STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, the government dealt a serious blow to the potato, vegetable, tobacco and grain farmers of Prince Edward Island when it decided to eliminate the interest free provision of the Advance Payments for Crops Act.

As a mixed farmer from P.E.I., I am well aware of the value of the Hon. Eugene Whelan's advance payments program. It provides interest free cash flow and orderly marketing which naturally brings better prices for farmers. Without the interest free aspect the program is useless. The farmer must pay the administrative costs of the program. The interest free advances covered these costs.

To meet their expenses, farmers will be forced to put their product on the market. This will cause a glut and prices will go down. Once again the farmer loses.

Everyone involved in agriculture in P.E.I. knows how important orderly marketing is to the agricultural industry and to the provincial economy. This is just another assault on the Canadian farmer.

VIA RAIL

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, today the Minister of Transport has dealt a deadly blow to Canadians who travel by VIA Rail. Like a hangman waiting for the secretly set hour of execution, the Minister of Transport stonewalled questions in the House, raised the public level of anxiety, cowardly avoided meeting concerned mayors, ignored the Tory pledge to consultation and open government, and contradicted the Prime Minister's commitment to environmentally sustainable development.

In light of his statement today, does the Minister of Transport actually care about Canada? Does he really understand the nation building role of railways? At the present rate of dismantling, will there be a Canada left by 1992? How long can Canadians trust this government with its interminable record of broken promises?

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, industry is taking a leading role in the protection of the environment. This evening, in the riding of Elk Island, public hearings are being held by Dow Chemical into the effect that planned expansion will have on the environment. Using a team approach, industry, environmental groups, government and the public can work together to protect our environment.

In September, Proctor and Gamble announced that reductions of dioxins and furans by more than 95 per cent in pulp wood have been achieved in an aggressive research program. With the co-operation of the dioxin task force team formed by the Pulp and Paper Research Institute of Canada and the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association to deal with the challenges of dioxin and furan reductions, industry is demonstrating leadership and commitment to the protection of the environment.

Let us follow the lead of industry. Let us work together in Canada to protect our environment. Let us all work together for a better quality of life for all Canadians.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport today announced that VIA Rail will be cut by 51 per cent. For rural Canada this is nothing more than another indication that the Tory agenda is to get out of the business of being government.

What we are seeing today is another indication that the public infrastructure, so critical to this country, is on the auction block and that rural Canada is the Conservative Government's scapegoat for its economic failure.

Air Canada is for sale. VIA Rail is now for sale. Canada's postal service is for sale. Is there nothing that has been created for the public sector which is not for sale?

The Minister of Transport said that the routes to remote communities will be maintained, but it is pending a further examination of cost-effective measures, leaving the door open for even more cuts.

Rural Canada is being sold out. Selling off VIA Rail so the private investor can cater to the vanities of those who can afford luxury travel is an insult to rural Canadians. We will not accept it.

FISHERIES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, last Monday I visited the vacant National Sea plant at Lockeport, Nova Scotia. It was, quite frankly, an eerie feeling walking through that modern, well-equipped but empty facility. The hard hats were on the hooks. The lights were still on the weigh scales. Everything was ready to go, except that there were no fish, so there were no plant workers.

Fifty five percent of the tax base of the town of Lockeport is that plant. Without the plant, quite simply, the town cannot function as a municipal unit.

I strongly urge the special cabinet committee now examining the fall-out for our Atlantic coast fishery to proceed with all dispatch and urgency in order that coastal communities like Lockeport and Port Mouton can receive the support and assistance that is now urgently required.

FREE TRADE

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will recall that during the last election campaign, barely a year ago, I fought to have his Government make a commitment to paying the cost of adjustment and retraining programs needed by business, before going ahead with free trade, because I thought such programs were important.

The Prime Minister will also recall his memorable visit to Les Boiseries de l'Outaouais factory where he put on a good electoral show, daring to call me a hypocrite because I insisted that his Government pay attention to adjustment and retraining programs. Today, the riding of Hull—Aylmer has been hit by the closure of Les Boiseries de l'Outaouais; 60 families are directly affected.

Will the Prime Minister, who mentioned Les Boiseries de l'Outaouais as a model for dealing with the challenge of free trade with the United States, say what he intends to do in future to stop the slew of plant shutdowns that we are now experiencing throughout the country? That is what I hope, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, recent attention has been focused on the horrible condition of the water quality of the Red River. Recent studies by various agencies have indicated that fecal bacteria levels are extremely high in the river.

The city of Winnipeg has been cited as the source of this pollutant, which negatively affects the water quality in my riding of Selkirk.

The river is of great historic significance to the area as it was the first settled waterway in western Canada, and has also been the source of a multimillion dollar sports fishing industry as well as tourism.

On behalf of my constituents, I am calling upon the mayor of Winnipeg and the provincial minister of the environment to move quickly to reach an agreement that would lead to the improvement of the quality of water in the Red River. Enough is enough.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, the Meech Lake Accord, which provides for Quebec's return to the great Canadian family with respect, honour and dignity, is threatened by the persistent refusal of two provincial premiers to ratify this historic agreement.

By refusing to ratify this accord, the Premiers of Manitoba and New Brunswick are repudiating the signature of their predecessors, who at the time were the legitimate representatives of their people.

Mr. Speaker, Quebecers are deeply disappointed by the attitude of Messrs. Filmon and McKenna who are blocking the process of national reconciliation that was unanimously adopted by the House of Commons and eight (provincial) governments representing 93 per cent of the Canadian people.

[English]

In 1980, 1985 and also last September 25, a majority of the people in my riding of Montmorency—Orléans and also in Quebec said "yes" to Canada. They will not accept another "no" from Canada.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of this House the plan by the immigration department to eliminate regional immigration offices in Winnipeg and Saskatoon. It is planned to centralize operations in Edmonton.

These regional offices were first established in each of the western provinces in the early 1970s, after studies indicated that large immigrant populations in each of these regions would warrant a high level of service in the late 1980s. This is perhaps truer today than it was at that time.

Where this misguided notion of amalgamating services comes from, members can only speculate. It certainly does not reflect the needs of those Canadians and would-be Canadians in the different and distinct communities of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Removing and distancing the decision-making ability of immigration officials clearly does not provide the kind of sensitivity needed to give force to one of the Immigration Act's highest tenets, that of helping new Canadians adjust into Canadian society.

What it does show is the fecklessness of government members in Manitoba and Saskatchewan in defending the interest of their constituents and provinces, bowing instead to more powerful voices.

I ask the Minister of Immigration to reconsider this insensitive move and to act in the interest of Canadians for a change.

THE FAMILY

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, since this is National Family Week, I think it is appropriate to talk about the need for a genuine family policy that meets the needs of modern society.

As the Prime Minister pointed out on August 25, for many Canadians, especially single parents, obtaining daycare for their children is not just a matter of lifestyle or personal enrichment but an absolute economic necessity. In this respect, the daycare program we hope to introduce very shortly will be a concrete response to the needs of all Canadian families.

The Labour Force Development Strategy announced by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mrs. McDougall) is also aimed at eliminating certain restrictions regarding parental and maternity leave.

More is needed however. In addition to extending this type of leave to 20 weeks, remuneration during that period should be set at 95 percent, to avoid penalizing couples who want to have children.

Of course, considering the economic situation and the Budget deficit, implementation of these measures may be a problem. But families have their price, and as a Government, we will have to realize that sooner or later.

[English]

VIA RAIL

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, in taking his broad axe to VIA Rail today, the Minister of Transport has applied a strange logic to the future of Canada's tourism industry.

The government is slashing the transcontinental route from 14 to three times a week. The Rocky Mountaineer will run only once a week for four months of the year.

Even without these absurd restrictions VIA cannot meet the tourism demands during Canada's peak tourism season. Tour operators have had to literally turn business away. Yet the message we got today is that if the profitable tourism runs are to be maintained they must be picked up by the private sector. In other words, sell off our only profit-making runs and take a broad axe to the rest.

In doing so this government has finally exposed its hidden agenda to junk its commitment to passenger rail service throughout Canada.

SOVIET ARMY CHORUS

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you on behalf of all members for once again permitting us the pleasure of receiving at noon today the Soviet Army Chorus and Dance Ensemble under the able conductor Anatoly Maltzev.

Since these brilliant artists last performed here in February, 1987, the warm winds of change have swept their country and the prospect for greater international co-operation and understanding has been greatly enhanced. These artists were among the pioneers of this growing rapprochement. It is encouraging to see them continue in their worthy cause.

[Translation]

Your presence and that of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) and many Members from all parties has once again helped to breach the walls of misunderstanding.

I want to thank those who came to greet this group, including the Right Hon. Prime Minister and Mr. Alexei Makalov from the Embassy, who accompanied them.

Mr. Maltsev, thank you and our best wishes to all your group.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

VIA RAIL

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister, a man who in piecemeal fashion is dismantling the infrastructure of our country—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): —a man who today announced the destruction of a national dream.

The Prime Minister told Canadians during the last election that VIA Rail was safe. He never told Canadians during the last election they were about to lose that railway. The Prime Minister said to the people of Canada, "Use it or lose it". Last year 500,000 more Canadians did use it. The Prime Minister has committed political fraud.

I ask him why is it that he did not tell Canadians in the towns and cities across the country that they would lose the service? Why did he not tell the thousands of employees of VIA Rail they were going to lose the service. Why did he not come clean to Canadians during the last election?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my right hon. friend would agree that the principal responsibility of the Prime Minister, the government, and the Parliament of Canada is to try and manage the economic affairs of the nation in such a way as to provide greater prosperity, and to render the economy as competitive as we can, while retaining all the fundamental instruments of our sovereignty which allow for even greater prosperity.

During the last election we campaigned on a series of initiatives, fundamental and chief among which was our commitment to make the economy of Canada sound, to make the public finances of Canada sound, and to render the economy more competitive to produce more jobs and greater prosperity for Canadians.

This is a difficult decision. The subsidy for VIA this past year was something in the neighbourhood of $641 million which, if unchecked, would rise to in excess of a $1 billion a year for a service that was used by a very tiny percentage of the population.

It is our view that the plan announced today by the Minister of Transport retains passenger transport across Canada, gives us the opportunity to strengthen that infrastructure, and renders Canada more competitive. I think in the longer haul it will bring benefits to all Canadians.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The Prime Minister not only has a duty to manage the country on behalf of Canadians, he has a primary responsibility to tell the truth to Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Today, the Prime Minister just did not destroy a dream or a notion of the past, he destroyed the possibility and the dream for Canadians to enter the 21st century with a modern efficient passenger service binding this country together. That is what he did.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, on October 14, 1988, the Prime Minister told residents: "We are prepared to submit all federal projects and all projects involving federal land to complete environmental impact studies".

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister did not say a partial study, he did not say an internal study. He said a complete and impartial environmental study.

How does he account for this one-page so-called study his Minister of Transport shook out of his sleeve today? Why did he not proceed with a complete environmental impact study? Why did he once again fail to keep the promises he made to Canadians during the election campaign?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, there are some omissions in the information quoted by the Leader of the Official Opposition. We are going to look at the whole document. What we have here is a misquote, since the Minister of the Environment is now developing an action program on the environment. It will be on the leading edge of what is being done in this field, not only in Canada but in most countries which have become major competitors in environmental science and international business.

A number of initiatives have been taken in this area. The Minister of Transport has already announced at a press conference that at the appropriate time and, in fact, very shortly, he will reveal the findings of the studies carried out by his Department.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): We now hear the Prime Minister talking about an environmental impact study after the fact because a conversation between his two ministers as an afterthought will not satisfy the people of Canada.

We know that the Prime Minister today appointed a royal commission to attempt to deflect attention away from the cuts to VIA Rail.

How can the Prime Minister destroy VIA Rail and then, and only then, appoint a royal commission to study the issue after the fact? Why, in these circumstances, does he not impose a moratorium on all decisions affecting VIA Rail until this royal commission has had a chance to study it and until a committee of Parliament under the chairmanship of the member of Parliament for Annapolis Valley—Hants has had a chance to study it on behalf of the people of Canada? Why did the Prime Minister not allow this to happen before the decisions were taken?

One further question, Mr. Speaker. When the royal commission concludes, as it inevitably must, that Canadians need a modern, efficient passenger train service system, what is he going to do then to revive VIA Rail after he destroyed it today?

Mr. Mulroney: To deal with the first, and perhaps the most important inaccuracy of the Leader of the Opposition, VIA Rail was not destroyed today. VIA Rail was maintained today in a manner that Canadians can afford.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: It is true, Mr. Speaker, that we do not have all of the answers in respect of the transportation needs of the 21st century. We have appointed a royal commission to deal not only with passenger transport but inter-modal transport, ranging from the infrastructure for airports, to train service, to passenger service involving buses and general transportation.

If this kind of thought and study had gone into these transportation problems at some time in the past, the Government of Canada could have avoided things like Mirabel.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, it is precisely to avoid the kinds of policies initiated on a whim by a Liberal government that we are going to seek the finest expertise to draw for Canada, a sophisticated nation entering the 21st century, a blueprint of our transportation needs to guide us all.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, on the question of VIA Rail, this Prime Minister is beginning to sound like the American officer during the Vietnam war who said, "We had to destroy the village in order to save it".

Today, the Prime Minister sent his messenger to the Press Gallery to announce that 2,761 VIA employees no longer have a job, to announce that three million Canadians who rode the rails in 1988 no longer have a train to ride and to announce that over half of VIA's network is being shut down—in short, the end of VIA Rail.

Why has the Prime Minister, who was mute about this matter during the last election, betrayed the disabled, the elderly, the youth, the poor, the small towns, and the regions of this country?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I think our friends from the Liberal party are going to have to make up their minds. The Leader of the Opposition has just blamed me for saying too much about VIA Rail in the last election. Now this member says I was mute.

The fact of the matter is that the government has maintained a passenger link, and has initiated studies that we hope will provide for Canada's transportation needs well into the 21st century.

I think my hon. friend would be the first to agree that you cannot build a transportation system for the 21st century on a 19th century infrastructure. That is what we are trying to change.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, it takes incredible gall to announce a royal commission into the mess that this government has made of the transportation infrastructure in Canada, but that is what this Prime Minister has done.

How can the Prime Minister expect Canadians to believe the government wants impartial advice when it has already, without consultation, butchered VIA Rail? Is not this royal commission nothing more than an autopsy of the Prime Minister's latest victim?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition says we killed VIA Rail. Then, all of a sudden, it is less mortal, we have butchered it. I am saying we have saved VIA Rail.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Only the Prime Minister of Canada would say that cutting something by 51 per cent is the way you go about saving it. That is Conservative logic.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this. The announcement today by the Minister of Transport means the loss of a minimum of 11,000 jobs, directly and indirectly, by VIA and all those communities that it has an impact on. It means the destruction of regional services in Atlantic Canada and elsewhere—a major reduction in national transportation service. Then we are going to have a multimillion dollar royal commission.

I want to ask the Prime Minister why the government did not announce its commission and listen to its results before it made up its mind about this wholesale destruction across the country.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I suppose that when you strip the rhetoric away what the hon. member is asking me is in respect of the royal commission.

It is a fact that I do not have, and I do not think anyone in this House has, a complete vision of the requirements for intermodal transportation in Canada in the 21st century.

Clearly one of the elements of passenger rail will be VIA Rail. This is why we have taken initiatives to save VIA Rail and maintain it across the country, which will still cost Canadian taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars in subsidies every year.

Notwithstanding that, we have taken this decision to save VIA Rail, and concurrently appoint a royal commission, and I think that my hon. friend would only agree that it is prudent to invite experts from Canada and around the world to help us address the transportation requirements of all kinds into the 21st century.

That, together with parliamentary input from all parties, will I think give Canada the transportation policy into the next century that we now lack.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, my next question is for the Prime Minister. The government has been in power since 1984. It is the greatest admission of the disastrous Ministry of Transport and the ministers if now, after all that time in office, the Prime Minister says that he does not know what we should be doing going into the next century. Why don't you know what you are doing?

If we now have a royal commission that will systematically look at the integrated needs of transportation such as rail, car or airplane, and if in doing that it should reach the decision that we ought not to be laying off 11,000 people as we are today and destroying the infrastructure of Atlantic Canada and elsewhere, is the government prepared to reverse its decision when it hears from the royal commission? If it is prepared to reverse its decision, does it make any sense at all to make the decision now and then have a royal commission? How ridiculous can you get?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, first of all let me correct my hon. friend. There is no question of VIA Rail laying off 11,000 people. We do not have 11,000 employees. The service will be maintained. The passenger service will be maintained in a proper way across the country still at a cost of some hundreds of millions of dollars a year.

For example, when a passenger gets on a train to go from Montreal to Ottawa the return tab picked up by the taxpayer is approximately $100. There are areas in western Canada that when a passenger gets on a train for a trip the subsidy is in the neighbourhood of $475 per trip. I think my hon. friend will agree that subsidies which extend into the billion dollar mark and are a few hundred dollars per passenger are abusive by any standards, particularly for a country that needs to bring its deficit down, so that that deficit reduction can have a favourable impact on interest rates and economic growth.

One of the reasons we have combined the study is precisely because we are able to maintain VIA essentially intact concurrent with an important transportation study. I do not believe there has been a study of transportation of any substance in Canada publicly done for some 30 years since the MacPherson Royal Commission. It is just about time that Canada defined a new policy for the requirements of the 21st century.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will know that in the United States, because it made the appropriate decision some years ago in modernizing Amtrak and attracting people to use the service, they now have a very minimal level of subsidization and that has continued in the United States. The Prime Minister knows that in Canada we now spend millions subsidizing roads. We spend millions subsidizing air traffic, and the people of Canada require in all regions some continuing level of subsidization in trains.

My question to the Prime Minister is the following one. Why don't we have the capital investment required to make a first rate modern rail service and continue that, like all other modern nations do around the world?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend asks the question rhetorically why Canada does not follow the intelligent policy invoked by Amtrak. The reason is the following.

In 1971 Amtrak scrapped 75 per cent of its passenger routes in the United States. By and large it kept the high density corridor traffic which given the different demographics makes Amtrak a more economically viable operation than the one we obviously have in Canada.

That is why we did not follow the Amtrak policy which quite frankly had we done so would have meant the complete termination of VIA Rail throughout Atlantic Canada and areas of western Canada and maintaining corridor traffic between Windsor and Quebec City. I want to tell the leader of the New Democratic Party that in our minds Canada does not extend from Windsor to Quebec City. It extends from one end of the country to the other, and that is why we are maintaining the traffic.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. I listened to his press conference very intently, and what he told us today was that there are 2,761 jobs lost because of this 51 per cent cut. Now I know for a fact that is not true. Just taking CN and CP employees alone it rises to 3,600 jobs. The minister did not put that into his little quotation of those jobs that will be lost.

Taking that into account, I have the following question for you, Mr. Minister. Exactly how many jobs? Can you tell this House the honest truth about how many jobs will be lost? There are not only 2,700; there will be way more. How many will there be? Tell us the real truth about how many jobs will be lost because of the 51 per cent cut.

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this morning, I tabled official documents concerning job losses and for once, instead of referring to leaked documents that provide false information, I urge you to refer to the documents you were given this morning, where I say that the VIA Rail closures and cutbacks will result in 2,761 layoffs. We recognize the problems due to restructuring, but I must say at the same time that the collective agreements governing those who work for the railways in Canada are among the most generous in the country and will cost $140 million over five years. I think that the Government has been generous with these employees in accordance with the signed collective agreements, and I ask the Opposition Parties to admit that finally, we in Canada will have a rail transport system that we can afford and that can last.

[English]

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, nowhere in this country—

An Hon. Member: Here we go.

Mr. Speaker: I don't want to hear what I just heard again. The hon. member for Sudbury.

Mrs. Marleau: Nowhere in this country is transportation more important or more vital than in northern communities. Yet, Sudbury and many other of our communities are receiving one blow after another to their transportation services.

• (1440)

Just this past Monday we were told that Air Canada was stopping all services to Sudbury and other communities in northern Ontario. Today, we have the shutdown of VIA Rail in northern Ontario and across this country.

Mr. Prime Minister, why have you brutalized the regions of northern Ontario this way?

[Translation]

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, obviously, I do not agree with my colleague about the northern part of the provinces. For the particularly remote regions, we have maintained nine so-called remote routes in the national transportation system so that citizens who do not have other means of transport can still travel.

As for Air Canada, Mr. Speaker, deregulation has made it possible to develop a series of quality airlines like Air Nova, Air Atlantic, Air Alliance and Air Ontario in this country; these regional airlines provide communities with services they did not have before. Air Canada is a private company that has the right to withdraw from some of its activities. But at the same time, Air Ontario will continue to provide services and to give the people of Sudbury the services they had before. It has not been proven that the services of Air Ontario will be inferior to those of Air Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian transportation system is complex, but using private enterprise and public services, we are giving Canadians the best.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport just announced that more than 1,800 jobs will be cut in Quebec, including 900 in Montreal. He added that Montreal could easily absorb these losses. In other words, nothing to get excited about. What a relief for the employees who are being laid off!

Does the Minister have the nerve to rise again in his seat and tell these workers, right here in the House, there is nothing to get excited about?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I certainly do have the nerve to rise again in my seat, and I would even go so far as to inform my hon. that I don't understand why she didn't at least check her information against the figures I gave two hours ago. Mr. Speaker, Quebec will lose 994 jobs, including 912 in Montreal, which is certainly not what the figures the Hon. Member quoted imply. So before getting worked up about figures that are wrong —I kept telling them: Wait for the real documents! I can see getting the figures wrong with leaked documents, but now they have the real documents, and they still can't get their facts straight.

Once again, I wish you would check your figures, and I wish you would realize that the collective agreements for these employees are the very best in Canada, and that we will spend $140 million so employees can benefit from the advantages of the agreements they signed.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Once again, Madam Speaker, the Conservative Government has abandoned the entire Montreal region. More than 900 jobs are directly affected I said "more than" and thousands of other jobs in related sectors will disappear. What does the Prime Minister intend to do to help the entire Montreal region which is already disadventaged, and especially the families affected by this decision?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the Government of which I am a member has done for Quebec and Montreal what the previous government never did. Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the Conservative Government has done a great deal for Montreal and will continue to do so. However, when difficult decisions have to be made, whether those decisions happen to concern Montreal or other areas in this country, we make those decisions in terms of the national interest, which is the case with the decisions we made today.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw the attention of the House to the presence in our gallery of Mr. Charles-Ferdinand Nothomb, speaker of the Chamber of representatives, and Mr. Edward J. Leemans, senator and honorary speaker of the Senate, who are accompanied by a delegation of Belgian parliamentarians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Earlier today in his press conference he indicated that he encourages any proposal to take over and operate a rail passenger service. In fact, according to a wire story tour operator Sam Blyth said today that he has permission from Transport Minister Bouchard and VIA Rail President Ron Lawless to start a luxury continental service from Toronto to Vancouver beginning next June. Tickets go on sale October 14. The cost is $2,495 a person. Anyone else who wants to buy a piece of the national dream need only contact Ron Lawless.

How can the Minister guarantee the continuation of a national rail passenger service if he is going to sell it off literally piece by piece?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the information given by this member is absolutely false.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, perhaps he might want to talk to Sam Blyth who has put out a press release that was on Midday today.

I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. It is interesting to note that in terms of cross Canada services the Minister of Transport has announced that the Canadian, which uses the Canadian Pacific lines, is to be cut out entirely, yet the Super Continental that uses CN lines, which according to his own documents is more expensive for VIA to operate on, is going to remain.

Could the minister tell this House whether this choice of routing, the choice of CN over CP, is based on the needs of the travelling public or on the needs of the president of VIA Rail who is also the president of the CNR?

[Translation]

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, once again the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan sees problems where there are none. This morning, at a press conference, I explained that the northern Supercontinental route was to be preferred because of the higher population density, and as for the southern route, we already had a section that was partly covered by the Rocky Mountaineer line between Vancouver and Calgary. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the decisions were made in terms of a national network, a network we can afford and a network that can be viable!

[English]

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

People in Canada would like to see the involvement of the private sector in VIA Rail. What consideration has been given to involve the private the sector in the operation of VIA Rail?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, what I said this morning and what I will repeat in the House is that we will be open to any good and reasonable proposal which will be made by the private sector and will be considered with a view to improving services for Canadians.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister says he saved VIA Rail. Well, he certainly did not save it in eastern Nova Scotia where its loss has been devastating.

This morning the Prime Minister spoke with a little girl who was a member of a group of students from Sydney Mines visiting Ottawa. She told him that if he did not save the trains her grandparents were not going to vote for him any more. The loss of those two votes is only the beginning.

Why has the Prime Minister, a graduate of St. Francis Xavier University, reduced eastern Nova Scotians to the level of second-class Canadians, when he stood in his place just a few months ago and said that there would be no second-class Canadians?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend indicates and probably quite accurately that as a result of this decision today we are going to lose votes. The fact of the matter is that we did not do this for votes. We did it because it is right for Canada.

My hon. friend refers to Nova Scotia where the rail link has been maintained six days a week into Halifax, where the maintenance centre in Halifax will be maintained. It is true that in Nova Scotia as elsewhere there are some lines that will be discontinued. We very much regret that. My hon. friend will recognize that we have worked very hard on behalf of Cape Breton with some of the initiatives taken and in eastern Nova Scotia, in particular.

My hon. friend is the first to know that the government and Parliament have had good results in some of the areas that we have involved ourselves in since 1984. The employment statistics are there to prove it.

It is true that there are these lines that are being discontinued, and we regret that very much. As my hon. friend examines the costs and the subsidy per capita required in each of these, I think he will come to the view that the taxpayers of Canada and the Parliament of Canada, which have other obligations in Cape Breton and we should assume more, can better spend taxpayers' money on behalf of a stronger Cape Breton and a stronger eastern Nova Scotia in ways other than those that we have followed in the past.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Why did he not tell the electorate before the last election what he just told us now about the cuts to VIA?

Today they announced that the train which goes from Halifax to Yarmouth will be eliminated as of January 15, 1990. Ridership on the line that serves my colleague from Annapolis Valley, myself, and many thousands of constituents was up by 12 per cent in the first quarter of this year.

The Deputy Prime Minister gave the challenge to Canadians, and in particular to the people in the valley and in southern Nova Scotia, to use the train. They used it. The ridership was up by 12 per cent this year in the first quarter. Why did they cut it? They used it and now they have lost it. Why?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, just for the record, I want to advise my friend who also has roots in eastern Nova Scotia that I would contest and be happy to discuss with her some of the figures that she has just used.

However, in fairness, I think should point out that on February 24, 1986 the government, in a statement by the then Minister of Transport, said: "At the same time the government is committed to a major reduction of subsidy payments for VIA Rail. Federal funding will be reduced to $400 million by 1989." The Minister then went on: "Corridor or regional services may be discontinued if they fail to meet financial performance targets for any two consecutive years after December 31, 1986. Transcontinental services may be cut to three times a week if they fail to meet 60 per cent of specific costs for any two consecutive years after December 31".

The government did put out to my hon. friend and colleagues in the House of Commons very substantial advance warning of our intentions and of our obligations. The figures that my hon. friend uses to justify her argument are, may I respectfully say, quite wrong. The figures that the minister has produced today justify the decisions announced.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative government has decimated the region of Campbellton, New Brunswick with its destructive rail transportation policy and is now removing all local lines in New Brunswick.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Why doesn't the Prime Minister ask the Minister of Transport to declare a moratorium on all service cuts at VIA Rail, pending the report of his royal commission of inquiry? Or is this commission just a ploy to deceive Canadians?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, this morning I thought the Liberal Party would have understood the purpose of this royal commission of inquiry. VIA Rail is a problem that costs a corporation $900 million, a problem that needs an additional $250 million. These are the kinds of figures Canadians understand and these are the figures Canadians want us to change.

Mr. Speaker, the VIA Rail decision deals with a corporation that is inefficient, that does not work and that costs too much.

Mr. Speaker, that being said, in the years to come, beyond the year 2000, we must be able to integrate our transportation network in this country. We must know how much we are going to invest in the railways in highway transportation and in the air and marine transport modes. If I followed the example set by the Liberal Party for 20 years, 50 years from now we would still be spending money piecemeal on transport.

[English]

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. The employees who work for VIA Rail are not numbers, not dollar signs, not person-years on a balance sheet. The ripple effect of the VIA job cuts will hit every home in the ridings of Moncton and Beausejour. It is nonsense to suggest that CN and CP were not making a huge profit on VIA's utilization of their lines and that profit is now going to be lost.

My question for the minister is as follows: Is the next shoe to fall the complete elimination of CN in Atlantic Canada?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Absolutely not, Mr. Speaker. The decision which has been made today about VIA Rail does not involve CN and CP.

I want to correct something here today that people on the other side use all the time. In 1983 the money that VIA had to pay to CN and CP was 65 per cent of the budget, but with the good policy of the Deputy Prime Minister today this money is 15 per cent.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

British Columbia is severely affected by the cuts to VIA Rail. The Super Continental has been reduced to three times weekly. The Canadian has been done away with. On Vancouver Island the Esquimalt and Nanaimo run has been completely eliminated. These measures demonstrate this government's complete contempt for the regions of Canada. Passenger service on Vancouver Island was a condition of B.C.'s entry into Confederation.

Is this government serving notice to the people of Vancouver Island that they are no longer welcome in Confederation?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I can say as a member of Parliament from Quebec who has been in British Columbia three times this summer that you are fully welcome in Canada, indeed.

I would also like to say that in British Columbia we have maintained the services that we can afford in the national perspective.

My colleague will understand that between Jasper and Prince Rupert the cost for every passenger who uses the train is $483 which is paid for by the Government of Canada and Canadian taxpayers and we continue to pay this amount of money. I believe that we have treated British Columbia as any other province of this country.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and it relates to the credibility of this government.

In 1985 the government said to Atlantic Canadians: "Use it or lose it" with regard to VIA. Today thousands more Atlantic Canadians use the rail system.

Earlier today another member asked whether or not the Halifax maintenance yard would be closed. The Prime Minister said that that is not true. The document that was passed out today states that the Halifax maintenance centre will be closed. That is it.

When are you going to tell the truth to the people of Canada?

• (1500)

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval) Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said that the Halifax maintenance centre will be kept open, and the Prime Minister is right. I believe though that there is still some work to do at the Halifax maintenance centre.

I answer as the Minister of Transport to the House of Commons. I answer to the House of Commons once again that the Halifax maintenance centre will be kept open, and I will hold all necessary discussions with the president of the VIA Rail.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Transport. Instead of 14 westbound trains leaving Winnipeg each week, there will now be only three. The Rocky Mountaineer which the minister himself admits is one of the most popular rides across Canada will be reduced to one trip a week for five months of the year. Considering that tourism is the fastest growing industry in the west, these cuts are a severe blow. How can this government claim it wants regional economies to diversify and prosper when they are dismantling the national transportation system?

[Translation]

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I have heard this particular comment on tourism several times.

First of all, I think it is somewhat premature to assume tourists will stop travelling altogether, just because we have closed a certain number of lines. After all, other means of transportation are available to tourists.

Second, as I said earlier, the Government intends to promote any initiatives that will encourage Canadians and tourists in general to use various means of transportation.

[English]

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, in northern Ontario in the past two days the actions of this government have caused the pull–out of Air Canada's service to North Bay, Sudbury, Timmins and parts of northern Quebec. Now the government has cut out VIA service by the loss of "The Canadian" route and also the removal of the Toronto to Kapuskasing run.

My question is for the Minister of Transport. Why is the Minister of Transport trying to make it really impossible for the people and businesses of northern Ontario to exist and at the same time compete at the same level as the large southern urban areas?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I believe that northern Ontario, northern Quebec, or any other part of the country, has been considered in the national perspective and within the capacity we have to pay for the services we have. The decision has been made in that perspective. That is why we kept services in many parts of the country. Once again, I will repeat again, we will pay for the service that we can afford, but we cannot afford any more,to put $641 million in a transportation system which carries 3 per cent of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: I want to advise the House that I will hear a single question from the hon. member for Nickel Belt, followed by a single question from the hon. member for London East.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The cuts announced this morning by the Minister of Transport are directed at the economy of the country in general and of the Montreal area in particular, where half the VIA Rail jobs are located.

Is the Minister able to say exactly how many jobs will be affected in Montreal, both at VIA Rail and in local industry, by which I mean VIA Rail's suppliers—more than a hundred companies?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I just answered that question from another colleague, saying that the official figures, which you can use because they are reliable, show that 912 jobs will be lost.

But the Hon. Member tells me that we are jeopardizing Montreal's economy. Mr. Speaker, Hon. Members of this House will be glad to know that over the next five years, given the deficit we inherited from the previous government, these measures will save $1 billion in government operations alone.

Mr. Speaker, that is what I call enlightened government management.

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In southwestern Ontario where one in five of the travelling public uses VIA Rail, where senior students, working men and women, and business people, need the service, where our highways are already congested and have become death traps, how can this government cut service to southwestern Ontario by more that 60 per cent? How can the minister justify this cold, callous, irresponsible action?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): I would say, Mr. Speaker, that I am very proud to be able to say that we have maintained almost all services in southwestern Ontario. I believe that is what Canadians want. But at the same time, whether it be southwestern Ontario, Quebec, the maritimes, or any other part of Canada, decisions have to be made with a national perspective and they will continue to be made in that way. When I look at the number of trips which will be made from Toronto to Windsor, Toronto to Sarnia, Toronto to Niagara Falls, I repeat, I am proud of the decision.

POINT OF ORDER

ANNOUNCEMENTS BY MINISTERS

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, it is a time-honoured tradition in this House that when ministers of the Crown are announcing major new initiatives and major policies that it be done before this House and not before any other bodies. The Minister of Transport this morning made his announcement at the National Press Theatre instead of in the House of Commons.

Because of the exchange here in the House during Question Period it is clear why the minister should have made his statement here, where we have obvious information, differences of opinion, differences of fact being presented at the same press conference by the president of VIA Rail than were presented by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport today.

I would ask that you review the situation to determine if in fact the privilege of Parliament as a whole has been breached because of this announcement outside the chamber.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the point that my hon. friend has made and I will deliver a letter to him as soon as possible indicating, I am sure, that this government has made more use of ministerial statements than any government in the past 10 to 12 years and to demonstrate that we are using the House for that type of thing. Today is Wednesday and my hon. friend knows that this announcement was made with all immediate haste and that—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: No, as soon as it was taken. The Minister made himself completely available in Question Period, and was here for the entire Question Period. The opposition has had full and ample time to question the minister and we will stand on our record on ministerial statements against any previous government.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I think the point been made by the member from Thunder Bay—Atikokan is that we knew this announcement was coming down for a week. We had the leaked document which the government denied for one full week, day after day. It was announced that this statement was going to be made Wednesday.

The problem that we have is that this statement was not made in the House of Commons. We have proof today from the conflicting answers that I received from the Prime Minister and from the Minister of Transport that we do not know whether or not the document given out at 11 o'clock is accurate because the Prime Minister says the Halifax maintenance centre will be kept open, and now we have—

Mr. Siddon: So did the Minister.

Mr. Murphy: Yes, and then the Minister of Transport got up and said exactly the same thing. The problem is that the document issued this morning says the Halifax maintenance centre will be closed. It does not say open part way. It does not say open for one or two people. The government should have made the point in the House, given us the documents in the House, and stood by the documents that it has given to the people of Canada.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport said very clearly today that the Halifax maintenance centre is going to be maintained. Now during the press conference after the announcement at 11.30 today, the President of CN and of VIA, Mr. Lawless, stated quite clearly in response to a question from a reporter that 190 jobs would be lost in the Halifax area due to the shutting down of the Halifax maintenance centre.

I think this government better get its act together and tell Canadians, the travelling public, and the people employed by VIA Rail what the truth is. Is that centre going to be closed down? Are those jobs going to be lost? Who is misleading whom in this case?

• (1510)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the answer that was given by the Minister of Justice to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan—

Mr. Lewis: It wasn't a point of order.

Mr. Milliken: It was a perfectly good point of order. The answer that was given was quite unsatisfactory. The Minister of Justice says that this government has made more ministerial statements in this House than any other. The ministerial statements have not dealt with the major issues of government policy, they have dealt with announcements of family week or international fairness week, or whatever they have been. They have been motherhood announcements on minor matters compared with this kind of item that is slashing the livelihood of thousands of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: The point of order is specifically this, whether it is appropriate for the government under the circumstances to have made an announcement by press conference other than by ministers' statements. That is the sole issue.

The hon. member for Kingston and The Islands might conclude on that point.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I was getting to that. I was trying to answer the comments that were coming from across the way. The fact is that there has been a practice in this House for years for ministers to come into this House and make major policy statements. It was a practice, I may say, Mr. Speaker, that was followed very, very carefully by the previous Liberal administration up until 1984.

We are faced now with a situation where the government has made a major policy announcement while the House was sitting. This House was sitting this week and the minister could easily have delayed this statement until Statements by Ministers in the next few minutes this afternoon. The minister could have made his announcement yesterday afternoon. We are told that the minister had to do it in a great frantic rush this morning at a press conference that was called only this morning. I say that it is a contempt of this House for the minister to avoid making his statement here.

Parliament sits to hear the policies of the Government of Canada and to comment on them. It is our job as members of Parliament to make comments on those policies as they are announced. Those announcements should not come out by way of press conference. We are not expected to respond by way of press conference and yet that is exactly the expectation raised by this abuse of the precedent and practice of this House.

I could quote extensively from previous members of the Conservative party. Mr. Diefenbaker used to chastise the Liberal Government constantly for making very minor announcements outside this House. Liberal governments made minor announcements outside but the major ones were all done in here. This was a major announcement that should have been done here.

Mr. Speaker: The Speaker, of course, is not supposed to have any personal memory of events in this place. But I do, and it has been customary from time to time over many years for complaints to be laid before the Speaker with respect to whether or not it was appropriate for the government to make a statement in the House which, of course, if that is done under the rules enables both opposition critics to have equal time to respond.

It has been argued by members that sit on both sides of this House on different occasions that that is the more appropriate way to proceed. I must advise Hon. Members and the public who are listening that that is not a practice which is stipulated in any rules of this House. Of course, as the Chair always says, if the House wishes to change the rules then the Chair will certainly abide by them. There are no rules to that effect, as I say, and the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, in raising this point, raises a complaint.

The government has made a response which may or may not satisfy hon. members but it is not a point of privilege and it is not a contempt of the House. I would suggest that Hon. Members discuss with each other ways and means by which the practice of making statements in the House can be followed as often as possible.

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present to the House petitions that have been certified pursuant to Article 36 as being correct in terms of their form. These British Columbians are concerned about the government's proposals to slash VIA Rail. I suppose on a day when it has been slashed by 51 per cent the government would want to know that there are already thousands, if not hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are already opposed to what the government was proposing and are certainly proposed what it has done today.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition certified pursuant to Standing Order 36 from 175 British Columbians expressing fear that the government was going to cut VIA Rail by one-third and perhaps more so now that the government has announced it is cutting it by 51 per cent.

We, the undersigned, call on Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade VIA equipment and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger service to all Canadians.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 from residents from Ontario and British Columbia who say that VIA Rail service is essential for many Canadians and has been a part of Canada for more than 100 years. They call upon Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade VIA equipment and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger service.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I also rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by over 150 people from the lower mainland in British Columbia. Most of these people are from the municipality of Burnaby and the City of New Westminster which is in my riding. They are very concerned about the cut-backs to VIA Rail service. They ask the government to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade the equipment and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger service from coast to coast in Canada.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to this House today a petition signed by constituents in my riding who are adamantly opposed to the tax on music lessons.

VIETNAM

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker,I have a petition signed by members of the Vietnamese community in my riding and throughout the region who are calling on the government to pressure the Vietnamese government to properly deal with the constituents in that particular area.

NAC ORCHESTRA

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to present to the House a petition signed by residents in my riding. Your petitioners humbly pray that the National Arts Centre Orchestra be maintained, and their petition reads as follows:

That assurances by given, first of all, that the National Arts Centre will maintain the present number of musicians and the same level of excellence in its orchestra, and that a sound cultural background will be the main consideration when appointing new members to the NAC's board of directors

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by constituents of mine relating to the sales tax proposal. These people are very upset at the government's proposal to slap a 9 per cent tax on goods and services. They maintain that this tax will not only be hidden and inequitable, but the petition reads that Liberals on behalf of Canadians strongly oppose this goods and services tax which is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment. For those causes these people would like to see this tax rejected by this House.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to be able to present pursuant to Standing Order 36 a petition signed by a number of Canadians from Ottawa, Montreal, Yorkton, Saskatchewan, my own riding of Surrey, British Columbia, Port Coquitlam. They all petition that the government maintain the VIA Rail service as it is a vital service connecting Canada.

RCMP DRESS CODE

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present many petitions. In fact, I have hundreds of petitions containing 68,582 names of people from Calgary in particular, and from all across Canada, who want to retain the uniformity of the RCMP dress uniform.

These petitioners say that the RCMP has a long and honourable tradition known and admired around the world. They are not discriminating, Mr. Speaker. These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to preserve the distinctive heritage and tradition of the RCMP by retaining the uniformity of the dress code with all the recognized colour and trappings that have such great historical value for our country.

All these petitions have been certified.

EXTRADITION

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I have a group of petitions containing 5,895 names from people of the area of Calgary southwest. These petitioners call upon the government of Canada to revise its extradition laws. I am pleased to join with these people who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to revise the laws of Canada relating to extradition to allow the Minister of Justice of Canada to order the extradition of alleged or convicted criminals at any time after their apprehension in Canada, even during their period of incarceration, for crimes committed in another country.

VIA RAIL

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition on the great concern of people from the Vancouver region and my riding of Vancouver East, people who today will be appalled at the announcement regarding VIA Rail, and who call on Parliament to maintain the VIA network and to upgrade VIA Rail rather than cutting it.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to lay these petitions before the House today on behalf of the residents of southwestern Ontario and my own constituency in particular. These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax and to provide a remedy.

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE ORCHESTRA

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 36 I rise to present the concerns of many Canadians about the present crisis in the negotiations of the National Arts Centre with the National Arts Centre orchestra, some of it because the Centre has been held at zero budget growth for five years. On this its twentieth anniversary these petitioners would ask for a demonstration of good faith by an immediate return to the bargaining table, a call which I hope the government will do this day while wishing the National Arts Centre a happy twentieth anniversary.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege this afternoon to table a petition from the required number of signators from Belleville, Ontario. These signatures were gained while we were travelling on VIA Rail. They pray that this government will rescind its orders regarding the closures of VIA Rail.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition signed by a large number of my constituents from Cardigan, P.E.I. My constituents call upon this Parliament to reject the goods and services tax. This is a hidden tax. My constituents believe this will be unfair and disastrous to the economy of Prince Edward Island.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I am tabling before you today a petition against the goods and services tax. There are people from my riding of Sudbury who are asking that they be heard by this government. They are extremely anxious that this government go back to the drawing board and come back with a fair and equitable tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to present a sixteen-page edition——from Canadian citizens from various municipalities against the proposed goods and services tax. This particular tax will be damaging to small businesses because of its complicated tax system. It will also be hurting the economy by reducing the purchasing power of Canadian citizens by the percentage points presented by the government.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present to the House a petition signed by some 83 constituents in the riding of Hamilton West who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

MILITARY EXPORTS

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I also have the duty, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present to the House a petition signed by 25 members of local churches, including the Westhill United Church in the riding of Hamilton West. The petition calls upon the government to provide full disclosure of Canadian military exports including the type, producers and vendors, purchaser and transporter, as well as the immediate and final destinations of the military exports to be printed in register form and available to the Canadian public upon request.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present five petitions with a total of 150 signatures of Canadians who strongly oppose the goods and services tax. They feel it is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit people not only hard but it will result in higher taxes, higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

These petitions have been duly certified by the clerk and these people humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition from constituents in the city of Peterborough, some 639 names, who are calling upon the government to rescind the decisions that it has announced this morning in regard to VIA Rail.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition signed by 5,400 of my constituents in the riding of Northumberland. They object to the government's proposed cut-backs to VIA Rail and, with the announcements today, suggest that the government should put a moratorium on all its proposed cut-backs. The petitioners have a concern that this government, which seems to be on the fast track to oblivion, is going to leave them on January 19, 1990, to freeze to death on the railway platforms in Trenton, Cobourg and Port Hope in my riding.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to table 93 petitions, duly signed and certified, containing 2,808 signatures in all from people in the riding of Hull—Aylmer and the Outaouais region who are opposed to the imposition of a tax on sales of goods and services and who ask the Government to withdraw this tax.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I rise in accordance with Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by a number of residents of Toronto calling upon Parliament to join with the Innu of Labrador in demanding that the Canadian government end all the NORAD-NATO low-level flight training in Canada, oppose establishment of a NATO operation in Canada, including the tactical fighter and reference training centre proposed for Goose Bay and redirect Canada's NATO-NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihood in promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty to table petitions signed by 74 residents of the community of Atikokan, a northwestern Ontario community that lost its rail passenger services some 10 years ago. They are concerned now that their neighbours in Thunder Bay, Dryden, Ignace, Nipigon, Red Rock, Terrace Bay, Schreiber all of the communities along the Canadian route will join them in having lost their transportation services and options.

The undersigned call upon Parliament to maintain VIA Rail, Canada's present national network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger services.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand today.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notice of motion for the production of papers No. P-15 in the name of the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway?

Motion No. P-15

That an Humble Address be presented to Her Excellency praying that she will cause to be laid before this House copies of all documents and proposals considered and accepted at the Paris Meeting on the Human Dimension of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, from May to June 23, 1989.

Mr. Cooper: The motion proposed by the hon. member is unacceptable for the following reasons: No. 1, the CSCE is an intergovernmental process which always operates under the procedural rules of consensus; No. 2, lacking a formal consensus on the part of all 35 CSCE countries to do so, the Canadian government is not in a position to release the formal proposal submitted at meetings such as the Paris meeting on the human dimension.

I would therefore ask the member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Robinson: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

GOVERNMENT ACTION RESPECTING VIA RAIL

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 52, I ask leave, through you, to propose a motion to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration; namely the drastic cuts of passenger rail services by VIA Rail announced today by the Minister of Transport which will impose severe hardships on Canadians, especially those who are least able to find affordable alternatives.

Mr. Speaker: First of all, so that it is clearly understood what we are doing here, under the orders which govern us, it is the right of members to rise and to ask for an emergency debate. The rules governing whether that should be accepted are well known to hon. members.

The matter that has been raised by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is a very serious matter and has engaged this House for a number of days and again today. It may well engage the time of the House in the future.

I have given very careful consideration to the application which I received earlier this morning. I repeat, the matter is of great importance. It is very much the subject of discussion in the country and debate in the House. I find that at least for now it does not meet the criteria of the order. However, I reiterate it is a matter of national importance.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, October 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-36, an act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Foster:

That Bill C-36, an Act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, these are tough times down on the farm and tough times in rural Canada.

The entire Question Period this afternoon was devoted to VIA Rail cuts, which will be another severe blow to rural Canada. It seems that this government wants to shut down rural Canada. Of course, the matter at hand, this bill that we are considering, is another blow, particularly to farmers in the country. They have used the cash advance system for more than 30 years. They have found it to be of good use, particularly when they could use cash advances on an interest free basis. If this bill goes through, they will lose the ability to use cash advances on an interest free basis. They will have to pay interest.

When I was speaking on the bill yesterday, I read into the parliamentary record a statement that was released a few days ago by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, which is opposed to this bill and wants the cash advance system to continue, but with interest free cash payments. I want to complete the reading of the statement into the parliamentary record:

> The Advance Payments for Crops Act serves to shift sales out of the immediate post harvest season thereby reducing the extent of export sales in autumn and shortage induced imports during later months. It also reduces downward price pressure in the domestic market in the immediate post harvest season.

This is a well known agricultural organization and it should be listened to.

Another important farm group that is opposed to this bill is the National Farmers Union. The NFU, in a statement the other day, said this, and again I quote:

> The Prairie Grain Advance Payments Program has for thirty years relieved grain producers from prolonged financial pressures in circumstances where poor delivery opportunities prevailed.
> The fact that the advances were interest free was, of course, the most attractive feature of the program. It enabled producers to save on interest costs by meeting debt obligations to creditors earlier than might otherwise be the case.

That is another important farm organization that is opposed to this government initiative.

Ordinary farmers have become involved in this debate. In fact, just yesterday my colleague from Lambton—Middlesex received a long distance phone call from a farmer in Weyburn, Saskatchewan, who was deeply concerned about the withdrawal of cash payments on an interest free basis. It shows how concerned farmers are that they will make long distance phone calls to MPs here in the nation's capital.

Other politicians in other provinces, of course, are concerned about this government move as well. In fact, the agriculture minister in my home province of Manitoba, the Hon. Mr. Findlay, issued a statement the other day expressing concern about this bill. Let me quote one paragraph from his statement. Of course, we must remind the country that the agriculture minister in the province of Manitoba is a Progressive Conservative so he shares the party of members opposite. He said, relating to this bill:

> As farmers requirements for cash advances are most critical during the first half of the crop year, I am requesting that Mr. Mazankowski give serious consideration to cash advances being interest free until January 31 of each year.

Those are some of the core arguments against this bill which is ill advised and should be withdrawn so that the government can enter into consultations with farm groups right across the country and get some advice on how it should proceed. What the farmers are saying, loud and clear, is that they want the cash advances to continue interest free.

Yesterday, when I was speaking on this bill, I said that I had been talking to a farmer friend and he could not understand what was in the government's mind, what was on its agenda. He found the government's performance very curious and confusing. He asked what this initiative is all about, whether it is part of a larger philosophy, part of some over-all program. That question was partly answered by the Deputy Prime Minister yesterday who said that this measure is an effort on the part of government to have Canadian farmers make their contribution to deficit reduction.

I really find that insulting. Farmers in this country do not need to be told what they have to do. I find that kind of statement condescending and insulting. Farmers have been asked over and over again to do their share. If there is any group of people in this country who do their fair share, it is the farmers. It seems that this government is bent on shutting down rural Canada. It is not just this bill that concerns me and the people of Canada, particularly farmers. There is a whole host of things going on in rural Canada. For example, there is the closing of post offices. It seems that almost every other week there is a post office somewhere in this country that is closed. Then, of course, there is VIA Rail. Today we got the announcement that 51 per cent of it is going to be shut down. I think most Canadians believe that if VIA Rail is cut in half, that will be the end of it. Pretty soon there will not be any more VIA Rail.

Continuing along with this program of shutting down rural Canada by the government, we saw as a result of the budget this spring the government wanting to close a number of military bases that are important to rural Canada, bases like Portage la Prairie in my province, Port Hardy in British Columbia and Summerside in Prince Edward Island.

Another blow to rural Canada is the reduction in regional development programs. There have been a number of cuts in regional development programs and that has been a blow to rural Canada. There have been cut-backs in the crop insurance program. That was alluded to in one of my colleagues' statements in the House yesterday. This is another blow that has to be sustained by the farmers of Canada.

When you come right down to it, the government is just killing rural Canada. If we have to live with this government much longer, there will be nothing left of rural Canada. These kinds of vicious attacks on rural Canada have to come to a stop, and the sooner the better.

The Deputy Prime Minister yesterday indicated that there is some kind of emergency with respect to this bill. He wants us to ram it through as quickly as possible because he wants to reinstitute the program so that farmers can have cash advances. They will get the cash advances if this bill goes through but not interest free. They will have to pay interest.

Who brought on the emergency? First of all, the farmers did not ask for a suspension of this program precipitously and without any kind of notice. The program was suspended. It was put into limbo by provisions of the budget last spring. The farmers have been left with this hanging over their heads all through the latter part of the spring, right through the summer and now it is fall. Winter is coming. The grain is in the bin. Farmers have to pay bills and still this government dithers.

The government complains about getting this done. It has to get this bill through as though there were an emergency. Who caused it? It certainly was not the farmers of Canada. It certainly was not the members on this side of the House. It was those people over there. They have to take the blame for this. They have to take the responsibility.

I would say in my few closing moments that this program has to be rethought. It has to be reviewed. It is quite apparent that the government did this without consultation and without sitting down with the farm organizations and asking them what is best for farmers. If they had done that, the farmers of Canada would have told them to leave it alone, that it is a good program. It has been in place for 30 years, don't touch it. If you want to save money and fight the deficit, you have all kinds of areas where you can go. You do not have to kill a program that has been serving the farm community well and serving the entire country.

My plea is to have this bill withdrawn and redrafted. Go back to the drafting boards and come back with something that makes sense, something that is going to help farmers and the agricultural community and ultimately all Canadians and the country.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague for the very interesting speech which I listened to the other day. I continue to hear today that farmers are subject once again to the government's short-sighted view.

I would ask my hon. colleague if he feels that this government has said that basically there are no sacred cows in our society, everything is subject to meeting the yardstick of profit. Bottom line budgeting is the important goal. The links that bind us in such a unique way in this country that has a physical geography that is different than any other place in the world is not taken into consideration. Now out goes the infrastructure of a good VIA Rail transportation system. Out went Air Canada and Teleglobe to the private sector. Now you are talking about this new move with respect to the farmers. In my colleague's view, is this Tory view that the only sacred trust left is bottom line profit one that is shared by the farmers that he spoke to.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend because I think her questions reflect that she knows exactly what this government is doing. The fact is that there is nothing sacred in this country. There is nothing sacred about Canada in so far as this government is concerned. It wants to carry out a kind of revolution without consulting Canadians. Conservatives did not say in the election campaign that they were going to shut down half of VIA Rail, and we all know that if we shut half of it down the rest of it will wither away very quickly. Not only are they interested in only the so-called bottom line but they seem to be hell-bent on developing the great American model for this country.

I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, the American model will not work for Canada. It may work for the Americans. If it works for them, leave it for them, but it will not work here. It is not going to work to destroy subsidies in this country. It is not going to work to destroy VIA Rail. It is not going to work to privatize the post office. You can go on and on. The government is on the wrong track and some day soon even it will understand it. I am hoping that it will not be too late because if it continues much longer, there will be nothing left of this country.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend my colleague on an excellent address in the House of Commons. I am sorry there were not more Tory Members of Parliament from the west to hear this.

I have a press clipping saying that the Keystone Producers of the province of Manitoba wrote to the Prime Minister on September 15 demanding that this government keep this program in place so that the farmers are able to obtain their interest free cash advances on grains in storage. I also have a letter from the Manitoba Corn Producers Association asking the same thing. They say that the program has always been an excellent method of increasing the orderly marketing of corn in Manitoba and prevents any dumping of corn in the fall thereby having shortages of this commodity in the spring. It is only in recent years that corn has been developed as a cash crop and a crop alternative for Manitoba. I would like to ask my colleague what in his opinion the impact of the withdrawal of these interest free loans will be to the producers in Manitoba.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, the impact is going to be a very negative one. The Conservatives across the way do not have to take my word for it. In fact, they do not even have to take the word of any of us on this side of the House. All they have to do is listen to farmers and farm organizations.

It was pointed out very forcefully in this House just yesterday that 19 producer organizations met in Winnipeg and decided to make a plea to the Prime Minister to put a stop to this, to continue the advance payments interest free. When my hon. friend from Lambton—Middlesex asks what kind of impact it is going to have, I cannot think of better testimony and a better answer than the one that comes from the producer organizations. They are in the front lines. They are at ground level. They know exactly what is going to happen. They know the impact and they say the impact is going to be horrific. It is going to be terrible. It is not in the interests of the farm community. In fact, one of the ministers is sitting over there right now, and I think all he has to do is consult some of his friends in the provincial government of Manitoba. The agriculture minister there has said it is not in the interests of the farm community. It is not in the interests of Canada to discontinue this program. If they would only listen, they would know that the impact of this bill is going to be very, very negative.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this bill. I guess I am like many people in Canada and probably in the House of Commons. If you scratch me very hard, you will find a farmer, and if not, at least a farmer's son, and I guess I fall into that category.

My grandfather farmed in the Eastern Townships in Quebec, moved to Alberta and farmed a very prosperous farm in central Alberta near Camrose. The farm was then run by my uncle and now it is run by my cousin. The next generation has already purchased the farm next to him so that the Nodan farm in Duhamel is growing.

I think that is typical of Canadians. Nearly all of us come from farm families and therefore we continue to have an interest in the viability of agriculture, not only because it is one of our major economic bases but because we have friends, relatives and families who are dependent on the viability of agriculture.

I am a little bit bewildered by this bill because what I have learned about the introduction of legislation and programs by the Conservatives since I have been here is that they take a problem and they make it worse. Certainly in the areas I am most familiar with, social services and affordable housing, they do everything they can to take a problem and see if they can make it into a total and utter mess, with high interest rates and cut-backs in services. Here is one area where there appeared to be no problem, so I thought at least they would leave it alone. They have followed their rule that if there is a problem they intervene and make it worse, and now they are starting to say that if there is no problem, they still intervene and create a problem.

In talking with my cousin and his wife, because now in agriculture farmers farm as couples, I have learned that being a farmer now is much more complex than it was when I grew up and used to go to my grandfather's farm and then my uncle's farm. A farmer now has to be many, many things.

First, he has to be an agriculturalist. There are new crops that he must keep up with, new pesticides, new weed control, new methods of farming. It is no longer the simple thing it used to be 50 years ago in Canada when you knew what crops you were going to plant, what you were going to do in the spring and the fall. Now you have to look at new agricultural methods.

Most of the more successful farmers have gone to agricultural college or use very heavily the services of Agriculture Canada to keep them up to date as agriculturalists. Farmers also have to be mechanics and equipment operators. No longer is the equipment simple.

I can remember assisting my uncle with the old traditional John Deere tractor. Heck, even I could be a John Deere tractor mechanic. Now, in talking with my cousin, I find that you have a $75,000 or $100,000 machine that is very, very complex, that has computer controlled parts. It takes a skilled equipment operator to run it and a great deal of skill to maintain it.

The farms, if they are to be viable, have machine shops that are the envy of the old traditional machine shops in small towns. This is increasingly necessary as the small towns are disappearing. On my grandfather's farm, it used to be that between that farm and Camrose there were three small towns. Now there is nothing. If there is a breakdown, you either have to be able to repair your equipment yourself or be prepared to go all the way to Camrose, Wetaskiwin or one of the other major centres to have equipment repaired. Farmers just cannot do that. In addition to being an agriculturalist, you must also be a mechanic and an equipment operator.

Most important, both Doug and Irma tell me that they have to be business people. Running farms is now a complicated business. They must deal with complicated issues like cash flow, debt, debt ratio and advance payments. They must have lines of credit. It has become a complex business enterprise.

One reason the big corporate farms are too frequently taking over is because they have the business expertise. Too often in Canada we have seen the family farm disappear, not because the family farmer is not a good agriculturalist or a good machinist, but because he does not have the skills and the background in the business area.

This is what this bill is all about. This bill amends a piece of legislation that has allowed farmers to act as business people and to be able to deal with problems of debt and cash flow which are the major things that have got people into difficulty.

The government has said that there is an urgency to get this bill passed. I think it has already been mentioned that the urgency is of its own creation. There was a piece of legislation in place with which everybody was quite happy. It has been suspended and now there is an urgency to get this new piece of legislation through. It is true that farmers are now in a position where they are unable to get loans.

This bill simply has the net effect of doing away with the advance payments for crops, because if you can borrow and you have to pay interest, you have a line of credit at the bank and the bank will do it. It simply privatizes the whole exercise. It takes the government out of making the business part of farms economical in the sense that you are now a part of the total free market. If your line of credit is good at the bank, so be it. If your line of credit is a little shaky, maybe you will not get moneys advanced and then you are in the position where you cannot go ahead and put in your crops or do the necessary things to make your farm profitable. We have the government saying that there is an urgency while the farmers are saying, "Listen, the only urgency is that you created a problem".

One of the other things that I think is very significant in looking at the whole question of debt is that in 1971 there was about $11 billion owed by farmers in Canada. This figure was up to $18 billion as of 1986, which is a dramatic increase of 61 per cent. One has to remember that this was in a period when farms were viable economically. It was in one of our better periods for farms. We are now in a situation where there are problems with the financial viability of our farms.

Again, in 1987, the Senate report said that of the 22,500 farmers who borrowed money, there was a full 12 per cent who were in financial difficulty. In British Columbia, my home province, nearly one in 12 farmers who were borrowing were in financial difficulty. So it makes a vital difference to the business operation of the farm as to whether you are borrowing interest free, or whether you are borrowing an advance on your crops, non–interest free.

At least the Conservatives can take credit for this bill hitting every region of Canada equally. It is devastating to the corn and soybean producers in Ontario, to the market gardeners in Quebec, to the grain farmers on the prairies and certainly to farmers in British Columbia, including farmers in Surrey North.

I am delighted to be able to tell people that although my riding is considered an urban riding, it has a big agricultural finger to it that includes a lot of what we consider market gardening. boards; the B.C. Coast Vegetable Growers Co-op, The Island Vegetable Growers Co-op and the Interior Vegetable Growers Co-op. All of these boards are saying the same type of thing, that this bill not only distracts from the financial viability of the farms, but it is hurting the marketing system.

In Ontario it is going to force farmers to deliver their corn or soybeans as early as possible in order to get cash flow. If deliveries can be spread out over different periods of time, particularly in the spring, there would not be shortages.

In the prairies the whole marketing system has become very complex. I grew up in many little prairie towns around Calgary. Most of those prairie towns do not now exist. We had 100 people at a family reunion on my grandfather's farm two summers ago and the last elevator was being boarded up at Duhamel. What the whole town has stood for since the turn of the century has basically gone. A lot of it has to do with the grain marketing system. It has been consolidated into larger centres. The number of storage facilities on farms has increased dramatically.

One of the things I should have mentioned is that the farmer, at least on the prairies, not only has to be an agriculturalist, a machinist and a business person, he has to be an elevator operator.

Marketing is very important. The marketing system can only accommodate 40 per cent of the crops. There has to be some mechanism where the storage and the delivery is evened out over a longer period of time. There has been an attempt to encourage the marketing so that there is less and less grain put into large storage facilities, but it is brought to the elevators and marketed when the transportation systems can accommodate it. The whole marketing and movement of agricultural products has become a very complex system in Canada.

The farm and marketing organizations say that one of the spin-offs in this bill is that it is going to make it that much more difficult to maintain the orderly marketing of farm products, and not only for grains. The same thing is true in vegetables. People are going to be forced, in order to get cash, to deliver to markets at an inopportune time.

The funny thing about this bill which I have also mentioned, is that it follows the Conservative tradition of, "If it is broken, make it worse; if it is not broken, let's create a problem". But also it follows the Tory tradition that nearly all of the Tories are opposed to it.

At Conservative meetings farmer after farmer and person after person representing organizations stood up and clearly denounced this measure. Yet what seems to happen is that the style of government that is being developed in Canada is, if it is not a problem, let's make a problem; if the government's actions are opposed by the Canadian public, by the people affected, and by the bulk of the people within the Tory party, that only makes it that much more gung-ho to go ahead. I just do not understand it.

I and the New Democratic Party are opposed to this, and we are opposed to it for three or four fundamental reasons. One, it makes the family farm less viable. We want to protect a way of life in Canada that allows families to stay on their farms. That is what has built this country, and made it unique. We do not want to get into a situation where the only people who can manage farms are the big financial corporate farms. It hurts the family farms. It hurts the consumers because it interrupts the marketing, whether those consumers be from marketing boards for farm vegetables or are international consumers. In our grains, which is a major part of our export trade, we are disrupting the consumer pattern and it hurts the smooth marketing of farm products.

Finally, it does nothing of any substance toward the reduction of the debt. It is laughable. What is the saving, $27 million or $28 million? If the government would drop the interest rate one percentage point, it would save ten times that amount. This is absolutely ridiculous. We are creating havoc within a vital sector of our economy to save an amount of money that is almost insignificant.

I notice the Speaker is signalling time. I will close with this final comment. I urge the government to reconsider this bill. Family farms have built Canada. I hope that you are not the people that destroy them.

Mr. Crawford: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for clarification. He mentioned vegetables, especially pertaining to red beets, carrots and tomatoes. Would he please clarify the advance payments and the interest paid on those crops?

Mr. Karpoff: I am afraid I cannot give details as to what the advance payments were on specific crops such as beans. I know that in British Columbia, with the vegetable marketing co-ops, the advance payment is a significant part of the cash flow. In dollar terms I know that the total amount of borrowing is $11 billion, but in terms of the total borrowings with the bill the amount went from about $35 million in 1957-58 to $330 million in 1980-81, and up to $563 million in the last crop year. I do not have before me the breakdown by agricultural section.

I know that in all of the various farming communities it is not the total amount, it is what it means to the individual farmer. Whether a very, very large farmer borrows $10,000 or $20,000 with interest or interest free is insignificant. But to a lot of our family farmers the ability to borrow $30,000 interest free is of exceptional significance.

So while I cannot give details by agricultural section as to the amounts of the advances, I know that individual farmers, whether they be a market gardener, a farmer in Ontario growing grain or corn, or a farmer in Alberta, the ability to borrow money plays a significant part in his ability to keep operating.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of us in this country who see a disturbing pattern, and this particular bill, we believe, is a part of that pattern. The pattern that we see shutdowns at VIA Rail, the shutdown of post offices, cuts in the crop insurance program, cuts in regional development, and we could go on and on. There is this disturbing pattern.

The previous speaker alluded to the supply management system that we have in this country. I think he is concerned that the Conservative government will ultimately cripple the supply management system. I happen to believe that it is in peril because of government policy.

But there is something else, and this is the question I have for my hon. friend for British Columbia. I sort of smell a rat and I smell it from the point of view of the free trade agreement. The free trade agreement reminds one of harmonization and the level playing field, those types of things. Why would the government deliberately get rid of this program, at least the interest free portion of it which is a subsidy of a kind? It is not very expensive, only about $27 million. Why would the government eliminate this particular feature of the program just before it begins some serious subsidy negotiations with the Americans? I would like to ask my hon. friend whether he sees a pattern there with respect to the FTA.

Mr. Karpoff: I think that there is no doubt that the free trade agreement permeates every move that the government makes. And yes, there are concerns that the free trade agreement, directly and indirectly, is going to attack our marketing boards and our management systems. I do not understand why at this time but the information I have American program to reduce or offset their equivalents in the 1989-90 year.

It seems that not only are we saying to the Americans that we will give them a level playing field but, if necessary because of the free trade agreement, we will give them more than a level playing field, we will give them an advantage. I think that that is what will seriously hurt us in the long run in Canada.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to comment on this bill and in particular to try to enlighten the Minister of Employment and Immigration, although it is virtually an impossible task to undertake, but I am always prepared to try for miracles, particularly for someone who is totally and completely abysmally ignorant about what is taking place in western Canada and conditions that pertain there.

Nevertheless, the House of Commons is a place where one must valiantly try his best to open up the closed minds that have been so dominant opposite. I think we all have read in our textbooks at one time or another about Chinese water torture, where drip by drip you wear down resistance, drip by drip you wear down the opposition to the point where they yell "surrender".

That is a proper metaphor for what this government is doing to the agricultural community of Canada. Day by day, drip by drip, program by program, the agricultural community of this country is feeling the heavy hand of this government as it attempts to fundamentally restructure and reorganize the element of agriculture that has been built up over the last 100 years in this country. It is a design. One has to acknowledge that there is a certain implicit, if not nefarious agenda behind all these actions. It is simply to turn over agriculture to the corporate community of Canada, the big agri-farm system, to ensure that those who have given their support to the trade agreement and provided the contributions to their treasuries will find some satisfaction. The people who they can dine out with, who put on the tuxedos and get the high-priced tickets for the big dinners are the people who their agriculture policy is designed to meet.

We have seen, over the last couple of years, a whole series of decisions. Of course, this bill in itself represents perhaps one of the clearest examples of a direct attack specifically on the family farm itself.

It is an attack specifically on those smaller farmers who for years have been able to rely upon a combination of crops and activities but who need a cash flow, some sense of certitude there would be a cash flow so that they can do the bridge financing necessary to buy the seed and prepare the ground and to do all the necessary development for the next crop year. That is what the advance cash payments have provided. Year after year they provided a level of stability, a level of certainty and a level of planning into the food cycle.

I agree that the big corporate farm friends of the minister of grains and oilseeds do not need that. They have their own corporate reserves and their treasuries. The advance cash payments are not something that is essential to them, so of course, the immediate conclusion is to get rid of them. Why have a program that does not suit our friends, they say. Why do something that has its own social and economic implications but is not part of our universe, is not part of our little clique?

We have a government that does not govern for most Canadians. It governs for a small elite and the rest of us are abandoned. The rest are exiles in this country. They are simply part of a large, forgotten majority who does not feel that they have access to or any contact with the national Government of Canada.

One can imagine the dyspepsia in the stomachs of the ministers opposite because they realize all of a sudden that what they have been trying to do piece by piece in covert fashion is finally being exposed. Finally we are beginning to see that there is a master plan and that is to totally revolutionize and radicalize the system of agriculture in this country and that they are using a whole variety of instruments to achieve it. This bill is only one instrument, I would suggest to you,

I draw to your attention a series of developments that have taken place; the substantial increase in the grain freight rates, the cancellation of grain shipments to Churchill, the way in which it has niggardly provided a drought assistance program to the point where many farmers have yet to receive it or received only partial payments, the pull-out of certain stabilization programs and, one that I deal with on a day by day basis, the enormous problems being faced in the area of trade.

Agriculture in this country is an export market. As a country we have taken some real pride in that. Our agriculture has led export markets and has made fortunes for this country over the years for everybody, city dweller and farm dweller alike.

That is perhaps the area which has proven to be most vulnerable, most under attack, most susceptible to the kind of wrenching that is taking place. Look what happened. The minister of grains and oilseeds could not wait for the ink to dry on the free trade agreement before he blew out the Wheat Board on its responsibility for oats. The haste with which he did it was not even polite. It was not even a polite burial. He could hardly contain his glee when he ran off to immediately undermine the responsibility of the Wheat Board in that crucial area.

Then, of course, we have what I think stands as one of the great big lies of our time. I have sat in the House now since we have opened and listened to the Minister of Agriculture and the minister of grains and oilseeds saying—and I applaud their theatrics—with a straight face, with the solemnity of a Baptist preacher, that when it comes to the decision on GATT dealing with yogurt and ice cream it has nothing to do with free trade.

Somehow they have convinced themselves, or are certainly trying to convince Canadians, that it has nothing to do with free trade. And yet I went back into Hansard, a useful record for Canadians to recognize, and I can quote to you the statements made by the former minister of agriculture, since retired. out and retire. He stood up in the House and said: "Now I recognize and I realize that taking the tariffs off these agricultural products will create a real threat to the marketing system". He said: "However, I have a solution for you, a solution that is airtight, guaranteed. We will put import controls on these products".

The former minister of agriculture fully recognized that the free trade agreement, by bringing to zero the tariff level for a wide range of imports, was going to put under real attack the market supply system and particularly the dairy industry. But he knew that he could probably get through the election, aided by that multimillion dollar propaganda campaign, the great lie that somehow import controls would protect dairy farmers across Canada, particularly in Quebec, Ontario and other places.

Well, certain members on this side challenged that and said that it just will not work that well. As is so often the case, the questions we raised have become the reality and the truth of today. The fact of the matter is that they knew it would never work. They knew it was a placebo. They knew it was a subterfuge all the time. But rather than simply admitting what a dangerous, serious threat it raises to the entire supply and management system of Canada, they are now saying, "Oh, the GATT made me do it", somehow ignoring the fact that the free trade agreement was the catalyst, was the initiation, was the beginning of the process bringing the supply and management field to its destruction. What sophistry, what complete and total sophistry.

Of course, let us not stop there. I know that the Minister of Employment and Immigration is now leaving so she can go to the confessional booth and get off her conscience the sins that have been committed against the agricultural community of Canada. I would say a few Hail Marys more because there is more to come, Madam Minister.

Let us talk about the pork decision, another matter of uncertainty for the farmers. We heard in this House from 1984 to 1988 the former Minister of Agriculture and others say don't worry, and we had the Canadian pork producers out there on the barricades fighting for free trade. Why? Because they believed and were told that there would be no problem, they had guaranteed access to the U.S. market. They said that free trade gives you guaranteed access.

I can remember the Prime Minister coming to western Canada and saying that the farmers would have to support free trade because it is the only way that the government could guarantee against U.S. harassment, and the multitudes rose up and said "Hallelujah, we've been saved".

Except, like Jimmy Swaggart and all the other fraudulent evangelists who have been defrocked over the last year, so has the Prime Minister, and his great call for salvation for the Canadian farmer has once again been exposed as simply one more false promise.

He knew again that the Americans, while we were off negotiating the free trade agreement, were also running through Congress a new trade bill and that trade bill carried new measures that gave U.S. farmers even more protection, more right to harass us, and that those measures were going to be cemented in to the free trade agreement. But did the government caution the farm community, did it warn the farmers what was coming? Did it say, "Look folks, I'm sorry, but the American Congress is out passing a new piece of legislation. That legislation is going to give them the right to tackle all our subsidy programs, our stabilization programs so we are going to have to stop the negotiations for a moment and see how we can provide for better protection". No, it went ahead, and the government signed the deal in full knowledge that it was committing the crime of dishonesty against the Canadian farmer.

Now we have a pork decision that comes out and we hear all these great cries of alarm from ministers opposite that we must appeal to the GATT. Is it not remarkable, is it not incredible, that only a few short months ago the government was saying "We don't need the GATT. We are going to sign a free trade agreement, that will give us secure access"? Now it is saying "God, I hope GATT can save us". We know that under the free trade agreement the only basis upon which we can challenge U.S. decisions now is whether they fairly administered their own trade law. We have to give Americans credit. They are honest, they are fair, they are administering their own trade law as they see fit.

If that was not enough we come back to the latest row, U.S. fears Durum imports. Here is another little hooker in U.S. trade legislation that no one quite talked about, that the previous Minister of Agriculture or the Minister for International Trade did not quite get around to talking to our farm community about. That is that under the U.S. trade legislation, commodity groups, producer groups and industrial groups now have the right to petition the department of commerce when they see an export from Canada that they do not like. They can petition the U.S. commerce department to do their research for them, to do all the work for them. It is cost free harassment. Why would they not use it? Why would they not say "Well, I can carve out a bigger market for myself by pushing out Canadian exports and I can get the U.S. government to do the work for me. I do not have to pay anything, I just fill out a petition". Why would they not do it?

When we presented exactly the same case on the floor of this House when we debated the trade bill, our minister of trade said that we do not need it because we are going to defend our farmers.

The North Dakota Wheat Association is now taking a petition to the U.S. department of commerce to look at Canadian Durum imports. It is having all the research done for them. If our farm community is going to combat that it will have to raise a couple of million dollars to pay for those high priced Washington lawyers and lobbyists to make the case.

Is it any wonder that there is a great sense of disillusionment, one end of this country does not know where to turn.

I do not want to depress you further, Mr. Speaker, because I know you are deeply sensitive about these issues, but the fact of the matter is that it does not stop there either. As part of this new program, the new renascence for agriculture in Canada, we now have the Canadian delegation at Geneva tabling a new negotiating paper on agriculture subsidies. Let us put aside for a moment all the protestations of the Minister of Agriculture and the minister of trade that they are here to defend the Canadian farmer.

What they are negotiating as our senior officials at Geneva tabled is what they call a "tariffication program", which would lump together all of the subsidy programs and give it a tariff equivalent. Then they would negotiate how we can reduce that total bundle of tariff programs. The transportation subsidy programs, grain stabilization, drought assistance and advance cash payments programs—everything—are going to be put in the same bundle. A value is going to be attached to it, and then we are going to negotiate with all the other countries to bring those values down. What that means is that we put every single agricultural support program up for bargaining, up for negotiation.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is that an honest approach for the Canadian farmer? Is that what we are saying to them? I suppose, if you are one of those big agri-corporate farm organizations with multi-billion dollar markets around the world, that is not going to bother you too much. But if you are a farmer with a section or two in western Canada or in southwestern Ontario, growing some corn or with a dairy basis, it does bother you. All of a sudden you find out that you cannot pay your bills any more and that the kind of support program that you relied upon, like advance cash payments or grain transportation programs or whatever it may be, simply will not be there.

What do you tell your kids who want to keep on farming? What do you say to your son or your daughter? Do you say: "Stay in the farming business. It is a great opportunity"? Or, do you say: "Maybe you should become a chartered accountant so you can go to work for the government trying to figure out how the GST is going to really mess up the Canadian economy"? That is the biggest employment opportunity that Canadians will face. That is what we are going to tell them to do.

Mr. Harvard: Be a tax cop.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Oh, sure. My friend from Winnipeg St. James says what we could probably do is hire all of those people who have to leave the farm to become tax policemen, or maybe go to work for the banks that are now foreclosing on the mortgages. We can have an army of people out there determining how they can wring further every seed from the lemon of a farm community in this country. That is the new Tory plan.

Once they get the prices down, once they get the farmers surrendering, once they get the sense of frustration and hopelessness on a high level, that is when they can move in and buy up those farms at cheap prices. That is when they can begin reorganizing and restructuring the land into a corporate system. All of a sudden, we will have a new system in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I simply put forward to you that that is not the only way it has to be done. There was a time in this country when agriculture was not simply measured by the cost accountant's calculations. One did not bring out the slide rule or the computer, as we witnessed today from the Minister of Transport. We believed that there was a certain sanctity in federal presence and programs providing a stability and underpinning to certain kinds of communities. We believed that one of the reasons for maintaining the concept of a family farm was because it was the keystone of a way of life, a keystone of smaller communities and towns and villages. That is what is disappearing from this country.

Let me talk about a relative of mine who is a school trustee just outside North Battleford. Sitting down over lunch with her just recently and talking about what it is like to be a school trustee in a rural township, the crucial, critical question was: How do you keep a science teacher in high school knowing that you are going to have to increase the mill rate by seven or eight points and farmers cannot pay it? Yet you know that if the science teacher goes, your own kids will not get the same level of education as they would in a town or the city. This is the anguish they go through to make that crucial choice of how to keep one science teacher in a small town. It becomes for them not a statistic. It is not a calculation that you run through Statistics Canada to obtain what makes sense. It is a human problem. It is a real problem. That decision, once made, means a disappearance of a way of life.

It is the same every time the government pulls out of a post office or says: "The train will not stop here any more" and reduces even further the federal presence and activity, a sense that there is a government that is trying at least to give some elementary sense of underpinning to those communities. They are going to give up. They are giving up. They are leaving the farms by the hundreds of thousands, because they no longer feel that there is any real hope out there.

This legislation that we are debating today is not simply an isolated action, drawn to try to reorganize or rationalize the farm program. It is one of the most sinister and direct attacks upon an important way of life and an important set of communities in this country. We are going to pay an enormous consequence for it.

How much longer this erosion or ravaging of the farm community can continue is hard to say. We do not know where it will stop and how it will continue. What we do know is that if legislation like this bill continues—and we are seeing more and more of it—there will be a further feeling of people being exiled in their own country, being abandoned by their own government and feeling that there is no longer a place for them to call themselves Canadians.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague who spoke so eloquently and specifically about the situation that is happening to the family farm in Canada. In representing an urban riding there is one thing my colleague touched upon that many people in urban ridings understand, that is the sanctity of life when there is a family living and working on a farm—the caring, the approachability, the passion, and the integrity of these families. Many of us who live in the city are looking for ways to help preserve the family farm.

My question is: What specific advice can you give to the millions of Canadians who care about the family farm? What actions can those of us who live in cities take to make sure the care, attention and support a national government must give to the family farm are activated again?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is a good question. It is one that has not been asked often enough by people who live in our urban areas. Too quickly we forget our roots. Most of us have migrated as my family did. My grandparents were farmers in Saskatchewan, one or two generations removed. We forget very quickly when we come to a city that we are not that far away and how much of our own well-being in the country is dependent upon the continued existence of a stable farm food system.

I think the first priority all Canadians must be asked to accept is that we must have a security of food supply. That is where I say to my hon. friend from Toronto that the interest of a downtown resident of Toronto is as crucial as it is for the farmer in North Battleford or in southwestern Ontario.

If we lose that sense of security that we can control and manage our own farm food supply, that we will not be dependent on other monopolies, we will lose not just on the price side but we will also lose something on the environmental side. We will be encouraging the ravaging of the forests of Latin America to provide beef or the incredible ravaging of the lands of southwestern United States which have been totally denuded because of the use of chemicals and pesticides. There is an integrated linkage or cycle that we all belong to.

When you pick up your corn wrapped in cellophane in a package in your supermarket, it is a decision that if you did it in a different way and were prepared to pay a proper price you would not listen to these savage prophets on the other side who say: "If we get rid of supply management we can have cheaper food". Yes, maybe this month, but try next year or the year after.

It must be recognized that right now in Canada we have one of the most bountiful breadbaskets in the world. We also have been very careful because of our tender ecology and our fragile environment to build into it a system that supports farmers against the cycles of world markets and bad climate. That is what we have to get people to accept. It may cost more in terms of pennies, but in the long run we will save thousands of dollars in terms of what it means to be Canadian.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed the following bills without amendment: Bill C–6, an act to amend the Radio Act and certain other acts in consequence thereof; Bill C–17, an act to amend the Customs Tariff; and Bill C–19, an act to amend the Canadian Exploration and Development Incentive Program Act.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

• (1640)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Government House
Ottawa

October 4, 1989

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Beverley McLachlin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in her capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 4th day of October, at 4.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the Royal Assent to certain Bills.

Yours sincerely
Jean M. Sévigny
Deputy Secretary, Operations

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–36, an act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Foster (p. 4275).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On questions or comments, the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre touched a chord, because I can say unequivocally that all of us have a lot at stake when it comes to the farm community. It is not just farmers or the small towns but it is people like the hon. member next to me who comes from Toronto.

I grew up on a farm in southern Manitoba. I know what it is like to go through a harvest period, getting up at five o'clock in the morning, getting the machinery ready for the work on the land during the day, milking cows, going out and combining all day. If you did not have dew on the grass, if you did not have dew on the stubble, you could perhaps combine until midnight, one o'clock or two o'clock in the morning. We would get perhaps two or three hours of sleep so that we could get up early in the morning and go to work and repeat the cycle.

What I am getting at is that farmers do not do it just for fun or for just making a living. It is a lifestyle. They believe in it. They enjoy it. They want it to continue. It is this lifestyle that they are trying to continue to hold on to.

When they go out during the harvest period or during the spring planting, they work perhaps 16, 18 or 20 hours a day some days. They do not ask for over time. They do not ask for an extra stipend. They do it because they love to work on the land.

I have a question for the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. It has to do with eliminating the interest free portion of the advance cash payments system. It seems to me that the government is throwing away an advantage or throwing away something in the forthcoming subsidy negotiations. To me, this is a subsidy.

What the government seems to be doing is saying: "We will take off all the subsidies, all the assistance that we give to farmers, and then we will go to the bargaining table". To me, that is putting the cart before the horse. I would like the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre to comment on that.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I suppose if you have watched this government negotiate in the last five years you would not be surprised. Everything is done backward. Somehow there seems to be a negotiating style which is that if I surrender right from the start everything I possibly have, maybe you will think me a nice person and therefore not tromp on me. It is a reverse style. It is not standing up, using the integrity of your own existing programs or defending them. It is simply looking at the agenda.

I would just like to provide members of the House with this advice. If they want to know what is next on the agenda, I refer them to the executive order that was passed by the U.S. President as part of the free trade deal. All the programs that the Americans identified as being unfair trade practices committed by Canada, left over from the free trade agreement, are the very things that this government is now eliminating: regional payments on unemployment insurance, grain stabilization and advance payments. It is all in the American document.

I simply say to you, Mr. Speaker, if we want to know what the negotiating style and agenda and blueprint for the Mulroney government is, we have to read what the U.S. President wrote a year ago.

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the previous speaker. I chanced to sit on a municipal council for a short while. The mayor of the council was a dairy farmer. He used to take a great amount of time to explain to me about the farm since I was from the city and I knew very little about it. I paid great interest to what he was saying.

He suggested that, the way things are going, perhaps in 20 years from now the dairy farmers like other farmers will most likely lose their farms because of the policies that we see. We could become a country where the farms would be owned by huge international companies like Shell Oil, for example, and the Canadian farmers of today would be the workers on those farms and no longer the owners. More and more we would see the farms become extremely huge and, as I said, owned by these international companies. I wonder if the member would make a comment on that suggestion.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the prognosis is correct. Unfortunately the time frame is much shorter. I wish that we had 20 years because it would mean that we could get rid of this government, bring in a proper government, and try to repair the damage they have done.

Mr. Cardiff: You had your chance.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): We did a good job for the dairy farmers in this country. What has happened is that because of the decision on ice cream and yogurt that was precipitated by signing the free trade deal, we are now faced with an immediate threat to the entire supply and market system of the dairy industry in Canada. That is not 20 years down the track; that is a month or two down the track. If that decision happens, then the structure of the dairy system that we have built up in this country will go into shambles. That is why time is of the essence.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if my comments are going to conflict with the visit from the Senate or not. If they do, I hope you will give me the balance of my time.

I am pleased to take this opportunity to speak in reference to one of Canada's primary industries, that of agriculture. I want to zero in specifically on this bill and perhaps do it from a slightly different angle than what we have been hearing. As you know the bill will become part of the APCA—and most farmers know what that means—in addition to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

I am particularly interested in the effect of the changes that this bill will impose on the industry and the fallout that it might have on the economy of the country. I am hearing great wails these days from the implement manufacturers and the implement distributors. There is just no business there these days, they tell me, because of the great uncertainties that exist in the industry.

The main purpose of the APCA was nothing more than a method of encouraging orderly marketing of goods. That staple arrangement was a good one. It is an excellent one. Most farmers appreciated it. The marketing program that we have now in place without any amendments has been very successful. It has put some order into the marketing of crops to the benefit of everyone.

If a producer can afford to put his crop on the market over a period of time, and that is what this bill would allow him to do if it is not changed, he can be assured of a better price. It is as simple as that. It is an old story. When there is a glut of produce on the market at harvest time the price goes down, naturally. But if the producer can store his product, keep it for a while, he can normally show, under normal conditions, a much better return on his investment. The present arrangement is a good one. It is an excellent arrangement.

It is not only good for the producer at harvest time; it is a good arrangement for consumers. It assures the consumer of a good supply of quality food year round. That is what it provides for.

I see some similarity in the way of orderly marketing that this provided for and the effect that it has on stabilizing the market with milk marketing boards. I think there is a tremendous similarity there. I just want to expand on that a bit.

The same good effects are realized with an orderly system of marketing dairy products. It supplies the consumer with an excellent source of supply year round at a good price.

I do not think anyone is determined to put the farmer out of business, even those on the other side of the House, but I really wonder sometimes if they have an appreciation of the dilemma that is starting to set in, in the industry, a dilemma brought about recently with a couple of decisions which they have been alluded to from all directions here this afternoon.

I will talk about those two recent decisions just for a second or two. Then I want to pursue, if I may, how I see the need to stabilize the agricultural industry and develop briefly the good effect that stabilization has on any industry, whether it be milk or produce of other grain or corn. A stable industry is the best industry for all concerned—the producer, the consumer and the processor.

The supply management marketing system which I think is under some degree of threat right now—and I know dairy farmers agree with me on that one—in the dairy industry like the APCA is just another way, a proven way, and the best way for all concerned. Again the supplier, consumer and processor—everybody was happy with that controlled marketing system. It was the envy of the world.

Let us examine, just for a minute—and I can remember these days—the system that existed in the dairy industry before we had an organized marketing board. Anyone who was ever close to a farm 35 or 40 years ago will have to agree with what I am going to say. You can recall perhaps the flow of milk hitting the market varied. It depended on many factors. Many of those factors were out of the control of the individual farmer. It depended on the season. It depended on the feed. It depended on the weather. Many things could affect the supply of milk that was on the market on a given day or in a given week. It was a terribly unsettling situation for anyone who wanted to make a career out of farming. It was just too risky.

Most of the factors that I have mentioned affecting supply were beyond the control of the individual farmer. Somebody had to come in. Somebody had to impose some system on to it to put some order into it, or no one would stay in the industry.

As a result, because of the flow, because of the highs and the lows, there was a tremendous instability in the market. There was too much of the product at one time, followed along weeks later where there was a shortage. You can imagine the way that the price would be following the supply. When there was an abundance on the market of course the price would drop. When there was a shortage on the market the price would go up. Can you imagine anybody in the industry trying to decide that they were going to expand their industry with that kind of fluctuation in the market? It was just impossible to do.

There was no control then on the market at all, reflecting those great swings in supply, followed by dramatic rises in price, immediately followed when the supply became plentiful again with a fall out of the bottom of the market. As a matter of fact, there were times when you could not even give away the product. You pour it on the ground because there was no thought at that time that a marketing board would ever work. But the Liberal Government made it work. I think it is a credit to the former Liberal government under Eugene Whelan that set marketing boards on a path that they could follow. I find, as the days go by, that we are picking at those processes. We are picking at them through this proposed legislation. One by one the farmers are starting to fall under the pressure.

Without an orderly marketing system the problems just feed on themselves. Without stability in price farmers could not plan ahead. They could not advance their operations because of the uncertainties in their industry with the result that many got out. The problem was that it was too risky for them and occasionally too many would get out. Then you had the reverse effect of a shortage of supply and you were on the roller coaster again.

This bill puts some stability into the market. It is not an expensive proposition if you are talking about dollars. I really question the motive behind the government in tampering with that when it was a relatively inexpensive source of revenue. It was interest free. But why keep the program at all if you are going to pay interest on it? I am sure most progressive farmers would say: "Well, we will go to the bank and borrow our money there".

The important thing in something as basic as food is that measures are needed to ensure a constant supply, a year-round constant supply of a good product at a good price. That is what this program was endeavouring to do. It would stabilize the market to allow a steady flow of produce into the market. This is so necessary when we are talking about something as basic as food. I do not think we should allow the basic supply of food to swing with the market, with the extremes that went with the market-place. It is just too important.

In stabilizing the market as it applies to the agricultural industry, whether it is grain or dairy product, it does not matter; the same support system is necessary and needed. It was appreciated by Canadian farmers. It is the best deal for all concerned.

To initiate programs where none exist now with this government seems to be a thing of the past. I am suggesting that the government could at least support the good programs that are in place. They are not expensive. I think everything possible should be done to see that they are protected because they have the effect of stabilizing a very important aspect in an industry in this country which is one of our basic programs.

That is what the program is designed to do. That is what it is all about. That is what it was doing. It does by making free interest loans available to farmers, allowing the farmer to release their crops onto the market in an orderly manner. Interest free loans allow farmers to do this. Otherwise, they would have to release their products onto the market as soon as they were harvested. We all know what the price would be at that point.

I am not sure if the processors and the multinationals would agree with me. I doubt very much if they would. They would like it very much if the cash strapped farmer would come with hat in hand, begging to sell his crops in a hurry because he is probably in the position where he has to get rid of his produce at bargain basement prices. You know the devastating effect that would have on the industry and on the individual farmer, even over a short period of time.

If the government could make some loan money available, the farmer would not be placed in that pressure situation where he must sell in order to stay afloat. That is what the concern of farmers has always been, the ability to stay afloat.

What I am asking for is that the government try to appreciate the dilemma in which some farmers will find themselves and the effect that this will have on the industry.

ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

• (1710)

And being returned:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate Chamber the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following Bills:

Bill C-6, An Act to amend the Radio Act and certain other Acts in consequence thereof—Chapter No. 17.

Bill C-17, An Act to amend the Customs Tariff—Chapter No. 18.

Bill C-19, An Act to amend the Canadian Exploration and Development Incentive Program Act—Chapter No. 19.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-36, an Act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Foster (p.4275).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Continuing debate with the Hon. Member for Leeds—Grenville.

Mr. Jordan: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if the government appreciates the dilemma that the cutting out of this program, this ability to borrow money interest free, will put on farmers who are already very disillusioned about a couple of recent decisions.

They were given assurance through the free trade debate that ice cream, yogurt, and ice cream novelties as they are called were on the import control list so they were protected. That was a fallacy. The countervail on pork will come up again, I understand, on October 11. There is some sort of provision to have it appealed. We will see how they make out with that.

We must become more competitive internationally is the part that I take exception to when it comes to dealing with basic food supply. I can tell the members opposite that if they go toe to toe with the Americans in the dairy industry, they are going to lose. There is absolutely no question about that. I think it is significant that they appreciate that dilemma.

You do not need to go very far, about 10 or 12 hours drive from here, to see herds of cows which get milked three times a day. This was unheard of until recently. The cow is really a machine. They push feed through it and milk it. It is at the scale that Canadian farmers will not be able to compete with because things are largely out of their control. Good luck is a factor. It is great if you can get it consistently, but you cannot count on luck in the agricultural industry.

The only solution that I see for Canadian farmers is to get government assistance in developing government strategies to counteract that. That is the category in which I place this program. This is an excellent government strategy to counteract all the difficulties of trying to survive in the agricultural industry under our climatic conditions. Why then would you dispense with it? It is not, as I mentioned before, that expensive to maintain, and if it is going to keep some semblance of order in the agricultural community, why would you dispose of it?

We can support farmers by offering these programs which give them financial assistance until such time as they can market their products in an orderly fashion on an annual basis and hopefully be able to survive. Otherwise I see the multinationals moving in and buying the crops. They will buy the grain when it is harvested. Not because they need that grain or corn at that particular time, that is not the point. They are not buying it because there is a need for it and because they have an immediate market for it. They are buying it because they are opportunists and they are taking advantage of the farmer who cannot weather it out because he is cash-strapped, and unless he is given some assistance he will soon be under. My plea to the government is that it try to appreciate the dilemma in which it is placing farmers in the climatic conditions under which farmers operate. The government must give the farmers some assistance and must not try to compete with the Americans in the dairy industry because I know who is going to lose.

If there is a program that is working these days, I think there is some moral obligation on the government to maintain that program. GATT said to put a freeze on some of these programs. GATT did not say to discontinue them. So I do not see any obligation on the part of the government to discontinue this program that is working. Leave it in place, support it, beef it up a little bit to help the farmer so he can survive.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, I listened closely to the member from Leeds—Grenville as he spoke, and to other members from his Party. I even heard the member for Winnipeg South Centre talking about the way that this government had reacted to pressures under the Free Trade Agreement.

Even his Party and farm organizations that had not supported this government in its free trade discussions and expanding the market-place for all Canadian products through free trade recognize and support GATT. The instruments that we believe, including free trade and GATT to benefit both agriculture and other manufactured products in Canada are a very necessary mixture.

The rulings that were discussed were rulings made by GATT. But unlike the member who spoke before I do not want to speak about something that I do not know anything about. I only want to speak about the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act as part of this bill.

The Liberal party, the Official Opposition, in assisting those farmers the Liberal member said needed assistance now, needed money now, has put forward a six-months' hoist as an amendment to delay the debate, to delay the implementation of this legislation that farmers want passed. That does not assist farmers. The Official Opposition has put forward a six-month delay when there are producers out there today who would like this bill passed tonight.

Mr. Fulton: Name one.

Mr. McKnight: The member from the New Democratic Party who comes from a wheat-producing area of northern British Columbia and the Queen Charlotte Islands wants me to name one. I can tell the hon. member that there are phone calls to the Department of Agriculture as well as phone calls to my office. I encourage every producer out there in western Canada to phone the Official Opposition, to phone those members of Parliament and tell them to stop this silliness of a six-month delay in legislation that will allow producers to receive cash advances at prime and in increased amounts, Mr. Speaker, from $30,000 to $250,000. What these members are putting forward is a delay in giving farmers an opportunity to receive cash advances on grain that they have produced.

The opposition is saying that this program will jeopardize orderly marketing. It will not jeopardize orderly marketing, because if people have an opportunity to receive a cash advance, then they are not forced into the open market. What the opposition is doing is forcing producers to go away from orderly marketing that we support in western Canada. They are saying, "Don't give them a cash advance. Delay it for six months". Then, Mr. Speaker, they will have to sell on the open market.

I ask the member this question. They will have an opportunity to receive increased amounts under the amendments, an opportunity for smaller producers, who, I am sure the member for the New Democratic Party knows, pay a larger interest. They have always said that the big guys get the breaks, the little guys don't. This allows a guarantee from the Government of Canada to the financial institutions, and they will be borrowing money as cheap or more cheaply than the large producers. Does he believe that that is good for small producers, or does he wish to force them into the open market system by not allowing this legislation to proceed for six months?

Mr. Jordan: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if the member is trying to run out the clock, but it took him a long time to tell us that he obviously does not understand the amendment. The amendment wants to delay changing the present legislation, withhold the amendments, because the farmer is just now harvesting his crop. He started out his year at seed time with the expectations, I suspect, that he would have access to this interest free money. If this legislation goes through without amendment at this time, he will no longer have this access to industry money. We are saying at this side of the House, delay that until at least we get through this harvest year, the crops are sold and the money is made available and then put it up again for discussion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On debate, the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C-36, and perhaps to educate the Minister of National Defence a little bit about the grain industry. One would have thought that someone from the Prairies would know something about the grain industry, but I suppose because I have one of the largest and most efficient grain elevators in the world in Prince Rupert, I have had an opportunity to learn a little more about grain than the minister has.

I might as well leap right off the top, Mr. Speaker, with what was quoted from The Western Producer. My friend from Prince Albert—Churchill River made note of it yesterday but certainly what the Conservative delegates, many of them farmers, had to say at the recent meetings on the Prairies are worth repeating here because the minister does not seem to understand what the implications are of wiping out the assistance that has been provided under the existing legislation through the government picking up interest costs and why that has added, not taken away, from orderly marketing of grains and crops.

This headline not only caught my colleague's eye, but it certainly caught mine because it said: "Rural PCs line up at convention to air their gripes". It goes on to say:

> Conservative farm policies were attacked last week by rural delegates attending the Progressive Conservative national convention.
> They said despite official government optimism and self-congratulations, conditions are bad down on the farm. And government policy is driving rural voters away from Conservatives, they warned.
> There was scarcely a word of praise for past government performance or the new theology of market-oriented, subsidy-reduced farm policy being developed and promoted by agriculture minister Don Mazankowski.
> As Mazankowski sat in the audience listening, delegate after delegate came to the microphone to complain about the state of the farm economy.
> They complained about prices, high interest rates, uncertainty caused by government policy and the inequities of the drought program.
> Russell Lakusta, of Wandering River in northeastern Alberta, complained that he cannot afford to turn his grain farm over to his son.
> "Farmers are in very poor shape", he said. "If we don't get federal help, lower interest rates and get to the point where farmers break even—" At that point, his voice broke and the sentence trailed off.
> Later the longtime Conservative said he does not find the government particularly sympathetic to the farmer's plight, despite the record of subsidies.
> "I still think the government is sorry for the $3 billion they gave to us," he said in an interview. "I don't know why. I think if it hadn't been for Grant Devine's election, we wouldn't have gotten that either."
> Farmer Bill Cole, from Ninette, Man., was equally blunt.
> He was angry about the loss of the interest-free advance payment program this year and the way the drought payment was handled. Payments were late, administration too cumbersome and in too many cases, farmers are being asked to pay back thousands of dollars already received in interim payments, he said in an interview.
> On his own farm, Cole received a $7 an acre interim payment and then, instead of the additional payment he expected to cover his bills, he received a notice from Ottawa that he had been overpaid by 52 cents an acre. He has to pay it back.

He went on to say:

> "That program was a disaster", said Cole, a member of the executive—

The Conservative executive, Mr. Speaker—

> —in grains minister Charlie Mayer's constituency organization.

Here is what he had to say:

> "I told Charlie last week to his face, you have two chances for re-election: slim and none."
> Other delegates had other complaints.
> A young Quebec farmer said the government should do more to help young people stay on the land.

An Ontario dairy farmer said reducing government regulation is not the answer.

A Prince Edward Island delegate warned that low prices and a lack of government action will send many family farms into the grasp of multinational, vertically-integrated food companies.

A southern Saskatchewan nurse said farmers are turning to alcohol, drugs and suicide because of poor conditions and a lack of government support.

I could go on, but let me deal with what some of the Conservative policies have been and what they have done.

Mr. McKnight: Did you run out of Hansard, Jim?

Mr. Fulton: The members across the way are trying to get me going. They may live to regret it. This is the party over there that has been abandoning branch lines. What does that mean to farmers across western Canada and farmers in other areas of the country? What about the closing of elevators? The government members probably do not know that if you take all of the rail cars capable of handling grain and you take all of the elevators, including Prince Rupert, Churchill, and the Lakehead, that can only handle a small fraction, not even 40 per cent, of the grain coming off the prairies.

What they are suggesting with this amendment is that that grain kept on the farm should be encouraged to be pushed out on to the market as soon as possible because the farmers are the ones who are going to be left carrying the interest rate as it builds higher and higher and higher through the winter.

Government members are always wanting to talk about a level playing field, if they are talking to their American friends. We know where the pressure came from for this amendment. It came from Washington. This is not being suggested by producers nor is it being suggested by anyone across the prairies.

This will destroy orderly marketing. It does not give farmers in different areas in the country the same opportunity because they do not have the same access. They do not have the same branch lines. They do not have the same access to elevators. It undermines the Wheat Board, it undermines the quota on grain deliveries, and it undermines the pooling concept of pricing.

What other things have been happening on the prairies? We have seen the continued movement—first under the Liberals but now at an accelerating rate under the Conservatives—of young people and long-time families off the farms in every single province in the country. We have seen the closing of schools, we have seen the collapse of much of the rural infrastructure that has made farming communities the vital driving force of this country, unlike most countries around the world. There is a real need for orderly marketing over as long a period as possible in order for farmers to get the best possible rate of return and also for this country to get the best rate of return in terms of balance of trade. This government is proposing to change the rules of the game once farmers have made certain calculations affecting this year and next year's operations.

Let us take a look at what precisely is being proposed here. These two programs provided producers of storable crops with interest-free government guaranteed loans at harvest time, based on a portion of the value of the crop up to $30,000 maximum, $60,000, and $90,000 in some circumstances, depending on partnerships and so on.

The producer was in effect able to sell part of his or her crop to pay bills even though the commodity stayed in his own bins or another storage facility. The loan was repaid as the crop was sold.

This Bill C-36, which replaces an earlier amending bill known as C-32, which the government withdrew in order to be enhanced, will make these loans interest bearing. The new maximum an individual producer can borrow is up to $250,000 and there is an interest guarantee in the event of loan default.

The Advanced Payments for Crops Act was initiated in 1977 and is essentially the eastern equivalent of its sister Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. The APCA ensured the producers marketed their crops when prices were most favourable. Individual commodity groups and marketing boards administered the act on behalf of Agriculture Canada.

There is intense opposition to the cancellation of the interest free loan provision. The Ontario Corn Producers Association, the OCPA and the Ontario Soy Bean Growers Marketing Board, the OSGMB, prepared briefs outlining their reasons for opposing the changes, proposals that have not been dealt with by anyone on the government side.

The OCPA says the program proved to be a major benefit in shifting corn sales from the autumn until later in the marketing year, thereby reducing the extent of export sales in the autumn and shortage-induced imports in later months. While the federal guarantee under a revised APCA would allow groups to borrow money at or slightly below prime, administration charges would mean an effective cost to producers at well above prime, providing no advantage over commercial sources of credit.

We know the pressure for this came from the U.S. and the Fraser Institute and these great think tanks this government relies on for cuts to VIA, for the clawback on pension and family allowance and for the cuts to UI.

Mr. McKnight: You are ad libbing, Jim. Get back to your text.

Mr. Fulton: We are looking forward to hearing from ministers on that side to seriously get up and debate the impact of their proposals.

My friend who was speaking a few moments ago was talking about the skulduggery involved with how this government has handled the whole question regarding yogurt and ice cream. We know how it has bungled and fumbled and misled farmers on that one. We know that that is the piece of wool that could unravel marketing boards in this country. There is not a dairyman in this country who does not know they were misled by the Conservatives during the trade debate and earlier this year.

Mr. McKnight: Wool comes from sheep, not cows.

Mr. Fulton: Those same groups point out there is no offsetting reduction for the 1989-90 crop year in the U.S. loan program, the American equivalent to the APCA for grains and oilseeds.

After conducting a cost benefit summary for the 1986-87 and 1988 crop years, the OCPA calculates benefits to the producer to average, expressed as value increase of $4.54 and $36.30 for each tonne respectively, for a total dollar figure of $2,044,826 and $16,796,423. At the same time the interest cost to Agriculture Canada was $1,175,976 in 1986-87 and $1,121,022 in 1987-88.

The cash advance meant a value increase of $8.79 and $60.73 a tonne for soybean producers in these two crop years, or a value of $1,523,932 and $10,716,590 respectively. It cost the government $759,817 and $773,050.

Users of the APCA and major farm groups want the current interest free program to be extended for this crop year with discussions held to determine the impact of changes on the farm community. Many producers had planned their finances with the assumption that the money would be available and they had been left in the lurch. This is something the government members do not really want to talk about. I am glad to see the Minister responsible for Grains and Oilseeds here now. Perhaps he can respond to what was going on at the convention regarding Mr. Cole. He is from Charlie's own executive in his constituency. He said:

> I told Charlie last week to his face, you have two chances for re-election: slim and none.

We will be looking forward to hearing how he is going to respond to that one.

Mr. McKnight: That is what you said about the government in 1988, Fulton.

Mr. Fulton: We will see. My vote went up.

Users of the APCA and major farm groups want the current interest free program to be extended for this crop year. Many of them, as I said a moment ago, have been left in a lurch.

Horticultural groups say the changes will force vegetable producers to market their crops early in the season when prices are low. Putting all this product on the market will force prices even lower. Union des producteurs agricoles suggests that these low prices will trigger stabilization payments which could get producers in countervailable difficulty with the U.S.

Well, what about consumers? Let us think about it for a moment. It is great for a short burst to get a real good buy on some tomatoes or cucumbers or turnips or potatoes or whatever, but the government does not seem to have thought very carefully through what that means to the producer. What does it mean to the producer? This will be a great boon, a great boondoggle to California and a lot of the mid-west states which have a much longer growing season.

Once again, we can see where all this came from: the trade debate. The government side never wanted to talk about the reality of our geography and our climate, but limiting the period within which farmers can sell their produce does only one thing, it drives down the price and it makes farms less viable. It is a very simple fact that the Conservatives seem incapable of understanding.

Of course, the Conservatives have changed who they are after as voters. They do not really give a damn about farmers any more. They do not give a damn about northerners. Who are they really after? They are after the yuppie vote. That is who they are after.

Mr. McKnight: That's the NDP vote.

Mr. Fulton: The Minister of Defence, in promoting low-level flights in Labrador, is certainly not interested in the votes of Newfoundlanders. He certainly is not interested in the human rights of Inuit, but he thinks that the yuppie voters in Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver might vote for him.

The Minister of Defence has not cut back on any of his expenditures and he has certainly never stood up in this House to stand up for the farmers on the prairies. We on this side certainly look forward to hearing him stand up and vote against a stupid bill like C-36 which is harming the very people that he claims to represent.

Mr. Funk: He is turning plough shares into jets.

Mr. Fulton: Selling all his products so soon after harvest will short the market for Quebec's 12 year round crops such as turnip, onion and cabbage. Supply will run out in March and consumers will have to buy imported U.S. produce and pay higher prices.

The Prairie Grain Advance Payment Act is older than the APCA, having started back in the 1957-58 crop year. It is administered by the Canadian Wheat Board. By giving producers of board grains their money up front and hence an incentive to deliver their grain in a more orderly fashion throughout the crop year as the board asks for deliveries of grades and kinds of grain in demand, the program helped to solve the storage problem and the handling system.

The amount advanced to farmers through the PGAPA has fluctuated over the years, but in the 1957-58 crop the government advanced $35 million to producers. By 1980-81, this had risen to $333 million and in the 1987-88 crop year to $563 million in loans. Administration costs for the same crop year amounted to $1 million according to the Wheat Board 1987-88 Annual Report.

The continuing closure of grain elevators has left the system with less than 40 per cent capacity. Hence, killing the program through the elimination of the interest free provision will worsen the congestion problem. As well, the July 1988 amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act, Bill C-92, which allows farmers to ship grain in producer cars to avoid paying some of the handling charges, will cause the further closure of marginal elevators.

I am sure companies like Cargill are clapping their hands and phoning the minister responsible for grains and the Minister of Agriculture saying "ready aye ready, this kind of approach is just lovely".

In the 1989-90 crop year, which began August 1, the government has decided not to lend any money until C-32 is passed, now Bill C-36, otherwise, under the current terms of the act, they would be obliged to again offer the interest free provision which, of course, leads to orderly marketing. That is something that the Conservative mind seems incapable of understanding any longer.

The Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board wrote to the minister responsible for grains on July 13, offering the minister the following unanimous resolution:

> That the Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board recommend to the federal government that for the 1989-90 crop year the cash advance program be operated as it was in the 1988-89 crop year.

In passing the motion the committee noted that it also wanted to give recognition to the fact that economic factors continue to create serious financial stress for many producers in western Canada.

• (1740)

The National Farmers Union offered similar advice in mid-August when they wrote: "A cash advance program is urgently needed for the 1989-90 crop year, since farmers need cash flow now to pay their bills".

Prairie pools say the changes will hurt orderly marketing and undermine the Canadian Wheat Board because it will be more difficult to manage deliveries.

Manitoba's Keystone Agricultural Producers noted in their June newsletter that the elimination of the interest free provision under both acts would be "particularly onerous for grains and oilseeds producers in Manitoba who are virtually obliged to ship their commodities through the port at Thunder Bay. Because that port is closed during the winter months, many farmers in Manitoba sit all winter with little or no opportunity to market grain, resulting, in turn, in their having little income with which to pay their bills and support the economies of their local communities".

One must wonder why the Minister responsible for grains would not understand that. It seems to be a fairly simple fact that if you have to get a loan and pay interest on it and you have got to maintain in your own storage facilities that grain until you can actually sell it, the longer you have to keep it on your farm, the longer you have to pay that interest, the more in debt you are eventually going to become.

If the Minister is interested in writing recipes for disaster for farmers in certain areas of the country, he has certainly done a good job of it. It truly defies the imagination to hear the Minister of National Defence go after the member who was speaking earlier, saying that a six month hoist is somehow denying farmers access to any kind of programs at all. What the government should be doing is keeping an orderly process in place and keeping the interest payment program in place. That is something they do not seem to understand.

According to the 1989 budget papers, the ones that were leaked to Doug Small and which the Minister dodged around and expected everyone to cheer for when they became public, the Minister of Finance said that he expects to save $27 million by dropping the interest free provision for each of the current and upcoming budget years; $10 million of the APCA and $17 million of the PGAPA.

What we have here is a proposal that does not sound like an enormous amount of money to a government, $27 million, but what it means to the farming community is a great deal. The implication that it has, whether it is for the Port of Prince Rupert or whether it is for crop producers in Quebec or grain producers on the prairies, is disorder. That is why those Conservative delegates at the national convention who were going to the microphone were telling the truth. They were telling the truth, not only to the Minister responsible for Grains and Oilseeds, they were telling the truth to the government. The Conservative age is over. The flat earth society has to be thrown out of office.

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the member that he seems to be focusing on the interest costs and the payment of interest under the old act. However, the market opportunities are the most important part of the act. It allows the producer to orderly market throughout the year.

That benefit is still there at a preferred interest rate, and the level has been increased. Each producer can participate at a greater level. I think it is wrong to focus on the subsidy or the interest rate. We should be focusing on the marketing ability. That is where the greater moneys can be derived back to agriculture. Does he realize that?

Mr. Fulton: I am not quite sure who the member is parliamentary secretary to, but if the member wants to have a close look at the legislation, I have a copy here on my desk. I will send it to him.

While one level of the loan may have been increased from $30,000 to a potential $250,000, if you are borrowing at prime or just below prime and you add on the administrative costs, you might as well go to a private lender. This is not going to lead to orderly marketing.

The member did not rise and dispute any of the facts that I put on the record regarding grain elevator capacity and the capacity we have in relation to rail cars and so on. That is 40 per cent of the crop. The rest is being held on the farm. This kind of a legislative approach will lead to attempts to sell off at lower prices rather than waiting throughout the year to when better sales can be achieved.

I know from tracking the prices at which grain is sold out of Prince Rupert at what times of year which markets will yield the best prices. This kind of approach will not lead to a kind of situation where a farmer will say that he will wait before he will start moving his grains until there is a better sign in the market.

I do not think the member or the government truly understand the implications of this bill.

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, the member who just spoke talked about farmers picking a time to sell through this elevator in his constituency that he is very, very familiar with and that he understands so well. He says this will force farmers to deliver when prices are better. That is what he said. They will pick their opportunity. Does he understand that the Canadian Wheat Board controls the export of grain through that elevator that he understands so well, that inputs are pooled and that producers share equally in that pooling?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the minister took the words that I was saying literally. I know a farmer does not pick up the phone to determine that on the Tokyo exchange the grain markets have gone up, so he will just load it on his truck and run it down to the elevator, pump it in, take it out to Rupert and load it on the boat.

If the minister thinks that is how the grain system works he really should not be in cabinet.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I just want to comment.

The parliamentary secretary talked about the importance of the opportunity to deliver grain. He obviously does not understand that this provision of taking away the interest free portion will result in the program being destroyed. The Ontario Corn Producers estimate that although in the past they have had something like 1,200 people use this program, possibly as few as 50 farmers will use it. The question is whether a group like the Ontario Corn Producers will even bother operating the program.

Talking about the advantages, if you look at the material provided to all members of this House by the Ontario Corn Producers you will see that the cost benefit of this program, of being able to market later in the year without having to pay those interest charges through the fall and winter months for the 1987 crop year, resulted in a 15 to 1 advantage. In other words, the cost to the government was something of the order of $1 million. The advantage in the increased price for those corn producers in Ontario was some $16 million. That is 15 to 1. That is not a bad improvement in prices.

I think that the parliamentary secretary should obey the law. The law says that you are supposed to provide that money now. The existing law says that you are supposed to provide that money to the corn producers, to the Canadian Wheat Board and to other groups with the interest being borne by the federal government. You should obey the law and provide those funds to those groups now because it is crop time and those moneys should be provided. You are breaking the law by not providing that money and you should do it now.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I could not agree more. I think the member put it very well and I am sure that the parliamentary secretary will not even try to get up to respond to it because he knows that we are right on this side of the House. We know that what they are doing to the farm community in this country is wrong. They are doing something to impress their friends at the Fraser Institute and down in Washington. They don't really care about what the implications are for the farm community. I am sure that the parliamentary secretary and the minister will not even dare to get up to respond to the facts that the hon. member and I put on the record today.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I think the member who represents the Prince Rupert area has made some telling points. I just want to say a couple of things. The government members have been saying over and over again that we should get this bill through because the farmers need help.

The fact of the matter is that it is they who are at fault. We had a program in place. The farmers were using it. The government members are the ones who have destroyed it. Now they are begging for help. Well, let's get things a little straight. Another point I want to make concerns the government wanting to enlist the support of the farmers to fight the deficit. This is their way of saying to the farmers: "come on, fight the deficit". Does the hon. member think that this is the right way to fight the deficit? Is this the way to eliminate waste? Is this the way to save money or can he think of better ways than attacking the farmers in this way?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for that very good question because anyone who has taken the time to look will see that the cash flow of the farm community in this country and the net income they are actually left with, either as individuals or as groups in this country, is falling. It is a very tragic situation. We have a government that has not just failed, but has refused to collect $34 billion owed by a small handful of profitable corporations and rich families in this country. That is not million, that is $34 billion. That is this year's deficit. There are 85,000 profitable corporations that paid no taxes last year.

An Hon. Member: That is not fair.

Mr. Fulton: Eighty-five thousand profitable corporations. So who is the government going after?

Well, Mr. Speaker, we know. We can look at the clawback on pensions or the clawback on family allowance. According to Statistics Canada, the UI cuts will mean 130,000 workers, particularly seasonal workers, who would have been eligible for unemployment insurance, are now cut off. Communities are cut off by today's announcement on VIA Rail cuts. Who is getting the big deal? Who is the sugar-daddy in this deal? You do not have to look too far. The 150 corporations that funded the fight against the Liberals and the NDP in the last election, and gave all the cash to the Tories on the free trade deal, are doing very well. Those corporations that do not have to pay any tax—

An Hon. Member: Welfare bums.

Mr. Fulton: That is right. David Lewis coined it in this chamber 20 years ago, the "corporate welfare bums". The political leadership is sadly lacking from the other side of the House. The idea of tarring and feathering and extorting more money out of the farm community should make every member of this House ill.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, I guess many thoughts could not help but go through a person's mind when watching what is going on here this afternoon, although I do not know why anybody would want to watch what we do here. After seeing what happened here this afternoon, I have a feeling of sadness that motivates me to speak.

We did not learn anything about the bill. There were all kinds of misrepresentations being passed off for fact. It is a rather sad display of a system that a lot of us take considerable amount of pride in. Sure, we are not perfect in government, and sure anytime that you ask people to pay something that previously they have not paid for, they are not going to like it. We know that. No government likes to increase taxes or likes to reduce government spending. But when you face the kind of situation that we face in this country, there are some tough choices that have to be made. This is one of them.

It is interesting to listen to the members opposite—and I do not mean in any way to be pejorative—but we do not have any farmers getting up over there. There are members getting up, reading things of which they know nothing about. Unfortunately, they do not make any sense, and maybe from their own point of view it is just as well as they do not know what they are saying because if they knew what they were saying, they probably would not say it.

Let me try, if I can, to put some of this in some context. Anybody watching would think that a bill that provided cash advances to between 15 per cent and 20 per cent of the western farmers and certainly less than 10 per cent of farmers in other parts of the country was going to cause the total demise of the family farm. This is ludicrous. This is silly. Sure, it is something that is going to cause problems with people who have to pay interest. But there is another side to it. Think about the damage caused by interest rates that got to 22 per cent, 23 per cent and 25 per cent in 1982. We are still recovering from that as a farm community. Nobody talks about that.

Those who are connected with the farm community know that all of us work with borrowed money. If they want to inflict hardship on the farm community, the best way to do it is with interest rates. Let interest rates go up in this country and then you are going to see the opposition yelling. If that happens, they are going to have good cause to yell. It is true that farmers are going to have to pay a little bit more for some of these programs, but we firmly believe that without this kind of approach we run the risk of crippling not only the farm economy but the whole business economy in this country.

As I said, this legislation has been used by something in the order of 15 to 20 per cent of all the farmers in western Canada, who make use of it under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. The numbers are difficult to calculate, but the number of other farmers who have used it is probably less than 5 per cent. You mention the Ontario corn growers. There are 25,000 corn producers in Ontario. Do you know how many use the program? About 500.

Sure, if you are one of the 500, it is going to affect you. But to suggest that this change will mean its demise is silly. The opposition does a disservice to themselves and the House to put some of the things on the record that they did this afternoon. Aside from that, if it is such terrible legislation, pass it and let us suffer the consequences with the farm community. You can point the finger at us and say: "That was bad legislation. We let you pass it. Let us go out there and explain it". Furthermore, you should know that this does not take away the cash advance program. It is not going to cause interest rates to be charged 2 and 3 per cent above prime as was suggested. It is going to be a government guaranteed loan and my guess is that it will probably be available at prime.

An Hon. Member: Your guess.

Mr. Mayer: Okay, challenge us. Wait and see what happens when it is implemented. In the case of the Canadian Wheat Board which borrows at less than prime, there is every indication that the rate could be even less than prime. To suggest that it is going to be just as easy to go to the bank, and you are going to pay the same interest, is wrong.

