism that represents both countries. We believe that we will get a fair hearing.

Furthermore, in so far as the other elements of it are concerned, because this is a GATT initiated process we are taking action in the GATT. We are working with the pork council, the meat council and the producers. We have every confidence that this process will work.

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also for the minister. I wish he had referred more to the pork than to the vegetables. There is a difference, and I am aware that he is aware of that.

He has not convinced Canadian pork producers of his enthusiasm as yet. I would like to ask him a few questions that I am being hit continuously with from farmers across Canada. They are maybe very simple ones, but I would like him to give us answers to them.

Why do Canadian farmers have to continuously do as the American government says and not as the American government does?

Where is the government support to protect Canadian farmers from the unfair, bullying harassment of the United States? I believe those are the words that he has used.

Where is our intestinal fortitude to stand up to the United States?

Some Hon. Members: Guts!

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would agree that vegetables are part of the agricultural industry. He did talk about agriculture in its totality, as well as pork.

I said before that we now have a provision under the auspices of the free trade agreement to settle disputes through an objective process, a binational disputes resolving mechanism, something which we have never had before. The dice are not loaded against us. We intend to use that provision.

We intend to use the provision of the GATT. The pork producers of Canada with whom we are working very closely know that. The Meat Council of Canada with which we are working very closely knows that. I have every confidence that this process is going to work.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Environment.

In 1988, Canada along with 34 other countries signed an International Protocol that commits this country to eliminating its nitrogen oxide to 1987 levels. Yesterday the transport committee was told by Transport 2000 that the shift of passengers from VIA Rail to 1.9 million more car trips would lead to an increase of 2.1 million additional kilograms of carbon dioxide, carbon monoxide, and nitrous oxide into the atmosphere.

In light of the breach of both the intent and the letter of the Protocol and the fact that the royal commission does not have a single environmental expert on it, will the Deputy Prime Minister place a moratorium on VIA Rail cuts until a full, independent, environmental assessment has been completed?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am told that Transport 2000 submitted some figures yesterday to the committee. It is not the first time the figures of Transport 2000 and those of Transport Canada do not coincide. However, the Minister of the Environment looked at all the available figures on emissions and pollution. He also concluded that considering the shift of passengers to other modes of transportation, the impact would not be as substantial as the Hon. Member would have us believe.

That is why the Minister of the Environment felt that the report tabled last week was conclusive in this respect did not warrant further studies and obviously in no way warranted a moratorium on VIA Rail cuts.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I find the minister's comments unusual because he knows full well that in the 7-page environmental assessment, which is really a joke, there was not one statistic showing the level of increase in atmospheric pollution.

Yesterday the minister told the Canadian Industrial Transportation League that the reduced rail subsidy would mean more government money for highway and airline services. Money cut from VIA Rail will not be saved. It will be spent to replace VIA Rail services.

Given that rail is the most environmentally friendly form of transportation and that no money will be saved, the same argument that the FCM made earlier today, will the minister admit to this House that he has made a mistake and agree to a moratorium on VIA cuts until its full environmental and socio-economic implications have been examined?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I will say what I said yesterday and he will well understand why I am here today.

I said that the government has to put money not only on rail services and highways but it also has to put money on air transportation.

I did not say that we will move the money from VIA Rail to air or highways. I said here a couple of times that we will save more than $1 billion for the next five years in terms of the deficit. It is what I said, it is what I repeat, and it is what I will always say.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I would like to direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Although the Government of Canada has welcomed Pakistan back into the Commonwealth, it has yet to raise pressing questions on human rights. Millions of Ahmadis Muslims are at risk because of the brutal suppression of their rights.

Because of the urgency of this situation, will the Deputy Prime Minister take the unusual step to contact the Prime Minister immediately on behalf of the House of Commons to, first, bring the questions of these horrendous human right violations to the attention of the Commonwealth and, second, to seek personal assurances from the Government of Pakistan that action will be taken to protect the lives of the Ahmadis Muslims who wish to practise their religious beliefs in peace and quiet?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, after our colleague the Hon. Member for Parkdale—High Park advised me of his concerns, I immediately asked officials at External Affairs to get in touch with our embassy in Pakistan and find out whether there were any new developments in the case of the Ahmadiya Muslims.

In fact, yesterday one of the senior officials happened to meet several leaders of the community, and they did not mention any particular problems.

However, I agree with the Hon. Member that we often hear reports of threats to this community. As in the past, we will continue our representations to the authorities, either through the ministers or through departmental officials.

[English]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister for External Relations.

Over a year ago, in September 1988, a bill was passed in this House to establish an international institute of human rights and democratic development. To date there has been no government announcement.

Given the seriousness which even CIDA acknowledges that Canadians give to international human rights issues, the procrastination or the lack of action represents nothing more than negligence.

When is the minister going to attach some action to her words of commitment to human rights and do something?

[Translation]

Mrs. Landry: Mr. Speaker, the decision to create an International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development was made because of our concern for and our interest in defending human rights throughout the world.

We will, of course, consult with the leaders of the Opposition, as provided in the Act, when deciding who will run the Centre, and of course the money, $1 million, will be made available to the Centre as soon as the official announcement is made.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

Another 200 jobs have been lost in Montreal. Employees with Eastern Airlines have received their pink slips and will be laid off on October 31.

Our labour legislation provides that the company must sit down with its employees to discuss the details of a shutdown. The Minister has been aware of the problem for four months, but no meeting has as yet taken place, and the company is waiting for a reply.

When will the Minister give 200 Canadian employees at Eastern Airlines an answer with respect to their future? Or is he going to let Eastern Airlines circumvent Canada's labour legislation?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour takes action in these situations as soon as he has been officially informed by the employer of any plans to lay off employees.

So far, the Department of Labour has received no notice from Eastern Airlines. Obviously, the Department cannot take any action until it has been officially advised of what Eastern Airlines intends to do.

I can assure the Hon. Member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville and all Members of this House that as soon as we are advised by the company, the Department of Labour will ensure there is full compliance with every provision of the Canada Labour Code.

• (1450)

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. This is just another example of the Government's flippant attitude to the loss of jobs in Montreal. Last week, we heard that over 11,000 jobs were lost in Montreal during the past 18 months. Now we know the answer. The reason is quite obvious, and I would like to quote the Hon. Member for Rosemont, a Government Member, who said that many ministers still showed a lack of awareness of the situation in Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, my question is this: Does the Minister agree with the Government Member's analysis, which accuses the Minister and his colleagues of ignoring the hardship of Montreal's workers?

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, I think I can sympathize with the concerns of the Hon. Member for LaSalle—Émard, who probably has other things on his mind, aside from the employment situation in Montreal, and I hope his prospects are promising. I may remind him that from 1980 to 1984, when his party was in power, the number of jobs created in Québec was minus 4,000. In other words, Québec lost 4,000 jobs during that time. In the five years since this Government came to power, Mr. Speaker, more than 145,000 jobs have been created in Québec, including 125,000 in Montreal, and I think this is an excellent record which he should look at more carefully.

WOMEN

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It concerns the report commissioned by the Commonwealth Heads of Government entitled Engendering Adjustment for the 1990s.

The report points out the severe and disproportionate impact of structural adjustment policies on women in the developing world and concludes that a new approach is required which will take into account the majority role women play in those countries.

Does the government intend to follow the recommendations of the report and speak clearly at the IMF and the World Bank on the detrimental effects of these Draconian economic measures on the women of the world?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, one of the things this government has done very actively is work on behalf of women in the Third World.

At the Commonwealth Status of Women Ministers' meeting last year we developed a work plan involving all these countries, because it is clearly more serious in the Third World where women do nearly 100 per cent of the work in the home and about 80 per cent of the work outside the home. That was the subject of quite a long discussion, and there is a work plan in place in the Commonwealth that we will be pursuing.

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, at the Commonwealth Finance Ministers' meeting in September the Minister of Finance said structural adjustment and not increased aid was the key to the debt crisis in Third World development.

This report is a clear indictment of the minister's position. In light of the previous speaker highlighting that women pay a key role, will the Minister of Finance and his government undertake to ensure that women's concerns are clearly incorporated in the implementation of adjustment policies? Will the minister undertake that?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member has just said is precisely the position that this government has been pursuing and encouraging in the discussions that we have had on the effect of adjustment on women in less developed countries.

The point I made which she has taken somewhat out of context is that there must be structural adjustment in these economies if they are to be able to move ahead and take advantage of better opportunities.

However, as that structural adjustment takes place it is important to acknowledge, recognize and plan for the impact of that on women, as has been set out in the Commonwealth study that has been referred to by my hon. colleague.

TRANSPORTATION

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport.

In light of the recently announced cuts to VIA Rail affecting the Calgary—Banff—Vancouver rail line, and because tourism is a major industry surrounding this route and it is essential to maintain a year-round service to accommodate skiers and sightseers, will the minister please tell me what his department is doing to promote the privatization of this most vital transportation link in my riding?

Further, will the minister also assure me that his department is doing all that is possible to guarantee that year-round service on this route will not be disrupted?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe this is a good question.

I would like to refer my colleague to what I said on October 4 when I announced the VIA Rail decision. I said that the private sector would be encouraged to take over any service in the country where services could be given to Canadians.

Of course this Rocky Mountain route is obviously the most profitable route that we have in the country. If the private sector wants to take over, of course VIA Rail has been given all the rights to receive the proposals and to consider those proposals in the best interest of travellers in this part of Canada.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration. Yesterday the minister claimed that the cornerstone of the government's immigration policy was family class, yet this level has not increased dramatically from the 30 per cent range of all immigrant applications under this government.

Does the minister not understand that this is making it more difficult for family members in Canada to be reunited, that it is causing a great deal of frustration? Why not return to the days when the family level of the whole immigration policy was upwards of 50 per cent and more.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member who keeps hammering at this subject that when the family class constituted 50 per cent of total immigration it was because his party had put in place policies that caused some of the lowest immigration levels of the post war period. I do not think that we have anything to be ashamed of in this regard.

Mr. Allmand: When were they the highest, Barbara?

Mrs. McDougall: Let me say that they are the highest right now. The family class is the highest level in this decade.

Mr. Allmand: Let's look at the fifties and sixties.

Mrs. McDougall: I should say that the hon. member knows very well that the family class is demand driven. To the extent that people come forward and sponsor family members who qualify, then those numbers will be exceeded.

This is the highest planning level in a decade. I would also point out that this is the government that expanded the family class and increased the points for the assisted relatives.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister could check with Canadians from coast to coast who cannot sponsor quickly enough or successfully enough and then perhaps return to the House of Commons and check the statements she just made.

My supplementary is directed to the same Minister. Yesterday, for the third consecutive year the Minister of Employment and Immigration did not see fit to increase the number of government-sponsored refugees. However, during his trip to Kuala Lumpur, the Prime Minister contradicted the Minister, saying that we admitted more refugees each year and that we were not doing enough to help them. I therefore want to ask the Minister to explain this contradiction. Why say one thing on the international scene and do another in Canada? Why?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the number of refugees who come to Canada for humanitarian purposes has increased every year. Let me say that the number of government sponsored refugees will remain at 13,000 next year. When we look around the world we see many changes in eastern Europe and other areas, and some greater normalization of exit permits and so on. That means we are dealing with a changing situation.

The number of privately sponsored refugees will increase by 3,000. Their settlement is not cost-free to the government, of course, because we pay a part of the services and we do it on an on open-ended basis, and we are proud to do it. We are increasing the number of refugees from southeast Asia by 500 in the coming year and we made commitments in Geneva in June that put us ahead of all other countries. The Prime Minister is right. We are increasing and we will continue to increase.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to advise the House that there will be a single question from the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk, a single question from the hon. member for Yukon, and a single question from the hon. member for Fundy—Royal and that will close off Question Period.

TRADE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Recently released Statistics Canada figures indicate that since the signing of the free trade agreement there has been a sharp decline in our trade surplus with the United States. Our exports to the United States have increased only 3.4 per cent, while U.S. imports to Canada have doubled to 7.5 per cent. The Prime Minister said that the free trade agreement would be the cornerstone of prosperity. It was going to protect Canada against U.S. trade measures. Ever since we signed the deal we have seen American harassment of our pork, steel, dairy, and fish industry. Now we are seeing trade figures that show it is not working.

Will this government now admit that the free trade agreement is not working, and that the free trade deal has cost Canadians more than they have gained?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have a report here from The Financial Post of yesterday which says, "U.S. trade deficit figures were bad news for United States policy makers, but good news for nimble Canadian exporters who appear to be taking early advantage of the free trade agreement."

That is not a government statement. That is an analysis by The Financial Post of what is happening.

The hon. member refers to the larger increase in imports relative to exports. That is a very simple thing to understand when you understand that there is a considerable increase in investment in this country and that leads directly to an increase in imports of machine goods and machine tools. A large part of the increase in our imports in those figures is because of the increase in the machine tools.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. The goods and services tax is the most profound change to the tax structure since income tax came in temporarily 72 years ago. Despite this, the government has limited hearings to approximately 10 hours for the entire Atlantic region, no hearings at all in Quebec, and today the minister says that poorer regions in Canada are going to be better off. Well, that is laughable. I want to ask the Minister if he will be up front, finally, with Canadians and confirm that more than half of poor Canadians living below the poverty line will in fact be worse off after the goods and services tax is implemented even with the goods and services tax credit?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says the government has limited the hearings. The government does not tell the committees what to do. The committees decide themselves what they should do. That was a decision taken by the committee in consultation with members from the Liberals, NDP, and the Conservatives.

The essential question the hon. member is asking is: will lower income Canadians be worse off or better off as a result of the goods and services tax? I can answer quite categorically, lower-income Canadians will be better off after sales tax reform because of the fact that they will receive a cheque every three months, in advance, through the goods and services tax credit, $275 per adult, $100 per child, income tested and it will be phased out as their incomes increase. But, families with incomes of $30,000 or less will be better off after tax reform.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Recently it was announced that a GATT panel had delayed the approval of a report that says Canada cannot limit imports of ice cream and yogurt. Reports stated that Canada violated its obligations under Article 11 of GATT in January of 1988 when it put import quotas on ice cream and yogurt to support the country's $7 billion a year dairy industry.

Given that the United States obtained a waiver from GATT in 1955 which allowed it to maintain its import restrictions on ice cream into the U.S. market, can the minister indicate what steps are being taken in order to ensure the same protection for our Canadian dairy industry?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, a number of actions are being taken. First, as the hon. member indicated Article 11 is the provision under which supply management systems are set up and operating in this country. The wording in Article 11 dates back to 1947. As a result in the current multilateral trade negotiations we are seeking to clarify and strengthen that article and update it to current agricultural realities and that process is ongoing. As well we consider the GATT waiver to be grossly unfair and we have served notice on the Americans that we intend to pursue this. As well we are pursuing this in the MTN negotiations and it too is on the negotiating table.

I can tell the hon. member, and he can assure the producers that he represents, that this government stands firmly committed behind the principles of supply management. We will do everything in our power to defend it vigorously.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton East on a question of privilege.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with reference to Beauchesne's fifth edition, Citation 16, which states:

> Privileges are enjoyed by individual members, because the House cannot perform its functions without unimpeded use of the services of its members.

As well, Citation 18 states:

> Privileges involve a member's capacity to serve the people who have chosen him as their representative.

Several times since coming to this House I have heard it alleged that the New Democratic Party supported the NEP. This is absolutely false and I wish to draw it to the attention of members opposite so that they may better do their job, better serve their constituents—

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has raised a question of privilege and he has referred to Beauchesne and certain citations which do in fact set out very clearly what privilege is. But the complaint that seems to be emerging is a matter of debate. Somebody has said something about somebody else as to whether or not they support something. That is a matter of debate and that is not a question of privilege. The hon. member may have a complaint but he will have to take the complaint elsewhere.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Windsor West on the usual point of order.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): I want to ask the government House Leader for a statement of business that the government intends to call for the coming week.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to reply to my hon. friend. Tomorrow we will continue with second reading debate on Bill C-36, that is the Agriculture Advance Payments. There is an understanding among the parties there will be no dilatory motions proposed. My hon. friends will understand that the opposition has been filibustering this bill for some time and we intend to push forward in order that the farmers of Canada will receive those very important payments.

If the opposition parties should discontinue their filibuster tomorrow and there is sufficient time, we would be pleased to revert to concurrence in motions in order that the House may have an opportunity to consider, in debate, the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Procedure vis-à-vis television.

On Monday, we will call for third reading of Bill C-20, the excise tax bill; on Tuesday, October 24, we will continue debate at report stage on Bill C-21. Those are the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): The Government House Leader has indicated that the opposition has filibustered on Bill C-36. I wonder, in making that particular comment to the House, if he could inform the House how many hours of debate there have been on this very important piece of legislation.

Mr. Lewis: There have been endless hours of debate. I do not have the exact time but I do want to point out to the House that the government is very anxious to pass this legislation in order that the farmers of Canada will be paid. We are moving ahead on this as quickly as possible. We would hope that the opposition will stop their filibuster.

Mr. Murphy: The Government House Leader, when he is speaking on House business, should state facts. It is my understanding that there have not even been eight hours of debate on this legislation at the present time. Certainly on most pieces of legislation, we go through at least the full eight hours of debate before the government threatens closure.

Mr. Lewis: This is a bill which is good news for the farmers of Canada. We do not want to threaten closure but I want the farmers of Canada to know that if it is necessary to put closure in order to pay the farmers of Canada the advance payments, we will do so.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I would like to respond to the statement by the Government House Leader. He has not got the week's business off to a very good start by referring to the efforts of members of this House to do their duty in debating issues of importance to the country as filibustering. Even in the Eastern Bloc countries they are moving away from the traditional one-party state, no-debate approach that they had for 40 years. My hon. friend seems to think that we should move in the opposite direction. I do not think that Canadians agree with that, especially the farmers of Canada who, through their national organizations, have called almost unanimously for the bill that we are talking about to be withdrawn.

If the minister is interested in the farmers of Canada, then he will listen to what they are saying through the intermediary of the voices of the Liberal party and other members and withdraw this bill. That is the way to listen to the farmers.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On a point of order, the Hon. Member for Algoma.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): On a point of order. I would like to point out that the Minister of Justice and the House Leader for the Government is really threatening Canadian farmers by saying that he is going to use closure. What the farmers want to do is to have cash, interest-free cash advances. What the government should do is just withdraw the bill and pay the money, the estimates of which are going to be approved tonight, to those farmers. That is what they want. They do not want this bill at all.

Mr. Lewis: I am pleased to have this debate continuing on an opposition day. Normally on opposition days we try to vacate the floor and allow the opposition to debate the matter that they brought up for debate. Since they insist on continuing this debate, I would respond to my hon. friend by saying this: Yes, we intend to threaten the Canadian farmers by paying them money and yes, we intend to override the filibusters by the opposition parties, the Liberals and the NDP, who do not want the Canadian farmers paid. We are going to do it as soon as possible.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

The House resumed consideration of motion of Mr. Robichaud:

> That this House condemn the government's mismanagement, lack of leadership, incompetence and negligence that has placed Canada's fishing communities and workers in unparalled jeopardy.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): The fishery is of vital importance in almost every single community, 158 of them, which make up the great riding of Burin—St. George's, along the south coast of Newfoundland, along the southwest corner and up a bit of the west coast.

It is for that reason, among others, that I am delighted to rise and support the motion put forward by my colleague from New Brunswick, from the riding of Beausejour, which calls on this House to condemn the government's mismanagement, lack of leadership, incompetence and negligence that have placed Canada's fishing communities and workers in unparalled jeopardy.

First of all, I could not have said it better myself. I believe when members of this House reflect on what the gentleman from New Brunswick has asked the House to concur in, they will rush to his support because this government, as the motion implies, has been lacking in leadership, has been incompetent, has been negligent and has placed Canada's fishing communities, including many of dozens of such communities in my own riding, in unparalled jeopardy.

I can say to the Minister of Fisheries I can support that resolution with great relish.

I listened to the Minister of Fisheries earlier in the debate. In response to my good friend from Gander—Grand Falls, in talking about the issue of overfishing, he used this tell-tale phrase: "We fixed that". Yes, he certainly fixed that, and I will show you how he fixed it.

I have here a document from the Government of Newfoundland, published last week and given to the Government of Canada some weeks ago, entitled "Resource Crisis in the Newfoundland Fishery". On Page 5 of that document, the Government of Newfoundland shows just how the Minister of Fisheries here in this House fixed the question of overfishing. I will give you a couple of quick figures.

The NAFO allocation for the European Community in 1986 was 26,295 metric tonnes. Those same countries in the EEC took in that year 160,000 metric tonnes or about six times what the catch was supposed to be. The next year the quota was 25,205 metric tonnes. The EEC countries, particularly Spain and Portugal, took 134,000 metric tonnes.

I say to the Minister of Fisheries that he fixed it all right. He, together with the Prime Minister, the member for St. John's West and the Minister of Trade, allowed Spain and Portugal to walk all over us during those years and he brags today that he fixed the over-fishing issue. He tends to be very selective when he is quoting statistics, when he is quoting from newspapers, just as he was this morning on the west coast issue. I wish I had time to talk about that because although it is the west coast of Canada, the trade ruling of a few days ago has a lot of implications for the fishery on the east coast of Canada, including the one in Newfoundland.

Just in passing, to make the point, the minister this morning told us that the ruling was being welcomed with open arms by everybody out there. He is being very selective. Why did he not read all the headlines? Why did he not read the one in the Ottawa Citizen of October 19, which said: "Fish Industry Slams Trade Ruling". Why did he not go to the newspaper in Quebec city, Le Soleil, which declares "Le saumon fait hurles". A rough translation, I believe, is "This ruling is an outrage". That is about the ruling the minister told us this morning was the best thing since sliced bread. It is only a matter of time before that kind of ruling, where the Americans can do what they want with our fish, begins getting applied to the east coast fishery, including the fishery in Burin—St. George's.

I listened with great interest this morning to the Minister of Fisheries. One of the things he said about me during his debate was that I am exaggerating the problem that I am spreading fear among the fishermen. He thinks everybody out there is wrong except him.

Let us look again at the report prepared by the Government of Newfoundland after a lot of research, where the Government of Newfoundland tells us and I quote: "The potential direct employment losses anticipated in the fishery in Newfoundland in 1990 are as follows: Offshore sector, 1,400 jobs; inshore sector, 800". The Newfoundland government is projecting losses of 2,200 jobs next year alone in the Newfoundland fishery.

• (1520)

The minister says, "There is no crisis, nothing to get worried about". Again, of course, the Newfoundland government finding was quite different. It continues: "The Newfoundland fishing industry is facing a resource crisis which will displace thousands of workers and undermine the economic base of whole communities".

Now how graphic does this minister need it painted to him before he begins to understand?

He then makes this brave phrase: "No government has managed the fishery likes this one". He is right now. He is dead on now. No government ever managed the fishery like this one. Finally he is dead right. He is not out even a whit. He is dead right. Nobody, not even a drunken sailor, could manage the fishery the way this crowd has managed the fishery. Who, in their right minds, supposing to protect the interests of Atlantic Canadian fishermen and plant workers, would say to the European community, "You are only allowed to take 20,000 but even if you take 160,000 we do not mind. Rape our fishery, as long as you smile at our Prime Minister. As long as you like our Prime Minister, as long as you wine and dine him when he goes to the foreign summits, we do not really get too upset about how much fish you take".

Now the gentleman from St. John's West is traipsing up and down Europe. He is going to solve the problem.

An Hon. Member: At the taxpayers' expense.

Mr. Simmons: Oh, yes. He is there now. He is going to educate the European community. Well I say to him, welcome to the club, Johnny Boy. Where have you been for the last four years? Spain and Portugal, I tell you, have been overfishing for four years. Finally he has discovered overfishing. Johnny has discovered another excuse to take a trip. I wish him well because he is over there at the expense of the Canadian taxpayers, including the fishermen whose jobs are being lost thanks to his inaction during the last four years.

I would hope, if the Minister of Trade, the Member for St. John's West, ever figures out which end of the fish is the front end, I hope he does get the message through to the Europeans even though he is four years late starting to talk about it. He has never been known in Newfoundland as one who is very shy to talk. So one wonders why he has not been talking before. Of course, the answer is simple. It was not part of the agenda of the Prime Minister to talk about overfishing until now, 1989. They discovered the problem four years late.

I heard the Minister this morning talking about unprocessed fish being taken into the American market and what a lament that is and how terrible that is. He is right, of course. But I want to know who told him? How did he find this out all of a sudden? Mr. Minister, where have you been? This is a problem we have had for some time in Atlantic Canada, particularly in Nova Scotia.

Of course, in what must be the juiciest bit of his speech altogether, he tells us that foreign overfishing is a priority of this government. Well, you would never know it when you look at the way that the Europeans and the French, in particular, in 3PS have been walking all over us, taking four times the quota for 3PS in 1985, 1986, 1987 and 1988.

I could talk for a long while about this, but I realize that my time is up. We have agreed to limit ourselves to 10 minutes so that all members can participate in this debate. There is a need for a remedy for those people who are hurting out there and there are many thousands. I say to the minister and to the Minister of Employment, who will speak later in the debate, that the established programs are not the answer here. The UI is not the answer. Welfare is not the answer, although that is what is happening to some people right now, thanks to this government.

The special response program, at least the one they put in Rose Blanche—Port-aux-Basque is not the answer. They have got to do better than that. If I had time I would elaborate, but perhaps on another occasion.

Mr. Reid: Madam Speaker, I really do not know where to start. I will have the opportunity later today to respond in more detail. I think, though, I cannot let pass the comments that the hon. member across the way made concerning overfishing, and 3PS I hope I do not have to remind him who signed the agreement in 1972. I hope I do not have to remind him that to try to resolve what emerged from 1972 this government went through a lot. I would use words that would probably have him on his feet to have me condemned for being out of order. This government managed to get the Government of France to a table, to arbitrate an agreement, to resolve the very difficult problem of management and deal with an arbitration in terms of the disputed boundary. This government managed to do that and was able to ensure that the fleet out of France took 10,000 tonnes less in 3PS on a declining scale. I know the Minister is going to pop up and say, yes, we gave them northern cod to do it. Yes we did, less than 1 per cent of what is there. The government said they could have that. But what it does not give our fishermen, what we in this country take less of, they will take less of, too.

As well, we have an arrangement that if they fish outside inappropriately, they do not get what is inside. What we have given them inside is gone. But we continue down the road to working out an agreement. I just wanted to remind my hon. friend across the way of that.

Mr. Simmons: I say to the member for St. John's East that the government did not bring the French to the table. They got this government on the mat. In 1985, 1986 and 1987, the quota, as the member will know, was of the order of 6,500 metric tonnes. They stole 26,000 metric tonnes. Then our brain from St. John's West goes over there, aided and abetted by the gentleman from St. John's East—and I do not know why he is involved in this, he is such a decent chap—they go over and get the French to agree not to take 26,000 tonnes. They were only supposed to take 6,400 tonnes. So they talk the French down and they agree not to steal 26,000 tonnes, but to steal only 17,000 tonnes. The Minister comes back and says, "What a victory. We actually convinced them that instead of taking 6,400 tonnes, they would take only 17,000 tonnes."

The member asked who signed the 1972 agreement. The Government of Canada under a Liberal regime signed the 1972 agreement and the was successful in administering it as follows. between 1972 and 1984 did the French overfish in 3PS. Not once. I challenge the member to contradict me.

Starting in 1985, after the change of government to the gentleman from Baie-Comeau, they overfished four to one; they overfished in 1986; the French overfished in 1987; they overfished in 1988; and now, in 1989, they are overfishing to the tune of three to one, 17,000 tonnes instead of 6,000 tonnes, aided and abetted by these members from St. John's East and St. John's West, who now want to take credit for allowing the French to steal three times as many fish as they were allowed to steal in the first place under the 1972 agreement.

The member states, yes, we signed that agreement and we are proud of it. The difference between the Liberals and that crowd is that we kept the French from overfishing and they cannot do it or will not do it.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I realize that there are so many in the Liberal party who want to speak on this and our time is very short.

• (1530)

This problem is not just one of today; it comes back to the fact that the Department of Fisheries has not had the foresight under this minister to have optimism in the east coast fishery. It does not have optimism on the west coast fishery. The minister can stand up in the House and say that we have sovereign rights over our natural resource of fish, and yet he will continually say he will do nothing to protect us or help us establish the presence that we need in the market-place.

We have a natural resource. We have the capacity inshore and offshore on the east coast to catch everything that is within our 200-mile limit. Yet this minister says we do not have a right to it. Our fishermen have not fished for two seasons in a row because he has allowed foreign overfishing.

Who supports me on the foreign overfishing issue? The premier of our province says that this minister should stop listening to his armchair fishermen here in Ottawa and his scientists and managers. I do not know why they are managing, there has been no fishery to manage for the most part for the last six months. They are paying people to do nothing, certainly not to have new ideas. But this minister is even against Premier John

Buchanan who says the minister has no credibility because he will not look at the problem of foreign overfishing.

A few weeks ago in this House, the minister said there is no hardship, and in the summer he met with the minister for ACOA from Pictou. He was one of the ministers who brought a group of people from Nova Scotia to meet with the minister in July. They had a marathon session one evening and the minister, according to the paper, asked dragger officials to give him some qualifications of the economic impact.

One fishermen whom I met received an answer last week to a letter he wrote. He had his books looked at for two years in a row, and he got a letter back saying, "The federal government does not have a special program set aside for this purpose, to help the east coast fishermen."

In fact, on July 26 the minister said, "Give me the evidence that people are hurting." This fisherman has fished for 30 years. He has never experienced the conditions that we have seen on the east coast in the last two years. It is so bad. The credibility of this minister is so bad and so damaging to our sovereign right over fish that he is helping the foreigners continue the bad practices they have established.

This minister has not managed the fishery. We are in the same place we were 10 years ago. The foreigners are still fishing. We have the capacity to take everything they are taking. We have the capacity to have established markets. We have not done anything. He has sat there and pompously told the people of Canada that he knows what fishing is about. He has not moved out of his comfortable armchair, with his people telling him what they should do. He does not talk to the people who are concerned. He does not come down to talk to the fishermen. He has not even come down to tell them anything except that the problem is over-capacity.

The fishermen will tell you the problem is not over-capacity. It is lack of quotas. They will tell you there has not been haddock and they will accept that, but they will not accept that there is not fish there that they could have been able to fish this fall.

Management has been management by quotas. Quotas require enforcement and supervision, something this Department of Fisheries is not able to do. Fisheries management has not worked in any of the sectors. The livelihood of people who have existed by fishing for years is slowly dwindling. This minister does not care.

An example of his improper management is that fish is being dumped by the inshore, the offshore, and the foreigners. Management has even allowed unused quotas. The other day in the House, I said that the sectors of the inshore fishermen had looked at what was left between here and the end of the year for quotas. Sure enough, there was 43,000 metric tons and another 20,000 metric tons in 4BWX and 5 in particular, some of which are not going to be caught by the offshore fishermen. Yet this minister will not allow the transfer committee to transfer the quota. He will allow it to stay there and not be caught, even though his management plan shows it is allowed to be taken. Because the offshore cannot take it or the Cape North cannot take it, he will not allow the inshore communities who are so dependent on the fishery to take it.

Time does not allow me to talk about everything I want to talk about, but this week in one of the local papers, the Digby Courier, there was a letter written by a fisherman who fishes there. I would like to put it on the record because I think it is an excellent letter. I would like to know what the minister is going to say to this letter which reads:

> Dear Editor; the following is a letter I have written to Fisheries Minister, Tom Siddon.

The headline is "Captain Hears Wolves at Wheelhouse Door". It reads:

> Dear Tom Siddon;
> I hope you will take time from your hectic schedule to read this letter from a humble peasant fisherman down in Digby, South West Nova Scotia.
> I want to make it clear from the start that we fishermen down here in good ole' Sou'West Nova have clearly decided that you have won, you are the master and we are your peasant fishermen, the fight is gone out of us and we will rebel no longer. We are prepared to give you all our support.
> From articles we have read, we realize that you are upset that some of our incomes could possibly match your own six digit income, and this of course is wrong. We assure you that due to some of your latest actions this will never happen again. Shutting down the ground fishery for the past three months has been a great step in this direction and your latest plan of taking fishermen's licences will certainly ruin a lot of good men's lives and with any luck our incomes will soon be as insignificant to you as we are.

As fishdraggermen, we realize that it is the honourable thing for us to step down. We have repeatedly proven that we are much more efficient and productive than your friends at Nat Sea. But we realize that friends are very important in life and by continuing to give them the bulk of the quotas and letting them fish while we are shut down, they may even become self-supporting someday, and make you proud. Doing our part to achieve this is certainly making us proud.

I am a fortunate peasant because by your good graces I am allowed to fish for scallops as well as groundfish. Recently our awaited fall inshore scallop fishery opened and as you've heard, all the scallops have died. I read your press release that we exaggerated the extent of this disaster but I have good news for you, we did not exaggerate one bit. Millions of pounds of previously healthy mature scallops have died and the repercussions on the thousands of people involved in this industry will be devastating. The mortality rate of the scallops is 80-100 per cent in the productive zones and the dying process is still continuing.

In the non-productive zones damage is less but don't worry, these areas will only support the fleet for a few weeks. The loss is easily in the tens of millions of dollars directly to the industry and untold amounts in spin-offs. I feel as a faithful servant it is my duty to give you and your biologists these figures because I'm sure you all have much more pertinent matters to attend.

You have said upon several occasions that your primary concern is to maintain and preserve the stocks. Well everyone makes mistakes and although you allowed the largest scallop beds and the biggest economical boost this area has ever seen to go to ruin, you are still in our good graces. We figure that with the help of you and the Dept. of Fisheries, our inshore zone should recover easily within 10 years.

There are a few of your chosen people I'd like to give a few deserved words of praise.

First and foremost your fisheries officers. These gallant men kept us out of the inshore zone all summer and allowed the poor scallops to die in peace. Even to the last minute before the opening they were on hand to ensure as many scallops as possible could die before we started fishing.

These men are the guards of your marine kingdom and since they now have salaries which double most fishermen they are working even harder to make you proud. Hats off to the gallant men and women in green.

I realize my time is up and I know I will not get agreement from the other side to extend my time to finish the letter. I can only say that it was a good letter and I am sure the minister will be answering it.

Mr. MacLellan: Madam Speaker, the concerns raised by my hon. friend are really of tremendous importance to all of us in Atlantic Canada because the fishery is not only an industry that applies in her constituency but touches on all 32 constituencies in Atlantic Canada. The prospects are bleak. It is something the people of Atlantic Canada are not looking forward to. They know bad news now. They are largely waiting for another shoe to drop. It is not a pleasant experience.

In addition to the other problems we have in Atlantic Canada, we feel let down. We feel betrayed by this government first and foremost because it refuses to admit there is a problem. The government continues to say that the fishery is in a good state of health, that there is no problem with the Atlantic Canadian fishery.

I would just like to ask my hon. friend, the member of Parliament from South West Nova, exactly what she has been able to hear and experience in her riding about the state of the health of the fishery.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for asking me about what I have been able to hear. I certainly have tried to tell this minister and the people down there have tried to tell him as well as the premier that this minister is on a collision course with the fishery. I thought that the letter that I was reading showed exactly what was in the minds of everybody.

The fisherman went on to say that:

Likewise to your biologist we bear no malice. We realize that the research needed to warn of this impending disaster could never be justified in face of the huge enforcement costs to protect the dying scallops. As far as groundfish goes, proper assessments of stocks could only be made by true fishermen and this is never done—who needs accurate assessments on which to base quota anyway? Not us, we're always tied up.

Also your media men deserve praise. The way they faithfully print distorted truths about the Fisheries and live with themselves after must take amazing strength and courage. We all realize the public must be deceived on matters of the fishery. It is the only way things will run smooth in your government.

Praise last but not least should ought to go to the justice system—

I will not go through that. He goes on:

> If I left anyone out who is helping to further your cause I apologize, but the good news is, to anyone out there who wishes to see hard times and poverty for the fishermen and people of Sou'West Nova, rejoice, it's well on its way.
> Well I'd better go. I think I hear the wolves at the door. I'll keep you up to date on any new disasters or bankruptcies in the fishery and you keep up the good work on your end. You know I did hear the wolves at the door, my wheelhouse door, and they're wearing green suits.

That explains exactly what is happening to the many thousands of people in communities throughout Scotia–Fundy, whether it is Lockeport or whether it is in Digby Neck or anywhere. This Minister of Fisheries will virtually erase the whole inshore fishery. The best will be gone unless he decides to start listening first to the fishermen, to the people who represent the fishermen and the fish plant workers, to the companies, to the premier and perhaps even to the minister from the province of Nova Scotia who must have some concerns at least about the lobster size that this government is going to allow without anything but political, diplomatic talk.

I can only say that this minister has done a great disservice to a natural resource that we have been given for the use of all people.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, it is always a pleasure to participate in a debate with my friends from Nova Scotia. The member for South West Nova looks charming today in black. It is appropriate that she is wearing it, because she has given us nothing but a litany of gloom and doom.

My colleague from Beaséjour has a very constructive resolution, in part.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): What's he wearing?

Mr. MacKay: Where is he? Oh, there he is.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Talk about inanities and not the fish. Talk about the colour of my dress.

Mr. MacKay: I was hoping we would have some kind of constructive solution.

The member for South West Nova and my good friend from Cape Breton—The Sydneys have indicated that this government does not recognize there is a problem. That is not true. There have been problems in the Atlantic fishery for 100 years, and there have been 100 studies in the last century. This is not an isolated phenomenon. The fishery, as the hon. member knows, being a knowledgeable person, tends to be cyclical in nature. The fish are not here. The fish are not in the waters where they used to be.

Those of us who remember back when a former government commissioned Senator Kirby to study the east coast fishery will remember that Senator Kirby made some recommendations. I will read for the edification of the House one of Senator Kirby's recommendations. This is Liberal policy, and there is nothing wrong with it. This is what he suggested at the time:

> The Atlantic fishery should be economically viable on an ongoing basis, where to be viable implies an ability to survive downturns with only a normal business failure rate and without government assistance.

I say to my friends opposite, was that Liberal policy that this fishery should survive normal business downturns without government assistance? It is not our policy. We try, whenever possible, to assist this sector. I would like to put on the record in a few moments some of the things that ACOA is doing to try to alleviate what is admittedly a situation that needs help.

Instead of getting some kind of assistance from the members opposite who are knowledgeable and concerned we get nothing but rhetoric. They cling to these rhetorical arguments like a drunk clings to a lamp post, more for support than for illumination. They do not put anything forward that seems to help the situation. We got nothing but a blanket condemnation of the minister of fisheries, who I think most members would be fair enough to realize is coping with a difficult situation in a conscientious way. He has a tough job.

I made a few notes about the statistics and I believe they are correct. I will refer to my friend opposite's constituency in South West Nova. In the Scotia—Fundy region, lobster landings have more than tripled and the landed value of lobster increased more than five times, from $28 million to $143 million. In the scallop industry, this year's catch looks like it will exceed last year's record levels and there are still three more months of fishing left.

This industry is not a simple one. The late Don Jamieson, if he were here today, would probably describe it as a multi-faceted, multi-dimensional, multi-purpose industry, and he would be right. But the members opposite do not seem to take into account the vagaries of nature. They think that just because fish swim around in schools, they can be educated to come whenever they are required. That is not so.

Back in those years Senator Kirby and the DFO managers, some of whom are still available, were projecting what they thought would happen around 1990. My colleague for Cape Breton—The Sydneys will remember that they were saying that in 2J3KL, which is the heart and soul of northern cod off Newfoundland, it was quite possible that by the early 1990s you could get 400,000 TAC without any problem. Well, that is not the case.

The marine biologists and oceanographers are the first to concede that the vast oceans around this continent are hiding a lot of data that they do not have. Nobody can foresee with certainty what mother nature will do from one year to the next.

I want to take a bit of time and simply put on the record some of the things that my ministry is attempting to do through the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency to alleviate this difficult situation. I would like to put this on the record. My colleague from South West Nova read a very interesting letter into the record. I think this would be at least as informative as the letter that she read, although I have a great deal of sympathy with what her constituent said.

We have, through ACOA, contributed in excess of $50 million to alleviate some of the problems inherent in the fisheries in Atlantic Canada. We have done so in different ways. We have contributed to a national centre for fisheries innovation which is a joint venture in Newfoundland between Memorial University and the Newfoundland and Labrador Institute of Fisheries and Marine Technology. This is something that is very useful for the future of the fishery. This centre's mandate is to focus intellectual and technological resources from the university, the institute and the private sector on the particular problems of the Atlantic fishery so we will understand more of the root causes that make this such an important industry to control, to the extent that this is possible. This is with the goal of making the industry more productive and profitable. Also, the centre will assist in creating markets for traditional under-utilized species by emphasizing quality control, packaging and productivity, something that will allow us to get value-added and other attributes that are necessary to keep this industry productive and to enlarge it.

ACOA's action program also provides operating funding to the Canadian Centre for International Fisheries Training and Development which was established in 1986 to market Canadian fisheries expertise world-wide. ACOA has contributed $7.5 million of its action program funds to the creation of the Canadian Centre for Marine Communications which will provide the first applied research and development facility mandated to help marine communications industries in Canada. This centre is committed to market-driven research and development work. It will benefit the small and medium-sized high technology firms in Atlantic Canada which are already seizing opportunities to develop marine communications products that can be manufactured in the Atlantic region for sale to world markets.

As these three centres gain impetus, they will focus the attention of international markets more and more upon Atlantic Canada as a region to be reckoned with. The gain of small fishermen is multiple. They will receive access to first-rate technology equipment and training, exposure to sophisticated marketing techniques and participation in a dynamic, multi-faceted industry.

I think again it is only fair to point out that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister for International Trade are together taking every step that is possible in a reasonable way to find ways to enhance, improve and foster the prosperity of the fisheries on both coasts of this country. For my hon. friends to say that the minister of fisheries does not care or that he is not faithful in his duties or that he does not visit the regions is patently false. She knows that. I know that when you are getting into partisan debate on something as important to Atlantic Canada as fisheries, there is always the temptation to get into these similes and metaphors.

Perhaps, to paraphrase the late Ogden Nash, one thing that Canadian politics would be very much the better for would be a more restrictive use of simile and metaphor, particularly when it comes to dealing with something that is as important as fisheries is to Atlantic Canada.

As my colleague from Burgeo pointed out, there are literally hundreds—I believe 1,300—communities in Atlantic Canada which are essentially dependent on fisheries. They are, in effect, a special kind of one-industry towns. It is more to these people than just an industry in the classic sense, it is a way of life. They have seen these cycles happen before. Many of them are frustrated. Many of them think that their government does not care. This is not true.

This government does care. The minister of fisheries cares. We are doing everything we can to cope with a very difficult situation. As more support is required, this government will come forward and provide that support as we have in the past to other sectors in Canada which were falling on difficult times.

Mr. MacLellan: Madam Speaker, as the hon. minister knows, being the minister responsible for ACOA, other than the funds that he has, there are a great many other things that need to be done and can be done in Atlantic Canada. One of those things is funding for small craft harbours.

The lack of fish is one very serious problem, but it is not going to be a problem for the fishermen in northern Cape Breton and Dingwall, Pleasant Bay and Bay St. Lawrence if some dredging is not done because they are not going to be able to get their boats in and out of the harbours. It is really becoming critical. Unless these fishermen can fish with catamarans, in another year or two they are going to be completely out of luck.

I would ask for the minister's comments on what I think is a very important concern about a service that must be provided.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, I agree with my colleague that it is imperative that the proper infrastructure and assistance be given to fishermen so they can bring their catch ashore and have a safe place to anchor their vessels. He knows there is never enough money for this sort of thing, but I remind him that in the not too distant past, this minister of fisheries spearheaded an attempt to raise an extraordinary amount of money, I think close to $100 million at the time, to do a lot of this kind of dredging infrastructure that was required.

I understand what he is saying and I undertake to him that I will see what can be done to work to allocate more funds. This is something that is very worth while, and to the extent that our resources will permit it, I will make an extra effort to see if we cannot be of further assistance.

Mr. Reid: Madam Speaker, the minister has talked about the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and the number of tremendous things that have been done in support of the development of the fishery.

One of the things that I frankly had some difficulty with in dealing with ACOA on, and one of the very few, I must admit, has been my attempt repeatedly to find support for resources to develop fish plants. Quite a number of times, I get asked for my support and obviously I give it, but there have been a number of occasions and I think of one in particular in the community of Marysvale where a young couple had put together a proposal and were prepared to do a tremendous amount of work in developing this fish plant.

I wonder if the minister could comment a little bit about ACOA's role in the development of fish plants and some of the things that they have had to contend with in this area.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, it is difficult to decide sometimes whether it is feasible to support further capacity in an industry where there seems to be a shortage of supply, but we like to look at these things in our ministry on a case-by-case basis. I understand the frustrations of my colleague and other members who would like to see more ACOA assistance and the mandate of ACOA widened and extended. I will take that as a representation and see what can be done.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I hope the minister pays that much attention to everybody's clothes. I am sure that was not the most important thing that I said here today, the statement made by my clothes. I think that it was so inappropriate. I say there are people hurting, never mind what people are wearing.

I would like to ask the minister how he relates to Premier John Buchanan's statement on Friday last that this minister is focusing on the wrong thing, he should be focusing on the foreign overfishing as well as listening to fishermen rather than to his scientists.

Mr. MacKay: Madam Speaker, Premier Buchanan, naturally is concerned, as my colleague is, about the fishery in Nova Scotia. He too is reacting to some extent out of frustration, I believe. No one cares more about the fishing industry or the people of Nova Scotia than John Buchanan, but at the same time, the provinces as my colleague knows, control the issuing of licences. I think it is fair to say that the province of Nova Scotia perhaps was a little too generous and may itself have contributed to this problem by issuing licences without sufficient study as to whether the capacity to sustain those licences was there.

I think it is true that many of us, including myself and herself and the minister, at times are not perceived to listen closely enough to the fishermen. I have great respect for them. I can relate to Premier Buchanan's comments in that regard.

I think the fishermen have a better track record by far in producing logical data and observations than some of our highly paid and esoteric marine biologists and oceanographers who are so technically oriented that they sometimes lose track of some of the practical and empirical observations that people in the industry make every day.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate with the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, the debate that we are participating in today should be one of the most important debates that I hope this chamber deals with in the next period of time. Today, I was supposed to speak to a large number of people in St. John's on exactly this topic. As has been obviously the case with members on all sides of the House, this is the place where I have to be to discuss what is clearly one of the most important issues that faces all Canadians, not just Newfoundlanders and Labradorians, not just Nova Scotians, not just Atlantic Canadians, but all Canadians. That is the challenge that we face in our fishery.

A number have said over a period of time, and this motion infers it as well, that this government does not care about the Atlantic fishery. More to the point, it has been said by my friends opposite that the government does not acknowledge that there is a problem in the fishery. The first thing that my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, said this morning was exactly that we face a serious challenge in dealing with the potential problems that our fishery and all of those who participate in it and depend on it face.

It is not just a challenge of fish. It is not just a challenge of the number of plants, the number of jobs, and the number of trawlers. More than anything, it is a challenge that deals with people. It is a challenge of communities, of families. It is a challenge that is about the very essence, particularly of Newfoundland and Labrador. It is about our culture, our history, and our lifeblood. Perhaps more than anything, it is about our future. It is the concern for that future that has motivated this government.

First, we recognize that the challenge we face in the fishery is not just a fish problem in Atlantic Canada, but a national problem of economics and a national problem to deal with Canadian people. It is that motivation that has made this government move ahead on a number of fronts to address the problem in a realistic and serious manner, not just to woe the situation or to bleat about what is wrong, but to try and come to terms with what we face as we deal with the quota question, for instance.

What is going to be the impact in the fishery if we have to reduce the quota from where it was in 1977 on, or from what we hoped and thought it should be? Quite clearly, we are going to have to reduce that quota. But the government must say to itself, and we all must say to ourselves, what does that mean for the fishery? First, what are the impacts on the fishery? Once we know what it means within the fishery, what is it going to mean to the economy around and depending upon the fishery? Again, and perhaps most important, what, therefore, does that matter to the people? What does it matter to the families in the communities that depend on that fishery and that economy?

There is a growing recognition that these things come together, that they are interlinked, that they are involved, that one depends on the other, that one flows from the other. Therefore, there must be a comprehensive approach to the problem. There must be a comprehensive approach to knowing what may happen, what could happen, and then knowing what we can do, not just the Government of Canada, or just the Department of Fisheries, or just the government in Newfoundland and Labrador, or the government in Nova Scotia, or one company, one union, or one community, but what all of us together must come together to do, what all of us together must realize has to be done. How do we deal with that?

In recognition that this is a national issue, the Prime Minister appointed a cabinet committee of senior cabinet ministers from right across the country, including my colleague who spoke just before, including the ministers who are particularly pertinent to the issue, but chaired by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the former Prime Minister of Canada, to focus the government in dealing with the problem not, as I say, just in terms of fisheries but to bring together all the resources of government. Bring them together and ask, "What have we got to deal with? What are the resources we have in hand to deal with the problem? What resources do we need that may not be there?" On top of that, we should ask, "What are our options? What other things can we do?"

In support of that committee there was a group of very senior public servants appointed from a variety of departments, employment and immigration, fisheries and oceans, a little help from external affairs, a little help from ACOA, and employment and immigration in Newfoundland as well as in Ottawa, to try to deal with the problem and to give ministers advice.

So what did they do? They consulted. They talked to communities, to provincial governments, to unions and to companies. They have had reports and papers and pieces of information from all over. They have gathered their own information which will form the body of knowledge, and the body of advice to which the government will respond in an organized, realistic fashion, in a way that we will know what the problems are, what the approaches must be. It must not be an attitude of just sit by or act all of a sudden out of the blue.

The government has also taken a series of approaches to deal with the serious problem of overfishing, of people from foreign countries taking fish outside the 200-mile limit. This did not start last night. This did not start last month. It has been going on for a period of time.

In 1986 this government undertook some new scientific studies, Not only did we do that, but we substantially increased the penalties for foreign overfishing. We increased the surveillance. We closed our ports to countries that were not prepared to co-operate and comply.

In international bodies like NAFO we have been trying to make these countries recognize a fundamental point that what we are dealing with here is an ecological problem, that if we all talk about sustainable development around the world, we should look in our own back yard. If we cannot sustain the fish stocks in the north Atlantic that we have all historically depended upon, if we are going to rape and pillage, it is not going to serve our interests and it is not going to do anybody any good.

So we have moved on that. The Prime Minister has spoken not only to individual heads of state and government leaders in Europe, but also to the European community collectively, as has the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Fisheries, and the Minister for International Trade. fishing", but "Look, you are threatening us, you are threatening yourselves. We like to think we are both fairly substantial players in this world. You are threatening a very important relationship, and that relationship has been affected by your actions."

We have also gone to the Europeans, and my friend the Minister for International Trade is just returning from Europe. He said to the European public: "Look at what you are doing. Look at what your governments are doing. Look at what effect it is having not only on your friends across the ocean but on the environment that you are so proud of and that you talk so much about."

It is no good to stand up in this House or otherwise and say: "All this is wrong. It is your fault. Look at what you have done." We must be able to stand up and say, as this government has said, that there are problems, and we will together solve them.

In conclusion, I would like to quote from a press conference of the Premier of Newfoundland and Labrador on October 5, 1989, in which he states:

"I am pleased to note that the federal government is also seized with the seriousness of this problem." When dealing with overfishing in a radio broadcast on VOCM with Mr. Bill Rowe the Premier said: "The European overfishing is still a major problem, but again it would take a whole program to get into it. The government is dealing with it and I must give credit to the federal government and to Mr. Crosbie for the effort they are making."

• (1610)

On the question of science, the federal government is taking the matter seriously now. The premier said: "I don't blame the federal government, in the blameworthy sense. Frankly, if Newfoundland and Labrador had had the jurisdiction we would be relying on the same scientists".

The level of co-operation between the two levels of government is exactly the sort of approach that collectively we must all take if we are going to deal with this problem, if we are going to have a viable, professional, long-term fishery for our future. If not, we may never get there.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member for St. John's East mentions the co-operation he is getting, or seems to feel the federal government is getting, from the newly elected Liberal premier, Premier Wells. I cannot see that this is happening in Nova Scotia with Premier Buchanan and Mr. Siddon.

We have seen the Haché task force, we have seen Stein task force, we have seen the Harris task force and in all of those we have had hundreds of hours of work put in by people within the community: fishermen, fish plant owners, community leaders and others, who spoke about the problems.

What was wrong with the Haché task force was the fact that the minister thought it should concentrate only on the inshore and only on over capacity. I cannot say that I heard anybody talk only on over capacity. Certainly those from the province of Nova Scotia talked about the management of this minister and his ability to manage the fish.

Premier Buchanan came out last week and spoke about his inability to understand this minister not listening to the fishermen or to the people who work in the industry. I am glad that in Newfoundland you have such a good arrangement between a Liberal government provincially and a federal government. I am glad for the hon. member that he does not have our type of problem and that his fishery seems rosy.

But, I will say this and I will ask the member again, does he feel that the inshore fishing community in Newfoundland, in the Gulf, in Quebec, and in Nova Scotia, Scotia-Fundy—and I say Scotia-Fundy contrary to the impression that the minister for ACOA left that it was only in the southern end, Scotia-Fundy covers most of Nova Scotia except his own area, and it goes into New Brunswick for those figures—has capacity enough to catch and process all the traditional stocks, including some of the northern cod in his area?

Does he feel that the inshore fishery can catch all the traditional stocks, and that a good role for the offshore vessels would be to replace the foreigners who are fishing? If we had any activity out there, we probably would not see the foreigners coming into the waters because it would not pay them to come.

Does the member have it in his mind, because he is parliamentary secretary and maybe he could influence the department, that the inshore communities that are so dependent and the offshore plants in those communities could process all of the traditional stocks, and that the offshore should probably be directed to go and take over where the foreigners are fishing within the 200-mile limit, and therefore, eliminate the problem that is there presently

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Before giving the floor back to the hon. member for St. John's East to answer, I would like to explain to people who are watching us what is happening this afternoon, because it has not been put on the record officially. Some members have decided to share the normal 20-minute period so we have divided the normal 10-minute period of questions and comments into two five-minute periods. understand what is happening.

There is but one minute left for the hon. member for St. John's East to answer his colleague who has taken four of the five minutes.

Mr. Reid: Madam Speaker, one minute is obviously not enough. Frankly, it is going to take that long to be sure of the question I was asked.

First, the provincial minister of fisheries in Nova Scotia, the member representing Pictou County in Nova Scotia, has been very co-operative and very helpful, as have been provincial colleagues. I cannot answer the question in one minute—

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): You were misquoting the Minister of Fisheries for the province who said Ottawa should force quotas against the foreigners.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for St. John's East has the floor.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, Madam Speaker. One of the problems that we face and it was brought to my attention quite graphically in Bonavista when I participated with fishermen this weekend in dealing with the question is that more and more of what we have called inshore fishermen in Newfoundland have been forced to move farther and farther out in bigger boats with bigger equipment. The question then becomes, are they taking fish that would normally be counted in the offshore quota within Canada? We have seen less and smaller fish on the traditional inshore. That question and that answer have many implications in a number of areas.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Of course.

Mr. Reid: Quite clearly it is a problem that we have been forced to confront in Nova Scotia.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): And in Newfoundland.

Mr. Reid: As we deal with what we have to deal with in the next little while in Newfoundland we will have to deal with it as well. But to suggest that those boats, the trawlers and others can immediately go over the line, or I think you are saying, catch the fish that is being made available to foreigners inside the zone, considering the process that we go through in terms of offering that fish to Canadian companies, we must ask whether they can take it, whether can they process it and whether they can they market it?

Silver hake is one example. The whitefish from other places have taken silver hake out. There are all sorts of silver hake sitting in Hubbards. We cannot sell it. People cannot get it if they cannot produce it. I could go on—

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Help them sell it. That is your role as a government, to help them sell it.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate. My best wishes to the hon. member for Cardigan.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Thank you, Madam Speaker. I appreciate this opportunity to speak on a motion that is before the House. As a member of Parliament for Cardigan, Prince Edward Island, the issue is especially important since the fishing industry is of vital importance to my constituents and my fellow islanders. Never before has the fishery been in such dire straits. The crisis the Atlantic fishery is currently facing has been brought on in large measure by the insensitivity of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to the industry's needs.

It might do the minister good to come to Cardigan or anywhere else in Atlantic Canada and see for himself the hardship this crisis is causing. Perhaps if he would look into the eyes of a lobster fisherman who has no market for his product or into the eyes of a child whose mother or father has just lost his or her job at the fish plant, maybe then he could do something for these Cardigan families.

I see these people all the time during my travel in the ridings. Fishermen are angry, angry at how they have been treated, angry at the lack of action from Ottawa. Fear and nervousness are running rampant among Island fishermen and fish plant workers. All about them they see declining stocks, loss of markets, fish plants closing, cuts to the UI program and increasing taxes. If we do not have enough problems with our own government's policies, now the giant to the south of us is rising to strike what might be the final blow to the industry.

The Americans are threatening us with legislation that could ban minimum sized Canadian lobsters from the U.S. market. The U.S. scored a huge victory this week in the first decision of the binational panel under the free trade agreement on Canadian fish landing rules.

Atlantic Canada has suffered greatly at the hands of this government. The fishing industry is the lifeline of our region. This industry is fundamental to the Prince Edward Island economy. It is the second largest industry in our province, second only to agriculture. It is also, a primary and seasonal resource industry which has taken more than its fair share of punishment from this government.

On P.E.I. there are 2,500 fishermen, 1,400 helpers and about 2,500 fish plant workers. These people account for about 10 per cent of the island workforce. The industry injects $200 million into the provincial economy. Fisheries exports make up about 30.7 per cent of the province's total export. This year we have had the most dismal fishery that our island has known for a long time.

It is hard to believe that a person at the helm of this sinking ship refuses to admit that the ship is going down. Everyone knows you cannot deal with a problem unless you admit that you have a problem. Yet, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans sees only blue skies and not a cloud anywhere.

Ignoring the problem seems to be a favourite trick of this minister. Last weekend I questioned him on his department's misleading the P.E.I. tuna fishermen. The government changed the rules of the game after it started. It removed the traditional right from the P.E.I. fishermen to fish in the Atlantic off Canso. The minister admitted his officials misled my constituents. In the next breath he was gloating about the prosperous season these tuna fishermen are having.

To add fat to the fire, the minister then claimed there were no rights written on commercial fishing licences. I have seen these rights on licences with my own two eyes. I have a copy of the licence right here, if anyone is interested. Fishermen in eastern P.E.I. are fed up with this minister. They are fed up with being deceived.

The lobster fishery in P.E.I. represents 70 per cent of the total value of island fishery. This season our lobster fishermen have been plagued by low prices due to a glut in the international market. The Canadian dollar is too strong. Our lobster is not competitive when the dollar is strong. The government could have helped prevent this glut. It could have lowered interest rates and brought down the dollar. Instead, this government has not seen fit to do that.

Lobster fishermen have long recognized the risk of limiting our market to the U.S. The government must assume leadership and develop other markets for this essential export.

Lobsters come second after our world famous potatoes in Prince Edward Island in exports. Now there is a storm brewing on the horizon that could indeed lead to the shutdown of my province's second largest industry.

Currently before the Senate and the House of Representatives in the U.S. Congress is a piece of legislation that has proposed to limit the import of Canadian minimum-sized lobsters into that country. This would surely be the straw that broke the camel's back.

Prince Edward Island exports 70 per cent of its canners to the U.S. Where will we send that 70 per cent of canners if this legislation is passed? What will happen to the fishermen, their helpers, and the plant fish workers? Why would the Americans attempt to do this in the first place if they did not see Canada as too weak to fight them on the issue?

Is it any wonder that the majority of Atlantic Canadians voted against this government and the free trade agreement in last year's election. The situation is bad enough right now without predicting what is in store for us. Until last week, there were 11 fish plants in my riding. Now there are 10.

The community of Marry Harbour is still reeling from the closure of the fish plant last week. The plant processed lobsters, groundfish, herring, herring roe and other species. It provided jobs for up to 200 seasonal workers. Now who do the fishermen sell their fish to, and where do the 200 seasonal workers go?

It is unbelievable in the light of such a crisis that the government is proposing to change the UI program, to remove the safety net. People in P.E.I. are not being fooled by the government's fancy reallocation of funds. The truth is that in P.E.I. 1,700 fewer people will be eligible to claim UI and the benefit period for 7,000 people will be cut shorter because of the proposed changes to the program.

Is that any way to treat people who are in a crisis, kick them when they are down? Does the government want to train these people to work in some other industry in central Canada?

The fishery is an integral part of Canadian history and heritage. People in Cardigan are proud to live there. They want to continue to live there and work in the fishery. It is time this government woke up and realized that the people who collect the harvest from the ocean at each end of this country deserve better. They deserve to enjoy the same income security and standard of living as those people in central Canada.

Mr. Proud: Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate my hon. colleague from Cardigan for his excellent speech.

I would like to make a few comments. The fishing industry of Prince Edward Island is responsible for 30.7 per cent of the province's exports. Together with tourism and agriculture, it is one of the big three economic staples of our province.

The economic contribution that the fishing industry makes to Canada, particularly on the west coast and in Atlantic Canada, is significant. The fishing industry's contribution to my province's gross provincial product is approximately 13 per cent. In Nova Scotia it is 11 per cent, while in Newfoundland it is the highest in Canada, at about 15 per cent.

In Atlantic Canada, there are over 100,000 fishermen and fish processors. They all depend on a stable Atlantic fisheries industry for employment. Now with lower quotas being imposed by the federal government, these Canadians are looking square into the eye of the storm,"hurricane unemployment". Federal scientists are now recommending even further cuts to an already beleaguered Atlantic fishing industry. They are recommending cuts to fish quotas for next year, while at the same time our federal ministers of international trade and fisheries are having no success in convincing the European community to halt its over-fishing. Once again the EEC is refusing to adhere to quotas set by the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization.

It will not adhere to the conservation measures established by NAFO last month. We have the minister giving assurances that Atlantic Canadians have a right to expect that the European community will reduce its self-appointed quotas.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I thought he was rising on a question or comment on the hon. member from Cardigan's intervention. Is he? The hon. member may continue. The hon. member from Cardigan has a response? No further questions or comments. Resuming debate.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Madam Speaker, members on this side of the House have been and will continue to draw the true picture of the present crisis in the east coast fishery and the pending disaster in the west coast fishery which will result from the recent bilateral panel ruling.

My colleagues from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Newfoundland, have adequately addressed many of the problems of the off-shore and other particular fisheries. For my part, I will address my remarks to the Atlantic and the Prince Edward Island lobster fishery and the present and future of that fishery.

The many-headed hydra of free trade which has just struck down the west coast fishermen is preparing to strike the east coast lobster fishermen. Yes, the free trade agreement which was supposed to give us assured entry to the great American market is actually going to limit entry to that market-place for the Atlantic lobster fishermen.

This is what is happening. Over the years, Canada has managed its fishery. Anyone who knows anything about fisheries management realizes it is a most difficult task, but it has been one which Canada pioneered, because it realized a long time ago that the resource would disappear if good management practices were not implemented.

As a result of this realization, Canada instituted seasons, quotas, limited entry and minimum size in order to preserve stocks for future Canadians and to ensure the present generation of fishermen the opportunity to earn a good living for themselves and their families.

The Americans instituted no such policy. The American way was to fish a stock to its death and then move on to another stock. Take the Alaskan or king crab, for example. American fishermen fished that stock to near extinction and abandoned the fishery.

The American lobster fishermen who until now had implemented few lobster management practices in the past have had to increase the minimum lobster carapace for size in their fishery in order to conserve their stock.

The Americans now have a minimum carapace size of 3.25 inches. This will give their lobsters a chance to spawn a number of more times before they are fished. This should result in more lobster in the future for American fishermen.

The Canadian minimum carapace size is 2.5 inches which is three-quarters of an inch smaller than the minimum American size lobster.

Fishing the smaller sized or canner lobster does not appear to have affected our fishery. This is due to our history of lobster management practices, our seasons, our licence buy back program of some years ago, the limited entry policy of the fishery, and the superior environment which exists for lobster propagation when compared to the American waters. In fact, our lobster landings have increased steadily over the years.

As the American lobster industry declined our exports into the American market increased to the point where more than 50 per cent of lobster consumed in the United States is imported from Canada. Of course, the Americans do not like this situation. They realize that if they can limit the amount of lobster imported from Canada they will get a much higher price for their own lobster.

During the free trade negotiations Senator George Mitchell of Maine, who is now the U.S. majority leader in the Senate, tried to get import limitations included in the free trade agreement in regard to potatoes and lobsters. President Reagan agreed to the limitation on potato imports under certain conditions but dropped restrictions on lobster imports. The American fishermen and Senator Mitchell were undeterred by that failure or failure to get federal GATT ruling on lobster imports from Canada.

The American Senate and House of Representatives have now introduced coincidental legislation to make it illegal to import lobster below their own minimum size of 3.25 inch carapace size. In the Senate, Senator Mitchell and others have proposed an amendment to the Magnuson Fishing Conservation and Management Act which states:

> —To ship or transport, or cause to be transported, or to sell in interstate commerce or foreign commerce any whole lobster or part thereof, of the species Horarus Americanus (whether fresh, chilled, frozen or otherwise preserved or prepared) that is smaller than the minimum possession size in effect at the time under the American Lobster Fishery Management Plan or any successor to that plan.

This means that Canada's export trade to the U.S. in lobster will be almost totally destroyed if this amendment is implemented.

All our canner size lobster, that is, those in the 2.5 inch to 3 and 3/16 inch carapace measurement could not be exported to the U.S. and a considerable portion of our market lobster, that is, those in 3 3/16 inch and over carapace measurement, are below the Canadian limit of 3 1/4 inches. This 3 1/4 inches will rise to 3 5/6 inches by 1992. That means that in 1988 more than 60 per cent of P.E.I's lobster exports were marketed in the United States. If this new American legislation becomes law, 75 per cent of that total would be affected.

Lobsters constitute two-thirds of the value of P.E.I.'s fishery and one-quarter of the total value of all our exports to the United States. In short, if P.E.I. is unable to export lobster to the U.S. as we do now under the present laws, our lobster fishery will be drastically reduced. An overabundance of supply would result in very low prices.

This American action is a thinly disguised barrier to trade. Conservation of lobsters is the excuse. How is limiting entry of Canadian lobster to American markets going to help conserve American lobster stocks? It will not.

It is a red herring. All that will result if American import controls are implemented is an increase in price to the American fishermen and the ruination of Canada lobster fishery. That is why P.E.I. lobster fishermen are so concerned about what is happening in the U.S. Congress. What is the Congress using to legitimize its actions? Nothing less than Article 12 of the free trade agreement, and I quote from American support documents:

> In 1988, the Senate Finance Committee recommended a provision for inclusion in the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement enabling legislation that would have directly prohibited imports of lobster which did not meet U.S. standards.
> The provision was introduced by Senators Mitchell, Cohen, Kerry, Kennedy, Fell and Chafee. The provision was dropped from the enabling legislation signed into law by President Reagan. Although the provision was not enacted, Article 20 of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) and chapter 12 of the U.S. free trade agreement still protect the right to enact such conservation measures.

This is the legal basis that the U.S. is now using to restrict imports of Canadian lobster.

In the synopsis of the free trade agreement published by this government, GATT Article 20 can justify import and export control measures if a country wants to preserve a commodity in short supply if they do not constitute an arbitrary, unjustified or disguised restriction to trade.

Eventually this action will go before the dispute settlement mechanism of the free trade agreement where, if the west coast fishing dispute results are any indication, Canada will have to look elsewhere for markets or be forced to increase carapace size to meet American requirements.

Not only are we being blackmailed into increasing the minimum size of landed lobster by the Americans. Are we to be subject to American fisheries inspectors in our canneries to inspect lobster meat going into cans destined for the American market? How else will the Americans know what size the lobsters are that go into cans?

There are serious implications for our sovereignty if the congressional amendment becomes law. We will have the U.S. dictating to us what our conservation policy will be after mismanaging theirs. We could have American inspectors in our plants telling us what we can or cannot process.

What is our government doing to head off this impending disaster? What assurances are they giving our lobster fishermen that their interests will be looked after? The indications are not good that the Canadian government can be trusted to support our fishermen.

Let us take, for example, the words of our Prime Minister when he visited President Bush at Kennebunkport in Maine in September past. Our Prime Minister was quoted as saying that Bush "advanced some persuasive arguments that I have instructed my office to begin examining. This matter which is very important to the United States will be resolved in much the same manner in which we seek to resolve others; in a friendly and constructive spirit." He continued to say: "The President was big on lobster today, I was big on pork."

The Prime Minister did not say: "This matter is very important to Canadian east coast fishermen who stand to lose $100 million." No, he said: "This matter is very important to the United States".

Not only are Canadian fishermen fed up with the minister of fisheries who refuses to deal with our crab fishermen, banned our tuna fishermen from traditional waters, seems incapable of policing foreign fishing quotas which are destroying our northern cod stocks, but sadly east coast fishermen cannot rely on the Prime Minister either to look after our interests.

Canadians, it has been said, are the last boy scouts in the international market-place. Canada cannot allow this U.S. move to curb our exports of lobster. GATT should be advised immediately. We won there before and we can win there again. Our Prime Minister and our Minister of Fisheries and our Minister of International Trade must take the initiative now to stand up and fight for our fishermen.

Mr. Reid: Madam Speaker, I thought perhaps it would be helpful or appropriate to in fact answer my hon. friend's question about this problem that we face in terms of carapace size and the action in the United States.

As I think the Prime Minister has quite clearly indicated in this House—I could stand corrected—on October 6, he made it very clear that he had given specific instructions that our ambassador make strong representation to the Government of the United States. Of course that has been done in a diplomatic note as of I think October 10 where we have made it clear that we do not support this action.

There is no justification on conservation grounds for prohibiting the import of lobsters legally caught in Canadian waters. These imports in no way jeopardize U.S. conservation regime for lobster stocks within their own waters. Therefore we feel strongly that we must protest and we have done so. I think we feel strongly that our case is right. I just want to reassure my friend that this government will continue to pursue this matter in the interests of Atlantic lobster fishermen.

Mr. McGuire: Madam Speaker, I am very happy to hear those remarks from the hon. member. The whole basis of the American action to use the excuse of conservation to limit our imports is totally irrelevant. I do not see how it can ever stand. I am very happy that the hon. member has assured us that the government is fighting this and will be protecting and standing up for our fishermen in Atlantic Canada.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member. When we deal with the lobster problem—maybe the hon. member can correct me—but I cannot recall that the size of lobsters have changed over the past 15 years as to what is being caught. Has the supply of lobster in your area decreased over the last 15 years?

I know that this year you had an oversupply of lobsters and a poor price. The actual supply of lobsters, because of the size caught by the lobster fishermen, has it gone down? We have been catching lobsters for a good long time. It has been a good marketable entity for Canadian fishermen into the U.S. and other markets. Has the volume of the lobster catch decreased?

Mr. McGuire: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. The volume of lobster in Prince Edward Island has been steadily increasing over this past 10 years, since 1978. Not only has the volume been increasing, but the price to the fishermen has been decreasing. In the fishery sector it is the bread and butter of our total fishery.

This year, because of the stagnant markets and the inventories that exist in Europe, and particularly in the United States, we have been unable to get rid of our present inventories, which has resulted in a depression of our prices. If we had to abide by this proposed American legislation on top of having an overabundance of lobster on our hands now, this would be a disastrous year. Instead of a poor year it would be a disastrous year.

Mr. MacAulay: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Egmont for his fine message. I am well aware that he was born and reared in a fishing area and is well aware of the role of small craft harbours and repair to harbours.

I was wondering if he is having any of the problems I am having in Grahams Pond and Savage Harbour and MacAuley's Wharf. Along with being a major problem for the fishermen, a place to put their traps and tie up their boats, it has also become an environmental problem. We also have a problem at Sturgeon Wharf. In Savage Harbour we are having major problems with the black wall. If these things are not repaired in my district, it is going to create a major problem. Are there any of those problems in your district?

Mr. McGuire: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Cardigan for his question. The underfunding of small craft harbours in Prince Edward Island is an ongoing concern to the fishermen. There is more to fishing than just going out and fishing. They need a safe harbour and wharf facilities in order to do the job properly.

For example, the harbour of Tignish, which is one of the largest harbours in Prince Edward Island, needs about a million dollars in repairs now, which is not going to happen this year. This is causing a lot of hardship to our fishermen.

I just want to say that the budget for small craft harbours, as far as P.E.I is concerned, is really poor. We need a lot of extra investment in our fishery so we can have safe harbour and good fishing facilities for our fishermen.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the motion on the government's record with respect to workers in communities involved in Canada's fishing industry.

The Canadian fishing industry is and always has been an integral part of the country's economic framework. It has been the lifeblood of many Canadians for hundreds of years. Yet, while this industry has a long and proud history in our country, it is, and not for the first time, facing a difficult period created by depleting stocks and changes in international marketing conditions.

Despite these circumstances I want to assure those men and women who make their living from the industry that the federal government is well aware of their situation and is working hard to develop measures to help them through this period. Indeed, this is in keeping with our track record. We were there before when the fishing industry workers needed us. We are there now, and I promise you we will be there in the future.

As you know, Madam Speaker, the fishing industry is a volatile one, affected by weather, market and conditions not under its control. This reality has compelled the fishing industry to be both flexible and adaptable. Likewise, we will show equal flexibility in ensuring that our programs and services meet the needs of the communities and the workers affected.

Any response to that industry must be viewed within a larger international perspective. Change and volatility are the watch words of our times. I might say that I was recently in Manilla in a factory that was making the huge drift-nets for the Pacific. I was trying to dissuade them. I saw their huge nets being made for tuna fishing, three times the size of anything we have seen before, and new boats being built to pull those nets. The nets would be twice the size of this chamber. They built a special factory for them. That is the sort of thing that we have to look at down the road.

To succeed in this environment we must be open to new ideas and the need for flexible and imaginative responses. We must continue to build our human resources by focusing on long-term employment and skills development. We must also stick to our fiscal principles.

This government has made much progress in improving economic conditions in less favourable regions in the country which affect many areas that count on the fishing industry for their livelihood.

For example, progress has been made through the introduction and the development of the Canadian Jobs Strategy or CJS since it began in 1985. It has helped countless Canadians to get the training and the work experience they need to find productive employment. This program has been well received in the fisheries sector. In the last fiscal year alone, the government directly invested $17.4 million in Canadian Jobs Strategy projects in the fisheries sector.

This strategy's success stems from the fact that its objective is to create long-term jobs and to build for the future. To do that, Canadian Jobs Strategy must take into account the local needs. What may work in a metropolis like Montreal or Toronto may not work in a fishing village in Newfoundland.

While we are proud of what we accomplished with CJS, we know we can do more. That is why we have developed the Labour Force Development Strategy. The Labour Force Development Strategy builds from the Canadian Jobs Strategy foundation. It provides additional clout to those programs and services we already have in place.

The Community Futures Program, which is in place in many fishing communities across Canada, illustrates my point. Community Futures has made great strides in helping small communities adjust to economic change. It employs a wide range of options to help these communities diversify their economies and increase employment opportunities.

One community that has already done well with the program is Port aux Basques in Newfoundland. Through determination and ingenuity companies were recruited to open plants in Port aux Basques. One of them, a Norwegian fabricating company, will create more than 200 jobs when this plant opens later this year. Additional employment will be created by several Canadian companies that have also set up shop there.

As well, almost $1 million in Community Futures funding has been used to train 120 residents as high tech welders, pipefitters and sheet metal workers. Seventy of these trainees are now working full time; another 30 are working part time; and the remainder are still in school. They have also assisted 24 residents in starting their own businesses through the program's self-employment incentive.

This entrepreneurial alternative allows people to create their own opportunities and that definitely is one way of addressing the problem of local unemployment. You can see why the Community Futures Program will receive an additional $50 million under the new Labour Force Development Strategy.

We are also doubling funding for the industrial adjustments service from $15 million to $30 million. This program has more than a quarter of a century of success behind it in helping companies to adjust to technological change, preventing lay-offs, and assisting employees when lay-offs are inevitable. The industrial adjustment service has entered into hundreds of agreements such as the one recently negotiated with the National Sea Products plant in Lockeport, Nova Scotia. We are sure that the same measure of success that has resulted from other agreements will be repeated here.

As you know, Madam Speaker, the Labour Force Development Strategy measures for helping fishing industry workers encompass more than enhancements to existing programs. Our government has always taken into account the needs of Canadian fishery workers. In the past, special measures have been taken and we are prepared to act again.

While our government takes measures to ensure the long-term prosperity of the fishing industry, some communities need short-term compensation. They will also need extra protection from situations such as adverse weather conditions that affect their standard of living.

More than ever before, we realize that increased assistance for affected fishery workers is linked inextricably with the future of many communities. The department is assessing the situation to determine the type of assistance these regions will require this year. Special measures are available to genuine fishermen and fish plant workers. And eligibility requirements for these special measures are tailored to the needs of these people.

In conclusion, I want to reiterate our government's concern for the problems facing the men and women employed in Canada's fishing industry. As you can see, Madam Speaker, this concern has been translated into initiatives that offer them opportunities suited for their particular circumstances. These options are important because we are bound to assist these communities and workers who have contributed so much to this country.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): I believe the hon. member is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and I am sure that he could send that speech home to his constituents.

In southern Ontario the Canadian Jobs Strategy might work, but I would challenge him to go down to Lockeport or to even speak to his colleague from South Shore and tell him how the Canadian Jobs Strategy or the labour project that he is talking about has helped the people who have lost in Lockeport.

The purpose of this data shows that the government's policy in fishery is not working. The fishery management plan is not working. Can the hon. parliamentary secretary explain to the House how this government has helped the people of Lockeport to earn a living there?

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, this problem that we have has not just arisen this year. It has been with us for a number of years. It ebbs and flows. It is a cyclical problem and what we are endeavouring to do is to find (a) industries that will move into the Lockeport area and (b) have training programs available to retrain people to accept those industries.

When we undertake a program of this nature we have to count on some initiative at the local level. It cannot all be done by government. We do not know everything and obviously we need local assistance to help us. We have people in the department looking at that whole fishery situation.

If I may be allowed to point to Newfoundland, which has a worst condition than in Lockeport, Nova Scotia, the job growth in Newfoundland is not just confined to the capital. During the past year the number of people of jobs in Newfoundland, outside the St. John's metropolitan area, has risen by over 9,500. The employment rate in that part of the province has fallen more than 2.1 per cent.

We have undertaken a number of initiatives in the Atlantic area. I know that some of them are going to succeed. I could not help but reflect on the comments of the member speaking before me about lobster. I just read the other day about the huge lobster market that is undeveloped in France. In fact, I read a very learned paper by a professor from the Newfoundland university about this huge market in France waiting for someone to jump on it. I do not know why we are so concerned. If we have a large crop of lobsters in P.E.I, I do not know why someone does not get on an airplane, go to France, and find out where they can sell it.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): We have no airplanes left to take it. Terra Nova can't take it.

Mr. Kempling: I have seen P.E.I. lobsters in Tokyo, in the big fish market there. I have seen P.E.I tuna. I have seen herring and herring roe in the big fish market in Tokyo. There are many areas beyond the United States, although it is the closest, where we can sell fish. There has to be some local initiative as well to assist the matter along.

Mr. Reid: Madam Speaker, one of the things that my hon. friend said in his comments was that not all programs apply in all areas. He made it very clear that perhaps the Canadian Jobs Strategy is not as applicable in some parts of the country as it is in others. He made reference to some of the very important programs that we have seen and some of the programs that are more suited again to other areas. Specific reference was made to Community Futures in Port aux Basques, which is in the Burin riding, and programs like that that have been developed to utilize local initiative.

As my friend knows, our colleague from South Shore has been very active in developing the local resources and using the people of the area. The initiative that they have developed in helping people to put that into practice and to apply it in responding to some of the problems, be it in ensuring that fish that was exported is now kept in the country and perhaps finding new buyers for facilities, is the sort of thing that our colleague has been undertaking.

I was going to read into the record some figures from previous response programs, but Madam Speaker is telling me I have very little time. I will not go into the $20 million that has been spent in emergency response in Newfoundland in the last three years.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate this afternoon.

Since the early 1980s, the reality has been unprecedented growth in employment in the fishery sector, both in harvesting and in processing in the Atlantic region. I would like to read you some figures that the minister has made available recently. He said, for Atlantic Canada from 1983 to 1988, landings of all fish species increased by 200,000 tonnes to 1.3 million tonnes. The total landed value increased by $400 million to over $1 billion during that same period. The total value of processed fish products increased by $750 million, to $2.2 billion in 1988.

We do have to face the reality that employment, the commercial activity, the economy of the fisheries resource in Atlantic Canada has, by and large, been at a high level of performance. As well, until recent months, perhaps, over the past year, the resources themselves, the natural fish stocks seem to have been sufficiently abundant to support that exploitation. It is only recently that we have become starkly aware of at least three major resource problems which will no longer sustain the expectations we have placed upon those resources.

First, there has been a gathering momentum of decline for several years in the groundfish stocks, particularly in the Nova Scotia waters, which has come to a shocking realization in recent months. As well, there has been a sharp drop in snow crab stocks, particularly in the New Brunswick and Quebec areas. Of course we are all familiar with the new information which we have concerning the northern cod populations.

As has been man's custom for centuries, we have continued to increase our expectations and our harvest so long as the resource seemed to be available. Now we confront the reality of the inevitable cycle, too much capacity.

I would like to quote from a report by the capacity committee which the minister, in co-operation with the industry helped to establish. Since 1987, they have been working to develop a proposed plan to cope with overcapacity in the groundfish fleet. Their conclusions state that the groundfish fleet already has twice the fishing power it needs. If the approximately 1,000 vessels licensed for groundfish but now fishing other species should return to groundfish, the fleet would have four times the fishing power it needs. As groundfish abundance has declined, quotas have dropped over the last seven years by about 40 per cent or 88,000 tonnes. That catch, if it were to be increased today, would be worth more than $60 million to the 2,700 groundfish boats in the Scotia—Fundy region.

As well, I would like to read from a quotation from Dr. Harris who did a study earlier this year about the northern cod situation. He says:

> We must be absolutely clear that failure to take appropriate steps to reduce current levels of fishing mortality will most probably lead to a significant decline in the spawning population of northern cod over the next several years.

He goes on to say this, and I think this is pivotal:

> Whatever management is taken, the panel recommends that the guiding principle must be the imperative necessity for an increase in the size of the spawning population.

What that really addresses is the subject of management of the resource. The government, contrary to the motion, has already commenced to act in that regard and, with specific reference to northern cod, the funding for scientific research will be increased this year by 80 per cent. The expanded research effort will increase from the current $3.8 million budget by an additional $3 million. That is hardly action consistent with the negative implications of this resolution.

I would like to talk for a few minutes about the management of the resource itself and about that phrase that we hear so much about today, sustainable development.

Yesterday I was privileged to be part of a legislative committee that reported a bill to this House which, perhaps, for the first time in Canadian legislation contains a definition of sustainable development. It is taken from the Brundtland report, from what is an international consensus on the definition of that phrase and means: The development that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs.

If there ever there has been a Canadian situation which demonstrates the principles of sustainable development, or at least the lack of them it has to be in the manner in which we so frequently have approached our fishery be it frequently on the Atlantic seaboard and on the Pacific coast as well.

The main area of my experience with the fishery has been the Atlantic salmon. There is much to learn from the management history and experience we have gained over recent years with Atlantic salmon that may well be applied to all fishery resources. The salmon story has both domestic and international implications much as is the case with the Atlantic groundfish crisis. It required in the case of Atlantic salmon a demonstration of leadership here at home before we could get the attention of the international fishery organizations and fishery countries. Salmon management involved other domestic conflicts, commercial fishermen in ocean migration routes, sports anglers in fresh water spawning rivers, native Indians at key locations in tidal estuaries, all competing vigorously for a diminishing resource despite clear signals that that stock was in serious trouble.

In the case of Atlantic salmon, Canada did finally start to act when we were just on the brink of disaster. A 10-year ban was imposed on the Maritimes commercial fishery for salmon. Angling limits were reduced first from six fish per day to four and then to two, and now large salmon are not permitted to be harvested at all. The total season limit for all fish, smaller fish only, in fact, is down to 10. What a dramatic action to reduce a daily limit to almost what is now a season limit.

We have introduced catch and release programs to preserve the resource and yet to permit the continuity of the very valuable recreational fishery.

I have the honour to chair National Recreational Fisheries Conference to be held in Fredericton, New Brunswick, two weeks from now in which the federal Department of Fisheries and Oceans national action plan for a sustainable fishery into the next century will deal with the recreational component. That is hardly an expression of management vision that would deserve the negative implications of this resolution this afternoon.

In terms of the Atlantic salmon, if I may go on with the analogy, allowances which were established in 1989 to initiate headland river by river system management received fierce opposition even from those to which the management plan is most designed to help. Those who are most dependent on our fishery resource are frequently, it seems the ones who most vigorously oppose its preservation. This seems to illustrate the reality of our changing perspective when we have abused nature's bounty.

We have been to the edge of extinction with the salmon resource and with our own eyes we have seen it because the salmon resource is spawned and born in our own rivers. We are able to count and even measure the size of the returning resource and yet we have been unwilling to believe even the reality of our own numbers.

When all is concluded, obviously people have got to be our greatest concern, and those who live by fishing are obviously in great difficulty in many places in the Atlantic region today. But we cannot respond to the circumstances of those people by plundering the resource. I would like to say that as my colleague, the parliamentary secretary to the minister, has outlined, there are programs in place, there are actions we are taking to speak to the circumstances in which those people find themselves today. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans, with its programs and with its mission statement from which I would like to read, has the following goal:

> To undertake policies and programs in support of Canada's economic, ecological and scientific interests in the oceans and inland waterways and to provide for the conservation the development and the sustained economic utilization of Canada's fishery resources.

This government, for the first time ever, is committed to sustainable development, to the realization that the resource is the key.

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate my friend from Fredericton on his address. I am not sure his heart was completely in it but I understand that. He and the gentleman before him, my friend and colleague from Burlington, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment, have together, during the last 20 minutes, made a number of points that need debating and commenting on. The time is short so I will come quickly to two points.

The first is something that the gentleman from Burlington said, but I want to put a question to the gentleman from Fredericton about it and that relates to job strategy. I say to him let's distinguish between the Canadian Jobs Strategy program and the Community Futures. These are two very different programs with very different results.

Community Futures is a good program as I said to this House before and said publicly. It is a good program. It has a lot of potential. There are some problems with it including the monkeying around at times with who goes on the board, but that is a side issue. We should not throw out the baby with the bath water. The program itself is a good program if it is given a chance to succeed.

The Canadian Jobs Strategy program must be marvellous for places like Burlington and Toronto and so on. What I can tell you is that it is creating unbelievable havoc in the small communities throughout southern, southwestern and western Newfoundland which I know best. I submit to the gentleman from Fredericton that he will know communities where equivalent havoc is being created by the Canadian Jobs Strategy program because the question arises, if you live in Toronto and are working in the beer plant and the beer plant closes, you can go down and get on a training program through Canada Manpower. Then you can go down and get a job putting bolts on the car in the car plant in Toronto.

The problem with Ramea and Belleoram is there is not very many car plants there. To put it differently, what do you train those people for? They have residents in those communities that now have the skills. The have the logging skill, the fishing skill, the homemaker's skill, the carpenter's skill, the welding skill. They have together the aggregate of skills which are required to survive and thrive in those communities. So what do we train them for?

In effect, those programs are denying them training altogether because there is no training that is appropriate or in the other case we are training them to pack suitcases to move to Toronto and Fort McMurray. Either of those options is unacceptable.

I say to the gentleman from Fredericton that it is absolutely unacceptable for people who have their roots there—I say to my friends from British Columbia, their loved ones and friends—to have a government whose only objective is to tear them away from everything they stand for, their old value system and everything just to get bread and butter. There ought to be a better way. There is a better way.

The better way is for the government, instead of using Canadian Jobs Strategy money in a way that is year after year or month after month diminishing the requirement for job strategy money because those people in those communities I am talking about cannot satisfy the requirements. But they do have the need. They have the need for jobs. They have the need for something to bridge them over so they can stay among their loved ones, so they can be, on a continuing basis, in the community which has values with which they identify.

I want to ask the gentleman from Fredericton if he would adjudicate the Canadian Jobs Strategy to be the unqualified success that is being portrayed by the minister of employment or is he, in fairness to his constituents, finding that some of his constituents, too, are having some difficulty making ends meet because of the way the rules have been botched in Canadian Job Strategy?

Mr. Bird: As I said in my remarks certainly the answer to the job strategy is not the plundering of the resource. I share the hon. member's concerns about the difficult perspective those in small fishing villages face. It is a very difficult question to create and to innovate and contemplate the kinds of adjustment and redeployment that will be necessary. At least the Canadian Jobs Strategy does address those kinds of problems. There is a process at work in this government.

I would like to ask the hon. member the question in reverse. As we have heard so often in this House criticism of this government for one thing after another, what does the hon. member suggest he would do given the state of the resource, given surely his agreement with the fact that plunder of the resource is not the answer. What would he do? How would he cope with the situation in those small fishing villages? What magic would he wrought that is better than is being done here? I would like to have that answer. It was his government and your fisheries minister in the late 1970s and early 1980s that created the beginnings of the overcapacity we now have, the miscalculation of the resource, the mismanagement of the resource. I could not help but contemplate that as this motion which was put by the hon. member for Beauséjour, a Liberal motion, that the House condemn the government's mismanagement, it would surely pertain to the management of the minister of the early 1980s.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): I am pleased to stand in this House today to participate in debate on this motion. The motion states that this House condemn the government's mismanagement, lack of leadership, incompetence and negligence that has placed Canada's fishing communities and workers in unparalleled jeopardy. Well that is putting it lightly.

I would like to focus mostly on the B.C. fishery. Mismanagement has been rampant in British Columbia for generations, but it seems to be an accelerating process in this last while. I am going to focus my comments on four main areas, the first the most recent free trade panel decision; second on fish farming and the effect that has on the fishery the third on the troll fleet versus recreational fishery in British Columbia; and fourth on drift-net fishery.

First of all, let us focus on the free trade panel decision. We have to look at this decision in the context of other government initiatives. For instance, the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The effect on jobs of the free trade panel decision is quite dramatic. The figures that I have, 24,000 full and part-time workers are affected and are now at risk because of this decision. Twenty-four thousand, this is on B.C. fishery. When we talk about the kind of effects on jobs we have to think about who those people are, which people are affected.

My colleague from New Westminster—Burnaby has provided me with figures for unemployment for women generally is 11.2 per cent. Unemployment for native women is a shocking 21.8 per cent. In British Columbia, 70 per cent of the workers in fish processing are women. The majority are either native women or from visible minorities. The kind of jobs that are affected by this free trade panel decision are good jobs, paying benefits. Many of these women who are affected by these job losses are the sole support for their families because, especially in the native communities, often the men have a much higher rate of unemployment than the women. What other jobs can these people be trained for?

The Minister of Employment and Immigration talks about what alternatives his government has, its long range plans for employment. Well, what is being done for the remote communities of British Columbia that are so dependent on the fishing industry for their jobs? What are the government's initiatives? I propose that it has none, that it is sacrificing these jobs.

On this free trade panel decision, I want to give you the kind of figures we are looking at. In Skagit County in Washington, the rate of pay for the fish processing industry is $5.50 an hour versus Canada where the rate is $13.00 an hour. Certainly if you want to be an ideological purist you can see the rationale for why the jobs are going south of the border. But I contend that the government of our country should be looking after Canadian jobs and should not be following the kind of ideological purity that is going to hurt Canadians. This free trade panel decision hurts Canadian jobs and it hurts Canadian communities.

I would like to remind the House of a quote from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans in February of 1988 when he was speaking to the Pacific Gill-netters Association convention. He said that we do not need more fish but we could generate more year-round employment at income by doing more with the fish. What does he mean, if it does not mean processing the fish, packaging the fish. This free trade panel decision does the very reverse. It sends the jobs south of the border.

However, this panel decision not only affects the job. It also affects our sovereignty. How can we control our resource if we do not know how many fish are actually being caught? How do we measure how many fish we have? We are talking about percentages that will have been set at 20 per cent of the fish. Twenty per cent of what? How do we measure it? How do you measure a percentage of an unknown quantity? How do you know logically? Do you not have to count them all to be able to know what the 20 per cent is?

If Americans are buying on the water and paying cash, how will we know what the exports have actually been? It is impossible to monitor escapements without counting on a daily basis how many fish have been caught. This is a conservation issue. I know that some members opposite have been talking about the kind of sustainable development initiatives of this government. We are talking about management here and this government, through its ministry of fisheries and oceans, is not managing this resource. There are five species of salmon and 4,500 runs of salmon, all of which need to be preserved. This government, through its negligence and mismanagement, is allowing that to be totally mismanaged.

We have a major problem on this. We are talking about jobs and about sovereignty. We are giving away our resource to the United States. As my hon. leader pointed out in Question Period the other day, what are the implications for our other resources? Does this mean that we are not going to be able to monitor our resources in other ways? It has vast implications, not just for the fishery but for provinces like British Columbia which is so resource dependent.

This government is not looking after the jobs and sovereignty of our country. Through this free trade panel decision, it is the first salvo of a much bigger picture.

I am now going to turn my comments to the whole issue of fish farming. This ministry has been granting licences, seemingly with little regard for the impact on the fishery. It is almost as if they are giving licences for a separate industry, not understanding it and seeing it in isolation rather than as part of the whole fishing scene, especially on the west coast. There has been an impact on the market because of the kind of prices that wild fishery can now ask versus the fish farming. I have a son who works in the fishery and it is a matter of the market prices going steadily downward because there have been so many fish farming licences granted.

I have no trouble with Canada feeding the world. I think it is a laudable goal that Canada should feed the world. But when it is at the cost of Canadian jobs, when it is taking the kind of money that many fisherpeople have invested in boats, equipment and so on and putting those people's jobs at risk in order to have a fling at what is called fish farming, I question that. There is a whole other aspect of fish farming that has to be looked at, as well, and that is the environmental consequences of granting so many licences for fish farms. There are many horror stories I could tell you about fish farming on the west coast. I could tell you of the kinds of drugs that are introduced into the farms to preserve the so-called health of the fish. I am talking about antibiotics that are dumped into the pens. What kind of safety regulations has this ministry brought in to ensure that the high density of drugs in the fish will not contaminate the wild fishery. How is it going to prevent them from escaping?

So, we have at least two concerns with fish farming, the environmental concerns and the effects on the markets and the traditional jobs in the fishery.

I now want to turn my comments to the effect on the troll fleet. My son works with the troll fleet in the summer. I believe he is watching from the gallery or from the lobby this afternoon. I hope he is paying attention, as I am finally talking about an issue that he can agree with.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Hunter: Well, he is a 16-year-old boy and they never agree with their mothers. For the past two years he has been out off the west coast of Vancouver Island with the troll fleet. Each year things have become steadily worse, according to him. He tells me stories of the overzealous action on the part of the fishery patrol. As soon as the fleet gets over fish and is actually successful in catching fish, they close down, and ask the fleet to move on. This is a kind of harassment because the patrol does not know what is going on. It does not have the ability to know how many fish are escaping or how many fish are coming back, so they close it down. And, what does that do to the fishery? Well, I know what it does to my son's skipper. It makes him very, very nervous, because all of a sudden he has two months to make his income for the year and the fishery is closed down and moved on. As a mother, I can speak of the kind of dangerous working conditions involved here. It is like a little chequerboard out there and they are only allowed a certain part of the ocean in which to do their fishing. All the boats are crammed into one little area and they have their poles going out and it is foggy. This is management? It is not management. It is a patchwork quilt of regulations that harasses the fishery and harasses the people of British Columbia in their attempts to make a living. And it is this government, with its central Canada focus on every policy, that is irritating to those of us on either coast.

• (1730)

I want also to speak about the mismanagement of the recreational fishery because many of my constituents do recreational fishing. You have to have a lot of imagination in order to figure out how tagging of salmon could conserve the resource and whether or not throwing back a dead fish because it is the wrong type is going to conserve it. As I said, you have to have a lot of imagination to see where that is going to get us.

My last area of comment regarding the mismanagement of the fishery relates to the drift-net fishery which so far we have only seen in the north Pacific. This is an absolute tragedy. We not only see the mismanagement of our fishing resources, we also see many marine mammals being caught. There is the environmental question as to whether or not that is a wise tactic.

I know that Canada has expressed its views that it is not a wise tactic, but I would like to say that Canada is certainly not expressing them in loud or forceful enough tones. This government, in negotiating with those who are engaged in drift-net fishery, has agreed to move the boundary northward. That is supposed to be a compromise because the government also said that it was going to allow fishery patrol people onto the boats—six boats—to monitor the situation. This would be laughable if it were not such a tragedy.

We are talking about a major pirating scheme in the north Pacific. What does allowing the movement northward of the boundary, mean for B.C. fishery, the salmon fishery? It means that more salmon, more of our resource that is supposed to be protected under international law, is going to be taken by these pirates. Once again, there is a complete absence of management. There are just not sufficient resources by this government to monitor the situation. If it were serious about putting people on boats, it has to put far more than six people on them.

What we want now is that transponders be put on each boat that is engaged in the drift-net. That is a device to track the boats by satellite. We have the technology. We just do not have the political will. That is what is totally absent regarding the fishery on the west coast. I know the Atlantic fishery has been dealt with from both sides of this House, but on the west coast, there is an absence of political will to talk about this crisis. Korea has apparently agreed that transponders be put on its boats.

Taiwan, one of the major and most flagrant violators of international law to which we would like to think we are subject is not. What can we do? This government has to stop looking at all of these little things in isolation. It seems to be expert in talking about international trade, but it doesn't seem to be able to get its act together when it actually comes down to looking after Canadians interest in that. We have to be able to put economic pressure on these violators, these pirates. I am talking about major sanctions.

We are not supposed to have recognized Taiwan, but we still get Japanese oranges from Taiwan. Why can't we put economic pressure on this country that is stealing our resource? We should be very clear about that. These are our salmon. It is our tax dollars that have gone to enhancing this market. We are giving it away through this drift-net fishery. We are allowing it to be taken.

Those small filament nets that catch everything are a disgusting display. My colleague from Nanaimo—Cowichan calls them curtains of death. I think that is a very apt description of those drift-nets. They are a very efficient killer. Of course you have to kill the fish, but this is killing everything, marine birds and marine mammals, and fish. I want to once again refocus my remarks on the salmon. We have paid for that salmon, and we are looking after it and trying, in spite of many violations in the forestry, to save those salmon streams. Yet this government is allowing the drift-net fishery to occur by making mealy-mouthed statements about the drift-net fishery saying that we will negotiate. Negotiations have to have some punch behind them. We have to have that resource protected. We have to be sure that it is Canadians who are being looked after by this government.

It is all very well to say nice comforting things about international trade being the direction of the future, but in order to save Canadians jobs we have to make sure that this government is looking after our interests. I know in British Columbia, it certainly is not the view of most people that that is what is happening.

It is the people of British Columbia who are affected, it is the women, the native women. They are the ones who are being put out of work.

This is a Liberal motion which I applaud. I like the language though it is a little weak. Mismanagement, incompetence and negligence are not quite strong enough words for me. I think some of the language I would use may be non-parliamentary. I applaud this motion and am sure there are many questions for me.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, just before I pose a question, I have a few observations with regard to the remarks made by my colleague from New Westminster—Burnaby. She indicated at the outset that in western Canada she is finding a great deal of concern being expressed by individuals in the fisheries with regard to some of the management policies of the Government of Canada. I want to tell the hon. member concerns.

In fact, I was somewhat dismayed when I heard on the floor of the House of Commons my colleague from Central Nova extolling the virtues of the present minister of fisheries only to be outdone by my colleague from St. John's East. It seems that at every opportunity, he wishes to support not only the policies of the Government of Canada but indeed, to support carte blanche the activities of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

We in Atlantic Canada, and I guess it is probably apropos to western Canada, have been suffering at the hands of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who refuses on all occasions to accept the advice, suggestions, the calls and the pleas of fishermen and individuals within the industry. I am appalled to hear that his cabinet colleague would say today on the floor of the House of Commons that it is a tough job being the minister of fisheries. We have a serious problem within the fishery, only to find that the minister of fisheries said in the House several days ago that everything is wonderful, everything is healthy, there are no difficulties within the fishing industry.

I want to address this particular concern to the hon. member who has just spoken. Would she not agree, in her spirit of objectivity, in her non-partisan manner as exhibited in the last number of minutes of her speech, that notwithstanding the fault with the regulations, the management policies that have been put in place by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, there is an added problem, a serious problem which affects west coast fishermen and those in the Atlantic.

That has to do with the arrogance, the unbelievable arrogance of the federal Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Would the hon. member not agree that if this particular minister would only accept the reality that there is a crisis within the fisheries and provide a coherent plan, we would then find solutions to what has become a disastrous economic situation for the west coast as well as the Atlantic coast?

While the hon. member is on her feet, would she not want to take the opportunity to share with members of the House of Commons who have listened attentively to her remarks and the remarks of all of our colleagues as to what sort of adjectives the hon. member say that the motion that this House condemn the government's mismanagement, lack of leadership, incompetence and negligence that has placed Canada's fishing communities and workers in unparalleled jeopardy is weak. I want to ask if the hon. member would rise in her place and join with us in this party by adding adjectives to the situation which the minister has caused for fishermen on both the west and east coasts.

While I am on my feet, I thought I would take one more moment—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I think that the hon. member will agree that the floor should be given to the Hon. Member for Saaninch—Gulf Islands.

Ms. Hunter: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. It is such a concise question. I just want to assure the hon. member that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, from my perspective in British Columbia, has certainly alienated every aspect of the fishing community, the recreational fishery, the troll fleet, the gill-netters, you name it, they are mad at him because of this mismanagement.

In order to allow other people to ask questions—because I know there are a number of other people who want to ask questions, I can just see them bouncing over there wanting to ask me questions—I think that I will leave the adjectives because they would not be parliamentary. I know that a lot of journalists, in particular, find that some of us women in the House are a little too partisan, and I would not want to dissuade them from that belief.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Madam Speaker, after listening carefully to what was said by the Hon. Member for Saanich—Gulf Islands (Ms. Hunter), I can inform her and indeed remind her that issuing fishfarming licences is a provincial responsibility. About the drift net situation, I may also remind her that Canada has started active discussions and serious negotiations with various Asian countries that practise this type of fishing in the Pacific, and so far, the results have been encouraging, and we are confident that substantial progress will be made in dealing with the indeed disastrous situation caused by drift nets in northern Pacific waters. I have a question for the Hon. Member. How can she claim that the fisheries are poorly managed, when on the Atlantic Coast, between 1983 and 1988, landings increased, landing values increased and the value of processed fish products increased as well?

[English]

Ms. Hunter: Madam Speaker, I do not think using the old provincial regulations answer is going to go very far. It does not excuse abdication of responsibility. We are talking about taxpayers' dollars going toward enhancing a resource and then saying that we cannot do anything about it because it is provincial jurisdiction.

That is the oldest tactic in the book. There is only one pocket that the taxman can dig his hand into and that is the pocket of the taxpayers of Canada.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty pursuant to orders adopted on Tuesday, April 4 and Tuesday, June 27, 1989, to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of the Main Estimates and all stages of the bill based thereon.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall I dispense with the ringing of the bells?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, first, I think you would find that there would be consent to dispense with the ringing of the bells.

Second, if you would look around the House, I think you would find that there would be unanimity to apply the vote on Motion No. 1 to Motions 2, 3 and 4.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the suggestion from the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I take it you would add to those votes the late arrivals from out east who came from the GST committee to fight this tax all the way.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It is noted that the votes of the hon. member for Dartmouth and the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer would be added to the nays.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I think you would find a disposition to apply the vote just taken on this motion and on the subsequent motions until we get to Motion No. 10, at which time this caucus would like to stand up for defence matters. Because of the base closures and the importance this has to our constituencies, we would like to stand up for them.

PRIVILEGE

STANDING COMMITTEE ON CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS AND GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, this morning I rise on a question of privilege. I want to indicate to the House that yesterday afternoon, just before the closing of the House, I gave a notice in writing to the Speaker that I wanted to rise on a question of privilege at the earliest opportunity, and I thank Mr. Speaker for recognizing me at what is in fact this earliest opportunity.

I want to indicate as well, Mr. Speaker, that if you deem that I have a prima facie case of privilege, I am willing to bring the matter, by motion, to the appropriate committee of this House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, privilege is defined in Beauchesne's and of course in Erskine May as—

Mr. Lewis: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Simmons: You cannot interrupt a question of privilege.

Mr. Boudria: You cannot interrupt a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: It is an application for privilege. The hon. Minister of Justice rises on a point of order. I am not quite sure what he may wish to say. I certainly will hear him, at least for a moment. I have been listening very carefully, and I want to assure the minister that I will be listening very carefully to the argument. The minister has the floor.

Mr. Lewis: I rise only to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it would probably be helpful to yourself and the House if my hon. friend, rather than addressing all of the procedural arguments first, were to outline to the House exactly what incident he is referring to.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Justice, who has some experience in arguing these matters, has made a suggestion that the hon. member may or may not want to follow.

In any event, I will hear the hon. member and I think that it might be helpful to the Chair if the hon. member did indicate what is the factual basis for the argument. I will then of course be guided by the helpful comments the hon. member may make in terms of references to authorities.

Mr. Boudria: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It seems evident that the government House leader already has his idea of what he thinks I am going to raise and wants to hear the argument before I even set out to describe to Mr. Speaker what in fact I believe in a general sense has been offended.

Then of course I will describe the incident and describe what has been breached, afterward, in the normal tradition of presenting these kinds of matters in the House. And, while I will not pretend to be an expert on the rules I will match myself against that minister, in particular, at any time.

Mr. Speaker: It would not be for your Speaker to suggest or imply, in any particular, which side of the House has the most expertise on these delicate and sometimes difficult matters.

• (1010)

However I can assure the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell that I have full confidence in his ability to put his argument.

Mr. Boudria: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your confidence. Privilege is generally defined as found in Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 16:

> They are enjoyed by individual members, because the House cannot perform its functions without unimpeded use of the services of its members; and by each House for the protection of its members and the vindication of its own authority and dignity.

Mr. Crosby: What edition?

Mr. Boudria: This is from Erskine May. A Conservative member across the way asked what edition. It is from his Treatise on the Law, Privileges, Proceedings and Usage of Parliament, Nineteenth Edition. That answers the question of the hon. member for Halifax West.

I want to submit to you that it is important for the privileges of this House that have been extended by this House to parliamentary committees to be able to function.

Mr. Cooper: This is out of order. That happened yesterday. It is out of order. This is 24 hours too late.

Mr. Lewis: This is too late.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I do believe that I gave notice of this point of privilege yesterday.

Mr. Gauthier: Don't be distracted by them. Get to the point.

Mr. Lewis: Yesterday was an opposition day.

Mr. Cooper: Yesterday at eleven o'clock. This happened at 9.30 yesterday morning.

Mr. Simmons: So you admit there are a couple of incidents.

Mr. Gauthier: That's right. They do it all the time.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, the incident that I bring to your attention is one that happened at five o'clock yesterday afternoon. It is too bad that some members heckling across the way are so ill informed as they usually are.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Boudria: Why don't you want to hear it? You're not going to go anywhere today unless you listen.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member complains, at least momentarily, of what is seen as heckling. The Chair of course in a situation like this always accepts comments that are made across the Chamber in as helpful a way as possibly can be interpreted.

The hon. member has the floor and is making an argument. I think it would be appropriate if we heard the hon. member.

Mr. Boudria: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Standing Order 116 of the House of Commons states:

> In a standing, special or legislative committee, the Standing Orders shall apply so far as may be applicable, except—

And it lists a few exceptions here. It continues:

> —the election of a Speaker, seconding of motions—

And so on. In other words, the Standing Orders of this House must apply to committees save and except a few exceptions that I previously listed. Those same Standing Orders of our House state quite clearly that one cannot discuss in the House an item which is not on the Order Paper.

What I am about to submit to you, Mr. Speaker, is that in fact the equivalent of that happened yesterday in a parliamentary committee of this House. If what happened yesterday is allowed to continue, I would suggest that none of the Standing Orders of the House, which have been duly passed by this House, would have any effect in committee whatsoever. By extension, I do believe that our privileges have been affected by what has happened. I do believe that such is the case.

A few days ago members of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations received notice of meeting, the committee equivalent of the Order Paper. The document which I have in hand, and which I would like to table before the House, is entitled 'Issue No. 23, Meeting No. 25, Notice of Meeting, Thursday, October 19, 3.30 p.m.'

It says on the order paper that I have here, or the committee equivalent of the Order Paper, that the item to be considered is as follows: "Consideration of draft report on credit cards." Only one item appears on that order paper, therefore I submit that only one item could be considered by the committee yesterday.

It was also suggested that this meeting had to be in camera, although of course I suppose one could alter that if one wanted to. The point I am making is that yesterday afternoon, unbeknownst to members of the opposition, eight Conservative members, most of whom had never been seen at the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gauthier: That is true, that is true.

Mr. Boudria: —because they are not regular members of that committee, were present. They immediately moved a motion that a witness who had been asked by a motion of that committee to testify on October 24 not be made to testify any longer.

The witness in question was Mr. Donald Lander, President and Chief Executive Officer of the Canada Post Corporation. This motion was moved yesterday revoking the previous motion and asking that Mr. Lander no longer be asked to testify next Monday but be asked to come at another date sometime hence.

That item was not on the order paper, not for consideration by the committee and, as a matter of fact, it could have very well been that members generally interested in that issue would have not even known that that item was up for discussion.

If we were, by extension—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I am not going to cut off the hon. member's argument, but I want to ask something.

Is the hon. member making this proposition: that if a notice goes out to members of a committee setting out what is to be discussed or setting out a notice or an agenda, and if something else happens that day, that that is somehow a breach of privilege of members? Is that the proposition?

Mr. Boudria: Not necessarily, Mr. Speaker, but I submit that you could be right. My suggestion is the following, Mr. Speaker, and let me explain to you why I think that upon instances what you say would be—

Mr. Speaker: All I can say is that it is terribly hard to rule against when you make such flattering suggestions, but the Chair is serious. If that is the proposition I must understand it as such.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, for instance, the document that I have here states: "orders of the day". If that is the only order of the day listed then that item is as you correctly suggested the one that should be discussed. Of course, without having consulted the steering committee to change the order of the day, then that item should be the only one. Or, alternatively, if unanimous consent of the committee would have been sought and granted, then of course that agenda could have been changed.

As you see, Mr. Speaker, the point I am making to you is that as you indicated earlier it could very well be that this in fact is a question of privilege. It becomes a question of privilege simply because government members on the committee did not seek to do that, moved this motion unilaterally and had it passed.

In conclusion, what has happened is that an item that was never before the committee, a topic that was never before the committee or scheduled before the committee on what was circulated stating "orders of the day". . .and that is what it says on Issue No. 23 of the Standing Committee of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations—was before us.

If we are asked to discuss a different item or items without unanimous consent of the committee to change that order, in fact by extension if we were to apply that to the House, the government could stand here on any day and declare that day to be the budget day, unilaterally, without even asking the previous consent of the House.

We just cannot operate that way. We do not do it in this House. I would submit to you that although the committees are the masters of their own business they nevertheless have to respect the orders of the House and you, Sir, are the custodian of those rules of the House which we collectively ask you administer on our behalf.

That is the point, Mr. Speaker, that I wanted to raise with you. I want to say, in conclusion, that I would be prepared to move the appropriate motion if you so deem that I have at least a prima facie case of privilege to be brought before the appropriate committee.

Mr. Speaker: If I have understood the argument of the hon. member correctly, the hon. member is really putting to the House that if by way of notice set out by the committee to members something else comes up that was not expected it puts the members at a disadvantage.

• (1020)

Do I understand the argument clearly? That seems to be what flows from what the hon. member from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has said. At the moment that is the complaint. I suppose what the hon. member is saying is that, given the fact that the notice set out something to be discussed and something else was discussed, that may or may not have affected who would turn up or how many people would turn up. That seems to be the gist of the hon. member's argument.

The hon. member is arguing with some skill that certain rules which apply in this place ought to, under these circumstances, also apply in committee. Have I understood the argument correctly?

Mr. Boudria: Generally, yes.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is nodding.

I will come to the hon. member for Vanier in just a moment, but first I will hear the hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, on the same point, Standing Order 116 of the House reads:

> In a standing, special or legislative committee, the Standing Orders shall apply so far as may be applicable, except the Standing Orders as to the election of a Speaker, seconding of motions, limiting the number of times of speaking and the length of speeches.

In other words, Standing Order 116 implies very directly that the committees are bound by the same rules as the House. In the House we have an order paper which lists the government legislation, as it does on page 11 of today's order paper. The government has the right within the legislation listed to bring any one item up for debate. It can switch, it has that right, but it has to be on the order paper.

The paper that was sent out announcing the committee yesterday was an order paper. It is listed as an order paper. It specified that the business of that committee for that day was not what the Conservative committee members in fact did. It was not an item that was before the committee for that day.

I thought, as we set up our standing committees and as we have talked about parliamentary reform and the importance of the committees having their own mandate and being able to exercise certain independence from the government, that we would have got away from those quick moves and the travelling goon squad of Tory members switching the legislation before committees.

Mr. Cooper: Order, that is a reflection on members.

Mr. Simmons: That is an accurate description.

Mr. Murphy: At an earlier meeting the committee decided that it wanted the head of Canada Post to appear. The committee made that decision with Conservative members there. To have a new group of Conservatives come to a meeting which is called for other purposes and say that they do not want the head of Canada Post to appear before a standing committee of this House is outrageous.

The committee has a right and an obligation to investigate Canada Post. It is an order of that committee. The House has been very favourably disposed to the committee investigating Canada Post and is authorizing travel for that committee for that purpose.

I do not understand why a group of new Conservatives would come to a committee and deny that committee the right to hear from the president of Canada Post, why they would try to do so when the orders of the day for that committee specifically said that the committee was supposed to be doing something else.

I find that the only way we can protect members of the House of Commons from this type of outrageous action happening time after time after time is to make sure that we do send out a notice saying what the purpose of a committee is, why that committee is meeting and that without unanimous consent there is no way the majority of the committee can change the rules midstream. If it does that, we are going to have complete anarchy in all our committees, and that is not acceptable to the House and that is not acceptable to members.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a couple of points.

I do not want to repeat the good points that were put, except to say that we all know that the order paper of the day for the House of Commons has a reserve on it that says: "subject to change without notice". However we are not talking about that. We are talking about orders of the day for committees, not several items but one item agreed upon unanimously by that committee which was, at the last moment, changed by the government members.

I want to make one comment, and a plea to government members. They are the ones that came to me on October 1, 2, and 3 and said,"We do not want any surprises in committee, we will play the game straight and forward". We agreed, among House leaders, that there would be no games played and nobody would be surprised. I put out a press release to my members, as I understood every member of the House was supposed to be advised by the House leaders and by the whips to the effect that meetings of committees were to be held for the sole purpose of hearing witnesses—and I remind government members that it was at their request that we did this—or for business pertaining to the hearing of witnesses, and that no other business be undertaken at the said meetings. Most committees have accepted that as a way of operating in good faith, and not the tyranny of the majority that was imposed on the committee yesterday. That is wrong.