Second, cash advances, the limit which farmers have been asking for, are going to be increased. It is going to be a better marketing tool because it is going to be increased to $250,000. To suggest additionally that this is going to hurt orderly marketing is exactly the opposite. With a cash advance you do not need to sell your grain because you have your money. The board has all kinds of examples where it needed grain and it put on a quota. There is no point in the guy hauling in the middle of winter because it is 40 below and he does not want to start his tractor, blow out the lane, get his truck going and all that. He has got his money. But if he has got to haul the grain to get his money, that helps as far as orderly marketing.

The hon. member laughs. This is the case. Look what happened last year on the prairies. There were some canola crushing facilities shut down because they could not get the canola. I am not saying totally, but a factor in that was the fact that these farmers had a cash advance. So, do not suggest that this is going to hurt orderly marketing. I could make the case that if anything it in fact may help. It has nothing to do with the pooling price. Whether you sell to the board on the first day of the crop year, which is August 1, or the last day which is the following July 31, you get exactly the same amount.

The hon. member for Skeena should know better than to get up and read this rubbish that somebody put in front of him. He is a smarter member than that, but that is the kind of stuff that we have heard this afternoon. It has nothing at all to do with the bill. We heard about free trade. If we get an early winter or a squirrel out there that does something silly, it is because of free trade. Everything is free trade. It has nothing to do with free trade.

What it does deal with is some fiscal sanity in this country so that our farmers and our business people can pay and continue to pay modest interest rates. To suggest that this one bill, used by probably less than 10 per cent of the farmers in the country, is going to cause the demise of everything is ludicrous.

Mr. Fulton: You could close all the heart units in the country. Only a few people need a heart unit.

Mr. Mayer: That is a silly analogy. Again, he is a smarter person than that. The sooner we get this bill passed, the sooner people will have cash advances and the sooner they will be able to make use of it in the same way that they have in the past.

I see you are calling time, Mr. Speaker. I will continue tomorrow, if I may.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to standing order 24(1).

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 106(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to petitions Nos 342-0892 and 342-0946.

COMMENTS IN COMMITTEE HEARINGS

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I was noticing that no ministers were rising to make a statement. I must say that as an Albertan by birth, as are many of us, we were offended by the comments made by the chairman of the finance committee in Edmonton. Considering that he is a senior representative of the government I was assuming that a minister of the cabinet would certainly be standing today to apologize for the rude comments.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member from Kamloops rises on a point of order concerning a statement that may or may not have been made. It certainly has been interpreted by the hon. member for Kamloops, as an experienced member of the House, in such a way that he wishes to raise a complaint about it.

I have to ask the hon. member to bear with the Chair. The point has now been raised, but there may be other ways the hon. member would like to follow up on it that are more appropriate than at this time in routine proceedings. I understand the hon. member's position.

TABLING OF COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of tabling, in both official languages, the report of the Legislative Committee on Bill S-2, an Act to implement conventions between Canada and the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg and Canada and the Polish People's Republic and an agreement between Canada and Papua New Guinea for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax without amendments.

ELECTIONS, PRIVILEGES, PROCEDURE AND PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—FOURTH AND FIFTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business. This report deems motion No. 441 presented by the member for Western Arctic a votable item.

I also have the honour to present the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business. This report would authorize the CBC to broadcast a video tape repeat of the House of Commons proceedings which would allow Canadians to have greater access to Parliament. It is the hope of the committee that we will move for concurrence of this report from the House at a later date.

CONSUMER PACKAGING AND LABELLING ACT

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West) moved for leave to introduce bill C-265, an Act to amend the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Act (nutritional value of food).

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, briefly the purpose of this bill is to ensure that the nutritional value, including vitamins, carbohydrates, fats and calories per portion of all processed foods is clearly stated on the package. This will provide important information for consumers to use when deciding which processed packaged foods to purchase for consumption.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I move:

> That, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 133(2), the petition of Mr. Leslie Benjamin, seeking the passing of an Act establishing a national passenger rail service, filed after the time limit specified under Standing Order 132, be referred to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedure and Private Members' Business, together with the Second Report of the Clerk of Petitions thereon, presented to the House on Monday, October 2, 1989, for any recommendations the Committee deems advisable.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? The Hon. Minister on a point of order.

• (1110)

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I think I may be able to assist my colleague from Thunder Bay—Atikokan, the House, and yourself. We have had an opportunity to examine the motion. I understand the difficulty here is a technical one. The hon. member has not had the opportunity to present his petition and from a procedural point of view has run into a problem. I can inform the House and the hon. member that we are ready to offer unanimous consent so this matter may be sent to committee as asked for in the motion.

Mr. Speaker: On the same point of order, the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the government's desire to expedite this matter. I would, however, like to have an opportunity to briefly explain the purpose of the petition and of the request from Mr. Benjamin.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the procedure, except that if there is going to be a debate, we will be there.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan may proceed as is his undoubted right to enter into debate on this.

In view of the comments of the minister, it is appropriate to say to the House that the Chair will, of course, apply the rules. The Chair will also be taking into account the fact that this is a procedural matter and that is what must be addressed. I hope hon. members will take that into account as the Chair will certainly take it into account. The Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I will endeavour to stick to the procedural aspects. Under the Standing Orders petitions for bills from private individuals should have been tabled in the first six weeks of the sitting of this House, that is, by May 12 of this year.

The reason the petition was submitted late is that at that point in time we were not aware of the need to develop a new national transportation system because we did not know that the government was going to eliminate the existing one. The Budget came down on April 27, so that was after the fact, decisions of yesterday were after that deadline. I submit to you, Sir, that the reason we are asking for this matter to be referred to the appropriate standing committee is so we can have that deadline waived allowing us to proceed to do what this government has refused to do and that is to develop a national transportation system that has permanency and legislation.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for his intervention. That has been a clear and concise explanation of why this is being asked. We have a situation at this point where the government has completely and utterly acceded to the request of the New Democratic Party.

The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier has the floor.

Mr. Gauthier: In talking to the procedural aspect of this question, I could give the House a brief explanation as to how to proceed with private bills and how members file petitions. I could read document after document into the record as to the difficulty with the standing order and other information that I have. I hesitate to do so because I think the Speaker would show his impatience with me.

My only comment is that, indeed, we are upset and believe that the government should have presented a global comprehensive approach to transportation before going ahead with the VIA Rail cuts, and the savaging of railroad transportation services. But we would certainly give unanimous approval that this matter be referred to the appropriate committee for consideration at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present a petition obtained by my friend, the Hon. Member for London East, on behalf of many of the people living in his riding, who oppose the goods and services tax being imposed on Canadians by this arrogant government. The petitioners humbly pray for Parliament to reject this outrageous tax.

VIA RAIL

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to present these petitions from the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right to present a grievance to this House. This grievance has to do with the VIA Rail service. They humbly ask this House to maintain and upgrade the service across Canada and offer the Canadian people an alternative to highway congestion and airport delays.

These petitions have been certified by the Clerk of Petitions.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to present to this House two petitions. One is from my own riding of Cochrane—Superior, and the other is from the riding of London East. The petitioners are demanding that the Government of Canada rescind the goods and services tax as it is a step backwards and does not address the crucial issue of fiscal reform in Canada.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to present a number of petitions dealing with the Conservative government's proposal to impose a goods and services tax on Canadians as of January 1, 1991.

[English]

The people who signed these petitions are from my riding and the surrounding area. They would like to make it clear to this government that they totally disagree with the application, and soundly oppose this new goods and services tax which is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians. It will hit them not only with higher taxes, but with higher inflation, higher interest rates, and higher unemployment.

Therefore, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present on behalf of hundreds of people from the ridings of London East, London West and London—Middlesex, including people from the St. Thomas area, a petition calling on this government to rescind its action on this cold, callous, and irresponsible, new goods and services tax which will affect every man, woman and child in those ridings.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to table today a petition that has been certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions according to Standing Order 36. The petition is signed by a number of residents of the City of Toronto. They point out that this government, like its Liberal predecessor, has refused to provide VIA with the necessary support to fully realize its potential to develop the kind of national passenger rail network that Canadians want and deserve. They call upon Parliament to live up to its original pledge to support VIA Rail.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): I have the honour of tabling, pursuant to Standing Order 36, two petitions by Canadians who call upon this Government to withdraw the proposed goods and services tax.

[English]

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am honoured to present to this House a petition from the people of London, Ontario, which humbly asks that the proposed goods and services tax being brought in by this government be rejected.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present two petitions from Canadians in London, Ontario, who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present four petitions which have been certified correct. All four petitions, with a total 116 signatures, deal with the proposed goods and services tax, and ask Parliament to do what it is supposed to do, namely, to listen to the people of Canada and, in this case, to categorically and unequivocally reject any legislation which is brought forward for the purpose of implementing the goods and services tax.

This will be just the beginning of many tens of petitions that the people of my riding will be presenting to the House.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of a number of westerners who were concerned—actually this was before the fact—about the proposed cuts to VIA. Now we could say the cuts to VIA. The petitioners are asking the government to reconsider that decision.

It is an honour to present this petition.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to also rise today under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present to the House petitions duly signed and certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions. These petitions from Canadians rights across this country call upon the government, in light of the now well-defined cuts to VIA Rail, to reconsider these cuts and to modernize the VIA Rail services in those parts of the country where it can provide a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient, environmentally-sound, and energy-efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 75 could be made an Order for Return, this return would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Deputy Speak: It is the pleasure of the House that Question No. 75 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The House resumed from Wednesday, October 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-36, an act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Foster (p. 4314).

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, in the approximately 10 minutes that I have I would like to outline for the House what the bill is. In listening to the opposition yesterday and a little bit on Tuesday, you would never know what this bill is.

Quite simply, this is a bill to change the way the present two bills, the Advance Payments for Crops Act, and the Western Grain Advance Payments Act operate. The Advance Payments for Crops Act was put into effect a little later than the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. Up until now farmers were able to go to their elevator, in the case of the Canadian Wheat Board, or make use of a producer association as far as the Advance Payments for Crops Act was concerned and obtain an advance on crops already harvested but not yet sold. Presently that legislation limits the amount of advance available to $30,000.

What the government is proposing to do is to not take away the eligibility for advances as surmised from listening to the opposition. It is to change the way the two acts presently operate so that interest is payable on those advances. We are not in any way removing the farmer's ability to obtain an advance. What we are proposing to do is to charge interest on those advances once they are obtained.

The suggestion has been made that this will hurt the orderly marketing system. Let me say that that is not the case. I do not see that as being the case at all. In fact you can make the other case that, to the extent that a farmer is able to obtain an advance before he sells his crop, it does not necessarily put a lot of pressure on him to sell his crop in order to get money. There are cases where that has actually hurt the orderly marketing system, maybe not to a large extent but there is that factor.

The suggestion was made that in terms of interest this will cost more money than you would have to pay if you went to the bank. Again, I do not think that that is necessarily the case. In fact, I would argue the opposite. We will have to wait to see what happens in practice. With a government guaranteed loan there is every reason to expect that the amount of interest that the farmer would pay, once he obtains a loan would be at or less than bank rate.

Certainly, in the case of the Canadian Wheat Board the Canadian Wheat Board operates, when it borrows money, at less than prime. To the extent that the board will be involved and will be able to offer those cash advances, there is every reason to expect that that could be better than the normal interest that a farmer would get from a bank. Again, that is not the case.

There is evidence, and there are cases, where a farmer does not need the cash advance to pay bills. The fact that the cash advance is there with no interest means that a farmer can go to the elevator, in the case of the Canadian Wheat Board, or make use of his producer association, in the case of the Advance Payments for Crops Act, obtain the advance, pay no interest on it and essentially have free money for a period of time. I do not think that that is a wise use of taxpayers' dollars. Again, I am not suggesting that that is a widespread practice but everybody knows that there are occasions when that has happened. By charging interest we will be making farmers look at how they use these two acts and make sure they use them with in good business practice.

I listened yesterday and the day before to all these things that are going to happen. Some of those suggestions are absolutely silly. I am trying to put into perspective what in fact these two amendments to the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Western Grain Advance Payments Act will do. You are still going to be able to get them, but you are going to have to pay interest on them.

Let us put this into perspective by considering how many people use them. In the case of the Canadian Wheat Board, which is where the majority of it is used, something less than 20 per cent of all of the producers use them. Even in the case of 1981–1982 when interest rates got well over 20 per cent, out of about 140,000 or 150,000 permit book holders only 33,388 producers took out cash advances, about 20 per cent. Not everybody uses them, and again I am not minimizing the importance of this program to the people who use them. Certainly it is important to the people who use them, but by no means has a majority of the producers used it.

In the case of Advance Payments for Crops Act it is even less. Again there are cases where they are very useful even though they are used by a small minority of farmers. In the case of the Ontario growers, about 25,000 corn growers in Ontario, last year 536 Ontario corn growers made use of the cash advance. We are not at all crippling the farm community, as one would think from listening to the opposition. Let us put that in some context.

I want to emphasize one point. To the extent that the opposition members believe the rhetoric that we heard from them yesterday and the day before, they then have a responsibility to see that this bill gets through. I hear them saying that this is going to decimate the farm community, using words like horrific and saying that it is going to destroy the family farm, that it is going to do all these things.

If that is the case, let's pass the bill. The cash advances will be available, and let it be clear to everybody involved in this issue—the farmers who want it and the farm organizations that want it—that the reason for this bill being held up is the opposition. The reason that farmers are not going to have cash advances available in any form is what the opposition is doing in holding this up.

It is one thing to have opposition and to get up and debate the merits of the case, but that is not what we heard yesterday. The hon. member for Mount Royal, a very fine lady for whom I have a lot of respect, got up to speak. With all due respect, when you see that kind of opposition it is simply opposing for the sake of opposing. The hon. member for Skeena, there is nothing to do with farming in his area. He is simply opposing for the sake of opposing.

If opposition members are as concerned as they make out to be, they should pass the bill and let the farmers have cash advances but let them pay interest. As I pointed out, it is not going to be nearly as bad as one would think from listening to the opposition.

Additionally the bill provides some amendments I hope members opposite would agree with which would raise the limit.

Previously you could get $30,000; now it goes up to $250,000. Admittedly you are going to have to pay interest on it, but it certainly gives farmers a better chance to cash manage and to market some of their crops. For those who grow some of the vegetable crops it doesn't take a lot when you have a large amount of money invested per acre to get over $30,000 and up to $100,000 worth of crop. That is a useful amendment in the bill.

We are prepared to proceed as quickly as we can within reason so that the bill can get passed. Farmers would then have this program available to them. They are going to have to pay interest, but at least they have the option.

I say very directly to those sitting opposite who have made up their minds to oppose this bill at any cost simply for the sake of mindless opposition and opposing that it is their responsibility, to the extent that they hold this bill up, that farmers are not going to have available to them cash advances in any form.

Let me say again that the amendments we are proposing here today are going to have interest payable but the limit is going to be raised to $250,000. I think that is something very useful.

I think I am getting close to the end of my allotted time, so let me make the point again. Nobody in a government likes having to increase taxes or taking away something that has already been there, but when we face the kind of financial situation that we have in this country this is one of the things that we are going to have to do.

As I have pointed out, a relatively small percentage of farmers make use of it. Admittedly they do find it useful. We are not taking away the program at all. We are making the program available but with interest payable. We are increasing the amount of dollars available under the program. To the extent that farmers used it in the past, I suspect that there may be more farmers using it with the limits raised. There are some useful things about the bill and I hope that members will agree it.

We are not trying to rush it through unduly, but I think it is important to proceed with it as quickly as we can. Opposition members make the point that we should have had this done by the end of June. Perhaps they have a point there, but this is not the end of June. That is hindsight.

This is the beginning of October. The sooner we get the bill through, the sooner cash advances will be available to producers. I would ask the members of the opposition to use the reason they give for opposing the bill, that it is so important to farmers, as the reason to pass the bill so that farmers can have cash advances as quickly as possible.

In conclusion, the longer we wait, the more marketing there is going to be and the less use in the present crop year that farmers are going to be able to make of the bill. Again, to the extent that the opposition is simply opposing for the sake of delay, that is the responsibility of the opposition.

I would hope the opposition will see fit to pass this bill as quickly as possible so that farmers can have cash advances available to them as soon as possible.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Algoma on a question or comment.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds. It must be one of the most pathetic defences that I have ever heard from a minister on a bill being brought in. He is not only trifling with the opposition that there is to this bill across the country; he is misrepresenting what the bill is and the importance of the existing program.

I would just like to point out to the minister that on Monday of this week, October 2, 19 major commodity groups met in Winnipeg. They are calling upon the Prime Minister of Canada to withdraw the bill, to obey the law of Canada and to provide the interest free cash advances. Which of these groups does he not agree with? There is the Western Canadian Wheat Growers Association, the Western Barley Growers Association, the Alberta Pulse Growers, Focus on Inputs, Keystone Agricultural Producers, the Prairie Canola Grain Growers Council, and the Manitoba Canola Growers. He is from Manitoba himself. There is the Saskatchewan Canola Growers, the Alberta Soft Wheat Growers, and the United Grain Growers. These are all responsible farm groups calling on the minister to abandon this foolishness, this law that would take away cash advances. We are not just talking about $22 million or $25 million of interest assistance. We are talking about hundreds of millions of dollars of cash flow assistance to farmers not only to assist them at the time of harvest but to assist them in the returns.

If you look at Ontario Corn Growers, it estimates that for every dollar spent by the Government of Canada on interest free cash advances, the benefit to the growers of corn in the province of Ontario is some $16. That is a cost benefit of 15 to 1. Surely even the Minister for Grains and Oilseeds would agree that that is a tremendous advantage. If that is what the government is trying to do, for every dollar that the government spent on support programs for farmers would return a benefit of 15 to 1, then no farmer in this country would ever have difficulty. Clearly this program is perhaps, in returns to producers, one of the best that the government actually has.

The minister says that the farmers have to bear some of the pain of deficit reduction. They are bearing $500 million worth of pain. In my view these are the best spent funds that the government provides under government programs.

I would hope that the Government of Canada would withdraw this bill or let it die on the Order Paper, as the 19 major farm organizations and another dozen or so are asking it to do; obey the law of Canada and provide those funds interest free.

It should provide the cash advance money to the Wheat Board, to the corn and oilseed producers—all these producer groups right across the country—because that is what they are asking the government to do and it should listen to these producer groups. It should obey the law and provide the money now. We are not holding up this money. It is the government by not obeying the law of Canada and making these cash advance funds available right now interest free.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is a well educated gentleman. He is a doctor of veterinary medicine and he knows very well that the way he uses figures is about as creative and as imaginative as can get. Euclid would be absolutely astounded to see the way he uses figures. He gives the impression that once the money is lent to farmers they never have to pay it back. This is silly. Surely he can come up with a better statement in the House of Commons than that.

The point is that sure the fact that a farmer can obtain a cash advance means that that money goes out sooner than it otherwise would. That is, by definition, what a cash advance is. A cash advance is an advance against the sale of a crop harvested but not yet sold. When the farmer sells his crop he has to repay the cash advance. The benefit to the farmer is in the form of interest forgone. That is what we are talking about. It is approximately $25 million and it varies from year to year. The figure used is $27 million; about two-thirds in western Canada and the remaining in the other parts of the country for other crops.

To suggest that there is that kind of a cost benefit ratio is absolute nonsense. If they are so concerned about not having cash advances available and not having that kind of money injected into the economy, surely the way to do it is to pass this bill. There may be even more money injected into the economy because you have raised the limits.

We have said right off the bat—and I said it today and yesterday—that farmers are going to have to pay interest. I am not disagreeing with any of the farm organizations. People want as much as they can get, especially from government, but there comes a time when you have to say there is a limit and we are saying that this is one of them.

When the hon. member uses those kinds of numbers and suggests that they mean anything, I suspect that he does not even believe his own figures. He is simply trying to use some numbers to dramatize a point that he really does not have. Again, if the opposition is so concerned about cash advances, let it pass the bill; we will have cash advances and farmers will then pay interest.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I have to reject completely what the minister has tried to put across here in the House, that we are delaying the passage of this bill.

This bill was tabled on June 26 in this House. On the second day after Parliament was recalled, on September 26, the bill was discussed. The government asked permission to withdraw it from this House because it was totally flawed. That reflects the incompetence on the other side of the House and that was part of the delay.

We did not get to the debate until this week and I think the government is suggesting now that Parliament should give up its right to debate in order to cover up the incompetence of the government for its having to withdraw the bill and the delay that it caused which is keeping the money from the producers.

However, when he says that it is due to a budgetary cut or trying to save money, I wonder if the minister could comment on the fact that the total tax he will be collecting on tobacco and alcoholic beverages for the coming year will be $3.5 billion. Some $27 million is small potatoes compared to that. When we considered what is coming out as a result of primary production in terms of the tobacco tax and the grains that go into the manufacture of alcoholic beverages, I think that is a small return the government should be obligated to maintain to help the producers produce the products that result in such a windfall for this government.

I want to ask the minister once more: if you are concerned about getting the money into the hands of the producers, will you withdraw this legislation, revert to the former legislation, sign your agreements with the producers and get money in their hands if this is your wish?

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, I guess it is easy to get up and make statements in isolation. The hon. member makes the point that we collect all this money in taxes and I think wants to leave the impression that the only money we spend as a government in support of farmers is money in the previous legislation, the interest forgone. That is not the case at all. He knows that.

The record of this government in supporting farmers is a very good one. I do not know if I can give figures off the top of my head, but I think in the last calendar year in direct and indirect payments we have probably spent over $3 billion in support of farmers. We are spending a considerable amount of money, aside from the interest that the government pays on behalf of farmers in these two acts—the Western Grain Advance Payments Act and the Advance Payments for Crops Act.

Let us put this in perspective. I am not suggesting that we pass the bill without debate. What I am suggesting is: when I listened to the debate yesterday in the House and I read parts of Hansard from Tuesday, this is not really opposition in terms of real genuine debate. It is simply opposition for the sake of opposition. Let us get it out of the House on second reading, get it to committee, and get the process under way, as opposed to putting up member after member who are reading speeches that are put in front of them and do not know anything about the bill. That is what is going on.

If the opposition is interested, let us conclude the debate today, right now, get it to committee as quickly as we can, call witnesses, and go ahead and proceed with the legislation. Then farmers will have available to them cash advances. Admittedly they are going to have to pay interest on it, but also they are going to have more cash advances as far as dollars are concerned because we are raising the limits. That is what we should be doing, instead of having this mindless opposition simply for the sake of opposition.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say at the outset that the minister has made the statement in the last few minutes that we on this side of the House do not understand the bill and made the accusation that we do not understand agriculture. I would like to challenge that statement.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I did not say that the opposition does not understand agriculture. That is not what I said at all. I said that some hon. members during the debate that I heard yesterday did not understand this bill. They were obviously reading from a prepared text but on a personal basis did not understand this bill. So let us be clear on the points that I just made.

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, I will tell the minister what I wanted to tell him. I also resent the fact that the accusation is being made that we are intentionally holding up the bill. I can tell the minister that I came to the House to partake in constructive criticism. I do understand the bill and I feel that I have that right and will take advantage of that right to make that constructive criticism. That is the vein in which we are speaking on this bill.

We know what the purpose of the bill has been. We know what will be the effects of the amendments that the government is proposing. In effect, the bill is going to gut the use of the act for many of the producers who have used it in the past. It will no longer be useful to them as the management tool it has been in the past.

We know that as far as the ministry is concerned the purpose of the bill is to save some $25 million to $27 million. This on the backs of the farmers who have used those programs. Later I will outline for the minister and challenge him to show me many other programs where investment by the government has returned many fold on the investment it has made by paying the interest on this loan.

I cannot believe what I have seen happening in the last few months I have had the privilege of being in this House as far as the gutting of many agricultural programs is concerned. This is just another one. Farmers are asking me daily and weekly: "What is going to be done to us next? We were told we had protection under Article 11 and those words are still there". In the last week or two the dairy farmers have lost a lot of confidence. They need to be reassured. The pork producers have lost a lot of confidence and now the grain farmers and vegetable and fruit farmers are saying: "Here goes another tool that we used. What is next?"

Farmers need all the financial management tools that they can possibly get in their hand. They get very unsettled and very depressed when they see them being taken away from them.

I would just like to ask a few questions and then discuss some answers in reference to Bill C-36.

First, has this program been a good investment of tax dollars? I think it has. The relative cost of the program has been minimal compared to the benefits it has generated. We have heard the figures from the Ontario Corn Producers. The minister says that only 536 of the Ontario Corn Producers use the program. But what is wrong with only 536 using the program? The Ontario Corn Producers say that probably very few of them will use the program in the future if the minister gets his way in charging interest on this.

If we look at the 1987 crop, for an investment of $2.61 by the government per tonne, if a grower used this in an orderly marketing system over six months the return to that grower was $12. That is a big return over six months.

In the year 1987–88, which was a different crop year, it was used again by many producers. I know if it happened in corn it happened in other grains and other crops as well. For an investment of $2.42 for each tonne of grain, if the grower marketed that nine months later, he got a return of $57.75. That is a return of 24 fold over a period of nine months. I might say that that is a fantastic investment by the Government of Canada in agriculture.

I could go on with other examples. This program is not only one that has been used by corn growers; this is a program that has been used by fruit and vegetable growers in B.C. It has been used by fruit and vegetable growers in Ontario. It has been used by farmers on the prairies. It has been used by potato farmers in the maritimes and all across Canada.

As well, we must realize the spin–off that comes from the effectiveness of this program. The farmer by using this financial tool is able to hold more of a crop in the bin or more of the product in storage and market it at a better time when he will probably, in most if not all cases, get a better price and therefore have more dollars to put back into circulation.

The spin–offs are spreading to the trucking industry, to grain elevator storage, to fruit and vegetable storages, to cold storages and elsewhere. The spin–off also benefits the farm implement dealers because the farmers, having had this management tool available to them, can build new storages, purchase new granaries, spend that money and keep it in circulation. That is to say nothing of the orderly marketing of these products so that the farmers can market them to the purchasers and make them more readily available throughout the year for all purchasers, whether they be grain or fruit and vegetable products.

Next, will the intent of the bill be attained if interest is charged on the advance? I admit that some farmers will still use it. Basically I feel the effectiveness of the program will be gutted when the farmers are told they are going to have pay interest on this. It has been a financial management tool that has been available to the producers and has enabled them to repay their spring operating costs before the year was completed.

As we know, most farmers operate on the cash system. When they have been able to borrow that and repay their suppliers in the fall for their fertilizer or seed, they have been able to take advantage of post harvest changes in the prices of their product and reap the benefit. This has been very successful for many but not all producers because every producer does not need to avail himself of every management tool there is, but this has been an effective tool. I state again that it will not be nearly as effective when the whole rule of the game is changed.

I ask the next question: if the government insists on doing so, is it fair to be making this change at this time of year? Farmers made their budgets and did their financial planning last January and February. At that time the old program was in effect. Nothing was said at that time that the rules were going to change part way through the ball game. I am sure many teams would like to do that if they could, but I do not think it is fair ball to do it at this time of year.

It could have been done in June. Admittedly the planning by the producers would have been done at that time as well. In fairness to the producers and the organizations, if the government insists on doing this it should look at the amendment put forward by this side of the House. It should have consultations with the producer organizations in the next month before taking this action.

I do not like to use the word blackmail, but the minister has said unless the new amendments are made the old program will be used after August 1. You either play by the rules or you do not get anything at all. It is not even obeying the law that is present on the books. That is upsetting many people out there.

The harvest is complete, tax planning and budgets have been done, bankers have sat down with their clients and worked this out. Now the farmer is in the position of having to go back to those that are assisting him and financing his program for the year and saying: "Well, I am sorry, the government changed the rules and we are going to have to do this in a different fashion".

Is the Canadian agricultural industry being challenged at the GATT with respect to the old program? I do not believe it is, although it may very well be challenged by producers to the south of us. We know this is one of the things the United States pointed its finger at as far as the so–called level playing field is concerned. We hear those words a lot. We have to be realistic. It pointed the finger and said that we should not do that. It concerns me that every time somebody points a finger at us we say: "Okay, we will change".

I am getting the impression that we are suckers; we are the good guys. We are the guys that are doing what other countries say should be done. We could debate that at another time, but then we do it, and they say thank you very much but they do not make any changes themselves. I think that is very evident.

I read the other day that the 1990 U.S. farm bill is virtually not making any changes as far as assistance to agriculture in the United States compared to the 1985 bill, but the United States is pointing its finger at Canada and saying that we cannot do this and we cannot do that. We had a finger pointed at us—so we literally lay down and died—then said, "Okay, if you don't want us to do it, we won't do it." It is going to be done off the backs of the farmers to the extent of $25 million or $27 million a year.

This is a program that does not stimulate production. This is a program that has been used for orderly marketing and will be used for orderly marketing by a few people, I will admit, but not by nearly as many and that is the concern.

The government agreed back in April at the GATT rounds to freeze the level of agriculture support. Here we are, being nice guys again to the rest of the world, saying, "Well, we won't freeze. We will reduce more whether you fellows do or not".

The other question I may have already answered: Is this program unlike that of any of those of our neighbours to the south? No, it is not. They have their loan programs and we do not get any impression that they are reducing them. It upsets me when we say that we are going to reduce ours. If they will reciprocate and reduce some of theirs, then that is a different game. We are in a different situation.

Where is our spine? Are we just going to lay down and die on this, or are we going to say to some of the finger-pointers, "No, this is something that we want to do for agriculture in Canada. This is something that we feel is a good return on tax dollars, and this is something we are going to fight for". Farmers feel that they have given a fair bit. Farmers are not opposed to giving their share toward attacking the deficit. They have been told they are going to do it on the excise tax. They have been told they are going to do it on dairy support programs.

Pork producers know that through actions that have taken place about which the government is not happy, and I hope that it can be successful in fighting it, there are countervails on pork, ice cream and yogurt. We pleaded for exemptions to the United States trade bill before we signed the deal last winter, but we did not get them. Now we re paying the price.

I request of the ministry that we debate these items back and forth with our neighbours to the south. I implore the minister to get as good a list of the support programs that they have south of the border as they appear to have of ours so that we can go back and argue some of these points.

Another question arises: Is the government consulting or even listening to the advice of the agriculture sector that is involved in this decision? I know the government is getting the information. I do not know whether it is reading it. I do not know whether it is listening to it if it hears it.

Farmers have recently and more often asked me if the government has lost the word "consultation" from its dictionary. I say that I certainly have that impression. The government does not seem to want to talk. It does not seem to want to listen.

I will quote from a letter to the Minister of Agriculture of September 20, from the Ontario Corn Producers:

> The Ontario Corn Producers Association respectively requests that this bill to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act (APCA) not be passed in its present form.
> We request that the current APCA programs be continued, with the interest-free provision, at least for the 1989-90 crop year.
> During the coming year, OCPA and other farm organizations could consult with the federal government to develop acceptable alternatives to the current APCA programs.
> Failure to enter any agreements for 1989-90 would result in financial difficulties for the many producers who have prepared cash-flow statements for 1989-90 and have received credit for the coming crop year based on the assumed continued existence of the APCA Program.

Elimination of the interest-free provision will effectively destroy the program and will result in an ineffectual program with minimal participation even if current advance loan levels are significantly increased.

I ask the minister, will he sit down and have that discussion? Not only did he received that letter that I quoted from, he received letters from the other 18 or 19 associations asking the minister to consider that. Will he not do that?

I realize government members have a majority. I recognize that they can do whatever they want, because if they do not have the nerve enough to put it forth before the House, they can do what they did with VIA Rail yesterday, they can do it by Order in Council. If members of their own caucus oppose it, they do not have to be embarrassed by they either not showing up or standing up and being counted as voting against it.

I find it very hard to believe that all of the members on the other side of the House can support this bill as it is before us now. I recognize all that. They have that majority. They can do it if they wish. I also state that that does not necessarily make it right or that does not necessarily make it fair.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the hon. member, and we have had conversations. I know he is a farmer who has had a lot of experience with various crops and I respect his views.

He makes the point that for every $2.51 that the government invests—and I take it that is what he means by interest that the government pays on the loan—there was a return of $12 and some cents. Surely that is a case for passing this bill. He is saying that a farmer is not smart enough to pay interest, the $2.51, in order to earn the $12.

If the member follows that statement to what I would think would be its logical conclusion, he should pass this bill. He is then enabling the farmer to make that investment of $2.51 instead of the government making it on his behalf and the farmer then would earn $12. Surely that is a good investment. By saying that they are going to dig their heels in and that they do not want to pass this bill, the member is denying that very farmer the ability to make use of the example that he just used. I wanted to point that out. Sure, we agree that interest is going to have to be paid by the farmer, but there is still a very great return there in his own numbers. I do not know how he gets those numbers, but I take them at face value. That is a very good and cogent argument for the opposition letting this bill go through and be passed.

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, as I stated several times, this is a management tool that the government has provided for the farmers to use in the past that has been cost-free to the farmers. Farmers are losing a lot. They are having a lot taken away from them.

No one likes to spend money unless a person has to spend money, yourself included, and that is quite obvious because you want to save $27 million in assistance to the agriculture community by withdrawing that aspect of this bill. I am saying that farmers have used that provision before and they wish to continue to use it as before. If it is a good investment for the farmer, is it not a good investment for the government and agriculture as well, to show the faith that this government has had in the agricultural community? As I say, the farmers are asking what is going to be taken away from them next.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to compliment the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings. I thought he made a very good presentation why the government should not be taking away the advance payments program.

The minister responsible for grains and oilseeds suggests that somehow or other the program is not going to be destroyed. All he needs to do is talk to the executive secretary of the Ontario Corn Producers, Mr. Daynard, and he will find out that in the past something like 1,200 farmers have used the program and that the group has probably analysed the program better than any other which has been making representations to members of Parliament. The group had a board meeting last Thursday and it was calculating whether it might be as low as 50 farmers who would actually use the program. That suggests to me that, in fact, something like fewer than 5 per cent would use the program when it is only a loan guarantee that the government is providing.

The minister makes the argument that if a farmer has the cash and credit to hold the crop over the winter, he will do better. The problem is that many farmers do not have the borrowing power, after having a production loan all throughout the crop season, to get this additional funding. There is no question in anybody's mind that removing the interest-free cash advance program for many producers will destroy the program.

Perhaps with the Wheat Board and the western oats, barley and wheat, they will probably run the program with other groups like the Ontario Corn Producers and soybean producers. Where such a very small number of producers would use the program, it is questionable whether they will even be bothered running it when something fewer than 5 per cent of the membership actually use it. There is no question that this change destroys the program for many producers. In any event, if producers are in a position where they can borrow the money at the bank, the advantage, according to the Ontario Corn Producers, for those who have reasonable credit is probably less than 1 per cent.

I just thought the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings would be very interested in the words of Mr. Glen Findlay. I know that the minister responsible for grains and oilseeds would not want to listen to this, but this is from the Manitoba Government. The Conservative Minister of Agriculture there has called on the Government of Canada to resume making the interest free cash advances to grain producers so that they can continue to pay bills while waiting to sell their crops. He said this on September 19. In a letter to the federal Minister of Agriculture, Findlay said he was concerned that the advance payments to producers were not available August 1 when the new crop year started. Mr. Findlay wrote:

> Producers have come to rely on these programs as an essential source of farm cash flow at harvest time. I would urge you to start issuing advance payments as an immediate priority, so that cash flow problems currently felt by Manitoba producers can be alleviated as soon as possible.

It just seems to me that the Conservative Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba is making the argument that every producer group is making in this country, namely, that this is an important means of cash flow at harvest time. It helps those producers in Manitoba who have a low-quality crop. In some areas of the prairies, there has been damp and wet weather during the harvest season, and farmers end up with a low-quality No. 3 or No. 4 wheat which cannot be put into the pool system because the demand is not there immediately. In those cases, we have the interest free cash advance available. For those producers who have already suffered because of a lower-quality crop, this makes money available to them.

I am sure that if the minister would just quietly let this bill die on the Order Paper or withdraw it, he would be answering the request of Mr. Findlay. I thought perhaps the member from Prince Edward—Hastings would be interested in this communication from Mr. Findlay because I am sure it would apply equally to some producers in Ontario as well.

Mr. Vanclief: Mr. Speaker, that is an interesting piece of information because it goes along with what the other organizations are saying. I repeat, we realize the government has a majority. We realize that the government is probably going to go through with this whether anyone likes it or not, but I do not think it is fair to change the rules in the middle of the ball game. That is what many of the organizations are saying. We don't like the way the rules are being changed at all, but at least if you are going to change them, don't change them half way through the game.

I would like to quote briefly before I sit down from the September issue of the Ontario Corn Producer magazine and I believe the Ontario Corn Producers Association has a pretty good telephone line and pretty good communications with the minister's office. I am surprised it has not been more effective in getting its message across. I will read from it:

> At present, it remains the OCPA policy to oppose the change (at least until such time as comparable changes are made in the U.S. Farm Bill), as we believe that any benefit conferred via an interest-bearing program will be eliminated via the myriad of administrative procedures (and cost borne by producers) which this program entails.

I think that sums it up.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, I have three brief points. First, producers. The numbers that I have here indicate that between 500 and 600 producers out of approximately 25,000 make use of the program. I do not know where he gets his numbers, but these are numbers that we have from the department for the 1988 crop year.

Second, the member gets up and reads a letter from the Minister of Agriculture in Manitoba. He wants the bill to be passed to alleviate cash flow problems. That is exactly what this bill will do. He does not say he wants the bill to be passed to save interest payments. He says he wants the bill or the program to go ahead, and I wrote down the wording, "to alleviate cash flow problems". That is exactly what this bill will do.

To go back again, if I can, to the member from Prince Edward—Hastings, he makes the case himself. He says that for $2.41 invested, which is what the government does when it pays interest on a farmer's loan, that farmer receives $12 in benefit. What he is suggesting is that nobody is going to use this program because farmers are not smart enough to know that. That is the implication that the members opposite make.

A farmer is going to make—I forgot the numbers—over $12 for an investment of $2.41. A farmer is going to be smart enough to do that, but he cannot do that if we do not pass this bill. The cash flow is going to be there. That same advantage as far as marketing is going to be there. It is a five to one return, as the hon. member said. All we are saying is that the farmer is going to have to pay the $2.41 instead of the government.

Let us pass the bill. Let us get it out of second reading today. Let us take it to committee. Let us bring it back. Let us get it through as quickly as we can within reason. We are not talking about railroading it. Let us get it through as quickly as we can within reason so that the farmers can have a chance to invest $2.41 and make the $12 that the hon. member talks about himself.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege because clearly when I read from the letter from Mr. Glen Findlay, the Minister of Agriculture for Manitoba, I said that he has called upon Ottawa to resume making interest free cash advances to grain producers so they can continue to pay their bills while waiting to sell their crops. The minister from Manitoba is not saying we should pass this bill. He is saying he wants interest free cash advances.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, going back to this government's Throne Speech opening this session of Parliament, it was not kidding when it said that agriculture is a burden to the federal treasury and that it was determined to reduce that burden in a drastic way.

All by itself, this government will show the world how selfless it is. The government will show the way to an unsubsidized agricultural world. It is prepared to sacrifice agriculture in Canada to show the world its good intention.

We are the only country in the world that is cutting down on the support we give to our farmers. The United States is not doing it. The Europeans are not doing it. Japan is not doing it. There is no concrete evidence that any other country is withdrawing support from its producers of food. Not only is our government withdrawing support from our farmers. It is doing so without knowing to what degree other countries, especially the U.S., are supporting their agricultural industries.

We now find ourselves in a peculiar position eight months after signing the free trade agreement. We are setting up a committee to determine what the American subsidy programs are. This is unbelievable. We signed a free trade agreement with the United States which will have a dramatic effect on our agricultural industry, both on producers and on processors, and we are making dramatic cuts through a budget without knowing to what degree the Americans are subsidizing their agricultural industry. We are just now trying to find that out.

We now know that the Americans know all about our subsidy program. Take the hog countervail action as an example. The American hog growers and the U.S. Department of Commerce know exactly how our hog industry is being assisted. Do we know how the American hog industry is being subsidized? No, we do not.

Even our tripartite stabilization agreement with hog growers which our Minister of Agriculture assured us would not be countervailable because it is an insurance program is high on the U.S. list of objections in the American countervail action. So much for ministerial assurances.

Why is our government going ahead pell mell to remove perceived irritants to the free trade agreement as it pertains to agriculture when we do not have any idea what the definition of a subsidy will be? Why is this government cutting freight rate assistance? Why is the government cutting the At and east grain and flour program? Why is the government eliminating the fuel tax rebate? Why is the crop insurance program being changed? Why are changes being made to the Farm Credit Corporation commodity-based loans?

This is what the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings was referring to when he said that the farmers of our country are becoming depressed. They do not know what will be hitting them next.

The potato farmer in Prince Edward Island will be especially hurt because of the fuel tax rebate cuts. Potato farming is, by its nature, a crop which uses considerable amounts of fuel when compared to the farming of other crops. Potato farmers are required to extensively use their farm tractors in the planting, cultivation, spraying and digging of their crops which necessitates the consumption of large amounts of fuel.

The cutting of the fuel tax rebate program will add thousands of dollars to potato farmers' cost of production. In just one instance, for the potato farmer who grows 300 acres of potatoes, it will cost him $10,000 more to plant and harvest his crop than it did previously.

The Farm Credit Corporation will no longer be giving commodity-based loans. We will have a situation where the U.S. government is providing its farmers with 6 per cent loans while our loan rate is from 12 to 12.75 per cent with the removal of commodity based loans. This is what our government calls a level playing field. Instead of trying to make our farmers more competitive we are making sure that they will not be as competitive.

Despite statements by this government our dairy industry with its marketing board structure is in considerable jeopardy. The first signs were this government's agreement to place a cap on the input costs for a period of 24 months. Then, in addition, there are budget cuts to the dairy export program and the Canadian Dairy Commission.

Canada finds itself in a great deal of difficulty with the preliminary GATT ruling on yogurt and ice cream. GATT nations respect bilateral agreements like the one we have signed with the United States. They usually adopt the recommendations made by their panels. Now Canada finds itself in a tight spot. The U.S. will have access to the Canadian market for its yogurt and ice cream while the U.S. will not allow Canada or any other country to export dairy products into its country by virtue of a law passed in defiance of a GATT ruling in 1954 which allowed other countries to export dairy products into the U.S.

What a mess we are making for ourselves in order to be liked by our neighbours. The government is saying that if agriculture cannot make a profit in a market-driven economy, then it has to be sacrificed. This notion is evident with the changes to the Advanced Payments for Crop Act.

The Prairie Grain Advanced Payments Act came into being in 1957-58, over 30 years ago. Why was this act passed? Obviously, the government at the time, and we all know its political persuasion, felt there was a compelling need to assist farmers, especially western farmers, in meeting some of the cash flow problems. The government of the day also saw the need to control and/or regulate the supply of grains. It wanted to eliminate the situation where there was a large glut every fall, a glut which had the effect of dramatically lowering the price to the farmer.

The Prairie Grain Advanced Payments Act resolved both these problems. By allowing the farmer to receive an interest-free advance payment, this act encouraged the farmer to withhold deliverable grains until later in the year when he could then receive a much better price for his product than he would have had he been forced to dump it in the fall.

The farmer did receive a two-fold benefit. His interest free advance allowed him to meet his cash-flow needs and he received a better price for his product. For many farmers these two factors turned a marginal operation into a viable one.

If this interest free incentive is lost we will be reverting to an intolerable situation. A farmer in Canada does not need special legislation in order to go to a commercial financial institution to borrow money and pay the excessively high current interest rates. He can do that at present on his own with his crop for collateral.

I would like to ask who will provide this extra storage space which will be required when the even flow of grain has been disrupted. Who will pay that? If the Department of Agriculture responds in the same vein as the Department of National Defence does in similar situations, the answer will be, "that is not our responsibility. We just cause these problems, it is someone else's job to resolve them". If you want evidence of this just examine the ongoing saga in Summerside.

My colleagues from Algoma, Lambton—Middlesex, Winnipeg—St. James, Prince Edward—Hastings and others have outlined the Liberal Party's position on this bill in a most competent and eloquent manner. I want to add to their commentary in a specific reference to Atlantic Canada.

In 1977, the Advance Payments for Crops Act was passed because of the excellent experience with the original act. The government extended the same basic considerations to root crops, some field-grown crops, honey and maple syrup.

This legislation, Bill C-36, which removes the interest free provision from advance payments, strikes at the very heart of the single most important agricultural crop in Atlantic Canada and that is potatoes. In the province of Prince Edward Island the National Farmers Union, the Federation of Agriculture, the Potato Producers Association of P.E.I. and the P.E.I. Potato Marketing Commission have unanimously condemned this bill. I would like to put on record some of the sentiments expressed by these organizations. I quote:

> The now-defunct interest free cash advance programs served a vital function. The program, in place for many years, was useful not only to producers but also to marketing agencies. Many producers depended on that system for cash flow during the harvest season. In some cases it was their only source of cash flow.

This is from Art Macklin, vice-president of the National Farmers Union. From a letter to the Prime Minister from the P.E.I. Potato Marketing Commission:

> Prince Edward Island potato producers are extremely disappointed and upset at your budget announcement that the Advanced Payments for Crops Act is to be amended to remove the interest-free provision. If this amendment is introduced, it will basically destroy this valuable program at a time when it is needed most. This is a serious setback to P.E.I. potato farmers and will cause real hardship this fall for potato growers facing high interest rates.

The no interest advance payments program has been extremely valuable in encouraging producers to market their crop in an orderly manner over the marketing season rather than being forced to sell early after harvest in the fall.

What is being proposed will have a serious destabilizing effect on the fall potato market at a time when Canada's potato industry, with the support of the federal Minister of Agriculture, is working hard at improving the present system of orderly marketing of potatoes. This is from Lloyd Palmer, the chairman of the commission.

In addition, a letter to me from the Potato Producers Association of P.E.I. states:

> Our organization was shocked and infuriated by the federal Minister of Finance's announcement to remove the interest free provision from the Advance Payments for Crops Act.
> The Potato Producers Association of Prince Edward Island finds the proposed amendments totally unacceptable and request you, as members of Parliament, to support all agricultural organizations in their request to have the proposed amendments revoked.
> Peter Van Nieuwenhuyen, President.

A letter to me from the Federation of Agriculture, Mr. Speaker, reads:

> I am sure you are aware of the importance of the potato industry to our province. However, you may not know that 40 per cent of our potato growers have been using the advance payments program. That accounted, this year, for $6.5 million in interest free advance payments to our potato growers.
> The change recommended by Mr. Wilson in the budget will do little to cut the national debt but on the other hand will cause great hardship for our potato growers and others, especially when today's rising interest rates are considered.
> The P.E.I. Federation of Agriculture is in favour of all Canadians working together to cut the country's debt, but we need a realistic approach rather than actions which harm our basic producers without helping the economy in any major way.

That is from Gary Heaney, president of the federation.

The evidence is overwhelming. The agricultural community objects in a most serious fashion to the removal of the interest free feature in the Advance Payments for Crops Act. Many farmers in this country are already having a very tough time, a time made tougher by the provisions of the free trade agreement. Why does this government want to introduce legislation to increase these hardships?

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I was listening with interest to my colleague's comments on Bill C-36. I listened with particular interest to the fact that the producers in Prince Edward Island want this bill withdrawn, the same as the producers in western Canada. The 17 organizations that met in Winnipeg again last Monday morning all called on the Prime Minister to have this piece of legislation withdrawn because the agreement should have been signed with the producer organizations long ago. Those cheques should have been in the mail by now.

However, I want to ask him if he has any indication as to how long those loans are usually applied for. Is it four months out of the season, from the time of harvest until four or six months later? Does he have any indication on that? He mentioned that 40 per cent of the potato growers in Prince Edward Island use these loans. Does he have any indication as to how many would use them if they take away the interest free provisions of the original legislation?

Mr. McGuire: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for the question. The answer is that as far as the potato growers are concerned the time they use this interest free advance payment is from six to eight months. Many of our farmers are building temperature controlled storages which enable them to hold their very perishable crop for very extended periods of time from harvest time until the following June when the prices normally go up and they can receive a better return for their product.

As I stated in my speech, 40 per cent of the potato growers use the advance payments scheme. I am told by the minister of agriculture in Prince Edward Island and by some of the producers in Prince Edward Island that they will no longer be using the program. In effect what the government members are doing is eliminating this tool from the arsenal which the potato producers have to make a viable operation of their farm. They are making it such that they will no longer be able to use it. As far as they are concerned the government may as well do away with the bill in total, because it will be of little benefit to them.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to speak in the House the other day on the main motion, and now it is my privilege to be able to rise and speak on the amendment to that motion.

The fact that I felt compelled to rise again to speak on this general debate really is as a result of some of the statements which the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds made earlier in the day and when he began his remarks on this subject yesterday.

The minister said yesterday that he felt somewhat sad at the tone of this debate, that he felt bad about some of things that he was hearing coming from the opposition benches. I do not blame the minister at all for feeling sad and bad about what he is hearing from the opposition benches because the report from the western producer that I read into the record, which included even people from his own constituency association, reflects very clearly the fact that what he is hearing from the opposition is in fact what he is hearing from the people of Canada, from the farmers of Canada and their organizations. He knows very well that this government of which he is a part is flying in the face of farm opinion from coast to coast. If I was the minister who had to stand up and defend that I would be sad as well.

I think it is a clear indication that this government has turned its back on the farm community, that it has written off the farm community. It thinks it need only appeal to the people in the suburbs who might gain some benefit through some of the financial manoeuvring on the stock markets and so on. This government likes to encourage those who might benefit from the large pools of capital that are left floating around the country, but it refuses to collect taxes from large corporations. Certainly that is the segment of the population this government wants to appeal to and no longer the farm community which kept it alive from the time of my predecessor John Diefenbaker on.

The minister also accused the opposition, I think his words were, of making some outrageous statements about the bill that is before us. I think the most outrageous thing that I have heard is the government's defence of this bill when he accused the opposition of dragging its heels, holding up this bill and keeping farmers from getting their money. He said he hoped that farmers across the country would jump on the opposition and call us to task for holding up their money. That is just totally preposterous. I did not think somebody who is as widely respected as the Minister for Grains and Oilseeds would even make that kind of a statement because the record on this is very clear.

The reason that we are into this in the first place is that the government, on April 27, did not include in its budget the leaked document that we hung around here at night trying to take a look at, the $27 million that was needed for cash advances in this year. The government was required by statute to include that money in the budget. It is a statutory provision and the government broke that, so it was then caught in the position where the law said it had to provide money but there was no money in the budget. It was the government that caught itself in this net. It did not seem to realize what it had done for a long time because it was not until June 26 that any mention was made at all of the situation that now faces farmers.

That bill was only introduced on June 26 and was not discussed in any way while the House was still sitting. It obviously was not urgent then. When we came back, I believe on September 26, the government realized it had botched the whole writing of that bill so badly that it could not stand scrutiny and would not even work, could not even be made operational. So the government withdrew the bill. The next day it came back with the bill that we see before us today.

If you look at this, there were 152 days between when the government broke the law by not providing money for a statutory program and the time when the government introduced the legislation that was supposed to correct this oversight. There have been eight days since then, about eight hours of which have actually been spent by the opposition debating this bill, and the government has the nerve to accuse us of dragging our heels and keeping money out of the hands of farmers when, first of all, it broke the statute and, second, it did not introduce a proper bill for 152 days.

That is just the kind of thing that the farmers of this country are not finding acceptable. That is making farmers coast to coast, including a lot of Conservative farmers, very angry with this government. I think this government is starting to feel the heat, and that is why the minister says that he feels sad.

I would in fact like to go so far as to have him discuss this with my colleagues. One way that we could get money very quickly to farmers, if we do not want to go through the whole process of debating this bill some more, having it go to committee, putting it through third reading and report stage, proclaiming it, then gearing up the bureaucracy it will take to administer this bill, is for the government to allow this amendment to pass.

Otherwise, even at best we are probably looking to the new year. If it is like the drought payment it could well take until March or April to get all the mechanisms in place, given the record of this government. We could get money flowing tomorrow if the government would allow this amendment to pass. I am sure that my colleagues on this side of the House would immediately approve the $27 million and the Supplementary Estimate in the same way we did for the drought program in June, to get this money flowing to farmers. I am sure I have the support of members on this side of the House for that kind of an initiative. I ask the minister to very seriously consider that.

The minister also made considerable effort to place this bill in the context of the government's over-all fiscal policy, the need to cope with the deficit by making the farmers assume part of the deficit reduction in this country. But again it was a totally contradictory approach that the minister took. First of all, he brags on the one hand that in the last year the government has spent $3 billion on the farm sector of which he is very proud, but then on the other hand he said this $27 million, which is a very key element right now for a lot of farmers' cash flow and in the operation of marketing organizations from coast to coast, absolutely has to be cut and cut right now. It just does not make any kind of sense at all.

The other argument that the minister made is that this deficit reduction has to take place because what is really killing farmers is high interest rates. That was one time when I in fact agreed with the minister. I applauded the minister for his insight in saying that, yes, high interest rates are killing farmers.

In fact they are, but it seemed very ironic coming from a minister who stands up in full support of the Governor of the Bank of Canada when he persists, in the face of virtually unanimous opinion from the forecasting and economic analysis community, the bankers and everybody, many of the government's friends, in keeping interest rates much higher in this country than they need be. In fact, the stubborn refusal to even consider changes to the interest rate policy by the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada is what is killing the economy in all sectors, not just agriculture.

I cannot see how the minister can say that to lower interest rates we have to cut this $27 million when it is his own government's policy that is causing the high interest rates in this country. Furthermore, if he is that worried about high interest rates, why is he out there supporting the grab and steal tax that his government has introduced?

The government concedes that that particular tax is going to create another 3 per cent inflation, which brings us from 5 per cent to 8 per cent inflation. You have to assume that there is going to be some way to catch up on that another 2 per cent or 3 per cent. Then we are at 10 or 11 per cent inflation.

Given the fact that this government stands behind the Bank of Canada policy of raising interest rates to counter inflation, it takes no imagination at all—in fact I think it is a very accurate forecast—to say that if inflation as a result of the grab and steal tax gets to 10 and 12 per cent we could be looking at 18 to 20 per cent interest rates within the next year or within a year of that tax being introduced.

It is totally preposterous for the minister to suggest that farmers have to eat this $27 million to lower the interest rates when both their interest rate policy itself and their approach to the grab and steal tax are going to raise those interest rates.

The minister failed completely to deal with the whole question of fairness that is involved in this matter. He went so far as to say that it is going to enhance orderly marketing and so on, because there are all these farmers out there who refuse to go out in 40 below weather in the morning to shovel out their augers and tractors and get their machinery running to shovel grain.

He is saying that these are the people who are destroying the orderly marketing system and that they have to be brought into line by making them pay interest on cash advances. That is one of the most outrageous statements probably ever made by a Minister of Agriculture in this House. I am looking forward to sending out copies of Hansard to farmers in my constituency and to other farmers I know in the country, so that they can see what the minister's analysis of the orderly marketing system is. There is an inherent unfairness to this and it has been pointed out by many members but it does not seem to have penetrated into the minister's thinking in any kind of way.

As has been clearly outlined—and nobody denied it; certainly he did not—the grain handling system only has capacity for less than 40 per cent of the grain that is produced in any one year. Therefore, 60 per cent of the grain cannot in fact, no matter what the business climate, no matter what the intentions of the farmers, enter that grain handling system when it is taken off the fields.

What the minister is in fact saying is that those people who get their crop off earlier, or happen to have harvested grades of wheat that are currently in the shipping program of the Canadian Wheat Board or other marketing organizations, can obviously get cash up front because they can sell their crop for cash. Those farmers who have a late harvest because of adverse conditions, which it often is in the part of the country that I represent, the northern prairies, cannot get their grain in; the elevators are plugged.

Or perhaps, as is the case this year again, there is an awful lot of feed wheat and very poor quality grain on the prairies for which the Canadian Wheat Board has not developed a marketing program because it did not know it was there. The demand is there for high quality wheat, so the people who have the high quality wheat can get their money up front; but the people who harvested late and are already in trouble, already have poor grades of grain, are going to be out of luck. They are going to have to pay interest solely for the reason that there is not room in the elevators and because they had a poor and a late crop.

How can the minister say that in any way that is fair? In the same way that discriminates against farmers geographically. The most classic example, ironically, is in his own province. In Saskatchewan and Alberta grain farmers have the advantage of being able to ship grain through the ports of Prince Rupert and Vancouver. That is always an option. There is a well developed grain handling system that heads off to the west coast. That system has ice-free ports and can function right through the winter.

However, for Manitoba producers it is a much different situation because their grain gets shipped out through Thunder Bay which has a long shutdown through the winter, which means that Manitoba farmers have no marketing option at all and no delivery option at all. Once the elevators are full and the port freezes up that system shuts down, so the very producers who he represents are the ones who are going to be hit the worst by this. It is no wonder that an executive member from his own constituency association rises at the Conservative convention and says his chances of re-election are slim and nil. I think it is very clear from this kind of an action that he is ignoring the interests of the farmers who are, in fact, his very neighbours.

Similarly the government's initiative in the budget to cut all funds for branch line rehabilitation, even those rail lines like those in my constituency where there had already been a public investment in upgrading the road bed, putting down ballasts and putting down ties when all they needed was heavy steel. The government said that it is going to waste the money which has been invested in that till now by not adding the little bit of additional money that it takes to put on heavy steel.

That just perpetuates even more the rationalization of the grain handling system which had been occurring over the last number of years and has in fact been hastened, with all due respect, by my colleagues from the Liberal benches. The removal of the Crow rate was certainly a factor in the rationalization of that railway system. Nevertheless, no matter whose fault it was, it has occurred, which means that people who live on the railway mainlines which are the ones that get all the investment and all the attention have elevators and local delivery points to which they can deliver virtually at any time, because those trains are moving through there every day taking grain out of those elevators. However, the people who live off those lines on branch lines, especially in communities where there are no more branch lines and are already hauling a long way, do not have a similar delivery option.

The minister is saying to farmers who live far away from the main lines—and we are talking here in some cases of hundreds of miles—that they have much less of an opportunity to sell their grain and to pocket the money for their grain at the time of harvest and to make a quick delivery than do people who live far away from the branch lines.

I know my time is starting to run out here, but there is one more point that I would like to make in relation to the minister's comments.

The minister from time to time has talked about, has in fact asserted, that farmers are clamouring for this bill to be passed, indicating I suppose that he has been in some kind of consultation with the farmers. That is the farthest thing from the truth. This government's record on consultation in the agriculture field is just dismal and getting worse.

Certainly we saw that earlier in this session when this whole issue of taking oats out of the Wheat Board came forward. There were even polls done by the Conservatives own pollsters, Allan Gregg and Decima Research, which indicated that 70 per cent of the farmers did not agree with the minister's initiative on that particular matter. Farmers, including many good Conservatives, stood up by the hundreds at meetings all over the prairies out and out condemning the government's initiative, but the government never listened at all.

In this case we have documented here not only some of the large organizations like the Saskatchewan Wheat Board, the National Farmers Union and the Federation of Agriculture, but even the very organizations that supported the government on free trade and supported it on taking oats out of the Wheat Board, organizations like the Western Canadian Wheat Growers and the Canola Growers. They have out and out condemned this legislation. They are not calling on the opposition to let this thing go through quickly. They are calling on the government to stop this legislation in its tracks and bring back the old bill whereby they can have cash advances immediately, interest free. All those organizations are calling on the government to do that, but the minister is not listening.

In conclusion, can the minister identify one other sector in the economy in which this government totally ignores opinion in the farm community right across the country, across the political spectrum? Is there any other sector where the ministry so totally ignores the opinion of farmers and their representatives as the government has on this particular measure? I invite the minister to respond to that.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River has made a very eloquent address and indeed his summary of the events leading up to the introduction of this bill was erudite, succinct and extremely accurate.

I think he will agree with me when I say it showed the fumbling and bumbling that has characterized this government in its failure to get the legislation in order. It adjourns the House and then expects us having had a lengthy adjournment to rush back and pass everything with no debate and to allow this kind of dreadful legislation through without proper discussion. The hon.

member, I think, was very clear in his explanation of how the government did that.

We in the opposition very much appreciate support from the third party in this House. We know that his party has been very good in assisting us in our opposition to this particular legislation. I know the hon. member for Kamloops shares my views. The thing that made we wonder when listening to the hon. member's speech—and as I say he spoke very well—is whether the voters in Saskatchewan do not read "Liberal" when they see "NDP" on the ballots, because everything he said we in this party have agreed with and indeed suggested in this House on a regular basis. I commend him for his comments.

Having said that, I would like to pose a question to the hon. member. I see the hon. member for Maclead on the other side. He must be very nervous about seeing this kind of legislation go through because his friends and neighbours would not approve of this bill.

Two-thirds of the money formerly spent under this bill, according to the minister's figures, were spent in western Canada. Those moneys, I am sure, were going into the riding of Macleod and indeed throughout the province of Alberta in a big way. Here they are being taken away by members of this government through this attitude that is in my view improper. They have an obligation to pay this money out under the existing legislation. They cannot assume, as they are doing, that this bill is going to pass this House. Indeed, if the members from Alberta and the hon. member for Winnipeg South would get on their hind legs and oppose this legislation, as their friends, neighbours and constituents I am sure would wish them to do, and vote against this bill it would not pass this House. Then we would not get this dreadful legislation in Canada and the government would have to dole out the money under the existing legislation as it is required by law to do.

I must say I was pretty astounded when I saw them applauding this legislation as the Minister of Agriculture made a speech introducing it the other day. One can only wonder whether or not they are accurately representing the views of their constituents, whether they are doing the job that the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River is doing in representing his constituents' views today.

Does the hon. member not agree with me that the other members of Parliament from Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan in particular are going to have their constituents' rights destroyed if we pass this legislation? Is this legislation not going to take out of their hands two-thirds of $27 million or about $18 million as I calculate it? Is this legislation not going to take that $18 million right out of their pockets and thereby deprive them of the sustenance and the livelihood to which they might have otherwise been entitled? Does he not think that is an outrage?

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate that question from the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. In fact it takes a bit of the pain away from the fact that he defeated a very talented and excellent candidate for the New Democratic Party in his constituency, Major Len Johnson, who in fact was born and raised in my constituency in the Prince Albert area.

Because he is from central Canada and perhaps has not had the exposure to the politics of the west, I would like to tell him that the reason that people in the west in fact support the NDP rather than the Liberal party in many cases is that they are very progressive people and they have found through experience, especially in Saskatchewan, that they do not have to recycle these progressive ideas through the Liberal party in order to get them implemented. In the west we have demonstrated that the NDP does a much better job of implementing them.

An Hon. Member: But you don't get in.

Mr. Funk: Well we certainly have there. We certainly formed some successful governments in western Canada and I think people there appreciate that. Hopefully that is something that we can extend from coast to coast. I suspect a fair number of the members now sitting as Liberals would in fact applaud that and might well want, at some point or other, to consider joining us in that effort.

The question, however, was a good one because it had to do with the pressure that the government members opposite I know are getting from their constituents. Those constituents are very angry. They know exactly what is happening to them and they expressed it very clearly at the Conservative convention, but it seems the government's policy is to ignore its own convention.

The government is taking money out of the pockets of farmers. Furthermore it is not only the 18 million bucks or the 27 million bucks, but the farmers of Canada know very well what this government means when it starts talking about market driven and self reliant. That means this government is planning to leave farmers high and dry in this country and farmers are not going to put up with it, including Conservative farmers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We have a very short time for questions and comments from the minister.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, I want to make three brief points. There has been reference today and yesterday to the fact that the government, if not directly stated certainly implied, is breaking the law by not providing cash advances under the present legislation.

Hon. members I know would not want to mislead the House. That is not the case. The legislation says that under certain conditions the minister may provide cash advances. It does not in any way state that the minister shall. So let there be no illusion. There is no law being broken by cash advances not being available because the legislation says the minister may.

Second, the member said that we are the only country in the world to reduce expenditures on agriculture. The hon. member should know that the U.S. is proposing to reduce expenditures on agriculture by something like $1 billion. To the extent that he makes the point, that is certainly not accurate.

Last, the New Brunswick potato agency, as I understand it, has indicated that it will make use of this program once it is passed with interest payable, and the potato people in Prince Edward Island where the hon. member comes from have been non-committal. They have not said they would not use it; they have not said they would use it, the point again being that the sooner we pass this legislation the sooner farmers will have the opportunity to have cash advances once again.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: A very short reply from the member for Prince Albert—Churchill River.

Mr. Funk: Mr. Speaker, the minister may well be correct with regard to the technicality of the law but western farmers assumed that when John Diefenbaker told them in 1957 that this money would be there every year, that it would be there, and I think the minister should remember the moral obligation that John George Diefenbaker left upon the Conservative Party when he introduced this legislation originally.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

VIA RAIL

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, our most famous transcontinental train, the Canadian, was created as part of the terms of entry of British Columbia into Confederation in 1871. The transcontinental route is not a frivolity; it is a constitutional commitment made to the people of British Columbia.

The geniuses in cabinet apparently believe that they can dishonour that commitment to British Columbia on economic grounds. They should, however, have read VIA's annual report that says on page 10, "The Canadian, our western transcontinental train—this one train generates $100 million for the tourist industry each year".

They should also have read the official cabinet background document tabled here yesterday before they cut the Victoria–Courtenay route. That document says that the Vancouver Island service will increase by 42 per cent in riders. They cut a route which their document says will produce a profit.

Only a Conservative Government would break a constitutional commitment to British Columbia and, in the process, destroy two train services which generate millions of dollars in profit.

Sir John A. Macdonald, the first Conservative Prime Minister and the first Prime Minister of our country, must be spinning in his grave.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my topic is appropriate.

The VIA Rail cutbacks recently announced were painful and disappointing to many Canadians. As difficult as they are, I support the minister's approach to both maintain national passenger service and to address the tremendous cost of VIA to the taxpayers.

No matter what we do as families, businesses, or government the costs must be weighed. At a cost of $5,000 million to the taxpayers over 12 years I agree the changes just had to be made.

People in my riding are insisting on cuts in government spending and I agree with them. To me, our debt of $350,000 million is a threat to all of us. It must be addressed and not conveniently swept under the carpet.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Quebec the Minister of Health and Welfare threatened that social programs will be jeopardized unless a 9 per cent goods and services tax is implemented. He admits more money was spent this year on reducing the deficit than on social programs. This former Minister of National Defence who was willing to spend billions on nuclear subs now indicates he is willing to reduce the deficit on the backs of pensioners, the disabled, the sick and the unemployed.

Instead of using blackmail threats against the provinces and others who oppose the GST, he should press the government to implement progressive alternatives to reduce the deficit. The government could begin by reducing interest rates, introducing a corporate minimum tax, taxing capital gains 100 per cent, and eliminating unfair tax breaks.

As Minister of Health and Welfare he must maintain and improve Canadian social programs, or he should resign.

DRUGS

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, October 3, 1989 was a most important day for the people of Vanier, a community located within the riding of Québec East. On that day, the Vanier Police Department launched a drug prevention program under the honorary chairmanship of Guy Lafleur, a well–known and much–esteemed hockey player. Under the theme "Drugs—No Future", the Vanier police are calling on young people from 5 to 20 years old to join them in saying no to drugs.

Mr. Speaker, this initiative involves activities in schools, social clubs and youth groups. This terrific project brings together a whole team to fight drugs and to educate the young people of Vanier and make them aware of the problems and dangers of using alcohol and other drugs.

Thanks go to the Vanier police, the City of Vanier, the Knights of Columbus and the Nordiques hockey team who are pooling their energies for the health and welfare of our youth!

ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, the same mismanagement, incompetence and disrespect for Parliament that the Prime Minister has shown with respect to our transportation policy such as cutting VIA, with respect to the taxation policy and the introduction of the GST, both decisions made without consulting this House or the people of Canada, he is now showing on the international scene.

I drew to the attention of this House recently concerns about the Prime Minister's expected decision to join the Organization of American States. Our party has repeatedly requested that he put off making any decision until we have heard from our NGOs and from the people of Canada.

To date, neither the Prime Minister nor the Secretary of State nor the chairman of the standing committee on external affairs have given any indication that prior to making this decision they will hold full hearings into this drastic change in Canadian foreign policy.

Once again, and I cannot stress strongly enough how important this is, I urge the Prime Minister to hold off making his decision until we have had an opportunity to fully explore and discuss the pros and cons of Canada becoming a full and active member of the Organization of American States.

SIX NATIONS RESERVE

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the residents of the Six Nations reserve are facing a crisis in their community.

Over 1,200 elementary school-age children of Six Nations have not been able to start school this year due to unsafe and unhealthy conditions at the school facilities. These include: asbestos in the schools, failure to meet fire code standards, failure to meet safety standards, inoperable and unsafe windows and doors, unsafe water and drainage systems, and inadequate washroom facilities.

It is unacceptable that the federal government which does an annual assessment of schools and which has declared each year since 1985 that the safety and health standards are deficient does nothing to improve these conditions and, indeed, allows Six Nations' children to attend schools slated for demolition.

The federal government has breached its responsibility to Six Nations. The government is neglecting basic human rights.

PATENT ACT

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, on October 1, fundamental changes to modernize Canada's Patent Act which were passed by Parliament in November, 1987, came into effect. The new act is an important element of this government's program to boost science and technology and to make Canada a strong competitor internationally.

As we all know, keeping abreast of new technology is critical to business success here at home and in the global market-place. That is why these changes were specifically designed to speed the transfer of technological information to the Canadian business community, thereby encouraging innovation and increasing productivity.

Among the big winners will be small and medium-sized businesses which do not have the capacity to conduct their own research and development. The new act will more quickly put the latest technologies from around the world at their fingertips.

We have also taken important steps in the interest of Canadian inventors. On October 2, the day after the new Patent Act came into effect, Canada ratified the Patent Co-operation Treaty. This treaty provides Canadian innovators with the means to more effectively protect their inventions abroad.

Finally, in the years ahead, this government intends to build on the changes to Canada's new Patent Act with the multi-year program to automate the patent office. Eventually, companies across Canada will have direct access to the largest collection of technological information in the country, the Canada Patent office.

NATIVE CHILD CARE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, during the first week of August the Ministers of Indian Affairs, National Health and Welfare and the Prime Minister received a copy of the Assembly of First Nations inquiry into native child care. To date the only response they have had from the Tory government is silence.

This study, funded by a grant from the Child Care Initiative Fund, found less than 70 child care centres operating in the 1,000 First Nations communities. Most, if not all, are understaffed and/or ill-equipped to meet the needs of native children.

Up until the day of the infamous budget leak, native leaders were assured that the money for the native child care initiative, $60 million, was not in jeopardy. It had been approved by Treasury Board. It was separate from the Tories child care initiative. Native leaders were dismayed to learn that this government made a conscious decision not to fund child care services for their children.

While $60 million does not meet the demand for native child care services, they feel it is a first step, a sign of a commitment.

I urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to respond to the Assembly of First Nations inquiry, to listen to native people and to respect their choice for child care services for their children. The time for study is over. The time for action is now.

ROYAL WINNIPEG BALLET

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, last night's gala performance of the Royal Winnipeg Ballet was a tremendous and exhilarating event. A celebration of 50 years of entertaining people through the finest of ballet, interpreting a story, theme, or rendering emotions through the artistry of dance and music brought the packed audience to a frenzied excitement.

I am sure that all members of Parliament would want to praise the Government of Canada for its wonderful initiative in supporting the Royal Winnipeg Ballet. The funds will be used to defray some of the costs of activities marking the dance company's fiftieth anniversary.

• (1410)

Founded in 1939, and given its Royal Charter in 1953, the Royal Winnipeg Ballet is the oldest dance company in Canada. It is appreciated for both its classical and modern repertoires. Two famous graduates of the Royal Winnipeg Ballet School have been award winning Evelyn Hart and the late David Perigrine.

The Royal Winnipeg Ballet, which will be on tour for 20 weeks this year, is known for the number of visits it makes abroad and for the immense success of these visits. A gold winner in Paris, Varna and Tokyo, the company has earned an international reputation.

I take this opportunity to wish the Royal Winnipeg Ballet much success in the next 50 years.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Draconian cuts announced yesterday by the Minister of Transport constitute yet another arrogant and abusive Tory tactic to destroy one of our national institutions. Why else would the Minister cut early morning train service from Canada's fifth busiest station, Kingston, to Canada's largest city, Toronto? This is a service that carried over 76,000 passengers last year according to the minister's own figures. Why else cut this train that serves Napanee, Belleville, Trenton, Port Hope, Cobourg and Oshawa? Why else cut redcaps who help the elderly, the infirm and the handicapped?

The cut of the Kingston–Toronto train makes it impossible for someone from Kingston to go and spend a day in Toronto and return on the same day. It is regressive. It is stupid. It will lessen travel in the corridor, travel that the minister in his statement yesterday admitted was vital for the future of VIA Rail.

The minister's announcement that VIA is for sale represents the total dismantling of a major Canadian asset owned and operated by Canadians. The Minister should be ashamed.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Transport made one of the most courageous moves in the history of Canada. Through the restructuring of VIA Rail he has taken the first major step toward developing a rational transportation system in Canada.

While some people in Calgary may be disappointed at the reduction in their service, virtually all understand and applaud the minister's efforts to cut spending and reduce the deficit.

We hope now that the minister will do everything in his power short of introducing new subsidies to facilitate and encourage the introduction of private enterprise solutions that will expand and vastly improve rail transportation to and from Calgary.

COMMENTS OF FINANCE COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the finance committee has reached a new low. Yesterday, he managed to insult the entire population of western Canada.

Who is this man to go into the province of Alberta and in response to serious and thoughtful concerns over the proposed GST, say, "I have never seen such stupidity in all my life"? Where does this man get off telling Albertans, "I wonder what they are, out to lunch". What gives the chairman of the finance committee the right to come from Metropolitan Toronto to western Canada and say, "I fail to understand how the level of education could be so low in the community". Why does the Member for Mississauga South remain in his job after commenting, "I guess what we ought to do is send a bunch of grade 5 teachers out here".

We in the west have had enough of this man's insults, his arrogance and contemptible behaviour. He owes us an apology. Better still, he owes us his resignation.

HOUSING

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): The Minister of Housing again is backing away from the positions of principle he took when he was a back-bencher. First, he agreed that the government had failed to provide affordable housing. Then he stated that the 30 per cent of income for housing is no longer a realistic figure. Now the minister says affordable housing is not a national priority.

How can he say that housing is not a priority when 1.2 million children in this country live in poverty, poverty often caused by the lack of affordable housing and high rents? How can he say that affordable housing is not a priority when the Canadian Real Estate Association says there are major affordability problems, not just in Toronto and Vancouver but in 27 areas of Canada.

This minister continues to be an apologist for the government's shameful lack of commitment to providing housing for Canadian families. This minister continues to make explanations in the House for his outlandish statements that are not believable.

Those in need of affordable housing and housing organizations have reached their limit of frustration with this minister's cavalier statements and his lack of action.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, the announced cancellation of the VIA Toronto, Peterborough, Havelock line through an area of rapid housing development has put the future of public transportation in the area in jeopardy. Spokespeople for GO Transit have stated that GO would be interested in the route as early as 1993.

Yesterday, the Minister of Transport stated a willingness to have discussions with the Government of Ontario about the future of the Toronto–Peterborough line. I urge the Minister to request his officials to initiate negotiations immediately with their Ontario counterparts. The objective would be to develop an interim plan to continue passenger rail service on the line until such time that GO Transit would inaugurate permanent service on its own initiative.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, farmers across this country, particularly in western Canada, depend upon the co-operation of the Canadian Government to ensure success in their farm operations.

The advance payments program is an important part of the co-operative relationship between our farmers and Canada's government. The Minister of Agriculture is committed to passing legislation that will provide advance payments for our farmers.

However, the Liberal Party of Canada, in its political wisdom, has chosen to put a road-block in the path of the minister's efforts to help our farmers. Canadian farmers will not tolerate political games by the Liberals.

Our farmers are important. Let us work together in this House to help our farmers. Let us pass the advance payments bill so farmers can get on with the business of farming.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): My question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Minister of Transport said, and I quote from the transcript, "The results of our study are clear. The restructuring of VIA will have a minimal effect on the environment. It will not result in substantial increases in energy consumption and emissions". That is what the minister said.

I want to refer the Prime Minister to the official document which formed the basis of the cabinet decision and which was tabled yesterday by the minister in the House of Commons. It is entitled Review of Passenger Rail Transportation in Canada. At page 110, this is what the document states: "The elimination of passenger rail service would result in an increase in fuel consumption by 63 million litres in 1990 and increase pollution; 62 per cent of VIA's passengers would be diverted to automobiles and 12 per cent to airlines. These two modes are far less fuel efficient and generate more pollution".

I want to ask the Prime Minister this, in view of what the official document says, slashing VIA Rail will have a negative effect both on energy consumption and on pollution, will he tell us whether when he approved the decision he had read the official document?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I maintain what I said yesterday. The Department of Transport did a preliminary study on the impact of the new VIA Rail network, and this study gave us the assurance that the environmental impact of the new network would be negligible. That is why we saw no need for an in-depth inquiry into the environmental implications of the new VIA Rail network.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I was quoting from the official document tabled by the Minister in the House yesterday to justify his decision. He cannot contradict what his own document says.

For months, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport kept saying that we had to wait for the official documents. No rumours, no gossip!

Now I would like to quote from the French version, at page 111, because the Minister of Transport said yesterday that chopping half of VIA Rail would eliminate only 2,761 jobs. Here on page 111, we read that in 1988, VIA contributed $860 million to the Canadian economy. Tourists who travelled by train spent $660 million more, which represents 57,000 jobs.

A little further, Mr. Speaker, on page 114, we read that eliminating passenger trains would be a permanent drain on the Canadian economy.

Could the Minister or the Prime Minister inform the House whether they read the official document?

• (1420)

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, we are of course aware of the contents of the official documents, and I still maintain that establishing the new VIA Rail network represents 2,76 lay-offs. From the way the Leader of the Opposition read the document, one got the impression that a large number of jobs are related to tourism. I agree, but people or tourists are not going to stop travelling tomorrow morning because in some cases, certain parts of the railway network have been abandoned. They will use other means of transportation and they will continue to invest in Canada, Mr. Speaker, and we will have a national network, a network that for the first time in many years Canadians will be able to afford.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the minister can waffle all he wants. I am reciting the official document prepared by VIA Rail which formed the basis for the cabinet's decision and which he tabled yesterday to justify the cabinet's decision.

I would like to read another section. Does the Prime Minister or minister know that this official document tabled yesterday has this to say at page 103

"People over 60 and people with family incomes under $30,000 tend to travel by rail more than the total population. In general, people with modest incomes such as the elderly, young and the people from economically depressed areas have less access to automobiles and a greater need for economical public transportation such as the train."

Has he read on page 9, Mr. Speaker, where the document has this to say:

"Cutting VIA Rail will represent a serious hardship particularly for the elderly, the handicapped and people travelling with small children."

How does the minister justify this decision which has such an unequal economic and social impact on the people of this country?

[Translation]

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the document to which the Leader of the Opposition reffered was prepared by VIA Rail. It was submitted by the VIA Rail Corporation. It is a study, a document we used as reference, but in fact the Department and the Government consulted a series of documents concerning the decision to be made.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that this document does not make any recommendations to the Government. We have considered it, but our decision to establish a national network commensurate with our ability to pay will not change. That is the kind of network we opted for yesterday and I am proud we did, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It is interesting to note again that while the government is cutting 2,700 quality jobs with VIA Rail which will lead to the loss of another 6,000 jobs in related industries, it is proposing to hire 3,000 tax hounds to enforce the governments goods and services tax. That is Tory logic.

There are still one million unemployed Canadians in this country. There are still 1,200 CN workers in Moncton who are out of work due to government policies. The government is introducing these cuts at a time when the Minister of Finance is predicting an 8.5 unemployment rate in 1990, and at the same time the government is cutting unemployment insurance.

Will the government suspend these VIA Rail cuts not only until the transport committee reports but until the government comes forward with a plan to retrain and/or to re-employ these VIA Rail workers in quality jobs, and to do it now and to put that plan before Parliament?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend places this in the context of job creation and employment. I think it is important—

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, jobs, jobs, jobs. Since this government was sworn in 1,555,000 new jobs have been created.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Inasmuch as my hon. friend is interested, the unemployment rate in Canada has fallen from 11.6 per cent since the day my hon. friend left the ministry to 7.4 per cent in Canada today. Almost 60 per cent of those jobs created have gone to women and there has been greater job-creation for minorities across Canada.

It is true, obviously, that when there are lay-offs it is up to the government through retraining programs and severance packages to make sure that the employees are dealt with with the greatest of consideration.

I am informed by the Minister of Transport, and others who have examined this, that the severance package available to VIA Rail employees who will be affected by this decision is among the most generous ever initiated by Canadian industry.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the Social Planning Council of greater Toronto points out that 90 per cent of those new jobs are in low-paying service industries.

Mr. Speaker, a third of these jobs eliminated by VIA Rail will be in Montreal, where the unemployment rate is now 10.7 per cent. These cuts will result in 3,000 more jobs being lost in related industries in Montreal. Other companies have recently shut down in Montreal, including Vickers, Gillette, etc.

My question is: What plans does the Government have to replace all those jobs lost in Montreal, especially the quality jobs like those that will be lost at VIA Rail? Montreal wants action now, Mr. Speaker!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my friend mentions—

[English]

Ms. Copps: Social Planning Council.

Mr. Mulroney: The Toronto Social Planning Council. I have not read the document. But perhaps my hon. friend would be interested, inasmuch as they predicted job losses this year, that since January 1 this year there have been 209,000 new jobs created in Canada, and 95 per cent of them are full-time jobs.

As for Québec, 344,000 new jobs were created since September 1984, compared to a net loss of 30,000 jobs under the Liberal Government.

In Montreal, 127,000 more people were on the labour market in 1988 than in 1984. Montreal's unemployment rate is 8.7 per cent, down from 11.3 per cent in September 1984. That is tremendous progress! We realize that there are serious problems in Montreal and we will deal with them seriously, in order to solve them permanently, as much as possible, for the benefit of all Montrealers.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, VIA Rail's business plan that was released by the Minister says the Atlantic maintenance centre will be closed. In this House yesterday the Prime Minister said it will remain open.

Given that the maintenance centre is designed to service the RDC trains which currently run on the now to be shut down regional Atlantic routes, and that the transcontinental trains are serviced in Montreal, is he now planning to shut down operations in Montreal? Which is it, people out of work in Halifax or in Montreal?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said yesterday, as I said, that the Halifax maintenance centre will be maintained. I also said the discussions are ongoing with the president and chief executive officer of VIA Rail to see how the operations of the maintenance centres will be managed. That is exactly what we are doing.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, the Minister in his opening statement at the press theatre yesterday said that the details should be left to Mr. Lawless to tell us. Obviously the two did not have their act together because they are saying different things in different documents.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Transport. Yesterday in the House the Prime Minister said very clearly that the cost to the taxpayer of the rail system in the corridor was $100 per passenger. The actual cost is $15.77 per passenger. I ask the Minister of Transport to indicate to the House which is the accurate figure in terms of the subsidy level paid by the Canadian taxpayer—the one of the Prime Minister's or the one that shows up in his documents?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my friend should be serious. He said $15. The average in Canada is $110. He speaks about the corridor, but he should say that on some routes in British Columbia it is $483 for every passenger on a train.

I believe we have to repeat. This network we propose is a national one but also an affordable network. If we listen to what is said by our friends in the NDP, we will expend money we do not have and we will kill VIA Rail. We will keep VIA Rail alive, but what we must have is a reasonable, affordable, national, and sustainable network now.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. On August 19, 1988, three months before the election, the Prime Minister appeared before 1,000 residents of the riding of Saint-Hyacinthe, on the platform of the station in Acton Vale, and reminded them that it was his Government that saved the passenger rail service between Sherbrooke and Montreal after the Liberal cutbacks. Yesterday, the Prime Minister did an about face and announced that this very important service, whose ridership increased by 6,000 between 1987-88, had been cancelled. My question to the Prime Minister is this: Why did he mislead the people of Saint-Hyacinthe and the people of Quebec about the future of their railway service, just to get their votes?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is wrong, because although it is true there have been cuts in the service between Montreal and Sherbrooke that includes a stop in Acton Vale, I can inform the Hon. Member that Canadian trains on the Montreal-Sherbrooke route will continue to stop three days a week in Acton Vale.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw the attention of the House to the presence in our gallery of His Royal Highness Prince Mohamed Bolkiah, Foreign Minister of the Sultanate of Brunei.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Over the last two days the Prime Minister has demonstrated that he does not care about increased traffic on our highways, he does not care about the environment, the poor, the elderly or the thousands of people who are going to lose jobs.

I want to ask the self-appointed czar of the free market system in Canada about competition. The government's official document that we were asked to await, Review '89, states that air fares are going to increase by 30 per cent over the next 24 months and that the loss of rail passenger service is going to accelerate that trend toward higher air fares.

What steps, if any, does the Prime Minister intend to take to protect Canadians from being gouged by increasing air fares or if, indeed, the elimination of VIA Rail passenger service is part of the package to ensure that the privatization of Air Canada is a financial success?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister has already spoken and, as time goes on, will respond to all members in respect of various alternatives that would be analysed. Indeed, I think my hon. friend may even eventually agree that the royal commission that we are proposing on passenger service and transportation in the 21st century will turn out to be a very viable and important instrument for Canada.

I regret that my hon. friend has little use for my views on transportation and refers to me as a czar. Perhaps he would be interested in the views of someone closer to his ideology and views, a man with a great deal of expertise in this area who sat as Minister of Transport in the Liberal government.

This morning Jean-Luc Pepin, interviewed on Morningside, said: "But the truth of the matter is that we have seen four revolutions since the advent of railways: the revolution of the automobile, the revolution of the bus, the revolution of the plane, and the revolution of electronics. There is no way we could have kept the railway system we had in the 19th century, no way at all. We had to adjust. That's what we are doing now".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest of respect to the Prime Minister and his new found friend, Mr. Pepin, we rejected that gentleman's views in 1982, 1983, and we reject them now.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dick: You didn't reject them in 1982-83.

Mr. McDermid: Explain.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Tobin: The very last paragraph of the government's own long awaited official document says: "Passenger rail is one of the safest modes of travel. If passenger rail is eliminated most travellers will be diverted to the automobile and fatalities will increase".

Why is the Prime Minister, according to the government's own estimates, dumping 2.7 million Canadians who rode the rails in 1988 on to the highways, highways that are already congested, dangerous, and too often fatal.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I think that the very distinguished Minister of Transport has responded quite fully, already, to many of the concerns raised by my hon. friend and in point of fact has indicated a series of inquiries and initiatives that will define for Canada the kind of transport policy that we need and that my hon. friend seeks for the citizens of his province and for Canada.

Mr. Tobin: We don't have a train in Newfoundland any more, Brian, thanks to you.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend mentions Newfoundland and the passenger service. I notice that he was quick to repudiate a very distinguished member of his party, Mr. Pepin, a former minister of the Crown.

I wonder if he would repudiate those members in his party of the government of 1967, when the Liberals introduced action to eliminate passenger train service in Newfoundland.

Mr. Tobin: I did, absolutely.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. For those Canadians who lost rail passenger service yesterday the prime concern now is: Is rail abandonment going to follow, especially since the president of CN was named the president of VIA Rail and given the job of recommending what routes should be cut thereby enhancing his own argument for rail abandonment?

Will the Prime Minister, knowing the importance of rail freight service in eastern Nova Scotia particularly Cape Breton, unequivocally assure the residents of eastern Nova Scotia that the rail line there will not be abandoned?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the National Transportation Act gives to the Governor in Council the ability to determine the policy concerning branch line abandonments. We know at the present time that CN and CP have made many requests to the NTA for the abandonment of branch lines.

Those proposals will be considered very carefully. I understand the concerns that my friend has, particularly on the section between Sydney and Halifax. It is something that I will consider once again very carefully, and we will do the best we can to maintain the best freight rail service in the country.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Yesterday's announcement on VIA Rail is a plan that will undoubtedly separate Canadians geographically, economically and socially.

I want to ask the minister whether or not he is aware that the termination of the Halifax–Sydney route will negatively affect the tourism industry, that it will deny Cape Bretoners the opportunity of good health care in Halifax, and that it will prevent students from affordable, reasonable transportation costs to pursue their education?

Will the minister explain to the Canadians in that region why this government persists in treating this area of the country as second–class citizens?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that this member can say what he just said, because 85 per cent of Canadians in Nova Scotia, as in any other province in the country, use their cars or the highways to travel in this country.

This line, Sydney–Halifax, has experienced since 1984 a 45 per cent decrease in ridership. We had to maintain a national network, we considered that the lines which were the least used normally, particularly the regional lines, had to be abandoned. What we have done is for the good of the national network.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the Government of British Columbia announced that it is suing the federal government for its breach of its constitutional undertaking by eliminating the last remaining rail service on Vancouver Island.

Was the Cabinet aware that it was riding roughshod over the Government of Canada's solemn undertaking when it destroyed the last remaining passenger service on Vancouver Island? Will the Prime Minister indicate that the government will now agree to abide by the promise made by this Parliament and the Government of Canada to the people of Vancouver Island?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, we have reviewed the matter and in the opinion of the government there was no constitutional obligation to maintain such a passenger rail service. We are not aware of any contractual arrangements which might be construed as creating an obligation on the Government of Canada.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I would hesitate to get into a legal argument with the learned and distinguished member.

Let me at least quote from a contract which the Minister of Rails and Canals on behalf of the Government of Canada signed in August of 1883 which provided that contractors will lay out, make, build, construct, maintain and work continuously a line of railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo.

Now, once again the government puts the boots to Vancouver Island and the west. How does this government square its call on provincial governments to stick by their commitments on constitutional change when it trashes a 106 year old agreement and commitment to the people of Vancouver Island?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, we have honoured all of our contractual agreements. If in fact there is a case to be made that case will be made in court.

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Will the minister direct his officials to negotiate an interim agreement with Ontario to continue the passenger rail service on the Toronto–Peterborough line until such time that GO Transit might otherwise take it over on a permanent basis?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wrote to all my colleagues at the provincial level to discuss any proposal which could be made by the provinces, particularly for the Toronto–Peterborough–Havelock line.

We have immediately started discussions, and I am quite confident that we will reach an agreement to transfer the line Havelock–Toronto to the GO Transit system in Ontario.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Supérieur): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Transport.

By cutting the vast majority of VIA Rail's secondary routes in Canada, including Cochrane—Kapuskasing, Marathon, Terrace Bay, Schreiber and Nipigon, the Minister is telling senior citizens, the poor, students and the disabled that they no longer have access to affordable transportation.

How does the Minister think these disadvantaged groups will be able to travel in Canada?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, when I consider the ridership rate on the routes to which my hon. friend referred, people were certainly using other means of transportation as well, because 85 per cent of Canadians, on these routes and elsewhere, take their cars, 5 to 10 per cent take the plane and the bus, which means that about 5 per cent of the local population, and this applies to any other region in this country, takes the train. So I have to assume that 95 per cent of senior citizens will continue to use the means of transportation they were using before.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Prime Minister.

I would like to ask him about the insensitive way his Government made cuts at VIA Rail. During the 1988 election campaign, the Prime Minister was bragging about how he had restored VIA Rail services in certain communities across Canada. So why did the Prime Minister cut VIA Rail services by 25 per cent between Ottawa and Toronto and by 40 per cent between Ottawa and Montreal, in my riding? Why did the Prime Minister once again forget to tell Canadians the truth during the election campaign?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, quite simply because in order to give all Canadians a national network, we did what we had to do to apportion railway services between Vancouver and Halifax. According to the Hon. Member's proposal, with the money you left us we would only have a network between Toronto and Montreal. Thanks, but no thanks.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Given the maintenance centre in Winnipeg will be completed in 1990 at the cost of $13.5 million, given the drastic cuts to VIA services announced yesterday, and given that the president of VIA wears the same hat in CN, could the minister assure this House and Manitobans that this newly constructed centre will remain a viable centre in Winnipeg and that it will not be given to CN but that it will be retained for VIA?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the operation of the maintenance centres in Winnipeg, Vancouver, Toronto or Montreal is a corporate decision by VIA Rail.

What I know is that the Winnipeg centre will continue its operation but that it will be done in light of the decisions made by the corporation, VIA Rail.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister.

The slashing of VIA Rail service will cost up to 800 jobs, directly and indirectly, in my province of Manitoba. The cuts and lay-offs are justified by this government on the need to improve VIA's efficiency. However, VIA's corporate plan, and I refer the minister to page 18 of the plan, says that VIA's operating subsidy per passenger mile will increase by over 50 per cent in 1990.

Is this the minister's idea of efficiency? Is this any way to run a railroad?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, very briefly I just want to say to my friend that if he will read these documents he will see that the province of Manitoba and Winnipeg in particular will lose 217 jobs.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister who will be well aware that two weeks ago the chairman of the finance committee insulted Atlantic Canadians by calling them all "nobodies".

• (1450)

Then last week he insulted all senior citizens in the country. Yesterday he fanned the fires of western separation and western alienation by referring to westerners as "ignorant, stupid, out to lunch" and then he threatened to send in grade five teachers to educate Albertans.

Will the Prime Minister do the honourable thing and extend an apology to all western Canadians on behalf of the chairman of the finance committee and do the right thing and ask for his resignation? If not, why will he not do that?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should tell my hon. friend, you should hear what he calls me.

I know what you call me. I have not read the remarks to which my hon. friend refers. I imagine when I do that the grace and elegance of them will leap off the page. But I will examine them very carefully and I will speak to the member as soon as I can and I will report back to my hon. friend.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am not asking the Prime Minister to report back to his hon. friend. What I am saying is that there are many members in this House who are representatives of the people of Alberta. Many of us were born and raised in the province of Alberta, as is his seat-mate. We consider these kinds of remarks, to be called stupid and ignorant, insulting and we would expect the Prime Minister to do the honourable thing and indicate right now whose side is he on? Is he on the side of the chairman of the finance committee, or is he on the side of grass roots Albertans?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry. I have not read the transcript of the remarks. I understand that the committee is moving from city to city and I have a tough time keeping up with the comments that are being made. I am starting to quiver because he is heading down toward eastern Quebec, but the Quebecers figure: "What the hell, you had him last week".

I will examine this carefully. I think we all know that the chairman of the finance committee is known for things other than the elegance of his language. But he is known as a very hard working, devoted parliamentarian, and I am sure that he would have nothing but the highest regard for all westerners, and in particular, my hon. friend.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. If he is quivering now, wait until he hears from the patrons of VIA Rail.

The Prime Minister has admitted by establishing a royal commission that he has no idea of the transportation needs of Canadians now or in the future. Yet he has chosen to destroy a rail transportation system that is vital to the future and which is absolutely essential for the maintenance of this country.

Why did he wait until yesterday to establish a royal commission? Why did he not establish a royal commission into VIA Rail in 1988 when he still supported it?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is quite inaccurate in some of his statements.

The possibilities for the royal commission are quite impressive. When my hon. friend see the names and the professional qualifications of those associated with the royal commission, he will be very well pleased. I know that transportation is for his area of Miramichi and for New Brunswick a particularly important issue.

I can give him the assurance that we will all be working together to make sure that what binds Canada, and has done so historically is strengthened and improved upon in the light of new transportation needs into the next century.

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, because my hon. friend is from New Brunswick, by referring him to a statement made by Mr. Pepin this morning. He said: "But to say, as the Premier of New Brunswick has said, that we need VIA in order to keep the country together is really romanticism, is really a dream. We have other ways of keeping the country together".

One of the ways we have of keeping the country together is by bringing about a sound competitive economy which will boost prosperity, increase productivity and create new wealth for all Canadians. That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Yesterday, P.E.I. lost its only remaining rail connection, a bus that runs from Charlottetown to Moncton. Some 28,000 passengers used this service last year, an increase of over 25 per cent from the previous year.

P.E.I. is now totally severed from the rest of Canada. Islanders and tourists cannot purchase a VIA ticket either to or from Prince Edward Island. This will have a great effect on tourism. Are we no longer considered a part of this country? Will the minister return this service to Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have made this decision in light of the national network. My friend knows very well that we are working at the present time on different options for Prince Edward Island in terms of keeping the link between the island and the mainland.

He also knows very well that in terms of the current system of transportation between Prince Edward Island and the mainland we have a very good ferry system. I believe that Prince Edward Island has not been deserted by the decision yesterday.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister knows that he and I can share humour on the proper occasion and exchange a barb at each other's expense when that is appropriate and relevant. But I do not think members of the House, certainly on this side, would agree with his response to the question from our colleague for Kamloops.

The member of Parliament for Mississauga South, who is the chairman of the finance committee of the House of Commons is representing this place across the country in Vancouver and in Alberta.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Have you read his statement?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I have read transcripts of his statement.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Have you read the whole statement?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I have read transcripts of his statement. In the last two weeks he has said to the people of Newfoundland, when he was discussing the itinerary of his committee, that it is not worth public money to go to the province of Newfoundland to hear what the citizens have to say out there. Now he has said to the people of Alberta that they are ignorant, that they need education at the grade five level, and that their evidence is not worthy of being listened to.

Whatever the Prime Minister may think of his own problems with the member for Mississauga South, by refusing to repudiate the member he is condoning what that member is saying. I urge him to reconsider on the floor of the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the statement by my right hon. friend that I am condoning what a member says is quite inappropriate.

Mr. Fulton: You sure did.

Mr. Mulroney: When we had some particularly egregious statements in the last few days by the member for Hull—Aylmer and the member for Scarborough—Agincourt, I never once suggested that those reflected the views—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Both of them apologized.

Mr. Mulroney: They apologized—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Then that member should apologize.

Mr. Mulroney: —and they should have apologized because they were outrageous statements. I never once suggested that my right hon. friend in any way condoned that kind of statement. Why would my right hon. friend want to impugn my motives in this regard when I have already indicated to my hon. friend for Kamloops that it is my intention to read carefully the transcript, to speak to the member, and to have him respond at an appropriate time when he returns.

I did not know that my right hon. friend believed that simply because something is said outside the House that I would endorse it. Of course I would never endorse statements like that. I thought my right hon. friend would give me the benefit of the doubt as I have readily given him the benefit of the doubt in circumstances much more serious in the past.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The question was not raised as a joke in this House of Commons. If the Prime Minister is taking this issue seriously, can we take it from him then that he is going to require an apology from the member for Mississauga South when he returns to this House, on behalf of all members of this House, because he is representing us all as he is hearing public testimony across the country?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, as I think he knows, I can assure my right hon. friend that any matter raised by my friend for Kamloops—Shuswap I take seriously. When he raises a matter like this, even though there was an exchange and some good humour between us, it does not in any way diminish the seriousness of the question that he raised and I will pursue it in that light and respond to my hon. friend as quickly as I can. I thank him again for bringing that to my attention because I had missed it.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Saskatoon—Dundurn. I would ask him to make his questions very brief.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration, but in her absence I would direct it to the Prime Minister. The minister tells us that 30,000 Canadians will lose their jobs as a result of changes to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. The Canadian Labour Congress tells us that the number is 130,000, a difference of 100,000 claimants.

Even the minister's own estimates reflect the tremendous amount of misery that will occur because of these changes. Let us take one example. In the Avalon Peninsula, on the basis of Bill C-21, 10,000 Canadians will be dispossessed of unemployment insurance. I want to ask the minister how the government can possibly justify that kind of devastation to the Canadian public, and I would like an answer right now.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, the statistics used in the study on unemployment insurance reform are correct, and I have every confidence in our statistics. They do, however, allow for the change in attitude we hope to see as a result of unemployment insurance reform, while the statistics to which you referred do not allow for changes in the behaviour of Canada's workers.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Government spokesman whether he can inform us of the business of the House for the next few days and perhaps the bills he intends to bring to the House for consideration, and also give us some indication of the business of the House for the next few days, tomorrow and perhaps next week.

Hon. Jean Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House): Mr. Speaker, I should be delighted to answer the question put by the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier. Tomorrow, we expect to consider the report stage of Bill C–10, Bill S–2, and second reading of Bill C–23. On Tuesday, October 10, since Monday is a holiday, we intend to consider the report stage of Bill C–20 and possibly second reading of Bill C–28. And finally on Wednesday, we intend to continue second reading of Bill C–28, followed, if time permits, by the debate on second reading of Bill C–33.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–36, an Act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Foster (p. 4275).

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure I stand here today to speak with respect to Bill C–36, a bill that is going to affect the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

Initially I would like to respond to some of the comments of the minister of grains and oil seeds this morning when he indicated that it was the opposition which was holding up this bill; and that was the reason farmers and producers were not receiving advance payments. With all due respect, the minister knows that that is utter nonsense. That is simply more dialogue coming from the Tories in order to mislead Canadians.

As the minister well knows, this intention to remove the interest free provision on advance payments to farmers was introduced last spring, on April 27. It took the government some 152 days introduce this bill. Now, if it had any sincerity with respect to farmers across this country and really had the interest of farmers at heart, it would have introduced this bill a long time ago. The government knows that many producers, many producer groups and many associations throughout this country have a lot of concern with respect to this bill. They are concerned that it is going to adversely affect agriculture in this country and they want to be heard. It is unfair for the government to simply bring in the bill at a time when farmers need advance payments and then say it is the opposition's fault for not passing the bill.

It is clear that when the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, and the Advance Payments for Crops Act were introduced some time ago, they had dual purpose. First of all, they were introduced at a time when the grain handling system throughout western Canada was in difficulty.

The purpose of the bill is to allow the Canadian Wheat Board to more orderly market its grain. It encourages producers to maintain grain in their own bins until the Wheat Board calls for it. As we know, the farmer only gets paid when he delivers his grain to the market. By allowing some advance loans, it allows the farmer to pay off his debts and still store the grain, which is an advantage to both the Canadian Wheat Board and to the producer.

As well, by keeping the product off the market, it avoids the situation where there are large amounts of grain entering the market, thereby adversely affecting the price of grain, particularly grain that is not part of the Canadian Wheat Board.

The Advance Payments for Crops Act was a benefit not only to producers, but to small businesses as well. As we all know, the farmer lives on credit for a good portion of the year and advance payments allow him to pay his bills to small business people, who themselves are suffering

With this change in the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, it is quite clear that farmers will not be utilizing the programs as they have before. A recent study by the UPA in Quebec indicated that approximately 10 per cent of the producers now utilizing the Advance Payments for Crops Act will utilize it when the interest amendments are added to these acts.

This is going to cause a lot of difficulty in a number of areas. First of all, it is going to mean that small business people will be unable to pay their own creditors because they will be carrying a credit from farmers. Small business people throughout Canada are under a tremendous amount of pressure today. If they are not receiving the credit that is owed them, it makes it difficult for them in turn to pay their own bills, which is going to mean that small business is going to suffer.

It also means that there is going to be pressure on the open market. There is going to be pressure for farmers to deliver their grain as soon as they can and that is going to adversely affect the market. It is going to drive prices down which, in turn, is going to adversely affect the price that producers are receiving for their grain.

It is sad that the government is taking this type of approach, because today rural Canada is under severe stress. The rural infrastructure in this country is about to collapse. A new phrase, in fact, has been coined throughout this country, "rural desertification", and it is true that community after community is losing people. They are losing services. Seniors no longer want to stay in communities where they were born, where they have lived and where they wish to retire, because they cannot be guaranteed services. Young families are hesitant to move into communities for the very same reasons. Family farms throughout this country are also under stress.

I think it is quite clear that this bill is not intended to help the small farmers across this country. Certainly, if it was, the government would not have put the limit at $250,000. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is a large sum of money. I know very few family farms that can take advantage of a loan of that size. It is only going to be the large industrial farms that will be able to take advantage of it.

This raises another problem. There are many industrial farms that are managing quite nicely. If they can take out a loan at a lower interest rate for $250,000, there is going to be a real possibility that these industrial farms will invest that money in term deposits for a few months and actually make money out of it. The people who will suffer will be the small farmers, the family farms across this nation, that have contributed so much to the development of this country. The pressure the government continues to place on the family farm simply cannot be sustained.

In fact, this bill is simply part of a ongoing philosophy that has existed in this country with successive federal Liberal and Conservative governments since World War II which has put increasing pressure on the rural structure. The number of farms that have been vacated in the last 40 years is phenomenal. The number of people who are leaving rural Canada is phenomenal.

The number of small businesses that are suffering in rural Canada is extraordinary. It is not simply because of an advance in technology, as some members may suggest. Certainly, that is part of it. It is true that as technology advances, it is easier for a producer to farm a large amount of land, but it is also made possible by the programs and the attitude that governments have had toward agriculture. The changes that Bill C-36 will invoke on the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act are simply one more step in successfully reducing rural Canada to a situation that it simply cannot sustain.

We in the New Democratic Party have recognized this stress. We wish that the other federal parties would recognize this problem as well. In fact, we have appointed a committee suggestions and policies that will benefit rural Canada. The Tory's philosophy is to simply look at the bottom economic line. The Tory philosophy is: "If it makes money, it is fine. If it does not make money, let it go."

We are committed to developing policies and programs that are going to maintain a viable and vital rural infrastructure throughout this country. This will be an ongoing program and we are very proud that this committee exists today.

When the minister calls for this bill to be passed immediately, he is ignoring the numerous groups and associations across this country that have real problems with this bill. There are numerous associations that want to speak to the legislative committee that will be appointed to look at this bill after second reading. This government is asking us to simply pass this bill and ignore those groups.

The government always talks about consultation. Well, here is another example of the Tory's type of consultation. It is no consultation at all. It is simply a ramrod approach while it makes up excuses and blames the opposition. But it is not going to work, because those groups are going to be heard. After second reading, it will go to committee, despite what the government proposes, despite the government's intention on ramming this bill through this House. It will go to committee.

The reason that farmers are not receiving advance payments now is not because of the members on this side of the House, it is because of the members on the government side of the House. If the members on the government side of the House had the interests of farmers at heart, had the interests of producers at heart, they would allow advance payments to go through this year, as they have gone through for the last number of years, in fact past decades.

An. Hon. Member: Since 1957.

Mr. Laporte: It would allow this bill to be debated properly, would allow for groups to speak to the committee, to speak to this government and put their positions forward. But the government does not want to hear any opposition to its proposals. That is why it is attempting to ram this bill through. It is the government's fault, it is not the members on this side of the House who are at fault. It is the government's fault for denying farmers throughout this country the interest free loans, the advance payments that they so rightly deserve and that they and all of rural Canada need.

In conclusion, I would just like to point out that we in the New Democratic Party are committed to a viable rural community, a community that has the compassion to maintain seniors in their homes, in communities where they grew up and lived, and in communities that they love and where they want to stay.

We are committed to developing policies that are going to allow young families to locate in rural communities if they want to locate there. We are committed to developing policies that are going to allow small businesses to be viable. Let us not forget that small business in this country creates more jobs than any other sector in this nation. This government is ignoring small business.

We are committed to the development of those programs and we are committed to providing services to those communities so that they can be viable and vital throughout this nation.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the member for his observations on this bill and the impact it will have on the farm sector in Canada. Will he comment on the level of producer support for this bill across western Canada and state whether that support and resolve on behalf of the producers and their organizations is even building in favour of the amendment that is before this House at this time.

• (1520)

Mr. Laporte: There is a lot of concern throughout western Canada about this bill. Certainly I have spoken to some groups who wish to be heard and have their positions put forth. The prairie pools wish to have their message heard. Certainly the National Farmers' Union which represents many farmers throughout not only western Canada but all of Canada wish to be heard on this matter.

Other groups such as the Manitoba Corn Growers Association and the honey producers from Manitoba and Alberta wish to have their positions put forward.

There are groups from various commodities, various aspects of agriculture who desire to be heard. They have a lot of concern that this bill is one more nail in the coffin of rural Canada. in these advance payments. The imposition of an interest rate on these advance payments simply is not beneficial to rural Canada.

Further, the government is increasing the amount of the limit to $250,000, of which it is guaranteeing 90 per cent. It knows full well that most small producers will not come anywhere near $250,000. To even bring that amount up indicates the government's attitude toward agriculture. The government always claims that it is helping agriculture. Well, if you are a large producer, if you are on an industrial farm, that might be true. It sure is not true if you happen to be a small producer, a family farm, whether it is in Saskatchewan, or Alberta, or Ontario, or Quebec, or in the Maritimes.

This is a government that cares not or thinks not of this type of producer. Yes, there are many groups in western Canada and throughout all of Canada who are very concerned about this bill, who would like to see the government simply put this matter on hold, to allow for advance payments to go through interest free and allow for a proper and thorough debate of this bill so that Parliament can do its real duty, that is represent the people of all of Canada.

Mr. Monteith: The hon. member might comment. He talks about the number of producers in Saskatchewan and across Canada who have used advance payments. I wonder if he would comment on the fact that last year, in the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, of the total of 69,000 producers, 561 members used the service. He mentioned the honey producers in Saskatchewan. In the Saskatchewan Beekeepers' Association, 56 of 350 producers used the service; and in the Saskatchewan Vegetable Growers Association, 8 of 150 producers used the service.

Across Canada no more than 4 per cent of the producers used advance payments. I wonder if the member would comment on that.

Mr. Laporte: The hon. member questions the number of people utilizing the advance payments act, implying that it is not utilized and is something that farmers don't even want.

I would like to remind the hon. member that in western Canada for the last three years we had a tremendous drought, and farmers never had the grain to get an advance payment in the first place. There have been a lot fewer farmers utilizing the advance payments because of the lack of crops in that region and, in fact, have been waiting for the government to bring in a permanent drought relief program. We are still waiting for it.

In 1985 the government promised that it would bring in a permanent drought relief program, a permanent agriculture program, and where is it? I haven't seen it. And no farmer in western Canada has seen it. Yet this member can go on about the fact that farmers do not want or use this advance payment. When they have no crop to deliver, they do not utilize the payment.

I would also like to point out to the member that two-thirds of the payments that were used with respect to the advance payment came under the Advance Payments for Crops Act and not the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. It is a program that is required and used by family farms throughout this country.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, it may seem strange that in a debate such as this someone from a riding such as Scarborough West would rise to speak, but the Minister of Housing will, I am sure, remain to hear what I have to say on this very important topic.

As a matter of fact, the reason I join in the discussion this afternoon is because I wondered what the dispute was with respect to Bill C-36, which is the resurrection of Bill C-32 from the last session.

The people of Scarborough West, like all Canadians, know that the health of our nation is dependent on the health of our agriculture industry, on the health of our farms and on farmers. Therefore, what is the dispute with respect to this bill?

Well I am not a farmer, I am a lawyer. So I begin my analysis by looking at the bill. I do not have to go much further than the third clause to see what one major problem is. The clause, and I am citing directly from it, states that the minister is going to:

> —guarantee to the producer organization the repayment of that advance, and the interest on that money that is attributable to that advance.

That is the amendment which is proposed. So, of course, we have to take a look and see what is proposed to be struck. What is proposed to be struck is:

> —where the Minister so guarantees, the Minister shall pay the interest in accordance with Paragraph 12.(1)(a).

Well, it becomes obvious that one of the effects of this bill is to strike out the interest free characteristics of this particular act.

We now know what is being intended. As a non-farmer, a person who is not involved in agriculture, with no farms in my riding, what is my next step in analyzing this situation? Well, it seems to me that I have to turn my attention to the people who are directly involved. So I started receiving and reviewing letters.

The Manitoba Corn Growers Association, in a recent letter, says quite clearly that: "The Manitoba Corn Growers Association would like to make you aware that we are opposed to the removal of the interest free provision of the Advance Payments for Crops Act".

The Prairie Pools Inc. consisting of the Alberta Pool, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, and the Manitoba Pool Elevators, say that it cannot support Bill C-36. They say that the current suspension of the act should be lifted and that the programs should be fully reinstated: "—with the interest free portion intact for the 1989-90 crop year. It is critical that this be done immediately".

Why? Well, among other reasons, the Pools say: "The interest-free advances encourage orderly marketing.

In my own province, the Ontario Corn Producers Association, in referring to the predecessor of this bill, called upon the Minister of Agriculture not to pass it in its present form. They state that: "Elimination of the interest free provision will effectively destroy the program and result in an ineffectual program with minimal participation".

Going to the other end of the country, the British Columbia Vegetable Marketing Commission asks that the proposed elimination of the interest free portion be reversed. Finally, the Saskatchewan Canola Growers Association is concerned and says that the program has been run to date at very little cost to the government or producers. It seems that looking at these various organizations and groups Canada-wide that are involved with agriculture on a daily basis, there is a clear consensus that the removal of the interest free provision should be reversed. How did that happen? What is the history behind this?

We know that in 1957 the Prairie Grains Advance Payments Act was introduced by another Conservative government, the Diefenbaker government, by the then Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Hon. Gordon Churchill. Thirty-two years later we are having that reversed. It seems the government has chosen to ignore the rationale behind the program and the integral role that the interest free payments play in the program's success. This is because the government has represented the program in the budget papers describing the program thus: "The objective of the program is to ensure that producers can obtain cash in advance from lenders on the strength of their marketable crops." This was not the objective of the program. This was one of the means by which the objectives of the program were to be met. Integral to meeting the objective was also the interest free provision of the Act.

The objective then, 32 years ago, as it should be now, was to encourage on-farm storage of produce. The program resulted from a recognition that the commercial storage capacity of the country was far less than the productive capabilities of the country. As Mr. Churchill, 32 years ago, clearly stated, "The legislation is necessary because of the large surplus of wheat."

Imagine the consequences if Canada failed to maintain adequate reserves and we suffered a crop failure in this country. If we had insufficient reserves, we could very well lose important markets for our produce for many years to come. We saw with last year's drought how quickly foreign countries rushed forward with their reserves to take advantage of our shortfall. Further, imagine if the world suffers crop failure, not in one but perhaps two or more years in a row. Imagine the consequences in terms of food security that could result if we have insufficient reserves.

It is a well-known fact that elevator companies have reduced their commercial storage capacity in the last 10 years and have increased through-put. We are now more dependent on our producers to maintain our reserves than in 1957. Yet now the government does not even want to recognize the true historical objective of the program, let alone the very real necessity for it.

According to Grain Matters, storage capacity in Canada is limited to only half of our annual exports of grains and oilseeds. Conversely, the United States of America, Argentina and Australia all have greater storage capabilities than their annual exports. These interest free advance payments are means to encourage storage to attempt to ensure Canada remains on equal ground with our competitors.

During the free trade agreement debate we heard time and time again from the government of the necessity of developing a level playing field with the United States in order to be competitive. Although the deal fails in substance to do that in our view, the objective was valid.

Now, with the goods and services tax, we are hearing the same argument advanced; that Canadian industry needs the goods and services tax to be on a level playing field with the world. I ask what of a level playing field with the world in the agricultural industry.

Instead of scrapping the interest free provision which will scrap the historical intent of the legislation, this government, if it were serious in promoting the Canadian agricultural trade and in ensuring food security, would be introducing legislation to increase not diminish our storage reserves. Do we need to go through the crisis of 1957 again to see the necessity of this provision of the program? Should we wait until those countries which maintain reserves steal our markets before ensuring our own reserves? That day is coming and this legislation will only accelerate the decline of our already dangerously poor storage capabilities.

In 1957 the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act was introduced to meet a national objective. As Mr. Churchill stated: "This resolution will be for the benefit of the people of Canada". The Conservative government was bringing this in for the benefit of the people of Canada. This government, a Conservative government, now refuses to recognize this objective. Instead, it refers, and again I quote from the budget papers, to "the elimination of the interest subsidy".

This is not a subsidy. It is a payment to the producer for storage costs incurred with the rate of payment determined by the interest rate of the advance. Note the word "subsidy", a word not yet defined under the free trade agreement. Is the government somehow afraid that this is going to be brought up by the United States, that it will somehow be embarrassed and forced by the United States to remove this because it is a subsidy, a word yet undefined? Is this somehow an effort to remove this argument before it is even raised?

In 1957 Mr. Churchill stated: "The cash advance is not a handout or a subsidy to western farmers". What the interest free component does is recognize the economic consequences to the producer when we, the Canadian public, ask him to store his produce for our rainy days. In 1957 there was a crisis because every producer attempted to sell his crops at once to bank his profits, to ensure he could afford to plant a crop the next year. The interest payments are an attempt by the government to ensure that the farmer is not penalized for participating in a program of a national objective.

Now, however, we do not see a government that recognizes this national objective. I am confident, as we debate this issue today, that the government will continue to deny the need of this national objective. It is just cut, cut, cut. It does not recognize the national objective under which this particular provision was brought on by its own party 32 years ago. It is not only those on this side of the House who recognize the true objectives of these two programs.

I would like now to quote from an independent source as to the objective of this program to balance against the view presented by the budget papers. The Canadian Tax Foundation in its issue, The National Finances, has described the objective of these programs for many years thusly: "Under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, the government makes interest free cash advances to farmers for storing certain grains on their farms".

It should be noted that this program is described as an exchange of advance payment for storage services provided by the producer. Finance is wrong in the budget papers to see it as merely a guarantee of credit. It is an agreement that provides the producer with a payment for contributing to the fulfilment of a national objective and that is the storage of our crops. Yet in the budget papers, we have a government saying: "The interest free aspect is not fundamental to this objective". Clearly it is fundamental to an objective that the government no longer feels is necessary. That objective is quite simply stated as food security.

The government's agriculture policy into which eliminating this interest-free provision fits is one of Canada should not purchase food. That is not the way we see it on this side of the House. Food security means just that, secure access to food. That means we must maintain our reserves and we must recognize that the $27 million we are currently paying our producers to maintain reserves in this country is cheap at 10 times the cost. We should encourage storage and not punish those producers who maintain those reserves should we ever need them. This government's hidden policy of purchase instead of produce is like attempting to buy fire insurance the day after the fire.

It is vital that we keep this legislation intact, that we understand the purposes for which the interest free provisions were brought in. We accept that they have not changed. We agree that the national objective must remain, and therefore those are some of the reasons why our party is opposing Bill C-36. It is not simply objective for objection's sake. We are putting forth concrete reasons why Bill C-36 should not be considered by this Parliament.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Scarborough West on his very articulate and excellent address. I want particularly to compliment him on the interest he has shown on behalf of his urban constituents. I am sure it must be on the minds of his constituents in a very large urban riding, as he mentioned in his address, regarding the security of supplies of food. We have heard in the last two days about the erosion of farm programs by this government. This concern is endorsed by almost all of the farm organizations in Canada and today was even further reinforced at a luncheon meeting of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture when Mr. Jack Proulx, a member of the CFA executive, made an impassioned speech opposing this bill.

With the current trend of this government toward the free market philosophy and the dismantling of farm programs, I want to ask my colleague if he has given any thought to making food production in Canada a matter of national security. He talked about security of food and I wonder if he might give us some of his thoughts on making it a national security, security of supply of high quality Canadian grown food for the Canadian consumers.

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, it is almost incredible that we would even have to be discussing whether or not we should make agriculture a national priority. It is incredible in a country like this. We have the second largest land mass in the world. We have incredible and vast areas devoted strictly to agriculture.

You can go back as far as you want in the history of mankind, even as far back as ancient Egypt when there were the seven lean years and the seven years of plenty. Of course, we should always be harvesting our agricultural produce in such a way that we never end up in a situation of want.

This is a country of great plenty, this is a country that can for the most part supply itself. It seems to me that it should be a given, not something for discussion, but rather a given that a national objective of ours is that we are not caught short at any time and that we always have sufficient food to feed our people and, indeed, sufficient food not only to feed our people, but to help others in depressed areas of the world in the event of a tragic famine of some nature.

In answer to the question, I would simply say that we should not even be talking about it. It should be automatic.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I want to follow up on the statement and question of the hon. member. The idea that we should produce enough food to feed ourselves is something that has become lost over the last number of years. We now have come to the position where we are thinking of rural Canada less as a producer of food and more as a place where people might want to live if they want that lifestyle.

Rural Canada is under a tremendous amount of pressure because we in Canada have not made it a requirement to keep agriculture going. I would like to ask the member, as an urban member, if he is prepared to allow the price of food to go to the level which would be required for us to stay viable in agriculture all across Canada.

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his question. It is a rather broad question and I am not quite sure that I understand the full import of it.

Is my hon. friend suggesting that for some reason an apple that, for example, presently costs 80 cents really should cost $2.50? I do not know whether that is what the suggestion is. Speaking as an urban member, obviously people want to be able to afford to buy food. It is very important in order to be able to buy food that we produce it.

It seems logical that foods produced in our country and shipped to points in our country should be less expensive than foods imported from other countries. I am not entirely sure what the hon. member meant by his question and how it related to urban families wanting a rural lifestyle. Beyond that, I do not know whether I have responded fully, but I am sorry, I did not quite understand the question.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I would like to clarify it. Farmers in Canada are going broke because the price of the product that they are producing is too low. Right now there are over 10,000 farmers in Saskatchewan with foreclosure notices.

They are going broke because the price that is being paid for the product that they are producing is too low. It is too low because it can be produced more cheaply in other parts of the world. The hon. member's suggestion that we should produce enough food to feed ourselves would require that we pay enough for that food so that the farmers who produce it can survive. That is not true in grains; it is not true in apples. We will not pay enough for apples for apple farmers to survive. It is not true in grapes; it is not true in most of the areas of agriculture.

Canadians are unwilling to pay the price for the food which would allow farmers to survive in that kind of production. The only places where we are able to survive fairly well is in exports.

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, I would say that the people in my riding of Scarborough West have never complained to me that the price of food is too low. There must be something going on between the time that the farmer sells the food at such a ridiculously low price according to the member and the time when my constituents buy the food. That is where there is a problem and that is what we can examine at some later date, but not when we are discussing Bill C-36.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the Hon. Member for York West—Immigration—Investor program—Special ministerial permits/ Government Response; the Hon. Member for Trinity—Spadina—Immigration—Backlog of refugee determination system; the Hon. Member for South West Nova—Fisheries.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-36, an Act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Foster (p.4275).

• (1550)

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise this afternoon to speak on Bill C-36, an act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act and the amendment to the motion which essentially calls for the bill not to be read at this time but six months from now.

Speaking directly to the amendment, I first want to suggest that postponing this bill for six months is not the effort that farm producers and producer groups would like to see. They would like to see this bill withdrawn completely and the existing act which was in place prior to the April budget of the finance minister be in force so they may have the full weight of the benefits of the advance payments act which existed prior to this year.

To clarify that a little further, the bill before us today essentially brings into practice what the Minister of Finance announced in the budget in April of this year, that the government would no longer pay interest on advances for the purchase of grain. The argument raised, of course, is that the government would rather use the $27 million expended on this program than have the producers in the field use it.

Farm groups, of course, have said the advances are important because they allow producers to sell their crops when the prices are high, when they are in the bins and they cannot sell them, and I will elaborate on that a little bit more in a few minutes.

We have to remember that this program was brought in in 1957 and has served the farm community extremely well since then. The farm population has utilized the program and has found it to be of great benefit. The fact that the government is now in financial difficulties is no reason to penalize the farm community which oft-times have no other place to turn than this particular program.

There are a couple of things that I should mention. This program is extremely valuable at times like this when the agriculture community is in such a state of stress. The financial crisis in the farm sector is absolutely real. It is having an impact right down to the human level. In some cases farmers have taken their lives because they felt that they failed their fathers' generation, their fathers who had broken the land and had often lost hands or legs while building up the country and producing on the land for their children. Then their children come along, and because of policies of the previous government and this government, they can no longer maintain their farms. Some of those farmers feel that they have failed their fathers and their grandfathers, and their sense of being has been destroyed.

The crisis is very real and we will remember a few things. We have to remember that this government is pushing more and more of the costs on to the farmers and they are getting absolutely no support from this government in terms of raising the price of the product. My colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt earlier today talked about the prices for farm products and he is absolutely right. Bills like this one before us today would be unnecessary if the price paid for farm products was adequate to meet the needs of the farm community.

Other programs that this government boasts about would be unnecessary if the price paid for the farm product was adequate to meet the needs of the production. A lot of the farm community is looking for that opportunity to indeed be carrying the weight of the economy. This is not the time to be pushing more and more costs on the producer.

I just want to remind you, Mr. Speaker, and some of the government members here today of what is happening out there in the farm community and why interest free cash advances are so important.

We know that the price is down on almost all commodities. Therefore, with the price down and support from the government down, obviously farm income is down, but interest rates remain very high. We cannot forget that the previous government had interest rates up to 20 per cent and 22 per cent and that is what forced many of the people in the farm community to get into this crisis situation.

Input costs continue to increase. With the free trade legislation and the goods and services tax being brought in, all of those input costs are increasing at the farm level. The expenses rise, the price continues to fall, and more and more of the costs of doing business are being transferred to the farmer.

We cannot forget that earlier this year oats was removed by this government from the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board. Subsequent to that move, the price of oats has fallen dramatically.

There was no stabilization payment for grains this year, even though in a period of time like this one following a drought, stabilization payments are more important than ever. Do not forget the deficiency payments that the Minister of Agriculture has been so proud of have been stopped, and there was not a dollar of deficiency payments made to any producer last year or this year.

The rail line rehabilitation program has also been terminated, meaning that more and more producers are going to have to haul their grain further and further to the elevator. Again, the cost of that transportation cost has been pushed over on to the farmer, and there is absolutely no support for the increased price that is paid for that product.

I can go on. I am going to list just a few other things here. We have to remember that the compensation payment that this government promised after it took away the two price wheat system last year because of the free trade deal has disappeared, and $270 million was promised, a one-time payment for a price that has been paid for years and years and years on the use of domestic grain in Canada. It disappeared.

The Minister of Agriculture was in Prince Albert not too long ago talking about crop insurance and how the crop insurance program that this government is going to implement is going to be the salvation of the agriculture community. Crop insurance is a very important aspect of the farm price circumstances, but the crop insurance system is not the end all answer to supporting the income of the farmer and certainly not if the farmer has to come up with higher and higher premiums every year just in order to stay in that program.

Too many of the people in the farm community are on the line. They have just barely enough cash flow, if any, to go from one year to the next. Interest and expenses cut into that cash flow significantly and we cannot increase that in any way.

One of the things that I discovered this summer as I worked more and more closely with labour market conditions in my own riding and as I looked around the province of Saskatchewan, was that Canada Employment Centres across the prairies are indicating that there is a tremendous lack of skilled farm labourers available at harvest time. Not only do the producers have to pull off these crops with more and more expensive equipment, because of course the cost of this stuff has all been increasing, but they are having to utilize it with less and less skilled labour. It is becoming a tremendous problem throughout the prairies and particularly in Saskatchewan.

Last, I mentioned the significance of cash flow on the farm. The goods and services tax proposed by this government is going to just destroy that cash flow position of the farmer or the producer on the western prairies. We can be sure that when the people in the farm communities start to look at all of these things, decisions made by government which could be made in another way that are affecting their lives, their ability to produce food from the land, they are certainly going to have second thoughts about the way in which they direct their attention in the future.

Two days ago in the House of Commons, the Minister of Agriculture spoke to us and he had a number of interesting things to say about this bill. I would like to make a few comments on what he had to say.

You will recall that he was talking about the opposition holding up this legislation. Here we are into the harvest, in fact the harvest in Saskatchewan is over. The grain is in the farmers' bins and they are looking for ways to sell it. In fact, if you go out and look at those bins you will find that a lot of them are full of grain. If you go to the grain elevators you will find that they are also full. The elevators cannot take any more of the grain that is in the bins but the farmer has to sell that grain.

This government is forcing that farmer now to take an advance on grain he can't sell and actually borrow the money for the sale and pay back interest. A number of those producers are sitting there with grain that the board is not buying at this time, grain which, because we had poor weather in the fall, is now fit for feed instead of export. That grain is not going to be bought for transport now. The grain that is being purchased now by the elevators is used for our exports, our best quality grain.

So the farmer who is sitting there with feed grain is wondering how he can go to the elevator and get paid for the grain that he has grown without having to borrow the money, which is what this government is now asking him to do. I am afraid this is a situation that is intolerable and shows the ignorance of this government about the conditions on the farm and how things work.

Before I come back to the Minister of Agriculture I have to mention a statement made yesterday by the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds. He said the major hold-up in all of this is because farmers out there don't want to haul their grain in winter. He said:

> There is no point in the guy hauling in the middle of winter because it is 40 below and he does not want to start his tractor, blow out the lane, get his truck going and all that. He has got his money. But if he has got to haul the grain to get his money, that helps as far as orderly marketing.

Well, I am sure there isn't a farmer out there who is going to read that statement, think about last winter when the weather was 40 below, and think "Oh, if I had not got my money then I would have shovelled out my driveway, shovelled out the road, got out to the elevator and delivered my grain because I needed the money." That is not the nature of this at all. What we are talking about is selling product when you can sell it and not having to borrow the money because the grain is in the bin and there is nothing you can do about it.

The Minister of Agriculture boasts that the limits have moved up from some $30,000 to $250,000. Big deal, Mr. Speaker. When you are not paying the bill you could put that up to $500,000, make it a million dollar limit. When you are not footing the bill it makes no difference. They can claim all the credit they want on this one for boosting the limits, but when you are borrowing the money at the producer level it doesn't make any difference on that side. It is still a loan and it is still a transfer of the cost to the producer. As I have indicated, the producer at this point does not need those additional costs.

We can't forget that the payments that were going into this program before amounted to some $27 million. When you look at the western economy, $27 million out of that economy, no matter how you look at it, is a lot.

I also want to make a suggestion. Earlier in the House today it was said that only a few farmers take advantage of this program. this is becoming more and more typical of this government. The government says that only a few use it so it is okay.

That is what the government says about the VIA Rail users. While this debate is going on, the same debate on VIA Rail is taking place. Only 3 per cent of the Canadian population use VIA Rail so slash it by 51 per cent. What an attitude!

The Government may say it is only a few. I do not care whether it is a few. I know it is not a few, not for farm producers and not for VIA Rail users. Those are important people and important parts of our society which deserve the support that they have been getting both on VIA Rail and particularly on this bill, the Advance Payments Act. These people, the producers and travellers, are not expendable in our economy.

My colleague last night in the House of Commons also suggested that the government, if you want to extend this logic any further, will next be closing down heart support units in this country because only a few people use those as well. I am afraid that, as disgusting as that thought may be, I tend to agree with the suggestion.

The Minister of Agriculture also talked about how the budget cuts have to extend through to the farm sector, and said that the government was not walking away from supporting the farmers of Canada. He is very proud of the distinguished record that the government has had in the past. Again I say, "Oh yeah, some record". We just recognized that we have the most serious financial crisis in agriculture in the history of this country and this government is bragging about all that it has done. It may have put more money into agriculture than any previous government, but that tells me one thing, that no previous government has supported agriculture properly or adequately, and, secondly, because the crisis is still there, that no matter what it has done to this point, it has not been adequate, it has not changed the problem, it has not helped get producers from one time to another.

We still have producers throughout the prairies who are looking to that great crop next year because that is what they need to survive. There have been so many things that have been pushing them down that there is every reason for the Saskatchewan producers to continue to believe that they do live in "next year country". Unfortunately, as long as governments take positions like this, it is always going to be next year country in Saskatchewan because there is nothing that is going to help to get them ahead.

I want to make one more comment on a quote made by the Minister of Agriculture. He said:

> We are asking the agriculture sector to do its share and to help overcome Canada's deficit problems. Farmers, like other Canadians, in the long run will benefit from the action we are taking today to put this country on a sounder financial footing.

Wonderful words, Mr. Speaker, but what he is saying is that the farmers who are left may benefit from the programs that are put in place by this government. I would suggest that there will certainly be no benefit at the farm community level for any of the producers who are sitting there now and dealing with the crisis that has been perpetuated by this and the previous government.

Over the last little while I have had numerous representations from individual farmers within my own riding and from various producer and commodity groups across the country. A number of those groups have suggested that we have to do everything we can to convince this government to maintain the interest free part of the advance payments act. Those groups are wide-ranging across the board, from those who are active in my province to those who are active across the country.

Obviously they have made those pleas to the government on the opposite side of the House. Both ministers who have spoken in this debate, the Minister of Grain and Oilseeds and the Minister of Agriculture, have discounted what they have been told by these major farm organizations. I am afraid I find that much too similar to the other activities that are going on. The government is not listening to the people on the goods and services tax, it is not listening to the people on VIA Rail, and now it is not listening to the interest groups that are active in the industry.

I have information before me from the Ontario Soybean Growers Marketing Board, the Corn Growers Association, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee, the National Farmers' Union and many others, all of whom are saying, maintain the interest free portion of the cash advance. It is crucial to the western farmers to keep the cash flow and keep the grain flowing from the farmer to the elevator to the export market.

I thank you for the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to speak in this afternoon's debate and I wish the government well in pursuing its agriculture policies in the future.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to commend my friend from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake. I have listened with great interest to what he has had to say. Many in this chamber will think of fish when they see me rise in my place because much of my riding depends so heavily on the fishery and I spend a fair amount of my time in this chamber talking about that.

There are two important agricultural pockets in the riding of Burin—St. George's. One is called the Codroy Valley, a very agriculturally fertile valley where there is a farming segment extending up into the Robinsons area. The other is on the Burin peninsula, the Winterland area in particular. So in my riding of Burin—St. George's there is some concern about farming matters generally.

I rise, not only because I am proud to represent farmers in this House, but for another reason. I want to put a question to the member and in so doing state my second reason for rising. The amendment by my friend, the member for Algoma, seconded by my seatmate and friend and colleague from Lambton—Middlesex, has the solution to this problem and I am wondering whether the gentleman from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake shares our view on what the solution is.

The existing legislation adequately addresses the problem. I heard a gentleman on the Tory back-bench today rave on about how the big bad Liberals and NDPers were holding up things and keeping money from the farmers. Let us keep the record straight on this. The existing statute allows the advance payments to flow. This legislation that we are now debating would put some restrictions on it, would make the amounts more measly and would introduce the question of interest and so on.

We understand what the Tories want to do, because we see a pattern here. It is the same thing they are trying to do to the fishermen. It is the same thing they are doing on VIA Rail, on Canada Post, on the Canada job development program.

If you want an umbrella phrase for all these apparently diverse issues, the umbrella phrase is "Chinese water torture". They are now doing to farmers what they have been doing to the fishermen for a long time, what they are doing to postal recipients in rural Newfoundland and rural Canada generally. They are sending out the message as part of the Tory agenda that if you live anywhere other than the Torontos, Vancouvers and Montreals of this world, we do not need you.

And so by a process, a slow Chinese water torture process, they are sending the message to farmers, aided and abetted by Tories who represent, however temporarily, farm ridings, to fishermen in rural Newfoundland and all parts of the Atlantic and the B.C. coast, through the Chinese water torture approach, that you are not part of our agenda, you are not part of the mainstream because you do not live in Toronto and you are not middle income. That is what this bill is all about. It is another step in the process, another cog in the wheel, another effort, another sequence in the Chinese water torture.

So I rise to put a question to my friend from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake. Does he not see in this bill an effort by the Tories to put the farmer just a little further underfoot? Also, does he not support the amendment put down by my friend from Algoma, and seconded by the gentleman from Lambton—Middlesex, that would give this whole thing a six month hoist, get it off the chamber floor, and let the farmers know where they stand on this so the government, under existing statute, can send out the payments as it should be doing instead of monkeying around with this cowardly bill here in the House in the first place?

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague from Newfoundland for the question. Before I answer the question he raised, I would like to comment on the closeness of the people of Newfoundland and Saskatchewan. They are very much like close cousins. Newfoundlanders have the ocean and we have our oceans of wheat that wave and blow in the breeze. We also have producers who rely on seasonal conditions to maintain their entire economy. The price of wheat and fish, the quotas day. Neither the producers in Newfoundland nor the producers in Saskatchewan have any control over their ability to maintain their life from year to year or from day to day.

The hand of government is heavy on the people who live in Newfoundland and Saskatchewan. In that regard, we have a tremendous amount in common. I have great respect for all those who come from Newfoundland and I hope and trust that they have the same for people from Saskatchewan.

The member talked a lot about the existing legislation and I agree. I thought I made it clear in my speech that the existing legislation which has been in place since 1957 has been very good to the producers in this regard. The interest free advance payment is just fine.

The problem with the amendment put forward by his colleague in the Liberal Party is that it does not ask or request or demand that the government actually implement the existing legislation or bring in the statutes that are required from it. The government has stated very clearly that there is nothing available for producers. If we stall this bill there will continue to be nothing in place until such time as the government decides what it wants to do. Until we get that commitment and something that guarantees that the interest free portion of this act will continue I will have difficulty supporting the amendment even though I agree that the change has to be made.

I would like to make one other thing clear, Mr. Speaker. During the time I had allocated to me I did not get a chance to specifically tie the reason for implementing this bill to the economic conditions in the country, namely, what the Conservative government sees as the big problem, the deficit. I maintain that if this government was serious about combating the deficit in Canada it would not be doing it on the backs of farmers, it would be hauling the Bank of Canada in here before us and demanding that the interest rates in this country be lowered. Until that happens, none of these other things will make a great deal of difference.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, the poetic interventions of our colleagues from Newfoundland and Saskatchewan are a tough act to follow. However, I am pleased to rise today in the House to speak on Bill C-36, an Act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

I would like to begin by congratulating my colleagues from Algoma and Lambton—Middlesex for the excellent interventions they have made on this bill. I would hope that the government will listen as well to the points they have raised and listen to the many farmers of this country who also oppose this bill.

The government must realize that Bill C-36 is both counterproductive and harmful to Canadian agriculture. Many members of this House have received a considerable amount of correspondence from various national and provincial agricultural organizations regarding Bill C-36. I have received letters from groups such as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Ontario Soybean Growers Marketing Board and the Ontario Corn Producers Association. Each and every one of these organizations are against the passage of Bill C-36. Obviously organizations such as these are aware of the needs of farmers and are aware of what actions the federal government should or should not take in order to ensure the success of Canadian agriculture. These groups have outlined several reasons why Bill C-36 should not be passed. I suggest that groups such as those I have mentioned have put forward valid arguments as to why Bill C-36 should not be passed. Unfortunately, the federal government in its infinite wisdom seems willing to ignore the views of the expert voices of Canadian agriculture.

One of the main reasons why farm groups do not wish to see Bill C-36 pass is that the bill eliminates the interest free provision of the cash advance program. These interest free advances are important factors in maintaining market stability in particular agriculture sectors. By eliminating the interest free portion of the advance payment for crops program the value of the entire program and its use by farmers will be reduced.

The advance payment for crops is a vital avenue for supplying farmers with the necessary funds to pay their operating costs and purchase supplies. It enables farmers to be in a position where they are not forced to sell their crops at harvest time when the market is flooded and prices are low. The advance payment for crops program has traditionally played a vital role in assisting farmers in the planning of their operations for the crop year. By cancelling the interest free provision of this program the government will place farmers in a difficult situation. They will no longer be able to rely on the fiscal and market stability which existed previously.

The interest free portion of the program enabled producers to store their crops at harvest time and still pay their bills and buy supplies for the coming crop year. This program has provided farmers with the flexibility to sell their crops at a time when the market price was high so they could meet financial obligations and prepare for the crop year ahead. The market also avoided being flooded at harvest and avoided shortages later on. Thus both the producer and agriculture benefited by this program.

With Bill C–36 all this will change. Farmers will have to pay interest costs on the advance payments. This added financial outlay will be expensive and detrimental to the usefulness of the program. With interest rates being as high as they are the financial burden to farmers who participate in this revamped program will be considerable. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture has already stated that the elimination of the interest free portion of the program takes away one of the few avenues farmers have to deal effectively with high interest rates.

The Ontario corn producers argue that while the federal guarantee under the ACPA will allow farmers to borrow money at, or slightly below the prime interest rate, administration charges would mean an actual cost to producers at well above prime. This, in effect, will provide no advantage over commercial sources of credit. The elimination of the interest free provision will effectively destroy the program and result in an ineffectual program with minimal participation. This even if the current advance loan levels are significantly increased as provided for in Bill C–36.

By eliminating the interest free provision of the advance payments program the government will not accomplish too much toward addressing the federal deficit. The government states it will save $27 million in the 1989–90 and 1990–91 crop years by not having to pay the interest on the cash advances to farmers. However, the government will at the same time create an agricultural sector with reduced farm incomes and a weakened marketing structure.

Furthermore, a number of farm organizations have argued that the relative cost of the APCA marketing program has been minimal when compared to the benefits the program established in the agricultural sector. The program was a useful one for producers and it achieved its intended goal of creating an orderly marketing system for the crops involved.

This program benefited farmers and the agriculture industry alike. Why then, if the program was such a success and the costs comparatively minor compared to the benefits produced, does the federal government now want to eliminate the interest free provision? Such a decision is illogical and completely inconsistent with this government's promises to support Canadian agriculture and Canadian farmers.

It is worth remembering the untenable situation which existed in agriculture prior to the advance payment for crops program coming into effect. Farmers sold their crops at harvest time when crop prices were traditionally low as they had no choice if they were to address their financial obligations.

The selling of crops at harvest created supply and demand imbalances and brought about price cutting and predatory marketing. The Advance Payments for Crops Act was viewed as an important remedy to these serious problems.

In a very real way the government is now planning to turn back the clock by disposing of the interest free provision of the program. If Bill C–36 passes, farmers will be charged interest on the advance payments they receive for their produce. The net result is higher costs for producers and a depressed price for their produce in an unstable market system.

If the government proceeds with Bill C–36 it will be displaying the lack of concern it has for farmers who have relied upon the interest free provisions of the program. The government will display its callous attitude toward maintaining a strong and effective marketing system for crops and it will also display its unwillingness to assist and support Canadian agriculture.

The situation in Canadian agriculture today is not one which instils a lot of confidence. Many farmers believe that the future of supply management in Canada is being threatened. Recent Canada–U.S. conflicts over yoghurt and ice cream as well as pork when added to the other problems such as industrial milk prices and the agricultural talks at the GATT, have generated a feeling among farmers that they cannot rely upon the government to assist and support their industry. Now the government wishes to cut the interest free part of the advance payments program. One can easily understand why our farmers feel the way they do.

The governments of other countries have not instituted similar actions in areas relating to programs such as advance payments for crops. The United States have their storage loans programs and Europeans have their intervention purchases which maintain commodity prices in the European community. These governments maintain interest free provisions in their respective programs.

They have not indicated any plans to transfer the interest paying burden to their producers.

The GATT Geneva Accord of April, 1989 calls upon countries such as Canada to freeze existing support programs. This accord does not force Canada to remove the interest free provisions of programs such as the APCA. Thus, there is no international pressure upon the Canadian government to remove the interest free aspect of the program.

It cannot be said that the advance payments for crops program is trade distorting. It isn't. The program does not stimulate production, it merely encourages and fosters orderly marketing of crops and grains. Thus, there is no conflict with either the program itself or the interest free provisions with regard to international trade.

I believe it is time for the government to show Canadian farmers that they are still important to the country. The advance payments for crops program was designed to assist farmers and facilitate effective marketing. By watering down the effectiveness of the program both farmers and agriculture in general will come out the loser.

I would like this government to start implementing responsible initiatives in agriculture rather than putting forward legislation such as Bill C-36. I urge the Minister of Agriculture to use the existing Advance Payments for Crops Act and Prairie Grains Advance Payments Act legislation and sign the agreements with producer organizations for this crop year. The minister must surely be aware that the harvest period has been completed in western Canada and is proceeding in other areas of the country. Farmers deserve to know what is in store for them.

The government would like us to believe that the interest free aspect of the advance payments given to farmers is not a fundamental part of the program's over-all objective of providing cash in advance on the strength of marketable crops. I would argue that having the interest free provision assists the farmers in the ways I have already discussed and is, in fact, vital toward assisting in the maintenance of an orderly marketing system.

This in itself is enough to view the interest free provision as being quite important to the over-all program.

It is expected that this measure to remove the interest free provision will lead to higher interest costs for farmers, with the increased cost dependent on interest rates and other dimensions of the loan packages arranged by farm organizations. Some of these organizations in western Canada have predicted that borrowing costs will increase by some $1,500 to $2,000 per farm per year. This is indeed a significant cost for producers to bear especially with the high interest rates currently in effect.

With regard to grain, Bill C-36 may cause increased congestion in a shrinking elevator system as farmers deliver early in order to receive payment. Thus, there will be added pressure on grain companies to ensure shipping points have adequate storage facilities. This is yet another example of the problems Bill C-36 will create.

Some producers believe that the orderly marketing of grains may be hampered as a result of Bill C-36. A number of agricultural groups believe that these cash advances have facilitated grain marketing, enabling grain to move smoothly through the system. Bill C-36 may well lead to increased pressures for high quotas early in the year.

Grain and oilseed producers have already paid their share to deficit reduction with the phasing out of excise and sales tax exemptions on diesel fuel and gasoline used in food production. I guess the government wants to go one better and have these producers shoulder more of the burden.

In conclusion, we can clearly see the harm Bill C-36 will cause if it is passed. It will have a negative effect upon corn and soybean producers in Ontario and grain producers in western Canada. Our farmers deserve better support from their federal government. They deserve to have the interest free advance payments for crops program and an orderly market system.

Mrs. Maheu: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Stormont—Dundas would share his thoughts on the security of our food supply in view of the demise of the fishing industry and the severe downturn in the farming industry.

Mr. Kilger: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for her question and particularly for her concern as I know it is a source of serious concern for her and for all of us in the House. I would not leave out anyone in the House. I think it is a concern of national interest to all of us.

In speaking with many producers in Stormont—Dundas, many of whom have family ties that originate from European countries such as Holland, they speak from past experiences within their own families in their original homelands. They have tried to impress upon me on many occasions that Canada should never leave itself vulnerable in such a critical area.

I think it would be callous of any government not to protect the security of each and every Canadian by maintaining a supply of food necessary to feed each and every one in the nation. I think we have to go one step better because it is expected of us by the international community, living in a rich country as we do, benefiting from the vast agricultural lands and so on.

We are certainly well placed to assist the international community where many people in various countries have far less than we do. Canadians have and will continue to show not only their respect but their generosity to all peoples of this world. We should be able to assist increasingly in feeding people around the world.

In closing, I thank my colleague again for raising the very important concern that she and all of us have.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this measure which is very close to my constituents and very close to myself. It has been an important part of western Canada's ability to keep grains on the market.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, this measure would amend two acts, one of which is the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act and the second which is the Advance Payments for Crops Act. These two acts service two very specific parts of the country. The Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act services the area of Canada which produces wheat, barley, and it used to for oats, those areas which are under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. The Canadian Wheat Board is the administrative body for this particular act.

The Advance Payments for Crops Act covers almost all other crops designated across the country. There are people in almost every province of Canada who have taken advantage of this act. In British Columbia, 1,000 people took advantage of it. In Prince Edward Island, where I think the amount is not quite so large, 214 people took advantage of it in 1987–88. The total who took advantage of the act in 1987–88 was close to 10,000 farmers.

The Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act serviced a good many more than that. Twenty per cent or 25 per cent on occasion, sometimes higher, of the farmers in western Canada who hold permit books have taken advantage of the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

Right now, in both of those areas, there are farmers in crisis situations. In fact, in rural Canada—and I am not speaking entirely of agricultural rural Canada—forestry, fishing and agriculture are in crisis positions. Therefore it is very difficult to understand why this government which claims to be so concerned about the welfare of the agricultural community should choose at this time to withdraw from this particular field. This withdrawal amounts to approximately $40,000 out of the pockets of the farmers of western Canada in this year in interest to the loans that they could have made. As far as the Advance Payments for Crops Act is concerned, it is my understanding that very few people will find it of value if they have to pay interest for their loans.

The reason for these two acts is interesting. The history should be known as part of the debate on this issue. The Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act was put in place by the Diefenbaker government in 1957. At that time we in the prairies were having difficulty in getting our grain to market. We were having difficulty storing it and the world did not need our grain in the fall. So the Diefenbaker government put in place the Prairie Grains Advance Payments Act which allowed the farmer to get some of the money for his crop. It actually enabled the farmer to sell some of his crop. When he delivered the grain to the elevator later on, that portion of the loan was taken from the crop he delivered.

Once it was in place, the government, the farmers and the grain industry recognized that this had far-reaching benefits because it allowed a spread-out of grain deliveries across the year. It allowed the Wheat Board to not get a huge amount of delivery in the fall. It allowed the delivery of grain to be spread out so that they could supply the world market in a more orderly manner.

Because the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act operated so well, in 1977 the government brought in the second act, the Advance Payments for Crops Act. This was essentially brought in to cover crops in eastern Canada. However, it now covers crops in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec and Prince Edward Island. It covers those crops that are not under supply-management and those crops that are not under the Wheat Board.

The primary purpose of the Advance Payments for Crops Act was to encourage orderly marketing. It has been very successful in doing that. This government has a penchant to deliver to the marketing structure rather than to allow security for the farmers or the producers of variety products. Their bible, if you wish to say that, is the market system. The market system, however, in agriculture always seemed to pay less in the fall when we had the crop. Then, after you had delivered it, the prices started to go up. When you did not have any grain or any crop to deliver in the spring or in the mid-winter, the prices were high.

The act allowed the farmer to hold the crop in his bin, get some money to pay his bills and then sell it at the higher market. It worked well. It worked for the benefit of the farmer, but it also worked for the benefit of the processors and the products that were handled in the industry, because it spread the delivery over a long period of time.

The government says that it is urgent that it get this bill through. How is it urgent? There is an act in place. If the legislation is in place which would allow this government to provide interest free loans to the western grain producers, if they wanted it, and interest free loans to the producers of other crops across Canada, there is a statutory requirement in place that all they have to do is make the move and the money will become available. Nobody here or in the country believes that they could not do that and could not make that money available very quickly if they really felt strongly about getting this money out to the farmers at this time.

The reason the Minister of Agriculture gave for the change in the act was the deficit. The cost of this program, about $40 million, is about $20 million out of the farmers' pockets this year and another possible total of $100 million over the next crop year. This total would be the cost to the government. It is not much of a contribution to the deficit, yet it is a tremendous amount to take out of the pockets of individual farmers.

Over the years it has become quite obvious that in agriculture, along with fisheries and forestry, rural Canada needs some kind of structure in place which allows sustainability, which allows those parts of Canada that are dependent upon those industries to remain productive and viable. These two acts were a very small part of a structure which attempted to do that. What we need is something much larger and much more secure than these two acts. But these two acts were there and gave the farmers the kind of support they needed when they needed it.

We have a tendency to say that this is support to the farmers. It is much more than that because the farmers across Canada get their supplies, usually on credit, from the small villages, the towns or even the cities around which they live. They buy their inputs from those areas on credit. When they get these advance payments, they are able to pay their bills. They are able to pay their bills without increasing their debt burden.

One of the things that everybody in Canada knows is that the debt burden of people in agriculture is huge. The total debt for agriculture across Canada right now is something over $23 billion.

What the government is asking these farmers to do, because it is the farmers who are already short of cash and who will make these loans, is to add on to that debt and increase the possibility of them going under. The possibility of them being foreclosed on or going under is very real.

In my province alone there are over 10,000 farmers right now being served with foreclosure notices, foreclosure notices which will take part of their land, part of their machinery or affect them in some way. Those are only the notices that we know about, the changes in ownership and structure of the rural community that we know about. A lot of farmers just throw up their hands and sign a quit claim which allows them to turn over, with a certain amount of saving of face, their farm or part of their farm and either rent it back or let somebody else farm it for the next few years.

We have a disastrous situation, a crisis situation on the farm these days. We have a government which says: "We want to save a little more money and this is one place where we can save it", at the expense of the farmer.

The point has been made often today and before that it is not a large number of people. It might not be a large number of people, but it is a fair sized group. As I pointed out before, the number of people in 1987–88 who made use of the Advance Payments for Crops Act across the country was something around 10,000 farmers. The number of people who made use of the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act was approximately 20 per cent of the 150,000 farmers who have quota books.

• (1650)

It is not as if this is a small group. Of course, it is the group that needs it most, in most cases. I know, and the government can point to this I am sure, that there are people who make use of these acts who do not need it. However, it would be very simple to put into the applications for advance payment some requirement which would at least force them to tell the producer organization, which in many cases is made up of their friends and neighbours, whether or not they had a cash flow problem. I am sure that the supplier down the road could tell you right now which of the farmers in the community have a cash flow problem and which ones do not and, therefore, which ones need advance payment and which do not.

I reiterate, this is not the time to move away from interest free advance payments. This is not the time to move into something which puts the farmer in a position where he has one more burden to worry about.

I support wholly the hoist motion which was moved by the member for Algoma which suggests that we forget about this bill now and look at it again six months from now. I would much rather of course see the government withdraw this bill now and put into effect the present legislation which would allow, within the next month or to, the bringing in of supplementary estimates, if they wish—they say they do not have any money in the budget—which would allow them to cover the loans that might be made.

This government has, over the years, suggested that they do everything by consultation, that they are very good at consultation. We have had a number of farm organizations that have questioned that. They said: "Yes, they come to us and they tell us what they are going to do. They leave and do what they want". They do not consider that consultation. In this particular case had they consulted with the farm producer groups across Canada—and those farm producer groups are a cross-section of the agricultural community and include the Prince Edward Island Potato Marketing Board, the Prince Edward Island Grain Growers, the Corn Growers of Ontario, the Ontario Corn Producers Association, the Ontario Soybean Growers Marketing Board—maybe they did consult and went ahead, as usual, doing what they intended—they would have found that there would be no support for the removal of the interest free portion of these acts.

The government has suggested that one of the reasons why it changed the act was to increase the levels, which were $30,000, $60,000 and $90,000. I suggest, first, that it is very easy to do this if you are borrowing the money and not having to pay the interest on it yourself. Second, this is a pretty good indication that the people they are worried about are the top level people who may not need this in the first place. It is the small farmer who made good use of this and would continue to make good use of this.

I support fully the hoist motion that this bill be put aside for six months and be brought back and, in the meantime, that the present legislation be continued.

Mr. Weiner: Mr. Speaker, I give notice that at the next sitting of the House, immediately before the Order of the Day is called for resuming debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill C–36, an act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, and any amendments proposed thereto, I will move that the debate shall not be further adjourned.

Mr. Hovdebo: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the minister is out of order. I am still in the question period of my speech. Consequently, he does not have the floor for that particular reason.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair finds the notice by the minister to be in order.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member who made that motion is in order, but it would have to come from an urbanite like that to slander the farmers of this country. I, too, live in a large city, but I would like to stand up in my comments and questions to tip my hat to the farmers and the food producers of this country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flis: They are the hardest working and most efficient food producers in the world.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flis: With markets around the world becoming so competitive, we should be doing everything within our power to help our farmers stay competitive and be more competitive. What is this government doing? It is doing everything in its power to pull our farmers under.

I would like to ask the member for Saskatoon—Humboldt what the trend is in his riding because I drove through there this summer visiting places like Kuroki, Wadena, Watrous, Wishart, Wynard, all the way to Saskatoon. I am sure his riding touches many of these towns.

I was born and raised on a farm. My parents farmed for 25 years. With four sons and two daughters, my father saw no future on the farm. He had to abandon the farm. I would like to ask the Hon. Member whether that trend is still continuing or are we saving the family farm. Is the trend of abandoning farms still continuing?

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out earlier, in my province, even very close to my home constituency in that area where the member was travelling, in some cases as much as 75 per cent of the farmers in some communities have received foreclosure notices and are in the process of losing part or all of their land. They may keep on farming it for a couple of years, but in the end it will go out of the family. It usually goes to somebody else. It means consolidation. The lands will continue to be farmed but by fewer people.

If we had in place a structure which would guarantee a fair price cost of production return on the products which are produced, we would have a viable and an economic industry right across Canada, particularly on the prairies. But we do not have that guarantee. Only if one is in a supply management product can one have that kind of guarantee. Even that is being undermined by the policies of this government.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have received written notice from the Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon) that he is unable to be present to move his motion during Private Members' Hour on Friday, October 6, 1989.

It has not been possible to arrange an exchange of positions in the order of precedence pursuant to Standing Order 94. Accordingly, I am directing the Table Officers to drop that item of business to the bottom of the order of precedence.

Private Members' Hour will therefore be suspended and, in accordance with Standing Order 94, the House shall revert to the business before it prior to Private Members' Hour.

[English]

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

HEALTH

RESEARCH INTO FOOD ADDITIVES

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing) moved:

> That in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of undertaking research on the cumulative or combined effects of food additives and pest-control products in the Canadian food supply.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today on an issue that dramatically illustrates the connection between concerns for the environment, human health, and the connections between those two things and economic decisions.

As the critic for health for the New Democrats I have been advocating the restructuring of our health care system to emphasize preventive measures. A full program of preventive care requires that no government decision be taken without integrating concern for human health into the equation.

To me this is a logical step to take along with my party's expressed support for sustainable economic development as set out in a valuable study recently completed by my colleague from Skeena, entitled "Towards a Sustainable Future".

As a species dependent on the earth for our mental and physical well-being, environmental issues are at the same time health issues. It is becoming increasingly clear that by destroying the environment, we create health risks. Destruction of ozone leads to skin cancer; lead emission from car exhausts cause cancer; global warming affects growth patterns causing food shortages and so on. The list is a long one, as we all know.

The issue is not simply protecting the environment. The issue is protecting ourselves. The topic of food additives and the use of pesticides integrates the environment and human health into economic decisions. The misuse of pesticides as we know can destroy wildlife and damage water systems. The accumulation of chemicals in the food supply is increasingly becoming a health hazard.

It is my belief that most members of this House support the goals of reducing our dependence on chemicals and ensuring the highest possible standards in our food supply. Of course taking this approach will give rise to expenditures of money at a time when all initiatives are being sacrificed by this government on the altar of deficit reduction. Those who place government austerity above measures to protect our environment should be looking over their shoulders. Most Canadians are willing to pay to protect the environment and their health. They are showing a greater willingness to vote on the basis of those concerns. Even food suppliers, and Provigo is a good example, are beginning the process of responding to that demand by agreeing to disclose all pesticides used on produce they sell. So while business is responding to these things it appears the government it is not doing all that it might.

I encourage the Standing Committee on the Environment to continue the work started in the last Parliament on pesticide use. In particular, the review could be of assistance in encouraging public participation and public information in the ongoing debate over pesticide use. In particular, the ongoing review by the Pesticide Registration Review Secretariat, which I welcome, should be accompanied by the greatest possible public participation. The review could allow for public hearings next year to cover the whole pesticide debate. Involvement of the Environment Committee could ensure that wide attention is brought to the efforts of the secretariat and pressure this government to clean up pesticide registration, the control process, and the enforcement process.

There are two points that I think the Review Secretariat might pay particular attention to. The first relates to concerns voiced in a very wide-spread manner about risk benefit analysis versus risk assessment. In terms of risk benefit analysis generally what is at stake is the risk, for example, the risk to our health against the economic benefit on the part of producers. That sort of economic trade-off has given rise to considerable problems over the last little while and given rise to considerable concern about the use of pesticides and chemical additives in our food.

The second point the Review Secretariat might want to pay particular attention to is that there is no public participation in the whole process of licensing and enforcement. There is not adequate information on decisions which are made and the reasons for those decisions, nor of the health and environmental data used in considering the registration of pesticides.

Canadians are concerned about pesticides and the dangers associated with them, and with the dangers associated with other chemical residues in our food. There is considerable concern in Canada now with the safety of our food supply.

The use of pesticides is widespread. They are sprayed on fruits and vegetables and on other plants to kill parasites, fungi, and weeds. They help protect produce from bruising; they ripen it and give it a better colour; and they are used to control parasites that bother farm animals. As a result, they show up further down in the food chain in the meat we eat. They are a pervasive presence in our food supply.

The issue has been treated as one of balance, of balancing the health interests of Canadians against the economic interests of producers and manufactures of food and of importers and retailers of food.

There are those who express an optimistic view of the effect of pesticides and chemical additives. Among those, is Dr. Losos, director general of the laboratory centre for disease control of the health protection branch of Health and Welfare Canada who says:

> No one can state for certain that anyone ever got cancer as a result of eating something that contained pesticide residues.

Such a cavalier approach to the problem is counteracted by the fact that some 10,000 cases of bacterial food poisoning are reported to health and welfare each year. I think we have to be concerned about the effects on the health of Canadians of these additives and pesticides. We must put safety and health first. We must ensure that we do not risk the health and safety of Canadians. We must reduce the damage we are doing to our environment.

Scientific opinion recognizes that virtually all pesticides are toxic, at least to some degree. Much of the debate to date has been about the setting of limits and the process by which limits are set.

Pesticides play a vital role in modern agriculture, but there are concerns about dangers to users, the environment, and consumers. Many chemicals and derivative compounds apparently in use are carcinogenic, and other chemicals can have neurotoxic effects and can alter neurological functions.

Food is highly likely to contain some level of pesticide residues. In fact, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration in 1987 found that 50 per cent of all fruit samples had detectable levels of pesticides. There is no safe level. Regulators cannot guarantee safety and cannot guarantee that no harm is occurring. Instead, we talk of risk benefit. Does the benefit of the product, usually economic, outweigh the probable harm in terms of health of the user, in terms of health of the consumer?

The objective of the process of regulation should be to ensure that only those pesticides and food additives which are safe and do not create a health hazard are put on to the market. The process at the moment of registration and control is an often haphazard one involving Agriculture Canada, Health and Welfare and provincial agencies.

There has been a good deal of criticism of the way in which both the risk benefit analysis has been carried out, the concentration on risk benefit analysis, and on the resources available for ensuring that effective controls are in place.

The Auditor General recently criticized the process of testing for pesticide residues, concluding, in part, that for many products the Department of Agriculture does not know the extent of human health risks posed by chemical and bacterial contamination in these foods and cannot assure itself that its inspection resources are directed to where these resources are greatest.

I would like to raise one other concern about the present situation in which we find ourselves with regards to the regulation of pesticides and food additives, in particular dealing with pesticides and then perhaps make a couple of suggestion.

This already difficult situation with regard to the registration of pesticides and the enforcement of pesticide control and food additive control has been extenuated by Schedule 7 of the free trade agreement which Canada recently signed with the United States. Schedule 7 deals with pesticides and with a move towards the equivalence of standards. Schedule 7 requires that there be work toward equivalent guidelines, technical regulations, standards and test methods; that there be work toward equivalent residue monitoring programs; that there be work toward equivalent technical regulations, standards or certifications for those pesticides; and work towards equivalence and the process for risk benefit assessment, tolerance setting and the setting of regulatory policies with respect to certain pesticides.

Canadian standards tend to be more rigorous than those in the United States, and the government has agreed, through this process of equivalence, to begin the process of reducing our standards and thus the degree of protection available to Canadians. At least, in this particular schedule, the free trade agreement does not talk about harmonization, but it does talk about equivalence, the bringing down of those standards.

Mr. Boyer: Or the raising up by the Americans.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Well, it is very unlikely that we are going to see the Americans raising their standards to our standards.

Mr. Boyer: Why?

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): The number of producers in the United States is significantly higher than the number of producers in Canada and the number of products available is significantly higher than those available in Canada.

What we need is a new method of pesticide registration to ensure that questions of health and environmental effects are more effectively put into the technical and economic equation. The costs and risks of pesticide use must be determined and research must be conducted into additive effects of chemicals on the environment, the users, and the consumers.

Users and consumers must be fully informed of the risks they face, and that includes adequate labelling of pesticide products to include health assessments. Food labelling must also include additives and the probable presence of pesticide residues in food irradiation. All those things would assist in ensuring that consumers are well aware of the procedures to which their foods have been subjected.

It would be useful also, as many have called for, if the government would create a new classification for fresh and processed foods which are pesticide free or organic foods which ensure that the consumers are well aware of the lack of presence of pesticides in some of the products that are available.

One of the serious problems that has arisen with regards to pesticides and chemical additives, as raised in the motion, is that we have very little knowledge of the cumulative effect of the various pesticides and chemical additives in our food today. There is a notorious chemical soup of products and additives out there and we really have very little understanding of how they all fit together.

Tests which are generally conducted are tests about the toxic nature of one product being used alone, separate from all others. What scientists see from these toxicity studies is the specific result of using just one chemical, one pesticide, or one additive. What Pollution Probe has called for is a significant exploration of the interaction between chemicals and the total chemical load on the population from pesticides, food additives, and the seemingly endless list of industrial chemicals that are available.

The number of pesticides alone is formidable. More than 600 of them are used throughout the world and about 220 are currently approved in Canada. Because so many factors, including pesticides, chemical additives and many other things that are present in our environment, contribute to the health difficulties that people face, we need another way of assessing toxicity and of testing for chemicals other than just concentrating on one single commodity at any given time. There are many things that the government could do to place a higher priority on the health of Canadians in this context.

As I have mentioned, first of all we need a more public process for the assessment of regulating pesticides and food additives and we need to ensure that we not only perform risk benefit considerations, that we do not face off health and economic matters, but indeed that we ask the real questions as to what risk these products give rise to.

We must pay particular attention to the compounding effects on all of the various chemicals utilized at different stages of our food production process. We must find out what is happening. We must conduct research on the cumulative effects of food additives and chemicals. This would be a critical step to take.

In conclusion, I would say that the government should take action on this immediately.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the proposal before us today is to consider whether the government should undertake research on the cumulative or combined effects of food additives and pest control products in the Canadian food supply.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure all members of the House are aware, rigorous controls are in effect with regard to both pesticides and food additives. For example, pesticide products are registered in Canada under the Pest Control Products Act. This act is administered by Agriculture Canada with registration of products occurring only after extensive consultation with various other government departments, including the Department of National Health and Welfare, and Environment Canada.

Health and Welfare evaluates the safety of these pest control products, both for the potential hazards of residues in foods and for occupational exposure risk to workers using these materials. Unlike the registration systems in some other countries, the Canadian registration process is extremely rigorous and places paramount importance on the safety of the pest control product both to the users and consumers of foods treated with these substances.

Residues in foods are regulated under the Food and Drugs Act and regulations through the establishment of maximum residue limits. Such maximum residue limits incorporating substantial built–in safety factors are set as low as possible and are based on both safety considerations and good agricultural practice.

Over the years, the increase in scientific knowledge, coupled with the evaluation and re–evaluation of pest control products has resulted in Canada enjoying one of the safest food supplies in the world. New pest control products are subjected to more and more stringent evaluation while older products such as DDT and Alachlor exhibiting definite or suspected safety hazards have been removed from the Canadian marketplace.

This strict evaluation process, in conjunction with the maximum residue limits under the food and drug regulations have shown positive results in the national pesticide monitoring survey, which indicates that a very small number of violative residues are being found in foods. In addition, the ongoing Canadian market basket survey indicates that the majority of foods consumed by Canadians contain little, if any, pesticide residues.

It must be kept in mind, however, that the food supply is, in fact, a collection of chemicals, such as proteins, minerals, vitamins combined in a variety of ways. Many of these chemicals are eaten in concentrations much higher than the residue levels of pest control products. It has often been stated that some of the naturally occurring chemicals are much more toxic than most of the pest control products in use today. If these natural chemicals were subjected to the same rigorous evaluation as the registered pest control products, it is possible that portions of the Canadian food supply would disappear.

Because of the vast number of chemicals and the multitude of permutations and combinations of interactions involved, a study of all possible combined effects of selected substances would be virtually impossible to carry out. It would also be extremely costly.

It also to be borne in mind that foods have been eaten for centuries with little evidence of any cumulative or combined effects. One therefore wonders when the residues of the pest control products are so low in comparison to other naturally occurring chemicals, what additional benefits for the consumer would arise by a study of the cumulative or combined effects of this group of compounds either singly or in possible combination with other substances such as food additives. This is particularly questionable in the face of no substantial evidence of existing hazard.

As I mentioned before, the available monitoring data indicated that the use of pest control products in Canada generally results in residues which are either non–detectable or at levels well below the established maximum residue limits established under the Canadian food and drug regulations. Furthermore, there is no scientific evidence to suggest that Canadian consumers have been exposed to hazardous or harmful pesticide residues in food as a result of the legal use of these products.

In fact, over the past three decades, there has only been one case of pesticide poisoning due to contaminated foods. This case, which was handled by regulatory authorities, was due to an illegal use and resulted in only temporary discomfort for the consumer involved.

Another fact to consider is that the majority of the pest control products sold in Canada are herbicides which are used for weed control. These herbicide products are generally applied very early in the growing season and therefore usually result in very low, if any, residues at time of harvest. Based on these considerations, together with analytical data on residues, the potential for the cumulative or combined effects of chemicals in foods to produce adverse consequences is, indeed, relatively small.

It is also important to note that the Canadian diet is very diverse and it is very unlikely that an individual would eat the same food every day without fail for his or her lifetime. Even so, the scientists in health and welfare assume this to be the situation when establishing maximum residue limits in order to determine the worst case estimates of intake.

I would like to repeat that, Mr. Speaker. It is important to note that the Canadian diet is very diverse and it is very unlikely that an individual would eat the same food every day, without fail, for his or her lifetime. Even so, the scientists in health and welfare assume that this is the case and that that is the situation that exists when establishing maximum residue limits in order to determine the worst case estimates of intake. This procedure, therefore, provides an additional margin of safety for the consumer.

It is also of interest to focus on the question of the cost of the studies which have been suggested by my hon. friend. The best information from private companies and national organizations involved in the pest control product industry indicates that the cost of development of a new pest control product in Canada is $30 million to $60 million and represents at least seven years of intensive research. The cost of the toxicology assessment portion of this data package represents an estimate $8 million to $10 million. These costs are borne by the industry interested in marketing a given product.

To suggest, therefore, that the Canadian government undertake research on the combined or cumulative effects in the pesticide area, which would cost millions and millions of dollars, would certainly be a tremendous burden in an era of restraint, particularly when no substantial benefits to the consumer would likely result.

In summary, there has not been any substantiated reports of combined or cumulative adverse affects in humans due to pesticide residues in food with or without other components such as food additives. The products used on any one crop are generally diverse and do not have the same mode of toxic action. The residue levels of pest control products in the Canadian food supply are generally very low or non-detectable. Acceptable daily intake levels, which are determined for individual chemicals based on extensive toxicity tests on laboratory animals, have built-in safety factors.

All of these facts lead this government to believe that this motion and its potential for expenditure of millions of taxpayers' dollars and years of government research manpower is not supported by a real need.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House today asks us to consider whether the Government should undertake research on the cumulative or combined effects of food additives and pesticides in Canadian food products.

The Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare is responsible for monitoring pesticide residues in food and the use of food additives.

These chemical substances are currently subject to a comprehensive assessment process before they are approved for use in Canada. At this point, it would be useful to take a brief look at the assessment process, especially where pesticides are concerned. A similar procedure is also followed for additives.

The term "pesticide" includes a whole range of products such as insecticides, fungicides and herbicides.

In the case of most of these product categories, progress made in chemical research during the past twenty years has led to new types of compounds with enhanced specificity, reduced persistence in the environment and lower toxicity for mammals. In many cases, enhanced specificity has meant a reduction in the quantities involved, selective application and lower concentrations of residues in food crops treated, at the time of harvest. Nevertheless, food may contain low concentrations of pesticide residues, and the Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare is responsible for evaluating the potential dangers of these residues and establishing, if necessary, maximum limits in accordance with Canadian food and drugs regulations. We may point out that the presence of pesticide residues is not necessarily harmful to consumers.

Maximum residue limits are established only after a complete assessment of various toxicological tests that are used internationally. These tests include studies on acute toxicity, both short and long term, and are carried out on various animal species in order to investigate a wide range of possible harmful effects, including cancer.

The daily admissible dose for a pesticide has a built–in safety factor that allows for the kind of toxicological effects observed in the animal species tested. The daily admissible dose represents that quantity of pesticide that may be ingested daily during a lifetime, without harmful effects. This figure is used to determine the safety and appropriateness of the suggested maximum limits.

The use of pesticides in Canada is based on the principle that the quantity of pesticide applied to a food crop should be the minimum that is required for effective control. Maximum limits are established after analysing the data on residue obtained through tests in real conditions based on the worst case estimate of intake in other words, one tries to obtain the strongest concentrations that could be expected under typical conditions of use. The maximum residue limit represents the maximum quantity of a given pesticide that may legally be found on a given food product. These limits are usually established using a whole, unprocessed agricultural product at the time of harvest, which may be seen as an additional safety margin. Since the concentration of many residues decreases during storage and transportation, and of course when the food is washed, ground and cooked, the residues in many cases fall well below the maximum acceptable limit and frequently are not detectable.

To enforce the food and drug regulations, the Health Protection Branch continually monitors Canadian and imported food. This surveillance shows that generally food contains pesticide residues in concentrations well below the maximum thresholds. In the rare cases where violations are found, they are mainly due to the use of a pesticide on a crop not being registered in Canada, although in some cases, higher upper limits had been authorized for the same pesticide on other food products. When violations are brought to light, appropriate measures are taken, including recall of the food product, Mr. Speaker.

The statement that actual pesticide residues are well within the statutory limits is also based on the preliminary results of the most recent comprehensive diet study conducted between 1985 and 1988 by the Department of National Health and Welfare. This study makes it possible to estimate the proportion of chemicals in humans from an analysis of these substances in composite samples of representative foods in the average total food intake of the population. The samples analysed are obtained in the marketplace and prepared for use just as in an average home kitchen.

Preliminary results confirm previous findings that any pesticide residues are in concentrations well below the statutory limits and that for the most part, they represent only a small fraction of the allowable daily dose calculated by the Health Protection Branch.

Mr. Speaker, no pesticide can be considered absolutely safe, but it is important that this danger be linked to exposure.

As was mentioned before, the mere detection of a small dose of such a substance in food does not mean that this substance is necessarily dangerous. Indeed, some common garden vegetables naturally contain substances that produce significant toxic effects in laboratory animals when administered in high doses.

In some cases, the concentrations of these vegetable substances is higher than those reported for synthetic pesticides or food additives. In any event, no data lead us to believe that eating such food as part of a well–balanced diet can endanger consumers' health.

Before beginning research on the cumulative interactions and potential combined effects of these residues in low concentrations with other substances in food, we should first consider Canada's safety record over the last 20 years. No death or illness due to pesticide residues in legal amounts has been recorded. Indeed, the only proven death resulting from the consumption of a pesticide residue in food that was recorded in Canada was due to the illegal use of a very highly toxic pesticide on cucumbers.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, since the recorded concentrations of pesticide residues in Canadian food supplies are very low and Canada's food safety record with respect to these substances is excellent, doing research into the cumulative or combined effects of pesticides with other substances such as additives in Canadian food products does not seem a priori to be a priority for now or likely to become one.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing has in a very thoughtful speech put before us this afternoon this question of what happens when food additives and pesticides that are about us everywhere and in the food chain combine one with another. What is the cumulative effect, the cascading effect, of more and more of these being added.

Given the fact that over 5 billion of us humans not to mention hundreds of billions of other animal and life forms are taking nourishment in various ways throughout every single day, there is no question but that this topic is one of central importance and in some respects relates to survival, because nourishment is what sustains life in all its forms.

I was glad to hear him take a thoughtful and essentially non-partisan approach in bringing this subject to the floor of the House this afternoon. I can, I guess, overlook a couple of areas where bias got into his remarks, where he felt he had to condemn the government and also take a side-swipe at the Americans and the free trade agreement.

I only want to say that I think Canadians expect parliamentarians to deal with issues of the environment in a way that is beyond partisan politics. There are certainly times and issues on which there will be differences in party opinion, differences of ideology, but in effect we have something here that, like several other issues in our country and at the international level, really are of transcending importance. Most Canadians that I know do not care what a party platform is or what a personal partisan drive is on an environmental issue. They want to hear answers that are concrete and specific.

To do that, I would first like to elaborate on the hon. member's plea to the government for a more public process and begin by referring to action that is now under way this year in the formation of the Federal Pesticide Registration Review Team.

This document which relates to the current activities of this Pesticide Registration Review Team has three points in it that I would like to mention fairly briefly. The first has to do with who are the members of this team. There are representatives from consumer groups, environmental groups, the farming community, labour, public health, biological, federal regulatory agencies, the forestry sector and the pesticide industry. It is a completely balanced, comprehensive and representative team of people to be involved in any review of pesticide use and registration in Canada.

The second point relates to a statement of purpose of this body. It is very brief, admirably expressed in one sentence, as follows:

> Recognizing the principles of sustainability, the purpose of the Review Team is to formulate recommendations for the Minister of Agriculture to adapt the Pesticide Registration process to changing policies and conditions with a view to ensuring the efficient federal regulation of pest control products that minimize the risk of harm to human health and the environment while meeting the needs of the stakeholders.

The third point that I would like to extract from this document for the purposes of the debate this afternoon is to note that as a result of their very first meeting earlier this year—this group continues to meet actively—20 separate issues were identified as constituting their initial focus. We are beyond the stage here of dealing with general statements or good intentions. We are down to dealing with very specific aspects of Canadian policy dealing with pesticides.

The issues include having a clear and central focus on where the federal decision-making authority for regulating pesticides is located; the extent and cause of backlogs in registering new products; the effectiveness of the existing Minor Use of Pesticides Program; the role of risk management principles in making regulatory decisions; the role of the public in the registration process.

Others include the co-ordination and co-operation with the provinces; co-ordination and co-operation between Canada and the United States; co-ordination of pest control products regulations with the important new legislation, Workplace Hazardous Materials Information System; enforcement program and penalty provisions; research permits; labelling; an ongoing review mechanism to ensure that the regulatory process can adapt quickly and fairly to changing needs and conditions. So it goes.

I am not reading all of this into the record but I did want to take the occasion to raise that for the consideration of members, particularly the member whose motion is before the House now, to indicate that this is not something that is new. This is not something that has caught the government by surprise, it is an issue that has for years been of central importance to Canadians, including previous governments. That is why Canada has had very strict and high standards relating to food, to consumer labelling, to ingredient identification. There is a separate issue that is somewhat related to this subject. We currently have a problem in Canada, and I believe the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was responding publicly to it today, of American products coming into Canada that do not comply with Canadian labelling requirements. For example, there are boxes of cereal on which the Americans talk about cholesterol, but we cannot in this country even use that word on a product. There are many Canadian standards that are much higher and stricter which I would speak of if I had time, but perhaps another member can pick up this point.

I want to deal with the procedure that is followed in Canada for testing food additives, approving them and controlling them, because Canadian standards in this area are very high. Frankly, the member is promoting further research. I do have significant reservations about research which involves animals for testing. I recognize that medical research is very important in that area, but there are a lot of other areas of testing where I think we have to look with more care than we have in the past as to what we wish to subject animal populations to in the name of some form of research.

This is something that two other members of the House and I are currently investigating, the various animal testing laboratories under the aegis of the federal government. I will leave it to another speaker to go into that procedure in detail, but the result of that procedure is that Canada has the best record of safety in food on the market of any country. We have in fact a remarkable state here that whenever there is some problem with food poisoning, whether it be with the kinds of difficulties that the hon. member was mentioning, it is a cause for great consternation and discussion because it is the exception to the rule.

I think the issue is important but we must be very careful not to raise unfounded fears in this area but to deal with the facts and keep the system that we do have on the track, especially as it can be modified as the result of the work of this review team to whose activities I have drawn attention.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak on this private member's motion by the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing which reads:

> That in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of undertaking research on the cumulative or combined effects of food additives and pest-control products in the Canadian food supply.

I heard the member opposite say Canada has the best record in terms of testing and control for safety. I would submit that a part of progress is always to build on our strengths and to continue on. Research does not mean that we are putting into question the current state of the situation. It means we would like always to work for the health and safety of all Canadians.

People are becoming less and less confident about the adequacy of government regulations limiting drugs and chemicals in foods. The government does not ban fruits and vegetables when it finds low pesticide residues or forbid the dosing of animal meats with hormones and antibiotics. Warnings about tainted food may be issued only when a consumer falls ill, when a citizen becomes a patient. That is too late. That is not prevention.

Several events in the past year indicate that there is good reason for the public to be increasingly concerned about what is in the food they eat. I would therefore like to laud the member who introduced this private member's motion.

In October our own Canadian Auditor General, Mr. Kenneth Dye, questioned the adequacy of government food testing and pesticide-regulating programs in his annual report. So obviously there is room, in fact a great deal of room for improvement.

A study released in February by the Natural Resources Defence Council, the NRDC, in Washington, D.C., estimated that up to 6,200 pre-schoolers in that part of the country may eventually develop cancer because of repeated exposure to pesticide residues on fruits and vegetables. That figure certainly is alarming and is not acceptable to any citizenry, certainly not to Canadian society. The major cause for concern is the pesticide daminozide, known by its trade name Alar.

The Ontario government released a study last September that concluded that dioxins and furans, two families of toxic substances, can be found in low levels in many foods, including meat, poultry, wheat, eggs, fruits, vegetables and milk.

Now I would like to speak more about the pesticides. Federal government officials estimate that between 250 and 300 pesticides are in use. Pesticides are sprayed on fruits and vegetables and kill parasites, fungi and weeds. They help to ripen produce, improve its colouring and protect it from bruising.

Agriculture Canada states that about half of fruits and vegetables have residues below the tolerance level, and most meat products also contain minute traces of pesticides. But Diane Kirkpatrick, Director of Health and Welfare Canada's Bureau of Chemical Safety, says that while the government should remain vigilant in monitoring levels, unless that is done, consumers may not be safe because residues are below the stated limit. So there is a need for continuing research. There is a need for research into the cumulative effects of additives and food pesticides.

She also said that the government is not worried about minute levels of Alar on apples and that there is no concrete evidence from animal studies as yet that Alar is carcinogenic. But there is a principle in law: "Absence of evidence is not evidence of absence". We would not like to wait for the harm to happen. When we have demonstrated the harm, even in animal studies, we have to accept that and presume the safety of the individual is foremost in our minds.

The NRDC study states that Alar is a potent carcinogen. The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, while it believes that NRDC's analysis is exaggerated, has, nevertheless, announced it is accelerating its proposal to ban Alar. So there was concern. Yet, Health and Welfare Canada has given the chemical a clean bill of health. So again there is a need for awareness on the part of the Canadian public.

The key difference between the U.S. and Canadian responses is how the governments interpret cancer risks from chemicals. Virtually all the information about the safety of chemicals comes from tests on rats and mice in the laboratory. In the case of daminozide and the chemical known as UDMH—the daminozide breaks down into a compound called UDMH when processed into apple sauce and apple juice—the laboratory studies to date are somewhat ambiguous. After the first year of a two-year study UDMH caused cancer in animals only at the highest dose tested. Canadian officials have interpreted this information to mean that UDMH is only carcinogenic when consumed in very large quantities.

By contrast, U.S. officials believe that, despite the uncertainties, there is a good chance that UDMH increases the risk of cancer even when consumed in much smaller doses.

I think the message here is, at a given point in time a particular dose of consumption may not be harmful. When taken over a period of time, cumulatively, it could harm the citizen.

The Environmental Protection Agency estimates that the levels of UDMH found in apple products present a lifetime cancer risk of about one in 22,000. Now, if you look at the risk of diseases in medical practice, certainly we worry even when the risk of illness is one in 22,000. We try to discover a cure. We try to discover a treatment. So if we do that in the day-to-day practice of medicine, then certainly we should also be concerned about risk of cancer even if the studies are not quite definitive yet.

Although this is a minute risk for each individual, when averaged over an entire population, however, it appears much more significant.

The Environmental Protection Agency's analysis is correct. UDMH could cause about 1,000 additional cancers in a nation the size of Canada. That is alarming. The key question is what to assume for the purposes of a regulatory policy. This is where Canada's approach is disturbing. The U.S. assumptions are the most protective of health, while Canada's are much less so. If Canada is wrong there will be continued exposure to a cancer-causing chemical and an increase in deaths due to cancer.

The University of Western Ontario Geneticist, Dr. Joseph Cummins worries that a pesticide like Alar might cause rare blood vessel cancers and thus there will be a measurable increase in that kind of cancer in the future.

Linda Pim, a Toronto environmental biologist, has similar concerns about the long-term impact of pesticides. Although individual chemicals might be safe on their own, they might be dangerous in combination with others. Again, this is one aspect of harm that research as proposed by this motion could show the Canadian public and our Canadian health officials. I would say that the government does not seem to appreciate the seriousness of these concerns.

I thought I could discuss the dioxin and furans, the two toxic families of chemicals, but I will respect the time you have allotted me and conclude that the government should place much more emphasis on the health of Canadians. If it did, it would be more concerned about the potential ill effects of pesticides, hormones, antibiotics and dioxins and furans. There is a need for more testing to be done to determine what levels of the substances are harmful and a corresponding review of the regulations which control their use.

I support this motion. When we determine to do research, when we try to establish what potentially could harm the Canadian public, there can only be progress, and therefore, I support this motion. I would like to ensure the continuing safety of Canadians through research.

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the motion presented by the Hon. Member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing (Mr. Axworthy). The motion before the House today deals with a very complex technology, namely the analysis of non-harmful food ingredients such as additives and pesticides, a field that is highly specialized. The aspects of this motion which concern food additives could be used to illustrate the degree of complexity involved. Actually, it would be preferable to separate the cumulative effects from the combined effects of food additives, simply because these are two entirely different matters.

The comprehensive toxicological assessment that food additives undergo before their use in Canada is approved will provide most of the information on the so-called cumulative effects of these products in the human body.

Food additives are no different from other chemical products that enter the body and are used by the body, and more specifically, the myriad of chemical products contained in food which include proteins, carbohydrates and fat. Some are transformed by normal bio-chemical reactions as a result of the body's metabolism and can help the body produce energy, while others, because of their physical and chemical properties, may never be absorbed and remain basically unchanged after entering the body.

Others may be absorbed and subsequently eliminated.

Actually, the human body is a wonderfully effective machine that is constantly ingesting food, water and air and uses what it needs while getting rid of the rest in one way or another.

We can say that relatively few elements have a chance to accumulate in the body. Usually they are either used or eliminated. If food additives were to accumulate and if such accumulation were to have a toxic impact, this would be detected by the toxicological analyses that are standard for all food additives before they are approved for use.

If these studies showed signs of accumulation, a thorough assessment of the significance of these findings would be done before the additive could be approved for use in food.

To examine the somewhat more complex issue of the combined effects of food additives, we have to consider the thousands of chemical products to which the body is exposed when it ingests food.

If we add one or two food additives to this whole mixture of chemical products that naturally occur in food, we must not conclude that these additives will necessarily set off a toxic reaction.

In fact, the odds are there would be a much higher risk that some of the thousands of other chemicals products would react together. That is what happens in cooking, Mr. Speaker, when we prepare food.

In fact, it is difficult to predict all the reactions that can be generated by food ingredients, including additives.

However, just as when other food elements or additives or pesticides are involved, this issue is dealt with by chemists, nutritionists or professional toxicologists with the Department of National Health and Welfare, during the strict pre-approval process.

As you know, research in this area would not be particularly useful. Most of the food we eat is cooked, which brings about hundreds and thousands of changes.

However, cooked food is eaten every day, and food is cooked for health reasons, because this rids the food we will eat of micro-organisms that can cause problems in the area of public health.

If we were to have a research program on the combined effects of food additives, we would have to ask ourselves several questions, like: Were do we start? What combinations of additives must be considered? How should these combinations be studied? Perhaps some other benefits that the consumer might derive should be considered as well. And last but not least, what would such a study cost?

It must certainly not be concluded, Mr. Speaker, that such studies are not important in cases that can be easily identified and where the danger is known. However, there would be little interest in beginning an intensive research program to study all possible reactions.

Furthermore, it is not obvious that the reaction products would necessarily be toxic.

They might very well be quite harmless and be handled by the body almost like other food components such as proteins and complex carbohydrates that make up the food we eat every day and which the human body metabolizes without difficulty.

Mr. Speaker, food safety research is a very costly exercise requiring highly specialized scientific personnel and complex equipment worth hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Before beginning such a research program, a thorough analysis of the need and cost-effectiveness must be done to ensure that scarce funds are well spent.

Research on the food supply is and must be based—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member, but his time is up.

The period for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

Adjournment Debate

• (1800)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

IMMIGRATION—BACKLOG IN REFUGEE DETERMINATION SYSTEM

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, this government, through neglect of duty and abuse of staff, is building up a brand new refugee backlog crisis which may end in further injustice to refugees.

On May 9 of this year in Question Period I pointed out to the minister that her new system of refugee determination started on January 1, 1989 was breaking down. Of 2,806 cases opened in four months only 1,008 had received final decisions. The minister answered that the problem was just a matter of start-up troubles. She claimed she would, and I quote:

> —continue to ensure that there are enough resources available so the system will work well—

It seems she did not provide the resources. According to the report of the Immigration and Refugee Board for September 11, 1989, of 7,203 cases opened, only 3,243 cases received final decisions—only 45 per cent. The rest, 3,691 cases, are deferred at one stage or another. The pipeline is filling up fast.

There was a time when 2,000 or 3,000 cases was a dreadful backlog. We now have about 100,000 cases in the old backlog, mostly built up since 1984. How many more thousands will this government add in a new backlog?

There is a very plain reason for much of this breakdown—understaffing of the clerical work. This was an important part of the origin of the old backlog, understaffing of the clerical work. It then took three to six months to type a transcript of a hearing under oath and send it to the old refugee status advisory committee. So the backlog was launched. As it snowballed, the racketeers found the delays very profitable for bringing in bogus refugees just to benefit by even a couple of years of work in Canada before they would be sent away.

Now this government is doing the same understaffing that may launch a new round of racketeering. Appointments are now being made months ahead for hearings which were supposed to be done within a very few weeks. Morale is sinking low in the immigration refugee board support staff, as in the whole immigration department.

After working Saturdays, Sundays and nights overtime, week after week after week, clerks are transferring or quitting. This government, rather than developing a fair hiring policy to meet the need, is resorting to contracting out the clerical work in violation of the union contract. When the government pays a contractor, say Kelly Girl, $900 a week, but the actual girl doing the work gets only $250 a week, not only is the girl being cheated but the Canadian taxpayers are being cheated, and plainly, the work is not getting done right.

Why is this government sabotaging its own pet refugee determination program which it steamrollered through Parliament against massive public opposition?

Last December the minister threatened to apply the infamous safe third country clause of her new Immigration Act if the system began to break down. This is the clause they could use to send refugee claimants into orbit, bounced from country to country without ever getting a fair hearing on a claim. Is the reason the minister is allowing this new backlog to build up to create a so-called new crisis, to justify sending refugees into orbit?

The minister hinted on April 5, according to The Toronto Star:

> —she might drop a clause in the new refugee laws that would permit Canada to send back refugee claimants who arrive from a safe third country such as the United States—

I hope she will drop that clause and not use it. The United States is not safe for refugees from fascist governments in Latin America or Africa. They deport most of them likely to prison, torture or death.

Therefore, I call on the minister to clean up her act, to hire appropriate clerical staff for the immigration and refugee board, and to enter a bill in Parliament to repeal the infamous safe third country clause of the Immigration Act.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have a chance to reply to the Hon. Member for Trinity-Spadina because he raises this issue as someone who is passionately concerned about the plight of refugees and people who are caught up in the turmoil of bureaucratic procedures. I know that his commitment to the well-being of individuals is one that has caused him to raise this issue now and many times in the past and, no doubt, as long as he is a member of the House, he will continue to bring issues like this before us. It is a reflection of his commitment to seeing that there is justice for all who have anything to do with the Canadian government system.

I think it is fair to say it was that same feeling that motivated the government to bring about changes because of the unacceptable level in the backlog that was developing under the previous operation of the law and the procedures under that law.

The hon. member's concerns—I will not call it an indictment of the new system—that he is already raising about the new system are perhaps not premature but, to be accurate, this new system has been in place only since January 1, and I think there is good evidence as well that it is demonstrating that it can be both efficient and fair, and those two things have to operate simultaneously, I believe.

Claims to convention refugee status certainly are dealt with far more quickly than occurred under the previous process and that efficiency, in turn, is having, I think, at least two benefits. One is that genuine refugees are able to get on with their lives in Canada and, second the abuse by those who have had obviously unfounded claims is being deterred.

The hon. member mentions that 93 per cent of all claims are being referred to the immigration and refugee board and that is absolutely correct. But I think it is important to add that 93 per cent of decisions rendered by the board are to the effect that the claimant is a convention refugee. It was never anticipated that the "creditable basis" test would result in the refusal of a high percentage of claims. Its value has always been seen in its capacity to deter abuse by permitting speedy determination of those claims which lack an arguable base. A more than 30 per cent decrease in claims at ports of entry certainly demonstrates that the test has achieved its objective.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have always felt that there was no point in rising if there is nobody to respond. I certainly would take the answer of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs because his minister chairs the special cabinet committee and he might impose on his minister to pay some attention to the crisis that is developing on the east coast.

My question was to the minister on September 28 at which time the minister in his answer stated:

> —on my first review of the report—

This is a reference to the Haché committee:

> —it appears that in the present year there are no extraordinary circumstances of hardship which are unlike those of previous years with the exception of lower prices and the problems created by exchange rates.

I can only say that for this minister who has been the minister of fisheries now for a number of years cannot, with his experience, say that there are problems in the fishery this year and last year in the groundfishery is incredible. Municipal leaders said on July 11 that probably 12,000 people are affected directly by the groundfish quotas that were in place under this minister's management scheme. They are worried. They know the problems that will develop because there has been no work. This means that there will be larger welfare rolls because people do not have enough stamps to be able to collect unemployment insurance. There is a spin-off effect with lack of work. It means not enough taxes are collected.

The whole community is affected by the fact that this minister will not look at his management plan and say to the people in the southern end of Nova Scotia, "Yes, there is fish in the waters; yes, you should be able to go out and fish them." The municipal leaders are not the only ones. This week, I got a letter from the Yarmouth County Affirmative Action Committee dated September 15, before the minister's answer, which says that because of the problems the federal government has now instituted regulations which have placed thousands of western Nova Scotians on the unemployment lines. Thousands more cannot now qualify for unemployment insurance. Those are two groups that have directed their concerns to this government and they have not been listened to.

In the middle of July, after public demonstrations by the plant workers and the fishermen, two provincial ministers came up and met with the minister. We have had nothing as a result of that meeting. They met again with the Haché committee and said that it was the worst of times and that the management plan was not working. Yet, I do not know what it will take for this minister to start believing people like the member for South Shore who has been saying that there has to be a solution. An awful lot of the fishermen have only had six to eight weeks of work, not even enough for unemployment stamps. Today's paper says "Siddon's comments on fishery called unbelievable by industry". This is in The Chronicle-Herald:

> Glen Wadman,, vice president of the Independent Seafood Producers Association of Nova Scotia, said Wednesday the minister's suggestion that there is no crisis in the fishery is "staggering".
> We represent 31 independent fish plants, many of whom have workers that have only worked seven to 10 weeks this year—
> "Some of them are worried about having their telephones and electricity cut off. Some have had to take their cars back to the local dealers because they're trying to pay for their homes.
> To hear the minister make those kinds of statements— well, it's unbelievable.

Others are saying "Let the minister cut his salary by 30 per cent like he cut the quotas of the inshore fishery by 30 per cent". A longliner says, "Soon, because of the policies, they will be tied up." A longliner should never be tied up because it has a fishery that is selective.

I want to say to this House and to the representative of the government who comes from the west one thing. As the Yarmouth County Affirmative Action Committee says, it is noted, and my hon. colleague over there comes from Alberta, "that the federal government did provide extensive assistance to western farmers when drought struck the prairie provinces. The federal government is directly responsible for providing funding for a state of the art fishing fleet". They feel that if one area of the country is going to be helped by this government, why can the other area not be helped as well.

We have waited since the spring to see if there would be an imaginary fund focused on several times by the government saying that there was going to be help for the east coast. Yet we have a minister who says there are no worries on the east coast, there is nothing wrong on the east coast.

There are people who have not worked who normally have had full-time jobs. There are 12,000 people who have worked in Shelburne, Yarmouth and Digby County directly in the fisheries. Over 5,000 of them are full-time plant workers. Let the minister go and tell them that they should not be working.

The worst thing that this Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has done is that he has not believed in the fishermen. He has not believed in the members of his own party who have told him that the state of the fishery is critical and needs to be taken care of and that his management plan is not helping the inshore fishery. He has not listened to the two provincial ministers of the Buchanan government who came here in July and went before the Haché task force and said there was a problem. He has not listened to anyone.

I think it is time that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is the chairman of the special committee, to look at the state of the east coast fishery, and started working as the Prime Minister said he would do to look at the conditions on the east coast. They have not done that. They have sat all summer and allowed a growing problem to exist while they have not listened to the people, the fishermen, the people who know what the conditions of the fishery are on the east coast.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to add to the minister's response that was given to the hon. member for South West Nova. I think it is very unfair for the member to accuse the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans of not listening to members of this House. Indeed he is and indeed he recognizes the problems that are facing the fisheries on the east coast, and on the west coast where we also have problems.

I do recognize, however, the passion and the feelings that my hon. friend for South West Nova has for her constituents. I understand those, coming from western Canada where we have had drought in the past. This is the first opportunity I have had since she came back to the House to publicly welcome her back after a little bit of a holiday—four years. I am glad to see her back. She is a feisty representative.

I will outline a little of what the minister is attempting to do, and I think my hon. friend will understand this also. She knows full well that a task force on the Scotia-Fundy groundfish was formed on July 18, 1989.

The terms of reference for the study were outlined to the chairman, Mr. Jean-Eudes Haché, in a letter from the minister and it includes the following issues: One, the adequacy of existing scientific advice on the Scotian Shelf, Georges Bank and Bay of Fundy groundfish fisheries; two, he wanted to know the basic management principles of the Scotia-Fundy groundfish fishery, including such things as the impact of present harvesting on the resource as well as the different fleet sectors; the effectiveness of conservation controls and an assessment of the capacity of existing fleets; three, the economic impact of alternative fishery management approaches on individuals and companies involved in the fishing industry and communities which are dependent upon the fishery.

The minister directed Mr. Haché to take into account all fleet gear sectors and to pay particular attention to the work and recommendation of the Scotia-Fundy capacity committee, an industry committee which deliberated for approximately one and one-half years on the question of vessel capacity in the Scotia-Fundy fishery. He was further instructed to keep an open mind on all of their options for management as well as to develop alternative approaches to fisheries development, including promotion of conservation-oriented technologies and the exploitation of underutilized species.

The task force began meeting with the industry and the general public on July 18, and completed its hearings on August 31. Some 30 meetings were held across the Scotia-Fundy region from Sydney to Campobello Island. All meetings were open to the public and the press were present at all meetings.

In total, some 61 written briefs were received by the task force as well as many oral presentations.

In addition, numerous suggestions, observations and recommendations were put forward during the open, free and often lively discussions that took place. Little consensus on potential solutions were apparent.

I notice you are giving me the sign to finish, Mr. Speaker. The minister is attempting, with a basis of good knowledge, good understanding and good input from the east coast fisheries, to come up with solutions that will be long lasting and effective. In the meantime, I would support the member for special support in the interim to help the Nova Scotia and the east coast fishermen over this rough period. I think all members in this House of Commons would agree with me.

IMMIGRATION—INVESTOR PROGRAM—SPECIAL MINISTERIAL PERMITS/GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity of discussing and debating during this late show. A question that I posed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration on June 19, 1989, which dealt with the fact that the government had used 100 ministerial permits to extend free entry into this country for people willing to invest under the investor program that was introduced and announced by the government back in 1988.

The problem with that particular action, and who knows if it was repeated in the period between June and the time currently, was twofold. First, the program was amended and announced in 1988. There were expectations created and, therefore, a demand was created, but we have in this House no legislative and formal authority under that new program in legislation. Therefore, that introduces the possibilities, without formal authority in legislation, without proper criteria, for all sorts of abuse with respect to that new program that was articulated back in 1988.

The second problem, of course, is something that has plagued this government's entrepreneurial program which it has doubled since coming into office in 1984. I am not suggesting that there is anything particularly wrong with entrepreneurial immigration as long as there is a fair balance with respect to the other sources of immigration. The big problem is that once individuals get into this country on a supposed plan to invest, create or start a new business or plant, there is very, very little follow-up by this government to see if that plant, business or operation has indeed opened.

There have been many media reports in the last number of months to indicate that people get into this country with a visa on the pretext that they are going to create jobs and set up businesses when in fact those businesses are nowhere to be seen. There must be a way of ensuring that if people are going to build a better mousetrap factory in Edmonton, Alberta, they have to build that factory, because that is precisely the reason why their visas were extended to them.

The other situation that was very problematic with ministerial permits was the abuse of the principle of a ministerial permit. Traditionally, ministerial permits have been extended to people in very dire need for humanitarian and compassionate grounds. There was no compassionate or humanitarian grounds in terms of dealing with people wishing to invest their dollars and cents. Therefore, there was a double standard at play. People who wanted to invest capital in this country were quickly given ministerial permits. Yet, day after day, in this House and outside this House, we see cases of needy people, facing life or death situations, certainly humanitarian cases, not being able to find the time of day from this minister and this government.

Giving those other individuals special ministerial permits was, in fact, undermining the very concept, principle and tradition of the use of those ministerial permits. It is for that reason and the others that I raised the question in the House of Commons with the minister. We did not get a satisfactory response then and I am looking forward to a response from the parliamentary secretary to try to enlighten this House and those members who are currently in this place to try to arrive at a situation where—

An Hon. Member: Name them.

Mr. Marchi: Some members are asking me to name them. I have too much respect for the members in the House to begin to name them on national television. We wish to clarify two points in very quick order. The first point is that if the program does not have the legislative authority, why are we proceeding in such an ad hoc fashion.

The second point is that the ministerial permits are traditionally there to help those on compassionate and humanitarian grounds.

Are we prepared to enact the necessary legislation so that this program may be scrutinized by Parliament, given the proper authority, and set up the proper regulations and implement the appropriate criteria under which all investor category entrepreneurs can be, in fact, analysed and processed?

I look forward to my hon. friend giving us the information on these very important matters.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy hearing my friend from York West during Question Period. He knows the meaning of opposition and he handles it very well. I welcome the opportunity to expand upon the reply given by the Minister of Employment and Immigration to the Hon. Member for York West on June 19.

Minister's permits may be issued for a number of reasons, and I think we all know that. In the case of immigrant investors, there are situations where the family with small children would want to arrive early in time for the school year, or to make additional investments in Canada that will contribute to creating jobs for Canadians.

Minister's permits may also be used for other types of situations outside the parameters of the business immigration program, such as humanitarian and compassionate grounds or in the national interest. I think this was outlined by my hon. friend. But I will give an example. A dependant of a person immigrating to Canada may have been found to be medically inadmissible and it has been established that public safety and financial and provincial jurisdictional factors are satisfactory. It is important to note that minister's permits are being used as a temporary measure for those who genuinely need them, pending passage of regulations or the approval of request for special authority of the Governor in Council.

I would also point out that the minister's permits issued to immigrant investors in 1988 represent .026 per cent of all minister's permits issued in 1988. I want to repeat that, .026 per cent of all minister's permits were issued under the immigrant investor program. That is very, very small indeed.

We are not extending special privileges to the chosen wealthy few, as my hon. friend has suggested. We are simply being fair and equitable to investors as we are to other categories of immigrants.

Finally, I would like to point out that the necessary amendments, as requested by my hon. friend, to the immigration regulations were prepublished on September 9, 1989, and should come into force in the very near future.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

FORGIVENESS OF DEBTS (SUB-SAHARAN AFRICA) ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (for the Minister for External Relations) moved that > Bill C-10, An Act relating to the forgiveness of debts incurred or assumed in respect of certain official development assistance loans made by the Government of Canada to the governments of certain countries in sub-Saharan Africa, as reported (without ammendment) from a legislative committee, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

[English]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): It is a pleasure to speak on this very important topic and to address this issue of assistance to developing countries, particularly in sub-Saharan Africa. As we all know, one of the most important issues of our time has been the growing burden of debt in the Third World. You are probably familiar with the old adage, Mr. Speaker, which states that "if I owe $1 million I have a problem. If I owe $100 million, the bank has a problem. But if I owe $1 billion, everybody has a problem". The situation with respect to world debt is just that. It is a problem not only for the countries involved, but a problem for all of us here in Canada and around the world.

While we support the general thrust of this legislation, we believe the government could go further in showing compassion and leadership in resolving this situation affecting the poorest of our developing nations. It is time for the government to demonstrate that Canada has a role to play in relieving the problems of the developing world, particularly those in Africa where we have had such a history of assistance under previous Liberal governments.

The recent cuts in CIDA funding which were announced in the budget do not augur well for the status that Canada has in the developing world. If we are to demonstrate that leadership role then we must continue to extend ourselves beyond what is reasonable to show our generosity to the Third World.

I must say it is more than just being generous, it is also good economics. Let us face it, many of these countries will never be able to pay their debts, and our forgiveness of the debts of these countries is really an accommodation to reality. Now, as the 20th century closes, we have entirely new challenges on the horizon on a world scale, in particular the dramatic problems of the environment, the question of the greenhouse effect and the depletion of our forests and our natural resources particularly in the Third World.

In North America and developed countries we have belatedly realized, after a century or two of profligacy, that we have depleted the forests. Suddenly we are asking the developing world to recognize that the destruction of their forests and the deforestation of their lands and their agricultural practices in the past are slowly strangling this planet. How can we now impose upon them these additional requirements, along with the debt that they have acquired in simply trying to feed their peoples, and to keep their economies going in relationship to the demands which the industrial society places on all the world? How can we expect these countries to pay off these accumulated debts and also meet these new challenges which will require major structural changes in their economies and will require attitudes that they have not had the chance to develop.

It is a simple case of not only reasonable charity but it is a case of accepting the facts in a situation where these countries have enormous debts which they cannot conceivably pay off.

We have to face facts. This government has to face facts. We have to find ways of accommodating the reality that these countries face. I think Bill C-10 is a small step in the right direction. It will alleviate the debts to us that have been acquired by a number of African countries. Let me list some of them for the record. There is the Republic of Cameroon with which Canada has enjoyed good relationships over the years. By virtue of the its bilingual character and its federation form of government, we have forged many links with Cameroon. It is only fair that we should begin to extend the hand of friendship to this country.

Others are the Republic of the Congo, the Republic of the Ivory Coast, the Gabonese Republic, the Republic of Ghana, the Republic of Kenya, the Democratic Republic of Madagascar and the Republic of Nigeria, the Republic of Senegal, the Kingdom of Swaziland, the Republic of Zaire, the Republic of Zambia, the Republic of Zimbabwe. All these countries in Africa will need assistance from Canada in the future in order to bring their economies into some kind of order and to begin the long process of creating the foundations for prosperity that can be generated through these people.

We should not expect this to occur overnight. The societies in those countries are very different from our own. I can remember as a young student travelling to Africa, spending three months in Zambia and seeing that particular country struggle with trying to meet the demands of its people when it was dependent on one commodity, namely, copper. It had no links with the sea for all of its exports. It depended on rail links to the east and to the west, through Mozambique which was a colony of the Portuguese, and Angola to the west which was also a colony of the Portuguese at the time, or through what was then Rhodesia to South Africa. Zambia is entirely surrounded. It participated in the struggle, which we supported, in order to bring independence to what is now Zimbabwe.

It paid a heavy price for that long struggle which is not over yet. Of course, it accumulated debt, because as the price of copper fluctuated over the last 20 years in response to changes in world demand, which were not of Zambia's making, Zambia's economy had to absorb the shock and acquire the debt. Changes in demands in countries like Canada, the United States and Europe resulted in changes in the demand for this particular commodity. In order for Zambia to rely less on one commodity and to broaden the structure of its economy, it will require a long and difficult process of industrialization. This is a struggle which all African countries, not only Zambia, have to deal with.

At the same time there are pressures for democratization. There are pressures through contacts with countries like Canada for expanding human rights in those countries. We must take a leadership role in those areas as well. We must also realize that the societies are very different, that the pressures which they face are very different from the pressures that we faced when we were proceeding with our own industrialization many years ago.

My experience in Zambia gave me a concrete example of what those African countries, whose problems will be partially alleviated by this bill, have faced and will continue to face in the years ahead. The United Nations has been focusing on the particular problems of Africa. The problem of hunger is nowhere more severe than in the economies of Africa where the climate and where the political turmoil over the last 35 years through the process of decolonization. It has left the whole continent in a state of upheaval and has created wars, famines, droughts and numerous other problems which are far beyond the capacity of the people of those countries to meet.

I notice that the member for Rosedale is here today. He is well aware, through his experience in Ethiopia, of the situation with the famine that occurred there. I want to compliment him on the role that he played when he was Ambassador to Ethiopia. I am sure he can speak with rich personal experience of the obligation which we have as Canadians in meeting the unfortunate situation which continues to exist in Africa and in supporting the people of these countries in their struggle to improve their lot.

We must not think of this modest piece of debt relief which the government is providing to several countries in Africa as the end. It really is only a small beginning toward extending a hand and participating in the rehabilitation of these countries and allowing them to be full partners with us as we enter into the 21st century.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for bringing to the attention of this House some very important principles and some very important economic directions that this government should be following.

It has been, as he has noted, the tradition of governments of this country to assist those nations which are less developed than our own to achieve an economic development that will be self-sustaining, competitive and, as the hon. member has pointed out, to the advantage of all those industrialized and economically advanced nations.

He did mention one point that I think should be drawn to the attention to this House. That is, in the forgiving of these debts to sub-Saharan nations, we are not so much engaging in a charitable action, but doing something that is economically sound and also very good for our own nation and for western economies as well.

Will the hon. member direct his attention to the concern that some others have raised in other committees that many of these debts, while it appears that we are being generous, are really figments of an imagination inasmuch as they can no longer be paid off and inasmuch as the nations that have these debts are not in a position to satisfy the initial obligation?

By forgiving these debts and the payments thereof, we are not only helping their economy we, at least, are not raising the expectations of our own. Are we not directing our energies in a way that might be a little bit more productive thereby satisfying both a human need as well as an industrial and economic one.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): I would like to thank my hon. colleague for his comments and question. It is true that forgiving the debt is not an act of charity that goes against economic reasoning, but really a recognition of reality. We should not forget that the debts which many of these countries accumulated over the years is partly due to the expectations which were created in industrial countries like our own. We were quite free to lend money to these countries in order that they could buy our products and create a demand for our goods, of what to them are the luxuries of western society, the lure of western society which we, as industrial countries, have encouraged them over the years to pursue. We are just as much part of the situation as they are. Our forgiveness of their debt is really a recognition of our own involvement in the affair. Another aspect is that it is pretty hard for an individual to operate under the burden of a debt which he or she cannot conceivably begin to repay.

In a developing country, such as those in Africa, before its citizens can begin to deal with their daily and current requirements they must meet the imposed burden, this obligation, which has been imposed upon them from a previous generation or from outside.

The forgiveness of the debt merely allows these countries to start clearing the slate, to focus on current realities, and if we assist these countries in economic management which is realistic and which enables them to develop consistently and appropriately to their own circumstances, we will not restart this problem to which we, in part, have contributed.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this bill. I can only echo the words of the member who just spoke.

This bill, which is the forgiveness of debt for the sub-Saharan countries in Africa, is only a small step in the right direction as far as the alleviation of the debt burden on Third World countries is concerned. This action on the part of Canada is not going to cost the Government of Canada a penny. It has no real impact upon the tax collection. Much of the debt has been in place for a considerable length of time and was considered a soft debt when it was loaned in the first place. It has been gathering interest on our books and has been a controversial subject in the public accounts of Canada because it shows there as an asset which we never have expected to collect. It will not entail any appropriation on the part of the Canadian Parliament. It is a small step, with very little impact as far as Canada is concerned. It is money we loaned that we really never expected to get back.

Third World development and the survival of people in the Third World is a continuing problem. Servicing the debt, which I am almost tempted to say was imposed on many Third World countries, is the most debilitating of all on the development action of the Third World countries. It is very difficult, in fact in many cases impossible, for the Third World country to attempt to service the debt and move in the direction of a sustainable economy.

This bill forgives some of those debts, but the government has not continued in the direction of official development assistance. Instead of increasing the assistance it is giving to Third World countries, this government has reduced that assistance. This is what we all call talking out of both sides of our mouths.

The government, in its rhetoric, has been saying that it will do all these great things to help development in Third World countries of the world, but in actual fact it is cutting development funds.

The cuts in official development assistance mean that we are giving less aid to the debt strapped countries of Central Africa. We are giving less aid even as we suggest that we will no longer try to collect the debt. The forgiveness of these debts does not come anywhere near making up for the effect of cuts in assistance to these countries.

These cuts impact, as usual, on the people who can least afford them. The cut in ODA impacts on the people who have no political clout in most cases. They have no voice in the affairs of the world and are the most vulnerable to reductions in assistance. This runs almost directly counter to the Prime Minister's statement to the United Nations in September 1988, when he stated that Canada has reviewed its official development and the government would increase the quality and quantity of the help we will give.

Almost immediately after that the government proceeded with cuts in ODA. In front of the whole world the Prime Minister recommitted Canada to achieving an ODA of .7 per cent of the GNP by the year 2000, and then he immediately reversed his decision and reduced the amount of assistance we give. Obviously the government's rhetoric is just window dressing.

Our commitment of .7 per cent of the GNP by the year 2000 was pushed back by this government when it first came to power. It is unlikely, unless there is a real turnaround in the policy of the government, that we will even reach that goal. If the indications of the last five years of the Conservative government in Canada are correct, we may be lucky to reach this goal by the year 2040 instead of the year 2000. This means we are not trying to assist a large portion of the population of the world. We should be doing more about it.

Canada is in a unique situation. We are a member of the Commonwealth; we are a member of La Francophonie. We are well respected in the United States. We are part of the Group of 7 of industrialized nations of the world and a member now of the Security Council of the United Nations. These roles afford Canada an opportunity to make real differences on the international stage, but if we just speak and do not act, if our rhetoric is not followed up by action, we will quickly be recognized as being all mouth and no action.

The lofty statements made by the Prime Minister have not been followed by the action of the government in the last few years. It is not as if this were good for us because cutting aid jeopardizes Canada's long-term interests. It jeopardizes our interests in trade with the developing world. It jeopardizes our standing and our impact on the developing world in many ways other than economic.

For a short-term gain we are giving away a considerable amount of the impact that we could have had. This is a serious miscalculation on the part of Canada. We claim to be a generous nation, but we stand behind the Scandinavian countries, Holland, Belgium and France, and we are gradually working our way downward in the list of those countries that have been the most generous to the developing world. We are part of the western industrialized countries that seem to spend our time and efforts making sure that instead of allowing these countries to develop, by imposing and insisting on payment of debt—and this is why I say this bill is going in the right direction—we are moving toward making it impossible for Third World countries to grow, develop and become more self-sufficient.

Loans with the kind of interest that is being charged—and again we are working in the direction of reducing the interest on many of the loans—are very detrimental to the survival and the development of Third World countries. We do not have to go far to see the impact of loans that are impossible to pay.

Right now in western Canada in the farm communities there are thousands of farmers who have loans higher than they can possibly service and consequently are in exactly the same position as these Third World countries. If they continue to try to service them, they get further into debt. If they do not continue to service them, they lose their land. Luckily the Third World countries are not likely to be foreclosed on, but the impact of these foreign debts is so long term and so debilitating that it can have the same kind of effect that it does in the local situation of a farmer.

We in Canada are supporting the IMF World Bank position on all of these debts. The IMF has been suggesting to countries such as Venezuela, Mexico and the Philippines, you can name dozens of them, and the Third World countries about which we are talking about today, that they must do something about how their economies work. They must restructure their economies so that they can pay this debt, restructure the economies in such a way that the payment of the debt goes before services to the population, the health of the population, even the feeding of the population.

The people in the Philippines tell us that they cannot possibly pay the debt and grow economically. In fact, the imposed structure which requires higher taxes is keeping out investment in the Philippines because there is no way that people will invest in the Philippines as long as the taxes are high in order to pay these debts.

I am going to spend the last few moments on exactly what we should be doing regarding world debt. The only just resolution for the debt crisis in the world is the cancellation of the debt and the allowing of economies to become self-reliant. That way all countries of the world will benefit, the countries that are presently in debt and those countries that trade with them and work with them, because as so go these countries, so goes the world.

Partial debt relief is just not going to work. Even if you forgive half the debt today and leave the other half in place, under the world financial structure, within a few years the debt will be back up to the same size again and be just as debilitating as it was before. In the mean time all of the development funds in that country will have gone to alleviate the debt. Every one of these debts has been paid for at least once and some of them twice in interest paid to the countries that have lent the money in some cases. Some of them are not interest bearing for 50 years, but in those cases we did not expect to get the money back anyway.

In 1988 the IMF World Bank made a statement. Again, the World Bank and the IMF are great on declarations but very small on follow-up. They suggested back in 1988 that they recognized the need for the elimination of debt as quickly as possible. Then they turned around and immediately imposed restructuring, which made sure that there would be no development, on a number of countries that are so wallowing in debt that they are almost at the point of not surviving.

The World Council of Churches also made some comments about the direction that the world should go in alleviating the debt problem. It said:

> The only way a country can both avoid being restructured from the outside and achieve a responsible—in the sense of first and participatory—development dynamic—Self-reliance—is based on effective control by the people over their country's natural resources and production. Its central productive focus is not response to the external demand, but identifying and acting on internal potentialities to fulfil the peoples' most urgent needs.

That is a very direct quotation which says that what we need to do is to allow these countries to use all of their potential on development. The only way they can do that is if we cancel the debts, all the debts, against Third World countries and give them a chance to become full participants in the economy of the world.

Bill C-10 is a small step toward a solution that could, if it were carried on and if it became the policy of all of the industrial countries of the west, solve the problem. If we do not do it, all that is happening is an action, a little bit of show, which will not change the situation for the struggling people of the world and their attempts to survive.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, this bill does give Canadians and Parliament an opportunity to address what in many ways is perhaps one of the two most important issues on the globe's agenda today. The other is of course the issue of the environment.

Both issues are connected; that is, the issue of the imbalance in economic opportunities and economic development between the rich nations and the poor nations of the world. This bill does confirm a particular step that Canada is taking, but it opens up an opportunity for us to consider in a broader way what Canada is doing in the area of international development.

We can no longer afford to see the globe divided into nations and to look at our society as isolated from the world abroad. What is happening in sub-Sahara Africa is happening in our own neighbourhood and we must see that section of the globe as part of our own neighbourhood. A child who dies from hunger in the refugee camps in Malawi must be seen as much as our neighbour as a child who dies from an automobile accident on the Malahat on Vancouver Island. We have to be prepared to devote our community resources to make radical changes in how the world distributes its wealth and in how we look after the people who are part of our human family.

What is the record of the government? It proposes a bill of this kind, but let us look behind the bill at some of the actual program steps taken by the government. This government has cut official development assistance. It has cut by $56.5 million assistance to international financial institutions. The voluntary sector, NGOs, have been cut by $9.6 million; multilateral food aid, cut by $32 million; multilateral technical assistance, cut by $12.8 million; bilateral food aid, cut by $24.4 million; international humanitarian assistance, cut by $4.5 million; and geographic programs, cut by $130 million.

It is a disgrace to this Parliament; it is a disgrace to the people of this country that the government has chosen to tax the poorest in the world in an effort to deal with its own mismanagement of our financial affairs. At the same time that it is making these cuts, the government is cutting taxes to the corporate sector, cutting out a series of moves which make easier for the rich to have more and imposes these penalties on the poor in the world.

We have to change our priorities. We must see that the first on our national agenda must be those in the world who are most in need. We have opportunities in this country to provide leadership on an international scale, and it is important that we do so.

I would like to take the opportunity to refer to one particular program that this government and its predecessor has given some support to, and that is Canada World Youth. It seems to me that the government has failed to grasp in the approach that it has taken to Official Development Assistance that, by and large, the Canadian people are supportive of programs to redistribute the world's wealth and to have Canada provide leadership in international development. This is demonstrated, not only in surveys, but in the kind of commitment that Canadians have given to international development organizations; the active role that Canadians have played, for example, in organizations such as Oxfam Canada, the work that Canadians have done overseas through CUSO and CIDA.

One program in particular, I think, has provided a great base of support for a clearer understanding by Canadians of what is going on in the world. Canada World Youth was a program formed approximately 15 to 18 years ago. The inspiration for it came from Senator Jacques Hébert who used his considerable persuasive capacities to talk the Government of Canada into launching a program which has enabled thousands of young people from Canada and thousands of young people from Third World countries to work together and live together in communities both in Canada and the Third World.

Out of the experience these thousands of young people have had has come a far more realistic understanding of the reality of the world, great progress in terms of self-development for those who have participated in the program and a clearer understanding of Canada for thousands of young people in Third World countries, many of whom are already moving into positions of leadership in those countries.

Canada World Youth is a program which is funded primarily by CIDA. It is beginning to receive organizational financial assistance from other provincial governments and of course gets some funding from the private. Canada World Youth has a board of directors which is voluntary and has now an effective and experienced infrastructure to provide effective leadership in the development of the program in Canada and abroad. Each year, the program works by developing a particular protocol with a series of Third World countries and under the program young Canadians can apply to participate in a six-month program.

An equal number of young people from Third World countries are selected to participate in the program by their home countries. The young people are divided into groups, a fundamental unit of seven Canadians and seven from the exchange country. They are brought together under the standard program first to spend three months living and working in a Canadian community and that is followed by three months in a Third World community. It is for young people, generally those in the post high school age group ranging in age from 19 to 21 or 22 years, as I understand it. It has offered to young Canadians and young people from Third World countries a very distinctive experience.

I was very fortunate myself to be able to participate for a few years on the board of directors of Canada World Youth. I was actually encouraged to do that by the fact that our daughter was in the program in 1979 and spent three months in Indonesia. As a result of that, she found an interest in southeast Asia and in the Pacific which has had a major beneficial effect on her life. I know from my direct connection with other young people who participated in Canada World Youth that it is an outstanding program and one which deserves the full support of Canadians.

We live in a time when we are under great pressures, but we also live in a time when in a unique way the world is close to us. The power and impact of television brings to our homes every night the reality of what is going on in South Africa, the situation in Mozambique, the difficulties that Namibia is having as it struggles toward self-government, the tremendous problems being experienced in sub-Sahara Africa, these issues are brought daily into our lives. As a result of that, this bill has the support of the Canadian people even at a time when the government is trying to persuade the country that it is obliged to make cuts in social programs and in programs such as this one.

These issues present dramatic opportunities for Canadians to participate in terms of service and with great hope for the future. I commend this bill to the House and I urge its adoption.

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Victoria on some of his remarks. I think his presence here is a reminder of the distinguished service his father gave for many years when he represented the Greenwood riding in Toronto.

Specifically I would like the member to acknowledge, if he would, that while he said many good things about Canada World Youth, surely the substance of this bill is an important step for this government to take, not only in its own right but with respect to dealing with the essential issue of the debt.

I have listened to a number of speakers this morning expressing concern about recent reductions in our ODA, not cuts as referred to but reductions from the targets that were originally set. Like many members I regret that those reductions have taken place. However, it is important to acknowledge that for some years now this government and its predecessors have led the way internationally in trying to take a more positive approach to the self-development that must take place in many of the countries referred to.

In particular the initiatives taken in 1986 which are now being acknowledged in this legislation with respect to the removal of some of the debt held by Canada for these sub-Saharan African countries are critically important. There is no issue that affects the developing countries of Africa more than the enormous burden of debt accumulated in the late seventies and early eighties.

By coincidence, next Friday, I will be sitting in Ethiopia having discussions on this matter with the leadership of the Economic Commission for Africa. In two weeks time we will be receiving a visit from the executive secretary of the economic commission for Africa who will meet with our Minister of Finance, with the Standing Committee on External Affairs, with the committee of finance, with voluntary groups, with African ambassadors and with those taking an active interest in Africa in order that we can have a full understanding of the important and destructive economic pressures which this massive debt has put on the people and the countries of Africa.

I think the leadership taken in this legislation is one that we should be willing to acknowledge while recognizing some of the other problems that have already been indicated.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his kind words and the reference to my father. I know he and my father shared many perilous journeys together flying into Biafra in the dark of night with shells flying around them and even joining together to write a book which came out a few weeks late, as I recall, but still has a place on our family shelf if not the shelves of anyone else.

I am prepared to acknowledge that this bill does a little something. However, this is not even half a loaf; this is probably one slice off the far end of the loaf.

After this bill is adopted the fundamental problems still remain and remain largely untouched by the government. It has barely maintained the programs which it inherited and in fact has not provided the leadership which this area so desperately needs.

Even after this bill is passed Nigeria will have an external debt of $28 billion. This bill merely forgives loans that were interest free for a term of up to 50 years. Just think of the refugee camps in Malawi as a result of the war going on in Mozambique, over which the member and others on his side of the House including the member from Waterloo have provided leadership and assistance.

The fact remains that there is a tremendous job to do. The international financial institutions need complete restructuring so those who live in the Third World and particularly in the sub-Sahara have a real voice in the decisions made at the international economic level. We need a radical restructuring of the world's economic institutions not only for the benefit of the people in sub-Sahara Africa who are our neighbours but for our own long-term economic benefit and as a key step in the move to save the planet's environment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 35 the House will now proceed to Statements by Members under Standing Order 31.

FISHERIES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Premier Clyde Wells released a report on the difficulties of the fishing industry of Newfoundland and Labrador, an emerging crisis which has already been recognized by this government with the establishment of the Harris task force and a special cabinet committee.

Mr. Wells is right to be concerned about the situation. However, to propose solutions which would simply compound the burden and pass the problem to a Nova Scotian economy already facing difficulties is simply un-Canadian. What makes Canada work is our ability to achieve consensus and to share. This is how our Prime Minister was able to bring together ten premiers and the Government of Canada at Meech Lake.

If Mr. Wells wants all the fish off Newfoundland shores to remain in Newfoundland, does he also want all Ontario tax dollars to remain in Ontario and not be transferred to Newfoundlanders through equalization, regional development or UI payments?

RCMP DRESS CODE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the RCMP has a long tradition of tolerance and understanding for the many cultures and racial groups that make up Canada. The uniform of this proud police force has evolved and changed over the years in response to new conditions. It is now appropriate that the RCMP accommodate religious groups such as Sikhs by allowing them to wear turbans as required by their faith. People of the Sikh faith should be fully represented on our national police force.

I regret greatly that members of this House are not only supporters but leaders in the attempt to prevent the modification of the RCMP dress code that would permit the entry of Sikh officers. The RCMP cannot be frozen in time. Canada is an evolving multi-ethnic community and the RCMP should fully represent this.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, dairy farmers across Canada are extremely concerned about their future. The recent GATT ruling on ice cream and yogurt threatens the very heart of the supply-management system in Canada.

In Prince Edward Island the dairy industry makes up approximately 15 per cent of the agricultural sector. There, 524 milk producers and 147 cream producers are asking questions about their future.

Across this country our farmers are wondering what is next on the chopping block as a result of this trade agreement with the United States. I urge this government to take immediate action in this crucial matter. It is essential that the dairy industry in Canada be protected.

HON. JOHN WISE

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, on September 16, over 1200 people gathered to pay tribute to the Hon. John Wise, our former minister of agriculture, for his dedication to his constituents and to the agricultural industry of Canada. John spent 16 years in this House, both as an opposition member and a minister of the Cabinet. As a member of Parliament for Elgin he ably represented the interests and concerns of his riding. As the minister of agriculture he worked to ensure that the farmers' concerns were recognized by the greater society.

I have known the former member for Elgin all my life and I can attest to his commitment to the current government's policies. It has been inferred in this House that the former member did not seek re-election because he was afraid of what might happen to supply marketing systems. This simply is not so. John Wise knew he could retire with a peaceful mind. He knew that supply-management would not be threatened by the free trade agreement. He knew Canadian farmers could and would take advantage of the challenges and opportunities afforded by this historic treaty.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it is scandalous that the Soviet police would attack and kill innocent civilians who had gathered peacefully simply to celebrate the founding of their city of Lviv.

On October 1, citizens of that western Ukrainian city were suddenly harassed by the Soviet police. When they protested their harassment, the police viciously attacked them at the the militia headquarters leaving three dead and at least 20 people badly injured. Clearly the citizens were denied their basic human rights. As Canadians we are naturally appalled by these actions. I therefore urge the Canadian government to protest this brutal violence against unarmed and peaceful citizens. I also ask the Canadian government to take steps to ensure that such police brutality is not repeated.

I ask the Prime Minister to take up the legitimate cause of Ukrainians in Ukraine with Mr. Gorbachev during the Prime Minister's visit scheduled to take place in the Soviet Union next month.

CHILD CARE

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, October 4, I attended the official opening of the Cliffwood Child Care Centre in my riding, yet another non-profit co-operative centre set up through the joint efforts of parents and the North York Board of Education.

The Hon. Elinor Caplan, MLA for Oriole; Joan King, metro councillor; principal Madam Andree Notage and vice-principal Madam Dorothy Mauror were in attendance. We assisted trustee Dan Hicks and the president of the child care centre, Allan Tweyman, in officially opening the centre.

This community is composed of Canadians of primarily Jewish, Chinese and East Indian heritage. The community then sang a song in French and English. Congratulations to Cliffwood community, a truly equal opportunity, a multicultural and bilingual Canadian community that looks after its children.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Legislative Committee on Unemployment Insurance held hearings in 13 cities across Canada. It was given two hours with the minister, a day with the deputy and his staff, and one day for clause-by-clause examination of amendments to one of the most complex pieces of legislation that this House is responsible for. Yesterday we were only able to thoroughly and seriously discuss three clauses out of 57 amending clauses.

We have a situation where this government is opting out of unemployment insurance financially and increasing the premium rates, and while the money rolls in, the government is paying absolutely no attention to the employers and the workers, those who are forced to pay. Yet the government still pulls the string.

It appears that we are trading one railroad in this country for the Tory railroading of the UI committee.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, recently in Fort Saskatchewan, the Government of Canada, along with the Government of Alberta and Sherritt Gordon, announced plans to establish the first major advanced industrial materials initiative for western Canada. The new organization, WESTAIM,is structured to assure widespread participation from universities, industries and other research organizations.

WESTAIM will be an international leader in advanced industrial materials research and development. The over-all objective of WESTAIM is to commercialize the results of applied research and development undertaken on a market-driven industry.

Advanced industrial materials are recognized as an integral part of long-term growth and diversification. The project provides the opportunity to put western Canada at the cutting edge of new technology.

Sherritt Gordon has finalized plans to move its head office from Toronto to Edmonton. The participation of the federal government in this innovative project demonstrates its strong commitment not only to research and technology but also to building a stronger economy in western Canada.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, this irresponsible and shameful government has just committed another one of its worst decisions that will hurt all regions of Canada by cutting passenger rail service by over 50 per cent.

In Ottawa alone, weekday service to Toronto has been butchered by 25 per cent while the Montreal route will be cut by 20 per cent. The breathtaking panoramic route of the Canadian from Ottawa to Vancouver will be eliminated for a more expensive one going through the ridings of Conservative MPs.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport is completely off track. It is clear the Tories could not care less about senior citizens, the disabled and young people who travel by train from coast to coast. What is going to happen to small rural municipalities for whom trains are a vital link with urban areas?

The Minister of Transport will go down in history as one of Confederation's executioners because of a decision that proves that to the Tories, cutbacks are more important than common sense.

The next cuts will be made by Canadians themselves, when they get rid of the Conservative Government and invest in their future with a Liberal government.

CHILD CARE

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the House and the people of Atlantic Canada of a recent announcement by the Minister of Health and Welfare to provide funding over a period of 31 months to the Froebel Institute for Early Childhood Education.

This project is designed to permit the Froebel Institute to organize a circulating portable library which will enable them to provide a comprehensive collection of reference materials to assist in the presentation of childhood development services throughout the Atlantic provinces.

We appreciate this indication of continued commitment by the government to child care funding and I would personally like to commend the minister for his far-sighted approach in approving this application. I certainly congratulate Dr. Jane Norman for her tremendous enthusiasm and initiative which has resulted in her many contributions in the field of childhood education.

SPACE AGENCY

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, while Canadians largely support this government's venture into space science research through the development of a Canadian space agency, there is legitimate concern that such a venture be used for non-military and peaceful purposes only.

The Minister of State has recently acknowledged that the bill to establish the space agency, Bill C-16, does not preclude its involvement in military pursuits. The term "peaceful purposes" may well be interpreted as non-aggressive military use such as satellite surveillance or the development and testing of space-based weapons systems.

The minister must assure this House and the Canadian people that the proposed space agency will not become a tool for military pursuits. Canada must not be drawn into the conquest of space as a military frontier, a concept that has captured the imagination of our neighbour to the south.

FREE TRADE

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): In reference to the statement made by the hon. member for Erie on October 3 about the effects of free trade on the Niagara Corridor, I would like to remind him and the House that hundreds of grape growers have had to tear up thousands of acres of prime farm land because of the Mulroney free trade deal.

The auto workers' plight in and around my riding is going to get worsè in the next little while because of the Mexican free enterprise zone along the U.S. border, the Maquiladora zone, which provides big business with non-unionized workers to labour in factories. These workers are paid $8 a day Canadian to work in an environment which has limited safety factors.

I would like to remind the hon. member and the House that as late as last week I received a substantial number of letters from our local merchants who reported a decrease in their sales because Canadians do their shopping across the river in the United States.

I would also like to remind him of a recent article that appeared in a Buffalo, New York newspaper which refers to their ever-booming business due to the free trade agreement and the fact that they have prospered with the Canadian businesses which have settled across the border.

The tremendous opportunities to which the hon. member has referred are for the Americans, not the Canadians.

THANKSGIVING

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake):r. Mr. Speaker, next Monday Canadians will be celebrating the traditional Thanksgiving holiday. Families and friends will be getting together to feast from this year's abundant harvest. They can give thanks that in Canada we do not suffer from production shortages and long line-ups to obtain the basic necessities of life.

Events around the world that have occurred since last Thanksgiving should cause Canadians to give extra thanks this year. A freedom rally in Tiananmen Square saw young protesters slaughtered. Even today thousands of East Germans flee their nation for a new freedom which we sometimes take for granted. Starvation and civil war in some African countries continues at an alarming rate.

Yes, Canadians have much to be grateful for and Canadians should assist those less fortunate so they can some day enjoy the same prosperity as we have. Have a happy Thanksgiving!

THANKSGIVING

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, this weekend most of us will have an opportunity to share with our families and friends a very important day, a day to acknowledge and be thankful for the riches we enjoy each and every day. These riches include the comfort of our families and our friends, our health, our livelihoods and this great nation we call home.

Our families are the cornerstone of our lives. They are there during the good times and the bad. They provide our strength and our vitality. We must never forget the contribution they make. It is appropriate, therefore, that Thanksgiving weekend should coincide with National Family Week.

Nor must we take for granted our country. Canada is a great nation filled with abundant resources and unlimited opportunities, a nation envied and respected by other countries of the world.

We have a great deal to be grateful for. I want to take this opportunity to wish you, my colleagues, our staff and our families a very special Thanksgiving Day.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

APPOINTMENT OF GOVERNOR GENERAL

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise to inform the House that Her Majesty the Queen has graciously approved the appointment, upon my recommendation, of the Hon. Raymon Hnatyshyn as the next Governor General of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: The installation will take place early in the new year and those who joined in the standing ovation will be invited. There will be a special leveé for the rest of you.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Hon. members need no introduction to Mr. Hnatyshyn who served in this House for over 14 years and as a Minister of the Crown for over five. Born in Saskatoon, Mr. Hnatyshyn is the son of a distinguished senator who himself was a symbol of the courage that developed the great heartland of western Canada. Both Mr. Hnatyshyn and his wife Gerda are representative of the cultural strength and diversity of Canada; he, born of proud Ukrainian stock and she, the daughter of Danish immigrants.

Mr. Hnatyshyn is known to all Canadians as a man of great warmth, civility and personal integrity.

Mr. Hnatyshyn, who was first elected as a member of this House in 1974, studied at the University of Saskatchewan and, after becoming a lawyer, was appointed Queen's Counsel in 1973.

This House will also recall his distinguished career as Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in 1979, then later as Government House Leader and Chairman of the Privy Council before becoming Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada.

[English]

As leader of the government in the House of Commons, Mr. Hnatyshyn clearly earned the respect and trust of all members of this House. He has, I think, truly been one of the effective parliamentarians of his time and one known to all members of this House as a gentleman who conducted himself with genuine courtesy toward others and good humour in his dealings with us all.

During the debate on official languages, our former colleague, the architect of the bill, reaffirmed his personnel commitment to both official languages, and I quote:

> "This Bill reflects the open-mindedness and tolerance of Canadians in matters of language and culture. This generosity of Canadians toward each is one of the most endearing features of our national identity."

In recommending passage of the bill, he added:

> This Bill is about fairness. This Bill is about equity of treatment of our fellow Canadians. This Bill is about the way in which we treat. . .

Of course, as Minister of Justice, Mr. Hnatyshyn played a key role in the Meech Lake Accord negotiations which seeks to bring back the province of Quebec into the Canadian constitutional family.

Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary to remind members of both the constitutional and symbolic importance of the position of Governor General.

• (1120)

[English]

In recommending this appointment to Her Majesty, I was conscious of the personal dignity, the vast experience and the profound understanding of this nation and its institutions that is required of all those chosen to hold this high office. I know members from all corners of this chamber and all political parties will agree that Mr. Hnatyshyn will more than meet the expectations of Canadians in this regard.

He will bring to this vital institution, I think, a generous vision and an impressive dedication that will complement that of his distinguished predecessors, all of whom have served Canada so well.

[Translation]

I also take this opportunity to pay tribute, on behalf of all Canadians, to Jeanne Sauvé and her husband Maurice who performed their role with great distinction and dignity and whom we shall always remember very warmly.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues, I wish to extend our congratulations and best wishes to Ray Hnatyshyn on his appointment to the position of Governor General of Canada.

[English]

Ray Hnatyshyn is a respected scholar, lawyer and parliamentarian. He is a man who has worked his way to the top in all of his callings. To a lawyer, what greater honour can come than to be Attorney General of Canada; to a parliamentarian, what greater task is there than that of the leader of the government in the House of Commons; to a Canadian patriot and statesman, what greater distinction could come than to be called upon to serve as Governor General?

Canadians of Ukrainian origin, and all Canadians in fact, will be especially pleased with Mr. Hnatyshyn's appointment. He grew up steeped in his cultural heritage and he has always been a proud and effective example of what that community has contributed to Canada. But above all, Ray Hnatyshyn has been a proud Canadian.

Mr. Speaker, those of us who worked with Mr. Hnatyshyn know him as a warm and generous man who is very committed to the cause of human dignity.

We believe that he and his family will be worthy successors to Mrs. Sauvé and her family, whom we also wish, at this opportunity, to congratulate and thank for their excellent work.

[English]

Once again, our congratulations and best wishes to Ray Hnatyshyn.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues, I rise to compliment the Government of Canada and the Prime Minister on an extremely wise selection and recommendation of the Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn as our next Governor General.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent I say to the Prime Minister, Your Honour, in passing, he observed that those who were standing at the time of his announcement would be invited to the inaugural dinner, and I want to assure him that those of us who were not standing at that time in my section of the House were not in any way doing so out of the slightest disagreement. We were discussing Question Period strategy at the time as the Prime Minister, I think, will well understand. We look forward, therefore, to being invited to that dinner.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The man who is about to assume this extremely important position in our parliamentary democracy has served his country well in his home province of Saskatchewan and beyond. He has been a minister of the Crown holding a number of important responsibilities; Minister of Energy, Minister of State for Science and Technology, government House leader, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Justice.