I say to the government, if it wants to operate under those circumstances, we can play the game also. But up to now I thought we were playing up front. We are playing square, we are playing honest games, and the government and its members are not playing good games at this time.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I do want to put a few comments on the record, because I think it is important that we lay the facts before you on this particular issue.

What I am told happened in this particular case is that the chairman of the committee at the last minute received a letter from the witness in question, Mr. Landers, which stated that he had a problem appearing on October 24, which was to be the next regularly scheduled meeting of the committee. He said he could not appear on that date because he was going to be out of the country, and requested another date.

The chairman brought that letter to the attention of the committee and asked that someone put a motion changing the date. A member of that committee, a member from the government side, put such a motion. He did not deny the right of Mr. Landers to come to the committee hearings. He did not say that he should not be a witness. In fact, the information I have is that they asked for a change in date, that Mr. Landers be allowed to come on October 30.

Anybody with any ounce of common sense understands that from time to time busy people have scheduling problems. When those people have scheduling problems we, as reasonable members of the House, and members of committees, have always tried to accommodate them. We have always tried to bend over backwards to make that a possibility.

So here we are faced with a situation where a witness in good faith sends a notice to the chairman saying he cannot make it on such and such a date, is it possible for a change. The committee decides to accommodate. What happened then is that the Liberals members of the committee decided that they did not want that motion put. In other words, they are going to insist that Mr. Landers come back from the States, interrupt whatever work he has to do, and appear on a date that is obviously inconvenient for him. I am told that what was done, in fact, was to try to accommodate the witness and to bring him in on October 30. That is part of the political side that I think has to be demonstrated here this morning, Mr. Speaker, because obviously that is not what is being expressed to you.

The other thing that I think is important is that this is clearly not an example of the government members trying to frustrate the work of the committee. That is not our intention at all. Our intention is to accommodate a witness, not to frustrate the committee. The committee has itself decided that it wants to look into certain aspects of Canada Post and Canada Post services, and that was agreed to by the government members. It is not their intention to frustrate that investigation in any way. So I think it is important that that be noted.

I noticed that my hon. friend, the whip on the opposition side said—and he used his words very carefully—"in some committees, in some cases there is consensus". Rightly so. We have asked on this side that wherever possible there not be motions that would be used to in any way surprise the committee, or disrupt the committee, or sidetrack the committee. But what we have here is a case of selective application of that principle.

I am told that there was an incident in the transport committee yesterday where in fact there was a surprise motion put that ended up with a bit of a donnybrook in the committee. Even though the committee had already agreed to a number of things, a surprise motion was put by a member of the opposition. So one has to be very careful, when one makes these arguments, that those arguments are on an equal footing and one is treating one side just as fairly as the other.

The other thing which deals more with the actual Standing Orders is that a member from the NDP has said that the order paper notice puts restrictions on the government. Mr. Speaker, you know full well that it does say, as my friend has pointed out, that it is a notice and that things may change, and obviously that is the case with which we have all worked.

The principles of the committees and the principles of reform that we were all looking for are that the committees be masters of their own destiny. That is essentially what we have been trying to work with. That is the kind of thing that I think is essential. Part is that it is absolutely necessary to treat our witnesses with some respect and to do our best to accommodate them when they have scheduling difficulties.

It is not a case of privilege, as I am sure you are well aware already. I think what we have is a political debate, a debate that, if all the facts were known, would change the tone of it considerably to say that we were simply trying to accommodate a witness.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burin—St. George's is rising. I happen to have some indication of what he wishes to say. I will, of course, hear him in a moment.

This may help hon. members. There are two issues in this application. One of them is procedural, and I intend to give it very careful consideration.

The other is a question of what happened at the committee and whether it should or should not have happened. The House knows, and it is the House's wish and has been for decades, that it is not the place of the Chair to interfere with what goes on in the committee.

The procedural point that has been raised by the hon. member for Glengarry-Prescott—Russell is that a notice went out which gave people an idea that certain things would be done, and something else was done. That is a procedural point. I am taking that procedural point and I will be considering it carefully. I do not intend to rule on it right now.

I say to the hon. member for Burin—St. George's, who is an experienced member of this House, because I do not know yet what he is going to say, that I would ask him to keep in mind that I am not going into the question of who said what and under what circumstances at that committee because the House, decades ago, made it quite clear that it does not want your Speaker to be doing that. I will hear the hon. member.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I intend to come to the procedural issue. I just want in passing to say to the Parliamentary Secretary that it did not really get bogged down on the issue of whether someone should come on a given date or not, in this case Mr. Don Lander. The real issue and our concern—and I believe the gentleman who raised this issue and I are the only two in this room who were actually at the meeting—was procedural. Our concern was in terms of the precedent it could set.

We saw the green piece of paper that my colleague has referred to as the "order paper". We saw it as embodying a decision of the committee, a steering committee, then adopted by the full committee, according to procedures laid down by the committee.

As an aside I submit, yes, the committee is the master of its destiny, but within the framework of the parameters of the House rules. It cannot go outside them. It is our point that, procedurally, the committee yesterday went well outside the parameters of the way the House operates. The House sets an order of business and can only change it by unanimous consent. No unanimous consent was sought yesterday.

There is another way. Either the chairman could have sought unanimous consent or could have very quickly convened a steering committee either before or after the other meeting. The mechanism is in place in that committee to take care of an emergency which apparently rose yesterday.

I point out, in closing, that it was not the emergency that it has been represented as here. While it happened kind of at the last minute—but not quite—there was time for a government member to have a typed motion when he arrived at the meeting. I submit to you, Sir, there was time for that. There was time to convene a quick steering committee and allow the thing to go forward as is normally the process. We saw it as an absence of some good faith. We think there was a better way. We are concerned in terms of the precedent it could set. If the government can change the order of business one day for a small matter, another day it can change it for a quite more substantial matter.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary in reply.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I do not particularly wish to reply to the member. It is more in relationship to the comments you made after I had spoken. I just want to make one comment on your comments when you indicated that you wanted to consider the procedural aspects.

I want to say to you, Sir, that we as a government would welcome any ruling which would suggest that any motions to be placed on the Order Paper would not be placed there in any case by surprise, that there would always be adequate notice. We on this side would be more than happy to accept that principle, if that is the principle the opposition is arguing for. Certainly that is what I hear them arguing for.

Mr. Speaker: I think I have heard enough argument. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary, of course with some skill, put forward a proposition which is not altogether beyond the ken of the Speaker. I am quite aware that depending on the day it may suit one or another in this chamber to have things very clearly set out before a committee meets. However, I think I do have the procedural point. I think I also have the point of the Parliamentary Secretary. I shall be very careful before I wander too far down that path.

Just so that the public who, after all, has been listening to this, understands exactly what it is we are doing here, an application has been made on a question of privilege because the item for discussion that was set out on the notice to committee members was not the item that was dealt with.

The second matter that has been raised in the discussion is whether or not the head of Canada Post can ever appear in front of the committee. It has been, I think, made quite clear from the government side that whatever happened at the committee does not preclude that particular gentleman from coming before the committee. I think I have taken the Parliamentary Secretary's words appropriately. I do not want members to think that what has happened is that the head of Canada Post will never appear before the committee.

Mr. Boudria: We never said that.

Mr. Speaker: I think we have some assurance from the government side that the government does not intend to take a position that the chairman of Canada Post not appear before the committee. Even though that may not be the procedural matter we are discussing in this discussion, as far as it has gone, it is in the public interest to know what the government's position is on that particular point. I see the parliamentary secretary nodding that I have interpreted it correctly.

The point that I have to decide, and which I am going to look at, is a very interesting and intriguing one. The hon. member for Burin—St. George's put it clearly in summation, and the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier and the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell have argued the point. I will look at it carefully. The hon. parliamentary secretary, of course, has also put some of the implications of that argument to the House, and I will consider that.

I thank hon. members for their interventions.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS ACT

The House resumed from October 5, 1989, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-36, an act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Foster (p. 4314).

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, as the member of Parliament for Cardigan and as a farmer who has benefited from the advance payments program, I welcome this opportunity to address the House on Bill C-36, an Act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act.

Since the onset of this thirty-first Parliament we have watched this government whittle away at agricultural programs, programs which Canadian farmers have been privileged to use.

The advance payments program is another in a long list of Tory cut-backs in agriculture. The assault continues and will force many farmers off their farms. This government has no compassion or sensitivity when it comes to axing agricultural programs.

The Advance Payments for Crops Act provides an incentive to producers to store certain agricultural products immediately after harvest so they can improve their farm income by marketing over an extended season. It gave producers a cash advance to help them to meet short term monetary commitments, an advance that was interest free. On Prince Edward Island alone the elimination of the interest free portion of this act means lending institutions will acquire at least $365,000 on the backs of Island farmers. This represents the amount of interest saved by a small agricultural based island, an island which is also part of this great nation. It is $365,000 which would go directly into our Island economy. This apparently does not matter to this government. The Island economy is very low on its list of priorities.

These savings represent approximately $3,000 per individual producer taking part in this program. It protects the producers from high interest rates. High interest rates are crippling agriculture in this country. There is no interest free money available to island producers. Banks continue to charge prime plus 1 or 2 per cent on operating loans which are needed so producers can feed this country.

Does this government feel comfortable knowing farmers are being pushed to the limit constantly? The elimination of the interest free aspect of the Advance Payments for Crops Act applied increased pressure on much needed cash flow. Farmers are finding it impossible to operate in a climate in which interest rates are so variable. Farmers are in a position of insecure income at the mercy of the market-place and the lending institutions.

In recent correspondence from the P.E.I. Potato Producers Association, the plight in the market-place was described well and I quote:

> Prior to the Advance Payments Program, farmers were forced to sell their crops soon after harvest in order to meet post harvest production costs.

By losing this free interest there will be increased pressure to dump product onto the market to reduce cash flow problems. There goes several of the stated advantages of the program, as taken from the advance payments for crops administrative manual, which include the following: Dumping products at harvest time is reduced; returns to producers are improved by letting them sell their product when market conditions are good and more orderly marketing of products is achieved.

This government does not seem to be aware that farm loans are considered high risk at lending institutions on Prince Edward Island. Small farmers cannot borrow 100 per cent of required operating money. It is ironic to think that the very people who are putting bread and butter on every table in this country are high risk. Think about it.

The Canadian agricultural industry is not based on luxury. Styles of food do not change with the whims of society. The agricultural industry in this country is based on a long-term debt, as are other industries, but the agricultural industry faces woes of short-term price fluctuations.

The interest free provision of this act could be read as a 100 per cent interest free subsidy program. Although a valuable asset to Canadian farmers, the word "subsidy" is not favourable under the free trade agreement. The orderly marketing of crops in Canada has been seriously jeopardized and, yes, sacrificed at the altar of the free trade agreement.

The market pressure created by the elimination of the interest free Advance Payments for Crops Act is flying in the face of what this government is preaching. You are saying that you want farmers to become more market oriented, more business oriented. This government is a living contradiction. The fact is that any forced increases in farm debt today will force more and more farmers into the Federal Debt Review Board. With the current reductions in every aspect of agriculture, any further reduction in federal programs is nothing short of increasing burden on producers of food.

The lack of priority given agriculture through cheap food policies and the lack of commitment this government has to the food industry becomes even more evident. To give farmers yet another option for guaranteed interest-bearing loans is but another Tory terror dropped on agriculture like a bomb.

Our interest rates continue to explode set by outside forces. This government is nailing the coffin shut slowly but surely.

During communications with the P.E.I. Grain Growers Co-op it was stated: "Eastern producers will have no impact when the giant of the west, the Canadian Wheat Board, was unsuccessful in having a western minister listen to their needs. We in the east, on this nation's great Atlantic shore appear to be shoveling fog in our attempts to be heard by this government."

These are the facts. There was no consultation with farmers. The program cut was scheduled. We were told to accept a program which is clearly second best.

The government admitted responsibility for the elimination of the tobacco industry, therefore, the Redux program. Maybe it should also accept the responsibility for the eventual elimination of the agricultural industry entirely.

By strangling farmers financially this government is pushing out the small, successful, proud family farms for which generations have operated across this country. What, in fact, does this government want, corporate farming? It certainly would seem to be where it is heading. Surely this government will change its agenda. I know the Canadian voters are sure to change it for them when the opportunity arises. Hopefully, by then, it will not be too late to salvage what is left in Canadian agriculture.

I plead with the government to reconsider and withdraw Bill C–36. Reinstate the interest–free aspect of the Advance Payments for Crops Act. Please put agriculture back in its proper place in this nation.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I rise in debate on Bill C–36 which is the second attempt by the government to make the interest free cash advance program disappear.

For years we have been listening to Conservative politicians praise themselves and pat themselves on the back for having introduced the concept of interest free cash advances. It was something that was suggested and demanded by farm organizations for many years in advance of that. But, in 1957, the government of John Diefenbaker introduced interest free cash advances in the west. Later on, the hon. Eugene Whelan who was the Minister of Agriculture introduced the same concept for the rest of Canada and for other commodities.

The system worked well. The government and the people of Canada got good money for their relatively small investment. Even now, when inflation and high interest rates have carried the cost of the program up, the Minister of Finance estimated that it would cost in the neighbourhood of only $27 million this year.

When one looks at the cost savings that were achieved from those cash advances, one can readily see that it was a very good investment on an annual basis. It took away the incentive for farmers to plug the elevator system and the transportation system in order to get money. By being able get a cash advance on the grain that was stored on their farms, farmers could pay their operating costs and continue to get through the winter. That is very important in a country like ours where the water transportation freezes up.

If you are a Manitoba farmer, once the Lakehead freezes in December no grain moves. Farmers cannot sell grain. They sit on it at their farms and yet, unfortunately, the expenses that those people have continue over the winter. They still have to eat. They still have to keep their buildings warm. They still have to make repairs to their equipment. The costs go on but there is no chance of income once winter sets in.

Similarly, in other areas of the country where different commodities are being raised, as in the fruit and vegetable area, lack of interest free cash advances will simply mean that they will return to the bad old days when they tended to deliver their produce early. When farmers deliver their produce early, they tend to depress the market. Because they depress the market they have to deliver even more produce in order to get the necessary dollars to pay their expenses, and before they are finished, instead of spreading the deliveries of things like rutabagas and turnips over 11 or 12 months, they are all out of product some time in February, March or early April, and the country has to depend on imports in order to make up the difference. So it is very costly for the country to do that. We think that for $27 million the continuation of an interest free cash advance makes ultimate sense.

In western Canada, in large part due to the interest free cash advance program the commercial elevator system was pared down. We did not need as much commercial storage if there was no incentive for farmers to get it into the commercial system. As long as they could keep their finances in order, they would store it at home. The farmer has already had to pay for storage at home. Most of the commercial elevator system in western Canada at least is co–operatively owned so the farmers own it twice. They were able to reduce their investment in the commercial system by some 40 per cent. If you look at the cost of building new elevators now, and if you were going to return to the kind of storage capacity that the commercial system had back in 1957, that new investment would cost more in interest each year than what this $27 million annually is costing now, and thus we avoid the pressure on the market which keeps the price down.

I can understand why a newly formulated free market oriented Conservative Government like we have had in the last two governments would want to move in this direction. It fits with their philosophy. They want to do things that will assist their friends in the grain trade and that will permit them to get lower priced grain. The government loves to see the market under pressure and farmers being forced to dump their grain and to take less than the cost of production. They love that. I understand why their supporters are all for it. But the farmers are not too intrigued with this idea. They do not think that they should be paying interest on the cash advance. Not only are they opposed to paying interest on it for the reasons that I have outlined, but they look at their international competitive position and they say: "Things are not changing in the United States. If I lived across the line I would be able to have this kind of privilege. Why is our government taking it away from us?"

They look at the Europeans and find the same thing. Why is Canada taking the initiative in this area? Why is Canada doing apparently everything it can to see that agriculture prices are forced down by putting pressure on producers to deliver early and to deliver too much to the market?

Not only does it do that but, as I have said, the forced dumping in many cases with many products means that at the end of the season we are forced to import products as well, which costs the economy of the country. From an economic point of view it makes no sense at all.

The government's arguments have been a real lesson in the modern politics of the Conservative era. They did not tell anyone in the election that this was part of the election program. No one knew that once re-elected this government would take away interest free cash advances. It was not part of the mandate. It was never breathed during the election. The only things we heard from Conservative candidates, including the Prime Minister, were soothing comments about how when farmers need help the government would be behind them and would always be on the side of the farmer. Why have they abandoned them now?

Prior notice is extremely important in a seasonal business like agriculture where decisions have to be made almost a year in advance. There was no prior notice until the delayed budget of April 27, the first in the history of the country during a sitting Parliament where a government came in to present a budget after the old fiscal year had ended. Virtually all of the farmers had been to their banks to arrange their credit for the summer. Their banks had no idea that there would not be a cash advance program sitting there waiting for them in the fall. The banks looked at their situation and decided how much they would lend them for the summer based on the secure knowledge that there would be a cash advance system available in the fall and the bank would have its money back within six months. Then the budget came.

That did not scare anyone very much in the banking community because there was not any immediate action. In fact, it was three months later, on June 26, that the government and the Minister of Agriculture and Deputy Prime Minister introduced Bill C-32 which outlined the method whereby the government was going to introduce this policy. It became fairly clear at that stage that there would not be any interest free cash advances in the fall.

But the government did not pursue the bill. There were only two days debate in the House before it recessed for the summer. The government decided to make the recess one month longer than normal. When we did come back the new crop year for those in the Wheat Board area had been in effect since August 1, and here we were back in session at the end of September. At that point in time the government decided to withdraw C-32.

When news of that filtered out the day before it was to be withdrawn, there were cheers in the farm community saying that at last the government had good sense, they realized that they were wrong, they are going to listen to the many farm groups and the advisory committee of the Wheat Board, the NFU and so on—

Is it not a 20-minute speech, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will have to cut you off in 30 seconds for Question Period. You may continue afterwards.

Mr. Althouse: They took heart. They thought that at last the government was withdrawing a bad bill and that they had succeeded in getting their message through to the government, as the senior citizens had done before them in stopping the deindexation of pensions many years before. I will continue my remarks after Question Period.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being eleven o'clock, we will proceed to statements by members with the hon. member for Elk Island.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

MANUFACTURERS' SALES TAX

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, some of the most important manufacturing industries in the province of Alberta are located in the riding of Elk Island. These industries provide tens of thousands of jobs in our riding.

• (1100)

The existing federal sales tax, the MST, is an unfair, unworkable tax on production. The MST is unfair because it results in more taxes on Canadian made goods than on goods from other countries. The MST is unworkable because it taxes some while allowing tax avoidance for others.

The Canadian government must take a leadership role in improving the tax system. Our government must prepare this country for the economic challenges of the future.

The MST is wrong for Elk Island. The MST is wrong for Canada. The MST must be replaced. Let us work together in this House to get rid of the MST. Let us work together to prepare our country for success in the competitive world of international trade. Let us work together to build a stronger economy for a better Canada.

CAPE BRETON ECONOMY

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the economy in industrial Cape Breton and indeed all of Cape Breton is at an all time low.

This is coupled with the fact that the Nova Scotia Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency recently released a demographic forecast for all of Nova Scotia to the year 2006, which states: "The population forecast for Cape Breton County, which includes the seven towns and the City of Sydney contained therein, forecasts an average population decline of 936 per year for each year from 1986 to the year 2006."

This news coupled with the tragic economic situation in Cape Breton calls upon the Government of Canada to provide the kind of economic leadership that this region of Canada needs.

I have asked the minister responsible for the Cape Breton Development Corporation to give us a clear and unequivocal commitment to maintain the operations at the Lingan mine in Cape Breton. I have asked this minister to give us a clear commitment with regard to the promotion and the expansion of the Donkin coal mine, on which the Government of Canada has spent close to $80 million.

This is a time for the Government of Canada to intervene in the economy of Cape Breton in order to provide economic opportunities for those citizens.

ACID RAIN

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the all-party Standing Committee on the Environment will travel to Washington, D.C. next week to encourage our colleagues in the U.S. Congress to strengthen their clean air legislation and resolve to reduce acid rain from U.S. sources.

The proposed cuts to sulphur dioxides are just barely in the ball park to help Canada. The proposals on nitrogen oxides are not helpful; the caps on emissions need firming up; reductions of transboundary flows of toxics need targets and timetables.

Canada also has much to do. New dirty coal fired plants are proposed in western Canada. Further actions are required in central Canada. New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have yet to bring in much needed regulations. To the great embarrassment of Canada, New Brunswick Power has been pushing for two new Columbian coal fired thermal plants without scrubbers at Belledune. The emissions from such plants are unacceptable to Canada, and as though by political witchcraft these plants are as of yesterday proposed to be fired by low sulphur oil or natural gas.

The environmental damage from acid rain is well over $1 billion per year in Canada, well over $5 billion per year in the United States. A cut of 10 million of sulphur oxides in the U.S. will cost $15 billion, a cost borne in just three years by the U.S. environment.

Canada had best get moving seriously on cleaning up our acid rain sources, existing and proposed, if we are to expect credibility in our fight to get the U.S. to do the same.

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, once again the federal Government, through its Environment Minister, showed its leadership at the federal-provincial conference of Environment Ministers held this week in Charlottetown.

The federal Government agreed to invest $100 million in the clean-up of abandoned contaminated sites in this country. The provinces agreed to do their share by contributing $100 million to this project.

Mr. Speaker, when we talk about the number of abandoned contaminated sites in this country, Abitibi—Témiscamingue probably and unfortunately holds the record for the most sites in any given region. Governments must act responsibly in this case, and that is why I demand a fair share of this agreement for my region, so that we can deal with the serious environmental problems caused by mine tailings, a major source of pollution.

I therefore want to ask the MNAs for the Abitibi—Témiscamingue area for their support in this attempt to take advantage of the opportunity we now have to do something positive for our environment.

BILL C-21

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the government has ignored the vital expertise of the public service employees who deal every day with out of work Canadians.

The employees of Canada employment centres have called Bill C-21 an incompassionate piece of legislation, forcing them to play a more negative policing role and eroding trust between them and their clients.

They are the ones every day who face the desperation, frustration, and anger of the unemployed without adequate resources.

[Translation]

The employment sector in the Department of Employment and Immigration has suffered substantial attrition during the past five years as a result of Tory cut-backs.

[English]

The minister's sole excuse for the devastation she is foisting on the unemployed is more training, more help finding a job, more employment options, yet she has not provided for one additional employee to give these services.

What she has done is to provide in Bill C-21 for the contracting out of these services. Bill C-21 sets up the privatization of Canada employment centres.

The minister intends to pay for this with increased premiums and with the food and rent money she is taking out of the pockets of the unemployed.

THE ARTS

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, last Sunday, October 15, Quebec's cultural industry paid tribute to its artists and performing artists at the 11th Adisq Gala.

Forty-five Felix trophies were given to outstanding members of our artistic and cultural community, including Drummondville's cultural centre and its director, Mr. Roland Janelle, who was awarded the title of "Diffuseur de l'année" in Quebec.

The Drummondville cultural centre is considered by the arts community as an outstanding institution with a sophisticated audience.

This award confirms the superiority of the Drummondville cultural centre in the kind of services it offers to artists, producers and the audience.

Congratulations are most certainly in order here, and we wish them well in all their future activities. In fact, I am very pleased that my government has supported a number of projects initiated by this organization for a number of years, for the benefit of the arts world in Quebec and the people of my riding.

LABOUR

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, it is a dark day in Canada for the labour movement when the Minister of Labour, who calls himself the Minister of Labour but is not interested in ordinary working people, gives notice that as of the end of this year there will be no further government funding possible for the Canada Centre for Occupational Health and Safety and when he fires the executive director and president who has been the basis and the foundation of that organization for the last 10 years.

I would like to ask the Minister of Labour about the Canada Centre for Occupational Health and Safety which provided information to the people of St. Basile le Grand.

When they had this problem with PCBs, where did they go for information? They went to the Canada Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

[English]

Who is going to be able to speak to the workers who are injured in industrial accidents, who face explosions, who want to understand the basis for chemicals? Who is going to get information about the International Labour Organization? Who is going to get information from NIOSH?

The decision of this minister to assassinate the Canada Centre for Occupational Health and Safety may be a laughing matter for certain Conservatives across this country. It is not a laughing matter among working people, and we intend to pursue this issue with every last breath we have.

EDUCATION

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, we are approaching the end of National Universities Week. Coming as I do from a province which possess several fine colleges and universities, both English and French institutions, I wish to express my respect for the immense contribution which they make to our society.

As other colleagues have noted throughout this week, higher education is more important today than ever before. The rapid growth of knowledge, particularly in the fields of science and technology, is presenting Canadians with ever more significant career challenges and opportunities. Universities do truly open doors to these opportunities.

While a university education is an important personal investment for a great many Canadians, support for universities is also an essential investment for governments at all levels on behalf of society. For example, the research being undertaken at Canadians universities is constantly helping us to address pressing concerns about our environment, health, and our capabilities to maintain the standards of living which we enjoy in the face of ever increasing foreign competition.

In this emerging world economy Canada's prosperity will depend on our ability to lead our competitors. That means Canadians will need to generate knowledge and use it creatively. To do that, Canada needs healthy and productive universities. Let us all commit to help keep them that way.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, in my riding today, as a matter of fact right at this very moment, the media are being briefed on a very special project piloted by Atomic Energy of Canada on the concept of deep underground disposal of used nuclear fuel from Canada's nuclear generating stations, none of which by the way are in my riding.

Earlier this week a representative of Atomic Energy of Canada came to my office and presented a series of very impressive and well designed documents, which I have in my hand, explaining this very project.

My staff was told that these media briefings are part of a normal procedure. However I would like to object to such procedures, given that an environmental task force has been set up to independently assess the same project, which by the way has not even started yet.

I find it objectionable that a government department is jumping the gun, so to speak, and has started its own lobbying at taxpayers' expense. I would hope that the Minister of the Environment would want these environmental assessments to be conducted in a fair and independent manner.

Mr. Speaker, you have already ruled on a similar advertising scheme; perhaps you would like to examine this one as well.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the August Supreme Court decision in CN-CP against Alberta Government Tel clearly found that the CRTC had jurisdiction over all telephone companies which participate in Telecom Canada, including the three prairie telephone companies.

The Railway Act amendments proposed yesterday do not change services; they do not change rates or affect ownership. The amendments do what the court said had to be done, that is, provide a consistent national regulatory structure under the CRTC.

The Minister of Communications said yesterday that it was his objective to preserve universal access to basic services at affordable prices while taking into account regional differences. He also said that he would ensure that all Canadians, particularly those in rural areas, would have access to quality services.

Residents of the rural prairies will expect that the minister will fulfil his commitment in ways that are fair and equitable.

CANADA POST

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, on October 10, Canada Post has, by way of letter, informed members of Parliament serving the northern regions of Canada including the Northwest Territories that a whopping, senseless 32 per cent increase in postal rates will be implemented following the 30-day notification requirement.

Canada Post is hereby sacrificing the welfare of those living in remote areas for the sake of profit making. The letter states: "Canada Post Corporation operates a business and as such cannot assume the cost of operating in a revenue losing situation".

Canada is a very large country, and each and every one of its citizens deserves equal treatment and has the right to a decent livelihood ensured by services such as Canada Post. It is clearly abandoning natives and northern residents.

Is it the government's intention to cut its deficit on the backs of those who can least afford it? What are you trying to do to the northern residents of Ontario and of northern Canada?

NATURAL GAS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I was privileged to represent the government and participate in the official opening of the Schrader Creek compressor station owned and operated by the gas transmission division of Nova Corporation of Alberta. This station located in the Caroline area operates on three major pipelines delivering clean burning, efficient natural gas to market.

Nova has been recognized as a good corporate citizen and a good employer throughout Alberta. This station incorporates the latest in technology to improve efficiency of operation, safety for employees and the environment around the plant.

Nova is to be commended for making this investment in its employees health and safety and congratulated for its confidence in the economy of this country which is going to make this investment a very practical one for them and for the country.

MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the recent trip to South Africa by the Conservative member of Parliament for Portage—Interlake must be condemned by all members of this House. This embarrassing incident is nothing new for the member for Portage—Interlake, and unfortunately nothing new for the Conservative party.

The Prime Minister, while trying to project an image as a world statesman and a leader of the fight to abolish apartheid, has work to do within his own caucus.

When asked about this trip with regards to government policy, the member for Portage—Interlake said that he did not agree with all the actions taken. By going to South Africa he has ignored the government position on tourism. By spending money in South Africa he has ignored the economic sanctions the government applauds. By going to the game farms in South Africa for his own pleasure he has relegated basic human rights to only a minor consideration.

The member for Portage—Interlake owes the government, the House, and Canada an apology.

CANADA–U.S. EXTRADITION TREATY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, Charles Ng has been in Canada for over four years, despite the fact that he is wanted for a series of brutal murders in California.

Ng's lawyers have managed to prevent his extradition through a series of appeals, all of which have been rejected, including the latest appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

It is time to send Ng back. I urge the Minister of Justice to use the Canada–U.S. Extradition Treaty to return Ng to face justice in California.

We simply cannot allow this country to become a haven for fugitives from justice.

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

SOUTH AFRICA

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. On the subject of South Africa the Prime Minister is quoted yesterday as saying that he wants to bring South Africa to its senses, not to its knees.

This, and the series of weak-kneed statements on the part of our Prime Minister on the subject of South African sanctions, has been alarming to all Canadians and those abroad who care about dismantling apartheid in South Africa.

The South African government's announcement of the international bank agreement easing debt repayment heightens the alarm.

What is more important to our government—diplomatic compromising with Margaret Thatcher or dismantling apartheid in South Africa?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I believe that yesterday I was very clear about the intentions of the Government of Canada, and we will continue to exert pressure on South Africa until apartheid is dismantled. That is our main position.

As for the debt rescheduling to which the hon. member referred, I can inform her that we have always tried to obtain the severest possible conditions. Perhaps I may point out to the hon. member that the measures announced yesterday in this new package provided for only three and half years, as opposed to Pretoria's request for 10 years, and although in most cases where a debt is rescheduled, countries get new capital, South Africa did not.

Furthermore, although a country usually only has to pay the interest, not the principal, South Africa must pay 20.5 per cent of the principal, in addition to the interest. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention that the Union Bank of Switzerland, a member of the rescheduling committee, described the agreement as rather harsh and said it was the most they could obtain. We will keep exerting pressure on South Africa, until apartheid is dismantled.

[English]

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, an amazing comment which appears to be condoning the lessening of South African debt burden.

On September 28, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that 12 of the 14 major banks co-ordinating South Africa's debt "agreed that they would be seeking the highest possible interest payments and the fastest possible repayments", a tough line but empty rhetoric given yesterday's announcement.

What will Canada do to press Canadian and international banks to increase pressure on South Africa's dismantling of apartheid? Or, is this government prepared to simply sit idly by and take no responsibility?

[Translation]

Mrs. Landry: Mr. Speaker, you will recall that the Secretary of State for External Affairs asked the banks not to approve new loans for South Africa, and this request was upheld. In the present case, there are no Canadian banks on the committee. The committee has rescheduled the debt, and Canadian banks are part of the package. We will continue to ask the banks to do what they have already done, which is to approve no new loans for South Africa, and we will keep up the pressure.

• (1120)

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, interesting comments from this government when yesterday the Australian Prime Minister, Mr. Hawke, stated that he regretted the bank's decision and the Zambian President, Mr. Kaunda, condemned the banks and stated: "They are sucking the blood out of black South Africans' economy". A Canadian official yesterday is quoted as saying that the South African Bank rescheduling of debt represents "a propaganda victory for South Africa".

This is the wrong signal that we are giving. Will this government immediately announce increased Canadian sanctions against South Africa to ensure that the pressure is maintained?

Mrs. Landry: Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to an article by Albert Juneau that appeared this morning in Le Devoir, and I quote:

> The Commonwealth countries have agreed to maintain current sanctions. Their effectiveness is no longer questioned—

The article goes on to say:

> Canada's position was therefore reasonable: no new sanctions, except for stricter credit requirements. From now on, the main issue in South Africa is political. The time is ripe for a dialogue between the various components of South Africa's mosaic. Pretoria must initiate negotiations with anti-apartheid groups. The banks have given it some breathing space. Will South Africa take this opportunity to implement reforms that are already long overdue?

Mr. Speaker, we have taken the necessary steps. We will go on doing so by reinforcing sanctions, and of course we hope that negotiations will finally achieve our ultimate goal, which is to dismantle apartheid.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Yesterday, the National Energy Board approved the export to the United States of over 90 per cent of Canada's Arctic natural gas reserves. This comes at a time when concerns about the environment will likely increase greatly the demand for natural gas, which is considered a cleaner fuel than oil.

Will the minister tell this House whether his department has conducted a study of Canada's long-term natural gas needs, particularly in the context of natural gas being seen as an environmentally safe fuel?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in respect of the National Energy Board approval of the export licence, the first point that I want to make to the hon. member is that any approval of the board is still subject to cabinet scrutiny.

I would say to the hon. member that while she makes the point about gas being a clean burning fuel, the government has programs in places like Vancouver, Alberta, Winnipeg, Toronto, New York, Hamilton and San Diego, where we are using Canadian technology to have cleaner burning methods for mass transit systems. Those who are interested in the environment might even think that that is important. We do, but maybe the critic for the environment does not.

Second, I say to the hon. member that while the 9.2 trillion cubic feet has been approved, the Canadian Geological Society of Canada places the estimated reserves in the Beaufort at 56 trillion, which is about six times more than the approval on the gas export licence which the NEB gave yesterday.

Mrs. Callbeck: Mr. Speaker, those are potential figures. The fact is that the board itself has admitted that it does not know what effect this increased concern for the environment will have on gas demand. In fact one of the authors of the report that was issued yesterday said that it may well be true that gas demand could increase substantially as Canadians look for cleaner fuels.

The minister has just said that cabinet has to approve this decision, and I know that. I want to ask the minister: Will he refuse to approve this National Energy Board decision until a study has been conducted so that Canadians are confident their energy future is not being exported to the United States?

Mr. Epp: The National Energy Board in any of the approvals that it grants examines the ongoing needs as well as projected needs of Canadians for natural gas.

I gave the hon. member figures from the Geological Society on the Beaufort. There is another point that has to be made. If one looks at the period of the National Energy Program one finds very quickly that gas in the ground when kept does not increase our supply, does not increase our explorations, and does not increase the ability of Canadians to bring more gas on stream.

I believe that the market-place is the best place to do it. I believe that the National Energy Board is well positioned to balance interests for Canadian gas usage and gas consumption as well as gas reserves, along with the economic needs of Canadians.

The hon. member has to remember that in the 1970s when the Berger commission was formed, Mr. Berger himself said there should be a 10-year moratorium on two issues primarily, one being land claims. If one takes a look at the COPE agreement which was completed and the statement of principles with the Dene-Métis which has until 1991 to conclude, one will find that the very people who went before the National Energy Board on request for approval for a gas export licence were native people, native leaders.

They are now cabinet ministers in the Northwest Territories. They are looking at the economic advantages. They are looking at their future. They do not want to be any more dependent than any of us.

I say to the hon. member that the best way to bring on more gas is to allow the market-place to get out to find gas, to keep reserves there for Canadians, and to maintain the economic benefits that come from it.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister who I well understand, as the House does, is away on official business, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister concerning the government's obvious, deliberate plan to mislead the people of this country about the impact of the trade deal on them.

Since the Prime Minister, in the House on October 10, refused to provide me with an assessment of the job impact of the trade deal and since the minister of trade, on June 20 last in the House, indicated the government was monitoring the impact of the trade deal, I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Does the government have some kind of an assessment of the job impact and, if so, will it table it in the House now so that everyone can see what it is?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the leader of the New Democratic Party for the question, because it will give us an opportunity to explain what the article in The Toronto Star was referring to.

The document is merely a collection of media clippings from various newspapers which announced plant openings, expansion of employment in this country, and so on. It is not an official document or an official analysis. The Minister for International Trade, recently in this House, made it very clear that he would hope that he would be able to make a report sometime next year after the free trade agreement had been in place for about a year. It is a little early to assess the benefits of the free trade agreement at this time.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. The same minister that he is referring to, namely, the Minister for International Trade, did not hesitate to use the list that he has just referred to, prepared by his officials, in the House on June 20 when he talked and boasted about jobs that had been created by Alcan Aluminium, Cargill, Novacor Chemicals, and others.

He did not mention, as he could have, other companies on the same list that had shut down operations and were putting new investments in the U.S. In short, it was a very selective report from the list to the House of Commons.

The minister has refused and the Deputy Prime Minister didn't answer. What I asked for was a list. I have a copy of the list that the minister himself was using. I want the minister to acknowledge now that when the Minister for International Trade last June was quoting from it he was doing it on a very selective basis by giving only good news and not providing the bad news. When is this government going to be honest and direct with the people of Canada about what is going on in this country?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to listen to the leader of the New Democratic Party talk about selectivity because if anybody preaches bad news around this country it is the leader of the New Democratic Party who selects very carefully some cases.

I can give the hon. leader some cases in my community where plants have rationalized and closed down because of the free trade agreement, but I can also give examples of plants that have opened up in my community because of the free trade agreement.

Mr. Broadbent: Do it!

Mr. McDermid: As a matter of fact, I just opened a plant the other day in Etobicoke, called Kodak Canada, a brand new chemical plant for recycled plastic bottles, and I can tell you it is there because of the free trade agreement. it didn't move to the United States.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister just revealed what we want. We want the government to produce the studies. He has accused us of providing bad news. What we ask for is an honest objective assessment with the pluses and negatives. That is what we want from the government.

The minister of trade promised on the twentieth that the government would be monitoring. According to some, about 57,000 jobs have been lost because of the trade deal. Since the people of Canada have a right to know, will the minister now produce the list, the copy of which I have, and any other documentation that the government has so that the people of Canada can understand in an honest and clear way what is happening with this deal. We just want the truth from this government.

Mr. McDermid: This government is very straight forward. If he is honest with the house, the hon. member will know that during the free trade debate discussions took place regarding rationalization of industries and so on. There are pluses and minuses and we said that at the time. He has to admit that. He has just said yes, so he admits that. There were pluses and minuses. The hon. member stands up in the House and preaches minuses every day.

I can tell the hon. member that the proof is in the pudding. There have been 158,000 new jobs created this year already. That is a plus. That shows that the free trade agreement is working.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, on August 15, 1984, during the election campaign in Kingston, Ontario, the Prime Minister, then the Leader of the Opposition, said this: "If the Canadian people see fit to give us their trust we will always give them ours." He went on: "That means an end to the obsession with secrecy."

Today the Minister of Finance is refusing to disclose documents which his own deputy minister recommends be made public. Why is the minister refusing to comply with the laws of this country and why is he violating the undertaking that his own Prime Minister gave to the Canadian people?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are going to be making documents available, but there are some documents that are clearly advice to the minister which will not be made available. I think that is—

Some Hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. members ask why. Because there is an element of the Access to Information Act which requires that if there are documents that are advice to ministers, that should be retained as confidential advice and should not be made available according to the Access to Information Act. I said in the House that we would be making available information that the applicant was entitled to under the Access to Information Act, and that information will be made available.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the facts seem to be that the minister is refusing to disclose 530 pages of information that his own officials gathered in response to this request, and he says that that is all advice to the minister. It is easy to cover this up in this way. I suggest to the minister that in accordance with the Prime Minister's undertaking to the people, he has an obligation to, in the Prime Minister's words, "end this obsession with secrecy".

How can the minister justify this stonewalling in his own department? Is it because he misled Canadians during the election campaign?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that is clearly no. There is a long-standing tradition that information that is advice to the minister has to be kept confidential under the Access to Information Act. If advice to ministers is not kept confidential, then that flow of advice from the officials to the minister will be broken. Clearly it is in the interest of parliamentary government not to have that flow of information broken, which is clearly advice from the deputy minister, from the department to the minister.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, this is incredible. The budget forecast documents requested by The Ottawa Citizen were pulled together in five days by the Department of Finance. Ninety-seven days later the Minister of Finance rose in this House and said, "It has taken a while to pull this information together".

I want an explanation from the minister. Is it not because release of the documents will show that indeed the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance misled Canadians in the last election?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, that is not the reason. We have made it very clear that through the activities and the actions that this government has taken, department by department, we are complying with the Access to Information Act. If the hon. member checks the record of the Department of Finance, I think he will find that the record of providing that information is good. What we are doing today is consistent with what we have done over the past five years, and it is completely in accordance with the Access to Information Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I checked the statements made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, and I would like to read one of them. During the 1988 campaign, Prime Minister Mulroney said his Government had taken care of the deficit, that all promises made by the Conservatives were and would be within Michael Wilson's financial limits and that everything had been calculated down to the last cent. If the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance were telling the truth during the election campaign, why do they now refuse to release documents that would show whether Canadians got a frank and open response to their questions from this Government?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have provided information on a range of things over the course of our experience in government that demonstrates we are providing documentation that is,"frank and open", to use the member's words.

I have commented on a number of occasions about the particular matter that was raised during the election campaign. I commented on that during the election campaign, and after the election campaign.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is in the same area. As the House knows, the minister promised to provide this information back on October 10. We now know that yesterday the minister overruled the advice given to him by his own deputy minister, Mr. Fred Gorbet. We also know that he has overruled the request of Inger Hansen, the information commissioner.

Can the minister explain to the House today his personal reason for not complying with the request of the information commissioner? What is his personal reason for overruling his own officials and the deputy minister of finance? Did the Minister of Finance indeed practise electoral fraud against the people of Canada during the last election campaign?

• (1140)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, could the hon. member repeat that question?

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I want to know the personal reason why the Minister of Finance has chosen not to release the budget forecast and the forecast on the deficit and interest rates that were made by the Ministry of Finance back in the fall and summer of 1988.

I want to know why he has overridden his own deputy minister of finance, why he overruled Inger Hansen, the information officer? Why does he not have faith in his own officials when they provided him with this information back on August 30? Why did he not release that information? What is the personal reason for that? Did he, indeed, practise electoral fraud against the people of Canada back in 1988?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think that is quite uncalled for language. I will not comment specifically on that, but I reject it totally. He asked what the personal reason. There is no personal reason. The reason we are not providing this information is that it was advice to the minister provided by the officials of the department.

The decision that we have taken here is completely in accord with the letter and the intent and the spirit of the Access to Information Act.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the minister said that "we have not decided to release the information". What I want to know is why he decided not to release the information. The information was given to him by his own deputy minister, by his own access to information people in his own department.

I want to know why he does not have faith in the judgment of his own deputy minister, faith in the judgment of his people who work in his own department in access to information. I want to know why he made the decision, not we, but why he made the decision not to come clean and give us that budget forecasting information from 1988.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me state quite categorically that I have full faith in the advice of my deputy minister, Mr. Gorbet. If the hon. member wants me to insert "I" for every time that I used "we" when I was referring to the decision, I am happy to do so.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications. It concerns the proposed amendments to the Railway Act which would have the CRTC solely regulate the telecommunications industry.

Can he respond to the concerns expressed by the Government of Saskatchewan that certain services now provided by Sask-Tel could be significantly more costly if Sask-Tel, in fact, comes under the regulatory jurisdiction of the CRTC?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question and the opportunity to clarify the intent of the amendments to the Railway Act.

These were called for as a result of the August 14 decisi1on of the Supreme Court of Canada. I can assure the hon. member that the amendments which flow to clear up jurisdictional confusion in the situation and to establish the federal regulatory authority in no way affect the structure, the rates or the autonomy of the prairie telephone companies. Indeed, it is my understanding that there have been discussions as recently as this morning between the Government of Canada and Premier Devine. Those assurances have been given and there will be continuing consultations while this bill is before the House.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Since the beginning of the year, businesses in Montreal have published 85 notices of permanent collective lay–offs, resulting in the loss of about 6,000 jobs in Montreal. Yesterday, we asked a number of questions about the loss of 200 jobs in Montreal at Eastern Airlines, while this month, Domtar announced the loss of 500 jobs and VIA Rail the loss of 900 jobs.

Is the government now prepared to listen to Montreal's workers and implement a special program to replace these lost jobs? What does the Government intend to do?

Hon. Jean Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce has a very selective memory, because if he took the time to calculate the number of jobs created in the Montreal region between September 1984 and September 1989, he might realize, to his surprise, that 160,000 jobs were created on Montreal Island since our government came to power. We can even do better than that, Mr. Speaker, because if the Hon. Member would take the trouble to compare the results under this government with the results under a Liberal government of which he was a member, he would realize that under his government, Montreal Island lost 4,000 jobs. That is the difference between a liberal government and a conservative government!

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, so far this year, 6,000 lay–offs have been announced at Montreal. These include Gillette, 590; Weston, 360; Kraft, 290; Warnaco, 140; Simpson's, 1,100; Marconi, 300; Geoffrion–Leclerc, 300; Northern Telecom, 250; Hostess, Frito–Lay, 110; Rothman's, 239; Vickers, 380; M.A.N. Ashton, 215; Unisys, 230; Domtar, 500; VIA Rail, 913; Eastern Airlines, 200 jobs. When will the government stop its rhetoric and give us some action?

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, speaking of rhetoric, the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce knows full well that under this government, on the Island of Montreal we created 160,000 jobs which compares fairly well to the fact that under the last Liberal government 4,000 jobs were lost. The unemployment rate on the Island of Montreal in Quebec went from 11.3 per cent to 8 per cent.

I noticed also on the list of things that have happened on the Island of Montreal that the hon. member seems to have forgotten a few things, starting with Bill C–22 which this government put through. What about the investment in Canadair that created 2,500 jobs? What about the space agency? What about the Liberal government's memory? The Liberals have know better than to get up and give us a sermon about the Island of Montreal.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture. It concerns the yoghurt and ice cream decision. Last week Robert Wright, the Canadian representative at the GATT negotiations in Geneva, said that the decision on yogurt and ice cream was so narrow that he could not see how the dairy supply–management system could continue to operate and that Canada was being asked to abandon its system. Those are devastating words coming from the Canadian representative at the GATT negotiations.

I wonder if the Minister of Agriculture can make a commitment today to Canadian dairy farmers right across the country, which will have an implication for other supply–management systems and marketing boards in this country, that the government will oppose this decision by the GATT panel and will refuse to implement it.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is absolutely right, this is a very narrow decision and that is precisely why this government, before the MTN negotiations, has taken the position that Article 11 has to be strengthened, clarified and brought into line with the realities of the 21st century. The fact of the matter is the wording that was developed in 1947 leaves open interpretations that allow these kinds of decisions to come forth.

We started that process, and the opposition has condemned us for it. It has condemned us for dealing with Article 11 in order to strengthen and clarify it. It accused us in that process of undermining Article 11, when, in fact, we are trying to clarify and strengthen it.

We have taken a very clear position in consultation with the dairy industry and with the provinces to fight this particular interpretation. We are soliciting the support of other council member countries, and as the hon. member knows, the meeting where this issue will be considered by the GATT council has been delayed pending further study and implication of this very important issue. My sense is that we are getting support from other council members. I would hope that we have the support of the hon. member.

As I said in the House yesterday, this government stands firmly committed to the principles of supply management and Article 11 is one of the keystones of maintaining supply management. We stand in full support of it in the GATT and we stood in full support of it in the free trade agreement.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, what I asked the minister was whether the government would refuse to accept this decision by the GATT panel and refuse to implement it. I wish the minister would respond simply to that question. We ask that specifically because the former Minister of Agriculture went around the country telling Canadian farmers that by simply transferring yoghurt and ice cream from the tariff list to the import control list he would protect the underpinnings of supply management. We know that to be a fraud.

Would the minister simply answer these two questions? Will he refuse to implement this and will he oppose it? And will he admit that the former Minister of Agriculture and the government, last year during the free trade debate, actually deliberately misled the Canadian people and Canadian dairy farmers?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think we will strike out the last part of that statement.

Mr. Mazankowski: I find it strange, Mr. Speaker, that when there is a GATT decision that is unfavourable to Canada these guys run for cover when most of the time they believe that you can get your protection from GATT. This is a GATT decision. This is a GATT panel decision and the hon. member should recognize that. We have several options available. I am not going to disclose our strategy on the floor of the House because it would impair our position in defending the best interests of Canada when this deal is dealt with before the GATT council.

SOUTH AFRICA

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, we have had quite a week as far as Canada's international reputation is concerned as it relates to South Africa. We have seen the Prime Minister boasting of Canada's leading role in fighting apartheid. The rescheduling of the South African debt makes a hollow mockery of that. The Canadian NGO community in Canada told the government what was going to happen. We have no leverage in regard to financial sanctions.

My question is to the Deputy Prime Minister. Who is determining Canadian foreign policy; the bankers in the boardrooms or the Canadian government?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I think this Government has shown that its anti-apartheid policy is very clear-cut and very effective.

As stated by the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs at the Commonwealth Conference, we will continue to exert the pressure on South Africa through our current sanctions, to ensure that the present government will ultimately have to change its position.

As for financial sanctions, as I explained earlier the package was negotiated by 14 banks which imposed conditions that were much stricter than before, and we will continue to initate measures with a view to dismantling apartheid.

[English]

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, the minister, in an answer to the previous question on this matter, admitted that South Africa now has a breathing space. What I want to know is, will the government wipe the egg off its face and immediately impose comprehensive, mandatory sanctions against South Africa?

[Translation]

Mrs. Landry: Mr. Speaker, I already explained that sanctions had achieved certain results, and everyone acknowledges this. I mentioned this earlier when I quoted a newspaper article.

We shall continue to strengthen and intensify our sanctions as planned, and of course we do hope, since there have been initial overtures, that the governement of South Africa will back down and initiate negotiations with the anti-apartheid movements.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Alberta is the only province in Canada that does not have a provincial sales tax. Although we do have a federal sales tax, it is presently included in the price of our goods. Alberta business and consumers alike are not comfortable with an add-on sales tax. When we change to the GST, will the federal tax be included in the selling price as it is now, or will it be added on at the cash register?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has pointed out, the GST is a very visible tax, quite contrary to the manufacturers' sales tax which is buried in the price of everything we buy today. We have proposed as a model presentation that the tax be included in the price of a product on the shelf, but that the tax be broken out at the cash register so that when the consumer is making a budgeting decision he knows not only the price on the shelf but the amount of tax when he goes to pay the final price at the cash register.

INDUSTRY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry. As the minister will know, the Wonder Bra textile factory in Hawkesbury, Ontario, in my riding announced yesterday that it was shutting its doors, putting 100 people out of work in a community of 10,000. That is about the same as losing 10,000 jobs in Montreal or Toronto, proportionately. This will not likely feature in the minister's book of free trade success stories.

What is the government going to do for my constituents of Hawkesbury, who are losing their jobs, most of them held by women, on this cold rainy fall day? What is he going to do to assist them?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, in terms of the last part of that question we have a very good system of support programs for people. Every year in Canada 3 million people change jobs, for lay-offs, for various reasons, and the support systems are there to make that possible.

But in terms of this particular plant, the company in question, Candella has four plants in Canada. It is closing its Hawkesbury plant on February 19, 1990. The 86 employees affected will be laid off but 86 new jobs will be added to the Matane plant. They are consolidating in Matane. The total number of jobs with this company in Canada will remain the same. There will be a consolidation.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, that resettlement policy will not impress my constituents.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, on November 10, 1987, Investment Canada allowed Wonder Bra to take over its main competitor, Daisy Fresh Creations. Less than two years later, the plants are closing. Why did the government allow Investment Canada to eliminate the competition and make my constituents lose their jobs?

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, Investment Canada's responsibilities refer to Canada as a whole, not just Hawkesbury. As I pointed out, in this instance there is no loss of jobs to Canada as a whole.

I understand the hon. member's concern for his constituency, and quite properly he is expressing concern for his constituents. But surely he is not suggesting that the Government of Canada should intervene and say no to this company, you cannot open up 86 new jobs in Matane, you must retain them in Hawkesbury because your member of Parliament demands it. Surely he is not asking that.

NATIONAL DISEASE CONTROL LABORATORY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The decision to locate the National Disease Control Laboratory in Winnipeg has been badly handled right from the beginning. In fact, without being unkind, I could say that it has been botched.

On July 19, 1989, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated that the laboratory would be situated at a site near the mint. On September 29 I received a letter from the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicating that the site had not yet been selected. On October 13 I received a letter from the same minister indicating that the site location would be the mint. On October 20, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated that that location could be changed again in Winnipeg. What is going on here? Could we get some clear, concise accurate information with regard to how this is going to handled? Where is it going to be located?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I can understand the hon. member's disappointment in the fact that under his Liberal government no lab was put into Winnipeg, but under this government and under the leadership of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources this initiative has been put forth.

All I can is that I know the provincial government officials have recently voiced some concern with municipal officials about the location of the site. When the final decision is made it will be announced. The only thing that the government wanted to indicate is that if officials, either at the provincial or municipal level, would show some concern and voice some opinion on where the site should be located, the government would obviously listen to them. That is all that this is about.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I had indicated that I had a letter from the Minister of National Health and Welfare that stated that a decision had been taken. Now this minister tells me that it has not been taken. I really do wonder now whether or not they know what they are doing.

My supplementary is directed to the same Minister. Will the initial announcement of an investment of over $90 million be maintained by this Government? And if the Government intends to scale down its investment, could it perhaps tell us what the new amount, the new figures will be?

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat in French what I told the Hon. Member in English, namely that our Government is delighted to be able to support the plan for a laboratory in Winnipeg, which is being spearheaded by my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who has defended this project with considerable zeal. There have been speculations and discussions, and various opinions have been expressed regarding the location of the laboratory, which is not surprising, Mr. Speaker. Every time the federal Government initiates a project of this scope, we have the same problem. What we are seeing in Winnipeg is not unusual. In any case, the government has expressed its intention to announce its decision as soon as possible. Meanwhile, if provincial or municipal authorities have anything to say, let them say it! We are ready to listen.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The entire history of Canadian wealth is one of exploitation of natural resources seized from the aboriginal peoples who first lived here. Those aboriginal peoples have never been fully or even fairly compensated. We now have one last major chance to get it right.

Because the NEB decision on Arctic gas brushes aside the request of the Dene–Métis Negotiations Secretariat to withhold approval until their land claims are fully settled, and because that decision rejects the request of virtually all northern peoples for specific training and employment programs as a condition of the export licences, will the minister advise the Governor in Council to suspend the NEB decision until these conditions are met and until the wishes of all the territorial aboriginal peoples are fully taken into account and honoured?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member reads the decision of the NEB, he will note that the NEB makes reference to the land claims of the Métis and the Dene people. It refers to the statement of principles which was signed by this government and which is being handled by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Negotiations are going forward and there is a time frame up to 1991 to settle.

As well, the NEB points out very clearly that if a pipeline application is heard, one of the conditions that will be examined will be the matter of training and the socioeconomic impact that a potential pipeline might have.

In fact, if the hon. member goes back to the Berger commission, which I am sure he supported, he will find that the Berger commission said that there should be a 10-year moratorium. There has already been a 12-year moratorium. Second, the Berger commission said that there should be land claim settlements wherever possible.

Through the Committee for Original Peoples Entitlement, COPE, that agreement was done. There was a statement of principles with the Dene and Métis people. The point, I think, is this. It is the very native people who are now in government in the Northwest Territories who 10 years ago when we were in office opposed any development because of the land claims not being settled and are now the proponents of the application. I say to the hon. member, listen to them, respect them and follow some of the vision they have for their area of the country.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): In truth, Mr. Speaker, the Inuvialuit are in support of the pipeline proposal. The Dene-Métis are, at this point, in opposition because their claim has not been settled. If I may remind the hon. minister what it was Mr. Justice Berger said, and I quote from page 196 of his volume 1:

> In my judgment, we must settle the native claims before we build the Mackenzie Valley pipeline. Such a settlement will not be simply the signing of an agreement, after which pipeline construction can then immediately proceed. Intrinsic to the settlement of native land claims is the establishment of new institutions and programs that will form the basis for native self-determination.

Again I ask, will the minister ask his colleagues in cabinet to suspend the NEB decision until these conditions are met?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, obviously I am not going to convince the hon. member of the validity of the process but I think Canadians are reasonable people. First, what we have to keep in mind is what the NEB approved yesterday was an export licence. Second, what is now to take place are hearings on a pipeline, if in fact the applications go forward. As part of that pipeline hearing, the first gas that could flow would be in 1996. The statement of principle with the Dene and Métis is for 1991. I think 1991 is prior to 1996, and I would suggest to him that part of the conditions of any pipeline approval, if given, would be one relating to training, one relating to socioeconomic realities, one relating to environmental questions and a whole host of them relating to economic questions.

I ask the hon. member, are you for the development of the lives of the people of the north or is it only rhetoric and are you using it only for political purposes?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has received notice of a point of order from the Hon. Member for Oshawa.

POINT OF ORDER

REQUEST TO TABLE DOCUMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Earlier in Question Period I made reference to a document that had been prepared in the office of the Minister for International Trade, a document that has been prepared there and circulated to the Secretary of State for External Affairs among other ministries.

I am asking for unanimous consent of the House so that I may table this document.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-267, an Act to amend the Criminal Code.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, this bill addresses the government's lack of action to protect the unborn child. In Canada last year alone, over 60,000 unborn children lost their lives due to the legislative void that was created when the Supreme Court of Canada struck down section 251 of the Criminal Code and thus issued a challenge to Parliament to carry out its duty to protect all Canadians, in or out of the womb.

This bill will include the definition of human being in the Criminal Code, a definition which will specifically include a human foetus or embryo. Thus, the killing of a human being would extend to the killing of unborn Canadians. With the long overdue recognition of the unborn as a human being, this bill will also repeal the provisions relating to infanticide which clearly provide for different types of killing of human beings based on age distinctions only.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring a point of order to your attention. I wish to raise with you some concerns and questions that I have about the admissibility of this bill and two other bills which are already on the Order Paper awaiting introduction.

• (1210)

As a new member of the House, I do not pretend to have all the expertise on parliamentary procedure, but it is my understanding, and it has been my personal experience, that no two similar private members' items can be brought on to the Order Paper. Standing Order 86(5) charges the Chair with the responsibility for determining whether two or more items are so similar as to be substantially the same and for ensuring that the second and subsequent similar items never appear on the Notice Paper.

We already have in this House two very similar anti-choice bills which have been introduced. They have been given first reading and now are awaiting selection in the draw. I wonder, if the House should give this bill first reading, whether we might not have three bills which seek the same ends, which would initiate the same debate and which, if successful, would do exactly the same thing to Canadian women.

I do not know the details of this proposed bill but my question is whether it contains the elements which make Bill C-266, standing in the name of the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex so similar to Bill C-261, standing in the name of the hon. member for York South—Weston. These two bills, C-266 and C-261, I think, have the identical effect. They both seek to recriminalize abortion. They seek to imprison for life anyone who performs an abortion. They seek to send any woman who has an abortion to jail for two years. They give only one valid reason for abortion and that is to save the life of the pregnant woman.

I do not want you, Mr. Speaker, or the House, to misunderstand my purpose in raising the question of the similarity of these bills. I do not want to see a curtailment in the ability of members to introduce measures, but I do want to ensure that the rules of the House are not being broken or are not being over- generously interpreted in order to allow a large number of near identical bills to be introduced, bills which seek to curtail the rights of Canadian women.

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. My hon. colleague has raised Standing Order 86(5) and I wish to point out that a review of the bills in question would indicate that they do not bear the type of similarity that is shown in subsection (5); that is to say, to be substantially the same.

The bill that I am moving today deals with a number of issues, including putting in a brand new definition of the words, human being, the entity human being, and it also deals with various provisions of the Criminal Code which are not dealt with in the two bills that are already presented for first reading, including the repeal of the word "infanticide" and of the various Criminal Code offences dealing with infanticide. The bill is not in any way substantially the same as the other two.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank the member for Scarborough West for his comments and I thank the member for New Westminster—Burnaby. The point raised by the member for New Westminster—Burnaby is a serious matter. I will therefore reserve on this matter.

Just for the benefit of the member for Scarborough West who brought up the bill, I do not intend to rule on this matter today.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present petitions on behalf of several hundred people residing in the province of British Columbia who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to formulate and legislate a law to protect life from conception, a law which seeks to save the life of both mother and child. Indeed, it is my pleasure and duty to present this on their behalf.

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I am presenting the first of several thousand petitions that we intend to present to save the lives of Canadian workers, specifically with the retention of full funding for the Canada Centre for Occupational Health and Safety. Whereas the human and financial costs of accidents in the workplace are a substantial drain on the resources of Canadian society as 16 million work days were lost in 1987 alone as a result of work related accidents and illnesses, for which $14 billion was spent in compensation, we the undersigned humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reinforce the national mandate of the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety by urging the government, if it truly is a government for labour and for management, to rescind all cuts and restore full funding to the centre and, by doing so, I might add, to save lives. If the saving of workers' lives are important to this government, then, for God's sake, let it restore full funding for the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present to this House a petition which, as my colleague, the member for Hamilton East has already declared—a petition signed, in this particular case, by over 50 residents of Hamilton and area—is just the first of thousands to come through the clerk of petitions.

It is a petition that calls on this House to reinstate and reinforce the national mandate of the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety by urging the government to rescind all cuts and restore full funding to the centre and to pledge ongoing funding for a centre, a Canadian centre, a national centre of international reputation, one based on trust between government, business and labour.

Petitions

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West):I also have a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, certified by the clerk of petitions, with over 150 signatures from residents of Hamilton West and area that calls on this government to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition that I would like to table with the House concerning the goods and services tax, signed by several Canadians who oppose the present plan to impose a sales tax on goods and services. They would like Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a series of petitions here from constituents in my riding of Mackenzie which calls upon the government to reject the current proposals for a goods and services tax, reform the tax system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, to ensure that if and when there is broad public consensus on a sales tax measure by the federal government to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, that this reform not be just used as an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab. Therefore, they call on the government to withdraw this proposal.

PROPOSED NATO TRAINING CENTRE

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by some 50 or 55 residents of Toronto, Westmount, Montreal, Lasalle and Dunham who are concerned about the action of the Canadian government regarding Goose Bay in Labrador.

They urge this Parliament to join with the Assembly of First Nations and the Innu people of Labrador and other aboriginal peoples of Canada in opposing the use of their lands for NATO and NORAD attack training. They demand an end to these low level training flights in Canada and an end to the proposal to bring a NATO base to Goose Bay and that the money now being spent to promote this should be redirected to improving the lives of the aboriginal peoples of Canada and promoting sustainable development.

OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition signed by my constituents in Gatineau—La Lièvre who object to the proposed goods and services tax. Your petitioners said it was unfair and premature to introduce the tax without first implementing a full reform of the Income Tax Act. The new tax is definitely unacceptable to all Canadians.

THE ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting a petition on behalf of the people of the province of Ontario, concerning the dress uniform of the Mounties, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

[English]

The undersigned 4,700 petitioners across Ontario and Carleton—Gloucester humbly pray and call upon Parliament to preserve the distinctive heritage and tradition of the RCMP by retaining the uniformity of dress code with all the recognizable colour and trappings that have such great historical value to this country. The pride and esprit de corps should not be jeopardized by changes to this truly great police force and its proud traditions and uniform.

• (1220)

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition which I wish to present on behalf of several dozen constituents in Thessalon, Ontario, which is protesting the government's goods and services tax. They point out that the government has already increased the manufacturers' sales tax from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent. The goods and services tax will have an adverse impact on practically everything Canadians buy. It will be especially hard on low income Canadians and that it will be especially harmful to small business.

I am pleased to present this petition on behalf of my constituents in Thessalon, Ontario.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present this petition on behalf of the senior citizens in Ottawa West who insist on speaking to their government, even if it insists on not listening. They are objecting most strenuously to the clawback of old age security and family allowance and the extreme hardship it will work and will continue to work on seniors and on families in our country.

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition that comes from communities across Ontario expressing concern about the impact on the tourism industry and on Canadians of the cuts to VIA Rail, and asking that the government not continue with these cuts.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege to present to this House a number of petitions with respect to the goods and services tax, this brutal tax that is about to be imposed upon Canadians, this anti-family, anti-children tax.

[Translation]

I present this petition in accordance with the Standing Orders of the House. This is a bad tax, and the reactions of Canadians have been very negative.

[English]

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand this morning, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present petitions, 52 from the Belleville and Tweed area of Ontario, and 60 from the Brockville area of Ontario, which are opposed to the government's measures to cut back on VIA Rail across this country. The petitioners are very concerned about the loss of thousands of jobs. They feel that a proper analysis has not been done, where a disproportionate subsidy is required for highway infrastructure or airports, as opposed to VIA Rail. These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada not to cancel, in whole or in part, rail passenger services in Canada.

FISHERIES

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a number of petitions. The first petition relates to the outrage felt by people in my riding, both on the Saanich Peninsula and on the Gulf Islands, to the horror of drift-net fishing that is occurring in the north Pacific. As my colleague from Nanaimo—Cowichan says these drift-nets are curtains of death. Over 500 people in my constituency alone have signed this petition. They call upon the government to act. We should be putting prohibitive tariffs and duties against the countries that engage in this practice.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): The second petition I want to present is related to the goods and services tax and is signed by nearly 1,000 people in my riding of Saanich—Gulf Islands, to let the government know of their outrage and distress at this measure. It also talks about their awareness that this is really a device with which to shift the tax burden to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumptive tax. The petition calls on the government to engage in real tax reform.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): The third petition I would like to present relates to the clawback of old age pensions. This petition is once again signed by over 500 of my constituents, many of whom are senior citizens who know that in spite of the smoke and mirrors engaged in by this government regarding high income pensioners, we know that the reality is that this is an assault on the universality of social programs.

I am pleased to present these petitions and I will alert the House to the fact that there will be plenty more coming from Saanich—Gulf Islands.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and honour to present to the House a petition executed on behalf of residents of the constituency of Scarborough—Rouge River. The petition has been certified correct and the petitioners call upon the government to reject the proposed goods and services tax for the reason that it will cause undue hardship to low and middle-income Canadians, cause higher inflation and higher interest rates.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present to this House a petition dealing with the cutting off of VIA Rail service. What is most regrettable, as I rise to present this petition, is that the government, because of its majority and it arrogance, will not listen, but through this petition the people of Canada are speaking out loud and clear. The people who in the regions are affected most adversely by these cuts, which are insensitive and have no basis in economic reality. I am pleased to present this petition to this House from the people of Belleville.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition in conformity with Standing Order 36, signed by 37 residents of the riding of Kingston and the Islands who object most vigorously to the government's proposed goods and services tax and call upon Parliament to reject this nasty and vicious piece of legislation.

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of numerous people asking this government to rescind all cuts to funding to the Canada Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, to restore full funding and to pledge ongoing funding.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present petitions from my riding of Northumberland. These petitions are signed by residents from towns such as Campbellford, Trenton, Port Hope, Cavan and Cobourg. These people are very concerned about the government's proposed goods and services tax legislation. These are not wealthy people with discretionary income funds that they can decide how they want to spend. Many of these signatures represent farmers and small business people who feel that the imposition of the proposed goods and services tax will be their ruination.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise again today to present even more petitions from people of my constituency of Prince Edward—Hastings on the government's unrealistic cuts to VIA Rail, requesting the government to rescind those cuts and to take a more realistic look at passenger travel service in Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–36, an act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be now read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Foster (p. 4275).

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, when we interrupted the debate to go to Question Period, I was just beginning to point out to the House how long we had waited for the government's initiative on this proposal to take away the interest free portions of cash advances. I was outlining the history of it, how there had been no mention of the government's desire to remove the interest free aspect of cash advances either during the election campaign or in the House. It came as a great surprise during the much delayed budget, and as a result, neither lenders nor borrowers on the farm were aware that this would happen until after their arrangements for the season had been made.

I felt that that was a very good set of circumstances on which to argue that the government should continue with the interest free cash advances. The law exists now. It is there. The only thing stopping interest free cash advances from being in the hands of farmers today is intransigence of the government. It is simply refusing to implement the law that is the law of the land at this moment.

We heard, during the course of this debate and many times before, that the government party, the Conservative Party of Canada, is the party that cares most for farmers and for rural communities. That began to break down a bit during the last election and it lost a lot of its support in rural areas, but it still keeps mouthing the words even though the facts are much to the contrary.

The Minister of Agriculture, during the campaign, said several times that he was going to have a drought program that would put $40 an acre into farmers' pockets. Of course that did not happen. After the campaign was over the cheques did not arrive at that level.

That is one of the reasons why farmers are now very strapped for cash and are finding it very difficult to see how they are going to operate without an interest free cash advance. Aside from the marketing problems, the storage problems and the on-farm finance problems, it creates a lot of problems for farm communities. Many suppliers were depending on receiving their payments for fertilizer and parts and chemical weed sprays in the fall when the interest free cash advance was taken out. Those people are sitting without money. Their creditors, their banks, are leaning on them too. They are saying, "Where is the money? You said it would be here in the fall when the farmers pay". So it has a real ripple effect.

We heard the Minister of Agriculture, the Deputy Prime Minister, saying today in Question Period a number of times, "this government is firmly behind supply management" in response to questions from the opposition. If this government were firmly behind supply management, I cash advance program because the management of the supplies of fruit, vegetable and grains cannot take place logically without having those advances in place in order to be competitive against the Americans and the Europeans.

Later on in Question Period, we heard from the Minister of Finance saying that it has always been government policy, and the action of this government follows through, according to him, to make decisions that will permit Canadians to make their own budgeting decisions. And yet this was the Minister of Finance who did not even present a Budget on time. He presented it late. That was the first time in the history of Canada, during the course of a Parliament, that the government has done this. The country ran on Governor General's warrants for a month. There was no reason for it except that the minister did not been some indication of what the government's intention was, but the government delayed until farmers were into seeding already and had already made their borrowing arrangements with the banks.

The decision that we are left with is one, if the government carries it through, that will be as disastrous for rural communities as was the proposal to deindex senior citizens' pensions. The government understood the pain that it was inflicting on seniors when it was conveyed to the Prime Minister in person by a little lady outside the doors of this House who stood on a box so she could be face to face with him and told him that he had lied to the senior citizens of the country when he said that the social programs were a sacred trust. By deindexing pensions he was taking money out of pensioners' pockets each year.

By taking away interest free cash advances, the government is taking money out of the pockets of the farmers of this country. It is forcing their products onto the market-place and forcing them to take a lower price than would be normal. It is forcing suppliers of farm goods and commodities at the community level to wait for their payments, and it is inflicting a good deal of pain on rural Canada because of this policy.

Oh yes, it is a good policy for the banks. The banks are going to get a little more money from interest because the rate will be slightly higher than what the Wheat Board was able to borrow the money at.

It will be good for the international grain companies because they buy supplies in Canada at a lower rate because farmers will always be forced into dumping product on the market at a lower price than they would if they could put it on in an orderly fashion under a system of marketing that takes into account the supplies in the market and allows farmers to manage those supplies, which is the whole idea behind supply management. It is bad for farmers and it is bad for rural communities but it is good for the government's friends, the banks; and it is good for the government's friends, the international grain traders.

We have not heard anything yet from the Tory premiers who I thought would have been raising a ruckus about this particular initiative by the government since it is only a few months ago that the government said that the biggest problem facing the provinces and constituents was high interest rates. Where is the first minister of Saskatchewan who is also agriculture minister? Have we heard from him about what these new interest rates will do to his farm community and farm constituents? He has been very quiet. Yet he was the same guy who led the charge on behalf of the premiers some months ago trying to get the federal government to reduce interest rates because it was harmful to the economies of the various regions of this country. Now he has disappeared. He is no longer fighting for the farmer. He has decided to stand aside and let the banks and the international grain companies have their way. It is too bad.

This is an important change in the way the government conducts the business of this country. It was an extremely important initiative when Prime Minister John Diefenbaker introduced it back in 1957. It did tremendous good for rural Canada and improved and streamlined the grain handling system of this country. To take it away now can only do irreparable harm. I think that this bill should be dropped. We are fighting it in the House. When it goes to committee, we will be hearing from the farm organizations which will continue to fight. The government has to be stopped on this particular piece of legislation.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure for me to stand in this House today on behalf of the people of Haldimand—Norfolk and to talk about Bill C-36 which is an act to amend the Advanced Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

Today we are witnessing the dismantling and demise of just one more program by this government; one more agricultural program that farmers throughout Canada have enjoyed.

Haldimand—Norfolk is an area which is rich in farmland, an area where we have a number of tobacco farmers about which I have stood up in the House on many occasions and spoken. The tobacco farmers are one of the key farming groups that have always used this program. Quite frankly, when I was back in the riding last week, a number of them came to me. They were very shocked about the treatment they have been getting from this government, especially since during the last election the part-time minister of agriculture came into my riding and indicated to tobacco farmers that, yes, the government would support them, that the government was committed to farming.

In fact, he went on to say that the government was committed to supply management and to all of farming. On the free trade deal, the minister said that agriculture would be protected, that our markets in the United States would be protected. We have seen that those markets have not been protected. This bill is just another indication that the government is not committed to farming, that the government is committing itself to budget deficit reduction on the backs of Canadian farmers and on the backs of those people who are least able to afford to pay.

In the past, this program has provided farmers with interest-free government loans up to $30,000 on their storable crops, repayable when the crop was sold. This program has ensured that producers can obtain cash in advance from lenders, knowing that they will receive payments for their crops at some later date. In other words, up until now the government was putting its financial strength behind the farmer, a sign that it really and truly believed in agriculture in Canada. Well, we saw what happened after the last election. As I pointed out earlier, we have seen that there are a number of different programs on which this government has broken its promise.

The government is now proposing to amend the act and remove the interest-free provision, while maintaining the loan guarantee. It estimates that by eliminating the interest subsidy there will be a saving of approximately $27 million in each of the years 1989-90 and 1990-91. This is a minor amount to this government. The government has indicated that it does not feel that this part of the program is essential.

It is coming to the stage where this government feels very little is essential any more, especially in the area of farming. Whereas the Canadian Government used to help its farmers, it is now apparent the trend is to throw them to the wolves; let them take care of themselves.

In this instance the government has not totally gutted the program, it has simply taken away a key aspect of the program, and in the end the government is making it unaffordable and inaccessible to most farmers. I think this shows the government's commitment to farming, the government's understanding of farming, and it shows, by the lack of any minister of the Crown within this House, that the government does not really care. This has become a common practice for the government and I feel that it is unacceptable.

Look at how the government decreased by $6 million the funding for assistance to the tobacco industry. As I said, it pulled money out of the tobacco industry, and this after the Minister of Agriculture came into my riding and promised tobacco farmers that he would support them.

Similar cuts were made in funding for crop insurance, branch line rehabilitation, dairy export subsidies, the Canadian Dairy Commission, and the AT and East Grain and Flour Subsidy Program. These have all been cut by this government, all vital programs for farmers, programs that farmers expected.

This government chips away at programs until they are no longer viable or economically accessible. Then the government blames farmers for not using the program. It says, "It is no longer needed. Farmers no longer use it". Well this, Mr. Speaker, is after the government has completely gutted the whole basis of the program. Then when farmers do not use the program because it is not worth their while, Well, that is sneaky. I call that dishonest.

Now to go back to the elimination of the interest-free portion of the advance payments program, what is the purpose of the program? Well, it serves as a bridge to farmers who experience cash flow problems while waiting for the opportunity to market their products in an orderly fashion. Coming from Ontario, I am interested in how this proposed legislation will affect our farmers. I have asked farmers throughout Ontario, and it has been estimated by the Ontario Federation of Agriculture that this measure alone will cost Ontario farmers $3.3 million in the current crop year. This will be felt mostly by corn producers, tobacco producers and soybean producers.

The Ontario figures for the crop year of 1987-88 show that almost $100 million in cash advances to farmers could be affected by this change. How will it affect other sectors? Tobacco, soybean and corn producers account for 98 per cent of all advances. Tobacco producers alone receive $52 million. So, as you can see, this is no small amount for farmers in my area.

As indicated previously, the valued interest benefit to Ontario farmers was more than $3.3 million. The breakdown by sectors shows that tobacco and corn farmers each received approximately 34 per cent of the interest benefit. Soybean producers receive 27 per cent of the interest benefit. Without a doubt, this program has been beneficial to farming in Ontario.

Naturally, you would think that a responsible government on the other side would keep the program and that a responsible government would consult with farmers prior to making changes to the program. Well, this did not happen. Without consulting, without even asking farmers how it would affect them, without even studying how it would affect farmers, the government has brought in changes to this program which will adversely affect their way of life.

This government does not believe in consultation or seeking advice from different interested parties prior to bringing in legislation. We have seen this in other areas, especially in the areas of VIA Rail cuts and clawbacks to senior citizens. Where was the government's commitment to talk to the people prior to bringing in any legislation?

On VIA Rail it makes the cuts and then it says it will have a royal commission on them. As you very well know, that is not the proper way of dealing with major changes to government policy. Quite frankly, the Canadian people are not prepared to take it.

These are not little organizations that are being affected. The Ontario Corn Producers Association represents over 25,000 Ontario corn producers. I would like to briefly outline why they oppose the changes to this program. The program has proven to be a major benefit in shifting corn sales from the autumn until later in the marketing year, thereby reducing the extent of export sales in autumn and shortage-induced imports during the later months. The net result has been financial benefits to producers, domestic users and commercial elevator operators; total benefits which far exceed the cost to the government.

The advance payments program has also been of great benefit to growers who store their soybeans on the farm at harvest and market them at premium prices throughout the marketing year to domestic processors and into the value-added export and domestic markets for seed, feed and food uses.

These organizations and many others believe that the elimination of interest-free provisions would effectively destroy the program. While the federal guarantee under this program would allow them to borrow money at or slightly below prime, administration charges would mean an effective cost to producers well above the prime. In other words, it is completely useless to them. In the end it will cost them more to borrow money than had they just gone out on the regular market to borrow it. There is no advantage over the commercial sources of credit. It still might prove attractive to those who are high credit risks, but this is not the purpose of the program.

At a time when trade is a major issue another benefit is that the Advanced Payments for Crops Act is not trade distorting. The Minister of Agriculture can go to our American friends and say that this is not a trade distorting measure. It does not stimulate production, but rather encourages orderly marketing. Just like the rest of our marketing boards, this program encourages orderly marketing. Without it there will not be that same advantage that we have in the orderly marketing of our commerce.

This government should also remember that the GATT Geneva Accord of early April obliges Canada to freeze existing support programs. It did not tell us to reduce them, it told us to freeze existing programs. What does this do for the Canadian government when it wants to go back to GATT and negotiate? It has already given away everything. There is no way that anything is left to negotiate with. As you can see, the reduction of this program gives the Canadian government a number of problems in its negotiating stance. It is particularly important to note that there is no offsetting reduction for the 1989-90 crop year in the U.S. loan program, the American equivalent to this program for grains and oilseeds.

Again, the Canadian government is giving away in this free trade environment while the Americans are doing nothing. They are not reducing their program, which puts our farmers at a competitive disadvantage with the Americans. That is wrong, Mr. Speaker.

Furthermore, this government seems to have forgotten that the Canadian grain and oilseed producers are already contributing their share to national debt reduction. In fact, I would say more than their fair share.

The numerous other cuts that have taken place in agricultural programs under this government have shown that Canadian farmers are doing more than their fair share in deficit reduction. Why is this government bringing in changes to a program which concerns a minimal amount of money and which means so much to Canadian farmers? Why is it picking on Canadian farmers? Why is it picking on those who least can defend themselves?

Several other sectors of the agricultural economy, like domestic processors, also benefit from the APCA. Extending the marketing season from harvest to the entire year benefits domestic processors who rely on a supply of soybeans 12 months a year. This allows them to have that supply 12 months a year. Soybeans stored in commercial elevators under the APCA generate additional storage revenue for the elevator.

Again, this is an orderly way of marketing. The APCA provides an incentive for growers to produce seed for seed companies. Since the seed is not delivered and sold until the next spring seed growers can obtain cash for the unsold seed through the APCA.

Ontario has developed a market in the far east for food quality soybeans. To meet the demands of the market, the soybeans must be segregated from other varieties and shipped on a regular basis throughout the year. Exporters do not have the ability to store a large number of small lots of high quality soybeans and rely on the farmer to store the product on the farm. The APCA helps growers producing for this market opportunity by providing cash at harvest so that the delivery period to the exporter can be extended.

Farm storage is another way to better take advantage of the market opportunities which do exist. Many producers who use the APCA also build storage for the soybeans on their farms. In this way the APCA indirectly helps companies who build these storage facilities. Without this, we are going to see a number of jobs lost in that area. As in so many other cases, this government likes to change the rules in the middle of the game. This is not fair. It is dishonest and a breach of trust between the Canadian government and Canadian farmers, and this agriculture minister knows that.

During the coming year farm organizations can consult with the federal government to develop acceptable alternatives to the current Advance Payments for Crops Act. The main concern is very simple. Canadian farmers' finances are already stretched to the limit. Farm organizations are saying that with all the other increases that have been required to bear by this government, that evern one penny more is too much.

Canadian farmers have borne too much of the cost of this government's deficit reduction. It is time that this government stood up and committed itself to helping Canadian farmers.

In conclusion, we have asked this minister and this government to bring in a new bill, to bring it at a later date so as to take effect in the new crop year and allow producers to voice their concerns and their suggestions. The minister has recently announced a national agri-food policy conference to take place in December. He says that he wants to work closely with the provinces, the farm organizations and others to plan and implement an improved policy framework.

Let me suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is an ideal opportunity for this minister to put his words into action. Consult with the farming groups, listen to what they have to say and change this program which adversely affects all Canadian farmers and all Canadians.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Carleton—Gloucester (Mr. Bellemare), on questions or comments.

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Hon. Member on his excellent speech. He showed the kind of sensitivity that the Minister of Agriculture seems to lack. His knowledge of the subject is exceptional. He has demonstrated his wholehearted support for Canada's farmers, and I would like to ask him how the Minister could communicate and establish a certain dialogue with the farming community in order to get some input.

[English]

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for that question.

It is not too hard for the Minister of Agriculture to go into the rural areas and speak to the farmers. There are all kinds of different farming groups that have come out against this bill. He did not have to bring out the bill. He could have consulted first with the different farming groups. He could have said that they have to do some deficit reduction and asked where it would best fit in, instead of cutting a program which costs very little in terms of the global budget. It costs $27 million, but that $27 million does a great amount for tobacco farmers, corn farmers, soybean farmers and farmers in all of Canada. The value you get for that $27 million is worth everything to farmers.

I thank my hon. friend for the question. The minister could have consulted with farmers prior to bringing in this program. Instead, just like the rest of the government ministers, it seems that he brings in the program, brings in the changes, makes the adverse effects and then says: "Oh, well maybe now we will consult". That is not the way to do it. I am sure that is not the way this side of the House would work.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address Bill C-36, not as an agricultural expert by any means, but as somebody who is very concerned about the implications of the bill and the impact that it will have on farmers, not only in my riding of Northumberland but across the country.

To me this bill represents a sleazy way in which our government is continuing to get rid of agricultural support for farmers and is failing again to provide the necessary support to a very vital industry in our country. I think it is necessary to have an understanding of just what this bill is addressing, and to do that you have to look at the program as it was before. I think that bringing in revised provisions to this act at this time is very poor judgment on the part of our government.

The intent of the bill is to help farmers to store product, to have an orderly marketing process for their products allowing them favourable prices for their products over an extended period of time. The government brought in this bill two days before the House recessed in June and then reintroduced it in September for debate after farmers had actually started to bring their crops in off the field and to store them, assuming that this act was in place, as it should have been by tradition, to support them. It then withdrew the bill because it realized that it was so flawed, and reintroduced it again. The bill that we are debating right now should be referring, if it is to be debated, to government action for next year, not the current year.

The funding that is presently available under the existing act should not be held up because we are debating this bill today.

"The Advance Payments for Crops Act is designed to assist producers of storable crops across Canada to market their product in an orderly way". These are quotes from our own government papers.

"The act provides for interest-free advance payments for storable crops other than wheat, oats, barley grown within the Canadian Wheat Board's designated area. The program guarantees bank loans to qualified producers, marketing organizations and pays the interest thereon. This allows farmers to store their crops rather than market them at a time when supplies are plentiful and prices depressed. Administrative costs are to be borne by the producer organizations".

The definition of the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act is as follows: "The government makes interest-free cash advances to farmers for storing certain grains on their farms before delivery to the Canadian Wheat Board. The advance is set according to a prescribed formula and the farmer is responsible for paying off the debt after the grain is delivered. The cash advance program is of importance when grain elevators are full and no storage is available. It has been used in exceptional circumstances, such as the postponement of grain harvesting from fall to spring because of adverse weather conditions, the drying of damp grain or when there are transportation problems".

I think these descriptions bring up a few of the criteria that I feel are most important and worthy of discussion in this proposed bill. The most important aspect, perhaps, is the elimination of the interest-free provision under the act.

According to the proposed revision there is no advantage whatsoever, as has been said by other colleagues in the House, to farmers having this program. They can just as easily go to a bank and make a loan there at more or less the same rate.

There is definitely no advantage to the agricultural associations which administer these programs. These associations are liable for 10 per cent of the loans made. It costs them funding to administer the program. There will be so few farmers who will benefit from the revised program that the associations themselves are no longer able, under the proposed revisions, to administer the program. They simply will not have sufficient funds to do so.

Many, many groups across this country have expressed their deep concern about the proposals in this bill. In Ontario, where my riding is, we have tobacco growers who represent a group that has received tremendous assistance through this program. Over one-third of the program goes to assist the tobacco and corn producers in our province. But there are nine different commodities in Ontario that are grown and which product benefits the farmers of the areas. These are: flue cured tobacco, corn, soybeans, apples, potatoes, processing tomatoes, honey, oats and barley.

Some 33 different producers in the province took advantage of the program last year which advanced $87 million and paid $53.3 million in interest.

I consider farming to be, as I said before, our most vital industry in this country. I consider agriculture or food to be a major security commodity in our world. Our world is changing dramatically. We are very pleased when we look at our world today to see the east-west détente that is taking place at the present time. We do not have the same fear that we did some years ago of nuclear war.

We are very interested to listen to the changes daily with regard to the policies of perestroika and glasnost in Russia, and the opening up of societies in Eastern Europe, but we have to balance this optimistic scenario with the alarming world economic scene in which a few multinational corporations are involved in a growth that is staggering. To quote from a report of the Club of Rome about this: "Every day of continued exponential growth brings the world system closer to the ultimate limits of that growth. A decision to do nothing is a decision to increase the risk of collapse".

I am alarmed as I see the policies of this government which allow our family farmers to go out of business, which allow multinational corporations to take over the food industry, and which dismantle our supply management programs leaving our farmers much more vulnerable than they were before.

I am discouraged by the attitude of farmers. I do not blame the farmers for their attitude but it alarms me. I think our government does not understand the crisis that will exist in this country if our farmers continue to fail in their ability to produce and live from their family farms.

I have spoken to many farmers in my riding who speak of the impending closure of their farm operations. I have spoken to farmers whose farm operations have closed down simply because they are no longer able to procure sufficient income to make the high risks that they bear on behalf of the people of Canada worth while.

In my particular riding of Northumberland the farmers who are at risk, the farmers who have had to sell their farms, the farmers who feel that that is imminent for them, are to some extent more fortunate than other farmers in this country.

Northumberland riding is an area of intense growth and development. We have a scarcity of housing. We are experiencing the growth pressures of Toronto where housing costs are enormous. People are looking from large urban areas to the area of Northumberland as a very desirable place to develop. Small businesses are coming in, and we have more and more industrial parks. We have more and more new housing subdivisions. These industrial parks and housing subdivisions are gobbling up number one prime agricultural land.

I cannot accept this. I think that this government has to be more committed to supporting farming in this country.

The revision to these acts, as I said before, is just one more example of how our government is getting rid of agricultural programs that support our farming industry. The farmers that I talk to are discouraged, disheartened and humiliated because of their financial circumstances. In my riding they are able to sell their prime agricultural farm land for housing and industrial development because of the growth experienced in my area.

I know, however, that farmers in other regions of this country who do not happen to reside in areas that are developing like mine also experience the same pressures of being unable to financially continue to maintain their agricultural production. These farmers are having to abandon their farms, their equipment, and walk away from their farms with nothing. I think this is a disgraceful situation.

I think that this country in this century has grossly underestimated the value of our country's farmers. We do not appreciate the labours of the farmers. It is not a one income operation on our family farms. Every member of the family is still involved, not only in agricultural farming on their own farm, but in order to maintain any level of existence with dignity they are having to be employed in off-farm operations as well.

We do not give credit to our farmers. We do not value in this country the food production we have because we have had it too good. The eastern Europeans and the Europeans are people in my riding who do understand better than others the serious value of food and food production. It is people from Europe who have undergone in this century two serious world wars. These people have experienced hunger and deprivation of basic food. They know that they can no longer even consider their countries to be in a situation of being self-sufficient in agricultural production.

I personally believe that this is important for every country in the world. I certainly believe it is a situation which should prevail and must prevail in our country. This country must be self-sufficient in food production in our basic food products that are easily grown in our country. If we through revisions to acts such as these which affect our agricultural industry allow farming and agricultural production to fail and allow Americans to take over our food production, then we are in serious trouble.

We know that the United States views our resources as being extremely valuable. Food is a security item. The U.S. would love to have our water, our forests, and our mines, all of our resources. If we do not have the ability to produce our own food and we are dependent on the United States for our food production, then we will find ourselves paying with our natural resources, our water, forests, fish and mining products. We will find that we are paying high prices for food in order to provide our resources to the United States. I do not think that is an enviable position at all. It is one that we must foresee and avoid at all costs.

I think that this government has to sit down to review and revise all of its agricultural policies and to do everything possible to help and support family farming and food production in this country. This bill is just one more example of how our government is not committed to that policy.

I have received letters from and had conversations with different producers throughout my riding who have addressed the seriousness of this bill in their own way. They say to us that the bill has no advantages for them as food producers, that it has serious disadvantages. They do not consider that it in any way disturbs our trading relationships with the United States. They ask that this bill be withdrawn at this moment and that they be given the advance payments necessary for them right now, necessary for them last month and the month before.

There are many groups in Canada which have expressed their concern about this bill including the prairie pools in the west, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, the National Farmers Union, the Manitoba Corn Growers Wheat Association, the Northumberland Federation of Agriculture, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Ontario Corn Producers Association, and the British Columbia Vegetable Marketing Commission. I could go on and on and on.

The intent of this bill is to get rid of the interest-free provision in the bill. That is totally unsuitable. The bill as it stands without this provision has no value for our Canadian farmers.

The act is in place to try and encourage a proper marketing system in our country. It encourages our farmers to store product. It helps them to maintain reserves, to help our whole country to sustain decent prices over a longer period of time in support of farmers' incomes.

If we do not withdraw this bill at this point in time we will make ourselves more vulnerable to the low commodity prices south of the border. It will have the inevitable effect of accelerating the existing process of putting more and more farmers in this country out of business.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for her address. Clearly a number of people who have spoken today talked about the sleazy approach of this legislation. They talked about the misleading approaches of government to a number of things.

We all remember VIA Rail. There was going to be investment before they got into power.

With respect to the trade deal, never, never would there be a trade deal. Of course, what is it?

Remember education? They would support it to the same level. They said they would double research and development. Nothing has happened there either. In fact, it has been cut, cut, cut.

Air Canada was not for sale, they said in 1985. Now it is gone. Remember deindexing? They didn't get away with it, but they are coming at it from another approach. The clawback amounts to the same thing.

I mentioned this morning the national laboratory. It was going to be here, then here, then here. They don't know where in the world it is going to be.

I was really concerned as well with some of the comments made recently with respect to our aid to developing nations.

My question goes back to a comment that was made that prime agricultural lands are being gobbled up by urban sprawl. I appreciate the fact that we need to have a clear policy with respect to self-sufficiency. I am hoping that that is a priority. At the same time I am concerned whether this or any other government actions will have any potential negative effects on the assistance that we normally give developing nations. Is there any chance that that might be so?

Mrs. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, in response to that question I think that the original intent of this act is an intention of this country in its agricultural policies toward developing nations as well. We are trying to help developing nations to have self-sufficiency in agricultural production. We are trying to help them to orderly market those products. By teaching this abroad, by assisting this abroad and then by repealing the same thing in this country makes us very two-faced.

I am very concerned about the impact in the future, the implications that will occur in the Third World if we as policy-makers do not respect the notion of self-sufficiency in agricultural production.

I would say that we are changing our attitude toward Third World countries and that that would no longer be a priority for our operation in Third World countries, in effect saying that agricultural production is fine in the hands of the multinational corporations.

We know, however, that that has very serious consequences. Multinational corporations have the same abilities as any producer. When you go shopping in supermarket in Canada you will find counters that have what the producers call loss–leaders. They are able to sell certain products at very reduced prices in order to encourage buying of that product on the part of the public.

Multinational corporations, as they attempt to take over agriculture on our continent, have the same ability. They can sell to Canada from the United States products at whatever low price they want in order to put our farmers out of production and capture the market.

I think that has very serious implications, not only for farming in this country but for farming world–wide. We are putting agricultural production into the hands of multinational corporations at which point we are vulnerable.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Northumberland made an excellent speech. She made a point on which I wonder if she could comment further.

Yesterday, in the course of his remarks concerning House business, the Minister of Justice and leader of the government in this House made some very strange and most gratuitous comments in respect to our participation in this debate. He said, as reported at page 4883 of Hansard:

> My hon. friends will understand that the opposition has been filibustering this bill for some time and we intend to push forward in order that the farmers of Canada will receive those very important payments.

• (1320)

Everyone knows that statement is utter garbage. I am surprised that the Minister of Justice of all people would come into this House and spout such nonsense. I know the Hon. Member shares my view in that respect.

What concerns me is the suggestion in the remarks of the minister that the debate in this Chamber is somehow holding these farmers up from their payments.

Is it not a fact that the Minister of Agriculture could now release the money under the existing act, which would give the farmers of this country more money than they will get under this bill? He is in a position to do that today.

The only reason he is not doing it today is that he is blackmailing Canadian farmers and trying to blame the opposition for the fact that he is not fulfilling his obligations under the law and making the payments under the existing act. Is that not the way it is? Could she perhaps explain it to some of the people sitting behind the ministers on the other side who seem to lack any appreciation of the facts in this matter?

Mrs. Stewart: Yes, I would agree. I really feel, as do other members in this House who have expressed this concern, that there is no reason for the revisions to this act to be holding up the government's immediate payment to our farmers, the payments which should have been made more than a month ago.

The proposed amendments which we object to mean that the acts will have no real benefit to our farmers. It is a sleazy way that this government has of simply withdrawing an important agricultural promotion program in this country.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I never thought I would be around here long enough to have to stand up to oppose a government bill which amends the Prairie Grain Cash Advance Payments Act and subsequent legislation that allowed it to cover all crops. If there was ever an alliance between the Conservatives, the CCF, and the farm organizations in western Canada, it was on this issue.

I was a station agent in the little village of Richmond in southwestern Saskatchewan in the days when there were not enough boxcars. The elevators did not have enough storage capacity. Quotas were small and farmers had to buy granaries. They even had to pile grain on the ground and cover it with straw and hay bales to protect it from the weather.

In order to allow grain producers to get more granaries, to relieve the congestion in the country elevator system and grain terminals, to relieve congestion on the railways when there was insufficient motive power and rolling stock, the Prairie Wheat Pools, the National and Saskatchewan Farmers Union, Manitoba, Alberta, the co–operative movement and the CCF started in the late 1940s demanding a system of cash flow for grain producers that would allow them to have income during the periods of time when they were up to their necks in grain and could not sell it or deliver it. That went on until 1957.

We all—even political opponents—applauded Mr. Diefenbaker. It was the second thing he did after he was sworn in. He implemented a system of interest-free cash advances on prairie grains. All of us, political friend and foe alike, applauded Mr. Diefenbaker because we ran into stubborn Liberal governments in the 1940s and early 1950s which did not listen. They would not listen and that was why they were defeated.

I have noted that they have not repented their sins. I hope one day one of them will get up and say how wrong they were on this and a number of other items.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was going to deal with the fact that he is talking about Liberal governments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Bird): What is your point of order, please?

Mr. Milliken: It is that we are debating a government bill and there is no minister of the Crown in this House. It is a principle of responsible government that a minister be here. This is a government bill—this is not Private Members' Hour—and there is not a single Minister in this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Bird): Order, please. I am advised that you are incorrect in reflecting on the presence or absence of members.

Mr. Benjamin: I do not mind the interruption, but I cannot think of a minister over there who I want in the place anyway, especially when I consider the hon. member for Vegreville, whom I really like. He is a good friend. We have been associates here for a long time. We were both members of the class of '68. He was one of the strongest of all in the fight for interest-free cash advances. He was one of the strongest of all.

Would you believe it was the same with VIA Rail? Today, he repeated a firm commitment to supply management and orderly marketing and marketing boards. I have been saddened to the verge of tears about that hon. gentleman who I think is basically an honest, decent man because he has stopped getting up to fight for what is right. How this piece of legislation could get past a committee of cabinet with the hon. member for Vegreville being present is beyond me. That is a very sad case, in my opinion.

The interest charges on those cash advances, initially on prairie grains and then subsequently on all crops right across Canada, have been more than recovered in other ways. In effect, it has not cost the government any money. Certainly it also has not cost our economy any money, but it has benefited our economy if for no other reason that just on our export markets, particularly in commodities that were not under marketing boards or supply management. Our farmers were subject to what was called, and still is, the market-place.

Of course when the market-place got flooded with lots of vegetables, fruits or whatnot, the price went right through the floor. But what else could they do? Commodities that could be stored and kept for some length of time took a beating. Farmers and fishermen are the only ones I know of who are price takers, not price setters. All the rest of our economy, all our professional people, all our unionized workers negotiate a price or set a price on what they are producing or the services or labour they are selling. Only farmers and fishermen have to take what they can get. They have always had to take less than what it costs to produce.

I have never been able to understand why any country, let alone this one, would allow that to happen. If we paid our fishermen and our agricultural producers their cost of production plus a decent living, and in order to help those who could not afford the higher cost of food, there are other programs to offset the high cost of food such as school lunch programs, and subsidies for the low income, the poor, and the elderly, then no longer would the finger be pointed at farmers and fishermen about the subsidies they are getting. It would be a consumer subsidy, and the farmers and the fishermen would be in the same category as the corporate community and the manufacturers and the processors who can set their price. Don't tell me about competition in the market-place, no matter what it is in, but I am particularly acquainted with transportation.

A railway sets a rate, the other railway has the same rate. An airline sets a fare, the other airline has the same fare. It goes on all the time. Lawyers have their fee schedules and if one lawyer starts cutting those fees too much he is in trouble with the law society. The same with architects and accountants, you name it.

If nothing else, the interest free cash advances not only gave some cash flow at times when there was no cash income for their production and their work, but it was the decent thing to do. Even subsequent to the defeat of the Diefenbaker government in 1963, the new Liberal government under Mr. Pearson recognized that, kept it, and made some improvements.

When this government came into power in 1984, we got what were called firm commitments from the Prime Minister, the then Minister of Agriculture, the present Minister of Agriculture and Deputy Prime Minister, and Tory candidates all over Canada on these agricultural programs.

I do not use the word "betrayal" lightly because that is a very strong, mean word to use. But it is a betrayal not only of those farmers, it is a betrayal of good, electoral and political process, and it is a betrayal in our country.

The $27 million that I believe is the figure that cash advances cost in interest is less than the cost of storing those commodities, less than the income tax benefits, much less, than the tax benefits for corporations and for the wealthy. My goodness, the government could pick up that $27 million just by charging one-tenth of 1 per cent interest on deferred corporation taxes which now amount to almost $40 billion. In fact, it is part of the alternative that I am advocating to the GST.

If corporations were made to pay 10 per cent interest on their deferred corporation tax, it would amount to $4 billion, and 10 per cent is less than the bank rate. We would be surprised then how fast the CPR, Inco, Bell Telephone and all that bunch would start paying back deferred corporation taxes because right now it is an interest free loan, and it will never otherwise be collected. It is just lying on the books of Canada. Those deferred corporation taxes are nothing more than an interest free loan.

When we look at Canadian Pacific or International Nickel's annual reports, they show it as a liability. They get an interest free loan: Canadian Pacific, $2 billion; International Nickel, $1.5 billion; Bell Telephone, $1.5 billion, each. They can get an interest free loan, but our farm producers cannot any more under this legislation.

My goodness, what is the government doing? It had better think about what it is doing. Those interest charges are less than the increased costs that would be incurred every time the grain companies and the transportation companies get flooded with a rush of grain because the farmers need money. If one were to revert back to the years of the 1940s and 1950s and the early 1960s, those costs would be much higher.

As long as we had the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act which, thanks to Mr. Otto Lang and the then Liberal government was repealed, the government would pay the storage costs on grain over a certain amount every year. They did this because it was not the fault of the grain companies and it was not the fault of the producers, and everybody seemed to think that all this surplus grain was somehow not an asset. Grain in the granary is like money in the bank. We had the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act in which the government would contribute as much as $100 million a year. I forget the figure, but I think if there was something like 175 million bushels of grain in storage at the end of a crop year, the government paid the storage charges on amounts above that. That was only fair.

When the government attempted to repeal the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and present Otto Lang's first grain stabilization bill, I and four farmers took him to court because the Minister of Finance had not paid the Canadian Wheat Board the storage charges that it owed for 18 months, and it came to over $96 million. We took him to federal court in Regina, the four farmers who had a direct interest in the matter. We got a writ of Mandamus which is the opposite of an injunction. A writ of Mandamus says you shall do something, instead of you shall not do something. The government had to pay $96 million $2.5 million in interest, plus $2,700 in court costs. We won that fight. But the government still got its way and did away with the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act.

I hope that there is somebody out there in the country or lots of organizations that are consulting with legal counsel to see how the law on this bill reads. I understand that even though this legislation has not been passed, the Cabinet and the Treasury Board will not authorize the Canadian Wheat Board to issue interest free cash advances, even though under the law our producers are entitled to it. It seems to me, particularly if the law says the Minister of Finance shall pay or shall allow, then we have to get into the Federal Court and get there fast.

This betrayal is a classic illustration of the unfair way this government treats certain sections of our society. If it is not VIA Rail, it is farmers. If it is not farmers, it is fishermen. They have a different set of standards or rules for each sector of our society. I think it is a crass, deliberate way of setting off one group in our society against another. It does not enhance our ability to remain a united country in a real Confederation.

I know most Canadians will not get excited about this. Interest free cash advances are not a big deal in downtown Vancouver, Toronto or Montreal. Hells bells, $27 million, that much is lost in the stock market in Toronto on a given day. Who cares? However, it is important in principle and it is important in fairness.

I want to ask the government and I want to ask my friend from Edmonton and all the other government members who are present, all eight or nine of them, would they please go to their caucuses and ask the minister responsible for this legislation to withdraw it forthwith. I don't know why I am trying to help the Tories to get themselves re-elected, but there is a classic principle about politics. The longer you are in the more you work at defeating yourself, and this is a classic example. This one is going to cost the Tories, I predict, a dozen seats in the three prairie provinces alone. I am afraid they will elect some of those wild-eyed idiots who call themselves reform. I call them deformed.

I know I have used up my time but I would sure love to continue speaking until two o'clock. If I am lucky, there will be some questions so I can hold forth some more.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It does not appear that the member is going to be lucky.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to speak in the House today on behalf of the agricultural community in Malpeque in opposition to Bill C-36. This bill is another example of the abusive treatment that Prince Edward Islanders received this spring as a result of the 1989 budget.

We have the pending closure of CFB Summerside, the changes to the unemployment insurance program, the increase in excise taxes, the reduction in the provincial health and education grants, and the VIA cuts outlined and confirmed two weeks ago with the announcement that there will no longer be a VIA bus to transport rail travellers from Moncton to Charlottetown. The list goes on and on. This government is challenging every aspect of life in my province and this bill is no exception.

Today, I would like to discuss how these amendments affect the Island farmer, how important these two acts have been to farmers both in Prince Edward Island and across Canada. I would like to examine what motivated this government into presenting a piece of legislation so detrimental to our marketing system. The motivation behind this bill is the free trade agreement with the United States.

Prince Edward Island, among many other things, is well known to Canadians as a million acre farm. Our beautiful rolling hills and red soil are famous for the crops they produce. For many Canadians, when they hear Prince Edward Island mentioned, they cannot help but think of potatoes.

Agriculture makes up approximately 15 per cent of Prince Edward Island's gross domestic product. Over 6,000 Islanders are involved in this industry and that does not include related industries like fertilizer plants, truckers, and so on. It is not difficult to see why Islanders are greatly concerned about this government's intention to amend the Advanced Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

I would like to share with the House today some correspondence that I received from representatives in my riding of Malpeque who are opposed to the amendments to this bill. The Potato Producers Association of Prince Edward Island states that its organization was "shocked and infuriated by the announcement by the federal Minister of Finance's announcement to remove the interest free provision from the Advance Payments for Crops Act. The Potato Producers Association of Prince Edward Island find the proposed amendments totally unacceptable and request you, as Members of Parliament, to support all agricultural organizations in their request to have the proposed amendments revoked."

I also had a letter from the Potato Marketing Commission. The commission states: "If this amendment is introduced, it will basically destroy this valuable program at a time when it is needed most. This is a serious setback to Prince Edward Island potato farmers and will cause real hardship this fall for potato growers facing high interest rates."

The Prince Edward Island Vegetable Growers Co-operative Association asks: "Is this amendment to the Advance Payments for Crops Act an indication of the present government's reversal of agricultural policy regarding import displacement and self-sufficiency and thereby opening our markets to U.S. production?"

I have received other letters besides the three that I have mentioned. Finally, I would like to share the concerns of Mr. Gary Heaney, President of the Prince Edward Island Federation of Agriculture. Mr. Heaney says: "The change recommended by the Finance Minister in the budget will do little to cut the national debt but, on the other hand, will cause great hardship for our potato growers and others, especially when today's rising interest rates are considered. The Prince Edward Island Federation of Agriculture is in favour of all Canadians working together to cut the country's debt. But we need a realistic approach rather than actions which harm our basic producers without helping the economy in any major way".

In the minister's opening comments on this bill, we heard from him, once again, how all Canadians must share in the deficit. The minister said in this modest way the government is asking farmers to contribute to lowering the deficit. What this government is asking farmers to do is not modest, by any stretch of the imagination.

I want to share a few facts and figures with you. The impact of this amendment on our potato producers in Prince Edward Island would be approximately $280,000 in lost free interest; tobacco producers, $54,000; vegetable and fruit growers, $10,000; and our grain growers, $18,000. That totals approximately $365,000 annually that our farmers will lose.

The effectiveness of the Advance Payments for Crops Act is certainly well known. For the last few days we have heard a lot of the advantages of the program discussed. Certainly, the most important is the interest free cash flow which helps create orderly marketing, which in turn brings better prices for the farmer.

The fact that the advances were interest free was the most important feature of the program. It enabled producers to save on interest costs by meeting debt obligations to creditors earlier than might otherwise have been the case.

With a cash flow and the crops stored a farmer could look after his smaller creditors, and pay off many of the costs incurred throughout the growing season. It assisted the small business people in the community as well. It meant that the fertilizer distributor was paid and the fuel and oil distributor was paid. There is no question that this cash advance program was needed and worked well.

A cash advance drawing a high interest rate is a very much less desirable solution than one that is interest free. An interest bearing advance does not improve a farmer's debt position. The burden of interest costs will only be transferred from one creditor to another. As the National Farmers' Union point out, producers have no effective way of passing on interest costs as part of the cost of their product. Interest payments on borrowed money which require inventory of production as collateral is a negative cost burden that many producers could not afford to absorb.

By turning the underlying foundation of the cash advance program inside out, Bill C-36 will destroy another basic agriculture program that provided a degree of underpinning for the Canadian farm security. The amended programs usefulness will be severely limited.

As I mentioned before, the interest free portion in both acts encourages orderly marketing. The Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act provides needed cash flow to producers during times of surplus stock and tight quotas. It permits the Canadian Wheat Board the leverage to time sales to the benefit of the farmers.

Along with a number of farm organizations, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has opposed Bill C-36. Their suggestion is that these two programs be fully reinstated with the interest free portion intact for the 1989-90 crop year. During this time, they suggested that a major study be conducted on the effects of the proposed amendments on the farm economy and farming costs.

It is quite appalling that this government has not listened to the farm organizations across Canada. My colleague, the member for Algoma has read into the record the long list of farm groups that oppose these amendments. We have not heard from one organization in support of this bill. This government must consult with those this legislation will so drastically affect. Bill C–36 must not be passed. I, along with my colleagues, trust that this government will listen to the Canadian agricultural community and withdraw this bill.

Another problem generated by these amendments is that the loans under the two acts have been suspended until the House deals with this legislation. The fruit and vegetable harvest is almost complete in Prince Edward Island. Many farmers do not have the cash advance needed for them to proceed with their business debts.

Furthermore, when this announcement was made in the April 27 budget, farmers had already planned their season with the interest free cash advance as part of their annual financial plan. They are dependent on this interest free cash advance for the 1989–90 crop.

It appears that this government is eroding every aspect of rural life in Canada. Our rural communities are no longer properly served by VIA Rail, the rural post office is slowly being removed, and we have the constant threat against the existence of the family farm by high interest rates. We have cuts in rural and regional development programs, and the undermining of our dairy industry.

I would urge this government that Bill C–36 be withdrawn and that the government carefully consult with the agricultural community across Canada before consideration of this type of legislation takes place.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment standing in the name of the hon. member for Algoma. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), a recorded division on the proposed amendment stands deferred.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions among the three parties in the House, and I think you will find that there is consent for us to revert to motions so that we can address a specific motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, which calls for concurrence in the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that we revert to motions?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

ELECTIONS, PRIVILEGES, PROCEDURE AND PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

CONCURRENCE IN FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like at this time to move concurrence in the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business.

The report has been before the House for some time. It basically is a simple recommendation to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation authorizing it to broadcast on the parliamentary channel a complete replay of the proceedings of the House of Commons immediately after the daily adjournment of the House, until some other arrangement has been entered into.

As hon. members know, the committee is studying the question of the televising of proceedings of this House, and until a definitive report has been received from the committee, we are suggesting this as an interim measure. It had full agreement of all members of the committee, and is the unanimous recommendation of the committee.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief intervention. I want to applaud the motion of my Liberal colleague. As a member from British Columbia, the replaying of the House proceedings for western Canada would be most useful. With the time change, we would then be getting Question Period being viewed at prime time. If we want to open up the political process for Canadians from all regions of Canada, this motion could only do well. I applaud the member's initiative in putting it forth.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, may I just indicate, on behalf of the government, that we are more than anxious to co-operate with this motion and would be happy to support it.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being two o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper.

MUSEUMS

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH CANADIAN MUSEUM OF OCEANOGRAPHY

The House resumed from Monday, June 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gauthier:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider giving serious study to the establishment of a Canadian Museum of Oceanography in the National Capital Region, which would include among other things a national freshwater and saltwater aquarium containing specimens of all of Canada's aquatic fauna.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to stand in the House today to speak on the motion of my hon. friend from Vanier, particularly after the debate that we heard in the House yesterday. Surely, it must indicate to all Canadians who watched and to those who participated here a recognition of the maritime way of life that is such an inherent part of this country.

• (1400)

Clearly, in Newfoundland and Labrador and Atlantic Canada, that goes without saying. But other Canadians in different parts of this country who live off the bounty in our waters, be they salt or fresh, recognize as does this motion that it is a huge part of the way we live.

The native people who were the first settlers of this country obviously lived on fish, in the Arctic and in other areas of the country. Those who first came here, the Norse, John Cabot, Cartier, the Basques, and those who followed quite clearly came for fish and for water mammals.

So much of this country has its culture and its history inherent in the water. Sadly, the tragedies that we witnessed last week in Middle Cove and St. John's East bring home how cruel that sea can be. But it is inseparable from how our people have used the sea and the fresh water as a source of their economy and their way of life.

Quite clearly, as a country surrounded by three oceans, and with the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes, clearly water is part of our national definition and how we see ourselves. I think it is only appropriate that a country like this have a museum of oceanography that celebrates that history and that culture, as well as its economy, which we talk a lot about in this House, and which is so important to us all.

Part of our concern for this history, culture and economy has to be the future. Where are we going? Clearly, one of the most important aspects of any museum, any celebration or any exhibition of this nature has to be our ecology and the environment that we depend upon for the future of that culture, of that history and perhaps, most importantly, for the future of that economy.

I suggest that to limit this proposal to one part of the country without at least investigating the possibility of this institution being established in the living, breathing part of our maritime regions, particularly the Atlantic provinces, would be, unfortunately, narrowing.

I would like to propose an amendment to this motion. If it is accepted, this side certainly would move to pass this motion right away. I think it is important on this dismal, rainy, Friday afternoon that we recognize that part of this spirit of co-operation is in celebration of a great festival and a great anniversary, the birthday of our hon. friend from Vanier.

I would like to move:

That Motion 361 be amended by deleting the words: "In the National Capital Region".

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: The House will perhaps allow me to say a few words, Mr. Speaker, and I will be brief.

[English]

I wish to say a few words to explain that I accept the comments made by my friend from St. John's East. It is, indeed, a proposal which would take into consideration the regions of this country. I do think it may have been a bit far-fetched for me to pretend to entertain an oceanographic type of museum in the national capital region. Nevertheless, the idea was there.

I did want to make sure that the House was made aware that in this great country of ours, surrounded by three oceans, we have to pay attention to our water resources. We are the largest country in the world possessing about one-third of the fresh water of the world. I think it is time for this country to take pride by equipping itself with a museum which reflects this wealth of Canada. I do think that with the environmental concerns of today we would be able to educate Canadians to better understand the richness and wealth of Canada in terms of its water resources.

Having said all that, I accept and thank the member for his wishes on my birthday, but I could not let the occasion slip without reminding the House that it is also on the same day, October 22, the birthday of the Deputy Speaker in the chair at this time. I want to wish you, Sir, a very happy birthday.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to see this amendment added to the original motion. I notice the motion states that there is a centre for research and conservation, concentrating on oceanographic studies. I want to point out that the Institute of Ocean Sciences is based in my riding of Saanich—Gulf Islands and therefore to suggest that there is a Pacific coast as well that would be most receptive to a museum of oceanography.

As the member for Ottawa—Vanier has stated such a museum would demonstrate Canada's expertise in the fishing sector. After yesterday's debate one must wonder whether or not our fishery expertise is going to be relegated to museum status rather than a viable industry.

In closing, I also want to say that this always raises the question of the use of federal dollars to support museums generally. In my riding I have two museums that are seeking federal support. One is on the Gulf Islands, on Pender Island at Port Washington where, I believe, they have been denied access to federal funds. This is a community that is trying very desperately to refurbish as a heritage site the Port Washington general store. With a lot of imagination and initiative from the local citizenry they have done great work, yet the federal government seems to want to put all of its museum money into central Canada, and particularly into the national capital region.

I agree with this amendment that perhaps we should be looking at other avenues where the money should be going, not only for a museum of oceanography but for museums generally.

Another example of a museum in my riding is the whale museum in Sidney which is also in need of federal funds, the kind that generate tourist interest in our area.