His government House leader experience ought to have normally been sufficient to annoy all members on this side of the House but, quite to the contrary, he handled that in a tough-minded way, as he is supposed to, but with a congeniality and affability of manner that earned warm respect, if at times partisan antagonism, from this side of the House.

He has, as has already been indicated, Your Honour, always had a broad view of this country. He grew up on the prairies but, like politicians of all parties who in one sense, if I can put it this way, rise to the occasion, he developed a broad sense of what Canada is all about without losing in the slightest his own deep commitment to the region in which he grew up.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Ray Hnatyshyn is a western Canadian whose ancestors are neither French nor English; that is, he represents an important dimension of our people. Mr. Hnatyshyn has a warm personality, a desirable quality for a Governor General.

[English]

His openness and his warmth will bring a human touch to a dignified position. We wish him well.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Yesterday the minister was booed in Quebec. His proposal to invite young Canadians to Canada's parks to discuss the environment is utterly hypocritical. Young people know very well that the Conservative policy on the environment is a fraud. Why does the minister claim that the environment is his priority when the cuts to VIA Rail were made without regard to environmental considerations?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Hamilton East should go to Quebec from time to time to realize that Quebecers are very polite, very courteous and very eager to talk about the environment. Yesterday I had the opportunity in one of Quebec's largest junior colleges, a CEGEP with 7,000 students, to meet a group of students interested in the environment. I wanted to tell them about the policies we are preparing for the whole country over the next five years. The reception was extremely courteous. I ask the Hon. Member to check with those who were there to see that we had an extremely interesting discussion which is very promising for the future. Young Canadians and young Quebecers want to take an interest in the environment and will not allow partisanship to interfere with a noble cause so fundamental to the country's future.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, the Minister is very good at making promises, but he does not deliver the goods; he did not deliver on VIA Rail.

Mr. Gauthier: Which will cost dearly, besides.

Ms. Copps: My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

[English]

During the election the Prime Minister stated in Hamilton, and I quote:

> In considering any development, any project and any program, we will make its environmental consequences as fundamental a test as we now apply to its economic feasibility.

Why did he say that when the VIA cuts show clearly he did not mean it? Why did the Prime Minister say yes to VIA cuts and no to the environment?

• (1130)

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I told the Hon. Member for Hamilton East several times that we have environmental legislation, that in general the Conservative Government respects the law, and that as part of the process to set up a new VIA Rail network, we conducted the necessary preliminary studies to determine the environmental impact of the new route network. Transport Department officials, in cooperation with those from the Environment Department, came to the conclusion that the environmental impact of the new network would be negligible and for that reason, it was not necessary to pursue environmental studies further. I even said that we would produce a document confirming these statements in the coming days.

So I ask the hon. member, instead of playing politics with the environment, to respect the law and look at the relevant documents which will prove to her that we did what we had to do.

[English]

Ms. Copps: My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. I expect an answer—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Copps: —because it was the Prime Minister who made all the promises about the environment.

The government's own cabinet document, which I assume the Prime Minister has read, states quite clearly that the decision to cut VIA will result in an increase in car travel, and an increase in the burning of fossil fuels. That cut in VIA will mean more acid rain and greater greenhouse effects.

On the eve of the American decision to cut acid rain, why is the Prime Minister approving the cut in VIA Rail which will actually result in an increase in acid rain in Canada and an increase in greenhouse gases? How can he do that with a straight face?

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-St-Jean): Mr. Speaker, this is a misrepresentation of the facts. The facts are quite clear. The environmental impact of this decision will be negligible.

The study conducted in Transport Canada has been reviewed by my officials. They completely and strongly agree with the conclusions drawn by the Transport Canada authorities.

There is no way that Canadians will believe that this decision is bad for the environment. Actually, it is very good for the environment because it will provide Canada with a way to devote more money to environment and to wipe out the deficit.

There is no way that Canadians will believe that it is better for the environment to go around the country with empty trains instead of putting people in buses. Experiments on buses have demonstrated that they are much more environmentally sound than trains.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. First of all, I want to tell the Minister of the Environment that there are no empty trains in the west.

One hundred and ten years ago Canadians built the train service from Toronto to Calgary so they could travel through Canada. They were tired of taking ox carts from the states. We have right now taken a giant step backward. If you want to take a train from Toronto to Calgary, you have to go through Chicago, Minneapolis, Minot, Grand Forks, and to Montana and then three days later you get on a bus and go to Calgary.

Given that we are actually financing the Amtrak expansion, does the Minister think we have to provide them with the passengers too?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my friend is from Manitoba in western Canada. I would like to give the member some ridership occupancy rates in Manitoba. For Wabowden–Churchill it is 7 per cent. We have Winnipeg—Capreol at 22 per cent.

Mr. Boudria: Capreol is in Ontario, not western Canada.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): I would be delighted to say that there is no occupancy rate over 60 per cent except one, which is the Transcontinental, and we consider everybody who stops at every station.

The decision is very sound. It corresponds with what Canadians want. They want a national network. We have a national network.

Canadians know that this country has to live with affordable expenditures. Increasingly, Canadians are accepting that we manage the country with a network that, once again, is national, sustainable, and affordable. You will increasingly be seeing this government use good management of money for Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, as the minister knows, Winnipeg is in Manitoba but Capreol is a thousand miles away in northern Ontario.

My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. When a deal was struck between Canada and British Columbia in 1871 the federal government agreed in the Constitution to provide and maintain rail services to and within British Columbia. The people of British Columbia want to know if there is no constitutional guarantee for rail passenger services exactly what this guarantee means in the Constitution.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, that matter was raised in the House yesterday. I am advised that the Government has been served today. Under those circumstances, it is not appropriate for us to fight the case in the House of Commons. We will have to deal with that matter in court.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment who had the nerve to get up and say that this decision about VIA would have a net positive impact on the environment.

The Minister of Transport, at least in the page he put out on Wednesday, acknowledged that there are going to be a million additional car trips as a result of this decision. I leave it to the Minister of Environment to understand the impact of that on the environment, and then for him to say it will be positive.

The minister said to me in the House on Tuesday, when I asked him about an environmental study, the following: "The guidelines provide the government with the obligation to conduct an initial study and then for the responsible minister from the initiating department to make a decision". Then he went on to say to me on Tuesday that when the decision was announced, i.e. on Wednesday, the responsible minister would then produce the study on the environmental impact.

We have waited for 48 hours. Where is the study?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): I said Wednesday, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat today that this document will be available in the coming days. The coming days could be today, Monday or Tuesday. But the member has nothing to be worried about. He will get the study and then he will see that we were right.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, we all know that the minister and his officials are going to have a busy weekend.

We checked with VIA this morning. It may be of interest for the minister to know that VIA officials said this morning that they know nothing about such a study. They did not participate in such a study. In fact, they said that the only thing they know about is what the minister said in the House.

I want to ask the minister how the people of Canada can take seriously a claim that environmental considerations were seriously undertaken when the people directly involved, namely, VIA Rail, said they weren't even consulted on it.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the NDP should know that VIA Rail is a corporation, it is not a person. In the government it is a person—the Minister of Transport—who is responsible for the preliminary study. I am the Minister of Transport. I did the study. I concluded that we do not need any other studies.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, it is truly amazing that the minister did the study locked away in his closet and did not consult VIA Rail, the people presumably who know something about laying down tracks, cars, and so on. They were not consulted, and the minister says that he did the study. God protect us! That's all I can say if he did it on his own.

But if the Minister did that wonderful study, where is it? He said that he did the study. Why is it not here for Hon. Members to look at before the weekend? The study is done. Where is it?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I just said, and I repeat, that the study will be produced in the coming days and that it will prove we were right. That being said, I also stated just now that the Minister is responsible for making the decision. That is what we did. I did not say that we did not consult or that officials of any level within VIA Rail were not given an opportunity to give their opinions—that is very obvious—in cooperation with the officials of my colleague in the Environment Department. The decision was made by the Minister of Transport. The documents will be produced and, again, the Leader of the New Democratic Party will rest easy because he will realize that the studies were well done and obviously came to the conclusion that I told him before.

• (1140)

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Transport, who just last week said she would not comment on leaked documents concerning VIA Rail, my question is to the Minister of Transport.

According to a government document—and we are speaking of studies here—"Canadians already are confronted with airport and highway congestion, particularly at Pearson International Airport and on the highways around Toronto and in southwestern Ontario. Population and travel growth will result in even greater congestion".

How can the Minister of Transport support cuts to VIA Rail—in the Hamilton–Toronto–Niagara route alone of one-third, not to mention the rest of southwestern Ontario—which will result in even further congestion on already clogged highways in southern and southwestern Ontario? How can he support these cuts?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Very simply, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that you will understand if I tell you, first, I do not know about the document because it has not been tabled. But the occupancy rate between Toronto and Niagara Falls is 46 per cent. We did not stop the train between Niagara Falls and Toronto. We maintained the train. But if the occupancy rate is at 70 to 75 per cent, we will serve the same number of people. It is mathematically understandable.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Travellers to the nation's capital, both business and tourist, are faced with dreadful road networks and poor air service. They often have chosen to come to the nation's capital by rail.

Ottawa will be severely disadvantaged through the axing of The Canadian and the reduction of the Montreal–Ottawa route from five to two runs. There will be no rail service in Ottawa after 5 p.m.

Why would the Prime Minister of Canada again savage the capital of this nation?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised because Ottawa is probably one of the best served cities in Canada in terms of rail. I am sure that many people who hear what you are saying today will be very surprised.

Once again, the same argument as for my friend from Hamilton applies. For example, the occupancy rate between Toronto and Ottawa is about 50 per cent. If we increase the occupancy rate I believe we will do two very important things. We will serve Canadians from Ottawa to Toronto, and we will save money. It is important on this side of the House to save money.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, Cornwall has suffered two serious blows in two days. My first question is for the Minister of Transport.

I previously asked the Minister of State for Transport in the House if she would guarantee that the two overnight trains between Toronto and Montreal which stop in Cornwall would not be rerouted. The minister later wrote to me stating, "There will be no diminution of the service to Cornwall".

How are my constituents to be served now that these very same overnight trains have been cut? This minister's words are not worth the paper they are written on. Why have my constituents been misled?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I said before. The decision was made in a national perspective. We had to consider our capacity to pay for the services we have.

I think Canadians increasingly will understand that we have this national network, which you said so many times that we should keep. It is there. But, once again, I think my friend understands in the bottom of his heart that we have to protect the finances of this country, too. He knows very well that he lives in a region where there are many other modes of transportation for citizens.

To permit all Canadians from Halifax to Vancouver to have different modes of transportation, but particularly the train where people do not have any other mode of transportation, is the basis of the decision that we made. Canadians want a transportation system that is the best, affordable, but also the most accessible for all Canadians.

Mr. Kilger: Mr. Speaker, the people of Stormont—Dundas, like all Canadians, want, above all, one thing—consistency. If you say one thing, do it.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): There is a great deal of humour to the second part of this question also.

The closing of the Courtaulds film plant puts 240 employees out of work. Many of these are older workers for whom finding new jobs will be difficult. Some have young families to support.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister what his government, the very government which is slashing UI benefits, is going to do to help these workers. The people of Cornwall have little to be thankful for on this holiday weekend.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very proud to say that the unemployment rate in this country today is 7.3 per cent. Of course, this government has worked hard for five years. I understand, Mr. Speaker, it was a dream five years ago. It is a reality today.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkey Valley): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Transport made his announcement on Wednesday to continue VIA service on eight remote routes he only delayed the executioner's axe. The government has said that it will be reviewing the transportation needs of these remote communities.

I want to ask the minister for details on this review. Who specifically will be conducting the review? When will it be done? I ask him to assure this House that he will hold full public meetings with city councils, chambers of commerce and workers on those routes so that these remote runs also do not get slashed.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, what I said Wednesday about the remote routes is that we will examine the cost and the service we provide on these routes because they represent $50 million for Canada, which is very expensive.

At the same time we said that along parts of those routes there are people who do not have any other mode of transportation. Transport Canada, on the day of the announcement, started an examination of all these routes.

I did not say at that time that we will abandon those routes. I said we will look at the possibility of providing other modes of transportation which will permit a decrease of the high level of costs of those routes. This is the process that will be followed. I can guarantee that people who do not have any other mode of transportation will be served, if not by rail, then by another mode of transportation which will satisfy them.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, using the Minister of Transport's own definition, the remote and truly isolated Canadian VIA line communities of Revelstoke, Golden and Field, with no airports for hundreds of kilometres and whose roads are regularly cut during long winter months by the heaviest snowfalls and avalanche closures in Canada, have now been truly abandoned by the minister's announcement. This is in spite of the fact that his own statistics show that this VIA line compares favourably in ridership, per passenger subsidy, cost recovery and occupancy with every other major western route.

How can the minister justify this blatant discrimination? If he cannot, will he now agree to postpone and review his total abandonment of these communities along the Kamloops–Calgary corridor?

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we have no other reliable means of transportation in winter. Is he going to supply us all with snowshoes or with cross-country skis so we can go first-class, because that is the only way out that we will have?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I already said concerning the transcontinental route for western Canada that the decision has been made in light of the fact that the capacity of population base was 12 per cent more on the northern route. On the southern route there are other modes of transportation available. Otherwise, it would be considered a remote area and we would provide the service. If there is anything which does not correspond to the definition I gave my friend, he should get in touch with the department. We will consider what he is talking about. If there is anything which does not correspond to the criteria that we considered when we made the decision, it will be a pleasure for us to discuss it with the member of Parliament.

FISHERIES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his capacity as chairman of the special committee on the Atlantic fishery.

Yesterday, displaying a remarkable degree of insularity, an abysmal knowledge of history and an utter disregard for the rights and interests of Atlantic Canadians, other than Newfoundlanders, Premier Clyde Wells called for all fish caught off Newfoundland and Labrador to be processed in Newfoundland, thereby ignoring 400 years of history.

Can the minister assure the House and the fishermen and plant workers of Nova Scotia who are dependent upon that fishery for their livelihood that one option that will not be considered by the special committee, or by the Government of Canada, is any diminution of the historic participation of Nova Scotians in the harvesting and processing of Canada's northern fish resources?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member and members of the House that the Government of Canada is not considering any move away from the traditional shares of the stock between Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

As the hon. member knows, the problems that we are facing have an impact upon both Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. As we consider solutions to this problem, we will take into full account the interests of each province and the traditions that are in play.

I should take the opportunity to say that we have noted the report published by Premier Wells of Newfoundland. We think it would have been helpful for him to wait for the publication of the Harris report and the completion of the task forces that were put in place by both the federal and the provincial governments. We think that there is a misleading implication given in the very name of his report in which he talks about a resource crisis.

In addition to the problem of the resource, there are also problems relating to the structural policy and economic policy that have to be considered in coming to any long-term solution.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I wanted to put it to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, but in his absence I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he would respond.

On Monday, the Minister of Fisheries told us that fishermen in Atlantic Canada were having quite a prosperous year, thank you very much. I wonder now whether the Prime Minister would admit that at the very time that his Minister of Fisheries was making that statement he, the Prime Minister and the government, were sitting on a report and had been sitting on it for a full two months from the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador which documents very graphically the frightful dimensions of the unfolding disaster—catastrophe—in the Newfoundland fishery.

Will the Prime Minister now acknowledge that the Newfoundland fishery is indeed on the verge of collapse? Will he now maybe bare his soul a bit and admit that he must assume the lion's share of the blame for this full-blown crisis in the fishery in Newfoundland?

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, in response to my hon. friend's question, there is no minister in this government that is more concerned and who cares more about the Atlantic fishermen than the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, as the minister pointed out, in many parts of Atlantic Canada there has been a good fishery. But he has also acknowledged in exactly the same statement that it is not as abundant as perhaps it has been in the past.

This government has proceeded through a series of measures including the appointment of the Harris panel, the task force of officials and, obviously, by the very senior committee of cabinet minister to deal with the problem that the premier has rightly laid out.

The premier's report, and the premier acknowledged this many times, is based on a series of assumptions and a series of numbers that may prove not to be correct.

Mr. Simmons: I thought better of the gentleman from St. John's East. If that was not so sad I would laugh at him. If that is an attempt, it must be an attempt at wit, in which case, he is about half way there.

The jurisdiction in the matter of fish quotas and landings is, of course, entirely federal. Yet the Newfoundland Premier yesterday made a generous offer to cost share an emergency comprehensive response program to deal with this issue.

Is the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, despite his abysmal ignorance of this subject as he displayed here Monday, now prepared to admit that a special comprehensive response program is necessary to address this situation, particularly in relation to Newfoundland?

Is he willing to co-operate with the Government of Newfoundland which has made this offer to cost share so that unnecessary hardship can be headed off?

If the gentleman from St. John's East is going to answer this, let him remember that his constituents are watching. Don't make a fool of yourself like you did the first time.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, if I may quote verbatim from the Premier's press conference yesterday: "I am pleased to note that the federal government has also seized of the seriousness of this problem as evidenced by the appointment of the Harris panel in the first instance and the creation of a special federal cabinet committee chaired by the Right Hon. Joe Clark, and the appointment of task force officials."

There is no question that this government through its cabinet committee and through its task force of officials has and will continue to work not only with the provincial government, fishermen, fishermen's unions, companies, business associations and community groups to deal with this problem in a realistic, serious way.

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Unlike what is being said here in the House, there is a genuine crisis in the Atlantic fisheries industry, and the situation is steadily deteriorating. There is no more ground fish, there are no more markets for our herring, and price levels for lobsters are declining. And as if that were not enough, now the Americans are getting involved. Because they threaten to pass with a bill that would restrict lobster sales on the U.S. market, we may lose more than one-third of a market that is worth $130 million.

I have the following question for the Prime Minister. What representations has he made to the Americans to make them understand that this bill is a threat to the entire Atlantic lobster industry and that it is totally unacceptable?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, another initiative was announced this morning by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. But the Hon. Member for Hamilton East, with her usual sense of style, is shouting across the floor.

Yes, I did raise this important matter of our Eastern fisheries directly with President Bush in Kennebunkport. I stressed the concerns of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia fishermen with respect to this problem.

Furthermore, a series of representations were authorized by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Some were made by Ambassador Burney in Washington, whom we met this week. The full weight and influence of the Canadian Government, provincial governments and Members of Parliament, like my honourable friend who just raised this important question, will be brought to bear on the U.S. Congress and the U.S. administration, in an attempt to settle this very serious problem, in the interests of our fishermen in eastern Canada.

[English]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): My question is for the Prime Minister.

There is a sense of impending doom in the Atlantic fishery. The U.S. Senate is harassing our lobstermen. Inshore fishermen in Canso and Cheticamp, for example, never know until the last minute where and how they will be able to fish. Yesterday National Sea Products had to lay up five trawlers. Why? Because mismanagement by this government has led to depleted groundfish stocks for Canadians. Yet the fisheries minister talks about how good things are in the fishery. What planet is he on?

When is the Prime Minister going to appoint a fisheries minister who has some feeling and understanding for the fishermen of Atlantic Canada and their families?

• (1200)

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has shown that he has care and interest in the fishery. This government, through not only the department of Fisheries and Oceans, through the cabinet collectively and through a series of departments including employment and immigration and others, has come together to look at the problem that we face, and that individuals in the communities face. We will respond with programs that suit the need when we fully understand the problem and have fully researched and dealt with the appropriate solution in consultations with a myriad of people who have an interest and a concern in the Atlantic fishery and the Atlantic economy.

VANCOUVER PORT CORPORATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport and it concerns another Crown corporation. The Vancouver Port Corporation has arrogantly overruled decisions of Vancouver City Council, an elected body, and is determined to impose a eight-storey grain elevator on a residential community.

Is it government policy that federal Crown corporations can overrule duly elected municipal governments?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have been made aware of the problems between the city of Vancouver and the ports corporation. My colleague for Vancouver East knows very well that there is an arm's length relationship between a Crown corporation and the Minister of Transport, however we have been informed. I have been in touch with the corporation. I have been told that the port of Vancouver has met the city of Vancouver and we hope that those discussions will continue in order to find an answer that would satisfy both parties.

Ms. Mitchell: Obviously this week the Crown corporation deliberately over-rode not just city council but a Board of Variance appeal as well into this situation. This is just the culmination of many hostile acts on behalf of that port corporation.

Will the minister intervene, and will he conduct an investigation, including an environmental assessment on this matter, because it has tremendous impact on the neighbourhoods?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): I agree with my colleague. I have been and will continue to be in touch with the port corporation. I will see if this request would be acceptable. We will see what may be possible. Once again, I will make my own personal inquiries about what has taken place in Vancouver.

BILL C-36

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds. Farmers in Canada, particularly western Canada, want the advance payment. Why has farmers not passed. Farmers need it now. What is the hold-up? Why has this bill not passed?

Mr. Simmons: Where have you been?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to Bill C-36 that provides amendments to both the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act as well as the Advance Payments for Crops Act.

We on this side of the House are fully prepared to pass the bill and have said so in debate in this House on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of this week.

If you are looking for reasons as to why the bill has not passed, and why farmers are not going to have their advance payments, you have to look to the members opposite. We would be very happy to pass the bill quickly and we should have some discussions between House leaders to get the bill passed so the farmers can have their cash advances.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Recently two retired 413 Squadron officers published a report which proves that this government has made a dangerous decision in transferring 413 Squadron to Greenwood. Lieutenant Colonel Denny Hopping and Major Gary Naylor have shown that CFB Summerside is closer to some 90 per cent of all search and rescue incidents in the Atlantic area, that the topography and climate at Summerside is superior, and that the transfer of 413 reduces the squadron's capability and endangers lives. The minister has a report and he knows the qualifications of these officers. Why does he continue to persist in closing CFB Summerside in the face of such expert military advice?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member says is not accurate. What I have interpreted from statements in the press by two former members of the Canadian forces is not accurate.

Surveys done have shown that the majority of incidents in search and rescue occur closer to Greenwood and Halifax than to Summerside.

Therefore, the establishment for efficiency reasons and for operational capabilities will be at Greenwood, and it is for that reason, and that reason alone, that it will be established in Greenwood.

Mr. McGuire: Mr. Speaker, the minister persists in saying that Greenwood is the most optimal base to have search and rescue, but in his own answers to the written question from the member from Labrador he says: "No specific specific study was undertaken on the impact of reductions or closures". He also says: "No specific study was conducted to determine the impact the closures or reductions would have on military effectiveness".

If he did not do any studies, I do not know how he can say that Greenwood is a superior location to Summerside, while these two officers have based their study on the Cross report of 1982.

My supplementary question is the following. Not only is the minister endangering lives in his determination to close CFB Summerside, all Canada knows he has issued a gag order on Lieutenant Colonel Denny Hopping, who has told the truth in support of his squadron and his community.

Why is the minister being deliberately derelict in his duty as minister to the people of Canada by killing the tracker squadron and transferring 413 Squadron, while threatening to punish those who tell the truth about the shortcomings of his decision?

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, I find it strange the hon. member says there is a gag order when he has been quoting the former officer of the Canadian forces here in the House and I have read quotes in the paper. There is a discipline that is required in Canadian forces and that discipline is enforced by the Canadian forces.

But I want to refer to the Journal Pioneer, Summerside, Prince Edward Island, September 26, 1989, page 4, for the hon. member's information: "Sad as it is for Summerside, we agree with the move. If there are to be cuts in the defence budget, which we do not accept as wise, then the fewer dollars must be spent more realistically. The rearrangement of search and rescue and patrol efforts at one base makes economic sense in practical terms. In practical terms, Greenwood is centrally located, virtually fog free and easier and cheaper to supply and service."

FINANCE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The Toronto-Dominion Bank agrees that this government's fiscal and monetary policies are driving Canada towards recession. In spite of dramatically lower interest rates among all our major competing countries, this government stubbornly refuses to lower interest rates here in Canada.

When is this government going to wake up?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member has not been paying attention. Rates were up one percentage point in most European countries yesterday. In Canada, they did not move at all.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, our short-term interest rates in Canada are 4.47 percentage points higher than in the United States. If the Minister of Finance is trying to stand here and defend these high interest rates, this government must realize that it is a major cause of inflation in Canada. It is this government that has driven up sales and excise taxes in its last budget by more than $3 billion. It is a government that is now going to saddle us with a goods and services tax. These are the things that cause inflation.

When is this government going to accept its responsibility and wake up to the new world realities? Our interest rates are dramatically out of line and they themselves are a major cause of inflation and government expense. Every percentage point rise in the interest rate increases our deficit by $1.6 billion. This is not strong fiscal management.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me be quite clear with hon. members. What is causing inflation is a range of things, including the fact that the economy has been growing more quickly than the capacity of the country to handle that growth.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): There is loud cackling from the front benches of the Liberal party who clearly do not understand the nature of inflation in this country.

Mr. Simmons: And so there should be at you. You are a joke in finance.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): What we are doing is keeping interest rates high to stop inflation from getting out of hand. We are also, through our fiscal policy, getting our deficit down as well, in order to stop the inflationary pressures in this country. What we are determined to do is avoid the problems that we had in the 1970s and early 1980s.

Mr. Peterson: It's self-induced inflation.

Mr. Simmons: All across the country you are a joke.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member from Newfoundland is making funny signs again. He clearly does not understand that in the 1970s, the Liberal government of the day swept the problem of inflation under the carpet. What happened? In 1976, we had a 5.5 per cent inflation rate. In 1981, we had a 13 per cent inflation rate. That led to 20 per cent plus interest rates and that in turn led to unemployment of 13.5 per cent. That, Mr. Speaker, we are determined to avoid and we will avoid.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will complete Question Period with questions from the member for Kamloops.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I regret I have to raise this issue with the Acting Prime Minister, but he will be well aware that following yesterday, and still today Albertans are seething from the comments made by the chairman of the finance committee. I know he will take this, as an Albertan, very seriously.

The chairman of the finance committee said again today that he stands by his comments. "I think that's my job", he says. "I have to call them as I see them. You have got to be frank with people". Well, be frank with people. He was calling Albertans and all the members here who represent Albertans, ignorant, stupid, out of touch, out to lunch, because he did not happen to agree with the Conservative tax policy being discussed at the hearings.

My question to the Acting Prime Minister is simply this, Mr. Speaker. The chairperson represents all of us—this is an all-party committee made up of representatives from the three political parties. When he speaks, he speaks for the committee. When he calls Albertans, or westerners generally, ignorant and stupid, what does the Acting Prime Minister now plan to do about these remarks and, more particularly, about the chairman of the finance committee?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will be speaking as the leader of the government party in the House of Commons to the chairman of the finance committee. He has had an opportunity to look at the transcript of the remarks and will be speaking directly to the chairman of the committee.

I think that the hon. member in his excitement to try to exploit an issue is creating some unusual precedents when he suggests that the chairman of the standing committee in his every utterance speaks for all members of the committee. During an earlier incarnation, I learned not to extend that kind of latitude to the hon. member in question.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Acting Prime Minister. It is a most serious matter when a serious financial spokesperson for the House, but particularly for the government, and a chairperson of the finance committee, calls Newfoundlanders "nobodys"; makes fun and ridicules senior citizens. Most recently, he called those of us who live in and represent western Canadians "stupid and ignorant" requiring grade V teachers from Toronto to come out west to educate us.

It would seem to me that the Acting Prime Minister should take this matter a little more seriously. When he said today that he stands by those comments, that in fact we are ignorant, that those of us who live in western Canada are stupid, surely as a representative of the government, and, in the absence of the Prime Minister who unfortunately had to leave, he would ask the hon. member to apologize to the people of western Canada in this instant and indicate that the government is quite prepared to ask for the resignation of the chairman of the finance committee.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member understands the rules of the House better than that. Certainly, I would hope that someone born in High River Hospital has a better understanding of the rules and the institutions of the House than he is now displaying.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): If an apology is to be forthcoming, the apology would have to be forthcoming from the individual member. The member understands that, and I think the House understands that. They also understand that the Prime Minister has indicated he will be speaking to the chairman of the finance committee and the House will be meeting next week.

STRIKING COMMITTEE

PRESENTATION OF THE FOURTEENTH REPORT

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the fourteenth report of the striking committee.

If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in this report later this day.

I would ask that we dispense with the reading of that report by the Clerk at the Table, as that report concerns only membership changes to committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to dispense with the reading?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

CONCURRENCE IN FOURTEENTH REPORT OF STRIKING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, if the House gives its consent, I move that the fourteenth report of the striking committee presented to the House earlier this day, be concurred in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to use this occasion to make a few short remarks about the intention of this report. One of the critical points in this report is that the elections of the chairs of the various committees be automatic and we do not necessarily have to go through this process on a regular basis.

I want to say on behalf of the New Democratic Party that on balance we have no concerns that the chairs of the committees act in good faith. There are some exceptions and we are concerned that with this particular report and this particular motion before us, the committees would lose the opportunity to reaffirm the leadership of the various committees.

I want to say something specifically about the chair of the finance committee. Over the last two days, I have drawn the House's attention to comments made by the chair. He referred to Albertans being stupid and ignorant, Newfoundlanders as being nobodys with no need to be heard on the important issue of the new GST tax, and suggested that senior citizens do not go anywhere so why would they be concerned with tax increases. He inferred they do not wear out their clothes, they do not travel, and they do not do much. This is ridiculing the seniors of the country. Obviously these are concerns shared by all members of the House.

In some cases, he does speak for the government, obviously when he indicated that universality was not a sacred trust, that the city of Ottawa and the people of Prince Edward Island would suffer for not voting Conservative. During the election campaign, he said that the GST would add a $10 billion windfall for the federal government which, of course is true, as we have seen from recent papers. So one assumes that he is speaking, not only for the finance committee, but also speaking for the government in terms of its intentions.

I want to simply say that we are concerned with the way in which the chairman of the finance committee has been conducting himself.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

• (1220)

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to say that I am not surprised by the point made by the House leader for the New Democratic Party. He has, over the last two days, shown some interest in this question. I know there are other issues and questions in which he holds some interest. Some of them may be more procedural or technical, and I think they have to do with the fact that he is arguing his case at the wrong point in time. If an opportunity was offered to us to put before the House the draft consent order, then maybe his comments would be appropriate in that context.

I see him nodding his head. We have dealt with the motion presented by the whip of our party. If there was unanimous consent for that, and I believe there is, maybe I can put this motion before the House now and we can discuss it. I move:

> That, notwithstanding any Standing Order or practice of the House or its Standing or Standing Joint Committees, the incumbent chairmen of the Standing and Standing Joint Committees shall continue in office until the committee concerned shall otherwise order, provided that House Standing and/or Standing Joint Committees whose chairmen cease to be members of the committee shall proceed to the election of a new chairman as their first order of business.

So I now understand that the motion presented by my colleague has been dealt with and we are now on this motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker The first motion moved by the Member for Calgary West is adopted by the House.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the interjection by my hon. friend.

I will continue with my remarks, the first part of my remarks being out of place in terms of order. In a sense I think that I have made the point that, on balance, we have no concern with the role and the effectiveness of the chairs of standing committees. They do an excellent job under difficult circumstances.

However, there are some where we have difficulties. There have been some committees that have refused to meet. The energy committee was one of those committees. At a time when a number of energy crises were before the country, the chair refused to call the committee together. We have had difficulties from time to time. I am focusing on one individual. I must say I personally find it difficult to do that, because in terms of his knowledge of financial matters, and the leadership that he has given the finance committee, and the status to which he has elevated the finance committee to deal with complicated matters he has been exemplary. But, unfortunately, I cannot, as a parliamentarian, simply stand by when a chair of a committee who I believe represents the members of that committee, makes such inappropriate and unacceptable statements regarding Canadian citizens. It is for that reason I have intervened in this process where normally an intervention would never be necessary.

Having registered concerns on behalf of the New Democratic Party, we will pass this motion on division. The intention, of course, is to register our concerns with the words uttered by the chair as a reflection against upstanding Canadian citizens from all parts of the country.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on behalf of what I hope is the entire striking committee which has representation from all three parties in the House.

The job of recommending to the House the members of committees is not the easiest job in the world and from time to time there is some discord in the House. But I believe members of the striking committee are rather consistently guided in their attempts to choose members to be on our standing committees and from time to time on our legislative committees who will work hard, do the job, and who bring to that job some considerable background and expertise. Members of the striking committee are concerned about the quality of the research, the quality of the advice, and the quality of the reports that come back for consideration by all members of the House.

From time to time it is unfortunate when members of the House use an inadvertent set of words or a deliberate set of words that are perhaps inflammatory. Those of us who have been around for ten years or longer have sometimes seen an awakening of public understanding of something that comes from those attempts. Sometimes we should not be as hasty as we might be to condemn a particular set of words, because there is a message in them. Sometimes in this House the words we use are so flowery and so complex that they defy understanding by most Canadians. Sometimes, I wonder if even those who utter the words really comprehend what they have just said.

Any quarrel that the House leader of the New Democratic Party has with the member is appropriately taken up when the member is present. It is perhaps unfortunate that the debate arose at this time. We have had through the process of parliamentary reform in the last five years a great deal of co-operation in evolving and developing the methods that help parliamentarians to participate in a much fuller way in the development of public policy. The particular exercise that took place in Edmonton this week with the finance committee travelling was not the kind of common exercise that existed in this place when I first came 10 years ago.

What is before the finance committee at this point is a proposal, a technical paper. Members of that committee, members from all sides of the House have been asked to go out, hear the Canadian people, come back to the House with advice as to whether the content of that technical paper will help Canadians.

Members of committees who travel experience a sense of frustration from time to time because people come with complaints without having done the background work that would indicate to the members of the committee that they have read the document and therefore are speaking to the document. It is my understanding that that has happened more than once in the finance committee's hearings in different places. It certainly was happening with the committee on unemployment insurance as it travelled the country.

When members are travelling and moving from community to community, day to day and working from early in the morning until late at night on our behalf, they get a little short tempered sometimes; they may become a little less prudent than they might be. All of us can take comfort in the reality that the finance committee, including its chairman, is one of the hardest working committees in this House. This has been true for several years now. It is one of the best informed committees of this House. When you look back at the end of the year they will have held more meetings than perhaps any other committee of this House. The quality of the work that they do is not always accepted by everybody, but there is nobody who can make the statement that the finance committee does not do a lot of homework and produce a sensible set of ideas as a consequence of understanding what it is that they are about. When that happens with a committee I think the chairman must receive some of the credit at least.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, to bring the motion into context, the purpose of the motion and the reason why we gave our consent to it was to simplify matters. Members will know that Standing Order 106 states:

> Within ten sitting days following the adoption by the House of a report of the Striking Committee, the Clerk of the House shall convene a meeting of each standing committee whose membership is contained in that report for the purpose of electing a Chairman, provided that forty-eight hours' notice is given of any such meeting.

The reason why we put this motion is in the interest of all committees so they can keep operating without having to go through the rigmarole of elections again. It is quite clear that the second part of the motion states: "Provided that those Standing and/or Standing Join Committees whose chairmen cease to be members of the committee shall proceed to the election of a new chairman as their first order of business." The purpose is to help committees continue with their work, and personally I think they are doing an awful lot of good work without having to go through the election in every committee of a chair and a vice-chair. Basically, we gave our support to that. We will enter into any debate as to whether members of certain committees are not holding meetings regularly or whether there are chairmen of committee or chairpersons of committees making remarks that we do not agree with, we will use committees to do that, not the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion moved by the deputy government House leader. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of Canadian men and women who are opposed to the GST, and my petition has been properly certified.

• (1230)

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition from my constituents concerning the proposed goods and services tax. The people feel that this tax is regressive because it asks low and middle income Canadians who are already overburdened with tax to foot the bill for government excesses.

The people have expressed their opposition to this tax and I can only hope that these cries of anguish are loud enough to restore the hearing of this government.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions: one of them deals with a subject of some importance to 143 Ottawa—Vanier constituents.

[English]

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, these people take exception to the proposed goods and services tax and its applicability to music lessons. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to consider music studies as an educational process and therefore exempt music education from the proposed sales tax.

The other petition that I have, signed by constituents in my riding, also refers to the GST and considers that the present government in proposing this tax is possibly doing the wrong thing for Canadians.

It says: whereas the Liberals on behalf of Canadians strongly oppose this goods and services tax, which is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes, higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment, wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of a number of constituents from Saskatoon—Humboldt and the surrounding area, I present a petition which calls upon the government to reject the current proposal of a goods and services tax and points out that the goods and services tax amounts to a tax grab and is one of the unfairest approaches to taxation in the country.

The petitioners call upon the government to reject the proposal and shift the burden of taxation to those people who can pay it most.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am honoured to present a petition on behalf of a number of people from western Canada who are calling upon the government to reconsider the decision to curtail VIA services in certain parts of Canada and to dismantle it in others.

The petitioners are asking Parliament to maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail in those areas of the country where it can provide a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient, environmentally sound, and energy efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting a petition signed by more than 800 residents in the riding of Carleton—Gloucester, in which they object to the GST, the tax proposed by the Conservative Government. They are very much concerned about the negative impact this tax will have on the community.

[English]

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I present a petition on behalf of concerned Canadian citizens who will be negatively impacted by the goods and services tax. I would specifically like to refer to the constituents of Western Arctic, who will be grievously impacted in the area of transportation and communications, which they rely on so heavily.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by many concerned Canadians.

They feel that the proposed goods and services tax would cause hardship to low and middle income Canadians and that it will create a tremendous burden on small business. The petitioners call upon this Parliament to reject this proposed goods and services tax.

BILL C-21

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition concerning Bill C-21, which will soon be reported back to the House.

This petition has been circulated by a person in my riding of Ottawa West who has spent her entire life working with, being a volunteer, and is now spending her retirement working for the dignity and worth of those who do not fully share in the wealth of our prosperous society.

She and her friends object to being told by the Prime Minister in October that unemployment insurance would not be cut when that is exactly what is being done.

She calls upon Parliament to reject the cuts in the unemployment insurance system, to propose more meaningful reforms and to concentrate on a labour force development strategy combined with a full employment policy and an effective regional development policy.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have a petition with 36 signatures to present.

These petitioners are retired persons and are concerned with the government's proposed goods and services tax. They feel this tax will cause severe hardship, not only to themselves as seniors, but also to low income persons.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition from Canadians who are concerned with this government's attitude toward VIA Rail. They are mostly in the Windsor corridor area, but I know they will support our call for remote VIA Rail services to be studied in a fair and public manner by this government.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of residents of my riding, Scarborough—Rouge River and the surrounding area.

The petition is certified as correct. The petitioners have executed the document to express their opposition to the government's proposed goods and services tax.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Saint-Laurent Associatioon of the Disabled, it is my privilege, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition on behalf of people who object to the new universal goods and services tax proposed by the Government because it would cause severe and undue hardship for low-and middle-income Canadians.

[English]

Also, on behalf of the Senior Citizens Council of Saint Laurent and pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to produce this petition to the House asking that the government reject the proposed goods and services tax because of the hardship that will be incurred by low and middle income families.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 also to present a petition signed by residents of Toronto and Scarborough.

These persons are very concerned that the government is about to impose on Canadians an unfair, regressive, vicious tax in the form of the goods and services tax. They call on Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax for the reasons I have indicated.

I may say that the petition was collected by my hon. friend, the member for Eglington—Lawrence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the member for Kamloops run out of petitions?

Mr. Riis: For today I have, but on Tuesday I will have other ones.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall all the remaining questions stand?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, since it is Friday I did not want to put the hon. member in an embarrassing position but I do want to raise a point.

There are 17 questions on the Order Paper that have been there since June 27. One of them has been there since April 26. I realize that that is not a huge number but, nevertheless, it is significant given that the time limit for answering these questions is 45 days. These questions have been there for ages. It is now well over 90 days since the last one was set down in that group that I mentioned. It seems to me that the government might move with a little alacrity.

To help my hon. friend I should tell him that I recognize he is in a difficult position and I am not blaming him. It is perhaps a question of general malaise in the government.

There is a motion on the Order Paper, Motion M-460, which I have set down as a private member's motion. If my hon. friend would like to help himself a bit and help the government out of a really embarrassing situation, because it has a duty to answer these questions in Parliament, he could perhaps refer it today to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges, Procedures and Private Members' Business for study. Perhaps that committee would come up with some rules that would deal with these questions in a way that would enable my friend to get his answers more quickly.

I think the motion that I proposed would be helpful. It is sort of salvation sitting ready at hand to help the hon. parliamentary secretary. I would like to assist him in that way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Just to make matters clear, the member for Kingston and the Islands is in fact correct. Notice was given on June 27. However they were printed only on September 25.

• (1240)

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am glad you mentioned that because of course I did want to remind the hon. member that this was in fact the case.

I also want to say to him that far from being embarrassed by his intervention this morning, he is giving me an opportunity to discuss a couple of problems that we have. Mr. Speaker has very kindly covered one of the problems that has created some dilemma for us. We are trying very hard to meet those deadlines.

He should know that to date we are sitting at about 80.4 per cent success rate on our questions; on regular questions in some cases it is at 77.7 per cent; on priority questions, 87.5 per cent. This government has not only been establishing but continuing a very clear and solid record of answering those questions. Occasionally when there is a day or two, or in the odd case a week of delay, there are usually very legitimate reasons.

Quite often, as is the case right now with some of the items that my friend has referred to, we are waiting for those documents to be translated. Due to their length those questions have been a little slow at translation. We should have them back in good time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FORGIVENESS OF DEBTS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs. Landry that Bill C-10, an act relating to the forgiveness of debts incurred or assumed in respect of certain official development assistance loans made by the Government of Canada to the governments of certain countries in sub-Saharan Africa, be read the third time and passed.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I feel very privileged to stand here in the House and speak very briefly to Bill C-10, an act relating to the forgiveness of debts incurred or assumed in respect of certain official development assistance loans made by the Government of Canada to the governments of certain countries in sub-Saharan Africa.

The government certainly should be commended for forgiving these debts. However, I think that we are overlooking something that has a much greater implication for the people of the sub–Saharan Africa than the forgiveness of debts. It is the human need, the human suffering, and the economic need that is present in the Third World countries today.

Canada has a decade of achievement on humanitarian grounds, on the approach that we have taken to people in need, but this accomplishment is being threatened for almost 900 million people; in other words one–sixth of mankind is sliding backward into poverty. That is a dreadful situation. We are all very concerned about our own debt here in Canada today. Some people applaud this government and the fact that it has cut back in foreign aid to the Third World countries.

I do not know how we can consider the steps the government has taken as brave when we look at the poverty and the children who are dying around the world. Of course we are concerned about our own, but we cannot be so narrow as to look only at our own nation. We have to look beyond our boundaries.

This government has reduced its commitment to Third World development and to the world poor. We know the bill has no impact on the budget of our country. Although the bill forgives debt, the government has not taken the leadership that has consistently been shown by Canada for a great number of years. Canada now ranks last among middle income developed countries as to its level of ODA. I do not think that is something we should all be very proud of as a nation.

It is a tragic situation when 40,000 children are dying every day in this world from malnutrition. The State of the World's Children 1989 states that it is the young child whose growing mind and body are susceptible to permanent damage from even temporary deprivation. It is the young child whose individual development today and whose social contribution tomorrow are being shaped by the economics of now. It is the young child who is paying the highest of all prices and who will bear the most recurring of all costs for the mounting debt repayments, the drop in export earnings, the increase in food costs, the fall in family incomes, the run down of health services, and the narrowing of educational opportunities.

It is simply no longer necessary for approximately 40,000 young children to die every day in developing worlds and for so many millions more to live on with ill health and poor growth. Today the world is both aware that this tragedy is happening and capable of preventing it and ethics must march with awareness, morality with capacity. It is the poor and the vulnerable who are suffering the most and for two main reasons: the first is that the poor have the least economic fat with which to absorb the blow of recession. The second reason is that the poor also have the least political muscle to ward off that blow. The Government of Canada is not responding as it originally promised. It is an irresponsible attitude to a major world problem. I support the bill but I beseech the government to address the serious problems of the world's hunger and economic ills. Of course we must relate to our own debt as well as to the world debt. We cannot work in the isolation of what is happening in our own country. We all must become self–reliant. The government has taken the right step to introduce a bill to forgive the debt but takes no leadership in dealing with the root causes of poverty and debt.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a very short comment on debate.

I believe this is an important albeit rather insignificant piece of legislation. We applaud this initiative called Bill C–10, which is really a bill to write off debts that the Government of Canada has made with a number of governments of African countries, namely the Republic of the Cameroon, the People's Republic of the Congo, Republic of the Ivory Coast, the Gabonese Republic, the Republic of Ghana, the Republic of Kenya, the Democratic Republic of Madagascar, the Federal Republic of Nigeria, the Republic of Senegal, Republic of Swaziland, Republic of Zaire, Republic of Zambia, and Republic of Zimbabwe.

This bill is a small step in the right direction and for that we are thankful, but it will go no way toward eliminating the horrendous debts faced by these countries. I draw to the House's attention that after this bill is passed Nigeria will still find itself with a debt in excess of $28 billion, Kenya with a debt in excess of $6 billion, and so on. These are countries where the situation is almost impossible under these oppressive debt loads, but the Government of Canada has taken this small step and for that I applaud it.

I want to make two short points. We do not want to leave the impression that the government is actually serious about foreign assistance. Not long ago the Prime Minister made a commitment on behalf of the Government of Canada when he spoke before the United Nations that it was Canada's intention to achieve a Overseas Development Assistance package relative to GNP with a ratio of 0.7 per cent by the year 2000. Mr. Speaker, 0.7 per cent of GNP going into Overseas Development Assistance would be an acceptable level and has been agreed for many years to be an acceptable level. Recently the government announced we will not reach that level of 0.7 per cent of GNP until at least the year 2040, so we have seen a reneging on that kind of commitment.

We only have to look at the last budget to be reminded of the cuts that have taken place: for international financial institutions, a cut of $56.5 million; for the voluntary sector, the non-governmental organizations, their budget was cut by $9.6 million. Multilateral food aid was cut by $32 million; multilateral technical assistance, cut by $12.8 million; bilateral food aid, cut by $24.4 million; international humanitarian assistance aid, cut by $4.5 million; geographic programs, cut by $130 million.

Mr. Speaker, here is the actual evidence. The proof, if you like, is in the eating of the pudding and when you eat it you find out that the government has substantially reduced in all areas its commitment to assisting those in need in the developing nations. Finally I am concerned with the comments made recently by the Minister of Finance when he was speaking at the Commonwealth Finance Ministers' Meeting in Kingston, Jamaica, on September 20, 1989, when he said: "Without the implementation of sustainable adjustment policies that lead to the re-establishment of self-sustaining growth, debt reduction and debt relief—" and I stress this point—"that debt reduction and debt relief do little more than buy time. Better domestic policies, not debt relief, are the key to sustained growth".

I become very concerned with those kinds of comments. Is this an indication that in terms of programs and action of debt relief the government is not interested in pursuing those options. By the fact that we have these overwhelming debt albatrosses around the necks of the developing countries, particularly the very poorest, is this government indicating that really what it needs is better domestic policies?

Let us be reminded that the prosperity that those of us in the first world countries and second world countries have was built originally by the exploitation of those third and fourth world countries. Therein lie the problems that they have today. The fundamental problem that they face in developing their domestic economic policies is the fact that we, as developed countries, exploited them so ruthlessly for so many years. They are really starting far back in the development process as a result of that exploitation.

We have an obligation as a country along with other western nations particularly to do what we can. While we applaud this small step in this minute debt forgiveness in terms of government to government loans, this only is the beginning and we will be pressing for a host of other initiatives that we hopefully will see taken soon.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

CANADA-LUXEMBOURG INCOME TAX CONVENTION

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill S-2, an act to implement conventions between Canada and the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg and Canada and the Polish People's Republic and an agreement between Canada and Papua, New Guinea for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Hon. Alan Redway (for the Minister of State for Finance) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Redway (for the Minister of State for Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to make two points that I think must be said. This bill is very straightforward and is meant to implement the agreement between Canada and the three countries that you have named, Mr. Speaker, to make life simpler for taxpayers who are doing business essentially in Canada and these three countries. We have done these with most countries now and we are catching up.

I did want to point out what I believe is an oddity. This is a very special initiative to remove a double taxation and to work in harmony with Poland and New Guinea and the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, yet we cannot get agreement among the Government of Canada and the provinces to work co-operatively in terms of taxation methods. I refer of course to the GST. Perhaps we will see this as a forerunner of co-operation in the future, not necessarily on this issue.

I do want to take this opportunity to say that with the changes we have all appreciated taking place in Poland, of course referring to the new non-communist Solidarity led government, and with the enhanced human rights and the new openness that we find in Poland, we are reminded I think regularly by members of the Polish-Canadian community that Canada wants to do whatever it can to facilitate economic development and the enhancement of human rights in Poland and to assist in a variety of other areas.

This means that Canadians, by definition, ought to be actively involved in Poland, particularly in economic development projects. There are a number of initiatives that are under way now and that are being planned in the months ahead.

This legislation will facilitate and encourage Canadians to participate economically in Canada and in Poland. Not that it will not be beneficial to the other countries named, but I think the timing is very appropriate and hopefully will give the incentive and encouragement to Canadians to do what we can to assist the Government of Poland and the people of Poland in the development of their country.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the comments made by the hon. member for Kamloops. We in the opposition of course support this legislation. I simply want at this stage, since it is about to be passed by this Chamber, to acknowledge the excellent work done on this bill by the members of the other place, particularly with its beneficent Liberal majority in the other place who studied this bill extensively. We are satisfied that their studies indicate the bill is in proper and satisfactory form, and we are happy to assist in its passage here today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

The House resumed from Monday, June 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp that Bill C-23, an act to amend the National Energy Board Act and to repeal certain enactments in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a couple of comments about this bill. Although these are mainly housekeeping provisions in the bill, of a technical nature, I think we have to be very concerned about the general direction that the government is going with energy policy as a result of the free trade deal with the United States.

Clearly that agreement gives access by the United States to our energy sources. It guarantees the Americans supply and guarantees them access to our resources. It emasculates the National Energy Board which was set up back in 1958 after the pipeline debate, because John Diefenbaker was very concerned about the future of our energy supply and the control that the United States would exercise over it. I think that there is a lot of concern by Canadians that we are guaranteeing supplies to the U.S. regardless of what shortages may occur.

At the present time they are moving up toward 40 per cent supply of our natural gas. That means if we have shortages of natural gas in the future, we will have to guarantee out of whatever source of supply there is from Canada that 40 per cent will go to the United States. The percentage may even go higher than that. I think we have to be very concerned about what is happening with this government in its head-long rush to a total integration of the North American economy, not only in manufacturing and other programs, but especially in energy programs.

I note that in the bill, the government proposes to reduce the number of members on the National Energy Board from 11 to 9. That just means there will be fewer members of the board who will have a lesser scope of knowledge about the number of issues which come before them. The weakening of the board is a very serious mistake because we cannot guarantee that supply for the future.

Many Canadians express horror at the fact that we are shipping something like 700,000 or 800,000 barrels of oil a day to the United States, essentially pumping out the western sedimentary basin, looking toward the future supply of very high-priced oil from the Arctic regions, from the Beaufort Sea, from non-conventional oil in the tar sands, from the east coast off-shore regions of our country.

This is oil that probably cannot be brought on stream for something less than the $30 to $40 a barrel range, while at the present time our oil from the western sedimentary basin at $18 or $20 is being exported in unsurpassed amounts to the U.S.

Weakening the National Energy Board is a mistake. Guaranteeing the United Stated that it will be able to have our electricity from Ontario at the same price as our own domestic producers is a mistake in the free trade deal. After all, Ontario Hydro and the people of the province of Ontario will commit in the next few years some $40 billion of the credit of this province to produce energy essentially at cost. Why should we be selling electricity at our cost price if the price in New York City is double that or higher? Yet in the free trade deal we have given that away.

The other part of the bill which I find of some concern is the part with regard to cost recovery. I know that the government is moving to do this in the energy field under the Atomic Energy Control Board Act as well. At a time when uranium producers are facing the most difficult time in their history—when uranium that can be produced in communities like Elliott Lake and mining camps like the Elliott Lake camp probably requires something in the range of $25 to $30 a pound to produce while the world price is around $10 a pound—the government is planning to impose charges for inspection by the Atomic Energy Control Board. Surely if there is a time not to hit an industry, it is when it is down. When the price of the commodity is $10 a pound and the cost of production is in the $25 to $30 per pound range, surely that is not the time to impose new charges. Yet essentially what we have is the analogy of the person who is being charged for speeding having to pay the salary of the policeman.

Surely the protection of the environment and the protection of the public is a general responsibility of the Government of Canada not of the individual who is being inspected by the regulatory agency. I think that is the same thing that we are facing here.

Often the energy industry faces a downturn. In the past couple of years, we have seen prices as low as $10 a barrel for crude oil. Imposing new costs often threatens the viability of small producers. I am not familiar with the exact details with regard to the oil and gas industry, but clearly that is the case in the uranium mining industry because of those new cost recovery programs. Therefore, I hope the government will back off with regard to uranium mining because uranium is an important energy fuel as well.

This is a technical bill and because of that it is difficult to know all the implications. I know that when it goes before the Energy, Mines and Resources Committee that members from our caucus will want to look more closely at these arrangements to ensure that we are not giving away the store because of these amendments with regard to electricity exports to the United States.

Clearly groups like the Ontario government and Ontario Hydro thought that the decisions which were made were apparently injected into the free trade negotiations in the last moments of the negotiations in early October, 1987, with no prior notice. These, at least to Ontario, were terribly irresponsible giveaways. I hope that this legislation is not simply implementing those decisions which are harmful to that important industry.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in this debate perhaps with some uncharacteristic diffidence because energy and certainly the production of electrical energy is not a matter of direct significance to my constituents. I might say that I have not had an opportunity to work directly in this field.

However, electrical energy is an important and vital industry to all Canadians and it has played an historic role in the development of our country. This bill is of concern, not just to those on the producing side, but to consumers and to all Canadians for what it says about the future not only of this particular industry but as well of those who are concerned with the environment.

Electricity is going to become even more important in the future than it has in the past. Electricity is an issue that goes to the whole question of increasing concern over global warming caused by emissions of carbon dioxide. It is the least damaging form of energy to the environment and thus offers us in the long run a significant potential to avoid the terrible destruction to the environment and to the ozone layer that is now beginning to be recognized, and to which the government says it is committed.

The questions of how we produce electricity and how we conserve it are becoming increasingly important. Because electricity is becoming increasingly important to Canadians, it stands to reason that this bill and how we regulate electricity in the years to come must receive very careful consideration in the House.

In the few moments allowed to me today, let me first highlight the history of electricity regulation in Canada and particularly the reasons for federal regulation. I would like then to set out our concerns from this part of the House on the bill itself. It is our view that this bill does not adequately protect the interest of Canadians in the future and must be opposed by the House.

For historical reasons, there has been a considerable overlap between provincial and federal jurisdictions in the electricity industry.

The industry began, of course, as a collection of very small plants serving isolated communities. As a result, when the British North America Act was adopted, the provinces moved quickly to claim jurisdiction over the regulation of the industry. The Act itself, of course, gave to the provinces jurisdiction for the development, conservation and production of electrical energy.

The same document, the British North America Act, granted authority over international trade and commerce to the federal government and to the federal Parliament. As a result, as the efficiency of Canadians to produce electrical energy increased and the possibility began emerging of electrical exports, the federal Parliament and the federal government undertook increasingly the regulation of international power lines and of exports across our borders. It is in this area that the federal regulatory system has been developed. It is this that is being tampered with by this proposed legislation.

From the outset, the federal government, on behalf of all Canadians in the public interest, held firm to one principle. The principle was that all quantities of electricity to be exported must be surplus to the present and reasonably foreseeable future requirements of Canadians. Even when the National Energy Board Act of 1959 was extended and permitted, the maximum export licence period to go from one year to 25 years, there was a clear expectation that the long term–licences would be granted only in exceptional circumstances.

It was only in 1962, under a Conservative government, I may add, that the then Minister of Trade and Commerce departed from this past policy at least to some extent. In his statement of national power policy, the minister said that long–term exports of power could be justified to permit the development of large–scale power projects which depended upon long–term export contracts for their financial viability.

We saw in 1962 the beginning of a breach of the fundamental policy that had covered exports since Confederation, a policy which put the primacy of securing Canadian supply both in present and in the future, at the heart of Canadian public policy. We began seeing a Conservative government inject into the debate the needs and requirements of private interests in the area of electrical production and of provincial interests on the production side.

We on our side of the House have never argued against the need to balance the production requirements and possibilities and potential with the larger issue of secure Canadian supply present and future. The legislation until now has protected the Canadian public interest by ensuring that there will invariably be a public open hearing whenever there is to be a new set of exports outside our borders and thus a further detraction from Canadian supply. It is these public hearings which have ensured Canadians that the public interest will be taken into account.

There are very important roles for regulation in the area of electricity export. It is important that Canadian consumers have a secure supply. It is important that Canadians have reasonably equal access, regardless of what region they live in. It is impossible to argue with the proposition that this industry must be regulated to ensure an equitable development in all regions of Canada. It is important to balance the interests of investors in a way that makes it consistent with the over-all public interest. If the industry is not adequately regulated, then it is possible that electrical monopolies which are shielded from competition can sell off electricity supplies to the detriment of the Canadian interest as a whole in maintaining a secure supply of these vital resources.

Under the system that we have, before these amendments come into effect, the National Energy Board issues electricity licences and orders for a period not exceeding 25 years. The NEB authorizes the construction and operation of international power lines and regulates inter-provincial power lines when designated by the Governor in Council. Finally, the board regulates the detailed routing of international and designated inter-provincial power lines.

Under the present system the NEB focuses on two criteria; one, whether the export is surplus to reasonably foreseeable Canadian requirements and, two, whether the export price is just and reasonable. It is important to note that except in very minor cases, the board conducts a public hearing. It conducts a public hearing and uses evidence presented in that open public hearing to determine whether the proposal is in the public interest. The thrust of this bill is to make exporting electricity from Canada easier, to streamline the process as it is put. Obviously streamlining the process is in itself a worthwhile objective. No one is in favour of unnecessary regulation or duplication of effort.

The United States, importers of electricity, has complained about our means of protecting our own national interest. The Americans find our public hearing process cumbersome and inconvenient. But minor inconvenience is not in itself a good reason for loosening up our rules.

It has been suggested that there is a duplication of effort. In our view, there is no substitute for national as opposed to provincial process, a national process independent of political machinations to determine what is in the national interest.

We are completely unconvinced that the current process needs to be changed. More important, we are persuaded that the changes proposed in this bill could undermine the protection that existing legislation provides the Canadian public. We are concerned that the bill gives in to consumers in the United States who already enjoy substantial benefits at our expense.

Let me be specific. Under this bill, the National Energy Board will routinely grant export licences and permits in most cases. In only a few cases will public hearings be required. As long as the sponsoring province has apparently complied with relevant federal environmental processes and as long as the provincial regulation is deemed to be sufficient, exporters need only obtain a permit. They can thereby usually avoid a federal public hearing. The second significant effect of this legislation is to increase the duration of export licences from 25 to 30 years. Finally, the NEB will be required to recover its costs.

Our concern about the bill, first and foremost, is that most export applications will not require a public hearing because of what will be the usually routine granting of permits. We say that no compelling reason has been advanced for making public hearings less frequent, especially given the importance of electricity to our national energy future. No evidence has been produced that will indicate that the existing process is unnecessarily burdensome.

A closed process seldom serves the public purpose well. An open system may not be convenient in every case, but it does serve the public interest. The case that the current process is too vexatious simply does not hold up.

While the NEB has forced alterations to export proposals, it has never refused an export application for electricity. The large utilities that wheel and deal in electricity generally seem to manage pretty well for themselves.

Second, the bill could politicize the decisions regarding whether simply to grant a permit or to hold public hearings to consider export proposals, because under the present system if the NEB is determined on the basis of its analysis that a given export application is not in the public interest, it would recommend to cabinet that a proposal be examined in greater detail by a public hearing. Under this bill, the final decision as to whether or not a public hearing is to be held is to be made by cabinet. This means that the decision under this system is much more likely to be made on narrow political grounds.

We have some examples. If a particular region in Canada has extra clout in cabinet, that region's political interest invariably will be considered by cabinet. Cabinet is a political body. The whole idea of setting up something like the National Energy Board is to establish an independent tribunal with a clear and separate independent mandate to look out for the public interest. That interest cannot be served if decisions can be made in secret by cabinet.

The authority of the National Energy Board could be seriously undermined if cabinet decided, again for political advantage, to reject recommendations of the NEB. This perhaps need only happen once, but if it does happen, the whole authority and credibility of the NEB is compromised. In that event, the NEB, even in anticipation of being overruled by cabinet, is going to have to become more political in its decision-making than it is mandated to be now.

The current arm's-length relationship between the NEB and the government serves the interests of Canadians and should not be changed. We must avoid the politicization of the process that depends on calm, impartial deliberations to protect the Canadian interest.

Let me address the change from 25 to 30 years. The Government House Leader made some reference in his remarks when this bill was being discussed in June to suggest that this was just a casual, narrow matter, that it was just a trivial change. If it is such a narrow, trivial change, why make it at all? If the thing works, don't fix it, a good Conservative philosophy, I would have thought, that would have commended itself to this government.

The only justification for extending from 25 to 30 years the maximum duration of export licences is to serve the industry and not the Canadian public interest. Given the recent upsurge in expression of concern about the greenhouse effect, it seems to me entirely likely that electricity and particularly electricity generated by hydroelectric facilities will become an increasingly important asset to this country. If that is the case, then why does the Canadian government allow even longer periods for export contracts to be signed?

The government's focus on making electricity exports easier is all the more worrisome in view of the proportionality provisions in the free trade agreement. Further, making exports easier now runs the risk of Canadians paying higher, not lower, prices for electricity in the future. Let me quote from a representative of The Consumers' Association of Canada, Tanis Mathers, as reported in the September 8 edition of the Montreal Gazette:

> The fear is that—new projects needed to fill the demand at that time may be more expensive and increase electricity rates for domestic consumers.

It should not escape the public's attention that many of the costs associated with the nuclear industry will not be covered by the current consumers of electricity but by future generations. Even the National Energy Board has expressed concern that Canadians will soon be paying more for their electricity. The following paragraph appears in the 1987 report on the regulation of electricity exports:

> Unlike many manufactured products, most Canadian electricity production may be subject to increasing costs. Utilities generally develop their more favourable hydro sites first. Thus, if any but the costliest sites were developed to service the export market, the selling utility would have to develop a more expensive hydro site to service Canadian demand earlier than without exports. This means that, because of exports Canadians would pay more sooner for their electricity. Similarly nuclear safety and siting is expected to become increasingly costly over time—

If in fact this country continues to develop in the area of nuclear safety, I may add. There is another recent development that will mean Canadians will pay more sooner rather than later and that is the goods and services tax. Under that tax, the sales of energy within Canada will be covered but not sales to U.S. consumers. As a result of the tax, the GST will penalize Canadian consumers for living in Canada.

I would like to draw to the attention of the House the words of then Prime Minister, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. He stated in the House of Commons on May 26, 1959, as reported in Hansard at page 4025:

> As to the price to be charged for gas and power, it must be just and reasonable in relation to the public interest. With the implementation of this legislation no longer will there be any suspicion that the Canadian consumer is being forced to subsidize the foreign markets or that Canadian industries will—

Let me just say in conclusion that electricity is a strategic commodity. It must be carefully and jealously husbanded. We must ensure that the decision on whether or not to export it is made on rational grounds in open public hearings. We must ensure that the decisions are not politicized. We must protect the independence of the process of the National Energy Board. We must not increase the duration of export licences by 20 per cent. We must ensure that Canadians not Americans, gain the most from this most valuable Canadian resource.

In summary, this bill must be reworked and it must be defeated.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest comparative advantages that Canada has had over the years has been the relative abundance of and easy access to energy, be it gas, oil or electricity. The actions of this government over the last few years has put that comparative advantage in jeopardy. The jeopardy I am speaking of is the fact that now, under the free trade agreement, we have promised that we will charge our own people the same price as we charge when selling that energy to the United States. In other words, the comparative advantage of abundance is gone because of the free trade agreement.

Besides that, we have, as the member indicated, put on a GST or are going to put a tax on energy used in Canada. That tax suggests that anything exported will not be taxed. What kind of an impact does the hon. member think this loss of comparative advantage will have on Canada, particularly on his own region on the coast of British Columbia?

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for the question. It is very clear that to the extent to which a negative two-price policy develops, the interest of consumers and the long-term economic health of the country will suffer.

The GST, as applied to the sales of energy within Canada will in fact add to the price of electrical energy to Canadians and put this country, therefore the users of electrical energy, at a competitive disadvantage to those in the United States, assuming that the same price is approved in energy sales and the policy continues.

We have had a long debate over the last two decades in this country about the appropriate pricing strategies vis-à-vis exports. We in the New Democratic Party have consistently argued—and one the most eloquent spokespeople on this was our late leader, Tommy Douglas, who had a substantial impact on the thinking of Canadians by his effectiveness as a spokesperson for the proposition—that we must use our assets in energy, and in particular electrical energy, as a significant asset for Canadians to overcome some of the disadvantages that geography has given us in developing a manufacturing sector to our economy. This government has thrown that policy out the window by bending too much to large private production interests. We say there must be a balance in public interest.

Obviously, this country is a producer of energy. We have to use that as an asset and we must recognize the needs of the industry to develop, but those interests must be kept in balance with our social and economic interests of having a strong industrial sector, of having beneficial and effective prices for our consumers and, in the final analysis, of conserving a resource such as electrical energy which will help us in defeating the problems that inflict our environment.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-23, an Act to amend the National Energy Board Act. I commend my colleague from Victoria for the contribution he has made to the debate. It was a most enlightening contribution. I would like particularly to expand on the points that he just made in response to a question.

A country always tries to take advantage of its assets in terms of becoming competitive in the international market. One of the things that Canada has that puts us ahead of so many other countries is in fact a widespread energy base. We have abundant energy resources and we should be taking advantage of this in terms of developing our economic infrastructure. That is why some of us are very concerned about the implications in this bill. Are we simply giving away this trump card we have in terms of dealing in the international market-place.

I do not have to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that electricity is of vital importance to our country and it is this importance that encourages me to participate in this debate today.

However, I must say that I rise for another reason. It is my firm belief that electricity will become even more important in the future, indeed strategic in the future when we will finally begin to take some initial steps toward addressing the serious problem of global warming caused, in large part, by the emissions of carbon dioxide.

In the last few days we have discussed the cuts to VIA Rail and the environmental insensitivity of that decision. I think we are all hoping for the day when we see electrical driven high speed trains in the major corridors of the country. That would be a major advancement in reducing carbon dioxide emissions and a major move toward cleaning up environmental pollution. Obviously in the future electricity is going to be playing an even more important role than it has played in the past.

Because of this importance, how we regulate electricity in the years to come should receive very serious consideration. This bill before us leads us, quite frankly, to a host of concerns. I think it is fair to say that the reasons for regulation of electricity exports include that it is important for Canadian consumers to have a secure supply. In the past government departments said: "We have an ample supply of oil for decades in the future", and we found ourselves in an oil shortage not long after. Therefore, there is a concern among Canadian citizens that we take steps to ensure that we have a secure supply long into the future for our own consumption purposes.

It is also important to Canadians to have reasonably equal access, regardless of where they happen to live in the country. We are fortunate to be blessed with hydroelectric resources throughout the country. However, there are some areas that are more advantaged than others. We have to recognize that we, as a national institution, have an obligation to ensure that all Canadians, regardless of where they happen to live, have equal and fair access to our hydroelectric resources.

As well, it is important to regulate the industry to assist development in the regions. A number of countries, particularly western European countries that are led by social democratic parties, use electricity to encourage economic development in more remote areas, to encourage manufacturing and so on in areas where probably it would not normally take place but where it provides job opportunities and so on in the hinterland, so to speak. We must do that as well as being opposed to concentrating all of our economic activity in the growth areas of southern Ontario and other specific locations throughout the country.

Another reason for regulation of our electricity exports is that it is important to balance the interests of investors with the over-all public interest. If the industry is not properly and adequately regulated, it is conceivable that electrical monopolies which are shielded from competition could gouge their customers—and we know of those examples—or that a group of investors or, indeed, even a province could push through a profitable electrical enterprise that would pollute the surrounding area, for example, and would not be in the national interest. Or we can foresee short-sighted decisions taken today that could cause future generations to pay more for their power than would have been the case if the plight of future generations had been considered by a well-established and independent regulatory authority.

Obviously, there are a number of reasons why regulation is necessary. I do not have to remind you, Mr. Speaker, of the current regulatory system. It is well understood. However, perhaps one aspect of our present system bears repeating, and that is that the National Energy Board conducts a public hearing and uses the evidence presented in that open public forum to judge whether the proposal is in the public interest or not. That public hearing process is critical.

A public hearing process, where Canadians can speak out on major initiatives being proposed so that in the end the best decision is made, is a critical component of the process that we have not seen recently with the VIA Rail decision. There have been no public fora, no hearings held on whether or not a certain line should be abandoned or a certain service should be curtailed or eliminated in part. We are hearing from across the country an outcry that the government has really erred in judgment on VIA because of its lack of serious input that experts and others could have provided through a public hearing process.

The main thrust of this bill before us is to make the export of electricity from Canada easier, to streamline the process. In itself that is obviously not bad. No one is in favour of unnecessary regulation, duplication of effort, red tape and frustration. No one wants to trip up exporters with unnecessary complications just for the sake of it.

However, we are all aware that the United States importers of electricity have complained about our means of protecting our national interest. I suppose we could say that is just too bloody bad. This is our national interest and if the Americans do not like our public hearing process and find it burdensome and inconvenient, well, that is too bad. It is our electricity, it is our future we are concerned with, it is our country we are concerned with, it is the people of Canada we are concerned with, and if the Americans do not like our so–called cumbersome process, I say that is too bad. We are not in the business of providing easy access by Americans to our natural resources, although this bill, unfortunately, does just that.

I and my colleagues in the New Democratic Party remain totally unconvinced that the current process needs to be changed. Perhaps more important, I am concerned that the changes proposed in this bill would undermine what protection the existing legislation provides for the Canadian public in the future. I am deeply concerned that this bill would mean that consumers in the United States would enjoy substantial benefit at our expense.

What are the main changes proposed in this bill that concern us? The most important change is that the National Energy Board will routinely grant export permits in most cases. As opposed to calling for a natural public hearing as part of any process, the National Energy Board can grant an export permit without necessarily calling a public hearing. They want to expand the maximum duration of export licences from 25 years to 30 years. I think it is important that most export applications now will not require a public hearing because of what will be the usual routine granting of permits. There is no compelling reason for making public hearings less frequent, especially given the importance of electricity to our national energy future. That is one of the assumptions built in.

The National Energy Board public hearings address issues of national importance. I believe that when a company wants to export electricity it is not necessarily thinking in the national interest. I suspect and would submit it is seldom thinking in the national interest, it is thinking in the interest of it's shareholders which is, of course, the business they are in. In some cases a certain province might be applying for an export application. It too might not necessarily be making judgments in the national interest but in the interest of the province.

We believe it is important that the national interest be taken into any consideration of exporting electricity to the United States. I would submit that a closed process seldom serves the public well. We always have to wonder why things are not being done in the open, why we would not have a public hearing, even if it is a streamlined public hearing. I think it is fair to say that it does serve the public interest well to be doing the business of the public in the open.

As my hon. friend from Victoria made so amply clear in his presentation, this bill would politicize the decisions regarding whether to simply grant a permit or to hold public hearings to consider an export proposal. We have seen too many decisions made not in the public interest but in the political interest of the government in office.

By the legislation, the final decision on whether a public hearing is held or not is made by cabinet, not the National Energy Board. This means that the decision under this system is much more likely to be made on narrow political grounds. I do not have to remind us of the F–18 decision on which every single expert who made his or her views known said that this particular proposal should go to western Canada; every single witness, every expert, and the government did exactly the opposite.

We have seen ample evidence that decisions that are very important to certain regions and certain provinces are made on political grounds I can see under this process under which no public hearing would be called where the members of a large province might say that it is in our interest as a province, or the area of Canada from which we come, to export substantially increased amounts of electricity to the United States when, in fact, it would be quite contrary to the national good. Again, this shows the political clout of large provinces, at least when it comes to population.

Let me simply conclude by repeating the idea that electricity will soon be seen as a strategic resource in the future of our country, not simply another commodity for export. I suggest that because it will be a strategic resource of the future it should be carefully and jealously husbanded and that means carefully regulated. We should ensure that there is always an opportunity for public hearings so the public's interest can be presented and the decision can be made in the interest of the public. We should ensure that decisions for electricity export are not politicized and are made as independent from the political process as possible. We should protect the independence of the chief regulatory body, in this case the National Energy Board, and we should certainly not increase the duration of export licences by 20 per cent. Twenty-five years is more than ample.

Always over our shoulder is the haunting spectre of the free trade deal. Many of us felt that this was simply a major step so the United States could get more control and more access to our natural resources which are of strategic importance; oil, gas and electricity. Now we see bills and legislation moving through the House to facilitate that opportunity, not for Canadians but for the United States and for Americans.

We should ensure that Canadians, not Americans, gain the most from our Canadian resources. This bill obviously needs to be seriously reworked. For that reason the New Democratic Party will vote against it at this stage. It is ill-conceived; it is wrong-headed; it is not acting in our best interests. We hope, Mr. Speaker, since the government majority will likely pass this bill at second reading, that at least during committee hearings and report stage sufficient amendments can be included to make this bill advantageous for Canada as opposed to advantageous for the United States of America.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys, in leading off the debate for our side, has said essentially what we need to say on this in so far as the provisions of the bill are concerned. I rise though because there is an aspect of the bill, certainly an implication in the bill, which has some particular specific import for the province that I have the honour to represent here together with a number of other people.

First, as has been said by a number of people, this bill seeks to facilitate the export of electricity to the United States. I could spend some time on that issue if I did not want to save my time for the other issue that I will identify in a moment. Just in passing, it seems that the garage sale of Canada continues. Come May, the month everybody decides to have a fire sale of sorts, they have what has come to be known in Canada as the backyard sale or the garage sale. Often you sell things you do not need, but that is not the analogy I am drawing here. You often sell them at fire sale prices and that is the analogy I am drawing here.

The garage sale of Canada continues. Everything is for sale at bargain-basement prices, but there is only one customer, the United States. I guess the garage sale analogy is not a particularly good one because even as a garage sale it is very restricted.

I want to come to another issue that is of concern to me, and I believe to many in this chamber, and that relates to the inconsistency here, the incongruity between, on the one hand, facilitating the export of electricity to the United States while at the same time preventing one province of Canada, the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, from moving its electricity across provincial barriers. This issue has a long and bitter history. It is not yet resolved and it is far from resolved. We who live in the province suffer because of the present situation.

I want to draw a parallel for you, Mr. Speaker, that you will be familiar with. We have our pipelines bringing gas from western Canada to Ontario and Quebec. There was never ever any question at the time it was proposed about the right to put the pipeline through the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba so that the gas could be transported into Ontario. It was understood and facilitated by the federal government of the day that if there was a product, in this case gas, in western Canada that needed to be moved to the central and eastern Canada market that it ought to move. If that required a physical trespass of the provinces in between, in this case Saskatchewan and Manitoba, so be it.

Of course, members will be aware that for many years we have moved gas through a pipeline built across those provinces into Ontario and Quebec. Compare that circumstance with the following one: The province of Newfoundland and Labrador has at Churchill Falls in Labrador a magnificent hydro generation facility put there in the mid 1960s with the collaboration of the two provincial governments, the government of Newfoundland and Labrador on the one hand and the government of Quebec on the other, and in particular the collaboration of their respective hydro agencies; Newfoundland and Labrador Hydro as it is now known, in the one case, and Quebec Hydro in the other case.

I will not go into the details of the funding for that particular capital project because these details would be extraneous to the point that I want to make here. I ask you again to reflect on my example given a moment ago about the movement of gas from western Canada into Ontario via a pipeline across the provinces affected.

I ask you to compare that with the situation in which you have hydroelectricity generated in Churchill Falls, Labrador, in the province of Newfoundland for consumption elsewhere, for the most part in the United States. As you will know, Mr. Speaker, electricity from that source in Churchill Falls, Labrador, has for many years been consumed in the United States, particularly in the state of New York.

How does it get from Churchill Falls, Labrador, in the province of Newfoundland to the state of New York? A quick look at your map will show you that the most expeditious route is for it to go across the province of Quebec, and that indeed is the way it does go, but that is not the full story. It goes that way only because of a middleman arrangement where in effect Hydro Quebec is the man in the middle. Hydro buys from Newfoundland and Labrador Hydro and market sells to the customer in the United States.

That sounds like a fairly sensible transaction until you look at the dollars involved. I do not have them all in front of me but members will be aware of one of the two basic issues here, both of which I want to identify.

One issue, of course, is the pittance that Newfoundland receives for its resource compared to the many hundreds of millions of dollars which Hydro Quebec receives, first, for being the marketer, but also, we acknowledge, for having been an investor in the project at the time it was constructed back in the mid 1960s. I do not want to mislead the House but the figures are of the order of a few million dollars in the case of Newfoundland's annual receipts—I am talking $20 million, $30 million—and $800 million in the case of the annual receipts that accrue to the Quebec treasury through Hydro Quebec.

We have all agreed, irrespective of where we sit in this chamber, that that is an unconscionable deal. We are also aware of the nature of contractual obligations and we in Newfoundland and Labrador have done what we think is the decent thing, although it is hard to swallow at times. We have done what people in institutions do everywhere, we have honoured the contract, as unconscionable as it is.

For some time there has been another way to resolve a related issue. Why a related issue? Well, why would we in Newfoundland and Labrador ever get into another deal like that? We have the resources to do so. In Newfoundland and Labrador we have the headwaters of those five rivers which flow to the sea in southern Quebec.

For many years there have been proposals that the two provinces ought to collaborate in developing and marketing that power.

There is also the Muskrat Falls development in Newfoundland and Labrador which would be developed, but why should we repeat the Upper Churchill Falls fiasco? Why should we again get ourselves in a situation where we are the hewers of wood and the drawers of water, where we are the people receiving the welfare rates, the minimum wage as it were, when another province is getting the real benefit from our resource?

I ask you, is that what happened in the case of the western provinces when they wanted to move their gas to Ontario? No. They continue to receive full market value for their resource which moves across other provinces. We want to move our resource across a province, in this case the province of Quebec, but we have not been permitted to do so. The solution has been there for some time but it has not been acted upon.

If we go back to 1981–82, the then Government of Canada brought in amendments to the National Energy Board which would have given Newfoundland wheeling rights, that is to say it would have given it the prerogative, the authority, to build a transmission line across the province of Quebec. We all know that proposal, beyond being amended in terms of the act, never got to the implementation stage, and I think we all know why. At the same time, I think that if we are going to stand here in this chamber and talk about the desirability of facilitating freer movement of Canadian electricity into the United States market, we ought to put all our cards on the table. What we are talking about, in effect, is the free movement of some Canadian electricity and this bill does absolutely nothing except add to the insult. It does absolutely nothing to facilitate the movement of that rich resource called Labrador hydro power from Labrador to its markets in the populous northeastern United States. What would that do for the economic well-being of the province of Newfoundland? It would change over night from the so-called, have-not status to a have status.

I believe it was Joey Smallwood in his heyday who used to talk about the last remaining storehouse of wealth in North America in reference to Labrador. He was right. The irony is that we who own the storehouse do not really have the keys to it. We own the resource but we cannot unlock it to the benefit of our people in Newfoundland and Labrador. So it is difficult for me as a Newfoundlander to sit in this House when this bill is being discussed and not rise at least for a few moments to flag that terrible circumstance.

I would make one appeal again, the appeal that has been made many times, the appeal to fairness, the same principle that ensured that western gas would move to Ontario. I would appeal to consistency, the principle that surely dictates that if you do it in the case of gas from western Canada, you ought to do the parallel thing in relation to the movement of hydroelectricity in the case of Newfoundland.

I alluded to the reason. Let me be more specific. The reason is summed up in the little cliche "Might is right". It is summed up in the unspoken understanding that there are more votes in Quebec than there are in Newfoundland. That we understand. We only have to watch what is happening to the Unemployment Insurance Act, Canada Post, railway abandonment, to the decision on the CF-18, taking it from Manitoba and putting it into Quebec, to understand the reality of how decisions get made these days by this particular government.

I am not sure why I take the trouble on this one. I am not sure because I know full well that Newfoundland's circumstance in this important matter must be of no consequence at all to the purveyors of what must be the most right-wing Tory agenda ever inflicted on any country anywhere. Why would this crowd, including the member for St. John's West and the member for St. John's East, be bothered with details such as whether Newfoundland becomes a have province or continues to languish as a have-not province. Why should they be concerned with that kind of detail when they are so busy being the attendants at the garage sale of Canada to the Americans, be it in electricity or any other of our resources?

Why do I take the time, Mr. Speaker? Because, at the very least, those of us who are sent here to represent the interests of Newfoundlanders and Labradorans have an obligation to flag this issue at every opportunity. We have the obligation to call attention to the despicably punitive treatment which Newfoundland is receiving because of this deal—not only the Upper Churchill, I talk of that too—but I talk also about the continuing refusal to allow Newfoundland to market its resource by moving it across another province, even though that same thing has been done in so far as gas is concerned for western Canada.

Now, speaking clichés, it has been said many times that none is so deaf as he who will not hear and so blind as he who will not see. That is really what we are dealing with here. Last weekend the Prime Minister allowed that Canadians had bent over backwards to bring Newfoundland into Confederation back in 1949. We get that kind of disdainful, condescending attitude towards Newfoundland. We have a Prime Minister who has dispatched his minions to Newfoundland, as he has done today in the person of the Minister for International Trade, the member for St. John's West, to tell Newfoundlanders who are scarcely finding enough money to put bread and butter on the table—those who depend on the fishery either as plant workers or fishermen—when and who are having trouble making ends meet that there is no problem in the fishery, that everything is hunky-dory, coming up roses. It is not difficult to understand why that same Prime Minister stands by and allows the present unconscionable situation as it affects Churchill Falls power and Labrador Power generally to continue.

I realize that my time has just about run out. I believe I have made the essential point that this bill, while it may well facilitate the export of electricity to the United States—and there are pros and cons there which we will be getting into by way of amendments in committee—has for Newfoundlanders another ominous implication. The insult will now become more graphic, more technical. It is the insult that says that if you live anywhere else in Canada, yes, you can move your products to the United States or wherever you want, but if you live in Newfoundland you are going to have to ask permission. Then, once you ask it, you are not going to get it, particularly if it relates to your richest resource, hydro power from Labrador. That is the shame of it. We will keep fighting that until somebody over there hears.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, if those of us who are here cared to look outside they would confirm that it is a rather dreary and slow moving Friday afternoon with the House virtually empty as members get ready to go to their constituencies and handle constituency duties over the weekend as well as spend time with their families for Thanksgiving.

I say that with recognition of the fact that those duties themselves are very important. I think it is does bring to light the interesting consequence or coincidence that this Bill is brought to the floor at this particular time of the day and this particular time of the week. It appears almost insignificant as it is brought up for debate. It is an insignificant appearing bill, and yet one that is extremely vital in defining and determining Canada's future and the future of Canada's resources. I would venture to say that the presentation of this bill to the House marks a turning point in the control of Canada's resource industry.

I think what we see in this bill is a clear and yet insidious attempt of this government to harmonize our energy policies with that of our neighbour to the south. Clearly, we are undoing some of the regulatory control that we have traditionally had over our resource industries, such as electricity in this case.

The purpose of this bill is very succinct. It is to facilitate the export of electrical power to the United States. Let's call a spade a spade. That is what it is here for.

I want to say that I agree with my colleagues who have spoken on this issue before, electricity is important as an energy commodity in Canada. It will become increasingly important within the next few years as we struggle to extract ourselves from an economy, a society that has relied on fossil fuels as a major energy source. Everyone here in the chamber and every person across Canada certainly knows the problems that not only Canada but the world is having in terms of emissions of carbon dioxide and global warming.

Electricity is a clean energy source, and because of that will become extremely important in the immediate future. Because it will become increasingly important to Canada as a major energy resource, it stands to reason that the subject of this Bill, that is, how we regulate that energy in the years to come, should also receive some very careful consideration.

For historical reasons there has been a considerable overlap between the provinces and the federal government in terms of the regulation of the electrical industry in Canada. From the outset, when our national energy program was established, the federal government held firmly to the very basic principle that all quantities of electricity to be exported must be surplus to our needs, both to the present needs and to the needs in the reasonably foreseeable future.

Even when the National Energy Board Act in 1959 extended the maximum export licence period for exports from one to 25 years in duration there was still the very clear expectation that our long-term energy export licences would be granted only in the exceptional circumstances that we did in fact have energy supplies surplus to our needs.

In light of the growing importance of electrical energy and the entry of Canada into the free trade agreement with the United States, there continues to be a very important role for regulation. It is important that Canadian consumers have a secure energy supply, not only in electrical power but in all sources of energy. It is important that Canadians have reasonable and equal access on a regional basis to those energy supplies.

It is important to regulate the industry to assist in the development of the regions of this country that are not so well off. We can use it as a regional development tool. I might add that in light of the free trade agreement the ability of Canada to utilize its energy resources for regional economic development incentives has been sadly diminished.

It is important to balance the interest of investors with over-all public interest. If the industry is not adequately regulated, then it is conceivable that electrical monopolies which are shielded from competition could in fact gouge their customers. It is conceivable that a group of investors or, indeed, even a province, could push through a profitable electrical enterprise that in fact would harm environmentally surrounding areas such as coal-generated electrical power.

It is conceivable that short-sighted decisions taken today could cause future generations to pay more for their power than would have been the case if proper regulatory controls were implemented and adhered to. I think that regulation of these exports is clearly essential if the interests of Canadians are to be protected adequately.

I want to go back to the main thrust of the bill, because this bill is very clear in its intent. It is to make the export of electrical energy from Canada easier. We all know where our major customer for that export lies. This bill is to streamline the process. This bill is to harmonize with our U.S. neighbour the process of free trade in electrical energy.

I firmly believe this bill is a pay-off of the Prime Minister to the premier for his support in the election on that free trade agreement. It is a political pay-off.

I know that our U.S. customers have for some time complained about the means that we have of protecting our national interests. They have been trying to get hold of our energy resources for some time. The free trade agreement has finally given them that handle. They have found in the past with the National Energy Board our process of public hearings, of ensuring that there is full debate on whether exports are granted, is burdensome. They do not want to deal with all those details. It is too inconvenient.

Some people have even suggested that the existing process is, in fact, a duplication of efforts. We are not convinced of that on this side of the House. I believe that my colleagues and I are unconvinced that the current process needs to be changed as radically as this legislation intends.

I am concerned also that the changes that are proposed in this bill could undermine the protection that the existing legislation provides the Canadian public in the future, particularly in light of the fact that we are now in a post free trade environment.

I am concerned that this bill could mean that the consumers in the United States could enjoy a substantial benefit at our expense.

When the Reagan administration was negotiating the free trade deal with Canada, its officials, after securing the provisions in the chapter concerning energy, were bold enough to declare that the energy section in the free trade agreement was a major prize in the bilateral trade agreement. The continental market established by the free trade agreement in energy covers almost every kind of energy product: oil, natural gas, coal, as well as electricity.

The accord has now been ratified. That reality came down upon us at the beginning of the year. As a result of that agreement we have now lost the right to use minimum export prices. We have lost the right to tax on exports or to influence export quotas as instruments of national energy policy.

I want to add that the interpreters for the government, when they were involved in the free trade negotiations, said that Canada has no obligation to supply energy to the United States, no obligation whatsoever. But, in fact, when we look at it, the claim is a shoddy play on words.

When we investigate it in detail we see that the deal concedes to the private energy corporations operating in Canada—and I must add including U.S. subsidiaries operating in Canada—the right to sell in the United States as much or as little of our non-renewable resources, including electricity, as they choose. Canadian governments, both federal and provincial, are going to have little or no control over this process.

I want to refer directly to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and specifically to the chapter on energy, Chapter 9. The articles within that chapter give to our U.S. counterparts access to our resources and proportional sharing of our resources. That is to say, once we have established an export market in electricity, for example, and if we were to undergo a shortage in Canada, we could not cut back on that commodity export to the United States unless we cut back the equivalent amount to our own domestic customers. It gives them equal access to a resource that is going to be critically important in Canada's future.

It goes on to say in Article 907 that neither party, neither the U.S. nor Canada, shall maintain or introduce a measure restricting imports of energy goods from or any exports of an energy good to the other party. We cannot restrict access once that access is granted. In times of shortage, in times of crisis, we cannot cut back on those export supplies unless we in fact cut back even to our own customers.

I maintain and reiterate that this piece of legislation, as innocent as it looks, is the legislative process by which we are moving in to free trade in our energy resources with the United States. As innocent as this piece of legislation is, I maintain it is extremely vital to Canada's future and in the ability of we as a nation to maintain some degree of control over these resource commodities in the future. Once we lose control of our energy resources, we lose control of our economy. That is why this bill is so critically important.

Electricity is a strategic commodity. The United States knows that. The free trade agreement had nothing to do with reduction of tariff barriers, although that is included in it. What the United States wanted out of the free trade agreement and got was clear access to Canada's non-renewable resources. We all know darn well that south of the border the Americans are running short on their resources, their energy supplies, their water. They now have to import oil supplies. They have an energy wasteful economy. Now they have an energy short economy. They are turning to Canada, to our waters, to our subterranean fossil fuels. They are turning to Canada as a resource haven to continue their mindless process of industrial and economic expansion.

That is why this piece of legislation is so vital to debate. If we let it go through we will in fact be relinquishing control of a very vital resource, and that is our energy supplies.

Based upon that argument I think it is no surprise that my colleagues and I will certainly not be supporting this legislation.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my colleague, the member for Okanagan—Shuswap, who in a previous incarnation was a member of the British Columbia legislature for an area which is now within my federal riding of Kootenay West—Revelstoke, particularly representing the communities of Burton, Fauquier and Edgewood, and what used to be the community of Arrow Park. He has shown by his remarks that he fully understands the apprehension, even the fear, of many people in the West Kootenay Basin and the Columbia River Valley of any measure such is now before us which tends to weaken the potential power of the public to have some say in what happens to our electrical energy resources and the water resources that are connected to them.

He will also be fully aware of the massive rejection of the free trade agreement that took place in his area and in ours, where in elections from 1974 through 1979, through 1980 and 1984, margins were some 700 votes no matter whether they were in favour of myself of the New Democratic Party or of Mr. Brisco of the Conservative Party.

In this last election it was up around the 4,000 figure. The reason for that was that in many parts of his constituency, as in mine, we were once before in Canadian history the guinea pigs for a continental energy policy when the Columbia River Treaty was shoved down our throats even with public hearings. We lost our communities. We lost some of the best farm land and some of the best forest land in the province of British Columbia.

It is because of that experience and that fear that we so massively rejected what we thought was at the heart of the free trade agreement espoused by the government.

My colleague said that we in the New Democratic Party would be voting against Bill C-23 because it weakens the potential power of the public to have a say as to what happens to them, their communities, their water, and their power. Even if we did not see that clearly ourselves, it would be impossible for us not to listen to the ghosts of the people who are buried under the waters of the Arrow Lakes and the Columbia River and in the communities of Burton and Arrow Park.

They paid the price, even in their burial places, of having that continental energy policy thrust down their throats. We are suspicious, and we have good reason. The government can only say: "Well, trust us, trust the bureaucracies, trust the power utilities, trust B.C. Hydro, trust all the other power corporations, be they public or private across the country, and trust the governments, our provincial governments and our federal government. We do not need to have public hearings. We will leave that up to the politicians and the bureaucrats to decide".

On the basis of our experience, our predecessors' experience and his own experience can he have that kind of trust in any government, especially considering that it was a Conservative government that negotiated and a Liberal government that implemented the treaty which hurt our communities and our people in the past?

Mr. MacWilliam: To answer the question specifically with regard to trust, I think that to a large measure I speak for my constituents in general when I say that there is a great distrust of the actions of this government with regard to entering into the free trade agreement and the sell-out of our energy and non-renewable resources.

My colleague's recollection of the arguments presented during the election on the free trade agreement as it applies to energy is very accurate. People are very concerned about it, and are still so. The fact is that we have seen the ravages of the effects of damming and the erasing of thousands of hectares of viable agricultural land, and changing the entire lifestyle of communities throughout a whole valley. I speak specifically of the damming of the Columbia River when the Columbia River Power Treaty was initiated. We have seen what can happen to the economies. We have seen what can happen to the lifestyle in a valley when that happens. We are concerned about it. There is a great deal of distrust of both federal and provincial actions.

We know, for example, that the Columbia River Power Treaty is coming up for renegotiation in 1992. It is very likely to expect that our American friends to the south will not want less water over the spillways. They probably will want more. For an area such as the Okanagan—Shuswap that is traditionally semi-arid because it is water-short, that poses some very serious problems for us. People are very much afraid that once you turn the taps on, you never turn them off. This brings to mind another plan that was dreamed up by our friends in the United States. I do not know what they think of us up here but they had the gall to dream up the NAWAPA plan, the North America Water and Power Alliance.

It is a simple little idea. You take British Columbia, you damn the south end of the Rocky Mountain trench, you flood the whole rest of the Rocky Mountain trench right up into the Yukon and use it as a massive reservoir to feed the Coke machines down in Los Angeles and San Diego. "It is a massive water and energy reservoir". It is arrogance to suggest that British Columbians or Canadians would allow that kind of thing to happen, flooding thousands and thousands of acres of British Columbia to serve as a reservoir for the southwestern U.S. power grid. That plan is still being talked about within the lobby groups that have the ear of the minister of energy.

Look at who negotiated our free trade agreement. Mr. Reisman was the grand designer of the grand canal scheme. It was a simple little plan to take James Bay and dump it into the Mississippi system.

We know what Mr. Reisman said about the water resources in Canada. He said this would be the carrot with which to negotiate the free trade agreement with the United States, and he used it as the carrot. The United States, as is a reasonable response, rubbed its hands in glee. It snatched the carrot, signed the deal, and now we are getting prepared for it to walk away with our energy supplies.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Nepean on a question or comment.

Mrs. Gaffney: First I would like to compliment my colleague from the NDP party on a powerful, emotional speech.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Gaffney: This is a very quick question because I know people are anxious to get home, but if a province decides it wants to export electricity into the U.S., what means or what mechanism will be in place that will allow Canadians to receive full disclosure of the actual export? Do you think that that is going to be covered in this bill?

Mr. MacWilliam: I think the member brings up a very perceptive question. What kind of access, what kind of process of disclosure is allowable under this particular piece of legislation? In looking at the details of this legislation, I would say that we have a considerable lessening of the ability of common taxpayers to investigate what the ramifications of an energy export provision are because through this bill they want to eliminate a lot of the process of public discussion and public disclosure. In response to a very important question that that process for public discussion with regard to the irrevocable sale of an energy resource has, in fact, been shut off. The people will have less chance to debate those issues.

That is precisely why the people in British Columbia and the people across Canada do not trust this type of legislation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that I call it 3 o'clock? The honourable parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cooper: May I, on behalf of the government, say that we have no intention of introducing any further legislation. We are quite happy to call it 3 o'clock.

We would like to wish all our colleagues in the House a very happy and good Thanksgiving.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Kamloops on the same point.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I want to say that we appreciate the generous comments offered by the parliamentary secretary.

Was it recorded in terms of the actual vote that it was passing on division?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes.

PRIVILEGE

CONTENTS OF NEWSPAPER ADVERTISEMENT—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I am now ready to rule on the question of privilege which was raised on September 25 by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition concerning the government advertisements which appeared in newspapers on August 26 relating to the proposed goods and services tax.

From the very outset, I wish to state emphatically that the Chair has no intention of dealing with the relative merits or limitations of the proposed tax; the Chair has absolutely no role to play in such political matters. The Chair's sole responsibility in this instance is to determine whether the matter raised by the Leader of the Opposition warrants setting aside the regular business of the House.

Citation 84(2) of Beauchesne's Rules and Forms of the House of Commons, fifth edition states:

> It has often been laid down that the Speaker's function in ruling on a claim of breach of privilege is limited to deciding the formal question, whether the case conforms with the conditions which alone entitle it to take precedence over the notices of motions and Orders of the Day standing on the Order Paper; and does not extend to deciding the question of substance, whether a breach of privilege has in fact been committed—a question which can only be decided by the House itself.

[Translation]

I want to again stress that the Speaker does not rule on whether a breach of privilege or a contempt has in fact been committed. The Speaker only determines whether an application based on a claim of contempt or breach of privilege is, on first impression, of sufficient importance to set aside the regular business of the House and go forward for a decision by the House. That is the narrow point that the Chair must decide.

[English]

It might be appropriate to first review some of the facts surrounding the present case. On August 26, 1989, the Department of Finance published in newspapers across the country an advertisement which stated:

> On January 1, 1991, Canada's Federal Sales Tax System will change. Please save this notice. It explains the changes and the reasons for them.

I point out that this ad was a full-page ad and the letters were very large indeed.

Let me repeat the wording of the advertisement in French.

> Le 1er janvier 1991, le régime de la taxe fédérale de vente connaîtra des modifications. Veuillez conserver cet avis. Il explique les modifications apportées et les raisons qui y président.

I should point out that in French, then, the ad went perhaps even farther than what was implied in the English.

The advertisement went on to explain that the goods and services tax "will replace the existing federal sales tax" and it outlined very specific proposed changes. It is true that in the ad some of those changes were set out under the heading "Proposed Changes".

In the interventions on September 25, the Hon. Member for Parkdale—High Park pointed out that these ads also appeared in many ethnocultural newspapers across Canada. At the invitation of the hon. member I examined a number of the newspapers in question, and found that most of these advertisements were published in early September, and that some of them were printed in Italian and Lithuanian.

The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier, in his intervention, laid stress on the fact that, in the French text, the wording of the advertisement suggests that the changes have already been made or adopted in so much that the ad uses a "participe passé" namely the word "adoptés".

In presenting his case for a breach of privilege, the Leader of the Opposition dealt with a number of serious issues. If I may be permitted to summarize his arguments, he makes two basic claims: first, that the advertisement prejudices the future proceedings of the House and of the finance committee which has undertaken an examination of a technical paper on the subject; and second, that the advertisement is a contempt of Parliament because it leaves readers to infer that the House has no role in the passage of the tax, thus misleading the Canadian public concerning the procedures employed by Parliament in adopting such legislation. To quote from the right hon. member at pages 3809–10 of Hansard:

> The wording "Please Save This Notice", followed by chapter and verse of the alleged tax changes, constitutes a basis for a question of privilege.

At least this is the argument of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. He continued:

> Those words "Please Save This Notice" constitute a contempt of Parliament, constitute an intimidation of Parliament, because the only inference to be drawn from the words "Please Save This Notice" is that it does not matter what members of Parliament do in dealing with these taxes. It does not matter what the committee on finance does with respect these taxes.

He goes on to argue:

> These advertisements violate our parliamentary tradition in two more ways. They prejudice the proceedings that are now before the Standing Committee on Finance as well as prejudicing future proceedings of the House itself.

The hon. member for Oshawa and Leader of the New Democratic Party spoke in support of the claims made by the Leader of the Opposition. In addition, he raised the issue of the propriety of a government using public funds to advertise its position on a debate which has yet to be held in Parliament. On this specific point, I would like to immediately refer to the ruling of Speaker Sauvé on October 17, 1980, at page 3781 of Hansard and I quote:

> "The fact that certain members feel they are disadvantaged by not having the same funds to advertise as does the government, which could possibly be a point of debate, as a matter of impropriety or under any other heading, does not constitute a prima facie case of privilege—"

I feel, just as Speaker Sauvé concluded, that this is an important issue which merits consideration, but it should not take place under the aegis of privilege.

[English]

To continue with the arguments presented to the Chair on the question of privilege, the Minister of Justice rose to make three basic points for rejecting this application as a breach of privilege or contempt of the House. He referred to the fact that the finance committee itself unanimously recommended that if the government were to proceed with the value-added tax it should publicize the details of that tax. He also explained that in the budget which was approved by the House, the government had indicated that the goods and services tax would be implemented on January 1, 1991. Finally, since the committee is presently studying the issue, he suggested that no case can be made for the claim that the committee's work is being impeded.

The Chair has also considered the arguments made by the hon. member for Windsor West, the hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Peace River, and I would like to thank them for their interventions in this serious matter.

[Translation]

In the present case, the Chair must address a number of issues. I intend to first deal with the issue of whether or not there has been a breach of privilege insofar as the advertisement prejudices the work of the House or the Committee. I will then deal with the claim that the advertisement is a contempt of Parliament because it infers that the House does not have any role to play in the passage of the tax, and that it misrepresents to the Canadian public the procedures employed by Parliament in adopting legislation.

[English]

Before proceeding with the first issue, the Chair feels it might be useful to offer members a short explanation of the difference between what constitutes a contempt of the House and what constitutes a breach of privilege.

The privileges extended to members individually and to the House as a collectivity are finite. They are generally categorized under five headings which are: freedom of speech, freedom from arrest in civil actions, exemptions from jury duty, exemption from attendance as a witness, and freedom from molestation. As Erskine May explains on pages 70 and 71 of the twentieth edition:

> The distinctive mark of a privilege is its ancillary character. The privileges of Parliament are rights which are "absolutely necessary for the due execution of its powers". They are enjoyed by individual Members, because the House cannot perform its functions without unimpeded use of the services of its Members; and by each House for the protection of its Members and the vindication of its own authority and dignity.

As a result, when members claim that a certain action constitutes a breach of privilege, they must specify which privilege is affected.

Contempts, on the other hand, cannot be enumerated or categorized. As Speaker Sauvé explained in a ruling on October 29, 1980, at page 4214 of Hansard:

> —while our privileges are defined, contempt of the House has no limits. When new ways are found to interfere with our proceedings, so too will the House, in appropriate cases, be able to find that a contempt of the House has occurred.

Broadly speaking, contempts are offences against the authority or the dignity of the House of Commons. They include situations which cannot specifically be claimed as breaches of the privileges of the House. As noted at pages 71 and 143 of Erskine May's twentieth edition:

> Each House also claims the right to punish actions, which, while not breaches of any specific privilege, are offences against its authority or dignity, such as disobedience to its legitimate commands or libels upon itself, its officers or its Members. Such actions, though often called "breaches of privilege", are more properly distinguished as "contempts".

It goes on:

> It would be vain to attempt an enumeration of every act which might be construed into a contempt, the power to punish for contempt being in its nature discretionary—. It may be stated generally that any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any Member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, produce such results may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence.

As already mentioned, it is not possible to categorize or to delineate what may fall under the definition of a contempt. It is not even possible to categorize the "severity" of a contempt. As a procedural authority on the Lok Sabha of India, that is the Indian Parliament, explains in Practice and Procedure of Parliament at page 209:

> Contempts of Parliament may, however, vary greatly in their nature and their gravity. At one extreme they may consist in little more than vulgar and irresponsible abuse; at the other they may constitute grave attacks undermining the very institution of Parliament itself.

In summary, all breaches of privileges are contempts of the House, but not all contempts are necessarily breaches of privilege. A contempt may be an act or an omission; it does not have to actually obstruct or impede the House or a member, it merely has to have the tendency to produce such results. Matters ranging from minor breaches of decorum to grave attacks against the authority of Parliament may be considered as contempts.

In the present case, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) contends that the advertisement by the Department of Finance prejudices the future proceedings of the House and the Finance Committee.

The Chair must determine which of the specific privileges of the House have been breached.

[English]

Certainly, freedom of speech has not been affected. The committee is continuing its deliberations and the House will no doubt be debating the several issues surrounding the proposed goods and services tax, either through Question Period or on the report of the finance committee which will be presented to the House no later than November 28, 1989. The House will also have the opportunity to debate any bills that the government may propose to the House and will also have an opportunity to vote on any Ways and Means motions, which necessarily precede the introduction of any such bills. The opportunity for debate and amendment are too numerous to list. Suffice it to say that those opportunities have not been diminished.

• (1120)

Now, has the House or have any Members been obstructed in the performance of their duties? In order for an obstruction to take place, there would have had to be some action which prevented the House or Members from attending to their duties, or which cast such serious reflections on a Member that he or she was not able to fulfill his or her responsibilities. I would submit that this is not the case in the present situation.

I would also like to point out that the House and its committees do not work in a vacuum. Members are constantly aware of outside factors and pressures. Since no threats or bribes have been made, it is difficult to see how the work of the House or the Finance Committee has been prejudiced or which specific privilege has been breached.

On this issue, I cannot find that any privilege has been breached.

[English]

In the present case, does the advertisement of the Department of Finance amount to a contempt of the House of Commons? The right hon. Leader of the Opposition argues that the advertisement in question is misleading in that it gives the general public the impression that this proposed change to the taxation system is a fait accompli and that Parliament has no role to play in examining and approving the changes. The effect of this may tend to diminish the authority of the House in the eyes of the public.

In reply, the Minister of Justice stated and I quote from page 3821 of Hansard, and this was the argument of the Minister of Justice:

> The ads were for proposed changes. They were for informational purposes. In fact they have done their job and we have hundreds and thousands of requests for information. We are trying to inform the people.

The justice minister explains that it was never the government's intention to suggest that legislation would not be submitted to Parliament for debate. During Question Period on September 25, the Minister of Finance also stated that the purpose of the ad was to inform, and in keeping with other documents of the spring budget.

Should the Chair accept the government's explanation and rule that no deliberate contempt was made? At this point it may be useful to quote from a Canadian authority on privilege. As Joseph Maingot explains at page 213 of Parliamentary Privilege in Canada:

> There are actions which, while not directly—obstructing the House of Commons or the member, nevertheless obstruct the House in the performance of its functions by diminishing the respect due it. As in the case of a court of law, the House of Commons is entitled to the utmost respect—.

Does the advertisement diminish the respect due to the House? The hon. member for Windsor West put forward the following argument at page 3823 of Hansard:

> When this advertisement—says in effect there will be a new tax on January 1, 1991,—the advertisement is intended to convey the idea that Parliament has acted on it because that is, I am sure, the ordinary understanding of Canadians about how a tax like this is finally adopted and comes into effect. That being the case, it is clearly a contempt of Parliament because it amounts to a misrepresentation of the role of this House.

The Chair is in a quandary. The arguments on both sides of the question are very strong. To add to the Chair's difficulties, procedural authorities also point out that precedents cannot be relied upon to determine if a contempt exists. In contrast, the Chair can more easily determine when a privilege has been breached because the categories are finite and rulings can be based on precedents and authorities. This case is certainly unique. Analogies can be made to the decision rendered by Speaker Sauvé on October 17, 1980, but at that time the issue centred on the propriety of the government to advertise in advance of a debate taking place in the House. The issue was not whether the dignity of the House had been affected.

Under these conditions, the Chair feels it must exercise extreme caution against unduly restricting the authority of the House to deal with a perceived contempt, especially given the arguments which have been presented.

[English]

I must confess that I have certain doubts regarding this case. Normally in cases of doubt, it has been the practice for Speakers to allow an appropriate motion to go forward for a decision of the House. To this effect, I would like to read from a ruling of Speaker Jerome, found at page 3975 of Hansard for March 21, 1978, where he quotes from a report of the United Kingdom Select Committee on Parliamentary Privileges.

> —it might be inferred that the test applied by the Speaker in deciding whether to give precedence over the orders of the day to a complaint of breach of privilege—is, Does the act complained of appear to me at first sight to be a breach of privilege? Rigorously applied, it would mean that no complaint of breach of privilege could ever be entertained unless the Speaker was of opinion that the act or conduct complained of was a breach of privilege—.

> Borderline cases and arguable ones would be excluded automatically because in such cases the Speaker could not say that he was of opinion that the act or conduct which was the subject of complaint prima facie constituted a breach of privilege.
> In my submission the question which the Speaker should ask himself—should be—has the Member an arguable point? If the Speaker feels any doubt on the question, he should—leave it to the House.

That is a quote in a judgment by Speaker Jerome citing, I should make it clear, the United Kingdom Select Committee on Parliamentary Privileges.

In order to clarify my thoughts on the issue of prima facie and to dispel the doubts that I have referred to, the Chair has pondered the intent of the offending advertisement as compared to its contents. I can express my own opinion that the content was obviously drafted in a cavalier manner; there is an element of confidence, if not of boldness, in the use of a phrase as definitive as "save this ad".

The Ministers of Justice and of Finance have said to the House that the intent of the ad was to inform Canadians. Members are well aware of our practice of accepting the word of an hon. member of the House. In accepting the ministers' explanations, the question of intent is answered and accordingly some of the Chair's doubts are also dispelled. The intent of the ad was not to diminish the dignity of the House. It is difficult to find prima facie contempt.

However, I want the House to understand very clearly that if your Speaker ever has to consider a situation like this again, the Chair will not be as generous. This is a case which, in my opinion, should never recur. I expect the Department of Finance and other departments to study this ruling carefully and remind everyone within the Public Service that we are a parliamentary democracy, not a so-called executive democracy, nor a so-called administrative democracy.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: In order that all hon. members know exactly what the procedure is, and in order that members of the public who are watching and listening understand clearly what the procedure is, let me return to what I said before, that if I had decided that this matter ought to go to the House, it would be followed, or could be followed, by a debate and a vote.

I believe it is in the interest of our parliamentary system of government to have a clear statement from the Speaker which cannot be misinterpreted either in debate or by a vote. A vote on this issue might not support the very important message which your Speaker wishes to convey and which I hope will be well considered in the future by governments, departmental officials and advertisement agencies retained by them. This advertisement may not be a contempt of the House in the narrow confines of a procedural definition, but it is, in my opinion, ill-conceived and it does a great disservice to the great traditions of this place. If we do not preserve these great traditions, our freedoms are at peril and our conventions become a mockery. I insist, and I believe I am supported by the majority of moderate and responsible members on both sides of the House, that this ad is objectionable and should never be repeated.

I have deliberately made this ruling with great care in order that if ever this issue has to be debated and considered by this House again these comments will serve to guide the House in its deliberations.

ORDER IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1). These have been referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

BILL C-21—REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the chairman I have honour to present the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, in both official languages, with amendments.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the second report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

In this report the public accounts committee addresses the need to attain an unqualified audit opinion on the audited financial statements of the Government of Canada.

For a number of years now the Auditor General, who audits the accounts of the government, has been expressing several reservations in his audit opinion on the government's financial statement. For the issues associated with two of these reservations considerable progress has been made in the accounting profession and in the government departments responsible for the preparation of the accounts of the financial statements of Canada.

These reservations concern first the consolidation of Crown corporations in the government's accounts and second the accounting for employee pension liabilities.

Consequently the public accounts committee has recommended that the government act to remove audit reservations from its financial statements by announcing the appropriate accounting policy changes in the next budget of the Minister of Finance for implementation in the 1989–1990 Public Accounts of Canada.

CRIMINAL CODE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-266, an act to amend the Criminal Code (offences against the foetus).

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, I present this bill today because I believe in the sanctity of human life and the rights of the unborn. We already recognize the current lack of effective legislation on this matter at the present time. I trust this bill will fulfil the needs and protect the rights of the unborn.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

MAIN ESTIMATES

TRANSPORT VOTES

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

> That, pursuant to Standing Order 81(4)(A) and Orders made Tuesday, April 4 and Tuesday, June 27, 1989, consideration of Transport Votes 1, 5, 10, 11, 15, 16, 20, 25, 30, 35, 40, 45, L50, 55, 60, 65, 70 and 75 of the Main Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1990, by the Standing Committee on Transport be extended beyond October 11, 1989.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 81(4)(A) and Orders made Tuesday, April 4 and Tuesday, June 27, 1989, the motion is deemed adopted.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present pursuant to Standing Order 36 a petition which has been certified correct as to form and content. This is another of a very large number of petitions in which in this case citizens of Windsor, Ontario humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the government's proposed goods and services tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions, one in French and one in English, in which your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the new goods and services tax because it is regressive, because it will increase inflation, because it will mean considerable hardship for low and middle income families and because it will raise interest rates and increase unemployment. The Government's proposal to make all Canadians pay a sales tax on goods and services is wrong, and these people say so in no uncertain words!

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition collected in my riding of York West by Mr. and Mrs. Manzo. They have gone around to various neighbourhoods in York West and have filed a petition solidly in support of the opposition's request that the goods and services tax be withdrawn from this House of Commons.

The petitioners in fact quote that there have been some 31 new taxes or tax increases since 1984 and that this tax will only build on that regressivity and make life very difficult, particularly for working middle class families in the riding.

I also have two further petitions that in essence are asking for the very same objective, namely, to withdraw this goods and services tax. It is signed by petitioners living in the great city of Windsor.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present three petitions on behalf of many Canadians who ask that Parliament do reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition duly certified by the clerk. It is signed by Canadians who are very concerned about the tax represented by the government's goods and services tax. They are concerned about a number of promises that have been broken and, in particular, they are terribly concerned about where this tax is going to go. It is starting at 9 per cent and we are not really sure where it will end.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to table a petition that has been signed by 26 residents of the community of Atikokan, certified correct as to form and content by the clerk of petitions.

These petitioners are from a community that lost its passenger rail service over 10 years ago. They are expresssing their concern about the closure of the rest of the system throughout northwestern Ontario in particular.

The undersigned call upon Parliament to maintain VIA Rail, Canada's present national network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger services.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I too have the privilege and honour to present a petition relating to the government's goods and services tax. It has been certified correct as to form and content by the clerk.

• (1140)

In their petition this group of Canadians points out that this government in the past five years has increased taxes not less than 31 times and that the GST would prove to be an unfair hardship on low and middle income Canadians.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services and tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am honoured to present a petition on behalf of a number of Canadians who are calling upon the government to reconsider its decision to curtail VIA services in certain parts of Canada and to dismantle it in others.

The petitioners are asking Parliament to maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail in those areas of the country where it can provide a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient, environmentally sound and energy efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

TAXATION REFORM

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 and certified correct by the clerk, I have a petition signed by 31 people from Maple Ridge in my riding of Mission—Coquitlam who are not only calling on the government to reject the current proposed goods and services tax but are asking that a reform in the taxation system be introduced so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations and to ensure that if and when there is broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax this reform not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege and responsibility under Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by many residents of Mission, British Columbia.

These Canadians from Mission, British Columbia, point out that the proposed goods and services tax is a regressive tax and that it lacks and does not show regard for taxpayers' ability to pay, and that in fact the government is now trying to tax reading, haircuts, diapers, coffins and home heating fuels.

The petitioners therefore call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to stand up pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present this petition from people in the lower mainland of British Columbia who are opposed to the government's intention to introduce a goods and services tax.

The petitioners point out that the present tax system has not been fully utilized in taxing those who are well able to pay—the wealthier and the corporations within our society. While the present tax is regressive enough they point out that the goods and services tax is going to be even more regressive and are asking the government to reconsider its intention to introduce it.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I too have the honour and privilege to present petitions properly certified and signed by the proper number of people from my adopted city of Windsor who petition the House, through their signatures, to do away with the goods and services tax.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition duly certified in accordance with Standing Order 36. It is signed by a number of residents of the city of Windsor.

The petitioners are opposed, as indicated in this petition, to the unfair and vicious goods and services tax that has been proposed by this heartless government. They call upon Parliament to reject the tax.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, from a number of people from Coquitlam, Maple Ridge, Burnaby, Pitt Meadows and Port Moody, British Columbia, who are pointing out that while 60,000 profitable corporations pay no income tax it seems unfair that people now will be required to pay tax on their reading, diapers, haircuts, home heating fuels and the like.

The petitioners are asking the government to back off from its decision to proceed with the national sales tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On a different matter, Mr. Speaker, I present a petition on behalf of a number of western Canadians who point out the fact that passenger rail service is an environmentally sound way to transport Canadians. They ask the Government of Canada once again to back off from its decision to curtail VIA Rail service throughout most of Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all the questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all the questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-20, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee.

Mr. Speaker: It is now my duty to make a ruling with respect to a number of amendments that were filed late Friday afternoon.

[Translation]

There are eighteen (18) motions in amendment set down on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill

C–20, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act. I have had an opportunity to examine them.

[English]

Motions Nos. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16 and 18 standing in the name of the hon. member for Calgary Northeast each seek to delete a separate clause of the bill. The cumulative effect of these motions would be that the House would proceed through another second reading debate with the possibility, of course, that the bill could ultimately be defeated by having all of its clauses deleted. The Chair has strong reservations about this manner of proceeding on the bill at this stage.

I will be guided by the decision of Mr. Speaker Francis concerning the report stage of Bill C–9, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act, which can be found in the Debates at pages 4559–4566 on June 12, 1984 and again at pages 4680–4683 on June 14, 1984. Therefore the grouping of all the deleting motions will follow the guidance found in that ruling.

I have misgivings with respect to motion numbered 1 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Yukon (Ms. McLaughlin). According to Citation 524 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fifth Edition, on page 176:

[English]

> The motion by which a tax is proposed in the House is now treated as an effective expression of the financial initiative of the Crown, and therefore, as the standard in relation to which the admissibility of amendments is determined. Accordingly, an amendment is debarred, not only from increasing the rate of a tax, but also from extending its incidence to new classes, even while proposing to relieve other classes of payers.

However, Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice on page 839 states that amendments must not exceed the scope, increase the amount or extend the incidence of any charge upon the people defined by the terms of Ways and Means resolutions by which the provisions propose to be amended are authorized.

Having studied the amendment I am of the view that the hon. member is limiting the scope of the tax by providing for an exemption for northern residents. Therefore it will be grouped for debate with Motion No. 2, which is also in order.

[Translation]

An affirmative vote on motion numbered 1 obviates the necessity of a vote on motion numbered 2. However, a negative vote on motion numbered 1, necessitates a vote on motion numbered 2.

[English]

Motions Nos. 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16 standing in the name of the hon. member for Calgary Northeast will be grouped together for debate. A vote on Motion No. 3 will be applied to all of the other motions in the group that I have just listed.

Motions numbered 4 and 5 standing in the names of the Hon. Members for the Yukon (Ms. McLaughlin) and for Calgary Northeast (Mr. Kindy) respectively will be grouped together for debate but voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 10 and 11 standing in the names of the same hon. members will be grouped for debate and voted on as follows: an affirmative vote on Motion No. 10 will obviate the need for a vote on Motion No. 11. However a negative vote on Motion No. 10 will require a vote on Motion No. 11.

• (1150)

Motions Nos. 17 and 18 standing in the names of the same two hon. members will be grouped for debate. If there is an affirmative vote on Motion No. 17, no question on Motion No. 18 will be put to the House. However a negative vote on Motion No. 17 will require that the question be put to the House on Motion No. 18.

I will now put motions numbered 1 and 2 to the House.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C–20 be amended in Clause 1 by adding immediately after line 16 at page 1 the following:

"except for northern residents as defined in the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): moved:

That Bill C-20 be amended by deleting Clause 1.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I have put forth this amendment, and I want to make a few remarks that I think justify the amendment as proposed.

This tax clearly is unfair to northerners. In the north I point out that basic telephone service is not available on a universal and affordable basis.

For example, I cite a study that was done in 1981, which found that telephone users in the Northwest Territories, northern Quebec and northern Ontario spent on average between $625 and $650 per year on toll services. This compared with an average of $206 per year for subscribers in the Bell territory as a whole. Clearly, with the higher cost of living in the north and the per capita income which is generally lower, this is an added burden for people who do live in the north.

In particular, as I have pointed out in other debates, the telecommunications tax hurts small business in rural areas that must do much of their ordering and their other business with southern businesses necessitating that they do this by long distance.