In closing, I want to applaud my colleague for St. John's East for putting this amendment to this original motion and I am sure we can vote in support of that motion.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak in support of the amendment. Of course, representing the city of Halifax, it would, in normal circumstances, be the obvious place for such a museum. But I would like to make a suggestion to the House, that given the situation in Atlantic Canada and, in particular, in our sister province of Prince Edward Island—I am sure that the hon. member for St. John's East would agree with me—that perhaps the place for the Museum of Oceanography might be the town of Summerside.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

PRIVILEGE

CANADA POST CORPORATION SERVICES

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I wish to lodge an official complaint and request an investigation by yourself or by the RCMP through your office, Mr. Speaker, regarding a postal delivery occurrence originating from this local post office.

Last Saturday, the editor of the West Quebec Post, a weekly paper in the Wakefield area, Mr. Ernie Mahoney, called my home to inform me that 21 parcels with post frank on them, containing information on the proposed goods and services tax, were found in a ditch in the Farrellton area which is near Wakefield, Quebec. These were found by a local farmer by the name of Connor Plunkett.

Mr. Mahoney, the editor, with the help of the farmer returned 20 of the 21 packages to the Wakefield post office. These parcels all bore, as I said, the post mark and addresses in the Navan–Orleans district in Ontario, in the opposite direction.

I find the situation, of course, unacceptable and obviously a criminal act. I would appreciate if you would investigate. I will be forwarding to you a letter with the details.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has brought to the attention of the House, through the Speaker, a situation with respect to the disposition of certain parcels of mail. It is a matter which is probably of some considerable concern to all hon. members.

I shall take it under advisement and return to the House as soon as I can with either recommendations or some further information which may be helpful. I thank the hon. member.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION

TABLING OF ELEVENTH REPORT OF CANADIAN GROUP

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour of tabling, in both official languages, the eleventh report of the Canadian Group of the Interparliamentary Union.

The report was prepared by the official delegation representing Canada at the eighty-second Interparliamentary Conference held in London, in the United Kingdom, from September 4 to 9, 1989.

Mr. Speaker, I may add that the Conference put special emphasis on the Interparliamentary Union's centennial, and that the Canadian delegation was very proud to represent Canada at the opening ceremonies which took place in the presence of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth and the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Right Hon. Margaret Thatcher.

PETITIONS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present yet another petition in support of VIA Rail.

It is signed by a number of Canadians who express their concern with the fact that the railway passenger service as carried out by VIA Rail is essential for many Canadians and has been part of Canada for more than 100 years.

• (1110)

They believe that the Government of Canada has announced a $500 million cut-back over four years, which will reduce the service and seriously affect the ability to have railway service in our country.

Therefore, the undersigned call upon Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, to upgrade VIA equipment, and to guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger service.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to rise to present two petitions which have been certified correct, both dealing with the proposed goods and services tax, both signed by members of the riding of Scarborough West.

There are a total of 53 signatures, all of them calling upon the government not to introduce this heinous tax.

REVISION OF EXTRADITION LAWS

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present, under Standing Order 36, petitions calling upon the government to revise our extradition laws.

They have been signed by 3,037 residents of Edmonton—Strathcona.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition today signed by the people of Thunder Bay who on January 15 will be losing their passenger rail service through the city of Thunder Bay.

It is more important now inasmuch as over this past weekend they had their first snow fall in the north. Several communities were denied access to airplane and highway transportation. The only available means of transportation was the railway. Had this happened on January 15, those people would have been denied access to any means of transportation whatsoever.

I have the honour of presenting this petition, signed by the people of Thunder Bay, which has been properly certified.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I also have some petitions from people in Thunder Bay who call upon the government to reverse its decision and continue passenger rail services.

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, I also have the honour of presenting a petition from the people of Thunder Bay in which they express their dissatisfaction with the government's plans for cutbacks at VIA Rail.

[English]

These people are afraid that many routes will be lost and thousands of jobs will also be lost. They request that the government take another look and cancel its plans to dismantle VIA Rail.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from 475 of my constituents, asking the government to maintain the existing VIA Rail network, to upgrade its equipment and to guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger service.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present, on behalf of a number of constituents in Colonsay, Bruno and Viscount near my constituency, a petition which asks the government to reject the proposed goods and service tax that would tax things like reading materials, haircuts, diapers, coffins and home heating fuels, and to put in place a fair tax system.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty to table this morning another petition from Canadians, 80 per cent of whom oppose the project of the Tory government to impose a sales tax on goods and services.

These people signed the petition in the hope that this Parliament will reject the proposed goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the people of Kenora—Rainy River, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present this petition.

The people of Kenora—Rainy River have asked that the government reconsider the removal of the Canadian, the VIA transportation that runs through the riding of Kenora—Rainy River, based on the fact that throughout the whole summer it was completely booked and there was a lack of cars.

We ask that the government reassess its reasoning for removing a service that is lacking in cars, not lacking in people who are interested in using it.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am very pleased to stand here this morning to present a petition on behalf of 107 petitioners who are concerned about the proposed cut-back in VIA Rail.

These petitioners are from the province of Ontario. They come from the Toronto area, Brockville, Agincourt, Willowdale, Cornwall, all over Ontario where the line between Toronto and Montreal very seriously affects them.

The petitioners are asking that the federal government please consider rescinding a decision to cut back on VIA Rail as they feel the service is very necessary to the people of Canada.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present a petition signed by a large number of residents of Kingston and the Islands.

These electors object to the government's goods and services tax and, along with 80 per cent of Canadians who oppose this tax, they call on the Parliament of Canada to reject it. In the petition they say that it will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates, and higher unemployment.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C-20, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, be read the third time and passed.

He said: Bill C-20 implements the changes announced in the Budget of April 27, 1989, concerning the federal sales tax and excise taxes and duties. These measures are an important component of the fiscal plan established by our Government to deal with the problem of our substantial and increasing national debt.

During the past four years, Mr. Speaker, this government has made considerable progress in reducing the annual deficit and slowing down the growth of the public debt. Additional measures are needed, however, if we are to sustain economic growth in this country and maintain the programs valued by Canadians. The fiscal plan we presented in the budget will achieve both goals, by reducing spending and increasing revenues. The proposed measures were carefully chosen to ensure a balanced approach that imposes the heaviest burden on those who are most able to bear it. Additional revenues will be drawn from a broad range of sources, including personal and corporate income tax and sales and excise taxes. Meeting the challenge posed by the debt by reducing spending and increasing revenues is a responsibility that we have to present and future generations of Canadians.

In view of the serious financial problems we are facing and in order to spread the burden of controlling the public debt as broadly as possible, this bill implements a number of increases in the federal sales tax. These increases include a 1 per cent increase in the federal sales tax rate on construction materials, from 8 to 9 per cent, effective January 1, 1990. The sales tax on alcohol and tobacco products will be increased from 18 to 19 per cent, effective April 28, 1989. The general sales tax rate is increased by 1.5 per cent, from 12 to 13.5 per cent, as of June 1, 1989. Taxes on telecommunications services and on programming services provided by telecommunications lines are also raised by 1 per cent, from 10 to 11 per cent, as of June 1, 1989.

These measures will contribute nearly $1 billion in 1989 and $2 billion in 1990 to deficit reduction.

Mr. Speaker, in the February 1986 Budget, this Government established the refundable sales tax credit to help Canadians of modest means. To offset the effect of increased federal sales tax rates on low-income individuals and families, the Bill to amend the Income Tax Act will considerably increase the refundable sales tax credit both in 1989 and in 1990. The sales tax credit for adults will be raised from $70 to $100 in 1989 and $140 in 1990. For children under 19, it will go from $35 to $50 in 1989 and $70 in 1990. Furthermore, the income cutoff for the credit will be raised from $16,000 to $18,000 in 1990 so that more Canadians can claim the credit.

This bill also increases some excise taxes and duties imposed under the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act. The excise tax on unleaded gasoline is raised one cent a litre as of April 28, 1989 and the excise tax on leaded gasoline two cents a litre. An additional increase of one cent a litre will take effect on January 1, 1990.

Excise taxes and duties on tobacco products are increased substantially by $4 a carton for cigarettes and proportionally for cigars. The duties and taxes on manufactured tobacco products are increased by $5.30 a 200-gram container in two stages to generate revenue and reduce the difference in tax between cigarettes and fine-cut tobacco.

These changes to the excise taxes and duties will bring in some $0.9 billion in additional revenue in 1989 and $1.6 billion in 1990. Furthermore, they meet Canadians' concerns about the environment and dangers to health and tie in with the Government's overall strategy to reduce smoking in Canada.

[English]

This bill provides tax relief for Canadians. The sales tax portion of the fuel tax rebate program for primary producers is being extended one additional year. This program provides rebates of federal sales and excise taxes on motor vehicle fuels to primary producers in respect of fuels they use for off highway production purposes.

The program was introduced in the fall of 1984 as a temporary measure and is scheduled to expire at the end of this year. While the rebates of excise taxes will be allowed to expire as scheduled, the sales tax rebates are being extended to December 31, 1990.

A new sales tax exemption is being introduced for machinery and apparatus purchased for use in the processing or treatment of toxic wastes in toxic waste treatment plants. This measure will respond to Canadians' concerns about the environment by reducing the cost of equipment acquired by toxic waste treatment plants to process toxic wastes in Canada.

This bill also implements several minor technical amendments to the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act. A number of amendments to this bill were proposed by some hon. members at report stage. Most of the proposed amendments related to the deleting of various clauses of the bill.

Interestingly, some of the motions would have deleted measures that would reduce taxes, such as clause 4 which extends the sales tax portion of the fuel tax rebate program for one additional year and clause 7 which provides a new exemption for machinery and apparatus for use in the treatment of toxic wastes.

On the other hand, some interesting proposals were made in the course of the debate on the merits of using the tax system to further the government's environmental objectives. While the House did not adopt any of these motions, hon. members may be assured that I have noted their comments on these issues.

This is an important bill. It will raise substantial additional revenues and implement a significant part of our plan to deal with the serious problem posed by the public debt. By reducing annual deficits and controlling the debt, we will be able to maintain the valued social programs and high standard of living Canadians have come to expect for themselves and for their children.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to reply to the hon. minister's address on this bill, Bill C-20. As a Canadian I would like to think that this government was interested in the finances of this country, but its entire record since taking office has indicated that it could not care less either about the welfare of this country or the welfare of Canadians.

The minister is trying to tell us that through some enlightenment he is now concerned with reducing the deficit.

When this government came to power there was a $22.6 billion interest tab on the debt that existed in this country. At the present time the interest on the deficit amounts to over $39 billion per year. The interest alone on the debt has increased by over $17 billion per year.

The government is now talking deficit because the election is behind it. It wants Canadians to believe that it is concerned about the economy of this country, that it is concerned about the welfare of Canadians. I find this deception of the government very difficult to accept.

The facts indicate that this is a government that callously and without concern for the people of this country has followed its own agenda. It has the people of Canada to look after themselves. It has an agenda that is going to open up our trade with the United States and link its interests with big business. The Tories say: "If in the meantime we act in your welfare it is coincidental and we wish you all the luck in the world".

This bill is nothing more than a preview to the gross deception that is yet to come, and that is the goods and services tax. A former friend of the government calls it "the gouge and squeeze tax". This bill is just a preliminary step to keep the pump primed until this government can get the big dollars. That is what it wants.

How can Canadians possibly believe that this government wants that money for any other reason than to squander it on what it considers its friends would like to have and on what will be in its best political interest?

Canadians will not accept that this government is interested in the welfare of this country or in the welfare of Canadians until it cleans its own house, until it deals with the management of this country in a way that Canadians feel is not only prudent but absolutely necessary. Until this government does something about bringing about government, bringing back political will to Canada, the country and its people will never accept tax increases in the nature that this government is putting forward.

We are asked to accept these increases in the federal sales tax and the excise tax. This is not the first time we have been asked to accept tax increases by this government. It is not the second time. It is not the third time. It is the fourth time that this government has come to the people of Canada and stated that it wants to increase the sales taxes and the excise taxes. This is the same form of consumption taxes that the Prime Minister himself "called the silent killer of jobs". In this case, the Prime Minister might ultimately be correct because if this government follows through with a goods and services tax, then there will be a silent killing of jobs and a noisy reaction from the people of Canada.

This is not going to be acceptable no matter how much this government tries to advertise and to make Canadians think that this is all in their best interests. We Canadians are no longer surprised to see such hypocritical action and double talk on the part of the government. The government is not going to deceive Canadians into believing that the goods and services tax, and these constant taxes, one after the other, time after time, are going to be in their best interests.

What are we going to get when we get the goods and services tax? We now have excise tax on gasoline at 13.5 per cent, the maximum, as if it were machinery manufactured in Canada. We have the sales tax at 13.5 per cent. We have the excise tax now at 8.5 cents a litre for non-leaded gasoline and 9.5 cents a litre for leaded gasoline. These taxes are tremendously high. Is this government going to take them off when the goods and services tax comes in? No, the government is not going to remove them. What it will probably do is tell Canadians that we need an environmental tax. We have to look after the environment.

The minister is talking about this tax as being an environmental tax for what we have to do for the environment. The environment is tremendously important. I just wish that the government realized how important it is. Canadians do, certainly on this side of this House we do. We only wish the government did. But the government will realize it, or at least it will in its pronouncements when it feels it has to issue a new tax. In addition to the goods and services tax we will undoubtedly be dealing with an increase in the sales tax and the excise tax in gasoline to justify keeping that tax where it is at the present time.

This government has a history of double talk. We have seen broken promises in other areas. We have seen it with VIA Rail. This government has said that it would improve rail services in this country and would never create second-class citizens. Well we have seen what has happened to that promise. The government has slashed rail services in this country and the people in the Atlantic and the north and in certain parts of western Canada are certainly second-class citizens in the minds of this government.

Everybody's favourite line is when the Right Hon. Prime Minister told voters: "Social programs were a sacred trust never to be tampered with". Canadians have come to realize that there is nothing sacred to this government, nothing at all.

Why, time after time after time, have we as Canadians, not only been misled, but have had the intelligence of everyone in this country insulted by the misleading policies and the misleading pronouncements of this government?

I would like to just go over this GST and talk about the inconsistencies with respect to what this government has said the goods and services tax would do and what this tax will actually do.

On October 8, 1988, during the election campaign, the hon. Minister of Finance said: "The bottom line is that the sales tax will not be used to raise the revenues of the Government of Canada". The reality is that the revenue is going to be used to raise the revenues of the Government of Canada. The revenue from the present tax is going to be increased from $18.5 billion to $24 billion. At the same time that the government is saying it is not going to raise revenues with the new sales tax, the revenues of the new sales tax are going to be used to fight the deficit. Now, if you do not have new revenues how are you going to fight the deficit? And even if you believed the government were interested in fighting the deficit, that record.

Second, the technical paper on the GST says that the GST will improve the over-all fairness of the tax system, that lower and modest income Canadians will be better off once the GST is in place. How can that be when the Standing Committee on Finance, at its hearings across the country, has literally had welfare groups and social interest groups from one coast to the other denounce it as being a flagrant tax grab that will position than they are today?

Even the Deputy Minister of Finance admitted that many low and middle income Canadians will be worse off when the GST is put into place. That is from a deputy minister. How can we ever believe that this government was actually concerned about the welfare of low and middle income Canadians?

In another segment of gallantry, the Minister of Finance also promised that: "Sales tax reform will eliminate the hidden tax in the prices consumers pay". But again, reality stands in the way of believing the words of the minister. The government is going to allow these retailers to state whether the tax is to be included in the price or is going to be added separately when the item is purchased. The government cannot have it both ways. It cannot say it is not going to be a hidden tax and then, at the same time, leave it to business to determine whether it is going to be a hidden tax or not.

These are the things we were told before election day. We were told this so that it would not become an issue, so that the government could feather out this whole question of the sales tax to make it palatable for Canadians so they would not ask questions. Whenever a question was asked the government came out with an answer that it thought we, in the Liberal Party, or Canadians wanted to hear, not the truth. That was not the important thing. It was getting through the election campaign and telling people what they wanted to hear. Then, once the election was over, sock it to them.

Mr. Robichaud: Good-bye Charlie Brown.

Mr. MacLellan: Good-bye Charlie Brown is right.

Another infamous document, the White Paper on sales tax reform states: "A good sales tax should not impose heavy compliance costs on business or create undue administrative costs for government". Well, what have we seen? What we have seen is that small businesses are going to be devastated by the cost of complying with this tax. We are going to impose upon small business a tremendous tax. We are going to impose on business in this country a $2 billion cost to comply with this goods and services tax. The president of the Federation of Independent Business, a former friend of the government, is now saying that the allowance that this government is going to pay to small business is not going to come close to compensating small business for the cost of having to comply with this tax. But this government is saying: "Well, that is the only thing we can do. The present 13.5 per cent tax on manufacturing is not working. We have to find an alternative and this is the only alternative." This is what is being forced down the throats of Canadians. It is unacceptable. If it were true, it would be unacceptable. The tax we have now is certainly better than the one this government is going to gouge from the Canadian people.

How do we know that this government has done its homework? Every indication seems to indicate that it has not. The Minister of Finance will stand in his place and say: "We tried to get it worked in with the provincial sales tax, but the provinces would not agree". I am afraid that the Canadian people have taken a poor second place to the government's determination to maintain its honeymoon, such as it is, with the provinces.

Can you, Mr. Speaker, just picture the Minister of Finance saying to his provincial counterparts: "We do not have to impose the GST. Why do we not work together and try to work it all into one national sales program? You do the collecting and we will split the revenues," and the provinces saying: "Stick it in your ear". Then the Minister of Finance says: "Oh, well, I tried". That would be end of the dialogue.

That is the determination that this government has tried to work on developing a national sales tax. What do we have? We have this complete and utterly unworkable situation, gouging the Canadian people, costing small businesses millions and billions of dollars to try to implement and put it into place, not to mention the additional public servants that we are going to need to bring it about and enforce it.

The government, by its own admission, says there are going to be over 2,500 new public servants. That is only what the government admits. We know from experience what the government admits we can multiply by quite another number. It is not acceptable by any stretch of the imagination.

I think it is time, and I think that Canadians feel it is time, that the job of the opposition, and certainly of the Canadian people, is to remind the government of what it is supposed to be doing, to remind the government that it made commitments prior to the election; that it has obligations that it has to honour; to remind the Prime Minister that the mark of good government, Mr. Speaker, is not how well you cozy up to big business, but how you represent the people of this country. It is a challenge to this government of restoring decency, honesty and integrity to government. For this government, that is going to be one heck of a big job. But the sooner it does it, then the sooner we are going to be able to get this country back into the profile we want it to be, the profile it used to have.

Right now the government is going in the other direction. It is taking all of its time, and all of the money it can get its hands on, to convince Canadians that they should want something that they do not want. The government has spent $20 million on an ad campaign to try to force down the throats of Canadians the acceptability of the goods and services tax. Canadians have listened. Canadians have heard. Canadians are repulsed by what their own government is trying to do. The Canadian people will not accept the line of advertising and the line of "hoi polloi" and hocus-pocus that this government is putting forward.

This is not going to be another free trade debate. The Canadian people now know what the free trade arrangement has meant to this country. They now know that they cannot believe what this government wants them to believe.

Let us make no mistake, Canadians from sea to sea, regardless of economic status, background, party affiliation or ideology, reject this tax completely and utterly.

In just the few short months since the technical paper on the goods and services tax was released thousands of petitions have been signed and registered. There have been letters to the editors in all of our national newspapers. Members of Parliament of all political affiliations have received hundreds of letters in total, denouncing this goods and services tax and the protests are not diminishing. We have heard the petitions today. We have heard the voice of Canadians. It says: "Don't implement this goods and services tax. It is not acceptable". Canadians are fed up with being taxed to death while this government squanders the money that being paid in taxes on things that are in its own political interest and to the advantage of its own political cronies. We saw this during the last e lection campaign with the money for ACOA, a five-year program, almost all spent in the election campaign. Not one year's worth of funds spent, not two, but three, four, maybe even five years' funding spent in an election campaign to try to buy the votes of Atlantic Canadians. Well, we saw what happened.

This government is misreading Canadians. Canadians want fair government. They want good government from their representatives. They do not want to be told and convinced of something they do not want. When they tell the government they do not want something, they do not want this government to yet again try to convince them that it is in their best interests and what a wonderful thing it its.

In the history of this country there have been few proposals that have received such massive opposition as has this GST proposal. It is overwhelming as a member of Parliament to speak to people. In a recent poll it was determined that 80 per cent of Canadians are opposed to this tax. Yet, the government forges on, trying to convince Canadians of what a wonderful thing it would be. It is trying to cut a hole through a wall of water and the government is going to be oblivious to the torrential downpour that is going to come down on top of it.

This is yet another case of this government not listening, not wanting to listen to the people of Canada. It is a completely, utterly flagrant abuse of democracy. We have the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister stating that they have something that they want to force Canadians to accept, but 26 million people or 80 per cent of the 26 million are saying no. A few members in the government are saying yes, and to them that is the democratic process that they are going to force down the throats of Canadians. They expect Canadians to say one morning when they wake up: "My goodness, I was wrong all along about the GST. What a wonderful thing it is".

Well, Mr. Speaker, if you believe that that is going to happen, then there is a bridge in Brooklyn I will sell to you at a very reasonable price. The opposition to the GST will not collapse. It has not even begun to waver. Canadians refuse to be coerced into accepting something that they do not feel is in their best interests or is even going to do what this government says its is going to do. This is in spite of the millions that is being spent to try to force this upon Canadians.

The manufacturers' sales tax as it exists right now at 13.5 per cent, as the government would say, is the only alternative. It is not the only alternative.

The people of Canada feel that the government has not managed the country properly and they are not going to accept this completely oppressive and obscene tax, knowing that the Government of Canada has no conception in its own mind of how to manage the economy.

What this government wants to achieve through this advertising campaign is a great example of what George Orwell in his novel 1984 put forward when he talked about double speak, which was the tool of big brother. Once again we have double speak by the Minister of Finance and by the Prime Minister. Just last month we saw double speak in action, in a way that I think big brother would have been very proud.

The Minister of Finance on Monday, September 25, introduced new terminology to the English language. He spoke of the goods and services tax as being a "fairness package" and having "fairness features". If it wasn't so pathetic, it would almost be funny.

The Minister of Finance referred to the goods and services tax as a "fairness feature". Doesn't that sort of makes you warm and tingly all over, to think that our government is going to put forward a fairness feature. Perhaps what he means is that Canadians will not suffer abject poverty. If Canadians do not really suffer abject poverty, are not completely down and out, then this tax is fair. If he leaves them with a few loonies in their pockets, then this tax is fair.

That is not what Canadians think is fair. In fact, even with the minister's fairness feature, which is his tax credit, 300,000 families living at the poverty level right now are going to be worse off. That is his fairness feature. Sure, he is going to give a few dollars back to the people, but only a portion of what he is taking away from Canadians, who can least afford to lose this money. The reality is the fairness feature tax credit that the Minister of Finance is going to give back will still require an average family of four, two parents, two children, with an income totalling $45,000 a year to pay $629 more in each tax year.

The minister referred as well to the fairness feature tax credit for business to help them recover the cost. I have already referred to what small business thinks of that. As I stated earlier, this fairness feature is just going to give small business back a portion of the amount that they are going to have to pay to collect this tax.

Canada will be the only country in the world with two different sales taxes, a sales tax provincially and a sales tax federally. Imagine the complications that this is going to cause to small businesses.

Why then, in view of the problems that this tax is going to create, is this government constantly subjecting the people of Canada to psychological manipulation? Why is it trying to force this down the throats of Canadians? We have seen the saga of the Standing Committee on Finance, led by that redoubtable crusader, the chairman, flying across the country speaking with Canadians, insulting them one by one as he goes, leaving a trail of bad feelings and complete disgust everywhere he lands.

It was the dubious privilege of the Atlantic provinces, just a few days ago, to have this caped crusader in their midst, the Batman of politics. He landed in Newfoundland and when witnesses came before him he kept saying: "Hurry up, hurry up, I have got to catch a plane. I cannot listen to all of this". He did not tell them, of course, that the plane was at his disposal and the plane would only go when he said it could go. He was pushing Canadians. He had allowed two days for the four Atlantic provinces on an issue as important as this. He was not even going to hear from the tourist industry of Nova Scotia. He still did not hear testimony from the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, an organization that represents 8,000 businesses in Atlantic Canada. This is the Batman that we talk about. I am telling you that this Batman may be fortunate to be able to hang from the ceiling of a cave by his feet when the people of Canada go looking for him.

This is insulting to the people of Canada. Yet, why is this being done? Why is all this attention being directed to our fearless crusader who is going across Canada and to the Minister of Finance? I suppose the more attention that we can attract to these fellows, then the more heat is taken off the Prime Minister. What a wonderful ploy.

If we were to look at the last five years of this government, we would find it very difficult to sum up exactly where it has gone because it has been like a balloon flying through the air with the air coming out of it. It has been zigzagging all over the place helter-skelter.

We cannot look at this government as having any concern for Canadians. We cannot give it a tag which says that this is a government that really is interested in the people of Canada. We cannot do that because it is not true. We cannot say it is the government of the depression years or the war years. Probably the best tag we could give this government would be related to the $1 piece that it brought out and call them the "loonie years". That is really what it amounts to.

There is nothing in this government for the people of Canada other than abuse and absolute misleading policies, redundancy, and absolute abandonment of principles. Why? Because this government is interested in following the course of the United States, marching in lockstep with the government of the U.S. as if it really believed that it knew where it was going or even where the Government of the United States was going.

I think it is interesting to read the October 23 edition of Time magazine. The cover story relating it to the American government states: "Is Government Dead?" There is a little caption saying: "Unwilling to lead, politicians are letting America slip into paralysis". This is what we are following?

Is it not evident that this is exactly what we are following? Before it is too late, we must start to pull this country together, to develop a financial package and a financial program that is going to help this country, not to completely and forever take Canadians into the wilderness and try to convince them of something that every Canadian knows is not helpful and is not true.

Before it is too late, will this government do something decent for this country? Will it do something decent for Canadians? Will it be honourable enough to develop policies that are going to help Canadians and not try to destroy this country?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would just like to bring to the attention of the House that we are on Standing Order 43. The first two speakers had unlimited time. The next speakers will have 20 minutes plus 10 minutes for questions and comments.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democrats, I want to join the opposition to this bill which is really a product of the budget, and reflects so much what was in the budget material, and follows the pattern set by the Conservatives ever since they were first elected in 1984.

Certainly the trend was established before that. It was bad enough before, this continuing process of loading more and more of the cost of maintaining government services in Canada upon the lowest income people, upon the middle income people, and relieving those at the top of the heap from paying their fair share. It was bad enough before 1984, but the process has certainly accelerated in every budget since the Conservatives produced their first budget after the 1984 election.

Their whole thrust, it would seem, has been to get revenue out of the people's pockets by adding on to consumer taxes of one kind or another. The estimate that we have produced is that up until this budget they have taken an extra $900 in tax from the average Canadian family between the years 1984 and 1988 through sales and excise taxes alone. It is part of the pattern that existed before but has been increased since to get more and more of the government's revenue from such taxes.

The increase in the sales tax on construction materials, equipment and building materials from 8 per cent to 9 per cent is an increase in the rate of tax of 12.5 per cent. That begins January 1, 1990. The increase in the sales tax on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products from 18 per cent to 19 per cent begins on April 28. An increase in the sales tax on telecommunications and programming services from 10 per cent to 11 per cent begins June 1, 1989, another increase of 10 per cent. There has been an increase in the sales tax on all other goods to which it applies from 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent, the manufacturers' sales tax. That is an increase of 15 per cent in the rate of tax.

This is the tax that other members and the Minister of Finance himself have referred to as the silent killer of jobs. It would seem as though the minister felt that he has done enough to kill jobs in Ontario, so he is increasing the rate of taxation alone by 15 per cent and making all the rest of the country pay the cost of his attempts to keep the lid on what is happening in southern Ontario.

Our estimate is that in this one budget alone the increases in sales and excise taxes is going to add another $500 per family on to the $700 that the Conservatives have already levied against every average Canadian family.

Consumption taxes are unfair. I think everyone will agree with that. Even the government will lend some measure of agreement to the idea that taxes should be based on the ability to pay and should not simply be a general sales tax.

There are other methods. We have talked about them during the budget debate. We have talked about other methods the government could have used to increase its revenue, if increasing its revenue was the main aim of the government in the first budget after the election campaign. We mentioned several of them. I mentioned several of them myself.

There is still some 50,000 profitable Canadian corporations that will be paying no tax even under this budget. There are very wealthy, high income individuals who because of the various allowable tax expenditures will pay no tax in spite of the increases. There is no point putting a surtax on an income tax if the individual is paying no income tax to start with.

I am not opposed to the idea of putting a surtax on the income of wealthy individuals, but I am opposed to them not paying the tax in the first place, the tax upon which the surtax can be levied. To talk about making it fairer by bringing in a further tax on consumption, the goods and services tax of course is the greatest misleading statement of all.

The increase in the federal services tax from 3 per cent to 5 per cent I cannot find too upsetting. It is another personal tax increase, and we have always argued that it should be based on the person's ability to pay. People who are paying that kind of income tax can pay the other surtax.

An additional 3 per cent for individuals with incomes over $70,000 will begin July 1. When you add that to what is already there, that will mean they will be paying an 8 per cent surtax. Those are the people who can afford to pay more revenue to the government.

On the other hand, when we look at the pattern of what the government has done, we realize that in the five-year history of the government it has reduced the maximum tax for people with incomes over $100,000 by $3,500 and, even after putting this increase into effect, those people will still be paying less income tax than they were when the Conservatives were first elected. It is obviously unfair.

It is part of the process of putting the weight more and more on the lowest income and on the middle income people and of continuing to provide relief to those with the highest incomes. They have done nothing to close the loopholes that exist for the 6,250 individuals in the highest income tax brackets who have not been hit by this government, indeed who have been relieved.

Other legislation is before the House that I might just refer to briefly. The shift from general revenue to premiums for regionally extended UI benefits adds another $1.7 billion tax on payrolls. For individuals with maximum insurable earnings this will mean a direct tax hike of about $90. It is another way of loading the cost of government upon the lowest and middle income people so that it will not be necessary to hit those at the highest levels.

A large corporations tax is to be levied on corporate capital in excess of $10 million, creditable against the existing 3 per cent federal surtax on corporate income. At least it is getting something, but we have to realize that this is not a minimum tax on corporations. Like the capital tax on banks, it taxes assets, not profits, and it will only apply to 3,600 corporations leaving tens of thousands still not paying corporate tax.

Speaking of banks, I recall the concern expressed by the banks or at least by the people who were buying bank shares before the last budget. They expected the government to come in with a new tax on banks and trust companies. Unfortunately that did not happen and the price of bank and trust company shares went up markedly in the market the next day. They were expecting to be paying some $4.1 billion—that was the finance minister's own figures—but it did not happen. His explanation was that it was going to be too difficult to administer. So easy to get more money out of the people at the bottom of the heap, so difficult to administer some new tax that is going to hit the wealthiest of all corporations in Canada. I wonder why it was so difficult.

They took a little bit off the corporations. They hit a few of them. They go to the bottom again and they hit small business. There is an increase in the effective small business tax rate from 12.4 per cent to 12.8 per cent and an increase in interest charges for overdue income tax payments of individuals by 2 per cent, which is simply following the increase in the prime rate that perhaps has had the greatest effect on the budget. Without that the deficit this year could have been substantially lower than it was the year before.

I recall that during the election campaign we expected the deficit to be $28.9 billion and then we found out when the budget came down that the latest figure was $35.5 billion, an increase of $6.7 billion in what the deficit was expected to be. It was totally attributable to the increase in interest rates and there would have been a substantial reduction had interest rates not increased so much.

They are passing some of that on to the people who are behind in their income tax instalments. Still, there is nothing to go after the $36.1 billion in deferred income taxes corporations have been allowed to postpone. As some of them say, they do not expect ever to pay it and, as some have argued, we cannot really collect that because it is never going to be paid. Yet, the corporations are able to claim this, to report it.

We could at least—I have argued this before as have others on our side of the House—charge interest on that deferred corporation tax. As long as it is sitting there on the balance sheets, let the Conservatives get some interest from it and let them get it at the same rate as they are getting it from individuals at the bottom of the heap. But I do not expect that to happen. That is contrary to the direction in which the government has been going since it was elected some five years ago.

According to the National Council on Welfare, sales and excise taxes have been the predominant source of new tax revenues since the Conservatives came to office, reflecting a 55.5 per cent increase in the revenue from those sources. The contrast is that revenue from personal income taxes increased by 33 per cent since 1984 and from corporate income tax by 17.7 per cent, not that the rates have gone up but rather that there had been that much more money or inflation. That is why the amount has increased.

The government should have followed up on what it was saying. It should have tried to make the tax system fairer. A more appropriate target, rather than going after the people at the bottom of the heap, would have been to have gone after the $30 billion patchwork of tax credits that are allowed to individuals and corporations.

The government then comes up with this proposal of bringing in a new tax system that is supposed to be fairer, the goods and services tax, and once again, going after the people at the bottom of the heap. I know that what I have said on this subject previously has been quoted in the House and has come back to me. I think that some of it bears repeating from my mouth as opposed to coming from somebody else's.

The goods and services tax, as it now stands, is not a fair way of getting more money from the Canadian public. We should be going to the individuals and corporations that have it, that can afford it, that are earning the incomes and are not paying tax at an appropriate rate.

There was a proposal which came out some 22 or 23 years ago in a report that was three years and a couple of months in the making, the Carter report. The report had good proposals for making the tax system fairer. As a matter of fact, the proposals were going to be so good for the people in the low and middle income brackets and so fair for the ones at the top that neither the Liberal nor the Conservative governments paid any attention to that report since. The Conservatives might well go back and look at that, if they want to be fair, to see whether there should not be for the first time in the history of Canada a truly fair system of getting revenue for government services.

The goods and services tax is not fair. The lower the income, the higher proportion of income one will pay in this tax. The government says we are going to mitigate that by having a system of credits, but we are going to make sure that we keep getting more money out of the lowest income people because that tax credit is not going to be fully indexed, only partially.

That way year by year, while the people in the lowest income brackets are getting credits paid to them, nevertheless they will have them clawed back each year through the government's failure to fully index these payments.

There is another way. I have spoken of this before and I am going to try it again. The government said that it was really going to be great, that it was going to give the credit every three months. It was not going to make us wait until the end of the year. Mr. Speaker, I do not know if you have any people in your riding who are on welfare, or whether you have ever had any experience with this, whether you have ever known anybody in that circumstance, but they are operating on a pretty tight budget. To have to wait for three months to recover the money that they spent on the first day after they got the previous cheque is asking a bit much of them.

A lot of single parents with very low incomes, raising families, trying to educate them, are going to be asked to somehow or other budget so that three months from the latest one they will get another cheque from the government to reimburse them for the cost of paying the GST. They are getting other payments every month. Is it that difficult to pay them monthly rather than quarterly?

I am not speaking in favour of the system. I am still opposed to the fact that it is not fully indexed, but there ought to be a way of getting those cheques into the hands of the consumers who need them so desperately more frequently than once every quarter. I hope that plea will not fall on deaf ears. I do not suppose we really know the answer to what the government is going to do about groceries. On the face of it at the moment it looks as though the most exotic of foods, if you buy them in a grocery store, will be tax-free. I hope I do not offend anybody, but if you buy the lowly hamburger in a fast food outlet you pay tax on it. Now it is the lowly hamburger that provides so many meals for families that cannot afford anything else. In some cases it is cheaper to buy that hamburger in a fast food outlet than it is to prepare it at home, though the quality would be a lot better at home. Nevertheless it is more economical. Those foods are taxed the way the system is now while the most exotic of foods bought in a grocery store will not be taxed. That is not fair.

People who have the means and are close enough to the border to drive across and load up with groceries will not be paying any tax on anything they bring in that way. If you cannot get across the border and have to buy goods in a store on this side—I am not talking now about groceries; I am talking about all goods generally—then you pay tax. That is not fair. There has to be a better way of handling it.

I recall reading a story when I was in the Victoria legislature written by someone in Montreal who was talking about various stock markets across Canada. Does anybody in the Vancouver exchange have a hope of making a profit? The average investor has better odds of making a profit if he bought Lotto Canada tickets. Yet that is tax-free. You can play that kind of gambling where a lot of money changes hands by the people who can afford it and pay no taxes, but if your mother goes out and plays bingo for an evening she pays taxes. That is not fair. If one form of gambling is going to be taxable then the other should be as well. Indeed it should be the other way around if anything.

The GST is supposed to be visible. Well it is like taxing the banks. It is difficult so we abandoned that idea. Anything that the government does not want to do, it says it is too difficult. If it means that the people at the bottom of the heap will know how much tax they are paying as compared to those at the top who do not really care, then it is difficult because the government does not really want to do it. The government does not really want them to see a cash register tape which identifies the amount of their income that is going to that tax. It is too difficult so it will not be done.

It is supposed to be revenue neutral. As we read the material that has come out recently we see that some $5.5 billion will be available for deficit reduction. Well that is not fair. It is not intended to be fair. We said from the beginning that it was intended that this would help reduce the government's deficit. It is so much easier to do it by taking more money from the people at the lowest and middle income brackets through this goods and services tax than it is to reduce the interest rate.

Then of course labour is supposed to carry the brunt of it. Its members are supposed to be the good people. They are supposed to say: "We know it is in the interest of government as a whole. We recognize we are paying more than our share, but we are not going to ask for any increase in wages to make up for this shortfall". It is not fair to go to that group in our community and say it has to pay the cost of the government's mismanagement of finances.

There are better ways of getting more income from the people who can afford it. The government should abandon this excise tax bill and come back with a proper plan that will get a higher proportion of its revenue from those who are best able to afford it.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, sales taxes are regressive and consumer taxes are regressive. They have an adverse effect, as the member has indicated, on the people who are least able to afford them. They also have a much larger adverse effect on regions that are remote from the central areas, because the very process of putting on taxes increases taxes for those who are further away from the source of the product in many cases.

I would like the member to comment on the impact of this particular series of budget tax increases on those areas that are somewhat remote and how those areas will be affected by not only this tax in this particular bill but the goods and services tax generally.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, I think we have all heard stories of various groups coming before the finance committee and talking about the expected effect of this goods and services tax on their communities. It is not just a matter of the final point of levying a 9 per cent tax on the cost and saying that it will cost 9 per cent, the same as it will cost the people in Toronto or wherever. We know it does not work that way.

We know that the 9 per cent will be added at every stage including the cost of transportation, the cost of maintaining the structure of the transportation system, of getting goods particularly to the more remote areas of the country. It is easier to point to them because it is so obvious that the effect is very marked in these areas. Certainly the closer you get to Toronto the less it is, and the worse it is each step you get farther away.

When you get into the northern areas of the country or the most extreme east or west ends of the country, the cost of the goods has increased so much by that time. Transportation is only part of it. Financing it and the structure of the organizations that are doing it all cost more the farther you get away from the centre. The 9 per cent is applied to that total so the GST will be even more unfair with respect to the people who live farther away from the centre of activity than it will be here in Ottawa or Toronto.

Mr. Wilbee: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member for a very rational approach to the problem. Of course I disagree with him in many areas.

One thing that the people have been talking to me about in my constituency of Delta is the fact that government is not cutting costs enough. The member seemed to be disturbed that part of the proceeds from the GST were to cut the deficit. I would ask him just where his party would plan on cutting government expenditures.

We often hear about the costs of government and that they object to raising taxes. We cannot have it both ways. I would ask the member just what his party would do to reduce government expenditures in its policy.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, I mentioned one method during the course of my presentation and that was the very high cost of interest in the deficit. Some $34 billion or something was the interest bill for last year. It is so high because of the government's determination to keep the value of the Canadian dollar up, no doubt as part of the free trade deal.

Certainly one way to reduce the cost of government would be to reduce that interest rate and save some $3 billion for every point that the interest rate was reduced. It is not an insignificant sum.

The member has never heard me talk in generalities about reducing the cost of government. I have sometimes quoted Sir Anthony Eden when he was Prime Minister. He said that everyone is in favour of general economy but not particular expenditures. It is easier to talk about ways in which we would like the government to spend more money. Certainly with respect to general economy, reducing the rate of unemployment by creating more employment opportunities would reduce the cost of government substantially. One way of doing that would be to reduce the interest rates.

From my point of view the biggest thing the government could do would be to reduce the interest rate. It would affect not just the cost of interest, but it would also get the economy moving in other parts of the country. It would reduce the costs of unemployment and make a bigger contribution to our economy if the government could just bring itself to forget about the free trade deal to the extent of letting our interest rates drop, at least down to the point where they were some years ago when there was just a four point spread between us and the United States.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, over the past 30 years it seems that the proportion of the tax burden in this country has shifted dramatically. Some 30 years ago, 50 per cent of the burden was paid by corporations, 50 per cent was paid by individuals. It seems that over 30 years of successive Liberal and Tory governments that burden has now shifted to the point where 80 per cent of the tax burden is paid by individuals, much of it through consumption taxes such as the one we are dealing with today, and 20 per cent of taxes are now paid by corporations. There seems to have been a dramatic shift in the direction of forcing the burden of taxes on to individuals in this country.

At the same time there has been a parallel development. Ownership of the Canadian economy has been more and more vested in a very small group of people or a small handful of holding companies. Diane Francis mentioned in her book Who Controls Canada that something like nine families and a small handful of holding companies control 50 per cent of the assets on the Toronto Stock Exchange, so the economy is very tightly held. Even El Salvador is owned by 14 families. Canada's economy is even more tightly held than the economy of El Salvador.

I am wondering if the member can suggest to us ways in which, by redistributing the tax burden in this country, we can also redistribute the ownership and democratize the ownership of our economy so that more Canadians can feel that they own our economy and have a democratic interest in the directions that our economy is going. Has the member any suggestions in that direction?

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, this ties in to the question by the hon. member for Delta when he was asking what expenditures could be reduced.

The expenditures we could reduce are the tax expenditures. The ones that made it possible for the very situation described by the member for Comox—Alberni to happen. It has not been anything else other than succeeding Liberal and Conservative governments making it easier for the wealthy individuals and the wealthy corporations to avoid paying income tax through various tax expenditures, all legal. They have steadily shifted the load, as I said during the course of my remarks earlier, from corporations and wealthy individuals to people in the lower and middle income tax brackets. They are the ones who are paying through this system of tax expenditures for corporations and individuals.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I feel very privileged to be able to stand here this morning and speak on Bill C-20. This bill contains the legislative amendments required to implement the federal sales tax and excise and duty changes announced in the budget.

This government proposes a 9 per cent goods and services sales tax to replace what it deems to be a regressive and economic liability to Canada in the 13 per cent federal sales tax. The federal sales tax was 9 per cent when this government took over in 1984. If it was so hurtful to our economy, why was it increased from 9 per cent to 10 per cent, to 11 per cent, to 12 per cent, and now to its present 13 per cent? It does not make sense. The Prime Minister called it a silent killer of jobs, yet he went ahead and increased this silent killer of jobs.

The government's opening speaker this morning commented on how this tax will help reduce the deficit. Is this something new we have been hearing recently? When it was originally proposed, there was no mention that this goods and services tax would help reduce the deficit until a few people, other than those on the government side, started checking into it and suddenly realized that there were billions of dollars in excess revenue over what was required from the FST that would be earned. So the government finally had to admit that it was not revenue neutral. I guess Canadians are saying, "Can this government ever make up its mind?"

We all went through an election in the fall of 1988. Unfortunately, nothing was mentioned except free trade. There was no mention at all that this country was faced with the largest deficit it has had in its history, that from 1944 to 1988 that deficit had doubled in size. There was no mention of this at all by the government. Yet here we are now into the Thirty-fourth Parliament, and all of a sudden the government is finally coming clean and saying that there is a serious problem with regard to the deficit and that we must reduce it.

I think that all of us as concerned Canadians are interested in reducing this deficit. But in 1991, if this goods and services tax goes ahead as planned by the federal government, Canadians will pay a new tax whenever they make purchases from a wide range of goods and services. The new sales tax, for most Canadians, will be applied in addition to the existing provincial retail sales tax, especially here in Ontario—I guess in all provinces except Alberta—with which they are now so familiar.

The proposed GST will also be a new experience for businesses. Today some businesses collect and remit retail sales tax, while those which produce or import manufactured goods collect and remit the federal manufacturers' sales tax. There are still, however, numerous enterprises which never see the current taxes directly because they never sell nor buy taxed products at the retail level, nor do they produce or import manufactured goods. This tax would then dramatically affect the way in which sales tax revenue is collected at the federal level.

The GST, as outlined in the August technical paper, is predicted to generate $24 billion in 1991, this amount being based on the rate of 9 per cent. Of this total revenue, about $18.5 billion would replace the revenue lost by the elimination of the existing MST, which by 1991 would have been levied at a rate of 13.5 per cent for most products. The remaining $5.5 billion would be returned to taxpayers in one form or another. By far the most important element in this regard would be the greatly enhanced sales tax credits. The existing system of credits would have cost $1.2 billion in 1991, and the proposed credits would cost about $3.6 billion. The difference of $2.4 billion was be financed by GST revenues. Finally, about $2 billion in revenues would be transferred to individuals and provinces as a result of the GST's impact on the price level.

The introduction of the GST is expected to raise prices by about 2.25 per cent. The remaining $200 million in GST revenues is slated to pay for additional administrative costs which include hiring at least 4,000 people to administer the GST.

There are many arguments both for and against. As the most recent poll has indicated, 80 per cent of Canadians say that there are more reasons against than for initiating this GST. As I stated earlier, all Canadians are concerned about our deficit and all Canadians will gladly find measures to reduce that deficit, but this is not the way to go. This is what they are saying. They are saying it in spades, and I think it is high time that we started listening.

The argument against revenue neutrality is further strengthened by noting that the federal government, in proposing a reform of the sales tax, has recognized the serious problem associated with the erosion of the MST base. The 13.5 per cent MST rate might well be viewed as untenable over time. Rather, it is only a temporary measure until such time as the GST can be put in place.

Tax expenditures are increasingly being substituted for program expenditures and loose interpretation of the concept of revenue neutrality allows tax base measures to be unnoticed in a way that expenditure measures could not be. By stressing the alleged revenue neutrality in the tax reform, the government is pointing out that there are structural problems inherent in the present tax system which need to be addressed. But these are two distinct issues and, unfortunately, the government is confusing them.

Let us look at the case of two sets of adults living together, one couple married and one couple living common law. The married couple would be entitled to a maximum GST credit of $550 which would be reduced on the basis of family income. Each individual of the couple would be entitled to an adult credit reduced on the basis of individual income. Rather than having the credits start to diminish at $24,800 of total income, as in the case of a married couple, their credits might not start to diminish until total income reached $49,600 if both adults earned the same amount.

In addition, the unmarried couple would be treated as single individuals. The common law couple would then be entitled to two tax credits. In other words, members of this House, it is far more beneficial tax-wise to live together as an unmarried couple than it is to live together as husband and wife. Now I think that is disgraceful.

We know there will be an impact on housing and, undoubtedly, housing accounts for the single largest expenditure made by families. This is true whether one rents or whether one buys. The GST would impose a 9 per cent tax rate on the retail price of a new house purchased from a developer. Thus, the GST has the potential to increase the price of new houses substantially. To offset this impact the government is proposing to rebate up to one-half the GST otherwise owing, subject to restrictions on the price of a house.

Clearly the tax implications of the shift to a GST would vary across Canada since house prices vary greatly. As the technical paper notes, home buyers in Toronto would face the greatest adverse effect of this change. The imposition of the GST on new housing would then raise house prices and confer a windfall profit on owners of existing housing.

On rental accommodation, in 1991 or later all aspects of the construction of a building would be subject to the GST, as would the cost of the land. Long-term residential rentals would be exempt from the GST. No tax would be collected on these rents and the landlord could not claim an input tax on any GST paid.

The introduction of a new and larger tax on new construction should raise rents across the land. As the tax drove up the prices of new apartments, some demand would shift to old apartments. But an increased demand for older apartments could not increase the fixed supply, obviously so the consequence would be fully reflected in price hikes in that market also.

The GST is a value-added tax rather than a sales tax. A sales tax can be thought of as a tax on a transaction rather than a tax on a product. Thus a provincial sales tax might be applied to a product numerous times. Think of an automobile which is sold new and taxed and later resold through a dealer and taxed again. This kind of multiple taxation should not occur with a GST type of value-added tax.

Why then would used products be taxed under the GST? There are several reasons. Used goods compete with new products and are often sold by the same retailer. If one were taxed and not the other, compliance costs for the seller might increase and an opportunity for tax evasion might present itself. Taxing one and not the other might also distort the relative prices of the two types of goods, especially if an untaxed source of used goods, say through imports, were available. As, well the sale of used goods often involves the creation of some value-added, and by taxing this sale that value-added can effectively be taxed. It is confusing stuff. I do not know who the heck is going to understand and know what to tax and what not to tax.

Last week I spoke on the GST and how it would affect municipalities. It is going to have a very, very grave effect on them. I will not go into this again. The municipalities have only one way of raising taxes, namely, through the property tax. What this government is doing is looking for revenue from municipal government, a government that is not able to raise its revenues. And yet, this government wishes to make gains on the backs of a municipal government.

In conclusion, the provinces are almost faced with a fait accompli. Ottawa plans to introduce unilaterally a sales tax of 9 per cent. It is obviously going to have a serious effect on provinces because there is already a sales tax in all of them except Alberta. The provinces would have to bear the full weight of resentment toward a tax of between 9 and 18 per cent. But even more important for the provinces, their refusing to participate in this sales tax leaves the federal government on its own to carry the borrowing of the money.

The intent of the goods and services tax is to provide the federal government with an efficient alternative, so it says, to the MST. Efficiency would be achieved by taking a fairly broad base, thereby minimizing distortions and consumer choice. By crediting the tax paid on business inputs, the GST is also intended to remove from capital and thus enhance productivity. I do not think it is going to do any of these things. It is going to have one of the most deleterious effects on the economy of this country. We know it is going to raise the inflation rate. We know it is going to raise the interest rate. We know there is going to be a slow-down in business. Why, oh why, is this government insisting on it? Eighty per cent of Canadians say "stop" say "no". For goodness sake, let's listen to them.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to congratulate the Hon. Member on her speech and on her grasp of the subject of the goods and services tax. She has really done her homework and understands the problems involved.

I think it is somewhat ironic that today we should be talking about tax increases and this particular tax, when this is the first day of Small Business Week in Canada. My question is directed to the Hon. Member, who I know has many small businesses in her riding, and I wonder whether she could tell the House about the attitude of small businesses in her riding. What does small business think of the new GST, the new tax on goods and services? I think everyone in this House agrees it will be an administrative nightmare.

Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I would like to hear what the Hon. Member has to say about small businesses in her riding.

[English]

Mrs. Gaffney: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. One of the things that I have done in my riding is to try to analyze the business community's attitude toward the GST. I did that by circulating a copy of the government's pamphlet on the GST to every business in my riding. I, in turn, also circulated the Liberal response, the opposition party's response, to the government's proposed goods and services tax. This way I was providing them with both sides of the spectrum, the government's side and the opposition's side. I was not trying to influence the business people, I was allowing them to make up their own minds with the information presented.

I also asked that if they felt, as we on this side of the House feel, that it was going to hurt business, would they sign a petition which I would be pleased to present in the House of Commons. These petitions are coming in on a daily basis. The small business community in the riding of Nepean is very, very concerned about the business tax.

There is not enough rebate being allowed to small business. The paperwork is going to be horrendous. The costs are going to be horrendous but much more important the community is telling me that business will suffer, and suffer badly. People see a definite downturn and I feel quite confident in standing here this morning and saying that I am speaking for the majority of the small business people in the riding of Nepean in that they do not wish to see this GST imposed upon them. They cannot afford it. Many have told me that they will literally be forced out of business.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, the budget on which this particular Bill C–20 is based is an illegitimate budget to start with in that it gave advantage to people across the country who are in the privileged position of knowing what was in this budget before it was presented to the House of Commons. Consequently, people had opportunities. We do not know much about that. Therefore, we should consider Bill C–20 an illegitimate bill in itself. What it does is increase, as the member put forward, the tax in areas which are already regressive. Would the member give us some indication of how she feels the direction is impacting on her particular constituency?

Mrs. Gaffney: Mr. Speaker, there are probably several ways in which these will be impacting upon my constituency. I have mentioned the business people. Maybe it was in a previous speech, I forget, but the senior citizens of our country are probably the people who are most concerned and will suffer the greatest with the GST. I have had literally hundreds of calls and hundreds of letters in my offices. Some are from the adult population in Nepean saying that they will not be able to afford it.

One senior said to me "My wife and I have raised a large family. We worked hard. We never took a holiday. We never wanted to leave our children." He had an average income, and told me that they had never bought a new car but bought Canada Savings Bonds because they believed in Canada. They did this consistently for years until their children were grown and through university. Here they are at a stage in their lives—they are both retired—when they can afford to take that holiday south. They can afford to buy that new car. Their income is over the $50,000 range and they are saying to me, "I will sell my Canada Savings Bonds. Why should I keep them? I will sell my Canada Savings Bonds and reduce my income so that my old age security pension cheque is not clawed back." I do not blame those senior citizens. I can guarantee that this government is going to lose billions of dollars through people selling their Canada Savings Bonds or through the non–purchase of new bonds. I think that will have a dreadful effect on all Canadians.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak. I can look into the future. I know you did not know that but that is it.

I see on bookshelves across Canada a story of "the taxingest government in the history of Canada" or maybe a book that is named "the grabbiest government in the history of Canada".

This chapter of Bill C–20 is chapter 7 of the grabbiest government in Canada's history. If you look over the last five years of government, you will see that chapter 1 was the initial budget. Actually it was not a budget.

It was a statement by the Minister of Finance, who started the process of increasing the taxes for the people of Canada, reducing the taxes for the corporations of Canada, and developing a system which impacts particularly on those who can least afford to pay taxes.

Chapter 7, Bill C–20, is an act to amend the Excise Tax Act, and an act to amend the Excise Act. It sounds dull and sounds innocuous, but the taxpayers are going to find it a particularly interesting chapter because it amounts to one more tax grab. We have indicated on many occasions that any kind of sales tax, any kind of consumer tax, is a regressive tax. This book that I am speaking of started during those last four years. It started increasing the very taxes that are being increased again today in this particular bill.

I can list for you, Mr. Speaker, if you want to hear them, exactly what each of the tax increases were over those five years. Do you want me to do that, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Not particularly.

Mr. Hovdebo: I am not sure that I want to do it either. In any event, this chapter is peculiar as well as interesting. As I said a few moments ago, the budget on which the bill is based, is an illegitimate budget. The leak of the budget gave many people in privileged positions information which they could use to their advantage. Never in the history of Canada, in the history of parliamentary governments, has that been allowed. Whenever it is found that somebody had a previous and early look at a budget, the indication was that it should not be passed. Therefore, it would be withdrawn. But not with this government.

The idea of taking advantage of a budget is not acceptable in a parliamentary government. This particular government did not seem to want to remove its budget from the books. It has gone further by bringing in Bill C–20 to further take advantage of not only the lower–income Canadians, but those on welfare and those without any income because the moneys they get will not go as far in keeping them alive.

The arrogance of the government is expressed very succinctly here. We have had no change. Surprisingly, the government made no real attempt to justify the fact that it had allowed people to take advantage, or allowed the situation where people could take advantage, of the budget. It made no effort to justify that. Consequently, we have here an illegitimate budget and an illegitimate bill. But the arrogance of this government is such that we are forced to look at this as if it were a legitimate operation.

Let us have a look at Bill C–20. I live in northern Saskatchewan, and I have spent a considerable amount of my life in northern Canada, places like Inuvik, Whitehorse in the Yukon, and in northern Quebec. I recognize that there is in this particular budget a far–reaching impact that is much greater on remote and northern areas than there is on downtown Toronto or Ottawa, for instance. There are a number of areas in which the taxation in Bill C–20 will have a direct impact upon the people of the Yukon or Northwest Territories. It increases the tax on fuels, on aviation fuel. One of the real differences between the southern part of Canada and the north, and you do not have to go too far north to recognize this difference, is the cost of fuel for travel and for heating. This bill increases the cost of fuel. It increases the cost of fuel by increasing the tax on that fuel. Consequently, it is a tax which is much greater on those northern, remote areas of the country. Transportation costs are greater to get the product to those places and this additional tax has been added to that cost.

Tourism is a major industry in many northern parts of Saskatchewan, Ontario and British Columbia. Tourism is a major industry in all the northern parts of Canada. This tax is going to increase the costs of all of the tourist industry across the country. It is going to increase the costs by increases in the cost of gasoline, fuel for ground transportation as well as air transportation.

It is not as if we did not know the impact of this kind of a tax. Last year, the government put on a communications tax. That is the kind of tax we are looking at now, a communications tax on every long distance telephone call in these areas. If you live in a northern community and you want to talk to your doctor, to your school about your children's progress, or to somebody who is going to supply you with gasoline or parts for whatever your industry happens to be, you are going to call long distance. If you live in Ottawa and you want to do any of these things, not one of those calls will be a long distance call and there will be no tax on them. But if you live in a northern community you will pay 10 per cent on every call that you make for every substantial item that you require to survive. That is an increased tax on northern and remote communities much greater than the 1 per cent increase on gasoline. But it is an increase which is there and it behooves us to look at it. It is the same kind of tax as the GST. It is going to be on all products and it is going to impact on northern communities much more than southern communities.

I will continue after Question Period.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member from Saskatoon—Humboldt will have ten minutes in his debate plus ten minutes for questions and comments.

It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

HUNGARY

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, 33 years ago on October 23, 1956, the flame of freedom briefly burned to light the darkness of Stalinist Hungarian communism.

The freedom fighters were just that, men and women who fought to bring freedom to their beloved homeland. The world watched with bated breath as a handful of patriots dared to challenge the mighty Soviet giant in pursuit of democracy and human rights. Despite promises made, the western world stood by while they fought on valiantly, courageously, heroically, to the death. The blood of these patriots seeped into the ground but was not forgotten.

Now, 33 years later, the tree of democratic reform has begun to bear fruit, thanks to the nourishment it received from those who fought and died in 1956.

Much is happening in Hungary today. Reforms thought impossible only a few years ago are enacted almost daily. We in Canada and the western world watch with hope. But we must also be ever vigilant that the fruits of the sacrifices of the freedom fighters will not be spoiled by renewed repression.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, on October 5, the Minister of Employment and Immigration announced that she had lifted the moratorium on deportations of Haitians. She said she believed the political situation in that country had returned to normal since a great wave of violence disrupted the November 8, 1987, attempt to hold elections there. Therefore,50 rejected refugee claimants are to be deported from Canada to Haiti, the first one tomorrow.

For decades, Haitians were terrorized by the Duvalier regime. Since 1986 they have had four successive governments installed by force of arms.

According to the June 1989 Overview on Haiti published by the Immigration and Refugee Documentation Centre, human rights violations continue under the latest regime. These include torture, extrajudicial executions, disappearances, arbitrary arrests and detentions.

The Tontons Macoutes still roam Haiti, possibly sanctioned by the military government.

I call on the minister to read the Immigration and Refugee Boards's report and to talk with Amnesty International before returning Haitians to risk death.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION AGENCY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that the National Transportation Agency has today issued Order No. 1989-R-326 apportioning costs for the reconstruction of the overhead bridge crossing the CN lines near Truro, Nova Scotia.

This bridge is in a serious state of deterioration and has had its capacity reduced repeatedly to the point where it cannot legally accommodate any more than a light truck. Everyone involved agrees that the bridge must be replaced immediately. The tracks in question divide the community of Salmon River right down the middle and are a barrier for school buses, ambulances and firefighting equipment.

I now call on all the parties involved, including CN, the National Transportation Agency, the province of Nova Scotia and the municipalities to work together to ensure that construction of the new bridge begins immediately and this problem is brought to a logical and safe conclusion.

I commend the National Transportation Agency for its determined efforts which have resulted in this order today.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, today is the first day of the week dedicated to small business. The government has selected the following slogan for this occasion: Grow today for tomorrow.

The government's cynicism is truly incredible, Mr. Speaker. It talks about growth for Canadian small businesses, when it is trying to impose a tax on goods and services, the GST, that will be a nightmare for small businesses.

[English]

I ask this government to withdraw the GST. That would be the best way to show that it cares for small business, which in the last 10 years has accounted for 93 per cent of the new jobs in the private sector.

[Translation]

Small businesses are the motor of our economy, Mr. Speaker. During the past ten years, small business created 93 per cent of the new jobs in the private sector.

If the Conservative government is anxious to defend the interests of small businesses, it should immediately withdraw its new goods and services tax.

[English]

COMMUNITY FUTURES PROGRAM

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has shown her commitment to the riding of Elk Island through the Lamont-Two Hills Community Futures Program. Community Futures is geared to helping workers in communities which have serious economic problems but show potential for growth.

In order to maximize a community's economic potential the program is guided by local board representatives who assess community needs and recommend support for business development, skills training or job relocation.

As part of the program, the Lamont-Two Hills Business Development Centre will receive $400,000 in federal funding to continue assisting small business in the area. During its first year 11 businesses were either started or maintained through the technical and financial services available at the centre. As a result, over 28 full-time and part-time jobs were either created or maintained.

Community Futures is solid evidence that the Government of Canada is committed to our rural communities.

NATIONAL UNIVERSITIES WEEK

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, this year's National Universities Week, which ended yesterday, caused Canadians to think about what universities mean to Canada's future and to realize that investment in our universities is at risk.

University classrooms are overcrowded. Professors have less time for individual students and existing research grants are insufficient. Yet advances in science and technology—particularly in medicine, biotechnology and communications—depend on university education and research.

Thus, I welcome the inclusion of education on the agenda of the upcoming First Ministers' Conference, considering that education has not been discussed at these conferences since 1973.

However, I am concerned because education will merely be one item among many to be discussed during only half a day of the two-day conference.

A First Ministers' conference should be convened which will focus specifically on the topics of education and research, to adopt a definite commitment to fund them so that we will experience a budget boost in this area instead of a budget blow.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, countless Albertans from all walks of life have expressed their concerns to me about the environmental impacts of the proposed pulp mills for northern Alberta. Edmontonians have written letters, telephoned and expressed their concerns directly to me.

The federal government and the province of Alberta have embarked on a joint environmental review. The review panel is presently holding hearings in towns throughout northern Alberta. This forestry investment will have major social, economic and environmental impacts on the whole of Alberta. Yet the review panel will not be holding hearings in Edmonton or Calgary.

All Albertans are subsidizing the forestry projects. All Albertans own the resources of the province. Debate must be encouraged, not discouraged.

I call upon Alberta Environment Minister Ralph Klein and the federal Environment Minister, the member for Lac-Saint-Jean, to ask the review panel to at least hold public hearings in Edmonton. All of Alberta is affected. All Albertans must be heard.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the occasion of Small Business Week, October 22 to 28, to express the New Democratic Party's recognition of the vital contribution of the small business community to Canada's economic growth and well-being. It is significant to note that in the past 10 years almost 70 per cent of all new jobs have been created by small businesses, many of which have less than five employees.

How ironic that Small Business Week—this celebration of entrepreneurship in Canada—takes place at a time when the continued economic viability of the small business community is under attack by the federal government's proposed goods and services tax. The GST will effectively turn individual small businesses into Revenue Canada tax collectors, forcing small businesses to carry the overwhelming burden of administering this tax. The GST will add to the mountain of paperwork already faced by small businesses and will substantially increase accounting costs.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that Small Business Week is an appropriate time for the government to demonstrate its commitment to small business by withdrawing the proposed goods and services tax.

CANADA POST

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, once again, Canada Post wants to terminate the local air service that carries perishable goods to the Inuit and Cree in New Quebec. Although it has not announced its intentions publicly, Canada Post has already increased postal charges by 30 per cent, 45 per cent and even more. The situation will become critical after November 13, 1989, and will have a direct impact on consumers in Northern communities. This is a complex situation which concerns Canada Post, the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs and the Department of National Health and Welfare.

If the government is trying to save money, it is in fact creating more serious problems that will affect the health and well-being of Northern residents. Mr. Speaker, this is another instance of people being unfairly penalized, compared to those living in southern communities.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, in a major snow storm on Friday, 36 centimetres of snow fell, paralyzing northern Ontario between Marathon and Sault Ste. Marie for more than 24 hours.

Northern Ontario residents were denied access to any road or air travel. The only transportation system operating for those residents was VIA Rail.

Had this taken place on January 16, 1990, the day when the VIA Rail cuts come into effect, the residents of northern Ontario would have been left without any means of transportation whatsoever, and this will happen in this year. This government obviously did not consider the weather of northern Ontario in its decision to eliminate the Canadian and the CP line which services close to 400,000 people.

Friday's storm illustrates all too well that this government has chosen to isolate these communities because of, for lack of a better word, a stupid decision. The people of northern Ontario implore this government to change its mind before it is too late.

Do not stop passenger rail service in northern Ontario, depriving the people in Wawa, White River, Marathon, Terrace Bay, Schreiber, Nipigon, Red Rock, Hurkett, Dorion, McKenzie, Thunder Bay, Ignace, Dryden, Kenora and many, many small communities of less than 500 people of passenger rail service because it will be eliminated.

EATING DISORDER AWARENESS WEEK

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, today marks the beginning of Eating Disorder Awareness Week.

The National Eating Disorder Information Centre is working to sensitize Canadians to the serious health hazards associated with such disorders as anorexia nervosa, bulimia and overeating.

Anorexia and bulimia are reaching epidemic proportions across Canada, affecting one in five college women and an increasing number of men. Between 10 and 20 per cent of anorexics die as a result of their eating disorder.

The National Eating Disorder Information Centre and the Bulimia and Anorexia Nervosa Association are working to help Canadians combat the low self-esteem and other psychological, physiological and societal factors that lead to these disorders.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare along with all hon. members supports these organizations in their endeavours and wishes them every success in their education campaign this week.

OFFICIAL RESIDENCES

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, now the National Capital Commission wishes to establish an eighth official residence in Canada, this newest one for the Chief of Defence Staff.

This proposal comes at a time when the federal government is preaching restraint, at a time when we have thousands of homeless, at a time when our soup kitchens are overflowing. What will be next? Will the Clerk of the Privy Council want a residence? What about the Deputy Minister of Finance, or perhaps even the chair of the National Capital Commission?

We see the government dismantling the national infrastructure with cuts to VIA Rail, the CBC, the privatization of Air Canada and the refusal to aid municipalities in their problems with infrastructure decay. We see this government failing to prepare for the future by drastically cutting back on research and development and weakening environmental legislation.

Yet it seems to think that these things do not matter as much as subsidized housing for the Chief of Defence Staff. For a government that is constantly calling on Canadians to tighten their belts, we never see a sign of it doing this. It seems to have removed its own belt so as to lash out at Canadians. I demand that it put it back on, tighten it and begin to look at important issues affecting all Canadians.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): On the first day of the tenth annual Small Business Week in Canada, I want to take this opportunity to salute millions of Canadians who take risks in order to start small businesses.

Mr. Speaker, since 1984, more than 150,000 small businesses have been created each year in Canada, and according to a recent study, more than 65 per cent survived the first three crucial years.

Four Canadians out of ten employed in the private sector work for a small business. In fact, 80 per cent of the new jobs created between 1978 and 1987 were in the small business sector.

Mr. Speaker, these figures spear for themselves and demonstrate the vital role played by small businesses in Canada's economy. The federal Government is aware of this contribution, and that is why it has done more than any other government to help small businesses in the past five years.

Mr. Speaker, this government firmly believes that in Canada, small business is big business.

INTER PARES

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, Saturday's The Globe and Mail displayed a front-page photograph of the Prime Minister and his spouse sitting in a rickshaw. Below the photo was the caption "riding in style". The imagery is an anachronism. It speaks volumes of this government's insensitivity toward the developing world.

Does the Prime Minister know anything about rickshaw drivers and the poverty in which they live? Rickshaw drivers are among the poorest people in the world. The development organization Inter Pares was doing something about the impoverished state of rickshaw drivers. Most drivers must rent the rickshaw from fleet owners at exorbitant prices.

Three years ago Inter Pares set up rural co-operative workshops in Bangladesh to enable them to become self-sufficient. This is what real development means.

The Prime Minister's budget put an end to the Inter Pares project. This Canadian organization is now looking to Europe to continue financing the co-operatives.

It is a sad day indeed when a Canadian organization running a successful program must appeal to other governments to keep development projects alive. I hope the Prime Minister left a big tip. Undoubtedly the driver could use it.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ENERGY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Last week, the minister indicated in this House that the supply of natural gas reserves in this country were so vast that despite the NEB approval to export 9.2 trillion cubic feet we would have no problems for future energy security.

That statement has now been contradicted by a senior official in his own department who said that the minister's comments and assessments were, in fact, academic and meaningless because of the difficulty of developing these resources for economic needs.

Under these circumstances I would like to ask the minister this. Is he prepared now to revise his comment, revise his advice to cabinet and give a commitment in the House today–that the cabinet will not approve the NEB decision until there can be clear evidence provided that this export of natural gas will not endanger the security of energy supply for Canadians?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in reference to what I said in the House those figures taken from the Geological Survey of Canada. The 9.2 tcf were placed against the 11.65 tcf of known and proven reserves of up to 56 tcf which was given by the Geological Survey of Canada. In fact, I have been given figures today by the Geological Survey of Canada which puts both numbers even higher.

The issue that we are dealing with is the question of how much of that gas is extractable in deep water conditions as well as northern conditions. That I think can only be determined if and when there is a pipeline application by either a company or a consortium of companies and the conditions that they would place.

What the NEB did with the export licence application last week—on the basis of the reserves that it had proven and the amount asked for on the application—was approve from its perspective an export licence. As I said, the GSC has figures today that could put them even higher than the figures I gave last week.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the issue is much simpler than that. It is whether we will be putting at risk the security of energy supply for Canadians. It is the responsibility of the cabinet to make that decision.

I ask the minister specifically, will he commit that before any further development or decisions are taken that the government will provide publicly to this House a clear indication of what the level of reserves are, and that it will not provide any approval of an export licence or permit until it can prove that there is sufficient reserves for Canadians and that they will not be put at any risk by this pipeline application?

• (1420)

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, the member and I both know that cabinet has to approve the export licence.

Mr. Gauthier: That is the weak link.

Mr. Epp: If the Whip is speaking about a weak link, I am sure he lives with it personally every day.

I am saying that cabinet will have to examine the export licence. I say to the Hon. Member that the NEB in its mandate obviously has to take a look at reserves, as well as the applications before it.

I say to the hon. member as well that he should be careful in assessing the matter as he did in his question because it goes back to the National Energy Program. The underlying argument of the National Energy Program was that if it was kept in the ground we were going to maintain reserves, and we were going to maintain the 25 year figure for Canadians in terms of security of gas.

I think all of us recognize that the activity in the oil and gas fields and the reserves are best increased if we allow that activity, which will also allow the cash flow that is needed in order to have further exploration and to have reserves built up.

I guess what I am saying directly to the member is that the plan of the NEP did not increase reserves. It gave a false sense of security about reserves in the future. It did not give us the reserves that we have now.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, we are not arguing about the NEP. We are arguing about the NEB, and the decision to authorize an export permit which could put energy security at risk.

As the minister clearly knows, because of the free trade agreement any export to the United States—including the 9.2 trillion cubic feet—would increase the level of exports to the United States to close to 60 per cent of our normal reserves.

Does the minister really believe that the best interests of this country are served by locking away in perpetuity 60 per cent of the natural gas energy reserves of this country to another country? Is that really defending the security and best interests of Canadians?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I do know what helps with the security of supply. One way is to have activity in the gas and oil fields. A second way is to give a return to those who are doing the exploration. Third, Canadians will have to re-examine in terms of long-term contracts that they have access to that gas.

If the hon. member looks at the export licence that was granted by the NEB, he will note very clearly that the NEB put down conditions whereby before an export contract could be granted to the United States, Canadians would need to have access to that information and to that gas as well. I say to him that I believe the market-place is the best place in which to have this function. It functions best with the NEB putting forward the conditions that it did on the export licence.

The last point that the hon. member should know is this. Before there is going to be any export, it will be based on a pipeline application. Those conditions are going to be raised and caveats obviously will be considered by the NEB to maintain security of supply for Canadians.

He should recognize, as I think all of us do here, that we cannot and should not consider that after the number of years we have been in the frontier we can simply continue having exploration and delineation without finally bringing that gas down and having the cash flow we need.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has repeatedly said that no major economic initiative will be undertaken until the government has a complete environmental assessment.

Now that the National Energy Board has given preliminary approval to the export of 9.2 trillion cubic feet of natural gas from the Arctic, will the minister guarantee that the Prime Minister's word will be honoured? Will there be a complete public review before the export licence is given approval by Cabinet?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think we have to differentiate again as to what happened. What happened with the NEB was that it had before it an application on an export licence and approved 9.2 trillion cubic feet.

What the hon. member is relating to, I would think more logically, is that when a pipeline application is made and heard by the NEB a full environmental assessment is done, as we have done on every other megaproject, whether in the north or for that matter any other part of Canada. It was done with Hibernia and Lloydminster. It will be done in the north if, first, an application for a pipeline is made and, second, a pipeline application is approved. It is at that stage that the environmental questions, the socio-economic questions, and the land claims questions all come into consideration. They will then have to be discussed and evaluated by the NEB.

Ms. Callbeck: Mr. Speaker, this is potentially the largest export of energy in the history of our country. My question is quite simple. Is there going to be an environmental assessment? How is it going to be carried out? I think this issue is important enough for the future of the north and for the future of all Canadians.

Is the government going to take this environmental assessment more seriously than it took the one on VIA Rail? In other words, is the Prime Minister's word going to be honoured this time?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member looks at the record with respect to energy projects, she will find that an environmental review was done on OSLO, Lloydminster and Hibernia. In fact, the point that I make to her is that in every one of those projects, as well as if there is any pipeline bringing gas down from the frontier, there have to be the environmental assessments as well.

The answer to the environmental question is, yes. But I say to her very directly, do not confuse a pipeline or potential pipeline with an export licence.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance about government secrecy.

Last Friday, the minister confirmed that he would not release the 500-odd pages of documents about economic forecasts in 1988, made prior to the election for the year 1989. That answer was just not good enough.

I want to know today from the Minister of Finance why he promised the House of Commons on October 10 that we could have the information when nine days later he was denying the information to the House of Commons. What happened between October 10 and October 20 that made the minister change his mind? Is there all of a sudden some new version, the Wilsonian version of the truth in this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, nothing changed from October 10 until last Friday. If the hon. member looks back to what I said on October 10, he will see I said that the information that the applicant was entitled to would be released. That is what has been released to the applicant.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, it was the party across the way with Walter Baker and Ged Baldwin which was so concerned about openness and secrecy in government many, many years ago.

What I want to know from the minister is this. Since I filed a request for access to information in March for the government's communications plans for its budgets of 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988, and for its plans for the White Paper on Taxation last year I want to know why he turned down that application in June. Why do we still not have that information? Why is he also withholding information on the unemployment insurance cutbacks from this House? I want to know why he is not forthcoming. Why this secrecy? Will he stop playing his silly little games and be open and honest with the people of Canada?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) Mr. Speaker, I would have to review the particular reasons and the content of the application for the turndown which was given, as he has referred to, in June. I do not have that information readily at hand.

What we are looking at here is a very important principle of parliamentary responsibility. That is that the minister is responsible for the management of his department. The minister is accountable to Parliament for the management of his department.

Along the course of those activities of managing the department, there will be information and advice provided by the public servants to the minister to allow the minister to do his job, to carry out his responsibilities. He is not bound to accept all the advice of deputy ministers, nor is he required to hide behind the advice of deputy ministers. Those decisions have to be made each time decisions are taken. But it is absolutely essential that there be confidentiality of the advice between the deputy minister and the minister so that that free flow of information will continue. It is on that basis that the access to information provides for the confidentiality of that information.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, that is just not good enough. We are really seeing a Wilsonian version of the truth, and I can tell you that even Conservative back-benchers are upset with him.

I will give him a third try. The minister, according to his own calculations, said that at least one province will suffer a negative impact under the GST.

I want to know today whether or not the minister will confirm that that province is Alberta, give us the dimensions of the negative impact and, while he is on his feet, tell us whether or not he will release all the documents pertaining to the impact of the goods and services tax on all 10 provinces and both territories in this country?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite aware that I have been very open in all the dealings that I have had with Parliament and I will continue to be very open in all the dealings that I have with Parliament.

The hon. member has made reference to the impact of the GST on the provinces. I have commented on that in a general way in this House. I have also said that we do have a tradition in our dealings with the provinces to discuss information with them before we go public with it in order to ensure that the information that is released to the public is not misleading. Until we have that discussion with the provinces, no, I am not prepared to make the information available.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is aware that the vast anti-GST coalition is growing every day. My question for the Minister of Finance is this: Is he prepared to acknowledge today that the government's proposal to tax goods and services has been rejected by people across the country, and is the Minister of Finance prepared to put an end to the confusion of consumers and the uncertainty created in the private sector by withdrawing this terrible tax?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to withdraw the goods and services tax. We have put forward a technical paper. The finance committee is hearing comments on that technical paper.

I think the hon. member will agree with me that there is broad agreement that we must move from the existing manufacturers' sales tax, which is deeply hidden in the production process, and move to the goods and services tax. People have disagreements with this. Some say there should be no exemptions and others say there should be exemptions, and many people have said they would like a lower rate, but there is no agreement whatsoever on how to get the rate down. Some say we should reduce the credit while others say the credit is not large enough, it has to be increased. Some say reduce the housing rebate and others say the housing rebate is not large enough.

Clearly, the disagreement with our proposal is on both sides of the proposal. I believe that the package that we have put on the table represents a very carefully constructed balance and a balance that is proving itself as we hear these recommendations from other people.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance.

Speaking about being on the table, the Minister of Finance has insulted his counterparts, the provincial Ministers of Finance of the provinces across this country, by saying they are playing political games with the goods and services tax.

Canadians do not believe for a moment the minister's contention that the provinces rejected a national sales tax proposal. Just to make sure we can make the record very clear on this, my question for the Minister of Finance is the following.

If, in fact, the provinces rejected the government's national sales tax proposal in April, would the minister make public the proposal that was rejected by the provincial Ministers of Finance? Then we will know who is telling the truth in this matter.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have been working with the provinces since the early part of 1987, discussing all aspects of the goods and services tax. At the stage that we are talking to the provinces, we are talking about a federal–provincial tax which has a large number of the attributes of the goods and services tax that is in the technical paper proposal today.

It became very clear from the comments that have been made in the past week and last August when the premiers met that the provinces do not have any sense of urgency, any real desire to move ahead with a goods and services tax proposal. When we saw that that was the case, and because of the very real sense of urgency that we have as a federal government to move away from an existing tax which is broken and which the finance committee of the House of Commons agreed on two occasions had to be changed, on that basis we felt we should move ahead with a federal only proposal.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, recently the Deputy Prime Minister sent a letter to the chairmen of the various House of Commons standing committees referring to the deficit and requesting that the chairmen submit any ideas that they might have on deficit reduction. However, as chairman of the Public Accounts committee, I did not have the honour of receiving such a letter.

Why did the Deputy Prime Minister fail to send a letter to the chairman of the Public Accounts committee? Is he afraid that he might get some constructive suggestions from this committee which, after all, is the watchdog committee of the spending of this government?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to apologize to the hon. member. I did not snub him deliberately. I assure him that we follow the deliberations of the public accounts committee on an ongoing basis.

If the hon. member feels so disposed to offer some suggestions, I will certainly receive them with a great deal of interest and gratitude.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for that answer. The Auditor General's report will be tabled in this House tomorrow. It will be permanently referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, as is the custom.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister give this House and all Canadians a commitment that this watchdog committee of the public purse will be given the free and independent role that it has exercised historically in the Parliament of Canada? Will he assure us that no road blocks will be put in the committee's way as we witnessed to a degree in the early stages of this Parliament?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I can certainly give the hon. member that assurance. Unlike the former Liberal government that red circled a number of staff positions and categories that the Auditor General had and reduced the number of people that they had at their disposal to do the job properly, I can assure him that we will not take that course of action.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance said just a moment ago that it is becoming "very clear" regarding the GST. I agree with him. It is becoming very clear every day that middle and low income Canadians will, under the proposed goods and services tax, fall farther and farther behind each year because of the caveat that tax credits will only be increased if Canada's inflation rate is more than three percentage points. Even government members of the finance committee are quoted as recognizing that low and middle income Canadians will be hurt.

Will the minister finally acknowledge the truth and agree the GST will hurt low and middle income Canadians, or is it going to take us five years under the Access to Information Act?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): I have to fundamentally disagree with that. The goods and services tax does not hurt low and middle income Canadians. Those same people will be receiving a rebate cheque four times a year amounting to $275 per adult, $100 per child.

That is quite different from what was the case with the sales tax system that we inherited five years ago. In 1986 we introduced the notion of a rebate, a refundable sales tax credit. We have increased the size of that and the number of people who will receive that rebate by a large amount. In fact, the total amount of the rebate will be $3.6 billion.

That is a clear indication to Canadians that we are concerned about the impact of sales taxes on low-income people, but we are also acting to protect those same people.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I remind the minister that even his back-benchers would disagree with him on this point. I would like to point out to him that the only number increasing is the number of poor and working poor Canadians who are already heading for the overloaded food banks as more of their income is eaten up by this tax.

Is this government committed, through taxation of the poor, to make the food banks the fastest growing banking chain in this country?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is concerned that the indexation is CPI minus three.

She should understand also that we have made a commitment to review this on an ongoing basis and adjust that low-income threshold as is appropriate. We started off the refundable sales tax credit with a low income threshold of $15,000, we increased it to $16,000, then to $18,000, and now with the GST proposal to $25,000. Surely she can understand that we are being responsive to the needs of the same people she is talking about.

Basic groceries are not under our proposal, that is food that is acquired by food banks, and will not be subject to tax. Clearly, we have the interests of lower-income people in mind as we constructed this proposal.

CANADA POST

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation.

Major changes are being made by Canada Post with respect to the shipping of perishable goods to Inuit and Cree communities in the northern areas of Abitibi and Manicouagan.

Mr. Speaker, my question is as follows: Could the Minister tell me today whether a meeting could be arranged, between now and the end of October 1989, between this department, the Department of Indian Affairs and the Department of Health and Welfare, and economic intervenors representing the Cree and Inuit, for the purpose of hearing their claims and finding a solution that is in the best interests of Northern Canadians?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly ask the managers at Canada Post to participate in such a meeting.

I should point out that Canada Post has already met with Makivik and the Fédération des coopératives du Québec during September. In terms of any other meetings on this issue, I will certainly ask the post office to co-operate and I am sure it will co-operate.

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, the United States Secretary of Agriculture recently expressed that the United States has a long-standing desire to increase subsidy disciplines on Canada. This government has already allowed the United States to discipline our pork producers, milk producers and our fish industry, unjustifiably. Now the United States wants to discipline our Canadian Durum wheat producers.

Will the Minister of Agriculture stop allowing our resource industries to be bullied by the United States and start objecting to their subsidies, or is he going to continue to accept these unfair United States trade law actions that supersede the free trade agreement?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can say to the hon. member that I believe the charges made by the Durum producers of North Dakota are totally unjustified and patently false.

The fact of the matter is that the United States has a much higher level of subsidy paid to its wheat producers and Durum producers than does Canada, by about $40 to $50 a tonne. That has been calculated and agreed to under the auspices of the free trade agreement. The fact that there have been significant shipments of Durum to the United States is the result of a lack of high quality Durum in that country and the fact that we have been able to produce it in a very efficient manner. We have penetrated that market because of our high quality and because of the demand.

If there is any issue that has to be contended with, it is the United States continued use of the export enhancement program and its non-commercial credit terms, which are very generous and which in effect distort the market-place in grains and oilseeds in the world.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, on October 16 the Canadian farm leaders, through a letter to the minister, asked him to look into this issue. The Alberta wheat pools, the Saskatchewan and Manitoba pools and the Canadian western wheat producers pointed out what the minister has just said, that the United States has higher subsidies than do the Canadian producers.

When will the minister stand up for Canadian farmers and start disciplining the United States for its programs, particularly the export enhancement program that is taking away Canadian markets in other countries, while at the same time protecting its domestic markets in the United States?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member will agree that the United States authorities can see and can listen. I have made our position very clear. We have made very clear through our embassy contact in Washington the facts of the matter. We have made strong representations to the United States in that regard.

I might just add in passing that the Secretary of Agriculture in the United States shares the view of the hon. member and me. He has been reported as saying in a headline in the Manitoba Co-operator: "Yeutter says Durum sales not unfair", meaning Canadian sales to the United States are not unfair.

That is a clear recognition of the fact that their subsidies are at a much higher level than ours. There is a clear indication that, because of quality and short supply, we have penetrated that market. It demonstrates to the people of the world that Canada can compete with the best of them, and we will continue to do it in the future as we have in the past.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, in the latest Mulroney-Wilson Budget, funds for the National Capital Commission were cut by $5 million, so it had to reduce some of its operational activities.

Closing the Gatineau Parkway between Taché Boulevard and Gamelin Street in Hull makes no sense, since the road network in the area has not been completed and this decision will result in major traffic problems for the people of the Outaouais.

Can the Minister tell me, Mr. Speaker, whether he will review this decision which is unduly harsh and, furthermore, is unacceptable in the circumstances?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Public Works, I will take that question as notice and get back to the hon. member as soon as possible

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, could the Deputy Prime Minister tell me whether the Minister responsible for the National Capital Commission will be able to give me an answer in the next few days to this question which is very important for the people of the Outaouais?

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I will give that undertaking to the hon. member. I will consult with the minister as soon as he returns, and perhaps he can contact him personally.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans with regard to the free trade panel decision on our fishing regulations.

The minister has had 38 days since the release of the preliminary report; 23 days remain before we have to make a decision. Can the minister give to the House, and to the thousands of industry workers whose jobs depend on this decision, some indication of the government's plans in this regard, or will we have to wait, as we are still waiting for the preliminary report, until the Americans tell us?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the question is not unlike several questions we answered last week. The Minister for International Trade has returned to the House. He would have been the appropriate one to answer the question.

• (1450)

The hon. member is very concerned about the clock ticking, but I think he wants us to ensure, even more so, that Canada makes the right decision in this matter. When we have decided, the hon. member will learn the outcome.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister for International Trade.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has heard from the processing companies and from the union to the effect that they would prefer to compensate the Americans rather than give up our right to control and manage our own resource. They say we must continue to land all of the salmon if we are going to have proper control. The benefits to Canada exceed any penalty.

Can the minister support this option as an alternative to knuckling under to the Americans?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to return to the House, but I find it has not improved much while I have been gone as far as the quality of questions are concerned.

With respect to the hon. gentleman's question, there are a number of options being looked at. The panel that was appointed under the free trade agreement, which consisted of a Canadian chairman, two Canadian representatives, and two American representatives, found that our regulations were supportable as regulations in aid of the conservation practices.

In accordance with the decision, we are looking at the options. It is suggested that there is an option about compensation. I am afraid it is not as easy as the trade might have us believe, that we could simply propose some small amount of compensation to the Americans that they would accept, but that is an option that is being looked at.

A decision will be taken that will be in the public interest, and in the interest of the fishermen and fish processing workers of British Columbia.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

I understand that some U.S. farmers have raised concerns over a perceived threat to their market by Canadian Durum wheat. In fact, North Dakota farmers may be airing their complaints and their desire to close the border to Canadian Durum imports to Sam Gibbons, trade subcommittee chairman in the near future.

Can the minister tell the House what we can do to stop such unfounded and unfair U.S. aggression?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier, the charges that the U.S. Durum farmers are making against the Canadian producers are totally unfounded and unjustified. There is about a $40 to $50 differential in support for Durum wheat in favour of the United States. That has been clearly ratified under the auspices of the free trade agreement.

The markets that Canada has penetrated in the United States are largely due to the result of a shortfall in high-quality Durum wheat. We have a lot of it, and we are going to continue to penetrate that market in a fair and proper manner.

We have made representations to the United States authorities and we will continue making those representations. As well, we will continue to pressure the United States to stop using the EEP program and its non-commercial credit programs which have distorted international trade on a large scale.

TORONTO HARBOUR

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it is the quality of the answers that improve every time the Minister for International Trade is absent from the House.

My question is for the Minister of Public Works, or his substitute, on the subject of the Crombie report on the future of Toronto's waterfront. The report offers hope that millions of Canadians living between Oshawa and Burlington can secure and regain access to their greatest ecological asset, namely Lake Ontario.

Last week Premier Peterson was reported as stating: "Not an office tower, a condominium, or even a tool-shed will be constructed without provincial agreement". Unfortunately, this veto on development cannot apply to federally owned lands.

Will the Government of Canada also place a similar veto on development on the large block of lands administered by Harbourfront and the Toronto Harbour Authority, lands which, as we all know, are ultimately owned by the Canadian people?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the plans that he refers to with the province of Ontario and Harbourfront are two separate issues. The Harbourfront situation has had a freeze on its development for some time now, and what we refer to as the pipeline projects.

There have been negotiations with the city of Toronto regarding Harbourfront and those negotiations are coming to a conclusion in the very near future. An announcement will be made at that time as to the future of Harbourfront.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister should know that under the authority of the Toronto Harbour, there are 1,200 acres. These come finally under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

Therefore, my question again, which I hope the minister will answer, is the following. Will the Government of Canada undertake to place the same development freeze on federally owned land under the Toronto Housing Authority so as to permit the proposals in the Crombie report to become a reality? Will he undertake at least that?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member. There is a difference between Harbourfront Commission and Harbourfront, as he knows. I thought he was referring to Harbourfront and not the Toronto Harbour Commission. I apologize to him.

There is a royal commission headed by David Crombie. We are awaiting his report before we take any action.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Last week, I asked the minister about the release of documents requested under the Access to Information Act which would show whether the Tory campaign promises were made in good faith.

The department prepared the necessary documents substantially by July and recommended their release. Earlier in Question Period the minister said that ministers are not bound to take the advice of their deputies. That, of course, is true for the minister in the case of economic advice, but the question of release of documents under the Access to Information Act is not economic advice but legal advice.

The minister has a legal obligation to release documents. I want to ask him to confirm, as he seemed to say earlier, that he was rejecting the advice of his deputy about what documents should be released.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the advice that is rendered by a Deputy Minister flows back and forth as a result of discussions, consultations and a range of other matters that end up forming that advice. It does not matter whether it is on policy matters that relate to the economic policies of the government or other broader ranging policy matters, it still falls under the category of advice. As the hon. member knows, as a former minister, that is protected by the Access to Information Act for very obvious reasons.

It is very important that that free flow of information and advice between the minister and the deputy minister is maintained. That is the basis on which I have acted in relation to this particular access to information question.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I think the House can only take it from that answer that the minister has indeed rejected the advice that he has received about what documents should be released.

Was his decision to reject advice about the interpretation of the Access to Information Act based on independent legal advice that he has obtained?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, here we are talking again about advice.

Mr. Kaplan: Legal advice.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Well, legal advice comes through the deputy minister through the departmental legal officers. This information is still by nature of advice, but clearly I am not going to be acting in ways that are totally counter to things that have been said to me in the department.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In December 1986 CN sold its trucking division to Route Canada which ceased operations shortly after in 1988. Many former employees of CN lost all or part of pension plans, vacation pay and severance funds earned over as many as 35 years of work with CN.

Can the minister indicate to the 45 former employees in my riding if and when a resolution can be expected to this ongoing frustrating issue?

• (1500)

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, the matter is still under investigation by the RCMP. I think it is not appropriate for me to make any comment on it.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I am sure the minister will be interested to know that on Saturday I had an opportunity to meet hundreds of people living in my community who wanted to talk to me about the government's proposed sales tax.

The minister should know that with few exceptions it was unanimous that the minister does not have support for this measure or for 7 per cent or 5 per cent or any percentage of sales tax. I want to ask the minister what my constituents asked me to ask him: Will the minister now come to his senses and withdraw what is a totally unfair, unacceptable sales tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I gave the answer to that question to one of his colleagues earlier.

I ask the question of the hon. member himself: Did he put up a proposal, an alternative proposal, on which his constituents could weigh the alternatives and say they preferred this proposal as opposed to something else that he was recommending? I see he is nodding his head. Let us hear what he had to say.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton East on a single question.

ENERGY

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): My question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Will the minister confirm that, in consequence of the policies of deregulation instituted by his government starting in 1985 most of the cheap gas available in Canada has rapidly been sold off at fire sale prices just to keep up the cash flow that he was talking about, so that when the pipeline comes on track from the Arctic, even if that gas is dedicated to Canadian markets, there will be no way you can get it to market at less than double the current gas price?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with what the hon. member put forward. If he takes a look at gas sales, both domestic and exported to the United States, he will see the increase to both. However I say to him as well that if he believes the domestic market in Canada is large enough to pay for the kind of costs which would have to be incurred to bring that gas down, he obviously does not know anything about economics.

Obviously we need the export market so we can use that gas for our domestic market. He should look at it from that point of view.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-21

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I wish to advise the House that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) and 78(2) with respect to an allocation of time to the report stage and third reading stage of Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act.

Under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3) I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allocating a specified number of days for consideration and disposal of proceedings at those stages of the bill.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C-20, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I will not go to the next chapter of my book on "the grabbiest government in Canadian history".

I just want to continue to a certain extent with the impact of Bill C-20 on the more remote areas of the country. As I pointed out before, we have in place already a communication tax which discriminates against rural and remote areas of the country, a discrimination tax which will operate very much like the GST the government is proposing. Its impact will be much greater in remote and rural areas than it will be in much of central Canada. That is part of the reason we think that the whole approach of Bill C-20 is probably the greatest tax grab of any Canadian government.

Another area of concern, particularly for Canadians in remote areas but for all Canadians to a certain extent, is the increase on building materials because that tax affects every area of the country. It affects those areas where the costs of building are already extremely high. Constructing of a building in the Northwest Territories will cost more per square foot and consequently you are going to pay a larger proportion of tax than someone building in the south or in a more densely populated area.

The increase of the tax from 8 per cent to the 9 per cent, which is provided in this particular bill, is not fair in the sense that it is a larger tax on people who are required to spend more than others on construction.

It is difficult to talk about this bill without talking about the impact of the GST as well. In the northern and rural areas the GST will be a tax on the final product and, since that final product is going to be much more expensive than it would be ordinarily in downtown Regina, for instance, it will cost those people more than other Canadians. In fact, if you look closely at the budget, you will find that because of a 40 per cent decrease in regional development all regions of the country except central Canada and the larger cities will be impacted negatively by this bill, by this tax, and by the policies of the government.

There are other things we should talk about with this bill besides its impact on northerners and rural people. This grab is going to have the greatest effect on middle income earners and in fact will have the opposite effect on large profit making corporations.

The government has been talking about the goods and services tax since before the budget. It made a lot of promises during the election period and following. For instance, it was going to eliminate the surtax. Now we are told it will not eliminate the surtax but will leave it in place. It is a tax which in itself is discriminatory because the surtax does not really mean very much to a large corporation with a good tax lawyer. If you end up paying no tax, as 60,000 corporations have indicated, an 8 per cent surtax on nothing is nothing. The impact of the surtax was minimal. They were told it would be taken off, and now it is going to be left on.

In addition, all Canadians are going to have to pay a surtax, particularly those who are on salary. There is no way. Regardless how good a tax lawyer they have, people on salary will find a loophole large enough not to pay any tax.

Also, the social programs are being attacked. A good example is the Unemployment Insurance Act which is being changed, worth a 15 per cent increase in premiums being paid. That is a 15 per cent increase that is being taken directly out of the salary of the workers who pay those premiums. The total effect of all these changes range from $700 to $1,700 a year. This is a major impact resulting in much less money that can be spent on keeping the economy going and flowing into the coffers of the government, where it seems to disappear while doing very little good for anybody at all.

Since this government has been in power taxes have increased by 171 per cent. That is a huge increase in taxes. With this bill the government is continuing in the same direction. That is why our party and the people of Canada believe that more time and effort should be put into establishing a fair taxation system which would tax those people who are able to pay and relieve those who find it difficult to pay even a small increase in taxes.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I enjoyed the member's remarks.

The government, in supporting its measures and then listening to the Opposition, always asks us what we think it should cut. This government seems to be able to think of nothing but cutting. Will the member remind the government that there are other measures besides cutting?

For example, in a committee where I was a member one of the members opposite suggested that either we had to go through with the government's programs or else add to the taxes of the aged. I am sure the member has some ideas on what we could do other than cutting social programs, such as increasing taxes to those who can very well afford to pay them.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I can think of some things that can be cut. One of them is the interest rate. If there was a one point decrease in interest rates, it would amount to $3 billion in the coffers of the government. That is the kind of cut that would be of some value to the government.

There are other things that can be done. One of them is to put in place a fair kind of taxation which collects, for instance, the $34 billion which the large corporations are holding as deferred taxes. Something that we have been suggesting for years is a minimum corporation tax. Even the Reagan government in the U.S. made some move in that direction by putting on a 20 per cent minimum corporation tax.

The large corporations have been able to escape paying any kind of tax by using the tax loopholes that are in place. The 20 per cent minimum tax would be there regardless of whether they were able to sneak through those loopholes. Those are the kinds of measures that will make the difference in bringing in the money by other means instead of cutting away from the social services and programs that people need and increasing taxation on the low and middle income Canadians who can least afford it.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I was impressed by the member's comments just prior to the dinner adjournment when he was discussing how the goods and services tax would have a compounding impact on the high cost of living in northern Canada. This was brought home to me a couple of weeks ago when I went with one of my Liberal colleagues up to northern Quebec to talk to the Cree and Inuit communities there.

I found out that when you go a certain distance north in Quebec, you no longer get free access to the federal government telephone lines. For example, to contact Health and Welfare Canada or to find out about your pensions or family allowance cheques, you have to make a long distance toll call from northern Canada in order to deal with those departments of the national government to which you would have free access if you lived in southern Canada.

Now, in addition to the toll call, you are going to be obliged to pay the telecommunications tax under this Excise Tax Act. When the GST comes in, you are going to be required to pay a 9 per cent tax on the toll calls you make just to get federal services and advice from federal agencies that are free if you were living in the southern part of Canada. It shows the kind of compounding effect that this tax will have on the unfair treatment we give to northern communities. I appreciated the member's comments on that.

I was really surprised to hear the member for Abitibi, in whose riding I was a visitor, talk now about the air parcel staging rate that the government through the Canada Post Corporation has just increased by 32 per cent. This is a parcel delivery system in the north where Canada Post ships groceries and medications to northern communities that have no other means of getting those goods other than through air service or through the Canada Post system. This government has now increased those rates by 32 per cent. Furthermore, it has cut back on the subsidy that used to be available through Indian Affairs or through Industry, Science and Technology by about $1 million a year over the last year.

This government appears not to value northern Canada at all and discriminates especially against native communities in northern Canada. In this legislation we are seeing a government that wants to compound the cost of living in the north, compound the cost of living in native communities. It seems to provide no useful relief at all to those who live in the north at much higher rates than in the south.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe that was just a comment. The hon. member for Essex—Kent on a question or comment.

Mr. Pickard: I want to make my presentation on the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member can make a comment or pose a question to the hon. member.

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, when I look at what has happened with the excise tax I have to consider the increases that have gone on over the last five years. The basic premise of our taxation policy in federal sales tax was 9 per cent five years ago and now it is being raised to 13.5 per cent. I think that is a tremendous cost to all Canadians. Would the member comment on that particular avenue?

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting that the government has been saying for years—and we have agreed with it quite often—that the manufacturers' tax has some problems. It is not a particularly good tax in some ways. The government's answer to it in Bill C–20 is to increase it and make the bad tax worse. Since the government came into power the maximum tax in this particular area was 9 per cent and now, as you point out, it is 13.5 per cent. Every one of those increases were to what the government says was a regressive and a bad tax. To make things worse, the GST that is to be put on is the same kind of a bad tax, and it will put it on at a level higher.

For instance, if you buy a stove for $200, under the present manufacturers' tax the tax cannot be more than $26 or $27. But if you buy that stove after the GST is in place, when it costs $500, there is going to be a tax of 9 times 5. In other words, you have doubled the amount of tax.

The tax has gone down from 13.5 per cent to 9 per cent, but it is applied to everything else like transportation, distribution fees and profit. You have doubled the tax that the consumer is going to pay on those items. That is true for every consumer item that is being taxed now. The manufacturers' tax was at the manufacturers' level. Now it will be at the final consumer level. A 4 per cent decrease is actually, almost, a 100 per cent increase in many cases.

Mr. White: Mr. Speaker, I have two brief questions I would like to pose to the member for Saskatoon—Humboldt. They deal with the comments he made in his closing remarks about tax collection and companies that perhaps do not pay their fair share.

I would be interested to know his party's or his personal opinion about loss deferral on companies, in particular the smaller resource companies in Alberta, and whether he is opposed to loss deferral for those companies.

The second question deals with the NDP's opposition in the last Parliament to the removal of flow-through shares and the tax deduction that individuals and companies were able to get through flow-through shares. They fought tooth and nail against the elimination of that particular tax loophole. Is he reversing his or his party's position on that particular tax deduction?

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, first, regarding the flow-through shares, the member should read his literature and read the literature of our position. He would see that the statement he made would be quite incorrect.

We have had a lot of experience with resource companies in the New Democratic Party, because we were in that position in Saskatchewan where we had to deal with those taxes. We recognize that every company and every primary resource is different and that you have to deal with it on a different basis.

We also recognize that those resources do not belong to those companies. They belong to the people of the provinces and they should get from it a major portion of the profits. Consequently, I would say, yes, we have to deal with every one of those situations differently and individually, but we must recognize the value of those resources which belong to the people of that province. They have the right to a major share of those profits.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, it is a real privilege and honour to stand today and discuss Bill C-20, an act to amend the Excise Tax.

From the commencement of this session of Parliament we have been involved in debates over taxes, and the legacy continues. What we and the Canadian public are witnessing is an unparalleled part of Canadian history. What we are witnessing is the government parading through, bill after bill, legislation after legislation, cause after cause, with one thing in common—a continual increase in taxes, all sorts of taxes that are eating into the incomes of low and middle income Canadians.

How many times this session will we hear from the government that no one likes to pay taxes or taxes are not popular, or that it needs to raise taxes, because of the financial mess this country is in? When will the tax parade stop? Is it the intention of the this government to make tax grab the catch word of the 1990s?

I use the parade as a comparison as well. We in Canada look on parades as a group of floats and bands going by. This government has brought forth a float of taxes—tax, after tax, after tax—and stood on the bandstand telling Canadians how well they are doing. Let us look at this specific float known as Bill C-20.

Bill C-20 contains the necessary legislative amendments to implement the federal sales tax, excise tax and excise duty changes announced in the budget of April 27, 1989. Nice rhetoric. What it means to all Canadians is: hold on to your wallet, hold on to your purse, hold on to your cheque book, the tax grab continues. What it means is that cigarettes will cost more, gasoline will cost more, using your telephone will cost more, home construction and repairs will cost more, a drink will cost more, many manufactured goods in this country will cost more. Indeed an impressive offering. Almost everything you do, buy, or dream of will cost you more. The proposed tax increases in Bill C-20 will affect all Canadians. All Canadians will pay more for almost every purchase.

These increases will hurt low and middle income families more because of the percentage of income spent on necessities like housing for a family, for the gasoline used to drive to work. These taxes are not aimed at luxury items. These tax increases are aimed right at the heart of the consumer market, and the parade continues.

Last November the government stated that the economy of Canada was in good shape. It said its spending commitments made during the election campaign were not going to cost Canadians more. That was November 1988. In April 1989 the Minister of Finance introduced the federal budget that would reduce government programs by $2 billion and increase tax revenues by $5 billion. At the same time the government told us that the deficit reduction and public debt reduction were foremost in the government's mind. That was on its mind in November. What was there?

When the government told us everything was okay, what was the drastic change in five months? In May or June the parade of legislative tax proposals began and it continues today. Increase of sales, an increase here or higher excise tax there, a little more duty charged here, while by the way, making the average Canadian the brunt of that tax burden. The government, even with this legislation, will not simply say: "Here is the plan, pay up". No. The government tells us Bill C-20 is necessary as a revenue bridge to sales tax reform.

A revenue bridge is interesting terminology. It means let us get the tax and excise revenues hiked up very high so that the rest of its tax reform proposals, such as the GST, will not be so painful. At least, they will not appear so painful. How does this revenue bridge really work? Let us look at the goods and services tax proposal and the current manufacturers' sales tax.

In 1984 the manufacturers' sales tax was 9 per cent. By the time the 1989 budget rolled around, the Conservative government had it up to 13.5 per cent, an increase of 4.5 per cent in just five years. Talk about revenue bridge, this is a revenue rocket.

If inflation on average is 5 per cent per year for the last five years, and the current manufacturers' sales tax is 13.5 per cent and is used to raise $18.5 billion, then in 1984–85 terms, the manufacturers' sales tax would have raised less than $10 billion. It would appear that the manufacturers' sales tax, raising less than $10 billion in 1984 and raising $18.5 billion in 1990 and having its rate go up from 9 per cent in 1984 to 13.5 per cent in 1989 is being used as far more than just a temporary revenue bridge. The tax is being used by this government to generate almost twice as much money today as it did five years ago. The problems attributed to the MST by this government have been compounded by its own initiatives.

The finance minister has called the MST a silent killer of jobs. Little wonder when you consider the rate has gone up 50 per cent and the revenues have doubled since 1984. The government has created a monster with which it must now deal. How does it choose to deal with it? Simple, call it a killer. Blame past governments and make Canadians pay for it, then introduce a new tax. Sell Canadians on it. Call it revenue neutral, but generate another $5.5 billion in taxes for Canadians. The average Canadian pays again.

I love a parade, but this parade has to stop. Bill C–20 will do the following; increase federal sales taxes on construction material from 8 per cent to 9 per cent, increase alcohol and tobacco taxes from 18 per cent to 19 per cent, increase the manufacturers' sales tax from 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent, increase telecommunications services from 10 per cent to 11 per cent, increase the excise tax on gasoline by one cent a litre as of March, 1989, another one cent a litre in January, 1990, plus an additional one cent a litre on leaded fuels, increase excise taxes and duties on tobacco products by $4 per carton of cigarettes and a similar amount on cigars, and place a $5.30 levy on a 200–gram container of manufactured tobacco.

The estimated take on the excise taxes and duties alone is $.9 billion in 1984 and has been increased to $1.6 billion by 1990. That increase again is $.9 billion from 1984 to $1.6 billion in 1990.

While the bill proposes increased tax credits and raising income thresholds from $16,000 to $18,000 in 1990, Canadians will not maintain their purchasing power. Farmers, for example, will lose their farm fuel rebate program. In my riding of Essex—Kent, farmers will pay more for such things as fuel by 1990 than they do today. This holds true for farmers everywhere in Canada.

Today, fuel rebates are 8.5 cents a litre and 7.5 cents a litre for diesel fuel. Yet in 1990, the rebate will be reduced to 3.5 cents per litre and by 1991, if the government has its own way, the rebate would be, based on the GST, reduced to 2.8 cents a litre, more than 5.5 cents per litre reduction in just two years, or two–thirds of that rebate being reduced.

The government claims a savings here of $200 million. What type of saving is this? How is this a saving if actual costs are just foisted on the already beleaguered agricultural community? A fault savings indeed. Yet, the government claims that these are necessary legislative amendments, that they are necessary to implement the federal sales tax, the excise tax and the excise duty changes that will provide a revenue bridge to the sales tax reform, a reform that is regressive, discriminatory, ill–conceived, and impossible to nurture. It is a tax that the members opposite would have us all sit back and enjoy while we sacrifice segments of the Canadian economy that can ill afford such expensive initiatives.

Bill C–20, in many respects is a forerunner of the government's proposed goods and services tax. The government needs the legislative changes proposed in Bill C–20 to pave its way for the introduction of the new GST. Is it not odd that we are reviewing legislation to make it easier to introduce a GST that has not yet been considered by this House? Is it not odd that Bill C–20 lays the groundwork for legislation which, although in draft form, has not been finally prepared? The GST legislation may receive wholesale revision at the committee stage before final consideration, or, more preferable, if the government were truly tuned to Canadians, the GST would be scrapped altogether and not introduced at all.

Is it not strange that we are hastily arranging legislation now for something yet to happen, if it happens at all? That is all a part of the tax parade, a parade that will have us muddle through a myriad of legislation, a tax reform prerequisite before the real crunch is brought in.

Today, one-fifth of Canadian youth, about 1.2 million live below the poverty line. Today, the National Council of Welfare states that current pension plans do not meet the needs of seniors with over 600,000 seniors living below the poverty line. Today, financing costs in Canada are higher on average, between 3 per cent and 4 per cent, than their U.S. counterparts. Today, inflation in our country has risen by .5 per cent to 1 per cent in the second quarter of 1989 due directly to today's tax initiatives by the government. Today, the government continues to increase taxes that will be a direct assault on Canada, its youth, seniors, businesses and farmers. Is this the type of government that we can afford? What does Bill C-20 do to alleviate the burden on these people? Nothing. It does nothing. Enjoy the parade.

Where does the bill really lead us? It leads us further and further along the tax reform road, a road that has as its ultimate destination the GST, a tax reform that has partially indexed thresholds and credits, a tax reform that is hidden, a tax reform that is regressive and discriminatory, a tax reform that will strangle our economy, have taxes rise at a rate higher than inflation, cause more and more Canadians to lose their tax credits, remove billions of dollars from disposable incomes and investment incomes and sacrifice thousands of Canadian jobs. The tax reform which commences with Bill C-20 will have devastating consequences.

The government's parade of tax legislation will not stop until it is all in place. It is a tax reform that does not address the issues of the homeless, farm stabilization, lower interest rates and the protection of universal social benefits. This is no tax reform. It is just a parade.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak in strong opposition to Bill C-20, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

This bill is a result of tax changes that were announced in the recent federal budget. This bill provides for increases in the manufacturers' sales tax from 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent and a tax on cigarettes and gasoline.

I rise to speak on behalf of my constituents in Haldimand—Norfolk, especially those in the tobacco industry who have been hard hit by this government's taxation policy. Once again, this government is attempting to reduce the deficit through heavy tax increases which hit middle and lower-income Canadians the hardest.

• (1540)

The manufacturers' sales tax is a regressive tax that impacts more on lower income Canadians than it does on the more affluent. As we have heard many times in this House during this debate and other debates, the Minister of Finance himself has referred to this tax as the silent killer of jobs. I can agree with that.

The budget was an ominous one. The Prime Minister promised tax fairness. The Minister of Finance's budget proposals made massive increases in personal taxes while corporate taxes continued to decline.

Since 1984 the average-income Canadian family is now paying an extra $2,000 in taxes as a result of the finance minister's budget. I ask the government, is this a progressive tax when Canadians have had to pay over $2,000 more in taxes since this government has come into power?

A progressive tax system means you pay taxes according to your ability to pay. This helps reduce inequality and helps raise the standard of living on the bottom end of the income scale. This is not being done at all through these tax increases. A regressive tax is one which makes the poor pay a higher percentage of their income in tax. This is what the Conservative government is doing to the poor.

Let me address the issue of agriculture because, as you know, Haldimand—Norfolk is one of the finest agriculture constituencies in this country. This regressive excise tax without a doubt will have an adverse effect on the people and on the agriculture and farming in my riding.

According to 1986 statistics, 20 per cent of the people of my riding depend on agriculture for employment. I strongly believe that this government is trying to get out of direct support for the family farm as a centrepiece of Canadian agriculture. The drive to incorporate farming accelerates the decline of rural communities. The small towns depend on and are affected greatly by this government's tax measures.

High interest rates devastate net farm income. Farm debt must be restructured to ensure the continued survival of the family farm. Debt write-down is necessary. The budget outlined a number of drastic cuts to agriculture programs which will have a devastating effect on farmers, especially those in my riding such as tobacco farmers, dairy farmers and grain farmers.

Let us look briefly at some of the budget cuts this government has decided to implement. I believe that we have to look at the whole system. We have to look not only at what programs this government is providing to farmers but we also have to look at what is cut, especially in this last budget.

In the Crop Insurance Cost Sharing Program, the federal government will be cutting down from $90 million to $110 million its share in the next two years by rebalancing of the cost. Producers, suggesting a one-third tripartite funding proposal, were squarely rejected by this government. Without an equitable funding mechanism such as the crop insurance premium cost, it will remain too expensive for many growers, especially in the poorer provinces. This means a continuation of low participation percentages among producers of many farm commodities.

Without a high participation percentage the economic and political need for ad hoc disaster relief programs will continue just as it has in the past.

Of course, we all know about the removal of the interest free provision to the Advance Payments for Crops Act under Bill C-36, which we debated earlier last week in this House. Farm organizations and members of our party have strongly opposed this legislation, but in doing so have been accused of depriving farmers of advance payments for the 1989 crop year. We called upon this government to withdraw that bill. Unfortunately it is still pressing on but we will continue to fight it. In reality, the present act authorizes such payments and only reluctance by this minister to exercise authority spelled out in the existing legislation prevents funds from now being disbursed to producers across this country. I do not like to say that the minister directly misled this House but he directly told farmers something that was not true.

We have asked this government to withdraw this legislation and to allow consultation on this matter. Unfortunately, this government does not have the insight to see the negative impact of this bill on agriculture. It is obvious that this government's strength does not lie in insight or understanding. Perhaps I am being too kind. Perhaps it does understand the negative impact of its so-called progressive changes and it just does not care. It has to be one or the other, and I am not quite sure which it is.

Coming from an agricultural riding, I am naturally concerned about the increased excise tax, and how this will affect farmer's actual cost of production. It has been estimated that the cumulative effects of the tax and the rebate changes will have very negative impacts on our agricultural industries. For example, the budget stated that leaded gasoline would increase by 2 cents a litre April 28, 1989, and as a result of federal sales tax, it would increase by a further .39 of a cent per litre June 11, 1989. The federal excise tax is to increase again on January 1, 1990, by one whole cent. On top of all this, the federal fuel rebate of 5 cents per litre will be eliminated effective January 1, 1990.

It does not take a rocket scientist to know that farmers, especially farmers in my area of Haldimand—Norfolk, will be affected greatly by this. The cumulative fuel cost increase to farmers works out to be 8.39 cents per litre between April 1, 1989, and January 1, 1990. That is 8 cents a litre. Can you imagine going to the gas pump and finding that your gas has gone up 8.39 cents a litre?

Mr. Wappel: Shame!

Mr. Speller: The member is right, it is shameful. We call on this government to do something about it.

Similarly, product prices for unleaded gasoline will increase by 7.1 cents while diesel will climb by 4.32 cents. This government says that we should bring down the deficit. Why is it bringing this deficit down on the backs of Canadian farmers, on the backs of those people who can least afford to pay?

Estimates by the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, based on Statistics Canada data, put the additional cost to farmers of the fuel tax rebate changes to Ontario at more than $25 million. This is just for Ontario farmers. As you can see, we are not talking about small pennies here.

A spokesman for the Canadian Tobacco Manufacturing Council has said that the increases are abusive, inflationary, regressive, and counter-productive. I could not say it any better myself. Farmers are telling this to this minister. The poor who are heaviest per capita smokers will be hardest hit by these measures. The new taxes come four months after the federal government banned most forms of tobacco advertising.

Mr. Al Bow, vice-chairman of the Ontario Flue-cured Tobacco Growers Marketing Board has indicated: "I don't know if we can recover this time". This is somewhat surprising because this Minister of Agriculture came to my riding and said: "Ottawa wants to send a strong signal to the industry that we are here to support tobacco producers in their time of need and in their time of adjustment". My colleagues know when he said that. He said that during the election campaign. Sure enough, after the election campaign he tells tobacco farmers, "Yes, we are going to support you but we are going to tax the heck out of you. We are not only going to tax you on the top end by taxing cigarettes, we are also going to tax your fuel. We are also going to increase your cost of production." That to me does not seem like support for our agricultural community. The government estimates reveal that there will be an increase of over $6 million in 1989-90 in assistance towards the orderly diversification of the tobacco-producing industry. This is a program set up to help tobacco farmers adjust into other farming sectors because of the conditions brought upon the industry by this government's adverse taxing policies. You would think that if you are asking tobacco farmers to move into other areas of production, and if you are going to over tax them, you would use some of that money on the bottom end to help them move into other crops. What the government has done is it cut out that program. It has slashed it.

What they have done is they have cut that out, slashed it. The government is telling tobacco farmers that it wants them to get out of the industry but it does not want to help them get out, they are going to have to find their own way out.

This government takes billions and billions of dollars out of tobacco each year. Surely it could put a little of that money back into the industry.

Why is it that this government promises one thing before an election and immediately afterwards goes back on its word? How can anyone trust this government? It is obvious that Canadians can no longer trust this government's word. If it promises one thing to farmers, it should stand by that promise. Farmers expect this, as do all Canadians.

It is this government's policies that have put the agriculture industry into the fragile position it is in today. A great deal of that has to do with this government's policies. Let us for a minute take another look at another promise.

During the free trade debate, this government promised Canadian farmers that they would have total access to the American markets. The Minister of Agriculture came into my riding and told dairy farmers that supply management would be protected by this government. Right in my own riding, he told the pork farmers that the Americans would stop harassing them, now that we had this free trade agreement we did not have to worry about American harassment.

Mr. Milliken: It is a fraud.

Mr. Speller: That is right, it is a fraud because, quite frankly, Canadian farmers want this government to live up to its words, stand up and tell the Americans, "We are not going to take this any more".

We have seen since free trade, and since the election was over, Americans harassing us on steel, pork, ice cream, yogurt and fishing. How can any agriculturalist believe the word of this government? The people believed the word of the government during the last election. They said, "Sure, we are going to give up all these things under free trade, but look what we are going to get in return. We are not going to get harassment". Well, we have seen over the past few months exactly what has happened and how good this government's word is.

Actions by this government clearly show that it does do not give two cents about agriculture. In fact, the quicker it can destroy the industry, the better.

This government is one of total regression. It is exemplified in the proposed goods and services tax. This ominous legislation is on the lips and minds of people from all walks of life. I had the opportunity during the past month to go to two fall fairs in my riding. Fall fairs are places where you can see thousands and thousands of people. Last year, the fairs were held during the election campaign so it was a good opportunity for us in rural Canada to sit down and talk to individual Canadian constituents.

I had some petitions on the side of my booth and quite frankly, we had to have a police officer to direct traffic because there were so many people signing petitions. The petition called upon this government to get rid of the goods and services tax. Thousands of my constituents, as have the constituents of my colleagues on this side of the House, were signing petitions. I am sure that if we have had thousands of petitioners, there must be thousands from the other side of the House calling upon this government to get rid of this tax.

This is just one adverse way that this government continues in its bad taxation policies. Time after time before the House of Commons committee looking into this issue, witnesses have appeared warning the government that this proposed tax is flawed and unworkable. Does this government listen? No, it does not, not any more than it listened to us when we warned it not to rush into signing the free trade agreement. You can see the commonality between the two issues. The government did not listen then and now we regularly find ourselves being challenged by the United States.

Raising $9 billion to combat the burgeoning deficit is not a mean feat for any finance minister, especially when this government has doubled the national debt in four years.

We saw in the newspaper today figures that show this government's deficit has increased another few billion dollars. It seems that when this government gives a projection as to what the budget deficit will be, it is always off by a billion or two. I do not understand. I think it takes a little common sense to know that if you bring down interest rates, the deficit will also come down.

This government's policy on interest rates is flawed. If the Conservatives would listen to the Canadian people, they would let them know that in fact it is a flawed program. Unfortunately, the only way to lower the deficit, from the government's point of view, is to reverse fundamental policy positions from its election campaign. We have seen that throughout this session.

I am unsure of my time, Mr. Speaker. I have three more minutes, thank you.

Over the last five years, this government has gone to great lengths to blatantly insist that its tax measures have been part of a master plan to broaden the tax base, lower income tax rates, eliminate special preferences and curb opportunities for tax avoidance. This is what the government says. This government has exhausted its tax grab opportunities on personal income tax. Now it is going for a tax on consumption.

Canadians are getting wiser. Some taxpayers, notably small entrepreneurs, are starting to realize that they cannot afford to rush too enthusiastically after tax and other incentives offered by this government because, quite frankly, they cannot believe them. Specific measures introduced in previous years to encourage investment in certain types of activities or in certain regions of the country have been limited or removed altogether.

Over the years, several programs to encourage individual taxpayers to invest in scientific research were gutted. This government stressed and continues to stress that research and development is vital for the growth and competitiveness of our businesses, but it has cut all the programs. This is just another example of how it is hard for Canadians to believe what this government says.

Sales tax reform is heralded as an improvement to the fairness of the tax system by allowing the application of lower rates to a much broader tax base. However, this $1 billion tax grab is highly regressive despite the proposed tax credit system for lower income taxpayers.

We also saw in the paper recently a study done by the Globe and the CBC, I believe. The study said that 80 per cent of Canadians were against this tax. Surely, the government can see the ill of its ways in trying to bring in this tax reform. Canadians clearly do not agree with this.

I see my time is almost up. I want to leave by reiterating what I said about the effects of this tax on agriculture. Farmers in my area told me clearly, and I am sure all the members on the other side have been told, that they do not mind paying their fair share of taxes, but they are sick and tired of being the ones who are always taxed. They do not want this tax. They are the whipping boys of this government and, quite frankly, they are not prepared to stand idly by this time. They are prepared to stand up and let this government know that it is not doing the right thing. They told me that next election it will be this side for whom they will be voting.

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to congratulate my colleague for his usual fine performance and, of course, for his lucid and correct arguments. I want to go one step further and congratulate the people of his riding who, notwithstanding the fact that the minister came during the election campaign and made an appeal to the people of his riding, they had the good foresight to elect my friend to represent them in the House of Commons, and a fine job he is doing.

We all know that these proposals, from the goods and services tax to the increase in the excise tax, are cleaning us out, if I can put it that way. Not only are they cleaning us out but they are cleaning Canadian taxpayers completely. It is interesting, talking about cleaning, that this bill intends to increase the wholesale tax on laundry detergent. Not only are we going to get cleaned but we are going to have to pay for it to boot.

I wonder if my friend would have any comments on that.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comments. He is absolutely right when he says that this government seems to be going after all those small little areas to tax, such as cleaning detergent. Quite frankly, I want to explain to him that people in my area were not fooled by these government promises because they have heard them all before. They have heard promises by this government. I do not think a lot of people in rural Canada were fooled by this. If you look at this side of the House you will see that we well represent rural Canada. Rural Canadians were not fooled by this government's policies.

I do want to say though that what I heard from the people in Haldimand—Norfolk during the fall fairs, and I will end with this, is that people can understand that a government has to tax. They can understand that there are certain problems with the deficit. They can understand all of this. What they cannot understand is why it is them. Why does the government tax programs, such as the advance payments program? Why would it cut out an interest free area to save on the deficit? Twenty-seven million dollars is not a lot of money in the whole, especially when that $27 million means the orderly marketing of grain in Canada. That is important because although the cost of $27 million may go back to the government, we now have no way to orderly market grain in Canada and we are going to see grain flooding onto the markets. Grain is not going to be able to be traded and, quite frankly, farmers will be going under because of this. This all relates back to deficits and taxation. Farmers cannot understand the logic behind these moves by the government.

Mr. White: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the comments of the member for Haldimand—Norfolk. I have a few comments because some of the things he said about agriculture specifically cannot go unchallenged.

I would like to begin with his comments about the public debt. If it were not so tragic, it would be laughable. When the Liberal party was in government back in the 1970s and up until 1984 we were forever on an uphill escalator of public debt. I shudder to think of what our finances would be like if the Liberals were still in government today.

Second, I am sorry to say that the member has shown a very sad lack of knowledge of the free trade agreement when it comes to red meat and supply management. The free trade agreement gave Canada and the United States mutual exclusion from the Meat Import Act. It did not mean freedom from American harassment but it gave us a recourse for those disputes. In addition, supply management is going to be saved by work in the GATT on Article 11. The free trade agreement will not destroy supply management. It is ridiculous to say so.

The other matter he mentioned was a Conservative saying one thing before an election and another thing after. Those Canadians with an interest in political history in Canada remember back in the 1970s when former Prime Minister Trudeau campaigned tooth and nail against wage and price controls. As soon as he won the election, what did we have but wage and price controls? In the 1980 election, former Prime Minister Trudeau again campaigned against the Conservative Budget to increase the price of gas by 18 cents. Within a year it was up a dollar. There is an old saying about the pot calling the kettle black and I think we have a perfect example here.

Just to close the comment, I am proud to say that this government served the farmers of Canada well. If you look at the rural ridings across Canada and the members they elected, I rest my case on the number of Conservative rural members as opposed to the number of Liberal rural members.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I do not need any lessons from the hon. member on either debt reduction or this free trade agreement. Quite frankly, it surprises me how a member on the other side can get up and talk about debt when his government, over the past five years of being in power, doubled the nation's debt accumulated from Confederation to date. That government doubled it, right from Confederation. In five years his government has doubled that debt, so I do not need any lessons from the hon. member on debt.

As for free trade, the hon. member is right. Unfortunately, his agriculture minister and his minister of trade went from riding to riding to riding saying that there will not be any more harassment by Americans. That is what they promised. What we have seen in steel, pork, fishing and dairy is harassment after harassment by Americans on Canadian products.

The hon. member said Article 11 is not negotiable. What do we see at the GATT negotiations? Surprise, surprise, now we are negotiating Article 11 of GATT. There is no guarantee by this government that supply management is protected. This government said all throughout the election campaign that supply management would be protected. Government members came into my riding and said: "Dairy farmers, you do not have to worry about it, it is not negotiable".

Well, we see now that it is on the table. Supply management is on the table at GATT. What have we left to negotiate with? We have nothing left. There is nothing left on our side with which to negotiate because we have given everything away.

This government has sold out Canadian farmers and Canadian farmers have said they are not going to take it any more.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I flipped through Bill C–20 which I will be speaking on today to see what is in the bill. It seemed like a rather innocuous title, an act to Amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act. But when I looked in the contents, I found sort of a wolf in sheep's clothing. The government was trying to trick us, I would suggest, into believing that it is something without very many teeth, that it is something very quiet with no problems for the people of Canada.

But when you look a little deeper, it is clear that this particular bill is part of the agenda that we have seen under this present government since 1984, a constant tax grab from the lower and middle income people of Canada. We look at what is in the bill and we see that it contains a tax on telecommunications. Well, on the surface that does not seem so very serious. People who use telecommunications are probably large corporations and they are going to be taxed. But if we look at who this is affecting, we find out that the people in the Northwest Territories and the people in the Yukon are the ones using telecommunications constantly to keep in touch with their relatives in the rest of Canada and the United States. The telecommunications tax is going to hit people in the far regions, in the Atlantic Provinces, in the west, including British Columbia where I come from. Often people in these regions, particularly in the north, have come from areas such as Ontario, southern British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Central Ontario and they want to keep in touch with their friends and relatives. With this particular bill the government has, in fact, taxed the person who has moved out of those areas and is populating our frontier areas, areas to which we must look for our future growth. They are being hit, I would submit, by this telecommunications tax.

I looked further to see what else the government has hit. It has taxed gasoline. If we look at the environmental aspect of that, it is not such a bad deal because the environmental argument is that it discourages the use of fossil fuels. But let's face it, here in Canada where we have such a broad area to cover, where we have miles and miles between communities, between families, it is not, I would submit, a luxury to be able to drive a vehicle from the outer areas into town for groceries. Sometimes, particularly up north, that requires miles and miles of driving, but they are the people who we are hitting with this tax. It is not a luxury tax, it is an essential part of living, an essential part of life.

It is unfortunate that the government cannot see that by adding the excise tax on gasoline it is hitting families, it is hitting the poor, it is hitting those on fixed incomes. Although from an environmental point of view the increased excise tax on leaded fuels is a desirable thing, many people across Canada who are among our poverty-stricken, among those who are on fixed incomes, cannot afford cars that use unleaded gasoline. They have the old beaters, the old pick-up trucks from prior to 1978. Those are the types of vehicles they must purchase to get their families around, to go in to town to get groceries and the very necessities of life. As well, perhaps they have to take a spouse to the hospital for an operation, and so on. They are the people who are going to be hit with this tax. It is a tax again on the poor.

The tax on cigarettes and liquor I really have very little argument with. I feel those are things that Canadians can do without. It, in fact, is similar to a luxury tax. I cannot object to that.

But I look over the last few years since 1984 to find out what has happened to the taxes. I see that corporate taxes are down a percentage point from 13 to 12 per cent. I see that upper-income earners' tax has dropped from 34 per cent to 29 per cent. I look at the other side of the ledger to see what has increased. We have increased all of these taxes I have just spoken about. But, in addition, since 1984 we have increased the manufacturers' sales tax from 9 per cent to the present 13.5 per cent. Building materials under this bill would go up to 9 per cent from 8 per cent. What effect is that going to have? On the manufacturers' sales tax end of it, there will be a 1.5 per cent increase from the 12 per cent it is at present, up 3 per cent from what it was in 1984. We have had three consecutive increases in the manufacturers' sales tax since 1984.

Who does that hurt? Where does it hit? Again, it is a consumption-style tax. It hits the poor. It hits those on fixed incomes, those in the middle-income groups. The people who can least afford to pay are the ones who are hit by these consumption taxes.

We see, since 1984, that revenues from consumption taxes have increased from 19 per cent to 25 per cent. Those, of course, are going to rise now in the advent of the goods and services tax if it is brought in against the wishes of those 78 per cent plus which number is growing of those in favour of scrapping the goods and services tax. What is the effect on Canadians?

The manufacturers' sales tax, of course, gives people less disposable income, the ability to purchase fewer things. The 9 per cent tax on the building goods makes it more and more difficult for average Canadians to own homes. In fact, it increases the rent of those who cannot afford to own homes, thereby again depressing available income. It is a vicious windmill that we have put these people into.

Now what have we got? We have now raised the taxes to such an extent that the National Council on Welfare has estimated that at the present time sales taxes take 11.5 per cent of the incomes of families earning $10,000 or less; 6.7 per cent of the incomes of families earning $40,000; but only 4.4 per cent of the income of families earning $100,000. I wonder, is this fair? Is this where we want to go in Canada? Is this the Canada that we want to see for the future? Is this what we want our children to have to put up in the next generation and generations thereafter? I would suggest that it is not.

We have seen this constant agenda of turning more and more to consumption taxes. The government now argues that the manufacturers' sales tax is not fair, that it is a silent killer of jobs and we have to do away with it. It is now 13.5 per cent so the government will make it 9 per cent.

However, the government does not tell us that the 13.5 per cent, of course, is on the manufacturers' level and as everybody in the chain up to the retail level takes his piece of the action that 13.5 per cent does not increase. However, with the value added concept that we are now getting into, at each stage we are adding the 9 per cent onto the value that we have added to the price of the good. So a $100 good out of the manufacturer would normally bring in $13.50 in tax. By the time it gets to the retail level it has increased to $200. By my multiplication, we will now pay $18 in tax instead of $13.50. But that is not what this government has told the people of Canada. It has said it was going to be a smaller tax. The issue, I would suggest, is not whether we should have a value added tax, which in this case we are calling a goods and services tax, but whether Canada can afford to have a value added tax.

In one of the finance committee hearings we listened to a group called the Tax Executive Institute and we questioned the members of the group about what was happening. This group was made up of 80 per cent U.S. tax executives along with a vice-president to talk to us about a value added tax. We asked the vice-president what the Americans have done in the area of a value added tax; how far it had ever gone. It has been tried a few times, we were told, but unsuccessfully. It won't float past the first stages of discussion. Why? Because this is a tax that will be almost impossible to administer, the complexity of implementation will be enormous.

Within their own group of tax executives they could not get agreement that a value added tax was the route to go. Yet, in Canada, although we are tying our kite to the string of the United States and trying to fly everything that they fly, we are going to try a value added tax that is unlikely to come into the United States in the foreseeable future, and I would suggest probably not for at least 20 years down the road or perhaps never. Yet, here in Canada we are going to try it, but we are going to try it in a manner that has never been tried in the world before; we are going to use a two-tiered system. We have a provincial tax, but we are not going to go with the provinces, we are going to try it on our own federally. So we are going to make it totally impossible for those out there who are gathering it to bring this in.

That is a problem with what we have done, but the problem is the tax itself. It is a regressive tax. It hurts the poor, the middle income earners, and those on fixed incomes such as the old age pensioners. It is not the answer to what we in Canada need for the future.

I looked at some of the problems with some of the witnesses who have appeared before the finance committee hearings on the technical paper. We have talked to farmers and the farmers tell us they do not want this tax. If we have to bring it in then they need certain exclusions. But the basic message is that a value added tax is going to hurt everybody up the line in administration.

We talk of the input credits and the government says, "Well, it does not really matter because you are a farmer and you are going to get back all of your input credits". I wonder where those people in their little ivory towers have been all their lives because they sure as heck have not been out on the farms talking to the farmers. They have not been in the small businesses talking to the business people. Those are the people who have to administer this.

You hear the bureaucrats in the Department of Finance, who have written this technical paper, telling us it is going to be simple, it is going to be easy to administer. It is so simple, you simply take the tax and you take your input credits and you subtract and you add and you send away this money and you get it all back. Nonsense! The people who have to do it are frightened to death of this administrative nightmare that the government has put them in.

They have bookkeeping problems. We talked to a potato farmer in Prince Edward Island. He said, "Look, I work from dawn until dusk. Although I run a farm with 1,100 acres of potatoes, my wife and I still do our own bookkeeping. Even though we may go out and spend $100,000 a year on equipment, we do not have the time to fill in the paper to get back our rebate".

A lot of farmers tell us they are not computerized, as are a lot of small businesses. So what happens? The farmers tell us that a lot of them will not be getting back the input credits, so it is simply going to cost them the 9 per cent more. I say that this is shameful. This is only one example of what is happening under the goods and services tax.

One of the other examples, is in the area of the poor. Government members on the committee constantly tell us, "Well, we have worked in this nice tax credit system, rebates for those with incomes under $24,000". Well that is all well and good. Go up to the Northwest Territories or the Yukon where they tell us that the illiteracy rate is higher than anywhere else in Canada. The trappers out on the traplines live a subsistence living I am told. They do not file income tax returns. They know nothing about tax credits. But, in order to run their traplines they buy snowmobiles, gasoline and their traps, and they have to pay the tax on top of that. They are not going to get any of their rebates back. It is simply going to cost those people more and they are already paying 25 per cent more for all of their goods and services than we, down in the southern regions, are paying. So it is a double taxation on those from the outer regions.

In Atlantic Canada they tell us that they are paying approximately 15 per cent more than what those of us in the rest of Canada are paying. Again this is double taxation.

We read in the newspaper that the Alberta Minister of Finance has said that the government has substantially underestimated the once-only bulge in inflation. It will be substantially higher, he tells us, than 2.25 per cent, and there will be a continuing spiral with the increases in costs through manufacturers' added costs, administrative costs, implementation costs, as well as the wage costs. These are going to bring up the inflationary spiral. It is going to have a devastating effect, the minister tells us, in the future, an effect that in the short run will hurt so badly that over the long run we will never gain back what we have lost. I wonder, is that what we need in Canada?

There are some definite alternatives at which we should look. Those alternatives do not have to be a value added tax system. They do not have to hit the poor. It is not a consumption type tax. One alternative is to cut the wasteful spending habits of this government, a government that increases taxes and spends more than it earns. We need not hit the social programs which we in Canada want, have fought hard for, and will continue to fight for; there are other methods. We can tax capital gains. We can phase down special tax breaks used primarily for upper-income people. We can revise the income tax rates and restore a full indexation system. Those are only some suggestions for the government. Another would be perhaps a wealth tax.

But Bill C-20 is simply part of this government's agenda, I would suggest, to fund its wasteful spending on the backs of the poor and the middle class.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment my friend for his terrific speech this afternoon. The one thing that he addressed that I have strong views on as well is the fact that the disincentive factor in the administration of the tax system is so high and is depressing people, whether they be farmers, seniors, or families. The government's objective is to try to address the deficit but at the same time it admits that the taxes it is proposing in this current system are inflationary. The government admits that inflation will be a minimum of 2.5 per cent, which is going to have an effect on our interest rates. We know that every time the interest rate goes up an extra $1.4 billion is added to the cost of servicing the debt.

Does the member not think that the tax system has become so cumbersome because the government is basically using a band-aid technique? Has the government not put itself in a position where any potential advantage that it sought has basically now become a total disadvantage? I wonder if the hon. member could comment on that.

Mr. Whittaker: It is an interesting proposition, Mr. Speaker, and I think quite correctly stated, that in fact what has happened is that the government, in its rush to gain added income, has ignored some of the things at which it should have been looking. The problem with the inflationary aspect of course is this. I fully believe, after hearing a number of economists as well as people from across Canada, that this 2.25 per cent that they have talked about in the inflationary bulge is substantially under estimated. Perhaps the Canadian Federation of Independent Business was closer in its estimate at 4 to 5 per cent and the once only bulge. Certainly, from past experience we have seen—although we cannot get an assurance from the Governor of the Bank of Canada—he will not increase the interest rates as a result of inflation.

Past experience shows us very clearly that when inflation goes up, interest rates will also go up. As interest rates go up, consumption will drop. When consumption drops, of course, we have the domino effect: employment drops, businesses fail and we are into a major recession. A recession has been predicted. We already have all of the recessionary trends that show us, starting now, that probably by the end of 1990 and the start of 1991, with the advent of this tax—and without it even—we are going to have a recession. But with the goods and services tax it is going to be devastating. It is going to be something that we did not even see back in 1981. It is going to be totally devastating for the economy.

I think this is the type of thing that Mr. Johnston from the government of Alberta, a Progressive Conservative government, was talking about. He spoke of the effects of this tax and the wounds that will not heal even over a period of time. I think that is what Canadians have to be made aware of and made aware of now. It is not a matter of dropping the tax to 7 per cent and dropping the base. The very concept of this tax leaves a bad flavour in my mouth, and I would suggest in the mouths of most Canadians. It is something that we have to spit out and get rid of now.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I, as well almost everyone in the House, enjoyed the thoughtful and clear presentation put forward by my colleague. It certainly brought to mind some of the communities in the riding I represent, places such as Bella Bella, Bella Coola and Klemtu communities that are going to have in excess of 10 per cent of the cash ripped right out of them. The price of goods that is already beyond the reach of many people in those communities will be again increased by at least 10 per cent by excises taxes and by the goods and services tax of this government.

I know that you, Mr. Speaker, were shocked and horrified at the scenario that my colleague laid out. But we take some comfort in the fact that there are solutions. The carefully proposed solutions that my colleague put forward are certainly reasonable. A reasonable government would adopt them.

The people in my riding, and not to the tune of 80 per cent, but almost to the tune of 100 per cent, are saying that there is a solution beyond the ones that my colleague has put forward. One is to get rid of this government. The Conservative Government is absolutely the worst organization that has ever been inflicted on the Canadian people. I know you would agree with me, Mr. Speaker. This outfit has come along and imposed income taxes and excise taxes far in excess of what is reasonable. It then turns around and threatens the very livelihood, the economic stability of this country with this terrible goods and services tax, or as it is called—the grief and suffering tax. My colleague would probably acknowledge that it is going to finish this government. It is certainly going to finish the Canadian economy and the well being of many citizens in it.

I wonder if my colleague would be prepared to comment on the real solution, that getting rid of the Conservative Government is the route to go in order to solve this major problem.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, as one of my colleagues over here has said, we cannot afford to wait three years. It is very difficult when you have a majority government. Hopefully, we can propose alternatives and have the government accept them.

One of the things that my friend stated in the preamble to his question concerned the small communities that he named off. It brings to mind one of the other things that will be hard hit in small communities besides some of the things that I have already mentioned such as tourism and small business, motels and hotels. It will be the cultural aspect. We are told by the radio broadcasting people that small town radio stations will now be threatened as a result of this tax, the things that small towns look to for communication between themselves and among themselves. Not only has the government cut down on what it is putting into the CBC, one of the things that many small communities depend on, but with the goods and services tax it is going to be hitting out at the communications of small communities, radios newspapers and some things such as theatre, art, the various things that people in small communities are so dependent upon.

Again, they talk about not having to charge the tax because you are under $30,000. It is all complex. It is much too complex for the person in small communities. All it does is cause them more problems. It causes more business failures. In the area of culture and communications, it causes failure. Again, it is hitting at the small communities. We are not the same out there in those little communities. We need much, much different things than they do in the large cities. Those are the things that are being hit now by this particular tax.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to rise to speak on Bill C–20 today. I think we have heard enough today about the specifics of Bill C–20 in terms of the federal sales tax increases, the 18 per cent to 19 per cent on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products, the 10 per cent to 11 per cent on telecommunications, the 8 per cent to 9 per cent on construction materials and the 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent on all other taxable goods.

I would like to address another issue today which I think the government is overlooking. There is a feeling in the community that the government has really lost its sense of caring. There is a feeling that the government has really lost the sense of compassion that a government should have. There is a feeling that the government is just plain indifferent to the frustration that all Canadians face when it comes to taxes and tax reform.

I, for one, think that most Canadians respect the fact that it is the government's responsibility, its duty, to make sure that we handle the economic affairs of this country in a proper and productive way. I do not believe that Canadians really begrudge the government attempting to do its job. I think what people were looking for, and I think what people trusted during the last election, was that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance when they approached tax reform would approach it in a more comprehensive way. We all know that—and I speak for my riding and I know there are many other ridings that feel the same way—the entire tax system is flawed.

When you take a look at the act, you see it is 1,666 pages. There are another 140 different sections on interpretations. There are exceptions to exceptions. There are guidelines to the rules and interpretations of court decisions that have been taken. People have such a frustration with the tax act and the tax system in general right now that there is a mood in the country that is providing a lot of disincentive. It is providing disincentive to our senior citizens who have worked their lives to make this country great. There is a disincentive to our entrepreneurs who want to be free to create and utilize their energy in making products that will, in turn, create jobs for Canadians. These products have to be made at such a level of quality and productivity that we are world class competitive. Just as we were coming out of the tough years of 1982 to 1984 and heading into a period when the economy was starting to really move again in 1985 to 1988, there was a sense of hope held by the entrepreneurs and many others in this country that we were finally going to put ourselves back on track.

What we have done with this tax system is shackle the entrepreneurs. We have provided a tremendous frustration level. I do not just point to entrepreneurs. Seniors citizens come to my constituency office. They do not know where to begin when they have 45 pages of rules and regulations and they try to figure out the tax system we have in this country. The frustration is just absolutely incredible. I know Revenue Canada does provide some service during peak periods, but this government should be approaching tax reform in a comprehensive way. It has not had the courage to do so.

I listened to the Minister of State for Finance speak this morning. He talked about the fact that this government has made progress on reducing the debt. I could not believe my ears. This is a man who understands the financial affairs of this country. It is no secret that there were some tough times in this country from 1980 to 1983. The debt ballooned because we had the worst recession in Canadian history. Our social service programs were called on with vigour. We needed those systems in place to ensure that unemployment insurance and all other social services were there to look after the disadvantaged in this country. That situation was not unique to Canada. It was a world recession.

From 1984 to 1988, one of the best periods in our economic growth, the government managed to double the nation's debt. In a period when the government should have lived up to its commitment of 1984, when it said it was going to address the deficit, it just basically ignored it. There was no reason to ignore it because the economy was booming along quite nicely.

Not only has the government doubled the debt, and continues to add to the deficit, but it comes into this Chamber and states it has made progress on the debt. I find that strange because I believe the central issue in the next election will be trust. Just like free trade was the issue in the last election, the issue in the next election will be trust.

When the Minister of State for Finance comes into this House today and states that the government has made progress on reducing the debt, I think he is really setting his government's trust factor back tremendously.

He went on to say that those who cannot carry this tax will be exempt. He has missed the point again. The hon. member from the New Democratic Party, the hon. member from the Okanagan, talked about the frustration farmers were having in filling out rebate forms. It is not just farmers who do not want to go into the business of filling out rebate forms every quarter. What about the taxi drivers? What about families? They do not want to go into the business of constantly having to fill out rebate forms.

In my city of Toronto there are over 10,000 taxi cab drivers. This system that the government and Mr. Wilson is proposing is bureaucratizing the entire nation. It is an incredible thing, and I just cannot fathom why they would want to have everyone in this country bureaucratized. It is a mystery to me.

The thing that really bothers me is the tone of the government. A colleague of mine who is travelling the country with other colleagues was telling me just before I came into the House today that the level of passion from all sectors, not just from seniors and entrepreneurs, but from tax experts, tax lawyers who are experts, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Canadian Race Track Association, some of whom have been traditional supporters of the government, is something that has never been seen in committees before. They are saying, "Please, Mr. Wilson, come to your senses and do what is right". Doing what is right would be going back to the drawing-board.

I for one do not think it is any big mark on one's career to stand up in this House after listening to the people of Canada for many months to say: "Look here, I have listened to the people of Canada. I am withdrawing this and going back to the drawing-board".

I have immense respect for the Minister of Finance. I have known him for many years. I think he is a great public servant. But I cannot understand his rigidity, his lack of willingness to explore other options. He is sitting in the Department of Finance with a staff of about 3,000 public servants, some of the best and brightest people in Canada. He has access to whatever he wants in the country because of his position. I cannot believe that in his heart of hearts he believes that what he is doing now is the only way and the right way for Canada.

I think that he knows in his heart that this is not good for entrepreneurship. It is not good for senior citizens. It is not good for the regions. It is not a good system. I am hoping that eventually he will muster the courage to go back to the drawing-board. We as constructive parliamentarians who must listen to all people, would have a lot more respect for the minister if he stopped walking along this current road, in an almost in a self- righteous fashion, something which has not been his tradition.

When I think of Bill C-20, which I am addressing mostly, I see there is absolutely no sensitivity to the north. We on this side of the House spent several days in the eastern Arctic during the summer. We had a policy meeting up there. We all love the north but we do not realize—and I for one forget—that it costs more in the north to buy vegetables, meat, and turkey. We saw a turkey that cost $120. In most parts of the country we might pay about $30 or $40, but in the north it costs $120. How do mothers and dads clothe their kids in the north? How do they pay for groceries? It is not right.

The way this country was built was by being regionally sensitive. If ever there was a region in this country today that needs special sensitivity it is the Northwest Territories. I would urge all my fellow members to take a trip to the north. I can tell you, you will come back with a totally different perspective. You will come back with pride, but at the same time you will have a feeling that all too often we in this House forget about some of the hardships, the frustration and the lack of opportunity for northerners. When we went into the supermarket in the north, yes, there was a good selection, but it was certainly not the kind of selection that you can get at Boushey's in downtown Ottawa or some of the other stores, or some of the stores in my riding on the Danforth.

The Minister of Finance and the Minister of State for Finance are projecting an attitude that is too insensitive. It is turning people off. I have mentioned before we are not the government. All we can do is bring the views of other Canadians to this chamber. Yes, they do have the majority vote. Just because you have the majority vote does not mean you have to continue with blind arrogance. It is not right.

We have to get a style and a system going in government where once we realize that we are doing something that is incorrect we fix it. We have the courage to fix it.

I think Canadians want their government to come up with a responsible plan. They want an end to the 50,000 pages that comprise the tax act. I do not think this feeling is unique to any one region, sector or social group. I think it is all Canadians. They want us to come forward with a system as the Minister of Finance promised in 1985, 1986 and 1988, which is more fair, simple, efficient and workable. If the Minister of Finance and the Government of Canada came up with a system like that we could reignite our economy.

The Minister of State for Finance said: "The additional revenue raised through these measures, the measures to amend the excise tax, are estimated at $2 billion in the first full year". The thing that I did not hear him deal with was the inflation factor of 2.5 per cent. If we went along with the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, we would see it estimates 5 per cent. We are talking about an extra three or four percentage points on the interest rate. That could be an added cost to the deficit of as much as $4 billion to $5 billion.

I stand to be corrected on that. But I know one thing. The $2 billion in revenue will virtually be eliminated for sure. It will be eliminated by the interest rate differential because of the increase in inflation.

My hon. friend from Halton—Peel shakes his head "no". He is a respected business commentator and now a member of Parliament for whom I have great feeling. If I am not accurate in that, I stand to be corrected, but I would like a thorough explanation on that. I have talked to economists and bankers. They are afraid that the inflationary effect of the GST is going to really affect our investment climate from abroad. That investment climate, once it is affected, will have an effect on our interest rate. Even now the Minister of Finance does not really have a will strong enough to give a direction to the Governor of the Bank of Canada. I presume that the reason why he is not doing that is because he is naturally concerned about inflation.

If he is concerned about inflation with the current interest rate, then why would it not be logical with an added inflation rate, because of this complicated tax system, that it would also affect our interest rates? That is the point that I am trying to make.

At any rate, I think that all too often in this House we forget about the disincentive factor. We are through Bill C-20 and the goods and services tax demoralizing our nation. I know that because I hear from people all the time. I will give just one short story.

Mr. Speaker, how much time do I have?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Your time has expired. Since it is getting awfully close to five o'clock I will let you have another couple of minutes.

Mr. Mills: I would like to tell one final story, Mr. Speaker.

Last weekend I met a man who was in the marble tile business. His business was doing well. But his problem was that he could not find quality trained people who would work on weekends because of the disincentive factor of the tax system. People are saying: "I work all weekend but I end up keeping only 30 per cent to 40 per cent in my pocket". That is what I mean by the disincentive factor. I think it is time that we look at that when we approach this tax system. I think it is time that the government go back to the drawing board and worry about turning on the nation rather than turning it off.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I just want to respond a little to the hon. member's views on interest rates. I will do it very quickly.

I know that the member has done a great deal of work on the issue of tax reform and I salute him on that. The issue of the inflationary effect of the proposed tax and the response to it by the Bank of Canada needs to be more than a knee-jerk one.

The Bank of Canada Governor has appeared before a parliamentary committee. He has said that he understands the threat of having higher interest rates responding to any GST induced inflation. He has told the parliamentary committee that he will not respond to GST induced inflation by jacking up interest rates. So we have some assurance from the Governor of the Bank of Canada himself on that.

We all recognize the real threat posed to the government's long term ability to manage the debt that is posed by interest rates. I agree with the hon. member on that very real threat. The only way we can get lower interest rates in the long term is to address the debt problem. Simply lowering rates to accomplish that is a very facile solution.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has 30 seconds.

Mr. Mills: I did not want you to think that I was ignoring the debt. But, at the same time, I would like to know how the Governor of the Bank of Canada can differentiate between GST inflation and whatever other inflation is out there. If he can, then we will try and draft it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have another six minutes remaining in questions or comments when we take this matter up again.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the amendment lost.

The hon. member for Elk Island on a point of order.

Mr. O'Kurley: Mr. Speaker, I was not able to make it until after the vote started. I would like my vote to count with the government side, please.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, we have now had reasonable discussion on this bill and, in the interests of being able to put it to committee and get on with the very valuable committee work, I wonder if there would be a disposition among the opposition parties to apply the result of the last vote in reverse to the motion for second reading ,in order that the farmers of Canada will receive these payments.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the farmers of Canada have already spoken. They have said no to this bill. Therefore we cannot accept my hon. friend's suggestion.

We did make some suggestions to him on how it might be possible to deal with the needs that are supposed to be dealt with by this bill. We put forward three suggestions. We have not received a positive response. If we get a positive response we will be willing to talk about expediting second reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not believe that there is unanimous consent.

It being 6.30 p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-21

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved:

That, in relation to Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, not more than one further sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of the report stage, and two sitting days to the consideration of the third reading stage of the bill; and

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to address this very serious motion which will be welcomed by members from all sides of the House. I would not be surprised if, when the recorded vote is taken, it is a unanimous vote.

I think it is fair to say that the House will know that this particular bill has had a great deal of debate. It is one of the few legislative bills on which the members of the committee had an opportunity to travel throughout the country. The country is still talking about those travels, and just how welcome this news was. I specifically refer to my friend from Burlington who was so well received in the maritimes.

These changes, as the House and the country will know, are made to enable the government to use unemployment insurance funds for training. In the past the Liberal way of using unemployment insurance funds was just to send people a cheque. We have been training people with unemployment insurance funds for years now.

The Liberals object to this fundamental change. They would rather send people a cheque and have them kept on the unemployment insurance rolls. The way we have done it is to take them off the unemployment insurance rolls, and we have created 1.5 million jobs. Those people are now paying unemployment insurance premiums. We are going to drag the Liberal party, kicking and screaming, into the 21st century.

We think there has been ample debate in committee, and I think you will find that the amount of time required at report stage, which is a further day, is ample. There are a lot of repetitive speeches. I know my friends opposite do not like repeating themselves, but they have been. Really, we are simply saving them from themselves, from further regurgitation of Hansard.

There will be one further day at report stage, two at third reading, and this bill will go down to the Senate. I would not be surprised if it is back from the Senate in a day because that place will see it as progressive legislation, legislation which the Liberals never had the nerve to pass when they were in government. Had they done so they would have been a little better off; there would not be so many of those Liberal hacks and flacks sitting in the Senate as appointees.

I do not intend to speak for very long today. As I sit down, let me say that the Opposition will probably want to vote on this bill immediately so I will not use up all of my 10 minutes.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Minister of Justice knows that it is contrary to the rules of the House to refer to the other place in derogatory terms. We have just heard him use words that I would not repeat and that I submit are unparliamentary. I ask that he withdraw them because they are contrary to the rules and practices of this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sure that the hon. minister has forgotten what he had said, and I am sure he will rectify it. We do respect the other place, and I am sure the hon. minister realizes that.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I have the utmost respect for the other place. I would want to know whether my friend objected to me calling them Liberal hacks or Liberal flacks. Which word should I withdraw first, the flack or the hack? Are there more flacks than hacks?

I will withdraw them both, Mr. Speaker, and I would not in any way want to cast any aspersions on the eminence of the appointees made over the period from 1967 to 1984. I would simple assure my hon. friend that for the next 20 years they are going to be better.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I just listened to the intervention made by the Minister of Justice with respect to this closure motion. I expected at least that the minister would make some attempt to justify this motion after one day of debate. All we heard was flippant, arrogant rhetoric which is the usual thing we have come to expect from this government.

Here we are once again faced with a closure motion on an extremely important bill after one day of debate. This is a measure which affects millions of Canadians. The unemployment insurance system last year paid out benefits to 2.2 million Canadians, Canadians who were obliged to claim under this program because they were put out of work against their will and needed that money to pay for their groceries and rent, to send their children to school, and so on.

This is the largest social program in Canada, a $13 billion program, and the government, in this bill, is cutting and slashing at this particular program. It is cutting off debate after one day by putting in a closure motion. On October 16, a week yesterday, we spent less than four hours debating 53 amendments at the report stage. Yet, the government saw fit today to bring in this motion.

Traditionally motions of this kind were only brought in when there was evident obstruction. I challenge the government or anybody who is associated with the government to show any kind of obstruction. The Speaker himself had organized those 53 amendments into 12 groupings. In the less than four hours that we have already debated this bill we have only been able to debate the first grouping of the 12 groupings that you yourself, Mr. Speaker, had organized for debate.

I want to point out that this type of action is the action of the most cynical, the most totalitarian government that I believe we have had in this country since Confederation. This government, since 1984, has introduced closure more times than all governments since the Second World War put together.

I am willing to bet that the number of times closure has been used by this government is more than that used by all governments since Confederation. In the 23 years that I have been here, from 1965 to 1984, I would say that closure was used maybe once or twice a year. This government uses it on almost every bill and it does it in a cynical and manipulative way. Conservatives try to make sure that Canadians do not know what is being done to them by this repressive legislation.

They put three or four very complex measures to Parliament, we carry on debate for one or two days, and then they impose closure.

This government totally misunderstands the role of Parliament in a democratic system. I venture to guess that it totally misunderstands democracy. The Conservatives believe, because they won a majority of seats in the 1988 election, that they have the right to ram through Parliament any type of measure that they please.

What they forget is that although they won the majority of seats in 1988, they did not win the majority of votes in this country. They won about 47 per cent of the votes. The combined opposition parties, the Liberals and the New Democrats, won approximately 53 per cent of the votes and the government party only won a majority in two of the ten provinces of Canada. It won a majority of votes in Quebec and it won a majority of votes in Alberta. It did not win a majority in any other province. It did not win a majority on an over-all basis in terms of popular vote.

Even more important, this bill was not part of the program that the Conservatives put to the people in 1988. As a matter of fact, in the election campaign of 1988 they said exactly the opposite to what they are doing now. Time and again we have quoted the words of the hon. Minister for International Trade in St. John's, Newfoundland, who said during the election campaign in response to a question that they would not touch the unemployment insurance system, that they would not cut the unemployment insurance system, and he said that he had that confirmed from the Prime Minister.

Here we have a bill which seriously slashes the unemployment insurance system. The government itself admits that it is reducing regular benefits by $1.3 billion and that it is recirculating that money for development and for training. I will deal with that in a second. It did not put that measure to the people in 1988.

Here the Conservatives are, on this bill which does exactly the opposite of what they said in the election, imposing closure after one day of debate at the report stage. That is bad enough, but I want to recall to you, to the House and to the Canadian people that in the debate on second reading in the month of June, they imposed closure after two half-days of debate on second reading. We had one half-day of debate on Tuesday, June 6; then we had another half-day of debate on June 7; and then on June 21, they imposed closure and we had one full day of debate. At second reading, we had really two full days of debate spread over three days. That is all. Again, that was on a most important bill such as this one.

With respect to the committee, after a lot of hard driving and pushing by the opposition, we managed to get certain hearings of a legislative committee with respect to this bill. The hearings, unfortunately, were organized during the summer when a lot of private groups and a lot of voluntary organizations were on holidays, when they found it very difficult to respond to the advertisements that were in the newspapers.

Nevertheless, the hearings went ahead after a period of organization during the summer and some briefing sessions in the early weeks of September and we had three weeks of hearings throughout the country. We had one week of hearings in Ottawa. There were four weeks of hearings. We heard from a lot of groups. We heard from 202 groups, not as many as wanted to be heard, and we did not hear a lot of expert testimony, and 157 of those 202 groups opposed the bill.

The hon. parliamentary secretary says that we should dismiss the fact that 157 groups opposed the bill because a lot of them were trade unions and they all rehashed the same brief as the Canadian Labour Congress. That is extremely misleading and once again arrogant because the different labour congresses in the different parts of the country really represent the feelings of workers in those provinces, whether it is Newfoundland, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, or Ontario.

While of course there is something in common with the brief of the Canadian Labour Congress, there were also very specific references to the type of labour force, the type of work being done, the seasonal nature of that work, and the resource base of that work from province to province. In northern Ontario, it is mining and forestry; in the west, it is resource industries again, oil, gas and so on. There was not a rehashing of the same brief over and over. They were the same basic principles, yes, but not a rehashing.

Why does this bill deserve a lot more debate? To begin with, I do not think we on this side expect that by debating this bill we are going to convince those members on the other side because they are deaf to the problems of Canadians. They do not want to hear about the problems of Canadians.

Again, I repeat, the purpose of debate in this House, particularly through the media and through television, is to inform Canadians of what is being done to them by this very harsh and cruel legislation. That is the purpose of the debate. The government is cutting off debate so that Canadians will not know what is happening to them.

They will only know maybe next year when they make a claim on unemployment insurance and find that they do not qualify. That is the purpose of the debate.

This bill cuts back and makes it more difficult to qualify for unemployment insurance. It cuts back the benefit periods. It increases the penalties without solving some of the problems that lead to quitting and unemployment insurance.

The government is totally withdrawing its contribution to the unemployment insurance fund which has been traditional, which has been in the law up until now. Last year it was $2.9 billion. The government is withdrawing that contribution and is leaving the payment of unemployment insurance totally in the hands of the workers and employers.

As a result of this bill, people will be unemployed with no unemployment insurance and they will be forced to go to the welfare systems.

In addition, by withdrawing large sums of money, a total of $1.3 billion from the fund and benefits, the government is going to be taking a lot of money out of provinces that do not have much money; for instance, Atlantic Canada and some of the western provinces. This is money that went back into those communities to help the basic economies stay alive. The government is taking that money out and we do not know where it is going.

This, Sir, will be my final remark. The government justifies the bill, as the Minister of Justice did, on the basis that it is going to shift a lot of this money into training. We on this side are 100 per cent in favour of more training, but this government cut the training budget in Canada from $2.2 billion to $1.3 billion, by 32 per cent, since it came to office in 1984. The training budget has been slashed year after year. Now the government is putting that money back into training but taking it away from unemployed workers, money that should be there to help workers pay for their groceries and their rent when they are unemployed. The government is putting that money into training and we do not know in which areas of the country.

I believe my time is up but let me repeat that this is a dictatorial, arrogant measure being imposed after one day of debate. There has been no obstruction on this bill and this is totally intolerable in a democracy.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reiterate what the last speaker just said. This is one of the most totalitarian, dictatorial things that this government has ever done. When some of the members opposite were in opposition they knew what obstruction was. They are the ones who invented obstruction in this House. For 14 days they rang the bells. When they got into power, what did they do? They limited the ability of the opposition to do the very same thing they had done. Now the opposition can ring the bells for 30 minutes. I do not know what the multiplication factor is from 14 days to 30 minutes, but I would suspect that it is somewhere in the neighbourhood of 80, 90 or 100 to 1, and for the government to even imply that there has been any kind of obstruction on the part of the opposition on Bill C-21 is absolutely ridiculous and indefensible from its point of view.

What we have here is just another one of a series of cuts. The government is cutting financing for post-secondary education, cutting financing for health care and cutting VIA Rail. This is just another in a series of cuts and this time it is cutting time. I would suggest that when a government comes to a point where the only way it can defend an action—and this action is indefensible anyway—is to cut time, it shows how absolutely deprived of any kind of originality or any kind of defence it has in so far as the legislation it is proposing is concerned.

This legislation was introduced in the most glowing of terms. I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, that the government did not change the colours in the Commons to red from green, irrespective of what the colours of the other House are. It is a wonder the government members did not put out the red carpet is what I am saying, Mr. Speaker, because this legislation was introduced with some of the most glowing terms that you could imagine of any legislation introduced into this House.

The Minister of Justice indicated in his opening remarks that this legislation would "drag the opposition screaming and hollering into the 20th century".

An Hon. Member: You mean the 21st century.

Mr. Fisher: No, no, I think I was right. It may have been a Freudian slip but it was still right. We are getting dragged into the 20th century by this legislation, by this government. This certainly is not going to be a credit to Canada or the 20th century in so far as working people anywhere in the world are concerned. This is the most devastating piece of legislation that has ever come to this House affecting Canadian workers. It has devastated a program which has been an absolute necessity to many parts of this country. In the last depression, it was able to save this country from the kind of devastation which we had experienced at the hands of another Tory government in the thirties, the Great Depression. It is because of the experience of that Great Depression that we have unemployment insurance, and it has been of immeasurable value to working people and all levels of society in Canada. There is not a merchant in this country who has not benefited since the introduction of unemployment insurance in Canada.

In many of the briefs which the committee heard as we travelled across the country, references were made to how important unemployment insurance was. The city of Sudbury was quick to point out how, when the nickel mining industry was so badly devastated because of the low sales of nickel world wide a few years ago, the unemployment insurance system was able to come to the rescue of the whole community. That is the kind of effect which the unemployment insurance has had. When the government introduced this legislation we were left with the impression that it was going to be—I do not like to use clichés but I suppose I must—the best thing since sliced bread.

To get back to what I was saying earlier, I cannot imagine why this government did not introduced it on a red carpet. But things change. The government did an impact study on what the effects of Bill C-21 would be. The government knew what the impact of Bill C-21 would be before it was introduced.

When we tried to get information on what the impact study had to say, the government would not give it to us. We went through the Access to Information Act to try to get information on what the impacts would be and we were refused access to information by this government under the law of the land through a loophole that says that if information is going to be made public within 90 days, the government does not have to release it. I don't suppose it would come as a surprise to you, Mr. Speaker, or anyone else in this country, to learn that information was not released within 90 days. It was a couple of weeks later than that.

The impact study on Bill C-21, which was introduced in such glowing terms, was released in the middle of the summer, the deadest, dullest time, the time when Canadians have the least interest in what is going on with regard to politics, a very safe time for the government to reveal to the country what the impacts of its devastating legislation would be.

The government did not roll out a red carpet to introduce the impacts of Bill C-21. I would suggest that what the government actually did was to sweep them underneath the rug, and I do not blame the government. I do not even blame it for introducing closure on this thing. The effects of this we heard when the committee went across this land, is so bad that if I were the government I would want to get this legislation out of the public eye just as quickly as possible because it is indefensible and indescribably bad.

What are some of the effects? Let us just look at a few comparisons. The government says, even in its own impact study, that 30,000 Canadians will no longer be able to avail themselves of unemployment insurance payments after Bill C-21 goes into effect. But, as is common with this government, it has a tendency, shall we say, to underestimate the negative effects of its actions. Other studies on the number of people who will be excluded totally range from the 30,000 that the government has suggested to as high as 150,000. The people in the Avalon Peninsula, because of longer working requirements, will have to work 11 weeks to qualify rather than the 10 now required. In that area alone, 10,000 people will be completely excluded from the ability to avail themselves of unemployment insurance which, of course, certainly puts in doubt the government's total number of 30,000.

I see my time is almost up, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Your time is up right now.

The hon. member for Burlington.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the member for Saskatoon—Dundurn for his words of encouragement and support when he said that he is pleased that we are bringing this bill forward and putting time allocation on it.

At the outset, I want to say a couple of things to perhaps put the record straight, if I may. I have heard members on the opposite side talk about this bill not being discussed during the 1988 election or not being mentioned at all. The inference is left that before you pass any legislation, you somehow or other must have it in your election platform and that is all that you do. Well I can remember when the 1980 peekaboo election was called and Trudeau just went across this country, bobbed and waved and weaved and said nothing, and yet brought in legislation. So let's stop the nonsense.

We have moved time allocation, the minister has stated, because agreement could not be reached with the opposition parties.

Mr. Allmand: After one day of debate.

Mr. Kempling: We have, Sir, endeavoured to reach agreement and have been open and accommodating from the beginning. When we had our organizational meeting in June we agreed with the member from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce on the cities that we should visit in each province. We agreed on how to deal with the Northwest Territories. We agreed on the number of witnesses we would have each day, 16 in number, and we agreed on the amount of time that we would allocate to each witness. We agreed to hear a wide variety of witnesses from many walks of life. In fact, Sir, we heard some briefs over and over and over again from national groups which have local affiliates across the country. We thought that we would hear the local version, but in most cases we just heard the national brief over and over, time and time again.

Mr. Fontana: You are saying the people across the country don't have a right to speak.

Mr. Kempling: All you have to do is read the record. Don't holler at me. You were not there so you would not know.

Mr. Keyes: We read the record about P.E.I. I read about you in the papers.

Mr. Kempling: What is in the papers? You have not read the record. You were not there and you should just close your lips.

Mr. Keyes: I read all about it.

Ms. Clancy: Trying to muzzle the opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Burlington has the floor.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, each witness was given 30 minutes to present his or her brief. Some used the time to present a brief, others accepted questions from the committee.

The committee on Bill C-21 was under a House Order to report by October 10. The House of Commons, of course, as we can see here today, is a debating forum and the opposition put forward motions to extend the committee hearings beyond October 10 which is its right.

Throughout the hearings, and particularly during the clause-by-clause considerations, members of the opposition used stalling tactics and time-wasting manoeuvres to slow down the process.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Kempling: In spite of all that, we persevered and we did report on October 10, as required in the House Order.

I approached members of the opposition—and I know they love me dearly—to see what sort of debate they wanted on report stage and third reading. I asked what sort of debate they were looking for. After all, we have had second reading, the committee has travelled across the country as agreed to by all parties, and we have heard more than 200 witnesses. We have heard from the minister and departmental officials for several hours. My questions was, more or less, "What do you want from here on?" All I got back was, "Well, I don't know, we'll have to see".

We offered at that time to extend debate during the lunch hour, if that would allow the opposition more members to express their views. Of course, there was no response. We looked at our very full agenda and the calendar and concluded that there would be little or no co-operation to conclude the debate, so we used the perfectly correct parliamentary procedure of time allocation to indicate that we intend to bring the debate on Bill C-21 at report stage and third reading to a conclusion.

In the course of debate we must make progress. If we cannot reach an agreement with the opposition parties, we have two options; we can either conclude the debate or put the bill aside for some time. We are the government and we have put forward, through the Throne Speech and other policy announcements, our intention to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. There was consultation with labour and various business groups.

The bill was drafted and passed by cabinet, introduced in debate, and then subjected to Canada-wide hearings, clause by clause, with the minister and her officials. The bill was finally, as I say, reported, as ordered, by October 10. Amendments were received and ruled upon by the Speaker, they were grouped for debate, and the report stage debate began.

• (1220)

Our task is to conclude the debate, after a reasonable amount of time. If we cannot reach an accommodation with the opposition, then we must use the rules of the House to complete each stage of debate and pass the bill along to the Senate for its consideration.

In order to show to the members that our heart is really in the right place, I move:

> That the House continue to sit through the lunch hour for the purpose of continuing consideration of the motion for time allocation on Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Those members who oppose the motion will please rise.

And more than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Since more than 15 members have risen, the motion is deemed to be withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in a spirit of disappointment and sorrow at the action of this government. It is an understatement to say that this bill is unfortunate. It is unfortunate for Canadian workers, it is unfortunate for Canadian women, and it is unfortunate for Atlantic Canada. This bill is an undermining of the beliefs and sentiments that led to the creation of an employment insurance scheme in Canada. It is a complete reversal of policy upon which Canadian workers have depended for nearly 50 years.

Mind you, Mr. Speaker, I suppose one has to commend the government for the provisions to bring the act in line with the principles of non-discrimination as set out in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Call me a cynic, but this government's recognition of such principles comes after arduous battles before the courts for the inclusion of persons, the majority of whom are women, working for companies owned completely or largely by their spouses, and for the end of discrimination based on age. Once the courts beat them up, maybe now and again the government will act on principle.

I would also like to commend those motions before us that seek to recognize the importance of adoptive parenting, but I am proud to say also that these motions were authored by or inspired by my colleagues in the opposition.

We are limited to one day's debate—one day. What an insult to the women of Canada. This government acknowledges that the budget will increase Canada's unemployment rate. Women, as we all know, have higher rates of unemployment than men. The 1988 annual averages of unemployment were 8.3 per cent for women, as opposed to 7.4 per cent for men. Women fill over 70 per cent of part-time jobs. The majority of seasonal workers are women and immigrants. Women still face the "last hired, first fired" phenomenon.

But this government wants to limit debate on this bill to one day. Many women will no longer qualify for UI benefits. At present over 70 per cent of UI benefits are received by claimants with less than 50 weeks of work and 25 per cent by those who cannot get more than 20 weeks of work.

Women will also face, more than any other group, the brunt of the proposed double penalty for workers who quit their jobs without just cause or who decline an offer of "suitable employment". Women face more difficulties in finding jobs than many men. They change jobs more often than men because women still face a lack of opportunity for advancement, because mothers must perform the fine balancing act of matching job hours to child care hours and because sexual advances by employers may make for an impossible work situation.

The penalties are seven to twelve weeks of disqualification, rather than the current one to six, followed by benefits amounting to 50 per cent of average earnings, rather than the current 60 per cent. It is a nice message for the women and children of this country. That 50 per cent is the same rate paid in the United States. Here we go! Here comes our level playing field once again.

The government has acknowledged that it is justifiable to quit a job because of harassment, and believe me the women of Canada say thank you very much for this recognition of a universal fact. But it is time consuming and very difficult to prove. Although disqualification can be appealed, few women in this country have the time and the money to forgo all of their benefits and wait what could be months for a decision.

Women are often in the poorest paying jobs. They often work part time because they cannot find full-time work. Should they be trapped in poverty wages forever? I guess that is the theory of the government, to one day prevent the people of Canada from finding out exactly what is going on here, one day to prevent the people of Canada from remembering the false promises of the Minister for International Trade during the 1988 election campaign.

A recent article in the magazine, Women's Education, states: "The privatization of training as a systemic trend is detrimental to women in particular. A radical shift to funding the immediate training needs of business using taxpayers' money will not overcome the occupational segregation of women. Indeed, it may well reinforce it. Social and economic equality for women can best be promoted by the public and non-profit sectors which are concerned with the needs of the trainees and of society, not simply tomorrow's balance sheet".

That is what we have here; a bill that is concerned with tomorrow's balance sheet and probably a balance sheet that is drawn in the United States of America.

The policy and planning branch of Employment and Immigration published a study last August. It identifies the 10 occupations that will contribute most to employment growth in the 1990s; sales people, food services, secretaries, cooks, cleaners and cashiers. Need I say more?

The government is funnelling money from the UI account into private sector training. A study by the Canadian Association of Adult Education shows that private programs assign only 25 per cent of training programs to women—25 per cent for 52 per cent of the population.

The government failed to develop a comprehensive job strategy so it is training workers for jobs that do not exist and ghettoizing women through punitive UI measures into accepting the low pay, low skill jobs. The more things change, the more they are the same, and the less and less the cries of women in economic exigencies are heard by our friends on the other side of the House.

In its 1987 report, the sub-committee on training and employment of the Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology wrote: "The Canadian Jobs Strategy should moderate its emphasis on private sector training in regions with a poorly developed private sector".

This government is proposing the federal pull-out of the unemployment insurance system. This government is backing out and taking $2.8 billion with it. Who will take up the slack? Employees and employers will contribute more to the fund and the unemployed will pay by finding themselves ineligible for UI benefits or facing a drastic reduction in their benefits. Eight hundred million dollars will be redirected to private sector training. Will that help Lockeport, Nova Scotia? For what jobs will that workforce be trained?

I find the government's suggestion deeply offensive to Canadian workers and an affront to the principles upon which our UI system is based, principles, by the way, to which Canada is a signatory in the International Labour Organization.

When our UI system was created in 1940, it was seen as essential that the federal government should finance its share of the cost so that the system would be a national one and the federal government would assume its responsibility for economic stability and the maintenance of low levels of unemployment. Given this government's performance to date, I can see that that commitment no longer exists.

This government is wreaking havoc in the lives of Canadians. The proposed dismantling of our UI system is consistent with this government's dismantling of the financial well-being of lower and middle income Canadians and the economies of the regions of Canada.

• (1230)

It is not the unemployment insurance system but rather the high level of unemployment which constitutes a fundamental economic problem in Canada. But maybe that truth is a little too difficult for this government to comprehend.

Hundreds of workers in my city of Halifax are facing unemployment at the hands of this government. Now it is telling them that even their UI benefits are to be cut.

This government's decision to end the At and East rail subsidy has put the Halifax grain elevator in immediate peril. Estimates by the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission put the loss to Halifax by the closure of the elevator at $14.4 million. The spin-off from such a closure will further devastate the economies of Halifax and Nova Scotia.

The Maritime Farmers Council estimates that two-thirds of hog producers and one-third to one-half of the egg producers in the region will be out of business if the elevator closes. A 1988 impact study on the port of Halifax prepared for Ports Canada shows that more than 450 jobs and $13 million could be lost in the city if the elevator closes.

We are talking about the unemployment of longshoremen, stevedores, truckers, rail workers, terminal operators and all those other people who are facing the loss of their livelihood when this government begins its domino theory in the economic system of Halifax.

This government has cut vital portions of VIA Rail service. They put the maintenance centre in peril. When those Haligonians who used to have a job go to the unemployment centre, this government will be responsible. When these workers want to collect their benefits, they will be told that their eligibility has been raised from 12 to 18 weeks. So they are not eligible; or if they are they will be told they are now only eligible for 21 weeks of benefits when they used to be eligible for 28 weeks.

The government is asking the workers of Halifax to pay more for UI, to pay longer for UI and to accept less from UI should they lose their jobs. The government has mismanaged the economy of Nova Scotia to the verge of extinction. It has mismanaged the inshore fishery by imposing drastic quotas putting hundreds of workers in the fishery out of jobs. How does it choose to make up for its own mismanagement? It imposed drastic tax measures while cutting vital subsidies such as rail service, transfer payments and now it is pulling out of UI.

The government says the onus is on private sector training, and they want the workers to pay for it. The question in Halifax and in Nova Scotia generally is: training for what jobs?

There has been a failure to develop a comprehensive job strategy. Now it plans to train workers for jobs that do not exist. I sat in on the UI hearings in Halifax. I heard a colleague from the other side of the House, who is present here today, tell the Acadian Federation to move or starve. This is not something that we appreciate in the maritimes and we will remember it for a long time.

The government has given the unemployed and soon-to-be unemployed of Halifax two options. One is to go on the over-strained social assistance. Well, we will not accept it, Mr. Speaker. The Halifax social assistance problem is facing a huge shortfall. The people of Halifax know this. The workers of Halifax know this, and they know who did it to them.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity this morning to take part in the debate. A few minutes ago, I saw opposition Members objecting to a suggestion that the House continue sitting during lunch hour and that while this morning, they were criticizing the government for trying to limit—for making arrangements to have the debate go on for a few days more and then ending the debate so that we can proceed with other business. I find this attitude hard to understand. On one hand, they don't want the additional time we are giving them, but on the other hand, they object to our terminating the debate at a given time.

Mr. Speaker, during the hearings we held across this country on Bill C-21, the proposed unemployment insurance reform, we heard 202 groups during nearly four weeks of hearings. It is true that many groups showed, if we can call it that, their opposition to the present bill.

However, Mr. Speaker, what the opposition did not say is that there was a kind of report, something you could call a work-plan, that was circulated across this country, and many groups, many unions, for all practical purposes, biased the debate by keeping the same text and only changing the figures according to local circumstances, and all this to be able to object to the bill.

We have heard all kinds of arguments, Mr. Speaker, in this debate on unemployment insurance reform. Some groups, people representing workers and unions, said it was all because of the free trade agreement and that we wanted to copy the United States. That is absolutely untrue, Mr. Speaker. There is nothing in this bill that is anything like what is happening in the United States with respect to unemployment insurance. The United States has 50 different unemployment insurance systems, while in Canada, we have one system for the whole country. In the United States, the unemployment insurance fund is about $22 billion in Canadian dollars. In Canada, the annual amount in the unemployment insurance fund is $12 billion. Considering they have 10 times our population, it should be $120 billion in the United States instead of only $22 billion.

So the two situations are entirely diffrent. We also have a number of social benefits that do not exist in the United States. Furthermore, our weekly benefits are much higher than in most American states, where benefits are much lower.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, as a result of the present unemployment insurance reform, there will be some very significant changes. Of the $1.3 billion we want to reallocate under this reform, $660 million will go to new benefits and supplementary benefits, including maternity and parental leave, which will now be far more substantial.

From now on, maternity leave will be 15 weeks, plus 10 weeks parental leave, which makes 25 weeks. This means new benefits and more maternity and parental leave.

There will also be an amendment at the report stage, Mr. Speaker, under which our government will provide five additional weeks for adoption. For instance, if the child is over six months of age when he enters the home, the spouse or one of the spouses will be entitled to five additional weeks, and the same number of weeks will be added to maternity leaves when the child enters the home, after an additional period of 6 months.

So I think this is a substantial improvement that deserves to be mentioned and that will benefit Canadian families.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to the $600 million for new benefits, $800 million will be spent on training. Initially, the unions, workers, and representatives of the New Democratic Party and the Liberal party didn't want this. They didn't want us to spend $800 million on training. Gradually, however, they started to change their minds. They said: It makes sense to spend $800 million on training. We can go along with that. But this is what they want us to do, Mr. Speaker: Go ahead, add $800 million, but take it out of taxpayer's pockets. Take it out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. That is what they wanted us to do. And that, Mr. Speaker, is something Canadians cannot afford to do indefinitely. There comes a time when we have to call a halt to spending.

Canadians know that our total debt has now reached $324 billion. It costs us $100 million in daily interest. That is why today, the government is trying to act responsibly by taking the money we have and making it more productive by reallocating those funds and directing them to budget envelopes or programs that reflect our needs. And that is what we are doing under the present unemployment insurance reform.

Eight hundred million dollars will be used to train our workers. The opposition knows that, Mr. Speaker. Today, 30 per cent of Canadians drop out of high school before graduating. But what do we do with these kids? You know what happens. One or two or three years later, they are unemployed. We cannot deal with the problem, by leaving them on unemployment insurance, for weeks or even years. We have to train them, Mr. Speaker.

That is the difference between education and training. I would urge the hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn to listen to what I am saying. I think it is important. There is a difference between education and training. Education is when you are a full-time student at the CEGEP or university, and so forth.

When someone enters the labour market and then becomes unemployed because he doesn't have enough training, it is our responsibility as this country's elected representatives to try and use the money in the fund and train these workers to get them back into the labour force as soon as possible.

Look at the statistics of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. You are familiar with those statistics. In 1985, 30 per cent of the business sector said they had trouble finding qualified workers. Three years later, in 1988, we are up to 50 per cent. These figures are significant, Mr. Speaker, and that is why we want to take $1.3 billion from the fund and reallocate it to meet the current needs of a society where these people must be trained.

Regarding the new system under which people will have to work 10 to 20 weeks to be eligible for unemployment insurance, all I can say is that in Toronto, where the unemployment rate is from 3.5 to 3.7 per cent, it is a lot easier to find jobs, and it makes sense that people there should have to work longer to be eligible, compared with the situation in the maritimes, for instance, or the Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean region, where we see unemployement rates of up to 12, 13 or even 14 per cent.

I believe our reform reflects the Canadian reality, the problems in some regions and the opportunities offered in others. I think this is very sensible.

Finally, remember when in 1977, under the Liberal Government, we went from 10 to 14 weeks for a person to be eligible for unemployment insurance. That year, in the maritimes more than 70 per cent of claimants submitted new claims for unemployment insurance benefits based on the new benefit period they needed. They needed two extra weeks, and more than 70 per cent were able to produce those extra weeks! I think these figures are quite interesting and need no further comment. We are doing the same thing today. We are trying to take money that is in the fund and reallocate it to programs that better reflect our needs.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I was planning to have a rather pleasant lunch with an old friend of mine at one o'clock today, but after listening to that diatribe from the hon. member opposite I am not too sure whether it will be possible to have a pleasant lunch.

As usual, that member and others on his side of the House do not address the major issue. The major issue at hand right now is what they call time allocation. It is a kind of euphemism for closure. They maintain that there is a big difference between time allocation and closure. I would submit that there is not.

When it comes to closure, what are we talking about? We are talking about chopping off a debate, lopping off your head, clapping a guillotine on your neck.

[Translation]

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Jonquière, on a point of order.

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): I may remind the hon. member who referred to the guillotine that only a few minutes ago, the opposition refused to extend the sitting of the House during lunch hour!

[English]

Mr. Harvard: I cannot imagine, Mr. Speaker, what the man was talking about. But let us get to the issue at hand.

No, it is true that this is not closure, not an instantaneous chopping off of debate. It is not like dropping the guillotine on your neck. But I would submit to you that there is really no difference because what really is time allocation? It is a limitation of debate. What is a limitation of debate? They choke you slowly. They strangle you slowly. They squeeze the air out of you. When it is all said and done, you are dead on the floor. So let us not talk about any subtle differences here. What they want to do is cut off debate.

What they have said to the Canadian people, particularly to the unemployed and the poor is: "Be damned, you do not count. We are not going to listen to you. We are not interested in your talk".

I remember a rather famous gentleman, who lived perhaps a little bit more than 100 years ago. His name was Vanderbilt. He said: "The public be damned!" It did not play well then, and it is not going to play well hearing it from this bunch in this particular century.

What are they afraid of after a measly three days of debate? Is this obstruction? Hardly. So what are they afraid of? Are they afraid of a little bit of democracy wafting into the House of Commons? It would be a terrible tragedy if we heard from the people. Would it not be terrible if the public representatives could stand up and speak on their behalf? No, they do not want that. They do not want debate. They do not want consultation. What it smacks of is repression. It is totalitarianism. It is dictatorial.

Do you know, Mr. Speaker, Pinochet would be proud of them. Honecker would be proud of them. There are all kinds of infamous people who would be proud. Another name that comes to mind is Noriega. You know these people have new champions, and they are over there. They do more than try to spoil lunch, they are trying to interfere with the business of the nation.

How many times have they invoked closure? In my opinion there is no difference between closure and time allocation. On this particular bill alone they have used closure twice—a dastardly action and they should be ashamed of themselves. In the free trade debate last December, they used it not once, not twice, not three, not four but five times. They used closure five times on the same bill. Is that an example of parliamentary democracy? Is that an example of responsible government? Not on your life!

I pulled the record having to do with closure. It is interesting, very interesting. In this century up until this government was elected, how many times was closure used? Was it 50 or 100 or a couple of hundred? If you measure the use of closure by this government, you probably would guess in the hundreds. But not true. According to my count, it is 23 times. Here you have a government using closure five times on one bill and twice on another. If you look through the record, you will see that in the Seventh Session of the Twelfth Parliament, 1917, it was not used one time. You can go through the list. In 1918 there was no closure, nor was there any in 1919, 1920, 1921, 1923, 1924, 1925, so it goes on.

Is this is a responsible government? Not on your life. The fact of the matter is though, and perhaps what is most troubling about it, is that we are not talking about some little picayune matter.

We are talking about a fundamental social program that has served Canadians well for over 40 years. We are talking about unemployment insurance. We are talking about a government that is going to decimate the program. We are talking about a government that is going to take close to $2 billion out of the fund. We are talking about a government that is going to privatize unemployment insurance. The government of the day is turning its back on the unemployment insurance program. It is turning its back on unemployed Canadians. It is turning its back on the poor of this nation. Those are the facts of the matter.

• (1250)

What do Canadians want? In the face of this major assault on this fundamental social program, what do Canadians want? They want to be heard. They want to be listened to. Do you think it is enough to put the committee on the road and visit 13 locations? All they received was 202 briefs. Of the 202 briefs, 157 were against it.

I met with a group just yesterday. That group pleaded with me and with the Official Opposition to give them more time and to give them a chance to explain to the country what this government is trying to do to this fundamental social program.

Is the government listening? Not at all. It is following the typical, right wing, oppressive agenda. It is all part of a pattern, part of privatization. You shut down VIA Rail. You shut down the post office. You shut down Air Canada. It all fits. Even this time allocation, this chopping off of debate, this approach of no debate and no consultation, fits as well.

For example, the government is intending to close down 14 military basis in the country. Did it consult? Did it approach anybody? Did it ask anybody? No, no, that would be beneath the government.

In closing, all I want to say is that we have a major program here which has been assaulted by the government. The government wants to cut it up and Canadians want to talk about it. They have not had the time. The government has to listen. Canadians have a long, long memory. This government thinks that a few more days of debate is going to be a high price. Wait until the next election; the price will be much, much higher.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand in support of this motion. Every three or four years we have an election in this country. The purpose of that election is so that the Canadian people can decide who is best suited to govern them. For the second election in a row of a majority government the people of Canada said they liked the approach, the sound economic management approach being taken by this government. They elected this government to govern. That is precisely what this government and this party are going to do.

We have heard a lot of rhetoric from the other side of this House today about the guillotine, about closure, and about cutting off debate. It seems to me it was some six months ago that these proposals were first tabled in this House. We have had six months of discussion, six months of debate and talk from all sides of this House and, indeed, from one end of this country to the other. My friends talk about the lack of an opportunity to discuss this bill. I remind them that in an unusual step we went to a legislative committee which went across the country to locations suggested, I might say, by members opposite.

We have heard at tedious length what people had to say about this bill. As my hon. friend from Burlington has pointed out, time and again, we had exactly the same brief presented to us. Now we are told that there is no opportunity to speak and to discuss this bill. It seems to me that what the people of Canada want to happen is that they want to see the government govern.

We could do as my friends opposite would like. We could discuss this bill for many, many more months and then the people of Canada would say: "We elected you to govern. Are you going to govern, or are you going to talk all day?" Then members opposite would say: "Hey, look at this government. This government does not govern. It sits around and talks all day."

This government governs. This government provides an opportunity for debate. When it is clear that members opposite are not interested in getting on with the nation's business, it uses the rules that were put in place, I might say, by the previous government which the hon. member who spoke previously now supports.

Why is it so important that we get on with this bill? It is because this bill is important to Canadians. It is part of a strategy, a strategy for the future of Canada that looks to the interest of Canadians; not one that looks back.

This government does not believe in paying people to sit home and do nothing. This government believes that Canadians are self-reliant, industrious individuals who want to prepare themselves for the 21st century. They are people who want full-time, meaningful, satisfying employment. That is why this bill is here, along with the other measures that this government has introduced.

We look to the future. We look to developing trade because through trade we have an opportunity to sell Canadian products. Through selling Canadian products, we generate wealth, economic activity and, indeed, we generate jobs for Canadians. This government does not look back. This government does not believe in building walls around the country and protecting ourselves from the world. This government believes in going out into the world and competing in the world because this government believes that Canadians are as good as any other people in this world, and we want to be a part of that.

We have confidence in Canadians. We are not afraid of Canadians and their limited ability. That is why we have put in place the Canadian Jobs Strategy along with the trade policies and the other economic policies of this government that are going to provide so much work to the benefit of this country.

That is why Canadians support this government. It is because of our sound approach to economic management. We believe that we have to have an effective unemployment insurance program as a safety net for Canadians, that the funds of that program need to be used for the benefit of Canadians.

Yet we have heard rhetoric from across the floor that Canadians are going to be disadvantaged by some of these new measures. We have heard, for example, that we should not have stiffer penalties for quitters, that this is a terrible thing. I wonder if members opposite are aware that in 1987, for example, there were over 375,000 claimants who were voluntary quitters and that this drew $1.2 billion from the unemployment insurance fund.

I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this government believes those funds can be more effectively utilized for the benefit of Canadians, to prepare them for the many high-tech jobs and other kinds of employment which are being created on a daily basis by this government. Over the last five years, 1.5 million new jobs have been created in Canada. That is an impressive record.

It is interesting to note, for example, that when the voluntary quitter provision was reduced from six to three weeks in 1971, within a year, two and a half times was the increase in the number of voluntary quitters. In 1976, when it was put back up again, the number of voluntary quitters dropped by one-third. The records and the facts speak for themselves.

Similarly we have heard a lot of talk about entrance requirements being increased. It is interesting to note that the experience of the previous government—and they have short memories over there, it seems—was that with the increased entrance requirements in 1977 they discovered a few years later that in fact, for example, in my own Atlantic region, 87 per cent of the people found the additional two weeks that were required to qualify.

We hear about the problem of seasonal workers, which ignores a very important provision that is in this bill. It is the removal of the repeater clause. Let us take my own constituency which has had difficulties because of the flagrant mismanagement of the fishery carried out by the previous government for 15 years that created—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I call it one o'clock, the hon. member will have six minutes remaining in his debate after three o'clock.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

UNITED NATIONS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, today, October 24, marks the anniversary of the founding of the United Nations.

Some 44 years ago today, the United Nations charter was signed, launching an organization that reflects mankind's desire to "save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, to establish conditions under which justice and respect for obligations arising from treaties —and international law can be maintained" and "to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom."

Since its inception, Canada has played an important role in the activities of the United Nations, including peacekeeping, membership expansion, and financial support of the many affiliated UN organizations such as the United Nations High Commission for Refugees, UNICEF, and the United Nations Environmental Program of which our distinguished Canadian, Maurice Strong, was the first executive director.

This year Canada attracts special international attention at the United Nations, having been voted to a two-year term on the United Nations Security Council.

We realize that the lessening of east-west tensions in our world is significant, but we cannot let this situation dull our UN initiatives to bring about total world peace and good order. We expect Canada to continue to be involved in peacekeeping efforts around the world and, complementary to this initiative, we encourage our government to take the historic opportunity and approve a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty at a UN conference on this matter to be held in 1990.

Mr. Speaker: I advise members that I have to interrupt statements for a moment.

THE LATE TREVOR MORGAN

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this House today to pay tribute to Mr. Trevor Morgan who served as member of Parliament for St. Catharines from 1972 to 1974. Mr. Morgan passed away last week.

Active in public life for over 30 years, Trevor Morgan served as a member of Port Dalhousie Town Council, St. Catharines City Council, and the Niagara Regional Council in addition to his tenure as member of Parliament.

Trevor was always a passionate advocate for his constituents' interests. A degenerative eye disease claimed his eyesight in the 1960s but Mr. Morgan continued his career despite his disability. He was a lawyer who was a fierce adversary in the courtroom. This is a fact to which I can personally attest.

The people of St. Catharines will miss Trevor Morgan. I wish to express their deepest sympathies to his wife, Linda, and son, Graham Trevor.

CANADA–U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am rising under the provisions of Standing Order 31 to express my outrage that another major Canadian plant has become a victim of the infamous free trade agreement.

This morning Fibreglas Canada announced reductions in its Canadian operations over the next several months. The majority of the 371 employees at the Sarnia plant will be affected by the plan and will leave the company in the second quarter of 1990. This is the second announced lay–off in the Sarnia–Lambton region that will impact on these dedicated employees, many of whom have lived in my constituency for many years and face a bleak winter of uncertainty.

The so–called rationalization of industry, brought about by the free trade agreement, has resulted in a host of mergers and a continuing exodus of jobs to the United States.

I ask the government today to intercede and stop this merger mania, re–examine the free trade agreement, and bring in a fair trade agreement which will protect Canadian workers, Canadian farmers, and stop the plundering of our resources.

CHAMBLY RIDING

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, it would seem that the Conservative Government has not lost its bad habits. We learned from our candidate in the by–election to be held in Chambly, Phil Edmonston, that the Minister of the Environment is getting read to go to the riding of Chambly next Saturday to announce another election goody, a big subsidy for the local community television station, a subsidy which the New Democratic candidate has been requesting for a long time now.

The Conservatives are not looking after the people in the riding of Chambly. They have not yet replaced their corrupt, convicted Member and they are still delaying keeping their promise to Saint–Basile to compensate for the damage caused by the PCB fire.

Mr. Speaker, when will they announce another subsidy for the Desjardins Movement to compensate for the $20 million that institution says it will lose with the GST? Mr. Speaker, it is high time for Chambly to have a real member of Parliament and that should be Phil Edmonston, an honest New Democrat of integrity!

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to salute the men and women of Canada who have embraced the spirit of entrepreneurship and have started some 750 small businesses across the country since 1984. With this in mind, two important addenda are worth mentioning.

First, these businesses have proven to be resilient. Over the past decade, more than three-quarters of all new businesses survived the crucial first year of operation. Second, between 1980 and 1985, female entrepreneurs represented more than half of these owner operated business start-ups.

We as a government recognize without hesitation that small business is the backbone of our economy. It is the greatest source of new ideas, new opportunities, new wealth, and new employment. Between 1978 and 1987, the small business sector accounted for more 80 per cent of all the net new jobs created in Canada.

Nowhere has the contribution of small business been more evident than in my riding of Sarnia—Lambton. We have been a community very reliant upon the cyclical nature of one industry, the petrochemical refining industry. Yet today, primarily through the initiatives of local men and women, small businesses have diversified the local economic base and effectively lowered the unemployment rate from an historical high in 1984 to one that is lower today than the provincial average.

In the spirit of Small Business Week, I pay tribute to both the present and the future entrepreneurs of Sarnia—Lambton and across this country.

MINES

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, after months of lobbying the Bourassa government, the efforts of Quebec's prospectors have finally paid off. The Minister of Finance of Quebec has just announced that the flow-through shares program will be improved.

Since last year, half the deduction for mining exploration expenses is allowed in calculating the cumulative net investment loss (CNIL).

Quebec Mines Minister Raymond Savoie had to make an extra effort to convince his leader Robert Bourassa and his finance minister.

For two years, Quebec's mining regions like Abitibi-Témiscamingue have been very concerned about their economy. Many junior mines have had to close while they wait for better days. In Abitibi-Témiscamingue, unemployment has risen significantly.

Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada must follow Quebec's example and also agree to eliminate CNIL on half the federal deduction for the purchase of flow-through shares.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-41 is about telecommunications. It implements the approach of the Supreme Court confirming that we have one national telecommunication telephone network that crosses provincial boundaries and clearly falls under federal authority. Its aim is to resolve the jurisdictional confusion which presently exists and to allow for a simplified regulatory framework. It is not a bill that is to set local or long distance rates. That is the mandate of the CRTC, the regulator.

The Supreme Court's ruling does not mean that western and other provincial voices will be ignored.

The minister could have deposited a more comprehensive bill, avoided the serious concerns being raised, recognized the history of social responsibility by provinces, and included the means for provincial participation on local questions of telephone service.

To alleviate concerns, first, the minister must go on record in support of universal affordable telephone service. Second, he should assure Canadians that the current situation with regard to independent telephone companies is not intended to favour any one region of Canada over any other. Third, he should reaffirm the federal jurisdiction and that it does not mean higher local telephone rates.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, in light of this being Small Business Week, I want to congratulate the Colchester, Truro, Stewiacke regional economic development task force for its initiative in planning an intermodal transport terminal and lifestyle business park for Debert, Nova Scotia.

• (1410)

To bring this project to a successful conclusion will require co-operation from all levels of government and industry including several federal departments and CN.

I urge all ministers involved to assist in all manner possible to ensure completion of this much needed intermodal park to service the area and encourage much needed employment.

CANADA POST

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, next week the House of Commons Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs begins public hearings into the operations of Canada Post. The committee will, among other things, learn how Canada Post management decisions are affecting the delivery of postal services to rural Canada.

In the meantime, Canada Post is continuing to convert and close post offices in small and medium sized communities despite public opposition.

A report from the previous standing committee called the actions of Canada Post heavy-handed but was ignored by both the corporation and the minister.

I call upon the minister responsible for Canada Post to show respect for the people of rural Canada and place a moratorium on all post office conversions and closures until the standing committee has completed its hearings, issued its report, and Parliament has had time to respond to its recommendations.

CANADIAN-SOVIET ARCTIC CO-OPERATION

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, under the auspices of the Arms Control Centre, Canadians are hosting the Canada-Soviet Conference on Canadian-Soviet Arctic Co-operation. Discussions and panellists so far have driven home the absence of Canadian policy with respect to the Arctic and to Arctic issues.

That is bad enough, but what is worse is the government's spokesmen have poured cold water on initiatives presented in a report by the panel on Arctic arms control that recommended among other things the establishment of a central Arctic demilitarized zone, a conference on Arctic security and co-operation, and the creation of an ambassador for circumpolar regions.

The government do-nothing vacillation is not a viable response to Soviet invitations for discussion and reciprocal co-operation in the region, nor is it a serious response to initiatives by expertise in the field.

I call on the government to examine thoroughly, thoughtfully, and with openness, the recommendations made by the panel on Arctic arms control and then to respond positively to invitations for peace.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the essence of the tabling of the annual Report of the Auditor General, the subsequent public scrutiny, and the follow up work has improved accountability to ensure that taxpayers' dollars are spent prudently.

This year the Auditor General tells us of real progress made in following up recommendations of previous years. His report indicates a notable improvement in accountability.

In regard to the control and accountability of Crown corporations, the Auditor General notes that our own observations support the view that vigilance and stability have characterized the Crown corporation sector in recent years. He continues:

> —the framework set out in legislation is not solely responsible for the demonstrated improvements. Strong and sustained attention by all concerned has played an important part in making this system work.

We have not yet reached perfection, but there is no question that government today is more open and more accountable than at any time before in our history.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, nearly 60,000 men and women who have lost their jobs due to the free trade deal are asking who benefited from the deal. As a matter of fact, most Canadians are asking who benefited from this free trade deal. Today we find out.

Mr. Allan Gotlieb, Canada's ambassador to the United States for the past seven years, is becoming an adviser to the Philadelphia law firm of Pepper, Hamilton and Scheetz. Since he helped negotiate the free trade deal and knows all of the elements of the free trade deal, his job will be to advise the Americans on how to take advantage of the free trade deal, probably at the expense of Canada.

When Canadians are wondering who benefited from the free trade deal, Allan Gotlieb can say: "I personally have benefited".

UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, today, on October 24, United Nations Day, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the anniversary of the founding of the United Nations Organization which is now 44 years old.

The UN officially became an organization on October 24, 1945, a successor to the League of Nations created by the Treaty of Versailles in 1919. That day marked the beginnings of an organization that reflected the hopes of the peoples of this world and their determination to maintain international peace and security; to achieve international co-operation in solving problems of an economic, social and cultural nature; to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war; to affirm their faith in fundamental human rights; and to promote social progress and better standards of living in larger freedom. That is the ultimate goal of the UN.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to take this opportunity to congratulate the recipient of the 1989 Pearson Medal for Peace, Maurice Strong, who received the award for his personal and volunteer efforts.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, the number one concern in Canada at the moment is the environment. Although the government has repeatedly claimed that this issue is at the top of its list of priorities, it has done very little to back up these claims.

The government is now being given the opportunity to do something positive about the environment by providing the expertise and financial commitment needed to extend a natural gas pipeline into the province of New Brunswick.

[Translation]

This project will enable the province to stop using coal, a source of acid rain, which is now being used in the thermal power stations that produce the province's electric power. Natural gas could also be used by large plants such as pulp and paper mills.

Mr. Speaker, if the federal Government is really serious about the environment, it should take steps as soon as possible to give the province and the companies concerned all the help they need to bring this project to fruition.

WESTERN ECONOMIC DIVERSIFICATION

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to a unique process now being developed by a local company named B.C. Chemicals, in Prince George, British Columbia.

With the assistance of both federal and provincial governments, pulp and industry waste tall oil, which is now being burnt, will be recycled to produce value added products such as resins, adhesives and stains. It can also be used to reprocess asphalt. Indeed, I am proud to say that this product is now being tested near Quesnel in my riding of Cariboo-Chilcotin. This is a good example of environmental awareness combined with good business sense.

My hat is off to western economic diversification, the Department of Forestry, the Province of British Columbia, and especially B. C. Chemicals for a fine example of western initiative.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my questions relate to the Auditor General's report which was tabled today. Indeed it was made public about 15 minutes ago.

I want to begin by asking the Minister of National Defence, or in his absence the Deputy Prime Minister, what exactly was the minister of defence doing in his role as minister responsible for emergency preparedness, when the Auditor General has stated that total confusion will reign in this country in the first hours following any natural disaster including an earthquake.

God forbid, but if there should be a major earthquake in this country, there is no agency of the government, according to the Auditor General, prepared to co-ordinate an emergency response or emergency relief measures.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister, or whomever he designates to respond, explain to the country why the minister of defence has failed to do his job?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to respond to the question of the Leader of the Opposition.

In fact, I am sure that if he read the Auditor General's report, he will have noticed that the Auditor General has said how well things have improved over the past few years in the field of emergency preparedness planning.

Indeed, with the establishment of the new legislative base and the establishment of our new agency, we are working very assiduously toward ensuring that we are well prepared for emergencies.

He specifically cites the development of a national earthquake preparedness plan as a good example of the kinds of plans that could be prepared for a variety and range of disasters which we hope would not befall us, but it is an example where we are working very closely with my home province of British Columbia. That planning is proceeding extremely well. Later this week I will be in Vancouver and will be discussing it at a workshop on emergency planning.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to the minister, who is also the member for Capilano in British Columbia—Mr. Speaker, you and I will share this interest—that indeed I have read the Auditor General's report, and here is what it states on page 587. British Columbia has been identified as a high risk region and area. "Goals and deadlines for national emergency planning by departments remain inadequately specified. We found the process for designating lead agencies for planning for emergencies to be inadequate." There has been progress but much remains to be done in the area of planning for national emergencies.

• (1420)

The Auditor General is saying that we do not have an immediate, adequate, co-ordinated response to an earthquake potential in British Columbia or anywhere else in the country, and that is what the report says.

[Translation]

My next question is directed to the Minister of Transport, since he was also mentioned in the Auditor General's Report.

Some Hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Turner (Vancourver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, since the answer given by the Minister of National Defence was quite elaborate, I believe that the Standing Orders allow me to respond.

My question is now for the Minister of Transport. Vessels carrying all kinds of goods make a total of 12,000 visits each year at Canadian ports, and more than 80 per cent of these vessels operate under foreign flags.

Today, Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General's report tells us that 93 per cent of these vessels are not inspected by the Canadian authorities, and this applies to seaworthiness, safety and transportation of dangerous goods.

Mr. Speaker, could the Minister explain to the House why the government has failed to put in place an inspection system to protect our waterways, port facilities and millions of Canadians against a potential marine disaster?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is correct when he says that the vast majority of commercial shipping activities in Canada are carried out under foreign flags and therefore not necessarily subject to the Canada Shipping Act, and we must therefore operate according to international rules.

However, I think the Leader of the Official Opposition is also aware that in the case of oil tankers, both Canadian and foreign vessels are monitored, foreign tankers on their first trip to Canada and Canadian tankers on an ongoing basis. As for other vessels, according to present international regulations we are aiming for 25 per cent. Canada has agreed to this proposal, and we are working toward that goal.

There have been enormous improvements in this respect. I agree there is still room for improvement, but once again, this is being done within the framework of international agreements, and I believe Canada has met its commitments in this respect.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General thinks we are poorly protected in an area that is clearly under federal jurisdiction.

[English]

My final question is for the Minister of the Environment. Despite repeated requests from the opposition, the minister has refused to have a public examination of the government's ability or inability to deal with chemical spills or spills of toxic substances in Canadian waters. The minister told the House that he did not need any public consultation because he was working on a plan of his own. The Auditor General has stated today that our country is in no way equipped to deal with chemical spills.

Why is it that after five years in power, when this government's priority is supposed to be the environment, when this minister was appointed to that portfolio with that priority, there is no plan in place according to the Auditor General to deal with toxic spills on either the west coast or the Atlantic coast or the Arctic coast?

Why has the Minister of the Environment failed to do his job on behalf of the people of Canada?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the main aspect of the danger signalled by the Leader of the Opposition is certainly the fact that oil spills are threatening Canada. We are all aware of this. This government is very concerned with that question. That is why we have set up two operations to provide us with recommendations to strengthen the capacity to control possible disasters.

We have an internal committee, which has been reporting to three ministers, with new rules. We have also set up a public panel review which has recently tabled an interim report and which will, in a few months, provide the government with a comprehensive report on the way to control the movement of oil through Canadian waters.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in answer to one of my questions in this House, the Deputy Prime Minister stated that he would receive any suggestions from me regarding expenditure of public funds "with a great deal of interest and gratitude" and that he would co-operate with the Auditor General.

Today, we learned that the Auditor General tried to do an audit on ministerial travel, but he could not perform it because he could not get any receipts from any ministers in this government and therefore could not do an audit of the cabinet of this country. Surely the Deputy Prime Minister does not consider this to be co-operation.

Why is the government hiding this information not only from the Auditor General but from the people of Canada? Does he not realize that this government and the cabinet ministers in the front benches are the ones who should be setting an example for all Canadians?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had read carefully the report of the Auditor General, he would find that the Auditor General is really getting to the point of accountability and openness in government.

I can assure you that this government is totally committed to accountability and openness. We have taken steps well along the lines that the Auditor General has recommended to ensure not only that the existing information is already available to members and the general public but that that existing information be enhanced and made available on a very regular basis.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I have read this section of the Auditor General's report and I sense that the Auditor General of Canada is very frustrated because this government is not forthcoming.

The Auditor General tried to get access to the letters that ministers sent to the Minister of National Defence requesting use of VIP Challenger aircraft. The letters would state where the flights would be going, the reason for the flights, and who was on board.

The act of Parliament setting up the office of the Auditor General of Canada gives the Auditor General the right to audit such government spending.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member will recognize the Chair has been very generous in terms of time. I ask him to put his question.

Mr. Hopkins: Why has the Government of Canada set itself up as being beyond the law, beyond all Canadians, that it does not have to abide by the law at a time when it expects the people of Canada to be law-abiding citizens? Where is the information?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would only like to note that the practices of this government follow a cabinet decision of 1963, a cabinet decision that was—

Mr. Kaplan: 1963, you can't go on living in the past.

Mr. de Cotret: Yes, a practice that was followed by every previous government.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, to answer the question, after reading that part of the report from the Auditor General, I asked the Comptroller General to ensure that he was in a position to make available a number of facts, on a periodic basis, dealing with ministers' expenditures. I would just like briefly to read out the list.

First of all, the total travel expenses of each minister; second, the number of times that each minister used the government aircraft; third, the date, the itinerary, and the names of all passengers on each trip in a government aircraft; fourth, the reason for use of a government aircraft; fifth, the cost of the use of the government aircraft. The Comptroller General is putting that in place.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I might point out to the President of the Treasury Board that Canadians voted for change. They did not vote to carry on the same lousy Liberal practices.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

• (1430)

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, now I have their attention. I will take out the two-by-four. My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

When the people of Canada voted in the present government, the government promised open and honest government. In the recent past we have seen a commitment to the opposite, a commitment to secrecy. The Information Commissioner has had to take the government to court to get information on budget documents. We are still waiting for the GST impact studies on the provinces. Now we find that the Auditor General is being denied the statutory right to audit ministerial travel expenses paid for out of departmental expenditures.

What does this government have to hide with respect to the minister's travel expenses? Why will the government not turn over to the Auditor General the information he required to do his job?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I believe I have already replied to that question. After reading the document from the Auditor General, we have moved in a very fast and direct manner with the Comptroller General to ensure that there is no secrecy and that all the pertinent information is made available to this House as well as to the Canadian public, both on travel and on the use of aircraft as was mentioned in the report. I believe we have done our job.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General, on page 18, had this to say: "In a time of restraint, those who spend taxpayers' dollars must be more than ever aware that they are answerable for how they spend them." This government, in times of restraint which it says we are in, is asking Canadians to tighten their belts.

Why has it failed to come clean with the Auditor General and deliver to him those receipts from ministerial travel which are paid out of departmental expenditures? Why has this government refused to do that? What is it that you have to hide? Is it that you are afraid that Canadians are going to be outraged when they see what you have spent?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, we are not refusing to provide information to this House or to Canadians in general. We are prepared, as a matter of fact, to go much further than the guidelines that were set back in 1963. We are prepared to be very accountable and very open about the expenses that this ministry is incurring.

The total travel expenses of each minister, the number of times that each minister uses the government aircraft, the date, the itinerary and the names of the passengers on each trip, the reason for the use and the cost of the government aircraft are included. I think, meets with the criteria of accountability and openness.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, a final supplementary to the Deputy Prime Minister. The Auditor General was very clear in what he requested. He requested access to receipts where ministers have followed Treasury Board's advice to retain them. The government told us that even if receipts existed, they would not be made available to us.

Canadians have not forgotten the Blais–Grenier "April in Paris" episode. Is that what this government is afraid will come out when these receipts are turned over? Will the Deputy Prime Minister take responsibility for turning over those receipts requested by the Auditor General so that we can turn on the lights on the collective Phineas Foggs over there?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, I think it is a well known fact in this House that the ministers are accountable. They are accountable to Parliament. They are accountable to the people. We are providing all the information that is required for parliamentarians or the general public to make a judgment on how we are dealing with the affairs of state.

We want to be open, we want to be accountable and we have taken the steps to do just that.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the government's refusal to provide information to the Auditor General concerning ministers' travel expenditures.

Given that in May, 1985, the government provided to Southam News information regarding the travel escapades of one Suzanne Blais–Grenier in great detail and given that in October, 1986, the government provided information to The Globe and Mail concerning the travels of the Prime Minister to Asia, why is the government refusing to provide to the Auditor General now what it provided to others in the past? Is it because those previous travels have so much embarrassed the government that it now refuses to provide that information to the public? Is that the real reason?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we are saying that we will provide on a regular basis the total travel expenses of each minister, the number of times he takes an aircraft, where he is going, who he is going with, his itinerary, the reason for the use of the aircraft and the cost of the government aircraft. I ask my hon. colleague what more does he want? All the information will be there.

[Translation]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the President of the Treasury Board who just asked me, what more did I want. I will tell him what I want. The Auditor General of Canada says in his report: The government wrote to me, stating that even where receipts had been kept, they would not be provided to my office. What I want to know from the Prime Minister and the Minister is this: Is he prepared to table these receipts in the House in the next ten days? Yes or no?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, my answer is simply that we are prepared, with the help of the Comptroller General, to table in the House or make available to anyone who so requests, the travel expenses of all ministers, minister by minister. This information will be available on a regular basis. It will be up to my colleagues opposite and to the Canadian people to judge what the government's ministers are doing. The situation is entirely normal and can be checked.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The Auditor General's report tabled today outlines a crisis of confidence in the safety of Canada's marine industry. Given that of the 41,000 vessels that ply Canadian waters, only 4,000 undergo regular inspections and in the case of our thousands of fishing vessels "usually only following a reported accident", quoting the document, I ask the minister how could he allow this dangerous situation to develop? What action is he prepared to take today to correct this incredible blunder?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I answered the same question earlier when it was put by the Leader of the Opposition. Once again, the vast majority of vessels operating in Canadian waters do so under foreign flags and are, as a result, subject to international agreements signed by Canada. As for vessels operating under the Canadian flag, I repeat that all oil tankers are monitored: 25 per cent, which is an objective that has been set internationally. We are striving towards that goal at the present time. The necessary steps have been taken. But once again, the Canadian Coast Guard and Transport Canada's Marine Group are constantly trying to improve the situation, concentrating on both the technological and the operational aspects. Once again, the Auditor General has mentioned a number of potential situations to which the Government is trying to respond, and it will continue to do so.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, the minister may not care about his fishermen and his men and women who serve in the merchant marine, but surely to goodness he cares about the 20 million Canadians who rely on ferry service on our east and west coasts.

In his report today, the Auditor General expressed genuine concern for the safety of these vessels and specifically, the lack of detailed risk management plans and the incredible practice of pre-arranged annual safety inspections. Will the minister allocate today the resources necessary to correct this terrible situation, or is he prepared to sit idly by until there is a disaster and a real loss of life?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I believe the concerns of my friend are real in the sense that there is a potential. At the same time, I would like to say to my friend that the Department of Transport, through the marine sector and the coast guard, is constantly looking at the regulations. We improve the regulations and we always provide the necessary resources to achieve the goals we have. But that will be done in light of the report of the Auditor General.

I am really delighted to say that the Canadian coast guard has a very good reputation in terms of the way it deals with regulations and it will continue to do so.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. On page 473 of the Auditor General's report he notes that a foreign vessel carrying dangerous goods could enter Canadian waters in the maritimes, not call at any Canadian port, and proceed all the way through the St. Lawrence Seaway into the Great Lakes with little chance of being subjected to an inspection to ensure that it met international ship safety requirements. Earlier on the previous page it points out that about 7 to 8 per cent of foreign vessels were, in fact, inspected.

Is the government prepared to provide the necessary people and dollars to ensure that foreign ships that may be carrying dangerous cargoes, not necessarily petroleum, but dangerous cargoes, can be inspected prior to proceeding into and through Canadian waters? Will the Minister give us that assurance?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that question twice. I said that under the international transportation rules, we are trying to determine a target of 25 per cent. It is true that at the present time it is about 7 or 8 per cent. But we signed the agreement, we accept the rule, and we are moving toward that direction. I can give the guarantee that that is exactly what we are doing. It is not a question of resources. It is a question of international agreement, and that is what we respect.

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the members' attention the presence in the gallery of a parliamentary delegation from the United Kingdom, led by Marion Roe, Member of Parliament.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, in response to the minister's comments, I should point out that on the same page, the Auditor General states that the coast guard does not have an over-all plan for meeting the goal of the European Port State Control Agreement to inspect 25 per cent of foreign vessels.

So the minister is saying one thing, the Auditor General is saying another. I want to know when the government will finally put its money where its mouth has been for a number of years and really do something to protect the Canadian environment, to protect that very important ecological system in the Great Lakes–St. Lawrence Seaway.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I repeat again, it has already been done. We are on the way to try to reach that goal of 25 per cent. Of course, we want to do so. We will provide the resources to reach that goal. But, once again, I said we are trying to determine exactly what resources we need to reach that purpose. It cannot be done in one day. We understand the report of the Auditor General.

Once again I repeat that Canada has one of the best records in terms of environmental protection.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment.

First I would like to congratulate the Minister of the Environment on the leadership he has shown at the conference in Charlottetown with his provincial counterparts, where we introduced some major environmental initiatives for this country.

My question concerns the agreement reached by the Minister and his provincial counterparts on $200 million to be spent on the clean-up of abandoned contaminated sites across the country.

First of all, I would like to ask the Minister who is going to decide which sites in Québec will benefit under this agreement. Second, I want to ask the Minister whether I can count on his support for a region like Abitibi—Témiscamingue, which has a record number of abandoned contaminated sites because of its mine tailings, a major source of pollution,— for having our region considered when the sites are selected.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say we concluded an agreement with the provincial governments for setting up a clean-up fund for contaminated sites in Canada.

As for the Hon. Member's question, a number of criteria are now being defined for selecting the sites where clean-up operations will take place.

These criteria will be established jointly with the provinces and will subsequently be applied in such a way as to achieve a fair apportionment of clean-up funds. I will certainly bear in mind the Hon. Member's concerns.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, according to the Auditor General's Report which has just been tabled, 93 per cent of merchant vessels are not subject to safety inspections, nor is their cargo.

A vessel that is not inspected, that is unsafe and carrying toxic products or even nuclear waste, for instance, might cause an accident of catastrophic proportions in the locks of the St. Lawrence.

How can the Minister of Transport justify his failure to take action, thereby exposing the environment and especially Canadian lives to potentially catastrophic accidents on the Great Lakes or the St. Lawrence?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will have to repeat in French what I said in English.

I said earlier that most goods are carried by vessels operating under foreign flags which are not subject to the Canada Shipping Act. We therefore have an international agreement under which we are committed to reaching a goal of 25 per cent. I am committed not only to following the recommendations of the Auditor General but also to applying international regulations.

That is exactly what we are doing. I disagree with the hon. member when he refers to a potential accident, since we probably have one of the best records in the world on environmental protection, especially when we realize, Mr. Speaker, that 100 per cent of all oil tankers are inspected on their first visit to Canada every year.

In this perspective, I think that Canada is doing its job, and especially the Department of Transport.

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, I find the minister's answer unacceptable. Seven per cent or even 25 per cent inspected is not enough.

Of the 7 or 8 per cent of the vessels that are inspected, too many have been judged to be unsafe. How can the Minister allow Canadian lives to be endangered by failing to increase the number of inspections of merchant ships?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member answered his own question, since we have said many times that the Government's objective was to achieve a goal of 25 per cent, considering, once again, that we are subject to international laws and international agreements in this respect, and that the agreement provides that 25 per cent of vessels carrying goods other than oil—since in the case of oil, we monitor 100 per cent of the tankers.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, whatever the language and whoever is asking the question, the answer is the same.

[English]

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. The Auditor General has estimated that the number of taxpayers under GST will increase thirteenfold from 75,000 to well over one million. He also said this morning that he felt the government would be incapable of handling the increased workload in administration of the GST in a way that is fair to small business.

Will the minister acknowledge the Auditor General's statements that the government will be unable to administer the tax and will he not agree to scrap this tax proposal and come back with a more fair and workable tax?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the reason that this government is moving to a more efficient and fair tax is precisely for the reasons described by the Auditor General. As the hon. member knows, the existing federal sales tax has some 22,000 different provisions and exemptions which are just totally unacceptable and cannot be dealt with effectively. That is why we are moving to more a effective, more efficient and fairer tax system.

I can assure the hon. member that through new technology, through innovative methods, new systems and consultation with the public sector, particularly the small business community, this is going to improve not only the administration but the tax system as a whole for all Canadians.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, the minister should know that you do not replace a bad tax with a worse tax. The minister has stated that he thinks that the tax will work. He thinks he can hire more tax investigators; he thinks he can train them and he thinks he can train small business to understand the tax. Is the minister not aware that if he is wrong it is small businesses in Canada that will bear the brunt of his mistakes? Will the minister assure Canadians and assure small business that they will not be stuck holding the bag for this government's lack of planning on this issue?

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that we are not re-inventing the wheel. There are some 48 countries around the world with a value added tax in the form of a GST which has been working effectively and fairly for the populations of those countries and which has given those producers and manufacturers a greater competitive edge over ours.

That is the reason why we are moving to a better system, to create more competitive opportunities for small, medium and large businesses in this country and to make the system fair in working toward deficit reduction. All of the consulting, the advice, the assistance, the help and the planning that we are undertaking is to help small businesses in all industries prepare for a smooth launch and a smooth transition for their benefit and for the benefit of all Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, today the Canada Assistance Program was also reviewed in the Auditor General's report, and I quote from Chapter 15 of the report: "Although our audit focused on the federal administration of CAP, we did become aware of some instances of apparent non-compliance by provinces with the CAP Act. We found nothing to indicate how these instances were considered to be in compliance with the act and the stated federal objectives of the CAP".

The Auditor General also pointed out the insufficient information available regarding this program.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to paraphrase what the Auditor General said and put her question.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would the minister tell the House why there has been no annual report for this program, as required by law, since this government came to power in 1984? Is that what the government considers to be open?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to start by thanking the Auditor General for his findings and for the advice that he has given us with regard to CAP.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Three cheers for the Auditor General.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, from my perspective in Health and Welfare, we welcome any suggestions made by the Auditor General, or even from hon. members opposite if they have suggestions for improvement to CAP and for any other program.

It is our determination to make sure that all expenditures under CAP are fully documented, fully audited by the federal government and we will ensure as well that all annual reports which are due are tabled in Parliament.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, does that mean that maybe by 1995, we will get the 1984 report?

If the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare were interested in the kind of suggestions that the opposition have regarding CAP, then he would indeed lift his finger when we ask him to provide us with the information we require regarding CAP and the provinces. When will the minister do that?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the opposition just cannot live with good news. That is the difficulty here.

As I have indicated, we are determined in National Health and Welfare to ensure that we can take every possible measure to ensure that every dollar transferred under CAP is properly audited and accounted for by provinces. Second, we will ensure that Parliament has made available to it all information to which it is entitled. We will do so on a timely basis too, Mr. Speaker.

TOBACCO PRODUCTS

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Now that he has the report from the Royal Society of Canada that does confirm what every smoker has said, that cigarette smoking is addictive, could he tell us just when we might expect the Government of Canada to look for these tougher laws regarding the advertising of tobacco products, specifically, that they are a hazard to health and, second, the addictive nature of tobacco products?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the government has indicated that we are anticipating having another round of regulations with regard to warnings on tobacco packages soon. The Royal Society's report has been closely studied within my department. It is a very, very helpful report for us. It strengthens our hand significantly with regard to giving these warnings to the public. The recommendations that we will make will draw heavily upon that report.

PAY EQUITY

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in 1987, a Human Rights Tribunal awarded federal hospital workers $28 million, the largest pay equity settlement in the history of the public service. Twenty–seven months later, 1,400 employees, mostly women, are still not getting the pay they deserve. They already live on wages at or below the poverty line and cannot afford to do without the extra $3,000 a year they are entitled to.

My question is for the President of the Treasury Board. What is the minister doing to correct this deplorable situation to give these workers the fair pay they are earning?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, retroactive pay adjustments totalling $28 million for the period September, 1980, to July, 1987, have already been implemented. For the retroactive period of adjustment, from September, 1980, to July, 1987, the Treasury Board Secretariat has re–evaluated positions at level one and those of seamstresses and community health representatives. It has issued a personnel management bulletin.

There is still yet some work to be done on some of the outstanding issues, but I believe that we have already made significant progress in implementing that decision.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, excuses and words do not put food on the table or shoes on children's feet.

I can only quote the annual report of the Human Rights Commission which said: "Either the government means business on equal pay or it does not". Obviously it does not.

Will the minister live up to his words, or does the Human Rights Commission have to order the Government of Canada to set a good example to other Canadian employers?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to assure my hon. colleague opposite that we do mean business on equal pay for work of equal value and that is why we set up the joint union management initiative to try to get to the crux of this matter.

Now the hon. member says that we do not mean business. I have just said that phase one of the order was already completed and $28 million is quite a bit of money.

The second phase, I must say, is already completed but the second phase is also subject to final approval by the tribunal and that is where we are at.

The third phase is well in progress, well in hand, and we are advancing with it very quickly.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE DRESS CODE

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the issue of the RCMP dress code.

Over a year and a half ago the commissioner of the RCMP, Mr. Norman Inkster, recommended that the dress code be amended to allow Sikh members to wear their turbans and ceremonial daggers. For some inexplicable reason, the government has dithered over the last 20 months on this issue.

I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether he is prepared to show some progressive leadership today and adopt the recommendation of the commissioner of the RCMP to ensure full equality for all Canadians?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General is reviewing this matter with the RCMP and expects to be able to review the matter fully and come up with a solution in the very near future.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, that is nonsense. The RCMP has already made a recommendation.

This issue is the true test of tolerance, understanding, and this government's commitment to the issue of equality for all Canadians. By delaying the decision, this government is fanning the flames of intolerance and discrimination.

So I put the question to the government again. Will it show some leadership, if it is truly committed to the issue of equality, and adopt the recommendation of the commissioner of the RCMP to allow Sikhs to join the force?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that the Solicitor General is reviewing this matter and that he will be coming down with a final decision in the very near future.

An Hon. Member: What's the problem?

Mr. Lewis: Well, the problem is in that party where that particular member cannot get together with the rest of his members on multiculturalism.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the public accounts were tabled in the House. On page 115 of the public accounts, third edition, dealing with Canada Post Corporation, it indicates that the leasing requirements for Canada Post over the next four years will decrease by about 65 per cent. Those leases by Canada Post are primarily for rural post offices in Public Works buildings.

My question is perhaps directed to the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of both the Minister of Public Works and the minister responsible for the post office. Is Public Works doing the dirty work for Canada Post and conspiring with Canada Post to get out of rural Canada?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Mr. Speaker, absolutely not.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Given that rural post offices are continuing to close across Canada, and given that the standing committee of this House is presently looking at the operations of Canada Post, in particular those dealing with rural Canada, I am wondering if the Deputy Prime Minister will make a commitment on behalf of the government to put a moratorium on the closing and conversions of small post offices until this committee has reported to the house.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, they are a talented bunch. I can tell the hon. member that the buildings that he refers to are ones that are extremely antiquated and are not serving any useful purpose at the present time. Public Works has given notice to vacate a number of those buildings, but will not do anything with those buildings until it has consulted with the local communities and interested groups in those communities.

PRIVILEGE

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises from the report of the Auditor General and questions which I raised in the House today.

It is quite clear that the Auditor General, under Section 5 of the Auditor General Act, has the statutory right to audit departmental expenditures and ministerial travel expenses that are part of the departmental expenditures. The point of my privilege is that the government is not providing information about departmental expenses. In fact, the Auditor General points out on page 136, chapter 6.16:

> We also pointed out in Guidelines Treasury Board had advised that "Even though Ministers do not have to provide receipts and supporting documentation, it would be prudent to maintain such information in Ministers' offices for audit purposes."

The government wrote back to the Auditor General on August 17, 1989 and it stated:

> Minister's offices have indeed been advised that it would be prudent to maintain their receipts for travel expenses. The rationale for that advice is based on the fact that Ministers are accountable to the House of Commons and would want to be in a position to respond, in the event that questions were raised in the House.

The Auditor General is an officer of Parliament and parliamentarians depend on the analysis and audit that he does of departmental expenditures which are part and parcel of the Financial Administration Act. Those are all out of general revenues. Therefore, if members of Parliament are going to be able to ask the proper questions as they relate to ministerial expenditures from the department, then we have to have the proper information.

The government has refused to provide the Auditor General, an officer of Parliament, with the appropriate receipts, so that we as members of Parliament can do our job.

I am proposing, Sir, that my privileges and the privileges of all members in this House are abrogated when the minister and the government refuse to turn over to the Auditor General that very important and vital information for us to do our jobs here. I am prepared, Mr. Speaker, if you find that there is prima facie evidence of privilege, to move the appropriate motion.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak in support of the question of privilege just raised by my hon. friend. Indeed the privileges of all the members of the House are affected by this issue. The Auditor General is an officer of Parliament. He has a statutory duty to perform the auditing function. Anyone knows that auditing cannot be done without full access by the auditor to all receipts that are in question.

In this case, the ministers of the Crown have a duty to comply with the law. They have a duty to provide for the Auditor General documents and material within their possession which he requires to perform his statutory function. Members in this place have a responsibility to inquire into the performance by the ministers of the Crown of their duties. The ministers are preventing the Auditor General from doing his function by withholding receipts.

I hear my hon. friends rely on a practice which they allege existed back in 1963. I do not think that that is relevant. I think that we are entitled to have the ministers comply with the law, whatever practices they may allege have existed in the past. I do not concede the arguments that they have made.

It may well be that the point has never been raised before, but that should not deter you, Mr. Speaker, from finding within the duties of this chamber a responsibility by ministers to comply with the law, so that the Auditor General, an officer of this place, can perform his full duties.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nickel Belt has raised a matter of which he complains. The hon. member for York Centre has supported him in that complaint. I have listened carefully to the arguments. There may well be another place in which the argument can be continued. It may be inside this chamber or it maybe outside, but I find that certainly there is not a question of privilege.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-21

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis:

That, in relation to Bill C-21, an Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, not more than one further sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of the report stage, and two sitting days to the consideration of the third reading stage of the Bill; and

That, fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for Government Business on the day allotted to report stage consideration and on the second day allotted to the third reading stage consideration of the said Bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this Order and, in turn, every question necessary in order to dispose of the stage of the Bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When the House rose at one o'clock, the hon. member for South Shore had the floor and he has three minutes remaining in his time for debate.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in that case, I will speak twice as fast and get in all my remarks.

I do have two or three further comments that I wish to make in support of this very important motion which is intended to enable the Government of Canada to get on with the business of Canadians in facilitating opportunities for unemployed Canadians.

I was making the point that there has been a lot of discussion about the impact of these changes on, for example, fish plant workers in Atlantic Canada. Some suggestions have been made that the increase in the entrance requirements may negatively impact seasonal workers such as fish plant workers.

I think it is important for all members of the House to study the bill carefully. For example, my own constituency falls in two unemployment regions, the Yarmouth region and the Kings region. In the Yarmouth region at the current unemployment rate, there would in fact be an increase of six weeks in the qualification period. Similarly, there would be in the area of Kings. However, what my hon. friends neglect to mention or have overlooked is that the removal of the repeater clause means that the six-week penalty that is now applied to those plant workers will come away, and the amount of time required to qualify for UI will be precisely the same. In areas where the rate is lower, in fact, people will benefit even more so.

Once again, what we have is a clear illustration that what this government seeks to do is to protect people who may be unemployed while at the same time investing Canadian tax dollars effectively to the benefit of Canadians. The labour force development strategy is going to be the basis whereby $1.2 billion will be invested in Canadians, in creating opportunities for unemployed Canadians to find themselves full-time, permanent employment in the Canadian workplace.