Another element of this that I wanted to point out is that radio phones which are used frequently by residents in rural areas in northern areas are in a sense doubly taxed because every telephone call that is made via a radio phone is in fact a long distance call. People who must rely on radio phones for their communication with their children's school or with doctors—with all of the regular business that most of us have to deal with in our personal lives—are being doubly penalized because those then become taxable long distance calls.

I would also add a comment on the inflationary effect of this kind of tax. The Yukon Government, for example, has estimated that a 1 per cent increase in the telecommunications tax means about $4 million extra to the taxpayer and of course to the Yukon Government. Obviously the Yukon Government has to get that money from somewhere. All long distance calls are taxed as well as the public mobile telephone systems. This does have an added impact on northern residents.

I would draw the House's attention to a report done in 1988 by the Public Interest Advocacy Centre, which has done a fairly comprehensive report on northern consumers and telecommunications policy in March of 1989.

In that report both the necessity of telephone communications for northern residents and the added burden that they have is outlined. I quote from that report that indicates that the per capita income, for example, for Inuit in the Northwest Territories was only 53 per cent of the average for the general Canadian population. In northern Quebec it was only 40 per cent of the general average, despite the fact that the average family spends three times more than a southern resident on toll services.

Similarly I would add that this report indicates that most of the calls in the north are ones currently classified and billed as long distance. For northerners toll service is an essential part of basic telephone service. This is a very important difference and one of the basic reasons for this amendment that I am proposing.

Functionally long distance service in northern and remote areas is really equivalent to local service in many southern areas. The result is that southern subscribers get unlimited free calling for most of their telephone calls while northern subscribers are paying toll services for each call.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I propose this amendment which I believe would, if accepted, reduce the burden on northerners and make a more equalized and fair system comparable to southern users of the telecommunications system.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary—Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to support motion No. 1 in the name of the Hon. Member.

I have children who work in the North, a son in Kuujjuaq and a daughter in Blanc-Sablon. I have visited these communities in Canada's North, and I have seen how difficult life in the North can be.

Penalizing these people by increasing the tax on telecommunications would be entirely unacceptable.

These people work in very difficult conditions. They make sacrifices, and I think that a Government that has any heart at all should not even consider penalizing them, penalizing Canada's Inuit.

That is why I support the Hon. Member's motion, and I believe Parliament should vote in favour of this motion so that people in Canada's North can live the same way as people in Central Canada, in Ontario.

[English]

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a few words to say on this particular amendment. First of all the real solution here, I say to the member for Yukon, would be not to have this latest imposition at all. I do not know where the government is going. I guess I do know where it is going, but I do not like where it is going, particularly on this communications tax.

Mr. Murphy: What about transportation?

Mr. Simmons: The member has chosen half a loaf, and we support that. I hear some coming awake in the NDP early this morning, earlier than usual.

I was about to say, if our colleague would just restrain himself for the moment, that I support what the member is doing because it is at least half a loaf, but the real solution is for the government to withdraw this infamous thing before it inflicts anything further on northerners and southerners alike.

In so far as this communication tax is concerned we have to put it in context with respect to people in my province who are already paying, quite apart from the federal tax which is now going to go to 11 per cent if the administration has its way, paying another 10 per cent provincially so that in compound terms they are paying about 22 per cent because they are paying a tax on a tax. You know that story, Mr. Speaker.

This is uncalled for. It is not needed at all, but if it must go forward then the very least that can be done is that we entertain the amendment put forward by the member for Yukon to at least exempt northern residents. They, in a very particular way, are called upon to bear the tax brunt in this country. The gentleman from Calgary Northeast put it very well when he spoke briefly to the amendment a minute ago. Everywhere one turns, whether it is in clause 1 or elsewhere in the bill, the tax grab continues. This infamous tax grab continues unabated. The unrelenting pulverization of the people least able to pay is well under way by this government.

If one were to take the regional impact of the tax measures in this budget and look at it as it affects northerners, as it affects people living generally in rural parts of this country, one would very quickly and unmistakably come to the conclusion that this government has a hate on for rural people. It has a particular thing in its craw about people who do not live in large urban centres. Everywhere one turns, whether it has to do with the railway abandonments, the closing of rural post offices, the sabotaging of the job creation programs, or if one turns directly to tax measures, which is our subject here today, one will find that the whole program of the government is particularly aimed at rural Canadians. Why are rural Canadians being asked to bear an undue amount of the load of the tax burden and so far as cut-backs are concerned? One would come to the conclusion that this government is in the business of overtly, deliberately shutting down rural Canada.

Take, for example, the job development strategy. There was a time when people in areas characteristic of seasonal employment could look to that kind of a program to tide them over. Not anymore. Now those people have a choice of not qualifying for those seasonal jobs or moving to urban centres, because the caveat about training requirements in those programs dictates, in effect, that those people can only qualify for those training opportunities if they live in urban areas where there are more sensible training options available. That is just one of the many examples that we can take from the program of this government to demonstrate that it has a hate on for rural Canadians. It is out to get rural Canadians. This particular clause, like the other clause in this bill that we will be dealing with over the next few days, is a demonstration of that. I have delight in supporting the amendment if it comes to that. At least, let us exempt northern Canadians. But the real solution is to get rid of the provision altogether and to have no increase whatsoever in the communications tax.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I was interested to hear the Liberal member for Burin—St. George's get up and speak about how this hurt the north and the rural areas of the country. I remember when he was on the government benches the Liberal government of the day introduced a tax on transportation. We spoke against that and explained that a tax on transportation hurt people going into the remote communities of this country. It certainly added an extra, unfair burden of taxation on those people and on those communities, because it was a percentage tax and because the tax was based on the higher air fare that those people had to endure. As a result, people in northern Canada, people in the remote parts of Canada were paying a much higher percentage and a much higher dollar value of tax than those in the south.

For those same arguments, I would like to support the motion put forward by my colleague, the member for Yukon. What we are trying to do with the motion that she has presented to the House today is to recognize that some taxes which are imposed on a basis of a flat percentage rate do add an unfair, unnecessary burden on people in the remote and northern areas of this country. Every time a tax is brought in which is 5 per cent, 6 per cent, 7 per cent, 8 per cent or 9 per cent across the board, what the Government of Canada does not recognize is that some people already have to pay so much more for what is a basic and cheap service in southern and more populated areas. Every time an extra one cent is added to the cost of gasoline, every time a 10 per cent tax is added on airline tickets, every time a tax is placed on long distance phone calls, what you are doing is giving a double burden, an extra burden of taxation on the people in these communities.

For that reason, as we look at this particular tax measure or as we look at other tax measures such as the notorious GST, we have to make sure that we really recognize what we are doing by passing these measures. I do not think the members on the government side recognize that. I know there are a number of members on the Conservative benches who represent communities that have been hurt by the dismantling of the northern tax benefit. Those members have not been able to get up in the House of Commons and say: Hold on, you are hurting communities in northern Alberta; you are hurting communities in northern B.C., in northern Saskatchewan, in northern Ontario, or in Atlantic Canada. But they know that that is happening and they know that their government, through its taxation policies, is hurting the very communities that they are supposed to be here representing.

It is unfortunate that from time to time government back-benchers feel that they cannot criticize their government. I applaud the government member who got up earlier today to speak in favour of our motion because it has taken that courage to speak out against his ferocious whip and the cabinet ministers of the government.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words in support of the motion presented by the hon. member for Yukon.

Let me begin by pointing out to Canadians who are watching that this is only a prelude to a government gone tax crazy. I mean, you have got to think about it. When this government came to office there was no tax on telecommunications. In the space of five years, it has tried to muzzle the people of this country by taxing their ability to communicate. This has got to be the ultimate in a government gone mad. It has let power go to its head and it seems that its sole existence is to tax, tax and tax.

Even the so-called manufacturers' sales tax, that silent killer of jobs, when this government came to office was 9 per cent and in the short period of five years it has gone up to 13.5 per cent. The only thing the government understands is to tax, tax, tax. Canadians are sick and tired of the government reaching both hands in both their pockets and their heads in some other part of the anatomy taking the hard-earned dollars out of the pockets of Canadians.

This particular tax on telecommunications is very bad in itself, but particularly so for people who reside in the northern part of our country. For example, in the Nickel Belt area there are many people in communities, primarily native communities, who have to use radio and telephones. When they have to phone the school that their children have been taken to, it is not like you or I, Mr. Speaker, picking up the telephone and phoning locally. It is a long distance call on the radio telephone. This government is going to tax that 11 per cent, moving it up one more per cent.

In fact, a study was done by the Public Interest Advocacy Centre on northern consumers and telecommunications policy. In their appearance before the regulatory body they stated: "In 1981, in connection with Bell Canada, it was found that Bell subscribers in the Northwest Territories, northern Quebec and northern Ontario spent an average between $625 and $650 per year on toll services. This compared with an average of $206 per year for subscribers in the Bell territory as a whole."

So now we are punishing people because they live in these nether regions of our country where we have been encouraging and trying to encourage people to go and settle and develop this country of ours. What this government has come along with is a tax on the ability of those people to communicate with each other even within their particular area which necessitates a long distance call.

I cannot understand, and I know that I am speaking for many Canadians, who cannot understand the mentality of a government like this. Outside of the member for Calgary Northeast, an honourable gentleman who spoke in support of this motion, they are all sitting on their hands. They will all sit. Why? Because their big boss has whipped them into line.

There are very few members on the other side who are prepared to throw off the whips of tyranny of Brian Mulroney and his honchos in the cabinet. There are very few of them willing to stand up and be counted: Canadians are waiting to hear them because we have to be united in defeating this tax hungry government. It is the only way. I say to Conservatives on the other side all we need is 20 of you to change positions. We beg you for one simple little vote. Vote with the opposition and send a message to this government. Vote for your own constituents and show them that you are representing their best interests. Surely you are not going to go along like a bunch of trained seals; somebody was so unkind as to call them lemmings. Surely you are not going to sit up and when a fish is thrown clap your flippers and say: "Aye, aye, Skipper." Surely, there are 20 of you over there who will hear the cry of the people saying: "Save us from this tax-crazy government. Relieve our burden of taxes, upon taxes, upon taxes." Surely there are 20 of you who can respond positively to the call.

Mr. Dick: Don't have a heart attack.

Mr. Rodriguez: This government is going to give a lot of Canadians a heart attack with what it has proposed. It is not enough that it will gyp them 11 per cent, but if you live in the province of Ontario you get 8 per cent put on top of that. You have a multiplicity of tax upon tax.

In a spirit of conciliation I reach out to brothers and sisters over there. We need 20 good men and women who will join with us to defeat this iniquitous tax proposal.

I know there is a thing called whips and discipline over there.

Mr. Dick: What cuts are you proposing?

Mr. Rodriguez: We are talking about this particular tax measure that the government has proposed. I am glad you raised that. Why don't you put a tax on mergers and corporate takeovers like the Americans are going to do? Last year we had takeovers of $5 billion. Just imagine if you put on a little 9 per cent tax. After all it is a sales tax. Somebody is buying something. Put on a 9 per cent tax. Look at what we could gain.

What about going even further? When one corporation wants to buy out another, it borrows money and is allowed to write off the interest on the money used for the take-over. They have not created one new job, but they are allowed to write off the interest on the money they borrowed for the take-over. Does that sound fair? No, it is not fair. That is why I appeal to 20 people over there. If they have any courage of conviction, on this one occasion join with us and let us defeat this. Let us strike a blow for ordinary Canadians. Let us strike a blow for working men and women in this country.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a chance to follow my hon. colleague who pointed out very clearly how the New Democrats feel about one more tax grab in the long march of tax grabbing.

The point that my hon. friend for Nickel Belt made was very appropriate. Not only is this an attack on working people and their families generally, it is an attack especially on certain Canadians. We consider that it is a part of a process that we have seen, and I refer to the general sales tax.

Obviously some Canadians are going to be hit harder by the general sales tax than others. Those people who live in the northern parts of Canada, the more remote regions will be hardest hit. For example, those Canadians who have to buy winter equipment, a lot of snow tires, all sorts of extras like snow clothing, and an excessive amount of heating fuels and so on, relative to southerners. In Vancouver you do not have to buy snow tires or snow clothing. Obviously, in Whitehorse, Prince George, Kamloops, Red Deer, and right across the country in all the northern areas you have to.

So what we are saying is that certain Canadians will have to spend a lot more of their hard earned money on sales taxes on items that they must buy, while southerners will not have to, or do not have to buy in the same amount. Heating fuel perhaps is the most obvious.

As my hon. colleague from the Yukon pointed out, the far northern regions are going to be extremely hard hit, not only generally by the Conservative government tax programs, but by this particular tax measure on telephone calls. That is what we are talking about.

When people in Canada who live in remote areas have a need to communicate for personal reasons, business reasons, or just day-to-day living reasons, make a long distance call; they are not like others living in southern Canada who simply pick up the telephone and dial to anybody they want to, virtually toll-free. That is not the way in the north. As you well know, Mr. Speaker, it is long distance telephone rates; it is long distance communication. When a tax is put on telecommunications, obviously you are taxing more heavily those people who have a greater amount of their purchasing power going into long distance calls.

My hon. colleague for the Yukon indicated that this needs to be amended to recognize that some Canadians experience greater telephone communications cost simply because of where they happen to live in this country. It seems to be unfair that we would introduce a tax that would obviously discriminate against those Canadians living in remote areas, a tax that would be biased against those Canadians who live in remote areas.

I would venture to say that virtually every tax initiative we have seen introduced by the Conservative government does just that. Certainly, the goods and services tax will, and now in Bill C-20, we are recognizing that again in terms of telecommunications costs, those people who live in more remote areas will be adversely affected.

For that reason, my hon. colleague for Yukon suggests that we amend the bill so that the telecommunications service tax not be allotted to northern members as is defined by the tax act which, of course, includes people living in the northern parts of Ontario, Quebec, Newfoundland, Manitoba, and other points west. I think it is a very reasoned amendment.

I ask my hon. Conservative friends across the aisle to speak out on some of these measures. Many members here come from remote areas, from far northern constituencies.

• (1220)

Are they suggesting, by the fact that they are mute on this issue, that they in fact support it and think it is a good idea to be taxing people who live in distant communities on their telephone charges. That is what they are saying because so far only one has had the courage to speak out on behalf of his constituents, and he has supported this amendment as any thoughtful parliamentarian would.

I will conclude my remarks in anticipation that we will hear some thoughtful interjections from hon. members opposite as we move to try and improve Bill C-20. As my colleague from Nickel Belt indicated in a very succinct fashion, this is one more in the long list of tax grabs by this government.

The government always asks where else can it get the money. One obvious way would be to reduce interest rates immediately which would collapse a good part of the deficit and the debt. It would stimulate, almost automatically, economic activity in every part of the country which would generate more revenue in sales tax, excise tax, personal tax, business tax and corporate tax. But no, Mr. Speaker, we are bound and determined that interest rates will remain very high and consequently the debts of the country will increase, the deficit increases, and economic development is strangled as a result of fiscal and other financial policies.

There are many places to get tax money beyond changing the interest rate policy. May I suggest just one in conclusion. I think all of us are well aware of the 60,000 profitable corporations in this country that do not pay any income tax at all. Of course, there are many that pay $20 a year, $200 a year, or $500 a year, but many do not pay a single penny in income tax. There are 60,000 large profitable corporations not paying a single cent. It is shameful. Other countries like the United States does not allow this to occur. In 1986 President Reagan brought in a minimum corporate tax so that there are not have tens of thousands of large corporations getting away scot-free.

However, in Canada the Conservatives have taken care of the large corporate sector so that now they are trying to nickel and dime a long distance tax from northern residents. Would they put a mimimum corporate tax on the Bank of Montreal? Would they put a minimum corporate tax on General Motors, Nova Corporation, the Royal Bank of Canada, or the Imperial Bank of Commerce? No, they would not touch those. But touch the Inuit and those people living in northern Canada and add a few dollars every week to their necessary telephone charges. It is absolutely disgusting what is going on. It is time that we allow members of the Conservative government to stand up and explain why we are nickel and diming every conceivable person in terms of tax increases. Why does it not bring in a minimum corporate tax so that the Bank of Montreal would be guaranteed to pay its fair share of tax every year, or Cadillac-Fairview pays its fair share of the tax? Why does it not bring in such legislation? Why does it bring in legislation that is going to put an extra charge on the telephone costs for all residents, and this particular clause draws our attention to the plight of those people living in Canada's north?

I stand down to await anxiously my Conservative colleagues across the way explaining why they feel this tax is necessary for a country which is the second largest in the world geographically. Being such a large country we should be sensitive to the fact that there some people who rely on telecommunications services and consequently bear a heavier share than others as a result of the huge country in which we live. I also ask them to explain why 60,000 profitable corporations get out of paying any income tax at all year after year, while the little shop at the corner store pays their fair share, the mom and pop shop pays their fair share, the person running the little welding shop pays his fair share, but not the Royal Bank of Canada, not Cadillac-Fairview, not Nova Corporation, not 60,000 other large profitable corporations that do not pay a single cent in spite of their hundreds of millions of dollars in profit year after year. I will step down and await some of my Conservative friends to explain those two items.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I want to enter this debate for a few moments. Most of the residents in my riding will not be impacted by the amendment put forward by my colleague, the member for Yukon, because most of my riding is not included in the northern tax area, although there are some areas that are in dispute and I understand that the hon. Rene Brunel will be handing down his report shortly. We are all waiting with interest to see what he decides in terms of the levels of support.

In northern Canada, in the northern parts of our provinces, there is a tendency over time to relocate seniors into larger communities. They are taken from the community where they have lived for years, whether it is a farm community or a mining community, and because of the way provinces have evolved they have put long-term care facilities in major centres. So seniors are being taken away from their families and moved to a central location. That is traumatic, but now, because of yet another tax increase, it will be more expensive for them to keep in touch with their loved ones, with their children, and vice versa, for the children to keep in touch with their mother or father in a long-term care facility.

The other thing that we are talking about, and that is why my colleague put forward the amendment, is it is not just the telephone calls that are being taxed but it is the reason for those calls. You are going to tax a call to the ambulance. You are going to tax a call to the fire department. You are going to tax a call to the police department. You are going to tax the calls of people looking for work, of doing a job search around their region, on top of the unemployment insurance cutbacks that this government is intent on doing, and making it much more difficult for the out of work individual to find gainful employment.

It is also going to impact on the cost of doing business in the north. Every cost that that small business or even large business has to endure, and a lot of the work today is done by telephone in terms of on-time delivery for inventory, will add to the cost of doing business in the north. That will result in two things. First of all, the obvious, which is higher prices to the consumer yet again. The second is one more disincentive for industries and businesses to locate in the north, and a greater incentive for them to once again concentrate around the golden horseshoe in Toronto.

The other aspect that I want to speak about, and one that has not been talked about so far this morning, is the impact of cable TV. Now one may think that it is a luxury. Those members of the House who live in the major metropolitan areas say: "We do not need cable. We just turn on the TV and there is the signal". In northern communities there is no such thing as off-air signals. Residents have to rely on cable if they are in an organized area. It is much more expensive to provide that service because it is a smaller market, and yet they are now being taxed at a greater percentage so that their cost is even higher. They get their news through those channels, whether it is on Cancom in terms of the four Canadian channels that are available or Newsworld which is now a service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, supposedly available to all Canadians, but is not because some have not picked it up. When the Yukon picks it up it is going to cost them that much more because it is already a high cost to deliver the signal and to distribute it.

The tax is wrong. I support my colleague's move to, at the very least, exempt northern residents, those defined by the Income Tax Act, from this extra burden. I do hope, like my colleagues have said before, that the members opposite will seriously consider supporting this amendment because it will send a signal to northern Canadians that perhaps somebody is listening.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 1 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Yukon. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the notion please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

• (1230)

Motions Nos. 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16, standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Calgary Northeast will be grouped together for debate. A vote on Motion No. 3, will be applied to all other motions in the group that I have just listed.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast) moved:

That Bill C-20 be amended by deleting Clause 2.

Motion No. 6.

That Bill C-20 be amended by deleting Clause 4.

Motion No. 7.

Motion No. 12.

That Bill C-20 be amended by deleting Clause 9.

Motion No. 13.

That Bill C-20 be amended by deleting Clause 12.

He said: Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say that the Minister of Finance when he brought in his budget said that we have been overtaxed in the past.

I would like to say that when our government took over in 1984-85 the manufacturers' sales tax was at 9 per cent. Now with this new bill you would bring it up to 13.5 per cent. This is penalizing our manufacturers. It has penalized them because they have to export to compete. This bill is making them less competitive and therefore manufacturers will not be able to sell our products abroad. I would like to quote the minister when he was addressing the legislative committee on Bill C–20. He said:

"This bill contains the necessary legislative amendments to implement the federal excise tax and excise duty changes announced in the budget of April 27, 1989. These measures are an important component of our government's plan of fiscal action to address the problem of the large and growing public debt by recognizing in reaction to the threat posed by the growing burden of the debt we are helping to build a stronger Canada for both present and future generations of Canadians".

These are beautiful words, but what is the reality?

Canada's revenues in 1984–85 were approximately $70 billion and our expenditures were $109 billion, for a total yearly deficit of $38 billion. For the fiscal year 1989–90, revenues have increased to $112 billion, taken out of the pockets of the poor people who live in Canada and small businesses. Very little came from the pockets of large corporations. Expenditures in that fiscal year are increased to $142 billion. We have been collecting more and spending more money.

The minister says he wants even more money. I wonder whether we are not moving in the direction of Argentina, for instance, that had no fiscal responsibility and today has the largest foreign debt of the nations in South America. The reason I mention Argentina is that in 1949 it was the sixth richest nation in the world and today it has an inflation rate of 300 per cent to 400 per cent a year. If we do not become fiscally responsible Canada could move in the same direction.

Our total national debt is close to $370 billion and it was only $180 billion in 1983–84. The Minister of Finance has doubled our national debt in a period when there was prosperity across Canada. There was work in central Canada. The economy was not overheating in the Atlantic provinces or in western Canada, but it was overheating in central Canada. So what did the Minister of Finance do? He raised the interest rates instead of taxing the big corporations which have not been paying their fair share.

I would like to give an historical perspective on the deficit and the debt so that we can better understand it and bring in solutions that would not simply increase the taxation powers of the government but bring about restraint and better economic management to address the fundamental problem of the national debt and the spending of the federal government.

As I have already said we have increased the national debt. We are collecting more money from individual taxpayers so that today each Canadian child and adult has a debt of approximately $13,000.

It takes 34 cents out of a dollar of public revenue to pay just the interest on that debt. The interest payments have outstripped the yearly deficit of $30.5 billion in this fiscal year.

The government proposes now to bring in a new goods and services tax that is going to follow those amendments to this bill. I would like to point out that in 1969–70 the total national debt was $17.5 billion. It was only 21 per cent of the Gross National Product.

In the year 1988–89 the national debt has increased to $350 billion. It is 36 per cent of the Gross National Product. The proportion of the debt to the Gross National Product has almost doubled and no country can tolerate such an increase.

I would say that people in the west, and in particular Albertans, understand very well what this goods and services tax means. It means that it will create more inflation. It will create at least 3 per cent more inflation. Albertans understand that. They understand that it will increase interest rates of the banks. They understand that. Some members of this House say that they do not understand.

They understand as well that it is the consumer who will pay for this goods and services tax when he goes to have his hair cut. There will be a tax on funerals and telecommunications. This is a regressive tax. I hope the Minister of Finance will listen, not to his officials in the Department of Finance, but to the people of Canada. The people of Canada do not want this tax. They have already been paying. Some of them ask where they will get the money.

I would like to refer the Minister of Finance to the fiscal remissions of large corporations that have not been paying their taxes. I believe that this tax is not only inflationary. It is regressive because it punishes the low income earners. It does not pass, as well, the test of fairness. It creates a bureaucracy. The Minister of National Revenue confirmed what I was saying six months ago, that it will take another 4,000 Revenue Canada inspectors.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to say that the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the motions that the hon. member for Calgary Northeast has proposed in the House today I think indicate incredibly sound sense. The extraordinary thing is that on the motion we have already debated today there has been no one on the opposite side of the House stand up to refute any of the arguments he has put to the House, in my view, quite ably.

I can understand the reluctance on the part of hon. members opposite to defend the indefensible, but it is their budget that is being proposed here and their budget taxation measures that are being discussed in these amendments. You would think that the minister or somebody would stand up and say: "The reason we are imposing this tax is because of this or because of that". But there is no defence of the taxation that has been proposed.

The hon. member for Calgary Northeast has provided the House with some criticisms that I think are worth while taking into account. The government obviously is ignoring those criticisms from one of it own members. It is a shocking example of arrogance and unwillingness to come into this House and discuss this matter. It says: "take it or leave it" and leaves it for us to vote against it.

Why the members on the opposite side sit on their hands and vote with the Minister of Finance for these incredibly harsh and vicious taxes is beyond me. The hon. member for Calgary Northeast has clearly seen the light and he realizes that this is something that is unacceptable to the people of Canada. Yet this government seems bent on pursuing this course, come what may.

I would like to turn to the taxes and some of the figures that the hon. member for Calgary Northeast has cited. He has already referred to the unbelievable spending habits of the government, and how expenditures have increased so dramatically from the time they took office. He pointed out, quite rightly, the $42 billion increase in taxes that Canadians are now paying since this Tory mismanagement group took over the operation of the Government of Canada in 1984.

The amount raised by taxation has gone from $70 billion, as the hon. member pointed out, to $112 billion in that five-year period. There have been 31 separate tax increases, and here we are debating a bunch more. Canadians have pretty well had it. This government has imposed too many tax increases.

I find it quite extraordinary that the Minister of Finance, in his rantings and ravings about the evils of the current manufacturers' sales tax, has repeatedly told Canadians how unacceptable that tax is, this silent killer of jobs. Even the Prime Minister has taken up the refrain, chanting a around the country: "this tax is a silent killer of jobs".

If it is such a silent killer of jobs, why have they increased it so drastically from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent as they are doing in this bill? If it is a silent killer of jobs surely you lower the tax, you do not increase it. But not this bunch. They do not seem to understand their own rhetoric. They say it is a silent killer of jobs on the one hand, but they make it worse by increasing it instead of lowering it. It simply escapes my comprehension.

I think most Canadians agree with me that this is sheer folly. The government is acting improperly, it is not doing its job, it is mismanaging the Canadian economy and mismanaging our tax system. It is mismanaging almost everything it touches. It is ruining VIA Rail. It is mismanaging one thing after another in Canada. It is time for the government to get out if it cannot do better.

I want to go back to the gasoline taxes because they are one set of the taxes that are being raised in this bill. The memory of hon. members opposite must be exceedingly short. I am sure the hon. member for Calgary Northeast recalls well the day the present Minister for International Trade who was formerly the Minister of Finance in another incarnation stood in this House and presented a budget. I was not here, but I remember hearing a lot about the budget at the time. The budget proposed massive tax increases of 28 cents, I believe, on gasoline. I am sure hon. members opposite remember what happened. The minister lost control of the House, was forced into an election, and was walloped in the election.

The Liberal party presented a set of coherent policies for Canada and won the election. The principal reason for that electoral victory, as hon. members opposite will well remember, was the vicious tax increases contained in the then Minister of Finance's budget. You will recall his expression: "Short-term pain for long-term gain". That is exactly what we are getting in this bill, but it is going to be a little longer term pain by the appearances of it because we will have, in theory, another three years more of this government to endure.

I say to the hon. members opposite we can cut short that period with a quick vote on this bill. Get rid of this bill and perhaps we will get of this government and save Canadians this kind of tax increase.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Milliken: One would think that the gasoline taxes that were proposed in 1980 taught this government a lesson. It learned that Canadians did not want this kind of tax and they were prepared to vote the government out if they got the chance. I say to hon. members opposite that is exactly the position they are in today. We have more increases in the gasoline taxes in this bill.

The hon. member for Calgary Northeast has proposed that we delete the clause, including that particular increase, and I agree with him. We should vote this clause out. We should support the motions that he has moved, deleting a series of clauses from this bill.

If the government has to go to the people on this and if the people decide they want to pay more taxes on gasoline, so be it. Let us go to the people and have that decision made there. If the hon. members opposite are so confident that the people want all these tax increases, that they want this silent killer of jobs increased some more, that Canadians want to pay more for their gasoline tax and all the other taxes the government has proposed in this budget, let us go to the people and let them tell us about it in an election. If the government is so confident surely it belies it will win.

If it thinks it will win, why would it be afraid to go to an election? I know why it is afraid to go, Mr. Speaker. It knows it would lose. Those members would lose in droves.

We would end up not having to pay these taxes. That is what is going on over there. The hon. member for Calgary Northeast seems to be the only one, at least in public, who has recognized that fact and stand up on his feet and say so. Why do the others not stand up and defend these taxes? I know why. It is a subterfuge.

My friend for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception knows the answer as well as I do. It is a subterfuge. They are trying to say that since some of their members and everybody is opposed to this tax, when the vote happens, maybe Canadians will not be watching and they will not see us vote. They will see that the hon. member for Calgary Northeast who they all know is a good Conservative member was on his feet opposing it, and they will assume that the Conservative party therefore is opposed to these taxes and they somehow got adopted by the House by some mysterious technique—osmosis or something—and the House suddenly adopted the tax by happenstance.

We know who has proposed this tax. It was the Minister of Finance and the Conservative government led by the Prime Minister. We know who is supporting this tax. It is the members who are sitting behind that government on their hands today with their mouths shut, saying absolutely nothing to oppose these vicious measures.

Mr. Mifflin: And they will be sorry for it.

Mr. Milliken: And they will regret it. We will bring that message home. The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception and I will make sure that that message is brought home, if necessary, in the ridings where the people have been led to believe that these taxes are the work of someone else. These taxes are the work of this government, $42 billion in increased revenue, the result of Conservative tax measures that have been introduced by this government in this House and passed with its majority.

If most Canadians realized how much more they were paying in taxes than what they were paying in 1984—and I suspect they have forgotten how low they were in comparison—then they would not have voted for this government in 1988. I think this government would face a severe problem at the polls if there was an election held tomorrow, or, indeed, at any future time.

I say to hon. members opposite: if hon. members cannot defend this policy, cannot defend these tax increases, at least have the courage to vote against them and get them out of here so we do not have to put up with them and impose them on the people of Canada who elected us to help them.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak in support of the amendments by the member for Calgary Northeast. Earlier I asked for 20 good men and women members on the Tory benches. Well, we have one, so we just have 19 to go, and hopefully with several more days of debate on this bill we might get the 19 others.

I know it may occur to people watching to ask themselves why an NDPer would second the amendments of the Conservative member who moves these amendments to his government's bill on taxation. One reason is because he could not find anyone on the government side to second his amendments. He could not find anyone who at least was prepared to stand up and publicly state before the viewers of this Parliament, before the country, that in fact enough is enough. There is not one of them with his courage who is prepared to stand and say to his leader and those around his leader that they are not going to be played for suckers, that they are not going to just be there as trained seals and flap their flippers every time they get a fish thrown at them.

Mr. Harvard: They are chickens.

Mr. Rodriguez: My hon. friend says they were chicken. I do not want to insult them that way yet because I am hoping that we can get 19 more to vote with us. I do not want to bad mouth them; I want to give them a good opportunity to be persuaded and to find courage to reach deep down within themselves to speak up. This is the time when this country needs clear unequivocal spokespersons on this question of taxation, and taxation, and taxation. They need that.

I mention the fact that this government was tax crazy. The facts speak for themselves. In the most recent budget, the 1989 budget, for example, there is an increase in the sales tax on construction materials and equipment for buildings, going from 8 per cent to 9 per cent beginning January 1, 1990.

Then there is an increase in the sales tax on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products from 18 per cent to 19 per cent beginning January 1, 1990 and there is an increase in the sales tax on telecommunications and programming services from 10 per cent to 11 per cent beginning June 1, 1989.

There is an increase in the sales tax on all other goods to which it applies, from 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent, beginning June 1, 1989. There were several increases to the excise tax on tobacco products beginning April 28, 1989, and again on October 1, 1989, to a total of $4 per carton of cigarettes. Then there was an increase in the excise tax on gasoline by 1 cent a litre beginning April 28, 1989, and again on January 1, 1990, and a further 1 cent per litre increase in leaded gasoline beginning April 28, 1989.

We then have the shifting of financing from general revenues to premiums for regional extended benefits in the unemployment insurance program. That will add another $1.7 billion tax increase on payrolls. I see it is one o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to call it 1 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have six minutes remaining in his debate after three o'clock this day.

It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

HASTINGS—PRINCE EDWARD REGIMENT

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to pay tribute to the Hastings—Prince Edward regiment who celebrated the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the origins of their regiment last weekend in my riding of Prince Edward—Hastings.

This regiment, known as the Hasty P's, mobilized in Picton in 1939 to enter the Second World War. This reunion also marks the fiftieth anniversary of this mobilization.

The Hasty P's were the most decorated Canadian regiment in the Second World War, receiving 31 battle honours, the highest being for the invasion of Italy under Lord Tweedsmuir of England. It is with great pride that I pay tribute to this rural and small town regiment who earned distinguished recognition for their loyal service to Canada during the Second World War.

DISASTERS

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I rise today in this House to extend my sympathies on behalf of the people of New Brunswick to the families of the Thanksgiving Day accident in Cormier Village.

New Brunswickers were shocked to learn of the tragedy which struck the tiny rural community this past weekend. The Leger and McGraw family reunion is not unlike hundreds of such celebrations which take place in small towns and villages across this country where Canadians come together to share in and give thanks for the blessings bestowed upon them in the past year.

The tragic incident in Cormier Village serves to remind us all of the fragility of life, and I know I speak for all members of Parliament when I say that our prayers are with these families now and in the coming days.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, October 7, Saskatchewan MLA Doug Anguish, from the constituency The Battlefords, and I held a public hearing into the proposed goods and services tax. We listened to the thoughts of our community and we were appalled at what we heard. The impact of the tax will be enormous on the people of northwest Saskatchewan.

We listened to briefs presented by 14 individuals and groups over a five and a half hour period. Every brief presented, including ones from the merchant's association, farm groups and the voluntary sector, opposed the goods and services tax and asked that we relay their message to the finance minister.

I am now writing a report based on those hearings and will be submitting it in the near future. I ask the Minister of Finance to listen to the people of Canada and to withdraw the GST.

NATIONAL PARKS

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, Canadians from sea to sea are concerned about our environment. One of the most important ways of protecting our environment is through our national parks system. Alberta's national parks are among the most magnificent environmental reserves in the world.

It is an honour and a great privilege to represent a riding that has been named after one of Alberta's five national parks. Elk Island National Park is home to thousands of birds and animals including trumpeter swans, beavers, moose, elk, deer and bison.

The Minister of the Environment is committed to preserving our environment. Through the Canadian Parks Service Fund, Elk Island will receive $675,000 for essential facilities and services at campsites, interpretive exhibits, elk handling facilities and other major improvements. This support for Elk Island National Park is solid evidence that the Government of Canada is committed to protecting and preserving our environment.

MINING

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, there is great concern in Canada's uranium mining and processing industry. The Government of Canada has proposed a plan whereby the Atomic Energy Control Board would provide its services to the industry on a cost recovery basis. This will have a serious impact on the workers, communities and companies whose livelihoods depend on a viable uranium mining industry.

There is little question that the Atomic Energy Control Board provides services which are essential in ensuring that proper standards of health and safety in the uranium mining sector are maintained. Nevertheless, these services are generally of benefit to Canadians as a whole, so taxing the industry directly for these services does not fairly reflect where the benefits are felt.

The uranium industry is competing in a tough market-place these days. The ability of our industry to remain competitive will be eroded if a cost recovery plan is implemented. It is much better that the industry's regulatory body continue to be funded from the general revenues of the Government of Canada. This way, there is no possible conflict of interest for inspectors whose services will be paid for directly by the companies. With the world price of uranium at an all-time low, the last thing the government should do at this time is place an additional burden of millions of dollars on the shoulders of this industry.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) wrote to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) recently to suggest setting up a common non-partisan fund to save the Meech Lake Accord. The Prime Minister answered him right away that he would look very favorably on such an initiative, saying: "I hope that all those who really care about meeting the challenge of Canada will continue to work in the same spirit. Regaining our unity and developing our prosperity are essential conditions for Canada's present and future influence and standing. I think that we have made great progress in this regard in recent years, but if future generations are to realize their full potential, we must remove the constitutional uncertainty overhanging our future development, starting today."

Mr. Speaker, the answer from our Prime Minister strengthens our hope that the present obstacles will be smoothed out.

DISASTERS

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, a tragic event has shaken the whole riding of Beauséjour, especially the community of Cormier Village. A fatal accident left 12 people dead and 45 others injured, of whom 7 are in serious condition. This accident is even more tragic because it decimated two families in Cormier Village, the Légers and the McGraws, at their annual gathering. In the face of such a tragedy, it is difficult to find words that really express how we feel. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you join me and all other Hon. Members of this House in our prayers for those who are in serious condition, while we wish the other injured people a speedy recovery.

And I am sure too, Mr. Speaker, that you join all of us in this House in offering our sincere condolences to the Léger and McGraw families and wishing them the courage they will need to come through this difficult period.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the announcement of the Minister of Transport of a royal commission on transportation in Canada. In the meantime, I urge the Minister of Transport to negotiate a separate agreement with the Province of Nova Scotia which would expedite the upgrading of the Trans-Canada Highway between Amherst and Truro.

The cutbacks of CN in Newfoundland resulted in substantial additional highway traffic through Nova Scotia, and the recent VIA announcements will result in even more traffic. This is an acute situation with certain sections of the highway experiencing accident rates sometimes four times the norm and all too often resulting in fatalities.

Nova Scotia is unique by design in that we have only one main highway into and out of the province which accommodates all the traffic for Nova Scotia as well as Newfoundland. An upgrading of this thoroughfare is absolutely essential.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the Minister of Transport rose in this House and tried to justify cutting VIA Rail by 50 per cent across the country by quoting the 7 per cent ridership occupancy rate on one particular train on the Waboden—Churchill run.

What he did not tell this House was that this is not the regular passenger train, it is the way-freight. What he did not tell this House is that this Churchill train is an old combination coach and baggage car built in 1928, with wooden seats and with a thin partition separating passengers from freight. There is no food or beverage service whatsoever. The train is always late because it is a freight train.

What the minister also did not tell this House is that it takes over 33 hours to go from Waboden to Churchill on this particular run. He did not tell this House that there is no place for the passengers to sleep. They are kicked off the train overnight and the station is closed.

The minister ignored the regular passenger train on which, during the tourist season, seats and sleeping accommodations are often impossible to come by. By wantonly using ridiculous aberrations, the minister is clearly demonstrating the obvious. He is not telling the truth to the people of Canada. VIA Rail needs a new conductor. The minister must go.

NATIONAL FIRE PREVENTION WEEK

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, this week, October 8 through 14, has been proclaimed National Fire Prevention Week. The theme this year is: "Big fires start small. Keep matches and lighters in the right hands". This theme was chosen following findings which indicate that one of every seven school children has recently played with fire, and that children playing with fire is the leading cause of fire deaths among very young children.

Canadians this week and throughout the year are invited to involve themselves in fire safety prevention measures and are reminded to take extra precautions at home to prevent children from having easy access to fire starting materials. As Saturday, October 14, marks Fire Service Recognition Day, I am sure that all members present and indeed all Canadians would like to join me in saluting the dedication and effectiveness of the members of Canada's fire service.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance sometimes likes to quote me in the House and I wish to provide him with more quotations. For instance, I also said that this Mulroney government is the worst thing that happened to the Canadian people since World War II.

[Translation]

I would like to quote the Minister who said in the House on March 8, 1984: "We will reduce spending. We will avoid raising taxes which are already too high".

An Hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Gauthier: The Minister of Finance!

He did not keep his promise. The Minister increased spending and raised taxes thirty-one times. Even worse, he is about to have Parliament approve a 9 per cent tax on goods and services. Mr. Speaker, this new tax is unfair and inequitable. It will cause particular hardship for low- and middle-income families.

The provinces are aware of the financial circumstances of Canadian families. That is why they do not tax food, and most provinces have no tax on clothing, or if they do, they tax at a very low rate. The Mulroney Government wants to tax these vital necessities as well. The goods and services tax is an anti-family tax. I think the Minister of Finance could use a new slogan, and I will quote one from a statement I made recently. It is: "What is good for the Conservatives is bad for Canadians".

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca is stumbling at the starting gate in the NDP leadership race and some of his star-struck colleagues are embracing him as the latest hands-on favourite.

I want to caution westerners, especially of the leftist, socialist persuasion, of the legacy of this three-year wonder as premier of the province of British Columbia. This is a man who doubled the salaries of the premiers and the MLAs as his first order of business. This is the man who said, when asked about borrowing money from a foreign country, "I am not here to pass moral judgment on the world, a buck is a buck". Does this mean that he would advocate doing business with South American drug barons or Libya or South Africa?

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, the environmental challenge facing all Canadians impacts especially on the workers whose livelihoods depend on our forests. Last week at the IWA conference in Vancouver, delegates debated and passed resolutions recognizing the importance of the environment, and called for policies that stress fighting wasteful logging practices, boosting research and development, an aggressive program of replanting trees and equitable land use policies. A resolution to have a union-wide referendum to approve an environmental fund also passed.

All too often, the workers in the forest get squeezed in resource conflicts by industry and government. As one delegate said about our forest resource, "I too am an environmentalist. My job depends on it."

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to recognize an organization which works tirelessly in the best interests of western Canadian farmers, the Canadian Wheat Board. The Canadian Wheat Board has always been active in finding new markets and expanding existing ones.

Presently, the Wheat Board markets western Canadian grains to over 60 countries throughout the world. During the last four years, the enormous export subsidies of the United States and the European Economic Community have made the job of the Canadian Wheat Board much more difficult. The fact that the 1988 harvest was very small made a bad situation even worse.

Despite the adverse conditions, the Canadian Wheat Board has done an excellent job of protecting our position in the international market-place. With grain production much improved on the prairies, I am sure they are looking forward to the challenges of the future and will meet them successfully as they have in the past. I am confident that the Canadian Wheat Board will remain the cornerstone of the western Canadian grain marketing system.

MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday I had the privilege to preside over the national Liberal task force on municipal infrastructure. Every Canadian is entitled to clean water, fresh air, adequate sewage systems, safe bridges and good roads.

However, as far as I could see from representations made by municipalities in the Ottawa—Carleton region, municipal infrastructures are in a deplorable state and need federal funding.

[English]

I believe that all levels of government have a commitment to improve our infrastructure. It is unrealistic to expect that the financial burden of infrastructure management should be borne by the local municipality alone, whether it is within the Ottawa region where the federal government gets a near free ride because of its heavy usage of local infrastructure or anywhere else throughout the country.

I therefore ask the Government to immediately acknowledge the importance of maintaining urban infrastructures by providing financial support to Canadian municipalities.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have some questions for the Prime Minister relating to his upcoming international trip. Four years ago on October 28, 1985, the Prime Minister said this to the United Nations in its General Assembly meeting:

> If there are not fundamental changes in South Africa, we are prepared to invoke total sanctions against that country and its repressive regime. If there is no progress in the dismantling of apartheid, our relations with South Africa may have to be severed absolutely.

That was what the Prime Minister said to the United Nations four years ago.

At the Commonwealth Conference in Malaysia next week, does the Prime Minister finally intend to honour his word and to indicate that Canada really will invoke total sanctions against South Africa? Will he use the influence of his office and Canadian public opinion to persuade other Commonwealth leaders, including Prime Minister Thatcher to the same thing? Is four years not long enough for the Prime Minister to keep his word?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think leaders of the front-line states, for example, would be somewhat surprised by the question of my right hon. friend because there is general recognition in the Commonwealth, particularly in the front-line states but also in many areas of the industrialized world, that the Commonwealth and Canada have provided very vigorous leadership in the fight against apartheid which began in earnest some four or five years ago.

Canada has taken some 50 initiatives, many of which have been followed by other industrialized nations. We are satisfied that the growing impact of these sanctions and policies has had a beneficial effect on developments in southern Africa: the results in Namibia, the developments in Angola, the election of President de Klerk and his recent visit to Zambia which would have been absolutely inconceivable some two or three years ago, his statements on the record of his desire to bring about fundamental change. All of this means for us that we have to maintain the pressure that Canada initiated, along with others, in the Commonwealth some four or five years ago.

I take the comments of my right hon. friend as an encouragement to intensify the procedures and the policies adopted by this government some five years ago to bring about desired change in South Africa.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, also on the record four years ago before the United Nations are the words "dismantling of apartheid" and "our relations may be severed absolutely". I note with concern the government's change in vocabulary in recent weeks. The government used to talk about abolishing apartheid, now it talks about reforming it. With great respect, no blacks were allowed to vote in the last South African general election.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, about the meeting of Commonwealth heads of government, I would like to get back to the question already before the House, the issue of China. Following the Beijing massacres, the Government declared that we could no longer act as if nothing had happened. However, on September 26, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, speaking on behalf of Canada, made his comprehensive speech before the annual United Nations general Assembly, and failed to say anything about China, not a word!

Could the Prime Minister explain this flagrant omission? Can we act as though nothing happened in China? Has our policy changed since the House passed a unanimous resolution condemning the events in China? Will the Prime Minister respond to the wishes of Parliament and table a resolution at the Commonwealth conference, demanding collective action against China?

Mr. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since the events, Canada's policy towards China has been to take a severe approach entirely appropriate to the circumstances. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has in no way departed from this policy which arose from the Chinese Government's brutal treatment of its people a few months ago.

In the House, the Minister stated clearly what our policy would be, a policy that is basically similar to that adopted by many large industrialized countries, and we have been consistent in implementing that policy. We wanted to send a clear message to the Chinese government, but on the other hand, we also wanted to maintain our links with the Chinese people, because all Canadians will benefit from maintaining the bridge that exists between the Chinese people and the Canadian people.

So that is the challenge we had to face, and I think we have faced this challenge successfully, in the interests of all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in response to an overwhelming expression of Canadian opinion reflected in the unanimous resolution of the House of Commons, the Secretary of State undertook to us and to Canadians that there would not be business as usual with the current leadership in China. I share with the Prime Minister his view that our quarrel is not with the Chinese people but with the current leadership, but the action of his government since that resolution has not lived up to the undertaking given to the House.

Following the Commonwealth Conference, the Prime Minister is travelling to Central America, so I would like to ask him about the Organization of American States. The Prime Minister has speculated about the possibility of Canada joining this organization. As this would represent a shift in Canadian foreign policy and indeed, a shift in the foreign policy of his own government, would it be the Prime Minister's intention to allow a parliamentary hearing to test Canadian opinion on this matter before he makes any announcement?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, obviously a committee of this House is free and unfettered in its ability to investigate any policy of this government, or to make any recommendations of policy.

For my part, in response to the question of my right hon. friend, I have been troubled for some time by the absence of Canada from any direct role in hemispheric affairs. There are few organizations that deal with this, the OAS being one of them. While Canada has been very active in Europe, in the United Nations and in organizations around the world, as a matter of deliberate government policy over many decades now, Canada has been absent from what could be an influential role in the Organization of American States.

Clearly, there are downsides to every decision. Each decision carries with it difficulties for the future. However, and I will be speaking of this in the days to come, I believe that Canada has a larger and a more beneficial role to play in the hemisphere. This government plans to pursue all avenues that will allow us to play that kind of productive role.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, there is one message that is ringing out loud and clear across the country for many in the workforce. Again today we have heard from labour leaders across the country who have stated unequivocally that workers in Canada will not play patsy as the government wages war on workers.

My question to the Prime Minister is very simple. We now know that the goods and services tax is going to increase inflation, lower the standard of living, and at least maintain interest rates where they are if not increase them. In the face of all of that, and in view of the unequivocal statement by labour across Canada that they will not become involved in wage moderation when in fact we know there will not be price moderation, is it the intention now of the government to withdraw the goods and services tax proposal and go back to the drawing board as is being recommended by people across the country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, one message that comes through pretty clearly in the hearings and in things that I have heard from a number of other people is that we should not be withdrawing this tax. I think the hon. member himself said back in the summer that this was the right way to go. Yes, the hon. member had some differences but he felt it was the right way to go to move from the existing 13.5 per cent manufactured sales tax to a 9 per cent goods and services tax.

The hon. member made specific reference to the importance of ensuring that we do not get an inflationary impact from the implementation of the goods and services tax. What we are asking Canadians to do here is to accommodate a 1 per cent negative impact on their income as a result of the one–time only inflationary impact as a result of the goods and services tax.

Let us put that in perspective. There has been an 11 per cent increase in real disposable income after tax, that is disposable income after tax and after inflation since 1984–85. Putting it in that perspective, I believe that the position the government has taken is a realistic one.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, Canadians understand the Governor of the Bank of Canada is saying once again he will keep a weather eye out for wage demands and ignore prices, and that is why I will repeat my question to the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister.

Since Canadians are being asked to accept a drop in their standard of living, do you seriously think that women and men working in Canada today will agree to moderate their wage demands, now we know the Governor of the Bank of Canada is only going to watch wages and not prices? As far as I can see, the message is quite clear: Canadian men and women will not play along!

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me just draw the attention of the House to the fact that most of the economic analyses have all agreed that there is a very important long-term benefit from the introduction of the goods and services tax; more jobs, higher growth, less inflation, greater productivity. This is widely agreed upon by the various think tanks.

The big question is whether we get this immediately in year one. Our analysis shows 35,000 new jobs in year one and 60,000 new jobs in year two. There are some very major economic benefits here if Canadians, both business and labour, do not act in such a way as to generate an inflationary impact. I have been saying, and others have been saying to business people, "Use restraint with your pricing and also use restraint in wage negotiations to make sure that we can avoid this inflationary impact and bring forward those major economic benefits as soon as we can".

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. A year ago this month the Prime Minister said with reference to the Canada-U.S. Trade Agreement, that if the consequences of this deal were bad, that it was "cancellable on six months' notice".

According to figures released by the Canadian Labour Congress today—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Wait for the question. The most recent data it has prepared indicates that there have been some 57,000 jobs lost. Does the Government of Canada agree with these figures, and if not, will it produce its own evidence by which Canadians can make comparison with its studies and those that have been done outside the government?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can produce figures that were released on Friday by Statistics Canada which indicate that unemployment in Canada has dropped to 7.3 per cent. It has not been lower since August 1981.

• (1430)

It indicates as well that there have been 189,000 new jobs created in Canada since January 1, 1989, when the free trade agreement came into effect, 86 per cent of them full-time.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister knows that there are still over one million Canadians unemployed and that notwithstanding the braying in the back-benches of his own party if the studies done outside the government are correct unemployment would be that much lower if we did not have the trade deal. That is what that is all about.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Once again the Conservative caucus demonstrates its lofty level of intelligence, but I leave that with the people of Canada.

When the Prime Minister made the claim last fall that the deal would be cancellable on six months notice, presumably he intended the people of Canada to believe his government would conduct its own studies to have a serious assessment of the effects of the trade deal. It could mean nothing else for a serious person. If the Prime Minister and his jackals here want to contend figures outside the House, why does the government not have the integrity to produce its own studies for the people of Canada on this?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the free trade agreement took effect on January 1, 1989. It is of course difficult for anyone to evaluate the full effects in such a short period of time, on one side or the other. I think my friend would acknowledge that. It will probably take somewhat more time before any objective observer can come to a definitive judgment. And I could understand my friend's question if, since January 1, 1989, Canada had lost 189,000 jobs. But we did not lose any, we created 189,000 new jobs in Canada. That seems to suggest to me that by and large the general economy, including the implications of the free trade agreement, are having beneficial results in Canada.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister knows full well that every year since the Second World War there have been thousands of new jobs created. That is not the issue.

Some Hon. Members: Wrong, wrong.

Mr. Broadbent: The serious issue, and I would hope the Prime Minister would be serious about it, is whether we would have more jobs that have been created, created, had we not had the trade deal. That is what a serious study would tell us and that is what the government should be up to.

The Prime Minister knows perfectly well that during the weekend, the Minister responsible for Agriculture admitted in a speech in Québec that ever since the trade agreement was signed, the results for Canada had been very negative in his Department, and this applies to pork, beef, sugar, fish and other products. According to this study, we have now lost nearly 60,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector. If that is true, isn't this sufficient reason for the Government to terminate the agreement?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State)(Agriculture) is of course concerned about the tenor of certain gestures or decisions by the U.S. administration, in light of the FTA. Last week we had a meeting with executives of the UPA, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of State (Agriculture), the Minister for International Trade and myself, to discuss and analyse approaches to problems of this nature. Of course, one must be vigilant whenever a trade treaty is concerned, and the Minister is trying to do so. The Hon. Member quoted from a document. I could mention another document that was published this morning. This is a report from Germany, datelined Munich.

[English]

"Premier Frank McKenna of New Brunswick told West German businessmen yesterday that the U.S.–Canadian free trade agreement has opened up major (new) market opportunities and urged them to invest in his province."

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Obviously, Premier McKenna, one of the distinguished Liberals in this country—maybe the only one—certainly, relatively speaking, a visionary Liberal—

Mr. Broadbent: On Meech Lake?

Mr. Mulroney: On commercial matters—has indicated a matter that I think my hon. friend will agree benefits New Brunswick. The associate Liberal finance critic from New Brunswick would agree, I am sure, that his former Premier and leader speaks very eloquently for New Brunswick in terms of economic matters. Therefore, I am sure a lot of Liberals will want to support him.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a comment on the Prime Minister's last statement. I wonder if he applies that sense of vision to the Premier of New Brunswick on constitutional matters as well.

The Prime Minister has made some use of figures on this issue, and I think there is a matter of division in the country. Why is it that in the Statistic Canada figures he quoted that the number of full-time jobs fell by 36,000 in the last month and that the job figures as compared to last year are down by 30 to 40 per cent?

Does that not begin to show that there has been a serious loss of jobs as a direct consequence of the trade agreement? If the government is disregarding those figures, why is it afraid to publish its own? Why is it afraid to come forward with its own score card as to the impact of the trade agreement as promised by this government in the election?

I ask the Prime Minister directly: Will the government publish now its studies and reports on the consequence of the trade agreement so that Canadians can finally know the truth?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, the figures are there as published by Statistics Canada. Since 1984 there have been 1,535,000 new jobs created in Canada.

Mr. Allmand: Since last year.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says: "since last year". Since November 1988, since the election involving the free trade agreement, there are 205,000 new jobs created in Canada. There were 5,000 in Newfoundland, 4,000 in Nova Scotia, 85,000 in Ontario, 27,000 in Alberta, and 84,000 in British Columbia. In fact this year more than 55 per cent of all the new jobs created in Canada have been created in western Canada and that too is a sign of economic and social progress.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is still fudging the answer. He is not giving the figures because he knows full well that the report shows that there were less jobs created this year than there were last year and that the full-time jobs are substantially down this year over the last year. It does not take an economic genius, which the Prime Minister is not, to figure out that the free trade agreement is having a negative effect.

We simply want to know when this government is going to live up to its commitment and promises to provide this country with the proper figures and proper adjustment programs so that Canadian workers will not be victimized by this agreement but will be helped by this government because of the free trade agreement's negative effect of loss of jobs that other groups can clearly see.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, from 1984 to 1988 Canada had the largest percentage growth in employment of any G-7 country: Canada's was 12 per cent, the United States was 9.5 per cent, the United Kingdom 7.5 per cent and so on. Since the free trade agreement has come into effect, there have been 189,000 new jobs created and the member for Winnipeg says we have lost jobs. There have been 189,000 new jobs, but perhaps my hon. friend would want to go on the record with some information that was provided by the finance department and the Bank of Canada. Since 1984 and 1988 more jobs were created in Canada than in the following countries put together: West Germany, France, Sweden, Belgium, Greece, Finland, Ireland, New Zealand and Austria. That is a record of job creation that my hon. friend should be applauding.

FINANCE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Over the weekend it was revealed that the Minister of Finance and the Information Commissioner are in a lawsuit over the minister's refusal to release departmental documents which would show whether the minister was telling the truth about Tory campaign promises during the election. These were departmental estimates on interest rates and on the deficit.

The minister has never claimed, nor have his officials, that these documents are entitled to exemption from disclosure, and they are not entitled to exemption from disclosure. On the contrary, in July and in September his officials told Iain Hunter, a reporter from The Ottawa Citizen that the documents were ready for release and in the minister's hands.

Is the minister prepared to obey the law, to end this senseless lawsuit, both sides of which are being paid for by the taxpayers, and to make these documents public today?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is no lawsuit. We have been working hard on developing the information that Mr. Hunter of The Ottawa Citizen has required.

I would say to him and I would say to the House today that we have every intention of providing the applicant with the information that he is entitled to under the act?

[Translation]

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, according to the Information Commissioner, the Government's and the Minister's failure to provide this information is in itself a violation of the Act. Again, I want to ask whether the Minister is now prepared to admit that the only reason for the delay, on two occasions, maybe three, is that the documents reveal that the Government's statement during the election campaign were false?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, my answer would be the same as I gave to his previous question.

It has taken a while to pull this information together, but when the information is completely pulled together we will provide all the information to Mr. Hunter that he is entitled to under the act.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. During the last election campaign we heard a lot of promises about adjustment programs geared to cushioning the negative impact of the free trade deal. News reports today say that 50,000 to 60,000 people have already lost their jobs as a direct result of the free trade deal.

The only adjustments I see being made are adjustments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Would the Prime Minister confirm that the only adjustment program he has is cut-backs in unemployment insurance so that the unemployed workers themselves can pay for the training of other unemployed workers?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the figures that came out today are not the figures that I explained to the member in committee last week. The figures that came out today are not in line with what the future of this country is and they are not in line with what is the labour force development strategy.

The labour force development strategy will provide $800 million more. It will be paid for by employers and employees, not by the unemployed who will have a far stronger chance of building a better future because they will have more job opportunities through Community Futures and through training for contemporary jobs. That is what workers in Canada have expressed to us that they want, through their application for our existing programs, because they want the training.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister as well. The only question I can ask in response to that answer is: will the Prime Minister go to Gaspe; will the Prime Minister go to Moncton, New Brunswick; will the Prime Minister go to the Avalon Peninsula and explain to the 10,000 people in the Avalon Peninsula why they are going to be cut off from unemployment insurance if Bill C-21 passes?

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, let me say first of all that the opportunities to upgrade skills are going to exist all across Canada. I have just returned from a trip to Atlantic Canada where I explained our programs which were well received by the people with whom I met in New Brunswick.

There is a demand for skilled labour in all parts of Canada, including Atlantic Canada. I met with all of our Community Futures managers there from across Atlantic Canada and they understand perfectly well what we are trying to do and they support it.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration. As a result of the base closure at Portage La Prairie and others, the minister heads a cabinet committee to deal with the negative impact of unemployment and economic losses to the area.

Will the minister guarantee adequate funds for the new economic opportunities office that she has opened there, about $2 million, in view of the fact that we are saving $450 million on defence.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his continuing interest in his community.

My officials have been meeting with community representatives, with employers and with workers in the area. Through the Office of Western Economic Diversification new jobs are already being created in the Portage area. There were 90 new jobs in product development and assembly at Western Combine Corporation in Portage. We are funding this store front office to help people in the community take advantage of new opportunities, and that is how the people in the community see it.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. On VIA Rail cuts the government is saying no public hearings. On the GST the government is saying it is going ahead no matter what the public says.

Now on unemployment insurance the government is ignoring everything that has been said right across the country about the devastating effects of Bill C-21 on the unemployed and on their communities and is ploughing ahead with this disastrous bill. Is there anything on which the Prime Minister and this government are prepared to listen to Canadians?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, let me point out that on the labour force development strategy, in response to some of the things that were said in the committee, we have come out with some amendments which I thought the hon. member supported.

As well, in terms of the growth in jobs that are going to be created as a result of the Community Futures and as a result of the training, that is something this government stands behind.

I would also remind the hon. member that the Liberal government in 1977 changed the entrance requirements as well. We intend to stand by our changes.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who is ignoring the views expressed in four weeks of testimony on her bill across Canada. Doesn't she realize that the cuts in unemployment benefits will impoverish thousands of Canadian unemployed and devastate the economies of so many small communities across Canada which depend on seasonal industries?

[English]

Is not the Minister really telling the unemployed in rural Canada with this bill: "move or starve"?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, quite the contrary. One of the things we did for seasonal workers, because we recognize the reality of this in parts of Canada, is that we took out the repeater provision which penalized seasonal workers. So we were paying attention to seasonal workers.

We are going to double the training money under this strategy and it is going to be very helpful to Canadians. I suggest that the hon. member help us decide what the training funds should be used for so we can help the people in his region as well.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In Newfoundland there is growing uneasiness over the federal government's employment policy engendered by Bill C-21, the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The emphasis on training for jobs that do not exist at the expense of jobs that do exist has the disastrous effect of forcing Newfoundlanders to move away from their home to find work. They can no longer rely on the traditional jobs available to them under the job development strategy.

Will the minister promise this House, and Newfoundlanders in particular, that she will show compassion and re-examine the proposed changes that will not work for other parts of Canada and that will be disastrous for Newfoundland?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think that Newfoundland, as the rest of Canada, deserves all of our help in terms of building an economic base from the ground up and providing the training that workers there need. There are skill shortages in Newfoundland as there are in other parts of Canada.

It is the strength of the Community Futures Program that starts in the community and defines those needs and those opportunities, combined with the training that we can provide, that is going to help people in Newfoundland as it is in other parts of Canada.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary question I am going to quote the Prime Minister who said that clearly there is a down side to every decision. There is quite a down side to this. Let us face it: this is a bad bill.

If this sudden shift in policy makes so much sense, can the minister explain why the committee on Bill C-21 in its hearings across the country experienced about a 90 per cent rejection rate; 80 per cent vehemently opposed, 10 per cent opposed and the remaining 10 per cent confused, undecided and lukewarm at best?

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member goes through the submissions that were made at the hearings, as I have, he should understand better that whereas there was some disagreement with some of the proposals from one side and there was disagreement with the other, we have labour and management for the first time in this country working together on what the training programs should look like. That is a real breakthrough for this country and for the kind of programs we are going to provide.

Oral Questions

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Minister of State for Agriculture admitted this past weekend that since free trade came in in this country in fact there has been a decrease in the relationships between the United States and Canada so far as trade is concerned.

In view of this, what explanation can the Prime Minister give for allowing, contrary to law, American used cars into this country without meeting Canadian safety standards?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that as concerns used cars coming into this country from the United States, the Department of Transport has already proceeded with a series of changes in its regulations, especially for vehicles more than eight years old, and we intend to bring the Canadian market's regulations into line with Canadian safety regulations. I can give the House the assurance that as procedures are implemented, Canadian regulations will be brought into line, and that there is no way used cars coming in from the United States will not meet Canadian safety regulations.

[English]

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, in fact this government said that safety standards would be respected for Canada in this entire arrangement with the United States. So I ask this government again: Why this reversal, why this decision to turn back this promise which was made to the Canadian people, why this decision to put the risk of Canadian safety on the bargaining table yet again?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my friend knows that what he says is absolutely untrue. He knows that very well. He knows that, for example, we have changed the regulations for the metric speedometers and the bilingual fuel labels. At this stage with the existing U.S. safety standards we will soon replace the regulations in place with the notice of defect, and after 1990 all vehicles imported will be required to respect the Canadian rules. He knows that very well. I do not believe that it is sound to mix politics with safety.

MINES

Mr. Guy St–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion.

The Canada–Québec agreement on mineral development expires in March 1990. This agreement has met its objectives quite satisfactorily, but much remains to be done with respect to research and development in the mining industry in Québec.

My question is as follows: Could the Minister confirm to the House today that he is currently engaged in talks with the Government of Québec for the purpose of renewing the agreement for the next five years, so that the mining industry will survive? If not, when will talks begin with the Government of Québec, with Mr. Bourassa's government?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I can indeed confirm that we are in active discussions with the Government of Quebec in terms of our co–operative economic agreements. I am hopeful that now that the Bourassa government has been re–elected a new ministry will be in place and we will be able to make progress and sign the agreements in the near future.

COMMUNITY FUTURES PROGRAM

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The Lamont–Two Hills Community Futures Program is important to Elk Island. Can the Minister assure us that this program will continue and, if so, will she also assure us that the smallest possible amount of program funding will be spent on administration and bureaucracy and that the maximum possible support will go toward helping the small businessmen and our community?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Lamont–Two Hills Community Futures is a program that has been under way for only a couple of years. As a young project it is already proving itself helpful. We would expect to see a transition from more administrative costs to more program costs as it progresses, because that has normally been the history of what has happened with community futures projects.

CANADA–U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in response to a question from the member for Essex—Windsor, the Minister of Transport again demonstrated a lack of familiarity with his own documents. He indicated that used cars under the free trade agreement would not be allowed importation from the United States unless they met Canadian safety standards.

I want to read from the regulatory impact analysis statement just produced this morning by this government which says:

> The Motor Vehicle Safety Act currently prohibits the importation of motor vehicles prescribed by regulation that do not meet Canadian motor vehicle safety standards. Strict enforcement of these provisions will conflict with the intent of the free trade agreement as used vehicles from the United States will not necessarily meet all Canadian motor vehicle safety standards and thus cannot be imported.

Would the Minister spend a little more time in reading the background documents on VIA and on free trade before he spontaneously gives answers like that in the House of Commons?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that the leader of the Liberal party had the document at the beginning of this session. It has been given to him by the member for Winnipeg.

Some Hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Benoit Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I will just repeat what I said. I said that we have changed regulations dealing with cars imported from the United States and we will continue to do that.

I said also that procedures have been developed that will require vehicles imported after 1990 to comply with Canadian standards when equivalent U.S. models may have different safety standards. That is what I said; that is what I repeat.

• (1500)

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, all that indicates is that the hon. member from Winnipeg, who is our trade critic, knows the documents produced by the government better than the minister does.

I want to suggest that it is becoming a habit that when the minister presents statements to this House and quotes government policy, when we get the documents the next day, as we did in the case of the regulatory impact analysis statement relating to the importation of used cars, among other goods, and when we got the statement produced by the president of VIA Rail, supposedly tabled in the House of Commons to support the minister's statements, the written documents in no way substantiate what he tells this House.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to use my documents rather than those produced in terms of employment by the member from Winnipeg. When he was the Minister of Employment and Immigration, we had the worst performance in terms of employment in this country.

I repeat what I said, Mr. Speaker. The documents I use as Minister of Transport are sound and very good documents. I prefer to use my documents rather than those produced by his party.

PRIVILEGE

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank your for giving me this opportunity to raise a question of privilege of which I gave the Chair notice this morning. Last Friday, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans published a document under the title: Atlantic Fisheries Media Book. This document contains some information that was already available to the public and also information that is being published for the first time. This information is not and was not available to Members. The Minister took this opportunity to release the information directly to the media, without inviting or notifying Members.

As a Member of this House with specific duties as the Opposition spokesman for fisheries, I feel that my rights have been breached and that my role as the Official Opposition critic has been diminished. Especially, Mr. Speaker, since in this document, the Minister seems to paint a picture that is far more optimistic than the gloomy situation in our Atlantic fisheries. We know there is a serious problem with our northern cod. Quotas have been cut, plants have had to close, the herring fisheries are in serious trouble, and lobster, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order! I am reluctant to interrupt the Hon. Member. I realize he may wish to formulate a complaint, but I must say, in response to his statement, that this does not constitute a question of privilege. However, if the Hon. Minister wishes to respond, he may do so.

[English]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly pleased to respond to the concerns raised in the form of a question of privilege by my hon. colleague for Beauséjour.

I am aware of a collection of information, I assume to be public information, which my Deputy Minister and officials have put together, summarizing the current economic performance, and the landings, the record of the fishery of recent years. I understand that that document has been used for the briefing of various members of the media, among others.

That document has not been made available to members of Parliament. I believe it to be based on public information. I would be most happy to make it available to all members of Parliament should that be the wish of the hon. member.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in no way has the privilege of members been breached in this manner.

Mr. Speaker: First, other members may wish to rise. There is no particular need to do that because this is not a question of privilege. The hon. member for Beausejour has directed a complaint to the Chair. I am sure that given the response by the Minister, perhaps a discussion would ensure that the complaint would not have to be brought again.

Hon. members will realize that a question of privilege is not the place to enter into a debate, no matter how legitimate or how difficult the issue is.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, you will remember that since last Friday, we have changed the Standing Orders somewhat with respect to committees of the House. As you know, the Standing Committees of the House have all been reconstituted and are now in a new session, and to avoid having elections in all the committees, the House decided not to follow the customary procedure in the Standing Orders according to which each committee elects its chairman, vice-chairman and so forth.

Today, it seems we have a few problems as a result of the decision we made here on Friday, since the committee clerks will not accept the lists of replacements for members of the various House committees, which may cause certain problems when we want to be replaced or have to be in two locations at the same time. Mr. Speaker, to deal with this situation and avoid any problems as a result of the fact that members have not had time since this morning to submit their lists of replacements, I wish to move, having consulted with the Government and the New Democratic Party, the following motion which reads as follows:

> That the list of replacements for members of Standing Committees, in effect on October 5, 1989, in other words, last Thursday, remain in effect, where appropriate, until October 17, 1989.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier is clearly putting a motion which would require consent of the House. There seems to be some indication that he has that consent. Is it agreed?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When the House rose at one o'clock, the hon. member for Nickel Belt had the floor.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-20, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee, and on Motions Nos. 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16 standing in the name of the hon. member for Calgary Northeast.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. At that time I was speaking in support of the amendments put forward by the hon. member for Calgary Northeast on Bill C-20. I had pointed out that the facts show that this government is tax crazy. I listed and enumerated, since 1984, the tax increases that the government has brought about on the people of Canada and that in fact Canadians are fed up with the way in which this government has been reaching into their pockets, left pocket, right pocket and back pockets, and taking their hard-earned money from them.

At the same time, I think Canadians are thoroughly shocked by the way in which the government treats the wealthy in this country. It seems that Michael Wilson, finance minister, once said in a speech in Montreal: "The problem with Canada is that there are too few rich people". I do not see why they seem to think of it as their mandate to try and increase the number of rich people by taking from the poor to give to the rich. This is a new version of Robin Hood.

In fact, just to give you an idea of how people feel, these are ordinary folk—who express in their own way—the way they feel about this government and taxes, I have received a couple of letters in the last week from two diverse places, one from here in Ottawa. I will read parts of the letter into the record because I think it is apropos. It is written to me and it states:

Dear Sir:

We are quite concerned as seniors of middle-income means as to the possible impact the GST and claw-back on the OAS is expected to have on our group—

We were both born and raised in a low-income and hard-working milieu. We, however, studied hard, worked hard and struggled all our lives in order to better ourselves and thus achieve a reasonable, comfortable life style for our children and ourselves. We planned for our retirement the best that we could on a middle-income salary. Suddenly, we find that these last two conservative governments are undermining all our efforts to ensure ourselves of a self-sufficient and decent life style.

We have corresponded with Mr. Blenkarn regarding our grave concerns—

Good luck to them.

—only to receive the attached response.

The attached response is the same offhand dismissal that Mr. Blenkarn has treated the people of Newfoundland, Alberta, British Columbia and northern Ontario to. If they are not from his income bracket, he just dismisses them. Nevertheless, this couple wrote to Mr. Blenkarn thinking that he was the chairman of the finance committee, that somehow or other he is the person you write to, or at least he might listen.

• (1510)

The letter continues:

We are neither naive nor stupid enough to believe that we are not likely to be seriously affected by the proposed GST, claw-back of the OAS and God only knows what else this government may be proposing for the future to further undermine our financial status and thus our life style.

We hope and pray that members like yourself, Mr. Douglas Young, Mr. Lorne Nystrom, to name a few, will continue to fight on our behalf and on behalf of people of the lower income levels. These two levels are the most vulnerable and least protected in Canadian society, yet the government is taking dead aim at them.

That is written very simply and from the heart. This gang seems to come from the head. They go from the head to people's pocket-books. This couple is writing from the heart, the way they have experienced it. They have worked all their lives and here comes this Tory government, acting like a Tory government. Of course we know the whole idea is to restructure the tax system so that the wealthy get off scot-free while you take it from middle and low-income Canadians.

Here is another letter from a couple of women in Lively, Ontario. It states:

Dear Mr. Rodriguez:

I am tired of the government doing what they want, everyone complaining and no one doing anything. I think the problem is that people feel helpless to fight the government and we don't know how to do it or what to do about it. We do not live in a democracy as we are led to believe. The government is far too powerful in this country.

> Everyone I know was against free trade and it went through. The concerns of the common taxpayer are of no concern to the government. They do what they want and they aren't in a position to suffer from their decisions.
> We work hard for our money and we aren't allowed to keep a decent portion of it. My husband works 10 hours a day, six days a week and we are always overdrawn at the bank, we do not have a new car—a 1980 small model—and we live in a small house. We don't drink, we don't go out except for the odd dinner out for a break and we all need clothes and other necessities. No matter how hard we work we don't get ahead.
> Forgive me if my letter sounds bitter and hateful but I'm just so tired of the government and what it is doing to us. I thought I'd write and tell you how I feel and so many others feel the same way. They may not want to write because they feel it's hopeless, too. Can't you do something?

How could Tories sit over there and not respond to a plaintive cry for help as people are trod upon by this government which has no mandate to do what it is doing? None whatsoever, no mandate at all.

I want to say that we need 19 more Tories with courage, with guts, with backbone, not a wishbone where their backbone should be. We want them to stand up like the Member for Calgary Northeast, stand up and be counted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the Hon. Member's time has expired.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to be able to take part today in this debate. I certainly support the motions that have been put forth by the Hon. Member for Calgary Northeast.

As an MP from Prince Edward Island, I have many concerns about this bill. Bill C–20 will affect our three main industries: farming, fishing and tourism. As well, it will affect the consumers, commuters and truckers. In fact, all islanders will be affected in some way by these changes.

This government claims to have chosen, and I quote, "a balanced approach that takes regional situations into account and that imposes the heaviest burden on those who are most able to bear it".

I contend that the measures contained in Bill C–20 reflect not a balanced approach but an unbalanced approach that stands to cost my part of the country, the Maritimes, more than other parts of Canada.

When we look at the elimination of the excise tax rebate on gasoline and diesel fuel, we see this means that it will cost the farmers on Prince Edward Island roughly $450,000 annually. We cannot forget that the farmer is also a consumer and that he is going to be hit by all these other tax increases. The gasoline tax increase when considered as an additional input cost of trucking will also mean higher freight rates to send crops to markets off the island.

If we look at another industry on Prince Edward Island, the tourist industry, we see that it means approximately $100 million to the economy of our province. It employs roughly one–tenth of the population. This increase in the price of gasoline, which has gone up 32 cents a gallon since 1984, is going to mean that the cost of a holiday in P.E.I., or in any part of Canada, is going to be more expensive. What this is going to mean is that a trip south is going to look more appealing than coming to Prince Edward Island.

The fisheries industry is affected by Bill C–20, and it is a vital industry to my province. Like the farmer, the fisherman will lose his gasoline excise tax exemption at the end of December. That means when he goes out to fish next year he is going to have to pay more for his fuel.

Again, let us not forget that the fisherman is also a consumer and is going to be subject to all these other tax increases like the rest of us. As I said, consumers are the main target of these tax measures under Bill C–20.

The Canadian consumer has been the target of this government's tax increases since 1984. We have seen an increase in the sales tax from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent. We have seen long distance telephone bills go from zero tax to 11 per cent tax. Finally, the gasoline tax has increased 7 cents per litre, or 32 cents a gallon, since 1984, and it may go even higher. Taxing the average Canadian consumer seems to be this government's policy. Since 1984 the total taxes of a family near the poverty line with two children and both parents working have gone up 176 per cent. The taxes on a comparable family earning $100,000 or more have gone up only 11 per cent. That is not my definition of fair taxation. In fact, I think that it is simply horrendous. Here we have taxes on a lower income family which have gone up 176 per cent as compared to 11 per cent for the high income family. We have the rich getting richer and the poor getting poorer.

I want to come back to the increased price of gasoline for a moment. The largest centres on Prince Edward Island, Summerside and Charlottetown, are both outside my riding. This means a lot of people in Malpeque have jobs in those areas and have to commute to work. The extra two cents per litre will mean that the average Island motorist will now pay at least $400 a year in federal and provincial taxes. It will mean that those who commute will have to pay double that amount, according to the Canadian Automobile Association.

That is the reality of rural living. That is what this means for the people of my riding. We have lost our VIA bus which means that 27,000 people who took the bus last year between Charlottetown and Moncton will now have to find another mode of transportation. This also is going to mean that we are going to have more cars on our overcrowded roads and more tax revenue going into government coffers.

While commuters face a tough time filling their cars with gasoline, including many who use car pools, the trucking industry is one industry that has really suffered and will continue to suffer as a result of this Bill C–20. Transportation firms have been asking the government to eliminate the excise tax because it discriminates against the long haul movements, thereby distorting regional economies.

A spokesman for Canadian Pacific said: "Transportation is a necessary input to virtually every business and service in this country". They maintain that by increasing the excise tax, which businesses cannot and will not be able to claim as an input credit, the government is discriminating against the trucking industry.

When the government imposes higher transportation costs as a result of the increase in fuel taxes, the basic price of goods, and therefore the tax paid on them, will be higher in places like Prince Edward Island. What this will mean is that people living in more remote regions will pay more tax than those living in central Canada. As my colleague from Yukon stated earlier this morning, this is simply unfair. This is not what I would call a balanced approach that takes regional considerations into account and imposes the heaviest burden on those who are most able to bear it, as the government claims.

To sum up, Bill C–20 in my opinion delivers just the opposite of what the government is suggesting. I contend that by increasing the tax on gasoline and other goods and services this government is hurting the regional economies like Prince Edward Island and people with lower incomes, many of whom can be found in my riding.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have an opportunity to speak to Bill C–20 because it has two very important provisions in it, clauses 4 and 5, which relate to regional economies, as the hon. member from Prince Edward Island has just outlined, and the massive increase in the excise tax on gasoline of two cents last April and one cent on January 1.

The impact of that amounts to some nine cents a gallon and is a pretty hefty increase in the price of gasoline. It had a lot of distorting impacts across the country, particularly in border cities like Sault Ste. Marie where we have literally hundreds of thousands of cars every week lining up to go across to the United States to fill up their tanks with gasoline there. That is harmful to our economy and the industry in that community.

The same thing has happened in other communities such as Fort Frances and other border cities across the country. But that is only one impact. The amazing thing is that somehow that industry is able to have its gas delivered from Canada to the United States. It is 55 cents and 57 cents a litre on the Canadian side and it is something like 32 cents or 35 cents a litre on the American side. Yet it comes out of the same tank. A lot of that of course is due to this increase in the gas tax, so that is of great concern. But that is only one aspect.

The really harmful aspect, I think, is on tourism and on the cost of living in regional areas of our country where one has long distances of 40, 50 or 60 miles a day to travel to work in whatever industries are available for employment. I think that this is a very serious and unfortunate increase in the excise tax on gasoline. These amendments seek to correct that problem.

The second area is the removal on January 1 of the refund of the excise tax. There has been a provision that rebates could be provided to farmers, to loggers, to fishermen, and to other primary industry producers. For agriculture alone it is estimated that it will cost about $100 million in the first year, which will be 1990. I think this amendment which would strike down this proposed removal of the excise tax on gasoline is a very good move.

Clearly, farmers were required in the budget to provide almost $500 million. That covers everything from crop insurance to grain and flour transportation, to the rail branch line rehabilitation program, and to grain and crop advance payments programs, the bill that we were debating last week, Bill C–36. It includes the dairy export program to the tune of $12 million, the commodity–based loan program at $15 million and the Canadian Dairy Commission program. That amounts to $399 million. But the gas tax rebate system involves $100 million, bang, every year.

This amendment proposes to reinstate that fuel tax rebate system which has been so beneficial to primary producers. I would hope that the members on the government side might take a second look at this with a view to retaining it because the impact on agriculture alone will be tremendous.

There will be similar impacts on fisheries, loggers, and people in other primary industries, but clearly for agriculture, it will be extremely harmful if the government does away with that rebate provision.

We are hoping as well that the government will back down on the whole arrangement for advance payments. Every farm group in this country is opposing the removal of the advance payment provisions of Bill C–36, which was also provided for in the budget of last April. Clearly, that is a very harmful decision that the government is proposing to take at a time when farmers are taking off their crops which provides up to $30,000 of cash flow, so that the farmers are forced to deliver a crop at a time when there is a massive supply on the market driving down prices. Those two issues alone will involve the loss of millions and millions of dollars to the agricultural community.

I hope that the minister will take another look at this and consider accepting this amendment which I think will be very beneficial both to farmers and other primary producers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Calgary Northeast on a point of order.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): I would like to withdraw Motion No. 9 standing in my name on the Order Paper as it deals with garbage disposal. I think the hon. member for Nickel Belt who seconded it agrees.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is no longer the member's, the motion belongs to the House. Therefore, we must have unanimous consent. Do we have unanimous consent to withdraw Motion No. 9 by the hon. member for Calgary Northeast?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion No. 9 withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Continuing debate with the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening intently to the speakers before me. I have found their speeches stimulating and enlightening. I hope we do not hit a soft spot for the next five or ten minutes.

I think the member for Malpeque, Prince Edward Island scored some very good points talking about tourism and the effects of the increase in gasoline tax. Of course, the member for Nickel Belt can always raise the level in this House considerably with his sense of humour, but he also scored some very good points. He is the man who has been noting that there is a strange kind of silence from the other side of the House. After all, it is the government's measure. It is the government's proposal. This is what the Tories want to do to the Canadian taxpayers and yet there seems to be a conspiracy of silence from that side of the House, save one. I listened very closely to the hon. member for Calgary Northeast and the gentleman made a lot of good points. It is too bad that his colleagues on that side of the House do not listen to him more often.

As I was listening to the hon. member for Calgary Northeast, I thought there is a man who I would call a small "c" Conservative. I wonder where all the small "c" Conservatives have gone from that side of the House? Where are the small "c" Conservatives who believe in fiscal restraint? Where are the small "c" Conservatives who believe in fiscal responsibility? Where are the small "c" Conservatives who believe that the government should not be day in and day out reaching into the pockets of Canadian taxpayers and taking more and more? Where have all the small "c" Conservatives gone to? Mr. Speaker? Where is the party of Borden? Where is the party of Meighen, Bennett, Diefenbaker, and Stanfield? Where have all the small "c" Conservatives gone? I do not know. I can tell you one thing and that is that they are not over there. This has become the party and the government of big spending. This is the party that now believes in driving the country further into debt.

It is necessary to remember that this is the party which said that it would take control of the economy. Remember those Halcyon days of the Tories way back in 1984 when they excoriated Liberals from one coast to the other. They said that we were the big spenders, that we were out of control, and how they would do wonders.

Where is the country now? The Tories certainly have not gained control of the deficit? What has happened to the debt? The debt gets bigger. It gets bigger by the day. It gets bigger by the hour. It gets bigger by the minute. In fact, it was the hon. member from Calgary Northeast who pointed out that five long years ago the debt was $170 billion. Now it is somewhere between $340 billion and perhaps as high as $370 billion. If nothing unusual happens in the next three years because after all we do expect the government to be around for that long maybe the debt will surpass the $400 billion mark. Canadians are asking themselves whether they can take it. They are already answering the question. They cannot take it. They have said a number of times that they are fed up. They are fed up right up to their teeth.

I ask where the small "c" Conservatives have gone who believe in some of these old fashioned values about guarding against spending too much and making sure that revenues and expenditures are in line; they are sort of in rhythm. I can tell you that the government on that side does not seem to believe that.

In the past five years we have seen not 10, not 20, not 30, but 31 increases in taxes. We get more as a result of Bill C–20. Of course, the biggest one is yet to come, the big whopper. The government calls it euphemistically GST or the goods and services tax. Maybe some conservative propaganda writer thought that it would go down a little better if it were called the "goods and services tax." For I think for the average or ordinary Canadian, it is just another tax grab. It is just more money out of people's pockets.

Canadians have said, and this has been demonstrated in many of the public hearings held by the House of Commons Finance Committee, that the goods and services tax will not do this country much good. Is the government listening? Does the government listen when the Conference Board of Canada says 72,000 jobs will be wiped out right off the top?

The Finance Minister himself admits that there will be an increase of inflation. It will be somewhere around 2.25 per cent. If you consider the inflation rate at 5 per cent and you add 2.25 on to 5 per cent, you are looking at an increase in inflation of around 50 per cent. I do not think that there are many Canadians who believe that we can take that kind of blow to the economy.

There will also be an increase in interest rates. An increase in inflation almost automatically leads to an increase in interest rates. The odd thing is that there is an increase in interest rates, it will follow that there will be an increase in the deficit. In the last eight to ten months the deficit has gone up because of the high interest rate policy of this government.

This government seems to go in many directions. On one side it talks about the deficit, we have to get it down. Yet, on the other side of the ledger the very thing that would exacerbate the situation, the very thing that would worsen the situation, is exactly the thing that the government does. One sometimes wonders what it is thinking about.

Government ministers talk over and over again about fighting the deficit. They ask all segments of Canadian society to do their bit. I heard the Minister of Agriculture allude to that the other day when he was talking about the need to change the legislation having to do with advance cash payments. This was the government's way of getting the Canadian farmer to do his bit in fighting the deficit. I consider that an insult. I do not think the Canadian farmer needs the Canadian government to stay up half the night thinking about ways of fighting the deficit. If there is anyone who knows anything about spending and fighting deficits it is the Canadian farmer. The Canadian farmer does not have to learn any lessons from this government. Now, of course, the government is going to increase the tax on telecommunications from 10 per cent to 15 per cent. I suppose hon. members opposite are now going to tell us that this is their idea of telling Canadian grandmothers and grandfathers who want to talk to their grandchildren that this is their way of fighting the deficit. Maybe, if we can just take a little bit more money from you when you dare call your family, that will be your way of fighting the deficit.

Of course, it is a double whammy. Take more out of the taxpayer when it comes to making a phone call and then on the other side seniors are asked to pay more through the clawback. If you conducted your life well, if you worked hard, and if you retired with a half decent income, what does the government say? The government says you have been kind of naughty. You are earning too much money. We are going to take some of that back. In fact, we will take all of it back when it comes to old age security. Is that any way to run a country? Is that any way to treat people who have built this country, who have worked hard? Is that any way to treat seniors? I do not think so.

I do not think the government has the mandate, the right to impose these taxes. I ran in the election campaign last fall and I do not recall the Conservatives talking about a 9 per cent GST. I do not remember the Conservatives talking about increasing the manufacturers' sales tax another point and a half. After all, they had raised it from 9 per cent back in 1984, and now they want to push it up to 13.5 per cent. Did they talk about a 1 per cent increase in the telecommunications tax? No. I seriously wonder whether they have the mandate to do what they are doing.

In closing, that this is a nasty piece of legislation. There is only one place to put it—the garbage can.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 3 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Calgary Northeast (Mr. Kindy).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8) the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Motions No. 4 and 5 standing in the names of the Hon. Member for Yukon and for Calgary Northeast respectively, will be grouped together for debate but voted on separately.

Mr. Ross Harvey (for Ms. McLaughlin) moved:

That Bill C-20 be amended in Clause 3 by striking out lines 26 to 30 and lines 37 to 39 at page 2.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): moved:

That Bill C-20 be amended by deleting Clause 3.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I simply want to say to my colleagues in the government and in the Official Opposition that we appreciate their unanimous consent to allow the motion to be put other than in the name of the hon. member for Yukon, considering her other duties this afternoon.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East) Mr. Speaker, "a silent killer of jobs"—"a silent killer of jobs". That is how the Minister of Finance repeatedly has characterized the manufacturers' sales tax. In many respects, we on this side of the House agree with that assessment. It is, perhaps, a bit dramatic—"a silent killer of jobs"—but it is not inaccurate. The functioning of the manufacturers' sales tax has been shown, as is agreed on all sides of the house, to have a negative effect on manufacturing and consequently on manufacturing jobs in this country. So I think it is safe to say, at least to the best of my knowledge, that no member of this House supports the manufacturers' sales tax, certainly not in its current form. If there is any member of the House who wishes to rise now and say otherwise, I would be fascinated to hear it. But I would again say that to my knowledge, no one, not a single member of this House, supports the manufacturers' sales tax in its current form, assuming I can take the government members at the word of the minister.

This is all to the good, especially as the minister has resolved upon the course of spending $7 million of taxpayers' money to tell taxpayers about the wickedness of a tax which no one likes. It is not as if he had to convince people. However, he has resolved on this course, as well.

It is interesting to note that when the Conservatives came to power in 1984, the Government of Canada collected 19 per cent of their revenues from consumption taxes. With successive Conservative budgets, however, we see this total now boosted to 25 per cent of total government revenues. It has gone from 19 per cent to 25 per cent of total government revenues being collected from consumption taxes, and this in a mere five years. Imagine what the Conservatives will be able to accomplish should they be granted—the thought is almost too terrible to contemplate—a third term. However, I have every confidence that the Canadian people in their wisdom will see that that is precluded.

Not a budget has gone by without the kind of change we find effected in Bill C-20, Clause 3. Incredibly, the very hon. member of this House who has deemed the manufacturers' sales tax to be "a silent killer of jobs" is seeking in Bill C-20 to boost that tax by a factor of about 12 per cent. It is incredible.

The Minister of Finance advises this House to take a manufacturers' sales tax at 12 per cent and boost it to 13.5 per cent, an increase of about 12 percent. Again, I say, we are talking, in consequence of that increase, of additional revenues to the government from this hated manufacturers' sales tax of about $270 million. That is $270 million worth more of jobs presumably killed by this silent killer of jobs.

So I must confess there seems to be, I will not say hypocrisy—I cannot believe that the Minister of Finance is capable of blatant hypocrisy—but perhaps it would not be too unkind to suggest that there is perhaps confusion at work here, especially as not a single budget has gone past under this current Finance Minister's period in that position without a rise in the manufacturers' sales tax.

Indeed, starting in 1984, when the Conservatives were elected and became the government of this country, the manufacturers' sales tax stood at 9 per cent. In their five short years in power the Conservatives have boosted this silent killer of jobs by 50 per cent. It is incredible. They say one thing, they profess one thing, and yet, oddly, they do another.

What conclusion can we draw from this? Are we perhaps to take the experience of having the Conservatives passionately saying one thing in this instance while doing the direct opposite and apply that to the other guarantees they are offering us with regard to the goods and services tax? Do you think, Mr. Speaker, it would be expedient for us to do that? I do. Because obviously any government capable of year after year after year raising the very tax which the Conservatives now say is a terrible thing that must be dealt away with is a government more than capable of taking an initial goods and services tax and, thereafter, year after year after year boosting it as well so that even if, as per Mr. Blenkarn, we wind up with a GST initially introduced at 4.5 per cent, if the record on the manufacturers' sales tax is anything to go by, it will be 9 per cent within two years. And Lord knows where the escalation finally will stop, if ever.

The advice to this House, contained in Motion No. 4, to delete those sections of clause 3 of the bill which authorize the boosting of the manufacturers' sales tax from 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent are very well advised, and I commend them to the entire House because we, at least on this side, take seriously the assessment of the manufacturers' sales tax as "a silent killer of jobs".

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the Hon. Member for Kamloops (Mr. Riis)—The Economy—Conference Board of Canada Report/National Sales Tax/Impact on Business Investment; the Hon. Member for Burin—St. George's (Mr. Simmons)—Fisheries—Impact of Free Trade Agreement on Atlantic Canada/Crisis in Atlantic Industry; the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon (Mr. Comuzzi)—Transportation—Impact of VIA Rail Corporate Plan/Government Position.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

The House resumed consideration of report stage of Bill C-20, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee, and on Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16 standing in the name of the hon. member for Calgary Northeast.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my colleague for Edmonton East has presented very succinctly and very cogently the fallacy and the hypocrisy of a government that not so long ago was saying that the manufacturers' sales tax is this so-called silent killer of jobs, and yet they have not hesitated to prostitute themselves and take as much profits and money out of people's pockets as they can from this silent killer.

There is a lesson here to be extrapolated by the way in which the government has used the manufacturers' sales tax with all its warts and with all its problems. The government just uses it as a cash cow. It moved it from 9 per cent to now 13.5 per cent.

The government has used it to milk from the consumers of this country every buck it can get. It should make all of us quake in our boots, we should all shake in our beds, and shiver in our timbers—not all at the same time—but it should give us no ease to see how this government is moving.

In fact, there are 17 countries in the world that have put in a goods and services tax, some call it a VAT tax. Only one of the 17 to date has not increased the rate of that tax since it was implemented. The most recent example, the one this government, this Prime Minister, and this Finance Minister are constantly throwing into the faces of New Democrats, is the Government of New Zealand. The government of New Zealand introduced a goods and services tax, and I understand its Finance Minister is here appearing before the Finance Committee as I speak giving advice. Here is a country that is giving advice to Michael Wilson, a country that introduced a goods and services tax in 1986 at 10 per cent. Today that tax is 14 per cent. It is not three years old and it is now 14 per cent. It has gone up 4 per cent in three years. This has got to be a symphony to the ears of Michael Wilson, the Finance Minister. He has dreams of sugarplums dancing in his head and it is not even Christmas Eve. This guy sees here the wherewithal to raise billions and billions of dollars.

To administer the present manufacturers' sales tax, the government has 1,500 bureaucrats. What did the Minister of Revenue announce the other day? The government is going to hire 4,000 more in addition to the 1,500. What happened to the 1,500? He did not make them disappear. The 1,500 has now increased by 4,000, even though we are abandoning the manufacturers' sales tax in the proposal, so we are still keeping the 1,500. You do not want to play poker with that guy, he would pick your pockets clean. So you have 4,000 and 1,500 which is 5,500 bureaucrats. I am sure the taxpayers out there are delighted to hear that hundreds of millions of dollars will go to pay the salaries of 5,500 bureaucrats who will pick their pockets.

This is a crying shame. This government sees the possibilities. It is projecting $25 billion from this goods and services tax. Everything from cribs to coffins, from condoms to copper pots will all be taxed. Then the government is still going to collect those excise taxes. When it is finished fleecing the sheep there will be $40 billion in the treasury.

I have read that this government has sent the bill on goods and services to the printers to be printed. Yes, it has sent it to the printers. What a sham of having the Chairman of the Finance Committee traipsing around the country giving the impression that somehow or other he had a conversion and is now willing to listen to what the people of Canada have to say.

It is cynical to note that every one of those witnesses who have come before the committee all said: "I agree with this thing, but don't tax me. Tax this guy over here and except me." We saw the Burger Kings, the McDonalds. "Don't tax me, tax everybody else". Of course, big business says that. They want to continue their lunches. Do not touch the executive lunches. Food in the grocery stores are exempt. The people in the restaurants are saying: "If you exempt them you have to exempt us but tax everybody else." Everybody says that sales taxes are the most regressive taxes. I am not satisfied that this government has searched long and hard for an alternative to the present goods and services tax. We know that it set out some guidelines: First, it was going to be visible; second, it would be simple; third, it would be integrated; and fourth, it would be revenue neutral. Now, for anybody who believed the Prime Minister when he said that, have I got a bridge to sell them.

• (1600)

This government lied to the people of Canada. The people who are responsible for economic policy lied to Canadians. What was supposed to be budget neutral has now created a bonanza for the government.

An Hon. Member: Its visible?

Mr. Rodriguez: It is visible like Salmon Rushdie, that is how visible it is. Do you believe everything the Prime Minister promises? We were not going to get free trade with the Americans when he was seeking the leadership of the Conservative Party in 1983. He said, as you recall, that famous quote: "You want to go to bed with an elephant, well you find out when the elephant rolls over what happens to you". The guy had a warped sexual mentality, going to bed with an elephant, but people believed him then and they found out what happened.

These four principles for this GST were laid down. Now we have found out that they are more practised in the breach than in the observance. The Conservatives are really after a cash cow to have in the barn because, once it is in the barn, for every 1 percentage increase, they can generate over $2 billion in increased revenues. I say to Canadians that I do not know what to do. I do not know how we stop this government from imposing what is going to be the most regressive tax system in the western world. I do not know what we have to do.

It is unfortunate we do not have recall laws in this country so that from time to time, with a certain number of signatures, we can have a vote to recall the government or to recall a Member of Parliament. It is unfortunate that there is no check and balance in the system. All I have seen since we started this prelude to the full-blown debate on GST are Tories who think it is a big joke and that somehow they are putting one over on the Canadian people. They are really doing a good job. People are writing letters to the Minister of Finance, signing petitions, all in good faith, thinking somehow or other all of these entreaties and indications of their opposition somehow persuades the government not to pursue this path. Unfortunately, they will find out, as I have, that they are just shut up after a short period of time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take a whole lot of time of the House, but I can only sit here so long. I just want to say to senior citizens, regardless of what the NDP told you last November, you still have your pensions and your medicare. What they are doing today is telling the government to do what they tell it. We listen and we hear and we understand. I think the NDP hope that Canadians do not understand because what the opposition is asking for is a return to the kind of government that was in this country from 1972 to 1984.

Mr. Milliken: That is right, we are.

Mr. Hawkes: That is right, he says, we are. That was a minority government in 1972 and it had a philosophy. It wanted to get re-elected. It does not matter what you have to do as long as the end goal is to get re-elected, power for power sake. What did they say to the Canadian people? They said: "We will spend, we will start all kinds of new programs. We will spend, and spend and spend. Then we will do another favour for Canadians, we will lower the tax rates."

That is the argument we are hearing here today. You do not have to tax. Be popular, spend, spend spend. Do not tax. What does that do? It does some great things for two months, three months. Everybody in the gallery today: "Use your credit card. Go out, enjoy. It will be a great supper. Spend $100 on a meal. It will be a wonderful supper."

Mr. Boudria: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you have noticed and that you are quite well aware as well that one should not address the public gallery when one makes remarks in the House of Commons. I am sure that you, Mr. Speaker, would want to remind the House of that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sure that the Whip of the government party is well aware of what he should be doing in this Chamber. He has been around here for quite a long time and I am sure he will take heed.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I thank the deputy Whip for the other side for bringing that to my attention. When I glanced up and saw the look of disbelief as they heard the speeches from the other side, I guess it just compelled me to stand and talk.

Everybody understands that when you borrow, you have to pay back, and when you borrow even more then you have less.

Mr. Gauthier: This is a tax bill.

Mr. Hawkes: Yes, it is a tax bill, as my friend across the way states. You are right it is a tax bill. Taxes are not popular.

Mr. Gauthier: Nothing to do with borrowing.

Mr. Hawkes: Borrowing is popular. Taxing is not. We suffered for 12 years from that philosophy of borrow, borrow, borrow, do not tax. Increase expenditures and we will be popular. Well, the chicken has come home to roost.

When I was first elected to the House, 12 cents out of a revenue taxation dollar went to pay interest on the debt. It is 35 cents today. We had 88 cents for pensions, medicare, VIA Rail and all those things. We have 65 cents today.

We hear members on the opposite side stand in the House and fight us on the cuts. The member for Nickel Belt says: "Do not cut 12,000 civil servants". That is what he has been saying for four years. Then today he said: "Do not hire 2,500". How can you have it both ways? Only the NDP can have it both ways. They are not responsible. They are an opposition party. There is a lot of fun to be had in opposition but there is a lot of hard work in governing.

A lot of decisions that have to be made are tough decisions. We try to make them with as much humanity and as much compassion as we can in the circumstances. We try to examine the research evidence to see how we can cut expenditures and how we can raise revenue, how we can get rid of 12 years of mismanagement of this economy and return the country to health. We have not done too badly.

Since free trade came in 209,000 Canadians have jobs. They are not on the welfare rolls, they are not on unemployment insurance today. That is 209,000 in a brief nine months. There are 1.5 million Canadians who have a job today who did not have a job five years ago. That is not bad management. Let us make the contrast. I say to all of the senior citizens who may be watching us today: "Out of your lifetime of experience in this country, after listening carefully to the Opposition about how the country is in trouble and owes more money than it should, what would you do?" What would their 90 years, 85 years, and 80 years of experience tell us to do? They would say: "Cut your expenditures, but don't cut out food. People have to eat. Don't cut out shelter. Don't cut out health care. The basics of life have to be taken care of, but cut some of your discretionary spending, as much as you can". They would say to continue to look forward, continue to cut out waste. But you have to get some extra income. You can't continue the debt spiral.

We cannot buy a house with a $20,000 mortgage and make it $21,000 the next year, $25,000 the year after that and $30,000 the year after that. Your mortgage cannot grow. To prepare for your retirement your mortgage has to go down. There have to be tax changes.

The Member from Edmonton East said: "silent killer of jobs". Well, it is getting noisier. People are beginning to understand that the manufacturers' sales tax is a cancer. It has been around since 1924.

Mr. Milliken: You keep raising it.

Mr. Hawkes: He says because you keep raising it. Of course. We have to raise taxes, but with a little co-operation on the other side we can get a better tax in place that does not kill jobs but creates jobs, provides a stable source of revenue, and reduces our need to borrow because more Canadians will have jobs, more Canadians will be paying taxes, fewer Canadians will be dependent on welfare, fewer Canadians will be dependent on unemployment insurance.

That is what this government's policies are all about. Canadians are told that taxes do not have to be raised, that expenditure cuts do not have to be made. I ask them to contrast that with the reality that that creates debt and debt chokes us all. Debt creates bankruptcy whether we are talking about a nation or a little business or a homeowner.

This year 1989 is the time for all of us in the Chamber who care about this country to say: "It is time to cut expenditures, it is time to raise taxes. It is time to get the debt under control. If you are listening to any other message, you are listening to charlatans who want to drag you into a bigger and bigger pothole, where you are going to drown."

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to the hon. member's comments on this legislation. He said that there are 209,000 Canadians who have a job today who did not have one before the Tory government took office. I would like to say to him that there are also 1.2 million children living in poverty in Canada who should not be living in poverty. I would like also to bring to the attention of this House that yesterday while we all celebrated Thanksgiving, while we had a wonderful dinner with our families and shared the weekend with families and friends, thousands of Canadians volunteered their time at food banks collecting canned goods to distribute over the next few months. In Toronto alone, 2,000 volunteers collected 850,000 pounds of food.

The tragedy of this is that every month more and more Canadian children are joining those already living in poverty.

The Daily Bread food banks in Toronto feed 84,000 people. Of these, 17,000 are children; 6,000 are physically challenged and 4,000 are pensioners. Yet we have a government which says that fewer Canadians will be living in poverty.

The member said fewer Canadians are living on unemployment insurance. When the government says that fewer Canadians will be living on unemployment insurance, it means it because what it is going to do is kick those moms and dads off of unemployment insurance to ensure that more children are going to the food banks.

I would like to ask this government and members in the House to consider that what we have in Canada is institutionalized poverty. What we have in Canada is institutionalized food banks. We have a mean-spirited government that, in addition to this kind of taxation, is introducing cuts in unemployment insurance, cuts in support to the family network, no child care, clawbacks in pensions and clawbacks in child allowance. Yet it is saying: "Look what a wonderful job we are doing in correcting the economy".

The hon. member who spoke before me talked about how hard one must work in government, assuming that those of us on the opposite side of the House do not work hard. Is this government planning to continue working very hard until all children in Canada are living in poverty, taking back as much as it can from the average Canadian, taking back as much as it can from working men and women to ensure that its corporate Bay Street buddies do not have to pay their share? That is what we are talking about. We are talking about who pays what share. We have not seen one step from this government to ensure that the profit-making corporations in this country pay their share. What we have is yet more taxation on those who are already overtaxed.

I noticed in my experience with the unemployment insurance committee that the government listens only to those to whom they want to listen in this country. I have received letters in from men and women in my riding who happen to share political views in terms of party affiliation with hon. members from the other side of the House.

Mr. Rodriguez: You mean Tories.

Ms. Langan: Tories, that is who I have received letters from. I have received letters from Tories who say: "This goes too far. We are tired of it, we are sick of it. We are not prepared to lose free enterprise to the Americans. We are not prepared to have our children taxed until there is no food available for them and they have to go to food banks. We are not prepared ourselves to be taxed and we are seriously considering where our political affiliation will lie in the future".

It may be that those people will not be coming to support the New Democratic Party. But what they will be doing is supporting a party that will indeed listen to them; be it the Reform party, be it the Christian Heritage party, be it any one of those parties.

An Hon. Member: The Liberal party.

Mr. Rodriguez: They listened to the Liberal party one time.

Ms. Langan: They listened to the Liberals one time and as you well know, Mr. Speaker, there is not a Liberal party in British Columbia so they have a choice of the Reform party or the Christian Heritage party. People who have long supported the Tory party have said "enough is enough".

Small business people in my riding are saying: "Would you please convey to the House of Commons that we work very hard in our small businesses, and we struggle very hard". They are facing increased taxation on things like gas, fuel, supplies, our employees' uniforms, all of those things that add to the burden and of the small margin which makes it impossible for a business to work. I have a daughter who is a young restaurateur in the riding next to mine. She is struggling.

She is a free enterpriser and she is struggling.

Mr. Epp: Good grief, a free enterpriser!

Ms. Langan: She is a free enterpriser.

Mr. Epp: She will vote Tory next time.

Ms. Langan: My daughter will never vote Tory. My daughter is a socialist with a conscience. She will be a rich socialist with a conscience. I have no problem with that.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Langan: We have too few of them to put you folks in your place.

An Hon. Member: Unlike them, she will be willing to pay her taxes.

Ms. Langan: She does not mind paying her taxes as long as they are fair taxes.

She is struggling to begin and get established in this small business. Every time she turns around there is a new tax. She said: "I wouldn't mind paying those taxes, if General Motors was paying its share, if the big business community was paying its share, if the Royal Bank that I have a loan with is paying its share, I would not mind a bit."

This is a young woman and she will be prepared when she is rich to pay her share. She believes now that they should also pay their share.

I would like to conclude by going back to my opening remarks. It is that 1.5 million children in this country live in poverty. I am getting mighty tired of hearing the hon. members from the other side of the House bleet about how many jobs they have created when that many children in this country are hungry.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I would not have participated at this stage of the debate had it not been for the speech from the Hon. Member for Calgary West who tried to suggest in the course of his remarks that somehow the defeat of this bill would return us to the bad old days of 1972 to 1984.

Those days today seem like Halcyon days compared to what Canadians had to endure since 1984 with the present administration and its incompetent management of the economy of this country. Indeed, I would like to look at the facts that the Hon. Member for Calgary Northeast pointed out in his speech this morning. He claimed that the deficit in 1984–85 was $38 billion. Anyone would think that if you are going to reduce a deficit, you would increase taxes.

There are two ways of going about it. You can either increase taxes or reduce expenditures. This government, with great trumpeting and fanfare, says that it is doing both. It increased taxes all right. It increased taxes by $42 billion. Any reasonable person would think that if you have increased taxes by $42 billion, you must have rid yourself of the deficit. Has the deficit gone down? It has gone down only to $30 billion.

If the government has increased the taxes $42 billion, one would think that the deficit would have gone down. But it stayed very large.

The government has doubled the national debt in four years of incompetent mismanagement. The member says that Canadians do not want to go back to the bad old days, 1972 to 1984. Canadians are crying out for the bad old days compared to what they are getting from this government with its VIA Rail cuts and that sort of thing.

Let me speak to the amendment that is before the House. I want to clarify one thing. The motion that has been moved by the Hon. Member for Edmonton East on behalf of the Hon. Member for Yukon deals with two amendments to the proposed bill before us.

The amendments delete the 13.5 per cent rate from the bill. The hon. member does not seek to delete the new 19 per cent tax on wines and the new 9 per cent tax on building materials. I would have thought that the Hon. Member for Kamloops whose riding I am sure depends heavily on the forest industry and the manufacture of building materials would have opposed this 9 per cent tax. Yet, the amendment proposed by the Hon.

Member for Yukon does not delete that portion of the bill.

I would not want to think that her amendment was in fact an approval of these vicious taxes. I can only assume that he supports the Hon. Member for Calgary Northeast in trying to get rid of the entire clause instead of just getting rid of the portion that deals with the 13.5 per cent. I know that a tax on wines might be abhorrent to the hon. member. Personally I do not find it so bad. I prefer to see none of these taxes increased and I think that is the position of our party.

If the motion that has been moved by the Hon. Member for Yukon is only to remove the 13.5 per cent rate and not to oppose the other increases at the same time, I think they might want to clarify that point to the House because, frankly, I prefer not to support that motion but support the Hon. Member for Calgary Northeast in his views that we should get rid of the entire increase altogether.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I can clarify that for my hon. friend very quickly. I think that if there has been some consistency in this debate—and there has been some inconsistency—it has been that the New Democratic Party opposes this tax. We oppose the use of consumption taxes, of course, as our various reports have made very clear.

I must say that it has not been quite clear whether or not the Liberal party opposes some other consumption tax. Maybe 9 per cent is too high, but maybe 7 per cent is okay, maybe 4 per cent, or maybe 3 per cent. I am simply saying that I have not heard that clarified. I do not want to allege any motivations here unnecessarily, but perhaps we could have this clearly stated later.

Let me make this clear, Mr. Speaker. This move to increase the manufacturers' sales tax once again sounds to me rather peculiar because I, like my colleague from Edmonton, heard the Minister of Finance from time to time suggest that the manufacturers' sales tax is a killer of jobs. He said that it kills jobs, it kills economic development, it kills economic enterprise. It kills opportunities to develop new businesses and, by definition, create new jobs. He said that and yet, what are we doing today? We are increasing the tax. We are increasing the job-killer tax.

Is it not rather hypocritical for a government to say that this tax is a killer of jobs and the next day ask us to pass legislation not only to keep the tax, but to increase the tax? Back in 1980 and 1984 this killer of jobs tax was 9 per cent. We all agreed that this tax had to go. Every parliamentarian felt that the manufacturers' sales tax was a bad tax. It was ill-conceived. It was biased. It was discriminatory against that sector of the economy that, in the past at least, tended to create the most jobs.

What does the government do when it is told we dislike this tax? I remember during the campaign in 1984 when the finance minister said the government disliked this tax and it had to change. Now we assume he meant for it to go down. He meant up, but that was not clear at that time. The Conservatives said: "We have to change this tax, so we will put it from 9 per cent to 10 per cent, up to 11 per cent, up to 12 per cent, and now up to 13.5 per cent".

This is not the way to encourage economic development in Canada. When a New Democrat says it has to change, it means it has to go. That is what we mean. When a Conservative says it has to change, it means it has to go up even higher. It is a Party of tax, tax, tax. It then picks the sector of the economy that in the past has been the job generator and taxes it even harder. They pile taxes on top of taxes and then at the end of it all say they have an even greater idea. They are going to slap a tax on everything: haircuts, cribs, coffins, reading material. Recognizing that we have five million people who are functionally illiterate, we will be the only country in the world that is going to tax reading material. If they buy a book, we will tax them; a magazine, we will tax them; a journal, we will tax them; a newspaper, we will tax them too.

What kind of government would do that to its people? What kind of government would tax children's clothing? At this time of year, when you have to go out and buy new snowsuits, buy new longjohns and get geared up for the long winter, the Conservative government says that as soon as it gets this tax in place it will tax those kids' snowboots and snowsuits. That is cruel. That is a cruel, mean way of taxation.

At the same time that this government wants to tax those mothers who go out and buy their children's snowboots, General Motors does not have to pay any tax. It says: "Oh, shucks, why force these folks to pay taxes at all? General Motors, the Royal Bank of Canada, Nova Corporation, or Cadillac–Fairview, why ask these big corporations to pay any tax at all? The Conservatives say they would rather tax the mother going out to buy clothing for her children for the winter. fill Now, if that is not a cruel, mean, dastardly tax, I do not know what is. It is actually hard to believe.

I cannot imagine how Conservatives can be sitting here today asking us to vote on legislation to increase the manufacturers' sales tax when for the last few weeks all we have been hearing across Canada is that we have to do away with this tax. We have to get rid of it because it is a killer of jobs. Here we are today responding to the Minister of Finance and he says, not only should we keep the manufacturers' tax, but we should increase it to 13.5 per cent.

One can go on to talk about hypocrisy and about the big lie. The chairman of the finance committee at every single meeting when people ask why we have to have a sales tax says this killer of jobs tax, the manufacturers' tax is bad, and is harmful to the economy. Does he know what the Minister of Finance is doing today? He is actually increasing this horrible tax. These two fellows should get together and chit–chat about this so that at least the same lie is going out. We cannot have one person saying one thing and the other person another which, of course, is now becoming unfortunately an all too familiar theme from the government.

I can simply summarize by saying that we are opposed to this increase in taxation. We do not think that increasing the sales tax makes any sense. We do not think that having it makes any sense at all and for that reason, I would encourage my friends opposite in the Conservative party, if they really believe that this manufacturers' sales tax is as bad as it is, for goodness' sake to vote in favour of this amendment to at least not increase this sales tax and to support their hon. colleague's amendment to do away with it totally.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, in my time in this Chamber and also in the Newfoundland House of Assembly, I have heard some entertaining speeches but none more so than the one I heard just a few minutes ago from the Whip for the government, the gentleman from Calgary West. It had a familiar ring. I wondered where I had heard the same general theme before.

I found myself thinking about the exclamations of Little Red Riding Hood when she saw the wolf in her grandmother's bed: "What great big ears you have, what a big nose you have, what big teeth you have," and so on. I saw the hon. member for Calgary West trying to be one thing but looking in reality like something quite different.

If you reflect on what he said, Mr. Speaker, the essence of what he said is, "Do not be fooled by the big ears, do not be fooled by the 13.5 per cent. Putting the tax from 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent and over the life of this government, putting the tax from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent is really the way we over here reduce taxes. It is the way we make things easier on you. You are not really seeing big ears or big teeth at all. You are really seeing a very friendly, paternal act here. We are trying to help Canadians with our tax reform."

I realized in the same moment, when I got past thinking about Little Red Riding Hood, that the gentleman from Calgary West had not often spoken in this Chamber and I realized why, of course, when I looked at the mover of the amendment. The gentleman from Calgary West is so busy these days whipping the gentleman from Calgary Northeast that he has not had much time to make speeches about tax increases or decreases, whichever you choose to characterize them as. I realized also, of course, why he has found it necessary to try to whip the gentleman from Calgary Northeast.

If I may say so, to the gentleman from Calgary Northeast, for all his having been whipped, does not look to be in too bad shape today. I think he is still fairly creative with his amendments and I commend him for speaking out on this very important issue.

I once advanced the perhaps novel suggestion that we ought, in the political party system in this country, to adopt a page out of the books of the National Hockey League, in which there is a business of trading people from time to time. As I looked around the chamber, I could see that various parties might benefit from such an arrangement whereby we would look at our caucus and find people not of our philosophical persuasion and see if we could not trade them to where they more properly belonged. I could see certain people figuring prominently in such a trade, certainly the member for Calgary Northeast. Certainly, my good friend from Nickel Belt would be sitting a lot closer to me physically. He already sits very close to me philosophically.

Mr. Rodriguez: To your left.

Mr. Simmons: He is to my left, charitably so, but a kindred spirit. If we ever have the trade, he will be much closer, I assure him. The gentleman from Calgary Northeast, of course, will soon have to make a move.

Lest this whole business be seen as being just a little too jocular, let me make the point. The point is that there are people in this House who, irrespective of party label, see this latest tax increase as the wrong way to go. I have real difficulty with it and with the rhetoric coming from the official spokesman for the Tories on this one. It is the gentleman from Calgary West who best summarizes the contradiction, when he, in effect, says that this increase to 13.5 per cent is our Thanksgiving present to you, it is our way of helping you. That is the problem with the whole mindset of this government. It does not, first of all, understand what the need is out there in the country. Therefore, how can it administer to the need when it does not understand what the problems are?

When I stand in this Chamber on behalf of thousands of fishermen and plant workers and tell government members that our fishery is on the verge of collapse in Newfoundland, for example, the minister gets up the same day and tells us everything is in a state of prosperity, to use his words. When the gentleman from my own province, the member from St. John's East, gets up and assures us, against the wishes of his constituents, I may say, that everything is fine and rosy in the fishery, I begin to realize that the Tories are out of touch with the reality out there, whether it is the reality of the fishing industry, the reality of the needs in agriculture; the reality of the unemployed or the realities of small business. They are so out of touch, is it any wonder that on this one they have this warped idea that somehow they are going to help us all by increasing the manufacturers' sales tax to 13.5 per cent.

The Minister of Finance raves on about taxes and the need for tax reform. Where has he been for the last four and a half or five years when this tax has been jacked from 9 per cent to 10, to 11 to 12, and now to 13.5 per cent? The manufacturers' sales tax that government members have been maligning and rightly so, has been one of their chief tools for raising additional revenues during the last four and a half years. It is not the only one. They have had all together 31 tax increases. That is not bad considering they have only been in office fewer than five years.

Earlier today, we dealt with amendments relating to the business of gasoline tax as it affects fishermen. Once again, the fishermen and the farmers are making a very important contribution to our gross national product. Yet, who is it who is being asked to bear the brunt again? It is the good old fishermen and the good old farmers. It is another example of how government does not really understand how to keep people working. The list goes on.

Mr. Dionne: The government does not have a word.

Mr. Simmons: I am just getting a signal here from my good friend from Miramachi who always has better ideas than I have, so I steal them whenever I can.

• (1640)

Mr. Epp: It's not tough.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, the minister from Provencher comes briefly awake. We welcome him to the debate. We have been here all day, actually, trying to stop this nefarious scheme that the government is trying to push through. We welcome him to the cause. He comes late but he is here, and I thank him.

Mr. Dionne: In body, if not in spirit.

Mr. Simmons: He is embarrassed. If ever there was a man of integrity, it is the gentleman from Provencher. We all know that. He is embarrassed by this. How he still sits there and allows this double-talk to go on all around him, I will never know, the very double-talk we have been talking about in the last few minutes. There is one man, Mr. Speaker, that you and I, Sir, have predicted would have bolted long ago out of basic integrity. Basic integrity would have moved him to this side. Maybe when I am through, now that we have his attention and he is fully awake the minister will probably get up and rationalize this conundrum for us, why it is that the government says it is by increasing taxes that it does us a favour. That is a puzzle. I am sure it is a puzzle for him too and I invite him to take his place and explain it all to us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 4 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for the Yukon.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 5 standing in the name of the hon. member for Calgary Northeast.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

We are now at Motions Nos. 10 and 11 which will be grouped for debate and voted on as follows: an affirmative vote on Motion No. 10 will obviate the need for a vote on Motion No. 11. However, a negative vote on Motion No. 10 will require a vote on Motion No. 11.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There was a misprint in the Order Paper, and where it says biodegradable laundry detergents, it should read non-biodegradable laundry detergents.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, first, as in prior motions, we would be agreeable to giving our unanimous consent, which is required in this case, for someone from the party on my left to move that motion in its proper form and wording. If he or she wants to move it with non-biodegradable, it is up to him or her to make the motion at this time.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, seeking the unanimous consent of the House, I move:

That Motion No. 10, standing in the name of Ms. McLaughlin be amended to read after Clause 8, "non-biodegradable laundry detergents".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, if indeed there is an error, we have absolutely no objection to correcting the error. The Chair might want to look to see whether or not that change is in order.

Mr. Riis: I appreciate the comment made by the government Whip, and I suspect that with unanimous consent it would be in order. I just want to take this opportunity to thank the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier for his suggestion for both the government's as well as the Official Opposition's co-operation on this change.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I see no problem with that. We have unanimous consent.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (for Ms. McLaughlin) moved:

Motion No. 10.

That Bill C-20 be amended in Clause 8 by striking out line 10 at page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

"8. Non-bio-degradable laundry detergents."

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast) moved:

That Bill C-20 be amended by deleting Clause 8.