Let me give two brief illustrations. This morning, one of the members opposite made reference to the town of Lockeport. Under this proposal, an additional $15 million will go into the industrial adjustment service, which means that towns like Lockeport are benefiting from that service and towns like Port Mouton will hopefully soon benefit from that service when they can get themselves an agreement.

The Government of Canada has already been there working with them to put an agreement into place to enable those one industry towns to adjust to the changes that are the result of the fishing situation in Atlantic Canada. Similarly, $50 million in additional money will go into the Community Futures Program. I look forward to those $50 million making it possible for the county of Shelburne which has had such a difficult time with the downturn in the fishing industry to get into the Community Futures Program. That is why these changes are important.

Beyond that, we are going to see the human resource development planning, $65 million in additional money, entry level skills development—

Some Hon. Members: Oh,oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Gentlemen, Question Period is over, this is debate. I recognize the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence on a point of order.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hear the hon. member mention all these fabulous programs that are going to take place in the nether—nether land and I thought it would be instructive for this House to understand exactly what has happened in that regard, because I have before me statistics given by—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is debate. The hon. member has 30 seconds left.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend can get in line if he wishes to speak. The important point to be made, and I will conclude on this point, is that Canadians want us to get on with the business of Canada. That is what this government is going to do. That is why it is important that we support this time allocation motion wherein we take advantage of the rules put in place by the previous government.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it is going to be very difficult to be heard properly after the volume of the previous speaker.

I will start my remarks by saying that this morning, the Minister of Justice opened his remarks on the government's railroading of the UI bill with smirks and sad attempts at humour. There is nothing humorous about putting off legitimate debate, or worse, shutting down debate on Bill C-21. He said he was going to drag the Liberals, kicking and screaming, into the 21st century. Well, I would like to suggest to this House that if this is what is in store for us in the 21st century, I fear for Canada.

The government has displayed once again that it has total contempt for the parliamentary process. It has already invoked closure on the second reading of this legislation. The government rushed into public hearings. It gave one month's notice in the middle of summer to community groups, unions and employers groups to prepare for and present briefs to the legislative committee. Had the opposition members on the committee not fought over this and fought for the people who were going to put submissions forward, the government was only prepared initially to give two weeks notice to people who were being asked to present briefs.

The hon. member for Burlington, when he was criticizing the speeches on this side of the House today, said: "You were not there and you did not read the transcripts". Well, Mr. Speaker, I was there; I read the transcripts and I know, indeed, that all the way through the process, the government side pushed, cut us off and was rude to people who presented briefs. We have documented letters outlining that rudeness. The transcripts show that rudeness. I would suggest that today is another example of absolute, total contempt for Parliament.

The minister who attended the committee hearings gave us one hour to voice our concerns about the legislation. When she agreed, because we felt that we had more questions than we were able to cover in an hour, to extend her time, the government members voted against it and said no, we could not have extra time with the minister even though she was willing to spend the time with us. Now I have to say that we have not seen a lot of her since in terms of her interest in this legislation or this debate. I would suggest that Canadians deserve better than this.

The members across the way have made reference to the presentations from unions and from other national bodies. I think one hon. member, before lunch, referred to it as a blueprint from across the country. I do not know if it has ever occurred to the government side of the House or to that hon. member that people across this land were telling the committee the same things because the legislation is equally bad no matter where you go in this country. Whether you go to a city, a rural community, a small town or the workplace, this legislation is not good for Canadians.

Conversely, I heard very little comment about the few briefs we heard in favour of the legislation. In fact, those few briefs were all over the map because they could not seem to agree about what was good about the legislation. At least people who opposed it understood and were agreed as to what was wrong with it.

I would like to make some references as to why it is so important that Canadians have the opportunity to have this legislation thoroughly debated in the House. In British Columbia, the province I come from, 48,000 people will see benefits reduced at an average of five and a half weeks; 3,000 will not qualify to receive benefits. Training programs will not be available to those who have not spent a long time in the workforce.

In Canada, independent studies show 130,000 Canadians will be cut off benefits. The government says only 30,000 will be affected. Well, 157 of 202 groups told us that many, many more people than those suggested by the government figures would be cut off.

We had in this House 48 hours of debate on the refugee bill. We had 53 hours of debate on the drug patent act. This government suggests that 30 hours of debate on unemployment insurance amendments is enough. Yet this legislation will directly or indirectly affect every man, woman and child who works in this country.

Still, with all of this evidence that was presented to us and all of the evidence that has been presented today in the House, we find the media has paid very little attention to this legislation. I suggest that the government should not be lulled by this. Every Canadian who is directly affected, and even those not directly affected, knows how bad this legislation is and they will remember. What will make them remember is when this legislation goes in effect, they will feel it every time their workplaces are threatened, every time their jobs are threatened and every time their families' jobs are threatened.

I would like to suggest that first the government attempted to muzzle Canadians and now it is muzzling Parliament. I say again that this government is showing absolute and total contempt for Parliament.

Because I am so outraged at that, and maybe it is because I have been here just under a year, I would like to move an amendment.

• (1520)

I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting the words "two sitting days to the consideration of the third reading stage" and replacing them with "200 sitting days to the consideration of the third reading stage".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will verify the motion. We will go on with debate with the hon. member for Laurentides.

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the opposition of a few facts. The labour force development strategy tabled in April, 1989, made clear that the UI system was going to be improved. Back in April, 1989, people were already talking about these, changes. The leaders of the opposition were asking questions about it in the House as far back April, 1989.

Then there was the production of Bill C–21 in June, 1989, which led to more questions in the House. The bill was debated at second reading and approved in principle. The next stage was the legislative committee.

As all members know, it is normal for a legislative committee to be small and to do its business in Ottawa. This legislative committee on Bill C–21 which was formed at the end of June, 1989, travelled and was increased in size. I was a member of that legislative committee.

We travelled from Vancouver, British Columbia, to St. John's, Newfoundland. We stopped in every province of Canada. We heard witnesses in every province. We heard witness for three weeks in Vancouver, British Columbia; Edmonton, Alberta; Saskatoon, Saskatchewan and Winnipeg, Manitoba. In Ontario the committee held hearings in Toronto and Sudbury. In Quebec, the same committee held hearings in Montreal and Jonquière. In New Brunswick, the committee sat in Moncton. In Prince Edward Island, the committee sat in Charlottetown; in Nova Scotia, in Halifax; in Newfoundland, in St. John's, plus a week in Ottawa after these travels.

Because we were not able to go to the territories, representatives of the territories were invited to come to some of the provinces. We heard the minister and her officials. We studied the bill clause by clause. Last week, we began the report stage.

We are debating a motion to allocate time for further consideration of Bill C–21. Members opposite say they were not given enough time for consideration of this bill. As I have just explained, this bill has been under consideration since June, 1989, and the policies underlying it two months before that.

What is the opposition doing now? Today opposition members turned down the opportunity to sit through lunch. Last week, on the first day of report stage, they turned down the opportunity to sit through lunch. They wanted nothing to do with the idea of extended hours.

Recently, one of the senior members of the New Democratic Party was quoted in a Toronto newspaper as saying that his party would refuse to agree to the scheduling of House time for the remaining stages of Bill C–21. It could not be more evident that opposition claims of shutting off debate are unfounded.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we are in the first stages of a national plan to achieve a fundamental economic goal, which is to use our human resources more wisely. This plan became official last April, when the Minister of Employment and Immigration outlined the new labour force development strategy, a set of measures to make our country more competitive by improving the way it uses the skills and energies of Canadians.

So far, the Canadian labour market has failed to deploy sufficient efforts to upgrade human resources. The new strategy is therefore a battle against waste, and to wage this battle, we intend to use, through Bill C–21, the resources of our unemployment insurance system and make it a tool for training and development.

Waste occurs at practically all levels in the labour market, including entrance levels. Too many young Canadians lack the necessary basic skills to obtain their first job, while the national average drop out rate is 30 per cent. We are about to enter the 90s, a decade during which, according to all the forecasts, most new jobs will require a grade 12 education.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the areas of education and training are complex and are dependent on provincial governments, regional labour market requirements and constantly changing qualifications. The government is not the sole agency responsible for training a highly qualified and educated labour force, but it can act as a catalyst. Thanks to the labour force development strategy, we now have a framework for co–operation that will be able to draw on the contributions of educators, the provinces, unions, employers and all Canadians, as never before.

Within the framework of this strategy, we are adding $100 million for training new workers, to the $485.4 million we are already spending in this area at the present time.

These measures, and others in which the private sector will play a major role, are aimed at improving our competitive position generally, but we will not succeed as long as Canadians are unable to find work because they lack the requisite skills.

Under Section 26 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, we can provide training for people who are unemployed. At the present time, we are spending only $350 million of the $13 billion in the UI fund on this option. We intend to raise this amount to $700 million. In this case, plans provide for direct participation by business and unions in promoting and managing training programs. We intend to support and facilitate their activities in this respect.

We also intend to spend $150 million on programs for people who find it particularly difficult to re–enter the labour market, including welfare recipients and older workers who are 45 or over.

Mr. Speaker, speaking of older workers, I would like to address another measure that seems particularly relevant in Canada today. Any program or practice aimed at preventing a Canadian who is able to work from doing so only because of his age is a waste of manpower. And that is the case with our system present UI system.

As soon as Canadians reach the age of 65, whatever their skills or ambitions may be, they fall into a trap: they no longer have the right to contribute to the unemployment insurance plan or receive benefits. The changes we are proposing will also entitle older Canadians to unemployment insurance benefits as long as they wish to work.

This measure, Mr. Speaker, and other measures provided under Bill C–21 will make it possible to take a new and intelligent approach to unemployment insurance, an approach that will make the system more relevant and will provide for an increased focus on training, a focus that is well overdue.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to express at the outset, my revulsion at the procedure that this government has adopted in proceeding with closure at this stage on this bill. Frankly, it is one of the most shocking—the minister laughs. All this government has done is sit around and laugh while it throttles the rights of Parliament. I say this is another example of that throttling, of that improper activity. I want to point out some of the shortcomings of the government in its dealings in this respect, because they have been legion since the election last November.

The statement I would like to read first is one of the government's former Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Erik Nielsen. I have his book here, in case members want to hear from that. The hon. member for Yukon, as he then was, on December 11, 1964, at page 11059 of Hansard, said:

> The procedure of closure has been repugnant to the sense of fair play of the Canadian people. My own personal view is that never in parliamentary debate should there be a muzzling of free debate.

He went on, at page 11061, on the same date, to say:

> There is something else I will vote against when the time comes to do so, and that is the imposition of closure in the House of Commons. I will vote against the gagging and throttling of parliamentary debate, because that is what is happening.

Those are the words of the government's former Deputy Prime Minister, a former colleague. He would be ashamed, thoroughly ashamed, to witness the spectacle that is going on on the other side of this House today. His book, that great litany of delight, which has such a wonderful appendix in it, is something I would commend for reading to hon. members opposite. They might find it helpful, as they review their future careers in this House, to look at their past record as assessed by the former Deputy Prime Minister.

Having looked at what he said, how can this government square what it is doing today with the example set by Mr. Nielsen and, indeed, by all their leaders in the past? The use of closure by this government has exceeded all past known records. Never has a Parliament in Canadian history had closure applied as frequently as this Parliament has done already, and we have only been sitting for 10 or 11 months, in theory, but in practice the sittings have been much less than that.

Let us review the number of times it has been used. Last December the government used it to suspend the rules of the House so it could ram through the free trade bill. Then the Tories used it three times on the free trade bill, the first time since 1956 that closure had been so abused. It is a shocking example. Three times it was used on that bill. They got it through in the minimum amount of time in this House by using closure at every stage at the earliest possible opportunity.

You would think that having done it once, the Conservative members would give up and say: "Okay, we have abused our position, perhaps, once. We had some justification in the previous Parliament." But let us look at the record.

The government called us back after three months off; January, February and March. We were called back for April, May and June, and by June the government was using closure again, because it said we were not passing its bills quickly enough.

If the bills are not going through fast enough to satisfy this bunch, I suggest they should have had us here in January, February and March when we could have discussed them. But government members said, "No, we don't need Parliament around. Parliament is something we don't want to hear from. Parliament damages our reputation. Parliament tarnishes the reputation of this government in the eyes of the public because they see how bad we are." That is their attitude and they should think that way because they are dreadful. This bill is dreadful and I will deal with its merits in a moment.

That is not all. We had closure applied three times in June; on the bill on plant breeders' rights, on this bill at second reading and on the excise tax amendment. Then we had notice given on Bill C–36 in October. We had notice given on the income tax bill, Bill C–28, the other day. Now we have a gagging order, under a different rule admittedly, but a gagging order. This is the first time this has been used in our Parliament but it is the same principle. It is an attempt to gag debate, to throttle the rights of this House to have open and free discussion of the government's legislative proposals. I say to the ministers opposite that they should be ashamed.

Let's look at the record of this bill itself. The bill was read for the first time on June 1 of this year. It was debated at second reading on June 6, and again on June 7 and June 21. Let's see how long it was discussed on each of those occasions. On June 6 it was discussed one hour and 40 minutes. On June 7, two hours and 40 minutes; and on June 21, the day the government applied closure at the second reading stage, nine hours and one minute.

That is the total length of time spent on second reading. The Tories rammed the bill through at second reading and then they adjourned the House for the summer. That is how urgent they regarded this thing. They said, "Oh well, we can adjourn the House for an extra two weeks in September because we don't need to have everybody back on this. It is not urgent." Now, all of a sudden it is urgent, they have to have this bill through tomorrow.

We have had only one day of debate at report stage. Look at the Order Paper. There are 43 amendments set down to discuss at report stage on this bill. Obviously it is highly contentious. As well are a lot of problems with this bill. Every speaker has said so. The government closes its ears and says, "We are not going to listen to that. We don't want the Canadian people to hear that. We are going to cut off debate in this House so they can't hear it." It is a disgraceful way to run a Parliament.

The responsibility for running this House rests over there. It is the government that controls the agenda in here. Everyone knows that, and it is ramming the bill through this House and not giving the members of the opposition a decent opportunity to make the points that they should be making against this dreadful bill.

Let me turn to some of the comments that have been made about Bill C–21. This Unemployment Insurance Act affects one of the premier social programs in Canada. It is a huge expense, about $13 billion as I understand it. That is a very significant social program in Canada and these changes are significant. They are major changes. They have been denounced by almost every group who appeared before the committee condemning these changes. Yet this government sits here and says, "We don't want to discuss it any more. One day in committee stage is more than enough. Canadians are hearing too many bad things about our policies. We don't want to discuss it any more."

Listen to what the Canadian Council on Social Development had to say about Bill C–21. Let's listen to some of the criticism it has made of this bill and see why the government is so reluctant to have it discussed. I think these reasons betray the justification that the government claims for using closure. It indicates that the government does not want to hear these criticisms. Let me read some of them into the record.

In a recent communique released October 2, subsequent to its presentation to the committee, the Canadian Council on Social Development said this:

> Low–income workers will be disproportionately affected by the cutbacks: 80 per cent of those affected will have incomes under $25,000 a year, according to calculations by Global Economics Ltd.
> The main disincentive to work is not UI benefits, but low wages. Most jobs available to UI recipients are at, or scarcely above, the minimum wage. A worker making the $4.00 federal minimum wage today, earns an annual income of $8,320. The average provincial minimum wage in 1986 supported a worker with dependent spouse and child at only 48 per cent of the Statistics Canada poverty line. The solution is to improve wages, not lower UI benefits.
> The proposed financing arrangements are regressive. Low income workers pay a larger percentage of their total earnings into UI premiums than do higher–income workers. Likewise, smaller employers pay proportionately more than do large employers. By funding labour adjustment programs from changes to UI, the government is shifting the burden from general taxation onto employers and workers, and more so onto those at lower income levels. Since a two–earner family with two children living on $20,000 a year will—as a result of this government's policies—be paying $1,424 more in income and sales tax in 1990 than in 1984 (according to CCSD calculations), low–income Canadians can ill afford the further burden of UI changes.

That is the statement by the respected Canadian Council on Social Development. Those are the criticisms that it levels against this bill.

• (1540)

The hon. member for Burlington shakes his head. He knows perfectly well these criticisms are valid. He should be supporting this council and denouncing this bill and this government for introducing such a piece of legislation and then trying to ram it through this House by the use of time allocation techniques and closure. That is what has been going on at every stage and it is not justified by any of the facts relating to the time on which this bill has been debated in this House. It has not been obstructed. It has not been prolonged unduly. This government is too impatient to allow Canadians to hear the truth about the savage policies that it is introducing in this country which are wrong and should be withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Simcoe Centre, I have looked at the motion of the member for Mission—Coquitlam and I will accept it. The debate is on the amendment.

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand in support of this motion and I welcome this opportunity to speak.

This government wants to get this wonderful country operating with every worker in a place of meaningful employment. It is urgent that no time be lost. Bill C-21 will help women, youth, part-time and seasonal workers, disabled and aboriginal peoples, older people and unemployed to take advantage of programs that will enhance their ability to take their place in the workforce. It will open the doors to better quality jobs and higher wages.

We have been accused of being hard-hearted, cold, uncaring and unloving, but let me tell you, we are just the opposite. This government believes in giving Canadians the opportunity to train and retrain for jobs that are waiting to be filled. How much better to be working than sitting with unemployment benefits and no hope. Remember, we are the government which has created the opportunities that increased jobs since 1984 by 1,555,000. Statistics Canada has said that since January we have created 189,000 jobs.

I just want to mention here that the unemployment insurance program is vital to the well-being of Canadians. Its role as a social safety net in providing temporary income protection to unemployed Canadian workers is essential and it is endorsed by this government.

A recent survey by Statistics Canada showed that 14 per cent of Canadian manufacturers were facing production problems due to a lack of skilled labour. Unless action is taken, these problems will likely become more acute in the 1990s.

Bill C-21 is a strategy for the future of Canada. It is one of many policies which have been developed to turn this country from being debt ridden to a country of sound management. We must not delay this program. Let us get on with the jobs we have been elected to do and support this motion.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to address this motion of the government. I have been in this House now for five years. Over the course of the last five years this government, in an ever-more-frequent fashion, has invoked closure in order to cut off and stifle debate on issues of national concern.

We have before us a bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, a bill that will affect, in a very direct way, hundreds of thousands of Canadians, a bill that will adversely affect the working poor in Canada. This government, in its arrogance, has decided to invoke closure to cut off debate.

You, Sir, have considerable experience in this House. You have been here for quite a number of years and know the rules of parliamentary procedure with respect to the invocation of closure and the stifling of debate. Yes, there is a place for closure in a democratic system. At times it may be necessary for a government, in very extreme circumstances, to cut off debate, to eliminate further discussion of a piece of legislation. But I would submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that those situations are extremely rare indeed. This government has done an about-face.

A few years ago when the Conservative party was in opposition its members spoke about the arrogance of closure. They referred to it as repugnant. The former Deputy Prime Minister, Erik Nielsen, on many occasions stood up on this side of the House when he was in opposition and criticized the imposition of closure. In fact, ministers of the Crown in the House here today have stood up and spoken against the bringing in of closure.

I think it is important that we ask why this government has decided to cut off debate, to muzzle discussion of this particular piece of legislation. I think the reasons are obvious. Of the 202 groups that appeared before the committee, the overwhelming majority opposed this bill. The overwhelming majority, 157 to be exact, recommended some very major changes.

It is not as if this is the first time that this government has brought in closure with respect to Bill C-21. In fact, at second reading stage, closure was invoked and, as was indicated previously, this bill was debated for a total of about 12 or 13 hours. That is not a long period of time when you consider the ramifications of the provisions in this particular bill.

Finally the bill did go to committee. The committee did travel. It did listen to Canadians. The itinerary was not as extensive as the opposition wanted it to be.

Mr. Kempling: It was exactly what the opposition asked for.

Mr. Nunziata: But the committee began to deliberate on some of the recommendations that were made by the various groups that appeared before the committee. Instead of debating fully the recommendations and amendments presented by the opposition, for the second time in the consideration of Bill C-21 at committee the Conservative members again invoked closure to cut off further debate.

Here we are back in the House at report stage and this government again invokes closure. It is clear why it is doing so; it is clearly embarrassed. The government knows that the longer we debate and discuss this particular legislation, the more opportunity Canadians will have to respond and the more heat it will take for this very regressive measure.

It is not as if the parliamentary timetable would not permit some extra discussion and debate on the 43 amendments that are on the Order Paper and before Parliament. The Prime Minister decided in June that he would take a three or four-month holiday, notwithstanding that the rules of the House specified a specific period of time for this House not to be in session. This government decided to take a few extra weeks' holiday, much to the chagrin and opposition of members on this side of the House. Why, if the government was so intent on dealing with this bill in such a quick fashion, did it not recall the House at an earlier point in time? Why, for example, has the House leader for the Conservative party not asked the opposition House leaders to extend the debate into the evening hours? It is clear that this government does not want any further discussion or debate.

The invocation of closure goes contrary to some of the very basic tenets of democracy, of the parliamentary system of government. In any democracy it is important that governments introduce legislation , that there be a fair and full debate and that the opposition be permitted to present alternatives. In the end, the government has a sufficient number of members in order to defeat any proposal made by the opposition parties.

What is important in a democratic system is that there be that debate, that discussion, in order for Canadians to fully understand. To invoke closure, in my respectful submission, Your Honour, is to show contempt for this Parliament. Contempt has been shown not only on this occasion but on many other occasions in the past five years, including in the past year or so, when this government on numerous occasions—four times during the free trade debate—invoked closure.

Canadians believe that there ought to be discussion and debate and will not accept arrogance on the part of the government. We in the opposition would very much like the opportunity to debate the merits of Bill C-21. A great number of my constituents will be directly affected by the provisions of this piece of legislation that runs about 33 pages.

I believe that I have a responsibility, indeed a duty, to speak to this bill, to articulate in the House of Commons and at committee how this particular legislation will affect my constituents. Because this government has chosen to invoke closure, my parliamentary privileges are affected in an adverse way because I will not have that opportunity to present my objections to Bill C-21. I will not have the opportunity to share with my colleagues on this side of the House and on that side of the House the reasons why the constituents of York South—Weston will be adversely affected by this piece of legislation.

In summary, let me say that we on this side of the House do not accept the arrogance of this government. We want to continue to debate this bill to discuss the merits of the legislation.

I know that I have but a few minutes to put on the record some of the concerns that I have. You are indicating, Mr. Speaker, a minute. Now how can I, in one minute, in 60 seconds, deal adequately with a bill that has 33 clauses, a bill that has drawn the attention of over 200 groups? How can I, in a reasonable fashion, deal with this bill in 60 seconds?

Mr. Harvard: It's impossible.

Mr. Nunziata: It is impossible. My colleague says it is impossible. The government knows that. I want to know why the government is afraid to allow me and my colleagues on this side of the House the opportunity to represent our constituents in a responsible way.

I have prepared submissions on Bill C-21. I am not being given the opportunity to present the submissions to this House. I find that regrettable. I know that you, Sir, are an individual who respects the tradition of this House.

Sir, you have been in this House for some 20-odd years and you know how important parliamentary debate is. I challenge other members of long standing in this House to point to another government at any point in history that has shown the arrogance and the undemocratic nature that this Conservative government has shown. Indeed it is a contempt of Parliament.

You sitting in the chair, Mr. Speaker, should not allow that to happen. I would ask you, Sir, to stand up for those rights.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, October 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-36, an act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I cannot stress how important the passage of this bill is to the agricultural industry of Canada. Farmers have made economic decisions based on the availability of advance grain payments; agri-business is relying on farmers making economic decisions whether it be in the area of purchasing equipment, fertilizers or seed; rural municipalities are expecting that taxes will be paid. Canadians generally have come to depend on this traditional availability of cash, and to delay Bill C-36 any further would be a disservice to those whose employment and standard of living depend on this bill. To delay is purely unconscionable.

This bill is important to farmers. They have told me that they are prepared to pay their share of the national debt. There is absolutely no argument with them in any way, shape or form on that subject. However they do object to members of the opposition delaying this bill, and they have said that they will remember them next election day. They have said to me: "You are the government; you fix this matter." Therefore I move:

That this question be now put.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion is debatable.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, in direct response to the motion put forward by the hon. member for Regina—Wascana, he must have the interests of Saskatchewan producers at heart. He must know that this bill, as it stands today, cannot go forward without proper and adequate debate in the House. It is particularly within the knowledge of the government and the government member who moved this motion that the Advance Payments for Crops Act, up until this point, very clearly outlined that this bill provided for the easy sale of grains and for the orderly marketing of grains under the Canadian Wheat Board.

It is not a loan that the farmer borrows against the crop that is in the bin. It should not be subject to the payment of interest, and that is essentially the nature of the bill before us.

The government is insisting that farmers pay an interest rate on the loan. Let me read into the record something that was in the local newspaper in my riding to support the argument that I am making here. The Prairie Pools was quoted in the North Battleford News Optimist as calling for a reinstatement of the interest-free cash advance for farmers. In a letter to the agriculture minister, which the Minister of Agriculture must have received by now, the president of Prairie Pools, Mr. Doug Livingstone, stated: "the interest-free cash advance is valuable in providing farmers with much needed cash during surplus stocks and tight quotas". Let me quote directly from that letter. Mr. Livingstone states: "Charging interest on cash advances may affect a producer's ability to wait for delivery opportunities later in the year".

The Prairie Pools and other farm organizations across the prairies have been telling this government since April 27, when this government first announced that it was going to go ahead with this bill, that this is not a program that should be subject to interest rates. This is quite clearly a program that allows for the sale of farm products.

I am sure you have seen how a farm operation works, Mr. Speaker, just as the member for Regina—Wascana would have seen how a farm operation works. You harvest your crop, you put it in the bin, and then you move it to the elevator for sale. It is at the elevator that the crop gets purchased. When the crop is sitting in the bin and the elevator is full, the farmer cannot move the crop from the bin to the elevator. Therefore it sits there. The farmer's bills are adding up because the people he borrowed money from during the summer in order to get the crop in and harvested cannot now be paid.

With this bill the government is adding an extra burden to this whole process of trying to move the grain from the bin to the elevator to export and as such is throwing a damper on the whole orderly marketing of grain.

Under no circumstances can the motion moved by the member for Regina—Wascana be heard at this point in time. The government still has not heard from a number of rural representatives both of my party and of the Official Opposition in the House. A number of witnesses are anxious, the Prairie Pools included, to appear before the committee of the House.

The Prairie Pools wants this government to hold off any planned changes to the cash advance until there is a thorough study of the possible effects of farm cash flow on agricultural marketing, which means there is a normal course of delay that should be taking place here.

• (1640)

If this government were really serious about protecting the interests of western Canadian farmers, it would withdraw this bill immediately and put into place the provisions of the statutes which presently exist. Those statutes call for the government simply to put out the forms for the cash advance program so that the farm community would, right now, have access to the cash advance. Interest-free as it may be, that is exactly the way it should be.

I also want to point out that I have received a number of phone calls over the course of the last couple of weeks from producers, some of whom are being pressured to pay debts by the Farm Credit Corporation which is stating: "If you can get a cash advance, we will be able to swing you through until this whole process is complete." Those particular farmers are wondering what they are supposed to do.

The government, last April 27, knew what it wanted to do with this cash advance program. It sat on it all the way through to now, and some of my constituents are in a real bind because they are not able to get the cash advance on which they are counting to pay off their debts. It is a direct responsibility of this government to ensure that farmers are able to hang on to what they have come to count on. In fact farmers do count on it for the sale of their grain and the maintenance of their farms.

This government has been so proud of its record on agriculture. Every time somebody on the other side of the House stands up, it is to talk about what this government has done for agriculture.

What state is agriculture in in this country? It is worse than it was under the previous government which had also mowed agriculture into the ground. Everything this government has done has been simply band-aids on problems. Not a single financial problem in the agricultural sector has been alleviated by any of the programs that have been instituted since 1984. One full term in government, and now we are into a second term of this particular government and the farm crisis is broadening. Bills like this are creating no end of difficulty for the producers who do not know what to do from one day to the next. They do not know where they are going to turn.

This year the crop in some parts of Saskatchewan and western Canada is better than it was last year because of the massive drought that hit the prairie provinces. There is a bit better crop in some areas of Saskatchewan and western Canada, and what happens? They cannot sell it now. They cannot get the money for the crop now because this government is holding back on this whole interest-free cash advance program.

The whole process up to this point has been quite disgusting and unnerving. The government should actually be ashamed of itself for talking about how wonderful it has been to agriculture, and then on the other hand pushing it down one more time. Not only is the government going to have a tax revolt on its hands and a train revolt, it is going to have an agriculture revolt if it keeps this sort of thing up.

The last time I spoke on this bill was on the motion of the Liberal party to hoist this matter for six months. At that point I suggested that the government was listening as much on this issue as it was listening on the issues of the goods and services tax and of VIA Rail. We have a situation where the people of Canada, the producers, the people who are most affected by government legislation, are doing the talking and the government is not doing the listening. They are doing exactly the opposite thing of what is demanded by the market-place, the market that they are so proud of out there.

I have had a large number of telephone calls in my riding concerning the cash advance. Every single one of those calls advocates a support for the interest-free cash advance, not because they are looking for a hand-out from the government and free money, but because that is the nature of this program. That is what is needed. A short time ago the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre outlined the purpose of this whole process when he stated:

> The Advance Payments for Crops Act was a benefit not only to producers but to small businesses as well. As we all know, the farmer lives on credit for a good portion of the year and advance payments allow him to pay his bills to small business people who are themselves suffering.

As this government will know, the hon. member who chairs the goods and services tax committee, the finance committee here in the House, has heard from people all over Canada. Small business people in western Canada are saying that this government, through the goods and services tax, is putting a burden on them that they cannot bear.

One of the reasons they cannot bear it is the pressure from the agricultural community at this point that the bills are not being paid. The economy is just too poor.

My colleague, the hon. member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, also stated:

> With this change in the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, it is quite clear that farmers will not be utilizing the programs as they had before. A study by the UPA in Quebec indicated that approximately 10 per cent of producers now utilizing the Advance Payments for Crops Act will utilize it when the interests amended are added to this act.

It is destroying the program. Putting the interest rate on to this program simply eliminates it, simply gets rid of the program altogether. This government may just as well have reduced and destroyed the program.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired. Before I recognize the next hon. member, there is a point of order by the Minister of Justice.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

AUTHORIZATION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties and I think you would find unanimous consent for the proceedings to be interrupted for me to put the following motion without debate. I move:

That a subcommittee of the Standing Committee of Finance composed of one member from each recognized party in the House, be authorized to travel to Yellowknife (Northwest Territories) on Thursday, October 26, 1989 for the purpose of hearing witnesses on the committee's consideration of the goods and services tax;

And that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the opposition and in a spirit of co-operation that we always show with the government when we are approached and asked about these things, we will of course agree to the motion that the minister has proposed and give our consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-36, an act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Schneider (p.5069).

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed myself last Friday when I was speaking to the amendment on this bill. I was only allowed 20 minutes and I have two hours' worth of stuff.

I want to start off by mentioning my hon. friend, the member for Regina—Wascana, who did what I consider to be the dumbest thing any member from the prairies could ever do, that is, to try and cut off debate on interest-free cash advances for farmers. I am not complaining about that. If he is going to be that stupid, I will be glad to help him out.

I want to say to my hon. friend that I challenge him to debate this matter in some place in his riding like Montmartre. You set the date, time, and place, and I will be there. I want you to do that; just give me a couple of weeks' notice. We will take this out to your farmers in the rural part of Regina—Wascana. Of course one of us will bring the Hansard record with us.

The government is breaking its own law by refusing both Treasury Board and cabinet to authorize the Canadian Wheat Board or the other agencies in the rest of Canada to issue cash advances, interest-free, on farm production.

• (1650)

I hope there are some legal eagles checking on this because I suspect the law says the Minister of Finance "shall", not "may" pay to provide the funds for the Canadian Wheat Board and the other agencies that issue the funds as a cash advance on that farm production.

If there ever was a backhanded, underhanded manner in which to subvert the law of the land, it is to not provide the money. The new crop year starts August 1 in the case of grain in the Canadian Wheat Board area.

Since August 1, the government has refused to allow the Canadian Wheat Board to issue cash advances which under the law it is allowed to do. What lengths the government goes to to subvert the law.

It is the same as what Otto Lang did when he tried to repeal the temporary Wheat Reserves Act to save the government $100 million by not having paid the Canadian Wheat Board storage costs on certain amounts of grain for the previous 18 months. We took him to court and beat him. We collected $100 million for the grain producers of western Canada.

The same thing is occurring again, only this time the faces have changed. They are just as ugly as the previous ones. The names have changed, Liberal–Conservative, Conservative–Liberal, the same breed of cats. Now the Tories are doing the same damn thing that they condemned the Liberals for doing.

When we are talking about interest–free, I had a chance to briefly mention last Friday about deferred corporation taxes. Almost $40 billion have accrued on the books of this country by corporations that were allowed to defer their taxes and they do not pay them back. In fact, it is an interest–free loan.

I suggested last Friday, Mr. Speaker, that if you were to charge 10 per cent interest on those deferred corporation taxes, which is at least 3 per cent below the bank rate, you would pick up $4 billion a year for the Government of Canada. I think that is a neat way to reduce the deficit.

The point is, there can be interest–free loans for corporations like the CPR, Bell Telephone, and International Nickel, but an interest–free cash advance for farmers is a no–no, say the Tories.

I do not necessarily know whether or not there will be any resurrections, but if there were one I would hope it would be the former member for Prince Albert who would come back and haunt the hon. Minister of Energy who sits there as a fine Christian gentleman. Mr. Diefenbaker, I am sure, would love to shake his jowls at him, poke his finger in his ear, in his nose, and in his eye about what he is doing to a program brought in in 1957. I find this passing strange. In fact, in western Canada, people of all political stripes applauded Mr. Diefenbaker, his political foes as well as his friends, and every farm organization, for bringing in something that we had been trying to get the Liberals to do since 1947, and we got it in 1957.

Who is trying to do away with it? The same outfit that brought it in. I do not think even the Liberals are that stupid, but the Tories are. In fact, they are setting records all the time. They set one today.

Many times the Tories berated the Liberals when they were in government for closure and time allocation and they did a terrible number of them. When one is in, the other one is out and all they do is exchange speeches. But the Tories today set a record. Always before, with the Liberals, you had a least two or three days to debate, but today the Tories set a record of one day. How about that? What a record to meet.

Now the Tories have set another record. They are destroying a program that was unanimously approved of, accepted, agreed to, and supported right across political lines and by all the farm organizations, including the ones that fight among themselves and with each other, and has been supported consistently since 1957.

I know it is a fond hope, but if the three and a half Tories who are in here would not mind, if they would go back to their own caucus and their—

An Hon. Member: Two and a half.

Mr. Benjamin: All right, two and a half. Perhaps these members would go back to their caucus and to the cabinet and say that this is a bum move, because the $27 million that the interest charges were on cash advances last year is a heck of a lot less than the cost of storing grain and transporting it. It provides a cash flow for grain producers so they can pay their taxes and their other bills. In fact, they can even make their payments to the Farm Credit Corporation.

This is such a stupid way to go about reducing government expenditures. The end result of passing a bill like this is that it is going to cost the government more than the $27 million.

I say to my hon. friend that you talk about sound business practices and business–like management, but I would not let this government manage a chicken coop. It is just blowing it. It is doing it "bass ackwards". It is so ridiculous that I would hope my hon. friend would go back to the cabinet committee or Treasury Board, or beat up on the Minister of Finance behind the Peace Tower or something, anything to get him to withdraw this nonsense. There is no saving in this for the government, and it is at a terrible cost for agriculture producers all over this country.

Surely, my hon. friend, the minister knows that. He knows in his own area of Manitoba what a benefit this has been to grain producers year in and year out since 1957. Why does he want to cut that off? It is inexplicable, it is not explainable, not justifiable and it is uncivilized. In fact, I will close by saying to my hon. friend that it is even un-Christian.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

THE SAFEGUARD LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY

AN ACT TO AUTHORIZE CONTINUATION AS A CORPORATION UNDER THE LAWS OF THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis) moved that Bill S-5, an Act to authorize the Safeguard Life Assurance Company to be continued as a corporation under the laws of the Province of Quebec, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as the member for Lévis, the city where a former parliamentary stenographer and editor for the House of Commons from 1892 to 1917, Alphonse Desjardins, founded Canada's first caisse populaire, the first of 1,343 Desjardins caisses populaires and credit unions in Quebec, I have the honour to table today a Bill to authorize the Safeguard Life Assurance Company to be continued under Quebec's Insurance Act.

On June 29, 1989, the Senate approved this bill on third reading. Established in 1901, the Safeguard was the first insurance company created and financed by the French-speaking business community in Canada. This share company again made economic history in our country in 1962 by becoming the exclusive property of the Caisses populaires Desjardins of Quebec, that is, 100 per cent owned by them. The Safeguard was the instrument—some would say the turning point—for bringing together the first holding company in Québec for financial institutions that belong to our fellow citizens through some 1,343 caisses populaires and credit unions in Quebec that make up the Desjardins Movement.

After a modest beginning, the Safeguard could take pride in being the largest French-speaking life insurance company in Canada in 1962, with $52 million in assets. Today, the Safeguard has $800 million in assets.

In March 1988, the elected directors of the Desjardins Movement approved the plan for the growth and capitalization of the Safeguard. Accordingly, Desjardins has already increased the company's capital and made a commitment to its future capitalization.

Today, the Safeguard is asking to be continued under Quebec jurisdiction. This is what the customers, shareholders and managers of the Safeguard want so that it can prosper and grow in this highly competitive and fast-changing environment in our country. To do so, it needs to be governed by a single control and supervision authority, the same one that already regulates all the other activities of the Desjardins Movement, namely the Inspector General of Financial Institutions of Quebec.

In addition, then-Minister of State for Finance, Thomas Hockin, the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, Mr. Mackenzie, and the Inspector General of Financial Institutions of Quebec, Mr. Bouchard, were informed of all the details of the Safeguard's plan and gave their support to this Bill.

As I said earlier, the Senate studied and approved this bill before the summer break. There was no opposition to this bill when it was considered in the Senate committee.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of continuing this company under Quebec jurisdiction is not to escape from or reduce supervision of its affairs but to achieve greater openness.

Indeed, such a move will force the company, in addition to satisfying the rules governing federally incorporated insurance companies and the rules set by Quebec, to meet all the requirements in all Canadian provinces from which federally chartered companies are exempt.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the proposed transfer of jurisdiction for the Safeguard makes a great deal of sense and is clearly to the benefit of its shareholders and customers and the public at large. Therefore, I urge the members of this House to pass the Safeguard bill quickly so that this company can carry out its planned transfer of jurisdiction as soon as possible.

[English]

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking today to Bill S-5, an act to authorize the Safeguard Life Assurance Company to be continued as a corporation under the laws of the province of Quebec. I am supporting the motion that it be referred to a legislative committee.

What this means in layman's terms is that the Safeguard Life Assurance Company is asking that it be allowed to transfer its charter from a federal charter, that is federal control, to control by the province of Quebec. There are probably some extremely valid reasons for so doing, and not the least of which is that it is mainly controlled by shareholders in the province of Quebec. On the other hand, it is important that we look very carefully at the reasons for the transfer of this company and that it not be because perhaps under the Quebec charter there might be considerably more loopholes of which they can take advantage. I support the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join the debate on Bill S-5 to authorize the Safeguard Life Assurance Company to be continued as a corporation under the laws of the province of Quebec.

I listened to the remarks of my colleague on the other side of the House, and I think I might point out that in February 1988 the management of Safeguard advised the office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions of their intention to replace their federal charter by a provincial charter.

They gave two reasons for making such a request. First, over 95 per cent of Safeguard policyholders live in Quebec and the company intends to concentrate all future operations in that province.

Second, Safeguard wishes to avail itself of certain provisions which, in the opinion of the board, would eventually be included in Quebec's legislation on insurance companies.

The office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions told the company that they would not raise objections if the company were to show that such a move was endorsed by shareholders and policyholders alike.

This position was then confirmed by the minister responsible for financial institutions because it was in keeping with the guidelines followed in recent years.

During the next few months the management of Safeguard consulted with their policyholders and shareholders, 95 per cent of whom approved the project aimed at securing a provincial charter. This is why the office of the Superintendent has since confirmed that it has no objection to Safeguard acquiring a provincial charter.

The bill now under consideration would authorize Safeguard to substitute a Québec government charter for the charter it now has.

As my colleague from Lévis (Mr. Fontaine) pointed out, the bill was passed by the Senate after committee hearings where it heard evidence from company management.

Mr. Speaker, I think we should—and the opposition agrees—refer Bill S-5 to a legislative committee for further consultation and disposition.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In view of the fact that the adjournment debate is at six o'clock, I must suspend the sitting now until six o'clock this day, at which time we will have the adjournment debate.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 5.08 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 5.58 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES—FISH PROCESSING REGULATIONS/ENFORCEMENT OF LANDING REQUIREMENTS

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, in discussing the final report of the free trade panel, the Minister for International Trade said, in effect, although I did not take his words down accurately, that compensation is not easy to calculate, but the ruling is being considered. These are the words that interest me most: "Whatever we do will be in the interest of Canadians generally and those involved in the industry in particular".

• (1800)

I fear that the people involved in the fishing industry in British Columbia will take very little comfort from those words, because they have been hearing similar comments from ministers on the government side for some years now.

In November, 1987, when the Minister of Fisheries was asked about the effect of the GATT ruling, he made it quite clear as to what the government position was. He offered his assurances that those jobs would not be jeopardized in any way. He went on to state:

> The provisions of Canada's participation in GATT allow for export controls for the purpose of preserving security of supply, for ensuring adequacy of supply to plants and for the conservation of the resource. Many member nations of GATT take advantage of such export restrictions.

Later on he said, "—a government which spends over $100 million a year to manage and enhance the west coast salmon and herring industry will not allow jobs, historically established, to be threatened by any such initiative."

Further on he stated, "What we have is a panel recommendation which will, in all likelihood, be overturned by the GATT council of which we are a member, and we will be opposing that recommendation when it reaches the GATT council." Those are very comforting words from almost two years ago. But the government took no such action. It had the report from GATT, and an opportunity to appeal it. It chose not to appeal. It had the opportunity to take alternative actions, and it chose not to do that.

The government did nothing in fact, and then it signed its way into the free trade agreement, or at least accepted the final wording of the free trade deal on December 10, 1987, in which agreement it agreed not to go against any GATT decision.

On March 21, 1988, the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister for International Trade announced that Canada would not veto the GATT panel ruling. It had that opportunity and they chose not to do that. It had an opportunity to impose export taxes, prior to the free trade agreement being signed. It chose not to do that. The next day, the full GATT council accepted the panel ruling.

Then the government came up with alternative proposals. It had some sure fire methods of controlling the situation. They could have vetoed the GATT council decision. It could have imposed an export tax. It chose not to do either. Instead, totally ignoring the recommendations from everyone involved in the fishing industry in the west coast, it brought in a new system of regulations, landing requirements for B.C. salmon and herring. This was going to be the way of saving the industry for British Columbia.

A panel was set up in response to the Americans raising this issue again. The panel brought in a preliminary report on September 15. That is almost 40 days ago now. The preliminary report, which has not been released to this date to the best of my knowledge, although we were able to get copies of it from the Americans, ruled against Canada.

There was a suggestion within the body of the report that if we did not insist on 100 per cent landing, then it might be okay. It did not state it would be, but stated it might be okay if we had something less than 100 per cent insistence of landing in British Columbia. The government has taken a lot of comfort from the fact that the panel, in the body of its report, suggested that something less than 100 per cent might be satisfactory. It did not state that it would be.

Once again, as I say, the government has taken comfort from that statement. But it has not told the fishing industry, the people involved in the processing industry, or the fishermen themselves, just what position the government intends to take.

It had 61 days in total from the release of the preliminary report. It has 21 days left, and it has chosen not to say anything, other than that it will consult the fishing industry. Again, I have not been able to find out from anyone in the fishing industry that the government is consulting anyone, and the days are slipping by.

Canada did react to the preliminary report. It had a position paper. But there is no rehearing of the case, although there was an opportunity given the death of one of the members of the panel and his replacement. There was an opportunity to have a rehearing and to hear new evidence. Evidence was available. Canada had the evidence. It has it in this paper which goes into the details as to what extent exports were going on in spite of the landing regulations. The fish were being landed in British Columbia and millions of pounds of fish were being shipped out after they were landed. So it is obvious from the evidence from affidavits that are sworn by Mr. Nordlandmann, the manager of the largest shipper of unprocessed salmon from B.C. landing stations. The evidence was there to show that it did not interfere with the shipments to the United States. Canada should have won that case. Canada still has the opportunity to say, "We are going to insist on 100 per cent landing because we need it to control the resource".

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, Canada and the United States received the final report of the FTA panel on Pacific salmon and herring on October 16 of this year. We are currently reviewing the report and its impact on Canadian landing requirements for Pacific salmon and herring and have not yet come to a decision. We have begun to consult with the B.C. government and the industry and have received some useful suggestions.

Under FTA rules, Canada and the United States must reach a decision on this case within 30 days of receipt of the final report. Regardless of the final decision, Canada will ensure that the conservation and management of the salmon and herring resource will not be compromised. The panel has recognized that it is the sovereign right of Canada to collect conservation and management information and that Canada does not have to depend on a foreign nation for that information.

The panel stated that Canada's landing requirements would be acceptable if provision was made to exempt from landing that portion of the catch whose exportation without landing would not impede the data collection process. The report also stated that the actual proportion should be determined on the basis of the actual data and management needs of each fishery or group of fisheries, but that a 10 to 20 per cent level would provide appropriate guidance.

The government feels strongly that it must take time to carefully study the report and complete consultations with the province of British Columbia and the industry before publicly announcing its purpose.

The government recognizes that it takes time to provide a proper assessment of the implications of the report. The critical question is whether the report permits a realistic achievement of our conservation and management requirements; that is, the ability to perform statistically valid biological sampling, the ability to obtain information needed for effective in-season management and the ability to validate catch by species, number and weight, area and time.

With the above in mind, the government is hopeful that through the consultative process and taking the time necessary to measure the impacts on the conservation of these essential resources, we will be able to ensure that our goals are met.

CANADA PENSION PLAN—REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT OF ACT—DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to again raise in this House a concern that I have relative to the Canada Pension Plan disability pension provisions. This flows from a question put to the Minister of National Health and Welfare back on June 14, 1989, a statement pursuant to standing order of approximately the same date, and also a question put back in May 1988.

The concern relates to those Canadians who have paid into the Canada Pension Plan over the years who become disabled and, as a result of the disability, have to leave their employment, but who are delayed in applying for their disability pension. These are not common occurrences nowadays because most Canadians are aware of the opportunity for disability pension. Indeed, if they are not, I am sure that the availability is brought to their attention by others.

But there are situations, and I think particularly of a Mrs. Donna Sinclair of Swift Current, Saskatchewan, a constituent of mine, with whose case I am well familiar. This is a lady who is 60 years old at this point in time, who contributed to the Canada Pension Plan, I believe, in 11 of 13 years between 1966 and 1978 or 1979. She had to leave her employment as a result of diabetes and subsequently has had both legs amputated. Somehow she did not know or did not understand that there was a possibility of a Canada Pension Plan disability pension. She finally learned of it from a friend or from relatives and applied in 1987. Of course, when she applied, she learned that she did not meet the test of recency because in order to be eligible, a person must have contributed, I believe, in five of the last ten years, in her particular situation. So she did not qualify.

• (1810)

It seems to me just and fair that people in this situation who have contributed through their employment, who have had to leave that employment through disability and who simply did not know of the availability, nonetheless ought not to be precluded from receiving a disability pension. Obviously there is not a simple answer to this because it does, I believe, require an amendment to the legislation. I think it is probably more complicated because the minister does not just wave a wand and do this. I think it requires federal-provincial co-operation and I am sure a lot of other things enter into it.

At this point in time, I certainly am not intending to be critical of the minister who, I think, is a very able and articulate individual. However, I do have a concern in this case that not enough is being done. I do not think that the answer given to me back in June is satisfactory, the answer being that I should put a motion on the Order Paper in regard to Private Members' Business and if and when that comes up the matter will again be raised.

We all know how Private Members' Business works. The matter may never be drawn. It is a matter of the luck of the draw and so I am taking the opportunity to again bring the matter to the attention of members in this House.

Mrs. Sinclair is not alone. I know of another situation in my constituency and other members from all sides have raised the matter with me as well. It is evident that in every constituency there are two or three or four such individuals. So it is not just an isolated situation. I think it is a situation that is deserving of attention and I, therefore, again express to the minister and to the department that it would be well to try to find a solution to accommodate people like Mrs. Sinclair who, I think, have played by all of the rules but did not understand that there was an availability.

I think what we are seeking here today is a review of the situation. I must compliment my colleague, the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and Disabled Persons, because he has responded and indicated that that committee will be examining certain aspects of the Canada Pension Plan and has undertaken to study the economic factors involved in integrating disabled persons into our society. If and when that comes forward, certainly we will be making representations to him and his committee. I thank him for his interest in the matter.

I think this is one problem which really does need the attention of both levels of government, that is, the federal government and the provinces. I sincerely hope that at some time in the not too distant future, the matter can become the subject of some discussion between those levels of government in regard to opening up the Canada Pension Plan legislation.

In closing, I appreciate the responses that I received of some caring and some compassion and some concern and, above all else, a willingness on the part of government to try to do something about this situation. There are people who are deserving, who are needy, and I think they need some kind of response.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the concerns of the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia with regard to the recency test which is applied to Canada Pension Plan disability benefit applicants.

Disability benefits are intended to replace earnings lost through disability. Therefore, a recent attachment to the workforce was a requirement for benefit eligibility. This government has already amended the recency test by providing more flexible eligibility requirements.

Under Bill C-116 effective January, 1987, the Canada Pension Plan disability provisions were amended so that persons who have contributed to the CPP in two of the last three years, or five of the last ten years prior to their application, can meet the contributory requirements.

Prior to the passage of this legislation, the test of recency required that contributions were made in five of the last ten years and one-third of the contributory period.

• (1815)

It may also be noted that under Bill C-116, the time limit of 12 months retroactively for the determination of disability in the original act was extended to 15 months in 1987. Through this amendment, some persons may qualify for disability benefits up to six years or more after they leave work. Most private insurance plans for disability have much more stringent recency tests. Most limit their protection to between 30 and 90 days following the cessation of work.

I wish to say that the hon. member is not alone in his concern for the disabled Canadians who failed to meet the CPP recency tests. The department is currently reviewing the limit on retroactivity determination to see whether some further extension of this time limit would be feasible.

However, the hon. member should be cognizant of the fact that amendments to this effect must be undertaken with caution, given the possibility that they could cause more problems than they solve. For example, the farther we go in the past, the more difficult it is to assess precisely when all the relevant medical and socioeconomic factors may have resulted in the disability of the individual. This is because the factors contributing to the disability often change over time. Indeed, such changes may lead to the amelioration, the elimination, or the degeneration of the health condition.

Furthermore, if the retroactive period were substantially extended the process of disability determination would likely require more information and resources from the client, and they would likely increase the time spent on disability adjudication, potentially delaying the initial payments for some individuals. Consequently, we have to ensure that the current administrative structure can respond adequately and efficiently to any change in the legislation.

In light of these and other conditions, the feasibility of a legislative amendment must be thoroughly evaluated. At the present time, the government does not have a specific time frame within which it intends to reopen the CPP act. The hon. member knows that his request to open the act to make amendments involves a process which is complex and requires considerable time. Major changes to the CPP require the approval of two-thirds of the provinces having two-thirds of the Canadian population, as well as the approval of Parliament.

However, I assure the hon. member that should the act be reopened, his recommendations will be taken into consideration.

CANADA POST CORPORATION—SERVICES IN COMMUNITIES/MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have this opportunity tonight to address the question which I asked in this House on June 15. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that it was on that date that Canada Post announced its profit of $96 million. It was on that day that a number of members rose in the House of Commons to discuss that profit and what it means to the services for residents of Canada.

As a result of the profit shown by Canada Post Corporation, and other matters, the Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations Committee has embarked upon a study of the operations of Canada Post, and by this time next week will have begun the hearings across Canada into the operations of Canada Post and a discussion about the future and the opportunities that Canada Post gives to residents of Canada.

The question I was asking of the minister concerned the communities from coast to coast in Canada that are organizing to save their rural post offices, or get door-to-door delivery. They are being denied the opportunity to do that, at the same time that Canada Post records a profit of $96 million.

Canada Post, the federal government, and the minister responsible for Canada Post, made a clear choice when they decided to accept the profits of $96 million over the needs of the rural communities of Canada and the service requirements of the people who live there. Canada Post and the federal government chose big business over Canadian people in providing that service.

• (1820)

Canada Post should take that profit of $96 million and use it to repair some of the damage that it has done to the postal system over the last few years. The federal government should insist that this money be used to extend door-to-door delivery service to suburban residents. The government should insist this capital be used to re-open rural post offices which have been shut across Canada.

Canada Post should be seen first and foremost not as a money machine for the federal government, but to honour its mandate which is service first. The government has turned Canada Post into a Frankenstein of Crown corporations, and it is running amok, not accountable to Parliament, to the committees or to the people of Canada.

At the time, I also released a ten-point plan which I thought should govern the future operations of Canada Post. I would like to put part of that on the record tonight in the time allotted to me. The ten-point program includes: The primary goal of Canada Post should be to provide and extend service to Canadians. The profit created by Canada Post should be directly rolled back into maintaining and expanding service to Canadians; that all 167 rural post offices closed by Canada Post should be immediately re-opened, and that the government should review rural postal operations with the goal of extending service to areas currently in need of service.

The federal government should ensure that door-to-door delivery is extended to suburban residents, and it should do away with the supermailboxes which have become super headaches across the country. Canada Post's campaign of harassment and intimidation of its workers must be halted, and the Canada Post Crown corporation should be expected to be a model employer that sees the link between good working conditions, harmonious labour relations, and the provision of better postal service to Canadians. All post office operations should be contracted in and a halt should be put on further erosion of service and working conditions through contracting out. Service should be extended where warranted at post offices to include the sale of paper, tape or other related items for the use in preparing parcels for mailing.

The Government of Canada and Canada Post should examine the possibility of providing services to Canadians which are provided in other countries, such as, flower sales and dry cleaning drop-off points in rural parts of Canada. The Government of Canada and Canada Post should abandon the plans to sell off parts of the postal system to the private sector and get back to the business of providing service to Canadians. Finally, the Rural Route Mail Carriers Organization should be recognized by the government so that it can negotiate working conditions and standards that it does not currently have.

In presenting that ten-point program, I reiterate my previous call from the spring sitting of this Parliament for a public inquiry into the Post Office, a public inquiry which comes from the Government of Canada as opposed to the Consumers and Corporate Affairs Commission. As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, during Question Period I called on the minister to institute a moratorium on the conversion and closing of rural post offices until such time as the committee has reported and Parliament has a chance to read the report.

Canada Post's expenditure earlier this year on 64,000 videos for employees, a new mega wardrobe for its employees, its campaign to take the Canada out of Canada Post, and its national coloured glossy promotional leaflet are clear signals to Canadians: the federal government and Canada Post are trying their hardest to make our postal system a pretty package for the private sector to facilitate the government's plans to privatize Canada Post and roll back the clock on postal service and working conditions.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in 1981 when the post office was incorporated into a Crown Corporation, it was mandated to improve the service and become financially self-sufficient.

This year is an important milestone for the post office regarding these objectives. Canada Post Corporation recorded a profit of $96 million. It is the first time in 30 years that the people of Canada are not required to subsidize their postal service when they pay their taxes.

• (1825)

The hon. member has suggested that the minister responsible for Canada Post is taking liberties with the mandate given to the corporation by Parliament. As well, he is suggesting that the profits have been achieved at the expense of service. It is an interesting suggestion but, unfortunately for the hon. member, it does not withstand close scrutiny.

When the post office was transformed into a Crown corporation, it was given an asset base that was in great need of attention. Capital investment levels were not sufficient at the time to maintain its base. Over the next five years, the corporation plans to invest $2.5 billion in new equipment and machinery. This investment is fundamental if the corporation is to continue to provide a postal service that is marked by being accessible, reliable and affordable. These investments will benefit all the customers of Canada Post and are only possible so long as the corporation continues to make a profit. Otherwise, we will return to the days when Canada Post was having to be a drain on the national treasury.

The corporation's achievement of being self-sufficient has not been achieved at the expense of service. On the contrary, the service that is provided by Canada Post has been improving. Today, the accounting firm of Ernst-Young, formerly Clarkson Gordon, released its service performance report on Canada Post. This report demonstrates that once again the corporation is meeting its commitment of on time delivery. The report reveals that the rate of on time delivery for a properly prepared, first-class letter mailed within the same urban area was 96 per cent. For delivery in the same province, it was also 96 per cent. Between provinces, these figures were 97 per cent. So you can see that we are getting on time delivery between urban centres. We have been getting on time delivery within the provinces and we are getting on time delivery between provinces. That is quite impressive for a corporation that delivers 33 million pieces of mail a day to nearly 10.7 million addresses.

Not only are delivery standards being met, but the corporation is working hard on improving accessibility. The corporation intends to increase the number of places that customers can access postal products and service. The corporation has made a commitment to Canadians that will keep rate increases below the price of inflation. This promise is being kept, as seen with the present proposed rate increase that is now before the Postal Service Review Committee.

The corporation has put forward a request to raise the price of a first-class stamp by one cent. This amounts to a 2.6 per cent increase. This is what is meant by self-sufficiency while improving service. I, and many others, do not think that that is wrong, but rather that it is something that should be encouraged and something that we are very proud of. We wish the post office continued success.

In conclusion, it is really nice to stand in the House of Commons with the galleries overflowing, the Speaker in his chair and the crowds cheering. It is wonderful to be here.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, this government's decision to axe The Canadian is a direct attack on the regions of Canada. Ridings such as mine, Kenora—Rainy River, feel that they have been abandoned by this government.

The withdrawal of The Canadian does not make any sense. In fact, VIA Rail's own documents show that The Canadian was the fourth busiest in Canada, carrying more than half a million people a year with the best occupancy rate on the system, 70 per cent annually and 94 per cent in the peak summer season. In fact, the VIA review states that The Canadian would not have seen further traffic growth beyond 1993 because it would have been operating at full capacity.

If this government had put money into new and upgraded equipment, it would have been able to save many of the routes it has cut. Instead, it chose to attack once more the regions of Canada. The constituents of Kenora—Rainy River and many millions of Canadians will not forget this travesty of justice.

SCHOOL SAFETY WEEK

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, from October 17 to 24, the Canada Safety Council observes its annual National School Safety Week, to promote accident prevention among school children.

This year, the campaign is about playing safe and watching out for others. It focuses on the issue of playground accidents, which cause injuries that could have been avoided. The campaign has also drawn our attention to Canadian standards for the construction, design and manufacturing of the equipment on public and private playgrounds.

The Canada Safety Council has launched a safety appeal to all Canadians, including the general public, municipalities, day care centres in schools, and parents, asking them to be alert to all possible dangers and make any changes that might be necessary, for instance, in the installation and maintenance of merry-go-rounds, supervision of young children; and teaching children safe games and how to be courteous.

We whole-heartedly support the efforts of the Council and provincial organizations to promote children's safety by enhancing public awareness and through preventive education.

DISARMAMENT WEEK

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, 11 years ago, the first United Nations Special Session on Disarmament proclaimed October 25 as the beginning of Disarmament Week.

As we approach the end of this decade, positive, far-reaching changes appear inevitable. Superpower leaders, especially Premier Gorbachev, are beginning to recognize the financial and military limits to the arms race.

The cold war is over. The dismantling of NATO and the Warsaw Pact have become realizable goals. New and exciting possibilities exist. Yet it saddens Canadians to see our government still using cold war rhetoric, allowing cruise missile testing, low level training flights, as well as nuclear armed ships in Canadian ports. Our government encourages and subsidizes the arms industry when it should do everything possible to make those industries obsolete.

Canada can and must play an important and historical leadership role in global disarmament. We need a government with the vision and the courage to think new thoughts. We need a government that is part of the solution, not part of the problem.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, we all know the substantial role played by small business in this country. Ninety-eight per cent of Canada's 900,000 businesses are small businesses. If every one of these created one job in this country, there would be practically no more unemployment.

As you know, many of these small businesses are managed by business people who belong to our ethnic communities.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take advantage of Small Business Week to bring to your attention a brand new directory of ethno-cultural business organizations which has just been published. This directory provides information on about 150 organizations and will help Canadian business people expand their contacts with various cultural communities in Canada and abroad.

Ethnocultural business groups are one of the moving forces of our economy, and as a result, Mr. Speaker, I think we cannot deny that multiculturalism in Canada has an economic dimension.

Canada should use its ethnic and racial diversity to enhance its position on international markets.

VIA RAIL

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, while this government slashes VIA Rail, Amtrak poises itself to fill the void. Yesterday in the Winnipeg Free Press, Amtrak advertised a new service to connect Winnipeg to the U.S. passenger rail network. The ad states: "It's easy, just get on the bus at the Winnipeg VIA Station".

What a transportation policy: Kill VIA, all aboard Amtrak; force Canadians to use an American bus link to the American railway network and make profits for Americans.

Amtrak says in the ad: "We'll get you to Grand Forks in time to catch our superliner, the Empire Builder". What a fitting name for the train. First this government goes to bed with the Americans through the free trade agreement and now the government shuts down the passenger rail system, the very symbol of our independence.

The Americans move in to pick up the pieces. Ride the Empire Builder, Mr. Speaker. "You can connect with any other train in the Amtrak national system. It could be the best connection you make all day."

We on this side of the House want passenger rail connections to be from The Canadian to the Supercontinental. We say leave the Empire Builder to the Americans and their Tory friends.

THE NORTH

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on October 20 this year, I went to the Inuit community of Salluit for the opening of their new airport. I spent some time in two grocery stores. At the Fédération des coopératives du Nouveau Québec, a dozen eggs sold for $2.75 and 1.38 ounces of black pepper for $3.60. At The Bay, a litre of 2 per cent milk cost $2.74, butter sold for $3.74 a pound, while a loaf of bread cost $1.89. On top of that, Mr. Speaker, effective November 13, 1989, Canada Post is going to raise the rates on commercial parcels sent by air freight to Quebec's northern regions. This means, for instance, that the price of bread will go up 80 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Government of Canada, Canada Post, the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs and the Department of National Health and Welfare to put an immediate moratorium on rate increases for commercial parcels containing essential products such as bread, butter, eggs, milk, medicine and all types of children's good.

SKATE CANADA INTERNATIONAL

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I know that all members would like to join me in extending best wishes to the young men and women who will be representing our country at the Sun Life Skate Canada International which will take place October 26 to October 29 in Cornwall, Ontario.

A total of 62 skaters representing 14 countries will participate in this the third ranked figure skating event in the world.

This competition will be extremely important for many young athletes who hope to represent their country at the 1992 Winter Olympics at Albertville, in France.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, with his customary dedication, Canada's Auditor General, whose mandate is to ensure that public funds are properly administered, made recommendations yesterday in his report for more efficient government management. In the report he also mentioned the considerable progress made by the government in implementing a new framework for the management of departments and corporations.

Crown corporations which, under the Liberals, seemed impossible to control, are now able to account for their activities very effectively. The Auditor General also states that since regulatory review was initiated by this government, the project scrutiny process has been satisfactory.

Our government's appreciation of the work done by the Auditor General is reflected in measures that were a response to recommendations made in previous years and have led to considerable improvements in many departments. I am confident that this government will take into account the recommendations of the Auditor General as it has in the past, because it is the only open and responsible government citizens can really trust.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to cite yet another example of government mismanagement as demonstrated by the Marine Sciences Research Institute in Mont Joli, Quebec, in the 1989 Auditor General's report.

The question is, when does a $17 million project cost $77 million? The answer is when the government does not carry out a needs analysis; number two, when the government does not take the lowest bid; number three, when the government offers tenders before a thorough cost analysis is complete; number four, when the government has not made provisions for easy access to the chosen site; number five, when the government fails to include the price of essential equipment for the facility like a $6 million computer; number six, when the government does not consider the latest environmental concerns and provides for only primary treatment of raw sewage; number seven, when the government presents a $17 million price tag knowing it is much more politically acceptable than $77 million; number eight and finally, the government does not learn from past mistakes and is not terribly intelligent.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, last week's environment ministers' conference in Charlottetown produced some very concrete results which all members of this House should applaud.

With regard to the ongoing problem of PCB waste in Canada, the ministers came to the highly ethical conclusion that the destruction of Canadian produced PCBs should occur, whenever possible, within Canadian borders. The federal Minister of the Environment moreover reaffirmed that those PCBs which are under the federal government's jurisdiction will, without exception, not be exported out of Canada. That is welcome news.

The minister has also announced a commitment to ensure the cleanup of contaminated toxic waste sites throughout Canada under the "polluter pay principle" and has agreed to a $250 million cost sharing program to deal with high risk "orphaned" sites.

On the subject of air quality, the federal minister announced that the federal government will impose very stringent regulations, as stringent as those that will be in place in California, to control auto emissions within the next five years.

Canadians are crying out for a cleaner Canada. It is my belief that the recent meeting in Charlottetown has ushered in a period of improved co-operation between federal and provincial governments, the result of which will be a healthier and more responsible Canada.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago, the National Council of Welfare released its study of the effects of this government's plans to claw back family allowance and old age pensions. It states that in spite of the Prime Minister's protestations to the contrary, the clawback proposal signals an end to the longstanding Canadian principle of universality. A social program that delivers benefits to everyone and then collects them all back from some recipients is not universal.

[Translation]

According to the study by the National Council of Welfare, the government is undermining family allowances and old age pensions. These new measures, which are discriminatory and increasingly complex, are gradually threatening the universality of our social programs. Clearly, our children, our senior citizens, the disadvantaged and, in the next decade, middle income families, are the victims of this policy.

[English]

By eliminating universality of family allowances, reducing unemployment benefits and backtracking on child care promises this government is dismantling, in five years, a social policy framework that it took Canada a century to construct. Canadians are saying that it is enough.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and concerns ministerial use of the Challenger aircraft.

According to the Auditor General's report at page 138, the guidelines provide, and I quote:

> "These aircraft may never be used for party or constituency purposes, or for purposes connected with an election campaign".

Mr. Speaker, since the official guidelines established by the Prime Minister provide that government aircraft may never be used for purposes connected with an election campaign, could the Deputy Prime Minister provide us with a complete list of persons who used a government aircraft, at what cost and for what purpose, between October 1, 1988 and November 21, 1988? Who made use of these aircraft during the election campaign and for what purpose?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, further to the Auditor General's report tabled yesterday, I have instructed the Comptroller General of Canada to make this information available to all members of this House and to the Canadian public, including the number of times each minister, individually, used a government aircraft; second, the date, itinerary and names of passengers for each trip on which the aircraft was used, the reason for using the aircraft; and finally, the cost of each trip on board a government Challenger aircraft. All this information will now be available on a regular basis, and the Hon. member will have full access to that information.

• (1420)

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, these documents are already available to the House and to the public. I will quote the relevant dates and expect to receive the information this afternoon.

[English]

I want to return to the Deputy Prime Minister because I want to ask about a rule set down by the Prime Minister of Canada and cited by the Auditor General. On page 138 of his report, the Auditor General states that ministers can take two types of flights, ministerial flights which are for non-departmental purposes and departmental flights which are for departmental purposes when a minister is carrying his or her duties as the departmental minister. The rule set down by the Prime Minister distinguishes these two kinds of flights.

The Auditor General goes on to say that 95 per cent of the flights requested by ministers were for non-departmental purposes. I can understand the occasional justification for some of these flights, but 95 per cent of the time?

Since it is a violation of the guidelines to use government jets for political, constituency or electoral purposes, will the Deputy Prime Minister explain the reason why 95 per cent of government jet flights were for non-departmental purposes?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell my hon. friend across the way that we have been very diligent in monitoring the use of government aircraft by this government. In the 12 month period ending in August 1984, government aircraft were used on 677 occasions. In the last period, with an estimate for the last two months of this period, they were used only 278 times. We reduced the use in a major way. We are ensuring that the use is made for government business.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): You will note, Mr. Speaker, that the minister has not answered the question. I want to suggest to the Deputy Prime Minister why 95 per cent are used for non-departmental purposes. Here is the situation. The Auditor General says that the allocated cost of a so-called ministerial flight is about eight times less than a so-called departmental flight. Therefore ministers can make their travel expenses appear much lower by claiming one type of flight rather than the other.

The Deputy Prime Minister has a choice. He can tell the House that either the ministers were using the jets for non-departmental or political purposes or they were deliberately falsifying their records to make their expenses appear low. Which is it? When is the government going to put into place a system where the people of Canada can get honest answers without having to go through this charade here in the House of Commons?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, I strongly disagree with the premise of the question that has been asked by my right hon. colleague. We have reduced the number of flights from 677 to an estimate of 278 this year on government business.

An Hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. de Cotret: I will answer the question. The right hon. member asked when the government is going to have an in depth review of all of this. The Auditor General has pointed out that he is concerned about the way costs are computed. He has expressed concerns about the reason why these flights are used.

On behalf of the government, I have asked the Comptroller General to make a complete study of this issue on an urgent basis within the next few months. I am undertaking today to table this study in this House and make the study available for any hon. colleague who may want to have the information. We will be forthcoming. We will give you the information.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister, and it concerns the government's refusal to provide travel receipts to the Auditor General. The November 1988 Treasury Board guidelines for ministers, and I have a copy in hand, state regarding travel receipts that these supporting documents should nevertheless be retained in ministers' offices for possible verification by, for example, the Auditor General of Canada.

Why is it that in the September 1989 version of the same document the words "Auditor General of Canada" have been removed? Why did the government doctor the rules after the Auditor General asked for the receipts?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, these are guidelines that are issued from time to time by Treasury Board. I must repeat that they date back to a tradition that was established in 1963 and followed by all successive governments since that time. They are changed periodically, but nonetheless they attempt to ensure that there is absolute accountability and openness on the part of government on these issues.

Yesterday I said that we would provide on a regular basis the total travel expenses of each minister in addition to the information that was being requested by the Auditor General in terms of the use of government aircraft. I believe that that is in keeping with our position to be accountable and very open about how this government conducts its business.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, with respect, that is not what I asked. I asked why the rules had been changed in September of 1989 immediately before the Auditor General's report was tabled in the House of Commons, and I did not get an answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, yesterday the President of the Treasury Board explained his refusal to provide the Auditor General with certain information by saying that it would compromise Canada's security if he revealed who had a meal or a drink with a minister.

I would like to know why it is such a secret to know with whom ministers have a drink. Since when is caviar a national secret?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, once again, my colleague is framing his question in a way that is not wholly justified.

My answer yesterday on receipts is quite clear. It is understood that a government minister might have to meet with a provincial colleague or a union leader. He might have to meet people from abroad, representatives of other states, always while conducting government business.

I think that opposition members can well understand that in such cases, it is important to maintain confidentiality. It is government business. We are prepared to provide all information on ministers' travel expenses in the way I stated yesterday. I think that will meet the objectives set forth by my hon. colleagues.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Last year's Auditor General's report referred to a half a billion dollars in lost revenues to the government because taxes were written off by this government. This year's report which just came out the other day cites another $350 million per year loss due to excise tax loopholes. Will the Minister of Finance give this House an assurance that before he collects one extra dollar from ordinary and honest Canadian taxpayers, he will close these loopholes and collect taxes from people who are not paying their taxes?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know the Hon. Member has been away from the House for quite understandable reasons, but I have responded to that question. We are closing that loophole. We are closing it through the goods and services tax.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): That is precisely the reason for the goods and services tax.

• (1430)

I want to refer him to the eleventh report of the finance committee which commented on the temporary measure that we brought in, in the last Parliament, to close this loophole and recommended that that proposal should not proceed.

The committee made some temporary recommendations as an interim solution pending the reform of the whole federal sales tax system. The federal sales tax system itself will close the very loophole to which the Auditor General is referring.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, the minister should go out in the country. He would see that there is a tax revolt brewing out there. Canadians are fed up with this government's loopholes in taxation.

[Translation]

My second question is for the same minister. Last year, 91 people were found guilty of tax evasion, but none of them went to jail. Why does the government not enforce the current legislation strictly?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure I understand the thrust of the hon. member's question. We are applying the current tax laws with vigour. We are also closing loopholes with vigour. We have been closing loopholes now for five years.

In response to the questions on the administration of tax laws and the administration of justice relating to tax laws, possibly he should be addressing that question to my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, or to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could put it another way to the minister. The minister cites the new GST. The Auditor General has said that under the present system there are loopholes, that there are ways that people are evading taxation, and that people are not being prosecuted duly for that.

I would like to ask the minister: Is it not a fact that with the more complicated goods and services tax we are going to have more leakages, more loopholes, and the honest Canadian taxpayer is going to have to pay more in personal income taxes and probably, ultimately, a raised GST? What have the Conservatives got against the honest taxpayer of Canada? Why are they pursuing this kind of policy?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Finance noted, the hon. member has a right to be absent from the House of Commons for the purpose that he pursues, but at least when he is absent he should pay attention to what is going on here. That question was answered in detail.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: Where's Mulroney? We haven't seen him for three weeks.

An Hon. Member: Where's Valcourt?

Mr. Jelinek: They sound like a bunch of whining hyenas, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister could finish his reply.

Mr. Jelinek: I will, in a nutshell, repeat what I said yesterday. We agree with the Auditor General that the present federal sales tax system is a complex one and very hard to administer. Attempts have been made to change the present federal sales tax since 1951. It was not successfully changed to accommodate the Canadian public and the Canadian taxpayer, and particularly the small business community which is so dependent on having a government provide the competitive opportunities which we believe the GST will.

The hon. member should note as well that the Auditor General, in his report in this area, has made it very clear that processing of remittances is more efficient today than it was in 1984, that the backlog has cleared more quickly since 1984, that discovered unreported income is up by over 100 per cent since 1984, and that we have accelerated source reduction remittance since 1984.

The list of positive, impressive and productivity improvements goes on and on by the Auditor General. It is good news for business, it is good news for Canadians, and it is good news for taxpayers.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and concerns this government's attempt to stonewall the Auditor General in his request for information on ministerial use of VIP aircraft. We already know of many instances of questionable travel by ministers of this government. However we now fear that those reports were just the tip of the iceberg.

Now we have the itinerary of the Minister of National Defence, who used the government jet on July 6, at a cost of at least $35,000 to the taxpayers, to fly from Saskatoon to Ottawa, even though a regular commercial flight was available at the time.

My question is: How many more questionable trips have been taken by ministers of this government, and how many millions of dollars have been squandered by this government's abuse of its own government guidelines?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the very fact that we are willing to make all of this information available is I think a good indication that we are not using them badly.

My hon. colleague raised the question about access to information. In his report, on page 26, the Auditor General says that "access is not an ongoing problem for me or my office". He goes on to say:

> On 27 December 1985 the government, by Order in Council, directed that the Auditor General be given access to a wide range of cabinet documents. These include all the information I normally need to fulfil my audit responsibilities. The Order in Council has resulted in a constructive relationship between the government and my Office over the past four years.

> This good working relationship has, I believe, served Parliament, the people of Canada, and the government itself well. I am confident that it can continue.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, it is not going to work in this government's defence today.

My supplementary question is again for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Treasury Board guidelines state, and I quote: "Executive aircraft should only be used in cases where commercial air service is not available or not suitable and when the purpose of the trip is to carry out ministerial or departmental business".

We know that this government is withholding information from the Auditor General which could well show an outright abuse of that public trust. My question is: How many more ministers of the Crown, of this government, would go the way of Suzanne Blais-Grenier if the Auditor General was allowed to do his job and was given all the information concerning government and ministers' expense accounts?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, we undertook yesterday in this House to give all members the number of times that each minister used a government aircraft, the date, the itinerary, the names of all passengers on each trip in a government aircraft, the reason for the use of a government aircraft, and the cost for the use of the government aircraft. That is more forthcoming than any government in the past.

If my hon. colleague has so many questions, maybe he would care to explain why in 1984 the previous government used aircraft on 677 occasions while we have brought that down to less than 300.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Yesterday, the Auditor General repeated something everyone knows:

> The Government would need less taxes if it were more efficient in collecting them and maximized its service delivery.

My question is as follows, Mr. Speaker: How can the Government justify ripping off taxpayers with its GST when it is not even able to administer the public finances properly?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me just remind the hon. member of the record of spending of this government.

We have held government spending growth and program spending to 3.6 per cent per annum since 1984–85. I remind the hon. member, for comparison, that that same number was 14 per cent in the previous four years. That is 5 per cent over the rate of inflation. Our record is half a per cent less than the rate of inflation. The overhead of government—light, heat, rent, wages, salaries—has gone down by 10 per cent from 1984–85 to 1988–89. Those are two very clear indications of how this government is controlling government spending.

Now compare us to the provinces. Our 3.6 per cent growth rate on program spending is as good as any of the provinces. The provinces range from 3.6 per cent up to 9.5 per cent for the province of Ontario. The average for the provinces is 6.4 per cent, nearly double the rate of increase of the federal government.

Clearly, if the hon. member is going to be honest with himself, he will say that we have a very good record of spending in this government.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, if the minister was to be honest with the Canadian people, he would do a heck of a lot better than that. This government is out of control. The fact is that the Auditor General has said that this government cannot manage the current bureaucracy. Now it is going to triple the number of tax collectors. The government has no right to increase taxes unless it can demonstrate that that is the cord of last resort.

Instead of trying to sell an unsaleable sales tax, why does the government not properly administer the nation's finances?

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the minister did not hear the question.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I did hear the hon. member use the words "out of control". Let me remind him while we are on the subject of the Auditor General that it was the Auditor General, about 10 years ago under a Liberal government, who said that the public purse was close to being right out of control.

If the hon. member wants to look through the statements that the Auditor General makes about the control of government spending, about the changes in attitude, they are in the Auditor General's report this year; they were in the Auditor General's report last year; and they will be in the Auditor General's report as long as this government is in office.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. PCBs and other dangerous cargoes are being carried on Canadian passenger ferries.

I put this government on notice through the Minister of Transport on September 15 by outlining the details of this situation, and all we have had is silence. Yesterday the Auditor General raked the government over the coals for its failure to put in place any program whatever to inspect shipments of dangerous cargoes on passenger ferries.

Will the government now, today in the House of Commons, end its silence on this issue and give the people of Canada a commitment that no more dangerous cargoes will be transported on passenger ferries until there is in place an adequate and proper system of inspection by the Department of Transport?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a very important point, one which the Auditor General also raised.

The transportation of dangerous goods in any mode is subject to very strict regulations under the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act. Anyone who transports dangerous goods in defiance of the act is breaking the law. The Auditor General has noted that we do investigate and conduct inspections on ferries when specific concerns exist. We do random inspections as well.

The department will continue to work closely with the other jurisdictions in this area to improve upon the safe transportation of dangerous goods.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the minister's own officials and the Auditor General say that in fact they do not have the personnel to make the inspections she refers to, so the law is not being complied with.

EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is again for the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday there was an earth tremor on Vancouver Island registering 3.1 on the Richter scale. As the minister knows, people in British Columbia are particularly concerned about the risks of earthquakes.

The Government of Japan spends $100 per capita on emergency preparedness. The city of San Francisco spends $19 per capita. This government spends 29 cents per capita on emergency preparedness.

The people of British Columbia want an honest, real assurance from this government that it understands the urgency of this matter. Will the minister stand up now and give us that assurance?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thought the member might again be complimenting the progress that has been made by Emergency Preparedness Canada in its earthquake planning efforts.

I would like to advise the member that emergency preparedness planning starts at the local level and the provinces have the prime responsibility for planning for earthquakes. At the federal level our role is to ensure there is co-ordination of federal government agencies and federal government resources to fit in with the provinces' plans.

We have developed a plan at the federal level. We have designated the federal agencies and identified resources that could be called into play to assist with the province of British Columbia.

As well, we have provided the resources to the province of British Columbia to hire a full-time earthquake planner. We participated in the training of local municipal officials. We put on workshops.

In fact, if I could suggest it to my hon. colleague who represents the riding of Victoria, we would like to see more activity emanating from the province of British Columbia because we respond to requests for training. If the people in his riding would like to get in touch with us, we would be glad to assist.

FINANCE

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. For the last four weeks while the finance committee has been examining the goods and services tax, many of my constituents and the Kelowna Chamber of Commerce have been suggesting that they would prefer a lower rate of tax, even if it means including such items as food.

Recently the Conference Board recommended a proposal for a 7 per cent rate. Will the minister at least consider some of these suggestions to lower the rate?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have read about and heard from a number of people who are suggesting that we lower the rate, but let me comment for a minute on the Conference Board proposal.

It has come up with a proposal for a 7 per cent rate but in that proposal it has exaggerated the price effect, the difference between a 7 per cent and a 9 per cent rate rate. In addition to that, it has left a $3 billion gap in the reduction of the rate from 9 per cent to 7 per cent.

The Conference Board can ignore a $3 billion gap and let the deficit go up. I unfortunately cannot. This government must proceed with a package that does allow for the deficit to continue its downward track.

Now in response to the hon. member's question, I have said all along that this is a GST system, a package. It includes a GST credit or a rebate to low income Canadians. It includes a reduction in the middle income rate, a payment to small business for compliance cost and a housing rebate. If that rate is to come down many of those elements have to be reduced.

There is not a consensus, that I have heard, on ways of reducing that rate.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of members the presence in the gallery of two long time former members of the Parliament from South Africa, Helen Suzman and Dr. Alex Boraine.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Last week in announcing a toxic waste clean-up program the minister indicated that Canadian toxic wastes would be incinerated in Canada. He said: "We will not destroy them in England. We will not destroy them on the planet Mars. We will have to destroy them here in Canada".

Despite this commitment the minister's department had just days earlier given permission to allow the shipment of contaminated wastes from Quebec to France for destruction.

Will the minister explain this inconsistency between his words and the actions of his department? Will he explain why he said earlier today that he does not have the power to prevent this shipment?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like the member to give the full quote on the expression of the government's policy on PCB exportation. What I said on behalf of the government was that there would be no more exports of federal PCBs to foreign countries for destruction and that we would try to reduce to the minimum the export of private PCBs to foreign countries for destruction.

• (1450)

Those PCBs which left Montreal last night are not federal PCBs; they are private PCBs.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): They left for France and the reason we have not stopped the shipment is that we had no legal reason to do so. I had extensive consultations with the government's legal experts, and I was advised that we have no legal grounds to act because the shipment complies completely with federal government requirements.

I will not expose this government to the embarrassment of having a decision quashed by the courts as was done in Quebec the other day. I have instructed the officials in my department to examine the possibilities of enacting new regulations to control completely the export of PCBs.

Mr. Anawak: Mr. Speaker, I find it strange that in an area of national interest there would be a difference between local PCBs and government PCBs.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): They are privatizing PCBs.

Mr. Anawak: Sections 41 to 45 of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act give the minister the power to make regulations prohibiting the import or export of toxic wastes. Under Section 35 of that act the minister can issue an interim order in the absence of adequate regulations.

Will the minister undertake to issue such an order immediately?

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, of course there is a distinction to draw between the two regulations that have been quoted. The last one is in case of immediate danger. I was advised by the officials last night that there was no danger to invoke in this case.

The other regulation is a general one, and we are in the process of examining the possibility of enacting such a regulation in the next week. We will keep Parliament posted.

VIA RAIL

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport my question is for the Minister of State for Transport. The day the minister announced the VIA Rail cut-backs he stated that unionized employees laid off as a result of the VIA cut-backs, in his words, would receive a generous package.

Will the minister confirm that VIA officials are now claiming that because the cut-backs were a government decision and not a VIA decision employees will receive benefits based on 80 per cent of their salaries rather than on 100 per cent as specified in their collective agreements? Since the government caused this problem will it continue to go along with it or will it change it?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Transport stated in the House, we have asked that VIA make sure that all employees are treated within the guidelines of the collective agreement and that they receive fair and just treatment.

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Just recently a 53-year-old VIA employee from Halifax with over 20 years service called VIA's hot line in Montreal to ask about the early retirement plan. He was told that no such plan existed. At the same time VIA is offering non-unionized employees an early retirement plan.

Will the minister confirm that a double standard does exist, that non-unionized employees are offered a golden handshake while unionized employees are not even offered a hand? Why would the government support this unfair practice?

Mrs. Martin (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, the VIA organization is now working on setting the plans for what it is going to be doing as it implements the changes in the next few months and the next few years. All consideration will be given to all employees whether they be union or non-union, and they will be treated fairly.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister claims that sending Haitians back to Haiti does not put them in any danger. She claims that she obtained this information from the United Nations and External Affairs.

The minister ought to know that neither the United Nations High Commission for Refugees nor Canada's representative at the United Nations are aware of such a report. Could the minister inform the House where she got this information? And could she table the information here in the House?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I said Sunday, I have reviewed the issue of deportations to Haiti. Officials in my Department and at the Canadian Embassy in Port-au-Prince were consulted.

[English]

I should add that after some considerable thought I am satisfied that the situation in Haiti is not such that refused refugee claimants or other Haitians who had no legal status in Canada would be exposed to any particular danger.

I have read reports prepared by my officials and they include the results of discussions with External Affairs and with information from the IRB which routinely takes into account information from the United Nations.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, the minister would surely be aware that according to a recent report by Americas Watch members of popular organizations in Haiti who speak out against the government are being killed or beaten and the Avril regime refuses to speak out or to take action to defend them.

Therefore, in view of the uncertainty in Haiti, will the minister halt all further deportations of Haitians, review their cases and allow them to remain on humanitarian and compassionate grounds?

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, let me point out that Haitians in Canada—and I know this is something that the hon. member has considerable sensitivity to, as I do myself—have access to protection through the Immigration and Refugee Board, if they can show that they are refugees within the sense of the definition contained in our immigration law which conforms to international practice and indeed is more sensitive.

The cases of persons who were found not to be refugees are reviewed by immigration officials who give consideration, once again routinely, to extenuating humanitarian and compassionate circumstances before removal is carried out.

FINANCE

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. During the past two years, Québec's mining regions, including Abitibi—Témiscamingue, have gone through a period of great economic anxiety. Many junior mines have had to close their doors and wait for better days. Unemployment has risen considerably, and last week, the Government of Québec abolished the CNIL on mine exploration costs. Mr. Speaker, my question is as follows: Could the Minister confirm to the House today whether he is prepared to discuss with the provincial Finance Ministers the possibility of abolishing the CNIL on half the federal deduction granted on every purchase of flow-through shares?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I understand the Hon. Member's concern about flow-through shares.

[English]

I would like to say to him that an investment decision that one would make to invest in a flow-through share is partly based on the CNIL but also partly based on the outlook for equity markets, the outlook for the gold markets and so on.

I appreciate my colleague's ongoing concern in this matter. I will certainly take his representations very much into account if there are any changes being contemplated.

MINING

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. In industrial Cape Breton the unemployment rate is twice the national average. This, coupled with the recent closure of CFB Sydney, Air Canada cut-backs, VIA Rail cut-backs, fish plant closing, ACOA cut-backs and Devco cut-backs, is crippling the economy of industrial Cape Breton.

Will the minister indicate to the House whether or not he is clearly committed to providing new moneys for insuring the longevity and viability of the Lingan mine, thereby enabling 1,200 workers to maintain their employment and to provide certainty to a community which is saddled with high unemployment?

• (1500)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to answer that question. I think the hon. member knows that no government has done more for Cape Breton than this government. From the beginning of 1984 until the present we have put into Devco for operating and capital expenses over $540 million, and that does not include any other programs we have been actively pursuing in Cape Breton.

I would like to tell the hon. member that I have been in touch with the corporation and the union. We are discussing corporate structuring for the future to make sure that Devco can continue as a commercial and viable corporation. We know that the Lingan colliery is an important part of that.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. In listening to him, even his own minister responsible for ACOA had to laugh at that comment, that no government has done more for Cape Breton than this government. Even he had to laugh.

Mr. MacKay: That is misleading the House.

Mr. Dingwall: My question is this. The Premier of Nova Scotia has stated, and I quote: "We already have made it very clear to the federal government that there is no possible way that that mine can close".

Will the minister inform the House as to whether or not the respective governments, provincial and federal, have entered negotiations in order to provide moneys under a special ERDA to ensure that that mine does not close? Is the federal minister responsible clearly committed to maintaining the operations of the Lingan mine and those 1,200 jobs? Yes or no?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that this government is committed to the long-term future of Devco as a commercial operation. The long-term future of Devco as a commercial operation means that it has to be operated as a commercial operation. It must, in fact, cut its cloth to the funds available.

I have said to the hon. member, to the House and to Devco that we are there to help. We have put in place a $32 million reference plan for it this year. We will continue with something similar in the future. That means Devco can continue. That means the Lingan colliery could very well have a future.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex will have a single question, followed by the hon. member for Nickel Belt with a single question.

FREE TRADE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, before the free trade agreement became law the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds spoke about the Canadian Wheat Board being able to sell into the American market without fear once the free trade agreement became law. The free trade agreement is now law. Yet our Canadian Durum wheat producers are being subjected to a threat of countervail duty.

Will the minister outline what action, if any, he is taking to defend Canadian interests, since the free trade agreement has failed to protect our producers. Or are your hands tied by the U.S. omnibus trade bill which obviously supersedes the free trade agreement?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to report to the member that largely as a result of free trade the Wheat Board is selling record amounts of wheat in the United States.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mayer: In fact, if I remember rightly—and think about this—the United States regularly exports 30 million the United States was our fourth or fifth largest customer as far as milling wheat is concerned. It looks like we are going to sell it a record amount of Durum this year.

So, as a result of the free trade agreement, we have better and more secure access. What the member is talking about is a threat of countervail. In the meantime we are selling wheat to that market in record amounts because we have a quality product, and it is priced competitively.

SCIENCE

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. As the minister is well aware, Canada has an opportunity to take a leadership role in research involving sub-atomic particles. For us to do that it is essential therefore for the Neutrino observatory to be located in the Creighton mine. To do that, the Neutrino now needs $12 million over the next four years.

Can the minister give an assurance to this House and to the scientific community in this country that the government will come up with the $12 million in funding which, of course, is hinged on other scientists contributing their $10 million? The effective date is November 15. Can the minister give some assurance to the research community in this country that we can get the Neutrino funding?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. It is one that has been repeated to me by the member for Timiskaming many times.

The situation at the moment is that the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council has $15 million on the table for the project. We have a commitment from the United States, which is not entirely firm yet. We have a commitment from the United Kingdom. We have $7.6 million from the Province of Ontario. There is still some to go. I am meeting with the president of NSERC at five o'clock today to see where that extra funding can be obtained, and if we can meet the deadline.

POINTS OF ORDER

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the Public Accounts of Canada in listing the indemnities to members has made a mistake in listing me, which if it were true would be remarkable, but it is not true, as having received $80,203 last year rather than $58,725 in indemnities. Public Accounts lists me as having received $26,655 in expense allowances rather than $19,525 and lists me as having received $30,927 in travel expenses rather than $22,267. All together, Mr. Speaker, Public Accounts lists me as having received $137,785 rather than $100,517.

Since I have not received the larger amounts listed, I wish to have the record show what were the accurate accounts. These are the figures that I have from the comptroller.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member.

The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam on a point of order.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Minister of Finance made reference to my absence from the House. He knows that is against the rules of the House. Perhaps it was corrected by a subsequent minister. I cannot make reference to where he is now. I would just tell him this that I did not take one of those government jets around the country, that is all.

Mr. Speaker: I certainly shall take notice of the hon. member's comments. I know that he will discuss his complaint with some of his colleagues in the better interests of decorum in this place.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to eight petitions.

ORDER IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

While I am on my feet, I move:

That the House do now proceed to Orders of the Day.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member from Victoria rising on a point of order?

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I realize that we generally raise a point of order when the government has moved such a motion. Correct me if I am wrong, but the government has moved a motion which all it manages to do is cut off petitions—well, there are a few other items but presumably there is nothing else coming up under that—but the rights of the citizens of this country to bring petitions are being cut off. I would ask you to rule it out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the hon. member's intervention. The hon. Minister of Justice's motion is completely in order.

I might also say with respect to petitions that there are two ways of presenting a petition. One is by filing them with the Table. They go to the government and they have to be answered within a certain period of time. The second is that a member can stand.

• (1510)

I recognize the inconvenience that it causes to members on both sides when one side or the other moves to eliminate, at least for one day, some aspects of Routine Proceedings. But I must say that the hon. Minister of Justice's motion is completely in order, and I shall proceed with it.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, October 16 consideration of Bill C–21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the procedure that has taken place in the House the last few minutes, I wonder if I could have the unanimous consent of the House to revert to presentation of committee reports. I have a report from the public accounts committee to present to the House today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the members of the House for their co–operation.

I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the third report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

I wish to say a few words in presenting this report, Mr. Speaker. The public accounts committee today tables a report which addresses significant concerns in the areas of government food inspection, pesticide regulation and controls against the spread of plant and animal diseases. Canadians continue to have confidence in the safety of the food supply. In order to maintain this confidence, as the audit considered by the committee pointed out, there is a need to assess risks to human health and allocate resources to the areas of highest risk.

While the Department of Agriculture which is responsible for the food production and inspection branch has responded positively to the audit, the committee is calling upon the Auditor General to assess the department's progress in this follow–up audit. In particular, the committee was not satisfied with the low quality of information presented to Parliament in the department's annual spending estimates, Part III of the estimates documents, and has recommended improvements in this regard.

The committee also recommends amendments to the import control provisions of legislation and regulations to help improve procedures that guard against the spread of animal and plant diseases. Finally, concerns were expressed about improved training of food inspectors and better management of labour relations in the department.

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS ACT

NOTICE OF MOTION PURSUANT TO S. O. 57

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I give notice that at the next sitting of the House, immediately before the order of the day is called for resuming debate on the motion for second reading and reference to a legislative committee of Bill C–36, an act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, and on any amendments proposed thereto, I will move that the debate shall not be further adjourned.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Given the spirit that this House showed a few moments ago in allowing the hon. member to revert to tabling of reports, I would ask unanimous consent that we be allowed to revert to the tabling of petitions so that members can represent their constituents in the way that the House rules were designed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Minister of Justice, on the same point of order.

Mr. Lewis: As the Speaker so aptly pointed out earlier today, there are two ways to file petitions. One takes up a lot time in the House, and another is through what is called the back door and at the table. I suggest to my hon. friend that he avail himself of that opportunity and do so accordingly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Regina—Lumsden, on a point of order.

Mr. Benjamin: Since we are still on Routine Proceedings, I move:

That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must rule that the motion is out of order and I must also rule, be it late, that there is no unanimous consent for the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan to revert to petitions. The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could seek clarification from Your Honour. We have now unanimously reverted back to presenting reports from committees. If we have reverted back to that point in Routine Proceedings, presumably that is where we are. Would you indicate, Mr. Speaker, whether now we will be proceeding with Routine Proceedings from that point?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The way that I ruled gave the authorization to the member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke to bring in his report by unanimous consent. We go back to Orders of the Day. Orders of the Day had been called when we did that, so we will resume Orders of the Day.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14.

Government Orders

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has reviewed the arguments of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce with respect to Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act to read in part as follows, and has decided that motions Nos. 21, 22 and 23 will remain grouped for debate, but voted on upon as follows: (a) A vote on Motion 21 will be applied to Motion No. 23; and (b) Motion No. 22 will be voted on separately.

I thank the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce for his comments.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate.

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I remind members, as we are about to vote on the first set of motions, that a vote on Motion No. 4 applies to Motion No. 5, and an affirmative vote on Motion No. 6 obviates the need for a vote on Motions Nos. 8 and 11. A negative vote on Motion No. 6 necessitates a vote on Motions Nos. 8 and 11. A vote on Motion No. 7 applies to Motion No. 10. Motions Nos. 12, 13 and 14 will be voted on separately. Is that clear for everybody?

Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 4 standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn) moved:

Motion No. 15

That Bill C-21 be amended in Clause 11 by adding immediately after line 7 at page 10 the following:

"(3) for the purpose of this section, a major claimant shall be defined as being a claimant having ten or more weeks of employment during the qualifying period."

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved:

Motion No. 16

That Bill C-21 be amended in Clause 12 by striking out line 13 at page 10 and substituting the following therefor:

"able to a claimant to".

Motion No. 18

That Bill C-21 be amended in Clause 14 by striking out line 10 at page 11 and substituting the following therefor:

"able to a claimant to".

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to speak on Bill C-21 today, I must admit that it does not give me very much pleasure.

This bill, which will totally revamp the unemployment insurance program, is nothing short of a policy to shut down rural Canada. It is nothing short of a policy to shut down the small community in Canada. It is nothing short of the rape of Canada's natural resources by this government with its trade policies.

I want to say today that in some rural communities there is only one industry. We have areas in this country today where the government has closed down that one industry. It sold the softwood lumber industry down the drain when it is the only employer in town. It is really brave of this government to come out and say that it will provide more mobility funds to move people to new places of employment.

I just wish that all cabinet ministers who gave their consent to this legislation were put in a position where they had to sell their homes, move out to the cities or to another area of the country to find a new job. They do not know what they are perpetrating upon small community Canada, upon people who have lived in their homes for a lifetime, who will have lesser time allotted for unemployment insurance. These people will have to move out. Suppose they have to move to Toronto to find a job? Who will put up with the expenses of living in the city of Toronto today after moving from some small community in northern Ontario or eastern Ontario?

What are you perpetrating upon these people? The government is already complaining about the high cost of living in Toronto but it is ready to ram more people in there, put more pavement over the land of this country. This will go a long way to developing this nation within 100 miles of the American border. The government is against regional development in this country. Without those support programs the regions of this country will not be able to exist.

The changes to unemployment insurance will adversely affect the rural Canadian economy because local industries and firms are often set up to employ seasonal workers long enough so that they can qualify for UI benefits. These citizens need a sound UI system to see them through the slow period. If they cannot pay the bills, the local grocery store will not benefit, the local gas station will not benefit. Nobody is going to benefit in that community.

In answer to this problem of rural communities where you have only one industry, the government has chosen to increase mobility funds. It will help workers move to areas where there are employment opportunities rather than create a comprehensive regional development policy. You are uprooting these people from their homes. You are doing it with the passage of this bill.

Unemployment insurance benefits not only help the unemployed pay for their rent, their groceries and other necessities but also sustain the economic life of the very community by providing essential purchasing power for business activity.

Furthermore, this government has moved away from its financial responsibility for the unemployed in this country. That is a direct responsibility of the federal government as a result of amendments to our constitution back in 1940. It is throwing the whole weight of the expenses of future programs for the unemployed on the individual worker who has to pay an increased fee toward the unemployment insurance fund.

The employer, whether small business or big business, whether a farmer employing a person, must pay a larger fee to the unemployment insurance fund. Why? Because the federal government is retreating like a coward from its financial responsibility to labour in this nation. The government should not move on its reform of the unemployment insurance system, if ever, until the boundaries for labour force economic regions have been redrawn.

As it stands now, some rural regions with high unemployment rates are grouped with metropolitan areas with lower rates of employment.

My own riding is a case in point. The upper Ottawa valley has always been averaged in with the city of Ottawa and with more affluent communities to the south. As a result, even though our unemployment rate is high at many times during the year, because we are averaged in with the lower unemployment rates in more prosperous communities it decreases our level of unemployment and we do not get the true picture. It affects the number of weeks that people have to work to qualify for unemployment insurance, and it also affects the number of weeks that they will be able to collect unemployment insurance.

In my own riding, I have a very good example of what happens on these famous boundary lines. I have a boundary line between Renfrew County and the District of Nipissing that runs right through the bush. If persons live on the south side of that boundary in Renfrew County, they have a longer waiting period because they are averaged in with Ottawa on the unemployment rate standards. Someone who lives just beyond the border to the north can qualify with a shorter number of weeks of employment.

We have a submission in from the upper valley that the boundary line for the new labour force economic region be Highway No. 7 up to Carleton Place and then Highway No. 15 from there on through to the town of Arnprior.

Move us up into northern Ontario where we belong instead of leaving us in an area where there is relatively good employment at times that affects every worker and every resident in an area where the average unemployment level is reduced because of the more affluent communities with which we are averaged to get the unemployment rate.

It is wrong to bring this bill in before those labour force economic regions are established. The government should understand that, but it does not care. It has been told this time and time again, but it is so anxious to get this in place it does not want the labour force economic region boundaries to interfere with their future plans.

I can only say in the 30 seconds I have left that the concept of government involvement in social assistance type programs or in regional development programs that are dependent on income maintenance schemes is now a thing of the past. Regional development is a thing of the past. Not only have we ceased to have governments assist regions in this country to grow, but by the passage of this bill the government is making things so difficult for the small, average Canadian in this country that he is eventually going to have to move out of those communities.

The government is depopulating rural Canada and sending those people to the cities. It is like standing up in the streets of the small communities of Canada and saying: "Will the last one out please turn out the lights?" This is what the government is perpetrating on small communities in Canada.

This bill is anti-employee as opposed to just anti-labour because it affects everybody who pays unemployment insurance regardless of their category. It is going to produce more urban areas in this country; more pavement and less development in the regions of the nation.

It is not only the revisions to this bill. It is the cuts in VIA Rail. It is the softwood lumber issue where the government has no sense of moving on the issue at all. As a result we are going to have rural Canada shut down.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the amendments that have been proposed to the bill to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to suggest that there is very, very good reason and good cause for these amendments.

Unemployment insurance legislation presently says people cannot get access to special benefits unless they have a major attachment to the workforce. Unemployment insurance defines major attachment as someone who has 20 or more weeks of insurable earnings. That means someone who has less than 20 weeks of work cannot get pregnancy benefits or sick benefits. Surely, that is an unfair assumption on the part of the act and an unfair way for us to proceed. We do not think that is right and we very strongly feel that there are different levels of unemployment in Canada by region, by nature of industry and by gender. So we have put forward and support this amendment on the basis that it does, indeed, reflect the varying levels of work in this country, the varying circumstances of those who are attached to the workforce and would more fairly and clearly reflect the needs of Canadians.

For example, the legislation does not recognize that in this case there is less work in Newfoundland than there is in Toronto. There is less work in Mission than there is in Vancouver.

We think that the present provision clearly discriminates against women in this legislation because only women, for example, face the provision regarding pregnancy.

I think it is important that while we debate this legislation, we keep clearly in mind the circumstances that women have faced over the years in becoming part of the workforce and the circumstances that still today predicate against them being full and active participants in the workforce. We receive work, we get work, but still we face barriers once we reach the workplace, even in this Chamber.

Particularly I want to address the kinds of barriers that women face in the workforce, like unemployment insurance provisions, and like other provisions in the workforce that make it very, very difficult for women to be full participants.

This legislation creates a situation where increasing eligibility periods and maintaining the 20 week eligibility period for special claims like pregnancy leave make it increasingly difficult for women to not only receive the benefits, but to also make it difficult for women as re-entrants into the workplace. What we would be doing with the government's provision in this legislation is depriving women in particular but, in fact, disabled workers and other workers who have barriers in front of them from keeping any employment benefit under the act.

I have said that women in particular would be adversely affected by restricting access to benefits under this act. But since 1985, 35 per cent of unemployed women were new and re-entrant participants in the workforce compared to 12 per cent of unemployable men. So, as you can see, Mr. Speaker, this particular clause in the amendments to the act would, in fact, continue to make it difficult for women because women would be more affected by this clause.

I would like the House to consider the fairness about inequity in access to unemployment insurance. Denying these benefits to "minor attachment claimants", in fact, perpetuates low attachment to the workforce by penalizing those people when they are out of the workforce by necessity. Women, youths, re-entrants to the workforce are especially hard hit and they have, for the most part, the shortest work records. If we want to encourage greater participation, why would we distinguish between the types of claimants? Why not make it easier for people to remain attached to the workforce?

It is interesting to note that the all-party committee during the last Parliament, some of whose members more recently served on the legislative committee on Bill C-21, recommended unanimously that special entrance requirements for these benefits be eliminated. They also recommended that the two week waiting period for maternity and adoption benefits be eliminated. I would like to know where those members from the governing side of the House are today who are standing in support of the government's motion but not supporting the amendments that we brought before the committee.

The amendments on this talk about one kind of discrimination. I would like to mention another kind of discrimination. The hon. member for Burlington yesterday talked about people appearing before the committee tabling briefs. I am not sure of his exact words, but the inference was that they were copies of the Canadian Labour Congress's brief. I would like to talk about the kinds of attitudes that permeate this whole piece of legislation. I would like to read a letter that was addressed to the chair of the legislative committee on Bill C-21. It talks about the kind of treatment a group of people received when they came before the committee. The letter states:

On September 28, 1989, myself and two other representatives of the National Union of Provincial Government Employees made a presentation to your committee on proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Having presented dozens of briefs to federal and provincial legislative committees over the past 20 years, I was quite shocked by the treatment our delegation received at the hands of certain government members of Parliament.

As you may recall during our presentation the hon. member from Burlington whispered loudly to his neighbour, slouched in his chair and made repeated gestures indicating his disapproval of the National Union's views of Bill C–21.

Two other Tory MPs whispered to each other so loudly that I had to interrupt them and ask them if there was another meeting going on. A Conservative staff person—not a member of the committee— made a loud negative comment to a committee member about the NUPGE brief prompting you to call for order.

During the question period, the MP from South Shore asked hostile questions then attempted to direct the answer and did not let me finish my response. At one point that member told me I was "out to lunch", at another point, he made a sarcastic comment about the presentation and the response to it from opposition members of the committee.

I have always believed that the purpose of legislative committee hearings was to give interested groups and individuals the opportunity to present their views on legislation introduced in the House of Commons. It was quite clear from their performance that certain committee members had no interest in our views and were determined to act accordingly.

As far as we are concerned the behaviour of the aforementioned MPs was rude and inappropriate. It was particularly inappropriate since those very members of Parliament have among their constituents members of our union and their families; do they not have a responsibility to hear what their own constituents have to say? I am confident that you, as chairman of the committee, do not condone this type of behaviour and will indicate your disapproval to your Conservative colleagues.

Democracy is too fragile and too important a process to be abused in this fashion. Let us hope that this type of incident does not happen again.

Sincerely yours,

John Fryer, National President, National Union of Provincial Government Employees.

That letter and the kinds of amendments included in Bill C–21 are the very reason that this side of the House is absolutely shocked and dismayed at the attitude of the government in terms of our presenting very thoughtful, reasoned amendments to this legislation. We would urge the government side of the House to give them serious consideration.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to be able to speak, albeit briefly considering the guillotine that has been imposed on the debate on this legislation by the government, on some of the amendments that have been proposed to Bill C–21. I am speaking to begin with of those amendments having to do with minor and major attachment claimants.

I would just like to raise a few points having to do with the reason we in our party believe that the distinction between minor and major attachment claimants is passé. It is a breach in equity and it is about time that that distinction be abolished in the unemployment insurance program.

I would like to say why we feel that way and why these amendments, which would add a little bit of equity into this flawed piece of legislation, ought to be introduced.

First, one of the few aspects of this legislation which had any merit dealt with what the government called making UI fair. In most cases it makes UI much less fair, but the improvements to parental benefits and the making of special benefits more flexible were a movement toward fairness.

As well, the provisions which make it possible for persons 65 years of age and over to qualify for, to contribute to, and to receive UI benefits were measures that had been called for three or four years ago by the Equality For All task force in order to make the unemployment insurance program compatible with the quality provisions of the charter.

The government, in taking four years to implement those benefits, did not do itself credit, but at least we finally see the government go some way toward rectifying that inequity.

The distinction between minor and major attachment claimants, as my colleague in the NDP mentioned, has the effect of requiring claimants for special benefits, such as maternity pregnancy benefits or parental benefits, to have 20 weeks of insurable earnings before being admitted under the program. In other instances such as regular benefits, the requirement depends on the local unemployment rate. This is really a distinction that ought not to exist. It is a flaw in the program. It is a breach of fairness.

What it really says is that women who become pregnant somehow have chosen to become pregnant while a member of the labour force in order to draw benefits while they are unemployed and on maternity benefits. That is the kind of stain which the major attachment requirement places upon any claimant who applies for parental or pregnancy benefits. That is the stain that has been placed on women in the past in unemployment insurance regulations.

I draw to your attention for historical purposes one example which used to be called the "magic ten" requirement, that required a women to be in the labour force at least ten weeks from the moment of conception to the time at which she drew her benefits. This was clearly an example of a society telling women they have no right in the workforce because they might become pregnant and we might have to pay them maternity benefits, that they tried to get into the workforce so that they could draw benefits from the state. The major and minor attachment distinction is one more example of that redundant, archaic and anachronistic feature in the unemployment insurance program which, if the government had been serious about making it fair, would have eliminated.

We are giving the government one chance to do that with these amendments. I hope we can get the government side to support these amendments and remove that distinction.

• (1630)

I would like to speak to the broader elements of this bill in the few moments that I have remaining. One of the things about unemployment insurance, when we talk about principles for modifying that law, is the whole principle of equity. One of the features which the government has trumpeted very loudly in terms of how this legislation will better affect the regions of this country which face high unemployment rates due largely to the seasonality of their industries is the repeater provision. The way in which the government has tried to pull the wool over our eyes with its abandonment of the repeater provision is really an example of how Canadians are being sold a bill of goods with this unemployment insurance bill.

The repeater provision, for those who are not familiar with the unemployment insurance program, is that provision which said that a person who had been receiving benefits during the qualifying period for which he was making a subsequent claim would require extra weeks of work in order to be eligible for benefits. The number of weeks was 16 and, depending upon the unemployment rate, even higher.

The government has ended repeater provisions and wants us to applaud it for having done so. Rather than applauding it, we should condemn the government for being so cynical in trying to tell us that that is an improvement in the program which will make unemployment benefits easier for workers in seasonal industries. Quite clearly it is not the case because while the government was taking away the repeater clause, it was raising the minimum entrance requirements for everybody to a point at which in almost every economic region of the country, with the exception of maybe three or four out of 48, the repeater provisions are completely nullified by the increase in the entrance requirement.

This winter those in regions of Nova Scotia or in New Brunswick will no longer have to face the repeater provision. What they will be faced with—and there will be many more people who will fall into this category—will be higher entrance requirements of four to six weeks. Many of them will arrive at the doorstep of the employment centre and ask to be qualified for unemployment benefits as they have in the past and will be told: "Sorry, we cannot help you, the government introduced a new bill. It means that you now need four to five more weeks of work in order to qualify for UI, so sorry, you will have to go somewhere other than your local welfare office."

The government has been rather amazed that its changes to UI have gone through with such little resistance. I would like to forewarn members opposite that they are just about to start to see the resistance that the Canadians are going to convey to them once these measures are put in place.

Every member opposite whose constituents are suddenly going to find that they must require two, three, four more weeks or not be qualified for benefits, will be on the members' doorsteps condemning the government's legislation which brought this about. We on this side of the House are not going to make it any easier.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, the unemployment insurance changes are before us now. In this instance, we are talking increasing eligibility periods and maintaining the 20–week eligibility period for special claimants and new and re–entrants, which seems to be designed to deprive those who have the most difficulty in obtaining and keeping employment of any benefit from the act. The whole thrust would seem to be that people who are unemployed are unemployed either because they want to be, because they want to get paid for not working—

Mr. Fisher: Punish the victims.

Mr. Stupich: As my colleague says, the government wants to punish the people who are the victims of the system itself. The people who are unemployed because they do not want to be are being punished and persuaded somehow or other that they have to keep on working or go to work in the first place. It is very prevalent in periods of high unemployment to say that those who are unemployed are unemployed because they are too lazy to work. I am sure we have all heard that. There is nothing new about that idea, and it comes up more and more in times of high unemployment.

It may be hard for some people to remember, but the unemployment insurance legislation itself came into effect in 1941. There were unemployed people even before we had legislation trying to push people into going to work, whether they wanted to or not. Some people say the unemployment insurance legislation keeps people unemployed because it is there. It is a safety net. They do not want to bother working. Even before there was that legislation, there were unemployed in the country.

During the Great Depression, we had as many as 20 per cent unemployed. Of course, the popular idea then was if we could simply export all of the unemployed from Canada we would be in great shape because everybody else would be working. It sounds silly, it is crazy. Nevertheless that idea was talked about and promoted, those people are too lazy to work, get them out of the country, and leave in the country only those who do have the ambition to work. Then we would have no problem. There would be nobody unemployed. Mr. Speaker, you and I know, it just does not work that way.

The legislation came in because there was very high unemployment prior to the war. The 20 per cent unemployment rate was one reason for bringing legislation in. It came in during the war when, strange to say, there was not that unwillingness to work. People did not take advantage of the unemployment legislation during the war because there were job opportunities, because we had an economic system that put everybody to work. There was a national effort. Unfortunately, it was a wasted accumulating munitions, which to a large extent were dumped in the Atlantic as though we were trying to fill up that hole. We had a million people in the armed services. Still we were able to produce everything we could consume and there was no unemployment.

That national effort was to fight a war and I was part of it. I was in the armed services at the time. Whatever the effort was, we were able to gear our economic and political systems to work together to pursue that goal.

All we need now is a government with a national goal that will provide job opportunities for all of those people. We will not be worrying then about changing the legislation in the hope that by changing it enough, we can force those people who are too lazy to work to go to work.

If there were job opportunities, those people would be working. The government should change its economic policies. One way would be to lower interest rates which would make it possible for us to export more goods, as we were doing during the war. We were exporting then. The fact that goods were going into a hole in the ocean did not matter because that created tremendous job opportunities. We did it all without borrowing abroad because there was nobody to borrow from then. We financed within Canada. We did so to pursue the national effort. There was nothing magic about it. It was a government plan. The government devised and organized it without interference. It had to almost conscript capital to force going along with it, but it was possible to organize during the war an economic system that provided employment for everybody who wanted to work. When there were those job opportunities, strange to say, everybody wanted to work, everybody did work, and for the first time, in the history of Canada to a large extent, women got involved in what were traditionally men's jobs before that. Of course now they have the opportunity to work in all those jobs. That is the way it works.

We cannot do away with unemployment. We cannot make the lot of the unemployed any better by making it tougher to collect unemployment insurance. That is simply going to push the load of maintaining those people onto provincial governments because welfare is going to have to come into play more. Of course, the provincial governments are getting less money, or at least the increase in transfer payments to the provinces are going down and that means that the provinces are going to finance most of this.

The federal government is going to control the economic system. The federal government is going to decide how much interest rates are going to have to go up to control what is happening in southern Ontario as opposed to what is happening in the rest of the country. The federal government will retain complete control of our economic system, but the provinces are going to have to finance the cost of the errors, the cost of the problems that are being created by the federal government.

The government has not come to fully realize just exactly what it is going to cost when you extend, as we are doing here, the periods that employees have to work in order to qualify for unemployment insurance. There will be the opportunity for employers to see that employees do not work long enough if they want to cut their costs. They are going to push people out of work before they qualify. The cost of maintaining those people is going to be borne by the provincial governments through the taxpayers in the provinces rather than by the federal government.

The fault is federal and the opportunity to change this is federal. The government has shown in the past that it can, when there is a national effort to accomplish something which is very worth while, change things. The federal government has the mechanism to do it within Canada. We are no so dependent on external forces as we would like to believe today. The federal government can do it, but it will not.