He said: Mr. Speaker, talking about this manufacturers' sales tax, as has been said prior, in 1984 it was at 9 per cent and now we are trying to raise it to 13.5 per cent. It is certainly not going to help our industry to compete internationally and domestically. This is why I think it is essential that this tax be defeated. The government has not shown restraint.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I regret having to interrupt my friend but we are dealing with Motion Nos. 10 and 11. Both motions deal with the same subject, that is Clause 8, and with the proposal that the sales tax be imposed on laundry detergents at the wholesale trade level.

If I understand the purpose of both the NDP motion and motion of the hon. member from Calgary, one wants to amend laundry detergent to non-biodegradable laundry detergent and the other wants to delete the whole clause. We are speaking to both motions and I fail to see the relevancy of the remarks of the hon. member right now. That is why I am trying to get you, Mr. Speaker, to tell me if indeed relevancy is being applied.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member just began speaking. With the first two or three sentences, I regret that I am not sure whether he is being relevant or not. If the hon. member will give him another two or three minutes, then I will naturally watch very closely.

Mr. Kindy: I think whatever raises taxes is relevant. The Minister of Finance talked about the growing public debt and said that we have to react to it and therefore increase taxes. Those taxes would be only temporary until 1991 when the goods and services tax comes into effect. The goods and services tax is certainly a major component of the Budget speech of the Minister of Finance. I would like to elaborate on that specific tax because it is part of the big scheme of raising taxes.

The goods and services tax is certainly inflationary. It is regressive because it punishes low-income people, and it does not pass the test of fairness. A study in the United States showed that it creates bureaucracy. As I said prior, we would have to increase by about 4,000 the number of employees at Revenue Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member just heard the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier speaking with regard to relevancy. I would hope that he would get to the cause and not just speak in generalities. This is both on his clause and on the clause of the Hon. Member for Yukon.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, creating more of a bureaucracy is not going to help the taxpayer. It is not going to help the housewife who has to buy detergents. It certainly is a big factor in reducing government spending. Therefore, I would suggest that we should delete as a package Bill C-20 so that there would be fairness to the consumer.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like first to respond to the comment about housewives who have to buy detergent and suggest to the House and to the hon. members within, particularly those of the male gender, that I believe that we have passed the day when only housewives buy detergent. I believe we have also passed the day when only men are concerned about the environment. On this point is where the hon. member who wants to delete this motion and the people on this side of the House are prepared to part company. I think it is very very important that we take this fine opportunity to set an example and to get really serious about the environment.

We have launched a study about the environment in which we are working here in the House of Commons. We have talked on all sides of the House about the environment across this country and how vitally important it is. Here we have a clause put forward by the Hon. Member for the Yukon suggesting that we only apply this tax to non-biodegradable detergents. What an excellent opportunity for us to show that we are serious about what happened in our environment.

I would like to see this apply to not only non-biodegradable detergents. It is a real pity that this clause does not allow for us to include taxation on anything that is unfriendly to the environment, but we are faced with just this amendment on non-biodegradable detergent, and I think that hon. members on the other side of the House, if they are serious about the laundry and if they are serious about the environment, would vote in favour of the amendment of the Hon. Member from the Yukon.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak this afternoon in this debate. Essentially what we have is a motion proposed by one of our colleagues, the member for the Yukon, giving in fact a special status to biodegradable laundry detergents and our colleague from Calgary wants to give that status to all laundry detergents by removing the clause in question.

I want to speak in favour of the amendment proposed by our colleague from the Yukon. I do believe it is time that we started to show in a very tangible way that biodegradable and otherwise environmentally friendly products be made more attractive to the consumer. Certainly one way of doing that is to have less taxation on products which are environmentally friendly. This government across the way pretends that it is interested in the environment. I see the former minister of health, now the minister of energy, listening attentively to my remarks this afternoon on this very important topic. He will know as the minister of energy how important energy conservation is. I know that he cut back in certain areas in the past where people were doing research in areas of solar energy. The minister cut back the funding in that area while at the same time the government was pretending to be interested in the environment.

Last summer, the Prime Minister attended the G–7 Summit of the Arches held in Paris and he told the rest of the world how they should be nice people like them, them being the present government, who are allegedly interested in the environment. Of course, this was at the same time as the government was preparing to cancel half of VIA Rail, at the same time as the government was cancelling energy projects involving solar energy, but now, today, the government across the way has an opportunity in a very small way to show that it is interested in the environment. The test is going to come momentarily for those Tories across the way as to whether or not they are interested in supporting a clause which provides incentives for people who want to purchase biodegradable laundry detergents as opposed to other kinds.

The amendment proposed by the member for the Yukon would in fact provide that kind of encouragement to anyone who wants to purchase the product. It is my hope that the government will see to it that the amendment is adopted and that we can move ahead in the future into more and more areas in which we will provide tax incentives or other forms of encouragement so that consumers can buy products more environmentally friendly than the ones they are purchasing now.

I will allow the rest of the time for my—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired. I know he is looking at the clock there but my clock says that it is five o'clock.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

MINING

EXPORT OF UNPROCESSED MINERALS

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of developing programs and policies to promote further processing of all extracted materials produced by Canadian mines in Canada, and to discourage the export of unprocessed minerals from Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I rise before this House to present a motion and I would urge my colleagues on all sides of the House to take notice of its intent which is to propose a new way of looking at the use of one of Canada's natural resources. The motion is as read by you, Mr. Speaker:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should consider the advisability of developing programs and policies to promote further processing of all extracted materials produced by Canadian mines in Canada, and to discourage the export of unprocessed minerals from Canada.

Canada's minerals and metals industry account for about 3 per cent of Canada's gross domestic product and almost 20 per cent of total merchandise exports. The industry provides a livelihood, directly or indirectly, for hundreds of thousands of Canadians from Newfoundland to British Columbia.

Some 120 communities in Canada depend largely on mining or mineral processing for their livelihood. In 1988 the mineral industry continued to be one of the two most important primary industries supporting the Ontario economy. Approximately $50 million was spent on exploration in the Yukon and in far northern British Columbia in 1988.

In British Columbia, there were increases in the value of mineral production in 1988 because of new gold mines and increased prices for zinc, copper and coal. In Manitoba, the exploration expenditure levels were maintained at 1987 levels at an estimated $50 million. All in all, rising base metal prices and the benefit of sustained productivity increases resulted in an earnings boom for Canada's mineral industry.

The Canadian Mining Journal even said that earnings for most companies in the base metal industry would be the highest in 10 years. This sounds pretty good, great in fact. However, this cycle of good news was preceded by a severe recession in the economy and the mining industry reacted by tightening up its operation. Of course, one of the measures that was used to cut costs was to reduce the labour force.

Falconbridge Limited, the second largest nickel producer in Canada, reduced its workforce by 38 per cent at its Sudbury operation. The workforce was almost cut in half from over 4,000 in 1982 to roughly 2,500 at the end of 1987. Inco Limited, the largest nickel producer in the world, reduced its workforce by about 41 per cent.

Now that times are good, as I outlined earlier, we must take another look at how these companies, with some guidance from the government, could help in sustaining Canada's economy and provide more security for Canadians who depend on the industry for their livelihood.

The Department of Industry, Science and Technology acknowledges in one of its documents that Inco has only recently resumed efforts in product development while Falconbridge has focused its R and D efforts in improving productivity, which does not create new jobs.

My motion proposes that we discourage the export of raw materials and I want to address this particular point in a little more detail. Mineral resources can be the basis for advanced processing activities and for the manufacturing of industry inputs. We must increase the integration between sectors and promote greater research and development activities while increasing Canadian control if we are to build these forward and backward linkages from the resource base.

The Department of Industry, Science and Technology has not done enough to promote synergy and create links between the primary sector and the manufacturing sector. More efforts must be made in that department.

The Algoma Steel Corporation announced plans this summer that would in effect take these matters into consideration. There is a strong possibility that it will close its mining operation in the town of Wawa. However, it is also looking into the possibility of the production of a new sinter product or of their sinter plant. Its plan consists of processing mill scale, a waste material that comes off the surface of steel, and blending it with other waste materials or ore.

It is to hope that the government would encourage such initiatives and provide the support needed in order for these types of projects to succeed. In this case alone, the jobs of 300 people are at stake. In fact, the future of the whole community depends on it.

Under the Ontario Mining Act, the Ontario government has the power to require companies to increase further processing of ores in Canada but it has allowed a number of specific exemptions. Falconbridge still exports nickel copper matte to its refinery in Norway while Inco ships nickel oxide, sinter and nickel sulphide to its plant in Clydach, Wales, for processing.

Take the case of copper mining in British Columbia. This is a highly unstable industry in which multinational companies produce concentrates solely for export. The copper is currently smelted in B.C. though the development of a smelter and of manufacturing facilities for the production of copper wire could be established. It is argued by some that the current situation, where more than 40 per cent of copper concentrates are shipped to foreign up-grading plants, is a good situation because there is a huge export market available in Japan and in Europe.

Let us look at how Japan is protecting its own economy. In Japan and most European countries tariff barriers exist against the importation of metals as refined products because they wish to protect their domestic refining and smelting industry.

I did mention earlier that some argue that since there is a market for copper concentrates, and given the cost of setting up new smelting plants and starting up new manufacturing plants, why bother? Why, indeed.

It is not hard to conceive that the earth does not possess an inexhaustible source of goods for humans to use and sometimes abuse, and that we all must work toward a sustainable form of economic development that would take into account future generations. We do not want to leave behind only stumps where trees used to grow, or gaping holes with all the richness they once contained spent and gone. We must make intelligent use of these resources that are present in a finite amount.

By promoting value-added products we then extend the cycle, and this is the kind of rationalization that would provide a much needed stability. Why not make use of realistic means to promote these types of endeavours? Why not introduce a two-price system so that we could waive or reduce mineral royalties on copper moving to a smelter? We could also make expiring export contracts available at an attractive rate to companies willing to construct a smelter and extend financial assistance to a company which wants to build one. Of course, some of these options depend upon the exercise of provincial powers over resources, but surely we can work toward a national agenda on these issues.

We can only deplore that decisions like these that Canada must make for its benefit are clearly undercut by the free trade deal. In effect, the terms of the trade deal have undermined the bargaining power of the B.C. government vis-a-vis the large international mining companies which dominate the industry. We cannot let this state of affairs continue. Canada must look into the protection of its economy and its resource rather than selling out to the highest bidder.

I would also like to add some comments on the effect of mining on the environment. Clearly, mining companies benefit from our natural resources. Many communities in this country, including communities in my riding of Timmins—Chapleau in the northern Ontario region, depend on the mining industry for their livelihood. However, the people living in these communities also have the right to a cleaner environment and a safe workplace.

I would like to see more measures adopted in order to protect the lives of the families living in these areas who see their rivers polluted by mining residues. I would like to see more research done so that air pollution can be controlled. I would like to see more measures to ensure safety in the workplace.

This motion is intended for the discussion of such concerns, as well as to promote a more rational, more stable and also a more sustainable economic development within industry and beyond. There are profits to be made from the exploitation of our mineral resources. The mining companies' present financial situation can attest to that. I would like to see some of those profits reinvested and work toward a stronger commitment, toward a cleaner and more sustainable use of our minerals.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada supports further processing of minerals extracted by Canadian mines. The big question is whether the cost of government intervention in this area would be compensated by the ensuing benefits. Mr. Speaker, I believe the answer is yes.

The situation in Canada is, briefly, as follows: Nickel ore is smelted and refined in Sudbury and Port Colborne. Canada processes its own copper ore and imports ore for smelters in Flin Flon, Rouyn-Noranda and Murdochville, to name a few.

Canada has 27 steel plants and non-ferrous metal smelters which employ 75,000 Canadians. Gold is processed in Canada to the final product stage, including maple leaf gold coins. Canadian uranimum is refined before export. Our aluminum refineries are of international caliber, processing bauxite which is entirely imported.

• (1710)

Mr. Speaker, we must also understand the market Canada's mining industry has to contend with, a market that is very competitive and subject to international pressure. The Canadian mining industry is not in a privileged situation.

If we were to try to make further processing mandatory, this would also increase the cost of Canadian products. Buyers would simply go elsewhere, and we might be doing irreparable harm to the healthy industry we have now.

The mining industry is now in a period of growth. It is firmly established on the international market. This is partly the result of the Canadian Government's mineral policy.

Mr. Speaker, this policy is based on the fact that the mining industry evolves in an international environment where competition is fierce. It also recognizes the fact that it is up to industry, not to the Government, to interpret and respond to signals given by the market. It is not up to us to dictate to industry how to manage its own affairs, but we try to create a favourable and constructive environment.

Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada's main role is to provide comprehensive technical and economic information, to promote market access, to limit obstacles to growth, for instance by encouraging free trade and overhauling the regulatory system, and finally, to ensure that the tax system is fair and equitable.

I would now like to emphasize the benefits to Canada of freer international trade as a result of mechanisms like the Free Trade Agreement and multilateral trade talks held under GATT, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

One reason why further processing has not developed further in Canada is that a number of other countries have erected tariff barriers against processed products, in order to protect their own industries. Canada's opportunities for further processing will increase as these barriers are removed.

Mr. Speaker, one thing is clear. Even if the GATT rules were to authorize tariff barriers for raw materials, which is hardly likely, in any case it wouldn't work. Inefficient refineries supported by these tariff barriers would close down before those that are able to compete on international markets.

For Canada, the best approach is to encourage speedy removal of tariffs on processed and semi-processed products, so that our industry can take advantage of its natural assets. The aluminum industry, which makes use of the abundant supply of hydro-electric power in our country, is one example. It is the most promising way of raising the level of further processing in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I may point out that as we approach the 90's, we will be dealing with a world economic order that is very different from what we knew 10 years ago. The world generally acknowledges that economic growth and prosperity are stimulated most by measures to libèrate trade, by rapid movement of information, technology and capital, and by competition which engenders efficiency.

Mr. Speaker, Canada has a healthy and dynamic mining industry that will prosper in this environment with government support, but without government intervention.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity I have been given to speak today on the subject raised by Hon. Member for Timmins—Chapleau (Mr. Samson).

As you know, the Canadian minerals and metals industry tends to expand outside the country, which is necessary.

Canada is the world's largest producer of zinc and uranium and second largest producer of potash, nickel, asbestos and gypsum.

Since Canada's contribution to the demand for these products is still far from its contribution to their supply, it is not surprising that we export large amounts of our minerals and metals at various stages of production.

[English]

Canada's contribution in this field is not confined to mining. In addition to the primary extraction of our mineral ores, Canada makes a major contribution to the further processing of this ore. We have a refining and smelting industry of which we can be proud and which, in certain areas, is world class. I shall have more to say about this later.

The motion before the House today would like to see an expanded role for further processing in Canada and I am in full agreement with that objective. In promoting this objective, however, we should not lose sight of some important realities. Competition is very intense worldwide at all stages of the mineral and metal industries. In the past decade we have seen the mining sector having to make some very painful adjustments, cutting its labour force and introducing new technologies in an effort to remain competitive. These adjustments were not easy, but they were necessary and the industry is the stronger for having made them.

In the same way that Canadian mines can close and lose customers to the benefit of foreign suppliers if they cannot keep their prices low, the refining and smelting sector also faces keen competition.

The Government is confident that under the right conditons, these sectors can prosper and develop. For several years now, we have tried to create ideal conditions for the processing sectors to prosper. These efforts are being pursued on various fronts. The first two ways involve increasing Canada's access to world markets and reforming the tax system. These are familiar to all Canadians. These efforts are not particularly directed at the minerals and metals industry, but provide a basis for the long-term growth of all sectors of this industry by allowing Canadian firms to compete effectively on world markets.

[English]

This government does not believe that it would be in the long-term interest of Canada's refining and smelting industry to provide it with artificial stimulus. When the protectionist measures were eventually dismantled, as they would have to be, the industry would have to make much more drastic adjustments than if it had been exposed all along to the discipline of foreign competition.

The motion suggests that Canada should discourage the export of unprocessed minerals. I do not think that this would help smelting and refining in Canada. The most efficient smelting and refining companies worldwide would simply find an alternative supply source. Remember that while Canada's resource base is rich, it is not unique. There are many competitors. If Canada is an unwilling seller, there are other suppliers to take our place. The best long term strategy for Canada's mineral processing industry is the rigorous pursuit of efficiency and the gradual build-up of capacity which would allow it to take advantage of Canada's rich mineral wealth.

I would like to repeat for the record the six principal objectives of mineral policy set out in the mineral and metal policy of the Government of Canada in May 1987. They are: to provide a fair and balanced fiscal and regulatory framework; to foster the development of the mineral and metal sector as a foundation for regional economic development; to promote improved technological performance and increase international competitiveness in all facets of the industry; to assist workers in communities affected by industrial adjustment; to facilitate enhanced mineral and metal exports and access to new and traditional markets; and to provide timely and accurate economic, technological and scientific information required by the industry and by the federal and provincial governments, labour and the general public.

As these objectives make clear, this government appreciates the strong role which mineral development has played and can continue to play in the economic development of Canada's regions. The Government of Canada will continue to provide a supportive environment for the industry in the ways outlined; encouragement of R and D, tax reform, provision of information, trade initiatives and adjustment assistance. However, insofar as the production and investment decisions of the industries are concerned, this government believes that individual firms are in the best position to evaluate the information on which these decisions should be based. The Canadian mineral and metal industry has a strong record of past achievement and we have every confidence that it will continue.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member from Timmins for giving me the opportunity to speak on this matter. As the member for Sudbury I probably know as much, if not more, than a lot of the people here about mining and refining as it is carried on in my city and province. I have less knowledge of what happens across our country but one of the things I am very aware of is that there is a debate, and it may not even be a debate at this point, on jurisdiction of the mining portfolio. I am very much aware that provinces control mineral rights and, as such, feel that it is their jurisdiction. I certainly would like to see the federal government try to pressure the provinces into doing the things that need to be done.

I would like to go back and refer to what happens in Ontario. Ontario in 1917, I believe, passed a mining act which said that all minerals extracted from the ground that had been patented after a certain date in 1917 had to be processed in Canada, in Ontario I gather, and proceeded to go on with this legislation.

In our town we have two major companies that do mining and some refining. We have Inco, International Nickel. International Nickel does a large portion of its refining in our city. It has a world-class refining capacity and does a great deal of the actual refining locally. It also ships some of its refining to Port Colborne and some goes all the way out Wales.

Falconbridge, on the other hand, does no refining whatsoever in Canada. In the early 1920s, when Falconbridge was wishing to refine some of its minerals itself, it found itself in a position where International Nickel controlled all of the patents everywhere except in Norway. Therefore, they were not able to register their patents for refining, or at least in this country or in the United States. So they bought up a closed refinery in Norway and were able to get a patent there and went on with business, and to this day they refine in Norway. The provincial government now gives Falconbridge special permission to ship to Norway.

In the early 1980s, when there was a severe downturn in the mining economy, had we forced Falconbridge to refine locally I do not think we would have a Falconbridge operation in Sudbury at this time. It is very important that when this rule is enforced there is some consideration given to the times. We know that this past year Falconbridge has had some considerable profits, and we are pleased with that. We also know that Falconbridge will be renegotiating this special permission with the provincial governments over the next few years.

I would like to impress upon our provincial governments the fact that we certainly would like to see the investment of some of these moneys that they have made in a refining plant, preferably in our city. On the other hand, we must always remember that they must invest money in new properties or the industry will not remain viable. It is important that, if that permission is given to ship out, there be considerable reason in terms of investments in properties to offset that. I really believe that if you build a refinery that costs $500 million and creates 300 jobs it may not be quite as good as creating 500 or 600 jobs at a new location and a new mine. All of these things have to be considered.

One of the things that I worry far more about at this point in time is the large push by multinationals to take control of our mining industry. A case in point, and it really did not come to pass, was the purchasing of Falconbridge by Amax. That did not come to pass, but I wonder what would happen to our industry and what kind of controls we would have if a company was solely owned from outside the country. Would it have the caring for the country and for the area in which it mines which a company that is at least partially owned in our own country would have? That worries me far more and I think we definitely have to take some very close looks at the trends of multinationals taking over some of our natural resources.

Another point that worries me very much is the monetary policy of this government, the high interest rates which lead to the high value of our dollar. I realize that it is far more difficult for our mines to make a profit when the value of our dollar is as high as it is. It is important that we maintain those profits so that the profits can be put back into our economy at a local level as well as at a national level.

I am also very worried that we will neglect the environment. That is a major issue. We in Sudbury, in Inco and Falconbridge, have done some tremendous things towards pollution abatement. As a matter of fact, I think in many ways Sudbury could be used as a model in terms of greening. I would certainly invite anyone to come to our community and see the types of investments that have been made, even through tough times, in our community on protection of the environment.

I would conclude by saying that I do support the motion. I think it is important that we pressure the provincial government, or at least exert our influence as a federal government, in ensuring that as much as possible what we produce here is refined here.

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise to speak on this issue of processing mineral resources in Canada.

Before I do so, I would like to refer back to the actual motion, wherein it says:

> —the government should consider the advisability of developing programs and policies to promote further processing of all extracted materials produced by Canadian mines—

This indicates to me one of the fundamental flaws in the motion. It says all resources must be further processed. It shows, I think, the lack of understanding of the hon. member proposing the motion, particularly with regard to the coal industry, with which I have some experience. I do not know how he imagines we are going to further process coal before we export it. Perhaps some explanation of the industry and the process is required.

When coal is exported to be used in utilities and to make electricity in foreign lands, the only thing that is done to it before it is used is that it is pulverized. Now, if we did that pulverizing here in Canada the coal would be absolutely impossible to handle. You cannot ship pulverized coal. It would plug up all of the equipment, it would be a complete mess in terms of the environment and so forth.

Certainly we cannot say that we wish to upgrade every mineral resource that is produced in Canada. That is one particular example where it would be categorically impossible, unless of course the hon. member wishes to actually make the electricity in Canada and put it in boxes and ship it out. I am sure that when that technology is available Canadian industry would be pleased to do it because one of the biggest problems we have in exporting coal is the cost of transportation. I am sure it will be many, many years before a technology of that nature is available.

The hon. member wants us to do everything possible to encourage the processing of minerals in Canada. I am very surprised that he should say that because his party is on record as opposing the goods and services tax which is, of course, directed at making our resource producers more viable and more economical. If we want to encourage processing in Canada, then we want to make our industries as viable as we possibly can. That extra income, the revenue that comes from having lower operating costs, will encourage them to upgrade resources further. This, of course, is an objective that we all share. I am pleased, as I say, to speak on this subject today.

I think it is important to understand something about the presence of downstream processing of raw materials in Canada, and the extent that this presence varies from commodity to commodity. In cases where Canada's domestic end-use market is substantial, downstream processing is often well established. Examples of this would be, of course, the aluminum and cement industries. In other cases, the pattern is predominantly determined by the presence of high tariff and non-tariff barriers in important foreign markets. These tariff barriers increase with the degree of processing and pose a major hurdle for Canadian expansion in this area.

It is in recognition of the problems posed by these trade barriers that this government completed the free trade agreement with the United States. Canada is also firmly committed to tariff reduction through the multilateral trade negotiations now under way at the GATT. We are confident that with the removal of trade barriers, as a result of the FTA and tariff reductions, we will see significant additional growth in the further processing of minerals and metals in Canada.

This future growth, indicated by market forces, will be assisted by this government's efforts aimed at enhancing Canada's reputation as a safe and attractive haven for investment, both foreign and domestic. This includes maintaining a fiscal regime which imparts no disadvantage to our producers.

Earlier I stated that Canada already has a strong presence in further processing of minerals. It is well known that over 80 per cent of Canada's mineral production is exported. It is often believed that the bulk of these exports is in the form of ores or concentrates. This is simply not true. Let me review the metal mining sector, a sector which alone accounts for over 70 per cent of Canada's mineral production.

One hundred per cent of all nickel ore produced in Canada is upgrade into nickel matte in this country. Furthermore, some two-thirds of this is refined in Canada. About 94 per cent of our gold production in 1987 was upgraded in Canada, and some 75 per cent of the silver concentrates were processed in this country as well. Over 50 per cent of copper and of zinc concentrates received upgrading in Canada. These commodities alone constitute about 60 per cent of the metal mining sector's output in any given year.

I would like to provide a little more detail about our copper industry. The Canadian copper industry is made up of two distinct groups, the west coast concentrate producers and the central eastern integrated producers. Rail transport of concentrates from British Columbia to eastern Canada for domestic processing is an expensive proposition. It is far more economical and attractive to ship concentrates to Japan for refining than to transport them across Canada.

The possible construction of a world-scale copper smelter in British Columbia has been studied but has not been found to be a viable proposition. I am confident that companies will continue to evaluate new possibilities as conditions change, and that if such a proposition becomes viable that they will undertake it.

While this government wishes to encourage further processing of minerals and metals in Canada, it must be careful how this is accomplished. It is preferable that this should come about without direct government intervention. It is well to remember that while we are a leading exporter of minerals concentrates, we are also an important importer of ores and concentrates. For example, we rely exclusively on imported bauxite and alumina for our aluminum industry.

We also need foreign copper concentrates to supply our smelters in eastern Canada. In order to maintain production at Cominco's Trail smelter, significant supplies of zinc concentrate will have to be imported when that company's huge Red Dog deposit in Alaska comes on stream in 1990.

Some nickel concentrates are already obtained from offshore for domestic refining. Imports of these are expected to increase next year when the Sherritt Gordon refinery acquires additional raw material for its operations.

It is evident that Canada should not take measures to promote downstream processing in a way that will provide grounds for any retaliatory action by those countries on whom we depend for some of our raw materials.

Looking at the non-metal business, it is worth noting that Canada is a leading exporter of coal and potash. I would like to point out that these commodities accounted for over $2.5 billion in export earnings in 1987. There is little scope for further upgrading of these items, as I mentioned earlier, particularly in regard to coal.

Canada does not lack for recent improvements to its downstream processing facilities. Let me give you some examples. In the case of zinc, the Trail smelter has been expanded, the Valleyfield smelter has been modernized, and Kidd Creek continues to be state-of-the-art.

While Canada does not mine the raw materials for aluminum, the aluminum industry is, nevertheless, a good example of new developments in the further processing of raw materials in this country. Thanks to the investment climate created by this present government, component manufacturers have chosen to locate here and to take advantage of the presence of this industry.

The aluminum industry continues to move aggressively into further processed forms. In 1988, Alcan announced construction of a new $3 million plant to produce ceramic-related materials for use in composite products, and a $25 million plant to manufacture dural, a ceramic particle reinforced aluminum in the Lac-Saint-Jean region of Quebec. Alcan will also build a new alumina hydrate plant at a cost of $28 million. This material is used in artificial marble, toothpaste and rubber backings for carpets.

A $112 million aluminum auto parts plant is being built in Quebec by a French company. This facility to be constructed in Riviere-Beaudette will produce precision cast aluminum parts including cylinder heads and intake manifolds for the automobile industry.

Earlier this year, Reynolds Metals announced plans for a $50 million plant plant in Louiseville, Quebec, that will produce cast aluminum wheels. This plant will employ some 325 people.

Another interesting new development is taking place in platinum. Traditionally, the platinum content of Canadian nickel matte has been recovered offshore. Now, a pilot plant to recover platinum from spent catalysts has started in Toronto. If successful, it may be adapted to handle the platinum content of domestic mineral concentrates.

Canada's steel industry is maintaining its position as a world leader and competitive producer by employing new technologies. The percentage of Canadian steel that is continuous cast far exceeds the level in the United States, and we have one of the most modern pipe and tube plants in the world. The steel industry has plans for a new galvanizing plant in Hamilton and expects to apply technologies which will move us away from the use of coke in the blast furnace. These programs will move our supply capability further downstream and ensure a cleaner environment in industrial areas.

Canada is on the verge of becoming the world's largest producer of magnesium metal. If all planned or potential magnesium smelting projects are implemented by 1994, total capital investment in this sector could amount to more than $1 billion, creating more than 1,000 new jobs. Canada's next producer of magnesium metal, Norsk Hydro, should have its plant at Bécancour, Quebec, in production shortly. This facility expects to employ approximately 350 permanent workers.

Other projects are under active consideration. For example, Noranda Minerals Inc. and Lavalin Inc. have announced their intention to proceed to the feasibility stage of their Magnola joint venture which will be based on asbestos tailings from the Thetford Mines area. Magnesium International Corporation and Alberta Natural Gas Limited are constructing a magnesium metal plant at Aylderside near High River, Alberta.

Canada's record on further processing is promising, but this government will continue to strive for improvement. Even now a considerable number of developments are under way that will improve our performance. These are examples of how this government has encouraged a well established industry to move further down the path of higher value-added activities. I am confident that this trend will continue as and when trade barriers are reduced as a result of our concerted actions with the free trade agreement and the GATT negotiations.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I think as the member for Calgary North rightly pointed out, we should really read the resolution again so that we can make sure we discuss the points that are relevant. We have heard the comments about mineral extraction and the processing of minerals in Canada. Yet the resolution, if I might re-read it for you, states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of developing programs and policies to promote further processing of all extracted materials produced by Canadian mines in Canada, and to discourage the export of unprocessed minerals from Canada.

It is interesting that the resolution switched from "materials" to "minerals". I am not sure what happened to all those other things that might not be classified as minerals in the discussion.

In my riding we have some substantial landfill sites provided to us courtesy of the city of Toronto. We are not necessarily happy to have them, but now there have been some proposals put forward that state that there might be some extraction opportunities of the wealth of energy and resources that are buried in these particular mountains, if I might call them appropriately.

When we talk about materials extraction, do we talk about iron? Obviously we must. We must talk about coal, uranium, nickel, peatmoss, copper, potash, limestone, zinc, cement—goodness, I bet you the list could go on. I think there are some 120 different identified minerals in the world. I think we have most of them in Canada, at least a substantial portion of them. I do not know if we can just talk about a very limited aspect. Of course, what is not mentioned in all this is where in fact do we as Canadians who want to process these products sell them.

As the Member for Calgary North rightly indicated, there are some products that we extract from the earth that really require no processing when they are ready for use. Certainly, he is very knowledgeable on the coal industry and made a very valid point. I suspect that the same may apply for example when we extract from the earth such things as oil, natural gas, and even water. I am not sure if a conventional thing called mining should always be considered. Mining is regarded as digging a hole in the ground to see what is down there. I am sure that is the old philosophy. The new philosophy in mining is such that I am sure that many things we do would in one sense or another be regarded as mining.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the finance committee dealing with the goods and services tax and have been travelling across Canada, at least to this point in time to western Canada, and soon to embark on a swing through eastern Canada, to hear the input of constituents. We have very clearly as a government identified that resource sector industries, particularly in western Canada and eastern Canada, would really benefit by the goods and services tax. I think it is very appropriate that we have had some comment about the coal industry. The coal industry came forward and very solidly embraced the concept of the goods and services tax.

It even estimated that each individual mine that it represents in western Canada in particular would become more profitable on average to the tune of some $500,000 per year. Half a million dollars may not be much, but it is half a million dollars that can be invested in technology. The industry can invest it in the creation of new jobs. When it buys technology it buys equipment. The industry buys things manufactured somewhere else in Canada, hopefully, even right in its own backyard or wherever the mine happens to be.

On the other side, as I mentioned, the finance committee less than a half hour ago had a presentation from the Hon. Mr. Douglas who was the Minister of Finance in New Zealand and who made some very enlightening presentations on the goods and services tax. As you know, the governing party is considered the left wing or socialist party of New Zealand. I think it caused some considerable problem to the members of the NDP caucus who sit on the Finance Committee because everything that was being said about the GST in New Zealand went so diametrically opposite to what the NDP is saying here in Canada. Yet, this was fellow brethren of the socialist societies of the world speaking to each other taking such a diametrically opposite point of view.

The one thing that Mr. Douglas commented on was that in New Zealand the practice has been to target industries and provide government assistance to those industries to do things. Since the Labour Party of New Zealand has taken over it has done away with that. It has done away with tax grants, incentive grants or, as is mentioned in this motion, programs and policies. It has done away with all of those things to business. The party's argument is that business ought to do what business deems right.

It has also done away with a lot of other programs. This Labour government had to admit that less government interference in the targeting of industries has in fact been very beneficial to New Zealand. Here we have before us a resolution which states that we ought to interfere in business and not let it do its own thing. Yet in New Zealand a government of the same stripe as some members of this House says that this is exactly wrong and that there ought to be less interference, with the end result that your industries will be better off.

I find that to be a very enlightening comment. Of course, it is nice to be able to say that we will process in Canada all of the things that we mine out of the ground. We will not get into specific items as to what they are at this particular point. That is great. We will process all these things. Then what will we do with them? It would be really nice to have a market in Canada where all these things could be sold. That would be just absolutely fantastic. Since there are only 25 million of us and not 250 million, we have a problem.

We have the ability in Canada to produce and to extract from the earth many more resources than we have the ability to consume ourselves. What do we do with these things? Do we just leave them in the ground until Canada's population is at 250 million? I guess we could come up with more grants to families to encourage them—not unlike as has been done in the province of Quebec—to have more children. I am not sure that that would get us to 250 million in a real hurry.

In the riding next to me, in the riding of Oshawa, the automotive industry, for example, is a very prominent employer. It is rather prominent in my riding as well. What does the automotive industry do? Ultimately, you can say that it processes extracted materials, whether it is steel, metals of one kind or another, or aluminum. It processes things and it sells them. In fairness, it sells the majority of those products produced in those plants in the riding next to me in some other country, not in Canada.

I would hazard to say that if we followed the policy of only selling those products that we extract to Canadians, then we would have a problem. It does not work. On the other hand, if we put in place rules that make that happen obviously our trading partners, wherever they are around the world, will erect barriers that will make it very difficult for us in Canada to sell things. Yes, that means in some cases, that we will have to sell products that are extracted from our rich resources and not processed. But what it does do is it provides us with a tremendous opportunity to sell processed products. Those processed products start to work to our advantage, as is very clear.

We do not operate in isolation to other countries. We do not operate in isolation to various trading arrangements that exist in the world. In fact, as members of the GATT, we have substantial trading relationships. Any policies that would interfere with the free flow of goods I would find very difficult to support because the agreements we have with trading partners encourage free flow in both directions. Yes, we win on some and we lose on others. We have a number of substantial winners which I hope in a future presentation, Mr. Speaker, you will allow me to speak on. I could go on for a half hour at least talking about the winners that we have in Canada on resource extraction.

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to share with the House some special feelings about the mining industry of Canada because, as the House will know, I served for two years, between 1984 and 1986, as the Minister of State for Mines. In that two-year period I enjoyed the learning process which is the privilege of all who serve in these capacities. But for me, as an engineer, it was a very special introduction to the magnificence of Canada's mining sector.

As members of the House will recall, the international cycle for commodities, particularly some of the main products of Canada, cycled very badly in the late 1970s and early 1980s. The industry had presented to government year after year the need for attention to their interest to reinforce the industry so that it could come back and compete when the cycles rejoined in the future.

As minister, I was privileged to meet with the leaders of our great mining companies in Canada and to learn of their capacities and their technologies and their very special concerns. In retrospect, I am pleased to have been able to serve as minister during a period in which those cycles did turn around. The very hopes and prospects of the industry which had been set out by the industry to the government and which the government accepted through its leaders in the Energy, Mines and Resources Department turned around.

I should not pass that reference to the department without giving credit to the men and women who have served Canada as technology leaders in the Can Labs that Canada sponsors jointly in working with the private sector. The doctors of technology who have established and guided those centres across Canada have done a wonderful job and are part of this rebuilding process, this further processing or refining process that we are discussing today.

As my memory goes back to those occasions together, I remember from the very beginning the need for consultation and the need for working in concert with the provincial governments. Our Constitution very specifically addresses the rights to mineral wealth to the provinces. I learned, as many of our colleagues here will know, that there was a division between the federal authority and the provincial authority which often confused and frustrated the mining industry. Mines ministers' conferences were never quite complete in much the way that Canada's discussions on its Constitution are not complete because Quebec was not there.

I was privileged to preside over and chair the first mines ministers' conference in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, at which the provincial Minister of Mines for Quebec, one of the three very large provincial ministries in mines, was present and participated fully, raising the same concerns for the mining industry that we all did. We looked for harmony and harmonization of the regulations so that mining decisions to explore, to develop, to exploit, to operate, were all addressed with a fairness or a unity for Canada so that it was not one province out-bargaining the other in terms of advantage.

The primary function of the Canadian Government in this process was to reinforce the magnificence, the potential of our mining industry. I remember another incident which was that a series of conditions in our finance legislation provided for what were then known as flow-through shares. It was a mechanism or a treatment of investments which went into the development or exploration for mining potential which is a tremendous risk.

I learned that while some of us look at investments as having a return within so many years, perhaps over a period of 10 years, for many mining ventures it was 10 years before they started to operate and begin to recover the front-end risk money which had gone in 10 years earlier. This is a tremendous expression of confidence in Canada's ability and in a mine's ability to ride through a cycle and then compete with all the others which are looking for the world markets.

I think it was my colleague from Ontario who pointed out this need to recognize that we are in a world market and that others can meet the demands of this market like anyone else.

I am going to be very disappointed this afternoon because I can see that the clock is going far too fast and I know you are not going to allow me, unless we get unanimous consent, another half hour. I will do my best to finish in the two or three minutes you are going to allow.

The uranium deposits with which Canada is blessed can continue to become for safe and peaceful purposes a tremendous resource in Canada, both in Ontario and particularly now in Saskatchewan. A special facility, Eldorado, was built at Port Hope, not far from the riding of Ontario. The competition which that processing plant found became an international concern in trade and in relationships with the U.S.

Major users of uranium in the U.S. would wish to buy the uranium in its raw form and direct it to the refining plants in the southern United States and then process it into their uranium thermal plants. This was fine except that we had a capacity which was efficient and modern. We added to that capacity in Port Hope, and further refining was done but always with the recognition that we had to compete with the access to the same materials through other means. We have tremendous competitors in this world when it comes to our mining products. The Australians are in a great position to compete with Canadians because their mines are just as rich, and their resources are just as strong.

I hope that this motion will be considered as time goes by, recognizing that the real need is for Canadians. I see you are almost on your feet, Mr. Speaker, so I will not stretch this out too long.

I want to give credit to the member from Calgary North who also raised a number of important points in his address to this House this afternoon. As I say, Mr. Speaker, I know you are going to have to watch the clock, it is your duty, and I honour you for it. Thank you very much for this occasion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

• (1800)

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

THE ECONOMY—CONFERENCE BOARD OF CANADA REPORT—NATIONAL SALES TAX—IMPACT ON BUSINESS INVESTMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to say a few words about the 9 per cent manufacturers' sales tax that the government plans to introduce on January 1, 1991.

I want to refer to an issue I raised in Question Period, regarding the report presented to the country by the Conference Board of Canada. At that time, the Conference Board vice president and chief economist, Mr. James Frank, issued a number of observations that I thought would be worth presenting to the Minister of Finance.

The Conference Board of Canada we all recognize as being the most prestigious and the most objective economic think-tank and projection firm in Canada. Their track record has been impeccable in terms of predicting the impact of various government programs, and their researchers and reports can be rated as nothing short of outstanding.

Their latest report on the goods and services tax indicates that inflation will increase, economic growth will be reduced, and that more than 70,000 jobs will be killed in the first year of the goods and services tax. To put it more precisely, the Conference Board of Canada suggests that inflation will increase to 7.3 per cent from 5 per cent, in 1991.

As a result of the hearings in various parts of Canada, we have heard that the labour movement certainly sees this as a reason to be requesting significant increases in pay packages. If inflation is going to increase by 7.3 per cent and the tax will add another 9 per cent to the cost of most goods and services, we are looking at requests coming in at 16 per cent in one year. Along with the indication from the manufacturing and retail sector that prices will have to be increased to reflect the increased costs associated with the sales tax, it means that prices will go up, and wages and salaries will have to go up to meet this increased cost of living.

When the cost of living goes up, or as I might also state it, the inflation rate goes up, the Governor of the Bank of Canada will feel obligated to raise interest rates accordingly. As the Minister of Finance has indicated, we can expect the interest rates to go up a number of percentage points as a result of the goods and services tax which will further strangle any hope of economic growth, particularly in the regions of Canada.

The Conference Board of Canada goes on at some length to point out some of the concerns that they have regarding this government proposal. I must say that they reflect much of what I have been hearing in communities like Clearwater, Chase, Barriere, Kamloops, Logan Lake, Westwold, Savona and many other smaller communities within my own constituency, where people really make four points. Whether they represent small business, homeowners, tourist operations, loggers, farmers, ranchers, restaurateurs, seniors, students, or whatever group, they remind us of the fact that the Prime Minister of Canada promised that if a sales tax was going to be introduced, we would be promised and guaranteed four items.

One, the tax would be visible for all to see. Well, the Prime Minister has had to renege on that promise because we now know that in many cases it will simply be built into the price of a service or a commodity and the public will never see the fact that there is a 9 per cent federal sales tax.

The Prime Minister promised that it would be revenue neutral. That is the second promise that he broke, because now the Prime Minister has indicated that it will not be revenue neutral, that this tax will raise $5.5 billion beyond what the present manufacturers' sales tax presently raises.

The Prime Minister also promised that the federal sales tax would be integrated with the provincial sales tax and we would have only one tax to pay that would be termed a sales tax. That promise has also been broken, because now we know that the federal government will first of all impose its 9 per cent tax and then on top of that the provincial governments that have a sales tax will impose their provincial sales tax, which means they will be taxing taxes.

The Prime Minister said that it would be very simple. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business, which represents 80,000 small businesses across Canada, states that this is going to be a red-tape nightmare, that this system is too complex to consider introducing and too expensive to introduce.

• (1805)

On the matter of the goods and services tax, groups like the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Canadian Organization for Small Business, virtually every agricultural organization in Canada and now, lastly, the Conference Board of Canada, the most prestigious board in the country with regard to predicting the economic implications of various government initiatives, are condemning the sales tax and saying that this will squeeze economic life out of our economy. They have asked the government to go back to the drawing board. They join with groups like the New Democratic Party which also have been saying: "Let's go back to the drawing board. Let's look at real tax reform of our tax system rather than have a regressive sales tax that discriminates against the regions of Canada and the poorer people of the country. Let's have real tax reform that is fair, just and equitable".

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer my Hon. New Democratic colleague and you will allow me to begin by pointing out how sweet it is to hear the New Democratic Party finally support these arguments, along with the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the small business federation, although they usually condemn the Chamber of Commerce and its members, condemn small business, etc. But this time, they support it.

On the other hand, my colleague perhaps made two small mistakes in his presentation, Mr. Speaker. In the first place, he said that the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business do not support the new tax. That is false. Every organization, Mr. Seaker, which appeared before the Standing Committee on Finance told us:

"First, the present federal sales tax is bad for Canada; the present federal sales tax must be changed. Now, in the context of your proposed GST, we would like to see some things done differently." Great! Everyone, even my colleague, the Finance critic, condemns the present federal sales tax. I listened to my constituents and I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I also go around my riding, to Pointe-du-Lac, Saint-Sévère, Saint-Barnabé, Trois-Rivères-Ouest or Trois-Rivières, and people tell me that they know the tax will be visible, because businesses will be very glad to put it on the bill, saying, "This is the federal government's tax, not profit we are making."

Second, people are aware that the tax will bring in more revenue, but they are very glad that the extra revenue will be returned to them. All families whose income is under $30,000 a year will get a tax credit.

Third, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister never insisted that the tax must be federal-provincial. He always said that he would prefer it, but we know that the provinces refused.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, small businesses, as I was told again lask week in Pointe-du-Lac, are very glad to know that they will get $600 a year to administer a tax that can fit on an 8 x 12 page.

Mr. Speaker, those are the points that I wanted to make. The tax will be simpler, fairer and more equitable for Canadians and for business.

FISHERIES—IMPACT OF FREE TRADE AGREEMENT ON ATLANTIC CANADA—CRISIS IN ATLANTIC INDUSTRY

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the riding of Burin—St. George's has 158 communities, the majority of which are very heavily involved in the fishery, and a number of which are involved in the deep sea fishery. For example, we have deep sea plants at Burgeo and Ramea, at Gaultois and Harbour Breton, at Fortune and Grand Bank, at Marystown and at Burin.

I tell you that, Mr. Speaker, because I believe it goes a long way toward explaining why it is I have been raising, on a regular basis, the issue of the current state of the fishery.

Indeed, the item on the agenda to which we are now speaking, the so-called late show or adjournment debate, actually arises out of a question that I put to the Minister of Fisheries on or about June 20.

For at least four months we have been talking about this issue and during that time I have been characterizing the current state as a crisis. The Minister has disagreed with me. As recently as Monday past, just eight days ago, he took exception. If we look at Hansard, we see that he chose quite different wording to characterize the current state of the fishery. He said that in most respects, fishermen in Atlantic Canada are enjoying a year which is prosperous and adequate for their needs.

Almost any fisherman, almost any plant worker in Atlantic Canada, can vouch for the fact that the minister's statement is simply not true. It is just not true. The question arises, why is the minister, aided and abetted, I may say, by the gentleman from St. John's West who I guess may be responding to these few remarks of mine, choosing to send out what is clearly a false signal? I can only guess that somebody has come up with a strategy to downplay the issue. They are not going to convince anybody who is actively involved in the fishery. They are certainly not going to convince anybody involved in the Newfoundland fishery, either the inshore or the deep-sea fishery, that there is no crisis. They are not going to convince any of those people that the fishery in Newfoundland is not on the verge of collapse.

They certainly are not going to convince the Newfoundland government from whom the Government of Canada has had in its hands this report for two months, a report rightly entitled "Resource Crisis in the Newfoundland Fishery". The report goes into some detail to spell out the dimensions of that crisis. It refers in part to the overfishing by the European community.

To give a quick example, in 1986, NAFO, the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization, assigned to the European Community countries 26,295 tonnes as its quota for that particular year; in round figures, 26,000 tonnes. In that year, countries in the European Community fished not 26,000 but 160,000 tonnes or about six times as much as the quota would allow. The figures are similar for succeeding years.

One, there is a crisis. Two, is there any wonder that there is a crisis? Third, I say to the minister and his parliamentary secretary that if there is no crisis, what is the Minister for International Trade doing overseas? Four years after it started, he has now discovered there is overfishing. He is now going to go out there and do a selling job. Well, bully for him. You have heard about closing the gate after the horse was gone.

This is a classic case of where this government has obfuscated, tried to cover up and be wishy-washy in terms of the issue and finally, too late, talking out of both sides of its mouth, the one hand saying there is no problem, there is no crisis, and the other hand going out to try to put out some fires.

It is beyond the bushfire stage. The fishermen, the plant workers that I represent, know there is a problem and they know the very serious dimensions of the problem. If we were to pursue this report a little further, we would find in graphic terms what the ramifications are going to be in terms of job losses in the next few months.

I do not need to take you through that, Mr. Speaker, because every fisherman, every plant worker, is aware of the dire possibilities for their industry and for their livelihood. That is why I raised the question in June and since then, and that is why I gave notice in June that I was not satisfied. I am still not satisfied with the answers I am getting from the government.

• (1815)

I want to know, and I hope the parliamentary secretary will tell us, why they have their blinkers on in terms of this issue. More to the point, what will they do to help mitigate the issue, to offset the serious dimensions of this problem being faced by fishermen and plant workers?

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic fishery is an essential and fundamental component of the Atlantic and the Canadian economies.

In the period since 1977 the value of output grew by 57 per cent in constant dollars while over-all growth in Atlantic Canada was 42 per cent during the same period. The Atlantic fishing industry is a world class competitor. This government believes that such fundamental strengths combined with the opportunities provided by the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement guarantee benefits for the Atlantic fishery.

While the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement bodes well for the future of all regions in Canada, the Atlantic region in particular can expect significant economic benefits. Most studies identify Atlantic Canada as a primary beneficiary of the agreement.

The Atlantic fishery in the long term is a winner from the free trade agreement. As tariffs are removed, Canadian processors will have the opportunity to expand production of consumer ready products in Canada. Such diversification will lead to more jobs and an improved economic base for many communities in this country.

This provides a positive note for the important Atlantic fishery. Of course, there are factors which are currently having a negative impact on the fishery. Recent downturns in the resource availability of some stocks are known to us all. Factors such as these have always been a part of the fishing industry. It remains fundamentally sound.

The government has in place a wide range of programs to address short run adjustment problems. These include the Canadian Jobs Strategy, industrial assistance and unemployment insurance which are available to cushion the impact of changes in economic activity on individuals and communities. After a full assessment of the problems in the existing programs, the government will, if necessary, initiate further programs or adjust existing programs to assist the industry as it has done in the past.

The important issues related to stock assessment and overfishing are being dealt with separately. The Prime Minister has appointed a special committee of cabinet to coordinate the government's response to problems in the northern cod fishery and to look at other Atlantic fisheries issues as appropriate. This committee is chaired by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

With respect to overfishing, among many other things the government has initiated a series of diplomatic initiatives to ensure that the European Community and its member countries realize the effect overfishing is having not only on this vital resource but also on the relationship between Canada and Europe.

This government is fully confident in the measures that it has in place or will put in place to deal with adjustment in the Atlantic fishery. Moreover, there are significant benefits offered by the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, and we are in a position to seize on them.

TRANSPORTATION—IMPACT OF CORPORATE PLAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, on June 6, 1989, I asked the Minister of Transport and through the Minister of Transport to the House and through the House to the people of Canada and more particularly to the people who work for VIA Rail in Canada what were the plans that they could rely on for their future as employees and workers of VIA Rail.

The question was based on information on that day or the day previous that was released in The Globe and Mail that indicated that VIA's corporate plan indicated that all of VIA Rail would be cut by at least 50 per cent; all the employees and the routes would be cut by at least 50 per cent. That was on June 6, almost four months ago.

I also questioned the Minister about whether, in consideration of the leaked report in The Globe and Mail and with respect to the corporate plan, it would not be wise and not be in good taste that he would at least let the people who were working for VIA Rail, the 3,000 people the report claimed were going to be laid off make plans for their future, for alternate employment, other employment, retirement, early retirement; or all those things that we are hearing about now in this House.

Essentially, I was asking that since we knew there was going to be some drastic measures taken on VIA Rail, could we at least give the employees of VIA Rail an opportunity to protect their own future.

Last Wednesday, a day which will be remembered, particularly by our friends in Atlantic Canada, northern Ontario, small communities throughout this province, municipalities across this country, as black Wednesday, Canadians learned the severity of the plan that we talked about in June in this House.

On January 15, 1990, VIA will eliminate 18 of its 38 routes. The number of trains running will drop to 191 from a current level of 405. The VIA network will reduce its present size by well over 50 per cent. The Globe and Mail was in fact correct. Its estimation of 3,000 employees directly affected was correct. Over 10,000 employees in Canada, those employees employed by CN and CP and in the tourist industry, will be indirectly affected.

The reason for my question in June was simply to allow these faithful people who are directly affected in Canada to prepare themselves for that eventuality. Atlantic Canada was disemboweled by the moves of VIA Rail. My greatest concern since the announcement has been the government's decision to eliminate The Canadian, a line that runs a passenger rail service through northern Ontario. Commencing on January 15 of next year, the 150,000 northern Ontario residents of Sudbury, the 1,000 residents from Chapleau, the 2,500 from White River, 5,000 residents in Marathon, the 2,500 residents in Terrace Bay, the 120,000 residents in Thunder Bay, the 1,000 people who live in Ignace, the 10,000 people who live in Dryden, the 10,000 who live in Kenora, all along that CP line, will be denied access to passenger rail service in our country. A total of over 350,000 residents in northern Ontario will be denied this service.

Instead, this government has chosen to provide VIA service cross–country three times a week by continuing the cross–country rail line through a route what we used to refer to as the continental line, or the old CN line that starts about 30 miles north when it leaves Toronto, goes up north, about 30 miles north of Sudbury from Capreol, travels the northern route through smaller communities and finds its way into Winnipeg. It goes through Sioux Lookout, Nakina and places like that.

As a result of this very vital decision that affects northern Ontario, the government has chosen to go by the northern CN route, which will have a population of about 5,000 people, rather than the route that was formerly occupied by The Canadian on the north shore of Lake Superior which gives the opportunity to 350,000 people from northern Ontario to still avail themselves of passenger rail service in our country.

I know the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport is prepared to answer this query today and I would ask, in closing, since this so affects the people of northern Ontario, could he restrict himself to that answer alone. Why did the government choose to go on a northern route with only 5,000 people who could avail themselves of passenger rail service rather than taking the other route that would allow 350,000 people from northern Ontario to avail themselves of passenger rail service? Thank you for this opportunity, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon for giving us the opportunity of once again explaining to the Canadian people some of the more difficult decisions that have had to be made in the transportation portfolio during these past few days.

As far as reductions in service in northern Ontario are concerned, the hon. member knows that in order to maintain the national service that is affordable and sustainable, we have had to make a very difficult decision. He knows a commitment has been made to service those comunities that have had no other forms of transportation.

• (1825)

All of those considerations had to be taken into account in order to meet the fiscal responsibilities, the realities which are facing us, and that the new system must be affordable.

The larger northern Ontario communities that the member has referred to have transportation alternatives which remain in place and which have the capacity to take up the slack and we expect will continue to serve the population in these areas.

I believe that the minister was quite clear last week when he made the announcement concerning VIA Rail's five year corporate plan. It is the government's intention that a restructured VIA will result in a national rail passenger network that is, as I have said before, affordable and sustainable. One of the most difficult decisions that had to be made in this restructuring process is that it would mean a reduction, as he has already mentioned, of some 38 per cent of the existing workforce. I think around 2,700 is the more correct figure, not 3,000 that he read in the paper a few months back.

The minister announced that VIA's five year plan makes provision for separation benefits for those affected employees totalling more than $140 million. VIA has one of the best separation packages available. Additionally, our government has specifically directed VIA to treat all affected employees with generosity and in the fullest compliance with all the applicable collective agreements and legal requirements that are already in place. While that is not a job, nonetheless it does help cushion the blow that will befall some of these people.

In closing, I would like to say that the government does have a host of services and programs, through the Department of Employment and Immigration, such as the industrial adjustment services, and the Canadian Jobs Strategy, that will also help workers to find new jobs and to acquire new skills.

This action has had to be taken because VIA was inefficient, ineffective, and in 1988 it cost a subsidy of some $641 million, and that was rising. It represented a subsidy of $1.5 million a day. Canadians will understand, I am sure, when they finally see the enormity of what we were putting out and what it was continuing to grow into when they see how we are trying to shrink that subsidy.

It is with regret that VIA is going to have to be cancelled out of some of the communities that it now services.

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE ORCHESTRA

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, 20 years ago the federal government established the National Arts Centre as Canada's national cultural institution. As Maureen Forrester, immediate past chair of the board, stated, "The formation of the NAC is arguably the most important single artistic development ever to occur in Canada's national capital".

Since its inception, several notables have been in such positions as director general, artistic director and on the board of trustees. Up until two years ago the centre's principals worked together to create one of Canada's finest institutions. Recently, patrons of the NAC have been asking people to sign petitions which accuse the new management of the NAC of being cavalier, incompetent and inadequate in artistic matters. It is for these reasons that I call on the Minister of Communications to initiate a public inquiry into the affairs of running the National Arts Centre. The inquiry must look into what has happened of late to bring the centre, its staff, its programming, and its orchestra to such an all-time low.

It is imperative that we address these problems before a major institution is destroyed and a wonderful orchestra becomes a thing of the past.

TOURISM

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the director of Carrefour Inc., located in L'Avenir, in my riding, and I am referring to Mr. René McKaye and his team who received an award last Friday in the "development" category, one of the Coeur-du-Québec 1989 tourism awards, for improving and developing their infrastructures.

I am also delighted that the Canadian Government was involved in this success thanks to its contribution through the special Laprade region program, which contributed $350,000.

Established in 1954 with the help of volunteers, this vacation centre, located in a magnificent setting on a hillside overlooking the Saint-François river, has changed considerably since those early years.

With its new infrastructures, Carrefour Inc. should now be considered a full-fledged resort.

Since Carrefour is open the year round, tourists, businesses and organizations that want to meet in a setting conducive to work and relaxation are able to take advantage of the many services and activities it offers.

This enterprise is to be commended for its determination, dynamic approach and sense of entrepreneurship in developing regional and provincial tourism.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I want to point out how well the Conservative Government understands the farmers of Canada and Quebec.

My Government listens to farmers. Last week, the president of the UPA (Quebec farmers' union), Mr. Proulx, and his officials met with our Ministers of Agriculture, the Minister for International Trade and the Prime Minister.

The federal Government has just granted Quebec pork producers $48 million under the stabilization program and, together with their federation, we are continuing the fight to abolish the countervailing duties imposed by the United States.

For milk producers, we abolished the milk price freeze and granted an increase of 47 cents per hectolitre.

We will make GATT see the light about yogourt and ice cream, Mr. Speaker. We want to strengthen Article XI of GATT, which fully protects us from certain imports.

The Hon. Member for Beauce is a strong defender of Quebec agriculture. We believe in the value of our marketing boards, our joint plans and our quotas!

Our farmers have made sacrifices, got organized and disciplined themselves. Believe me, we will protect ourselves!

The Conservative Members from Quebec are attentive and alert and my Government understands agriculture.

YUKON

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, today I have the great pleasure of welcoming a new premier into the Canadian constitutional family. Not only a new premier but a Social Democrat premier.

• (1410)

Yesterday, celebrating the tenth anniversary of responsible government in the Yukon, and acting upon the authority granted to the Yukon by a Progressive Conservative Government, the hon. Tony Penikett abolished the title "Government Leader" and instituted the title of "Premier".

Authority for this action was expressly granted on October 10, 1979, by the Minister of Northern and Indian Affairs.

As Premier Penikett stated: "The colonial title of government leader is not recognized anywhere outside of the north."

I welcome this New Democrat premier into the fold. I trust that the Prime Minister will do the same and that we will, finally, see the duly elected leader of the Yukon government as an active participant in all First Ministers conferences.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE DRESS CODE

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable sadness that I rise today to ask Canadians for tolerance and understanding on an issue of great concern to many.

As you know, numerous petitions have recently been filed with this House regarding the allowance of cultural dress and religious symbols in the code of dress of the RCMP. These petitions and the related controversy have given rise to unfortunate incidents of prejudice and racism that are directed at the Sikh community.

We all must and I am sure do deplore and condemn this intolerance and prejudice. This is fundamentally an argument about human rights, cultural identity and the very nature of our multicultural mosaic. Racism has no place.

The Sikh community has a long tradition of living in harmony with other cultures all over the world. I am sure that men of good will can resolve this issue in a way which is consistent with our Charter of Rights and in a way that also celebrates not only our cultural diversity but also the traditions that unite all Canadians.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, today, the United Nations Day of Solidarity with South African political prisoners, I wish to take this opportunity to remember the thousands of political prisoners who have been imprisoned in South Africa for their struggle against the racist policies of apartheid. Last night, South African president de Klerk announced the immediate release of eight long-term political prisoners, the desired effect obviously being to deflect criticism during the upcoming Commonwealth Conference. This action is to be applauded but it is insufficient.

The release of eight prisoners who have served up to 26 years in jail in South Africa does not represent the end to the policy of apartheid in South Africa. South Africa has just come through a national election where not one black person was able to vote, this in a population whose majority is black.

Four years ago, before the United Nations General Assembly, the Prime Minister committed to increased sanctions against South Africa if apartheid was not dismantled. Apartheid is still alive and well in South Africa and those opposed to apartheid in South Africa urge Canada and other nations to step up the pressure not decrease it. Sanctions are working. Do not stop now.

Today, in particular, we must remember the hundreds of political prisoners who yet remain imprisoned in South Africa and their struggle to overthrow the oppression of the apartheid system. Canada must represent their interests before the Heads of State Commonwealth Conference and exemplify its own commitment to continue to fight apartheid by furthering sanctions now.

PULP AND PAPER INDUSTRY

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to point out to the House the excellent performance of Tembec Inc., a pulp and paper company located in Témiscamingue, in my riding. Tembec was chosen for one of the 1989 Canadian export awards of excellence. For Tembec, Mr. Speaker, that is a well-deserved honour which is due to the dynamism of its president, Frank Dottori, and a staff of remarkable ability.

This Canadian export award of excellence honours Canadian companies that not only increased their exports but also exported new products successfully or reached new markets.

The winners are chosen from among hundreds of candidates by a selection board made up of Canadian personalities, in particular, business people, union leaders, journalists and officials of the Department of External Affairs and of International Trade Canada.

So, Mr. Speaker, I congratulate Tembec, its president and all its employees!

EDUCATION

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has anointed himself the "Education Prime Minister". In a speech to the Conservative party in August, the Prime Minister proclaimed that: "this government will carry its fair share of the burden to ensure that all young Canadians receive a first class education as they confront a world class challenge".

The Prime Minister also said that education will be a high priority at the next First Ministers' Conference, and he would advocate a collective study of Canada's education system.

These are admirable goals, but unfortunately the reality of this government's commitment to higher education is totally inadequate. This week the government will introduce Bill C-33, which will slash federal expenditure on education by $650 million over the next five years. When the effects of the last cuts by this government in 1986 are included the totals are staggering. Over a nine year period, between 1986 to 1994, this government led by an education Prime Minister will cut close to $7 billion from federal transfers devoted to post-secondary education.

Yesterday, to add insult to injury, a senior federal official was quoted as saying that education discussions with the provinces are to be held in private because: "What we are going to say about it, you are not going to want to hear in public".

On behalf of all Canadians who support the improvement of higher education in Canada, I demand that the First Ministers discussion take place in public and that this government immediately withdraw the destructive Bill C-33.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, Manitoba's historic role as a Canadian transportation centre is eroding. Over 3,000 CN and CP employees have lost their jobs in Manitoba over the last eight years. The recent savage cuts in VIA Rail will hasten this erosion. This is appalling since Manitoba has major advantages as a transportation hub. It is located at the geographic centre of the country and has strong representation of both federally owned and private transportation companies.

The federal and Manitoba governments acknowledged the importance of Manitoba's transportation sector in 1984 when they initiated two transportation agreements. But these agreements are expiring with no renewal of commitment. Maintaining Manitoba as a transportation centre is vital not only to the well-being of Manitobans, but also to the provision of efficient transportation to all Canadians. Nothing will fill the void. Thus I urge the government to take action to repair the damage and restore Manitoba's rightful role as a Canadian transportation centre.

CANADIAN WINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Wine Institute, composed of 17 companies, operating 30 wineries and representing 80 per cent of Canadian wine producers, has recently announced its support in principle of the proposed goods and services tax.

The wine industry has been adversely affected under the current federal sales tax which is applied at the manufacturer's level. Subsequent tax cascading results in an inflated price for Canadian wine. Given the current rates of excise tax and provincial mark-up levels, Canadian wines would be more affordable once the GST was in place. As a result, domestic wines would be much more competitive with imports.

In the past, individuals have expressed concerns about the wine industry's ability to compete in the world market. We should continue this concern and give the wine industry the ability to compete in the international marketplace. Replacing the federal sales tax will enhance its capacity to do so by making Canadian wines more affordable for consumers

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, when I listen to the Hon. Member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Mr. David Barrett, who is running for the leadership of the New Democratic Party, I am astounded at the Hon. Member's failure to understand what Quebec is all about and at his lack of political maturity in wanting to capitalize on anti-French sentiment.

I think he would do well to visit the people of Quebec and listen to what they have to say.

If he does, he will be surprised at the vast movement that is forming today in Quebec. Independence is no longer the sole concern of people in the Parti Quebecois.

For several weeks, provincial and federal Liberals have been coming to see us, and they say that if the Anglophones turn us down, this time it will be independence.

Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca is running for the leadership of one of Canada's political parties, but if he doesn't change his approach, he may well become the leader of a political party without a country.

FINANCE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The Government has just called its star witness in the goods and services tax affair, and I am referring to the former Minister of Finance of New Zealand, who is now Minister of Police.

I am sure all Members appreciate Mr. Douglas' good will. However, does our Minister of Finance realize that after the goods and services tax was introduced in New Zealand in October 1986, New Zealand registered a negative growth rate; New Zealand went into a period of economic recession; inflation was over 15 per cent; the cost of food rose 10 per cent in one month; the number of jobs dropped by more than 3 per cent, and finally, New Zealand's exports, which until then had increased by over 9 per cent, dropped by 0.1 per cent?

An Hon. Member: That's true!

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me remind my friend that Mr. Douglas was the finance minister for the Labour party of New Zealand, not for the Conservative party of New Zealand.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): So what?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): He was asked, I think, almost the same question as the Leader of the Opposition has just asked concerning the economic performance that New Zealand has had in recent years. The answer that he gave was quite simple. They have made an awful lot of changes in New Zealand, one of which was the GST.

But there was a very large amount of deregulation—

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Sounds familiar.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —that resulted in a substantial amount of economic disruption in that country which resulted in some slow-down in the economy. But I believe that in recent years we have seen that that economy has performed quite a bit better. The conclusion that Mr. Douglas drew was, certainly, if New Zealand had not done those things the economic performance of the country would have been considerably worse.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): That is exactly what Mr. Douglas said.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, he was a great star witness. Yes, he is a member of the Labour party. He happened to be the Minister of Finance who brought in the GST in New Zealand. He was also a member of a government that brought in free trade with Australia, privatization and all three of these elements resulted in the negative figures I have just recited to the House of Commons.

Speaking of a tax grab, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, who has been left out of this current debate.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Charest: A slow day.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The minister says it is a slow day. Yes, it is a slow day. We are coming to you. I have no doubt that the minister is clean in his response.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Every minor hockey league in this country will have to pay a 9 per cent tax for arena rentals. Every 14 year-old who joins a minor hockey league or a figure-skating club will have to pay a 9 per cent tax. Every child who enrolls in a swimming course will face a 9 per cent tax. And this minister, who represents the young people of this country and the athletes of this country, has done nothing to protect Canadian children from engaging in sports programs.

I think the House should recognize that this government is putting a 9 per cent tax on the future Alex Baumanns, the Carolyn Waldos, the Kurt Brownings, the Gaetan Bouchers and the Mario Lemieux. Since little leaguers do not have the massive lobbies that have appeared before this committee of the House of Commons, why has the minister not been speaking out in favour of sports and young people of this country to protect them from this massive 9 per cent tax?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Charest: Pick on somebody your own size, John!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: After the right hon. gentleman's speech I should probably call for questions and comments. The Minister of Finance.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): We are working out our game plan, Mr. Speaker.

Talking of little leaguers, I am happy to answer the Leader of the Official Opposition in saying that this government has been very attentive to the area of sports to the point where we have created a great deal of activity in the area of fair play, for example, so that we could deal with what we think is the most important issue for young athletes in this country, which is fair play. That is why we have the Fair Play Commission.

As for the sales tax issue, all I can say is that there will be more money for sport and for parents in this country so that young children can enter into sport activity if the finances of this country are in good shape. That is common sense.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has left for an international trip when he gets back I will advise him to put the minister on waivers.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I see the Minister of Communications here and I would like to put a question to him. I am surprised he is not in Hollywood as an advance man for the Prime Minister.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, we ought to note in this House that artists, orchestras, dance troupes, opera companies, playwrights and regional theatres will all be hammered by this 9 per cent tax. According to a study prepared for the Canada Council by Woods, Gordon Consultants reporting to the minister, performing arts organizations will pay up to seven times more federal tax than they currently pay.

Why has the Minister of Communications not done anything to keep Canadian cultural groups from being wiped out by this tax Why is the Minister allowing his colleague to impose a tax on the future Karen Kains, k.d. langs, the Denys Arcands, the Robert Batemans, the Gilles Vigneaults and Anne Murrays of this country? Why has he not stood up for the artistic community in this country to protect our Canadian identity?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, my Department has been examining and analysing this matter for several months. I had a chance to discuss the issue with my provincial colleagues in Winnipeg last week, and I gave them the assurance that the Government, in this area as in all others, would act responsibly. In fact we have proved that in other areas since 1984. The cultural sector has increased its percentage of the Government's discretionary spending from 5.4 to 7 percent, and the Government intends to keep up the good work, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for International Trade. In a speech on October 2, the minister said: "The availability of concessional funding for trade has been instrumental in providing equal footing for our exporters".

Yet today we learn that the government is cancelling the funding for trade. There will be no concessional funding until next April. Can the minister tell us why, at a time when our exports are at a ten-year low when the rate of our dollar is crippling our exports, the government has added another crippling blow in our ability to compete abroad? Will he undertake to explain to his colleague, the Minister of Finance, that exports abroad will create jobs for Canada, will create more wealth and that is the best way to deal with the deficit?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman forgot to mention in his prologue—I suppose that is what you would call it—that the current account reference levels this year have increased 66 per cent over last year, going up in the Estimates from $75 million to $125 million and I think it is likely there will be supplementary estimates which will further increase that. There is a considerable increase in the spending for export credit financing. We have been doing so well that Canadian exports and the need for support is increased even at a faster rate than the amount of money that the House has voted in the Estimates. So the hon. gentleman's complaint is that we are doing too well.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my complaint is that we are running a current account deficit with every single country in the world. Our exports are at a 10-year low, and our trade market is falling out of the bottom. This government is doing nothing about it.

We want to know why it is, at a time when our so-called favoured trade market has just increased a $100 million war chest to go after our markets with the Pacific Rim while it has had $200 million for additional export financing for agriculture, this government is cancelling concessional financing for our own companies. Are we just surrending finally and getting out with a whimper, or is this government going to stand up for Canadian business for a change?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I suppose we will have to decide whether we want to believe the hon. trade critic for the Official Opposition or whether we want to believe impartial experts, for example—

An Hon. Member: Like you?

Mr. Crosbie: I am an impartial expert, but I will refer to others in my modesty, Mr. Speaker.

There was an article in The Financial Post of September 23, 1989: "Signs point to trade upswing; new export chances will boost Canada's surplus". The picture the hon. gentleman painted is an entirely false picture.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Environment, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Earlier today, simultaneously in Chicago and Toronto, there was an alarming report produced by the Institute for Research on Public Policy jointly with the oldest conservation in the United States. According to this report the situation in the Great Lakes has been getting worse. In their words, there is an environmental crisis and the health of humans as well as that of wildlife continues to be threatened.

Yesterday, in anticipation of this announcement, the minister of health recycled an old election promise by saying that the Conservative government would spend $1 per Canadian per year for the next five years to deal with this crisis. Since the Prime Minister in the election campaign said: "No area is higher on our environmental priority list than the Great Lakes themselves", I want to ask the minister why in that time has the government done nothing in the Great Lakes and what makes him believe that $1 per Canadian per year for the next five years is at all adequate?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all the premise of the hon. member's question is wrong. We have had programs in place for a good deal of time dealing with the Great Lakes.

What this commitment yesterday represents is a doubling of the federal commitment to clean up the Great Lakes. It represents an effort being made to cut down on new pollution going to the Great Lakes. It represents an effort to clean up the 17 hot spots around the Great Lakes in Canadian or binational territory. It represents for the first time a major new effort to get fundamental information that we need about the health effects of pollution in the Great Lakes. The hon. gentleman feels that is not important; I think Canadians will disagree with him, and I think that Canadians will feel that this initiative announced yesterday is of fundamental importance to every Canadian.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister's rhetoric is no different from the Prime Minister's. We saw the action that was taken since then and the action is zero. When the government was elected in 1984 there were 17 toxic spots on the Great Lakes. There are 17 today. It hasn't changed one bit. No money was spent on the Great Lakes in the past year to deal with this situation.

My question to the minister is this: Since there are 6 million Canadians drinking the water in the Great Lakes system that according to these reports today leads to birth defects, tumours, and nerve and brain damage on human beings, when is the government going to start delivering the goods? What makes him think that moving from 50 cents per Canadian per year to $1 per Canadian per year is anywhere adequate to deal with the serious problem?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has actually bothered to read the report. I have. I do not know if the hon. gentleman has actually bothered to look at what sort of research has been done to date on health effects, but I can say that my department believes that a new initiative of some $20 million to look at the health effects—

Mr. Broadbent: It's peanuts.

Mr. Beatty: "Peanuts", says the hon. gentleman; just $20 million, he says. Don't bother doing it, he says; it is not important. Well, he is wrong.

It is time that Canadians had this sort of information so that we knew exactly what were the threats to specific populations, so that we knew what measures could be taken to protect them, and so that we could ensure that efforts were being made to clean up these environmental hot spots and that Canadians had conditions in the Great Lakes which enhance human health and which do not threaten human health. We believe this is an important initiative.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I repeat, in the four years leading up to the last election there was nothing done about the 17 spots. This great promise was made in last year's election. There is no greater priority than the Great Lakes and nothing has been done in the year since. The people have given up on the Government of Canada when it comes to the environment.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in the United States, the Environmental Protection Agency published a list of major polluters, and as a result, because of this humiliating disclosure, some of these polluters, have changed their practices. Will the Canadian Government publish a similar list here in Canada?

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, let me first correct the hon. gentleman, if he has any interest in facts. He says that nothing has been done with regard to those environmental hot spots around the Great Lakes. That is simply false.

The hon. gentleman should know full well, if he does not, that the amendment to the 1978 Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement, the 1987 Protocol which was negotiated by Canada and pressed for by Canada, was designed to put the responsibility on both governments on both sides of the lakes to clean up these hot spots and to take further action. That is exactly what we have been doing. We have been putting in place remedial action plans.

One of these hot spots—

Mr. Broadbent: The situation is getting worse, not better.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman screams across his suggestions about what we should be doing. Let me suggest to him that he listen for a minute because he obviously is in need of facts.

In this fund we have set aside there is money for cleaning up those hot spots. There is money to be put in place to prevent pollution of the Great Lakes. There is money to be put in place to ensure that we have information about the environmental threat to human health. Members of the NDP says that doubling the federal effort is inconsequential. I think they are wrong, and I think this initiative is important for Canadians.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and it also deals with the recycled garbage that the government is parading as environmental policy.

I would like to refer the hon. minister to a statement made by the Prime Minister in Hamilton one year ago when he was on the election trail. He stated that of the $125 million being set aside for the Great Lakes action plan $75 million would be spent specifically on cleaning up the 17 hot spots. In the minister's own statement yesterday on page 3 that amount has shrunk to $55 million, a $20 million drop in the amount of money being spent to clean up the Great Lakes.

I would like to ask the minister who authorized the $20 million cut and, if there is a need for a study, why did he not add $20 million as a separate add-on in light of the potential for brain damage and the other incredibly disturbing evidence we have seen in the report tabled today?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to this announcement of $125 million being committed to Great Lakes clean up as recycled garbage. It is $125 million more than the Liberal government was prepared to put into cleaning up the Great Lakes. All that we had was talk from them.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: The hon. member refers to $20 million less in terms of the clean-up program. That is because we created a $20 million health effects fund to allow us for the first time to get—

Ms. Copps: That's right, it's not cleaning up.

Mr. Beatty: Again the hon. member shouts from her seat. Perhaps she could listen. We created a $20 million health effects program which was designed to give us the very sort of information the hon. member alleges she has already and does not need. We also indicated that we are prepared to add to that fund after 1992 if it is necessary to do so in the clean up of those 17 hot spots.

The hon. member may not feel that it is important to have a study of the health effects, to be able to identify what threats there may be to specific populations such as foetuses, infants, our native population, and others who consume large amounts of water fowl and fish. We believe that information is essential. As Minister of National Health and Welfare I believe this important new initiative will be very important for the health of Canadians.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, one of the 17 hot spots is in my riding, and if the minister wants to know—

• (1440)

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Copps: He may laugh about the fact that 9 million Canadians are drinking water that could lead their children to brain damage. Of course I have a concern. I have had a concern and consideration for many more years, and I do not need the minister's lectures.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, what is the position of the Minister of the Environment on this issue? Is the Minister of the Environment attending the International Joint Commission's conference? No, Mr. Speaker, because the Minister of the Environment is doing a tour—

[English]

He is doing a tour of the Rhine wine valley and he is studying pollution in Paris. Where is the Minister of the Environment of Canada when he is confronted with one of the most disturbing studies in the history of the Great Lakes? He is off studying the Rhine pollution problems and pollution in Paris. I would like to know where the minister is.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I trust that I will be given equal time to respond to that speech.

The hon. member says that one of the hot spots is in her constituency. One of the hot spots is in my constituency as well in Collingwood Harbour. My constituents will welcome this announcement and they will feel that the new effort being made to protect the health of people who are living on the Great Lakes and who are affected by it is an important advance in terms of serving the needs of Canadians. The hon. member may not feel that it is important to her constituents. It is certainly important to mine.

The hon. member dismisses contemptuously the fact that the Minister of the Environment is in London, Bonn and Paris for bilateral meetings with European environment ministers, with the French Prime Minister, Mr. Ricard, and with the Secretary General of the OECD.

If the hon. member knew anything about the environment she would know that the environment is an international matter that requires concerted international action. We believe that the efforts of the Minister of the Environment in Europe are essential in terms of encouraging concerted international efforts to protect Canada's environment.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport who announced the VIA cuts last week and who announced the cut in the Canadian.

Across northern Ontario there are two rail lines. The rail line chosen to continue this passage across northern Ontario was a CN line that services a population of about 5,000 people. This decision eliminates passenger rail service on the CP line from Sudbury to Chapleau, White River, Marathon, Nipigon, Thunder Bay, Dryden, Kenora, and on to Winnipeg. The route services a population of over 350,000 people.

This decision is obviously an error: servicing 5,000 people instead of 350,000 people across northern Ontario. If the minister persists in going ahead with the VIA cuts, will he at least agree to use the route that services the most people across northern Ontario?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I know of the concern of my colleague for northern Ontario, but he knows very well that when we have to make a decision in terms of the national service we have to make difficult decisions.

In the case of northern Ontario we have to consider that there are a few communities that do not have any other mode of transportation while in Thunder Bay and in Sudbury, we have good air transportation, roads, and so on. He understands very well that in the decision that we made we considered that it was better at the time to keep the service for what we called the remote communities rather than for Thunder Bay and Sudbury which, once again, have better modes of transportation.

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, it seems that that decision was made more to look after the interests of CN and Mr. Lawless than the interests of the people of northern Ontario.

I can assure the minister that I am familiar with those routes in northern Ontario that he talks about, and this is not a question of servicing nine remote routes. Those areas that are serviced by the CN route can be serviced by other transportation modes at less expense.

I return to the question. Is it more important to service 5,000 people in northern Ontario or the 350,000 people who are being denied passenger rail service throughout northern Ontario? Will the minister make the change in that fundamental error in his business plan?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, indeed I want to make a change, and I think my friend basically understands that. Yes, perhaps it is just 5,000 people, but once again, I repeat what I said, and it has been a scenario we have used for the whole country.

We have people in this country who do not have any other mode of transportation. I understand the problem of Thunder Bay and Sudbury particularly, but in Thunder Bay and Sudbury there is a very good air transportation system.

Once again, people will continue to use the other modes of transportation. In the mean time, we have to serve all Canadians. Very honestly, that is what we tried to do in the decision we made last week.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and it concerns pollution in the Great Lakes system. When the minister responded to my leader a few minutes ago, he said that since this government was elected in 1984 it had acted on pollution.

I want to remind hon. members that once the government was elected in 1984 the Canadian wildlife service was cut by 23 per cent, the toxicology research centre was closed, the wildlife interpretation centre was closed, and the Great Lakes pollution monitoring program was eliminated. There was an exhaustive report on pollution which came out of National Health and Welfare. That report was killed by the Department of the Environment.

I want to ask this minister whether or not this government is prepared to respond to the real concerns of the people who live around the Great Lakes system and take a real commitment to cleaning up that source of danger to health.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, not only are we prepared to do so but we have done so. It is precisely what we did yesterday by announcing a fund of $125 million designed to do precisely that.

In addition to that, since we were elected this government has renegotiated and strengthened the Canada–U.S. Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement. We have maintained substantial research and monitoring programs to identify and assess toxic problems. We have helped develop with Ontario remedial action plans for 17 areas of concern where water quality is impaired. We have had co-operative studies in development of management plans with the U.S. on the Niagara River, Lake Ontario, and the upper lakes connecting channels. We have had annual expenditures in support of the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement of $18 million.

Now we have doubled that federal effort and taken an important new step in terms of protecting the Great Lakes.

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question directed to the same minister. Canadians know that this government's commitment toward cleaning up the environment so far has been zilch.

The minister's government has promised since as far back as I can remember to bring in a safe drinking water act in co-operation with Ontario or provincial governments. Why does he not do that? Why does he not at least respond in a positive way to proposals that have been put forward by municipal governments right across this country to pour some money into cleaning up the serious sewage problems that exist in every major city in Canada? Instead of rejecting that out of hand why does he not do something concrete about it?

Mr. Beatty: Again, Mr. Speaker, $125 million is nothing concrete to the NDP. It is nothing substantial. We believe that $125 million is substantial.

The hon. member asks about the safe drinking water act. If the hon. member had been here for the Speech from the Throne he would know that we are committed to introducing a safe drinking water act.

There are a number of important steps that have been taken already. The doubling of the federal effort in the Great Lakes will help to move us forward to the point where the Great Lakes will represent an asset to human health and where there is adequate protection for Canada's fragile environment.

NUCLEAR POWER

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Mr. Minister, this is about nuclear power in New Brunswick.

In view of the fact that your department and Atomic Energy Canada Limited are considering prospective locations for construction of a prototype Candu III reactor; in view of the fact that the management and operation of the Point Lepreau I plant by New Brunswick Power is rated by experts as second to none in the world for efficiency and safety; in view of the fact that New Brunswick is reported to be seriously reviewing its previous long-term plans for wood and coal-fired thermal generating units, recognizing the serious carbon dioxide emissions posed by fossil fuels, Mr. Minister; and in view of the fact that a potentially sound market for the export of electricity exists into New England, can you please advise this House if you have received a formal expression of interest from the province of New Brunswick to enter into official negotiations for establishment of the Candu III reactor in New Brunswick?

• (1450)

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the opposition is so interested in the subject. I want to tell my colleague that AECL and the Government of Canada have been discussing with New Brunswick Power and with the New Brunswick government the possibility of Lepreau II.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, New Brunswick Power is looking at whether or not to expand its thermal units, the Belledune units, and at both cost effectiveness as well as the CO2 emissions that result from thermal power.

I can tell the hon. member that Lepreau I is one of the best and most efficient operations in the world and, if we can negotiate a Lepreau II in New Brunswick, it would be a Candu III which would be a prototype of the next generation of reactors. As well, we would be interested in seeing what we could do in terms of the industrial benefits that would take place in that province as well.

Mr. Bird: Mr. Minister, I did not hear clearly whether you had received an expression of interest from the province of New Brunswick formally. If you have, would you be willing to enter into official negotiations with that province?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, we obviously are discussing it with New Brunswick and would be interested in formal negotiations. I think it is up to the New Brunswick government to make the ultimate decision as to whether or not to go with the nuclear option or whether to pursue Belledune.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The closure of the Lockeport plant has effectively left that community without employment. This is the reality of the minister's groundfish management plan. Thousands of workers in communities like Lockeport are out of work.

I ask the minister what is he recommending to the special cabinet committee as an alternative livelihood for the plant workers in places like Lockeport, Digby Neck, Argyle, and many other places that are being left destitute by this minister's management plan?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and other colleagues know that the Canadian fishery is managed on the basis of establishing quotas scientifically to ensure the sustainable development of those resources.

There are certain of the Atlantic groundfish stocks, especially those in the Scotia–Fundy region, which have been depressed over recent years, and one reason for that has been the excessive overcapacity in that fleet. This is an important element of the discussions that are occurring before the special committee that is headed by the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs. When we have initiatives to report, they shall be reported in the appropriate way.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): My supplementary question is again directed to the minister. The minister claims that there is no quota left to go around in his management plan. Yet, under the current groundfish management plan the offshore fleet in Nova Scotia still has 43,500 metric tons in Newfoundland and the gulf and 20,000 metric tons in 4VWX and 5, an amount that they cannot catch between now and the end of the year. I do not know what type of mathematics this minister needs to hear about.

Knowing this and knowing of the hardships that exist in all those communities in Nova Scotia such as Lockeport, I ask the minister whether he will ask the transfer committee that met last week, under his discretion, to reconsider the request of the inshore representatives who asked that 13,000 metric tons in the Scotia–Fundy 4VWX and 5 be transferred to the inshore to salvage the livelihoods of the many communities that are going destitute. The minister is over there and that special cabinet committee is not even meeting.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I beg to differ with the hon. member. The committee is indeed meeting and will report in due course. At the same time I should point out that the closure of the Lockeport plant of National Sea is part of a series of decisions that National Sea has to take regrettably because there are not enough stocks available to it in the offshore allocations.

Now the hon. member is asking me to transfer more fish from the offshore to the inshore who consumed their full quotas with the exception of the fixed gear inshore fishery, much of which is still fishing and will continue to do so for some weeks to come yet.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration who seems to spare no efforts to make unemployment insurance benefits available only to the privileged few.

I refer to Bill C–21's punitive measures which are going to deprive many unemployed of the benefits. Her department, not content with the punitive measures of the bill, appears to be preparing regulations to circumvent a federal appeal court decision of last April 14 that the commission was incorrectly and improperly interpreting the regulations regarding vacation pay and severance pay, thus depriving the unemployed of up $100 million per annum in benefits to which they are legally entitled.

Is the minister's department in fact preparing such changes to the regulations to get around this court decision?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, everyone in the House knows the meaning of the word "interpretation". This is a good example of interpretation applied to our daily lives.

Our officials drafted an interpretation of the regulations, published in 1985. The court handed down another interpretation in April 1989. Our officials apply the regulations consecutively, while the court suggests doing so concurrently.

Since the court's decision, our officials have, of course, acted accordingly.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, the regulations are not within the purview of Parliament and its committees.

Since April 14, the Minister's department has acted as though the Appeal Court's decision had no significance for its interpretations. As a result, it was able to save up to $100 million annually, at the expense of the unemployed.

If the court's decision does not satisfy the Minister, is she prepared to table new legislation for consideration by the House, and if she feels the decision is fair and satifactory, is she prepared to give specific instructions to her officials to obey the law and the court's decision?

Mrs. Vézina: Mr. Speaker, here is another example of interpretation.

I just said that since the court's decision, our officials have applied the concurrent method suggested by the court.

As a responsible government, we are now drafting an amendment to the regulations to be able to observe our policy—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Vézina: —which relies on the consecutive method.

NEWSPAPER ADVERTISEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister regarding integrity in government. He would be well aware of yesterday's ruling regarding the use of taxpayers' money to advertise the Conservative party's tax policy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member of course can ask a question, but I think hon. members might agree with me that it is not appropriate to interpret a ruling of the Chair in a preamble. I would hope the hon. member would desist from doing that.

• (1500)

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your intervention. I will simply ask the Deputy Prime Minister if, in recognition of the ruling, he would do the right thing, the honourable thing, the decent thing, and use the PC Canada Fund to pay for the ads as opposed to the taxpayers of Canada.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member is placing an interpretation on the ruling or not. Having regard to the ruling that was rendered by yourself in this House, Sir, we respect your ruling. We will live by it as we always have and always will.

Mr. Speaker, my understanding was that you did not find a prima facie case of privilege—that was my understanding—but that you did render an admonition and established some guidelines. Of course, in future the government will be cognizant of those guidelines.

An Hon. Member: He did not answer the question.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I think for a lot of Canadians living by the ruling would mean paying for those ads from the Conservative Party political fund.

I wanted to give the Deputy Prime Minister an opportunity. I am surprised that having had that opportunity he would not take it and do what, in everyone's mind, is the ethical thing to do, that is to use the PC Canada Fund to pay for ads that obviously should have been paid for on a political basis.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister do what has to be the honourable and the decent thing and make those payments from the political fund of his party?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, if the hon.—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am having very great difficulty finding how that question, aimed at what should or should not be done with the PC Canada Fund, has anything to do with the administration of government. It has to do with a political party and I would apply the same rules to either side of the House.

The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Yesterday, the Canadian Labour Congress reported that since the beginning of this year, more than 60,000 jobs have been lost in this country. Today in Montreal, it was announced that 500 Domtar employees will be laid off next month. My question is: When will the Government be prepared to take these job losses seriously? Yesterday's answer that thousands of jobs have been created is not satisfactory, because the majority of these jobs are temporary and pay the minimum wage. Mr. Speaker, Canadians now want real jobs, not lay-offs!

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, from September 1984 to September 1989, 160,000 jobs were created in the Montreal area. That is pretty good. The unemployment rate in Montreal, which was 11.3 per cent, has dropped 8 per cent. We are proud of that record. During the previous government's term, from 1980 to 1984, 4,000 jobs were lost in Montreal, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

If he wants to know about full-time and part-time jobs, in the last year in Canada there were 189,000 jobs created by the end of September as compared with 164,000 the year before, of which 86 per cent were full-time.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise the hon. member that, although I know he would like to put a second question, by looking at the clock I think that Question Period is over.

CONCURRENCE IN FIFTEENTH REPORT

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, if the House gives its consent I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, that the fifteenth report of the Striking Committee presented to the House earlier this day be concurred in, and I would suggest that we dispense with the reading of the report. It simply affects naming members to standing committees.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the member for Calgary Southwest.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, with your permission would it be possible to return to presenting reports from committees? Unfortunately, I could not hear you back here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the House will agree.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

INDUSTRY, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY, REGIONAL AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate this opportunity.

I have the honour to present the first report of the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, Regional and Northern Development on the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1990, in both official languages.

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, that has been certified correct by the clerk of petitions. This petition is from a number of western Canadians who call upon the government to reconsider the decision to curtail VIA Rail service in much of Canada and to reduce the level of VIA Rail service in other parts of Canada; in a sense, to reconsider its decision on VIA Rail and instead to invest in modernizing VIA Rail so we can join with the rest of the world in expanding passenger rail service as opposed to curtailing it.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and duty to present a petition to this House. The petitioners ask Parliament to reject the new tax proposed by the Conservative Government.

[English]

It is a petition that asks members of the House of Commons to reject the new proposed goods and services tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present in this House a petition signed by constituents in Ottawa—Vanier. It points out that the Conservative Government has inflicted at least 31 new taxes or tax increases on Canadian taxpayers since 1984, that since September 1984, the federal manufacturers' sales tax has been raised from 9 to 13.5 per cent by the Conservative Government, that this same Government wants to impose on Canadians a new universal 9 per cent goods and services tax which they consider bad, that this new tax will be hidden in the selling price, that it will apply to practically everything that Canadians buy and that imposing this new universal goods and services tax will cause serious and unfair difficulties for Canadians with low or moderate incomes.

For these reasons, the petitioners ask Parliament to reject this new goods and services tax.

• (1510)

[English]

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present on behalf of a number of constituents of the Minister of Defence who present their idea that the goods and services tax is a tax that is going to harm them and that the government should reconsider it and eliminate it entirely.

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present hundreds of petitions on behalf of the National Arts Centre orchestra, an excellent world-class orchestra which has brought fame to Canada and its capital city, which petitioners believe that the National Arts Centre orchestra is in imminent danger of being damaged or even destroyed and who would wish for a public hearing into this serious matter. I depose for your consideration these hundreds of petitions.

[Translation]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty to table two petitions. The first contains over 500 names. They are Canadians who object to the tax proposed by the Conservative Government, the goods and services tax. It will be bad for Canadians. It will reduce consumers' spending power by at least 9 per cent. It will have a horrible effect on small merchants and will be dreadfully complicated.

[English]

RCMP DRESS CODE

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have here over 2,000 names of Canadians from across Canada. This petition refers to the RCMP uniform. These petitioners across Canada would like to see the tradition kept regarding the RCMP uniform.

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I have here several hundred names of petitioners from the National Capital Region. All petitioners duly signed pursuant to Standing Order 36, with regard to the concern over the management of the National Arts Centre and its world-class orchestra. These petitioners are very concerned over the longevity of the orchestra. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to seek a public inquiry into the management of both the National Arts Centre and its fine orchestra.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty and honour, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present to the House a petition duly certified by the Clerk of Petitions, and signed by some 70 members of the Dundas Senior Citizens' Club. These seniors are standing up and saying that enough is enough. They call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

I also have a petition from the riding of Hamilton West. In particular, 35 people from Emerald Street North signed the petition. They also call upon this government to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege and duty pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition of some 1,500 names from my constituency of Highlands—Canso. These petitioners deplore the fact that currently in Canada there is no law to protect the unborn.

They humbly submit to Parliament that urgent and decisive action is required on the part of the government to introduce new legislation that will protect the principle of life from the moment of conception. They call upon Parliament to revise the laws of Canada relating to the unborn in order to protect the rights of the unborn.

[Translation]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and privilege to present three petitions from one of the very small businesses in the riding of Saint-Laurent—Cartierville, asking us as parliamentarians to reject this new tax on goods and services because it will be a very costly burden for small business.

[English]

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to stand on behalf of 271 constituents from Ottawa South today who are calling upon this House to reject the government's plans to tax back old age security benefits which were paid for by a surtax from the years 1952 to 1971 and continued to be paid for by these petitioners in the years following that.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and privilege to present a number of petitions which have been gathered in my riding by a number of senior citizens who are very frightened. As a matter of fact, they are terrified of what is going to happen to them under the goods and service tax. They ask that this government withdraw its proposal, go back to the drawing board and come up with something that is fairer.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition duly certified by the clerk. It is signed by 30 Canadians who are concerned by the goods and services tax. Their concern is that it is hidden, complicated and is not shared by the provinces, and that it will hit the low and middle-income Canadians.

These Canadians do humbly pray and call upon Parliament to categorically and unequivocally reject any legislation that is brought forward for the purpose of implementing the said goods and services tax.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of filing a petition under Standing Order 36. The petitioners from the Toronto area are opposed to the goods and services tax proposed by the government in its advertising campaign. They call upon Parliament to reject this vicious and unnecessary piece of legislation, when and if it is introduced, to avoid unfair taxation of the Canadian public.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36. I am proud to present a petition signed by some 35 of my constituents from Kootenay West—Revelstoke, particularly from the cities of Nelson, Rossland, Trail and Castlegar and the municipalities of Fruitvale, Montrose and Winlaw with respect to their opposition to the proposed goods and services tax. They ask Parliament to reform the taxation system so there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations and, further, that we cause the government to cease with the proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition signed by a little over one hundred residents of Canada in Halifax, Toronto and Manitoba. They are calling on this House to join with the Assembly of First Nations, the Innu of Labrador and other aboriginal peoples of northern Canada to oppose the use of their lands for NATO-NORAD training; specifically, the low level flight training and the proposed NATO base in Goose Bay. They call on this House to redirect Canada's NATO-NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and livelihood and promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty and pleasure, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present petitions representing the thousands of signatures coming from my riding. These petitions come particularly from the small towns of Campbellford and Hastings, places where the citizens feel they are already suffering unduly from cut-backs to VIA Rail, proposed changes to UI and the clawback of CPP programs. They feel that this would be an inordinate burden for them and they do not feel that piecemeal changes to the proposed legislation would do. They ask this government to repeal entirely the proposed goods and services tax legislation.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present even more petitions from the towns of Campbellford and Stirling requesting and calling upon this Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, as I advised the House last week, the constituents of my riding are up in arms about the goods and services tax. I am pleased to present today three certificates totalling 90 signatures calling upon the government to totally reject any legislation which would implement the goods and services tax which has been proposed by this callous and unfeeling government.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to stand pursuant to Standing Order 36, and present a petition certified to be correct as to form and content by the clerk of petitions. The petition I am particularly proud to present because I collected each of the names myself aboard a VIA train on August 24, travelling with my family from Saskatoon to Ottawa, return. The petition is signed by individuals from all across Canada as well as tourists from England, the United States, Australia, the United Arab Emirates, Japan, West Germany and France. The petition particularly says that VIA is important for tourists, seniors, young people and aboriginal Canadians, and that VIA must be upgraded and have a budget sufficient to maintain its mandate for passenger service.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition with regard to the goods and services tax. The members of this riding humbly pray that Parliament will reject the goods and services tax as presented.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and my privilege, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition certified correct as to form and content on the GST. It is from many residents of Eglinton—Lawrence, many of whom took the trouble to express their views regarding the goods and services tax, a silent killer of jobs, an unfair tax imposed on all residents of Canada. They urge and plead with Parliament to withdraw completely the goods and services tax.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, just by way of some information for the House, there are three questions outstanding at the moment; one of which was a priority question, two of which are not. They are numbers 62, 84 and 106. I wanted to bring to the attention of the House that No. 62 is presently at translation and should be back right away. Nos. 84 and 106 are expected very shortly. I would ask that all the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-28, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak on the motion for second reading of Bill C-28, which implements the changes to the Income Tax Act announced in the April Budget of the Minister of Finance.

[Translation]

Some fiscal measures have already been presented in this House. Bill C-17 was referred to a committee after receiving concise but thorough consideration during second reading. I trust this Bill will receive the same efficient consideration.

[English]

This is not the first budget bill to be discussed by this House as a result of the April budget. Bill C-17, which amends the Customs Tariff Act, received concise but thorough consideration at all stages in this House, I am happy to note, and Bill C-20 amending the Excise Tax is in committee for study. I trust this bill will receive the same efficient consideration as those bills did.

[Translation]

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the measures in the bill now before us have to be seen clearly in the overall context of the budget's goals. As the Minister of Finance stated in his budget, Canada's large and growing debt is a serious problem that must be brought under control so that we can build for the future, not borrow from it. The measures in Bill C-28 make a major contribution to achieving that goal.

I want to be very precise about what I mean by controlling the debt, and about the measures that will contribute to it. Controlling the debt is not an end in itself. It is a means to an end—an essential precondition to the maintenance of our social and other programs, and to the achievement of sustained economic growth, improved competitiveness and the creation of productive jobs.

[English]

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that every member of this House shares with this government the desire to reach these goals. We all want an environment in which inflation and interest rates can come down. That means we must have firm, measured and consistent fiscal and monetary policies. Reducing the deficit and controlling the debt are an integral part of our policy approach. The April budget responds to the need for fiscal action to control the debt. It contains a balanced package of measures that places the greater burden on those who are better able to bear it.

On the spending side, our government has made expenditure cuts in areas such as defence, foreign aid, business subsidies and other transfers, payments to Crown corporations and government operations. These are effective in the current year and will have a substantial impact on spending for several years into the future.

These expenditure control measures, together with the revenue measures in the budget, will reduce the deficit by over $5 billion this year and $9 billion next year. This year they will almost offset the rise in interest costs and leave a deficit of $30.5 billion. Next year the deficit is projected to drop to $28 billion and in five years time it will be cut in half.

I want to turn now to the revenue measures of the budget and, more specifically, to review the measures specifically and directly related to the Income Tax Act.

[Translation]

With regard to changes made to the personal income tax and the tax itself, Bill C–28 implements an increase in the personal surtax, which will rise from 3 per cent to 5 per cent. As well, an additional high–income surtax of 3 per cent will be applied to federal income tax on income in excess of $15,000. These measures will be phased in over two years, and will be fully applied in taxation year 1990. In 1989 the effect will be that the basic personal surtax will be increased to 4 per cent and the high–income surtax will be effective at a rate of 1.5 per cent.

While acting to bring the public debt under control, the government has examined the tax base to ensure that no Canadian bears a disproportionate level of income tax. This Bill, consequently, includes measures to improve the fairness of the tax base.

Specifically, the Bill introduces taxation of accrued investment income on a annual basis. In this way, taxpayers who invest in contracts which pay interest annually and those who choose to invest in compound instruments will be taxed on a comparable basis.

[English]

Measures are also introduced to ensure that lessors of property must recognize leasing profits on a current basis. This enables the government to ensure that the leasing industry bears its fair share of tax and curtails the use of leasing as an after–tax financing mechanism. While these new measures will limit the tax advantages of leasing property, they will not affect the other desirable attributes of leasing. In particular, these measures will allow those people who lease property to claim capital cost allowance as if they had acquired the property directly.

• (1530)

The personal income tax system plays a major role in managing the over–all spending of the government. It does this by providing a basis for income tested assistance and by providing for taxation at progressive rates of most types of government assistance received by individuals. This role is being expanded by measures in Bill C–28.

These amendments provide for the recovery of various types of federal social assistance from those taxpayers who do not need assistance from the government. By moving to a more progressive system, the government is ensuring the continued existence of these programs for taxpayers who need help. By assuring the continued viability of these social programs, this bill is making an extremely important contribution to the maintenance of our social safety net.

[Translation]

The budget also included significant measures relating to changes made to the corporate tax system. We believe it is important to ensure that all large corporations pay tax and contribute to debt control. Therefore, effective July 1 of this year, a tax on large corporations was introduced. This tax, which will be levied at a rate of 0.175 per cent on capital employed in Canada in excess of $10 million, will ensure that all large companies pay federal taxes and thus contribute to debt reduction.

We expect that some 3,600 corporations which account for approximately three–quarters of total corporate capital employed in Canada, will be subject to the tax. Together with modifications to the existing corporate surtax, this measure is expected to raise $965 million in additional federal revenue in its first full year of application.

[English]

This bill also contains a number of measures dealing with securities lending and dividend rental arrangements. These measures are designed to facilitate the efficient operation of Canada's capital markets while eliminating the revenue loss arising from certain tax motivated dividend rental arrangements.

The new rules ensure that a securities loan will not be regarded as a disposition of the security and will therefore not give rise to gains or losses for tax purposes. They provide that the lender of a share will be entitled to trade compensatory payments received from the borrower of the share as dividends. To offset the cost of these benefits such payments will be non-deductible to the borrowers.

However, where a person borrows shares only to take advantage of the favourable tax treatment afforded any dividends paid on the shares while they are borrowed, the borrower will now be considered to have entered into a dividend rental arrangement. The borrower will therefore be denied the dividend tax credit or inter-corporate dividend deduction, whichever is applicable.

This legislation recognizes the importance of securities lending in the operation of Canada's capital markets. It will provide greater certainty of tax treatment for investors and securities dealers alike. Together, these measures will facilitate legitimate securities lending but will curtail share lending only for tax purposes.

[Translation]

Finally, as a result of ongoing consultations with the securities industry, the deduction for dividend compensation payments for all taxpayers will be disallowed, effective July 1, 1989. In the case of payments made by registered securities dealers, the disallowance will be phased in so that only one third of such payments made before April 1, 1990 will be non-deductible.

Accordingly, the 50 per cent phase-in for the disallowance of dividend compensation payments, announced in the May 26 press release from the Department of Finance, will not be implemented. We will monitor the impact of these new rules to ensure that the Canadian securities industry maintains its international competitiveness.

[English]

The government has not forgotten how important it is to ensure that persons who owe income tax actually pay that tax. To encourage taxpayers to pay their taxes on a timely basis, this bill will increase the rate of interest payable on overdue tax payments by two percentage points. A similar increase will be made to the rate of interest paid by the government on overdue refunds. There are also provisions to ensure that corporate tax payments due to the government are delivered on time.

An underlying principle of our government's economic policies is fairness and compassion for all Canadians. This must be reflected in the tax system. A number of measures in Bill C-28 are intended to assist certain categories of taxpayers who deserve further help.

[Translation]

Accordingly the Bill provides for:

-new deductions in respect of part-time attendant care expenses for the working disabled,

-the deduction of certain legal expenses incurred to obtain a pension benefit or retiring allowance,

-an expanded list of medical expenses qualifying for tax assistance, to include eight new medical devices, and

-other amendments to ensure that certain counselling benefits provided to employees are not taxable.

Bill C-28 also introduces a new drought relief tax deferral in respect of cattle farmers who have had to reduce the size of their breeding herds as a result of drought. These measures all improve the fairness of the tax system, and will assist those Canadians who face difficulties not encountered by most of their fellow citizens.

In conclusion, the measures in this bill have benefited from extensive consultations with taxpayers and their advisors. It is very important that this legislation be passed as quickly as possible, to remove the uncertainty that inevitably exists for the very large number of taxpayers, both individuals and businesses, affected by these amendments.

[English]

As members of the House, we must all realize that the seriousness of Canada's debt problem requires equally serious determination and action on the part of the government to bring it under control. Acting now will enable us to maintain and protect social and other programs for Canadians today as well as in the future.

In addition, acting now will give us the fiscal flexibility in the future to respond to the priorities that Canadians feel strongly about. That is our objective.

The measures in this bill, together with the other measures in the budget, will help us deal with the debt problem in the interest of all Canadians.

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the minister carefully and not once did I hear him mention our old age pensioners who are being brutally attacked in this bill.

This bill is an attack on the rights of our senior citizens. It is an attack on old age pensions. This bill is an attack on the rights of children. This bill is an attack on family allowances. This bill is an attack on the principle of universality of our social programs. This bill is an attack on the social contract that has governed this country for the 20th century. This bill is a betrayal of the promises of the Prime Minister of Canada. This bill is a betrayal of what the Prime Minister once called "a sacred trust".

• (1540)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): This bill makes 59 amendments to the Income Tax Act. No one can deal with all of them in the time allowed within the rules. I cannot deal with all of them. I just want to mention one other briefly, and then I am going to document the treachery and deception of this government in its dealings with Canadian families and with our senior citizens.

[Translation]

First of all I would like to talk about the special income surtax the Government introduced in 1986. Members will recall that the Minister of Finance referred to this surtax as a temporary one when he announced it here in the House. According to the Minister, it would not be in effect for very long. The 1987 Budget clearly indicated that the tax would be eliminated as soon as the new sales tax came into force. The Minister of Finance said at the time that:

> As soon as the new tax became effective, surtaxes on personal and corporate income would be abolished.

That is what he said, Mr. Speaker, and that is what he promised. But what did he actually do? The surtaxes are still with us. In fact, they have increased from 3 per cent to 5 per cent for middle-income Canadians and up to 8 per cent for Canadians on high incomes, and they are no longer temporary but permanent. They are now an integral part of the Canadian tax system. The Minister's technical paper on the goods and services tax does not say the surtaxes will be eliminated. These new surtaxes against individuals, surtaxes that are no longer temporary by permanent, will cost Canadians $1.1 billion more, which is a flagrant contradiction of the Government's stated objectives of its tax reform. According to the Minister, the main purpose of tax reform was to reduce personal income tax.

[English]

So much for this minister's idea of tax reform because it has proven to be nothing but a sham. It is nothing but a disguised tax increase, nothing but a massive tax grab under the umbrella of so-called reform. With this government there has been nothing but increase after increase ever since it was sworn into office. Since 1984 they have increased taxes 31 times.

I want to deal now in more detail with the so-called claw-back provisions on family allowances and old age pensions contained in this bill. I am not surprised that the minister in his presentation before the House ignored it. This claw-back is the culmination of years of deception—years of deception by this Prime Minister and by this Minister of Finance, deception of their true intentions with regard to the universality of our social programs. This government and this Prime Minister has consistently misled Canadians.

Listen to what the Prime Minister himself said in 1984. "Social programs were"—and I repeat those words: "—a sacred trust never to be tampered with".

Shortly after his election he tried to deindex the old age pension. He and the Minister of Finance backed down, but only after an enormous public outcry, an outcry backed by members of Parliament from this side of the House. We forced them back because they had broken their promise, they had broken that sacred trust.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): One would have thought, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister of this country would have learned a lesson. But there he was again in 1988 in another election, this time using his mother as a prop. He was on stage with his own mother saying that he would never do anything to reduce social programs. He repeated to the country the promise of a sacred trust. Indeed, on October 15, 1988, during the election campaign in Summerside, Prince Edward Island—and that is one community he never should dare to visit again—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): —the Prime Minister said to the people of Summerside, and through them to the people of Prince Edward Island and Atlantic Canada, the following: "As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada, social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved, not diminished by our government". What could be more categorical? What could be less ambiguous? What could be a more definitive commitment to the senior citizens of our country than that statement made a few weeks before the election in 1988?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of taking part in two national debates, one in English and one in French. I have here a copy of the transcript of the French debate, including a question put by reporter Daniel Lessard. This is what Mr. Lessard said in front of the camera, in front of a national audience, in French: "Mr. Mulroney, are you ready this evening to promise, before Madame Denis and before all Canadians, not to touch senior citizens' pensions and to maintain, in their entirety, our social programs?"

Mr. Speaker, I may remind you that Madame Denis is the same Madame Solange Denis who came here on Parliament Hill and told Mr. Mulroney, to his face: "Mr. Mulroney, you lied, you betrayed us. At the next election it will be: Goodbye, Charlie Brown, we won't forget that!" And Madame Denis was right!

And here is Mr. Mulroney's answer in French to Mr. Lessard: , "As far as the future is concerned, I find that our system which we have in place is sound and deserves to be respected and maintained".

[English]

Because we are being listened to in both languages and because that commitment was so categorical, Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will excuse my translating that, repeating it in our other official language.

This was a question put to the Prime Minister of Canada in the national debate in French during the last federal election campaign. It was a debate in which the member for Oshawa, Mr. Broadbent, the Prime Minister, Mr. Mulroney, and I engaged the attention of Canadians. It was put by Daniel Lessard, one of the three journalists asking questions of us.

Mr. Lessard asked the Prime Minister this question: "Are you ready this evening to promise before Madame Solange Denis, and before all Canadians, not to touch senior citizens' pensions and to maintain, in their entirety, our social programs?" The Prime Minister responded and I quote: "As far as the future is concerned, I find that the system which we have in place is sound and deserves to be respected and maintained".

That was the Prime Minister's commitment to Canadians during the French language debate. That was the ultimate in deception towards our senior citizens. That was the ultimate in political fraud.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, that 1988 commitment was worth as little as the commitment made by the Prime Minister in 1984. It was just part of the deceptive strategy for getting re-elected. It is no wonder while we sit in this House of Commons—elected by the people of Canada—that public cynicism is at an all-time high. It is no wonder that those of us in public life do not receive from our fellow citizens the credit that sometimes we feel we deserve. People do not know whom to trust anymore. If they cannot trust the Prime Minister, whom can they trust in the public life of our country?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, there has been deception after deception. The Prime Minister's word meant absolutely nothing. The bill before this House proves that without a doubt.

• (1550)

When we on this side of the House warned senior citizens they could not trust this government, this is what the Minister of Finance had to say during that same election campaign. I quote his remarks made in St. John's, Newfoundland as reported by The Evening Telegram on November 2, 1988:

> I say to Ed Broadbent and I say to John Turner, don't go into the old age homes in this country and frighten widows and widowers who are 80, 85 and 90 years old with things that are patently untrue. Try to fight the election on the facts. Playing on the fears and emotions of some of the most defenceless people in our society today is despicable. If you want to pick on Brian Mulroney, if you want to pick on Mike Wilson, that's fine, that's politics. But don't pick on our senior citizens.

Who is picking on our senior citizens now? Who is attacking their pensions? Not me, Mr. Speaker. It is the government opposite. It is doing exactly what we thought it would do. It is doing exactly what we said it would do, and worse.

Before the Empire Club the Minister of Finance, talking about the sales tax and replying to me when I said it would cost Canadians billions of dollars more—and it is—called me a coward and a liar. He said there would not be one additional cent of tax. That is the type of rhetoric, the type of morality we are dealing with.

If you allow me a little peripheral, but germane, comment to the subject of taxation, Mr. Speaker, for five years I have listened to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance attempt to misrepresent my record as Minister of Finance. I can look at that gentleman over there who holds the custodianship now, the fiduciary responsibility, for the finances of the country. I was the last Minister of Finance to present a surplus to this country and to this House of Commons in 1973, two successive surpluses, and in five budgets an annual deficit on average of $710 million—not $30 billion-plus as we have had for the last five years. I have been listening to this for five years.

I would like to take a few minutes to tell the House what I did, under the leadership of Mr. Trudeau, for senior citizens as minister of finance compared with what this government and this minister are doing. The rhetoric of this government and of the Prime Minister is good but rhetoric does not do anything to put money into the pockets and purses of our senior citizens. You will forgive me, Your Honour, if this sounds moderately immodest, but the facts speak for themselves. With Mr. Trudeau's complete backing I indexed the old age security pension to the cost of living to protect our senior citizens completely from inflation.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I told this House of Commons that I did not want to see the men and women of this country who had contributed a lifetime of their earnings, their savings, their productivity and their energy to building this country when they had retired and could no longer protect themselves from inflation, bear the brunt of it. I said that the country will protect you, and will protect you absolutely. That is what we did.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The current Minister of Finance, again with the complete backing of his Prime Minister, is withdrawing that protection from our senior citizens. I increased the old age pension, first by 11 per cent. I increased the tax exemption for senior citizens by 54 per cent.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Again, with Mr. Trudeau's backing, I increased the basic old age pension by another 21 per cent. Once more with the backing of the Prime Minister of the day I cut taxes by 8 per cent and indexed the Canada pension plan.

Yes, it is true that in 1972 and 1974 I made promises to the senior citizens of this country. The difference between me and the current Minister of Finance is I kept my promises and this minister broke his.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Never once as minister of finance, never once during the difficult times of the world-wide oil crisis in 1973–74, did I reduce any of our benefits to our senior citizens, because in the Liberal Party we have always believed that we honour our elders, we honour our senior citizens, we do not attack their basic rights.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, if this Bill is passed, and they have a majority, old age pensions and family allowances will no longer be universal. The Government is not only changing the foundation of these programs, it is creating precedents that will affect other social programs.

The Bill before the House today creates special measures to tax the old age pensions and family allowances of people with incomes of $50,000 or more. The cut-off point of $50,000 is only partly indexed, because there is no compensation for inflation over 3 per cent. The cut-off point will not follow annual inflation, so that in real terms, it will go down. Ten years from now, nearly one million Canadian families will lose all or part of their family allowances and old age pensions.

[English]

The minister and the Prime Minister say that the programs are still universal because everybody still gets a cheque. What they are not admitting is that along with the pension cheque or the family allowance cheque, they are also sending out a tax invoice at the same time to certain Canadians based on income. They are saying it is universal unless you make x amount of dollars per year.

There is one honest member of Parliament on the government side. He may be out of control. He may be a loose cannon. He may be a one-man fog-horn from coast to coast, but I will say this for the hon. member for Mississauga South, he may from time to time bring the good reputation of this House into question, but at least he speaks the truth.

This is a letter that he wrote in response to a constituent of his. I do not know whether any of you ever received a response from the member for Mississauga South, but this one is a collector's item. He does reply to his constituents. The senior citizen is obviously complaining about the claw-back on his old age pension. This appears as reported in The Ottawa Citizen on September 23. The headline is: "MP contradicts PM over 'sacred trust' ". These are the words of the member for Mississauga South:

> With respect to your claw-back matter, I understand your concern.

How about that? That is unusually sensitive for this particular member.

This is what he wrote in response to a letter of complaint written by 61-year old William Daly.

> We have decided to eliminate universality and we do that in a sense by the claw-back in both family allowance and the old age pension.
> As you know, it has been a Conservative philosophy for some time that distributions from the state ought to go essentially to those in need. While the claw-back may be unfair and sneaky, it is there.

That unmasks it all. I do not question the sincerity of the minister who appeared this afternoon. I do not blame him for not mentioning it because why defend the indefensible? Why defend something that would enrage every senior citizen in this country who is now watching the House of Commons?

It is not universal, Mr. Speaker. Let us face it. We are back to the old means test. We now have an income tested program. That is what this debate is all about.

What is more, people will be taxed differently depending on where their income comes from. A senior who receives pension income will pay more tax than another senior whose income comes primarily from investments.

Single-earner families will be discriminated against. If both parents work and they earn $49,000 each for a total family income of $98,000, there is no claw-back in the family allowance or pension. But if it is a one-earner family with an income over $50,000 they lose benefits. That is not only not fair, it is stupid.

• (1600)

I now wish to address social contracts. When the old age pension was introduced, a special tax was created to help pay for it. I want to quote from the 1971 tax guide, and this also appeared in earlier tax guides since the installation of the old age pension. Canadians who paid tax in the early 1950s until 1971 paid a special surtax. The 1971 tax guide states: "All taxpayers whose taxable income is over $500 are subject to the Old Age Security Tax. The tax is 4 per cent of taxable income—maximum $240."

This tax was in effect until 1971. Canadians who paid that tax throughout the 1950s and 1960s until 1971, and that includes almost everybody over the age of 40 including those receiving pensions today, are now to be deprived of the benefits of what they believed that tax was earning them. That is nothing short of straight robbery. They paid the tax for the pension and, unilaterally, without any advance notice they are being deprived of the pension which that tax earned them.

Those senior citizens who contributed 4 per cent of their income on a special tax in the 1950s and 1960s and will now have 100 per cent of their pension clawed back, taxed back, in effect are paying a tax of 104 per cent. They paid thousands of dollars over a 20-year period believing that they were going to be entitled to the full old age pension. Now it has been taken from them. That is expropriation without compensation. The senior citizens of this country will demand compensation at the next general election.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): This is abandonment of the commitments and the social contracts that governments have had with the people in this country. What this government is saying to Canadians is "Don't count on it. Don't count on having a pension when you reach retirement age. Don't count on having a family allowance when you are trying to raise a family because we could rejig these numbers next week, next month, next year, or in three years." Once a government decides to set a discretionary limit on the total amount of the pension, whether it is $50,000 today or $40,000 tomorrow, nobody is safe and nobody can count on it because it is no longer a right of citizenship, it depends on the pure, unadulterated, unilateral discretion of the government of the day.

[Translation]

What about the social contract? What about the government's commitment to maintain its part of the contract? The Prime Minister has forgotten about it. The Minister of Finance has reneged on the contract. The Government simply does not believe in the universality of social programs. Why not admit it? Why not come out and say so? Why not? Because if they admit that universality no longer has its place in our country, the government denies what it has repeated and promised over and over again. It prefers to end universality in a roundabout way. Canadians, however, are not easily fooled.

[English]

Don't take it just from me. The National Council on Welfare had this to say: "The move away from universal benefits is the most significant change in social policy in a generation. Yet it was announced by the Minister of Finance in a budget speech with no prior consultation. In the case of seniors, the federal government had publicly rejected the idea of a clawback or a surtax on old age pensions as late as January, 1985, on the grounds that it would seriously disrupt the retirement income system. The clawback changes the rules of the game without their consent. The elderly have already paid for their old age pensions through a lifetime of paying income taxes."

That was a press release by the council on September 13, 1989. The president of the Senior Citizens Federation says the following in a letter dated June 23, 1989, to the Prime Minister: "We view this proposal as a serious breach of faith by our government and an insidious effort to undercut the social security programs that you have on numerous times stated are a sacred trust."

In a letter dated May 24, 1989 to the Minister of Finance the Coalition of Quebec Seniors says: "The pension clawback is discriminatory on the basis of age, unfair, and contrary to the Charter of Rights. It creates a steeper tax rate for seniors than for others of similar income levels. Seniors who with great difficulty have succeeded over the years in saving for their retirement are being penalized".

What this proposal means, of course, is that a senior with an income of $70,000 per year will be taxed differently than someone younger making the same amount of money. That is not fair and it doesn't make sense.

Why from this corner of the House, both in this House and across the country, certainly since the days of Mackenzie King, and then on to Mr. St. Laurent, Mr. Pearson, Mr. Trudeau, have we always believed in universality? Why has universality been the guiding principle in the social programs accepted in this country? We have tried to explain this principle to the government. This government has never been able to grasp it. I will try again.

If there is one characteristic that is Canadian, if there is one quality by which we like to define ourselves, it is the quality of fairness, equal opportunity and equal treatment. We believe that no matter where you come from, where you live, what you earn, who your family is that you have an equal right to the social programs of this country, that all individuals are entitled to the social programs as a right of citizenship. It is part of the social contract in return for a lifetime of contribution to our community.

We believe that all Canadians deserve that equal and equitable treatment no matter what their social status. Universality means that everyone is treated the same. We do not mean that you don't tax the rich more than the poor. We believe in a progressive income tax where those who have the ability to pay, pay. That is the fault with this goods and services tax. It is regressive.