The federal government is abdicating its responsibility to improve the system, to come up with a system that will work and instead, deliberately pursuing policies which are bound to end in increased unemployment, and at the same time saying that the cost of supporting the people who are forced into unemployment will be borne by another level of government.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate on these amendments to Bill C–21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I share the views expressed by my colleagues on this side of the House as to the cruel and unfair measures the government will take in its changes to the unemployment insurance system. I want to congratulate the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce on his excellent intervention and for his sincere convictions in wishing to see the unemployment insurance system maintained and supported instead of being gutted by this government.

The amendments proposed by the Liberal members who were on the legislative committee studying Bill C–21 are both positive and valid. They seek to ensure that Canada's unemployment insurance system obtains the support it requires in order to provide effective measures for workers who become unemployed.

I ask that the government give serious consideration to adopting the amendments which have been put forward by my colleagues.

I believe that every member in this House realizes what these changes will mean for the Canadian worker. Simply put, workers will have to pay more into the system and receive less in benefits if they become unemployed. There is something inherently wrong with such a relationship. This certainly goes against the attitude of compassion which the government frequently tries to sell to Canadians.

Bill C–21 will place severe limitations and restrictions on the unemployment insurance system and those who may require its assistance. It restricts a claimant's access, eligibility and entitlements. We should remember that UI is supported in part by workers and employers through their individual contributions. Bill C–21 will increase the amount of qualifying weeks needed for a claimant to receive benefits and it will reduce the number of weeks in which those benefits will be provided.

The government has announced that it will withdraw its contributions to the unemployment insurance fund as of January 1, 1990. Employees and employers will be forced to make up for this withdrawal by having their UI premiums increased. The government will now make those workers who may need unemployment insurance assistance truly pay more for less.

It was very benevolent of the government to state in the recent budget that it would be willing to step in and contribute to the financing of unemployment insurance during "difficult economic times when it is inappropriate to raise premiums and prudent to allow deficits to build in the UI account". One is left, however, with the truly frightening thought as to just what exactly will have to occur before the government deems Canada to be in difficult economic times. What will be the litmus test this government will use to make such a decision?

Perhaps the government will recognize difficult economic times are in existence if for example the country is facing high interest rates, severe budget cuts, multiple tax increases, and the closure or takeover of numerous Canadian industries and businesses. Such events would certainly increase unemployment in Canada. If these are valid examples of difficult economic times, then I suggest that the government would be better off to withdraw Bill C–21 right now and maintain its contributions to the unemployment insurance.

I represent the riding of Stormont—Dundas. This riding includes the city of Cornwall and the two rural counties of Stormont and Dundas. Thus my constituents may work in either an urban or rural setting. This is not unlike the situation which exists in a number of ridings throughout Canada. The changes to the unemployment insurance system will, however, have a negative impact upon many of my rural constituents.

Many rural industries and businesses operate with seasonal workers. These workers are usually able to obtain the required number of qualifying weeks for unemployment insurance benefits. Bill C–21 will increase the number of weeks that will be required for such benefits. Given the seasonal nature of their jobs, these workers may not be able to accumulate the extra number of weeks.

Employers in rural areas lay off seasonal workers after a specific period. To become eligible for unemployment insurance benefits, many seasonal workers would have to be kept on longer. I am not sure that employers would keep their workers on longer as it means more wages have to be paid and this increases the employer's operating costs. As a result, their businesses would become less competitive.

If these businesses compete on the international market, they would suffer economically because of the increased costs. It would be ironic to see the Conservative free trade deal adversely affected by its own unemployment insurance changes.

The government boasts that it will provide additional funds for job training. Such a step in itself is positive. However there is a problem of training someone for a job that simply is not there. Often in rural communities there is only one industry or major employer. There are no other avenues for employment. If workers residing in rural areas enter training programs, then after they have learned new skills they may have to move from their present location to find jobs elsewhere.

The government has stated it will increase mobility funds to help workers relocate to higher employment areas. This, however, does not help the viability of the places where the transplanted workers once lived. Is the government content to have a series of ghost towns in rural Canada?

The unemployment insurance benefits have served as a stabilizer in communities where high unemployment exists. These benefits actually play an important role in the local economy. At times they contribute to keeping businesses alive and help keep from placing an added strain on the welfare system. Unfortunately, there are many cases of this throughout the country.

Unemployment in the city of Cornwall, as in the counties of Stormont and Dundas, is fairly high. It is between 10.7 and 10.9 per cent. While unemployment may be higher in other parts of Canada, I believe that these figures are still significant. They convince me that the changes to unemployment insurance will have a serious impact within my riding and other areas of eastern Ontario.

The problem is compounded with the inclusion of Stormont and Dundas and surrounding areas into the eastern Ontario economic region, a region which also incorporates the city of Ottawa. On August 16, 1988, the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration announced the undertaking of a comprehensive review of the unemployment insurance economic regions. These regions are used for the delivery of the unemployment insurance program. The unemployment rate assigned to the economic region in which a worker resides determines the minimum number of insurable weeks needed for that worker to qualify for benefits.

At the time of her announcement the Minister of State for Employment and Immigration said that it had been 12 years since the last comprehensive review had occurred. Since then the minister added that the distribution of people and employment opportunities in Canada have changed.

Thus, rather than just making adjustments, this review would ensure that the system of economic regions would become more responsive and sensitive to the differing conditions throughout Canada. This sounds wonderful except that the review is still going on and the implementation of the unemployment insurance changes is getting closer and closer every day.

The Minister of State for Employment and Immigration made her statement over a year ago. Officials in the department have said that the review has been in progress for well over a year. Moreover, on June 6, 1989, at a meeting of the House of Commons employment committee, senior officials from the Department of Employment and Immigration said that there could be a delay in having the new boundaries in place before the unemployment insurance changes come into effect on January 1, 1990.

The town of Renfrew, the cities of Cornwall and Brockville, and the united counties of Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry have all passed resolutions petitioning the government to bring the necessary boundary changes to the eastern Ontario economic region. I would like to read a portion of their resolution. It states:

> The inclusion of the region of Ottawa–Carleton in the same economic region with such counties as Lanark, Leeds—Grenville, Prescott—Russell, Renfrew, Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry implies that the level of local economic activity characteristic of Metropolitan Ottawa is also characteristic of these counties. This is not the case. The government must revise the current boundaries of the eastern Ontario economic region to accurately reflect the economic realities of eastern Ontario.

Job opportunities and unemployment rates in Stormont—Dundas are not the same as those exist in Ottawa. The two are drastically different. Ottawa has an unemployment rate of just under 6 per cent. Stormont—Dundas has a rate between of 10 per cent and 11 per cent. The inclusion of these areas with Ottawa–Carleton is a ridiculous and wholly unfair situation.

An unemployment insurance claimant residing in a region that has an unemployment rate of under 6 per cent needs, under the new system, 20 weeks of work to qualify for benefits. In a region with an unemployment rate of between 10 per cent and 11 per cent, a claimant requires only 15 weeks to be eligible for benefits. By using the old boundaries, one can easily see the inequality and hardships this will cause.

The Liberal members on the legislative committee studying Bill C–21 have put forward a number of amendments which would improve the fairness of this bill. The government should adopt their amendments if it is sincerely interested in maintaining an effective unemployment insurance system in Canada.

I believe the government would be providing an extreme disservice to Canadian workers by introducing Bill C–21 without including the amendments of my hon. colleagues. The government would in fact be saying that it does not care how Bill C–21 will affect the lives of Canadians in all parts of the country.

People who become unemployed do not automatically lose their financial obligations. Their bills are not paid for them and they do not always find another job right away. What about the older worker, women in the service sector and our youth who are trying to survive in our competitive workforce. By passing Bill C–21 without amendments the government would be saying that it does not care about these people at all.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in addressing this stage of Bill C–21 it disturbs me to see the government's actions. We are asking the working people of this country to pay more for longer periods to get less for shorter periods. On top of that, we are asking the same working people and their employers, regardless of their ability, to pay for a multitude of programs that have absolutely nothing to do with unemployment rates and have absolutely nothing to do with the principle of insurance.

This government from time to time has gone on at great length to say that we have to return the unemployment insurance system to the principles of insurability and that it should have some relevance to the purposes for which the unemployment insurance system was first designed.

But this bill not only introduces one of the most unfair kinds of taxation systems imaginable but, in terms of social cost accounting, it is moving 180 degrees in the opposite direction from which anyone with any modicum of common sense at all ought to be considering. We are asking working people and their employers, regardless of their ability to pay, be they workers or employers, to pay more for longer periods to get less for shorter periods. Obviously that does not make sense. It certainly is not justice and it certainly is not fair.

I have worked with many working people in the some 21 years I spent in the hourly paid labour force in several industries. Those who have worked for 10 or 20 years and are fortunate enough never to find themselves unemployed for a long enough period of time to collect at least know that some of the people they work with are going to benefit from the UI program. They say: "Well, even though I never got anything out of it and I have been paying all these years, at least my workmates get something".

Now we are asking them to pay for education programs and to go even further along the path which was set under the Liberal administration a few years ago. They are paying more for what should be economic development programs and job creation programs. Those programs may be fine. They may be dandy, and maybe we are not going to argue with those particular programs at all, although some of them have had pretty patchy records from time to time. On what basis of common sense or any other kind of reasoning do we suggest that these programs have any relationship at all to an individual employee's or employer's record of employment or unemployment? There is just no basis in reasoning.

Some of the other measures that are being taken within Bill C–21 have been required by court action to extend maternity benefits into paternal benefits are good. While we have not taken issue with them within the context of Bill C–21, I am one of those who have wondered for some time just what the hell they have got to do with employment and unemployment in terms of unemployment insurance premiums.

Where is the relationship between whether somebody is employable or unemployable depending upon the vagaries of their particular company or industry? These are good programs but they have no connection to an unemployment insurance program. It is fraudulent to suggest that they do. We are compounding that fraud by all of these changes, both in internal financing and the kinds of programs we are asking the UIC fund to pay, that is the whole thrust of Bill C–21.

When a measure is so far out and so incomprehensible in terms of the aims and objectives of unemployment insurance as is this, it is hard to know how to force yourself to deal with some of the detailed matters arising out of the legislation. When the entire concept is screwy, it is hard to do what you think is just wasting your time talking about the dotted i's and the crossed t's.

Other changes have been made from time to time in answer to the kinds of reactions arising from some sections of the labour force and some sections of the business community, that say we have to tighten up the rules, tighten up the periods and qualifications, et cetera. We bring in new regulations. Some ordinary employees work 5, 10, 15 or 20 years and never collect UI often never collecting during their entire lives. If they do find themselves suddenly thrown out of work, having been laid off and honestly unemployed after having paid the premiums, they go to the UI office and they make a claim. While some of the trick questions and various other methods that have been brought into the system over the years to stop abuses of the system do not do a very good job of stopping or dissuading those few who want to cheat this system and any system, these methods do an excellent job of discouraging and cheating these honest employees who, once every 10 or 20 years, find themselves on the unemployment lines. They are the ones who get shafted.

Surely we have been at this business of unemployment insurance long enough that anyone who has been a member of Parliament for a few months, not to mention several years as a number of the members opposite have been, should know that those workers are the people who get hurt every time we tighten the screws, and not the ones who Parliament has supposedly been after. So why do we keep doing it? Is it our intent to shaft honest employers and honest employees? I cannot believe that, but after experiencing this place off and on for a number of years I am really left wondering just what kind of motivations we have when we continue to abuse this entire system and the people who should be the honest beneficiaries of it in times of their own peril.

Most working people are honest, most are hard working, most employees and most employers do not mind paying their share. But in terms of equity, why should an employer who is operating a very marginal business in terms of profit, or may in fact be suffering a loss, have to pay exactly the same amount of taxes per employee as a corporation which may have been in the enviable position of earning hundreds of thousands or millions of dollars in profit over the preceding year? What kind of sense of equity brings about a system in which we not only place 100 per cent of the responsibility for payment on those employers and their employees but in which we add a whole host of other programs; social programs, maternity benefits, paternal benefits, job training strategies, education programs and everything else that should properly come out of general revenue based upon ability to pay, and put them onto the backs of those employers and those employees?

The entire system, as we are amending it, is making less and less and less sense every year. If our constituents from one end of the country to the other, from cities and rural areas and the resource hinterlands of this country are up in arms, if they are feeling that nobody really gives a damn about them and nobody in Parliament really gives a damn about any sense of equity or justice, then we can hardly blame them. If we and this institution become held in contempt for what we are doing to those people, I, for one, think that they are entirely justified if we go by the track record of this Parliament in recent years.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the bill that we are considering would seek to drastically change the unemployment insurance regime, a system that has served this country very well. In so many other institutions or programs, be it medicare, pensions or any other item that I could mention to you in the arena of government activities there are abuses. Take medicare, for example. It is not difficult for us to demonstrate that in the medicare area there are abuses. But who is there among us who would suggest that we ought to throw out medicare, that we ought to disrupt the basic system, that we ought to throw out the baby with the bath water? Surely there is a better way.

I submit to you that if these changes go through, if this savage piece of legislation goes through, if the government has its way in gutting the unemployment insurance system, it will have thrown out the baby with the bath water, it will have destroyed a system, a program that has served this country very well.

I hear some among us in this Chamber talk about the lazy people. I have heard it again and again, muttered at first, but now they are getting a little braver because they are beginning to realize that a number of their colleagues over there share the view that somehow people who draw unemployment insurance are lazy.

They ought to have been with me today when I was travelling back from my constituency of Burin—St. George's. At the airport in Stephenville I talked to a lady from one of the nearby communities, a married woman who has three children aged 9, 11 and 13. She was doing what tens of thousands of Newfoundlanders have done over the years. She had the option of staying put and drawing unemployment insurance at the present rate, not at the doctored rate, the diminished rate that we will have if and when this bill goes through. She had that option, but instead last night she packed her suitcase and left her children in the charge of a family member. As I speak she is in Toronto looking for a job. I said to her: "Did you have a job or some indication of a job before you decided to go?" She said: "No, I have to go. I have no choice."

She has a choice of sorts. She can stay home and draw that unemployment insurance and be with her loved ones including her three children, or she can go and seek employment. She is doing what the thousands of Newfoundlanders who live in Fort McMurray, Cambridge, Toronto, Halifax and Vancouver do; what the hundreds from my riding who work on the CP tracks from Saskatchewan through to B.C. every summer for many months do; and what the hundreds more who work on the Great Lakes boats for eight or nine months a year away from their families do.

I have to tell you that as a Newfoundlander I am insulted, absolutely insulted, by the pious suggestions of those people who tell us they will save us from ourselves, who tell us they will help us stop being lazy. I have news for you. It is not laziness that has put many of my fellow Newfoundlanders on the receiving end of unemployment insurance over the years, not laziness but absolute, dire necessity.

As in the example I just gave you of the mother with the three children, even when they have the option of receiving unemployment insurance benefits many of them opt to go and look for something better.

Other of my colleagues here on this side of the House will be making points about the individual problems with this legislation. I just want in passing to mention a couple, but I then want to get back on a theme that I think might help members of this House understand why it is the unemployment insurance system ought not to be savaged in the way it will be with this legislation.

The longer qualification period and the shorter benefit period are two proposed provisions which will play a lot of havoc in the area I represent. Why is that? Is it a game because they do not want to go to work? No, it is because there is no work to go to.

It is all very well for somebody who lives in southern Ontario where the economy is moving along quite fine, thank you very much, to sit in judgment on those who receive unemployment insurance benefits. It is a very different matter for those on the receiving end, a very different manner indeed.

You have to look at Newfoundland and other parts of rural Canada in this particular context. In so far as Newfoundland is concerned, and my riding of Burin—St. George's, many of the jobs are by nature seasonal occupations. That is not to anybody's blame; it is just the way it is. It is difficult in parts of Newfoundland to catch fish through three feet of ice. It is difficult to catch fish when the Arctic ice is moving down from Greenland as it does on the northeast coast of Newfoundland, sometimes as late as June. It is foolhardy to be putting nets out there if they are going to be mowed down by an iceberg several times as high as your house.

There are realities out there. If you extract a livelihood from the harsh resources of the North Atlantic there are some realities. One of them is: just as you do not stand in front of a truck in downtown Toronto unless you have a short-term objective, you do not put your boat or nets in front of an iceberg.

All those people who piously tell us about how they are going to save Canada from lazy people ought to take a trip to Newfoundland or take a trip to Cambridge, Ontario, or Fort McMurray and have a look at the lazy Newfoundlanders they are muttering about.

They will find a couple of things if they have done a survey. They will find there are more native born Newfoundlanders living outside Newfoundland today than there are in Newfoundland. I wonder why. It is because they had enough get up and go to get up and go to where the jobs are. But some of them, for many reasons, have not had that option open to them.

We are fed up with being characterized as a bunch of lazies because we happen to take advantage of a program that was designed for our kind in the beginning.

What is our kind? It is the kind of people who through no fault of their own have to find a way to bridge themselves between seasonal job opportunities. That is what the guts of this program is all about. That is why I get upset that the government is wanting to take the guts out of this program and that is what it is doing with this legislation, make no mistake about it.

It is Tory resettlement 1989 style. It is a cowardly, not too well disguised attempt to encourage people to move to urban Canada. Well, we have news for them. I see from your signal, Sir, that my time has run out. If I had more time I would tell you what that news is.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, for now I give you notice that if this government, through unemployment insurance wrecking, through the closing of post offices, through the shutting down and abandoning of railway lines, through the foisting upon people of another tax which they cannot pay, insists on trying to shut down rural Canada as it is doing, the public will have a message for it come the next election.

Maybe what ought to be done, I say to my good friend for Burlington whose heart is in the right place but whose head is all tangled up with the wrong gang, is to go back and, instead of bringing in those semantic rules, those changes which mean nothing, do the people of Canada who have helped build this country from coast to coast a favour, do them a service instead of being party to the insult that somehow they are lazy because they need assistance from the public purse once in a while, until the seasonal job comes around again, until they can of their own resources provide the livelihood for their family and their loved ones.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it is with no great pleasure again that I stand here to debate Bill C–21. After having gone through the closure motions which we went through yesterday and the Draconian actions which this government has put this Parliament through in order that it would hear as little debate as possible on this measure, there is no joy in getting up to speak to it.

When we look at such measures in Bill C–21 as major and minor attachment to the workforce, the natural question to ask is: What does that mean? What it means in its essence is that those who are least advantaged in our society are going to be the ones who suffer the most.

Who are the least advantaged in our society, or the most disadvantaged, whichever way you would like to put it, Mr. Speaker? We find there are several groups of people within that description, but certainly there are those who are less well educated and there are those who work part time, and both groups contain a preponderance of women. In the final analysis, those who are going to be most severely affected by these changes to Bill C–21, and most other changes as well, are women.

For the government to come in with such a change to the act is an indication which I think can be traced to free trade. It can be traced to these fine schemes the government has for forcing the Canadian workforce to be competitive.

Those are phrases which we often hear the government refer to in defence of any number of things it is proposing, all the way from the general sales tax. These references are couched in language that it is trying to do something with the deficit and the national debt and so on. Of course, there have been references as well to Bill C–21 in the same context, trying to become competitive, and free trade is involved in it as well. Of course, competitiveness was one of the reasons that the government kept referring to as the necessity for getting free trade.

When we talk about competitiveness the implication is always that Canadian workers are really overpaid. When the government talks about competitiveness, it talks about lean and mean. When the government talks about reductions, it talks about social programs. There are any number of our competitors who have better social programs than Canada does.

It makes you wonder, but not for long, what the government is talking about when it talks about "competitive". The reason you do not have to wonder very long, Mr. Speaker, is that you suddenly realize that what they are talking about is our competitiveness in relation not to the more progressive countries of this world but to the least progressive countries of this world.

Members of the committee on the government side have even made direct references to how well off Canada is in relation to, I am not sure whether it was Bangladesh or the Philippines or some other very seriously disadvantaged country.

Why is the government putting in these measures in Bill C–21? When we look at the government's own impact study, we find an admission which I would be ashamed to do if I were the government. It admits that right off the top there are going to be 30,000 Canadians eliminated altogether from being able to benefit from unemployment insurance.

There have been more credible studies, I would suggest, which have shown that in the neighbourhood of 130,000 Canadians will be excluded entirely from unemployment insurance benefits, not 30,000. One hundred thousand more Canadians will be excluded entirely from unemployment insurance after the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act goes in compared to those who are able to access it now.

We are going to create a very large class of very poor people, again, as I said, mostly poorly educated and mostly women. It is not a marvel when you look at those countries which so often are implicated in the government's statements that we need to become more competitive, that in those countries in what are commonly called unfortunately the Third World countries, we find that the people who are abused by the multinational corporations and their own governments are the poor and that they are mostly women.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, consciously or unconsciously one of the main consequences of these changes to C–21 which the government is bringing in will be that in Canada, in preparation for an even broader free trade agreement with what we often hear the government refer to as the Pacific Rim, we will be setting up people who will be glad, because they are not able to even get the poorly paid minimum wage jobs that are available in this country now.

The minimum wage is something else we could talk about. I would remind the country that the federal government's minimum wage is the lowest in the country. At best on the government's minimum wage a single person anywhere in the country would make half as much as the poverty line in this country.

This bill is setting up Canadians for the multinationals to come in and use those poor people, to use those women in exactly the same way as they are being used in the Third World countries; for the menial, repetitious tasks which experience has shown time and time again wear these people out in three to five years. In many instances they are not able to continue to any other kind of employment, because of perhaps poor eyesight or because of the totally debilitating postures they have developed due to the conditions under which they have been forced to work, than going on the streets as prostitutes.

I would suggest that this bill is moving Canada very, very close to that line. With the spread to the Pacific Rim trading, to the Pacific Rim free trade deal, I predict that this is precisely one of the effects that this bill is going to have.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for allowing me the opportunity to address Bill C–21 on changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

I see that the hon. member opposite is grinning with the same kind of grin that the government is giving all of us who are very concerned about the changes in this bill; a kind of grin that says "the heck with you" because we are putting forth some changes and even though we are following a procedure that, as my colleague to the left has said, is Draconian in the extreme, we are going to put it through. Even if the contents of this bill go counter to all the principles that Canadians have come to regard as being part and parcel of this nation's fabric, principles that have taken us 100 years to build up as part of the Canadian character, we are going to shove it through without the appropriate debate.

I am pleased that we have at least a modicum of opportunity to address some of the amendments that are here before us, amendments that have been made necessary, quite frankly, because the bill does not do what it ought to do, namely, to address the unemployment problem in this country, most of it structurally.

I have heard the government members over the course of several days spread out over several months—because we have had such limited time to debate this bill in this House—read out some statistics about the greatness of their job programs. Nothing could be further from the truth. In fact, the unemployment rates for the post–recession period, for the post–growth period that is supposedly unprecedented in the history of this country, are much higher than they were in the pre–recession period. In fact, what is very, very telling is that the structural unemployment rate in 1988, according to StatsCanada, is much higher.

I know the parliamentary secretary is trying to represen rate in 1988, according to StatsCanada, is much higher. watching him carefully on the monitor to make sure that things are being waded through properly. But I draw to his attention that the structural unemployment rate in 1988, five years after we began a post–recession period of unprecedented growth, sits at 8.3 per cent. That is 5 per cent higher than it was before this country entered into a recession.

That structural unemployment rate is verified in the doubling of a rate amongst older workers. In 1982, for example, as Canada was going into a recession, the structural unemployment rate among seniors was at 7.7 per cent and today it sits at 14.8 per cent. The prime structural rate nationally sits at 7.7 whereas prior to the recession and prior to all this growth it was at 5.6 per cent. The duration of unemployment in 1982, the duration of time that people spent on unemployment benefits if they found themselves without employment in 1982, prior to this country entering a recession, was 15.7 weeks for the average claimant. For the average claimant at the end of 1988, according to StatsCan figures, in a period of unprecedented growth, the duration was 19.1 weeks per claimant.

These figures beg the question why, why Bill C-21? What is this bill doing to address the structural unemployment of this country? What is this bill doing to address the longer term of unemployment in this country? What is this bill doing to address the varying disparities nationally among our regions?

Precious little, Mr. Speaker. I give you an example. The government has spent much time, through its members, reading statistics about how it is going to put in more moneys. Instead of putting moneys into income maintenance for claimants it is going to put moneys into job creation programs, into job entry, into job development, into skill shortages, into skills investment and community futures. Well, I think it is important and instructive for us all, for the nation, to understand what the government is doing. It is important so that the nation—all peoples watching this debate which has been shortened by the government's desire to pass through a bill very quickly without having the nation wake up to discover what is happening to it and to its citizens—can judge.

Let me read some of the figures because they are in juxtaposition with the minister's words. It is appropriate for all of us to wonder which speak the truth; the words of the minister and her government or the statistics of the moneys that the government is actually putting forward in these job training programs in job development.

For 1989, according to the Estimates, there was a net decrease of 8 per cent of funds available for job development. For job entry there was a net decrease of 1.7 over 1988. The skill shortages area is extremely important because the minister is justifying the changes to the unemployment insurance bill on the basis that we require greater skills amongst our labour force. What she has done is decreased—that is spelled d-e-c-r-e-a-s-e-d, Mr. Parliamentary Secretary—moneys to the tune of 3.6 per cent. She has dropped the amount of money in skills investment by 7 per cent. She has dropped the amount of moneys for Community Futures by 2.5 per cent. She has dropped the amount of moneys available for Innovations by 20 per cent over the last year.

Mr. Speaker and hon. members, I ask you, is this an indication of a government that is telling the truth, or is this an indication of a government whose actions speak a greater lie than its words?

One need only take a look at some of the clauses that this government would ram through. For example, it is unprepared to support a motion by my hon. colleague for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce in the area of benefits for people who adopt children. We have seen a reduction of unemployment benefits for such purposes go from 15 to 10 weeks, where the amendment of my colleague says, "Let us substitute the word "ten" for "fifteen". What happens? The government says, "No, no, no, we cannot support that. We are going to make some mealy-mouthed approach to the fact that we are going to rectify a problem". The government introduces a clause that is going to implement a means test from which only those who have the patience of Job will be able to profit.

That would be bad enough, but we take this very miserly and vicious attitude towards helping to develop a labour force for refer to as an equally vicious subclause in clause 19 of this bill. In addition to giving the government the power to change the unemployment insurance fund from an income maintenance program to a training type of program, it privatizes unemployment insurance and gives the government the authority to take a grand total of about 15 per cent of all funds from premiums and apply them to training programs, training programs which obviously it is not at all favouring, if we accept the Statistics Canada figures that I just read a few moments ago, figures that are corroborated by the department.

The estimates for Canadian Jobs Strategy, the amount of moneys that are going to be generated by this adjustment in the training program run at about $1.4 billion and the unemployment insurance bill is going to be greater than that. What will happen is that the government, with a sleight of hand, will move moneys out of unemployment insurance premiums into Canadian Jobs Strategy. Well, thank you very much. Let us suppose that this is going to serve the people of Canada, it is going to serve the labour of this country. What about those claimants to unemployment insurance who face an employment counsellor and say, "I do not want to accept unemployment insurance. I want to go on a training program".

I draw your attention to Clause 19, Mr. Speaker. Claimants cannot appeal the decision of an employment counsellor. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, as I ask all members on the opposite side of the House and on this side of the House; if we are truly interested in developing a skilled labour market for all of Canada, should we not at least give them the right of appeal? I guess the answer is that the working people of Canada are going to be treated with the same contemptuous arrogance with which this House has been dealt by the minister and this government in this debate.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House focuses on the provisions of this legislation which discriminate against new claimants for unemployment and, in particular, young people. The bill discriminates, therefore, against those who have the greatest difficulty in surviving economically and socially. Once again we have an example of the government's actions confounding the government's rhetoric. Once again, the government contributes to the unnecessary divide that is building in this country between the affluent and the less well-to-do. Once again, the government pushes away from the family table the least advantaged, in this case Canada's unemployed young people.

I want to address one set of consequences of this legislation that has not so far received much focus. I speak in part in my capacity as critic for the Solicitor General's Department for our party.

It is fitting that we raise the issue of the impact on crime prevention in this country of this legislation because today the Solicitor General with a lot of PR fanfare announced Crime Prevention Week. The hypocrisy of this government knows no bounds. The very week it asked Canada in sanctimonious terms to participate in crime prevention it guts one of the key programs that gives some hope of preventing increased crime in Canada.

Two weeks ago in Montreal an international conference of experts and civic leaders was sponsored by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. This conference included guests and delegates from Europe and throughout North America. Included in the sponsors was the European Forum on Urban Security and the U.S. Conference on Mayors in collaboration with the Montreal Urban Community, five international organizations of cities and more than 30 partners. They received over 100 briefs. They had delegates from 31 countries around the world and were addressed by the Under Secretary General of the United Nations, the Secretary General of the Council of Europe, ministers from France, the Netherlands and Canada, as well as mayors from Canada's and the world's major cities.

At this conference the federal government gave merely passing attention. Two of the ministers dropped in to give speeches and disappeared. The speeches, if I may say, were marked by bromidic clichés. In the follow-up seminar after the conference the Minister of Justice did not even appear himself. He sent his Parliamentary Secretary who did not take the trouble to even understand what the seminar was about.

The overwhelming conclusion of this major international conference was that community must be the focal point of crime prevention, and that we must go beyond the criminal justice system in seeking a solution to the rising crime rate in Canada and throughout the world. Crime prevention must focus on social development, it was said in this important conference. The causes of crime, as we have known for years include poverty, unemployment, lack of affordable, decent housing and an unresponsive education system. It is particularly among our young people that unemployment has the effect of moving them to crime, and crime is largely centred among our young people.

We were treated in the seminar after the conference to a very important paper based on a study in the U.K. by a David Farrington and a Donald J. West. This study surveyed over the last 25 years 400 young people in London and traced their development from about age eight or nine to now when they are into their mid-thirties. They were able to interview in their most recent round somewhere over 90 per cent of the participants back in the early 1960s. They were able to look at those who got into trouble with the law and who had contributed to the rising crime rate in Britain. They were able to make some analysis of what it was that distinguished those who got into trouble from those who did not.

The overwhelming conclusion was the conclusion which the conference itself reached. In order to prevent the development of crime and antisocial behaviour, social prevention programs are vitally needed. These could begin, and I quote: "by targeting three important predictors of offending that may be both causal and modifiable"—sociological words at their best—"economic deprivation, school failure and poor parental child rearing behaviour". What this points to is a combination of programs, but a combination in which dealing with youth unemployment is absolutely essential.

• (1740)

Britain, under the Prime Minister's friend Margaret Thatcher, tried to do what this government is doing in a slightly different way. They cut off young people from unemployment insurance, or the British version thereof, between the ages of 16 and 18. That change lasted for barely a year. Margaret Thatcher herself finally understood the impact of that on the other issue which she was concerned with, which was crime in British cities. She changed her position entirely. The government was forced to reverse that decision and to reinstitute unemployment insurance for the 16 to 18 year olds in Britain.

If this government is serious about crime prevention, if it wants to do more than rhetoric, it must withdraw this bill and completely revamp the provisions applicable to young people in Canada.

UI is a major federal program. It is one of the points at which the federal government directly intervenes in the social systems in Canada. It gives the federal government some very real leverage in trying to cope with the social problems that are hitting our cities and our countryside. The delicate fabric of our social system is critical to the fight against illegal drugs and crime that accompanies that dreadful traffic.

I plead with the government to take this issue more seriously than it has. What we have seen all summer is a situation in which the government has simply pretended to listen. It has reduced the number of hearings that it has held and wants to hold across the country. It has said from the outset that it is not going to accept changes, and we have seen that reaction so far in the House. It has turned a deaf ear to the pleas of the people from every section of this country not to proceed with these changes, not to do this unravelling of a critical social program for the people of this country.

At the conference I referred to earlier some of the speakers revealed the two world visions that now face us when we look at the changing social conditions since the end of the Second World War, the rapid urbanization, the tremendous growth in poverty around the world, the changing economic system that is imposing changes on the social, political and economic systems around the world.

We in the west have two possible responses, two opposite visions that we can put forward. We can put forward the vision of a Ronald Reagan or a Margaret Thatcher or the Prime Minister of this country, which is of two nations, of two worlds—a rich world and a poor world. The rich can increasingly build a bunker around themselves and try to fend off the legitimate cries for equality, the legitimate cries for a place at the table. Or we can move to a different vision, a vision at which we first begin by recognizing that the world is a family, that we are all one, and that our obligation as members of Parliament and as public servants is to try not to narrow the access to the riches that this country and this world can produce but instead to broaden the access to those riches and that a country is going to be measured not by the wealth of its richest citizens, but by how we treat our poor and, in particular, our young people who must begin by building a world of hope. Only then can we begin seriously and realistically to deal with the problems that confront us.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Has the time for debate expired? If that is the case, I want to again say in the strongest terms that by using closure in this debate the government has shown complete contempt for democracy as many points have not been made in this debate.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions with Mr. Kempling and directly with the minister's office in the last ten minutes on whether both Motions Nos. 24A and 28 would be accepted as in order. We have not yet reached a conclusion on that. We will try to do that in the next few minutes.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It was my understanding that Motions Nos. 25, 26 and 39 were to be moved and put to the House and that it was the vote on Motion No. 25 that would determine the results on Motions Nos. 26 and 39. I do not think we had an opportunity to move Motions Nos. 26 and 39.

However, I would like to ask if there is unanimous consent of the House to introduce Motion No. 28, which does exactly the same thing and is entirely compatible with the Employment Equity Act and the standards that the government enforces on private employers?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost. I therefore declare Motion No. 5 lost on recorded division. The next question is on Motion No. 6.

During the taking of the vote

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the member for Kamloops. The Chair would just like to know if the member for Kamloops is rising in favour of the motion or opposed to the motion.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to make that clear. I think I was asleep at the switch. We are actually voting in favour of the government motion.

• (1850)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Since the Chair had already called for those opposed to the motion, the only way that we could come back to those voting for the motion would be if there was unanimous consent.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Are there any more nays?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost. I therefore declare Motions Nos. 16 and 18 lost on recorded division.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any responsibility more onerous on members than the casting of a vote in division. I have some doubts about the wisdom of standing up 24 times, but when the results of the last vote were announced, there was a total of 38 members present in the chamber on the opposition side and I suspect that there were fewer members on our side than the vote count would indicate.

If we fall into sloppy habits in relation to votes, we could get the House and the integrity of Parliament into trouble down the road. I would suggest that members should be present in the chamber to hear the motion read and they should remain in the chamber until the vote is announced or they should not vote.

I would hope that on all sides of the House we might respect that set of principles so that we can have clarity on the results of the votes.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The next question is on Motion No. 20.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

• (2000)

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there might be a disposition in the chamber to apply the vote that was just taken to the next two motions, Motions Nos. 33 and 24, and in exchange give all members a five minute adjournment to attend to obvious necessities which might give us all a little comfort.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the generous offer of my hon. friend. However, I think the fact that since this government has used some form of closure more than any other government in history it is important we stand to be counted.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The next question is on Motion No. 33.

NUCLEAR POWER ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-267, an act establishing a moratorium on the continued development of nuclear power in Canada for the purpose of establishing a public inquiry into nuclear power that is followed by a national referendum.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, before the government privatizes the entire nuclear industry we had better have a public inquiry. This bill has been introduced to call for a moratorium on any expansion in terms of nuclear power in Canada and to establish a full, open and comprehensive public inquiry into the use of nuclear power in all of its forms. Once that is done, presumably we could determine the appropriate course of action.

Basically it is calling for a public inquiry that I might say could be followed by a national referendum, although I think there are more appropriate ways to determine the future of nuclear power in Canada once all the information is provided to us.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA HEALTH ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-268, An Act to amend the Canada Health Act (abortion).

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I move this bill, an act to amend the Canada Health Act, which would penalize provinces that pay for abortions when the mother's life is not in danger. The amount so paid would be deducted from the federal contributions to the provinces for health care.

I want to thank my colleague, the member for Mississauga East, for seconding this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the Bill be read the second time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to move this bill, an act to amend the Criminal Code (destruction of the foetus). This bill would make it an offence, liable to life imprisonment, for anyone who wilfully causes the death of a foetus.

I want to thank my colleague, the hon. member for Mississauga East, for seconding this bill as well.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

POINT OF ORDER

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, last week in the House, as reported at page 4952 of Hansard, I raised a point of order on another private member's bill that would seek to have the same effect as I understand this private member's bill would. There has been no ruling yet on my point of order. I would ask, if it is in order, that this bill be included in my previous point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made a request which under the circumstances seems reasonable to the Chair. I will take her comments into account and will include them when I return to the House with respect to her earlier point of order on the same issue.

Following that ruling I will be able to deal further with the bill one way or the other, depending on the order.

ELECTIONS, PRIVILEGES, PROCEDURE AND PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

ORDER OF PRECEDENCE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties and I think you would find unanimous consent for the following two motions to be put immediately and voted upon without debate. I move:

That the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business inquire into, consider and report to the House (by December 7, 1989) on whether (and, if so, then by what procedural changes) there should be changes to the manner in which Private Members' items are selected to become items in the order of precedence, and

That, if the said committee is of the opinion that other aspects of the procedures or practices relating to the conduct of Private Members' Business (including procedures on private bills) should be reviewed or modified the committee include such observations or recommendations to the House in its report.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the Hon. Minister of Justice. Is there agreement?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

COMMUNICATIONS AND CULTURE

TELEVISED BROADCASTING OF MEETINGS

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That televised broadcasting be authorized of certain meetings of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, specifically during the consideration of Order in Council appointments of Patrick Watson and Gerard Veilleux to the Canadian Broadcasting Commission, and of Keith Spicer to the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission, and of Joan Pennefather as government film commissioner; and

That such broadcasting be on the basis of the principles and practices now governing broadcast of the proceedings of the House of Commons; and

That such authority be in effect beginning the week of October 30, 1989.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the provisions of the motion of the Hon. Minister of Justice. Is there agreement?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

REVISION OF EXTRADITION LAW

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise today with a petition concerning Charles Ng, the U.S. citizen wanted to stand trial for 13 murders in the Untied States. An extradition is now under way.

I have the honour to present a petition which has been certified by the clerk pursuant to Standing Order 36.

This petition, which contains 1,339 signatures, calls on the Government of Canada to revise the extradition laws which would allow the Minister of Justice to order the extradition of fugitives, either immediately or after they have been dealt with fully by the Canadian penal system. This brings the total number of signatures on petitions entered into the House on this matter to 90,987.

• (1120)

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of several dozen of my constituents in the community of Elliot Lake in northern Ontario. It calls upon the House of Commons and Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

They point out that the manufacturers' sales tax has already been increased from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent and that the goods and services tax would have a very adverse affect on our economy, on the regions of the country, and on tourism. They point out as well that the government has already introduced more than two dozen tax increases since 1984.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present this petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, which petition has been certified correct as to form and content, on behalf of many Canadians, including constituents of Winnipeg North, who believe that this new proposed goods and services tax will be hidden from Canadians and will apply to virtually everything they buy and that the imposition of this new proposed goods and services tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and medium income Canadians.

Therefore the petitioners, believing that the House of Commons will grant them a remedy, do pray that such a remedy be granted and that Parliament reject the proposed goods and services tax.

EDUCATION—TAX EXEMPT STATUS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present three different petitions. The first petition is asking Parliament to ensure that any changes to the federal sales tax will not change the tax exempt status of education and related personal enrichment activities because educational activities have been traditionally exempt from taxation.

VIA RAIL

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the second petition, which is from a number of people on the lower mainland of British Columbia, calls on Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade VIA equipment, and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry on its mandate to provide passenger service.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the third petition is calling upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax; to reform the tax system so that there is an effective minimum tax on the wealthy individuals and corporations; to ensure that if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure this reform not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab; and to cause the government to cease with a proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions. The first one deals with the government's intentions to shut down passenger rail services in Canada.

The people who signed this petition humbly submit to this House that the Government of Canada has decided to eliminate many of VIA Rail's existing routes and thousands of jobs. They state that the people of Canada deserve a high quality passenger rail service, including modernized equipment throughout the network and a rapid rail system for the corridor; that the rail passenger mode is the safest and the most environmentally friendly mode of travel; that annual subsidies provided by the Government of Canada to VIA Rail are not disproportionate to subsidization required for highly infrastructural airports; that several rural communities rely exclusively on rail passenger services; and that the tourism industry in Canada also relies on rail passenger services.

The people who signed humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada not to cancel, in whole or in part, rail passenger services in Canada.

[Translation]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): I have a second petition, Mr. Speaker, one more in a series of petitions I have presented in the House, which is signed by constituents of Ottawa—Vanier and by visitors to the beautiful riding of Ottawa—Vanier, all of whom object to this federal sales tax on goods and services and who call upon Parliament to reject out of hand this new tax on goods and services because it will be inflationary, will harm the Canadian economy and cause serious and undue hardship for middle- and low-income families.

[English]

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition duly certified under Standing Order 36 from people in my constituency who call upon Parliament to enact legislation which will effectively protect the life of the preborn child without distinction as to stage of development.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition from many Canadians in the greater Toronto region. The petition has been certified correct as to form and content.

It calls upon this House and all members of Parliament to urge the government to put aside its GST proposal. The GST in the estimation of all Canadians who signed this petition is a prescription for economic disaster.

Among those who have affixed their signatures are Canadians engaged in the tourist industry. These people predict a loss of some 30,000 jobs in the industry, 5,000 of them in Ontario alone. They along with other Canadians plead with this House to scrap the GST totally.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions duly authorized pursuant to Standing Order 36. One petition concerns objections to the general sales tax which is being put forward by the government. They point out that it is unfair and that it is taxing people on their ability to pay. They object to haircuts being taxed, as well as diapers and home heating fuels.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents, pursuant to Standing Order 36, people from Kamloops who are almost delirious in their opposition to the general sales tax.

They point out a whole variety of areas where they think the government is completely wrong-headed in its approach and are asking it to back off from this very punitive, cruel, horrible and discriminatory tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on a different issue, and pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have a petition certified correct by the clerk of petitions to present.

It is from Quebec where a variety of communities have come together with a number of western Canadian communities in opposition to the government's decision to curtail VIA Rail service to so many Canadian communities. They point out why this is a particularly environmentally unsound decision.

With the Minister of the Environment being here, I hope that he is paying attention to all these different people speaking out against the transfer of so many people who presently ride the trains to automobiles, congested airports, and the like.

I think they make a very convincing case for the Minister of the Environment.

[Translation]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition which deals with a subject that is very important to my constituents. Your petitioners object to the proposed goods and services tax. They believe that in proposing this tax, the Government is making the wrong decision for Canadians. Your petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

[English]

VIA RAIL

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and responsibility to present a petition under Standing Order 36 which has been certified correct by the clerk.

The petitioners state that whereas the Government of Canada has called for the closure, sale or transfer of substantial parts of the VIA Rail system, therefore they ask the Parliament of Canada to maintain VIA Rail, Canada's present national network.

We ask Parliament to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, which has been certified correct as to form and content.

This petition is signed by Canadians from across the country who say that the Government of Canada has called for the closure, sale or transfer of substantial parts of the VIA Rail system and asks the Parliament of Canada to maintain VIA Rail, Canada's present national network.

• (1130)

They ask Parliament to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment. They ask Parliament for a passenger train act, giving VIA Rail a firm legislative mandate. Finally, they ask Parliament for a revised costing arrangement with the railway companies.

RIGHT TO LIFE

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. It is signed by 3,740 constituents of the ridings of Durham, Oshawa and Ontario. The petitioners call upon Parliament to enact legislation immediately that will protect the life of every human being in Canada, from conception to natural death.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from Canadians who urge the government to abandon its proposal for a goods and services tax because it is unfair and because of its lack of regard for taxpayers' ability to pay.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by residents of the Burnaby and Vancouver area, which points out that railway passenger service as carried on by VIA Rail is essential for many Canadians. It has been a part of Canada for more than 100 years, yet the Government of Canada has announced a cut of $400 million over five years in its operating grants to VIA. These cuts will result in a serious reduction in passenger railway service and threaten maintenance, safety and jobs.

Finally, the petitioners note that the reductions in budget and service could eliminate one-third of our national passenger railway system. They therefore call upon Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade VIA equipment and guarantee VIA Rail sufficient support to carry out its important mandate to provide passenger service across Canada.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition on behalf of I think every taxpayer in the town of Vonda, Saskatchewan, who call upon the government to reject the current proposals for a goods and services tax and to reform the taxation system so that the pressure of taxation is more evenly spread out and not only on ordinary Canadians.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that once again I am presenting a petition on behalf of Canadians who are both hurt and angry that this government persists in turning a deaf ear to their pleas to repeal the regressive GST.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition which has been certified correct pursuant to Standing Order 36. This petition is from a number of people in Windsor, Ontario. In this petition the signatories humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of many Canadians who are asking Parliament to reject outright this goods and services tax, as they fear the imposition will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-income families.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX AND VIA RAIL

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have two petitions to file, one dealing with the goods and services tax and the other dealing with VIA Rail. The petitioners are basically asking the government to change its positions, to save VIA Rail and to abandon the GST, instead of doing what it is now doing, which is abandoning VIA Rail and trying to save the GST.

VIA RAIL

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of the citizens of Thunder Bay who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right to present a grievance to this House. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada not to cancel, in whole or in part, passenger rail service in Canada.

[Translation]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by a number of constituents in Windsor West. They object to the goods and services tax and call upon Parliament to reject a tax that is so unjust and unfair.

[English]

VIA RAIL

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on the subject of VIA Rail, a petition which has been certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions.

The petitioners, who come from Coquitlam and the vast majority who come from Revelstoke, British Columbia, which is along the to-be-abandoned Canadian VIA line, suggest to the government that the VIA Rail network be maintained, that the government act to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment, and, to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

These residents are both angry and anxious. I do not think they are delirious.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition here duly authorized under Standing Order 36. The petitioners from Clinton, Waterloo, Stratford, and Kingston, Ontario, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to restore VIA Rail services, to provide the railroad with the necessary resources, to provide good service, and to maintain and improve the railroad.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, October 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-36, an act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee, and the amendment of Mr. Schneider (p. 5069).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Regina—Lumsden has two minutes left in his debate.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I would like some clarification. Am I finishing my magnificent speech on second reading, or can I now speak on the closure motion?

• (1220)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has two minutes remaining in the speech that he had prior, and that will be it.

Mr. Benjamin: I would rather have another 20 minutes. However, I wish to make a few quick points in the time remaining. I hope I get some questions, particularly from the member for Regina—Wascana.

I want to point out something that has not been mentioned yet about interest free cash advances. The repayment record by the farmers of Canada is in the order of 99 per cent. It is probably the best record of repayment of any government program.

The other point I want to make is that the government is breaking the law. It has refused to allow the Canadian Wheat Board to issue interest free cash advances since August 1, the beginning of the crop year. This legislation was being implemented before it even saw the light of day in the House of Commons. If that is not law breaking, I do not know what is. If that is not the worst kind of totalitarian activity, I do not know what is. The Canadian Wheat Board has not been allowed, even though the law says it can and should make interest free cash advances since August 1. That is a violation not only of the law, but it is a violation of the farm industry in Canada.

Some farmers need cash now to meet their payments to the Farm Credit Corporation, to clean up their fuel bills from their harvest and for a host of other things. There are many places in this country where at the moment their produce either cannot be sold or there is so much of it, it should not be sold. Why victimize agricultural producers for something that is no fault of theirs, that was not of their doing or their creation?

As I pointed out before and repeat, we provide interest free loans, which will never be paid, to the corporate sector through deferred corporation taxes, about $40 billion worth. That is an interest free deferment of taxes which are deferred forever. But the government wants to deny farmers interest free cash advances, which they have always repaid in full. This flies in the face of what used to be a very good—they did not have very many—policy of the Conservative Party. In fact, the political parties in the prairie provinces were united on this issue back in the 1940s and 1950s. The stubborn Liberal Government refused to do it, but Mr. Diefenbaker did. People of all political stripes and all the farm organizations applauded them then and have done so ever since.

Why you would want to pick on this small item in all of the government's operations at the expense of agriculture producers escapes me completely. I have yet to hear any good, sound reason from anybody in this House as to the necessity for doing this, or some reason for doing it, any kind of a reason. If somebody over there can come up with a reason why this needs to be done, I would like to hear it. In fact, will somebody over there get up and make a comment so that I can answer. I invite members opposite to ask me a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are no questions or comments.

Mr. Benjamin: Why not? We are still on second reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are no questions and comments. We are now under a new set of rules. I will allow the hon. member another two or three minutes, if he would like.

Mr. Benjamin: Give me another 10 minutes. Can I have unanimous consent to continue my remarks?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak to this bill. I am very disappointed that this government has again taken this jackboot approach to closure. It is a terrible day for the farmers of this country. This government has invoked closure more times than we have had legislation before this House. It is time that the government went back to the farming community, consulted with them and used the legislation that is now in place to make available to them the moneys that they so desperately need at this time of the year.

The original advance payment program, which this bill now wants to change, was designed with the basic goal of establishing an orderly market system for Canadian farm products, one which ensured that supply met demand and that prices remained relatively stable. This program was meeting that goal satisfactorily.

Farmers require a substantial input at the beginning of the season, and so at harvest time they are eager to pay off the debts arising from this input. However, if they dump their entire crop onto the market at this time, several negative things happen. A flooded market means low prices for producers, an over-stressed processing and transportation system and a produce shortage would accompany high prices for consumers in the spring. That is the result of the financial pressure on producers to sell their entire crop at harvest time.

Since the advance payments program has been implemented, Canada has enjoyed an orderly marketing system which is the envy of many countries. The basic factor in this success has been the interest free loans advanced to producers through their producer organizations and guaranteed by the federal government at harvest time.

With Bill C-36, the government is eliminating the interest free component of the loan program. In doing so, it will cripple the already vulnerable family farm in Canada. The Minister of Agriculture has tried to soften the blow by telling farmers that by losing the interest free loans they will be doing their share to overcome Canada's deficit. Well, when the banks foreclose on their farms and their families lose their livelihood, I am sure that the farmers will rest easy knowing that they are helping to cut the government's deficit.

The issue of cost effectiveness has been explored by my colleagues on this side of the House, but I believe that its importance cannot be over-emphasized. Just how much will the government save by making the farmers pay interest on their loans through this program? The minister says that the amendments to this program will save the government approximately $20 million in this fiscal year. Dozens of farm organizations from Atlantic potato producers to Ontario corn producers to western grain producers have told this government that without the interest free component of the program, the program will be too expensive for many producers. These same organizations have told the government again and again that the advantages of this program far outweigh the costs.

The government will find out too late that there is a cost in destroying the interest free program, a cost collected not only in dollars, but in a much more intangible and valuable coin, that of the survival of the family farm.

• (1230)

Passage of this legislation would mean higher costs for farmers at a time when our family farm is under siege already, as we can see daily in the reports of farm foreclosures and bankruptcies.

Farming organizations in western Canada estimate that eliminating the interest free component of the program will increase borrowing costs in the range of $1,500 to $2,000 per year per farm. Skyrocketing interest rates resulting from the government's irresponsible fiscal policies will play their part in crushing farmers under growing debt. Government savings simply do not translate into farmer savings.

In other words, without the interest free aspect, the advance payments program will be rendered virtually useless to farmers.

The Ontario Corn Producers Association which, in the past years, has seen approximately 2,000 producers participate in the program has stated that eliminating the interest free provision will result in an ineffectual program with minimal participation.

What is this government's true motive in proposing this measure? It is true that if producers are discouraged from participating and the program dies from neglect then the government will save money. Is this the true plan? The destruction of the interest free advance payment program is only a step in the federal government's increasingly obvious assault on the family farm in Canada.

Cutbacks in transportation subsidies, budgets for dairy export programs and support for organizations such as the Canadian Dairy Commission, to name but a few, have resulted in farmers losing $400 million in support structures since the last election. This is not even counting the damage that Bill C-36 promises to do.

Industries such as wine and tobacco are floundering. Marketing boards have been drastically weakened. The effects of the free trade agreement hold little promise for the farmers of this country.

While the government pays lip service to the preservation of the family farm in Canada, it cripples its future by destroying these mechanisms which have allowed it to survive thus far in a cut-throat global market-place.

We have seen countless times this government's disregard for ordinary Canadians, its abdication from the unemployment insurance program, its gutting of our national rail system, its multi-pronged attack on Atlantic Canada and, most recently, in its proposed goods and services tax. That this government pays heed only to big business is painfully obvious. We need not be surprised but certainly angered by its attack on the family farm.

The interest free cash advance program has not only bolstered the Canadian marketing system to the benefit of producers, but to the benefit of millions of consumers as well. These ordinary consumers will also suffer from the destruction of this program.

With interest growing on their debts from harvest time onward, farmers will naturally be under great pressure to sell all of their produce and begin paying off their massive debts immediately, especially considering the high interest rates. The result will be low prices and spiraling debts for producers, a swamped quota system which, until now, has been the envy of the world and subsequent higher prices for consumers due to produce shortages next spring. This, in turn, necessitates higher imports from the U.S. which are often of an aged and inferior quality. This will be the result of a badly controlled market which this government's policy will create.

The government has tried to foist its guilt off on this side of the House belating that by our determination to save the existing advance payment program through debate we are only delaying urgently needed payments to farmers. If so, how does the government explain the dozens of producer organizations that have joined us in insisting that this bill is badly flawed? How does this government explain the fact that the Prince Edward Island Federation of Agriculture, the Ontario Corn Producers Association, the Western Canadian Wheat Growers Association and many other organizations have expressly requested that the government not implement this bill?

Such respected bodies such as the Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board unanimously resolved to recommend that the federal government operate the cash advance program as usual for the 1989-90 crop year and only propose amendments after consultation with the producer organizations.

Of course, in the implementation of its agenda, the government has never shown much interest in seeking the input of those Canadians who will be most affected by the measures. From a finance committee that considered originally only going to two cities in Atlantic Canada and a Minister of Transport who refused to meet with municipal officials, this government obviously does not want to hear what Canadians have to say.

The Minister of Agriculture and his colleagues are turning a deaf ear to all of the producer organizations coast to coast that oppose this bill. This government's arrogance is stunning and will not be forgotten by farmers and other Canadians.

I find it appalling that the government will go forward at this time with this bill when farmers and producers so greatly need money at this time of year. They need their credit line and then be able to go to the banks when they have to borrow more money to keep their operations afloat.

This could not come at a worst time for Canadian farmers, when they are fighting all the effects and the impacts of the free trade agreement and the threat to their marketing policies. Again I would urge this government to go back to these organizations and negotiate a bill that will be much more beneficial. I ask it to keep this program intact, certainly for this year as has been recommended by all these producer organizations.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate.

I think the essence of what we are trying to do here is put in place the amendments to the Advance Payments for Crops Act and also the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

What I am hearing from producers is that over-all they feel the government is on the right track in trying to deal with the debt and deficit problems which, after all, is the fundamental problem affecting the country right now. The interest charges on that debt would curtail the activities of any government. I say that not in any partisan way because it would not matter which party was in charge here. The size of the national debt and the interest charges that have to be paid on it are, without a doubt, a formidable obstacle and, in essence, shackle the abilities of government to be able to continue to deliver the programs we have now, let alone to improve upon them.

I think that producers across Canada understand the problem and the dilemma that faces the government. I think they understand also that the answer to the problem is not just to raise taxes, but that there also have to be some reductions in government spending.

In the recent budget, there were reductions. Every department of the government was asked to make some contribution to deal with the deficit problem. Of course, it is natural that each and every one of those proposals would be opposed by the opposition because that is their job, and by various groups affected in the country.

The fact is that most people across the country understand that these things have to be done. There is no great desire on the part of the government to inflict pain or hurt. The problem is that unless the deficit is addressed in some meaningful fashion at this time, we will soon reach the point where all of the revenue of government is taken up in interest charges, in servicing the debt of the past. Clearly, that cannot continue very long.

In regard to the amendments to these bills, the essence of them is this: That farmers will still be able—

Mr. Milliken: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): —to obtain financing to carry their crops from harvest time to delivery.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a point of order.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who is speaking is clearly making an intelligent speech, but there is not a single minister of the Crown in this House to hear it. We are on a closure motion. This is a government bill. There should be a minister here.

• (1240)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member knows that he should not indicate who is and who is not in the chamber. We have a lobby. We have television sets here in the House.

Mr. Gauthier: Where are they?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): They are probably in the chamber some place, or else on the telephone. I do not wish to argue with the hon. member. He is right, but we still have that rule. We do not indicate whether there are or are not members in the House. The hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that the Minister of Agriculture and the minister of state responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, have tried on a number of occasions to see this legislation through. The farmers, the producers in this country want access to the cash advances. I think they are tired of seeing the stonewalling that is going on in this place. I think they are tired of hearing the arguments back and forth on both sides. I think at this point in time, they are less interested in whether minister x is in the front row or the fact that the entire opposition benches are empty. I mean everyone can play that game.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I must say that what is good for the goose is good for the gander. I wish hon. members would please take heed and let us not get into saying who is and who is not in this chamber. The hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, your point of course is well taken and I think illustrates the fact that I am sure the producers of this country would want members on all sides to get on with the business of Parliament to pass this legislation and to make the cash advances available to the farm community.

I wanted to take a couple of moments to outline a couple of the proposals that are in this bill. Of course, farmers will still be able to obtain financing to carry their crops from harvest time to delivery. They can still take advantage of marketing opportunities. The advances will be administered through producer organizations with which the federal government has agreements. The advance is extended to the farmer by the producer organization and is repaid by the farmer when the crop is delivered. The federal government will guarantee these advances against default so that the organizations and lenders involved take no risk.

What are the changes that are the subject of debate here? First, to provide better security, the act will guarantee payment of interest as well as the principal of the advance itself.

Second, under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, the interest rates will be designated by the minister rather than by regulation. This should assist in getting the advances into producers' hands more quickly.

Third, the advance limits would be designated by the minister up to a higher level than previously. Finally, interest rates will be based on rates negotiated by the Canadian Wheat Board or other producer organizations with the lending institutions. These rates will be significantly lower than would be the case if producers organizations sought credit independent of the federal guarantee.

In so far as orderly marketing is concerned, surely it is up to the producer to decide when to deliver within the schedules that are prescribed by the particular organization so that when the marketing agency—and I refer here to the Canadian Wheat Board as being of special interest to producers within my constituency—wants a particular grain or a crop delivered, they will open quota. It is of course up to the producer to decide to deliver. The fact that he is paying interest may indeed cause him to respond to the opening of quota and the request for delivery by the board. But that decision to ignore the request to the selling agency should be financed by the producer, not by the taxpayer. Of course, the price to the producer delivering is averaged throughout the year.

I want to spend some time on the background to this bill because I think it is being portrayed in some circles as some sort of heartless, vicious attack on the farm community. The fact is that nothing could be further from the truth. Unless serious steps are taken now to address the debt and deficit problem in this country, there simply will not be federal moneys available. Forget about interest free advances, there will not be any money available for fundamental farm programs, for the administration of the agriculture department, or indeed for the ordinary running of government departments, to say nothing about transfer payments to the provinces, or the support of our social safety net which we have come to appreciate and to enjoy. So there is a very fundamental issue at stake here.

I would like to make some reference to the magnitude of the debt at this point in time. The national debt and all of the accumulated deficits of the past amount to some $330 billion. We are told that that accumulated total of national debt will become $350 billion by spring. The interest payments that have to be made on that debt are in the neighbourhood of $35 billion to $39 billion a year. That is an enormous sum of money. It amounts to about $1,400 for every man, woman and child in this country. That amount has to be found to service the debt that was built up when the governments of the past failed to take in enough money, failed to tax Canadians sufficiently to pay for the programs that were delivered in the past.

That is the problem facing this government today, and, I might add, will have to be faced by whoever is in government. So again I stress that my remarks are intended to be as non-partisan as they can possibly be in this place. The figures do not change. The figures are there. The debt is there and it is inescapable. It will not go away. We cannot tear it up. We cannot renege on the treasury bills. We cannot renege on the Canada savings bonds. These are investments by Canadians in the main and they expect, of course, to receive interest on their investment.

We continue to try to find ways to deal with this problem. The size of the national debt has reached the point where the interest charges on it are feeding on themselves, like a snowball going down hill. Despite the best efforts of the past several years in terms of reducing government involvement, reducing the public service, in terms of eliminating non-essential programs, getting rid of a number of Crown corporations that were serving no useful public purpose, and in spite of some tax increases in the past, we still have this mounting debt.

It is clear that more has to be done. It is inescapable. It simply will not go away. We may be told that it is a heartless budget, and you cannot cut national defence, cut CBC, or reduce programs, but it has to be done some place. The only way that it is possible to deal with the debt and deficit problem is either to take in more money or to spend less.

There are two ways to take in more money. One is to increase taxes and another is to put more Canadians to work. Obviously government is moving in two thrusts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The member for Winnipeg North on a point of order.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, permit me to ask a question on the motion of closure to the member?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am afraid not. The hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia. There are no questions or comments.

Mr. Milliken: It is permitted for him to allow a question by consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, by consent, after the hon. member finishes his speech, by consent.

Mr. Milliken: Or the hon. member consents during the speech.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the attempts of the opposition members to try to interrupt the thrust of what I am saying and I understand why. It is pretty clear that they do not like to hear—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Pagtakhan: I think the hon. member is trying to insinuate motives. That is fundamentally wrong and against a common rule of order. I was serious in wanting to ask a serious question. If the hon. member were to impose a false motive, that is dishonourable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Resuming debate.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): I certainly hope that these unwarranted interjections are not using up my time in debate because I think it is an important topic. I want to continue to deal with it more fully. We have as of government to be able to continue to deliver existing programs. If it is not seriously dealt with, it is going to curtail the ability of future governments to continue to provide even the most basic services to Canadians. It is a serious topic and, yes, I would be pleased to stay here all day and answer questions relative to this particular topic to the extent that the rules allow.

• (1250)

What I was saying before the interruption was that the choice is open to government in dealing with this problem either to increase revenue or to decrease expenditures. There is no other way, as I do not think there is any other magic potion or magic powder that we can throw out in this Chamber to make this problem disappear. It is just not possible. We have to deal with reality.

I would rather we did not have a national debt. This year the Government of Canada, without taking into account interest on the past debt, will have a surplus on its operations of $9 billion. However, with $39 billion to pay in interest on the past debt, the deficit is going to wind up at $30 billion. But if we did not have the debt of the past, if we did not have to service it, we could effect a reduction in taxes of $9 billion to Canadians. We could afford all sorts of programs. But we cannot. We are handcuffed as a result of that past debt.

It is fine for those opposite to try to interrupt, and I do not blame them, because after all they are the ones who created the problem. I am not here to waste time going back over the situation. I think Canadians know that, and they made the Liberals pay the price in 1984, as a result of their profligacy. What we have to do now is address the problem.

We can take in more money. How do we do that? Do we raise taxes? Yes. That has been done. We also try to put more Canadians back to work, so instead of drawing on the public purse they are contributing to it.

I am happy to say that this government through its policies has enabled the small business entrepreneurial sector in this country to create 1,500,000 new jobs, net, over the past five years more than there were in the fall of 1984.

That still is not good enough. We also have to curtail government expenditures. There is no other way to do it. We take in more money through increased taxes, take in more money through having more people working and not drawing out of the public purse. We also have to curtail government expenditures. That is the reason for the provisions in the budget of this spring, which asked all sectors of the economy, all departments of government to make some contribution toward the cause of debt and deficit reduction. It seems quite straight forward to me. There is no magic to it.

I think what Canadians would be very interested in hearing from those in opposition, rather than this sort of scatter gun criticism, objecting to every proposal we have to try to deal with the problem are some sensible, workable alternatives. If you do not like what this government is doing in terms of reducing expenditure or increasing revenues, then for heaven's sake, let us hear from you, not some sort of mindless interruption in the middle of someone's speech, but something concrete.

How is it going to be done? Is it going to be done through the medium of a wealth tax that the NDP proposes? Are we going to come back with the old estate tax so that after taxing people every year through their lives, you are going to hit them again when they die? The people of Saskatchewan had enough of that back in the 1970s.

Mr. Foster: You are going to hit them with the funerals.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Here they go, Mr. Speaker. Another interjection from the opposition agriculture critic who sat back in his administration and laid a capital gains tax on the agricultural community. That capital gains tax which hung like a poisonous cloud over the farm community for 15 years until this government came along, lived up to its promises and eliminated that hated tax. It is a tax which western Canadians and, I think, Canadians generally are going to remember for a good long time.

What I would like to encourage the opposition members to do at this point in time is to help out the producers of this country by agreeing to the speedy passage of this legislation so that the producers can get the cash advances. They want to get those advances, Mr. Speaker. That is what they are telling me.

Mr. Althouse: Who is holding it up? The government.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): The people who are holding it up, in response to the member from Mackenzie, are the opposition parties.

We have had five days of debate on this bill. The government has been forced to curtail debate because the opposition parties are not interested in helping the farmers of this country. If they were, they would assist our government not only in passing this legislation to enable the availability of the advances but would also assist the government in its measures to try to deal with the national debt which they created, both parties over there, and the interest that has to be paid on it.

Mr. Althouse: Over half of it was done in the last four years.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): I hear some more crying from the opposition benches, but the fact is that it is the New Democrats who back in December of 1979 crawled into bed with the Liberal opposition, defeated the Conservative government and thereby condemned Canadians to five more years of the grossest kind of mismanagement and overspending that this country has ever seen. The figures are there. The national debt burgeoned under those twin evils.

Mr. Ferguson: You doubled it over the last four years.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): They are yelling it doubled over the last four years. Of course it has because the effect of compound interest on the past debt in fact has doubled it. There is no question about it. But every nickel of the national debt involves overspending by past Liberal-NDP coalitions plus the unpaid interest on those figures. Those figures are there for all to see, and opposition members know very well that that is the case.

This government has been left with a legacy of overspending by previous governments. The reason that government today is hamstrung in its ability to deliver programs and continue to do the things that Canadians want is the very deficit and debt problem that was left to us from the past.

We now have to find in excess of $39 billion to service that past debt. Now the opposition people say: "No, renege on it. There is no problem. Do not pay on the bonds, do not pay on the treasury bills, continue to build up the national debt as we did in the past, and let us become a banana republic". Well that is not very responsible. It is simply not good enough.

This government is going to continue to support the farm community through responsible deficit reduction.

I would like to refer opposition members to Canadian Prairie Farming, 1960–2000, An Economic Analysis by the Economic Council of Canada. The figures are in there. If anyone thinks this government has not supported agriculture, I urge you to have a good look into this book here. All of it is justified and we are proud of doing it, but do not ever say that this government has not supported Canadian agriculture.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I just want to explain to the hon. member for Winnipeg North that I thought he wanted an explanation on how the debate was going to carry on. It is 20 minutes without any questions and comments.

I agree that if we have unanimous consent the hon. member could pose a question, but I would have to ask the House if there is unanimous consent to allow the hon. member a question?

Mr. Milliken: Just consent of the member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Would the hon. member entertain a question?

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to entertain a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I must have unanimous consent of the House under the Standing Orders, in order to pose these questions and go beyond 20 minutes. It is beyond 20 minutes now. It is 20 minutes of debate, period.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Winnipeg North has the floor to ask a question, very fast. We only have 30 seconds left.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia not admit that had closure happened before his time to speak he would have had no opportunity to share his thoughts with us?

The same thing would happen now to other parliamentarians who would like to speak and share their concerns on this bill. Closure is always repugnant to a sense of fair play. It is the sword of Damocles to all parliamentarians, and it is a poison dart to democracy. Will he not admit that?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has 15 seconds.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that in many other Parliaments debate is somewhat limited. The practice in Britain is to have one or two speakers on a bill. I think it is quite possible to say everything that is necessary to be said about a bill on behalf of a political party, in a very short period of time. If there was a will on the part of this House to pass this legislation for the benefit of Canadian farmers, it could be done in very short order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

CANADA POST

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, rural Canada is under siege. Services and institutions which have long been an integral part of the lives of rural Canadians are being dismantled and removed.

For generations the post office has been a focal point of our rural communities. Today Canada Post is slowly but relentlessly proceeding with its agenda to remove the post office from these communities. Rural postal outlets are being opened in areas where the citizens have indicated they do not want them and they have no need of them. Why?

The answer is that it is the first step in the process to close the main post offices. When the postmaster or postmistress leaves for whatever reason, the post office will also be gone. A bond which holds the community together will be gone.

There has been no consultation with the municipalities involved. Canada Post officials attend meetings, spout the party line, leave, and the RPO policy continues. The closures continue. Rural Canada suffers. Canada Post officials have lost their credibility. People no longer believe them.

The Chamber of Commerce, other organizations and concerned individuals in my riding will continue to resist this erosion of postal service. This government cannot be allowed to abdicate its responsibility for quality postal service in this country.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of small business week, I wish to highlight the value we place on our small business community.

The future of small business in Canada has never looked brighter. With the increasingly international scope of economics and business, as well as the recent free trade agreement with our neighbour to the south, Canada can look with confidence toward the growth of a vigorous and competitive economy, the envy of every other nation.

Small business forms the backbone of the Canadian economy and is our firm guarantee of future prosperity. It is also a chief avenue of economic development for our multicultural communities. Almost one–third of Canadians have origins other than English or French. These citizens make up 50 per cent of those who own and/or operate their own businesses.

The entrepreneurial spirit is clearly alive and well in Canada. It is a solid foundation for our ethnocultural communities. Indeed, our social diversity in general constitutes a major asset in the building of our economy.

I would like to pay homage today to all those Canadians from our ethnocultural communities who have made such a vital contribution to the business life and over all economic growth of our country.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, when the Auditor General's Report was tabled, we found that Canadians did not have sufficient access to information. Since certain types of abuse might never be revealed by a government that prefers to act secretly, it is time we provided the Auditor General with the tools he needs to do his job. It is imperative that any one who witnesses abuse of public funds be able to inform the Auditor General without fear of reprisal.

BANKING

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, the laundering of money from drug trafficking is a serious problem in Canada. Until last January when Bill C–61 was enacted, Canadian law never specifically made money laundering a crime. Bill C–61 encourages Canadian banks to establish their own private guidelines on what constitutes suspicious bank deposits.

I would like to commend the Royal Bank of Canada for going one step further by imposing a de facto reporting requirement for all large transactions. Since January, anyone making a large cash deposit at the Royal must sign a declaration of source of funds. That person must provide personal identification such as a social insurance number, passport or driver's licence. The signed form gives the bank permission to disclose the transaction to the police.

So far this year, the Royal has examined close to 100 suspicious accounts, and has reported 76 to the RCMP. On October 12, 1989, U.S. criminal charges were laid against a Royal Bank customer after police were tipped off by the bank about suspicious transactions. The Royal Bank should serve as an example for all Canadian banks to follow in the war against drugs.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, this government has allowed negotiations to break down between itself and the Public Service Alliance of Canada which represents Veterans Affairs and National Parole employees. These individuals have worked without a contract for almost three years. They are now being put in a position where they have to choose between their own needs and those of their clients.

We are talking about a group of people, most of whom are social workers, people who have dedicated their lives to helping others. This a moral dilemma for many of them. How do they reconcile their own needs for a reasonable salary with their desire to ensure that the aging veteran has someone he or she can count on to be there if a crisis arises?

I know many of the employees of Veterans Affairs to be dedicated and hard working individuals who devote many hours to making the veterans lives easier. Most give more devotion and energy to their jobs than any employer could reasonably expect. Who will the veterans turn to if these employees are forced to go on strike?

I have seen their demands and they are not unreasonable, but after three years with no increase in pay, they are being backed into a corner. Our veterans served us well when we needed them. They need veterans affairs services and they need them now. Please ensure that these employees are treated fairly so that the veterans are not hurt by Treasury Board's lack of good faith.

CANADA CAREER WEEK

Mr. Guy St–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, when he announced Canada Career Week, to be held from October 29 to November 4, the Minister of State (Youth) said: "Canada Career Week gives young people a chance to plan for their future, aware of the changes that are taking place on the labour market".

Under the theme "Careers in Focus", Canada Employment Centres across the country will organize activities in co–operation with schools and community organizations.

Mr. Speaker, Canada Career Week is an excellent way to make young people aware of labour market trends and the importance of planning their studies in terms of their career requirements.

CANADA–U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring the concerns of the Canadian printing industry about tariff reductions under the free trade agreement to the attention of the House.

The printing industry is united in its opposition to the accelerated elimination of the tariff on printing products. The massive capacity of the U.S. industry relative to the Canadian industry and market has resulted in significant U.S. competition.

The Americans have been able to compete very effectively. Indeed, the balance of trade is significantly in their favour. Statistics Canada reports that over $276.6 million in printing products were imported from the U.S. while Canada exported only $132.7 million to the States, resulting in a trade deficit of $143.9 million.

Under the free trade agreement, the tariffs on printed products are scheduled to be phased out over five years. Now the government is talking about accelerating this to January 1990. The printing industry believes the acceleration of tariff removal will be disruptive and have a negative impact.

I urge the government to listen to the Canadian Printing Industry Association, the employers, and the Graphic Communications International Union, the workers, and do everything in its power to ensure that the removal of these tariffs is not accelerated.

CINEMA

Mr. Michel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, movie buffs are meeting in Rouyn-Noranda on October 28 this year to celebrate the eighth edition of the International Film Festival in Abitibi—Témiscamingue.

Mr. Speaker, this important event has become a symbol of excellence in our region. Again, I want to congratulate the dynamic director of this festival, Mr. Jacques Matte, and his valiant team who for the eighth consecutive year will show us the best the film world has to offer.

The hospitality and warmth of the people of Abitibi—Témiscamingue have become a byword in this country and internationally, thanks to this annual festival which attracts an impressive number of actors and actresses, directors, distributors and media from all over the world. Welcome to Rouyn-Noranda! And three cheers for the 8th International Film Festival in Abitibi—Témiscamingue! Three cheers for Abitibi—Témiscamingue!

DISARMAMENT

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, this is Arms Control and Disarmament Week worldwide and a timely occasion, I am sure all members will agree, for Canada to show initiative, vigour and foresight in arms control and disarmament.

Parliamentarians for Global Action have provided Canada with an opportunity to reverse its intransigence in the face of meaningful action in this area. Canada can and should join the over 39 countries that back the call for an amendment to the partial test ban treaty on nuclear weapons, an amendment that would turn the treaty into a comprehensive ban on nuclear tests.

If the world threat of nuclear weapons is to be overcome, progressive industrialized nations have to take up the challenge on behalf of humankind. Canada cannot let pass the occasion to show leadership, especially now that it has a seat on the Security Council.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, the same spirit which drove the people to settle areas of Canada like my riding of Cariboo-Chilcotin flourishes today among the small business sector of our nation's economy. The hopes, the hardships, the risks and the rewards all characterize the spirit of the people who built this country and who continue to make it grow. In fact, in my riding, fully 85 per cent of the jobs depend on small business.

Small business is the life-blood of the Canadian economy, and as it grows, so Canada grows.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to defend my rights as a member of Parliament. As you know, I have brought the educational crisis which is taking place on the Six Nations Reserve to the attention of this House and the minister on a number of occasions. I have continually asked the minister to meet Chief Montour to resolve the situation and to get the students back to school as soon as possible.

Finally, the minister, on the recommendation of the commissioner of the Indian Commission of Ontario, has agreed to meet Chief Montour tomorrow. I was asked by Chief Montour to attend the meeting as their member of Parliament, but much to my shock, I was informed by Chief Montour that the minister had informed him that he was not prepared to meet with them as long as their member of Parliament was there.

As a member of Parliament, I will not stand in the way of this meeting, but I believe that this is a direct attempt to circumvent the electoral process. This minister is challenging my rights as a member of Parliament to represent my constituents in the best way I can. What does he have to hide? I call on the minister to resolve this situation and to meet the chief in an open and honest manner. This is not the time to bring in more broken promises.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, last night this House held multiple votes on the report stage of the legislation to improve the management of the Unemployment Insurance Act, Bill C–21. We had a total of 23 standing votes. The record will show that only 26 socialists voted for their opposition to our government's Bill C–21 on unemployment.

The official public record will also show that by the time we reached the last vote last night, the socialists objection to the government bill had declined by 50 per cent and only 13 voted against the government. Ergo, our government support is growing in the ranks of our socialist friends. The official government record confirms that the New Democratic Party is not at all convinced of its position and NDP members are prepared to abstain or be absent from the House for a vote they screamed so loud to have.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–21, the government's UIC bill, is now raising municipal property taxes all around Canada. By increasing UIC employers' contributions, a whopping 21 per cent as of January 1, local municipalities and school boards must raise property taxes to cover premium increases of up to $180 per employee.

In my riding of Surrey North, this means an additional $814,000. In the city of Vancouver, it is $2.3 million. In the city of Toronto, not counting its suburbs, it is $3.4 million.

UIC and job training are the responsibility of the federal government, not the local governments. What cash assistance is this government willing to provide local municipalities to pay the increases in UIC premiums? None! The government is forcing municipalities to raise property taxes and forcing more people out of their homes.

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, today is a memorable day indeed. The Minister of State (Science and Technology) has just announced the names of 14 centres of excellence selected under the network of centres of excellence program which has a budget of $240 million. The selection of these networks is a decisive stage in a series of efforts made by the Government of Canada to promote long-term basic and applied research in Canada.

The program is a challenge to researchers to abolish boundaries between disciplines, schools of thought and institutions, and work together on developing projects aimed at improving the competitive position of industry across this country.

These networks are an excellent way to promote excellence in the field of scientific research in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Canadian Government and on behalf of all my colleagues, I wish every success to the researchers who obtained these contributions through the centres of excellence networks.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I am responding today to a report prepared by the PC Quebec caucus complaining that too much federal research and development money is spent in the National Capital Region. In complaining, the report ignores the fact that most departmental research is carried out in the National Capital Region as well as the concentration of federal laboratories operated by the National Research Council.

The report implied that the level of R and D spending in the National Capital Region is excessive and that more should be spent in Quebec. The Minister of Communications is quoted as saying that there is a problem and agreeing that his province should get more.

Although it is natural in politics, members of the House should avoid the temptation to jump on the bandwagon of demanding more R and D money for their regions. R and D is too important and the money is too scarce for it to be thrown into the political pork-barrel.

All regions in Canada should be doing more R and D, but you do not increase the level of R and D in Canada by moving existing activities from one region to another. Investment in science must take into account the best interest of science. Regional considerations should only play a role when international experts have made location one of the technical determinants. Politicians should not pretend to be experts when they are not.

I call upon all members of this House and upon the government to denounce the pernicious and parochial attitude about science revealed in the Tory caucus report.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the government's continuing refusal to provide receipts on ministerial travel to the Auditor General.

Yesterday I brought to the attention of this House that Treasury Board guidelines had been doctored in September, 1989 removing a crucial sentence referring to the Auditor General. I have since found another instance of changing the rules where the words "for audit purposes", referring to travel receipts, have also been removed from the September, 1989 version of the guidelines.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Why did the government doctor those rules? Why does the government not want the Auditor General to see these files?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, there is no doctoring of the rules here. The guidelines were issued for the first time in November, 1988 and all guidelines of Treasury Board are reviewed periodically to make sure they are consistent. I have been told that these were changed as a matter of course in 1989 to reflect the situation that existed. It was only to reflect the decisions that had been taken years and years ago and by which governments had abided over the years.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister just told us that the rules were amended to save embarrassment for the government.

[Translation]

My supplementary is directed to the President of the Treasury Board.

Yesterday, the Minister's answer to my question was that they would provide figures on the travel expenses of each minister on a regular basis. Mr. Speaker, this information is already available. We can find all that out simply by reading the Public Accounts. That is not what the Auditor General of Canada wants to know.

Is the Minister now prepared to give us some real answers? Is he prepared to hand over the receipts for travel expenses to the Auditor General, as the latter requested? Yes or no?

Is he prepared to hand over to the Auditor General the letters from ministers requisitioning government aircrafts, as the Auditor General requested? Yes or no?

[English]

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat what I have already said to this House. I have asked the Comptroller General to ensure that they had a complete record of ministerial expenses and that that record be made available on a regular basis to anybody who wanted it.

• (1420)

Yesterday, I was also asked a very pertinent question about the use of government aircraft during election campaigns. I went into the record in somewhat more detail to be forthcoming and open with the Opposition.

During the election campaign, the government had used aircraft on five occasions in October and five occasions in November, 1988. Upon verification, out of those 10 trips, the Governor General used the aircraft seven times. Two of the trips were in November after the election. We only had one official trip during that period and that was for a Canada—U.S. anniversary of the Blue Water Bridge in Sarnia. That happened the day the election was called. That compares to the statistics that I have for the 1984 election. There were 38 trips. I would just like the Opposition to explain what they did on those trips.

Mr. Boudria: If the minister is so convinced that he is right, why does he not provide this House with the receipts. That is the question I want answered.

In his book, Where I Stand, the Prime Minister wrote about government spending at page 46, and I have a copy of that book here that was recently purchased for 99 cents at Coles. It says at page 46:

> My starting point on the issue of government spending is freedom of information. We cannot even begin to come to grips with this problem unless and until the books of government are opened up so that we can all see what is being done with the cash.

I would like to know why we cannot see the receipts. Why can we not see what is being done with the cash?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, yesterday and the day before I told the House that we would give the total travel expenses of each minister, that we would give the number of times that each minister used a government aircraft, the date, the itinerary, the names of all passengers on each trip on government aircraft, the reason for the use of government aircraft, the cost of the use of government aircraft, which is essentially what the Auditor General was asking for.

I can also say that when I look at some of the numbers that will be presented to this House, I find that when we talk about the use of government aircraft in the last year, we are 62 per cent below in the utilization of the fleet by the previous government in the last 12 months that it was in office. I think that is a very good record indeed.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. It concerns this government's refusal to provide the Auditor General with all of the documents regarding the use of VIP aircraft.

On October 24, the President of the Treasury Board said, and I quote from page 5051 of Hansard:

> We will provide on a regular basis the total travel expenses of each minister, the number of times he takes an aircraft, where he is going, who he is going with, his itinerary, the reason for the use of the aircraft and the cost of the government aircraft.

The Auditor General is not asking if the aircraft was used. The Auditor General is asking why the aircraft was used.

If the minister is willing to provide the information for future trips, why is he refusing to provide the same information to the Auditor General on past trips? Why is he stonewalling? What has this government got to hide?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, I think we took good note of what the Auditor General had to say. We read the report carefully. I immediately talked to the Comptroller General of Canada and asked him to make sure that this information would be available on a regular basis for anyone who wanted to have access to it. That is the government's commitment to openness and accountability and the government's response to the Auditor General.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The minister is simply trying to confuse the situation. It is fact that the Department of National Defence maintains certain log records which are now available to the public. However, the Auditor General wanted to see the letters of request which would indicate the purpose for which the VIP aircraft were used and whether or not the Treasury Board guidelines were followed and if appropriate charges were made to those ministers.

My question to the minister is simple. Will he or will he not give the Auditor General all of the documents requested but denied for the period commencing April 1, 1989, yes or no?

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that a government has provided all this information as openly and accountably.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. de Cotret: In addition to the list that my hon. colleague just read out, I would also like to say, and I made a commitment before this House, that we will have a thorough review of the accounting practices in terms of the cost of the executive fleet and that report will be tabled in this House. I have asked for the report of the Comptroller General and I expect to have it in the following weeks. We will table it for everybody to see. I cannot understand why my hon. colleague is talking about stonewalling or hiding anything. We are open and accountable.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCurdy: If these expressions of support will end, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday, the minister said that his 9 per cent GST on just about everything that moves could not be reduced. In Montreal last night, he refused to give Canadians assurance that it would not increase.

Can we assume from these remarkable statements that in fact the GST will rise if it is introduced at the same rate as the manufacturers' sales tax has increased since this government has been in office?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was going to wish the hon. member all the best in his current endeavours but he seemed to turn that one off with the preamble to his question so I will restrain myself.

I have commented on a number of occasions in this House, as the hon. member is aware, on the very important balance that is in the package of measures that form the GST system and the difficulty of changing just one of those. It is not possible. If people want lower rates, they have to accept a reduction in things like the credit to the middle income reduction or the payment to small business. Those are very important elements. I have just commented very specifically on the difficulty of making changes to those very important fairness elements in the package.

The hon. member has commented on the fact that I cannot make any guarantees for future governments. I am sure he understands that that is not possible to do. In this House I have said that barring unforeseen circumstances, we do not anticipate that rate changing.

However, those are things that any government has to maintain some flexibility on.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance talks about balance in the system. One of the problems is that most ordinary Canadians see the system that he is advocating as being severely imbalanced in favour of the rich as compared to the poor.

I would simply direct this question to the minister. In view of the record of this government which in its time in office has increased the manufacturers' sales tax from 9 per cent to 10 per cent to 11 per cent to 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent, would it not be fair for the taxpayers to assume that if this tax is introduced, on the basis of the government's record that eventually the taxpayers are going to be bled dry by increases in the GST just as they were by the manufacturers' sales tax?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member has raised two points that I would like to address. The first is that he says that this new GST system is weighted against those with lower incomes and favours those with upper incomes.

• (1430)

Let me remind the hon. member that when we came into office low income people were paying two or three percentage points more of their income in sales tax than people in upper income brackets. But, with the refundable sales tax credit and now the goods and services tax credit under the proposed system, those with low incomes will pay two percentage points less of their income in sales tax than those in upper incomes. Clearly we have shifted the whole balance of the sales tax system in favour of those in lower income brackets.

The hon. member has raised a second point relating to what could happen in the future. The only assurance that any taxpayer has that tax rates will not increase is if a government controls its spending. We have controlled program spending of the Government of Canada to 3.5 per cent over the last five years, on average. That is less than the rate of inflation.

In that same period of time the average of the provinces has been 6.4 per cent. One province, Ontario, has raised its program spending, on average, 9.5 per cent. That is the best assurance. If we continue that record of keeping program spending lower than the provinces, that is how Canadians can be assured that the tax burden will not be increased.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, the average taxpayer is going to be interested in that carefully crafted answer which ignores the additional $2,000 a year in tax being paid by ordinary taxpayers.

The minister asks us to trust him. The Auditor General pointed out in his report that 1,500 tax collectors could not collect the manufacturers' sales tax from 75,000 accounts, with either adequacy or fairness, and that that has been a cost to the ordinary taxpayer.

How does the minister think it is possible that one million accounts are going to be served by only a two to threefold increase in the number of collectors without adding still a greater burden on the shoulders of the ordinary taxpayer?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me draw to the attention of the hon. member the difference between the existing federal sales tax and the goods and services tax. Under the existing tax for those 75,000 taxpayers there are 22,000 separate deals between Revenue Canada and the individual taxpayers. These have developed over the years. They have resulted in the most complex form of sales tax system that anyone can imagine anywhere.

Surely the hon. member can understand why we want to move away from that system into a far more simple system, the goods and services tax, which will require far fewer people per taxpayer to administer and will allow us to ensure that there is not the same sort of tax avoidance that is there under the existing system, to which the Auditor General has referred. That, we have said, is one of the key reasons we must move from the existing system to a new system where there will not be that same form of tax avoidance.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. On May 24, the minister of Industry, Science and Technology stated, and I quote: "We are going to promote research and development. We want to support the winners".

Could the Minister give us the assurance today that Canadian winners will remain in Canadian hands?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, in terms of Canadian companies, all of those takeovers to which my hon. friend refers are looked at by Investment Canada. They are looked at in terms of net benefit to Canada. That is the important thing—net benefit to Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. That is exactly what you did with Lumonics, Lee Instruments, Xicom and all the other high tech companies we sold to foreign interests.

[English]

In the same speech the minister proudly announced: "I am confident we have the individual pieces it takes to establish an industrial research and development strength to take us into the next century."

And, at the same time this government, is negotiating the sale of Connaught to the Government of France. Why does this government consider the Government of France to be one of the key pieces that we need to make our economy great?

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, unlike the previous government, this government does not negotiate the sale of anything. This is a private deal that is being worked upon.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winegard: When Connaught and Merieux have a deal that satisfies Investment Canada and the minister, I am sure the minister will rule on it.

If they want to talk about research and development, why do they not talk about the centres of excellence program announced just an hour ago? Why do they not talk about $240 million going into R and D in this country?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment.

As the minister knows, statements on unemployment, the numbers of jobs lost and jobs created are based on the Statistics Canada monthly labour force survey. According to the Auditor General the sample sizes of the labour force survey have been reduced due to recent budget cuts and consequently, he says, the accuracy of the survey is now doubtful. In 1986, 5,217 households were dropped from the survey.

Since these unemployment figures are widely used not only in economic planning but also for job creation programs and employment services, what does the government intend to do to restore the labour force survey as a credible source of information for Canadians?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the Auditor General's recommendation. As with all his other recommendations, we will be looking at them within the context of what we do within our department.

One of the things that has happened in terms of the labour force statistics is that sample sizes change over time, in part having to do with the increasingly sophisticated techniques that surveyors use. Having said that, I have discussed with my officials looking at the labour force statistics how they can be improved.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General has said that due to budget cuts Statistics Canada is not able to give accurate information on unemployment to Canadians. As the minister knows, the labour force survey is also the main source of data for unemployment insurance and, depending on the unemployment rate in the different regions, eligibility and duration of benefits will vary considerably.

If these figures are not accurate, unemployed workers could be cheated of benefits, and this could be even worse under Bill C-21.

I want to ask the minister: When will the report on the new economic regions for unemployment insurance be made public, and what will the minister do to assure accurate figures for these regions?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure Hon. Members that we have done our job as a responsible government, because in the last twelve years, no review of the economic regions was ever done. When the committee is ready to submit its recommendation, I will be very pleased, as minister responsible, to announce it to the House of Commons.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. The all-party Standing Committee on the Environment spent the last two days in Washington, D.C. encouraging Congress to do the right thing: to hold firm on cutting SO2 emissions by at least 10 million tonnes by the year 2000 and to cap new emissions.

Canada has yet to legislate a national cap on acid rain. Will the minister assure this House that there will be a national legislated cap in place within the time frame we are urging on the United States, which will likely be Earth Day in April 1990?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, current control actions in the seven eastern most provinces of Canada have already resulted in a 40 per cent reduction in emissions. In 1994 we will have achieved a full 50 per cent target. This means that by then Canada will have reduced its emissions by 2.3 million tonnes. It is clear to this government that we cannot allow emissions to increase after that, so we need a cap.

• (1440)

This is an item on the agenda of the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment. We have a committee which is responsible for devising recommendations. We think the motto should be to secure a national cap in those seven provinces through negotiations at the CCME level and then to secure the cap through legislation. A possible motto could be, for example, what we did for the controls which presently exist, that is, to use the provincial legislation process.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Time is of the essence here. The cap in the United States is under real threat from some very powerful forces. If Canada is to expect the U.S. to cap emissions to protect the environment from future acid rain sources, then the same principle must apply here and to date only Ontario has agreed to cap emissions.

Will the minister take steps between now and March of next year to see that legally enforceable limits or caps are in place for the other nine provinces and two territories, or is the U.S. legislation without a cap something the minister finds acceptable?

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I just said what we are already doing to reach this goal. As far as the western provinces are concerned, we all know that happily there is no acid rain problem there. But, we think that we will also need targets and schedules there for the future.

CANADA POST

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In 1982, the Department of National Health and Welfare had to intervene to send perishable foodstuffs to northern Québec. Today, Canada Post Corporation is about to increase its rates by 32 per cent, 45 per cent and even more as a result of a decision that the Treasury Board made in April 1989 to cut $1 million from its subsidy for the shipping of parcels in the North. My question is as follows.

By November 13, 1989, could a moratorium be declared on rate increases set by Canada Post Corporation for essential products like dairy products, fruit, vegetables, bread, food and children's articles?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I want to reassure the Hon. Member for Abitibi. I know and realize the importance of his question and I want to assure him that this Government is also very concerned. All Ministers directly involved in finding a solution plan to meet and have been contacted. I know that my colleague who is responsible for Canada Post is also to call a meeting shortly to try to find an appropriate solution to the present situation.

PWA CORPORATION

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Bureau of Competition Policy allowed PWA Corporation, the owners of Canadian Airlines International, to take over Wardair thereby giving two airline companies in Canada control of 98 per cent of the market. Now PWA is selling all the aircraft it took from Wardair, plus 11 of its own.

It is evident that PWA had no intention of carrying on any of the service of Wardair. All it wanted to do was get rid of a troublesome competitor.

Could the Deputy Prime Minister tell us what assurances the government required from PWA that it would at least provide service in a major portion of the market formerly provided by Wardair? Could the Deputy Minister tell us what benefit there is to the consumers of Canada from the cannibalization of what was once Wardair?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised a number of points about the merger. He recognizes that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is not present in the House. The minister will reply to him at the appropriate time.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: How about the Minister of Transport?

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): The Deputy Prime Minister is here.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, I would expect on a subject as important as this to Canadians and to the Canadian consumers that the government would be a little more forthcoming with an answer, particularly since it is obvious that not only could PWA not afford to buy Wardair, it could not afford to keep the airplanes it already had, because it is selling 11 of its own along with the 15 it got from Wardair.

Will the government, will the minister, will the Deputy Prime Minister, will somebody tell us what assurances they got from PWA as to the financial strength of PWA? What level of financial strength was required before they let this takeover go ahead?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the member from The Sydneys that if PWA had not bought Wardair we would not have that service at all today.

Mr. MacLellan: What's the difference?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): The member should know that we would have had hundreds or thousands more lay-offs if PWA had not bought Wardair some time ago. The member knows very well that PWA is trying to rationalize its operations in a way that will enable it to provide service by Canadian Airlines on former Wardair routes. The member knows that very well.

I believe this was a good deal because it permitted hundreds and thousands of Canadians to keep their jobs, jobs they would otherwise have lost.

AIR CANADA

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Minister of Transport. As he will know, Air Canada has pulled out of Sept Iles, Quebec; Sydney, Nova Scotia; Gander and Stephenville, Newfoundland, just to name a few.

In the case of Stephenville, Air Canada has refused to enter into a joint fare arrangement with First Air which would allow it to provide a replacement jet service to Stephenville. Air Canada has not only decided now where it will not fly, it is also dictating that nobody will fly there and, in the process, making a sham of airline deregulation.

Why did the government not foresee this cowardly stranglehold application of deregulation, and does the minister condone this bullyism?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to say first that Air Canada is a private corporation which has the right to fly where it wants and where it can provide services. Stephenville has services which will be provided by another company. I believe that my friend knows that very well.

Dealing with the question of deregulation I would like to quote an outstanding Canadian. His name is Max Ward. He said recently: "The airline business has been strangled by politicians who between 1946 and 1984 did not understand the way that aviation has to run". I think the member has his answer about deregulation.

Mr. Simmons: Air Canada is private, yes. That does not give it the option of dictating who will have service in this country.

This refusal effectively gives Air Canada and the other national airline the ability to carve up the territory, to decide who is going to have service and who is not going to have service right from Whitehorse to Stephenville.

I ask the minister: What steps does he intend to take to ensure that there will be unfettered competition in the airline industry rather than Air Canada's kneecapping approach to protecting its markets?

• (1450)

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, rather than trying to scare the people of Newfoundland, particularly in Stephenville, about air transportation the member should say that Air Atlantic immediately covered the flights Air Canada withdrew and actually we have an increase in the number of departures each day.

It demonstrates that the private sector can sometimes provide more services in this country than could the air transportation companies we had before.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

On October 2, the minister of fisheries told the House: "fishermen in Atlantic Canada are enjoying a year which is prosperous and adequate". On the other hand, just a couple of days ago the Minister for International Trade said: "This fishing industry is in trouble— that is the state of the fishing industry at this moment—your arse is in the pickle".

Will the Deputy Prime Minister take under advisement appointing someone as minister of fisheries who has some appreciation of the problems facing the fishing industry on both coasts of Canada?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I hate to be quoted incorrectly. By the way, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans just announced today an additional $28 million for increased aerial surveillance and enforcement measures in connection with the fishery, both in eastern Canada and western Canada. He is well aware of the needs of the fishery.

The Hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has been pointing out that it is not all gloom and doom, that the fishing industry today is contributing far more to the Gross National Product than it was a few years ago, and that there are healthy sectors of the fisheries. And of course, as we all know, there are sectors of the fishery that are in difficulty because of the resource.

I could read the whole quotation but I won't. I could give the illustrious story that I gave yesterday but I won't because it might take too long.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, the Minister for International Trade should listen to the Minister for International Trade.

On October 16, the free trade panel ruled against B.C. salmon and herring regulations. Both the minister of fisheries and the Minister for International Trade promised consultation with the people who are under the gun. The only consultation to this point in time has been between the Canadian and the U.S. Governments. Only 20 days remain of the 61 we had. When will the promised consultation with the people in B.C. begin?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, since the panel report was received the government has, as it has been doing constantly during the resolution of this dispute, had consultations with the Government of British Columbia which does not wish the panel report implemented but which in its letter to me has acknowledged that never has it experienced such a process of consultation as it has experienced with us in this issue.

We have had consultations with the fishing industry of British Columbia. We have had consultations with the fishing union of British Columbia. We have had consultations—

Mr. Fulton: Not true.

An Hon. Member: Not that we're aware of.

Mr. Crosbie: They're never aware of very much, and they may not be aware of the fact that they have been consulted with.

We have had consultations with the governments of the Atlantic provinces as well which have an interest in this issue. So there has been a great deal of consultation.

I would ask the hon. gentleman to remember that this is a panel report delivered by a Canadian chairman with two Canadian members and two American members, so he should give it some weight.

REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGIES

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

As is well known, reproductive technology does not include abortion.

What assurances can the minister give that the Royal Commission on Reproductive Technologies will deal expeditiously with the urgent issues before it, including surrogate parenthood, infertility and test tube conception, and not be diverted by the quite separate issue of abortion?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, this is another example of our Government's responsible attitude. We promised to appoint a commission on reproductive technology. The commission has a mandate that is very specific and that will be kept entirely separate from the abortion issue. Appointments were made above all on the basis of qualifications and knowledge and experience in the area of human rights, and we have a commission that will do its work under a specific mandate with qualified people and a specific goal which is entirely different from the abortion issue.

Mrs. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Minister's intentions are honourable, but it is absolutely crucial to exclude abortion from the debate. Will the Minister make it quite clear in the commission's mandate that abortion is not a part of that mandate?

Mrs. Vézina: Mr. Speaker, I think the commission's mandate is quite clear, in that it asks the commission to examine the implications for health, research and the public interest and to recommend policies and advise on precautions that should be taken in the case of existing and future medical and scientific programs.

We are preparing for the present and working for the future, in order to avoid the kind of situations we see today.

FORESTRY

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Forestry).

Last July the minister admitted that the 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber had a devastating effect on the industry. The minister is quoted as saying that he would present the Americans with a proposition to test the grounds before he sent them a termination notice to cancel the Memorandum of Understanding.

Could the minister inform Canadians on the progress of his action?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, it is true that I said earlier this year the softwood lumber tax was a minor factor in the non-congenial economic circumstances of the lumber sector, particularly in the hon. member's area of northern Ontario.

We have served notice on the United States that we wish to revisit the issue. At the same time we are holding discussions with the provinces, which is a necessary and important ingredient in developing and assembling the necessary evidence with which to approach the Americans with the proposition to eliminate the MOU.

Mr. Bélair: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Indeed, northern Ontario has suffered greatly with this tax. He has just indicated that the Americans are willing to listen.

What can we expect from the American Government on this?

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I said that we have served notice on the Americans that we want to revisit the issue. I did not say that they have shown readiness to listen.

What I have said is that we are constructing the evidence that will provide us with the necessary authority and jurisdiction to negotiate out of the MOU.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Only last year the Prime Minister promised to improve not destroy medicare.

Last night the Canadian Medical Association appeared before the finance committee. The doctors questioned this government's commitment to medicare. They stated that the goods and services tax will dramatically increase the cost of running our hospitals and increase the operating costs for doctors and other health care professionals. They indicated that the goods and services tax will increase health care costs.

Will the Minister of Finance explain how adding to the cost of Canada's health care system through the GST constitutes an improvement to that system?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the full report of the Canadian Medical Association but the hon. member, I am sure, is aware that medical services, medical devices, and prescription drugs are all exempt under the goods and services tax.

I think that that demonstrates very clearly our commitment to the health system in this country, a commitment that we have maintained for many, many years.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, that certainly is not what the doctors said last night. Surely they know more about the front line of health care than does the Minister of Finance.

Would somebody responding on behalf of the minister of health like to contradict the doctors on this point? Will they now admit that the goods and services tax will increase the cost of medicare, or are they disagreeing with the doctors, saying that the doctors do not know what they are talking about?

• (1500)

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I will answer in the same way, Mr. Speaker. I have not had an opportunity to read the specific statements of the medical association. Clearly, medicare is exempt.

The treatment of hospitals is such that they will not be required to pay any additional sales tax under the new system relative to what they are paying under the old system. In each of these ways we have responded in a way that demonstrates our commitment to the health care system in this country.

PROPOSED RESEARCH CENTRE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. At this time last year during the election campaign the Prime Minister was telling no less than the United Nations that Winnipeg was going to get a centre for the international promotion of sustainable development. We were excited about that because finally we were going to get something out of this government. But now we are not too sure.

The government and the Cabinet have suddenly become very silent about this centre. Rumours fly. I want to know from the minister right now are we going to get that centre? If so, when are we going to get it?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would encourage the member to maintain his excitement at the same level as before. We are actively working with Manitoba and CIDA on the negotiation of an agreement to set up this magnificent centre. It is very important for us.

Point of Order

We are on the eve of striking a final agreement with the province and all interested parties. My officials are working very actively on it. Stay tuned. You will have more news in a few weeks.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, that is encouraging, but I can tell the hon. minister that it is always very difficult to get excited about anything regarding this government.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. Again, there are a number of rumours flying about this centre. What we have heard is that if we do get the centre it is going to be a mere shell, that it will be nothing but a token operation, that it will be nothing more than an administrative office, and that real jobs and real contracts will go elsewhere in the country.

My question is: can the minister assure us that the centre is coming to Winnipeg? Can he also assure us that this will be a centre with real contracts and real jobs, meaning something real for the City of Winnipeg and the Province of Manitoba?

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, in spite of all those rumours, probably created by the member himself, there will be a real centre with real content, real substance, a real mission, real people and real success.

POINT OF ORDER

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising out of what I thought at the beginning was one instance in this question period, but as it turns out it was two. In doing so I refer to Beauchesne's, citation 327(1), which states:

> A Minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he be prepared to lay it upon the Table.

I would note further in citation 327(5) it states:

> To be cited, a document must be quoted or specifically used to influence debate.

Citation 327(7) states:

> When a letter, even though it may have been written originally as a private letter, becomes part of a record of a department, it becomes a public document, and if quoted by a Minister in debate, must be tabled on request.

During the course of his responses to questions from the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, the hon. President of the Treasury Board consistently and persistently quoted from a document he was holding in his hand having to do, presumably, with plane trips taken by ministers. I would submit that that having been the case he is now duty bound to table that document.

As well, and for the same reason, when he was responding to a question from the hon. member from Nanaimo—Cowichan, the hon. Minister for International Trade cited and, indeed, quoted from a letter from the Government of British Columbia to his department. I submit that he, too, is now duty bound to table that letter.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): I was quoting from this document, Mr. Speaker, and I would be happy to table it.

Mr. Gauthier: How do you know it is the same document?

Mr. de Cotret: If the members want special copies I would be happy to provide them.

Mr. Ouellet: Table all the receipt books at the same time.

PRIVILEGE

CENTRES OF EXCELLENCE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege.

I think it is a collective right of all members of Parliament to be treated on an equal basis. It is a question of equity that information available to a member of Parliament is shared by all members of Parliament.

My question of privilege arises from the press conference that was held today by the Minister of State for Science and Technology dealing with the network of Centres of Excellence. I was very happy to hear about the announcement. I am proud to say that the University of Ottawa in my riding will be more than happy to have seven of those centres operating.

I am very distressed by the fact that last night all Tory members were informed by electronic mail, that is, the House of Commons network of—

An Hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Gauthier: I know because two Tory members told me.

An Hon. Member: Do you believe them?

Mr. Gauthier: Whether I should believe them or not is not the question.

I also know further, Mr. Speaker, because the office of the member for Ottawa South called the minister's office and was informed that, indeed, all Tory members had been informed last night by electronic mail that this morning all ministers would receive copies of this brief and this announcement and at maybe one o'clock or later this afternoon the rest of us would hear about this announcement.

My question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, involves a question of equity. I am not questioning the value of the announcement nor am I questioning its contents. I am just saying that if it is true that we are all equal in this place—

Mr. Lewis: It is not true.

Mr. Gauthier: I hear the Minister of Justice say, "It is not true". If it is not true then something should be done to rectify that kind of a situation.

I believe it is a custom, a practice, a long-standing habit of governments to want to share good information with all members. This is good information.

I ask why the government is so secretive, so paranoid about information that it fails to tell all members of Parliament including those of the Liberal caucus, and those of the New Democratic caucus, about this announcement.

My question of privilege is simple. I do not like being treated as a second-class citizen in this place. I do not think it is fair. I do not think it is right. I do not think it has to be the practice of this government, even though I am told that there are other events in past history where this very same government was very secretive and made announcements outside the House without informing us.

My point is that in this case the government did inform its members that there was a press conference at the Museum of Natural History, that they should be there if they wanted to hear about it. We were not invited, Mr. Speaker. I find that totally irresponsible and unacceptable.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, I do not think anyone was notified last evening. What should have happened was that at 12.30 p.m. today all members of this House should have had the kit announcing the press conference at one o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I take the minister's word. He said "should". That is conditional. I am just telling him that his office told us this morning that last night his own members were informed. I can understand that maybe he will want to go into his office and ask who is putting out this wrong information. I take the minister's word for it. It should have happened as he described. It did not happen. I regret that.

• (1510)

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, if the documentation did not arrive on the desks of the opposition members this morning, I apologize. The plan was to have it on all members' desks before the press conference at one o'clock.

POINT OF ORDER

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I was advised by the House of Commons Comptroller, Mr. John Ferrier, that the figures listed in the schedule of MPs' expenses in the Public Accounts of Canada, Volume 2, Part 2, as they relate to me are completely incorrect. The House of Commons Comptroller has notified the President of the Treasury Board of this mistake, as I have, and apparently the correction has been made.

The correct figures for my indemnities, expense allowance, and travel allowance should have read as follows: $58,725, $19,525, and $30,275.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Government House Leader to give the customary statement of business which the Government House Leader will be calling over the coming week.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, we are giving a great deal of consideration to forthcoming business. We want, as always, to be as equitable as possible to the spokespersons for the opposition. I anticipate that before the close of business today we will be able to give that statement.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—St-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Government House Leader. I hope that since last night he has had time to reflect on the series of long votes, the long proceedings that took place.

Mr. Kempling: Where were you?

Mr. Ouellet: I was here and voted on every vote that took place last night.

I would like the Government House Leader to tell us if he has taken seriously the recommendations of the McGrath committee that recommended that we use electronic voting in the House of Commons, which was at the time a unanimous report of the House. Unfortunately, it was not followed through.

I hope the Government House Leader, upon reflection, will take this very important recommendation of a very important committee of the House of Commons seriously, and act upon it.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments made by my hon. friend. I reflected last night that what took place was an abuse of the privileges—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Cut it out. Closure is an abuse after one day's debate.

Mr. Lewis: Just a minute. I thought you were in the same party. I could have sworn you were in the same party. I really could have.

I think it is an abuse to keep the House of Commons and the business of this country stalled for some 30 standing votes.

Mr. Volpe: Get serious. You didn't call the House of Commons for three months, then you want to push something through.

Mr. Lewis: A colleague in your party has asked a question of me about electronic voting. Why do you not settle this in caucus next Wednesday?

If this is a representation from the official opposition, we will take it as such. I suggest though to my hon. friend that once the Liberal caucus has decided its position on the matter of electronic voting, and there does seem to be some dissension, we will be glad to consider it.

Mr. Ouellet: I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I want the minister to remember that this recommendation of the McGrath committee came after the absolutely unacceptable abuse of Parliament by the then opposition, the Conservative Party, which had the bells ringing for a period of two weeks.

In order to try to find a concrete solution to this possible repetition of abuse, a recommendation was made by representatives of the three parties in the House of Commons. The government, through the Prime Minister, was supposed to act upon it. He has never acted upon it. That is the situation.

I am asking the minister if he is going to review the situation and act upon this recommendation. This type of abuse, whether it comes from one party or another, could come in the future and could be bad for the reputation of the House of Commons. That is the purpose of my question.

Mr. Lewis: I happen to agree 100 per cent with my hon. friend, Mr. Speaker. As far as I am concerned what happened last night was an abuse of the reputation of the House of Commons.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, as a member of one of the opposition parties last night that simply asked the members of the House to stand and be counted on a number of very important amendments to a significant piece of legislation in terms of its implications to the people of Canada, I do not consider it to be an abuse of the House. We were following the rules that have unfolded traditionally in our House of Commons.

I find it somewhat ironic that a government which in four short years has used closure more often than has ever been used in Canadian history before talks about abuse of the traditions and customs of the House of Commons.

I think it is important that we recognize that democracy sometimes is not as quick and as efficient as other forms of government, but it is the better and the best form of government. If it takes a few hours to vote on a very important piece of legislation that is anything but an abuse of Parliament and its traditions.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jean Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I find it regrettable that the minister has left the House. We only get one chance a week to ask questions about the orders of work in this place and he cannot stay for five minutes to listen to questions from this side. I find that totally unacceptable.

I want to ask the minister a question that relates to an order adopted by this House twice, first on April 4 and then June 27. It was ordered at that time that the opposition would have four opposition days, that is, days on which we can settle the agenda in the month of October. There are three working days left in this month. All we wanted to know, in the interest of getting some co-ordinated efforts to really oppose this lousy government, is what it is calling for tomorrow, one day. The other two, we will decide.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Some of the recent interjections are encouraging. Members are talented. Members are hard-working. Some sense of planning would aid all of us in our capacity to screen legislation well and to do what it is that the people sent us here to do and expect us to do.

It is the absence of ability to co-operate in the planning, that has led to the need for the government and for the members on this side of the House to do the planning. There are rules within our procedures that allow us to do the planning through time allocation or through the use of closure. That is what has been going on. It has thrown the system into a little bit of turmoil. The House leader did indicate that before the close of business today he would have something more to say. It might be an opportunity to ask questions at that point.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I am more or less new to this place. I do not know all the rules. I would like to say something in response to what the hon. government House leader said.

He said that by our coming here last night and voting on some 22 or 23 amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act that we were abusing the business of the House, abusing this place. I find that rather offensive because I, among others, came here thinking we were conducting some very serious business on behalf of this country. Those changes to the act certainly were sweeping and significant and brought about a lot of concern in this country.

I, for one, thought that we were doing our business for our country exactly where we stood and what we was doing. Now the government House leader says that by following the rules and following our responsibilities that we are abusing the privileges of this place. I just find that incredibly offensive.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-36, an act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Schneider (p. 5069).

• (1520)

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to stand today and speak on this very important piece of legislation which affects the advance payments to farmers in the riding of Essex—Kent as well as the farmers across Canada.

Bill C-36 intends to cancel the interest free provisions of the advance payments for crops and the prairie grain advance programs. The intention of this legislation is not acceptable to the Canadian farmer.

The government introduced this bill on September 27, 1989. At that time harvest across Canada was well under way. In my riding much of the harvest is complete. Yet we are debating legislation that has kept money out of the pockets of farmers in this country.

It is unfortunate that the legislation was introduced when it was when we stop and think that the farmers early in the spring had done a great deal of planning for their production. Very quickly, the government has changed the rules in the middle of the season. When farmers commenced their current year production they arranged their financing on the basis of the advance payments they were expecting.

However, this government has chosen to change course in the middle of that. Today, the government has forced closure on this bill, not allowing the opposition, not allowing the government, not allowing the farm community within the country to be heard fairly and justly. Many people on this side of the House have stated how bad it is that the government would come forward with closure as many times as it has.

I, too, am a new member of this House and I am very concerned that every time a piece of legislation comes forward we are not allowed to speak clearly, fairly and openly on it. We are forced to closure. We are forced to sit long hours hoping that we will have an opportunity to speak, not necessarily given that opportunity on a regular basis.

Two days ago we debated Bill C-20, a taxation bill which the government claims is necessary as a transition to tax reform. Why does the government emphasize the need for transition legislation one day but not the next? Where is the transition for farmers on advance payments? There is none. The government refuses to provide interest free advance payments for crops and has suspended the past practice without any legislation in place.

The government would have Canadians and our farmers believe that it is the fault of opposition parties for not having the new bill in place. The proposed legislation is bad, and we must tell the government that it is bad. We are attempting to do that at this point in time.

We on the opposition side of the House are not alone in our criticism. Prairie Pools Corporation opposes the bill. That organization has formally requested the government to withdraw the bill at this time. It has indicated that a thorough review of the legislation is necessary to assess the impacts on cash flow and agricultural marketing. The corporation further noted that the existing Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act has proven valuable for providing the needed cash flow to producers and encouraged orderly marketing and efficient grain handling.

The National Farmers Union opposes the bill. This organization has also condemned the proposed legislation, requesting the government withdraw Bill C-36 and reinstate the current interest free legislation. It has criticized Bill C–36 as being regressive. We on this side of the House agree with that assessment.

The existing prairie grain advance payment program enabled producers to save on interest costs. It allowed producers to meet debt obligations, assisted creditors to have accounts paid on time to settle outstanding accounts, relieved pressure on the Canadian Wheat Board elevators and the quota system from becoming clogged and assisted the board in programming orderly marketing and sales.

The National Farmers Union views these positive features as an integral part of the farming industry. The removal of the benefits, if Bill C–36 is passed, will be devastating to the farm community.

The Ontario Corn Producers Association has also requested the Minister of Agriculture to abandon Bill C–36 and that the current programs be continued. The association is opposed to the elimination of interest free provisions of the current legislation because the relative cost of APCA marketing programs has been minimal compared to the benefits generated in the agricultural sector.

The program has proven to be of major benefit in shifting corn sales from autumn until later in the marketing year, thereby reducing the extent of export sales in autumn and shortages induced by imports during later months. The net result has been financial benefits to producers, domestic users and commercial elevators.

The APCA program is not trade distorting. It does not stimulate production but rather encourages orderly marketing. The GATT Geneva Accord of early April obliges Canada to freeze existing support programs, not reduce them.

There is no offsetting reduction for the 1989–90 crop year in the U.S. loan program—the American equivalent for the APCA—for grains and oilseeds. Canadian grain and oilseed producers are already contributing their share to the national debt via the programs in excise sales tax, sales tax exemptions on diesel fuel and on gasoline.

All of these farming organizations are prepared to meet with the Minister of Agriculture to review proposals on advance payments. That point must be clearly understood. The organizations are willing to have open discussions. We encourage this. But what they are saying is do not arbitrarily change the rules of the game half way through a season. The crops are not only planted for the most part they are harvested as well. Farmers depend upon these advance payment incentives.

According to this government's budget in the next two years farmers will see reductions such as crop insurance by $200 million; grain and flour transportation by $40 million; branch line rehabilitation by $32 million; grain and crops advance payments by $54 million; dairy export by $14 million; commodity based loans by $14.5 million; dairy commission by $14 million; and excise tax and fuel rebates by $100 million.

How much are we going to ask the farm community to sacrifice? Are we going to tax the withdrawal programs until the Canadian farmer cannot afford to be in business? Farmers are asking, "Where will it end?".

Other farming organizations, including the Ontario Soybean Growers Marketing Board, B.C. Vegetable Marketing Commission, and the Saskatchewan Canola Growers Association, to name a few, have echoed their colleagues' concerns and requests to reinstate the current programs of advance payments.

Farmers, farming organizations, marketing boards, elevator operators, farm financiers—literally thousands upon thousands of Canadians—believe in the benefits of the advance payments program. Everyone involved in agriculture believes in these programs. The only people not in favour are the members opposite. Does that say something about the government? I think it does.

Farmers in my riding are upset. They are upset that this government does not care about them anymore. Farmers are being asked to make concession after concession on their incomes, concessions that will cost the farming community $400 million in the next two years. These restrictions must cease. These loss of dollars to the farm community cannot be carried through week after week, month after month. We must reverse these ill–conceived actions of the government. Farmers deserve better. Let us begin now to show them that we do care.

I implore the government to reverse these anti–farming initiatives and let the farming community survive.

This morning hon. colleagues on the other side of the House brought forth the fact that we are several billion dollars in debt. We have been hearing that echoed in the House time after time. The members of the government have continually stated that it was the fault of a previous Liberal government. Canadian people are not that naive. After five years in power, the government has increased the debt $150 billion, doubled the national debt, and at the same time continually blamed their predecessors for the problems.

It is time to face reality. It is time to stop blaming somebody who was in government five years ago. It is time to carry through initiatives that are required. It seems to me the government is heading in a very wrong direction. It is going after the farm community, the weaker people in our society, and that will devastate this country.

It is time this government changed its direction and came to the reality that Canadian people are important, not just the farm community, but all of those who are weaker in our society. I believe the government has overlooked this important fact.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I am rising in the House today to address this government's intention to withdraw the interest free provision for prairie grain advance payments and advance payments for crops.

At first glance, Canadians might wonder what all the fuss is about. After all, we are only talking about some $25 million to $27 million which farmers could surely sacrifice seeing how this government feels so strapped for cash, could they not?

I am glad I have this opportunity to speak in the House on the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act changes because it is through measures such as this that we can see how this government is mistreating Canada's farmers.

This piece of legislation raises so many issues that illustrate what this government is all about. It raises the issues of confusion, incompetence, and I might add, spinelessness. While I am glad I have been given the opportunity to defend Canadian farmers' interests, I am sorry the government would even put forth such a piece of legislation in the first place, that we should have a debate on whether we provide farmers with a program that works, or do we take it away and slap Canadian farmers in the face?

Unfortunately, this government's agenda seems to require dismantling good programs. At the rate it is going, by the end of its term it will have done more damage to the effective institutions in this country than any other government in Canadian history, that is, unless it begins to listen to what Canadians are saying, to come up with creative and positive reforms, and to abandon their cut and slash attitude.

The changes to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, which are being proposed, provide one example of what I mean by the mindless cut and slash policy of this government. At stake is approximately $27 million for Canadian farmers, farmers who store their grain in the fall and collect an advance payment for it which they will sell in the spring or early summer when grain prices are higher and the fall grain glut is cleared.

The Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds claims he is not trying to prevent farmers from using this program. He is simply going to charge them interest on partial payment for grain stored six to eight months over the winter.

I have news for the minister. When the government eliminates the interest free provision in this act, it discourages farmers from using the program. In effect, the government is discouraging the storage of grain, impacting negatively on the elevator storage industry, on Canada's food security, as well as on Canadian farmers. Without the interest free provisions of the advance payment program, and with the increased administrative costs to the farmer under this legislation, the attractiveness of this program to the average farmer is lost. Then one day, who knows, this government might come along and tell farmers they are not using this program very much and cut it completely. It would not surprise me one bit, seeing as the effectiveness of the program would have been cut with Bill C-36.

What might happen with the prairie grain advance payments program, may be the same tactic the Minister of Transport is using with VIA Rail, wound and then move in for the kill; cut the effectiveness of the service now, and when it is down on its knees, stamp it out for good. One less bother for the government.

I would like to expand on why the program should continue to exist as it does now, because it seems to me that the government does not think these things out for itself. What is worse is the fact that when the opposition points out the flaws in the government's reasoning, the government gets too embarrassed to make the proper changes. Instead, it blames the entire mess on the opposition. It is the only way that the members opposite think they can save face after having bungled this legislation. By failing to listen to the reasons this opposition and 19 producer groups across Canada have been trying to communicate to the government, I am afraid they are only making matters worse.

Let us first look at what is at stake for the government. Cutting the interest free provisions for advance payments would mean roughly $25 to $27 million for the government treasury. While this $25 million makes this program beneficial and worth while for farmers, it is a drop in the bucket for the government when compared to the revenue generated from taxes on products generated on farms, almost $1 billion on alcohol beverages and $1.8 billion on tobacco, just to name two.

As my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex pointed out, the government collects about $3.5 billion in excise and sales taxes on tobacco and alcohol products. Yet, it complains that it cannot afford $25 million for a program that has been working very well in favour of orderly marketing in Canada for the last 30 years.

I wonder why this particular $25 million is so crucial all of a sudden, and why this government would rather face the wrath of Canadian farmers than put its own house in order. What can one expect from a confused government that digs itself into a bigger and bigger hole by raising interest rates, increasing its deficit, increasing taxes, all the while dragging the Canadian economy into the hole with it.

Maybe we are seeing a continuation of this government's policy of breaking down Canada's orderly marketing system in favour of free market enterprise to comply with secret agreements made in the free trade negotiations, just like in the softwood lumber dispute, when we gave up our bargaining chips before we got to the table.

As my hon. colleagues across the floor must know, this program does not even lead to trade distortions. It simply encourages the orderly marketing of our grains, corn, and other crops. I am afraid that I fail to see this government's justification for chipping away at the financial management tools that have been so valuable to the farmers in the past.

We on this side of the House understand the need to control the deficit. What we disagree with is the government's affinity for making cuts that affect the poor, the sick, the elderly, the unemployed, as well as small businessmen and farmers, while paving the road, I might add, for big business, multinational corporations and the wealthy. Members opposite should know that the mark of a country's government is how it treats its weakest members, not its strongest.

I would like to end by making a plea, as all members on this side have done, to the members opposite, to vote against this legislation because of its severe implications for orderly marketing in Canada. A vote against Bill C–36, is a vote for common sense, for Canadian farmers, and for the institutions that have allowed our agriculture community, indeed, all of us to prosper.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, we are facing a closure motion which I think was totally unnecessary and uncalled for in this particular instance. We have been debating Bill C–36, which is an act to take away the interest free cash advances that farmers in western Canada have had since 1957. The reasons the government is giving for that are totally bogus.

• (1540)

We listened to the member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia tell us that the government is faced with a huge debt. That is something we all know. He attempted to blame it on the NDP. Apparently it was all our fault because we defeated the government of Joe Clark. We do feel some responsibility for that. I think we were very much vindicated in 1984 when we saw not Joe Clark but a different leader lead the Conservative Party to form a government.

Under that leadership the accumulative deficit and debt of this country more than doubled in the first four years. It took Liberals some 120 years to accumulate a bit over $150 billion, and according to the words of the member for Swift Current, we have now passed $320 billion, which is more than twice that debt, and heading for $350 billion or $360 billion by spring when this fiscal year is finished.

So it was a good thing we defeated the Conservatives in 1979, or we would have had that kind of deficit as well as the last five years with which to deal. We would have been dealing with far more debt than we are now.

The member attempted to show that the taking away of a $27 million expenditure for interest free cash advances would somehow cure this huge debt that his government has placed on the shoulders of the Canadian people. Somehow $27 million is going to rectify that. How ludicrous. Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, that $27 million will not even pay the interest on that debt for six hours? The minor debate that has occurred on this bill has gone just over six hours, and the interest has been ticking away on the national debt accumulated by this Conservative government and the more than the $27 million that it is proposing to save with this proposal has already been spent, just as that few hours ticked away. It is a ludicrous kind of argument, but it gets even more stupid when one looks at the true economics of it.

With the availability of the interest free cash advances, farm producers right across the country have made good use of their ability to hold product from the market in order that the market not be flooded with product. Fruit and vegetable producers have used it to good advantage. The cash advance system has permitted them to keep the product in storage, so that the price rises. That is important, not only to farm incomes, but also to government deficits and government expenditures.

With the kind of "force the product on to the market" approach that the current government is taking with this particular proposal, it will be forced by other measures that this country adopted years ago to pay agricultural stabilization payments because when this action forces the price of farm produce down, other government funds are expended to bring farm incomes up.

I will demonstrate how important this is. Not only does it have that effect, but it reduces government income. With the advantage of higher prices, which farmers are able to take advantage of now that they are sprinkling their produce on to market when demand is there, farmers occasionally have to pay income tax, because their incomes are higher. With this stupid and short-sighted action, the government is forgoing the collection of far more than the $27 million worth of income tax.

I said that I would give you some examples of how this works, Mr. Speaker. Let us look at figures from the Ontario Corn Producers Association which point out, according to their calculations, that in the crop year of 1986–87, the fact that interest free cash advances were available resulted in the average price of corn going up $4.54 per tonne. They report that this meant that over-all all of the producers benefited by approximately $2,044,800 as a result. What did it cost the government for the farmers to make that kind of saving from the market? That year it cost Agriculture Canada $1,175,000, so they got pretty close to two for one return on their investment.

The following year was even better. In the 1987–88 crop year, instead of dumping their product at the beginning of the crop period, the benefit to the producer from being able to market his product in an orderly fashion and sprinkling it on to the market for a 12-month period, resulted in the producers gaining a little better than $36 a tonne for a final price. That meant that all of the corn producers in Ontario benefited by $16.8 million at a cost to the federal treasury of a mere $1.1 million, which was the cost of maintaining the interest free cash advance. There was a better than sixteen for one return on the government's expenditure. You can be very certain, Mr. Speaker, that on that extra $16 million that Ontario corn producers received, a lot of income tax was paid and the government probably had returned many times over the small expenditure laid out for the interest free cash advances.

I have some similar figures here from soybean producers in Ontario, who report that in the crop year 1987–88, they estimate that there was an advantage to them of being able to utilize the cash advance system in that year of just over $60 per tonne, a total of $10.7 million for that crop year. It cost the federal government $773,000. That is a very good return for the Government of Canada for its small investment. The returns in income tax payments alone would have far exceeded the expenditures they made. The market stayed up to the point where stabilization payments coming out of another government envelope were not necessary.

It is a foolish set of economic arguments that the government is trying to foist on the farm community. Farmers are much too clever to buy that argument. There are some who are not so clever, and it is very unfortunate. I and perhaps some other members have received a letter from the Premier of Saskatchewan who is also the Minister of Agriculture for that province. He is writing, he says, "to express our concern", and I think it is the royal "our", "at the delay which Saskatchewan farmers are currently experiencing in being able to apply for cash advances on their crops, and to encourage you, as your party's agriculture critic, to work towards a speedy resolution to this problem. This delay is causing considerable hardship for many of this province's producers, who rely on the cash advance program to meet a number of their financial obligations."

Then he goes on and tells a mistruth. He says:

> As you know, cash advances cannot be issued until such time as Bill C-36, an act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, is passed by Parliament.

Such rubbish! The Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act have been in effect in this country for years and years. There is nothing stopping the government from putting that program into effect, except their own stubbornness and stupidity. All they have to do is give the directive. Parliament has spoken. We have presented them with the law. We have presented them with the power to do it. Why don't they do it?

• (1550)

Did Premier Grant Devine, in his divine wisdom, write to the Minister of Agriculture and ask him to please obey the law and make cash advances available? He does not seem to have. Did he write to the Prime Minister and tell him how concerned he was about forcing the farmers he speaks for to pay even more interest? You would think that he would have, but it does not seem that he did. That is strange, because this is the man who convinced the premiers at a premiers' conference last summer that they should be putting pressure on the federal government to do something about interest rates. Here was his great opportunity to ask the government, as politely as he could, to please obey the law and provide these funds at zero rate of interest to the farm community. Did the Premier of Saskatchewan say anything about that? No, he does not seem to have bothered to write them. He wrote me, a member of the third party in opposition, asking me to quickly change the law so his producers could start paying more interest on an already very difficult burden of debt that those producers are paying now.

As the Premier of Saskatchewan and having divine wisdom, he should know all about the problems of carrying debt. He seemed to understand it a year ago when he carried the message on behalf of the premiers about high interest rates. As you will remember, Mr. Speaker, he came to Ottawa, gave the message, was so persuasive that as he was climbing the steps of the plane, the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada announced that interest rates had just gone up a half of 1 per cent.

This premier and this Minister of Agriculture is also the person that knows the effects of interest rates on his own farmers, because he is the man who got himself re-elected in 1986 on a program of low interest and no interest loans to his farmers. Then as soon as he was elected, he made those loans collect a rather high rate of interest, 50 per cent higher than he had indicated it would be during the election campaign.

Not only that but he is out there collecting those loans. He has declared a great many of them bad loans, and he has put collection agencies on over 4,500 farmers in the province of Saskatchewan. That is how concerned he is about the rise in interest rates. He is concerned because he has got himself in the position of being just like one of the banking institutions and just like this federal government that see things from the point of view of the banks, and the international grain companies, but do not see things from the point of view of the people they were elected to represent.

There are a couple of other things that the member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia used as excuses for introducing this legislation. He tried to convince the House that with the added burden of paying interest on cash advances that farmers would be forced to deliver their grain earlier. Of course, it may have that effect. It certainly will in the open market crops. The Union des producteurs agricoles du Québec have told us that they see producers of turnips and some of the fruit and vegetable crops being forced to market their produce in about six or eight months instead of over a full 12-month period. That would have the effect of putting pressure on agricultural prices at the beginning of the year, and end up with consumers having to rely on imported produce which is going to be much more expensive for the last part of the year.

This does nothing for producers or consumers, but it is helpful to the banking business, because when the banks lend money to the Wheat Board or some of the farm groups under this interest free program the rate is much lower because it is a government rate. Now, the credit rating will be slightly different and the costs will be up a wee bit, and they will receive a fraction or a full percentage point, perhaps in some of the smaller groups as much as 2 percentage points more, and their take will be increased. The international grain cartels will love it. The purchasers of fruits and vegetables will love it because it will force prices down at the beginning of the year. Consumers seldom get that price reflected in the stores. It provides an opportunity for greater profits for those handlers, but it means disaster for farmers.

It will have a tendency to push down net farm incomes. As I pointed out earlier in my speech, there will be some commodities where the downward effect will be so strong that in fact it will trigger payments under the Agricultural Stabilization Act and the government will be paying out money in spite of itself. For the simple maintenance of this program, at a cost of some five or six hours of interest that the government is paying anyway, it would be able to leave the farm community and the rural community in a position where their prices would be going up to the point where income tax revenues would be collected instead of subsidy payments going out to the farm community. That, in our mind, is good business.

This party of Conservatives is doing this because it does not agree with orderly marketing, cannot understand the value of that to the farming community, and have decided it has to kowtow to the banks and international grain cartel and some of the Americans who are saying that we have to do away with the Wheat Board and marketing boards. It has decided to kowtow to that, make a nod in that direction, and begin the process of undermining prices and the ability of farmers to get their cost of production out of the market.

In conclusion, I think that this legislation demonstrates that this government is once again refusing to be effective and efficient in its management of the economy and, in particular, in its management of affairs that affect rural Canada. In its presenting the closure motion, it has demonstrated an equal disregard for communication and for reality. Had it proceeded at a regular pace, I am sure the bill would have been through by now. When it starts using closure, members are inclined to make a speech to complain about that. Had the government used common sense, this could have been before the committee where the farm organizations and the farm groups need to be heard, because the government has obviously decided it is not going to listen to us or believe us. The farm groups have to be heard. They know how this will affect them. I think we have to hear every farm group in those communities.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, once again members of Parliament have the opportunity to speak on this very important issue. Once again, we will endeavour to try to make this minister and the government understand how important the interest free provision is to Canadian farmers.

This program was put in place to encourage orderly marketing of product. It has been very successful in achieving this goal by shifting sales from the fall when the crops are harvested to later on in the marketing year. This allows farmers the leeway to either play the market, or have the ability to market their product at a time when it is more reasonable and more equitable to do so. This program was put in place to encourage the orderly marketing of produce.

Historically, crop prices are the lowest on average at harvest time. The depressed prices are usually as a direct consequence of the eagerness of farmers to sell their crops soon after they are removed from the field. This eagerness is precipitated by two main factors: first, the need to generate cash to pay shopping expenses, the year end tax bills, and related financial operations; and uncertainties as to whether subsequent price increases will be sufficient to cover interest and storage carrying costs.

The advanced payment program under the Advance Payments for Crops Act has been one of the most effective means of countering historic marketing patterns and encouraging a more orderly marketing, that is, a greater percentage of crops are sold during the late winter, spring and summer rather than in the fall when all the congestion is in the market-place. Producers in the program have indeed benefited most of all, especially tobacco farmers in my riding. Even non-participants have benefited to some extent by experiencing relatively higher harvest time prices because of the reduced sale of the crop at this time of season. In other words, the market has not been flooded as it used to be before this program came into effect, which resulted in depressed prices.

• (1600)

Those involved in commercial grain storage also benefit from holding over crops until market prices improve. Since the advance payments program was initiated in 1983–84 we have seen a substantial change in the marketing patterns. This has been a progressive step forward. To start fooling with this success is foolhardy, unreasonable and unfeeling, to say the least.

By making this change the government estimates it will save $27 million a year, hardly a large sum and hardly worth destroying a working and valuable program for. The minister and this government refuse to even try to understand how this measure will negatively affect Canadian farmers. They regularly ignore our advice and suggestions. You would think they would listen to the producers, the farmers themselves, who are most adversely affected by this program but they refuse to listen.

The government continues to bring in programs such as this which adversely affect a number of sectors of our economy and a number of Canadians without properly informing Canadians. There is no consultation and I call upon the government to move more toward a consultative process. It helps in the whole process of parliamentary democracy.

I never cease to be amazed by this government's approach. Time and time again it tried to rush bills through Parliament without consultation or thinking about the ramifications of these changes.

Mr. Rideout: Closure all the time.

Mr. Speller: Closure all the time. I think there has been more closure within my first year here in Parliament than we have ever seen. That is not acceptable to people on this side of the House.

Although only 582 Canadian corn farmers participated in the 1988–89 advance payments program, this low number was clearly a result of the small drought-reduced corn harvest this year. Many farmers throughout Ontario and indeed throughout Canada had a hard time last year during that period because of the drought program. Therefore, it is not surprising that the number who actually participated in the program was low. In the three previous years when the crop size was more typical, 1,000 to 1,200 farmers participated. The number of tonnes involved was in the range of 400,000 to 500,000 tonnes or about 10 per cent to 15 per cent of the total marketed commercial Ontario corn crop. The government indicated that it could not agree with the suggestion of the Ontario corn producers that a participation rate of 10 per cent to 20 per cent means a relatively low benefit to the entire industry.

In the case of corn, the 10 per cent to 15 per cent of the commercial crop involved in the program means that this quality of corn is not sold into a glutted harvest-time market and is available for market needs later during the crop year. The benefit of this action extends to all producers and purchasers. In reality this is a benefit of the way that we have produced orderly marketing here in Canada. This is not the only orderly marketing area under attack by this government. We have seen that in the orderly marketing of our milk products and in many other orderly marketing areas of trade the government does not seem to be as committed as it says.

Let us look at the free trade deal. The government gave a commitment during the last election that under free trade the supply management or the orderly marketing of milk products would be protected. We have seen, as I and my colleagues have said time and time again, that there is no protection under the free trade agreement for orderly marketing of products. This is one more way to throw our marketing of agricultural products into a crisis. There is no way that Canadian farmers can orderly market not only grains but milk products under the free trade deal that we have in place now. Quite frankly, the Americans have not received the message. Americans have not acknowledged that we have orderly access into their market. What they have said is: "Yes, we signed the deal, but we fooled you. There is no way that we are going to allow your products into our market".

That throws into whack the whole question of marketing products in Canada. The recent GATT decisions have the same effect. GATT and other countries, led by the Americans, are attacking our supply of managed systems under Article II of GATT.

During the free trade debate the government said it would not be negotiated at GATT. We have seen that in fact it is. It said it would protect producers under the import control list. We found how effective that has been for our milk products for ice cream and yogurt. It has had absolutely no effect. In fact, the Americans are again attacking our marketing. This is just one more example of how our marketing systems are being attacked and being unduly represented by this government.

The Ontario corn producers also argue that it would be a flaw if most producers in most of the crops were enrolled in the program since this could mean a shortage of available crop at harvest time. Fortunately, with the program structured as it is at present, this has not occurred.

They also point out in their letter that while it is possible for organizations such as OCPA to borrow money using the APCA guarantee at about the prime rate of interest, the administration costs are significant, and it is not unreasonable to expect the full cost to the producer of prime plus 1 per cent or 2 per cent, depending on the amount of money borrowed. Administration costs include legal costs, inspection costs, lien registrations and office operations with the program.

In other words, it is going to be of no benefit to Canadian farmers. They are not going to get any advantage by going into this program. They have come to us and told us that. They want the people on this side of the House to stand up and let the government know that this program is no good. By not having the interest-free provision of the program, the government is in essence destroying it. It is making it totally useless for Canadian farmers.

The Ontario Corn Producers Association were particularly concerned with the suggestion that the presence of advanced payments represent an impediment to orderly marketing. Unfortunately, the implicit conclusion is that somehow the amendments inherent in Bill C-36 will reduce the incentive for storage which exists in the present program by encouraging sales, rather than storage. They strongly disagree that the advance payment programs have been disruptive to orderly marketing by discouraging timely sales.

They were also very disturbed that a desirability to encourage farmers to sell crops more quickly may be a reason for the amendments contained in Bill C-36. Like us, they strongly objected and disagreed with the suggestion that by opposing Bill C-36, farm organizations are depriving farmers of advanced payments for the 1989 crop.

In reality the present act authorizes such payments. OCPA filed an application for a 1989 program several months ago. Only reluctance by this minister to exercise authority spelled out in the existing legislation prevents funds from now being dispersed to crop producers across the country.

It was clearly lack of initiative by this minister to continue that program which is stopping funds from going to farmers now. Their final criticism is that Bill C-36 represents a reduction in federal support for Canadian farmers when no commitment has been made to reduce comparable assistance elsewhere, particularly in the United States. There is no such reduction in the U.S. farm bill loan provisions available to American farmers.

These are the arguments we have been putting forward to the government for many days now. Surely all farmers cannot be wrong. Before this government and this minister again reject the suggestion we have made to withdraw the bill and have some meaningful consultation with the producers who use this program, I have been asked by the farmers in Haldimand—Norfolk to ask this government to withdraw the bill, to sit down with farmers, have some meaningful consultation and get on with the program, instead of trying to bring in programs which are detrimental to their livelihoods.

Before making a rash decision to ram this bill through the House with its majority, I would suggest that it review the Auditor General's report which repeatedly takes the Department of Agriculture to task for the erosion of accountability and of parliamentary control. Just once maybe the government could be open-minded and realize that the farm organizations and members of Parliament are offering constructive suggestions to ensure that this program will continue to be a success.

As I mentioned in my previous speech, the minister has indicated that he wants to work closely with the provinces, farm organizations and others to plan and implement an improved policy network. Let us put action where his words are. Why does the minister not prove to farmers that he cares about them, that he will consult with them and that he will put their ideas into legislation, not after the fact like this government has tended to do, but before it pushes through legislation without consultation.

I call on the minister to listen to their suggestions and concerns. They are defending their livelihoods. They are not sitting back and trying to bring in programs dealing with anybody else's livelihood, they are defending their own livelihood. These people are good farmers and they deserve more than a bill that attacks their livelihood.

I urge the minister to stand up for farmers, stand up for agriculture, and withdraw this bill. I believe this bill will have a detrimental effect on farming.

I am concerned the way this minister has suggested that we on this side are delaying the bill somehow and that we are not giving farmers their livelihood.

They have many more members than us and if they wanted to bring in this bill they could have done so last week. Yet he goes across the country saying that we are the ones who are stopping their livelihood. Well, quite frankly, farmers in Canada are not fooled by that argument.

We have a case here today where the government brings in closure. This is the government's way of saying that we are delaying the bill. How many hours have we debated this major piece of legislation? We have spent four or five hours on a major piece of legislation that has wide-ranging effects on the farming communities of Canada. Surely we can debate this bill much longer than that.

I will close by saying that we, the farmers of Haldimand—Norfolk, reject this bill. They are not fooled by the government's argument that this bill will be anything but detrimental. On their behalf I call on this government to withdraw this bill. Do the honourable thing and withdraw the bill, consult with the farmers and try to bring in a more reasonable and fair approach to this issue.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to stand here today to speak on this bill that we are attempting to get through.

We had to bring in closure. I think all members of this House realize that we had to do that because of the delaying tactics of the Liberals and NDP who say that they are so much in favour of supporting farmers.

There have been discussions between our House leader and the House leaders of the two other parties with regard to these amendments. Since this House came back in September we have been trying to get an agreement in the House of Commons. The member who spoke previously is probably a new member and does not understand all of the nuances that go on in this House, but one of them is the attempt at co-operation of opposition parties, whether they be Liberal or NDP.

We have been trying to get this through since we came back to the House of Commons. We have had nothing but roadblocks from these people who are delaying it. Then they complain because we bring in closure. We bring in closure because the farmers in my community, the farmers in western Canada, the farmers right across this fair country of ours are waiting for this bill to go through so that those who want it can access the advance payments, those who want to do it.

Mr. Althouse: Apply the law.

Mr. Shields: Well, well, well. My honourable friend from the NDP says: "apply the law". Let me read to him some of the information. There is nothing in either the Advance Payments for Crops Act or the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act which requires guarantees of advance or advances to be made.

Mr. Althouse: Nothing is stopping you.

Mr. Shields: If he would take the time to read it and understand what he is talking about when he stands in the House, he would know that section 4 of the Advance Payments for Crops Act provides that the minister may guarantee advances made by a producer organization.

Mr. Althouse: Go ahead.

Mr. Shields: Section 3 of the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act states that the board may make advances on the initial payment for threshed grain to a producer. The word "may" in legislation does not compel an action to be taken. By not taking any action, the government is therefore not acting contrary to the law and the hon. member knows that very well.

Mr. Althouse: There is nothing stopping you from putting it in place.

Mr. Shields: All he wants to do is yell and not listen to what people are saying in this house. Open your ears and read my lips. I will send this over to the hon. member and he can read it.

Mr. Boyer: The hon. member listens with his mouth.

Mr. Althouse: The law is there. Use it.

Mr. Shields: Parliament passed a law that states he may. We are trying in this Parliament to amend the acts in such a way that it will allow a producer to receive not $30,000 in advance payments, not $60,000 in advance payment if there are two of them, not even $90,000. We are amending this law to allow a producer to receive $250,000 in advances.

Mr. Althouse: How many will use that?

Mr. Shields: The hon. member asked how many people will use that. The provision is in place for that to happen.

The main thrust of the opposition is that we should not be charging an interest rate on any of the advance payments.

I would like to educate the hon. member. The producers in my riding have come to me and said it is time they started to pick up some of the slack they have been getting for nothing. They are prepared to pay a fair interest rate. What is a fair interest rate? It is prime or lower because it is going to be government guaranteed.

Honourable members over there stand up and tell us to cut spending. They stand up and say: "You have a debt out there that you have increased. You are not doing anything to control these things." They make all of these complaints, but when we attempt to bring things into line in a more equitable way, they stand up and scream because we use closure. We are imposing closure because those very people over there have done absolutely nothing to co-operate and assist.

I have producers in my riding who phone me to ask when this is going to be passed so they can get an advance payment. I tell them to phone the member for Oshawa. I tell them they might get something if they phone both of those lame duck leaders of the two parties across the way, but I doubt it.

It is unfortunate that the tone of this House and the tone of co-operation has dropped so dramatically over the past three or four years. Sometimes I am ashamed to sit in my seat in this House and watch what goes on. I saw it last night when we in this House wasted time and money for three and a half hours.

• (1620)

The opposition talks about wasting money. We had people on overtime. The pages were here when they should have been home studying. We had all the staff of the House of Commons, the staff in Debates, and all of those areas working overtime because the people across the way wanted to prove a point. They wanted to make us all stand for every single vote.

What did it amount to? We voted from six o'clock until past nine-thirty, three and a half hours, while those members were sitting there trying to embarrass us or prove a point or gain something in principle rather than allow us to go back to our offices to do some work and allow people to go home and be with their families like they should have been. That is the kind of attitude that we are getting in this House and that is the kind of attitude we have been getting since we came back in September.

It is too bad. They are still fighting the last election. Again I point out that I have producers phoning me asking when they can get their advance payment. I am telling them that they can get an advance payment when these amendments go through. These amendments are necessary. These amendments are supported by the vast majority of producers who I have talked to in my riding. They are supporting these amendments because some of them want to access more advance payments and more funds.

Opposition members cannot speak out of both sides of their mouths. They continually do that, but they have got to be taken to task for this.

I am not going to waste the time of the House any longer. I have put on record why we are using closure. We have had absolutely no co-operation from those people over there. It is obvious that they are not going to give us any more co-operation at any other time. I would recommend to this government that if it has to use closure on every single piece of legislation, then that is exactly what it should do because we are not going to get co-operation from those people across the way. They say it is against the law. It is not. I read very clearly into the record how it is not against the law. It reads very clearly. If hon. members over there want to get a copy of the act, they can read it and understand that it is not against the law.

Mr. Althouse: I said obey the law.

Mr. Shields: We are going to increase access to funds that farmers have not had access to before because they are government guaranteed. It does not matter if their land or their equipment is encumbered, the payment is strictly on the commodity, and it is strictly government guaranteed. Each producer is eligible, at the minister's discretion, for up to $250,000. Some of my colleagues across the way would like to suggest that no farmer will use that. I do not know what their producers are doing, but it certainly is not the impression that I get from my area.

I would like to put it on the record that the government House leader and the people involved in the agriculture committees from the Official Opposition began negotiations with our people from this side of the House, with the House leader of the NDP and people involved there. The first discussions took place in late June.

Major discussions started to take place when we came back to this House in September, and they have done nothing but stonewall. They have done nothing but express all the animosity that they felt because of the election, so we could not get this bill into the house. Then they cry about closure. That is the only way we are going to be able to proceed. We are going to do it because we are a government that is here to do what is right.

We are a government that cares about the producers in Canada. We are a government that has cared. All we have to do is look at the record. We care for the agricultural community in this country and we are going to continue to do that.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you agree with me. At least you were smiling. I had better not accuse you of that, Mr. Speaker, you are supposed to be impartial.

The facts are clearly on the record. The producers whom I have talked to in the agricultural community in my riding and in ridings of Alberta have said that they are quite prepared to pay a reasonable interest rate on their advance payments because they recognize that the government cannot carry it any longer. They recognize that. When I tell them that they are going to get it for prime and it is going to be government backed, or that there is even a possibility that they will get it below prime, I have found nothing but total support for this bill.

I would suggest my hon. friends across the way come to their senses and let us get this bill through like it should be so that we can help the producers in our country they way they should be helped.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly glad that the Hon. Member for Athabasca shortened his remarks somewhat. I think he was having a bad day. He certainly wasted our time. He succeeded in only distorting the record. I think I would use three words to sum up his remarks: babble, balderdash, and bunk.

The member said that he was putting forward certain alleged facts to clear the record or to establish the record. All he was able to do was to make it more murky and distort the record.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Athabasca, on a point of order.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I would like you to consider whether the accusation hurled across the Chamber from one member to another of distorting the record is parliamentary. I think you would find in Beauchesne's that it is not acceptable. I ask that member to be careful in the language that he is using. I understand that debates can become heated. I can understand that he might take a different view. But to deliberately accuse another member of distorting the record is tantamount to accusing another member of lying. That is clearly unparliamentary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will have a look at the "blues" and then I will come back. If I have to make a ruling, I will.

The hon. member for Winnipeg St. James has the floor.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I did not realize that my good friend from Athabasca was so sensitive, so gentle, so fragile. I would not think for a moment—

Mr. Shields: I am not fragile. It's common courtesy and decency.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, just so that the hon. member for Athabasca understands, I did not accuse him of deliberately distorting the record. The effect of his remarks is distortion. There may be a subtle difference. The fact of the matter is the man does not know what he is talking about. As a result of not knowing what he talks about, he distorts the record. I did not accuse him of deliberately distorting the record, of deliberately fracturing the truth or deliberately bending the truth. But I do suggest that the effect of his remarks is distortion.

It really is an honour for me to take part in this debate. It is a privilege and a duty for me to go to bat for farmers across this country. I have spent more than 30 years in broadcasting. I have spent more than 30 years living in some of the major cities of this country. But my roots still run deep in prairie soil, and a part of me will always be found on a southern Manitoba farm.

The farmers, even though they comprise only about 4 per cent of the population in this country, are still the backbone of this country. They supply us with our food. Where would we be, including our good friends across the way, without Canadian farmers? Where would they be without the efforts of farmers? Perhaps they would have some rather empty stomachs.

• (1630)

Mr. Boyer: It is getting very profound.

Mr. Harvard: It is getting very profound, something that we are not used to hearing from that side of the House.

I think that we have to recognize the efforts of Canadian farmers. We have to recognize the importance of Canadian farmers. We have to recognize what they do for this country. I think it behooves us to send out certain signals to them, positive signals, important signals.

What do we get from that side of the House? In the face of this kind of legislation that will decimate, that will gut a piece of legislation that was in place for 40 years, what do we get from the government members? Closure, closure. They tell Canadian farmers it is time to not listen anymore. They are not interested in your input. They are not really interested in hearing what you have to say. They are going to use closure, the old slit-the-throat, chop-off-the-head use of the guillotine. This is their way. The hon. member for Athabasca was saying, "Well, we had to do it; we just had to do it." In the face of what? I guess he was alleging some kind of obstruction from this side of the House.

Why is it that this government has such a propensity for closure? Just yesterday, I was talking in the face of another kind of closure euphemistically called time allocation. Yesterday I mentioned the record with respect to closure. This government has a fetish about closure. It used it five times in the trade debate going back to last December.

Mr. Boyer: Time allocation is something a broadcaster can understand.

Mr. Harvard: That is right. We do things within the limits of 15 seconds, 30 seconds, one minute, but broadcasting is not the font of democracy, is it? The font of democracy is here and we have a different approach to freedom of speech in this Chamber. I do not think that we can put it in the same context as broadcasting by confining it to 15 second blurbs.

They say they had to do it, that they had to use closure. Well, I submit that they did not. If they would have just got their act together, if they had just done a better job, they wouldn't need it. Why do we not review the facts? Why do we not review the record? The record is that they put this very valuable program into limbo back last spring when the hon. Minister of Finance brought down the budget. That was the start of this mess.

What happened after that? Despite the fact that the program was put into limbo, despite the fact that there was this threat put over farmers' heads, despite the fact that the farmers were now left in this state of uncertainty, what did government members do? They sat on their hands and they did nothing. We went through the latter part of the spring, all through the summer and beginning of the fall and they did nothing. Then they brought in a bill, and lo and behold, it was a mess. It was flawed. It was so bad—and this must have been embarrassing, it really must have been humiliating, if they ever do feel humiliation—they had to withdraw it. Right?

An Hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Harvard: My hon. friend confirms. They had to withdraw the bill. That is the kind of sloppiness that you people carry off. You withdrew the bill and then you brought in this one, Bill C-36. Then you accuse us of some kind of obstruction. You urge us to get it done. We have to get it done now for the sake of the farmers.

Where were you in May and June? Where were you in July and August, September and October? What were you doing? You certainly were not minding the store. You were not minding your business.

On top of that most farm organizations in this country have stated that it is bad legislation. It is the wrong way to go. Is the government listening? Not on your life. It does not listen. It is going ahead and telling us we have to do it now and please, please stand aside. This is a performance that ought not be repeated.

This program has been in effect for over 40 years. It was brought in by a Conservative government, if my grasp of history is proper. I think the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker would be quite disturbed if he knew what is going on today. He represented a prairie province, a prairie constituency and prairie people. I am not too sure if he would be very excited about this kind of legislation to change legislation that worked well.

I do not know of too many farm organizations that were saying "Gut this program. We certainly do not want cash advances on an interest-free basis, no way". I did not hear prairie farmers or any farmers across the country saying that, not on your life. It was not costing a lot of money, only $26 million or $27 million. In the context of other expenditures, that is not a lot of money.

I think that farmers are a little bewildered by it all because, in effect, the government is saying that it has to reach into their pockets for $27 million. All in the name of deficit reduction to get spending down, the government is going to ask them to make this sacrifice. It is important. The government is asking farmers to make this sacrifice. It just wants another $27 million. Maybe in another world, in other circumstances, farmers would understand.

Farmers are a little bewildered because they know what is going on and they know something about the record. Since this government came to power five years ago, where has spending gone?

When the government came to power in 1984, it was taking in $70 billion in revenues. Now it is taking in $112 billion. Extra revenues amount to $42 billion. That is a pretty good take, a sizeable chunk of money, $42 billion.

The farmers are saying 'You want a little more out of me. You want to just take that extra bit out of me, $27 million". No wonder the farmer is a little bewildered. There is more.

Farmers are asked to make this sacrifice but what is the government doing at the same time? The debt goes up. It never stops going up. If we use the five-year record of the government, when it came to power, the debt was $170 billion. Now it is $350 billion, $360 billion. Little wonder farmers in this country are bewildered when this government comes after them again.

There is another dimension to this burden, shared not by farmers alone but by all Canadians, an increase in taxation. We have said many times in the House how good this government has been at increasing taxes. Perhaps it is another fetish. Thirty-one times this government has raised taxes and there is yet to come the grand-daddy of all, the so-called goods and services tax, the grief and suffering tax, which is going to take another $10 billion out of the pockets of Canadians.

My good friend from Brandon—Souris, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment, has taken his place in the House. He represents what I would call a good slice of God's country. Given the fact that the hon. parliamentary secretary is close to the soil and close to farmers in southwestern Manitoba, I would have thought that if there ever was one on the other side of the House who could talk some sense into this government, to bring to the cabinet a sense of reality, it would be that honourable gentleman. I am sure he has tried but he has failed, and that is too bad.

• (1640)

Mr. Boyer: He's the one they've been listening to.

Mr. Harvard: You may have been listening to him but you have not been listening very well. I think that perhaps you should check your ears.

Another thing that we have to consider in the context of the heavy burden that I just recited is that farmers are also concerned about not only themselves but their entire community, rural Canada, the way this government is closing down rural Canada. There is a litany of complaints about the way the government is treating rural Canada, the way the government is shutting down rural post offices, gutting VIA Rail, closing down military bases and, of course, doing most of it without any kind of consultation.

What has gone wrong with the process? Is there something demeaning about consulting with Canadians? Is it beneath this government to talk to the farmers? Have things got that bad in Canada?

No wonder the farmers are bewildered. They wonder whether they have any friends in the nation's capital. Look what has happened in the wake of the free trade agreement with respect to certain producers, to supply management, to orderly marketing.

I think it was just a few years ago that we thought that these were solid, secure institutions, that no one would dare dismantle them. I guess maybe we were thinking wrongly. Perhaps we should have been a bit more wary, particularly of this government.

Look what has happened just recently with Durum wheat producers. I thought that we in this country championed success, I thought we applauded success. I thought we always said to the men and women of this country, "Go out and work hard and do well. We want you to succeed, and if you succeed you will be rewarded". I am quite sure the Durum wheat producers in this country followed that dictum, and they have been doing quite well, in fact so well that we now hear complaints from our good friends to the south: "You can't do that, you're succeeding too well. If you don't stop selling so much, if you don't stop being so competitive, well, we may just threaten you with a countervail".

That is pretty disturbing because we know what has happened in other agriculture spheres. Just ask milk producers, egg producers and pork producers. The list goes on and on. Even one of the gentleman closely attached to the free trade negotiations, Mr. Clayton Yeutter, expressed sympathy for the Durum wheat producers in North Dakota, a state of the union just across the border from my province. He said, and it is on record in a letter to the Durum wheat producers of North Dakota, that the Americans might even consider pushing a countervail so that they can put a stop to this rather unseemly competition from north of the border.

What do we hear from the government? Not a heck of a lot. I think we could hear a lot more. We want to hear a lot more.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that you have put up your famous finger, which signals one minute to go. I would urge my good friends who are chuckling on the other side—maybe they have heard something important this afternoon. Right?

Some Hon. Members: Right.

Mr. Harvard: It is a little late in the debate, but I do sense that government members' ears are opening, that in the last 20 minutes, there has been a little penetration, perhaps just a little. Right?

An Hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Harvard: Given this penetration, just let me say this. I would urge them to reconsider the bill, withdraw it, consult with farmers and get it right for a change. Get it right for farmers and get it right for the country.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why in the last month I have had such a tendency to pick up the remarks of the person who spoke before me. It must be a hold-over from being on a committee or something.

Picking up from my colleague who spoke last, I do not believe that this government is capable of getting anything right. The hon. member also indicated that perhaps there was some measure of understanding breaking through. I despair that that will never happen either. I despair for at least two reasons, the first being that until last May, I was a little more closely connected to the agriculture community than I am now. I sold the quarter section of land I owned at that time, but I would like to establish that I do have connections to the soil having grown up in rural Saskatchewan. In fact, it is almost impossible to be from Saskatchewan and not have some kind of a rural connection. Certainly many of my relatives are still farmers there. I appreciate what they do and I am a part of what they do.

I despair for the second reason in that for the second time in two days, I find myself having to stand against closure. If the message on this bill is not filtering through to the government, I rather suspect that the message is filtering through to the Canadian public that what we have here is a government elected a year ago which really cares not. I guess it is a misnomer to call it a government. It is not governing. The people opposite are ruling. I rather suspect that Good King John would be very proud of the way these people are railroading their way through this Parliament.

An Hon. Member: King John D.

Mr. Fisher: No, not King John D. King John D. would not be all that pleased about it either. King John would be very pleased with the way these people are ruling. Those of an earlier era who fought so hard to bring in the Magna Carta would be as despairing as I am at the way these people are railroading their way through Parliament.

The agricultural community from one end of this land to the other has nothing very good to say about this piece of legislation. Why on earth would they rush to make use of this when they can go to their banks and get interest rates that are as favourable on loans as this government is giving? Why, when previously they were able to get interest-free loans on the commodities which the agricultural community worked so hard to produce would they be pleased that this legislation is being introduced?

I guess there are other questions which have to be asked in relation to this legislation. One of them certainly is why would the government introduce it. I suspect, in considering the way this government has operated since it was elected in 1984, one of the main reasons that it is being introduced is that what happened previously had the effect, if not directly and formally, of being almost a marketing board. It had a levelling effect on the ability of the producers to be able to realize to the fullest extent possible within certain limitations the fullest value for what they produced.

It meant that they were not forced, in order to have available funds at the end of the growing season when the crops become available, to sell those commodities immediately. They were not forced to glut the market with the things that they produced. Glutting the market would have the effect of lowering prices which may at first blush have been an advantage for the consumers but later on in the year, after the commodities had been used up, after the supply was gone and the prices went up, we would consume in many instances imported products and the prices would have been higher than they ever were. The consumer certainly would not benefit from that.

I suspect that certainly part of the rationale was to get away from something that had the effect of levelling those things out. When prices are relatively level, it does away with speculation. I suspect that there are a good many friends of the government who were only too pleased to be able to get involved in speculation on the commodities which our agricultural producers spend so much time producing. We say the producers ought to be able to benefit to the fullest extent. The interest free cash advance allowed that to happen.

What will happen now will do away with the orderly marketing part of the agricultural community which has been in place for so many years. The same effect will be felt no matter which commodities we are talking about. The relatively orderly marketing, transportation and in-elevator storage of western grains is being severely affected by this foolish action of the government.

Rail line abandonment, of course, is another issue. I suppose there will be some piece of legislation here shortly concerning railways for which we will see a closure motion as well. Nevertheless, over the years with rail line abandonment and the subsequent abandonment of rural elevators, the elevator storage of commodities in western Canada has been severely limited. With the ability farmers had from the advance payment to sell their commodities over a period of time throughout the year, the elevator system, depleted though it was, was not congested.

Likewise, the same could be said of rail transportation of grain throughout the country as well. It had that levelling effect on rail transportation as well as the storage of grain off farm. That is in jeopardy if this legislation goes through.

We can talk about vegetables. One of my colleagues referred to what happens with vegetables. Again, once the harvesting season occurs, there is a flooding of vegetables onto the market with the subsequent lowering of prices which does not occur if there is some kind of advance so that the farmer can get some kind of a stabilization of his income throughout the year to be able to pay off some of his debts in a more orderly way.

If it comes to a point where the farmer is forced to sell his vegetables at a lower price than ought to be realized and the stabilization program kicks in, in all probability, not only will the cost to the government through the stabilization plan be more than the support for the interest rate, it will also put into place the possibility of the Americans bringing in a countervailing action because of this stabilization program itself. That is another one of the dangers that is most likely to occur as a result of bringing in this kind of legislation.

There have been some references to the fact that the Opposition is holding up this legislation. This is not so. There is nothing now to prevent the government from giving advance payments to the agricultural community under the present legislation. The government has simply decided not to make cash advances under the present legislation. I do not know whether it is trying to punish the Opposition or whether it is trying to punish the farmer, but whatever the case may be, it certainly is not the Opposition's fault that the farmers have been unable to get cash advances.

I see that my time has pretty well run out. I thank you very much for the opportunity to have spoken on this issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon if he wants to speak for three minutes. Otherwise I can call it five o'clock.

It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

BILL OF RIGHTS

SUGGESTED CHILD PROTECTION COMMISSION

The House resumed from Monday September 25, consideration of the motion of Ms. Langan:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of negotiating with the provinces to provide a comprehensive Bill of Rights for children which would standardize laws throughout the country, and that this Bill of Rights include a child protection commission and an emergency hotline which children could contact in times of crisis.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today on a motion focusing on the needs of children and on effective ways to better ensure that Canadian children live in a happy, safe and secure environment. Clearly all of us care about our children and see the future in terms of the life circumstances of these children.

Today I would like to focus on one of the key problems facing society, one which is having grave, long-lasting effects on our children, and that is the problem of family violence. To call the violence that is occurring within many Canadian families a phenomenon is perhaps not quite appropriate. For children, women and men trapped in the vicious cycle of family violence, it is a hard and frightening day-to-day reality. For those of us who remember our childhood fondly and continue to be enriched by our family lives, it is hard to imagine the family as anything other than a source of our greatest comfort, happiness and love.

In the past decade, a number of studies have been commissioned by governments or professional organizations that have provided new information and startling statistics about the incidents of family violence that challenge our most basic assumptions about what is really going on inside many Canadian families. These statistics in particular have grabbed headlines and national attention.

In 1980, the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women reported that one in 10 women were beaten on a regular basis by their husbands or partners. In 1987, a follow-up report said an estimated one million Canadian women were being battered by the men with whom they live.

Professor Robin Badgley told us one in two young women experience some kind of sexual abuse during their childhood as do one in three young men. In fact, Badgley told us that 42 per cent of our population were victims of unwanted sexual acts at some point in their lives.

Only a few years ago the Fraser report on the incidence of prostitution shocked us further with the statistics on juvenile prostitution. The Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics reported that in 1986, 191 homicides, or 40 per cent of all homicides that year, involved people who were either related by blood or marriage or lived in a common law situation. It is hard to believe, I am sure. In response, governments and communities across the country have developed a wide range of programs and services in support of families dealing with violence.

Most notably, over the last decade a significant number of crisis centres have opened, most recently as a result of the federal government's Project Haven. Likewise, progress has been made in areas of police intervention and their policy of laying assault charges against those who abuse their spouses. As well, a number of media campaigns and public service announcements have served to increase our awareness of the problem.

This government introduced and passed new legislation a couple of years ago which makes it easier for children to testify in sexual abuse cases. Mr. Rix Rogers, well known for his work on behalf of the voluntary sector, was appointed as a special adviser to the Minister of National Health and Welfare on child sexual abuse. And, as we have already heard, Mr. Rogers is expected to present his report to the minister.

For many years, the federal government has shared with the provinces the cost of crisis intervention programs and through the Canada Assistance Plan, the provision of shelters in communities across the land. We have also done our part to co-ordinate and collect information for services providers and researchers through the National Clearinghouse on Family Violence. In addition, the federal government has funded a large number of projects and studies and has been at the table for nearly every discussion of substance on family violence that has taken place in the past decade.

Internationally, as well, Canada is well known for the priority it gives to the prevention of family violence. For example, in the mid-1980s Canada put family violence on the agenda of a European meeting of ministers responsible for social affairs. The Canadian government has also made a major statement to the United Nations inter-regional consultation on social welfare which asserted that family violence should be a concern in all societies, regardless of culture, age, or economic status. As we all know, Canada is also very much involved in the United Nations activity on the Convention of the Rights of the Child, which is expected to be adopted later this year.

Though we have plenty to be proud of, we would all be kidding ourselves to think we are even close to finding solutions which get to the root of the problem. There are a few things of which we can be sure. We know the cost to our society is great in personal and global societal terms. We know many of our costly social programs are rooted in violence which begins at home. We also know that family violence tends to be passed on from generation to generation. The little girl abused by her father all too often becomes a battered wife or turns to prostitution. The young man who watched his father dominate his mother with violence learns to repeat that pattern with his own family.

Our penitentiaries, our hospitals, our schools, our transition houses, our streets, are full of people who have learned first hand the lesson taught by violence. Other lessons about civility, personal and social responsibility, and trust come much harder. We know too that it is usually when we combine our resources that we collectively move closer to finding real solutions to family violence.

In its report "Battered but not Beaten", the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women gave all the service providers active in the violence area a pat on the back for the work they have done to date. The report's author said, however, that despite all our good intentions and good work we had a fundamental problem, our efforts failed the "reality test". The author says we just did not always meet the test of the battered individual's reality. We do not always understand, nor are we always equipped to address the real human needs, either before or after the violence occurs. It is at the individual "people" level where the hurt lingers and where the answers must be found.

It is also at the individual "people" level that families come into play. While families are the source of hurt for some, they can become the source of comfort for others. We all certainly have to recognize the essentialness of the family.

But where do we go from there? We certainly cannot stand by and watch the violence continue. In the ideal world I think we all want to move closer to the positive vision of the family. We all want to see a safe place to call our own. We all want to have children and spouses nearby to enjoy time together. We all want to be secure in our relations, to be free of fear, to have a sense of well-being that comes with security of hearth and home, to be cared about.

The federal government alone cannot deliver that perfect vision of the future to individual Canadians. The causes and effects of family violence are much too complex for us to presume so much. Only through a partnership with the provincial governments, the voluntary sector, service providers and, most importantly, communities across the country, can we have a good chance of restoring some balance and some security to those who have lived with violence.

The federal government has already called on this partnership, on this co-operative effort, most recently, of course, in the form of National Health and Welfare's announcement yesterday to pledge financial support of up to $1.3 million for the "Kids Help Line".

As you may know, the Kids Help Line was launched by the Canadian Children's Foundation in May, 1989. It offers immediate, free and anonymous help to Canada's seven million children. Counselling, information and, if appropriate, referral services are provided to children and youth experiencing a variety of problems including child abuse and/or neglect, loneliness, alcohol or substance abuse.

Federal moneys will be available over the next 12-month period. Six hundred and fifty thousand of the $1.3 million will be provided immediately and the remainder will be made available on the basis of a dollar-for-dollar matching with financial support from other sources, most importantly, the corporate sector.

We have made a lot of progress, but there is clearly much more work to be done. This government takes this issue and this challenge very seriously and will continue to strive to foster a society that is caring and secure.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak as strongly and as passionately as I can in support of this motion.

In legislation in various jurisdictions across this country that relates to the family there is a phrase that recurs over and over again. That phrase is, "The best interests of the child are paramount". We see that phrase in federal and provincial legislation. We hear lip service paid to it on almost a daily basis by lawyers, social workers and judges, by people in this country generally. The problem is that that is all it is, it is lip service.

In Canada in 1989 the status of the child, of far too many children, is one of poverty, of fear, of abuse. One million children or more in this country live in poverty. One million children or more in this country have to depend for their sustenance upon food banks. Children in every province and territory of this country are subject to horrendous forms of abuse that would give nightmares, and do give nightmares, to any one of us sitting in this House.

The problem is that we all, as a group, agree that this situation must stop, that children need to be protected, that if we have no other task to accomplish, not as politicians or legislators, but as human beings, the protection of our children has to be the foremost action to be taken in our lives.

The kinds of things to which children have a right crop up in legislation right across the country. As well, one of the areas of reference for a motion such as this is the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. That particular document talks about a child's right to care, a child's right to a home, to adequate health care, to protection from abuse, to protection from exploitation and to protection from war. Obviously, there are things that we can do about this in the short term and things that we can do about it in the long term. But the blot on the escutcheon of every one of us as Canadians, is that we do very little about it at all.

Every day in this country social workers, school nurses, teachers, lawyers, all sorts of different levels of professionals who work in the area of children's rights, see time and again how the system prevents us from adequately protecting children.

Just recently we have heard terrible stories of sexual abuse. It is not limited to one province, it is not limited to one neighbourhood. It goes on everywhere. It is not limited to a particular social or economic class. It is not limited to a particular geographic area. And what do we do in response? We sit back and say, "This is terrible, something must be done".

In supporting this motion we see the opportunity to actually do something. This is not something that depends on partisan politics. I do not think there is a soul in this House that would not rise to fight for the rights of defenceless children. But the time has come for action. As my colleague across the way said, it can only be done in co-operation with the provinces. But, the political will, I suggest, must come from the federal government to make the move to the various provinces. The support that is necessary to get programs and legislation such as this, in its various forms, where it is necessary in the different jurisdictions off the ground, has to have a prime mover and that prime mover should be the federal government.

Every day when we hear about the various problems besetting children across this country there seems to be one or more that will take the limelight for a short period of time. Not to denigrate the need for action and positive support in the area of child sexual abuse, or in the area of physical abuse against children generally, I think that we have to look at this in a more cosmic manner, if you will. We have to look at the very basics that are necessary for children—not even necessary, but that are the rights of children. We have to look at the need for shelter, proper nutrition, proper schooling and proper health care.

I mentioned earlier the various workers who toil on a daily basis against overwhelming odds to assist children. One particular experience that I had as a practising lawyer comes to mind. It was the case of two children who were apprehended because they were, indeed, children in need of protection. They were in the custody of a parent who had a severe alcohol problem and who was absolutely incapable of caring for them. The two children were apprehended by the relevant authority. They were approximately three years apart in age. One child was placed in a foster home, the other child was placed in a group home. The foster home and the group home were 40 miles apart, there was no opportunity for these two children to see each other and to maintain almost the only form of emotional contact and emotional relationship that had sustained them in their short lives.

The younger child became very withdrawn. Again, the social workers were worried, the judge was concerned, the lawyers were concerned. Everybody was worried but there was no facility available to keep these two siblings in the same place. Finally, after a tremendous effort by all concerned, after three months a foster home that would take both children was found. I can only speculate as to the damage that had been done in this length of time to two already damaged children.

In a sense it was nobody's fault in the specific. It was not the judge's fault, the lawyers' or the social workers' fault. It was the lack of a political will to provide the atmosphere for children in need of protection, to ensure that in attempting to protect them we do not worsen their situation. It is not cheap and it is not easy, but it is the major duty of all of us to provide it.

A further thing that took place, indeed with these same children, was the realization by all the professionals involved in this particularly tragic case of the relationship between the older child and his parent. It had become a reversal of the parent–child relationship. This child was taking the responsibility and ran away on various occasions from the group home because he felt he had the responsibility to care for his alcoholic parent. This child was 11 years old.

Because of the lack of support services for this family from the beginning of its troubles, because of the lack of emotional support, the lack of counselling, and just the general lack of a plan to deal with children who are suffering in our society, this child became delinquent and eventually ended up in the young offenders system in our courts.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the member for Mission–Coquitlam for bringing forward this motion. I would like to utter un cri de coeur to all of us here in this House that when it comes to the issue of children and their needs and their rights that we put aside our partisan considerations and work as a single unit to bring about the legislative and social support systems that are needed to ensure that children can take their full place and receive their rightful heritage in our country.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to this motion presented by my colleague for Mission—Coquitlam. I am pleased to be able to support this motion.

This comes at a very critical time for it is long past the time that we took the issue of children's welfare seriously. Society has developed many altruistic and benign phrases with regards to children. We have all used expressions such as, "children are our greatest resource" or "children are our future". These words are correct because children are our future, they are our greatest resource, and they are presently the ones who we as a society have failed most harshly.

The United Nations General Assembly has been grappling with the issue of children's rights for the past three decades. Ten years ago it established the International Year of the Child. Now, after years of consultation and negotiation, the General Assembly is going to, hopefully, adopt a convention on the rights of the child.

It is imperative that we address this situation nationally and internationally for the problems affecting children are critical. Throughout the world children bear the brunt of society's callousness, whether it is through war, poverty or the lack of status within their own country. We know that there have been over 200 wars since the end of World War II. With the advent of technology we have all been able to see images of never-ending armed conflict in our world.

We have seen a young girl run from the horror of a napalm attack. We have all seen toddlers picking their way through the rubble of Beruit. In a really haunting photo we have seen an infant held in his father's arms dead after a poison gas attack. War has made them orphans. It has turned them into refugees. Indeed, over half of the world's 12 to 14 million refugees are children. We know the many problems that refugees face; overcrowded camps, long waiting lists for entry into safe countries. However the situation is much worse for children who are refugees. Should they be fortunate enough to escape to an area of greater peace, the future for them is still very bleak.

The United Nations estimates that almost 100 million children today are homeless. Their only means of survival is on the street. This means that they have no personal security and no adequate source of nutrition. Many of them are unable to receive even a basic level of education. It is estimated that one-seventh of all school age boys in the world are unable to attend school, and the situation is much worse for school age girls, Mr. Speaker. One-quarter of these girls are not in school. Many of them are not in school because they are forced into the workforce. Child labour is a booming activity around our world. Over 80 million children between the ages of 10 and 14 are working, and this figure increases once we add in those children under the age of 10.

If the statistics about war and homelessness and poverty are not bad enough, we should take a moment to look at the bottom line of our treatment of children. Forty thousand children die each and every day from starvation, from polluted water and from disease in our world. Each one of these 40,000 deaths could be prevented by one single vaccination. Could anything be so simple? Can anything be as cruel to deny this?

We can prevent these unnecessary deaths. To give everyone in the world; women, men and children, adequate health, food, shelter and education would cost only $17 billion. For anyone who thinks that this is an outrageous figure, Mr. Speaker, let me put it in relative terms. Every two weeks the world spends that much money on weapons alone.

I know that everyone in this House is disturbed by such negligence towards innocent children, but this problem is not a problem restricted to only the poorest of nations or to those countries that are plagued by civil war. The problems are also reaching crisis proportions here in Canada. Today, here in Canada, one in five children live in poverty. For many of us that is a very frightening statistic, but for over one million children in Canada that is the debilitating reality.

To be a child born into a poor family in Canada today is to have a death rate that is 50 per cent to 100 per cent higher than that of children born into affluent families. If these children are fortunate enough to survive they will experience more health problems. The disadvantages continue as they grow older as poor children are twice as likely to drop out of school.

This problem is approaching epidemic proportions, but why? Because we are forcing more and more of our children into poverty. The Canadian Council on Social Development has recently issued the Canadian Fact Book on Poverty. It notes that in 1975 someone who was receiving minimum wage and supporting a spouse and a child earned an income equivalent to 81 per cent of the poverty line. By 1986 the same worker earned only 46 per cent of the poverty line. Now, with both spouses working for minimum wage, they would still reach only 92 percent of the poverty line.

Our present system entrenches these individuals into a life of poverty, and it is the children who are the most harmed. In Canada 61.8 per cent of children of single mothers live in poverty. In Sweden the figure is only 9.8 per cent. We do have options that are available to us. Unfortunately, our government refuses to act.

First of all, present rates of social assistance fail to provide any real semblance of fair support. The Social Planning and Research Council has noted that in my own home province of British Columbia assistance rates are far from realistic. On B.C. welfare rates a parent is only able to feed a child properly, using the Canada Food Guide, for two and a half weeks out of every month. What are these children expected to eat for the following 12 days? Malnourished and hungry children are unable to function properly in school. Some schools now offer a lunch program to battle the growing problem of hungry children.

I recently visited a school in Vancouver, one of only five schools in the whole city of Vancouver, that offers a hot lunch program to children. It is a great deal of work for the parents in that community, for the teachers and the support staff, but it is wonderful to watch these little children carrying their trays up to receive a nutritious meal at lunch time.

What are we doing to help all the other children in Canada who fall between the cracks of our social assistance programs? Unfortunately, if the government continues with its present agenda, the situation will only worsen.

This government has not raised the federal minimum wage since 1986. At $4 an hour it still remains the lowest minimum wage in all of Canada. We have not developed any cohesive and responsible system of job creation. Three-fifths of the jobs created in the last four years have been low-wage jobs. The government is reinforcing the chains of poverty on children.

If the federal government is truly committed to protecting children it will act. The government has a choice. It can continue to address the needs of big business or it can look at the faces of the children who are lined up at food banks, crowded into unsanitary, unsafe housing, and say, "Enough is enough".

I support this bill, and I congratulate my colleague for Mission—Coquitlam for bringing it forward.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to start the debate on Motion No. 254, in the name of the Hon. Member for Mission—Coquitlam (Ms. Langan), with a quote from the Grand dictionnaire des citations françaises by Collange which reads as follows: "Children can teach us to take advantage of every moment instead of complaining about the weather".

I thought this was very apt, Mr. Speaker. As the father of two children, I agree that having children is truly an enjoyable experience. You know, sometimes when you come home and you see toys all over the place, you sigh: They haven't put them away yet. And you complain.

However, Mr. Speaker, when you think about it, you are glad those toys are there, because it means the house is alive, and you realize it is nice to have a family.

To get back to motion No. 254 in the name of the hon. member whom I got to know a little better when she travelled with us across the country when the committee was considering Bill C-21 on unemployment insurance reform—she is a very dedicated person and I understand why she is anxious to have a special bill of rights that will protect children.

We are talking about missing children, children who have been abused, about violence against children and also about sexual abuse.

Mr. Speaker, in this connection I would like to mention that the Ministry of the Solicitor General has played an important national role in responding to the missing children issues.

Before providing the details on current ministry involvement in missing children, it may be useful to recall the history of the federal government's involvements in the issue.

In 1985 the government was faced with growing public concern about child abductions by strangers.

• (1730)

Public concerns were based on a small number of well publicized cases of the abduction and murder of children. These public concerns were intensified by alarmist and inaccurate media reports.

At the time, reliable national statistics were not available in Canada to put these concerns in perspective, by providing accurate information on the actual extent of the problem in Canada. In response to this situation, the then Solicitor General of Canada, announced a missing children initiative in December, 1985. As key elements of this initiative, the minister announced plans for a national forum on missing children, the creation of a missing children registry within the RCMP and initiated a research program on missing children.

The overall objective of these initiatives was to increase our knowledge of the problem and of the needs of missing children, and to use that knowledege as the basis for a concerted national effort to improve efforts to prevent children going missing, and secondly to improve the overall responses of police, government departments, social agencies, and voluntary groups in locating and helping missing children.

As you know, the police are normally the lead community agency in responding to a missing child incident. This is true whether the child has run away from his or her home, been abducted by a parent or abducted by a stranger.

The creation of the RCMP Missing Children Registry, in July, 1986, has been the single most important contribution of the Ministry of the Solicitor General to the missing children issue.

The centre has a direct link to the missing persons file of the Canadian Police Information Centre. Whenever a missing child is reported to a police agency in any part of Canada, this report is immediately entered in the C.P.I.C. missing persons file.

Thanks to direct access to the missing children files, the registry staff is able to assist the efforts of police agencies, provincial government departments, social agencies and organizations such as Child Find to locate and return missing children.

The registry's statistics demonstrate both the magnitude of the missing children problem in Canada, and the importance of the role of the registry and the police in responding.

Thus registry statistics for 1987 show that over 57,000 missing children incidents were reported to Canadian police, and that in 56,000 of the incidents, the children were located during that same period. At any given time, there are approximately 1,500 children currently missing and reported to Canadian police. This is not a negligible figure, 1,500 children missing at any given time.

The registry staff play an important role in international liaison. For example, registry staff assist United States jurisdictions searching for missing children in Canada. They also help Canadian agencies contact the appropriate jurisdictions in the United States in searching for missing children believed to be in the U.S. To ensure effective international co-ordination of efforts to locate and return missing children, the registry maintains contact with the U.S. state and federal clearing houses for missing children, as well as with Interpol, External Affairs, Canada Customs, and voluntary agencies.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the RCMP—and Canadian police agencies from coast to coast—deserve high praise for the manner in which they have responded to the needs of missing children. You can imagine how hard it must be on a family!

In addition to the creation of the RCMP Missing Children's Registry, the Ministry of the Solicitor General has undertaken a program of research on assessing children in four major police agencies—Montreal, Toronto, Edmonton and Surrey, B.C. The purpose of the study was to understand the nature of the problem including the relationship with other social ills including family violence, child abuse and delinquency.

The findings of the research reinforce the statistics from the missing children's registry. The majority of the missing children incidents reported to the police involve children running from their home or from an institution. Many of these children run away more than once during the same year. After runaways, abductions by parents constitute the second largest category of missing children incidents reported to the police. Abductions by strangers constitue a smaller but nevertheless important number of cases. Such abductions are most serious and difficult to live with for the families.

These findings, as well as the experience of the missing children's registry, underline the fact that all missing children should be considered at risk. Whether the child is fleeing an unhealthy family environment or has been abducted by a parent in the context of a custody dispute—and certainly when abducted by a stranger—the child's intellectual, emotional and moral development and physical safety is threatened.

Mr. Speaker, our Department will also continue to cooperate with other federal departments, provincial governments and voluntary agencies in the search for effective preventive and support networks for missing children, and indeed for all children and young people who need help.

Mr. Speaker, in our colleague's Motion 254, she wants a children's emergency hotline established. You know that there is a voluntary organization, the Canadian Children's Foundation, which has already set this up. Since May this year, it has operated the first emergency telephone line for Canadian children. It is called Kid's Help Phone and provides some seven million children with immediate, free, anonymous assistance, in both languages.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the positive results achieved, with some 654 phone calls a day or 45,000 cases in the last few months, our Government will spend $1.3 million in a 12-month period to support the work that has been done by this agency and to ensure that there will always be a telephone line to help children going through difficult times, whether due to sexual abuse or something else.

[English]

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in listening to the comments of the previous speaker, I have to concur that, yes, there have been some initiatives made by the federal Department of National Health and Welfare with regard to children. However, in reading the motion as put forward by my colleague from Mission—Coquitlam, it states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of negotiating with the provinces to provide a comprehensive Bill of Rights for children which would standardize the laws throughout the country—

What could be so wrong with that particular submission? It goes on to state that that bill of rights ought to include a child protection commission, and an emergency hotline. I cannot understand how any member on any side of this particular Chamber could object to the substance or, more particularly, to the intent of the motion as put forward by my colleague.

It is very clear that what is being suggested in this motion is something that all parliamentarians, regardless of political persuasion, ought to support. Yes, there may be some fine tuning from time to time that members opposite would wish to include, add or amend, but the intent is very clear.

The third part of the motion it talks about an emergency hotline. We are all aware that very recently the Canadian Children's Foundation, a national non-profit fund raising organization put together what is known as the Kids Hotline. Yes, the government has participated to a certain extent, but the government also now knows that this national organization is in need of federal funding. It would not an ongoing expense of the Government of Canada, but a one-time grant to be given to that organization so that it may carry on its activities.

What the hon. member is suggesting in her motion is before the Canadian people at the present time. I assume all of us who are sincere when we say we wish to do things for and on behalf of children must conclude this motion is acceptable in terms of form, acceptable in terms of its intent, and acceptable in terms of its substance.

A U.S. child psychologist said, and I quote: "The concept of childhood is threatened with extinction in the society we have created. Today's child has become the unwilling, unintended victim of overwhelming stress, the stress born by rapid bewildering social change and constantly rising expectations."

In our rapid, fast-moving society, we have made great strides when it comes to technology and dealing with changing labour market demands. As with most strides or progress made in one field, another field usually gets left behind. Unfortunately, the children of the world and, yes, the children of our country, have been subject to this oversight.

One could argue with very little difficulty that the children have been robbed of their childhood. Children need time to grow, to learn, to laugh and, yes, to feel free. Society today, however, has laboured our children with social problems that serve only to stunt their growth and their development. To name a few there is child abuse, sexual abuse, child suicide, runaways, kidnapping, neglect, child pornography, child prostitution, emotional and psychological developments, drug and alcohol abuse, child crimes and teenage pregnancy.

As all hon. members would attest, the children of the 1980s and 1990s are not the same as the children of the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s. Today, a child is told not to talk to strangers, not to take candy from strangers, not to be left alone with a teacher or, indeed, anyone else. It could be argued—and I argue it—that we have a generation of children growing up and learning not to trust. This is very sad. It is very sad for parents, very sad for institutions which must deal with children and, yes, very sad for the children themselves.

It is our fault as Canadians, because their trust has been violated. One prime obvious sad travesty is a situation which we have all evidenced on national television, that being the situation in the province of Newfoundland.

We thought it was only adults who experienced stress and anxiety. Children have been diagnosed with free-floating anxiety. In adolescence, free-floating anxiety can take the form of depression and contribute to suicide. In Toronto, as in many large cities, the increase in stress reactions among young people have been so great that special children and adolescent services have been set up to care for these youngsters.

A clinical psychologist, Diane Syer, who is at the crisis intervention unit at the Toronto East General Hospital, said, "This trend can be blamed on the fragmentation of the family and the erosion of social institutions such as religion, the mobility of people in our society and a pervasive sense that the future will be grim."

All children have special needs, intellectual, social and emotional. These needs are not necessarily the same as adults. Children do not learn and think in the same way as adults. For these reasons alone we need a comprehensive bill of rights for children.

When all else has been told, the best years of your life are when you are young. For many children there is truth in this statement, but for many others that is not the truth. We need a bill of rights for children to protect children by law and to bring back the real meaning of childhood.

The institutions of the 1940s and 1950s, indeed the 1960s and part of the 1970s, in many instances no longer serve our children the way they ought to. There is a role, a fiduciary obligation if you will or a moral obligation on the state, namely the national government, to provide leadership in an important area affecting children across this land.

I am fully aware, as is I believe my colleague who moved this motion, of the jurisdictional difficulties. Are we as parliamentarians prepared to say that because of the constitutional dilemma that this may present we will not act in the paramount interest of children? Is that what we as a Parliament in 1989–90 wish to say to those children across this land? Surely, if one examines the intent of the motion, the words used are: "the advisability of negotiating with the provinces".

Surely the minister responsible, either the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Solicitor General or indeed the Minister of Justice, would want to put a position paper before the provinces in this country to have them respond, not in a partisan way, but in a very caring, sensitive way, to a Canadian bill of rights for children.

If that were done, if that leadership were exercised by the Government of Canada, I am reasonably confident that the spirit in which it would be made would be one of non-partisanship, one to address children of all ages, of all regions, of all faiths, of all ethnic backgrounds. I am sure you would find in the provinces a sense and a warming to the concept of a bill of rights and thereafter a consensus for its establishment into law under federal statute affecting each and every province.

On that note, keeping in mind that my time is limited, let me congratulate once again my colleague for the introduction of this Private Members' Motion, and to say to all members on both sides that the intent, the form and the substance is something which all members should rise in their place and fully support as it speaks to the best interest of tomorrow's leaders, namely, the young children of Canada.

[Translation]

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, there are many children in Bourassa, which is why I am delighted with this opportunity to speak to the subject of child welfare once again. I want to thank the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam and the hon. member who spoke earlier for presenting and addressing a motion on the important subject of children's rights and how they should be protected. I think the Hon. member will agree that what I have to say may be a satisfactory response to her concerns.

According to the motion tabled in the House:

> —the government should consider the advisability of negotiating with the provinces to provide a comprehensive Bill of Rights for children which would standardize laws throughout the country, and this Bill of Rights include a child protection commission,—

Mr. Speaker, this motion faces some very real obstacles in the division of legislative powers provided by our Constitution in this country. We believe, however, that there is a more realistic approach to achieving the objectives expressed in the motion, without changing the division of powers or perhaps disrupting child protection services already in place.

• (1750)

In fact, the solution I intend to propose would make it possible for all parties to go beyond the objectives stated implicitly by the hon. member in her motion.

Mr. Speaker, to ensure that the interests of Canadian children are served as well as possible, the Government of Canada should consider, in close consultation with the provinces and territories, ratifying a draft international agreement designed specifically to protect the rights of the child, not only in Canada but throughout the world. I am, of course, referring to the draft United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, which will probably be approved by the UN General Assembly later this year.

The Convention on the Rights of the Child proposed by the United Nations would establish a modern, international standard for the protection of the child's social, economic, political, religious, cultural and civic rights. We are talking about a convention that provides for the widest possible range of rights. Its 54 articles, which are still at the draft stage and concern the rights of the child, guarantee the protection of children without families, children exposed to violence and neglect, children who are the victims of exploitation, whatever form it may take, and handicapped children and their right to be treated without discrimination. By providing for such a wide range of rights for the child, the draft United Nations Convention is a fully satisfactory response to that part of the motion before the House which mentions the need for a comprehensive Bill of Rights for children.

Mr. Speaker, the Convention on the Rights of the Child proposed by the United Nations also provides for a number of mechanisms to monitor compliance. First of all, each country that ratifies the convention shall submit to the United Nations, within two years following ratification, a progress report detailing the nature and scope of the measures taken to implement the provisions of the convention. Furthermore, the draft convention provides for a committee on the rights of the child, an international panel of experts that will be responsible for evaluating the living conditions of children in the countries that ratify the convention. The committee will have the right to publish the results of its inquiries and to recommend certain measures for the protection of children.

If Canada decides to ratify the convention, the Government of Canada would be subject to the same scrutiny as the other signatories.

Mr. Speaker, the provisions of the draft UN convention that provide for monitoring the rights of the child will achieve the same objectives or objectives similar to those of the child protection commission proposed by the hon. member.

The UN Convention of the Rights of the Child is receiving more and more support throughout the world. Supporters of the convention have agreed on 1989 as their target year for ratification of the convention by the UN General Assembly. The House will recall that 1989 marks the 10th anniversary of the International Year of the Child as well as the 30th anniversary of the Declaration of the Rights of the Child at the United Nations.

This declaration contains recommendations for the rights of the child but does not have force of law. Unlike the proposed convention, the UN Declaration of the Rights of the Child is not an international legislative instrument that is final and binding.

Mr. Speaker, except for unforeseen circumstances, it is expected that the UN General Assembly will approve the international convention in 1989, so that the Government of Canada will be able to ratify it.

Hon. members will be interested to know that Canada is internationally recognized as having played a leading role in drafting the proposed convention. All or part of versions prepared by Canada were used as the basis for articles on child sexual abuse, health, standard of living, education goals, recreation, economic exploitation, criminal procedure and care mechanisms.

This is just one more reason why the Government of Canada, with the assistance of the provinces and the territories, should consider ratifying the convention.

Mr. Speaker, ratifying the international convention would involve making our laws conform to the convention, both federally and provincially. Since we would be obliged to align our legislation with the provisions of the proposed convention, the ultimate goal of the ratification process would be to provide for some standardization in the provisions of child protection and child welfare legislation across Canada.

To that extent, Mr. Speaker, ratification of the convention would be a response to that part of the motion tabled by the hon. member which asks that child protection laws be standardized across Canada.

Harmonizing federal and provincial legislation with the standards set forth in the proposed UN Convention on the Rights of the Child has been in the works for quite sometime. It is therefore not unlikely that the convention's provisions will be approved by all Canadian jurisdictions.

Mr. Speaker, the proposed convention stresses the right of the child to receive the best possible health care and requires countries to ensure that no child is deprived of access to such care. That is also, Mr. Speaker, the objective pursued by the Government of Canada.

Under the Canada Assistance Plan, the Government of Canada shares with the provinces the cost of helping families who are, or are likely to be, in need and who have children. Family allowances and The Child Tax Credit are among the many other measures designed to afford economic protection to Canadian children.

By definition, children depend on their families, on care-givers or on other adults to whose care they have been entrusted, all of whom must consider the best interests of the child and act accordingly. When that is not the case or worse, when the child is abused or neglected, the child is in danger and something must be done.

Mr. Speaker, it is not easy to fight problems like violence against children. We have to make the best interests of the child our priority.

Particular emphasis is placed on the fight against child abuse in the Canadian children's program which is co-ordinated by the Family Violence Prevention Division of the Department of National Health and Welfare. The Division is responsible for $20 million in funding for innovative projects that will help prevent child sexual abuse.

The Family Violence Prevention Division was created in 1986 as a visible agency for co-ordinating federal initiatives in the fight against family violence. It includes the National Clearinghouse on Family Violence, a source of information and public awareness tool, thanks to its publications and audio-visual material.

Mr. Speaker, although the merits of the motion before the House are quite obvious, we feel there is a better way to protect the rights of all children.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-36, an act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Schneider (p.5069).

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to rise this afternoon in this Chamber and speak on behalf of every farmer in this country who will be hard done by as a result of the actions of the government in reducing their interest in the rebate of $27 million on their advance payments quota.

Before I get into the substance of my remarks, I would like to discuss the comments of my friend for Mackenzie who spoke earlier in the day. I was very interested in his comments, especially those that originally went over some of our heads, when he was talking about his province of Saskatchewan and he mentioned "divine " wisdom and all of those events that happened in the province of Saskatchewan that are led by the "divine" intervention, I would imagine, of the premier of that province.

Also, I cannot help but remark on the comments made by the member for Athabasca who was trying to justify this government's moves in respect to the closure motion. He said that we were the members in this House who were causing the farmers to be denied the benefits to which they were entitled. I feel offended by those comments, inasmuch as I never heard anything that was further removed from the truth.

Since I have been a member of this House, I have seen many instances where the government has done things that it wanted to do without coming to this House for approval. It spent funds without coming to this House for approval. It spent approximately $10 million on advertising the goods and services tax in newspapers right across this country, and it did not come to this House for approval. Yet, the member for Athabasca rises and states that we are denying the farmers in this country the wherewithal to meet their interest commitments. That is not quite correct. I want to draw his attention to that matter.

This government, by its actions, has proven that it does almost anything it wants to do, almost to the point that it has forgotten what the parliamentary system is all about. From our experience, it looks as if it is operating an executive form of government, much the same as our friends in the United States. It seems to be able to do whatever it wants and then come to Parliament for approval after the fact.

The government seems to forget that in the parliamentary system, matters of great concern to this country come before this House, this Chamber for full debate, and once they are debated to their fullest extent, there is a vote. That is the parliamentary system under which this country has operated since 1867, and I suspect will continue to operate, regardless of what the government is doing with respect to the executive type of administration that it seems to be leading this country into.

As I discuss this executive form of government and its actions, I want to comment on the closure motion. I think this is the ninth time in the short history of this government that it has invoked the time element on the debate of a bill. It is important for us to understand what is happening, particularly when it affects the agricultural community of our country.

Limiting debate is repugnant. It shows an irreverence for this House and a disrespect for its procedures and those things that we, as parliamentarians, have come to hold very dear to our hearts. We hope that by expressing our concerns members opposite would reconsider their future actions and decide that closing debate on vital issues that affect every person is not the proper way to run a country. We have to form a consensus of opinion that meets the needs of the people in this country for the purposes of unity and harmony, and that is what I think we are all trying to achieve.

It does not surprise us that they would move in that direction, inasmuch as this government with this bill on agriculture and its effect on the farmers in our community has shown a complete disrespect for all small town Canada, and rural Canada. This morning we attended a transportation hearing. We were talking about VIA Rail and Rural Dignity made a presentation. When you consider all of the facets that happen in rural Canada today such as the disbanding of rural post offices, the disbanding of passenger rail service in our country, all the other elements that do not affect the cities of Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver, you can see why they would form this allegiance to the big centres of the country and have a complete disregard for our small communities where most of the farmers in our country reside.

When you speak of agriculture in our country your mind wanders immediately. I am from Ontario. When you travel down highway 401 from Toronto to Windsor you can see all those magnificent fields laden with corn, black earth and the vegetables that they grow. These lands provide Canadians with fruits and vegetables. These farmers are being hurt by what this government is trying to do with this bill.

As your mind wanders and travels to the west, to the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta and those magnificent fields of grain, soybeans, and other crops grown there, you think of the crops that are so vital to our communities and to our country. As you think of the grain in the west, you think of the very complex growing system and manufacturing system that we require to grow that grain and get it to those very vital export markets on which we rely to balance our payments.

It is a complex system, and I want to address that in a few moments to show why the farmers in this country need that $27 million in order to make sure that the process is kept in place. When you think of this magnificent industry growing in the western provinces and the subsidies that are required to assist it, and the $27 million is part of that, when you think of the system that is required to take this grain from its source of supply on the farms of this country and trucked to smaller elevators and from the smaller elevators put in the rail cars and shipped, you think immediately of the complex nature of the transportation system that is required.

When you think of transportation and the movement of grain, you automatically think of the Western Grain Transportation Act, and let me just comment on that for a moment. When we talk about agriculture and grain, we cannot help but mention and address the issue of the Western Grain Transportation Act and the inequities that arise out of that particular piece of legislation.

On the one hand, we are talking about $27 million in interest payments, but when you discuss the Western Grain Transportation Act you are not talking of a subsidy on transportation of $550 million or $600 million. I think the numbers that we looked at at the end of last year were well over $1.1 billion in subsidies for the movement of grain in this country from the western provinces to Prince Rupert and Vancouver in British Columbia, or the alternate route in my riding of Thunder Bay—Nipigon.

When you consider the enormous subsidy in this western grain transportation program and compare it to the $27 million, it pales by comparison. That Western Grain Transportation Act has to be changed for the benefit of the agricultural producers and for the farmers of this country who are growing our grain, but that is an argument for another day.

We rise in this House on this side to provide support and interest in the hope that we can convince this government to retain the steady and even flow of products into our system.

The system that I talked about is the operative word. In the growing of grain, we are not simply talking as if it was many years past of going out into fields and planting seed, hoping and praying for some sunshine and some rain so that the grain would grow and then harvesting the grain and shipping it to ports. The system today is so complex, so highly technical, it is a process that defies the imagination from the planting of the seed to its eventual use somewhere in another country in this world. Some of it will stay in Canada, but most of it will be exported to other countries, Third World countries, to feed people in China, to feed people in the Ukraine, to feed people in Poland, and to feed people in Russia.

What we have is a very complex manufacturing process in growing our grain and getting it to the eventual user in our country. That complex process requires everyone contributing his part to make sure that the process continues on its way to its eventual use.

And a good part of this government's obligation is to make sure that from the time the seed is planted to the time it is harvested and to the time it is merchandised, that the farmer, the owner, the person who is responsible for the fundamental issue in this, is recompensed for his problems. Making a car is simple; you make the car, you take it out and sell it. But grain takes from the middle of April when the crop year begins to September and that process has to be financed. All we are talking about here today is that period of time where we have the grain starting to grow to the time of its eventual processing and distribution to those people I mentioned before.

It is a complex system, and farmers are automated to the best of their ability now. Prior to April they plough the fields, till the soil and plant the seed. At all times they hope that there will be just enough rain and just enough sunshine so that they can get a crop, contrary to what we experienced last year. They tend to their crops through this period of time, and there is constant work that is involved, and then it comes time for harvest.

The harvesting on the prairies is done with these magnificent machines that do it in such short order today. If everything is good, they get a reasonable crop. In some years, they get a magnificent crop. In other years they get a very poor crop. On the average, crops have been good.

After harvest they can store it in their own storage areas within their farm yards, or they can load it on trucks and take it down to the terminals that store it for them. Their responsibility almost ends there, but they do not get paid for it then.

They can either handle that grain on their own, or they can give it to a pool and the pool will handle it for them. This is a process that I am talking about where they need this interest, this assistance on advance payments in order to help them continue to produce what they do and to make profit.

The system gets complex. They store it in the prairie grain elevators. Now it has to be moved from the storage facilities and the grain facilities that they have in western Canada. The Wheat Board then decides where the market is going to be. They will ship it to Prince Rupert or Vancouver, or they may decide to sell the grain to their European markets and ship it to Thunder Bay. It is easy to say that they ship it to Thunder Bay, but the process in itself is complicated.

I get back to this intricate system that we need to produce our grain harvest. It goes from the elevator, to be loaded on to a special type of railway car, and it is moved either up the mountains to Prince Rupert and Vancouver or it is moved downhill to the ports at Thunder Bay. From the yard where the cars are marshalled in these areas they are brought into the terminals and the grain elevators. I can speak with some authority about Thunder Bay. If the grain is moved into those marshalling yards, the grain is then sorted, put in different elevator bins, and cleaned. Value is added at that point, and then it is stored in another elevator.

The grain has been handled now about six times. You would think at that point we would be getting toward the end of the process, but the transportation is only the beginning. From that point in Thunder Bay we have to get the grain to a down river port.

Now comes the water transportation system in our country, the St. Lawrence Seaway. The ships are owned by a variety of companies in this country, mostly Canadian: CSL and Patterson. They come in and load so many tonnes from the elevators on to these ships which go to Sault Ste. Marie, Toronto, through the Welland Canal, and on to what we call the down river ports in Quebec which take on this grain.

The grain is taken off the ships, put into another elevator, stored again, waiting for the offshore purchasers to take it back to their countries. So the grain, again, is sitting there and must be shipped once more on large ships which come here from Europe.

I can see my time is drawing to a close. It is important that we realize the intricacies of the growing and transporting of grain in this country, and that during the whole process, which takes several months from the time it is grown to the time it is completed, the farmer is waiting to be paid.

All this bill is trying to do is take away the money he would normally receive, this $27 million, which could finance the grain in this country waiting for shipment or sale to other parts of the country. I suggest to you this government should withdraw this bill and give the agricultural producers, the farmers of this country, an opportunity and a chance.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak for a few minutes on this bill. It is an important bill as far as many parts of the country are concerned. We have had a tendency to speak about western Canadian grain generally.

I want to point out that it has a much, much greater impact across the country than that. In the last little while in Prince Edward Island, the grain growers, vegetable growers, marketing boards, and tobacco growers were users of these particular advance payments.

In Ontario there were nine organizations that used this type of advance payment: Blue Water Storage, Cedar Springs Cherry Growers, the Ontario Soybean Growers, the Ontario Flue-cured Tobacco Growers, the Ontario Corn Producers Association, the Ontario Potato Growers Marketing Board, Timiskaming Grain Growers, Georgian Triangle Apples Limited, and the St. Lawrence Valley Fruit Growers Association. These were groups of producers which used this particular advance payment structure.

• (1820)

The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, the Saskatchewan Beekeepers Association and the Saskatchewan Vegetable Growers also used advance payments; in Manitoba, the Honey Marketing Board and the Canola Growers; in British Columbia, the B.C. Tree Fruits Limited, B.C. Coast Vegetables, the Okanagan Fruit Producers and Shippers Association, the Island Vegetable Co-op Association, and the Interior Vegetable Agency; in Alberta, the Alberta Fresh Vegetable Marketing Board, the Potato Commission, the Alberta Honey Producers, the Wheat Pool, and the seed producers. These are some of the organizations which made use of this particular bill.

There is also the bill which deals with wheat board grains, now only barley and wheat. In the past it was barley, wheat and oats.

It is not a limited group that we are talking about here. It is farmers right across the country. What we are seeing here to some extent is the final stage of the abandoning of our old friend from Prince Albert, John Diefenbaker. As a member who represented the same constituency as Mr. Diefenbaker, I recognize the contribution that he made to agriculture and to Canada.

I recognize also, sometimes to my chagrin, the contribution that he made to the Conservative Party in this country. For years he kept that party going in the west. When they found themselves in the wilderness he was always there. Besides that, he made a contribution to this Parliament. He was one of the strongest opponents of closure. In fact, he won his first national election as Prime Minister using closure of the TransCanada PipeLines bill as the basis for his cross country campaign.

What we are seeing here is the Conservative party abandoning John Diefenbaker, what he stood for, what this Parliament stood for when he was in it, and what he stood for as far as the Conservative party was concerned. He kept the party alive and he had a real concern for farmers. In 1957 he was the person who brought into this House the Advance Payments for Prairie Grains Act. Now we have the Conservative party denying in every phase of its operations the important contribution that John Diefenbaker made to this House, to Canada, and in this particular bill to the farmers of Canada.

In 1977 the second bill was put into place because it was recognized that there was a need for it. The two bills have somewhat the same reason for being, but slightly different.

The Western Prairie Grains Advance Payments Act was for the marketing of wheat, barley and oats. It was put in place because there were problems with delivery. There were quota problems. You might have the grain in your bin, but there was no room in the elevator; there were no boxcars available to take it to market. It gave the prairie farmer the opportunity to keep that grain but still get enough money to pay his bills.

Therefore, it helped the farmer because he did not have to pay interest on the bills that he owed to the fertilizer supplier and the gas supplier in the community. But it helped those communities, too, because they were dependent upon farmers, for money from farmers. It got that money to those communities when they needed it.

One would think that this government is almost deliberately moving to eliminate what is rural Canada. For instance, the last speaker mentioned post offices and the elimination of transportation. If you look back at the introduction of this particular bill by the Minister of Agriculture and look at what he said, not even very indirectly, it suggests that the time has come to abandon the farmers, that they have to look at competing in a situation where they are finding themselves less and less able to compete.

What this government is going to do is pull the plug and say: "You're on your own. You pay for your insurance. If you can't pay for it, it's too bad." That kind of approach is harming the confidence of the farmers in the west and all across Canada. How much money is really involved? It is $27 million. Your friend, Mr. Speaker, Peter Pocklington, took more out of Alberta in one loan than that total amount.

Yesterday, the Auditor General tabled in this House a report that suggested there was one little loophole in the collecting of the federal sales tax that costs this government $350 million a year. This $27 million is 7.5 per cent of that loss which the government allows to slip away without any effort to collect. We are not talking about a huge amount of money. As I suggested earlier, we have two bills being amended here: The Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act and the Advance Payments for Crops Act.

The Advance Payments Act is for those crops which are sold on the open market. There is no pooling attempt. The price is what the farmer or the producer or the retailer can get when he sells it. The tendency for prices to go down when there is a lot of them on the market is recognized by everyone. If you dump all of the crops on to the market at the beginning of the year because farmers are short of money and need that money, the prices go down.

I grew up on the prairies when there was no Canadian Wheat Board. My father used to do his best to hang on to his wheat or his grain in the fall because it might be 75 cents or $1 a bushel in the fall, but if he could hold it until spring it would be $2 a bushel and twice as much could be made on it. The Wheat Board eliminated that for the grain growers on the prairies, but we still have a lot of farmers growing products under that basis. The Advance Payments Act allowed the evening out of that, because if all the corn from Ontario arrives on the market at the same time in the fall, the price would go down and that is what the farmer would get.

If farmers receive some advance payment, the price of the corn stays up because there is not too much of it out there. As it goes on to the market gradually over the season it keeps its price. Those people buying corn know that if the price is too low they are not going to get any corn because the advance payment is there to provide the farmer with the cash when he needs it.

Corn Growers of Ontario tells us that none of them or very few of them—only those who need the money for other reasons—will actually use the advance payments process if they have to pay interest on it. If you are betting that the price of corn will go up and have to pay 12 or 15 per cent interest on the money that you borrow, you are betting that the price will go up more than the 15 per cent that you will have to pay on that corn. Very few farmers are willing to take that chance.

In order to pay their bills and to assist their communities in surviving, they are going to put their grain on the market as quickly as they can, force the price down and take what they can get, with the net result that in the long run they will be making less money. As my colleague, the member for Mackenzie pointed out, it is quite possible that the government will have to support them under the other programs which the government has in place.

We have been told by the member for Athabasca that this bill is not being passed because of the New Democrats and the Liberals. He should recognize, as I think most of the people of the country do, that there is a bill in place. The legislation is in place. If there is the political will, as he suggests there is, all the government has to do is use the legislation and it can have that money to the farmers next week. There are some farmers who need it. There are not many who want it under the circumstances which are being suggested by the government. There are very few who need the $250,000.

The statistics show that very few of the farmers took the maximum that was available to them under the present act. The present act allowed them $30,000 if they were single farmers, $60,000 if there were two people involved, and $90,000 as a maximum in a corporation or a triple partnership.

Mr. Shields: Now they will get $250,000 if they need it.

Mr. Hovdebo: So if they need $250,000 and they have to pay interest on it why would they do it, particularly if they are doing it because the prices—

An Hon. Member: Because they are getting it cheaper than they can get it anywhere else.

Mr. Hovdebo: That is exactly the reason. The member for Athabasca is reinforcing my argument. If you have to pay interest on it and you are taking that loan out because you are waiting for the price to go up, you are betting. You pay 15 per cent for that loan and the price only goes up 10 per cent, what have you gained?

An Hon. Member: Nothing.

Mr. Hovdebo: Nothing at all. My friend from Athabasca suggested that this bill was here in June. It was here in June. It was so bad that nobody wanted it. The government brought it in on June 25, the last day that we sat in this House and wanted it all passed in one day.

Those of us who saw the bill thought that it was so ridiculous that we laughed. The government saw it was ridiculous too and removed it. The bill came back in the fall only slightly changed. It came back the second time in September as a different bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A point of order. The hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend said that the farmers need the advance payments. They are going to get them. That is why we put closure through.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order. The hon. member has the floor in debate.

Mr. Hovdebo: The bill was brought before us in September, but it was so bad and had so many flaws in it that the government withdrew it. That was Bill C-32. It withdrew that in the House on October 3.

A few days ago, we reached the eighth hour of debate. This bill upon which the government has brought closure has had maybe eight hours and 10 minutes of debate. The government says that is enough debate. We have had a little more than two days of debate, and it is quite out of line with the tradition of this House to bring in closure at that point. It implies the government is afraid that if the farmers know too much about the bill that they will not accept it and the government might lose some of the support of the farmers.

Traditionally the Conservatives have had a lot of support in the rural areas, but they are losing it because they are bringing in ill conceived and underdeveloped legislation such as this.

The reason the government gave us for bringing this bill in and putting interest on the advances to farmers had nothing to do with the value to the farmers, it was more to do with deficit reduction.

Who caused the inflation in this country that led to this problem? It certainly was not the farmers. The farmers got a billion dollars of help in the last couple of years. Some will say that they are getting too much. But that has been returned to the country many times over by the farmers, even in these last two years, because the total production of the farm community has been increasing, even as they have been making less money. What is a fair share for the farmers to pay? What we are asking the farmers to do is add to a debt that they already have.

The farmers are already in trouble with debt. The last thing farmers need is more debt. This is what the farmers are being asked to do in this particular case. They are being asked to take an advance, an interest bearing debt, to increase the debt. The irony is that the farmers who are going to possibly borrow the $250,000 are the ones who are so deperately badly off now that nobody will give them money in any other way. That is the only reason why the $250,000 is there, Mr. Speaker.

As I said before, every group of farmers across the country has used, in some way, this advance payment structure. We should be doing what we can to keep that kind of structure in place so that the farmers can make the market work better and work for them. If you force them to take less for their product, many more farmers will have to leave the industry. We should be trying to keep them there, not eliminating them. We have no intention of supporting this bill under its present structure.

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I too appreciate the opportunity to address this bill. We have heard today how this amending legislation does not change the spirit and intent of the two acts, and I want to add to that.

First, as before, the Advance Payments for Crops Act will help producers store crops after harvest and spread deliveries over the entire marketing season to take advantage of stronger prices.

Second, the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act will ease pressure on the quota delivery system and reduce congestion at local elevators.

Third, the loan guarantee components of these acts are to remain intact.

• (1840)

The federal government will continue to guarantee the principal amount advanced to the farmers under the various programs. While we are amending the advance payments act in order to remove the interest-free provisions, it has also provided us with an opportunity to enhance these acts.

As I understand it, consultations were held with the producers and their organizations throughout the summer. These consultations have now resulted in improvements contained in the bill before this House.

In order to make advances available under both acts, as soon as possible after this bill is given Royal Assent, regulations will no longer be used to establish maximum interest rates covered under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. In the future the maximum interest rates to be guaranteed under the program will be determined by the Minister of Agriculture, prime or less than prime.

Under the current Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, regulation sets the maximum rate of interest which the government will guarantee in the event a producer defaults on a loan. No such amendment is required to the Advance Payments for Crops Act since such provisions were added to the legislation in 1985. To ensure that advance payments under both acts are available as soon as possible after Bill C-36 has received Royal Assent, it is proposed that the minister also set the interest rates which are to be covered by the Canadian Wheat Board.

If we continue to rely on regulations, this would mean an undue delay on advance payments to western wheat and barley producers, many of whom are in my constituency of Wetaskiwin. These producers would be forced to wait for new regulations before they could take advantage of the program.

Since a similar change to the Advance Payments for Crops Act has proven successful, we should proceed as quickly as possible with this amendment to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. Producers participating in this program, especially those of my constituency, should not face delays in receiving their advances. By removing the need for regulations, the government is ensuring that those western grain producers who have come to rely on advance payment programs can do so again and as soon as possible. I believe this can only be an enhanced benefit for my area.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to participate in this debate and I will say right at the outset without a minister of the Crown in this House, my words are falling on deaf ears. It is ministers of the Crown who have an obligation to be here. There is not a single one for the second time today. Their duty is to be in this place—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): This is the second time I have had to mention to the member that he should not mention who is or who is not in the Chamber. I do not wish to discuss that any more. I would hope the hon. member would take heed and follow the decorum of this House.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I hope ministers of the Crown would follow the decorum of this House and observe the convention that one at least out of 38 ministers be in this Chamber when a government bill is under discussion. They are the ones who have invoked closure today. They are the ones who control the agenda of this House. They are the ones who decide which bills are going to be discussed here and they have an obligation to be here and to be answerable to this House.

We have a responsible government. This is not a presidential system where members can do what they want. These ministers are responsible to this House of Commons. They are members of this House and they have an obligation, at least one of them, to be here at all times.

I realize His Honour does not like my reference to this, but I think it is an important principle of parliamentary democracy. I stress it for that reason.

I want to say also—

Mr. Shields: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I invite my hon. friend to walk into the lobby where the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds is sitting, having something to eat while watching the monitors and listening to everything that is being said. The hon. member's people are sitting on the other side of the House watching the monitors to see what is going on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member realizes what is happening here. As far as members being in the House and out of the House, there are installed televisions in the lobbies which members can see. As an extra hour of debate goes through the dinner hour, I am sure that the hon. member will be heard in the lobby. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has the floor.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, if I wanted to speak to the Minister in the lobby, I would go to the lobby and speak to the minister. I am here addressing this bill in a speech in the Parliament of Canada and I have a right to make my speech here, and the minister has an obligation to be here to listen to this speech.

In any event, I will proceed with what I was going to say. I want to also refer to the fact that I am sorry that the Minister of Justice is unable to be here tonight. I know that he cannot be. I am not suggesting that he is away for anything other than his responsibilities in office. I am sorry he cannot be here because I am going to quote from some of his speeches. I think he would enjoy hearing himself quoted. I am sorry that he and the Deputy Prime Minister, who I am also going to quote from extensively, are unable to be present to hear those things. I realize they are busy. They have their hands on the levers of power. They are busy working away for the people of Canada doing their best. But I am going to read from their speeches, and I know that hon. members opposite are going to enjoy hearing the words of wisdom from these men of the present government, words from the past.

Let us look at the record of the proceedings on this bill because here we have closure moved on this bill. Yesterday we had closure in a different form on another bill. Now we have it again today on this bill. Let us look at the debating record on this particular item. The bill was introduced for first reading on June 16, and we all know what happened to that one. The bill was so badly botched up because the government did not do proper planning and proper organization that it had to withdraw that one. So the government got our unanimous agreement to withdraw a dreadful bill and substitute another one which is almost as bad.

The bill was debated in this House in the afternoon only of Tuesday, October 3, for 1 hour and 53 minutes. It was debated again on Wednesday, October 4 for the afternoon, because we only sit in the afternoons on Wednesdays, for 2 hours and 6 minutes. It was debated on Thursday, October 5, for 3 hours and 24 minutes. Then it was debated again on Friday, October 20 for 1 hour and 47 minutes, for a total of 9 hours and 10 minutes. That is the total amount of debate on the bill until today.

We have closure because 9 hours and 10 minutes is too much time on one bill, according to this government. Closure is moved because it does not want to hear the bad news any more. The government wants to shut us up. It wants to close Parliament down and get us out of here.

Mr. Nicholson: We want to get the farmers paid.

Mr. Milliken: You do not want to get the farmers paid.

The hon. member knows the farmers could be paid under the existing legislation.

Mr. Kempling: You're a windbag.

Mr. Milliken: They would be paid a lot more than they are going to get paid under this legislation. But this government is so tight-fisted it will not pay the farmers under the existing legislation. It is trying to blackmail the farmers of Canada by saying: "Pass this bill or you do not get paid at all".

Mr. Nicholson: Rubbish.

Mr. Milliken: Let us look at the record of closure that has gone on in this House in the past. This is the eighth time closure has been used in this Parliament by this government, more than any other government ever in Canadian history, more than any other Parliament in Canadian history.

Mr. Kempling: Who put closure on the Constitution.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Burlington better watch his blood pressure.

Let us look at the House of Commons Debates. On October 23, 1980, what was being discussed? The Constitution. We all know that that debate raged for months and months and months. We had a closure motion moved by the then Government House Leader, the Hon. Yvon Pinard.

Mr. Kempling: Where is he now?

Mr. Milliken: He has been elevated to the bench, I should inform the hon. member for Burlington. On October 23 at page 4027 of Hansard the now Deputy Prime Minister, the hon. member for Vegreville, had these words to say. I hope the hon. member for Burlington will listen to these words. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, I participate in this debate with a degree of sadness and regret having regard to the fact that we have just had thrust upon this House one of the most repugnant and most destructive devices ever perpetrated on the democratic process.

What was he talking about?

Mr. Kempling: Talking about the Constitution.

Mr. Milliken: Closure. He was talking about closure. If the hon. member would take the time to read the speech, he would know this is all about closure. If the hon. member does not believe me, listen to this. He went on:

> The government's action is the result of a move that is ruthless, arrogant, and, I believe, cowardly. Parliament is now succumbing, as the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) has said, to the tyranny of the majority.

That is the way he was talking about closure then. He sits here deadly silent now. He does not dare discuss this issue now because he knows what he said then was right. He does not want the words quoted.

Let us go to a subsequent speech. October 26, 1983, what happened on that day? The House was discussing Bill C-155, an act to facilitate the transportation, shipping and handling of western grain. It was the Crow rate debate. Let us look at the record of what happened on that debate. Let me read from the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre on that occasion. He was the Minister of Transport and he was not proposing the Draconian closure rule that we are debating today, he was discussing a time allocation order, the one we had yesterday, which is another form of closure.

He said this bill was introduced in Parliament on second reading and over 97 speakers had an opportunity to express their point of view. Then there were three solid months of committee hearings at which time over 200 representations were heard. That is why he was introducing closure. This debate had dragged on and on and on, and they were on the report stage at this point as I recall.

Let me look at the record. The House of Commons spent nine days at second reading stage of that bill. Then the matter was studied in committee for three months. There were 15 days spent at report stage and they finally brought a time allocation order and did third reading in two days.

Mr. Kempling: So What?

Mr. Milliken: We have only had four days debate on this bill, not nine days, and here we have closure being clopped on at second reading already. It is a shocking example. The hon. member for Burlington should be ashamed to be supporting a government that is so arrogant and so willing to trample on the rights of Parliament.

Here is what the hon. member for Vegreville had to say on that occasion in 1983. He stated: "I really regret what the minister has done today". I assume these were not crocodile tears. He continues:

> The position of this party has been one of constructive criticism, months and months of it, but that did not matter:

> We have offered alternatives, tried to improve the Bill and seek out reasonable solutions. But the minister is so skittish about his own bill that he has to move closure. He will not allow the alternatives to be debated.

Nine days of debate at second reading, three months in committee with over 200 witnesses, 15 days in the report stage in the House and here is the Deputy Prime Minister saying the minister would not allow the alternatives to be debated. What would he say today if he were here discussing this bill in this debate. He would say we have not had an opportunity to discuss this thing. He would say our rights are being trampled on, if he followed his example. But oh, no, there is more. On page 28353 of Hansard he states:

> Here we have an opportunity to debate some of the positive alternatives advanced by our Party, and that is being denied.

What about us? What about the denial of our rights as members of Parliament to discuss this bill after 4 days, not 24, which is what the hon. member for Vegreville had in 1983. He continues:

> Rather than working toward a solution, the Government decided to use force.

What is the government doing here? Raw force, Mr. Speaker, for the eighth time in this Parliament. He goes on:

> Members opposite suggest they are acting in the best interest of the country because they are being stubborn.

That is the kind of language he was using. On the same page. He states:

> —we in our Party have tried to work toward a positive and satisfactory solution. We have opposed and we have proposed. We have offered alternatives. We have listened to the evidence before the committee— But we are very saddened by the fact—> —that we have not been able to debate the alternative proposals we believe would go a long way toward improving this Bill.

It almost makes one weep, Mr. Speaker.

To debate the alternative proposals, my foot. He had 24 days to debate the alternative proposals; 97 members spoke on second reading alone, and here is the Deputy Prime Minister shedding these crocodile tears, spouting this stuff and nonsense about not having an opportunity to debate. Why is he not up here saying we have not had a fair opportunity today if he believed that then? We have had only four days at second reading on this bill and one of them was a half day. We have had nine hours of debate on this bill and here closure is being moved again.

Mr. Kempling: That is all it needs.

Mr. Milliken: I say it is an absolute disgrace.

I have more because we have the Minister of Justice to deal with now. I am sure if he is watching this on television he must be getting very nervous because in a debate in 1984 on a time allocation motion on a Borrowing Authority Bill, the Minister of Justice decided to get into the act and he made a remark about closure. It is a very short remark but I think it is very instructive. At page 2518 of Hansard March 28, 1984 he stated:

> But closure is the problem of the Liberal Party.

That is what the Minister of Justice said. The man who has introduced closure more than any other House Leader ever in Canada had the nerve to say in 1984 that closure was the problem of the Liberal Party.

If it was the problem of the Liberal Party, it is the problem of the Tory party today because they have shamefully abused the trust that was placed in them by the Canadian people last November by applying closure at every stage of every bill in this House. It is an indictment I would be ashamed of were I sitting on the other side of the House.

Let us look at the record on that bill when the Minister of Justice had the unmitigated gall to make that statement. Bill C-21 had been debated—let us listen to the dates, the hon. member for Burlington might find this interesting—on March 7, March 8, March 13, March 14, March 15, March 20, March 21, March 27, March 28. Those are the dates it was debated on second reading. It was at that point they brought in this time allocation order to get the bill through.

Have we had debate of that magnitude on this bill? No.

Mr. Nicholson: You have had plenty of debate. Why don't you want to help the farmers of the country.

Mr. Milliken: No. Have we had it on any of the bills on which closure has been moved in this House? No. We have not. Closure has been rammed down our throats at every turn by this government and it is a shocking indictment.

Here is another quote by the Minister of Justice, as he now is. He said on page 2519 of t*Hansard*o of the same date:

> "It is very unfortunate that the Liberal Party is cutting off debate on this Bill and, naturally, our Party will be voting against the motion to cut debate.

Here we have this absolute two-faced nonsense from this minister who, after all those days of debate, eight days of debate, now says that after four days we have had too much. Three and a half, as a matter of fact. It is quite unsatisfactory.

Let me turn to the bill. This bill, as the honourable member for Halifax says, is pernicious. When the government could be paying this money out to the farmers today, it is sitting back waiting for this bill to pass and saying the reason the farmers do not have it is because of us. It has worked itself into a corner.

Mr. Nicholson: You are against the farmers.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Niagara Falls is here and he seems to think the farmers are not with us. Again, if I was the Deputy Prime Minister, I would be quaking in my boots with the letters we are getting on these things.

Let me read this letter into the record. It comes from the President of the Manitoba Canola Growers Association. The Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds is very fond of telling us how he has these people in his pocket, that they support this legislation, that they think it is the greatest thing since sliced bread. Let us hear what they think about this.

Let me read this letter dated October 20 from the President of the Manitoba Granola Growers Association and see what they think about this legislation. The letter is addressed to my colleague, the agriculture critic, the hon. member for Algoma. It states:

> We would like to encourage your continued support for reinstatement of the interest-free provision for the cash advance programs. Without the reinstatement of said provision, the program holds little benefit for Canadian farmers.

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure my hon. friend would like to keep the record straight. Granola you buy in grocery stores, granola bars and so on. I think he is referring to canola growers.

Mr. Kempling: He has no idea.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I apologize. Of course I meant canola. I thank the hon. member for Athabasca for his very helpful intervention. I am delighted to receive help from the other side. Let me continue reading the letter:

> With respect to oilseeds, the interest-free cash advance has contributed to orderly delivery, by removing the pressure on producers to sell at harvest, a time when prices tend to trend down.
> Further, one of our Board members happens to be the person responsible for administering the Canola Cash Advance Program offered under the Prairie Canola Growers Council. His calculations show that with the fee which must be charged to cover the costs of administering the program the true cost of the advance would be prime plus at least one or two percent. Because the administration fee is a fixed amount no matter the size of the loan, the shorter the period for which the loan is held and the smaller the amount borrowed, the higher the actual interest rate becomes, making it more economical for farmers under those circumstances to borrow directly from a lending institution. As a result, the cash advance loses all usefulness.

In other words, this man is saying this bill is absolutely useless for these growers.

I will continue reading the letter:

> While our organization's interest is solely canola, none of our members grow only canola. Consequently, I feel it reasonable to also make a comment on the advance program for grains marketed by the Canadian Wheat Board. I think it only fair, that as long as Canadian farmers must operate under a system which requires them to hold grain in on-farm storage, that we should be reimbursed for that storage. The cash advance program as it has been in the past at least provided some consideration in that direction.
> Would you please let our office know when Bill C-36 goes to committee as we are interested in submitting a brief.

They are opposed to this bill, they have sense. The letter is signed by Mr. Max Polon, President of the Manitoba Canola Growers Association. These people realize what a disaster this bill is for the farming community in Canada.

I have more. An article appeared in The Kingston Whig-Standard just today. One of my constituents, who happens to be the president of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, Mrs. Brigid Pyke, had this to say, according to the article:

> Farmers will soon learn whether the Canada-U.S. free trade agreement has killed the small family farm in Canada, says Brigid Pyke, President of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture. Mrs. Pyke says that weak bargaining by Canada during the free trade negotiations allowed the U.S. control of farm products coming into its country, but no such power for Canada.

I could go on to read the rest of the article, but the message is clear. This government and its supporters who are bellowing away from their seats clearly have it in their minds that they are doing the farmers a favour by this bill, but every farm organization in Canada says this is not the kind of favour they need. With friends like them, they say to us, who needs enemies.

This is taking money away from farmers. Government members admit it. They stand up and say, "We are awfully sorry to be taking this money away,"—and they shed crocodile tears at the prospect—but they say, "We have to do it to balance the budget." Having run up the national debt to double what it was when the Conservatives took office, they now feel that it has become an urgent priority. I can understand why they think so. If I had botched the economy as badly as the Minister of Finance has botched it I would be running around talking about the deficit all the time too, and that is what he does. He has managed to work the hon. member for Burlington into a lather about it, obviously, because he sits there and makes comments from his seat. I invite him to participate in this debate. I do not think he has made a speech on this bill yet. I would be glad to hear from him.

As I said at the outset, and I will terminate my comments in a very short time, I have to say how sorry I am to have to participate in this debate because not being a farmer and not knowing a great deal about farming, I will admit to some ignorance on that subject. But I know when people are being taken, I know when people are being had, and that is what is being done by this government, by this bill, and I am not going to sit idly by when closure is invoked and stay silent while the farmers get shafted by this government.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak this evening on this particular debate, and I am sure that my colleagues across are all looking forward to my contribution, as you are Mr. Speaker.

I see, of course, that some Conservative members perhaps thought, mistakenly of course, that this debate would finish early, that they could go home early tonight and that the Opposition would allow the government to run roughshod over the rights of Canadian farmers. Well, not so, not so. We in the Opposition stand up for the Canadian farmers. We want to help them, and we are against the government across the way and what it is trying to do.

I have here a newsletter of the Ontario Corn Producers' Association, an organization from my province of Ontario. There are a large number of corn producers, as most hon. members will know, in the great riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, as there are in the riding of Stormont—Dundas, so ably represented by my colleague sitting near me here.

I want to read what the corn producers were saying in the September newsletter. They spoke first of the Ontario Minister of Agriculture. Ontario got a brand new Minister of Agriculture, a Liberal Minister of Agriculture, and here is what was said about this Liberal Minister of Agriculture:

> OCPA welcomes David Ramsay to the position of Minister of Agriculture and Food in Ontario. Mr. Ramsay won a lot of friends with his openness and honesty in answering questions following his luncheon speech at our semi-annual convention on September 6 at the Waterloo Inn—
> We also express our thanks to Jack Riddell for his 4-year span as ag. minister in the province. While Jack was well-known for his "devil's advocate" approach in examining requests and advice provided by producer organizations, we always found him to be a good listener, generally receptive to well-researched proposals, and totally dedicated to the well-being of rural Ontario.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, being the non-partisan person you are, that those farmers have nothing but praise for the two Liberal ministers of agriculture in Ontario, Mr. Riddell, the predecessor, and Mr. Ramsay, the new minister. Those are the comments that these people had to make.

Let me read a little bit further where these people speak about advance payments. They say the following:

> There is little to add to our comments of previous newsletters, and to the announcement that appears in this magazine, other than the statement made recently by a special assistant to the Agriculture Minister Don Mazankowski that no program will be offered until the Act is amended (to eliminate the interest-free provision) and new regulations are completed. At present, it remains OCPA policy to oppose the changes (at least until such time as comparable changes are made in the U.S. Farm Bill), as we believe that any benefit conferred via an interest-bearing program will be eliminated via the myriad of administrative procedures (and costs borne by producers) which this program entails. It's an unfortunate situation because there are signs, according to some analysts, that storage after harvest could be beneficial during the coming crop marketing year.

They are talking about the two provincial Liberal ministers of agriculture, and they say what a fine job they are doing. They only mention in one paragraph the federal government and condemn the fact that the program that they announced in Bill C-36 is lousy. That is the difference. It is time that the members across the way started listening to that. This is not the Liberal policy book. This is the Ontario Corn Producers' newsletter from which I have been reading.

The member across the way is from Ontario and perhaps there is not much corn grown in his constituency, but whether there is or is not, the consumers of Ontario are nevertheless, in the long run, paying directly or indirectly. Of course, damage to the farmers of Ontario and to Canadian farmers generally is damage to the Canadian consumer because in the long run, the loss of a good agricultural economy is not just a loss to the farmers but to society as a whole.