We have always believed that if you limit programs and direct them to the poor, if you design them for the poor, if you design them for those at the lower income scales, then those programs inevitably become poor programs. Universality means that the rich man and the poor man wait in the same doctor's office for the same service and are covered in the same way. They mean that regardless of income, regardless of connections, there is equal treatment.

Universality has been a unifying force in our country. It makes our social programs credible because there is no ghettoizing of the haves and the have-nots, such as the poor get something and the rich don't. Everybody does, subject to an over-all taxation system, but the programs are credible because when they come to all of us then we are all behind them. They are community programs, and that is why Canada has been the most successful country in the world.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The danger is that once you start tinkering with that principle, once you start undermining the principle of universality, you put everything in question. Who decides who gets what benefits? Where do you draw the line? Who decides which of our citizens need more help than the next one? Once the principle is abandoned and discretion is reintroduced into our social programs, what is next? Medicare? Hospitalization? Free public education? Oh, some members may raise their eyebrows, but this is the first government in Canadian history that has ever put a tax on learning, a tax on books. This government is destabilizing and endangering the social contract which is based on trust, legitimate expectation, reliance on the word of our public officers.

I hesitate to say, "I told you so". It is the worst thing you can say to a member of your family, the worst thing you can say to a neighbour. You never get any credit for it. But I made a prediction in this House of Commons in December, 1984, when I spoke out against the government's proposal to de-index the Old Age Pension. I said then that this debate would not end until there was "a clear, unmistakable, credible, believable and unassailable commitment that the government will not tamper with the universality of the social programs of this country which are counted on by millions of Canadians. They are part of the social contract, part of the glue, the adhesion, and the unity that have made this country a very decent place to live". That is what I said then, and I regret that that prediction has come true.

I want to say to you, Sir, my colleagues will be entering this debate. This is not going to be the end of it. It is only, perhaps to use the Churchillian phrase, "the end of the beginning". Now we know. Now we have the legislation. It is before the House. Now we know that all those commitments made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, those commitments to protect and defend and enhance our social programs, promises are not worth a damn. Now we know that this government has no commitment that cannot be broken, no matter how solemn the occasion, no matter how frequently it is made. That is the measure of this Prime Minister and this Minister of Finance, and that is the measure of this debate.

I could not be more serious when I say now we are dealing with part of the basic moral fibre and structure of this country. Can our politicians and public figures be trusted? If commitments of the Prime Minister made on several occasions on national television and across the country, not only in two federal elections, but whenever he was accosted by members of the public are no longer sacred—and now we know they are not—then on this side of the House on behalf of Canadians on this and other issues we are in a battle and we will press it right to the limit.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the government would like to advise the House that tomorrow will be designated as an opposition day.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my hon. colleague, the Leader of the Opposition, for his excellent speech.

I am honoured to lead off my party's debate on Bill C-28. I was going to say that it was a beautiful autumn day, resplendent in beautiful colours, with mother nature at work, a kaleidoscope and all of those beautiful terms, but really it is a black Wednesday in October across Canada. It is probably very appropriately a grim, sombre day because the discussion of Bill C-28 is an historic piece of legislation that spells the end of universality for social programs in Canada. A sacred trust of the Canadian people.

This government has created a new vernacular of political jargon in this country. Words such as reprofile, deregulate, privatize, rationalize, patronize, Americanize and finally benefit reduction tax, better known as the clawback. The name speaks for itself. This is on the heels of VIA cuts with the statement of the Prime Minister, "We must cut VIA in order to save it", and "We must decrease social benefits in order to maintain them". What sort of bizarre, fallacious reasoning in this? It is obviously Tory reasoning. It would earn a failure in logic in first-year university in philosophy and in the real world it is pure debauchery. This, indeed, is historic legislation, but history will not treat either legislation or the government kindly for its actions.

Speaking of history, I would like to cite some references dated, but nevertheless prophetic. William H. Seward, a Republican—no surprise—in January 1861 stated:

> So I look upon Prince Rupert's Land and Canada, and saw how an ingenious people and a capable, enlightened government, are occupied with bridging rivers and making railroads and telegraphs to develop, organize and create and preserve the great British Provinces of the north; by the Great Lakes, the St. Lawrence and around the shores of Hudson's Bay, and I am able to say, "It is very well; you are building excellent states to be hereafter admitted to the American Union.

This government wants us to be like the United States. This legislation strikes out at the supposed richer, older citizens of our country. You know the now famous quote, Mr. Speaker: "As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada, social benefits will be improved, not diminished by this government which is committed to social justice and fairness for all Canadians". He forgot to add, "fairness for all, except for children and senior citizens".

This was said in October 1988. What a dramatic turnabout, but a turnabout that we have grown all too used to.

Remember the free trade debate? Free trade will not affect our social programs. It will, in fact, enhance them. Some of the candidates brought out their mothers and fathers and said: "I would never deceive you. I would never lie to you. Please believe me, because my mother knows that I am telling the truth". Well, today every grandmother and grandfather in this country is getting a swift kick.

I do not accept the remarks of the finance committee chairman that older people don't wear out their clothes, or they don't buy furniture. The intimation is that older people are sedentary. They are not. This clawback is causing older citizens to rise up again and glut their ire as they did in 1984.

The problem with this legislation is that it is sneaky, pernicious, discriminatory, an attack on seniors, but is also a lever into attacking all of the social services that will affect 128,000 pensioners in 1990, but one million in 20 years from now. Let us remember that we are an aging population. The claws of clawback will eventually hit everybody if, God forbid, this government remains in power.

We are not only talking to 65 year olds, but we are talking to 25 year olds making $25,000 now, with salary increased only by inflation. They will have part of their Old Age Security clawed back at retirement. So we are are not just talking about 65 year olds, we are talking about 25 year olds, 35 year olds, and 45 year olds.

What do seniors think? Not that the government cares. An editorial from The Legion magazine of July and August, 1989, put it very succinctly: "Indeed, even if the $50,000 income threshold will drop in real terms because it will not be indexed to a level of inflation, but only to inflation minus 3 per cent, with a reduction of the real income at which the tax kicks in, more seniors will have to pay more money. Not coincidentally the numbers of seniors will be increasing as Canada's population ages collectively. In more than just a decade, a large number of seniors will be caught in the net and it won't be just the big fish. In essence, the government is sneaking up on us. What we have here, in addition to the government's betrayal of public trust, is a case of age discrimination".

Up to this point I have spoken in generalities. Many people will say: "Well, it doesn't apply to me". I want to cite a specific case of a constituent of mine who came into the office and talked about this clawback. She was fighting mad, upset, hurt, and indignant. Her story, we cannot generalize that just because someone makes $50,000 a year that means one is well to do and can easily afford to give back some of one's Old Age Security. This lady is a single woman. She worked for 35 to 40 years in a well-paid responsible position. She was a very budget conscious person for all of her working life. At retirement she had placed $250,000 into the provincial and federal tax coffers. The 1971 tax guideline, clause 37, Section 3, Old Age Security Act states: "All taxpayers whose taxable income is over $500 are subject to the old age security tax. The tax is 4 per cent of taxable income."

• (1620)

This lady lives in a non-profit housing unit. Her rent has gone from $426 to $469 to $510 per month in the last 15 months. The 4 per cent rent guideline does not apply to non-profit housing. Because of this woman's good fortune she has set up a $10,000 scholarship for a needy student. Excellent. Now she finds out that the company she worked for for 35 or 40 years has been bought out by another larger company and her pension is on hold. She has worked all of this out for 35 to 40 years and the whole budget is now shot. In tears she states that there is a lifelong budget shot to hell.

There are many stories out there similar to this. Different circumstances but, nevertheless, there can be a tragic end. Universality is not a right of citizenship any more. You will be asked: "Do you deserve it? Do you need it? Do you qualify for it? Prove it". If only big business had the same kind of morals.

Going back to free trade. The end of universality is a government desire. We want to be like the United States. I cite the problems since January 1 of harassment by Americans regarding pork, lumber, fish, and steel. Subsidies were supposed to be negotiated over the next seven years. Yet when a punitive duty was brought against Sysco and Algoma Steel the Minister for International Trade said: "Oh, well, everyone knows that Sysco is highly subsidized". So, they are now a write-off.

I wrote letters to the Prime Minister and the Minister for International Trade with regard to this punitive duty against the steel mill in my city. I got no response nor any reaction whatsoever. The free trade agreement binds us, it permeates all of our discussions, and makes us more and more like the United States.

A reputable politician, Mr. Gotlieb, the ex-Canadian ambassador to the United States states: "Lobbying in the United States is now vital. The free trade agreement offered us no protection whatsoever. We have to get in there and lobby for our rights". We should take his advice. It is important.

Social programs are no longer a sacred cow. The cow will soon be dead and the bleeding has begun. The end of universality has begun and it is acknowledged by the government's finance committee chairman. I will cite the same letter. We have a copy of the letter if one would deny the report of the Ottawa Citizen. I think it bears repeating. As you know, it has been a conservative philosophy for some time that distributions from the state ought to go essentially to those in need. While the clawback may be unfair and sneaky it is there. That says it all. That really does say it all.

The National Council on Welfare report is financed by the government and has various points with regard to the illegitimacy of the clawback. I would like to highlight number seven. "The clawback could erode support for social programs. Eventually it will weaken popular support for social programs in general including those which help the poor. Giving benefits with one hand and taking them all back with the other is a hypocritical policy that could engender middle-income voters' resentment at paying taxes for social programs to which they are not really entitled". In layman's terms people will say: "Well, I don't want to pay into it because I am not going to receive anything from it".

Time will not permit me to elaborate on the family allowance clawback but it is, suffice it to say, that the same scenario will evolve and within ten years 30 per cent of all families will be negatively affected.

This legislation hits everybody. It hits the seniors, it hits young people, but of course it hits the middle-income group that has to support these young people. As far as transfer payments are concerned, they are being cut in this omnibus tax bill. Under Established Programs Financing the federal government provides support to the provinces in the form of cash and tax transfers for health care and post-secondary education. In the Budget the government announced it would cut the growth in its EPF transfers by one percentage point beginning in 1990-91.

I should like to turn to one of my favourite books and I have read it perhaps a hundred times because I cannot believe what I read. It is called Where I Stand, by our Prime Minister. This was written when he was at his zenith of popularity. He is talking about research and development and he says:

> The starting line for me is the technological dimension. Either we go into the game and become important players in this major league or we become a nation that will, during its entire lifetime, play in the Junior B circuit. To play with the majors, we must make a firm commitment to double the public and private funds allocated to research and development—Research and development, and the resulting innovations are the lifeblood of a successful economy and country.

And he goes on:

> As a percentage of its population, Canada employs in research and development one-third as many people as do the Swedes, the Germans, and the Japanese and one-half as many as the Dutch, the French, and the Americans. Of all the industrialized countries of the Western world, Ireland and Iceland are the only countries that invest less than we do in this vital field.

We must double our research and development. And part of that doubling has to come through transfer payments. Now that is the myth, this is the reality.

John Ferguson of Southam News writes:

> Meanwhile, indications are that total spending on research and development in which we already lag far behind our major trading partners appears to have declined again last year as a proportion of the economy.
> Mulroney promised in the 1984 election that Canada would double spending on R and D under a Tory government. It was then 1.37 per cent of gross domestic product. It slid to 1.31 per cent in 1987 and when the 1988 figures come out they will likely show the figure below 1.30 per cent.

In the same article Mr. Ferguson writes:

> Another sign of waning interest: the 34-member National Advisory Committee on Science and Technology, chaired by Mulroney and touted as a signal of his commitment, has not met since last summer.

How can we do better when we cut, cut, cut? All of these measures will condemn us to be hewers of wood and drawers of water in perpetuity. Transfer payments affect our post-secondary education and hospital care. This could create two tiers of medical care, one for the have-provinces and one for the have-not provinces. The Canadian Medical Association says: "We are headed toward a two-tier health care system with one quality of health care in the rich provinces and second or third-rate services in the poor provinces".

Today I received a fax from Sault Ste. Marie in Ontario, which is one of the have-provinces and perhaps no one would deny that we in Ontario are indeed fortunate. But, the health care system in Ontario is in disarray, operated by a Liberal government, handling what meagre funds the Tory government passes on to it. This report is extremely upsetting, to say the least. A local individual perhaps lost his life because one of the best hospitals in Ontario could not care for him. It did not have the staff available. This is an indication that when the have-provinces are having problems, you can see what reduction in transfer payments could result in.

As far as the system is concerned, the system will work for those who are in the system who can play the system, but most average Canadians have no idea what the system is or how they can participate. The indication that average Canadians have been consulted on this tax bill, are, of course, erroneous.

• (1630)

James Carter said in 1895: "In every community those who feel the burdens of taxation are naturally prone to relieve themselves from it if they can. One class struggles to throw the burden off its shoulders. If they succeed, of course, it must fall upon others. They also in turn labour to get rid of it. Finally, the load falls upon those who will not or cannot make a successful effort for relief. This is in general a one-sided struggle in which the rich only engage and which the poor always go to the wall".

This legislation is a natural fallout from the budget. Let there be no doubt that this was a big business budget. When they brought forth all of their wishes from the wish book they got just about what they wanted.

Their wish list contained the following: the government must set targets for reducing the deficit and sustain the effort over a number of years of unshakeable commitment; the deficit must be slated to fall by close to $7 billion per year; expenditure reduction should make up the bulk of cuts in the deficit. The following recommendation is particularly noteworthy: since social programs make up 60 per cent of government program spending, social programs should be the major target.

It is coming true. They say that any social program spending should be targeted only to those in need. This means the end to any concept of universality, including universal pensions. Tax increases will have to form some part of the deficit reduction strategy. Such tax hikes should be temporary when possible and applied to deficit reduction. The manufacturers' sales tax should be replaced with a national sales tax, and the federal government should introduce this unilaterally if it cannot secure provincial support. Small business groups caution that sales tax reform should be done very carefully if they are to support it. Ideally the tax should have no exemptions or exceptions and regressivity should be offset for the poor by a refundable tax credit.

Everything they wanted they got. Business should not be exempt from the program cuts to carry its share of the burden. Expenditure cuts to business should look at limiting industrial grants and subsidies for regional development. These were recommendations by the big business lobby.

I say that this big business lobby has become very sophisticated in its public relations. They say: "We have to tread softly not to upset the average Canadians. Let us put this kind of rhetoric in here and we will deceive them." Indeed I think people were deceived at first, but now they are starting to catch on and people are upset. They are extremely upset with the whole budgeting process and the tax grab by this government.

Since taxation is complicated and there are many different taxes involved, the ordinary citizen might be forgiven for being a bit confused. But if a large majority of Canadians have felt in the past that the rich were not paying enough tax, once the smoke and mirrors of the current reform are removed these same Canadians may be surprised to find that the rich are paying even less tax.

The finance minister's tax reform or tax deform, depending on how you take it, is indeed mostly smoke and mirrors. There is a lot of talk about making the rich pay more and helping those at the bottom end of the economy. In reality the reforms do almost nothing to achieve those ends. Some well-to-do investors in the corporations will pay more but most high rollers will pay less.

There was very little outcry. The Financial Post and The Financial Times, and The Globe's report on business, lost interest very, very quickly in the tax reform, indicating that it was a pleasant budget for big business.

The finance minister's reform has not really caused the government to veer from its agenda at all, except perhaps to throw out a quick tax reduction a few years ago. From the beginning the government has been moving toward a much heavier emphasis on the sales tax, the most regressive kind of tax. Since it came to power in 1984 it has increased corporate taxes by only 4.2 per cent while it increased income tax by 48.2 per cent.

I believe our party will soon be talking about implementing a wealth tax because the top 10 per cent in this country own more than half the country's wealth.

We are in step with the United States. Everything that we once stood for, revered, enjoyed, accepted and expected is being cut from under us. This is a very sorry day. These are sorry times. Until Canadians rise as one and shout: "we are as mad as hell, we are not going to put up with it any more"—and I think it is getting closer and closer—the government will move forward with its agenda, an agenda which is destroying us and making us a market driven, profit motivated society where only the fittest survive. What about the rest—and the rest—and the rest.

We beseech the government to rescind its clawback for the benefit of all Canadians. The Prime Minister said not too long ago: "We are in the process of building two Canadas—one which is rich and promising and one which is underdeveloped and underemployed", which is unacceptable. We agree whole-heartedly with the Prime Minister that this is totally unacceptable.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to a major piece of legislation, Bill C-28, and especially to answer the former Minister of Finance of this country who, as you know Mr. Speaker, took us from being hard-pressed to depressed, and I am referring to the Hon. Member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Turner), the Leader of the Opposition.

An Hon. Member: Right on!

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, strangely enough, not so long ago the Leader of the Opposition got rid of his financial critic because he said the Conservative government's policies were good. So he was kicked out. And I can predict, Mr. Speaker, that the regional president of the federal Liberal Party— The truth is never palatable, Mr. Speaker, but we all need to hear the truth from time to time.

Ms. Copps: That is not the truth!

Mr. Vincent: Now what did I say, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. St-Julien: It didn't take us 20 years to see the light.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I had the courtesy to listen to my colleagues and I think they should do the same for me. They would learn something.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, I can predict that the regional president of the federal Liberal party in our area will soon be on the outs, because only last week, he said he agreed with the economic policies of the Conservative Party in the riding of Trois-Rivières. Just watch, Mr. Speaker: their regional president will soon be fired, just like their financial critic.

An Hon. Member: Talk about the bill, not the Liberal Party!

Mr. Vincent: Be patient! We'll get there. Nothing to get excited about. We have the whole afternoon!

When I hear the former Minister of Finance, who at the time managed to increase the deficit very substantially, when I hear him talk about the elderly and the last budget, it reminds me of the economic statement of 1984, the budget of 1985, the budget of 1986, the budget of 1987 and the budget of 1988. That makes five, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition must have taken the speeches he made on those occasions and used them to write the one he gave today. If he had given us a replay of his speeches on past Budgets, it would have been the same speech, absolutely identical. The economy will be in bad shape. The elderly will be in bad shape, family allowances, and so forth— And this while our records show that 1.5 million jobs were created during the past four years in this country, permanent jobs, which means ten times as many as the previous Liberal government created over the same period, and that Government created part-time jobs, Mr. Speaker. And people remember that! Talk to the people in Trois-Rivières and they will tell you all about it.

• (1640)

Mr. Speaker, just I am sure you do on the weekend, I make the rounds among the various senior citizens' clubs: Sainte-Marguerite, Saint-Jean-de-Bréboeuf, Saint-Philippe and Radisson. During the budget period, they asked me: What's all this about old age security pensions and returning part of our cheque and so forth! I said: Listen, if you have a gross annual income of $77,000, not $42,000, not $24,000 and not $52,000 but $77,000, you will have to return part of your old age security pension. And you know what, Mr. Speaker? The people in the riding of Trois-Rivières said: It's not a bad idea. The senior citizens in the riding of Trois-Rivières said: It makes good sense.

If I have an annual income of $77,000, I can give back part of my old age security cheque as tax to the federal government and I will still be able to live very well. That is what is in the Conservative government's 1989 budget. And I think that at some point, we must call a spade a spade. For 20 years, there was shameless waste by the former Liberal government, Mr. Speaker, so that when we took power in 1984, the accumulated debt was $200 billion and the annual deficit was $39 billion. It is funny how the Opposition does not talk when we speak the truth! It is funny how they become very quiet.

We must be realistic, Mr. Speaker. What has this government done for four years? It is true that we raised taxes, yes! I do not think there is a member on this side of the House who will not admit that. We will also admit something, Mr. Speaker: since tax reform in 1988, each Canadian taxpayer has between $1,600 and $1,800 more a year in his pocket. That too must be said! Because with the 1988 reform, taxes went down. Because with the reform in 1986 for the refundable federal sales tax credit, that tax, which as we know is not wonderful, is less regressive. With the GST, the credit will be raised and the tax will be even less regressive. The tax will penalize people on low or moderate incomes even less and it will apply to those who can afford it. That is good, sound administration.

Look at the Leader of the Opposition. The Leader of the Opposition was asked if he was against the cuts to VIA Rail. Yes! Is he against free trade? Yes! Is he against the budget, all budgets? Is he against the GST? Yes! He is against all that. No problem! He is against it all. And I could go on. But we also say to him: Mr. Leader of the Opposition, if you are against it, fine! But what are your solutions?

Mr. St–Julien: He has none!

Mr. Vincent: "Well, no, I have no solutions, I am the opposition, I oppose. I have nothing to say, I am the opposition, I oppose." That is the policy of the Liberal Party: "to oppose!" Mr. Speaker, we do not create and continue to build a country with such a philosophy, "I oppose! I have nothing to say, I oppose!" That is the Opposition Leader's job. Since September 4, 1984, no Liberal or NDP Member has had the decency to come to this House and say, "I am against such and such a policy of the Conservative Government; here is what I propose. I am against a certain bill; I think it should be done this way." Not once has there been any suggestion on any subject. With such a style of opposition, we do not see how one of those two parties can govern this country the way it should be governed in the 1990s, as we approach the year 2000.

Because do not forget, Mr. Speaker, ten years from now we will be entering the year 2000, and to meet the expectations of Canadians for the year 2000 we need economic, cultural and social policies that are adequate.

Mr. Speaker, they suggest the Budget is no good. But like the four others that came before it, that Budget is Canada's economic policy. The Opposition never refers to the cost of the national debt for 1988–89—24.8 per cent of budget expenditures, nearly 25 per cent. This means that 25 per cent of all Canadian cheques issued by the Canadian Government are to pay the interests on the debts made by the previous Government opposite.

Mr. Speaker, to put that in terms of revenues, in other words if I take that 25 per cent and compare it against Canadian Government revenues for 1988–89, we come to 31.7 per cent!

An Hon. Member: That is 32 per cent.

Mr. Vincent: —32 per cent, as stated by the Hon. Member for Abitibi (Mr. St–Julien). Indeed, 32 per cent of our fiscal revenues go to the payment, not of the principal, but the mere interests on our debts.

As we can easily understand, it is impossible to keep governing the country the way Opposition Parties would like to.

Mr. Speaker, last week I attended a yearly alumni meeting of Lafleche college, in Trois–Rivières. It was the college's twentieth anniversary and I met a number of former students who are social workers, accountant or what have you, across Quebec. Do you know what those upwardly mobile young people said? They said: We believe in Canada, we believe that in order to have a strong country tomorrow, we need your economic policies now.

We believe that if VIA Rail cannot cover its costs, if it costs Canadians, if it costs us young people in this country $650 million a year, yes you must cut services!

An Hon. Member: Impossible!

Mr. Vincent: Yes, you must maintain it across the country, as you are now doing, but yes, you must cut services.

An Hon. Member: Unbelievable!

Mr. Vincent: This, Mr. Speaker, is exactly what young Canadians are thinking!

An Hon. Member: Untrue!

Mr. Vincent: The truth once more upsets people, Mr. Speaker, but we must live with it.

Mr. Speaker, they will have an opportunity after I conclude my speech to put questions if that is their wish. But if they will listen now, I will not be too long.

Mr. Speaker, last Saturday I attended a gathering of volunteers in Pointe–du–Lac, a yearly meeting of all those who give their time and energies to those activities. Those people receive no pay but they take their area, their community to heart. But what are these people saying? They are saying the same thing: Indeed, the government in office has to administer and slash where it is needed, just so higher-income families will pay their fair share of taxes, much in the way lower-income families will also pay their fair share, but keeping in mind the fact that they do earn less.

Mr. Speaker, that is the rationale behind the GST. We know that the GST credit will be much higher than what it will be in 1990, but that year every adult will get $140 and every child $70, and the threshold will rise from $16,000 to $18,000 a year. That, Mr. Speaker, is sound administration.

I heard the NDP member refer to corporations and wealthy people who do not pay their share of taxes. As you would know, Mr. Speaker, since 1986 all Canadians pay at least a minimum tax, which means that there is no longer a single Canadian who does not pay his or her fair share of annual taxes.

• (1650)

You also know that as a result of the latest Budget the government will raise close to $1 billion more through the corporate surtax. Mr. Speaker, all corporations will pay their fair share of taxes. I would suggest this is sound management and, looking at it from an economic standpoint, that is what this country needs for the future.

Mr. Speaker, I listened to the former Minister of Finance refer to his performance. Here is his performance, Mr. Speaker: while he was Minister of Finance, average expenses increased by 20 per cent a year, the deficit went up, the net debt went up, everything went up when the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Turner) was Minister of Finance. This is the same man who today, as he has been doing over the past five years, is trying to teach ethics to this government which in four years did manage to reduce the annual deficit by $10 billion—a 25 per cent deficit reduction every year for four years. It stood at $39 billion when we took over, it is now down to $29 billion. Indeed, 39 minus 10 is 29, and 10 out of 39 works out to 25 per cent.

I see the opposition member smiling. The figures are there and, as my father would say, figures speak for themselves. Mr. Speaker, that is what the Budget is all about.

In 1991, again because we have to keep low income families in mind, as a result of the new federal sales tax the annual refundable tax credit will amount to $275 per adult and $100 per child. Mr. Speaker, this tax will change absolutely nothing for families whose income is under $30,000. Nine million Canadians will receive a refundable tax credit. Nine million Canadians!

So when I see that the Opposition criticize a budget which shows economic leadership and is consistent with the efforts we have made over the past five years to reduce the deficit, to make sure that low income families are protected, to ensure that Canadian corporations can operate without tons of regulations and legislation as was the case under the previous government, to privatize Crown corporations which compete with private enterprise or which are not profit making concerns for the government— That is what we have done over the past four years and will continue to do, Mr. Speaker!

Bringing down the annual deficit is not wishful thinking but a necessity for this country. We just cannot imagine reaching Year 2000 with Canada being the country most in debt in the world. I think we must be realistic.

I want Members of the Opposition to start making serious proposals and stop arguing that they are against the budget, against the GST, against this or that. Members opposite are always behaving as though they were fighting for the survival of the country, involved in the very last struggle to help Canada make it—Mr. Speaker, we have been hearing the same tune for the past five years, and also for the past five years the Canadian economy has been doing fine, we have been creating jobs, the unemployment rate is down and Canadian men and women are living in a stable economic climate and enjoy pleasant federal-provincial relations. That is important too. Since 1984, major investments have been made throughout Canada, whether in the Atlantic provinces, Quebec, the prairies or British Columbia, and they have helped the economy. The unemployment rate will therefore go down. Mr. Speaker, these are realities.

In conclusion, I suggest that Bill C-28 must be adopted as soon as possible to be implemented and ensure that the economic well being which we have experienced since 1984 will continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Abitibi on a question or comment.

Mr. St–Julien: A comment, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased to address the hon. member for Trois–Rivières. You will recall that, in 1984, the Liberal Government then in power created a tax credit to promote research, thus causing the worst tax fraud in Canadian history, what could be called today the rip–off of the century. And today's Liberals, even the new ones, do not even remember it. They have not heard about it in their caucus. I would like to quote an article published in La Presse—

Mr. Boudria: Do you still have your Liberal party membership card?

Mr. St–Julien: That article dated September 30, 1987 reads as follows: "Taking into account the economic situation, the previous Liberal Government, for no valid reason, made taxpayers billions of dollars poorer." That was confirmed by Auditor General Dye. I want to get to Canada's current financial situation. In early 1984, Marc Lalonde the then Minister of Finance knew that the Scientific Research Tax Credit Program would cause problems. He was warned again a few months later but his Department did not do anything because the Government was about to go on the campaign trail.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell my hon. friend, the Member for Trois–Rivières, that had the Liberal Government intervened right away in 1984, it could have saved a lot of money. And what did we do when we came into office? We cut those research tax credits. Finance Minister Marc Lalonde, who had predicted that the Program would cost $200 million, ended up with a $3.5 billion Program and a fraud of up to $1.9 billion. Nobody knows where that $1.9 billion went. My question for the Hon. Member for Trois–Rivières is this: What could have been done in today's political context with $1.9 billion in his riding, in Abitibi, in Quebec and in Canada?

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to hear what I would call an astute question, and the hon. member for Abitibi.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, if they want to ask questions, they're welcome to do so, but when I have the floor, I would like to be heard!

The hon. member for Abitibi is absolutely right. The former government implemented a program, and I have nothing against that except that it provides for tax credits, abatements, and so on. We know that when a back–door program, is established through the use of the Income Tax Act instead of direct subsidies, it is impossible to predict its cost. They told us it would cost some $200 million, and that it would be promote scientific research, when in fact, Mr. Speaker, it did cost, as my colleague mentionned, almost $4 billion. But what's the problem, you ask. The then minister of Finance knew very well, right from the begining, that it would cost us plenty. But he stood behind his decision, and our country lost the opportunity to spend not millions, but billions of dollars, on social programs such as assistance programs for our handicapped or our ethnic groups, or on cultural and economic programs. Unfortunalety, that money has gone down the drain!

• (1700)

And, as has my colleague for Abitibi noted, we do not even know who got it. All we know is that there was fraud involved. All we know is that billions of dollars have disappeared, passing from a numbered company to another, that things were bought and sold. That is what is called a bad management of a country. And since the opposition members are honest people, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that each of them was against such a thing. If each of them had been able to say no to that bad thing, they surely would have done so. Unhappily, Mr. Speaker, the decision was not theirs to make, and we have lost a couple of billions in funds of all kinds.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the hon. member opposite, after listening to his speech. I would like to know if he personally supports Section 48 of the legislation, the thrust of which is to claw back senior citizens' pensions. Does he support the total or partial claw–back of senior citizens' pensions, especially in view of the fact that, as emphasized by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition his excellent speech, a large number of them directly contributed to the fund by paying at some stage 4 per cent of their income tax so that those monies would be reinvested separately for their pensions. In other terms, does the hon. member support expropriating the assets of senior citizens, as Section 48 of the legislation would?

Mr. Vincent: I thank the hon. member opposite for his question. I think I made this quite clear in my speech, but I will repeat it just the same Mr. Speaker. The hon. member referred to a budget, measure that says, in terms of figures, that where an individual aged 65 and over has a net annual income of $77,000, and I repeat $77,000, he or she shall pay back part or all of his or her old age security benefits. And let me tell the hon. member opposite, Mr. Speaker, that I travelled across my constituency and people are saying that of course, with an $77,000 annual income, you can afford to pay back part of your old age security pension cheque because yes, you have enough income to help support the debt left by the Liberals. This is what people in my constituency are saying, Mr. Speaker, and I totally agree.

I think we must be realistic, and as the Leader of the Opposition stated, we never taxed senior citizens. In his question, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell says exactly the opposite. He says that the Liberals taxed senior citizens when they were in office and now they don't want to tax them anymore. Mr. Speaker, we have to be realistic. I think that a person who is 65 or older and whose income exceeds $77,000 can pay his or her share to solve the national debt problem which we inherited from the previous Liberal government.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to make sure that I had understood the hon. member's reply correctly. He has just stated that he is in favour of expropriating the property of senior citizens who are earning over $77,000 a year to give it back to the State. I heard him say that he is convinced that, in a popularity contest in his riding, his constituents would agree to expropriate without compensation the property of senior citizens earning over $77,000. Mr. Speaker, let me tell you that if such is the position of the hon. member opposite, it is certainly not ours as Liberals.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if my Hon. friend still lives in a super affluent riding. But I can tell you that in the riding of Trois-Rivières, people earning $77,000 and more a year are few and far between. There are not a lot of them. It is a riding where people are well-off but are not getting the kind of income to be concerned about the question at this level. Again, I suggest that the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell does not understand the system. All Canadians who are 65 years and over receive their full old age security pension. All the budget is saying is that people earning $77,000 and more a year will pay a special tax, which means that part of the amount paid to them in old age security pension will return to the Government. The budget states that people earning over $77,000 a year will have to pay a special tax, and I suggest that more Canadian men and women, and especially my Trois-Rivières constitents, are all in favour of this measure.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, it has been pretty painful listening to the presentation of the hon. member for Trois-Rivières. I weep for truth in this House for truth has been a major casualty after that assault from the member for Trois-Rivières. Truth has been battered. It has been bruised. In fact, I think we will have to carry it out of the House on a stretcher. That is the kind of presentation that we have had from the member for Trois-Rivières.

I am pleased to take part in this debate this afternoon on Bill C-28, particularly as it applies to the so-called clawback. I say that because this matter of clawback goes to the very core of Canada. It goes to the heart of this country. It says a lot about what this country is. Is it a country of compassion? Is it a country that cares? Is it a country of citizens who feel that they are their brothers' keepers? Or is this a country where everyone is out for himself, where the rule of the jungle applies?

Those are the questions we have to ask ourselves. The answers are quite obvious. They are apparent from the presentations from the other side. We know where they stand. They want a society that can only be described as dog eat dog, everyone out for himself. That is what they want. That is why they are assaulting the seniors of this country. That is why they are going after the very men and women who built this country and who made this country what it is.

Just last week the chairman of the House of Commons finance committee managed, and it was quite a trick, to insult the entire population of western Canada. I think we got an apology from him. The Minister of State for Finance went one step further this afternoon. I am quite sure that he did not realize what he did nor did he intend to do it, but he managed to insult all senior citizens in this country. I will tell you how he did it. He did it by not even mentioning the word "clawback". He did not even mention the subject. He did not allude to the issue.

There is no bigger insult than not recognizing people's feelings and concerns. Those people on the other side who form the government of the day know that the senior citizens in this country are angry. They are very, very upset. It took a little while for this issue to sort of grab hold, but senior citizens now know what is going on. This is no small issue to them.

Were their concerns recognized by the speeches from that side of the House this afternoon? No, not a word. In fact, what they really said to the senior citizens of the country this afternoon was that they do not count, that they do not matter. They sort of said: "Shove off, buster, we don't care about you." I consider that the ultimate insult. The senior citizens of this country have a grievance. They worked hard. They set aside a portion of their earnings. In fact, it was so designated in their income tax forms back in the 1950s and 1960s. That was pointed out by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition this afternoon. They paid into a fund, and the government comes along and takes it. To add insult to injury, the Tories did not even ask, they did not even consult.

Was there a word about the clawback in the 1988 campaign? Not a whisper, not a boo, not a word. As soon as they got elected, what did they do? They put this infamous, perfidious, pernicious, ugly, nasty clawback into the budget, all in the name of deficit reduction. In fact, I got the feeling that the Conservatives have come to the conclusion that they can do anything, any damnable thing, any abominable thing, as long as it is in the name of deficit reduction. In fact, deficit reduction has been put up on a pedestal so high why, we might as well canonize it, make it a saint. Perhaps we should call it "Saint Deficit Reduction". Perhaps that is what the Tories want.

It is pretty shameful and they are not going to get away with it. They may use their majority, they may use their numbers, but they are going to pay for this because the seniors of this country are not going to forget. As far as I know, we still have a democracy in this country and as far as I know, we are going to have an election down the road. The senior citizens of this country are not going to forget.

Why does this government pick on seniors? Are they some kind of special group to be abused? They worked hard, put their money aside, they were expecting something and now this discrimination comes along, this discriminatory measure. If you reach a particular age, a particular plateau and if you have a particular level of income, they are going to hit you. In effect, they say: "Well, you have reached a certain age and we are going to pick you out for a particular kind of assault". Senior citizens do not like that and they are going to remember.

I do not think that the government of the day is listening because there is unrest out there. We get telephone calls, we get letters, we get petitions. The people want to put a stop to this. There have been editorials written. I want to read into the record some remarks that were made in a publication entitled One Voice. It is the voice of senior citizens. There is an article in it called "Clawback Sparks National Outcry". I want to just pick out a few paragraphs because they put their argument against the clawback quite succinctly. I will not go into the preamble, but in the third paragraph, the article continues:

> The same—or more—revenue could be generated by raising the rate at the top income tax bracket by only 1 percent, thereby taxing all high income earners.

In other words, if they think they need this money, they do not have to use a clawback. A mere 1 per cent on high income earners and they would get what they want.

The article continues:

> Many view the mechanism as discriminatory, since it taxes pensioners and families at a higher rate than others earning the same income.
> Of greater significance and concern is that over the years more and more pensioners and families will start repaying their benefits.
> Partial indexation is responsible, the threshold is now $50,000, but by the year 2000—

And that is only 11 years away.

> —it will have fallen to the equivalent of $35,000 in today's dollars. By the time the Baby Boom generation enters retirement, most of them will have to repay their OAS benefits through the clawback.

That is what the seniors are saying. This is not the imagination of an opposition member. This does not come out of the blue. This is what the senior citizens of Canada are saying.

The article continues:

> In the meantime, once we have accepted the principle of the clawback as part of our system, governments of the day are free to set the threshold as they wish—$30,000, $20,000, etc.
> There are widespread fears that the clawback is the "thin edge of the wedge", a wedge which will destroy the Canada's much envied universal social benefits program.
> History will remember the clawback as the end of universality, not for its drop in the deficit bucket.

I want to repeat that because these are words of wisdom. I repeat:

> History will remember the clawback as the end of universality, not for its drop in the deficit bucket.

Are government members listening? Are they paying any attention to what senior citizens are saying? Not a boo, not a word. In fact, we have heard two speakers this afternoon from the government side, and they have not had the decency to address this issue raised by senior citizens. It is as if senior citizens just do not count. They are not important. Obviously what they are saying is not going to contribute to the debate. We will just forge on, push ahead, because we are right. They are not right.

I want to say something about universality because the clawback does end universality. There is no argument about it. For the government to say it does not end universality because they are entitled to it unless, of course, they earn too much begs the question.

We on this side of the House feel strongly about universality because we want a country that is united. We want a country that does not have several strata of groups of people. We would like to think that we have a country where all of us are equal, that you are not separated by income, for example, or by some particular station in life. That is why we feel strongly about universality. That is why we feel that there should be equal opportunity, that everyone should be treated equally, that equality reigns supreme. That is why we have something like medicare. That is why we have a system of hospitalization. That is why we have a public school system. That is why we have an old age security system that is open to all.

That is important because when you have something that is as fundamental as an old age security program, you should not be going around asking questions: How old are you? What's your income? Where do you come from? There should only be one question and one question only: Are you a Canadian citizen? If you are a Canadian citizen you are entitled to it, you get it. Yet, this government says no.

We have built up a tradition in this country. We have built up a system of equality that recognizes all Canadians as equal and these people want to put an end to it. They are going to bring about what is called the means test. Oh, they will deny until the cows come home that they are bringing in a means test, but that is exactly what they are going to do.

• (1720)

In the old days, you started the means test at the bottom. This clever bunch started it at the top. I think the idea was to fool Canadians, particularly the senior citizens. We will not start the means test until the $50,000 income level and people will not notice or catch on.

Well, people have noticed. They have recognized it and see it for what it is. It is that nasty, mean, pernicious old means test. It was rejected by our parents, it was rejected by our grandparents and, by golly, it is going to be rejected again by the current generation of Canadians. The government may get away with it for a while but not for long. I think the senior citizens of this country have a long memory.

Not only can the threshold of the clawback move, $50,000 today and $40,000 tomorrow and $30,000 the day after that, even if you did not move the threshold by $1, you would still lose something through deindexation. If you do not move the threshold, what is the value in today's dollars? What is the value of old age security as a result of the clawback 11 years from now at the turn of the century? The fact of the matter is that it is going to be worth perhaps $30,000 or $35,000. In effect, that is where the threshold will be even without moving it.

I opened my remarks by mentioning truth and how it has been a casualty this afternoon as a result of some presentations from the other side. This is nothing new. This whole clawback scheme was a sneaky thing right from the beginning. The Conservatives never said a word back in the 1980 election. Do you think for a moment that the clawback had not crossed their minds, that it had never entered their skulls, permeated their craniums? You can bet your bottom dollar that it was there all the time in the back of their minds. It was, as my good friend from Kingston and the Islands said, on their hidden agenda. When they get elected and know they do not have to face an election for four years, they show a little nerve, this unmitigated gall, arrogance, hubris. This is a government of hubris. They did it without telling Canadians what was coming. In other words, to heck with democracy. Why do we have election campaigns? Why do we have democracy? Is it so they can just go ahead unilaterally without consultation? That is not my notion of democracy and I do not think it is the notion of democracy of many Canadians, except for that bunch over there.

I would say in closing that the clawback is part of a pattern. We see this pattern in cuts in VIA Rail, the closure of post offices in rural Canada, the privatization of Air Canada, the gutting of the unemployment insurance program. It goes on and on and on. Now we have the clawback.

This has been an attack on seniors. It is a betrayal of the senior citizens of this country. They do not deserve this kind of treatment. They deserve our respect. They earned their right to this pension. I have nothing against the richer people in this country, regardless of age, paying their fair share. I want them to pay their fair share, but it need not be done through this kind of discriminatory measure. You can do it through a fair taxation system. You do not even need to be a genius. In fact, you can be a Progressive Conservative. If you just apply yourself, you can figure out a fair taxation system that will not assault every senior citizen in this country.

This is my entreat. I beg and I beseech and I implore this bunch on that side of the House to open their ears and listen. Get the message. The message is clear. It is as clear as the nose on your face. They do not like it. It is not good for the country and it must go.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. A minister has finally come into the House. I will repeatedly object to the fact that on an important bill, particularly on a budget bill, there ought to be a minister sitting in this House. There is nobody here.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There are ministers here.

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, I have to agree with my hon. colleague on most of his points but I do have some concern as to what the Liberal alternative would be. Our alternative is as we have said ad tedium even for ourselves. Now it is becoming ever more apparent that it is the right thing to do.

It is often said that Liberals sound like New Democrats in opposition and like Progressive Conservatives in government. Can we trust you any more than the government side? Will you really dare increase the taxes on the rich? History really does not distinguish you from them. You had your opportunity to implement a fair tax system. You did not do it. What is the Liberal alternative?

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman had a question, I did not hear it. I was distracted.

Mr. Butland: What would the Liberal alternative be?

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, the question is ludicrous. It is not a question of a Liberal alternative. It is a question of a Liberal program that was put there by Liberals.

This country has not yet suffered through a democratic administration at the federal level. Manitobans have and the people of Saskatchewan have as have the people of British Columbia.

I find it rather lamentable that the hon. gentleman from British Columbia would attack us. I thought the rotten bunch was those people over there. I thought he would go after them, but he is some kind of elephant. He wants to go into the past.

I will remind him of this: Who brought in UIC? Who brought in family allowance? Who brought in Old Age Security?

Some Hon. Members: The Liberals.

Mr. Harvard: I could go on and on and on.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, I want to make a comment and then I will put a question to the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James. Replying specifically to the Member for Kingston and the Islands, he constantly rises in this House to make the point of who is here and who is not here, notwithstanding the rule that that is not an appropriate subject for comment.

What I want to say to him and to anybody else who happens to be listening is that unfortunately for the member for Kingston and the Islands, every word spoken in this House is recorded for all time. It is on videotape. It is on the written record to be read and understood. I want to tell you that we find out everything that is said by members opposite. We record it and we respond to it.

• (1730)

This very day the Leader of the Official Opposition said in this House of Commons that he was the author of financial responsibility in Canada, that he brought in budgets and so on but what he did not tell the House and what should now be recorded is that, having done that he left, he went back to his roots in Bay Street and let hyper inflation take place, let the interest rate go up into double digits let unemployment go into digits, let 1,300,000 Canadians become unemployed as a result of those policies.

I want to ask the member who now brags about introducing programs what his point is. Do we in this nation, in order to create financial responsibility, raise revenues, or reduce services? I understood the member's speech to mean that we should maintain services, increase services and lower revenue. Surely, he cannot deny that that is simply going to raise the deficit, cause more pressure to inflate interest rates and all other cost factors in this nation and lead us into the very kind of thing that defeated his government in 1984.

Mr. Harvard: Again it is that same old line from the Conservatives. Anything, as long as its done in the name of deficit reduction, is right. Even if you turn a class of Canadians into second class citizens that is all right with them. Well, damn it, it is not all right, it is not. What gives them the right to destroy universality? What gives them the right to assault elderly Canadians, the senior citizens, the people who built up this country. They do not have the right. We built up in this country traditions, customs, conventions, a system, a whole line of programs and they have come along to destroy them one by one, one after another. They do not have that right, and they are going to get the message in 1992 or earlier that what they have done is absolutely wrong.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of my colleague for Winnipeg—St. James. I want to congratulate him first for the very thought provoking and excellent speech that he made this afternoon.

Earlier I asked a question of the member for Trois-Rivières. I asked him if he felt that it was okay to expropriate the property of our senior citizens if they had earnings beyond a certain threshold, namely, $70,000. I think I can say from his reply that it was okay with him, that he felt that it was all right to take back the property of the senior citizens of this country if they had earnings beyond a certain limit. I want to ask my colleague what he thinks of that kind of answer from the member for Trois-Rivières.

Mr. Harvard: I do not think it is much of an answer. Where I grew up, a deal was a deal, a bargain was a bargain and a contract was a contract. In other words, your word was your bond. I thought there was a solemn contract between the federal government of this country and the senior citizens of Canada that a deal was in place, that they had contributed to this scheme and when they reached age 65 they would get benefits under old age security. That is not the government view. It feels that it has the right to abrogate that contract, to shirk its responsibility. I think that is a dastardly deed.

I put it this way, can you imagine if a private company did this, can you imagine if a life insurance company on some particular pretext said, "We do not have to honour your policy, you have reached age 65 or, you know what, you have been too successful, you have made too much money. You know what, we have had kind of a bad year, or we had a bad decade, so we are going to take a little out of your pocket. Is that not kind of fair? We will just sort of ignore the words in the contract".

Well, I don't think that is fair. Certainly no one on this side of the House feels it is fair and I will bet you my last loonie that not one senior citizen thinks it is fair either.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I begin to debate today this terrible bill, the end of universality in Canada, but I begin by making reference to something that was said by my hon. colleague from Winnipeg—St. James when he talked about "Saint Deficit Reduction". Much as I agree with his speech I think we have to say and it has to be admitted that Saint Deficit Reduction does not come from realms celestial, it comes from the other side of this House where celestial matters are much lacking. It comes instead from the netherworld and from a form of social planning that attacks Canadians rather than helps them.

Mr. Boudria: An unholy bunch.

Ms. Clancy: An unholy alliance of Canadians from coast to coast who are prepared to see the end of social programs as we know them, as Canadians have come to expect them, and as all people in this country who paid taxes until 1971 contributed to them.

Universality; the principle of treating all Canadians alike, of fostering a sense of community, a sense that all Canadians share in some of the riches of this country and in some of the benefits. Universality; which says to senior Canadians, you contributed; you worked years ago for 35 cents an hour, for 50 cents an hour; you were taxed. But now you are going to get some return on those taxes. Universality; unlike other social programs, universal benefits do not—

Mr. Crosby: Does that include everybody?

Ms. Clancy: I am sorry, Harry, I didn't hear that.

Mr. Crosby: Does that include millionaires?

Ms. Clancy: It includes millionaires. Have you got something against millionaires? Are we going to be prejudiced against millionaires here? No, Howard, you have 10 minutes at the end, just wait, chill it.

Unlike other social programs, universal benefits do not set the poor apart from the millionaires, they do not make the poor feel like second-class citizens. We are not back to the days when the hon. member from Halifax West and I, who share a common Irish ancestry, saw signs that said, "No Irish need apply". We are not back to the days when Canadians who live on one side of the railroad tracks are considered inferior to Canadians who live on the other side of the railroad tracks. Universal benefits do not set the poor apart from the rich and they do not stigmatize lower income Canadians.

Not too long ago I was in a bank in the neighbourhood which the hon. member from Halifax West and I used to share—he had to move out of town; I don't know if that was because of social programs or not. While in the bank I met a woman who worked for 45 years in the city of Halifax in the private sector. After 45 years of working she retired at age 65 on a pension from her private sector job of $40 a month. You are not really going to keep yourself very well on $40 a month. But this woman was in receipt of the old age pension. She would not, however, apply for the guaranteed income supplement to which she was entitled. In talking to her that day I asked her why not. She told me why not. She referred to another woman in that same bank line who had worked for over 40 years in the public school system of Nova Scotia and, thanks to the lobbying techniques and the good contractual relations practised by the Nova Scotia teachers union, this woman had a secure pension, cost of living adjusted, but she, too, was in receipt of old age pension benefits. My friend, the woman with the princely pension of $40 a month said: "You see, we both get the old age pension. I am not getting a hand-out; I get it, she gets it. I feel that I can accept this with pride."

This woman still lives in my riding. She still gets a pension of $40 a month. She still won't apply for the guaranteed income supplement because, in her mind, it is a hand-out. How is she going to feel when she looks at her contemporaries who, because of different lifestyles, different modes of financial planning—and probably because of not being female in the work force—have managed to give themselves incomes in excess of $50,000 a year and thus are having those incomes clawed back, having those old age pension benefits clawed back.

I will tell you how she is going to feel, Mr. Speaker. She is going to feel like a second rate Canadian. In her pride she is going to say, "I cannot accept this because it is not given with an even hand to everyone in my situation, to everyone in my age group".

Fifty thousand dollars a year is not exactly a princely income, not in this day and age. Admittedly, it is a tragedy. In this country there are far too many people who fall below that income. But let us look at the one income family, $51,000 a year, on a pension alone. There is no way to get around that, the clawback will come into effect. The clawback will take benefits away from those senior citizens with a pension income in excess of $50,000 a year.

In my province of Nova Scotia we are very proud people. in spite of the hard knocks that have been dealt to us, particularly in the last couple of years by the federal government, we pride ourselves on the ability to plan for the future. Senior citizens in Atlantic Canada have planned for the future and part of that plan, no matter what their income may be, includes the old age pension. Suddenly, with very little notice, they are being told, "No, sorry, that no longer is part and parcel of your retirement income. That is gone." There is a great swipe taken by this claw and it is leaving senior citizens right across this country bleeding.

We are also seeing a special tax on families with children, a tax that does not apply to families without children. This bill proposes a clawback of 15 per cent of family allowance and old age pension for taxpayers with incomes over $50,000 and a full clawback for taxpayers earning over $70,000. The claw-back on family allowance alone will take $1.686 billion out of family budgets in the next five years. This claw-back will affect 535,000 Canadian families, and the numbers will grow because within 10 years close to one million Canadian families will have begun to lose their family allowances and old age pensions due to the partial indexing of the $50,000 threshold.

I spent 10 years in the practice of family law in the city of Halifax. The bulk of my clients were women—women and children in crisis—and not all of them were what we consider to be poverty level. Indeed, many of them were women who lived in the finest neighbourhoods in luxurious houses, who were married to men who made incomes that would certainly put them well beyond the limits of this clawback. But I saw women in my city of Halifax save the family allowance benefit month after month, year after year, until they had enough money to get themselves out of untenable situations; situations where they themselves were abused, situations where their children were abused physically, emotionally and spiritually.

The family allowance, in particular, has great meaning for Canadian women. For many women it is the only income that they have. It is the only money that they see with no strings attached that belongs to them. It is money that they do not have to account for to their husbands. Suddenly, the husband's income tax is going to be clawed back to cover these benefits. What is that going to do in a household where a wife is trying to save that money for an escape hatch? That added stress in that family situation is going to create untold hardship and untold misery for women and children right across this country I wonder if the government has considered this. I wonder if, in the hardness of their hearts, they wonder how children and women in Canada are going to react to the pain that this clawback will cause. So another group in this country is bleeding from the government's unceremonious and hard-hearted use of the clawback.

The claw-back proposal is particularly discriminatory against families in which only one parent works, and yet we see a government that is happy to fund anti-equality groups like REAL Women who say, not necessarily incorrectly, that in the best of all possible worlds a woman should stay at home and look after her children. Nobody who labours in the fields of the battle for women's rights disagrees with that in principle. We agree that women should have a choice.

We also know that in this country today, given the extent of the economic exigencies plaguing the Canadian family, the number of women who have a free choice to stay home or to go out to work is getting smaller every day. We know, Mr. Speaker, because the statistics tell us that women work, not to provide colour television sets or trips to Hawaii or any of the things that the government obviously thinks is behind the influx of women into the workforce, but to keep their families in food, shelter, clothing and education.

But what will happen with the claw-back? The one parent who works and supports a spouse and children will be in a far worse position than a family in which both parents work and earn under the clawback level. A family in which both parents work and earn $49,000 will not have to pay back any of their benefits, but a family in which one parent works earning $75,000 will lose all their benefits.

Where is fairness, Mr. Speaker? Where is the Canadian way? Where is the idea that this government allegedly adheres to in supporting the Canadian family? It is not there for Canadian women. It is not there for Canadian children. It is not there for older Canadians. I do not think it is "Saint Deficit Reduction", I think it's a case of a government that says, "We do not care. This is not on our priority list. This is not important to us as a government. This does not come within our financial plan." Well I can only say that a financial plan that leaves Canadians in the kinds of situations that this one is going to leave them in is one that comes from people who clearly do not think very far into the future.

I represent one of the most more prosperous areas of Atlantic Canada, at least we were a little more prosperous until the budget was unleashed upon us this spring. What we have seen in Halifax, what we have seen right across my region, and what I and my colleagues on this side of the House—because most Atlantic Canadians sent people to this side of the House—hear when we go home to our ridings is a tale of woe. We see senior citizens worried about the pensions that they are going to lose. We see senior citizens worried that while they are going to get their pensions clawed back, they are going to be hit with a 9 per cent sales tax. We see young families wondering if they are going to be able to bring their children to the regional health facility in Halifax because the trains are cut.

Last week after the VIA cuts were announced there was a particularly poignant story on the CBC news. A young woman, the mother of a small child, in one of the outlying areas of Nova Scotia, has to bring that child on a monthly basis to the children's hospital in Halifax for chemotherapy. That young woman has taken the child in the morning by train, found it very comfortable, brought the child for treatment, and then has been able, because of the further comfort of the train, to take him back that evening. That young woman is now faced with the fact that when she brings her child for therapy in the future that she will have to spend an extra day and a night in Halifax because taking the child home by bus does not have the comfort, does not have the ease and the facility that the train did, so she has an excess cost.

She has an excess cost because she is going to get hit with the general suffering tax. And she may well—I do not know what her income level is—but she may well be hit with an excess cost if she comes over the income level for the clawback. And if she does not come over the income level for the clawback today, Mr. Speaker, you may rest assured that she probably will within a few years.

We talk about fairness and about the things to which Canadians aspire. We talk about a vision for Canada. I look at my riding that has 22 senior citizen apartment complexes. We are an aging population. If nothing else, a government that truly plans for the future should be looking at that planning in the sense of that aging population, in the sense that within a number of years all of us who are lucky enough to live that long are going to be in the position of being senior citizens and pensioners.

If we have no sense of what is fair for the people whom we represent today, would it not at least be sensible for this government to have some idea of self-preservation for the people who will be seniors in the future? I guess not, Mr. Speaker. What we have here is an uncaring government. What we have here is a government that says that universality is a thing of the past. A sense of pride for Canadians, whatever their income level, is not important. A sense of self-worth for older Canadians who have spent their time building this country, sacrificing for this country, sacrificing for their children and sacrificing for generations yet unborn, is worth nothing. Nothing, Mr. Speaker. I call that, not something that comes, as I said earlier, from the realm celestial, no, that is someting that comes from the realms that this government will someday be more familiar with.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to add some comments and to put a question to my colleague from across the harbour. I have been listening to the debate today. I listened to my hon. colleague for Halifax West who sits on the other side of the House, and I can tell you that after listening to my colleague for Halifax I am certainly very proud to be sitting on this side of the House with somebody who cares as much about the people in her riding and Canadians and senior citizens as what her comments just illustrated.

First of all, I would like to say that many people on this side of the House, all the Liberals on this side of the House at least, are concerned about the clawback provisions that the member for Halifax so eloquently spoke about. Every individual on this side of the House, and probably on the other side of the House as well, has received phone calls, has received letters, has been visited by seniors, who, as the member said, feel betrayed by this government, who feel that they were sold a bill of goods. Mny of these seniors, prior to the last election, gave some members opposite another chance after the government tried to partially deindex old age pensions. One of the things that is particularly troublesome is the callous disregard of the government of illustrating its true agenda during the campaign.

I can remember quite clearly that during the campaign at one point the Prime Minister, speaking to a group of seniors, I believe somewhere in Quebec, had the audacity to take his mother forward and say to the crowd, "Don't worry about old age pensions, I will never touch them. My mother is on old age pension. Do you think I would do that to my mother?" Well obviously he has done something to his mother and it hasn't been to protect her pension. What he has done with this particular piece of legislation that has been presented by his minister is to make a mockery of the trust that has been placed in him by many of the seniors across this country.

Initially, this government has tried to silence the seniors. It said that anything over $50,000 will be taxed back, as if $50,000 was $50,000 in the spending power of 1982. The government said it would not touch the universal pension. The government tried to tell seniors who had planned their futures properly and who felt that they had a right to a universal pension to keep their mouths shut because if they told people that they were concerned, it would mean that they were making $50,000 and somehow they should hang their heads in shame.

I say that this government should hang its head in shame because the people who have built this country and made this economy as strong as it is, many whom have saved and struggled all their lives, as my hon. colleague from Halifax has said, are deserving of the benefits of good planning, but they are also deserving of good, fair treatment from this government.

Earlier, the Leader of the Opposition mentioned that most of these individuals over the age of 40 have paid a special tax so that they had access to this universal pension; not a welfare payment, not a subsidy but, as my colleague from Halifax has said, something that they felt was a right that they had paid into.

I would just like to add my voice to the comments of my hon. friend from Halifax and say that the legislation is not just regressive, but shows a total disregard and a total lack of caring for those who have given so much to make this country what it is. The members on this side of the House will not let the government get away with this, even if this legislation does pass without amendment. We will stand up for those seniors because the members opposite have forgotten how to do that.

Ms Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague, the member from Dartmouth, for his comments. I would like to say that the government can be put on notice that the Liberal members from Atlantic Canada are not going to be fooled, their constituents are not going to be fooled and, indeed, the constituents from their neighbouring ridings are not going to be fooled either. We know what fairness is, we know what pride is, and we know what making a contribution to this country deserves. It does not deserve the treatment that has been handed out by this government. It does not deserve the treatment that seniors and families with children can look forward to. It does not deserve unfairness. It does not deserve regressive taxation and it does not deserve the kind of cowardly, uncaring treatment that they have received.

The time is over and the time to take the blinders off is now. I, on behalf of my colleagues from Atlantic Canada say; Take off your blinders and look to see the train that is hurtling towards you. You can derail VIA, but you cannot derail the proud people of Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Crosby (Halifax West) Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes that are left to us in this House of Commons before you see six o'clock, let me try to answer some of the disinformation that has been spread through the rhetoric of my friends from the Halifax–Dartmouth area.

They would have Canadians believe that they are protecting the little persons of Canada, those in need. What could be further from the truth? What the government is asking in this change is for those senior citizens, persons over 65 years of age, who are receiving from the national treasury of Canada an allowance per month, and if their income, in addition to that allowance, exceeds $44,000 and rises to $77,000 per individual, that they pay a portion of that back to the national treasury.

Now why do we want them to pay a portion of that back to the national treasury? So we can take those dollars from $75,000 plus income–earners over 65 and provide that to persons who are truly and really in need. And what do the members opposite say? They say: "Stop that. Don't do that. We want them to keep every cent of the $75,000. We do not want them to share that with those in need in Canada".

I just want to put the question to the member, is the great danger to persons in need in Canada not a bankrupt national treasury? Is the real danger not that the government will not have funds, like the Government of Poland does not have funds, like the Government of Brazil does not have funds to pay people in need? Is that what she wants to do, bankrupt Canada so we can nationalize poverty?

Ms Clancy: Mr. Speaker, permit me to give a brief answer to my verbose friend. I would just like to say that perhaps the member has heard of fair income tax. A clawback is a clawback and income tax is income tax and the twain could meet if the government put its mind to fair income tax.

As to a bankrupt treasury, fine words from a member sitting on the side of the House that doubled the deficit in four short years—doubled the deficit, Mr. Speaker. I say give us fair taxes, don't give us any more deceit.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt this lovely debate.

It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to standing order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6 p.m.

Government Orders

ADDRESS

of

HIS MAJESTY, KING HUSSEIN BIN TALAL

of the

Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan

to

Both Houses of Parliament in the

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

on Wednesday, October 11, 1989

[English]

The King was welcomed by the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister of Canada and thanked by the Honourable Gildas Molgat, Deputy Speaker of the Senate and the Honourable John A. Fraser, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Speaker of the House of Commons): The Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, colleagues, ladies and gentlemen:

We meet here today to mark the visit to Canada of His Majesty King Hussein Bin Talal of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, and of his gracious wife, Queen Noor. Welcome, Your Majesties. We are honoured to receive you. In this House and in this country you are among friends.

We also celebrate here today the landmark first address to the Canadian Parliament of the leader of an Arab country. Your autobiography and the testimony of many respected world leaders record your dedication, sir, to the cause of peace in the Middle East. In fact, few, if any, have shown greater determination in this cause nor pursued it with greater resolve.

As Prime Minister Thatcher has said so aptly of you, Your Majesty, your human qualities, above all your courage and clear-sightedness, have earned you both respect and admiration world-wide. I can assure you, sir, that admiration is shared by every member of this House and by all Canadians.

• (1120)

[Translation]

Canadians hold in high regard and genuine friendship those leaders in the region, such as you, your Majesty, who have had the great courage and profound wisdom to look beyond intractable conflict and seek a just and durable peace. We, in this House, know that you have taken great personal as well as political risks to bring an end to the Arab-Israeli conflict. For this, we salute you.

[English]

Canadians know that they are truly fortunate to live in a region of the world that has been spared the destruction of war for its entire existence. But Canadians have served and suffered and sacrificed their lives in wars abroad. They have seen the horrific consequences of war in the Middle East where Canadians have participated in virtually ever peacekeeping initiative since the UN's foundation. It is for these reasons that Canadians want nothing more for your region, Your Majesty, than that all its countries and all its peoples live, at last, in justice, security, and peace.

Successive Canadian governments have supported all constructive efforts to achieve a comprehensive negotiated settlement of the problems of the Middle East. Canada's support for Israel's right to exist and for its security is well known. It enables us to speak frankly to our Israeli friends, as I did in the presence of President Herzog in this House in June, when I said that Canada supports the concept of land for peace.

But we believe that peace will not come if any of the parties is so threatened by the actions and statements of others that it feels it must give absolute priority to security over peace.

[Translation]

We believe that peace will only come on the basis of respect for the security, well-being and legitimacy of all states in the region, and of respect for the rights of the Palestinian people. And those rights include their participation in the determination of their own future.

Over the past year and a half, developments in the Middle East have altered long-standing assumptions about the nature of the peace process. Your own courageous and difficult decision last year, your Majesty, to disengage from Jordan's historical links with the West Bank was a turning point in the peace process.

[English]

The time is now arriving when other leaders in the Middle East must make equally difficult but far-sighted decisions as you have, Your Majesty. The Israeli government's proposal for elections was, we believe, a significant initial step in a political process that could lead to a negotiated settlement.

We are encouraged that President Mubarak has joined actively in the search for progress; his ten points have taken the peace process a step further. Canada stands ready to advance this process in whatever ways we can.

Comparable hope for a settlement in Lebanon, as you mentioned last evening, has been overwhelmed repeatedly by violence and hate. Canadians look on the heart-breaking situation there with grief and dismay.

[Translation]

Members on all sides of this house are particularly touched by the anguish of Canadians with family and loved-ones caught in the terrible cycle of civil war in Lebanon. Like you, we pray for a political settlement that reflects the aspirations for peace of all Lebanese and that will restore their country's national unity, sovereignty and territorial integrity. We are encouraged by the efforts of the Arab League Tripartite Committee to establish a basis for national reconciliation and we hope, for the sake of all the Lebanese people, that this time, the cease-fire will lead to peace.

[English]

Thanks to your especially strong and impressive leadership, Your Majesty, Canadians see in Jordan an island of stability and economic development. Jordan is a land of ancient civilization. Canada is yet a young country of modern history. This year marks the twenty-fifth anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between Canada and Jordan. What brings us together is not only diplomatic association but the prospect of ongoing friendship and constructive co-operation. The economic links between us are significant and growing. Petro-Canada International's technical assistance program to identify oil and gas reserves in your nation is a major case in point.

Your visit here, Your Majesty, and that of your gracious Queen, allows us to strengthen our friendship and build our bilateral relationship and broaden the common ground we share in the search for peace. I am, personally, very much looking forward to continuing the excellent dialogue that we began in The Hague. All Canadians, Sir, are anxious to hear your views.

Colleagues of the House of Commons and the Senate, I present to you His Majesty King Hussein Bin Talal of Jordan whom I now proudly invite to address the Parliament and the people of Canada.

HIS MAJESTY KING HUSSEIN OF JORDAN: Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, I would like to thank his excellency the Prime Minister for his kind introduction. It is indeed an honour, a privilege and a pleasure for me to visit Canada again and to address this joint session of the Houses of Parliament.

Whatever the differences between our respective cultures may be, there is an important heritage which we have in common: the tradition of civilization, over 5000 years old, going back to humanity's first urban settlements in the lands of Egypt, Jordan, Syria, Palestine and Iraq—today, the heartlands of our Arab world.

In ancient times, our vast, beautiful and spiritually evocative landscape inspired the birth and expansion of three of the world's most enduring religions—Judaism, Christianity and Islam. In medieval Islamic times it was in the schools and libraries of our Arab cities that the great patrimony of classical knowledge was translated into Arabic, preserved, refined, and ultimately passed on to an emerging Europe, to spark the first stirrings of the Renaissance. It was among the great Arab and Muslim centres of learning in Baghdad, Damascus, Cairo and Andalusia that medieval scholars, thinkers and scientists expanded the frontiers of human knowledge in such fields as astronomy, mathematics, philosophy, ethics, medicine and law.

Today, of course, the tables are turned, and we find ourselves at civilization's receiving end. Also, we are saddled with a different reputation. The genesis of constructive pluralism, of which we were the original pioneers, is forgotten and the conflict of contemporary nationalisms holds sway. Central to our present predicament is the need to reach a settlement over the question of Palestine. And it is to the particulars of this question that I shall address myself today.

Rather than go into the history of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, I shall concentrate on the way in which matters stand right now.

Since last year, the Palestinians and the Arab world have made a historic compromise—to concede geography, but not quality of national rights. The PLO has met all the prerequisites and requirements to achieve a peaceful settlement of the Palestinian–Israeli conflict in line with international legitimacy and global consensus. The one remaining obstacle to a just peace is Israel's inability to reach a decision on the future of the Arab territories that it has occupied by force for over 20 years.

At present, one–half of the Israeli governing coalition favours a territorial compromise. The other half looks for ways to fulfil its avowed pledge to annex the territories, albeit in a camouflaged way to avoid regional and international repercussions. Unable to achieve more than the lowest common denominator of political consensus, the Israeli government tries to mire the peace process in debates over modalities and procedures in order to gain time and forestall the moment of decision.

Hence the convoluted process inherent in the Israeli Prime Minister's plan for elections in the occupied territories. Palestinian representatives are needed to talk to the Israeli government about elections which, in turn, are needed to select Palestinian representatives to talk to the Israeli government. To help break the impasse, President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt made his ten–point proposal on the issue of elections. It is not an alternative plan nor is it a set of preconditions for dialogue. The peace plan, as approved by the Israeli government in May, called for Egypt's assistance and the ten points have come in the spirit of the proposed process. We believe that the Mubarak proposals constitute a helpful vehicle to advance the peace process. Ironically, we now see the Israeli Prime Minister trying to derail the very process which he claims as his own brainchild.

These attempts to forestall the inevitable are futile. No matter how long and winding the road may be, no matter how many twists and turns it contains, it will ultimately lead to the question: Does Israel accept the application of United Nations Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 to the Arab territories that it now occupies as they were applied to Sinai?

There is only one Resolution 242 and it is ironic to see Israel accept its application to Sinai in its entirety and float a different interpretation of the same resolution where the West Bank is concerned. If Israel were to accept this principle, the modalities would not constitute a hurdle and the road to the international peace conference would be open.

As we strive to bring about a peaceful resolution of the Palestinian problem, in all its aspects, a resolution that allows Palestinians to exercise their legitimate national rights and guarantees the security of all nations in the region, we are saddened to see Lebanon, once a haven for democracy, art and culture, come so close to being a den of iniquity where outlaws find sanctuary and terror reigns.

We find it encouraging that the plan of the Arab tripartite committee has been accepted, not only by all the Lebanese factions, but also by all Arab Governments. We sincerely hope that the newly formed Lebanese Security Committee will continue to function, and that the tripartite committee will continue to receive the co–operation of all parties concerned. We thank God that the cease–fire is, at last, being observed. But it would not be sufficient to stop the bloodshed and silence the guns.

Another area where we are disappointed to see the truce failing to develop into a permanent peace is the Gulf. We are very keen to prevent the cease–fire between Iraq and Iran from becoming a lull, in which the two sides catch their breath in preparation for the next round.

Each one of these conflicts—the Lebanese problem and the Gulf War—must be brought to a just, comprehensive, and lasting peaceful settlement, and it is imperative for the world community to help in this pursuit. Lester Pearson articulated this imperative most eloquently when he said: "Aggression, in any part of the world, constitutes in the long run, a threat to every other part. If it is true that we cannot tolerate a city of residential suburbs surrounding slums and degradation, it is equally true that we cannot be safe in a world community which condones lawless aggression in any part of it".

These insightful words have grown even more pertinent with the passage of time. The rapid advances in communications technology have increased the level of exposure and raised awareness of other cultures and ways of life, thus raising the hopes and expectations of the less fortunate to explore and take advantage of the new opportunities unfolding before them.

This optimism has resulted in a higher level of maturity, best evidenced by the atmosphere at the Ninth Non-aligned Summit in September of this year. The voluble anti-imperialist rhetoric of the past had given way to more quiet analysis of common concerns like international debt, regional conflicts, and the environment, and a search for co-operation in facing these challenges. One of the points that received virtually universal emphasis in the conference was that differences of ideology should not prevent good relations and co-operation between nations.

This pragmatic and constructive attitude cannot be taken for granted. It must be encouraged and nurtured because, if it fails to bear fruit, if the under-developed world is not helped to make headway toward the cherished goals of development and progress, the resultant frustration and socioeconomic ills would contribute actively to destabilising the countries concerned and their regions.

Nowhere is this more true than in the Middle East, especially since Israel has accumulated a nuclear arsenal and other weapons of mass destruction. There can be no global security in the absence of regional and national security and social stability. The opposite is equally true. Peace is the only path to the security and prosperity of any region, while conflict in any part of it turns the whole region into a time bomb that threatens world stability.

Ladies and gentlemen, the world has become so interdependent and closely integrated that no nation has the resources to face the challenges of our time on its own. Without organized and comprehensive regional plans of co-operation, the various countries' attempts at development become random shots in the dark.

This lesson was not wasted on the Middle East. We saw Europe begin to work toward political unity, having successfully achieved economic complementarity; we saw Canada enter a free trade agreement with the United States; and Jordan began to work for the establishment of the Arab Co-operation Council.

Today, the council comprises Egypt, Iraq, the Yemen Arab Republic, as well as Jordan, and remains open for the admission of other states that will be welcomed as constructive members in our community. All four countries have committed themselves to facing the social and economic challenges of the 21st century in a regionally co-ordinated effort to achieve comprehensive development. The success of this endeavour requires an atmosphere of political moderation and stability.

When we look at the experience of Europe we find that the political process that started with the European coal and steel agreement created in a short while more concrete foundations for European security than centuries of defensive pacts and innumerable balances of power. It did so by creating a common interest in stability that turned the most implacable enemies into staunch allies. It is our faith that the security of all nations in the Middle East can only be achieved through a similar process.

This is the security that we seek to achieve. We pray to God to grant us success in this endeavour.

Thank you.

Hon. Gildas Molgat (Deputy Speaker of the Senate): Your Majesties, Mr. Speaker, —Mr. Prime Minister, Hon. colleagues in the Senate and the House of Commons—

[English]

Distinguished guests:

On behalf of my colleagues in the Senate of Canada, I thank Your Majesty for the honour you have paid us in addressing this joint session of Parliament. This Chamber no doubt reminds you of the British parliamentary traditions with which you are so familiar.

[Translation]

It is with great pleasure that we welcome Your Majesty and Her Majesty Queen Noor to this Chamber. It is entirely appropriate that you should be the first Arab Head of State to address this assembly.

[English]

We know that when you acceded to the Throne you decided to be a modern sovereign of your people. We knew that we would be moved by the words of a monarch who, during the 37 years of his reign, has played a critical role in the unfolding drama in the Middle East and in the search for a lasting and just peace. Canada too has been actively involved in the search for a solution which would reconcile and do justice to the claims of the contending parties.

[Translation]

For two decades, Your Majesty, you and your government have succeeded in living peacefully with your neighbours, thus making Jordan a haven of stability and development in a region torn by strife. This has been achieved largely thanks to the courage, statesmanship and realism that Your Majesty has shown over the years.

[English]

Canadians in all walks of life have admired Your Majesty's willingness to take personal and political risks in the interests of peace. We have admired the reasoned, moderate tone with which you intervene on the international scene.

We are therefore extremely grateful to you and we thank you sincerely for sharing with us your preoccupations and your insights. I know your words have been eagerly listened to by all present.

On behalf of the Senate, I would thank you for visiting us. We wish Your Majesties happiness, peace and prosperity for your people and for the members of your family.

Mr. Speaker: Your Majesties, Members of the House of Commons and Senate, honoured and distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen:

[Translation]

It is my duty, but it is also a great pleasure for me, Your Majesty, to say, speaking on behalf of all Members of the House of Commons and all political parties represented here today, how much we appreciate your visit to our country and your presence in this historic Chamber. And we are particularly pleased to receive Her Gracious Majesty Queen Noor, your wife, as guest of honour.

[English]

Your presence here today culminates a long and important association between your country and Canada. Diplomatic relations were established between our countries in 1964. Since then we have maintained contacts which we hope have done two things: first, to bring us closer as nations which desire peace and progress for all the peoples of God's earth; and, second, because of our association, we have created a relationship within which we have been able to discuss, in very frank terms, the Middle East situation and the concern and interest of all nations which hope for an end to hostilities and a just peace.

[Translation]

Trade, diplomatic relations and major diplomatic and state visits have all contributed to the development of this friendship and will continue to do so.

• (1150)

[English]

We in this place who have paid attention to events in the Middle East have no illusions; we are acutely aware of history, of tragedy and heartbreak, and also of the absolute necessity to find a solution based on common sense, reality, justice and compassion.

We are also aware that all of us on earth face a rapidly changing global environment. If public opinion research in this country is accurate, the great majority of Canadians believe that the man–made threat to our global environment is the greatest danger we face. If this is so, and many of us believe it is so, surely our two countries can persuade others that whatever the provocation for conflict there is now a terrible imperative to come together and save the world for all of us.

Your Majesty, you spoke of this last night when you said that environmental dangers "stop at no boundaries", and you went on to say that we must strive for "co–operation rather than confrontation" and that it must be within a spirit of reason and dialogue.

These statements illustrate we believe your own wisdom, and we are heartened by your comments which indicate that despite all of the problems which you face, you can say to us what so desperately needs to be said, co–operation rather than confrontation, reason and dialogue, and that our environmental dangers know no boundaries.

[Translation]

Your Majesty, you are welcome in this Chamber, and we hope we shall have the honour of receiving you again. We wish to express our earnest hopes for peace and happiness for your people and your neighbours.

[English]

Thank you, Your Majesties, for being with us today.

PETITIONS

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the pleasure to present here in the House of Commons a petition from Canadians who oppose the tax proposed by the Conservative Government, the 9 per cent GST.

[English]

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and duty, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present to this House 103 petitions containing over 4,000 signatures from the residents of my riding of Hamilton West, including the Hamilton—Wentworth region, who call upon the government to scrap this proposed goods and services tax.

These petitions are in addition to the ones I have already presented in this House and are only a portion of the remaining petitions of mine which are in the hands of the clerk. Some of these petitions were collected as result of a town hall meeting held in my riding at which 350 people attended and not one person was in favour of this government's proposed tax. They say, "enough is enough".

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present these petitions in the House of Commons, reflecting the ancient and undoubted right of the citizens of this country to present a grievance with the certain assurance that this honourable House will therefore provide a remedy.

The undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon this Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Madam Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to introduce and present a petition to you signed by many of my constituents from Ituna, Hubbard, Regina, as well as members of my constituency of Regina—Qu'Appelle.

The petitioners are requesting Parliament to maintain our VIA Rail service. They point out that with the pronounced cuts by the minister, Regina will no longer receive rail passenger service. The petitioners are asking the government to maintain this essential service in order to maintain our national unity.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I rise this morning on behalf of a number of Canadians who are petitioning this Parliament and the Conservative government to do away with its 9 per cent goods and services tax and go back to the drawing board. They claim that this new tax, which will be hidden from all Canadians, will be applied to virtually everything they buy. They petition the government to cancel this outrageous tax.

• (1110)

VIA RAIL

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise, as did my friend before me, the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle, with a petition on preserving VIA Rail. These petitioners from Saskatchewan are echoed in their sentiments by my constituents in British Columbia. The petitioners state that the railway passenger service as carried on by VIA Rail is an essential means of transportation for many Canadians and has been part of basic Canadian infrastructure for over 100 years.

They also mention the fact that this is an environmentally sensitive means of transportation. There are a number of signatures on the petition, which calls on Parliament to maintain VIA Rail, Canada's present national network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment, and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service. That is what the government should be doing.

[Translation]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, it is my duty to present a petition signed by some of my constituents who claim that the goods and services tax will be bad for Canadians.

[English]

These petitioners support their claim by saying that the Tory government has increased the present manufacturers' sales tax from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent in less than five years. The Conservative government wants to impose on these Canadian consumers a goods and services tax which will be hidden. We would be the only country in the world having a two sales tax system, with each tax administered by a different level of government. The imposition of the tax will create an onerous burden on small businesses. The petitioners pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I also rise under Standing Order 36, to present a petition from a number of constituents in southwestern Ontario, duly certified by the clerk of petitions, which calls upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

This is among a number of petitions that I have received at fall fairs throughout my riding which, unfortunately, are locked in the clerk of petitions' office now and which I will be presenting at a later date.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise as I have before and no doubt will again under Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by numerous Canadians, calling on the government to maintain VIA Rail Canada, to upgrade VIA Rail and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate.

This petition today is particularly appropriate, given the expressions by American rail companies of interest in operating a passenger rail service in Canada. Basically, these petitioners simply call on the government to reject the tender overtures of "Massah" to the south and rebuild a Canadian rail passenger network.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, I am honoured today to rise in the House and present a petition from London East, pursuant to Standing Order 36, which has been certified correct as to form and content. The petitioners pray and call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition on behalf of the Golden Age Association of Bethora requesting that Parliament reject the proposed goods and services tax because of the serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-income Canadians.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent): Madam Speaker, I also have a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, presented by the Golden Age Club of Saint-Laurent, which also asks us to reject this goods and services tax. I have several other petitions as well that are waiting at the Clerk's office.

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is an honour for me to present petitions on behalf of people from London East, London West, and London—Middlesex, as I have in the past, do so now, and will in the future, requesting that this government rescind and reverse this callous tax that it wishes to impose on every man, woman, and child across this country.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Madam Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present to the House four petitions containing a total of 121 signatures dealing with the proposed goods and services tax.

The people who have signed these four petitions are all in the riding of Scarborough West, and call upon the House to categorically and unequivocally reject any legislation which is brought forward for the purpose of implementing the said goods and services tax.

I am bringing these petitions forward, as I have done each day that I am in the House, and as I will continue to do each day that I am in the House, as I have many hundreds of petitions from members of my riding.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition duly certified by the clerk of petitions.

Canadians are fed up with the 31 tax increases that this government has imposed since 1984, more are in the offing, and they now see the goods and services tax as a sales tax, and on top of that as another tax grab.

I have 30 signatures here of Canadians who call on Parliament to firmly reject this proposed goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36 that has been certified correct by the clerk of petitions. The petitioners point out how disappointed and distressed a number of British Columbians are at the decision of the government to curtail VIA Rail service.

The petitioners point out that they would prefer that the government modernize VIA Rail and provide it with the necessary financing to turn it into a first-class, high speed passenger rail service for Canada, to build an appropriate infrastructure for the future, both in terms of transportation and also for the tourist industry.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my honour and pleasure to present a petition on behalf of concerned Canadians who are adamantly opposed to the goods and services tax.

They humbly request that the government look at what is being done to this country as it relates to taxes, and the fact that young people, in particular, are getting to the point in their lives where they wonder if it is even worth going to work in the morning when they know that the money that they are making is just going to the government to throw away on extravagant affairs, new limousines, and lots of ministers of the Crown.

I ask the government to look at this with seriousness and hopefully come to its senses before it is too late.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, I also have the honour to present a petition signed by people from a number of communities in Manitoba, including Gillam, Winnipeg, Sundance, York Landing, Pikwitonei, and other communities in Manitoba, expressing their concern with the government's intent to cut VIA Rail.

The petitioners believe that it will cost jobs, it is going to hurt the communities that are affected, and that it is part of a plan by the federal government to destroy the Canadian national railway system.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, from certain residents of the city of London. These petitioners have realized the old maxim that "Tory times are hard times", and have signed this petition opposing the goods and services tax to indicate their desire to avoid the worst excesses of this government in taxing them to the hilt.

The petitioners oppose the goods and services tax and call on Parliament to reject this particular legislation.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to table a petition signed by a number of residents from the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, from Cambridge and La Salle, Quebec, from Toronto, Sarnia, Kitchener, London, Wyoming and Guelph, Ontario.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to maintain, improve, and modernize VIA Rail service in those areas of the country where it can provide a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient, environmentally sound, and energy efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

• (1120)

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Madam Speaker, I too have the pleasure and the honour of presenting a petition. It relates to the goods and services tax and has been certified correct as to content and form by the clerk of petitions. There are approximately 40 signatures on this petition. The signatories point out in the petition that the GST will be an unfair burden on ordinary Canadians, and that the 9 per cent tax is unfair. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the so-called GST.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville) moved:

That this House advise the government to scrap the proposed goods and services tax and implement a tax system which is based on the ability to pay and which includes:

1) a minimum corporate tax on profitable corporations;

2) taxation of capital gains income, with the exception of farmland sold for agricultural purposes, small businesses and principal residences;

3) the restoration of an inheritance tax on wealthy estates;

4) effectively progressive income tax; and

5) tax provisions which encourage environmentally sound practices.

He said: Madam Speaker, I rise today to ask the House to reject this proposal in the technical paper on the goods and services tax. We speak directly to the people of Canada, asking them to band together to organize to fight against the Conservative Party in an effort to stop the tax.

I have been across the country recently and I have seen an interesting coalition of people ranging from the trade union movement in this country, many farm organizations, chambers of commerce, John Bulloch and many ordinary Canadians and small business people who are all saying loudly and clearly that enough is enough, the tax should be stopped, and the Conservatives should withdraw their proposition from the House.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, with the GST, there will be a 9 per cent tax on everything in this country: hairdressing, movies, pizzas and funerals. Canadians will have to pay a 9 per cent tax on just about anything.

Madam Speaker, it is high time we said: enough is enough. We have to stop this tax! "Mr. Prime Minister, you lied to us!"

[English]

We can do this if the people of this country stand together as one and say no. If we do not watch out in this country, we are soon going to have the taxes of Sweden and the services of Margaret Thatcher's Britain. That is what this debate is all about.

Who is going to pay? It is going to be the poor people, the ordinary workers, and middle income Canadians, particularly those with a number of children, who will pay. It will be the women who will be the hardest hit in the country. It will be the seniors, along with the women, who will be the hardest hit as well.

About four years ago in Canada there was a great debate over deindexing old age pensions. The seniors of this country got together, they rallied Canadian after Canadian, and they forced a majority government to come to its senses within a few short weeks. I can remember very well in the lobby of the House of Commons one day back in July of 1985, when a woman, Madam Denis said to the Prime Minister: "Monsieur le premier ministre, vous nous avez menti!" "You have lied to us!" That magical moment went across this country on the television screens in French and English. Within a few short days the government across the way came to its senses and withdrew the bill to de-index old age pensions. If we could do it back in 1985 we are going to do it again in 1990 or 1989 in terms of withdrawing the goods and services tax.

Now we go across the country and talk to trade unionists, chambers of commerce, and all kinds of small business organizations. We have seen people holding rallies. My colleague for Edmonton East was at a rally in Edmonton a few days ago of 1,500 to 1,600 people with all political stripes represented and there people were saying: "Scrap the tax. We are not going to pay a tax like this. It is unfair." In Red Deer, Alberta, just two days ago, 3,000 people in the heartland of Tory Canada came out and said "no" to the Prime Minister and "no" to the Minister of Finance.

This tax is part of the Tory agenda to change our country forever. First, we had free trade, then deregulation, then privatization, and now with this tax move we have phase two, in my opinion, of free trade. We have a tax system now that will make up for the loss in tariff revenues, and we have a tax system now that is going to reduce the burden on big corporations so they are more competitive with the corporations in the United States. It is part of the Tory agenda and the people of this country should make no mistake about it.

Since 1984 we have seen a tremendous shift in the tax burden away from big business in this country to the ordinary people. In fact, corporate taxes have dropped by about 21 per cent, while taxes on individuals have skyrocketed since the first Tory budgets back in 1984 and 1985. This move before the country today, which is rallying people of all political stripes in opposition to it, represents the single biggest tax grab in the history of Canada.

Even the Department of Finance is estimating $24 billion, and that estimate is very conservative. It is going to be more like $27 billion, $28 billion, or $29 billion by the time the bureaucrats of the Minister of Finance get finished with it. It is a big tax grab.

Secondly, it is regressive. It is going to hit the poor very hard. We have all kinds of statistics about the poor. Across the way the government is not even going to index the tax credits fully to the cost of inflation. In fact, they only get the increase in the cost of living over 3 per cent. So every year the poor in this country will fall further and further behind. The thresholds are too low. For an individual person in poverty, that individual person if he or she makes $15,000 a year will pay more under the GST than under the present system in spite of the tax credit that is in this legislation. I think that is a shameful disgrace in modern day Canada, a country that is abundant with wealth and technology and people to make it happen and make it work.

It is a tax grab. It is regressive. It is a tremendous transfer in principle of billions of dollars of taxation revenue from big business, from the big corporations in this country to the ordinary people. Because under this legislation, under the technical paper for the GST, business can write off all expenses. It is called a churning process. When they buy machinery and equipment they can write off all the expenses through what is called a tax credit or an input tax credit. They write it off at the manufacturing level, at the wholesale level, at the retail level. They keep writing it off, and writing it off until the ordinary citizen arrives to buy a refrigerator or a stove and the ordinary citizen is then going to have to pay the entire tax bill.

That is a tremendous shift away from progressive taxation in this country, a shift from the large corporations and from the wealthy in Canada to loading the tax on the ordinary citizen. That is why thousands of people are turning out at rallies, and that is why people are sending petitions to the House of Commons.

We will be the only country in the world with a two-tier tax system, with the federal state having one tax and the provinces or the member states having another tax. The provinces have said no.

• (1130)

I had the opportunity last week to talk with Dick Johnston, the Treasurer of Alberta, who is the treasurer most committed to stopping the tax.

We get laughs across the way from one of the ministers. I say to the minister across the way that he has not been at our committee. He has not seen the Retail Council of Canada, whose president is the president of Loblaws, come before our committee and say that a two-tier tax system and the complexities we have will add an extra $2 billion per year in administrative costs for retailers alone. That too will be passed on to the ordinary citizens of this country.

John Bulloch who is no flaming socialist or Marxist, on behalf of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business in this country, is saying that this tax must be stopped. He is saying it is a nightmare, it is complex, it is full of red tape, and it will be expensive to the small business people of this country.

I remember a hairdresser in Regina coming to our committee. Her name is Evelyn Armstrong. She said to us that if this tax comes through businesses that are very price sensitive like the hairdressing business in this country will suffer. Many will go bankrupt. People will have fewer haircuts. They will have less expensive haircuts because of the 9 per cent tax. Much of the business will be driven underground as people open up part-time beauty salons and part-time hairdressing shops in their basements or in spare rooms.

This tax is a tax grab. It is regressive. It is a change from big business to the consumer. It is a two-tier system which will cost a lot of money. It is complicated.

We have had witness after witness come to our committee and ask questions that cannot be answered by the Department of Finance. For example, why is a birth control pill not taxable and yet a condom is taxed at 9 per cent?

If you go into a donut shop and eat six donuts with a cup of coffee and read your paper on a Saturday morning, those six donuts are taxable because a donut shop is called a restaurant and you are eating them in the shop. But if one of these big, fat, wealthy Tories across the way who picks up his donuts and eats them at home, they are not taxed because it is called a basic grocery.

Why do we have this complexity in a law that will create all kinds of red tape and bureaucracy for the ordinary citizen and for the small business person?

The tax, despite promises by the minister across the way, will not be visible. It will not be visible to the ordinary person so that he can see what he will pay. These are promises that have been made by the Conservative Party and the Conservative government time and time and time again.

Instead of having a goods and services tax on absolutely everything except basic groceries and prescription goods in this country, our party is arguing that we need alternatives to this system of a consumption tax. We are saying that there are alternatives where the rich people in this country should pay their fair share and where the big corporations in this country should pay their fair share so that we can maintain the services that the ordinary folk of Canada need in order to live a decent standard of living in a wealthy country called Canada.

We can only get that if people band together and say no to the tax, stop this tax, and look seriously at some of the alternatives. I can say to you that it concerns me when I see people like Link Nifield and others in Alberta and different parts of this country organizing a campaign not only to stop the tax but to cut back on spending and services by the Government of Canada.

Sure, there is a lot of waste in the Government of Canada. There is a lot of stupid spending like $800,000 on a government ad to promote a tax that has not even passed. I know that there is a lot of crazy spending going on. We must not get carried away by cutting back on the federal budget by billions and billions of dollars. When ordinary people who depend on their pensions for their livelihood will be the ones who will be affected.

We cannot give credence to the movement that it has already started to end universality on social programs through a clawback of family allowances and a clawback of old age pensions. We cannot give credence to the movement in which there is now a cut-back in Established Programs Financing of 1 per cent for medical care and post-secondary education. That is not the way to go when we have a campaign to stop this tax.

What we must do is stop the tax. We must rally the people of Canada and say no to the GST. We must say no to this tax that will hurt the ordinary people, the women, the children and the seniors of Canada and at the same time use our resources to make sure we have better social programs and jobs for every single Canadian and opportunities in the future for the people of Canada.

We should consider a series of alternatives by which we can get some money to create more wealth in this country, and we suggested that in our motion today.

One of our recommendations is a minimum corporate tax, something so radical that even Ronald Reagan introduced it into the United States a few years ago. A minimum corporate tax would raise at least $1 billion per year in this country which could be spent on creating jobs, on research and development, and on better pensions for the seniors of Canada.

We should also have a capital gains tax to raise a lot more money than we are raising, with the exemption of course for the family farm, the small business and the individual residence that a person has. But outside that, why should capital gains not be taxed in the same way as another dollar or another buck is taxed in Canada? If we did that we would have hundreds of millions of dollars per year more to spend on programs to reduce the discriminatory sales taxes that we already have, which penalize ordinary people from one part of Canada to the other.

Another way of reforming our tax system is to reduce the tax expenditures now which go out to the wealthy and the big corporations in Canada. We have had study after study and economist after economist who have said that there is negligible benefit, if any benefit at all, from many of these tax expenditures that we are now seeing.

Fourth, we must once again increase the marginal tax rates on the rich in Canada. It does not make any sense that under the last phase of tax reform that the tax rate for the wealthiest Canadians was reduced from 34 per cent to 29 per cent. Someone making $100,000 will be paying a maximum tax to the federal government of 29 per cent, but someone making $1 million is still going to be paying 29 per cent to the federal government.

That is not a tax system based on the ability to pay. That is not a tax system that is progressive. That is a tax system that is regressive. The ordinary citizen who is struggling out there at a minimum wage or a single parent family with a couple of kids should know that under the Conservative party they are going to be paying more and more and more for movies, pizza, McDonald burgers which they are picking up at McDonald's, while rich Canadians are going to be paying less and less because the Conservative party has lowered their taxes through lowering the marginal tax rate.

I suggest we go back to what we had in this country before, more tax rates and much higher marginal tax rates for the wealthy. Instead of 29 per cent let us go back to at least 34 per cent, and my personal preference would be much higher than that for the extremely wealthy in this country.

Why do we not look at a wealth tax? In Canada today the top 20 per cent of our people own 69 per cent of the wealth and the bottom 40 per cent of Canada has only 2 per cent of the wealth. We are one of only a couple of countries in the OECD that does not have a wealth tax at all. It is the ordinary worker and the farmer who is doing the work and creating the wealth in this country, and it is the rich who are getting richer and it is the rich who are not paying.

In Canada the Bronfman family alone controls or owns some 459 corporations in our country; the Irving family, 138 corporations; and the Weston family, 117 corporations. Poor old Peter Pocklington is one of the poorest big guys in Canada and yet when he gets into trouble every government, particularly Don Getty and Lougheed, will bail him out. He is a big welfare case. Yet, we do not have a wealth tax. We do not have a wealth tax, but we spend all kinds of money from the federal government year after year subsidizing the Pocklingtons and the Westons and the Irvings and corporation after corporation. They make their millions and there is no wealth tax.

What will be the consequences of this tax deal? Madam Speaker, if you had come to our committee about two weeks ago you would have noticed that the Conference Board said to us that in the first three or four years under the GST corporate profits in Canada will be increasing by $10 billion and disposable income going down by $17 billion.

Yet, the Minister of Fiance and his bureaucrats in their ivory towers in Ottawa say: "Well, there is only going to be an increase in inflation of 2–1/4 per cent, and it will only be 2–1/2 per cent because the workers in this country will restrain themselves. They will not ask for any increase". Where are they living? The workers of this country are going to have to have a major wage increase to keep up with the increased in the cost of living.

You can look at the Conference Board, Wood Gundy, Informetrica and economist after economist to see that the increase in the cost of in inflation is not going to be 2 per cent. The increase in inflation will be more like 4 per cent or 5 per cent because of the GST. Add that to the regular projection of about 5 per cent or 6 per cent and the increase in inflation will be 10 per cent or 11 per cent in 1991.

How does the Minister of Finance expect the worker to take the brunt of this tremendous government induced inflationary push in 1991? Then, the minister and his naive officials say that the existing manufacturers' sales tax, which will be $18 billion by 1991, will be passed on in its entirety to the people of Canada. Imagine that. The naivety of the Minister of Finance and his officials to say that every single dollar of the $18 billion existing federal sales tax and manufactured sales tax would be passed on.

Have you ever seen a case, Madam Speaker, where there has been a major tax decrease and the money ends up in the pockets of the consumer? If you have, please get up and tell me about it because I have not seen that. The ordinary people of this country have not seen that. When the price of crude oil drops or is dropped by the OPEC countries, we do not see the entire drop at the gas pump in Kamsack, Saskatchewan or Chicoutimi, Quebec.

[Translation]

No, Madam Speaker, the GST is not a progressive tax for Canadians, definitely not. The GST is a very regressive tax. The GST is a tax that will collect a lot of money from Canadians across Canada, about 24, 26, 27 or 28 billion dollars worth. It is now time for Canadians to say "No"in this Chamber, to this Prime Minister, this Minister of Finance and this Government.

[English]

If we get together as Canadians, if we listen to the people of Canada, we can say to the government that enough is enough, scrap the tax, bring in a new system that is progressive, where the rich will pay, where the corporations will pay, where the friends of the Tories will pay. Madam Speaker, they are not listening to the ordinary people of Canada. If they cease to listen, then in the next election campaign they will never again sit on the government side of the House.

Mr. Mifflin: Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member's presentation, advocations and admonitions on the goods and services tax. I must say I agreed with a lot of what he had to say. There were certain elements that I would certainly like to hear a little more about.

I was struck by some of the alternatives that he suggested in his point program. One particular point I would like the hon. member to amplify on is his concern about the level of taxation on big business and corporations. I wonder if he could just amplify his view on the gap between the corporate tax rate in Canada and the United States and what effect that has on where business is going to be, particularly with respect to the goods and services tax and the ambience that has created. Also, will he give us his views but particularly recommendations that he may have on taxing big business?

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, I think if he looks back at the changes in tax in this country, my friend, who is a fairly new member of the House of Commons, will realize that it was a previous Liberal government that started this change of reducing the tax load on corporations in Canada, reducing the tax load on wealthy people in this country.

I remember finance ministers like Mr. Benson and Mr. MacEachen, and a certain gentleman named Jean Chrétien whom I am sure you have forgotten, and another fellow who is now Leader of the Opposition. I can remember all these people bringing in tax measures that gradually let the tax load of the corporations go down, down, down. That is one reason why the Liberal Party in this country almost disappeared in 1984. They became known as the party of the rich, the party of the wealthy, and the party of big business in Canada.

I know that even my friends like the Liberal Whip were so embarrassed in those days that he was even more red in the face than he is today, seeing how right wing his party has become. I know he has done a little bit to try to remedy that, but I remind him that a Liberal in opposition is much more progressive than a Liberal in government. They are like a leopard, they tend to change their spots.

What we need in this country is a truly progressive tax system based on the ability to pay. What we need in this country is to make sure that the rich pay their fair share and that the corporations pay their fair share.

What we need, instead of a massive consumer tax on ordinary Canadians, is a progressive tax. I have mentioned a wealth tax as a possibility. Another possibility is a merger tax when you have corporate mergers in Canada. Another possibility is increasing the corporate tax rate in Canada. Another thing that I have mentioned, which Reagan did in the United States, which is surely not a radical proposition, is the minimum corporate tax on profitable corporations. Another possibility is ending some of the write-offs for excess interest that corporations can claim and some of the dividend tax credits that wealthy people in this country can claim. There are many, many things we can look at in terms of reforming the tax system.

I hear a voice across the way from the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce. The voice across the way must know that the national Chamber of Commerce of Canada, at its convention in St. John's three weeks ago, said no to the GST.

Mrs. Dobbie: No they didn't.

Mr. Nystrom: Said no to this proposition by the Minister of Finance and they were responding to their grassroot Chamber of Commerce across Canada.

They responded because the ordinary small business person is saying that this proposition is too complicated and that this proposition will hurt small business. It will help the big company. It will help the manufacturer. It will put the small person out of business.

They were also saying to the Chamber of Commerce leadership at that convention that they do not want to be the tax collectors on behalf of the Government of Canada. I suspect also that they too, like a lot of us, do not look forward to about 6,000 or 7,000 more bureaucrats being hired as tax collectors. So I say to the voice of the Chamber of Commerce in Winnipeg that now sits in disguise as a Tory MP in the back benches that she should listen to her former organization and perhaps she would be a bit educated about the damage that GST is going to cause Canada as it turns us into a major recession.

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, I was interested in listening to the member. It is always interesting how the NDP can take a reasonable proposition such as tax reform and turn it into a rant and rave and turn every Canadian against the very possibility of having any reform.

Since the hon. member has turned into a political historian, perhaps the whole House should engage in a little bit of a history lesson. Those of us who are from the west are very familiar with the history of the NDP governments in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. Each, in turn, marked the bankruptcy of a provincial government. They come to the national House hoping that nobody reads a paper in Saskatchewan, nobody reads a paper in Winnipeg, nobody reads a paper in Vancouver and Victoria, and that Canadians do not realize that these are the very people who tried to bankrupt them.

They talk in great terms about the working people. What did they do with the working people in Winnipeg, the working people in Regina, the working people in British Columbia? They increased their taxes year after year after year.

They talk about Mr. Benson. Well let us talk about the governments of Barrett. Let us talk about the governments of Shchreyer. Look what happened to Howard Pawley. Some of the great defeats in Canadian political history have been the defeats of provincial NDP governments on this very tax issue. This is the same party. I would like the hon. member to respond. He has the gift of the gab in the national House, but he refuses to accept the responsibility for what his provincial counterparts have been doing for the last three decades.

Mr. Nystrom: Madam Speaker, let us continue the history lesson on western Canada and social democracy. In Saskatchewan, the CCF, under the leadership of Tommy Douglas, took over office in 1944 and stayed there until 1964. During 20 years of government in Saskatchewan there was not a single budgetary deficit in the history of that political party with that Premier. That continued with Woodrow Lloyd as Premier during three of those last years.

I know the man from Winnipeg North Centre does not know anything about history. He is not a student of history. In 1971 Allan Blakeney was the elected Premier of Saskatchewan and he stayed there for 11 years. Every one of those 11 years saw either a budgetary surplus or a balanced budget in the province of Saskatchewan. That is not bad for a social democratic party that led the way. It was a social laboratory in this country in terms of social programs and later on, in the Blakeney years, economic programs through the mixed economy, the potash corporation, and the co-operative movement.

On my left sits a former Minister of Finance from British Columbia. When the present member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca was Premier of British Columbia he brought in three or four budgets and every single one of those budgets was not only a balanced budget but a budgetary surplus.

I do not want to embarrass the member for Winnipeg North Centre by going closer to home, but I remember Ed Schreyer very well. I think in the Schreyer years four out of four were balanced budgets in Manitoba. Were they not four out of four in the Schreyer years?

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Nystrom: I understand my friend from Winnipeg North Centre knows nothing about history. He is not an historian. He has never done much reading in terms of the background of western Canadian politics, but he did not know that. I think the record of New Democratic Party governments in the west speaks for itself. They are fiscally very responsible, they have done very well. They have brought in new social programs.

Quite to the contrary, what has happened to the Liberal Party? Every single progressive measure in Canada brought in by the Liberal Party was brought in because they were being pushed and pulled by the CCF, by Woodsworth, Knowles, Douglas, and Lewis, and my friend from Ottawa—Vanier knows that. He knows that. That is why his face now is as red as his Liberal tie.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak this morning on the subject of tax reform, in connection with the motion moved by the New Democratic Party.

[English]

If there is a good and useful consequence of the proposal to introduce a goods and services tax in Canada, I believe that it may be that it will raise in Canada the realization that the time is now overdue for real tax reform on a broad and general basis in this country.

It is more than 25 years now since the appointment of the last Royal Commission on Taxation, headed by Kenneth Carter. It is many years since the results of that Carter Commission report were enacted into the 1971 tax reforms, and things have changed monumentally since those days. The needs of governments, the involvement of governments at all levels in our economy and in our affairs as a people have changed. The complexity of the modern world has increased significantly. The complexity of our underlying tax system has increased apace.

As somebody who has spent a lot of time before coming into this place working with the tax laws, I have been concerned about that for a while. I drew out this morning my most recent edition of the Income Tax Act. I can still lift it. It is about 1,500 pages long. You cannot travel with it on an aircraft in Canada because it will not fit under the seat in front of you. If we have ever reached the point when it was time for us to stand back and take a look at the tax system that exists to see where we are going as a nation, now is the time.

fit under the seat in front of you. If we have ever reached the point when it was time for us to stand back and take a look at the tax system that exists to see where we are going as a nation, now is the time.

What we need to do in Canada is to recognize that after all of the rhetoric, after all of the changes, after all of the shifts from income tax to consumption tax, from corporate tax to personal tax, to goods and services taxes, from manufacturing taxes, after all that there is one taxpayer in Canada. It is the same taxpayer who pays his municipal taxes, who pays his municipal water rates. That is the one who pays provincial taxes and that is the one who pays federal taxes.

Unless we can get together as a country and look at the compounding problems of federal, provincial, municipal taxes, we will never sort ourselves out of this mess. The power to tax is the power to destroy. I believe that the latest measures brought forward by the government opposite have a great deal of potential for destruction of our economic well-being.

Last week in Vancouver the mayor came to speak to the finance committee studying the GST. He brought this point forward. There is one taxpayer. The municipal taxpayer in Vancouver is the same individual who is being called upon to pay the goods and services tax.

In Alberta, the treasurer spoke to us at length about the need for provincial tax points that were being eroded by the goods and services tax. The need for reform, surely, is obvious to all of us, not just in terms of the complexity that arises out of the volume that we need to go through in order to understand the current income tax system, but in terms of the normal objectives of a tax system: equity, fairness, economic efficiency, and, in Canada, some special concerns.

There are the stresses on nationhood, the stresses that arise from the need for the regions to be able to realize their objectives within the context of this country. Stresses are felt in the west, stresses are felt in Atlantic Canada, and especially in the north. We look at what is happening with what the government opposite calls tax reform and we see that those stresses are going to become more acute in the years to follow.

Then we have the environmental imperative. There is a need in whatever measure we undertake in this country to understand the direct and indirect consequences for environmental well-being that is the overriding preoccupation of all of our people.

What we have had over the last five years is not tax reform, even though the proposals have been packaged in a document that said all over the outside of it "Tax Reform" la réforme fiscale. What we have had is ongoing ad hockery. We have had a willingness to look for each and every way possible to increase government revenues, to grab money out of the pockets of the Canadian taxpayers.

That is not tax reform, that is a tax grab. What has happened to overall government revenues over the last four or five years? They have increased by more than $40 billion and yet the deficit remains at the level of $30 billion. This is in spite of the fact that for the last seven years, beginning in 1982, the western world has had an unprecedented period of economic growth and prosperity that the government should have been benefiting from. Instead, it has doubled the national debt. Instead, it has reached into the Canadian taxpayers' pockets and torn out more than $40 billion more than it ever took before. Instead, it has shifted the burden of government service downstream more and more onto the provinces and the municipalities of this country. It has allowed the Canadian infrastructures that are so important to our existence as a nation to erode and deteriorate.

The latest example is VIA Rail.

Meanwhile, the Trans-Canada Highway is in a state of disrepair and the rivers are polluted, and it is called it tax reform. What about the consultative process? We had a consultation is what they will say. We had the Standing Committee on Finance study tax reform, Phase I and now it is studying Phase II under the amiable chairmanship of the member for Mississauga South, that great promoter of grade five education.

What did they study under Phase I? They studied a package called reforms which consisted of lowering the rates, broadening the base, removing some exemptions and simplifying the structure by reducing the number of tax brackets. Simplification? Well, we talked about that before the election but really it is not as important as overall reform, they said.

The act is much wider, much broader and much heavier than it was before 1984 as we come out of the first phase of Tory tax reform. It is much more complicated. In fact the last enactment that simplified income tax at all was brought in by Finance Minister Lalonde when he simplified the rules for small business taxation. There is no overall consultative process, no study of alternative policies. There is no look at where we are going as a country or at the overlap between federal and provincial tax burdens. No, we reduced the number of brackets from ten to three.

I guess that simplified it for some opposite. Frankly, most Canadians never found it all that difficult to go to the back of their guide and work out their rate. Have they made it more fair? What we have discovered in looking at the effects of net tax increases over the years since 1984, according to the Canadian Council on Social Development, is that there has been a significant shift in the burden of taxation in this country and that burden is now being borne by families. Since 1984 the Canadian family with a poverty line income has experienced an increase in taxes of 61 per cent. That is where the burden is being borne. For the average income family, it is 29 per cent and for the upper income family, 7 per cent.

When you look at what has happened to the Canadian tax system overall since 1984, you discover that in spite of all the pro-family rhetoric we sometimes hear across the way, the real way in which it could be helping families in Canada is ignored by the Conservative government. It does not care about families.

Then there is the essential dishonesty of its approach to tax reform. What kind of system is it, what kind of government is it that comes forward before an election and says that it is lowering taxes, that you will get bigger refunds on July 1, 1988, just in time for the November election? A few months later, after the election is safely out of the way, it increased taxes.

They talk about two phases of tax reform. Phase I will lower taxes and Phase II, which is revenue neutral, will fix up the manufacturers' sales tax, that old chestnut that needs to be repaired. What happens? After the election is over and after they are safely in office, we find that the reform of the manufacturers' sales tax is a poorly disguised tax grab.

Then we have the elimination of universality, those social programs that were a sacred trust. The government said it would never touch them. People who bought and paid for old age securities in the years before 1971 were assured by the House of Commons in debate when tax reform went through in 1971 that they would continue to be entitled to universal old age security. It is gone with a stroke of the pen. Who cares about them? They are old anyway.

I want to talk a little about the goods and services tax. This tax is the single most significant change to the Canadian tax system since the introduction of the income tax in 1917. This is not a temporary measure. This is a measure that will bring with it an incredible federal bureaucracy, thousands and thousands of tax police across Canada hired to enforce it, a paper burden on small business. In short, it is a burden that will be borne by all Canadians for the rest of their lives. There will be no way out of this tax once it is implemented.

What is it? What does it represent? We know first of all that it is a tax grab. We know that the minister's promises before the election of revenue neutrality were nothing more than words. They were nothing more than pre-election rhetoric. They were simply false. According to the Department of Finance, we may raise $24 billion and some out of this tax, $24 billion compared to the $18 billion that is being raised by the manufacturers' sales tax after this government increased it by 50 per cent from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent in its five years in office.

The $24 billion is a low estimate. Some of the estimates are as high as $30 billion. If the experience of New Zealand which the government likes to recommend to us is any indication, $30 billion might be a low estimate.

This new tax is a shift in the tax burden. It is a shift from big business to small business, it is a shift from central Canada to the regions, it is a shift from corporations to consumers, it is a shift from manufacturers to services. The government will deny this. It says:"the manufacturers' sales tax, you do not think that just because we collect it from the corporations that they end up paying it, do you? No, no, corporations pass that on, after all its the people who buy their products who pay the tax". That is nice in economic theory, but it makes one wonder why the Conference Board of Canada went through its projections on what would happen when the implementation of the GST was completed to corporate income.

The gross domestic product in Canada is actually declining in the first year, 1991, and very marginally increasing in subsequent years according to the Conference Board of Canada. Corporate profits increase in 1991 by $.6 billion, in 1992 by $4.9 billion, and in 1993 by $3.9 billion. I ask you, how does that happen? That is by how much the corporate profits are going to increase after the implementation of this tax.

There is only one of two explanations. Since we have seen from the same projections that the economy is not particularly growing, certainly not growing at that rate, where is the additional corporate profit coming from? What it means is that the manufacturers' sales tax was either not being passed on but was being eaten by the manufacturers to some extent, in other words being borne by the shareholders—and we might wonder what the nationality of those shareholders is—or the other explanation is that the corporations will simply not pass on the 13.5 per cent savings when they realize them at the elimination of the MST. That would not be inconsistent with what happened in 1978 when the Minister of Finance, Jean Chrétien, reduced the manufacturer's sales tax from 12 to 9 per cent.

What else is the GST? It is a deluge of complexity. John Bulloch of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business told us that it is going to be a nightmare on Main Street. We will be the only country in the world with a fully integrated, consumer level, two-tiered sales tax with different exemptions, different rates and different complexities. Every mother and father store owner across Canada, every retailer, every restaurateur and every service, unless they are generating revenues of less than $30,000 a year, is going to have to figure out how to collect it, how to pay it, how to differentiate it from the retail sales tax. It is a mess.

Anyone who brings in New Zealand as an example of how the thing might work is just out of their minds. New Zealand is a unitary state with no provincial or state governments. There is no complexity there. It is a state in which internal transportation costs are of no consequence. There is no basis of comparison there.

• (1210)

The Retail Council of Canada called this new tax an unspeakable act of self-mutilation. These are the Tories' friends. Imagine having friends like that, Madam Speaker. Then there is the regressive nature of the tax. It is regressive. They say regressivity can be addressed with the refundable tax credit mechanism. That is the solution for all of it. All you have to do is file an income tax return and you will get four quarterly payments a year, making the tax progressive. We will find all those poor people, the illiterate people, the people who are out of sight and who are not on anybody's computer, and we will say: "Here is your T-1, please complete it and file it, and the government will send you a cheque." Thank you for progressivity, Mr. Wilson.

What about food? We have heard before the committee again and again, and we have heard statements by the chairman and the vice chairman of the finance committee, that it would be a good idea to broaden the base by taxing basic groceries. That would make things so much simpler, they say, and then we can lower the rate.

The food retailers told us that they were not worried about the complexity of having basic groceries exempt, that they are used to doing that under the retail sales tax systems in nine provinces, that it is no big problem. But the effect of taxing food on regressivity is very significant because it is clear that low-income people spend a much higher proportion of their incomes on food, on basic groceries, than do other Canadians, especially upper and middle-income Canadians.

Although the government seems incapable of finding a solution to the fact that there is no luxury tax, it is saying there are anomalies here, for instance, caviar will be exempt, and cartons of milk from McDonald's will not be. Surely those can be addressed with a little bit of ingenuity. There must be a good rationale for this magnificent tax, there must be one somewhere.

The government says the exporters need it. Well, those raving socialists at the Fraser Institute told us last week that the exporters do not need it. They are already getting government support and subsidies of 1 per cent, which is equal to the component of the manufacturers' sales tax contained in their exports. So it is a complete opposite.

The government says that the manufacturers need it for domestic consumption. Surely the best minds in Canada can find some way to solve any problems that are arising from domestic consumption with respect to the manufacturers' sales tax. The real problem that our manufacturers and exporters face is the consequences of the government's monetary policy, the high interest rates, 4 per cent above the U.S. rate.

What I am suggesting today is that what we need in Canada is a full review of the tax system. I agree with the essence of the New Democratic Party motion that the goods and services tax should not be proceeded with, but I do not agree with its suggestion that we can patch up the tax system with a series of minor amendments. Therefore, I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, the following amendment to the motion which is before you today, Madam Speaker, that will propose an over-all review of our tax systems in Canada.

I move:

> That all of the words in the motion following "goods and services tax" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> and after full and thorough consultation with Canadians and in full co-operation with the provinces to bring about the reform of taxation in Canada, including personal and corporate income taxes and other taxes based upon the following principles:
> (1) fairness;
> (2) simplicity;
> (3) the ability to pay; and
> (4) consistency with the environmental imperative of sustainable development.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Hon. Member for Ottawa South was kind enough to send a copy of his amendment to the Chair prior to taking the floor in debate, so I have had a chance to examine the procedural acceptability of the motion.

[Translation]

I first want to thank the Hon. Member for his co-operation, which I greatly appreciate.

[English]

However, I have doubts about the acceptability of this amendment. I will refer the hon. member and everyone in the House to citation 482 of Beauchesne's which reads as follows:

> On an allotted day, during consideration of the business of Supply, an amendment must not provide the basis for an entirely different debate than that proposed in the original motion.

In my opinion, the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Ottawa South does this. It takes away what is on the table today and brings a new suggestion.

I could also refer the hon. member to a ruling by Speaker Lamoureux in his Decisions page 322. We are faced with a situation similar to this. Speaker Lamoureux said:

> The proposed amendment does more than qualify or amend the main motion; it seeks to provide a basis for an entirely different debate. Furthermore, when the opposition parties agree on the choice of subject for an allotted day, "the spirit of fair play would require that the day not be taken away by means of an amendment". The Standing Order requiring notice would be pointless if, after notice had been given, the motion were amended to make possible the consideration of an entirely new facet of the question.

Thus, with respect, I must rule the amendment out of order and not permissible at this time.

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Questions or comments.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to my hon. colleague's presentation and I found again, as usual, that he raises some very appropriate points in terms of opposition to the general sales tax.

I have one question for him. He will recall that in our motion we suggested that one source of revenue would be an inheritance tax, recognizing of course that of the western industrialized nations all but two have such a tax. We in Canada had such a tax until in the early 1970s the Liberal government decided to do away with it so that if you inherited an incredibly wealthy estate there would be no tax on it. We are one of the two countries in the western world not to have an inheritance tax.

I wonder if the hon. member could explain why the Liberal Party thought that was an appropriate amendment to the tax act, to remove an inheritance tax from our system.

Mr. Manley: Madam Speaker, first of all, it is time, as I said in my speech, for us to review all taxation in Canada. I think that in order to do that reasonably a full consultative process across the system would include a review of wealth or inheritance taxes as part of the possible solution to the increasing demands that there are for government revenue. I do not think that can be discarded.

In specific answer to the question raised, what happened with tax reform in 1971 was two things. First, there was the introduction of the capital gains tax to the system which was intended to and which, until the Tories began tinkering with it a few years ago, did result to some extent in a realization of taxation on wealth at the time that a person died through the deemed realization on death of assets.

The other thing that happened in 1971 when the federal government abandoned the estate tax was that it was really given over to the provinces, many of which continued to have estate or succession duties for quite a few years after 1971. Ontario continued until 1979 to have a succession duty which is a wealth tax on death.

There are many problems with the capital gains tax. The first thing this government did in that memorable budget that the Minister of Finance presented in May 1985, in which it also attempted to deindex old age pensions, was to introduce a $500,000 capital gains exemption. The government said it was in order to stimulate economic activity, to reward risk taking.

With respect, the investment of money in real estate in Florida, which was equally exempt when there are gains realized, does not stimulate economic activity in Canada. Its total inability to be able to target a capital gains exemption so that it achieved the economic goals that it claimed it should have was demonstrated by that budgetary measure.

The government has not fully backed away from that measure yet. The move to 75 per cent inclusion is a good one in that direction, but overall it has failed in analysing the needs of the revenue with respect to the capital gains tax. The government has never gone back to the principles established by Carter and asked itself how it could make the system work better and more fairly.

I certainly think that wealth taxes and inheritance taxes need to go back under consideration by all of us. But really what underlies the needs of the Canadian tax system is a system of consultation and overall reform so that everybody feels that we have come out of this with a better and fairer tax system.

Ms. Greene: Madam Speaker, it is my understanding that the member's party, as well as the New Democratic Party, endorsed the findings of an all-party parliamentary committee which recommended that we remove the manufacturers' sales tax and that a value added tax on the broadest base possible be established.

I am just wondering how the member can be so inconsistent with the previous recommendations of his party, and how he can now at this point in time—years after tax reform has been well established and gone through a proper process, and the manufacturers' sales tax has been examined—basically urge Parliament to start all over again.

Mr. Manley: Madam Speaker, I might say that I am delighted at the question. The inconsistency in this is not on this side of the House at all. The inconsistency is over there. It was over there that there was proposed to be a replacement of the manufacturers' sales tax by a one-tiered tax across Canada, by a visible tax across Canada, by a tax that was going to be revenue neutral, by a tax that was going to be fair to low-income Canadians, by a tax that was going to benefit middle-income Canadians. None of those promises have been met, none of them.

The point about New Zealand is the key one, and this is the point that was raised again and again by the Tories' friends when they came to the finance committee. The chambers of commerce said withdraw this tax, it cannot work in a two-tiered system. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business said it is a nightmare on Main Street, withdraw it. Even the Fraser Institute said it is not visible, withdraw it. And the government thinks that we are inconsistent.

Mr. Harvard: Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Ottawa South for an excellent presentation. I agree that we need tax reform and tax review in this country. What we do not need, for example, is that silly history lesson that we got from the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville a few minutes ago. I would have to give it a failing grade immediately.

I have seen the enemy and the enemy is over there, it is among that crowd. The enemy is not Walter Gordon, God bless his soul. The enemy is not Edgar Benson, and the enemy is not Jean Chrétien or John Turner. The enemy is over there, and the enemy is very apparent. We can see him.

We are in a mess in this country. In the past five years the Tories have increased taxes 31 times. What have we got for it? The loss of VIA Rail, some result. Spending is up $42 billion, and what do we get for it? A decimation of UIC, some result. We have borrowed more in this country than ever before, and what have we got? Closure of post offices from one coast to another. We have got free trade which was supposed to do wonders for the economy, and what have we got? A loss of jobs and plant closures. We get tax reform, and what do we get out of that? Just a whopping tax grab called the GST.

I see a pattern here. I see a program that was started five years ago. It all comes together. We are spending more, the government is taking more, and we, 26 million Canadians, are getting less. Do you see a pattern?

Mr. Manley: Madam Speaker, I thank the member for the question. There is a distinct pattern. My friend opposite talked about it as being fiscal responsibility. I beg to differ. What has happened over the last four years is the greatest example of fiscal incompetence that we have had in the history of Canada. We have seen the total tax revenue of the Government of Canada go from some $70 billion or $71 billion in 1984–85 to, in the current fiscal year, $112.4 billion. We expect, based on the projections of the recent budget, that by 1991–92 that is going to be up to $138 billion.