I have here a letter that was written to the Minister of Agriculture dated June 5, 1989. Perhaps some of my colleagues referred to this earlier tonight, but it bears repeating. It states:

> The Ontario Corn Producers' Association and the Ontario Soybean Growers Marketing Board are opposed to the announcement contained in the April budget that calls for the elimination of the interest free provision of the Advance Payments for Crops Act.

They are opposed to it. We are hearing from the Minister of Agriculture and from his Associate Minister through planted questions that come from the back row of the Conservative side that somehow people are in favour of this bill. Of course we are in favour of advance payments, but we are not in favour of a bill that will remove the interest-free provisions. That is what we are against. Planting questions through back-benchers will not solve this. What will solve this is a realization by the government that this measure it is trying to impose upon the House tonight using all kinds of methods to stifle debate will not work.

Oh, yes, sooner or later when we run out of speakers, the government will get its bill, but it will not get the support and approval of Canadians. It will not get the support and approval of farmers across Canada. Yes, a few trained seals in the back row will applaud when the Minister of Agriculture stands to vote, and the Minister of Agriculture will pretend that that is synonymous with the approval of the Canadian people, but he is wrong. He is wrong if that is what he thinks.

I say to those government members across the way that there is still time for them to go out to the lobby to shake up the Minister of Agriculture, to tell him to withdraw the bill, to start over, to do it properly, and to listen to the great recommendations made by my honourable and very distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, who at one time was also a Minister of Agriculture and a great one at that, and to listen to the recommendations of my colleague from Algoma, who similarly has a lot of experience in representing farmers as the opposition agriculture critic for many years.

Mr. Boyer: Do the corn producers refer to him too in their newsletter?

Mr. Boudria: The member across the way asked if the corn producers, in their newsletter, referred to one opposition member versus another. The important thing is that the corn producers refer to the minister and to his policies and they say that the minister's policies are lousy. That is what is important for my colleague across the way to remember. What is so unfortunate is that the members across the way, in spite of the fact that we have repeated it over and over again, fail to understand.

I know you understand, Mr. Speaker, because you are a non-partisan person, and you understand that fully. But the members across the way are not nearly as objective as you and I. They do not understand nearly as well. Perhaps by stating and restating it, we will convince them of the fact that this bill as presently drafted is not in the best interests of Canadian farmers.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in my riding there are a number of corn growers, a number of farmers, as you know, and I have mentioned this many times in the House of Commons. Our farmers are sick and tired of hearing about cuts, cuts and more cuts every time the budget comes around, cuts that always have a disastrous impact on the agricultural sector, cuts that are always imposed by a Minister of Finance who seems totally impervious to the fact that Canadian agriculture is suffering, a Minister who seems totally indifferent to the fact that our Canadian farmers will find it increasingly hard to cope as a result of so-called free trade. Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that the Minister of Finance and all his fellow members opposite better start listening to the Official Opposition and to Canadian farmers. They know what they need. They know that during the past few years, the present Government has imposed cutbacks that are entirely unreasonable, considering the problems I mentioned earlier.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I want to make a last appeal to hon. members opposite, and ask them once again to forget the Minister of Finance, to forget the fact that in 15 or 20 minutes they will be thanked for voting the right way. I ask them to consider something far more important, their own constituents, and above all, I ask them to consider Canada's producers and farmers this evening. It is high time we started thinking about our farmers and forgot the bankers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the representative of the government House leader to tell us what the business of the House will be for tomorrow and hopefully beyond that.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the government House leader anticipated being here for a 1 a.m. vote and bringing the information on the business of the House with him on that occasion.

The surprise ending of the debate and the quickness of the vote make it clear that he is not here with us and that that information is with him. We will share it will all members of the House as quickly as possible upon his arrival. The House will start at ten o'clock.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, while I appreciate the difficult position the government Whip finds himself in, I do not think it says much for the government's respect for Parliament not to be able at this time to say what business the government intends to call.

I would suggest that if government members would like to stay here until one o'clock, we could easily arrange it. I hope the government will realize that it is not only showing disrespect for this House but for the parliamentary process not to be able to say what the business is. I hope the Canadian people will realize how incapable the government is of managing the business of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 7.57 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 7.58 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the government if it would indicate to us the business of the House for the next few days so that we are not stuck in a predicament that we were last night when no representative of the government was in a position to tell the House what bills were to be debated this morning. That situation makes it very difficult for the House to function.

• (1010)

I would like to ask the government House leader if we are to assume that Monday and Tuesday will be opposition days, and what business he proposes for next Wednesday.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday at three o'clock, we were trying to put together an order of business for today which would meet the convenience of the government and the opposition members so that their critics could be in attendance to speak to bills.

That is the normal course of events for a Friday when we endeavour to clean up pieces of legislation and not commence debate on major pieces. Those discussions were ongoing at the time that I rose yesterday afternoon. They included Bill C-29, the bill to establish the Department of Forestry, and Bill C-16, the bill to establish the Canadian Space Agency. There were also discussions vis-à-vis the bill on the Museums Corporation but they did not come to fruition.

We were successful in determining that the opposition parties were prepared to go ahead with Bill C-29, the bill to establish the Department of Forestry. We decided to back that up with Bill C-16, the legislation to establish the Canadian Space Agency. We understand that the opposition parties are prepared to go ahead with those, that their spokespersons are in attendance.

In fact, I think the spokesperson for the Liberals, I believe, was pleased that we were going ahead with the forestry bill this week because next week would have been inconvenient for him. I understand that. That is part of the way things work around here. We do not call things on Friday that are deliberately set to inconvenience people. In fact, my colleague for Burnaby—Kingsway and I might have liked to have gone ahead with Bill C-38, the bill to make amendments to the Federal Court Act, but unfortunately the Liberal critic was otherwise occupied on business of the Opposition and could not be here. I understand that. The two of us would have liked to have gone ahead but we decided not to in order—

Mr. Milliken: What a lot of nonsense.

Mr. Lewis: We did. The member for Kingston and the Islands might have preferred that we go ahead with the Federal Court Act, but I decided to wait until the critic who has spent some time on it was here to discuss it. I mean that sincerely.

The work that is being done in preparation for today's business has been done with the critics. Unfortunately, I was in Montreal last night. I had intended to come back. I understood that the opposition parties would have the horses to carry the debate to one o'clock. Unfortunately, they did not. I arrived here at 11.31 p.m., and the place was closed. Obviously, the vote took place in advance of that. That is the business for today.

Now that the question has been raised about Monday and Tuesday, I am in a position to advise the House that Monday will be an opposition day, as will Tuesday.

The business for Wednesday will await the same procedure that I have just outlined to the House, namely, that we will endeavour to see what critics are available in order to advance business and convenience members. As soon as that is in place which may be later today or Monday, I will advise the House.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the government House leader did not mean to mislead the House. George, is not available today and it was known that he would not be available today. That information, I am advised, was communicated to the minister. There was no consultation on this issue, except for our communicating to the minister, or to whomever was engaged in discussions with our side, that the critic is not here and is not going to be here for some time.

The suggestion that there has been consultation on this issue, that other bills have been deferred and this one put forward or that there was any process of consultation, is simply wrong.

I would ask the government House leader to be prepared to renegotiate the issue. It is a demonstration of the problems that have occurred because of the procedures the government has followed.

I see the government House leader getting himself agitated but I am telling the House that my instructions are that our critic has planned for some time not to be here today. This information was communicated, and he is not here today. As a result, we are not in the position we ought to be. If the government House leader wants to rely on that point for justification of the procedure which he has followed in this case, he is simply out to lunch.

If the minister has different information, I trust he will put it on the record at this stage, because it is very clear that our critic not going to be here.

Mr. Oberle: Perhaps I could enlighten my hon. friend from Victoria. It is simply not true that there were no consultations. In fact, the committee dealing with Bill C-29 established a timetable which was clearly laid out to all members. We are now three days past the timetable. There was a sense of urgency that the hon. member from Prince George—Bulkley Valley himself introduced in a debate to get this bill done so that the standing committee can get on with its business.

I personally negotiated and consulted with the House Leader of the New Democratic Party yesterday. There was a clear understanding, after consultation with the critic on forestry for the New Democratic Party, that the bill should go ahead, that the Party would be ready to introduce the amendments.

In fact, the Order Paper shows that the hon. member, Mr. Brewin, would move the amendments that normally the critic would have moved. Obviously, there had to be consultation for the hon. member to be ready to move the amendments which are listed on the Order Paper. There would have had to be consultation for the hon. member's name to appear on the Order Paper. There were consultations and we were told that the NDP was ready as was the Official Opposition to proceed with this item this morning. Certainly, we are ready, and have been for some time.

Mr. Brewin: First, motions were put in my name because we heard rumours that the government intended to proceed with this matter, but they were over our objections. There was no consultation, I repeat, on what was going to come today.

Mr. Oberle: Phone Nelson Riis.

Mr. Brewin: The minister says there was consultation in general terms about the timing. But we were told, and told up until yesterday, that today was going to be a Liberal opposition day. I am sure our colleagues in the Liberal party will confirm that until this changed it was going to be a Liberal opposition day today. So, the minister has it wrong. I hope that we can take a minute, Mr. Speaker, and see if we cannot sort this out. Our clear preference is to proceed with some other item of business today.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I want to respond to a few of the points raised by the Government House Leader and I want to do it quickly, because I do not want to delay the discussion on this bill.

I have to remind the government House leader that when he said that the normal course was followed, the House leader's staff only consulted with the opposition House leader's staff after the House had adjourned last night. That is not the normal way in which things are done.

In so far as the remarks of the minister to the effect that he wanted to be back here for 1 a.m., because that is when the vote would be—or something to that effect—surely the government House leader knows that is not what the rules call for.

• (1020)

The rules say that 1 a.m. is the maximum time, in other words, the latest time at which the vote can be held, but the vote could very well have been at 6.05 p.m. Because of the vigorous opposition that there was to the bill, the Opposition expressed that it did not want to go along with that particular legislative measure until some time during the evening. Of course, the government House leader fully knows that, I suspect.

PRIVILEGE

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I gave you notice earlier this morning of my intention to raise a question of privilege on the matter that has been under discussion. I hope you will bear with me, if I am not familiar with the procedures I should follow or the points I should raise.

However, I feel that my most fundamental right and responsibility as a member of Parliament in this House and, therefore, my most fundamental privilege, is to come here and represent the views of my constituents in the business of the nation. I cannot do that if I do not know until I sit in this House the business of the nation before the House for the day. I consider that my privilege, and the privilege of my constituents, to be represented in this House has been violated by the government not advising Parliament of what the business of the House for this day will be. That makes it impossible for me to prepare what I need to present in this House.

One of the bills that might have been up today was a bill of very direct concern to this region and to my constituents. I sat on the legislative committee and it is a bill on which I have amendments before the House.

Mr. Lewis: It is a bill which is not called yet.

Mrs. Catterall: It is one of the bills that was potentially on the agenda for today. I would ask for the Speaker's advice on whether or not this is a question of privilege.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair thanks the member for her comments. However, the Chair must rule that it is a point of order and not a question of privilege.

The government, by virtue of Standing Order 40(2), decides the government business in such sequence and when. For that reason, I must rule that the point raised by the hon. member for Ottawa West is not a question of privilege.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–29, an act to establish the Department of Forestry, to amend the Forestry Development and Research act and to make related amendments to other Acts, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING—MOTIONS IN AMENDEMENT

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There are eight motions in amendment to the bill. I have reviewed the motions and I am now ready to make my decision known concerning the selection, grouping, and voting patterns.

[Translation]

Motions nos. 1, 2, 3 and 5 standing in the name of the Minister of State for Forestry are in order and will be grouped for debate with the vote on Motion no. 1 applying to Motions nos. 2, 3 and 5.

[English]

Motions nos. 4, 6, and 8 standing in the name of the hon. member for Victoria appear to be inserting new elements into the clauses of the bill, which, as the hon. member is aware, is contrary to our parliamentary practice. Therefore, in accordance with Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 773(1), I will not select these motions.

[Translation]

Motion no. 7 is acceptable and will be debated and voted upon separately.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Victoria on a point of order.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I gather that it is the habit in this House to feel slightly aggrieved sometimes at the rulings of the Chair, but on the other hand, to accept them with as much grace as we can manage to muster.

I do so with respect to your ruling on Motions Nos. 4 and 6. However, with respect to Motion No. 8 I would ask the Chair to take a second look. Motion No. 8 purports to amend clause 6. Clause 6 of the bill provides that the Governor in Council may make regulations for the protection, care and management of lands comprised in forest experimental areas and lands in respect of which the minister has assumed responsibility including regulations respecting: (a) the cutting, removal and disposal of timber and so on; and (b) the protection of the flora and fauna.

The proposed amendment would add (g) the use of pesticides and pest control products, and (h) the preservation of culturally altered trees.

In other words, the first thing to be said is that the enumeration from (a) to proposed (h) merely enunciates and elaborates the general terms of the clause. It does not add anything to the clause. It merely elaborates on the definitions of the clause. There is no additional or new element added by these amendments. It clarifies and explains.

Second, the proposed enumeration includes the protection of flora and fauna. What we propose to add is the use of pesticides and pest control products and the preservation of culturally altered trees which, in turn, relates back to number (a).

I have great difficulty understanding, with due respect, the purport of the ruling. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, if you would be prepared to take a second look at that. We do have some time because it will not be dealt with immediately. We can proceed with the other motions and you might take a moment if you would on behalf of the House to reconsider this.

The issue, of course, of pesticides and pest control products and culturally altered trees—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank the member for his comments. I will have a second look at it, as the member recommends. I will now put Motions nos. 1, 2, 3 and 5 to the House for debate.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-29 be amended in Clause 2 in the French version by Striking out line 9 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

" 'développement durable' Développement qui".

Motion No. 2

—That Bill C-29 be amended in Clause 6 in the French version by striking out line 21 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"c) s'engage à surveiller et à promouvoir l'élaboration et".

Motion No. 3

—That Bill C-29 be amended in Clause 6 in the French version by striking out lines 24 and 25 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"d) tient compte d'un aménagement intégré et du développement durable des".

Motion No. 5

—That Bill C-29 be amended in Clause 7 by striking lines 5 to 8 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"(c) enhance public awareness of the social, economic and environmental benefits derived from Canada's forests".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Forestry.

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be brief in this debate on a bill which from the outset has met with the unanimous consent of all three parties. The purpose of these motions is, after all, to improve the quality of the French in the bill's interpretation. What we wanted to do with our amendments is simply rewrite the bill where necessary, in good French, always bearing in mind the proposal made at the outset by the parties when amendments were proposed, and we made a point of respecting the tenor of the original amendments.

Mr. Speaker, I believe these amendments respect the spirit in which the legislative committee drafted its amendments in committee and the only difference being is that they are drafted in better French, with the help of various dictionaries which enabled us to introduce an acceptable quality of French into the text of the motions. We also had discussions with people in the industry about generally accepted terms like "développement durable". Since we wanted to reflect the exact meaning of these terms as understood by the industry, we made our changes while always, as I said earlier, respecting the original concept.

• (1030)

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I may simply add to what the previous speaker just said that, first of all, it was not nerely a matter of whether the terms used in the bill were legal, it was also a matter of promoting the proper use of French in our proceedings. As the previous speaker said, the amendments had received unanimous consent in committee. They were substantial amendments, and it was extremely important to use the right terms in order to convey a clear message and to ensure it would be clear what the Parliament of Canada intended to do in connection with our forests. I can therefore inform the House that our party will support these technical amendment, without reservations.

[English]

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I recognize that this particular clause deals with the language of the bill, particularly the French interpretation.

However, I think we should use this opportunity to recognize that the idea of sustainable development, whether it is expressed properly in English or French, is a key element in this particular bill. We, of course, support the motion, but the idea that sustainable development can be overlooked in any language needs to be commented on.

I live in the northern part of Saskatchewan. In my farming operation there are approximately 200 acres of forest which can be and is harvested on a continuing basis. The sustainability of that kind of industry in rural Canada is very important. Forestry is a rural industry and the people who are involved in forestry consider themselves rural people. Both provincial and federal governments must work toward sustainable development which will allow them to have a continuing livelihood based on that industry.

I recognize that this bill is an attempt to go in that direction and we appreciate that very much.

We recognize also that sustainability must, as far as forestry is concerned, be a major concern not only provincially but federally as well. This bill is a move in that direction.

This issue also needs to be looked at on a world-wide basis. We can contribute much more than we do to the continuation of the forests as a part of the world economy.

I spent several years in Africa in a part of the Sahara Desert where trees were being used for fuel to such an extent that it was getting very difficult to survive in many parts around the fringe of what is recognized as a pretty difficult area in which to live.

Although we support this change, I think we should take the opportunity to express that sustainability should not be limited to any specific area but should be recognized as a requirement across the industry.

If we are going to support rural Canada, then we must recognize that forestry is a strong element of rural Canada and needs the kind of support that we unequivocally give to other areas like agriculture. We recognize that there is a need for sustainability all across the country.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the comments made by my hon. friend. Indeed, the committee in its wisdom elaborated extensively on the concept of sustainable development and the importance to forestry of this particular concept, not only in terms of the trade-offs and the compromises that have to be made as we expand the industry and develop new processes to keep the industry internationally competitive, but also in terms of the importance of our forest to the ecological system and to the environment.

It is for that reason that the committee in its wisdom chose to enlarge on the interpretation section to give a definition of the concept of sustainable development. This will indeed be the first such inclusion in any of the statutes of the government. May I just read the definition which is generally accepted throughout the world as being the definition of sustainable development. It says: "Sustainable development means development that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs."

I thank the committee for its wisdom to include this phrase in this bill and, of course, it does answer my hon. friend's concerns.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of the motion and in particular Motion No. 5 which would add to the bill and to the duties of the new ministry the duty of enhancing public awareness of the social, economic and environmental benefits derived from Canada's forests.

I come from an urban constituency. Apart from occasional pruning, very few trees are cut down in our riding but on the other hand, even urban ridings like Victoria depend in a very vital way on the forest industry and on the forests of Canada. We depend on it economically, socially and environmentally. Beyond Victoria, throughout Vancouver Island, the forest industry is critical. In British Columbia the forest industry has always been our leading industry. This bill acknowledges on behalf of the Parliament of Canada the importance of forestry to this country, and the particular amendment that is before the House recognizes and elaborates on that recognition.

There is a need to improve public awareness of the importance of forestry to Canadians. Half the total land of Canada, 79 per cent of the area within the ten provinces, is forested; 60 per cent of forest land is productive. That is 243.7 million hectares. By comparison, 67.8 million hectares of land in Canada are in agriculture.

The production of the forest industry in Canada is $38 billion annually. Only the food and beverage industry exceeds the forest industry's contribution to manufacturing in Canada. It is a major export industry for this country with $17.9 billion in forest product exports; lumber alone, $4.1 billion; paper and paperboard, $7.5 billion; other forest products, $1.4 billion. In 1987, exports rose to 20.9 billion and provided this country with a net balance of trade of $18.3 billion in 1987.

The industry in forestry accounts for 15 per cent of Canada's merchandise trade. We supply 23 per cent of the world's exports of pulp and paper and 23 per cent of the total exports of manufactured forest products. The forest industry employs 840,000 Canadians, directly or indirectly. That represents nearly 10 per cent of all working Canadians. Forest industries provide an economic base for more than 300 one-industry communities across Canada. Economically, forestry is central to Canada's economic future.

Beyond that, as the public is slowly becoming aware and governments even more slowly becoming aware, forests are critical to our environment. Forests moderate weather, regulate stream flow, minimize soil erosion, protect fish and wildlife habitat and improve air quality. Rain forests together with oceanic planktons account for 90 per cent of the photosynthetic oxygen of the world.

In our part of the world, we are engaged in a deep community debate about the role of forestry and its connection with the environment. This bill and this clause, in particular, makes clear the minister's responsibility for ensuring that in that environmental debate the role of forestry is clearly understood by all Canadians. We cannot leave simply to the forest industry, whose credibility on this issue is less than perfect, the responsibility to explain to Canadians the important role of the forest industry in our environment.

We have a raging debate in British Columbia over the preservation of some of our most important valleys. The debate revolves around the issue of the role in the environment that the forests play and its role in related industries, such as tourism.

In that debate it is important that the role of forests in our economic and social life be clearly understood and that the government take the lead in terms of developing public awareness in building transition from an old style forest industry into a new environmentally sensitive forest industry so that we also begin to shift the jobs from the primary industries into the secondary and tertiary industries connected with forestry.

This country is far behind some of the other countries in Europe, such as Sweden, in adding value in terms of jobs and economic life for our community from our very critical forest industry.

In terms of developing public awareness, let me offer a few suggestions at this stage of the debate to the minister. There has been a tendency for governments to be persuaded that the best kind of advertising is to put a picture of the minister on a billboard, or a full-page ad in The Globe and Mail. While this minister may actually contribute mightily to at least people looking at the billboard, it seems to me we need a little more imagination in the way in which we develop public awareness in this country.

It must start with community based awareness programs in which people in our urban centres have an opportunity to actually get out into Canada's forests, not only to see the virgin forests in all their majesty and beauty, but also to understand in real depth how the forest industry works in this country, how the process works from beginning to end. As well, people in the forest industry must understand much better the concerns of urban Canadians on the environmental issue so that we begin to build a sense of community around these issues.

We need to work with the schools across Canada. We have an education system that gives us an opportunity to reach in a systematic way all of our young people in every part of the country. I would hope the minister, in developing programs of public awareness, will consult with school boards, colleges and universities throughout the country, and will develop with the forest industry and the trade union movement, which has played a leadership role in developing public awareness of these issues, a detailed program that can have real meaning to our young people.

Beyond that, I come from a constituency which has many seniors, in which there is a body of wealth, experience and understanding that could be put to work in enhancing public awareness of our forest industry. I believe there is great potential in working with seniors' groups not only in shaping the programs but in developing a relationship in those programs between our young people and our seniors. In our submission, a public system of developing awareness should be community based. Also, the minister should be discouraged as much as possible from putting his photograph on billboards, and move instead to programs which will pull this country together and enhance even further the role of this great industry in Canada's future.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of the amendments which are before the House to Bill C–29, Motions Nos 1, 2, 3, and 5, which stand in the name of the Minister of State for Forestry.

I might say that a number of these amendments, and I am sure the minister would agree, were strongly urged upon the minister in committee, in particular by my colleague, the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, who has done such an outstanding job on behalf of New Democrats in speaking for us on this important legislation.

As well, my colleague, the member of Parliament for Skeena, our spokesperson on the environment, has played an important role in shaping the response of New Democrats on this critical legislation, which indeed is long overdue. My colleague for Skeena in his very eloquent remarks on this legislation at second reading had occasion to quote from a report done, I believe, by the Minister of State for Forestry himself, called The Green Ghetto.

I am not going to take the time during report stage to remind the minister of some of the very thoughtful comments he made at that time, but I will note that there is certainly a glaring inconsistency between too many of the policies of this government and the policies which the hon. member enunciated at the time of the drafting of that report, The Green Ghetto.

I want to say that as an urban member, as well as my colleague from Victoria who just spoke, certainly I share the concerns that have been enunciated by many of my constituents, indeed by many British Columbians and Canadians about the destruction in particular of old growth forests.

We are pleased to note the minister has made a strong commitment to the concept of sustainable development, but we have to be very careful that we have not only words, but action, in this important area. For example, the minister responsible for forestry, and I use the words advisedly, in the province of British Columbia, has accused environmentalists of being out to destroy the economy. He suggested that the environmentalists had a hidden agenda and were out to destroy the economy.

We need government leadership. We need leadership that will bring together the elements in the community that are concerned about the future of the forest industry. That includes environmentalists. It includes representatives of working men and women in the industry, including the IWA, the International Woodworkers Association.

I was very pleased to note that the IWA recently adopted a policy at their convention which clearly commits it to the establishment and maintenance of fully sustainable forestry. That is defined in the IWA's policy as, "forestry that leaves to future generations of Canadians a rich endowment of fish and wildlife, soils capable of supporting varied ecosystems and commercial forests, managed so as to provide many more jobs and the wide range of forest recreations that Canadians value."

We have to bring these elements of the community together. That is not to say that there will not be conflicts or differences. I must say, Mr. Speaker, I was deeply saddened to note that certain members of the IWA, at the same time as promoting a thoughtful and comprehensive policy in this area, have been in court suing environmentalists in the Port Alberni provincial court.

In fact, a logging road in Sulphur Passage, north of Tofino, had been blocked. I very much regret that some members of the IWA, hopefully acting as individuals, have taken it upon themselves to actually sue the individuals involved in this action. For those people who took a stand to protect the future of this fragile ecosystem, I think it is most regrettable that that kind of action would be taken on the part of some of these members.

I made reference earlier to the important work of my colleague, the member for Skeena, on the whole question of forestry.

I want to take a few moments on this amendment to point out some of the concerns that we addressed in the report of the New Democratic task force on the environment, appropriately entitled: "Toward a Sustainable Future". This very comprehensive report was adopted following hearings by New Democrats across Canada.

In the report it is noted that one of our most precious resources, our forests, are really under siege. The rate of clear-cutting has increased in the last 40 years, to the point where many experts feel that the rate of logging now exceeds the long-term ability of our forests to replenish themselves. That after all, is what sustainable development should be about, development of our resources in a way that will ensure that our children and our children's children will also be able to enjoy the fruits of an economy in which there are jobs and in which there are forests.

But 63 per cent of Canadians believe that the most important factor to consider when deciding forest land use is the impact on the environment. Now Canadians believe that the greatest threats to forests are acid rain and other pollution, overcutting and mismanagement.

When we look, for example, at the situation in the Temagami area of Ontario, only 13 per cent of the forests in that area, the old growth red and white pine forests have, in fact, been regenerated. Is it any wonder that facing the extinction of this old growth forest after years of mismanagement, this forest of red and white pine, that Canadians have taken up the call to protect this fragile environment?

I would note as well that in many of the areas of land use conflict there is an additional concern, and that is the whole question of the rights of Canada's aboriginal peoples. That is certainly the case in the Temagami area. It is not just an environmental question, it is a question as well of, according to the spokespeople for the native people in that area, the Tem-Augama people, of possible extinction. According to their letter, they will be pushed over the cliff. They will be dead as a society of people. The old growth red and white pine forest will be gone as well, if in fact the logging road is pushed through that area.

That is another reason why we surely have to call for the negotiation of land claims as an integral part of a policy on forest and land use management. I know that my colleague from Comox—Alberni has done a great deal of work on this whole question of the resolution of native land claims. It is a very important area for us as New Democrats.

Native people have said to us: "We do not not inherit this land from our ancestors. We borrow it from our children". That must be our approach to environmental questions, whether it be forestry questions or other questions. That is why we support the amendments that clearly enunciate the importance of enhancing public awareness of the social, economic and environmental benefits derived from Canada's forests.

My colleague for Prince George—Bulkley Valley has pointed out the importance of taking a comprehensive approach in this whole area. We do not even have an inventory after all, of old growth forests in British Columbia or elsewhere in Canada, for that matter. This is an area in which the federal government can assist in providing leadership. In British Columbia, we have called for a royal commission on forestry and we have been joined in that call by the IWA, who have urged a comprehensive look at this very important question.

My colleague has pointed out as well, that an essential element of the regeneration of forests is an assurance of FRDA agreements. We are still waiting for renewal of this important agreement in British Columbia, which runs out at the end of March. I will have much more to say on this and other amendments as the opportunity arises. But again, I want to commend the minister for recognizing the importance of public awareness in the area of sustainable development of this most important Canadian resource.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being eleven o'clock, we will now proceed to Statements by Members. The hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, it seems that the Prime Minister will announce today that Canada is joining the Organization of American States. The minute allowed for a member's statement is not enough to do justice to the importance of the subject. Therefore, the Liberal Party will issue a full statement later on the role that Canada should play in Latin American and Caribbean affairs.

Let me just say now that joining this organization cannot take the place of a valid policy on the region. The Conservative government must formally commit itself, by concrete acts, to raising Canada's profile, in terms of both financial and human resources, in Latin America and the Caribbean. Also, it should immediately establish a set of priorities and principles to guide Canada's representatives to the OAS and in the region, for example, to strongly promote respect for human rights and to closely monitor situations that might result in violations of these rights, to provide effective aid taking into account respect for human rights and the environment, and to state clearly Canada's point of view on the settlement of conflicts in the region and to promote the democratization of institutions and governments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. The hon. member for Abitibi has the floor.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Loch Meech monster has surfaced again. In an interview yesterday, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, the man who managed the incredible feat of repatriating half the Constitution after promoting national unity and bilingualism, launched another attack on the Meech Lake Accord, which according to him will put an end to Canada as we know it.

The former Prime Minister, whose customary arrogance hon. members will recall, in addition to ridiculing the leaders of the seven provinces that ratified the accord, shrugs off the humiliation suffered by Quebec in 1982 and blames political leaders in Ottawa and Quebec for the constitutional anomaly he himself created.

Canadians understand the importance of ratifying Meech Lake, and I am sure they also remember the War Measures Act and the National Energy Program.

EL SALVADOR

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, Mirtala Lopez, Salvadoran human rights worker, was captured by the fourth Salvadoran infantry brigade in the north of El Salvador yesterday, Thursday, October 26, at 11 a.m. She is the daughter of Magdalena Hernandez, a peasant leader from Las Vueltas, a Salvadoran town twinned with Windsor, who is now on a speaking tour of Canada.

Ms. Lopez and four other human rights workers were trying to help 1,600 Salvadoran refugees return home after years of exile in Honduras. The army, financed, armed, and advised by the United States, has blocked the refugees' re-entry for nine days, causing exposure, hunger and three deaths in the mountains.

Ms. Lopez, who was imprisoned and tortured for three months by armed forces earlier this year, is likely to be tortured again and killed along with the other prisoners.

I call on our Prime Minister to tell his good friend President Bush publicly that Canadians detest the bloody tyranny the United States and his government is imposing on El Salvador and to demand immediate release of these prisoners unharmed.

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of this week, Small Business Week, I would like to say that small business in Canada has emerged as a key engine of economic growth and job creation. Hundreds and thousands of Canadians have taken the exciting step of founding their own businesses. They have taken risks, committed their resources and devoted long hours to the success of their ventures.

Since 1984 Canada has had the best job creation record of all major industrialized economies, largely due the its vibrant business sector. This is Small Business Week and the government is aware of the importance of the small business sector's contribution to the economy. We strive through our policies and programs to foster the growth of existing firms and the creation of others through entrepreneurship.

CANADIAN COAST GUARD

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada once again is exhibiting its contempt for the men and women who dedicate their lives to the Public Service of Canada.

Earlier this week, I walked an information picket line with some of these men and women employed as ships' crews with the Canadian Coast Guard. These are the individuals who make Canadian waters a safe place for fishing ships, merchant ships and pleasure boaters. They work on armed fishery patrol vessels to protect Canadian sovereignty and police the valuable fish stocks on the east coast. They tow barges and work on oil tankers, defence research vessels, and coastal harbour fire tugs. They provide our country with essential commendable service in an honest and upright fashion.

This government has allowed these men and women to work without a collective agreement for well over two years. If this is not tragic enough, this government insists on continuing to impose on those contracts regional rates of pay.

As a member of Parliament representing some of these employees, I am deeply offended at having these workers, my constituents, treated in such a callous and discriminatory manner. I call upon this government to start bargaining in good faith and to conclude a fair agreement which removes the indefensible discriminatory practice of paying people on the basis of where they live and not the job that they do.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, this week in the riding of Elk Island our weekly newspapers have been highlighting the importance of small business. One of the newspapers, the Fort Saskatchewan Record has outlined the potential benefits of the GST to small business.

The article correctly pointed out that special measures like the small traders exemption, streamlined accounting systems, less frequent filing requirements, payments by Ottawa of a fee of up to $600 and financial support for adapting cash registers are special considerations designed to help small business adapt from the old federal sales tax to the new GST system.

As a highlight, The Record informed readers that under the GST, $600 million will be directed from Ottawa to small business in Canada. On behalf of all the people of Elk Island, I salute small business for its ongoing commitment to our community and for its valuable contribution to the Canadian economy.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the Governments of Canada and British Columbia must immediately open negotiations with the First Nations of B.C. on the matters of title and rights.

The Gitksan-Wet'Suwet'en are asserting authority over their 57,000 square kilometre traditional territories. Chief Justice McEachern describes their trial which began in May 1987 as the most important land claim trial ever undertaken in Canada.

Amid much controversy but with growing native and non-native support, the Gitksan-Wet'Suwet'en chiefs have set up roadblocks on logging roads entering their territories. The B.C. Court of Appeal ruled four months ago that the chiefs can prevail against new resource developments as long as the question of aboriginal title remains unsettled. It will be many months before the Supreme Court of B.C. rules and it will be many years before the matters raised are ruled on by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Earlier in the week, the Minister of Indian Affairs met with the B.C. Attorney General and confirmed that the province will not be pursuing any injunctions affecting the roadblocks. The Gitksan- Wet'Suwet'en have a right to halt the exploitation of their lands according to Canada's Constitution and the highest court in B.C. The simple fact is that the moment for justice has arrived, and before some incident sparks tragedy, I call upon the Prime Minister to act and to negotiate.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, the Standing Committee on the Environment had the opportunity to visit Washington on October 24 and 25. This trip gave us the opportunity to meet with a number of congressmen including Senate Majority House Leader George Mitchell of Maine on the topic of acid rain.

I am quite pleased to be able to report that acid rain legislation in the House of Representatives will be before the Committee on Energy and Commerce shortly and that a bill is expected to be introduced in the Senate in a couple of weeks. Canadians should be encouraged that there is great optimism in both the House and Senate that a bill will be passed.

The political situation in the U.S. with respect to acid rain has changed dramatically. The argument is not if a bill will be passed. It is how and when a bill will be passed. The general consensus appears to be that legislation should be in place by early 1990, if not earlier.

Canadians from coast to coast and members on both sides of this House can take heart in the fact that effective U.S. legislation on acid rain appears to be on the horizon to reduce acid rain by about 10 million tonnes in the U.S. by the year 2000 A D. As a member of the acid rain committee and one who has been working on this for close to 10 years, that is certainly welcome and exciting news.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I recognize the contribution that small businesses have made to my riding of Malpeque and to all ridings in Canada. There is no doubt that the spirit of entrepreneurship is the backbone of communities across our country. However, I am concerned with the effect the government's GST will have on small business development.

• (1110)

For the past few weeks, the finance committee has travelled across Canada. We have heard how detrimental this tax will be to the growth of the small business industry. Yesterday the committee held its final hearing. I urge this government to listen carefully to what Canadians are saying about this tax.

We must encourage the spirit of entrepreneurship, not stifle it with bureaucratic nightmares for small business people. This week, as we acknowledge the small business community across Canada, let us think of ways to further its existence and stop the GST.

EXTRADITION

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I applaud the decision taken by the Minister of Justice in ordering the extradition of Charles Ng to the United States. The member for Peterborough as well as many Alberta members should also be commended for their continuing efforts in this regard.

However, there is some truth to the maxim "justice delayed is justice denied". To prevent delay in justice and discourage others who may seek refuge in Canada to escape justice in their own country, the Minister of Justice should have the power to order the extradition of alleged or convicted criminals any time after their apprehension in Canada or during their period of incarceration for crimes committed in Canada. I encourage the minister to continue to pursue legislation in this regard.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General in his annual report twice states that there are two options open to a government that wants to tackle the deficit and debt without curtailing programs. He says,"It can increase taxes or it can operate more efficiently."

This unfortunate statement infers that the debt and deficit problem could be met through greater efficiency alone. That is simply not true and the Auditor General knows it. There is no quick fix. Ready proof of the inference can be found in the Wednesday The Globe and Mail headline "Federal tax increase not necessary, Dye says".

The Auditor General has quite properly identified opportunities for improved efficiency and better management in government. It is unfortunate that his serious misstatement regarding the deficit problems mars his report. I call on the Auditor General to clarify his statement so that Canadians will not be misled on an issue of vital national importance.

NUCLEAR INDUSTRY

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it is said that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited wishes to sell a nuclear reactor to Israel. Given that Israel is widely reported to have a covert nuclear bomb assembly capability, I call on the Government of Canada to block this sale. Given that the Israelis are not signatories to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, they cannot be considered to be purely peaceful consumers of nuclear power.

It should be remembered that in 1974 the Indian government detonated a nuclear bomb based largely on Candu technology and nuclear materials. We do not need this dangerously dirty technology and the balance of power in the Middle East does not need another nuclear plant with all the possibilities of diverting nuclear materials to nuclear weapons production that such a Candu plant would imply.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, recent events have called to the attention of all Canadians that Canada's Great Lakes, one of our precious resources, are in a crisis. They have become the beachhead for both chemical and biological pollution.

In 1981 the government ignored a study by Environment Canada which recommended that ships exchange ballast water in mid-ocean to prevent an invasion of zebra mussels in the Great Lakes. In 1985 the government axed the study and purged the scientists who sought to ascertain the risk to human health posed by toxic chemicals in the Great Lakes.

In 1987 the government failed to honour the commitment with the United States to clean up the Great Lakes. As a consequence, zebra mussels have proliferated and toxic chemicals have accumulated in the Great Lakes, thereby adversely affecting our food and water supplies and risking birth defects, brain damage and cancer in people.

The government's response to date has been too little too late. I urge the Prime Minister to introduce a long-term environmental program that will effectively clean up the Great Lakes and thereby assure Canadians of today and Canadians of tomorrow that they will be safe from the twin problems of chemical and biological pollution.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, the Meech Lake monster has surfaced once again. In an interview yesterday, former Prime Minister Trudeau renewed his attack on the Meech Lake Accord. He claims that it would mean the end of Canada as we know it. This comes from someone who preached one thing, national unity, but practised another, repatriating the Constitution to the exclusion of Quebec.

The former Prime Minister's rigidity even to the point of arrogance is legendary. Not only did he ridicule the premiers of seven provinces that ratified the accord, not only did he poke fun at Quebec's humiliation in 1982, he now blames the politicians in Ottawa and Quebec whom he left to clean up the constitutional anomaly which is fully his legacy.

Canadians who believe the message of national unity that Mr. Trudeau once preached now understand the importance of ratifying the Meech Lake Accord.

GENERAL MOTORS

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, last week General Motors of Canada announced that it would move the van production facility currently located in Scarborough to a new consolidated production facility at Flint, Michigan. The Scarborough van plant now employs about 2,700 people and has an annual payroll of close to $100 million.

In the North American auto market, trans-border shifts in auto production are going to occur from time to time, but all of us will agree that significant losses or gains in auto production are material factors in the health of our industrial sector.

The Minister for International Trade must make himself fully aware of the circumstances surrounding this plant closure. His ministry must be proactive in ensuring that this significant Scarborough industrial resource continues to be utilized. He cannot leave management of our economy exclusively to General Motors.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel) Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister always said his tax would be revenue neutral and would not be used to reduce his deficit. Is the minister aware that the Economic Council of Canada has published a study that proves the exact opposite? With tables to prove its points the Economic Council of Canada states that additional revenue generated by the minister's new tax will total $7.9 billion in 1995, and that the deficit will be reduced by about $5.2 billion. Considering this damning evidence, will the Minister finally admit he did not tell the whole truth?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can repeat the answers that I have given to the early part of his question again if the hon. member wishes. On the question of the Economic Council report, I have read that report and I am still puzzled by certain omissions in the report. I may not have seen all the appendices to the report, but at this point, it is not clear how we get to the lower rate of tax that the Economic Council is proposing without giving up some of the clear fairness elements in the package. I am not sure which fairness elements in the package the Economic Council is proposing that we do away with and until I see the full extent of this analysis, I am not prepared to comment further.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Not only does the minister refuse to consider the possibility of reducing the GST rate, he has refused to acknowledge or deny the fact that the rate might go up. The cock has now crowed twice: first in Montreal and then yesterday in the House of Commons, when a member of the opposition asked him a question and the minister again refused to commit himself. The minister's credibility is at stake. I am now giving him a chance to make a clear and formal commitment to the House that he will not increase the rate of his GST.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for a minister to promise not to change tax rates in the future. So many things can happen in our international economy. There may be other problems, and there may also be domestic problems. It is impossible to make this kind of commitment. I have said, from time to time, that the best deal for Canadians is to have a government that controls spending.

Some Hon. Members: With care.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —with care. And our goverment's record is very good. We have reduced spending by 3.6 per cent over five years, the best record of any government in this country, and it is better than the record of the hon. member's government, which increased spending by 14 per cent during the five years preceding 1984.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): And that is very bad indeed.

• (1120)

[English]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, such an answer coming from a minister who is responsible for doubling the national debt is certainly not reassuring.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: You do not want us to say it, eh? It hurts. Is the minister aware that one of his senior officials said yesterday that over 30,000 new jobs were lost when Ottawa walked away from negotiations with the provinces over the creation of a joint national sales tax? This says a lot for a government that was supposed to promise national reconciliations with the provinces.

Will the minister acknowledge his mistakes, listen to his officials, go back to square one and resume negotiations with the provinces?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to my hon. friend's statement about the increase in the size of the government debt. If we did not have to pay the interest on the debt that had been run up by his government and previous Liberal governments, we would not have had a deficit today.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Let me put that in perspective and context for the hon. member. When we came into office, there was a deficit in program spending in relation to the revenues of the government. We have now turned that into a surplus from a deficit of $22 billion to a surplus this year of $9 billion. We are paying our way in this government but we are still saddled with the debt that the previous government ran up and the hon. member knows it. I can tell from the smile on his face.

Mr. Ouellet: The Auditor General says you mismanaged the country.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): If the hon. member wants to look at specific quotes that the Auditor General has made, he will read where the Auditor General says that we have great control of spending in this country. It is there in black and white in the report.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance, who claims he can control spending. Some time ago, Canadians dicovered that the Government intended to budget $4.5 million of their money to promote the GST. Now we find that this misleading advertising will cost not $4.5 million but as much as $9.1 million. Why should Canadian taxpayers have to pay for misleading Tory advertising?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is an advertising budget and there is a budget that involves a number of things, primarily for brochures, for the printing of the technical paper, for the overview of the technical paper and, yes, those things do cost money.

I remind the hon. member that when the finance committee returned from its trip to New Zealand a year and a half ago one of the things that the committee recommended in its report—I do not have the precise words here. In fact, I do. If the government proceeds with the tax, the committee recommends that it establish a private sector advisory committee to develop practical rules for the new tax, and to publicize the details of the new tax and the relevant social policy transfers.

It is very important for Canadians to understand the nature of this tax. If the hon. member refers to the CBC–The Globe and Mail poll earlier this week, he would see that 60 per cent of Canadians said they did not have enough information about the tax. It is very important for us to get that information out so that people can draw their conclusions about the new tax.

Mr. Boudria: If the minister wants to talk about the public opinion poll, I can remind him that 80 per cent of Canadians do not want any part of his tax, nor the advertising, nor anything else that goes with it.

The headlines in the newspaper today state that "The KGB has now abolished its anti-dissent unit, its top police". At the same time, Canadians know that the Government of Canada has doubled its anti-dissent budget in promoting the goods and services tax.

When are we going to get some glasnost in Canada? When are we going to get a government that stops using taxpayers' dollars to manipulate public opinion?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have both glasnost and perestroika in this country. The whole budget-making process, the tax reform process, has been done in a very open way. We have held consultations now for two and a half years since the White Paper was put out on the sales tax proposal. We have had another paper since the April budget. We have a technical paper now dated August 8 of this year.

In a very real way, glasnost is demonstrated to the Canadian people. It is all in pursuit of perestroika which is restructuring, withdrawing a number of the elements of the economy that are holding back the private sector.

If you go back to the November 8 economic statement, we stated our intention to introduce a number of ways that we would improve the functioning of the economy. Tax reform was one, open trade was another, incentives for investment, privatization, deregulation of energy, of transportation and of financial services, making for a more flexible labour force. I would be happy to send over to the hon. member a copy of the November 8 economic statement.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, on May 23, our research office filed a request through the Access to Information Act and on September 12 the Minister of Finance responded by saying the government would spend $6.6 million on GST advertising. Yesterday in committee, finance department officials revealed that $9.1 million of taxpayers' money would be spent to sell the GST to a reluctant and angry Canadian population.

I ask the Minister of Finance, was that $6.6 million figure given to our research department through access to information on September 12 not entirely the truth?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as normally happens with this type of question, some of the information is left out of the preamble. In the letter of September 12, it states: "All records have been reviewed up to and including August 8." That information was provided to Mr. Keith Reynolds of the NDP caucus research bureau and was absolutely accurate.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, what we see here is the government making a 40 per cent increase in its budgeting in less than two months. This is the second incident in a week where the minister has been shown to undermine the access to information process. He is telling us one thing and doing another.

• (1130)

How can Canadians believe the assurances that this minister has given them about the GST?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I fundamentally reject that because we provided the information that was requested. We made it quite clear what the information was, and then in this past week we have updated that information in view of recent circumstances. Surely the hon. member must admit that that is very open government, in providing all the information the committee needed yesterday and asked for yesterday in a very open way.

I see sitting beside the hon. member the member for Nickel Belt. We have had all this fire and brimstone from the NDP members of Parliament about what a terrible thing the goods and services tax is, but then the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt says: "I would like to see a tax at the retail level of 5 per cent". So he is accepting the principle of a tax. All we are arguing about is the rate.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, the minister told us $6.6 million. It turned out to be $9.1 million.

What else has the minister got in his back pocket? What else is he not telling us? I think it is time that Canadians got the truth instead of being subjected to contemptible government advertising. Is this the Minister of Finance, or is he the minister of propaganda?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member can have it both ways. The finance committee of the House of Commons, on which were sitting representatives of both opposition parties, agreed on the recommendation that I read out.

It is the fifteenth report. It is dated in early 1988 and it says that we must publicize the details of the new tax.

If we do not have money to publicize the details, what are we going to do it with—tom-toms? Are we just going to speak on little telephones or what?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): You have to use information like this—reports, brochures, and other forms of publications—to ensure that Canadians understand the details of the proposals so that they can make up their minds about the proposals.

Some hon. members have referred to the CBC poll that said 80 per cent were against this tax; 60 per cent also said they did not have enough information on which they could make that judgment.

FISHERIES

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade.

Yesterday his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, indicated that the problems in the Scotia Fundy region were ones of overcapacity in terms of harvesting and processing, while the problems in the Newfoundland fishery related to science, the environment and other factors. If you assume that the problems are different, it is logical to assume that the solutions will be different.

I would like to ask the Minister for International Trade if he could indicate to the House that there will be a measure of fairness, that the Government of Canada will not participate in any mug's game to put Newfoundland fishermen against Nova Scotia fisherman, and that the solutions which will be put in place hopefully in due course will provide equity both for Newfoundlanders as well as Nova Scotians.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, that is the easiest question I have ever had to answer in the House.

We are interested in the problems of Canadian fishermen. We understand that Newfoundland fishermen are Canadians as are Nova Scotia fishermen, Quebec fishermen, New Brunswick fishermen, P.E.I. fishermen, British Columbia fishermen. In fact wherever there is a Canadian fishing we are interested in the problems of that Canadian fishermen. Equity and fairness is certainly the hallmark.

With reference to the Scotia Fundy Shelf this is a matter that is being referred as well to the cabinet committee led by my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The task force led by Mr. Haché has been looking at the situation there. We hope to deal with this problem and to be as helpful as we can and as soon as we can.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary questions is for the same minister. At this very hour the community of Louisburg in eastern Nova Scotia, with an unemployment rate of 22.9 per cent, is involved in a march of concern to demonstrate its dismay at the possible closure of its fish plant throwing 400 workers out of work.

I would like to ask the minister, on behalf of the Government of Canada, what assurances he and this national government will give those workers. Can he, will he guarantee their jobs and thereby ensure that this community saddled with high unemployment will have some degree of certainty as it looks to the future.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the firm of National Sea Products, as it is known, has been having some difficulties as have other east coast Canadian fishing companies. They have had losses now for a number of quarters. The company does not believe that they can continue taking losses and they are going to have to take steps that will minimize their losses and put them back in a profitable position.

Now it is not just Louisburg. The company has a number of plants in my own district of St. John's West. It has a plant at Arnold's Cove, a plant at St. John's, a plant at Burgeo, Newfoundland, and other plants in Nova Scotia.

We have had no information from the company that it has decided to close any particular plant.

We are expecting that they will consult with us before they do take any such action so we can be ready to do all we can to assist the people who were working in any plant that they might decide that they had to close, either temporarily or whatever the decision might be. We have had no such information.

Therefore, I can only say to the people of Louisburg: "We hope that your plant is not going to be closed. We will do what we can to see that it continues to operate, and we will certainly do everything we can to assist anyone who might be laid off as a result of the present resource situation in the east coast fishery".

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my bosom pal, the Minister for International Trade, fresh from his bull in the china shop romp across Europe, only to find that his colleague the minister of fisheries is stomping around on our own china shop over here, frothing at the mouth about "prosperous times" he says "prosperous times in the Atlantic fishery".

The minister, to his credit, tells the opposite story. He does it graphically, even earthily, but he says it and he is on target, I say to him.

But what I want to know is: Who speaks for the government on this fisheries issue in Atlantic Canada—the Minister for International Trade, which I hope is the case, or the minister of fisheries?

Maybe, if the Minister for International Trade would stay closer to home and mind the shop, he could contain the damage being done by the minister of fisheries in the Atlantic fishery.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, when any minister speaks on behalf of the government then that minister is speaking on behalf of the government. There isn't any way to divide the matter up. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is speaking on behalf of the government and I trust that I am as well, and we are in perfect harmony.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has rightly pointed out that the fishing industry on the east coast of Canada is far healthier than it was four or five years ago.

Some sectors of it are always healthy; some sectors are not. In the inshore fishery every year there will be part of the coast where the inshore fishermen get no fish, so that is certainly not healthy in that particular area. In another part of the shoreline there will be a very good fishery, so that fishery is healthy. The fishery can be both healthy and non-healthy, both at the same time. While the hon. gentleman opposite might not want to acknowledge that, that is the situation.

The minister of fisheries yesterday announced a new $28 million program for aerial surveillance and enforcement in the offshore, moneys that were never allocated or spent by the hon. gentlemen opposite when we had the misfortune to have them in government in this country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1140)

Mr. Simmons: You know, even when you squirm you're delightful.

Mr. Speaker, let us get this straight. The fishery is healthy and it is unhealthy; both versions are correct. The government believes both views, that the patient will live and the patient will die but even if it dies there is nothing wrong with it. Smack in the middle of all that glorified, beautiful bafflegab there is an admission from the minister who knows the situation well, that our fisheries is in crisis particularly in Newfoundland.

I ask him now: instead of dancing all over and trying to cover for his colleague who has admittedly embarrassed him on this issue, when is the government going to come forward with an adequate special and credible response program to address the needs of those thousands of people out there who are having difficulty putting bread and butter on the table?

Come to the rescue of your fellow Newfoundlanders, John, please.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, it was Oscar Wilde who said about Bernard Shaw that he had no enemies but that he was intentionally disliked by his friends. It could equally have been said about the hon. gentleman who is questioning me at the moment.

With respect to the question that he has asked, at the beginning of this year our fisheries scientists gave us advice that was startling different from the advice that they had been giving the minister of fisheries and the government in the previous five or six years in connection with the size and total allowable catches which might be made of northern cod.

As a result the government acted immediately. We appointed Dr. Leslie Harris, and I think several distinguished fisheries scientists knowledgeable of the fishery, to review the whole methodology and to recommend to the government what they think is the situation, what steps should be taken to ensure that we are getting accurate forecasts, and to advise us on what they think the TAC should be next year. Their report will be in by the end of the year.

The minister of fisheries has already allocated $3 million additional funds for research into the east coast fishery, what stocks are fished there.

Action has been taken. A cabinet committee has been appointed. A task force under a Mr. Stein has been appointed. There is action being taken every day, and we will have a plan in place to deal with the problems when we know exactly what are the nature and the extent of the problem.

Mr. Simmons: Bread and butter, Johnny.

SPACE PROGRAM

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology.

A consultant's report which was mandated by the government of Manitoba and funded at least in part by the federal government says that the closure of the Churchill rocket range was a mistake, that its dismantling should be halted and reversed, that closing the range makes Canada dependent on other nations for its space program and is devastating to that program.

My question to the minister is simply this: Is the government prepared to respond to that report in a positive way and co-operate with the Manitoba government in reopening the Churchill rocket range?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows that report is being studied by the National Research Council which still has authority over that range. When it has had a chance to look at it, indeed it will make a recommendation to the government.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, that report says that the current Canadian rocket program with one launch every two years from foreign soil is inadequate to sustain scientific careers or attract young scientists.

This morning we have the manager of the Manitoba space program saying that the ideal situation would be for NASA or someone else to come in and reopen the base. The government of Manitoba has already found that there is considerable demand for the use of that particular rocket range.

I ask the government: What position does it take with respect to the reopening of that range which it closed?

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, when we have had a chance to review that report and when I have had a chance to review the report from the National Research Council, I will be delighted to make some response to the whole issue.

SEMI-AUTOMATIC WEAPONS

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Many of my constituents in Cariboo—Chilcotin, in fact many people across Canada, have been expressing sincere concern regarding the proposed legislation to ban the importation of semi-automatic weapons.

On behalf of law-abiding Canadians who possess legitimate semi-automatic weapons, I would ask the minister to clarify his intent.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no intention of banning the importation of semi-automatic weapons, none whatsoever. The government is looking at the banning of further importation of firearms originally designed and manufactured to fire in an automatic mode which are converted to semi-automatics for importation purposes.

There is no intention at all to ban the importation of semi-automatics, only those originally designed and manufactured to fire in an automatic mode. Any such weapons that are currently in the country would be grandfathered.

CANADA POST

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for Canada Post, I will direct my question to any other minister who is prepared to justify the substance of my question.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[English]

On October 10, Canada Post informed communities north of my riding of Cochrane—Superior and of Kenora—Rainy River of a prohibitive, senseless 32 per cent increase in postal rates effective November 13, 1989. The first citizens of this country depend on Canada Post for their basic essentials.

In view of the fact that unemployment hovers around 50 per cent and 90 per cent in those remote areas, would the minister bring Canada Post to its senses and continue to offer a service affordable to the citizens of the north?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for Canada Post said in this House the other day that he was prepared and anxious to have a meeting between all those affected and Canada Post. That meeting is being arranged.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Broughton Island is one of the 23 communities in my constituency of the central and eastern Arctic which will be hard hit by this Canada Post rate increase. If this increase is imposed, the people of Broughton Island will have to pay about $5 for one litre of milk, $6 for a celery bunch, and $10 for a three-pound bag of apples.

How does the minister think the people of Broughton Island will be able to afford these basic groceries? Will she take immediate steps to stop this planned rate increase?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I would simply repeat what my hon. colleague said on behalf of the minister responsible for Canada Post.

With respect to the impact in the north it is difficult to determine the impact precisely. The minister responsible for Canada Post has expressed his willingness to meet with all the affected groups in order to determine whether this is an appropriate policy, and that meeting is forthcoming.

PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE OF CANADA

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, employees of Veterans Affairs and National Parole have been trying to negotiate a fair settlement to their contract that expired about three years ago. Their demands are not unreasonable. They want wages to keep pace with inflation and parity with other government workers in similar jobs. These employees are in the helping profession which includes counsellors and social workers. As such these individuals are very committed to their clients.

My question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. I would like to know: When does the government intend to return to the negotiating table with the Public Service Alliance of Canada to work out a fair settlement?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we actually returned to the table yesterday morning. The negotiations continued all day yesterday, and we resumed this morning. We are in the process now of mediation following the Conciliation Board report.

• (1150)

I would certainly hope that this process of mediation would lead to a successful resolution of the issues that are before us. I can tell the member that we are being as forthcoming as we can with the backdrop of the over-all agreement in the public service.

We are at the table at the moment. It would be premature to say that the talks will either succeed or fail. I certainly hope and the government certainly hopes that these talks will succeed in the next few hours.

Mr. Wood: Mr. Speaker, I do appreciate the answer.

My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I would also like this minister, if he could use his influence on his colleagues at the Treasury Board, to ensure that ageing veterans have the help they depend on to get them through the many difficulties they are experiencing with increased medical problems as a result of war injuries and that employees of his ministry are not forced to go out on strike.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board has indicated to this House very clearly that the labour process, the negotiation process, is in effect now.

We are in the process of mediation. Meetings are taking place now. Following the conciliation process, hopefully this will end in an agreement between the two sides.

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour concerning the health and survival of the operations of the Canadian Centre for Occupational Health and Safety, which has been threatened by the government's financial slashing.

The minister has told this house that the centre is not at risk over funding costs and also that this should be obvious because the market-place has lots of options.

I would like to ask the minister: what in fact has the market-place offered in the way of alternatives for this agency, an agency geared to the avoidance of industrial health hazards which not only protects health but saves time and many thousands of dollars? Is $10 million too high a price to save lives?

I would like to ask the minister: With 90 days to go under the minister's imposed deadline, what are the results of his marketing plan? As the minister knows, the CEO of the centre went to market to buy a plan. The plan cost $180,000. It was a fantasy and, when the council rejected it, it cost him his job.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated many times in this House, since its inception 10 years ago the centre has done a tremendous job, and we intend that the centre will continue its operations.

The CEO of the organization was asked to prepare a plan to meet the objective of this government that it become self-sufficient over the next three years. The CEO presented its plan to the governors of council in October, and its plan was rejected. The council of governors has formed a task force and hired a consultant to prepare a new plan which I have asked them to present to me by January 31 next.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, that really does not help. The whole issue of the centre's survival is now mired in utter confusion and nobody knows who is in charge any more.

The minister has said that the proof of the pudding lies in the fact that a new plan is in the works. That is not so.

An October 19 memo from the Canadian Labour Congress stated that it refused to participate in alternative planning within the impossible constraints imposed by the minister. It is one of the three bodies responsible for the governing of that centre. The confusion over leadership, the viability of selling a product that is not owned by the centre and where the NIOSH-CCOHS contractual agreements can be terminated in 30 days, do not show sound planning. All this makes the minister's request impossible to meet.

I would ask the minister: Will he agree now to end some of the confusion, take a second look and recommend that the centre receive guaranteed interim financing? Will he reopen negotiations with the centre without preconditions?

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, the Centre for Occupational Health and Safety was informed in April, through its CEO, that the government would want the centre to become self-sufficient over the next two years.

The CEO was asked to prepare a plan. The council of governors rejected that plan at the October 5 and 6 meeting. They have themselves decided to form a task force and hire a consultant to have a second look at it. I have asked them to present their report by January 31. When I receive the report I will see what they have to offer.

TAXATION

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance.

Seniors across the country have been led to believe that they will be the victims of double taxation on their old age security high income repayment.

Could the Minister of Finance tell me if this is true? If it is true, it is grossly unfair.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can reassure the hon. member that it is absolutely untrue. The high income repayment is calculated and then the net amount after the repayment is subject to the normal income tax for the person in the tax bracket they would be in.

There is absolutely no double counting, and it is the fairest way that we can put together to achieve our objectives.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

On Monday, hundreds of Canadians will march outside this Chamber to demonstrate their rejection of the proposed goods and services tax. Many of these Canadians are offended that this government is preparing to tax books and magazines since publishing is a very price sensitive industry where increases in consumer costs result in a proportional decrease in demand. A study by Woods Gordon says that the tax will result in a 10 per cent to 15 per cent drop in sales.

My question is: Why does the minister feel he can jeopardize a vital industry with such a hefty tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the analysis the hon. member has made. Those studies that are done by companies like Woods Gordon or others are looking at one industry in isolation to anything else that is happening in the economy.

Since all sectors of the economy are being affected by the broad base tax, there is not the distortion which would have that effect generated by the new tax.

Our position has always been to make the tax as broadly based as possible so that the burden of taxation can be shared as fairly as possible and as equitably as possible across the economy. In that way we would make a very large improvement from the existing tax which is based on such a narrow part of the economy, leaving other parts of the economy free of tax.

Ms. Guarnieri: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister is hoping to reduce Erik Nielsen's future sales of his book by introducing the tax.

[Translation]

My supplementary is directed to the same minister. By imposing the 9 per cent GST, the Tory Government will massacre the publishing industry, especially Francophone publishing companies. French books are already for more expansive than English books.

Does the Minister realize he is penalizing Francophone readers and that as result, only a minority of wealthy Francophones would be able to afford books?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member ignores the fact that a very generous credit rebate will be paid to low income Canadians that will offset the impact of the goods and services tax on people in low income brackets.

To put that into perspective, families with less than $300,000 of income will be better off after tax reform, and that is a considerable change over the type of sales tax we inherited some five years ago where there was no offset, there was no rebate paid to low income Canadians. We are moving from a tax which was clearly regressive to one that is in fact progressive and clearly much fairer than the old system.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Question Period will close with questions from the member for Kingston and the Island and the member for Victoria.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION ACT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday he replied to a request for information pursuant to the Access for Information Act. In order to avoid a court battle he created a veritable paper blizzard and tried to snow the reporter who filed the request. Neither the reporter nor we in the Liberal party are easily snowed.

• (1200)

Why will the minister not release the 530 sheets his departmental officials originally prepared for him to release, and recommended that he release, instead of the 1,000 sheets of nonsense that he published yesterday in response to this request for information?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member who is continually walking around in a blizzard, the information we have provided is the information to which the applicant is entitled under the Access to Information Act. The other information which has been withheld is clearly advice to the minister.

My friend is a very knowledgeable lawyer, I am told. I do not know that first hand. These rumours, though, are scurrying around. He knows the importance of advice to minister. He knows that has been identified in the act as an element that should be protected so that the free flow of information and the free dialogue between the minister and his deputy minister will be maintained. It is on that basis I have made the decision that that advice should not be released.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE DRESS CODE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. In June the RCMP Commissioner told the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General that he had legal advice, presumably from the Department of Justice, that it was a denial of rights under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to fail to permit Sikhs to wear turbans as members of the RCMP, that it was contrary to the Canadian Charter of Rights.

It is now nearly November, Mr. Speaker.

Will the minister, who is responsible for enforcing the Charter, insist that the Solicitor General stop dithering on this issue and approve the RCMP recommendation? Will the minister take the opportunity that will be available to the government this afternoon, when a motion brought in the name of the member for Burnaby—Kingsway on this issue to make it very clear to Sikhs and to others in the multicultural community and to all Canadians, that the rights of Canadians in this matter are going to be upheld by our national police and by the Minister of Justice?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, speaking on behalf of the Solicitor General, I would advise my hon. friend that the government is giving careful consideration to the recommendations of the Commissioner of the RCMP. The discussions on these recommendations will be based on the essential principles, that is, to maintain and improve policing service to all Canadians.

As I said earlier this week when the Solicitor General was away, it is my understanding that he is reviewing this matter urgently and a decision will be made in due course.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of State for Science and Technology on a point of order.

SPACE PROGRAM

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, I may have inadvertently misled my college from Windsor—St. Clair on the question with respect to the Churchill rocket range. I said the National Research Council because perhaps technically that is correct.

The group actually reviewing it is the Canadian Space Agency which, until the bill is passed, officially does not exist. But that is the group doing the review.

CANADA–EUROPEAN PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

PRESENTATION OF REPORTS

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the following reports of the Canada–Europe Parliamentary Association: Preliminary Meeting, 7th Parliamentary and Scientific Conference, Paris, France; Parliamentary Visit to Hungary, Czechoslovakia and Poland; Annual OECD Debate of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, Strasbourg, France.

[English]

The delegation that went to eastern Europe certainly was there at a time of historical significance. The meetings with the parliamentarians and the government officials confirm that "political reform" were the words of eastern Europe. We heard them most often.

The rise of democracy to a multi-party system and increased human rights were what people wanted to talk about and, indeed, what they wanted Canada's Parliament to support and to help in the future.

We learned in Poland that economic development is critical. In fact, it is absolutely necessary in order that political reform moved forward that this development occur.

The government officials and the parliamentary officials from the equivalent of both the House of Commons the Senate concurred in saying that Canada has a vital role to play.

The association was pleased to see that earlier this month the Government of Canada had gone forward with its efforts. The association wants this House to know that further recommendations will be made at a meeting next week which the members will forward on to appropriate government ministers as well as to you, Sir. Canada's Parliament is really behind this movement in eastern Europe to democracy and increased human rights.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there is a motion I would like to put to the House which has been discussed with House Leaders. It results from the splitting of the Committee on Communications and Culture, Citizenship and Multiculturalism and assists in the designation of exactly where the papers and reports, et cetera, which had been previously put to the entire committee, be placed in view of the fact that we now have two committees.

If my colleagues will bear with me, I will read it and then it can be put if we have unanimous consent. I move:

Routine Proceedings

That all outstanding orders of reference before the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, Citizenship and Multiculturalism prior to September 27, 1989, shall be deemed referred, with evidence adduced in relation thereto, to the new appropriate corresponding standing committee; and that, all reports, returns and papers, deemed permanently referred to the Standing Committee on Communications, Culture, Citizenship and Multiculturalism, pursuant to Standing Orders 47(4) and 71, prior to September 27, 1989 shall be deemed permanently referred, with the evidence adduced in relation thereto, to the new appropriate corresponding standing committee.

Mr. Milliken: We consent to the motion proposed, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, we would concur with that recommendation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. government House leader have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to rise and present some petitions. Constituents of Winnipeg North support the citizens of Thunder Bay in their petition which I now present pursuant to Standing Order 36.

This petition has been certified correct as to form and content. Like the constituents of Winnipeg North, the citizens of Thunder Bay oppose the cuts to VIA Rail services for a variety of reasons, among them for the jobs that will be lost, the services that will be cut, the increase in environmental pollution and the likely increase in accidents.

The petitioners hereby pray that the announced cuts be rescinded and that the government instead increase the support to modernize equipment and thereby attract more Canadians to use the VIA Rail train service.

• (1210)

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to present a number of petitions from Canadians from the Ontario area opposing the goods and services tax. They feel that this tax will impose an onerous burden on small businesses. They feel that this will impact negatively on low and middle income Canadians. Therefore, they seek the remedy from this House that Parliament reject the proposed goods and service tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to table a duly certified petition signed by people from Thunder Bay who object to the dismantling of VIA Rail.

RIGHT TO LIFE

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to stand in this House today and present a petition on behalf of 6,600 Prince Edward Islanders who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to formulate and legislate a law to protect life from conception, a law which seeks to save the life of both mother and child.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured once again to rise in the House and present several petitions on behalf of the constituents of the riding of Kent.

Pursuant to Standing Order 36, the attached petitions are certified correct in form and content. The petition is with regard to Via Rail and the petitioners are asking the government to please rescind its bill and continue with the rail service.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I also have petitions regarding the GST, requesting that the government not go forward with this tax.

FORESTRY

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition, duly certified under Standing Order 36, from several hundred of my constituents. Those constituents recognize the value of the provincial–federal resource development agreement which has created jobs and replenished our forests in British Columbia. The undersigned encourage the Parliament of Canada to renew this important agreement with British Columbia and thereby provide for a renewed commitment to restocking our forest land, advancing forestry research, promoting silviculture and assisting the forest industry in developing new products and markets that will provide forestry jobs for the future.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting a petition, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 36, on the subject of cutbacks at VIA Rail, signed by Canadians who strenuously object to cutbacks without prior consultation on the consequences.

[English]

DRIFT-NET FISHING

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition, duly certified pursuant to Standing Order 36, signed by 2,500 people on the issue of drift-net fishing.

The petitioners call on the government to stop the use of pelagic drift-nets in the north Pacific Ocean. The petitioners urge the government to move this item high on its agenda. It is a matter of great concern to people in my constituency and across Canada and we ask the government to act now.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of Canadians, calling upon the government to withdraw the goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from people right across western Canada who are members of Transport 2000 and Rural Dignity of Canada, who are petitioning the Parliament of Canada to maintain VIA Rail, Canada's present national network, upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment, to pass a passenger train act giving VIA Rail a firm legislative mandate and, finally, to revise the costing arrangement with the railway companies.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions. One of them is from a number people resident in Windsor, Ontario. They are concerned with danger to Canada's rail transportation and the government's stated intention. They pray and call upon Parliament to maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail services in those areas of the country where they can provide a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient, environmentally sound and energy efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHT TRAINING

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a number of residents of Toronto, Pickering, Scarborough, West Hill concerned with the government's mishandling of the land that the Inuit live in in eastern Quebec and Labrador. They join with the Assembly of First Nations and the Inuit of Labrador and other aboriginal peoples of northern Canada in calling on the government to oppose use of those lands for NATO-NORAD attack training, to end all NATO-NORAD low-level flight training in Canada, to oppose establishment of NATO operations such as the proposed tactical fighter weapons training centre at Goose Bay, and to redirect Canada's NATO-NORAD funding towardss enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihood, and promoting sustainable development for all Canadaians.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, my honour and duty on behalf of the citizens of the town of Asquith which happens to be in the constituency of the Minister of National Defence who point out that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system that is presently in place, rather, it is increasing the unfairness of the system. They call upon the government to reject the current proposal for the goods and services tax and deal with taxation to make taxation of ordinary Canadians more fair than it is today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: By consent, the Member for Miramichi.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I have other petitions to present as well. I have three of them here and they are all from Canadians protesting the unfairness of the goods and services tax. I ask that these petitions be received by the House.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of the electors of Kingston and the Islands, many of whom have signed this petition objecting to the government's introduction of a goods and services tax which they claim is unfair and inequitable and wrong. They call on Parliament to reject the tax.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I present a petition duly certified on behalf of the constituents of the Western Arctic who fear the imposition of the 9 per cent goods and services tax.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present in the House today four petitions from residents of Scarborough, Metropolitan Toronto and vicinity. The petitions have been certified as correct. The petitioners call upon the government to withdraw the proposed goods and services tax for the reasons, among others, that the tax will cause higher inflation, higher interest rates and generally higher taxes.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, question No. 132 will be answered today.

TRAINING SESSIONS FOR ADJUDICATORS

Question No. 132—Mr. Heap:

1. Do Refugee Board members and adjudicators work together on the first level hearing and, if so, were training sessions offered separately for members and adjudicators?

2. Within the Immigration Department (a) what person or persons conducted the training sessions for the adjudicators (b) what procedures were used to conduct these training sessions (c) what person or persons are responsible for updating adjudicators on changing world conditions as they affect refugee claimants at the first stage of the process?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): 1. The adjudicator and the Refugee Board member share, equally, responsibility for determining a person's eligibility to claim refugee status in Canada and for deciding whether there is a credible basis for the claim. As the presiding officer, the adjudicator may, from time to time, consult with the Refugee Board member on matters of a procedural nature, which have a direct bearing on the initial hearing into the refugee claim. Aside from the initial hearing into the eligibility and credible basis of a refugee claim, the adjudicator has sole jurisdiction over the conduct of immigration inquiries and the resultant decisions.

In preparation for the implementation of the new refugee determination system, intensive training sessions were held for adjudicators and Refugee Board members. While these training sessions were held independently of each other, many of the resource persons who participated addressed both groups.

2.(a) Training sessions for adjudicators were designed and delivered by a team of Immigration Adjudication Branch staff, made up of the Acting Senior Analysis and Procedures Officer of Adjudication Headquarters, two Section Heads; one from the Quebec/Atlantic Division and one from the Pacific/Western Division and several adjudicators from the Toronto, Mississauga and Mirabel offices.

(b) Various techniques were employed in the delivery of training for adjudicators. These included lectures and presentations by resource persons and guest speakers representing various government and non-government agencies. The Legal Officer of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) addressed adjudicators on the definition of a Convention Refugee. They also received a presentation and attended workshops in a session on "The Refugee Experience" given by a Resettlement Counsellor from the UNHCR. A number of presentaions were also given by representatives of the Immigraiton and Refugee board (including the Chairman), the Department of Justice and by various experts and executive heads from within Employment and Immigration Canada itself. Mock hearings were conducted and audio-visual presentations were also made.

(c) The Immigration Adjudication Branch provides adjudicators with ongoing training, including a national training program provided on an annual basis, divisional training on an annual basis, monthly section meetings and any other training deemed appropriate. Adjudication libraries in every office contain an up-to-date index of inquiry and refugee-related jurisprudence and other documentation and material relative to the function of the adjudicator. The Immigration and Refugee Board also provides the Adjudication Branch with copies of papers profiling the current conditions in contries known to be sources of refugee claimants. These papers are distributed to all Adjudication offices across Canada.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-29, an act to establish the Department of Forestry, to amend the Forestry Development and Research Act and to make related amendments to other acts, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and Motions nos. 1,2,3 and 5 standing in the name of the Minister of State for Forestry.

• (1220)

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in rising to speak on this bill. My riding of Surrey North is one of the ridings in British Columbia that was founded on the forestry industry. On the north it borders on the Fraser River which has been the highway for the processing of lumber and plywood since the turn of the century. The foreshores of the riding are still the main booming grounds along the Fraser River.

In addition, we have a number of very large mills in the north part of the riding on the Fraser River. These have changed over the years. Initially they were big lumber mills and now they are mainly shake and cedar mills.

The population of my riding Surrey North, of course, is basically a working riding. We have a large population who live in the riding and work in the lumber industry, particularly in the lumber milling and in the plywood. Therefore, the economic health of the riding is very much dependent on the continued success of our forest industry and our lumber industry.

I want to go back and look at the record of the last two governments as it relates to the development of forestry in British Columbia and in all of Canada. In the 1984 election campaign, the Conservatives said that they would bring in legislation to create a ministry of forestry. It has taken them five years to act.

I think that is indicative of the government's understanding of the vital role of forestry in this country, that it is not profound because if it really looked at the economic value that the forestry plays in this country—in fact, it is one of the mainstream industries that keep this country viable—it would have acted on its promise immediately.

There seems to be a lot more rhetoric on that side than there is action. The government talks about trying to look at sustainable development, but even as late as this summer, 55 per cent of Canadians did not believe the government was doing an adequate job when it came to environmental protection and sustainable development.

I think the record of the Conservatives in the forest industry has not been very good, but it probably is one step better than that of the Liberals. The Liberals were even much more blunt about it as their leader said in 1984, while he was in Prince George, which is one of the heartlands of the forestry industry in British Columbia, that they were against a full department of forestry.

The decline in the forest industry over the last number of years is a reflection of the lack of inaction by the two previous governments. I think we have to consider what the forestry industry in fact means to the Canadian economy.

In 1986 the forest products exports were $17.9 billion. Lumber exports were $4.1 billion. Paper and paperboards were $7.5 billion. Other forest products were an additional $1.4 billion. In 1987 the total exports were over $20 billion. This compares with farm products of $1.4 billion, fisheries of $2 billion, energy exports of gas, $5.5 billion, and metals of $6.2 billion. The percentage of export industry that is dependent on forest products is very high.

Fifteen per cent of all of our export trade merchandise in Canada is dependent upon the forest industry.

Canada supplies 23 per cent of the world's exports of pulp and paper and 23 per cent of the world's manufactured goods. When we are talking about our export market, we should realize we have let a lot of opportunities slip away on us because we have not developed the technologies and the industry around secondary manufacturing. The number of jobs that we sustain in Canada per unit of forest product harvested is not anywhere near what it is in many of other countries. I will talk about that again later.

In addition to the economic value forests have in this country, they of course are a very, very significant part of our ecology. They are the backbone that regulate and moderate temperature. They stop the erosion of soils. They are the habitat for our wildlife. They are part of our world-wide reputation for beauty and nature. Without them, of course, Canada would not only lose a tremendous amount of its economic wealth because of the export of lumber products, it would also lose a tremendous amount of its tourist trade which is dependent upon people coming to this country to see the exceptional beauty of our forests.

One of the things that disturbs me is that the funding for sustaining forestry has been eroding. This year $28 million less has been allocated than in the previous fiscal year. The Conservatives, while they are bringing in a ministry of forestry, are diversifying and confusing the funding for forestry. Instead of having the funding for forestry under the control of a minister of forestry, it is being chopped up all over the place. Some of it is going to the Western Diversification Fund, which means that the minister of forestry will have to go to another cabinet minister to get funds to provide the moneys that are necessary for reforestation. Furthermore, the number of reforestation projects that the provinces can undertake will be diminished.

British Columbia wants $300 million but the funds are not adequate and are not being granted under the Western Diversification Fund. The same thing is happening in the Atlantic region where instead of having it under the ministry of forestry, it is in fact being put under the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

Sometimes you begin to wonder if there is a real commitment to forestry to sustain development or whether the government is trying to play political and public relations games using titles like the Western Diversification Fund and the Atlantic Opportunities Agency.

I want to talk briefly about Clause 7(c) which is dealt with in this group of motions, enhancing public awareness of social, economic, environmental benefits derived from Canada's forests. I think we are all believe that this is mandatory. We are concerned that it not become propaganda for the Tory cabinet ministers, but that the government will develop unique programs that are community-based, which will enhance the understanding of the total community, so that we can have the type of forestry programs that are necessary for economic development and for the ecology.

• (1230)

In order to improve on that section, I would like to make an amendment to Clause 7(C). I move:

> That Motion No. 5 be amended by adding following the word "forests" the words specifically concerning the value of sustainable development.

That clause would then read:

> "(c) enhance public awareness of the social, economic and environmental benefits derived from Canada's forests specifically concerning the value of sustainable development.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

The hon. member for Comox—Alberni on debate.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I just want to deal briefly with the amendment. I am a little bit concerned that when the definition of sustainability appears in this act that it talks in general terms about how development today will preserve our options for the future. That statement with reference to this particular section of the act is far too general.

It is easy to sustain trees. As some foresters tell us, it is like planting a vegetable garden. You can plant the trees, fertilize the trees, cultivate the trees, space and thin the trees and in 70 years you are able to cut down the trees and start the process all over again.

That is what some people conceive as sustainable development in the forest industry. However, it sounds more like the practice of sustained yield that forest companies, foresters and people involved in the industry have talked about in the past. There is quite a difference between the principle of sustained yield, which we support here as well, and the principle of sustainable forestry. A forest is quite different from a collection of trees. A forest itself is a complex, living organism that is made up of trees, under-storey vegetation, insects and all sorts of animal life; its wildlife habitat, hydrologic resources, streams, waterflow, groundwater and microclimates and humidity. All of those things go to make up the forest as a complex organism itself which is quite a bit greater than the sum of its parts.

We are concerned that in the minister taking advantage of his powers under this section of the act that he is going to be talking strictly about the economic benefits of the forest industry and perhaps joining with some of the advertising programs that have been mounted by the forest companies, such as the "Forest Forever" type of programs which do not educate the public as to the problems that we have in preserving and sustaining our forests. My concern is that the minister be specifically empowered under this section of the legislation to talk about the specific concern of sustainability of our forests.

A few months ago the Brundtland report came down. Madam Brundtland and her committee suggested that something in the neighbourhood of 12 per cent of representative ecosystems be set aside in each country in the world in order to preserve a genetic pool that would be available in the event that we mismanaged our forests completely or we made errors in the way we managed forests. That has taken place in the past and continues to take place. The reason for Madam Brundtland's suggestion was that those areas of old growth forests be allowed to remain in order to repopulate the areas in which we made mistakes.

That is what I see as managing the forests in a sustainable way. It is quite different from managing trees according to the principle of sustained yield or sustained output. That is quite a different principle. We would like to make sure in this clause that the minister recognizes that as his responsibility from the point of view of sustained yield, because we would all like to see our forest economy continue, and grow and thrive. We would also like to see our employment in the forest industry continue to grow and thrive.

I would like to see communities like mine, Port Alberni, Courtenay and Parksville on Vancouver Island, many of which are forestry based communities, or where people who work in the forest industry live and send their kids to school, continue to grow and thrive. They will do that if we manage our trees on a sustained yield basis.

Managing our forests is quite a different thing. It is absolutely obligatory on the part of this government and this minister in particular and the new ministry of which he will be in charge once this legislation is passed to also talk to the people of Canada and to emphasize to the provinces and to the people across this country the need to manage our forests, that complex organism I talked about before that is made up of trees, animals, hydrologic systems, climatic systems, wildlife habitat, and all of those things that are more than the sum of its parts. The minister has to talk about those as well and has to promote the continuation of those.

There is a problem in the management of our forest lands in this country today. As my colleague from Burnaby—Kingsway pointed out, there appears to be an inadequate process of environmental impact and assessment of forestry operations. There appears to be an inadequate public involvement process. As a result, the public does not feel that they as communities are adequately involved in forest land use decision-making. Other groups with equally important interests in forest management, those who manage wildlife, those who are involved in the tourist industry, those who have an interest in the forests as well, are not represented. As my colleague pointed out, the result of this has been land use conflicts all across Canada that have grown to be very, very bitter conflicts.

He pointed out one that took place in Clayoquot Sound where it resolved down to the union having to go out and sue in small claims court to recover wages lost from environmentalists who, with the best of intentions, were using civil disobedience to block roads in order to prevent road building taking place which they felt was a threat to the forests in Clayoquot Sound on the west coast of my riding.

I do not question the intentions of either side. The problem was that there was no legitimate public involvement process in land use decision making. There was no legitimate environmental impact or social impact process which would have protected and optimized jobs in the forest industry, jobs in the tourist industry and other interests in forest land use.

In the absence of that process, what could those people do? They felt compelled, desperate and they went in and blocked roads. As a result, they ended up being forced to pay the wages of the loggers who had lost their jobs. I might add, the loggers were equally desperate, their jobs were being threatened by that action. It is hard to blame either the loggers or the environmentalists.

What is to blame in this situation is the fact that this government has not demanded environmental impact assessment procedures from provincial governments even though federal resources are affected.

The other issue involves the native interests in our forest lands. We see the same kind of conflicts taking place in Quebec. For example, the Barrier Lake Algonquins were attacked by the Quebec riot police, with helicopters overhead. It was almost reminiscent of the situation in Afghanistan a few years ago. Those police, working on behalf and representing the interests of the government and the forest companies, refused any consultation with the Barrier Lake Algonquins. When they expressed their opposition in the only way that remained open to them through civil disobedience, the riot police were brought in. Their Chief was thrown in jail.

Today, as far as I am aware, absolutely no negotiation is taking place. In that case, the lands that are about to be logged are in a wilderness area, an area that was set aside to protect certain species of wildlife on behalf of both the native Indians of the area and the people of Quebec. Those things have been ignored by the Government of Quebec, and as a result native Indians have been thrown in jail. Those kind of conflicts are taking place all across this country.

Let us hope that government members will have had an opportunity to review the amendment, to give it some consideration and respond affirmatively to it because this amendment asks that the minister not only consider promoting the economic and the social benefits of our forests and the forest industry but also considers sustaining the forest environment in our country which is quite a different thing from sustaining trees.

It is a good amendment. I am very pleased that my colleague moved it and I hope that the House will rise and support it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has received the amendment from the Member for Surrey North and neglected to propose it to the House at that time. I will do so now. Mr. Karpoff moved:

That Motion No. 5 be amended by adding the following word: "forest". The words specifically concerning the value of sustainable development.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair does find the amendment to be in order. At the same time, I was asked by the Member for Victoria to review my ruling concerning motions at the report stage on Bill C-29.

After careful consideration and listening to the convincing arguments for the Member for Victoria the Chair will allow Motion No. 8 to be debated and to be voted on separately.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to speak on this bill for the protection of our forests and, particularly, on this amendment, the first part of which originally came from the government to enhance public awareness of the social, economic and environmental benefits derived from Canada's forests, and now with the addition made by my colleague, the specific direction of concern for sustainable development.

This has been a concern of Canadians for a great many years and not only for those who live in the ridings where there are great forests or where people depend on the forests for their livelihood, although that is obviously a very, very major concern for those ridings and for that reason a major concern for all Canada because it is such an important part of our economy.

However, this has been a concern from the very beginning of Canada. In fact, one of the first persons to warn about the possible loss of our forests before Canada was even extended to its present sea to sea extent was Sir John A. Macdonald who said on June 22, 1871: "The sight of immense masses of timber passing my window every morning—", I suppose he was referring to the timber going down the Ottawa River "—constantly suggests to my mind the absolute necessity there is for looking into the future of this great trade. We are recklessly destroying the timber of Canada and there is scarcely the possibility of replacing it."

That was said 128 years ago by the first Prime Minister of this country. His warning does not seem to have been taken very seriously.

We are rapidly losing our forests as are many other countries in the world. We have been warned now that our forests are not just necessary to the economy, not just necessary for those who like hunting and fishing and camping or canoeing, but they are necessary for air.

We are warned about the dramatic losses of forest in places like the Amazon Valley, Indonesia and other areas not quite so dramatic, such as southern Chile where the Fascist government has sold off forest and mining rights so that the hills are absolutely denuded by strip mining and clear cutting.

We also find that the Soviet Union has now recognized that its forests are not unlimited and it is beginning to take thought for the preservation of them.

But in Canada it seems that in spite of Sir John A. Macdonald and others our forest industries are mainly allowed to be cut without adequate replacement and the government's replacement programs are not adequate.

In the riding I represent, the riding of Trinity—Spadina in Toronto, we do not have forests, certainly not forests for harvesting. We do have many trees and for that we have to thank homeowners of years ago and in our own time who planted trees on their private properties and the parks department that has a policy of trying to replace every tree with two trees. When one tree has to be cut down, the Toronto parks department in the city of Toronto attempts to plant two. That is good, but it is not nearly enough.

Just as one way of measuring it, it takes, so I understand, several healthy sized maple trees to replace in the air the oxygen consumed by one family automobile driven about 20,000 miles in a year. Now the exact figures can be refined one way or another but, in fact, since we have a little more than one automobile per person in the city of Toronto, I believe we do not have enough trees to keep replacing the oxygen used by our automobiles. We depend on the rest of the country to supplement our oxygen. We depend on the forests of Canada to keep Toronto breathing.

As I said, we do not have forests in Toronto and we do not have many people directly dependent on the forest industry for a pay cheque. But my understanding is that every man, every woman and every child in Toronto from the moment of birth, wants to breathe and they want to breathe good air. It is becoming a problem in Toronto partly because of pollution from too many automobiles and partly because of so many heating plants. In most people's experience, the general temperature of Toronto has risen in recent years. There are just so many warm buildings in downtown Toronto.

Some people think we have too many people in Toronto. Some of the people came to Toronto because the trees in their neighbourhoods were all cut down. I lived from 1951 to 1954 in the Gatineau Valley where I was in charge of an Anglican parish. There practically all the white pine had been cut a generation or two before and people were then cutting the second and third growth for pulpwood. It is very difficult to keep the tree growth in balance with the pulpwood growth. When a tree gets to be four inches it is a salable pulpwood log.

Many of the people from the Gatineau Valley left the Gatineau, whether it was to go to Montreal or to Rouyn–Noranda or to Toronto because the saw logs, the lumber logs, were practically all gone and they could not all live off pulpwood cutting or such other small industries as there were in the valley.

So these people came to Toronto looking for work and they all expected to breathe. They have a right to breathe, and they have a right to work as well. But if we are going to destroy the forest they will not work and if we destroy enough of the forests they and we will not breathe.

It has come to the point where the scientists are warning us that we simply cannot continue to survive if we continue to destroy our forests.

• (1250)

This is the most serious concern I have and therefore I am very pleased that the governmebnt has undertaken to do some enhancing of the public's understanding of this matter. I hope that solid educational material will be put forward and not glossy brochures bragging about how much the government has done.

It can put forward information, for example, on more specific matters. For example, 62 per cent of the sugar maples in Quebec have been damaged by acid rain. At current rates the Canadian maple syrup industry will be dead within a decade. Some of us enjoy maple syrup, Mr. Speaker. No doubt we can live without it and possibly we would be even more healthy without various forms of sugar. But it is a $40 million a year industry. What are those people going to do when the sugar maple trees are gone?

It was reported this spring in British Columbia that cedar, arbutus and Douglas fir trees in some areas were showing signs of damage due to acid precipitation. This morning the Minister of the Environment seemed to say that acid rain was not a problem on the west coast. I am not sure I caught his exact wording but if he does think it is not a problem, perhaps he should talk to some of the people in British Columbia who are concerned about the Douglas fir and these other trees.

I want now to take up a very important related matter which I hope the government will include when it is doing its enhancement program and when it is advertising the need for sustainable development. The forest and the so–called rural areas of Canada in many places are bound up with the sustainable development of our First Nations. In many parts of Canada the forest is an industry that has been operating for, I suppose, 11,000 years by the people who have lived there without destroying it. They gathered what there was from the trees or the rivers or by hunting wild game or sometimes doing agriculture in small clearings.

However, they did not destroy the forests. The forests were there for thousands of years until we Europeans came. I believe one of the ways of preserving the forests so that we in Ottawa, or Toronto or in the other cities in Canada can breathe—I hope the government will take this up seriously—is to grant the land rights that Canada's First Nations are still demanding and of which they have never been lawfully deprived.

In eastern Quebec, for example, the Innu or Montagnais people living around La Romaine are being harassed by the overflights by NATO. These overflights are bombing training for destroying the Soviet Union. In order to practise flying low under the radar they are destroying the way of life of about 9,000 or 10,000 Innu people in the land the Innu people call Ntasinan and that we call eastern Quebec and Labrador.

They are not only driving the Innu people out of their homeland, they are damaging the soil and the water with fuel pollution. They are damaging the trees, they are using parts of it as a bombing range, sometimes using dummy bombs, but soon if NATO goes in there they will be using live bombs. They are damaging the forests, disturbing the wildlife, polluting the rivers and turning it into a battle zone. This is the most extreme case in Canada. The government should be stopping this so as to protect Canada's forests in that area and the other areas.

There are Indian land rights which the Canadian Council of Churches are helping them to defend all across the northern parts of Canada. If this government is serious in the educating the Canadian public to the need for our forests in many different ways, they will include the need to protect Canada's First Nations in their responsible use of our forests.

There has not been very much education by this government or by any previous government on this matter of the land. Somehow or other the words of our first Prime Minister seem to be buried wherever he wrote them.

This amendment of the government to "enhance public awareness of the social, economic and environmental benefits derived from Canada's forests" with the subamendment to include "sustainable economic development" is certainly a very necessary thing to do. It is much more important than spending $40 million trying to sell the trade deal with the United States or however many millions of dollars the government is still planning to spend selling the goods and services tax. It would be far more useful to acquaint Canadians in our cities and in our rural areas with the fact that we absolutely need our forests. Those who never want to walk in a forest or paddle a canoe down a river in our forest areas need our forests because our cities will not survive without the oxygen produced by them and the other forests of the world.

This part of the bill I think is very commendable and I hope both the amendment and the subamendment will receive the support of this House.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few comments about Motion No. 6 which is before the House, and the proposal that the bill should include in the minister's responsibilities the power to enhance public awareness of the social, economic and environmental benefits derived from Canada's forests and specifically, according to the subamendment, to provide sustainable development.

I rise as a member from Saskatchewan, an area where I think it is generally not perceived in the rest of Canada as being a forested region. Yet the House should know that that riding of Mackenzie was virtually all forest originally and the forestry industry is still a very big part of the economic activity that goes on there.

As you may know, Mr. Speaker, Saskatchewan is not all prairie. Only about a quarter of the total area is prairie and the rest is a mixture of open land and parkland. After that the topography is solid forest until you get into the Canadian shield. So for northeastern Saskatchewan, which is the area I represent, the farmers who are still there, though they are becoming fewer in number, arrived faced with the prospect of good timber and turning that timber into lumber for shipment out of the region for use in building towns and villages and farm buildings. This was very much a part of the early life of that particular part of the country.

All of us who still live there have parents or grandparents who were involved in the forest industry, particularly in the winter time. There are still two very large plants in the town of Hudson Bay which rely quite heavily on the forest industry, with a plywood plant and a stud mill that are both still operating at this time.

The reason that I wish to speak on this subamendment which refers to the need for sustainable development is just that. In this town with two large mills employing just over 1,000 people directly and indirectly, we have been told that the stud mill will have to close in June next year because the forests are being depleted of large enough timber within a transportable area. That, combined with the agreement to impose an export tax on the product from that mill, as part of the negotiations that led up to the trade agreement, leaves us in the forestry business worse off than we were before. We had free trade in forestry products before the negotiations began. After the negotiations we had a tax on our own products before we could export them. As a result, the decision has been made that the mill will be closed and many of the people employed in that particular corner of the province will be looking for other ways of making a living.

We do have some other options. The stud mill was basically using spruce and pine. There are great stands of poplar which do not have much use, other than to produce local timber. Local people understand the value of poplar wood, but we have not convinced other users of the benefit of it. There have been numerous studies and projects launched to decide what to do with all this poplar. There is now a proposal going through the region, the location of which, by rumour, will be in either Nipawin or Hudson Bay, to utilize some of that standing poplar and aspen by applying a new technology to transform it into pulp and paper.

If it comes to pass, it will provide some of the employment that will be lost by the closure of this stud mill, thanks in part to the decision in the negotiations leading up to the trade agreement. Perhaps the region may be able to save some of its jobs and find another way of utilizing some of the trees that are in that substantially forested area. The total forest is shrinking somewhat because of incursions of farmland, but the area that has been designated to be forest is still there. It needs perhaps better management so that we do not have the boom and bust kind of harvesting, where a large logging and timber milling company will move in to utilize the resource, then disappear for the next 30 or 40 years. That has too often been the case in that region.

I think it is important that the new department of forestry take cognizance of the need for sustainable development, as the amendment that is before the House now suggests. As well, I believe that the new department, as a federal department, should use its powers to enhance public awareness of the social, economic and environmental benefits to be derived from Canada's forests. I am not completely convinced that this new department will have very much power to do that. When I look at the powers that exist in the bill, as I read it, the new department will simply take over everything that fell through the cracks from existing agencies, boards and departments within the federal government.

We are all aware that most of the big economic decisions with regard to forestry tend to be made at the provincial level because the provinces have the jurisdiction over the production and harvesting of those forests within their own boundaries. Federal jurisdiction only applies when those products leave the provincial boundary. I suppose the main initiative for developing and establishing a department of forestry was probably pushed along most rapidly by the decision of the government in the last Parliament to establish the export tax on forest and lumber materials as they leave the country.

I think the industry had great difficulty finding a focus for their complaints to the government. Their thinking seems to have been that if there was a department of forestry, they would at least have had some place to focus their discontent. They were not happy with the results they obtained by dealing with the Ministers of the Environment, Agriculture, Trade and Commerce and any others who had a peripheral interest in the trade issue having to do with forestry and lumber products. So there was pressure to have a ministry of forestry and the Prime Minister was willing to expand his cabinet yet again.

The benefits that can accrue from this amendment are that the general public and presumably the provincial governments and the industry itself will be made aware of the benefits to be gained from participating in sustainable development. They will co-operate and provide the kind of regulation and management of our forests that will in fact have that result.

The resource that they are working with is extremely important to this country. Some of my colleagues have pointed out the importance of forestry and forests to the ecology and the environment of this country. As they have pointed out, more than half the total land area of Canada is covered in forests. In the 10 provinces alone, almost 80 per cent of the area is forested, approximately four times the acreage that is used in agricultural land. As we drive through or fly over the country we cannot help but notice how large the harvesting process is. As we fly over British Columbia or northern Ontario, even parts of Saskatchewan, we see huge areas that have been laid waste as a result of the clear-cutting system we have in place. We can observe big bare spots on the landscape from one to five miles in the air.

Canadians have to be made aware of what that does when we clear huge areas like that. What happens to the local residents of small towns in the area when the resource that they are relying on for jobs is depleted? It is very difficult to continue strong economic and social units in those towns, to raise families, to establish churches and businesses, when the harvesting is done in such a way that forests are depleted and jobs are no longer sustainable.

I urge the House to support this subamendment and enhance the ability of the government to make people aware of how harmful that kind of development can be and how there are other options that we can adopt.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise to support the amendment put forward by my colleague which adds to the motion of the minister to enhance public awareness of the social, economic and environmental benefits derived from Canadian forests, the further requirement or onus upon the new ministry to enhance public awareness of the principles of sustainable development regarding our forest resources.

I am also very pleased to do this within the context of the bill as a whole, which sets up for the first time, I believe, in Canada, a full minister and department of forests.

• (1310)

Before I get into the substance of my remarks, I would like again to congratulate the minister. I know he has had this goal for some time. It has been a long gestation period. We are finally getting there and what we are trying to do by working together, and I believe I speak for all parties in this regard, is to try at this time to set up a full ministry of forestry to ensure that it has the strongest mandate possible in order to preserve and enhance an industry that has both historically and in terms of its economic contribution done more for Canada and Canadians than probably any other industry.

I am also very pleased to be addressing this particular amendment at this time because just last weekend in the city of Nelson, which is my home town, and one of the centres of my constituency of Kootenay West—Revelstoke, there was a conference called "Getting High on Nature". I think it will turn out to have played a very important part in increasing exactly this public awareness not only of the principles of sustainable development, but also the other mandates that are listed as being important functions of this ministry and department.

The conference "Getting High on Nature" was actually hosted by School District No. 7 which encompasses the city of Nelson and surrounding area. It was the brainchild of a Mr. Bob Harrigan who is a well known communicator, particularly in western Canada, on subjects related to the environment and more recently coupled with the phrase "sustainable development".

This conference included about 120 high school students and some 300 educators, both educational administrators and public school teachers from elementary and high schools throughout British Columbia and other provinces in western Canada. The key participants from across the country, some of them of international renown, dealt with a number of areas of environmental concern. I was able to be present at some of the ceremonial aspects of the conference between other responsibilities in the constituency and noted that regardless of which workshop—at least 20 or 30 workshops at which the educators and the students were working together to get a better grasp of the complexities of all of these issues—whether they were talking about soil, water or air, or any subject related to the environment, forestry always played a role.

There were, of course, particular workshops and a number of keynote speaks who dealt primarily with the principles of sustainable development and with the intricacies of the forest industry and its particular problems, but regardless of the single topic, forestry always played a part.

The minister will know, and anyone acquainted with the forest industry will know, that if you are talking about soil quality, a great deal of attention must be paid to the impact of the forest cover on the build-up and maintenance of those soils.

When it comes to matters of irrigation and water tables, the preservation of a balanced forest is vital to that substance upon which our society depends for its very day-to-day existence. Of course in recent years, anyone with eyes to see and the ears to hear could not ignore the terrific impact that forest cover both in Canada and internationally plays upon the atmospheric environment, particularly in light of recent debates on the greenhouse effect and the dangers of global warming.

Of course many of the other discussions that took place at that conference dealt with the ongoing debate which is taking place between the various users of the forestry resource, whether they be loggers, fallers, sawmill workers, people in the plywood industry, hunters, naturalists, water users and other soil users. Everyone has a vested interest. The growing recognition by conferences such as the one held by Nelson last weekend or in the media generally in recent months, is that the principle of sustainable development means that those resources that we have always held to be renewable must in fact be made renewable. It is vitally important if we are to be able to derive a good living both individually and as a nation from that resource, or to be able to enjoy the recreational time that gives this nation and its people much of their own particular spirit.

Another event that happened within my own constituency recently I think also shows the importance of the coupling of environmental awareness and the economic importance of the forestry resource. The company which operates the pulp operation in Castlegar is now in partnership between certain Canadian economic interests and the Chinese government. The pulp mill in Castlegar recently announced a $630 million expansion program. It was interesting to note that in their public information release they suggested that one of the major reasons for that major investment at this time was the stricter and proper environmental standards that have now been imposed on the industry.

I particularly noted at the time that this release was giving strong credence to what many people have been saying for years, that a new awareness and concentration on protecting the environment in fact can create jobs. Here you have $630 million being invested, a doubling of production in an area of the province of British Columbia which has the highest proportion of decadent wood of any other part of the province, causing the doubling of pulp capacity in an area in which that wood supply had to be utilized in order to make room for new forest regeneration. We were very happy not only because of the jobs that were being created but because the expansion of that operation allowed us to utilize our resource in a much better way, and, as it turns out, in a much more environmentally sensitive way at the same time.

I was also happy because it allowed me to use that as an example. All of us who are concerned with the economic well-being of those communities and the people dependent on this industry, and I have been one of them for the majority of my working life, can use it to show that we can have a resource that provides jobs, that provides strengthened communities and looks after our environment at the same time, as long as we do it intelligently and with a view to the needs of the future.

I have been involved over many, many years in a number of attempts through public meetings, the use of theatre music, to try to bring groups together, be they be environmentalists or loggers. We have attempted to bring them together in forums in which they can begin to meet on some common ground, and it is not always easy. Any other members who happen to come from constituencies that comprise strong representation both of woodworkers and those with a very strong feeling for the natural aspects of our environment, will realize that being a politician for those kinds of areas is not always the easiest thing to do. You are trying constantly to get them to find common ground, to continue to talk with each other in a reasonable manner and to respect each other's roles. But it can be done. Take, for example, two of my best friends, both who come from my own area. One is Jack Munro, president of IWA Canada. The other is Colleen McCrory, who is president of the Valhalla Wilderness Society and one of the chief, so-called, "hired guns" of the environmental movement in Canada. Many ministers here shudder when they hear her name because she seems to be able to get appointments and get things done in half an hour that other people would take months to do.

• (1320)

If those two people and the people who work with them can agree with each other on the needs and principles of sustainable development, working together to build a healthy forest industry and a healthy Canada for the future, then it is possible. I hope that the minister will accept this amendment and we can proceed together to build a stronger industry, a stronger Canada and a healthy environment.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, support of the sub-amendment which specifically supports the principle of sustainable development in relation to the forestry industry of this country.

I will begin first of all by saying one never knows how much one appreciates anything until one has lost it. You would understand that if you came from the Nickel Belt. Unfortunately, I never did have an opportunity to appreciate the luxurious growth which did exist in the Sudbury Basin before the Chicago fire and before the development of smelting nickel. The folks who had lived there for a long time told me of the lush growth on the hills, the streams which ran through the hills, valleys, the streams filled with trout. One old gentleman told me that when he was a boy he would go with his father and fish for trout to bring home for supper, and he had just gone about a mile from where he lived in the small community of Coniston.

If you have been to the Sudbury Basin in the last 15 years, Mr. Speaker, you will know what I mean because we have lost our forests. We lost them because we were greedy—I am talking about the species—and cut down the trees. Everybody attributes that to the Chicago fire because the wood from the trees cut in the Sudbury Basin really went to rebuild Chicago after the Chicago fire. Then along came the smelting of nickel which was done on roaster beds. They would cut the logs down and pile them all up into a huge beds, then they would put eaves on the ends of these piles and then light a fire. The ore would smelt and the nickel would run off into the eaves and be collected.

As a result of that, the SO_2 finished off what little growth there was close to the ground. Once the growth was gone the wind removed the soil from the hills so that all we had was simply hills of bedrock.

We miss those forests. I think it really does detract from the quality of life. I know when people talk about the quality of life today we talk about food, the clothing we wear, the kind of houses we live in and the kind of cars we drive. But I think quality of life also speaks to the question of the environment as well because I think there is something very soothing about the forests. It certainly keeps man closer in touch with nature. So, we are attempting now to rebuild the forests. When I began my speech I said that in fact we do not know what it is like. We do not know what we have lost until we have actually lost it. We do not have it, and we want to rebuild it.

Today Canadians, as a nation, are much more aware of the importance of the forests in our country. I get letters from student groups in high schools who are pleading for me to intervene with the ambassador from Brazil, to write letters imploring him to cease the development in the Amazon Basin so that we can maintain the tropical rain forests. There is a heightened consciousness of the need to protect the forests, not only in the world but also in Canada. It is important to know in Canada, in particular, the importance of forestry to our country. Half of the total land area of Canada, 79 per cent of the area within the 10 provinces, is forested. Sixty percent of forest land is productive. Production of forest products in 1987 accounted for $38 billion. Only the food and beverage industry exceeded the forest industry's contribution to manufacturing in Canada.

In 1986 forest product exports were $17.9 billion; lumber exports were $4.1 billion; paper and paperboard, $7.5 billion; and other forest products accounted for $1.4 billion. In 1987 exports were up to $20.9 billion.

They provided Canada with a net balance of trade of $18.3 billion in 1987. Farm products in comparison accounted for $1.4 billion; fishery products, $2 billion; energy products including petroleum, natural gas, and electricity, $5.5 billion; metal ores and non-ferrous metals, $6.2 billion.

The forest product industries in this country account for 15 per cent of Canada's total merchandise trade. Canada supplies 23 per cent of the world's exports of pulp and paper, and 23 per cent of total exports of manufactured forest products. There are 840,000 persons employed directly or indirectly in the forestry industry, representing 7.4 per cent of all working Canadians. The forestry industry provides the economic base for more than 300 single-industry communities across Canada.

Apart from that economic contribution, I think it is important to recognize that forests have a direct impact on the weather, something I think we have ignored in the past. The forests regulate the stream flow. I mentioned what happened in our area. Once the forest disappeared, the streams disappeared. Forests minimize soil erosion. I described what happened in our own area. It protects fish and wildlife habitat, and, of course, improves air quality.

Rain forests, together with oceanic plankton, account for 90 per cent of the world's photosynthetic oxygen. Yet I am absolutely amazed of how we waste our forests. Foresters who work in the bush in northern Ontario tell me I would be amazed at the waste in the bush, the slashing of trees and logs left that could not be hauled out.

You can go through parks just north of my riding where there was inappropriate husbandry of the forest. It was slash and run. There was no reforestation. Provincial governments entered into cosy deals with forestry companies. That was the whole reason for the countervail by the Americans on softwood lumber. The stumpage fees were not high enough, they charged. It was notorious in the province of Ontario that the stumpage fees charged were not sufficient to reforest what was being cut by the private sector. There was absolutely no consideration of the harm being done to the environment.

I want to say to the minister that I am personally pleased that we are finally going to have a department of forestry, promised in 1984, delivered in 1989. The Liberals would not touch it, of course. After 20 years of Liberal rule, the Liberal governments did not even recognize the importance of having a ministry of forestry. We have a ministry of fisheries and a ministry of energy and mines. But here is the most important resource to the economic well-being of this country as well as its aesthetic well-being and yet it had no ministry. I want to say to the minister that we support this bill, we support this subamendment, we are pleased that we will have a ministry. I am sure the trees are happy. I want to tell the government that I am going out to hug a tree.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I say to my friend, not only are the trees happy, but if you listen, the wood is happy too. I say that to my good friend from Nickel Belt all in jest.

I support the bill wholeheartedly, without reservation. It is a good idea. The minister was there a minute ago. I am sure he is hanging on to every word I am saying while out there. It is a good idea, I say to him, because one in every ten jobs in Canada is generated by the forestry industry. That is a figure we have heard on a number of occasions in this House and so we should because I submit that part of the problem in terms of the lack of profile that forestry matters have had in government and in attracting the attention of decision-makers is that politicians of all political stripes have not cottoned onto or tuned into the marvellous impact for economic good that the forestry industry has in this country.

A few years ago when the Hon. John Roberts was the minister responsible for forestry, I had the good fortune to be his parliamentary secretary for a couple of years. In that capacity, I got to know some of the people in the forestry industry, right from British Columbia to Newfoundland. The forestry industry, of course, is extremely well served and the country is well served by the calibre of people who are involved in the industry, both in terms of the government bureaucracies federally and provincially and in terms of people who have chosen to invest in the industry and who work in the industry.

I do not want to delay the passage of this legislation. That is not my purpose in rising. It is just to get on the record one or two concerns that I have and then I want to give notice to whoever on the other side is piloting this legislation through the House that I shall be finished speaking in just a very few minutes. Oh, there is the minister. I say to him and his colleagues that it is my intention to get a couple of things on the record and then hopefully assist the administration in getting this good piece of legislation moving through the stages before we rise for the day.

I have the honour to represent a riding called Burin—St. George's. In the center of that riding geographically there is a bit of geography known locally as "Bay Despair". For the francophones among us, you would probably pronounce the it "Baie D'Espoir". It is a tribute to the Newfoundlanders who live there that they are able to take what is a foreign language term and put it into very translatable idiom, particularly given the local situation where the unemployment rate is of the order of 80 per cent.

Why is unemployment that high in that particular area? That is the highest unemployment rate of any geographical pocket in Newfoundland and, indeed, just about the highest anywhere in Canada. The term "Baie D'Espoir" in French means Bay of Hope. The story behind it is that when some people were lost at sea they thought their number was up and then realized that they were up a long bay and hence, they called it Bay D'Espoir. For them, it was exactly a place of hope.

In Bay Despair, as we call it, why is it that the English corruption of the name so accurately reflects the reality in that particular area? The reason has to do with forestry. If you go back over many years, you will find that in Bay Despair on the south coast of Newfoundland, the communities of St. Alban's, St. Joseph's, St. Veronica's, Bay Despair, Milltown, Morrisville and to a degree Conne River, the 6,000 people in those communities came to rely over many years—going back around to the turn of the century and before and until the late 1950s, about 30 years ago—on forestry as a generator of economic activity and a source of employment.

In the later part of that period ending in about 1957 or 1958, these people used to actually harvest wood which was shipped from Bay Despair to England as pit props to prop up the underground mining facilities in Wales and southwest England. Of course, before that, they also used to cut logs which were boomed and taken by boat around into the paper mill at Corner Brook, quite a long voyage by water for those of you who know the geography and the distances involved.

Here is my point. The Bowater Company was the company harvesting the wood for both purposes, the local paper manufacturing purposes and the export of pit props. Once Bowater ceased its operation there, what did you have on your hands? You had literally hundreds of people, mainly men, who had skills in harvesting wood which were no longer marketable because there was no longer any need for harvesting wood. You had a whole generation of people who were quite skilled at harvesting wood, familiar with the technology of the day but had nowhere to market their skills. Those people over time went to Labrador, to other parts of Newfoundland or to various parts of the Canadian mainland to find jobs where they could.

I come to the early 1980s. The government of the day, the great Liberal government of Mr. Trudeau of which I was pleased to be a supporter introduced a forestry economic stimulation program, FESP for short.

Mr. Thompson: Festering?

Mr. Simmons: I think the member is coming awake. I didn't quite get what he said but—

An Hon. Member: He's one of your colleagues.

• (1340)

Mr. Simmons: No, it was not one of my colleagues. It was one of the rump group that sits up there. They are supporters of the government but reluctant supporters so they sit well up on the far end of the Chamber. We meet here every day at this time, and you should really drop in more often.

I want to conclude on the point I was making, because I would like to leave the minister some time to make his remarks, if that is his wish. I want him in particular, if he would, to consider addressing the issue I just introduced—the issue of the Forestry Economic Stimulation Program, the so-called FESP. I have just spent some minutes describing to the Chamber the situation in Bay D'Espoir, why the unemployment rate is high. In capsule, it is because many people there have forestry skills and nowhere to market them.

For a brief period in the early 1980s they were helped by this government through the special FESP program. They were able to engage in various activities—silviculture, thinning, various functions which were related to their forestry skills. It provided much needed employment, but equally to the point it gave an opportunity for us to regenerate our good forest stands in that particular part of the country.

I see my time is up. I make a plea to the minister to indicate to us whether he has given some thought to restoring that kind of a program for the sake of our forests and at the same time to creating some employment opportunities in that particular area as well as the St. George's area of my riding which also benefited from the FESP initiative.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment to the amendment on Motion No. 5, standing in the name of the hon. member for Surrey North.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the subamendment lost on division.

The next question will be on Motion No. 1. A vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motions Nos. 2, 3, and and 5. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 5 agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The next motion is Motion No. 7 which will be debated and voted on separately.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria) moved:

Motion No. 7.

That Bill C-29 be amended in Clause 10 by adding immediately after line 31 at page 3 the following:

"(3) The report shall include but not be restricted to information on forest employment, an inventory of Canada's forest lands, a review of new forestry-related products, a survey of environmental standards being applied by the forest industry, trade issues and figures and the integrated use of our forests."

He said: Mr. Speaker, just a quick word on this motion which stands in my name, but in spirit it is the motion of the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley who has been the very effective New Democratic critic in the forestry areas. He has worked very hard with the minister on this bill and is generally in support of it.

This particular amendment comes from that member, and I am very pleased to move it in the House. The amendment has this effect: clause 10 of the bill provides that the minister is to file annually a report showing the operations of the forestry ministry and is to include an account of the condition of forest resources of Canada and their contribution to the Canadian economy.

The amendment, which I hope and understand will be accepted by the government, is to provide for a further outline of what is to be included in the report. It is to include information on forest employment; an inventory of forest lands, which is very important; a review of new forestry related product; and a survey of environmental standards, trade issues and the integrated use of our forest. On behalf of our party I am very pleased to move this amendment.

[Translation]

M. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, I support the amendment proposed by the New Democratic Party because I agree that an inventory, integrated use of our forests and new forestry-related products would be desirable. Of course, integrated forest management is imperative, although the amendment is similar to the section that deals with establishing a national data centre. We agree to support this amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 7 standing in the name of the hon. member for Victoria. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 7 agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The last motion at report stage is Motion No. 8.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): moved:

Motion No. 8

That Bill C-29 be amended in Clause 18 by adding immediately after line 46 at page 6 the following:

"(g) the use of pesticides and pest control products; and (h) the preservation of culturally altered trees."

He said: Mr. Speaker, again the motion really comes from our critic in this area, the member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley.

Before I launch into a passionate defence of this addition, I would like to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your ruling earlier today which has permitted us to have this as a separate motion. I appreciate very much your ruling on that point.

I will not take long because we wish to accommodate the minister, at least to some extent, by allowing him a few minutes on third reading.

Let me just say that we believe it would be a very helpful amendment to include in the specific regulations that Cabinet is entitled to pass a provision that the Cabinet may in this area regulate the use of pesticides and pest control products, as well as the preservation of culturally altered trees. The very language speaks for itself. It is an important amendment, and I would hope that the government would feel it can accept the amendment.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, I am reluctant to ask my colleagues to reject this amendment, perhaps for the same reason that the Chair had earlier decided not to accept it.

In dealing with pesticides and pest control products, it would be reaching into the mandates, authorities and jurisdictions of other departments of government and the provinces. I really do not think that this particular amendment would do much to strengthen the bill as it is or add to the mandate that has been assigned to the new ministry. I would ask my colleagues to reject this amendment and would ask for their understanding.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Some Hon. Members: On division.

Motion No. 8 negatived.

• (1350)

Mr. Oberle (for the Prime Minister) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Oberle (for the Prime Minister) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few minutes, in concluding the affairs of this bill before the House to re-establish the Department of Forestry, to express my gratitude and that of the government to all those who have contributed to the debate throughout the country, those who have appeared as witnesses before the legislative committee including the Canadian Institute of Forestry, forestry advisory councils and all the various agencies which have an important stake in our forests.

I also want to thank my colleagues and friends in the opposition parties who have approached this debate with a spirit of co-operation and enthusiasm, all of which reminds us of the fact that our forests are an ever-increasingly important component of life in Canada, critically important to our economy.

My colleagues have spoken, on second reading and again in support of the amendments before the House, of the regional importance of forestry and its importance to trade and to jobs. I do not wish to take time to reiterate all that.

We also talked about new dimensions that are be equated with our forests today—the environment, the ecology, and the concept of sustainable development which is so critically important particularly to forestry, not just because it is important to restructure and reconfigure the industry so that it can be less harmful to the environment through the discharge of chemicals and agents into the environment but to the management of the forests themselves, which as we all know now are perhaps the most critical element of our ecological system. It is said that our forests are the lungs of the globe.

I would anticipate that the new Department of Forestry will not suffer the same fate as predicted by some, as did the mandate that was established back in 1960. Today we are looking at our forests in a much different light.

One of our poets said some time ago that of all of nature's scenes it is the woods where she reveals her deepest secrets and bestows her greatest blessings and riches. How true that is when we look at it in the context of this debate.