What has really happened here is that the government has, by pursuit of high interest policies, by failure to curb its own wastes and excess in so many ways—the most recent good example being the incredible waste on advertising about a tax that has not been approved by the Parliament of Canada—carried out the greatest tax grab in the history of Canada while at the same time permitting the federal debt to double in four years, half of the national debt of Canada in one term of one government.

What else can they do except to look for newer and better ways to gouge Canadians? The result, of course, is that we are bearing a heavier burden of tax, both at the personal income level and at the sales and excise level, whereas we have seen the continual decrease in the level of taxes borne by corporations. As I pointed out earlier that means that it is the shareholders, whatever nationality they may be, who are benefiting, the consumers and taxpayers of Canada who are paying the bills.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak to the motion today. It will give the government an opportunity to discuss, as we want to have the broadest debate possible on the taxation system in this country.

Before I begin my formal remarks though, I cannot help but make comment on the two speeches that we have heard so far today, which were full of criticism, full of "scrap this and scrap that", so on and so forth, but with very little alternative. I am going to discuss some of the alternatives that the New Democratic Party has in its motion and I am going to pay particular attention to the Liberal solution to the tax situation in this country of having another royal commission, another study. They did that in 1971, as I remember. We saw what transpired from there and there has been some criticism of what has happened from that tax reform today in the House.

I might say to the hon. member that in all fairness—and I am sure he was not misleading the House with his figures—income has in fact increased to the Government of Canada by some $40 billion. I think that is what he said. One of the things he did not point out, and I think in all fairness he should have, was that only 20 per cent of that increase came from tax increases. The other 80 per cent came from the growth of the economy—a million and a half new taxpayers in this country, new jobs that have been created and people paying taxes—and the betterment of our corporations and of small businesses in this country which are paying their taxes as well. He failed to mention that. I think that he should, in his presentation to be fair, have pointed out that a very small portion, one-fifth of that additional income that the government has realized, has come from income tax.

Let us talk about the reforming of Canada's tax system. During the last five years, our government has taken much–needed action to modernize and to improve the fairness of Canada's tax system. It is not done yet, and it is not perfect. I am the first one to admit that. At least this government has taken very positive action. Canada needs a modern tax system in order to meet the challenge of an increasingly competitive global economy.

Today the New Democratic Party said that we should go back to the old ways, that we should leave the manufacturer's sales tax and go back to the old tax reform where we had 10 different levels of taxation. "Let us tax the rich." I remember them campaigning on that once. "Tax the rich." That was the whole theme of their campaign. We know what happened to that.

The NDP think that we in Canada live on this little island and that we do not need to compete in the world, that we do not need to compete with companies in other countries around the world which have tax systems as well. If we tax our corporations out of existence, then they will not be able to compete. We export 35 per cent of what we produce in this country. We have to be able to compete. We cannot tax our corporations out of existence. The NDP would be the first ones to complain about the lay–offs from these plants that had to close down because they could not compete around the world.

We must understand that we are dealing in a global economy. Equally important, Canadians want a tax system that is as equitable as possible. That is what we are attempting to do.

Mr. Riis: Get serious.

Mr. McDermid: I think both parties will admit that I sat very quietly during both presentations.

Mr. Riis: For the first time in history.

Mr. Harvard: Are you not feeling well?

Mr. McDermid: Now the government is giving its presentation and I would like the same courtesy.

Mr. Riis: It's so boring.

Mr. McDermid: If the hon. member for Kamloops wants to sit and heckle all day he can. This is their motion, and he is the only one in the House. He is the only NDP in the House.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member is an experienced member of the House. I could say that out of all of the Conservative caucus there is virtually no one here, but that would not be appropriate.

He ought to be aware that referring to the absence or presence of members in the House is unacceptable. I know that he has a memory lapse from time to time but I would encourage him to recall what the traditions and the rules of the House are and abide by them.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. minister has the floor.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, I always enjoy the interruptions of the hon. member for Kamloops. He is so well informed. I will not mention that nobody is here but him from the NDP any more. I promise.

The measures that we have taken to reform Canada's tax system are part of a comprehensive long–term economic strategy which was laid out before this House in November of 1984. The strategy has been designed to produce a more competitive economy, sustained economic growth and the creation of productive Canadian jobs. It would be much, much easier for our government to let the subject of tax reform drift as past governments have done. For a government that takes its responsibilities seriously that kind of cop–out was just not acceptable.

Our objective is to have the fairest and most efficient tax system that can be designed. I believe that we have made considerable progress toward achieving that goal. In reforming the personal and corporate income tax system, stage one of tax reform was lowered tax rates. We broadened the tax base to increase efficiency and restore fairness to the system.

Our reform package ensures that higher income individuals and corporations pay their fair share of taxes. It ensures that investment decisions are based on economic merit rather than tax considerations and how to beat the tax man. It ensures that individuals in similar economic circumstances are taxed more equitably. It ensures that lower income Canadians bear a proportionately smaller share of the tax burden than higher income Canadians.

Replacing the current federal sales tax with the goods and services tax is another building block in our over-all plan for sustaining economic growth and prosperity. In this regard, it is essential to recognize how important a country's tax system is in determining the competitiveness of its economy. We need a tax system which will contribute to, not detract from, Canada's natural advantages, one that will encourage competitiveness and job creation.

In terms of the existing sales tax I noticed very carefully today that not one of the opposition members mentioned the existing sales tax, not one of them. Not one of them suggested that it be removed. Not one of them suggested that we need a new sales tax system in this country. All they said was, "Scrap it". They never talked about the existing sales tax, with the exception of my hon. friend from Ottawa South who bragged about Jean Chrétien who reduced the federal sales tax rate from 12 per cent to 9 per cent just before an election period back some years ago. That is probably the best thing that he did as finance minister, I might say. I do not want to get into a leadership debate today.

When we look at this existing sales tax we see a tax that has not been fair to either Canadian manufacturers or consumers. It has not been conditioned to economic competitiveness and growth. Let us be clear, this tax is not just a source of academic embarrassment to public finance theorists. This tax hurts Canadians. The present tax is hidden. It handicaps the economy. It is very complex to administer. It is a very unreliable generator of revenue. Incredibly, the current hidden federal sales tax puts Canadian manufacturers at a disadvantage to foreign manufacturers, not only on exports but on imports as well. It is narrowly based. It is inequitable. It leads to all sorts of distortions in the market-place.

Seventy-five thousand firms pay this tax, submit it to government. There are 22,000 special arrangements and administrative interpretations—22,000. So it is not fair even to those 75,000 who are submitting the tax today.

In view of the sorry state of this hidden federal sales tax, there is really no choice but to replace it. Yet the system is a major pillar of our tax structure. It contributes more than 17 per cent of the federal government's revenues annually.

Removing the tax and building a replacement is a challenge of major proportions. Nobody is questioning that. I do not think any of the witnesses who have come before the Standing Committee on Finance have minimized the job of replacing this manufacturer's sales tax. One thing that they all say is, "Get rid of it". I do not think that is part of the debate in this country. I think that is a given. Even the opposition parties in a motion presented to this House unanimously from a standing committee said we had to get rid of it.

There are many approaches to the problem, in theory at least. For example, as an alternative to bringing in new sales tax systems some have argued, and the NDP argue this, that the current tax should simply be abolished and the foregone revenues replaced by a corresponding increase in income tax rates. Supporters of this approach argue that this would allow for a fairer tax system overall. There are, however, some powerful economic reasons for avoiding such an increased reliance on income taxation.

Our current tax structure relies on three pillars: sales tax, income tax and corporate tax. The current federal sales tax next year will contribute about $17 billion in tax revenues. To put this in perspective, if we eliminated the federal sales tax that we have now, which we want to do, and put it on to income tax, Canadians would be paying a 30 per cent increase in personal income tax—a 30 per cent increase in personal income tax. An increase of this magnitude would lead to substantial disincentives to work and invest. There is no question about that.

Alternatively, relying on the corporate tax system for these revenues would require corporate tax revenues to more than double. We would have to double the taxation on all our small businesses, on all our corporations in this country to realize the same amount of money.

Therefore, the real issue is not whether Canada needs a sales tax, but to try to develop a sales tax that is fair and supports growth. Replacing the existing tax with the tax that the government is proposing through its goods and services tax will achieve three important goals. First, it will continue to contribute to the government's ongoing plan to reduce the deficit. It will be a vital element in our plan to make the changes necessary to ensure that Canada can compete effectively in the world and at home. It will improve the overall fairness of the tax system. Lower and modest income Canadians will be better off when the GST is in place.

During the few moments I have left I want to address specifically the points in the motion before the House. The motion suggests that we should introduce a minimum corporate tax on profitable corporations. In the two decades before our government took office governments of the day permitted the corporate tax system to become riddled with special exemptions and deductions. I agree with my hon. friend for Ottawa South when he says the tax act is so thick he cannot get it under the seat of a plane. I never carry the tax thing around, to be quite honest with you. But I guess some people like the hon. member for Ottawa South takes it with him and cannot get it under his airplane seat. I understand that. But he must remember that the Income Tax Act just did not develop in the last four years. That, over the last 20 years, has allowed these special exemptions and these deductions. What it did was encourage wasteful activity and it eroded the nation's tax base.

Let us talk about a minimum corporate tax. That is what some people are suggesting we should introduce. However, this government believed that rather than patching up the tax, which that does—it allows the same exemptions and all the other stuff but you just put a minimum tax on—the best solution was to go to the root of the problem and curtail these special exemptions. The result has been a progressive reform of the corporate tax system over the past six years. This has included measures to generally reduce fast write-offs on capital expenditures, to increase the rate of capital gains taxation, to eliminate the general investment tax credit rates, to sharply reduce special investment tax credit rates, to block the use of various complicated financial schemes, to transfer losses and other tax advantages from non-profitable corporations to profitable ones.

In addition, in the April budget the government introduced the large corporations tax which ensures that all corporations pay federal tax.

The overall impact of these measures is that we will be able to increase annual revenues from the corporate sector by over $2 billion. Furthermore, because the corporate tax base is much broader now, the year to year variations in tax revenue will be more stable in the future than they have been in the past. This will enable the government to plan its programs on the basis of more certain corporate tax revenues. In summary, the federal government has chosen to repair the fundamental weaknesses of the corporate tax system, rather than leave them in place.

The motion suggests that we should tax income from capital gains at 100 per cent, with the exemption of capital gains from farm lands sold for agricultural purposes, small businesses, and principal residences. Under the existing tax, farmers and small businesses enjoy a $500,000 capital gains exemption and the existing tax also does not apply to the sale of principal residences.

However, the government remains committed to the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption for all other taxpayers as an incentive to encourage risk taking and increased equity participation in the Canadian economy. We believe that over time this measure will improve the balance sheets and the financial health of Canadian companies, thus contributing to job creation and higher incomes.

A further incentive to invest is provided by the inclusion rate for capital gains which the hon. member talked about today. The inclusion rate has been increased from 50 per cent to 66 2/3 per cent and is legislated to rise to 75 per cent for 1990 and subsequent years.

I would point out that it is desirable that the burden of Canada's capital gains tax not be significantly above that of other industrial nations. Canada will not be able to attract equity investment that is needed for future growth and job creation if we place an excessive tax burden on capital gains while our neighbours do not. For these and other reasons we believe that the present tax treatment of capital gains in Canada is appropriate.

The motion suggests that we should restore an inheritance tax on wealthy estates. Past experience with estate and gift taxes has shown that these taxes, first, were inequitable and, second, they were inefficient. The hon. member wanted some reasons why it was removed. Third, these taxes were complex to administer. Realizing this, the previous Liberal government abolished estate and gift taxes in 1971. Those taxes were found to be inequitable because of the many avenues of legal tax avoidance open to taxpayers with access to sophisticated tax planning advice and the resources to pursue these opportunities. Such taxes were also inefficient because they encouraged taxpayers to invest their wealth to an excessive extent in those investments that for administrative purposes are tax lightly. Thus they tended to encourage increased investment in farm land and life insurance policies.

A decision by the government to reintroduce estate and gift taxes would likely encourage wealthy Canadians to take up foreign residency—this is what we saw happen before and is one of the reasons why it was changed—and redirect their investment in entrepreneurial activities elsewhere. Do you remember the famous trips to the Bahamas by so many of our wealthy in this country just because of that, because of tax planning purposes? This would deprive Canada, of course, of savings and entrepreneurial talent. We agree with that decision that was taken back in 1971. We disagree with the New Democratic Party.

I guess the most important thing, something which never bothers the socialists, is that it was administratively complex because to be successful revenue raisers, they must be accompanied by complex anti-avoidance measures. Even then, the experience of other countries shows that such measures are largely ineffective. The taxpayers and their advisers appear to be always one step ahead of the tax department. I think the hon. member knows that.

On balance, such a tax as that proposed in the motion would yield small revenues, require complex legislation, be subject to widespread legal avoidance, and perhaps even illegal evasion.

The motion suggests the introduction of a more effective, progressive income tax. I said earlier that the goods and services tax is the second element in the government's comprehensive tax reform package. The first stage that took effect in 1988 involved changes to both personal and corporate income taxes. The personal income tax proposals were designed to produce a fairer, more understandable tax system. These changes also promoted greater initiative and improved competitiveness, thus contributing to economic growth and job creation. The record speaks for itself—1.5 million jobs over the last five years. The key to achieving these goals was to lower tax rates and broaden the tax base.

Lower tax rates improved incentives for Canadians to work, to invest, and to raise their standards of living. More than 85 per cent of all households had their income tax reduced as a result of tax reform. Some 850,000 lower income Canadians had their income tax eliminated. At the same time, income taxes were increased for about one million high income households. I experienced that myself.

These taxpayers included those who had claimed large, special tax preferences or credits. A progressive tax system is one in which every one pays their share, based on their ability to pay.

In 1986, the government introduced the alternative minimum tax to respond to the growing concern at the numbers of high income Canadians who were paying little or no personal income tax. Statistics show that in 1987 there were 39,550 taxpayers subject to the minimum tax yielding revenues of close to $150 million, which resulted in the reduction of a number of high income individuals who were not paying their share of tax. Now only about one-half of 1 per cent of high income individuals are paying little or no personal income tax. They cannot get away with that for much longer than two years when it catches up with them again.

Our commitment to a fairer tax system is apparent in the proposal of sales tax reform as well. A broad tax base, a low rate and targeted assistance to lower and modest income families will ensure that the proposal will be fair.

Are you telling me my time is up, Madam Speaker? I am just getting warmed up, for heaven's sake.

Let me just say on the GST, if I might just have a paragraph, that they keep telling me that it is not fair to low income people. The GST credit will be increased to $225 per adult and $100 per child. The household income level up to which maximum benefits will be paid will be increased to $24,000, so that many more Canadian families will benefit from the credit. It will be delivered four times a year in advance. More than nine million Canadians will receive the GST credit cheques. Families earning less than $30,000 will be better off once the GST is in place.

In addition to the enriched GST credit, the middle income tax rate will be reduced from 26 per cent to 25 per cent. This will provide assistance to middle income families and make the income tax system more progressive.

• (1250)

I realize my time is up, Madam Speaker. I just want to say that I welcome the opportunity to debate this matter today. I thank the New Democratic Party for bringing this motion forward because it gives the government an opportunity to present—and we will have other speakers later today who will go into the goods and services tax in more detail and to explain how it will work—in more detail how it will benefit Canada for many, many years.

Mr. Manley: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to ask the minister a couple of questions about aspects of the goods and services tax that particularly trouble me.

First of all, I think he has taken a bit of the line of his leader in saying, "These people are not allowed to criticize unless they provide a detailed alternative". I would ask him to go back and review the comments that I made. That statement is a form of intellectual dishonesty because we do have an existing tax system in Canada and an alternative has been proposed. If public debate is going to be meaningful on this issue, what we need to do is focus on the proposed alternative and debate that so that Canadians understand exactly what it is that is being proposed. In criticizing that approach he has essentially tried to adopt the strategy, which I am sure he would like, of making the defence and offence.

I would like to ask him about something which truly troubles me about this tax, or two aspects of it. The first is the effect on lower income Canadians. The minister was just referring to the refundable tax credits which are meant to alleviate the amount that this tax is regressive.

If the government is really concerned about ensuring that the tax is not regressive on low income Canadians, why on earth are those tax credits not fully indexed? They are going to erode at 3 per cent a year. These are the poorest, lowest income people in Canada.

The other aspect of this that troubles me is the effect that it will have on our diverse regions. The manufacturers' sales tax is applied at the manufacturing level. The goods are then transported by and large from central Canada to the extremes, especially the north. The new tax will be applied at the retail level. Therefore, in addition to existing excise taxes, it will result in a 9 per cent tax on the transportation costs incurred in getting goods to the regions, the north in particular, a very significant increase.

When the finance committee was in Whitehorse a couple of weeks ago we heard about how the 25 per cent additional cost-of-living burden is experienced in Whitehorse as compared to Edmonton and Vancouver. This is only going to be made worse when the tax is applied on the transportation included price of the goods. I would like the minister's comments on those two points.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, I appreciate those two questions. First of all, on the indexing, as you know the government in its policy back in 1985-86 indexed programs of the government after 3 per cent, with the exception of the senior citizens' pensions which at the time we attempted to do as well. In this particular instance this will follow the policy of the government as stated.

That is not to say that the base level cannot be adjusted from time to time, and is, as the hon. member knows. Even in indexed pension programs and so on and so forth, the base is adjusted from time to time. There is nothing to prevent a government from increasing that base from time to time as is necessary. There is no reason why this will not happen in the future.

For people projecting into 1995 and the year 2000 what this rebate will do based on today's figures is really a little unfair and very hypothetical. As the hon. member knows, governments adjust these bases from time to time, and will continue to do so.

With respect to the second question, everything in the north costs more. It always has. Those people are now paying a 13.5 per cent sales tax which is multiplied upon—they do not know it. It is based on transportation because—

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): No, it is not.

Mr. McDermid: Excuse me, when an individual buys a product that is manufactured they pay a 13.5 per cent tax on it. They will not do that in the future. As the 9 per cent moves through, the business that pays the 9 per cent on transportation can subtract that from the tax they collect. Therefore, the transportation costs are business input costs and thus can be subtracted. I am the first one to admit that things are more expensive in the north, but a succession of governments has recognized this and has given certain tax concessions to people living north of a certain line that is drawn by the government.

Mr. Manley: So will you do it?

Mr. McDermid: It is there, it is in place now. In fact, because of the resource base which is in the north, the resource industries are going to benefit far more from this sales tax than any others. The overall impact in the north is in fact going to be relatively neutral. I think the Minister of Finance said the other day that it was a 1 per cent difference or something because of the overall impact of the GST.

You cannot look at it on a very narrow basis. You have to look at the overall economy of the region. That is what they did not do when they were making their presentations. I looked at those presentations very carefully, but they did not talk about the overall improvement in the resource industry and the competitiveness of the resource industry, the increase of jobs being created and so on. They did not talk about that.

One cannot look at the GST as did the funeral directors appearing before the committee last night, on a narrow basis. When you are discussing the tax you have to look at the overall economic performance and how it is going to affect the economy of this country. In fact, every economist in this country has said that the goods and services tax is an improvement for the output of this country.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Absolutely not.

Mr. McDermid: Check it. We have got figures that show it is costing us $9 billion in production today and that when it is brought in it will increase productivity and increase jobs in this country. That is what this is all about. It is to bring in a fairer, much broader based tax system that in the long run, and even in the short run, is going to be much fairer to the Canadian taxpayers, and it is going to be much better for our economy. When our economy is working, people are working. When people are working, they are paying taxes. When they are paying taxes, then it is not necessary to increase taxes. You do not have to put heavy burdens on one section of the economy or the other. All they want is fairness. That is what this is all about.

Mr. Nault: Madam Speaker, I will place my question as quickly as I can to the minister.

Before I do that, I would like to let him know—and he should know this since he is a minister of the Crown—that the manufacturers' sales tax is not part of the resource base industries as he has indicated. The produce and equipment are exempt as it relates to that. You should know that and maybe you should look it up if you get a chance.

Also, if the manufacturers' sales tax is so bad, something which you allude to in your speech, why is it that it went from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent? Why did it not stay there where it belonged because it is supposedly so bad for Canadians? Please tell us before we retire for lunch why that is so.

Mr. McDermid: I thank you for that. That is the exact reason why. It is an unfair tax but, at the time, we still needed revenue. The government still needed to operate. We had to pay for health care, post-secondary education, social services the costs of which increase every year. Our grants to provinces are going up every year. They had to be paid for. That is why it went up, but it is not fair. The Minister of Finance was the first one to recognize it. That is why he is trying to bring in a fair goods and services tax that will be fair to all Canadians. Thank you for bringing that point up.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of this House a letter which illustrates the outrage my constituents feel at the elimination of VIA Rail service from Halifax to Sydney. The letter is from Mr. Angus O'Neill of Mulgrave, Nova Scotia. Mr. O'Neill states:

> I am writing to let you know we support you in your effort to save VIA Rail, the people's railway.
> This government has forgotten the people, the majority of whom did not vote for them and is serving the millionaire minority who, in large measure, paid for their election. This government also hit our region hardest with the VIA Rail cuts as it has with all of their regressive, repressive measures. Honest governments try to keep election promises but the Mulroney government is trying to break all its election promises.
> It was more ideology than economics or social awareness that motivated Mr. Bouchard's butchery of our passenger rail service. His reasons were dishonest; his facts fiction.

And Mr. O'Neill ends with a story:

> About 15 years ago I left on the Railiner from Halifax at 6.45 p.m. on Christmas Eve. Planes were grounded, buses stopped and cars abandoned. No one worried aboard the train as it pushed on like a snowplow. We got into Havre Boucher station at 3 a.m. Christmas day. The train kept on to Sydney but I and others could not get away from Havre Boucher station until the highway plows cleared the roads at noon.

This government is robbing Cape Breton and eastern Nova Scotia of passenger rail service. It is time the Minister of Transport—

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid the hon. member's time has expired.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE DRESS CODE

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see that the Commissioner of the RCMP, Mr. Inkster, has officially recognized the importance of reasonable accommodation of human differences. He has recommended to the Solicitor General that members of the Sikh religion who qualify to be RCMP officers should be allowed to wear their turbans, ceremonial daggers and beards.

I also appreciate the justice the RCMP has shown in permitting modifications of the traditional uniform to accommodate female officers.

It is encouraging to see that the RCMP is following the example of the Metro Toronto Police in removing barriers which have prevented equal opportunity for all Canadians to join the RCMP.

I urge the Solicitor General to uphold this progressive and sensible recommendation.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the countdown to possible disaster will begin if the U.S. National Aeronautics and Space Administration goes ahead with the launch of a space probe containing lethal plutonium.

From the moment the shuttle is launched to when the probe, called Galileo, makes two high-speed lowl-level flights over earth, this planet will be in danger of radioactive contamination.

The probe is fueled by 49.25 pounds of plutonium, one pound of which has the capacity to kill every person on earth.

The chance for shuttle accidents is now upgraded from one chance in 100,000 to one in 78. Another launch disaster similar to the Challenger holocaust could release lethal doses of plutonium to be spread by winds throughout this planet.

Because Canada has already been the victim of radioactive debris from a Soviet nuclear satellite, and because one of the purposes of the American space probe is for military reasons, Canada must send a letter of protest to NASA for putting the people of this planet at such unnecessary risk.

PUBLISHING

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, the National Library of Canada has recently undertaken a program of mass deacidification of Canadian books. This is necessary because almost all books printed in this century have used acidic paper. However, there are new processes available which allow for the production of alkaline books.

The federal government is a huge user of paper and publisher of documents and therefore it would make sense for the federal government to take the initiative and convert to the use of alkaline paper for publishing documents. Not only would this extend the shelf life of these publications, thus saving money for the National Library, but the reduction in the use of acidic chemicals in paper production would benefit our environment.

This is an opportunity for the government to lead by example and because of the size of its printing operation I believe it would have a major impact.

CHILD CARE

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of members the issue of Canada's child care crisis, and that is exactly what it is, Mr. Speaker, a crisis.

At the present time, we have parents who cannot afford child care; parents who cannot find child care for their children; parents who must put their children's names on waiting lists just to get into a child care facility; and we have child care staff who, under the current system, earn less than workers who look after some animals. This is a shameful situation.

Back on August 11, 1988, the Prime Minister said:

> We want the best of care for our future generation.

The Prime Minister also said:

> This government is committed to social justice for all Canadians. Child care is the centrepiece of that commitment.

I ask, Canadians ask: Where is that commitment?

At this time, we do not need more studies, reports, and task forces. Canadian families need a national child care plan, one of quality, affordability, availability, accessibility, and they need it now. Children are the only group in our democratic society whose political rights are entrusted to another group. This government is not worthy of that trust. If children were given the right to vote—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. member's time has expired.

TRANSPORTATION

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, in view of the recently announced cuts to VIA Rail, and in view of the anticipated increase in the volume of traffic to an already over-taxed highway, will the Minister of Public Works reaffirm his commitment to the constituents of Wild Rose and to the travelling public that he will undertake as an immediate priority, the allocation of sufficient funds in the budget for the 1990–91 fiscal year to continue with the twinning of the Trans-Canada Highway in Banff National Park?

It is imperative that we do everything we can to prevent further unnecessary traffic accidents and fatalities on a hazardous highway which will become more so, as alternatives to it are eliminated.

AIR FARES

Mr. Steve Butland (Salt Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to discuss flying the friendly skies of deregulation with general reference to northern Canada.

Our jet service was, or will be, replaced with some smaller aircraft which will provide us with more frequent flights, although some aircraft will have no toilet, no food service, no physical space, no host or hostess, but we can still anticipate less expensive fares because of increased competition. Mr. Speaker, would you believe it is more expensive for anyone to fly Ottawa—Sault Ste. Marie return than it is to fly to Florida, Puerto Plata, Frankfurt, Amersterdam, Paris, Copenhagen, Brussels, and yes, even Casablanca.

The return flight to Sault Ste. Marie is $509. So much for cheaper fares. And let us not forget the unacceptable 9 per cent sales tax. The skies are less than friendly for the people of northern Canada.

MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Harb) said not long ago in Le Droit: "In 1984, the Mulroney Government stopped paying municipalities the subsidies that until then helped them absorb part of the costs of infrastructure maintenance."

Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre should have done his homework before making that statement, because the Liberal Government terminated the subsidy program for local community services in 1982.

We should remember it was the federal Liberals who lost Canada billions of dollars, for no good reason, with their scientific research tax credit in 1983–84.

Mr. Speaker, that is the program the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre should have mentioned in Le Droit, a program that was cancelled by the Tories shortly after they came to power, a program to which reporter Paul Morisset referred in L'Actualité of February 1987, in the title of his article: The Robbery Of The Century.

ABORTION

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, as members of the House will know, two weeks ago I arranged for the film, Eclipse of Reason, to be broadcast through Oasis on Channel 98. This film discusses second and third-trimester abortion from the medical point of view and depicts the procedure which is endured by the unborn child. I took this action so that members and senators of all parties would be better informed on the medical facts before entering into debate on this issue.

Although I am well aware of just how busy members are during a session, I hope that all took the brief 27 minutes out of their schedules to watch this short but informative documentary. If, however, members were unable to view the film on one of the three days that it was shown, please feel free to contact me and I will arrange a private screening.

• (1410)

I am certain that with this additional perspective members and senators will be better informed about the emotional subject of abortion.

DRUGS

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, the problem of drug abuse and trafficking, and together with the vast chain of associative problems, must become a paramount concern of government and citizens alike. Decisive action must begin in earnest to curb this rising tide which overwhelms large segments of our population and costs such exorbitant sums in policing services and health care.

It has been suggested by the Owen Sound Ontario Board of Police Commissioners, and which I agreed to as well, that all profits of assets seized under the Narcotics Control Act and subject to Bill C–61 be returned to the municipality in which the seizures were made. These funds would be directed into drug education and prevention or treatment programs at the local level, a move in the right direction if we are ever to be successful in cooperating to remove this tremendous loss of potential energy and leadership among our population and to lead us toward a drug–free society.

WOMEN

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Premier of Québec introduced his new Cabinet. Today, I will not comment on individual appointments. I will let history be the judge!

Nevertheless, I think Mr. Bourassa is to be commended for having asked a large number of women to shoulder some very important responsibilities. At Cultural Affairs, Regional Development, Finance, Communications and Status of Women, they will have their work cut out for them.

Mr. Speaker, the women of this country have taken their place in political life, but above all, they have shown that with their skills, judgment, intelligence and sensitivity, they are able to play a major role in public affairs today. It would of course have been better to hear a man say this. I admit that I appropriated this role with all due humility and, Mr. Speaker, I hope the opposite sex will not hold it against me.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, on this the day of the Person's Award, a report has been released in Montreal which gives a startling reminder of the pervasiveness of violence against women in Canada. Women in this country live in fear, fear that they will be raped, abused or assaulted on the street, in their homes, by strangers, by friends, or by husbands. Sadly, their fear is justified. One million Canadian women will be abused by their husbands or partners in the next 12 months. One in four Canadian women can expect to be assaulted in their lifetimes, and half of those women will be assaulted before the age of 17.

Fifty-six per cent of urban Canadian women are afraid to walk alone in their own neighbourhoods after dark. Women who have been abused still face a society which considers them to blame, a society that tells them over and over that they do not have the credibility, the money or the power to fight back.

The women in Canada face a government that has yet to take a leading role in stopping the violence that is directed toward them. The government's allocation of $40 million last spring was a paltry attempt at a short-term fix to a life-long problem.

I urge this government to take a real stand against violence toward women.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, one of the most important communities in the riding of Elk Island is Fort Saskatchewan. This city of over 12,000 people was named after one of the first Northwest Mounted Police forts in Canada. Since 1874, the fort on the North Saskatchewan River has served as a symbol of law and order in Canada.

As part of the foundation of the present day Royal Canadian Mounted Police, this community offers much to the history of Canada. Respect for the RCMP with its rich heritage and long-standing traditions is great not only in Fort Saskatchewan, but also in other parts of the Elk Island constituency.

On behalf of all of the people of Elk Island, I salute our police fort community and celebrate the valuable contribution of Fort Saskatchewan to the history of the RCMP in Canada.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Saskatchewan is attempting to construct a replacement dam in Island Falls in northeastern Saskatchewan without being subjected to a federal environmental assessment and review process.

As was the case with the Rafferty-Alameda project, Premier Devine is saying that he is going to do what he wants regardless of how it affects the province of Manitoba.

Again, Manitoba's Gary Filmon is silent. When the original Island Falls dam was built in the Churchill River in 1927, no environmental review took place. For over 50 years this project has flooded Manitoba Crown lands and Indian reserves. Despite what Saskatchewan is saying, plans for the new dam are very different from the original dam. The dam will change water levels, damage fisheries, wildlife and waterfowl habitats. Navigation and water supply will be negatively affected. The lives of the Mathias Colomb and the Barren Lands band members will be changed forever.

The Minister of the Environment has a duty and he must ensure that a full environmental assessment review process takes place.

THE LATE JOHN WESLEY BEAVER

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, John Wesley Beaver, fondly known as Jack, died in Cobourg after a lengthy illness.

He was a great Canadian, a leader throughout his life, whether as a young man excelling in athletics, winning a middleweight boxing title, or serving his country during World War II as a spitfire pilot in the Battle of Britain and invasion of Europe, or in his professional life as an electrical engineer rising through the ranks of Ontario Hydro to become President and Chief Executive Officer of Churchill Falls Inc. Labrador. Mr. Beaver, a long-time friend, was an Ojibway Indian from the Alnwick reserve in my riding. He was a descendant of generations of chiefs. He himself was chief for four years in the early 1950s. He contributed greatly to his native community, working with it to achieve self-government and to build an economic base through small business on reserves.

His views and counsel will be greatly missed both within his native community and in the corporate world. Our deepest sympathies are extended to his wife Marjory and their children and other members of the Beaver family as we all mourn the passing of this great native Canadian.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POLLUTION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will the real Minister of Finance please stand up?

Some Hon. Members: Oh! Oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I do have a question for the Minister of Finance. For five years this minister has refused to provide any money for the treatment of raw sewage by Canadian cities and towns. In that time, during the custody he has had over our nation's finances, more than six billion pounds of raw sewage have been dumped by Canadian municipalities into Canadian lakes and rivers. Let me put this into context for the House.

Last year alone the equivalent of 150,000 drinking glasses full of chloroform, 84,000 glasses full of arsenic and 2.5 million glasses full of lead were dumped by Canadian municipalities into the Great Lakes.

Does the Minister of Finance, after five years reflection, still not think that this dumping of raw sewage into the Canadian environment and into the Great Lakes system is not a responsibility of the Government of Canada? When is he finally going to put in some money to respond to this crisis?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, perhaps you would allow me to answer on behalf of the Minister of the Environment.

What the right hon. gentleman is reciting here is quite an indictment of the municipalities and the provinces which have the principal responsibility for the treatment of effluent from city sewer systems.

Mr. Gauthier: Pass the buck, is it?

Mr. Oberle Mr. Speaker, it is not true, as the right hon. gentleman asserts, that there has been no action by the federal government.

Mr. Gauthier: What do you mean, it is not true?

Mr. Oberle: We have contributed to research and information. We have assisted municipalities and provinces in tightening up their regulatory process. The fact remains in the end that the responsibility for the management and treatment of effluent remains with the municipalities and the provinces.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister can talk about constitutional jurisdiction. Why do we have a federal Minister of the Environment, why do we have a federal Minister of Health if we are not going to exercise some responsibility at the national level, in conjunction with our municipalities and our provinces, to clean up this mess? He should respond in a more—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1420)

[Translation]

To get back to my question, Mr. Speaker, although it seems the Minister of Finance once again is either unwilling or unable to answer, every year this Tory Government spends four times as much on advertising as it intends to spend on cleaning up the Great Lakes.

Since we all know that companies will now have to commit billions of dollars to clean up our environment, could the Minister of Finance explain why his 9 per cent tax will apply to pollution control equipment?

[English]

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, we are not surprised at the simplistic solutions that the opposition would propose for the clean up of the environment and the clean up of the Great Lakes. It is the same solution they have used in the past and that is to spread money at the troubled waters. That in itself is not the solution.

Mr. Peterson: It is not a national priority you are telling us.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, if that were a solution the problem would not be as severe as it is today. The fact is that the authors of the report published yesterday admit that much research needs to be done. We do not know what the effects are on health. The fact is that action has been taken. Action committees are under way, studying and working to clean up the hot spots. We have mounted two trusts. One in the area of remedial action and a more important one perhaps in the area of preventive measures that need to be taken in close collaboration with industry, municipalities, states, provinces and government.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) Mr. Speaker, the minister is doing a brave job—I say this to the Deputy Prime Minister—in responding to a question the Minister of Finance ought to have answered. He is talking about research. We do not need to research pollution. We need some action in this country. I say to the Minister that he cannot see the forest for the trees on this particular problem.

Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Finance is not responding, I want to put a question to the Minister of Transport. The final recommendation of the report released yesterday jointly by the Institute for Research on Public Policy in Canada and the Conservation Foundation of the United States reads this way and I quote:

> We require sweeping changes in lifestyle from societies increasingly dependent on the motor car for transportation.

How can the Minister of Transport release at the same time his own absurd, ludicrous, ridiculous and even phoney impact study on the cutting of VIA Rail and say that 2.5 million more Canadians travelling by car every year as a result of the cuts will not be increasing the pollution problem in the country? Where has he been living for the last few years?

An Hon. Member: On the moon.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have already tried to explain to the right hon. gentleman the way in which the process has to be worked. I will try again.

First, the law requires the minister responsible to make a preliminary study to see if it is necessary to go forward and go further in terms of environment. The figures here are based on facts. They are there, and the Leader of the Opposition could question all the facts. We have considered the facts which have been proposed by Transport Canada. I should be more specific. They have been totally endorsed by the officers of Environment Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): The Leader of the Opposition says that it is a phoney document. I am sorry, but I have all confidence in the officers of Environment Canada. I can guarantee that those figures are good. There is no reason, based upon those figures, to go further in terms of the environmental study, and we won't, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, if the study to which the Minister of Transport referred is so reliable, where are the figures on nitric oxide and carbon dioxide? Where are the facts, on acid rain and the greenhouse effect, following the cutbacks at VIA Rail? Why wasn't this kind of study done by experts at the Department of the Environment instead of by the Minister's officials?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, everyone except the Liberal Party understands that as far as the VIA Rail network is concerned, it all depends on the number of passengers we take out of the network and put on other modes of transport. We said that theoretically, because some people may take the train, 2,400,000 people would travel by car.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say that since the 70's, 96 per cent of hydrocarbon, carbon monoxide and nitric oxide emissions have been reduced, and that by the year 2000, these emissions will be down to 5 per cent. This started under the previous government. Canada has some of the strictest regulations in the world on emissions of polluting substances, and that is the perspective in which the study was carried out. It is in the same perspective that I say to the Hon. Member for Windsor West that this study is a valid one. It shows it is unnecessary to go any further, because once again, its conclusions are entirely endorsed by the Department of the Environment, by officials of the Department of the Environment, and the study states that it is useless to go any further because the consequences are absolutely negligible.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, we have had nothing from the Department of the Environment other than the Minister's silence and absence.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, it was reported today that a group of American railroaders want to operate three passenger rail routes in Canada in place of VIA Rail's service which the government wants to eliminate. In fact, their spokesman said: "The public has proven that despite the intentions of the federal government it wants passenger rail service and will partronize it when available".

Why doesn't the government allow VIA Rail to continue to operate these services? Why does the minister and the government show less confidence in Canadian passenger rail service than a group of American entrepreneurs?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, because Canadians will have to pay for the deficit that you created. Canadians know increasingly that you never cared about the deficit, but we do care about the deficit.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Canadians have seen in the last 24 hours, whether it comes to the Great Lakes or VIA Rail, in terms of the impact the government is all talk and no action whatsoever.

I want to ask the minister about his so-called environmental impact study. I have three previous studies that have been done. The Fraser-Thompson Corridor, a 100 page document on environmental impact; the Alaska Highway Pipeline, Environmental Impact Study of 100 pages and a third one, done interestingly enough on CN Rail Twin-tracking Program in British Columbia alone—one part of the whole railway system—a 100 page document. In contrast I have here a seven-page mimeographed handout that the minister prepared over the weekend. Will the minister now be honest with the people of Canada and admit that his so-called study was a complete fraud when it comes to the environment?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious again that the Leader of the NDP does not understand. The situation is much more complex than what he raised. I repeat what I said. We took the passengers on the current network who want to be served and we moved those passengers to other modes of transportation.

I will give you, Mr. Speaker, just a little figure which will explain what I am talking about. If you move all those cars on highways, where at the present time we have 142,000 cars moving at the same hour and what if we put on the Canadian highways 142,000 more. I would like for you to understand once again that the figures are good. They are the figures accepted by Transport Canada and Environment Canada.

• (1430)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, neither the figures nor the minister are any good when it comes to the environment.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: The minister cannot name a single environmentalist in the country who will support what he has done in the last 24 hours.

With reference to the need for a serious job in terms of studying the environmental impact on the VIA proposal, the Great Lakes study itself that came down yesterday made very specific reference.

I ask the minister to check it out; do not take my word for it. On page 25, they said that if we are going to deal with the Great Lakes we have to deal with the whole ecosystem, particularly air pollution. They cite the need to reduce auto remissions. They cite the need, therefore, for further studies about the impact of alternative modes of transportations on the environment.

If the minister were serious, on the part of the government that claims to be serious about the Great Lakes would he not now admit that in terms of his responsibility on VIA Rail they ought to have done a comprehensive alternative use of transportation study to help reduce air emissions in the Great Lakes region?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I have two points to make. The first one is that I do not understand when the leader of the NDP asks for a more comprehensive study.

He was laughing at me when I proposed a royal commission to look at the future of transportation. Of course it will consider the environmental side of the new transportation system.

When something is serious it is not for the leader of the NDP. Dealing with the quality of the leader, I will have the elegance not to comment on that.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the minister reminded me about his royal commission after the fact. That is precisely the point: the government is making a decision now about VIA but is doing its study afterward. The government is supposed to do the environmental study ahead of the project to head off the effect.

[Translation]

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the Government refused to conduct a serious environmental impact study on the VIA Rail cuts. The same Government has not taken a serious stand on the Great Lakes.

Would the Minister admit that the only aspect of the environment that matters for the Government is propaganda?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, once again I am surprised at the reaction of the New Democrats' Leader, because he claims that the study which was done, and I always said that it was a preliminary study, as required by law to determine the need for a supplementary study— The preliminary study does not require us to conduct a further study. What surprises me, Mr. Speaker, is that this study was endorsed by Environment Department officials, and any comprehensive study called for by the New Democratic Leader would be done by the same Environment officials.

So why are they wrong now and why would they be right if we had a comprehensive environmental study?

Mr. Speaker, a little consistency from that side of the House, please!

[English]

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and is with regard to the Great Lakes water quality.

Canadians are scared and concerned about the massive toxic soup of the Great Lakes. The minister will be aware that many of the remedial action plans announced in 1985 are actually remedial delay plans. Not a drop of water or a grain of poisoned sediment has been cleaned. Canadians want action.

The Prime Minister announced last year $75 million for clean up. Now the minister is saying that it is only $55 million plus $20 million for a health study. If the government is so committed to action, why the delays and why the drop in clean-up funds? It takes billions, not millions.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is quite right. The task at hand is costly and will require some time and serious commitment by all the stakeholders and all the players. It includes the jurisdiction of the United States, the provinces, the municipalities, the science communities and of course the federal government.

Indeed it can be said that it is quite beyond the capacity or the means of any one jurisdiction to address the problem properly. The fact is that the federal government, since 1984, has taken very decisive action. It is not true that nothing has happened.

Everybody here is as well informed as I am about the work that has gone on in the Windermere Basin in the Hamilton Harbour. It is one of the sites that has been identified as one of the hot spots. We now have solid agreements with the jurisdiction in the United States. We have agreements with the provinces. The municipalities are involved. The science community is involved in various ways in the universities that study and do research. Things are in hand. What else would the hon. member have us do?

Mr. Crawford: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement has no real mechanisms for putting people's feet to the fire. Nothing is legally binding on the U.S. or Canadian government to follow its plan.

Will this government commit to negotiating a formal Great Lakes treaty, with the Americans, to force both sides to follow the rules and regulations and not leave our citizens' health and well-being to the whims of political promises?

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows we have renegotiated the Great Lakes treaty with the United States. There are teeth in the agreement. Action has taken place on both sides of the lakes. In fact the comprehensive monitoring process that has been launched by these treaty negotiations points out that progress is being made. The problem is not as severe as it was 10 years ago.

That does not give us any great comfort, but the fact is that we are making progress and there is a strong commitment, certainly by this government, to complete the task.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, television is the key medium of influence for most Canadians. The new broadcasting bill purports to ensure a Canadian broadcasting policy.

In the light of the country's rapidly changing political dynamics, the new broadcasting bill fails to Canadianize and reinforce Canadian unity.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Why will this government no longer ensure that the CBC is required in its mandate to contribute to national unity through its programming? Why is this government removing, bite by bite, anything that helps to reinforce Canada?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to Bill C-40 which was tabled in the House earlier today.

I think on careful examination that the hon. member will find that the CBC's role in national cultural identity is strengthened through the insertion of a new subclause to which I would be happy to draw her attention. I believe it is subclause 3(1)(l)(iii). I am sure that she would be very pleased to read that.

In addition, the new mandate of the CBC is to foster Canadian consciousness. I am sure that we will hear further from the hon. member as the bill proceeds.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his answer. I think Canadian unity and Canadian identity need more than a little subclause.

[Translation]

Why didn't the Government's new legislation make it incumbent on the CBC to promote national unity? Why did the Government forget its responsibility for reinforcing Canadian unity?

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, the answer is the same in French as it was in English, in other words, the proposed legislation makes it incumbent on the CBC to foster Canadian consciousness.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. A few moments ago he said that the whole matter of environmental assessment is much more complex than my leader would believe.

I want to ask the Minister, if it is much more complex would he not admit that a proper environmental assessment would include the following: relative fuel consumption of various modes of transportation; relative emissions of hydrocarbons, carbon monoxide, nitrogen oxide by various modes and their contribution to the greenhouse effect and ground level ozone; the impact of increased traffic in high density areas; the impact of expanding infrastructures and a route by route environmental analysis of all significant factors?

Would he also admit that his study did not examine any one of those items.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I said twice. I said that it is a preliminary study which has to determine what will be the environmental effect on other modes of transportation if we move passengers from the trains. That is the bottom line.

The answer is: it will be negligible at the time. It means that we do not have to go further to determine if the new passengers will create more environmental problem. The answer is no. This answer has been confirmed by environmental specialists.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, only the Minister of Transport could tell the country that 1.7 million more automobiles on the roads will not add to the environment.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Angus: I believe the Minister needs some assistance. I have in my hand a document put forward by the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office called Federal Environmental Assessment and Review Process, Initial Assessment Guide. It is basically a "how to" to conduct an environmental assessment.

An Hon. Member: Good idea.

Mr. Angus: It is available from the Library of Parliament. Perhaps the minister would like to have his staff get it, take a look at it and then decide, finally, that what should be done is a full environmental assessment before any of these cuts are proceeded with. Will he do that?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval) Mr. Speaker, we know that the New Democratic Party would like to have a full environmental assessment by those people, FARO, those specialists in the environment who already decided that we do not need this environmental study. I am trying to understand but do not try to understand the NDP, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of members the presence in the gallery of Mr. Cyprien Mbonimpa, Minister of External Relations and Co-operation of Burundi.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I also wish to draw to the attention of members the presence in the gallery of a delegation from Austria, led by Mr. Erich Fidesser, Member of Parliament for the Province of Lower Austria.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

Mr. André Plourde (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Agriculture). Last Friday evening, a major fire caused serious damage in the sheep section of Agriculture Canada's experimental farm in La Pocatière, in the riding of Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup which I have the honour and the privilege to represent in this House. Mr. Speaker, flames devastated the new facilities, finished in 1988 at a cost of $1.4 million. About 700 sheep were lost, all ewes belonging to ten different breeds, which were being used in a major genetics and breeding program aimed at increasing the number of births in sheep. Mr. Speaker, since this experimental centre was the second largest in Canada, my question is as follows: Can you confirm, for my benefit and for the benefit of the entire population of Eastern Quebec, what Agriculture Canada intends to do regarding future use of this research centre? Second, does your Department intend to proceed with the construction—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the Minister could respond.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter. At the facility, which was a considerable asset to sheep raising in Eastern Canada, we luckily managed to preserve all genetic records. We already have many breeders who will be able to take advantage of our findings. I think that is good news.

As far as rebuilding is concerned, our people are now working on this aspect, and I think we can say the Government intends to rebuild the facilities, Mr. Speaker.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I have an urgent question for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs concerning the appalling and unacceptable conditions that exist in a number of the Six Nations Reserve schools, of which he is aware, which I have seen first hand, and which are being boycotted by some 1,200 elementary school children.

In 1985 the fire marshals indicated that there were dozens of infractions to fire and safety regulations which needed immediate attention. It took the minister four years to take action.

Will the minister make a commitment in the House today that funds will be made available over and above what he has committed to date to bring the schools up to the proper safety levels? Will he commit to remove instead of just hide the asbestos which has been found in these schools?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to remind my hon. colleague that I have only been Minister of Indian Affairs for about eight or nine months. Therefore I did not have the benefit of those four years he is referring to.

It is an important question, Mr. Speaker, and I hope I will have the courtesy of being able to answer. It is an important situation. It is a grave situation that has been looked into.

The health and safety issues that were raised have been resolved. The inspectors of both Labour Canada and Health and Welfare have been on site and have confirmed that the schools are safe. That is not to suggest that there is not more that has to be done. As a matter of fact I have asked Commissioner Harry Laforme of Ontario to look into the matter with the community, because there seems to be a disagreement right now that we are trying to solve.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, the disagreement is broken promises. Mr. Laforme is a fine gentleman, but the fact remains that this government, maybe not the minister, made a commitment to build three new schools on the Six Nations Reserve.

The fact was that one of these schools was to be open by this September. No sod has yet been turned. No other Canadian community would tolerate these conditions for their children and this community will no longer tolerate them.

Will the minister finally live up to his promises, start construction of these schools, meet with the chief which he refuses to do, or is he prepared to continue to put at risk the health and safety of the children of the Six Nations?

Mr. Cadieux: First of all, Mr. Speaker, I have not refused to meet with Chief Motour.

There was an appointment that had been scheduled for next Monday which I understand has been cancelled by the chief and not by your humble servant here, Mr. Speaker.

With respect to the construction of the schools, they are planned. They request the participation of the community itself because they will be building the schools themselves. We will be proceeding with construction of new schools as was planned.

FISHERIES

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Tuna fishermen in eastern P.E.I. have been led down the garden path by this minister's department. They were guaranteed by DFO officials before the season opened that they would be allowed to fish tuna in Atlantic off Canso, and that any tuna they caught there would count against their home zone quota. Once P.E.I. fishermen arrived in the Canso area and started to catch tuna, the DFO officials changed their tune and told them to pack up and go home.

Could the minister explain to this House why fishermen in my riding were misled by his officials?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that regional officials in earlier consultations with the fishermen of the gulf region did indicate that quotas taken outside the region might be deducted from or be considered as part of their quota within the gulf.

• (1450)

We have had such a successful tuna fishery this year in all of Atlantic Canada, including the areas of Northumberland Strait and Fishermans Bank on which the P.E.I. fishermen fish, including the North Lake fishery out of eastern P.E.I., landed $500,000 of tuna last weekend, that equity has certainly been ensured. All fishermen are being generously treated in the way this fishery is managed this year.

Mr. MacAulay: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. P.E.I. fishermen were given a verbal assurance by DFO officials that they would be able to fish off Canso this year. In fact their rights were written on the licences they received from DFO.

I ask the Minister the following questions: Why have the rights of P.E.I. fishermen been taken away? Will the minister immediately restore these traditional rights to the P.E.I. tuna fishermen?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, there are no rights that are written on licences. In the final analysis we manage the fishery to ensure a fair distribution of opportunity.

I am told that in the Canso area traditionally a small number of P.E.I. based boats fish there, but this year because of the bonanza nature of the tuna fishery a much larger number of P.E.I. based fishermen wanted to fish off the Canso area in a different region.

I repeat, P.E.I. and gulf fishermen have done very handsomely this year in the tuna fishery, and last weekend alone $.5 million worth of tuna was landed in eastern P.E.I., because that fishery has been very abundant.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is for whoever is acting for the Minister of the Environment today.

Tony Hodge, one of the authors of the Great Lakes great legacy study said on Midday today that his greatest concern is that federal politicians are just reacting to polls, that they do not understand the depth of the problem.

The public does understand. If, for example, it is going to take $40 million in Windsor and between $60 million and $70 million in Thunder Bay for sewage treatment, would the public not understand that $55 million is not going to go very far? Would they not conclude that this government is engaged in cynical propaganda or that this government consists of a bunch of ecological nincompoops?

Some Hon. Members: Both.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's criticism and that of the author whom he quotes would perhaps be justified if we had behaved as the opposition does, namely, respond to critical questions like that every time there is an article in The Globe and Mail or The Star.

The fact is that since 1984 and leading up to 1987 significant action was taken. Just two days ago we announced a $125 million program with three tasks attached to it: remedial and preventive, as well as a health study.

Let me quote another author of the report, Mr. David Reynolds, who said: "We, frankly, do not know what all this means to human health". He said: "Little research has been done on the long-term effects of chemicals on the 35 million Americans and Canadians who live in the basin".

There needs to be some advance work done to find out just what the problem is. I have already told them that in the case of sewage being discharged into the Great Lakes it is the principal responsibility of the municipalities which will just simply have to readjust their priorities in terms of the management of their affairs.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I guess the hon. minister does not understand that $40 million and $60 million just does not add up when only $125 million is the total budgeted.

Now, referring to The Globe and Mail, how about the upper Great Lakes Connecting Channel Study that said there should be great emphasis placed on such connecting channels as the Detroit River.

Having read that, as I am sure the minister has, how could he explain the fact that Darrell Pekartz from Environment Canada, meeting with the Binational Advisory Council preparing the remedial action plan for the Detroit River, told them that the Detroit River is unlikely to get funding from this program over its duration. How does he explain that? That is not in The Globe and Mail.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I cannot confirm or deny what one or another official of a Canadian government agency may have said to another agency.

All I am telling the hon. member is that if he examines the record he will find that significant action is taken. A commitment is made by the Canadian government and has been in place. Action is taken in all areas of the Great Lakes and in particular in those areas which fall under Canadian jurisdiction.

The fact is, as I said earlier, that the solution to the global problem is far beyond any one jurisdiction either in its regulatory capacity or in its capacity to mount the necessary resources, so we continue to mobilize the combined efforts of all those who have a stake in cleaning up the Great Lakes.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I have question for the Minister of Agriculture and his new-found assistant over there. It is a rather urgent question that I have for the Minister of Agriculture.

I have received many phone calls from farmers both in and outside my constituency who are counting on funds to be made available by the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. Not one farmer criticized paying the interest that will be required by Bill C-36. Saskatchewan farmers are willing to pay their share toward reducing our deficit. They want to know when our government will be in a position to provide farmers access to these funds that they so desperately need.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can advise his farmers that the opposition's tactic of filibustering Bill C-36 is really, in effect, denying access to advance payments for crops and prairie grain.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I would take this opportunity to call on them—and I ask the hon. member to contact his farmers and maybe they can call on opposition members—to stop their silly tactics and get on with the job of passing Bill C-36 so the mechanism can be available for farmers to take advantage of and to help them in the orderly flow of grain and other crops after harvest.

AIR TRANSPORTATION

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The two new runways proposed for Pearson International Airport will increase noise exposure projections in residential areas in the region of Peel. The minister's own department produced the NEP forecast upon which the city of Mississauga based its land use policies.

What assurances, if any, is the minister providing to my constituents that they will not be subjected to even more intolerable noise levels as a result of these additional runways?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that is a good question.

This summer I was in Toronto to make the announcement about the new runways. I think the member will remember that also this summer, at the same time, I said that a full environmental assessment would be made in terms of the involvement or implications of those new runways.

The final decision will be made in light of recommendations which will be given to me by the Department of Environment, having in mind that all consideration will be given to ensure that the quality of life will be the best for people of Mississauga, Etobicoke, and Brampton.

Ms. Guarnieri: Mr. Speaker, I wish I could return the compliment, but it is evident that this government plans to tax us into submission and then drown out our cries of protest with aircraft noise.

I have a supplementary question. When the minister announced plans to expand Pearson, he called for, and I quote: "an accelerated environmental assessment". The minister cannot disguise the fact that he is going to rush through an important environmental study just so he can get on with building his new runways.

• (1500)

Will the minister pledge to this House and the residents of my riding today that no runways will be built if the environmental assessment is negative?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I can first give the guarantee that all necessary measures will be taken to ensure that the environmental assessment will be the best.

The Minister of the Environment already said in a press release issued in Toronto this summer that it will be conditional on the acceptance by the Department of the Environment that the quality of life will be considered and that it will not represent any more damage for the people of Mississauga.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Indian Affairs. Canadian Armed Forces Camp Ipperwash on Lake Huron was seized from the Stoney Point Chippewas in 1942 under the War Measures Act. The government promised to return the land when it was no longer required for military purposes. Today the camp is used for cadets and militia; military personnel use it to store their recreational vehicles and as a summer recreation spot for their families.

My question to the minister of municipal affairs is when will the government return the land to the Chippewas and locate military and cadet training camps on sites that were not seized from their rightful owners?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the hon. member that Camp Ipperwash is being used for very important activities of the Department of National Defence, including for cadets and the reserve. We have no plans to make any changes in the present use of Camp Ipperwash.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. Mr. Minister, you have asked the people of Elk Island and other parts of Alberta to change the manufacturers' sales tax. We want to know what is wrong with the old tax. Can we not just fix it up? What is so bad about a tax on production anyway? Why change it now? Why can we not just keep the old manufacturers' sales tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right. We have a manufacturers' sales tax and we are proposing to change that. The true reason why we are proposing to change this tax is that it is broken. It is not working. It is a drag on our economy. It is a hidden tax on exports, exports that come from right across the country including the hon. member's own riding of Elk Island. It is also a tax on imports that is one third less than on Canadian domestic production. For all of these reasons it is very important to change the tax.

In the last Parliament there were some proposals put forward to have an adjustment of the existing manufacturers' sales tax. The finance committee of the House of Commons was quite critical of this patch on the old tax. It is for that reason we believe it is important to move to a complete revision of the sales tax system.

PRIVILEGE

INDIAN AFFAIRS—QUESTION PERIOD REPLY

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs may have inadvertently misled the House when he indicated that the Chief of the Six Nations Reserve, Chief Montour, refused to meet him. In fact, when I checked with the chief's office, it was indicated that the minister had refused to meet with the chief until the children went back to school. I also checked with the minister's office and they gave me the same indication, that the minister had refused to meet with the chief until the children went back to school.

I want to give the minister a chance to correct the record and if, in fact, he wants to meet with the chief I will gladly act as an intermediary in this matter.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I have already asked someone to act as a mediator in this particular issue. It is Mr. Laforme of Ontario. If I do need additional help, I will count on my hon. colleague to help me.

With respect to the meeting, I had a meeting scheduled with Chief Montour. Obviously, there had been prior discussions for the children to return to school because both the inspectors of Labour Canada and Health and Welfare have declared the schools to be safe. Obviously the meeting was on the understanding that the children would be back in school and we would be addressing the situation of the new schools in a normal manner. The chief refused that condition, refused the meeting and it was cancelled.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Haldimand—Norfolk has raised a matter. There seems to be some disagreement. The Minister is responding. It is not a question of privilege, but I hope the exchange has helped to clarify things.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, this being Thursday, I want to ask the government House leader if he will give us the customary statement setting out the business the government intends to call and present to the House over the coming week.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties. With respect to tomorrow's business, you will find that there is agreement that when Bills C-20 and C-18 are called, there is an understanding that there will be no dilatory motions put during the proceedings tomorrow in order that both those bills can be discussed.

Bill C-20 is at the report stage and I believe we are at the last of a grouping of motions for discussion. Bill C-18, the bill to create the multiculturalism and citizenship department, is very near completion. We expect that we will be able to complete second reading on that.

On Monday, October 16, we will devote the entire day to report stage of Bill C-21, the Unemployment Insurance Act amendments.

On Tuesday, October 17, and Wednesday, October 18, we will continue debate on second reading of Bill C-28, the income tax bill. In the event that the debate on Bill C-28 is finished on time on Wednesday, we propose to call second reading of Bill C-40, the new broadcast act which was just introduced today.

Thursday, October 19, is an allotted day for the consideration of any opposition motion and for passage, at all stages, of the 1989-90 supply bill.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister on a point of order.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in an answer I gave this afternoon to the Leader of the Opposition, I gave two figures, and I want to be sure the record is corrected in this respect. I said, in English I believe, that there would be 150 more cars per hour on Canadian highways after the changeover, while we now had 42,000 during any given hour between midnight and six o'clock. I may have said 142,000, in English, but I meant 42,000 cars running at any given hour between six o'clock in the morning and midnight. Not 142,000 but 42,000.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S. O. 81—PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Nystrom:

> That this House advise the government to scrap the proposed goods and services tax and implement a tax system which is based on the ability to pay and which includes:
> 1) a minimum corporate tax on profitable corporations;
> 2) taxation of capital gains income, with the exception of farmland sold for agricultural purposes, small businesses and principal residences;
> 3) the restoration of an inheritance tax on wealthy estates;
> 4) effectively progressive income tax; and
> 5) tax provisions which encourage environmentally sound practices.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, now that we have had the first round of speakers on this supply day, there have been some discussions between the parties regarding the concept of rather than having 20 minute speeches and the 10 minute question and comment periods, we will have 10 minute speeches and five minutes of questions and comments and continue with the usual rotation.

Madam Speaker, I would ask that you seek unanimous consent to proceed in that fashion for the rest of the day.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Do I understand that all three parties agree on 10 minute speeches followed by a five minute question and comment period?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, although Parliament Hill is often well insulated against the sounds of the outside world, I think that if we listened closely we could hear the major rumblings of discontent from the rest of Canada. These rumblings, I would suggest are the sounds of the avalanche of discontent caused by this goods and services tax technical paper and proposed legislation that the government is trying to saddle Canadians with.

• (1510)

The force of those rumblings and the voices of Canadians from across Canada will shake the very foundations of this government, a government that has shown contempt for the people of Canada in the past and in this bill once again thumbs its nose at average Canadians. Canadians have had enough and they will not stand for it. I have received letters from a small smattering of those people from my riding. I am sure all members of Parliament on both sides of the House have had many, many letters. Let me give you a sampling from my riding. A letter from Grand Forks in the province of British Columbia states:

> This letter is to protest the implementation of the Goods and Services Tax. This is not the solution to reduce the deficit. I think the Government should control their spending, especially their special-interest spending, and determine their priorities. This could generate a lot more revenue without hurting everyone and creating such havoc.
> I, for one, have supported the Progressive Conservative party in the past, but will not continue to do so if you insist on this stupid course.

Another letter from Summerland, British Columbia states:

> —the complexity of the proposal boggles the mind. Surely a minister with your resources could come up with a less complicated, and more equitable means of raising taxes. I know that were I in your situation, the first thing I would do would be to reduce spending. Surely that is not beyond your capabilities!

Another letter from Penticton, British Columbia states:

> I have talked to many young and old, not one of these persons are in favour of this "tax grab". By adding 9 per cent, I for one will keep a real close guard on my pocket-book, and will buy nothing except the most needed.
> Please tell the government, that the majority of Canadians do not make the kind of moneys the MPs do.

Another letter from Penticton states:

> Mr. Wilson, you missed the boat on this one. Once again the government has underestimated the durability and tolerance of Canadians—
> In the United States I would be considered one of the silent majority. I go to work, pay my taxes, and try to save some money for my retirement without complaining. No more! I am going to do everything I can to stop this horrific tax. I will be joining every organization that is against this tax and use every legal means I have to stop this travesty!

Another letter from Grand Forks states:

> We have reached the point of saturation of taxes, whether it be federal, provincial, or municipal—.
> Between the high interest rates and our "fair" tax system we will surely join other Third World countries in "the rich get richer and poor get poorer and the middle class foots the bill".

From Oliver, British Columbia, this letter states:

> —it is hereby requested that your government take a more common-sense attitude in your efforts to decrease the federal deficit. A most worthy step would be to realize we, the taxpayers and citizens, keep the government operating and it does not bode well when we are asked to take less, while we become painfully aware of your government's excessive spending habits.

A letter from Okanagan Falls states:

> —I do think that it could be something for someone to give very serious thought to and maybe sometime, somehow, something MIGHT develop to free the "little guy tax slave" from his oppressors and their idea of getting all that they possibly can for themselves and "friends" all the while in doing so the low income people of this country are pushed deeper, and deeper, down into the muck of poverty. Is equitable treatment for ALL too much to ask, or expect? Whatever did happen to the concept that no one should be expected to pay other than what they were able to pay?

Also I have a letter with respect to the goods and services tax and how it will affect a business person from Penticton who states:

> As a former member for 30 years of the Federal Progressive Conservative Party, I must now speak out against the government which I, as a small business person, feel has totally lost touch with the people of Canada.

Those are simply a smattering from the mounds of mail that I have received from my riding and throughout Canada as small business critic on what people in Canada think of this particular technical paper and the proposal of a 9 per cent goods and services tax.

The government has promised simplicity. What did they do? They have snowed under the small business community of Canada. That is emphasized by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business which has insisted that the government go back to the drawing board, scrap the present tax, and get down to some serious thought as far as tax reform goes.

The small business community cannot take another kick while they are down. I am from the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen–Merritt where, to be parochial, we have been hit hard by the GATT. We have been hit hard by the free trade agreement in our industries with respect to agriculture. Added to the top of that, our tourism industry, which is one of our largest growth industries in the province of British Columbia and certainly in my riding, has predicted the loss of 400 jobs. Across Canada we are told by the tourist associations that there will be a loss by 1994 of $1.3 billion from the revenues of tourism. That is a loss predicted of 30,000 jobs Canada–wide.

We in the Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt and boundary areas are dependent on the small business sector. We are dependent on tourism. We cannot afford another kick while we are down. We cannot afford this goods and services tax in that area.

As we travelled across Canada on the finance committee, we heard from restaurant associations that stated they will lose 40,000 jobs with massive amounts of money. We have heard hotel associations representing major hotels state that there will be business losses and business failures in the major centres. We heard hotel associations from smaller communities tell us that they are very price sensitive, that the small communities, the small mom and pop operations are the operations that will go down as failures in today's economic climate created by the goods and services tax.

These people are barely eking out a living now. To kick them while they are down when they are finally rising up from the problems in 1981 is not only unfair, but it is despicable. It is terrible that we have to put up with that in the Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt and boundary country. In that area we do not need the goods and services tax.

I would suggest to you that not only do we not need it in my riding, but the story is the same if you go to the Yukon territories where they depend on tourism. It is the same in Prince Edward Island where there is an agriculture and tourism base. It is the same in Newfoundland. It is the same on Vancouver Island. It is the same throughout the prairies and central Canada.

We cannot stand to have any further kicks while we are down. We cannot stand it in the tourism industry or in the small business sector. The seniors sector, once again, is an area that will be hard hit. One Voice has told us that they cannot see the goods and services tax going through as it is slated. They are diametrically opposed to the very concept of this because it is regressive. That again hits my riding.

Before I complete, let me just read a small section from a statement by the Economic Development Corporation of Osoyoos and area. Osoyoos is a small border town. The Economic Development Corporation is trying hard to assist that community in the business sector. They state that it is the organizations' hypothesis that the goods and services tax will significantly encourage residents to shop in the United States, therefore, significantly hurting local retail businesses and economy.

I think that for much of the 100 mile corridor across Canada that borders on the United States we have seen the evidence of that over the past three weeks before the Finance Committee. There will be a flood of our economy down into the United States and we in Canada cannot stand for that. We have alternatives, and hopefully I will be asked for some of them during the period for questions and comments.

• (1520)

Canada cannot and will not go along with this goods and services tax the government is proposing.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member on his presentation.

This morning we had a press conference where we were calling on all of those people who are opposed to the goods and services tax all across the country to join us in a pre–Hallowe'en rally in front of Parliament Hill at noon on Monday to tell this government about their feelings vis–à–vis this regressive, hidden and inflationary value added tax.

Over the weekend I was looking at an article in the Financial Post dated October 24, 1988. In this article were some examples of what happened in certain parts of Europe. In Belgium, the equivalent to the goods and services tax is approximately 25.5 per cent; in France, it goes up as high as 33 per cent; in Greece, it goes as high as 36 per cent; in Italy, 38 per cent, in Portugal, 30 per cent, and in Spain, 33 per cent.

Does the honourable member think that this government is going to be a lot better than those in Europe and will not be tempted to increase this goods and services tax over the years to reach 20 per cent?

Mr. Whittaker: From the studies that I have seen, it is clear that in all the countries that have brought in the goods and services tax, within months of bringing in that tax the rate was increased. The latest example from New Zealand is that it went from 10 per cent to 12.5 per cent.

I think in every case not only have they raised the tax that they brought in originally, but they increased their spending to meet the cash cow effect, so what we have is a situation where the governments spend more as they get it in, and look less at what their expenditures are.

It is undoubtedly a fact that if this is brought in, as is often proposed by some of the government's friends in the manufacturing sector, and we broaden the base, bring in foods, do away with exemptions, and if we lower the rate, it is simply a matter of time before the rate is raised up. I think all of the people who have appeared before us in committee have agreed to this.

The inflationary factor that is involved in any level of goods and services tax, particularly the one at 9 per cent, will probably be double what the government has originally told us. The spiral effect of inflation which the government has not taken into consideration due to increased prices and increases in wage demands will have detrimental effects on all of the economy of Canada with a probable increase in the value of the dollar and an increase in the level of interest rates. We will have total chaos and perhaps a major recession as a result of this.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Madam Speaker, when this government came to office in 1984, it was faced with a corporate tax system that was riddled with special deductions, exemptions, and credits. The result was a fast-eroding, federal tax base on the one hand, and a corporate sector that was being given all the wrong economic signals on the other hand. A large part of corporate resources and ingenuity was going into minimizing taxes through a plethora of government incentives. The Canadian corporation had lost its way and in fact had been lured into the woods and up the creek by the former government.

Corporate resources would have been better applied to resolving real corporate problems, such as developing more and better products for existing domestic and foreign markets. Instead, they were induced by the former government to scurry after crumbs in the form of incentives, incentives paid for by the average Canadian. The damage done by this policy to the economy was obvious. Large numbers of ventures failed once the incentives either ran out or became insufficient to support uneconomic businesses and large amounts of public funds wasted on schemes such as the scientific research tax credit—quick flips.

Even more distressing was the fact that these special incentives were so attractive that they mounted year after year, much faster than they could possibly be used. This created a tremendous incentive for taxpayers to create intricate mechanisms and schemes to sell unused tax credits and losses to profitable taxpayers.

The credibility of the tax system was in grave danger as a result of this progressive degeneration. The former government not only encouraged this behaviour, they made it impossible for even the best business people to avoid seeking such devices. The danger was not only that corporations would continue to play an increasingly smaller role in providing their share of support to funding public programs, but that individual taxpayers would react to basically an unfair situation by going to great length to minimize their taxes as well.

It does not end there. Socialist members have often raised the fact that the corporate sector's share of government revenues has fallen over the years. This is only partly true, and to the extent that it is, it has not been due to any shrinking of public responsibility by Canadian businesses as other parties suggest. In fact, as a proportion of corporate profits, corporate taxes have not changed significantly over the last quarter century. What did fall was corporate income as a percentage of total income. The reason corporate income declined in importance is that this sector was led down an unproductive path by the former government.

Our government was, therefore, faced with a fundamental choice in 1984. Leave the basic system in place with all of its structural faults and fast eroding base and offset it with a minimum tax, or go to the very heart of the problem by repairing damage inflicted by the former government and restoring stability to the tax system. We chose the latter and embarked upon a program of corporate tax reform which began with a moratorium in 1984 on that great waste of your tax money, the scientific research tax credit—quick flips. This process continues to this day with the introduction of the large corporation tax in the April 27, 1989 budget.

In between, the more important measures have included the termination of the scientific research tax credit, that fitting example of what the opposition stands for; measures to prevent a variety of schemes to transfer tax losses from non-profitable corporations to profitable corporations, schemes encouraged by the policies of the former government, the reduction of accelerated capital consumption allowance rates across a broad range of capital goods and industries; the elimination of the general investment tax credits which proved to be such a failure in producing real wealth; the reduction of a variety of special purpose investment tax credits; an increase in the rate of taxation of capital gains; the introduction of a corporate surtax; the introduction of put-in-use rules to limit the use of deductions where taxable income is not forthcoming; removal of the inventory allowance; curtailment of the use of the leasing to transfer benefits for accelerated capital consumption allowances from non-taxable entities to profitable firms; and a creditable tax on large deposit-taking institutions.

The benefits of this approach to tax reform have been significant. We now have a broader and more stable corporate tax base which ensures that corporations, and especially large corporations, pay their fair share. In total, these measures will provide well over $2 billion in new tax revenues and will help provide the government with the funds it needs to deliver essential services to Canadians. Just as important, the changes to the tax system have turned the corporate sector's attention back to basic economic fundamentals and away from devising complicated ways to avoid tax. This is critical if our firms are to be able to compete in increasingly tough world markets.

What would the opposition have done? What do they propose? A minimum tax, a tax that would leave the old, inefficient and unfair system in place, and try to cover it up with a mechanism which would be very difficult and complicated to administer. Canadian corporations would continue to pursue complicated schemes to avoid tax and then pay a minimum tax as an afterthought. Even worse, this minimum tax would have been an unbearable burden to small and medium businesses just barely scraping by as it is. Inefficiencies and unfairness would have persisted and all Canadians would have suffered.

The right approach is to fix the system, not compensate for it. The right approach is to provide a fair and efficient system of taxation. That is what this government did.

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, I was very interested in the comments of this Conservative member as he tried to wind his way through both a defence of a fair tax system and a defence of his own tax system, which I think is basically a contradiction.

There are two things I would like him to address. Given that this is supposed to be a new and fairer tax system, I am a little curious as to why the government now feels that children and students should be heavily taxed. As we know, everything that a child now buys, under the GST will be taxed. As well, students for the first time in our history will be taxed. Their books will be taxed, their food at the universities will be taxed, and their lessons will be taxed.

One of the interesting contradictions in this system is that when somebody goes to a stockbroker, they do not pay tax when buying stocks, but if they decide their child needs to see a psychologist, they have to pay tax on that. I just do not quite understand why a child psychologist is less important than a stockbroker. Perhaps the member has a better insight as to the fairness in that particular system.

I think that nowadays students, particularly part-time students, cannot raise enough funds and they continue to go to school for five or six years to gain their 15 credits. A lot of them are women who choose to return to the work force, and others are single parents to whom this is an additional expense. Because women usually end up at the low end of the labour market, they earn between $4 and $5 an hour. If they are now going to pay 9 per cent more on everything as students, how many hours do they have to put in just to pay the government? It takes a lot of time, and I do not think the Conservative members have given any thought to the absolute unfairness of taxing children and taxing students. Perhaps the member can show us some insight in the next minute as to exactly what is so fair about this.

Mr. Richardson: Madam Speaker, I think one of the things this government has given a lot of thought to is the $350 billion debt created by the former Liberal government. We have to get a hold on this. The country cannot continue to go on living beyond its means.

The hon. member mentioned the cost to students going to university. Canadians are very fortunate in this country to be able to go to university and pay a small amount of the actual cost of their education that they do. We can only continue to support students going to university and support the wonderful social programs we have in this country if we get our financial situation under control.

One of the fair ways of doing it is the way that 48 countries in this world have done it, including five out of seven countries of the G–7, the largest industrialized countries of the world. The only two countries of the G–7 yet to bring in a goods and services tax are Canada and the United States. The United States is looking at it now. We would like to be a leader in North America, as we have been, in tax reform. To be internationally competitive in the world, to continue to be able to pay for social programs that our government has brought in, to continue to provide these services and balance the budget in this country, we obviously have to increase the revenues to be able to pay for them. The experience in other countries has been that this is a fair system. It is not a regressive system. We have introduced an addition to the program in this country where we will provide tax credits to lower income Canadians, to the extent that those in families with incomes of less than $30,000 will actually be ahead of the game in terms of taxation under this GST system. It is a fair progressive tax and one that will help us reduce the national debt in this country and get this country back on its fiscal feet.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): A point of order, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Walker: Madam Speaker, I would like the member to clarify the record. I think he mistakenly said that there is $350 billion worth of debt created by the opposition. Perhaps he would like to explain exactly what was meant by that.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member rose on a point of order. I think the point that he made is a question for debate which certainly could be debated with the hon. gentleman. It is not a point of order.

There is still one minute to go in the period reserved for questions or comments. I will allow the hon. member to conclude.

Mr. Richardson: Madam Speaker, I think this is another myth that may be masqueraded along with this circus that the hon. member from Ottawa is going to conduct here later in October.

The Liberal answer to dealing with the economic problems of the world is: "Let's have another circus. Let's have a masquerade before Hallowe'en".

Let me answer the member's question about who created the deficit in this country. Over the past 15 years, during the Trudeau government, I can recall going out to the opening of senior citizens' homes and saying, "Isn't this wonderful that the federal government is providing financing at 2 per cent mortgage financing for these seniors' homes, for these seniors who have done such a wonderful job of creating this country for us". Well that sounded great at the time, except that they did not pay it off at the time. We have got 25 and 30 year mortgages created by the Liberal government on seniors' homes all across this country at effective 2 per cent mortgages that taxpayers today are paying for and will continue to pay for for 25 years.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I must interrupt the hon. member. His time has expired. Resuming debate.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I rise to join in the debate on the motion by the member for Yorkton—Melville. It is an important motion and I am glad it is on the floor for debate today.

Over the last number of weeks and months the nation's attention and anger has turned to the government policy called the GST, the goods and services tax.

Today, we are debating a motion by the hon. member which calls upon the government to scrap this tax. Earlier in the day, the members of this House were treated to one of the finest speeches I have heard since I have been elected in this House and, I am sure, one of the finest speeches in the last number of years, from my colleague for Ottawa South. He spoke eloquently about the concerns that Canadians have with this very flawed proposal, this veiled attempt at tax reform.

This latest Tory tax grab, which has been called the GST, proposes to bilk $26 billion from Canadians' back pockets. The government, before it introduced this particular goods and services tax proposal, and the Minister of Finance said that there would be a few principles underlining the new proposal that would be coming in. He said that the first principle is that it had to be a single-tier system. It cannot be a multi-tier system. He struck out on that count.

What we have now, in the words of John Bulloch from the Federation of Independent Business, is a nightmare on Main Street. This government is prepared to put a piece of legislation before this House that, if adopted, is going to cost the small businessman and woman across Canada up to $7,000, according to one of the estimates, in compliance costs with a system that is going to duplicate an already cluttered sales tax system across this country.

He also said, time and time again, that this new sales tax would be visible. But then he had to stand here in the House and look sheepishly at his feet when he told the House that there was no way that he could make this tax a visible tax. He struck out on that count as well.

He also said that the tax was going to be revenue neutral. He talked about the unfair manufacturers' sales tax that was taking in $18 billion in revenue. He called it a killer of jobs. Well, earlier today, one of the members on this side of the House, in response to a speech from a government minister, let that minister know that it was this very government that took that 9 per cent manufacturers' sales tax and hiked it to 13.5 per cent.

He has also said that any of the additional moneys raised will be given back in rebates, but that has been shot full of holes time and time again as presenter after presenter appears before the finance committee in its travels. He struck out on that count.

He also said that the over-riding principle of realistic tax reform is that it must be fair. Well, I am going to show him in the next few minutes that he struck out on that count as well.

Before I do that, I want to talk a little about the crippling effect some of the other budgetary measures of this government has had on the regions, particularly Atlantic Canada.

• (1540)

Over the last number of months we have seen this government show a complete disregard for the principles of wealth redistribution and equalization. We have seen this government hell bent on pursuing a course of dividing this country between those who have and those who have not. One of the documents produced by the government's own agency, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, put it quite clearly in a leaked document that the government did not want to go public. Some Atlantic Canadian working in that office had the good sense to see that this report had to go public and leaked it. This is before the GST proposal came forward. It stated that, "the measures introduced in the budget of the Minister of Finance in the spring of this year will cost an additional $200 million in tax bites against corporations, large and small, and individuals in Nova Scotia alone."

We have also seen this government bring in programs to reduce the amount of money the Prime Minister had promised for regional development in Atlantic Canada. We have seen the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency have its mandate almost gutted, neutered, so that now any business venture over $200,000 no longer qualifies for direct grant assistance. We have seen the government cut back in established program funding to the government of the province of Nova Scotia to the tune of $70 million less than will be going into the coffers over the coming years. That money was earmarked for hospitals and for post-secondary education institutions.

We have also seen the government come in with uncaring, cold and vicious cuts to the unemployment insurance system. In a region that has perpetually suffered from the highest unemployment in Canada, the people of Atlantic Canada are going to suffer the most from those cuts. So much for compassion from the members opposite.

We look specifically at the GST and the effect on industries in the Atlantic. It shows that the policies that this government has adopted which are destroying the nation's fabric piece by piece, province by province, and region by region, are continuing.

The fisheries in Atlantic Canada has been brought to its knees by this government's policies that have allowed over-fishing, have shown no enforcement, and have left our fishermen and our fish plant workers, without work and without any prospects for a future.

One thing this government has done is to tax the fishermen's bait, the dead fish used by the few fishermen remaining who can eke out a living in the Atlantic fisheries. Those fishermen are now going to have to pay 9 per cent more on the cost of their bait. How cold, callous, cruel and misguided can this government's policies be?

Another industry that employs some 100,000 Atlantic Canadians is the forest industry. I checked before I came here today because I wanted to find out exactly what effect the GST would have on the independent man or woman who works in the forest industry, the self-employed woodsmen who go to cut pulp on private wood lots. What effect will it have? I called the information hot line. I was told that unless that individual has registered himself as a business, which I take to mean incorporate at a great deal of cost, he or she will have to pay an extra 9 per cent on the cost of his or her chainsaw, on the cost of gasoline that goes into it, on the oil for the machine. They will have to pay an extra 9 per cent on work boots, work gloves and work clothes. This is what the Minister of Finance calls fair.

The effect of this tax will be devastating on the tourism industry. The tourism industry in Atlantic Canada is one of those real creators of new wealth and new jobs.

In Nova Scotia alone over $760 million per year is left in our economy by tourists from outside Nova Scotia. Fully 76 per cent of the tourists who visit Nova Scotia and spend those dollars and create those jobs are Canadians, not Americans. Twenty-four per cent are foreigners, including Americans.

In response to a question in the House, the Minister of State for Tourism, I believe, got up and had the audacity to say he was concerned about the tourism industry all over Canada, including Atlantic Canada, so the government was going to have a generous rebate system for foreign travellers. How daft can he get?

If 76 per cent of the travellers are from Canada, that means 76 per cent of the money that is left in the province of Nova Scotia is left by Canadians. They are the same Canadians who are going to be driving down to Maine, to Massachusetts, and to Cape Cod by this government's regressive tax policy. Canadians now looking for a seaside holiday are going to be driven stateside, and that is where they are going to spend their money. There will be thousands and thousands of jobs lost in the tourism industry in Atlantic Canada.

Perhaps this is one of the little side deals he has done with the President of the United States to try to increase the tourism in Kennebunkport.

In conclusion, this government has betrayed and misled Canadians. It has taxed us from the cradle to the grave and I am sure if it could find a way to tax us in the hereafter we would be debating that as well. It has taxed haircuts, bingo cards, kids' chips, lollipops, swimming lessons and recreation. Seventy-eight per cent of Canadians say they have enough of this Tory tax grab. Ninety per cent of Canadian business has said the same thing and I join with my colleagues and the millions of Canadians in saying that this tax must be scrapped.

Mr. Richardson: I thought it might be nice for the hon. member to be able to join with millions of Canadians in something. It is nice that these fellows can be in a majority once in a while, as rare as it is.

I want to comment on the hon. member's speech. This sort of thing is not helpful to the whole basic issue. We hear this across the country. I have been travelling with the finance committee and I find that Canadians, once they have had an opportunity to read the proposal, as I am sure the hon. member would feel if he ever has an opportunity to read the proposal, understand that this is a very progressive broadly-based tax in the interest of all Canadians.

On no specific point did the hon. member really prove his point in terms of where these difficulties would arise. It is simply a question of him continuing to go on to raise these myths about the difficulty of the tax. When he raised questions about added input costs of 9 per cent for fishermen or whatever, at no point did he speak of the tax base available. Any business, small or large in the country, with regard to the GST, simply pay the tax on things they buy and get a rebate of 9 per cent from the government.

When the hon. member raises this issue I wonder where he fits in the income tax credits and input credits into his equation, in terms of receiving money back for all of those small businesses in the Atlantic provinces who now pay an average of 13.5 per cent, probably up to 19 per cent in terms of some of the equipment they buy, certainly vehicles. Nineteen per cent manufacturers' sales tax is the cost they absorb in their families and businesses now.

With the GST, there will be an input tax credit. They will pay the 9 per cent when they buy it and they will get a rebate of 9 per cent from the federal government. Essentially they will be further ahead, particularly as it relates to the western provinces and the Atlantic provinces which are resource based provinces. These provinces, because of the export potential, will come out ahead of the game.

The hon. member would be best serving his constituents to support this tax because it is in the best interest of Atlantic Canadians.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I have listened to the illogical answer of the hon. member for Calgary Southeast.

• (1550)

I have listened to what you have said. Initially, what you told us in this House is that you travelled with the committee and that you have listened as well. I cannot believe the nerve of the members of the government who believe that 78 per cent of the Canadian public, obviously, are wrong. You guys must have a monopoly on all that is right and righteous. Seventy-eight per cent of Canadians have said that this is a tax that they do not want, about 90 per cent of Canadian business.

You could not even get one provincial premier, not even one of the few Tory premiers who are left, to agree to go in on this tax with you. We have heard officials from various governments who have said that this tax will destroy some of the resource based industries in their areas. When you talk about the fishery, you should go back, since you are defending your government's policies, and read it.

The fish bait that is used by fishermen is not eligible for a rebate and it is not eligible for an exemption. If you want to sit out back a little later, I will show it to you in the book. Maybe you can give it to your colleagues. I can also remember one of your colleagues who I think is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, at a meeting in Halifax just a few weeks ago when he spoke to the Canadian Japanese Automobile Retailers Association, indicating in a series of four answers to four questions that there would not be a sales tax on the full price of a used vehicle.

Subsequent to that, I happened to call up the toll free number. I was told by a senior tax official that that was simply not the case. When you are telling me that I should listen, I tell you that you and your people should listen to small businessmen across this country and you should read your own documents before you get up and start pointing fingers at anybody in this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Before we resume debate, I would like to point out to the Hon. Member for Dartmouth that the Chair has been quite patient. I know the hon. member has not been here for that long. He should not be addressing a member directly, but through the Chair. It would make things a lot easier.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to a motion by the Opposition, especially after listening to the Hon. Member for Dartmouth (Mr. MacDonald). I am surprised, Madam Speaker, because when I went to Halifax two weeks ago to attend a conference of members of CAJAD, he was there, and I thought that at the time he understood the point I was trying to make, which was that the federal sales tax was not a good thing and needed to be changed. I am surprised, because everyone there was in favour of the change, and to answer his comment about used cars, what I said at the time is still valid today, namely that the tax on goods and services does not apply to the price of used cars sold by a dealer but to the difference between the price paid by the dealer for the used car and the dealer's selling price, because when he sells the car, the dealer provides goods and services, and that is what we want to tax. So the Hon. Member should go back to his books and listen carefully to what he hears at conferences.

Madam Speaker, I would like to provide some background. I know many people in my own riding regularly listen to the proceedings at this time of the day, and I would like to give some background information on the Opposition motion—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Vincent: If Hon. Members opposite would care to listen with the same courtesy I showed them, it would be better for all concerned, Madam Speaker.

The motion reads as follows:

That this House advise the Government to scrap a proposed goods and services tax and implement a tax system which is based on the ability to pay and which includes:

This is where it gets interesting, Madam Speaker.

(1) a minimum corporate tax on profitable corporations;

And we all know that the Budget includes a tax on capital.

(2) taxation of capital gains income, with the exception of farmland sold for agricultural purposes, small businesses and principal residences;

Madam Speaker, there is already a capital gains tax in Canada.

(3) the restoration of an inheritance tax on wealthy estates;

What is a wealthy estate and when is it not wealthy, Madam Speaker? That remains to be seen!

However, the Opposition forgot to mention the federal Government's previous experience in taxing estates or, since you are from Quebec, that province's experience in taxing estates. That experience led to a single conclusion, namely that the cost of organizing and administering estate taxes was about equivalent to the amount of money collected.

So on the one hand, they say they want to clean up government finances and cut red tape, and on the other hand the Opposition wants us to hire people to produce more red tape. That is their position!

(4) effectively progressive income tax;

In 1988, Madam Speaker, Part I of the tax reform provided for three tax brackets instead of ten. In fact, it did even better. It changed everything that was called an exemption. Under the old Liberal regime, two individuals, one earning $10,000 and the other $100,000, both had the same exemption, say $3,000, at the end of the year. For the one earning $10,000, it meant $300 or $400 less tax to pay, whereas it was a saving of $1,500 for the one earning $100,000. At that income level, the tax rate makes a $3,000 exemption worth much more. We took all that out. Now we say: Whether you earn $10,000, $25,000 or $100,000, you will have a $1,000 tax credit. We replaced all two pages of exemptions under the old Liberal regime with tax credits. That makes the income tax system not regressive and benefits low-income families and individuals compared to high-income earners.

You see, Madam Speaker, that is the fourth point; it has already been done.

5) tax provisions which encourage environmentally sound practices.

We see the Opposition's hand in that, Madam Speaker. When you don't know what to do with an issue, you give incentives like the scientific research tax credit. It cost Canadians three or four $billion. Instead of taking money, giving it to company x, which will have to report by deadline y on the amount of money z given for scientific research, they created tax credits, which cost billions.

It is the same thing for the environment, Madam Speaker. It is a measure which gives you no way of knowing in advance who will benefit, to what extent, how and when. That is just like asking the Government to throw money out the window. That is what item 5 of the motion does.

In the last five years, Madam Speaker, this Government has done much more for the environment than the former Government was able to do. The Minister of the Environment continues his excellent work. We will not solve environmental problems with tax measures.

Madam Speaker, when we look at this motion, we see one thing. We see that the Opposition is not only after the goods and services tax. No. It wants to undo the fiscal policy of the last five years. This fiscal policy has done two things. First, it strengthened the Canadian tax system and especially tax fairness, and second, it helped the Canadian economy make substantial progress over the past five years. That is what the fiscal policy of these last five years has done.

What did we do to improve the tax system? I said that we cut tax shelters, we cut the scientific research tax credit, we introduced a refundable federal sales tax credit for low-income families in 1986. That was innovative. Since 1986, the amount a family or individual receives annually has doubled and it will quadruple in 1991 with the implementation of the new goods and services tax. That is innovative and breaks with the old-style taxation of the present federal sales tax. That tax is 65 years old, Madam Speaker. Sixty-five is time for retirement. We want to retire that federal sales tax.

All the organizations that appeared before the Standing Committee on Finance said the same thing: The present sales tax is bad!

Mr. Gauthier: Yours is worse!

Mr. Vincent: It is bad!

Mr. Gauthier: Yours is worse—they all said that!

Mr. Vincent: People might want to see some changes made to our proposal. That is normal. But it is definitely accepted and more acceptable than the federal sales tax. My colleague from Ottawa—Vanier will definitely admit that, not here, because he is not in a position to do so, but I well know that outside the House, he will admit that the new tax is better than the old one, because he is an intelligent, sensible man. And especially, Madam Speaker, since the honourable profession which he practised before entering this House is not affected by the GST!

• (1600)

I heard the NDP Members talk about taxing companies, taxing individuals, tax, tax, tax. That is fine, Madam Speaker, but remember one thing: Canada is in a competitive international market. Therefore, the Canadian personal and corporate tax system must be competitive with rates in the United States, Europe and Japan. That is important—

An Hon. Member: With the United States!

Mr. Vincent: Yes, with the United States! Yes! It is funny how proud we are as a government and as a country to sell to the United States. Maybe the Liberal party is not proud of it, but it creates jobs here. You over there do not care about jobs. That is another problem. We care about employment. Come to Trois-Rivières; people there care about jobs! That is why it is important to sell to the United States and Europe.

Madam Speaker, I see that my time is up and I will respect your decision with great pleasure. In closing, I think that we must defeat this motion, which, as I explained, in no way fits the future that we want for Canada in the year 2000.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member about the surtax that was introduced in 1985. At the time it was 3 per cent. A little later, it rose to 5 per cent. On June 18, 1987, the Minister of Finance said in the House that as soon as the new sales tax was introduced, personal and corporate income surtaxes would be eliminated. However, in 1989, the Minister of Finance said in English:

[English]

"At this point I do not want to hold this one out".

[Translation]

In 1987, the Minister of Finance said, "It shows.", replying that he would eliminate the surtax, but in 1989, when questioned by the Finance Committee, he said he could not eliminate the surtax— My question to the Hon. Member is as follows: If the Government really wants to go ahead with the GST as drafted, without discussions with the provinces and the various parties involved, will the Hon. Member continue to support his government's proposals in their present form?

Mr. Vincent: Madam Speaker, I have the benefit of four years' experience with the Department of Finance, and I can inform the hon. member for Ottawa Centre that the Conservative Government negotiated with the provinces for two years, but for various reasons no agreement was reached on a national sales tax, which would have been the ideal situation, everyone agrees. Now there is no agreement, but as I pointed out earlier, the present federal sales tax must be changed, and there is agreement on that. At least there is that.

Third, Madam Speaker, the hon. member forgot a very important aspect of the proposed GST. I can't blame him because I forgot to mention it myself. I am referring to the fact that after bringing the number of tax brackets down to three, we are now setting the second bracket at 25 per cent instead of 26 per cent, to improve the situation of low- and middle-income families. Madam Speaker, I think this amply compensates for the surtax that remains in place for high-income Canadians.

Mr. Gauthier: What about the temporary surtax?

Mr. Vincent: I just answered that question.

[English]

Mr. Butland: Madam Speaker, I have a question for the member for Trois Rivieres on free trade and the goods and services tax. In the province of Ontario tourism has gone down 8 to 25 per cent, including tourism in Niagara Falls. The bridge from Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, to Sault Ste Marie, Michigan, is tilted—Canadians are flocking to the United States every day.

Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars per week is spent on groceries on the Michigan side; $2 million already has been spent in the first 10 months by Canadians shopping in the United States. The flow of money is going from Canada to the United States. Tourism here is way down. I say the playing field is not level and this goods and services tax will only exacerbate the problem. The circumstance at border cities is chaotic. It is a disaster.

Would the government, and hon. member personally, want to help out border cities? Would he perhaps exclude them from the goods and services tax? What sort of comment might he have to assist border cities?

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Madam Speaker, I think the comments by the Member for the New Democratic Party are very interesting, but I don't think it is up to the Government to do so. I think it is up to all Members of this House to pass the message on to Canadians that they should buy Canadian and support Canadian business. Madam Speaker, this is not a partisan issue. It is a matter that has an impact on all Members of this House. To save money, many Canadians prefer to shop in the United States, when they live near the border and generally speaking, this is bad for Canada. I think my colleague should be the first to stress this point and sell this philosophy to Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, it is high time we had this kind of debate in the House, and I think the New Democratic Party is to be commended for tabling a motion in the House that gives us an opportunity to spend a few minutes discussing tax reform, a discussion I believe is necessary on a subject that concerns all Canadians. Madam Speaker, we would of course have preferred to see our amendment accepted by the Chair, so that we could broaden the scope of the debate and get at the core of the problem.

Today, Canadians want to know first of all whether our tax system is equitable, fair and visible, and whether it is truly adapted to the needs of Canadians. In other words, whether it is modern enough to meet the demands of the 90's. We all agree that the system needs restructuring, that tax reform is necessary. That is why we made a suggestion this morning for thorough consultations with Canadians and the provinces, with a view to bringing about fundamental tax reforms in this country. We feel this reform, study or consultation should focus on personal and corporate income tax and on any other tax measures that may be used to pay our debts and enable Canadians to continue to enjoy the services and programs that were developed and introduced many years ago. We would like to see a system that is fair to everyone, that is simple, that is based on the ability to pay—in other words, progressive –, that meets the environmental demands of the day and helps provide for sustainable development. The four themes I just mentioned: fairness, simplicity, ability to pay and environmental demands are themes I think should be discussed across this country, because this is truly a problem that demands our attention.

I admit that the motion before us is concerned mainly with attacking the goods and services tax. In that regard, I will just say that I quite agree it is high time for Canadians to get the message across clearly to this Government: the goods and services tax proposed by the Conservatives is unacceptable in its present form because, we must admit, it meets none of the requirements, none of the criteria set by the Finance Minister himself. I will read those criteria to you! Not only the Finance Minister but also the Prime Minister in the 1988 election campaign said the tax had to be revenue-neutral, that it could not bring in more than the present tax, about $17 or $18 billion. It had to be visible, but it will not be; it will be as hidden as the present tax is. It will have to be set in cooperation with the provinces. It will not be! We know that; the Parliamentary Secretary admitted it himself. It failed, it missed the mark. The provinces left the negotiating table and said: No, your proposed formula is not acceptable. The new goods and services tax meets none of the criteria set by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance.

I remind you of some statements made by the Finance Minister. He promised a revenue-neutral tax in the election campaign, and I quote him:

[English]

"The bottom line is that the GST (the goods and services tax) will not be used to raise the revenues of the Government of Canada." He said that on June 19, 1987, on CTV News. The same minister said, "So again what we are trying to do is be, using your words, "revenue neutral", in the second stage as well".

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, they did not keep their promise. The Minister's own technical paper now being considered in committee shows that he intends to collect 5 or 6 billion dollars more than under the present tax, which is about 24 or 25 billion dollars. These figures are on the conservative side, because if we are to believe certain witnesses—I have here a letter that says the Federation of Independent Businesses maintains that the Mulroney Government will collect 15 billion more from Canadians. Fifteen billion is fifteen thousand million!

About visibility: we wanted a visible tax so that people will know they are paying y taxes on product x. There will be no visibility, because the government has said: legally, we cannot insist that the tax be visible on the bill.

However, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) promised the House a visible tax. On June 18, 1987, he said: "Sales tax reform will eliminate the hidden tax in the prices consumers pay". It says so at page 7634 in Hansard, but it wasn't true!

Two years later, on June 22, 1989, the Minister of Finance told the House: "Our legal advice is that we do not have the legal right to require a retailer to impose the tax extra to pricing, or to include it in the pricing".

Madam Speaker, businesses are not obliged to indicate the amount of GST on the bill, and so it will not be visible.

They told us: "Well, we will give them an incentive". Another broken promise!

They told us there would be federal-provincial co-operation. We will be the only federal system, the only Western country, the only Western developed country with a double retail sales tax: a provincial tax in most provinces except Alberta, plus a federal tax. This has an even more complex and damaging aspect, because the provinces will apply their sales tax on top of the tax imposed by the federal Government. It will be the sale price plus 9 per cent plus, in my own province of Ontario, 8 per cent. This will be a very heavy burden on low- and middle-income families, because they are the ones that will have to pay. I don't think it is fair to put this kind of burden on their shoulders.

After five years under the reign of this government—and in this context the word "reign" has a pejorative connotation—Canada's national debt has doubled since Confederation. On August 8, 1984 the Minister of Finance told the House: "We will reduce expenditures and refrain from increasing taxes, which are too high as it is".

And during the 1984 election campaign this same government kept repeating, and I quote: "Our immediate aim is to bring down the deficit by reducing expenditures, not by raising taxes".

Yet over the past five years the Conservative government has saddled the Canadian population with 31 tax increases. Interest rates have been fluctuating at an alarming rate. Low income Canadians are poorer than ever, the rich are richer than ever!

During the past five years under the Mulroney government, the taxes of a family with two children and an annual income of $23,600 have gone up by 60 per cent. The taxes of a similar family earning an average annual income of $45,000 have increased by 30 per cent, while those of the wealthy earning $100,000 a year are up by 8 per cent. A family earning $23,600, up 60 per cent; $45,000, up 30 per cent; and if you earn $100,000 your increase amounts to 8 per cent. Madam Speaker, I repeat that it is unfair.

I want to conclude my remarks by stating that we do need a reform, but first we must consult Canadians, we must get the provinces on side. We have to find a fair, equitable, open and simple solution. But the GST of this Conservative government will do nothing to help us meet the basic requirements of a system which runs well and is fair to everybody.

[English]

Mr. Hovdebo: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the succinct way the member defined what he considers a fair, progressive tax structure. I notice in passing though that he did not express his support for the five suggestions made in the motion before us.

• (1620)

Among everybody to whom I have spoken, and I guess generally across the country, there is a great suspicion that the price of everything will go up. The price of labour, goods and services will go up besides the tax being added on. There is also a suspicion that the manufacturing tax which is supposed to come off is unlikely to be passed on to the consumer.

This whole approach would add, as it has in Great Britain and in New Zealand, a considerable amount to the cost of living. Does the member agree that this is one of the real dangers of this kind of tax, that it will add so much to the cost of living and that it will be much more inflationary than is suggested by the government?

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the question.

I did not address the points in the main motion basically because I really believe that the approach of the New Democratic Party in this debate was a patchwork type of approach. I do not agree that we should be doing any patchwork.

Canadians are fed up with patchwork. This is what the GST does. It is just a patchwork approach to a very difficult problem that we will need to resolve together. I object to people wanting to impose upon us a patchwork approach which I took the motion that we have before us today to be, unless it was amended by my friend from Ottawa South who had a very good way of putting it into a more comprehensive, global context. I apologize if I did not address, in the 10 minutes that I had, all the issues of the main motion, but I did want to address the points that I believe are important.

To try to answer the question that was put to me, it is true that we have no guarantees from this government that it will ensure that the saving of the 13.5 per cent manufacturer's tax will be passed on to the consumers. That is true. The government will not legislate, I know, that manufacturers who are making the 13.5 per cent savings on their goods as of January 1, 1990—God forbid if it ever comes into force—must pass that savings on to their consumers. And that is one of the big problems because they won't. They didn't when Jean Chrétien reduced the tax from 12 to 9 per cent. The experience of this country is, beware, they do not pass these savings on, they just jack up the price and say that it is part of doing business.

I have to tell people also to beware of the shell game here. The 9 per cent will cost a lot more than the 13.5 per cent even though some of my Tory friends say that they are reducing it from 13.5 to 9 per cent. That is a lie. That is not true. On a piece of furniture—a rocking chair for instance—that is manufactured for say $200 on which we pay 13.5 per cent today—which is $27 tax—when that same rocking chair gets through the transportation network, through the marketing and the store sells it and adds on its profits, it will sell for $400. Well, 9 per cent of $400 is $36, so it will cost Canadians more, not less.

That is why I think it is time for this government to drop the idea of the GST and to come to grips with the real issues. It should ask Canadians what they want in terms of fiscal reform.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Today we are discussing the business of supply which is one of the essential functions of this House, and for which the government is accountable to the House of Commons. There is not a single minister of the Crown in the House, and I object to that.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member knows very well that this is the type of remark that he should not make in the House, yet he keeps doing it.

Mr. A. H. Harry Brightwell (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to take part in this debate today. The goods and services tax is fundamentally important to every single Canadian, to the future of every Canadian.

We in this Parliament have a responsibility to pass on to our next generation a sound economy, a fair tax, and a country that can hold its own with its competitors in the world. I want to say that we should pass on a debt-free country.

I was going to say that we should pass on a debt-free country. Frankly, while the goods and services tax is going to help in this regard, we are saddled with that huge debt we inherited in 1984. The member said we have doubled the debt. Perhaps it has doubled but it is the service cost of that debt that has generated all of the present debt. That government set a pattern that we are having difficulty breaking away from and we are saddled with that huge debt.

In the short time that I have today I would like to talk about why we must replace the existing sales tax. We know that the existing sales tax distorts business, it is hidden from consumers. The hon. member from Vanier was talking about the hidden tax. I would dispute that this new tax will be hidden because, indeed, every single business that will buy must have it separated. This tax will be visible.

The problem with the old tax is that it is hidden. It penalizes Canadian producers. What a terrible thing to have to continue, and the opposition is not suggesting any other way around it. It is very complex. It is unreliable because people can make business decisions to get around the tax.

In 1984 we set down an agenda for economic renewal. The agenda for renewal spelled out in plain terms our government's priorities and principles, and described a clear policy framework directed toward job creation. And what a record we have. One and a half million more Canadians are working now than there were in 1984. The agenda described economic growth, sound fiscal management, economic efficiency and improved international competitiveness.

The plan focused on a strong private sector as an economic leader, on a compassionate social policy to help Canadians in need and on government being a creator of solutions and not one of the problems.

The goods and services tax is the result of extensive consultation and careful study that began way back with the White Paper on tax reform in June of 1987. Tax reform was to be implemented in two stages. In 1988 the government reformed its personal and corporate tax systems. The goods and services tax is the next step in this overall plan.

We are living today with a federal sales tax that was put in place in 1924, 65 years ago. How many changes have occurred in the industrial world since then? Then it was simple; manufacturers made the article and wholesalers sold the article. Now everything has changed except our tax. The world economy has also changed around us and Canadians have to change in order to meet the competition.

Today's business world is different. This difference has been recognized by nations around the world. Other nations have changed their tax systems. In fact, 48 nations in the world presently use a tax similar to the goods and services tax that this government is proposing. This is hardly a new invention, hardly something different that we are proposing here today.

The opposition would lead us to believe that Canadians are not able to handle the degree of complexity in the tax, but other nations in the world can. I do not believe that for a moment. I know that Canadians can indeed understand the tax if they are given a chance to understand it and they will, in fact, be able to work competitively in the world.

It has been clear to me for some time that many people, including the opposition, do not understand what is in this tax. In fact, from what I have heard today I know that is true. If opposition members meet constituents who do not understand it as well they do not care. They are quite happy to allow the misconceptions to continue in the constituent's mind. They are not trying to tell them the facts about the tax. They have not studied it.

The member from Dartmouth said "Study the tax". He said there is a 9 per cent tax on bait that can never be recovered. Every business in Canada can be taken to a tax free position through the application of the goods and services tax, even fishermen who pay a tax on their bait.

We have heard from the member from Vanier about the new goods and services tax being a tax on tax, that the Ontario tax will be a tax on the goods and services tax. Indeed, it might. I would like to make two comments. First, the leaders in the provincial world thought they would force the Government of Canada out of this particular field and not let it have a consumer tax simply by not co-operating. I am sure that the citizens of Ontario particularly—I will not speak for the other people across Canada—would want the two taxes. Indeed, the province and the Government of Canada will come to an agreement so that we will indeed have a joint tax down the road.

The member for Vanier also talked about the impact on the lower-income family. He did not bother mentioning the tax rebates that will go to these people and, indeed, give them more money when they are done than what they have at the present time.

Getting back to my topic, which is basically the federal sales tax, items that we buy every day are taxed right now. They include cosmetics, garbage bags, children's toys and kitchen utensils. Even food carries an impact of the federal sales tax. Other things in business such as office furniture and tools carry tax, even though many of those are supposed to be tax exempt. But there is an impact of federal sales tax that carries through in the cost of every single item that is made. It is there as a hidden aspect, but there as well as an added item at the end after manufacturing.

We should talk a little about who pays the present tax. It is suggested by many—perhaps not today for I have not heard anybody say it—that all the tax will come from the consumer. Consumers have forever paid the tax that is built in as a business expense. Indeed, if they pay the tax now, they will pay the tax later.

We have heard them say that the new tax will be 9 per cent on everything, like a tax increase. The truth is it will be very difficult for members opposite to show me any single item that will have a net increase of 9 per cent because there will be cost reductions. There will be competition in industries all over. There are businessmen on this side of the House—perhaps there are not too many over there—who know that competition does keep a lid on prices and will force the passing on of any savings.

The $17 billion in taxes that we collect right now are buried so deeply in production processes that they are virtually invisible to the majority of Canadians. Under the present tax we are taxing the business inputs of our companies which compete with companies around the world. This puts our companies at a distinct disadvantage, both here with respect to the price of products that we sell at home against imported products, and also against selling in other parts of the world. This unfairness in the tax is costing us jobs.

Let us be realistic. What country in the world would let a tax continue that shoots itself in the foot, that hurts itself in jobs and production? I do not think you can find many others, or any others, certainly not nations of equal industrial growth and ability like ourselves. We are committed to a better future for our children. Any member of Parliament representing constituents in the House should be supportive of such a move to preserve our current good life.

There is another negative aspect of this tax. Manufacturers can organize themselves to evade the tax. They can set up a manufacturing base and move all of their costs and future costs into another company to reduce the amount of tax that is applied to the manufacturing cost. So the present tax is not reliable.

This tax is supposed to cover some 75,000 firms, but indeed it is made very complex because there are 22,000 special arrangements with administrative interpretations. There is an increasingly larger number of court cases which are trying to define the tax as it stands now and show it will not produce the revenue that it does in the future because of this type of organization.

The goods and services tax will apply uniformly across a broad base of goods and services. The present tax applies only to 30 per cent of the products that are sold. This is a very narrow base on which to have a tax which is really, in its own right, a consumption tax.

It is certainly a great understatement to say that the present sales tax is inadequate. It is outdated. It is damaging our ability to compete in the world.

I see that I have come to the end of what I might say. Perhaps I diverge a little too much on the things that the opposition members have said.

Our government has faced and will continue to face economic challenges so that we can ensure Canada's prosperity in a competitive, ever changing world. We have a plan for meeting the challenge ahead. The plan is working. The goods and services tax is an essential part of that plan.

Mr. Hovdebo: Madam Speaker, I know that the member recognizes that a good portion of our production in Canada is exported to the United States and is used there to produce products which sometimes come in to compete with our products. Under this particular tax, any export to the United States will not be taxed. Thus, a manufacturing firm which uses Canadian products in the States will not have to pay this 9 per cent tax. However, a manufacturing firm in Canada which uses the same materials will have to pay the tax.

I know the member is going to tell me that it is going to be rebated, but many small firms and many productions, such as farm productions, have a cash flow problem to start with. That cash flow problem is going to be increased by 9 per cent. Would it not make much more sense not to have this tax in place and to be more competitive right from the start?

Mr. Brightwell: Madam Speaker, perhaps the hon. member does not realize that every manufacturing institution in Canada and the United States will indeed be tax free. There will not be any tax carried on.

He speaks about cash flow. He and I have a kindred interest in farming. That is one area in which I agree there will be forever a claiming back of rebates. Beyond that, in businesses where all products are taxed there will be a positive cash flow because each business will forever have money owing to government in its bank account and will indeed have more money and more interest generated from it.

Products entering from the United States will be as cheap as they are now. Because we compete on the market there, our products will be cheaper. In any case, a 9 per cent tax will be paid on both sides of this issue, imported and on Canadian-made products. It will be applied fairly, which I am sure is what the hon. member must want.

Mr. Speller: Madam Speaker, I must say I was somewhat shocked that a member of this House responsible for agriculture—in fact the chairman of the agriculture committee—got up in the House today and said nothing about the effects of the GST on agriculture.

I want to bring to his attention something that is in the finance minister's technical paper. It says: "Sales of farmland will generally be subject to the normal GST rules. Sales or leases of farmland will be taxable". In other words, a farmer who sells one quarter of a section of land to another farmer or, in fact, leases it to his son, will have to pay tax. What this does is it raises the input costs of farmers. What this tax does is give more paperwork to farmers. It also brings up a system of "the cheque is in the mail" syndrome. This is something that farmers will have to deal with.

I had the opportunity to see a number of farmers at our local fair. Farmer after farmer after farmer came up to sign petitions against this GST because they recognize that it is not good for agriculture. So I leave it to the member to get up and say something about agriculture and the effects of the GST on agricultural communities.

Mr. Brightwell: Madam Speaker, the hon. member should know that I know there are other things in life apart from agriculture, although I do spend a good part of my time in that particular area.

I have already acknowledged the fact that farmers will forever be claiming input costs. I have also said that they, like every other business, will be tax free. So this in and out aspect of the tax does not mean increased costs to the farmer who is renting the land.

• (1640)

I want to ask the hon. member if he spent any time explaining the tax to the people who came to his booth. I would like to suggest that this member fed on the misconceptions held by the people coming to the booth and allowed them to grow. He is not really trying to explain this tax to the people of Canada.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I rise in support of this motion today. It is a far-seeing motion that is part of real tax reform and which provides the alternatives that the Prime Minister has been calling for. Here are part of the alternatives to real tax reform.

I support this motion not just in support of my riding but in support of the people of Canada—the rights of the people of Canada to be free from a regressive tax grab and to see what real tax reform could look like.

First, I would like to make some comments on the manufacturers' sales tax which, as the previous speaker said, is an unfair tax. I would ask why this Tory Government raised an unfair tax from 9 per cent to 10 per cent to 11 per cent to 12 per cent to 13.5 per cent. In other words it raised this unfair tax since 1984. We can only take from that that in order to deal with an unfair tax this government has decided that it will make an unfair tax more unfair for every Canadian, whether it is to buy their children's clothes, a postage stamp or to bury someone. This is a tax that goes beyond the grave as well.

We have heard a lot today about the effects of this tax on various ridings. I would like to make a few comments today on the effects on those Canadians who live in our northern regions.

First, it is known that it is very expensive to live in the northern regions of our country. One of the issues I would like to address about this tax is the potential effect on inflation, which the government itself acknowledges. There will be an inflationary aspect to this tax, some 2.5 per cent according to the government, but to other analysts it will be beyond 3 per cent. There is no tax rebate, no tax credit to compensate northerners, farmers and those who are living in poverty for the inflationary effect of this proposed tax.

I would like a northern resident to say that the cost of living in the north ranges from 25 per cent to 50 per cent higher than southern regions, and in some remote areas in the Northwest Territories it is as much as 75 per cent to 100 per cent higher. We are going to see a situation where residents of northern areas suffer not only from the inflationary effect but also from the tax itself.

As you know, Madam Speaker, many of our goods—virtually all of our goods—from food to processed goods are trucked in or flown in. Northerners are going to be hurt particularly by the added transportation costs when the tax comes on to transportation as it is proposed. This will affect not only those of us in northern Canada, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, but all northern parts of the provinces and indeed all rural areas which are reliant on these forms of transport. Of course, cutting VIA Rail will be another severe blow to those areas that have relied on the rail system for delivery of those goods.

The 9 per cent means that we will be suffering greater tax hardship than our counterparts in the south. I want to give some specific examples of that. For example, based on Statistics Canada data it is estimated that the average family in Whitehorse, in my riding of the Yukon, will pay $500 more per year than a southern family with the tax increases. Whereas the average Canadian family may anticipate a tax increase—and it is a total tax increase of $2,000 a year—a northern resident can anticipate an increase of approximately $2,500.

Another increased cost to northerners will be the taxes mentioned on transportation. Northerners travel more. They have to, not just to visit family and friends but for medical reasons and to do business. For example, the average Yukon family spent $662 on air travel in 1986 compared with the Canadian average of $211. That is almost three times as much. I want to remind the House that that amount is for essential services which include medical care, business reasons and so on.

What the GST means is that this family will pay an average of $40 more as compared with a southern family on increased air fare alone.

As everyone knows—and even the Hon. Minister of Finance knows—it is much colder in the north. It is much darker in the north beginning this time of year. Therefore, we use more oil, electricity and natural gas, as do other Canadians, but we use more of it than do other Canadians. In Whitehorse the average resident spends $638 on home heating fuels alone. That is compared with some $400 for the rest of Canada. Nine per cent of $638 obviously is more than 9 per cent of $425.

This tax will cost northerners more. This tax is a penalty for people living in our northern regions.

Let me make it clear that I do not in any way support this tax or this form of regressive taxation. That is why I support the New Democratic Party motion which proposes real alternatives and real tax reforms.

I was interested to hear during the hearings of the committee in Whitehorse one of the government members of the committee propose that there would be an adjustment made to the northern benefits allowance to compensate for the increased burden of taxation which may fall as a result of this proposed goods and services tax. I would certainly be interested in hearing more details on that as we have found with the northern benefits tax, which I know is under review at the moment, there are still many loopholes. There are many problems with people in claiming the benefits that they are entitled to under that format.

Northerners know that this tax is unfair, not just to them but to all Canadians. The biggest problem, as I said, is that this is a regressive tax. It is tied to the amount of money people spend and not to their wealth or incomes.

Clearly the poor are going to be hit harder by this increased consumption tax. It violates the principle of taxation according to ability to pay. It continues to shift the burden from the large corporations to the consumer.

There are alternatives, and we mention some in our motion. I would like to add a few.

There must be a comprehensive restructuring, as I have said and as we indicate in our motion, of the tax system. For example, there should be an annual net wealth tax. People should not be taxed strictly on their income but on what they own. Net wealth is the best measure of an individual's ability to pay. There are estimates that this could bring at least $1 billion in revenue to the government.

The former speaker talked about the deficit. As we know, a decrease in interest rates of 1 per cent would immediately add $1.6 billion in revenue for the government. Clearly, the calls for a decrease in interest rates—a call by all Parties on the finance committee—could be a measure which could result in an increase in tax revenues as well.

We can limit as well corporate interest deductibility. As I said earlier, with the goods and services tax there will be a tax on stamps and on children's clothing, but there are to be no taxes on the interest on the money that large corporations borrow for mergers and takeovers or, indeed, on any merger or takeover. Stockbrokers are free from having to pay the tax. I think it would be of small consolation to a single parent trying to raise a family and trying to pay for housing to know that stockbrokers' transactions will not be part of this taxable system.

We can raise income tax for the highest earners. The latest statistics already indicate that the luckiest Canadians are those who make over $125,000 a year because they are still those best favoured by our tax system.

We can also eliminate the $100,000 tax free capital gains exemption, except for farms, family businesses and private residences, which would bring in some $600 million in government revenue.

Protection of the environment is the number one issue today. I have seen nothing that indicates that the government has done an environmental assessment of this proposed goods and services tax. What will this mean for the purchases of environmentally-friendly products?

• (1650)

An environmental tax on the other hand would work toward solving two problems—protecting our environment and creating tax revenues. We need a genuine minimum corporate tax.

These are just a few of the suggestions for tax reform. What this government must realize is it cannot continue to shift the burden on to the poor and middle-income earners. It cannot continue to have support from the Canadian people. It cannot continue to call this tax reform.

Madam Speaker, today we are proposing some elements of real tax reform. I urge all members of this House to support this motion.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Madam Speaker, I appreciate having an opportunity to speak on this motion, especially as someone who has spent the last three weeks hearing representations from people both here in Ottawa and in other parts of the country.

I notice that this motion essentially calls upon the government to abandon its efforts to reform the federal sales tax and to do other things. I would say that unfortunately it appears that the members who are proposing this motion have not been listening to the groups which have been coming and speaking before the finance committee.

Quite frankly, what I can tell you and other members of the House who may not have been free from their other duties to come and observe all of our committee meetings is that, for the most part, about nine out of ten groups that have come before the committee have endorsed the concept of a value added tax, or a goods and services tax.

In almost every case they have had particular measures that they want changed or done differently. We can look at small business, for example. Mr. Bulloch spoke on behalf of small business. He said there was no other solution to the problem but a type of goods and services tax. He was unequivocal about that. He wanted the provinces to be part of the system so that there would be one system in Canada rather than two, but he had no doubts about a value added tax.

We had a representative from the National Council on Welfare, Mr. Ken Battle, who came and told us that the proposal put forward by the government is superior to the system that is in place today, a system, I might add, that has been there since 1924. He had some concerns with regard to the credits and the indexing of the credits, but comparing the proposal to the existing system was a positive step. I would have thought that the New Democratic Party might have been interested in hearing from the National Council on Welfare.

We had, in addition, Mrs. Shirley Carr, who came before the committee on Tuesday morning representing the Canadian Labour Congress. When I asked her directly how she felt about a value added tax which is in place in 48 other countries in the world, she said she had no difficulty in supporting the concept of a value added tax. Again, she had some concerns about this particular proposal and wanted some changes. Effectively, she wanted us to go back and have a royal commission to see what we could do in that regard.

Maybe I should speak on that for a moment because I think some people have the impression that what we are doing is somehow new or just thought up in the last few months or a year. In fact, the existing federal manufacturers' sales tax has been around since 1924. Today it accounts for about 20 per cent of the revenue of the federal government—around $18 billion. It is a large number we are talking about, but a system that has been in place for many years.

However, almost since the time it was brought in, its flaws have been known. There have been a variety of commissions, studies and examinations saying we have do something about this. In 1940, 50 years ago, there was the Rowell-Sirois commission which examined this issue and came to the conclusion that something should be done. In the 1960s there were various studies. In 1966 the Carter commission, which has been referred to by other members, examined taxation in Canada and put forward some suggestions. On the income tax side, those suggestions were adopted in 1971 by the then Minister of Finance, Edgar Benson. However, the government did not proceed with the other part of the equation, that is sales tax reform.

In 1975, we had the Minister of Finance of the day, who is now the current Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Turner, put forward a paper on the subject, seeking to reform the federal sales tax system. Of course nothing happened. Any time that previous government over the last 20 years before this government took office ran into some difficulty or some criticism it abandoned the effort. So that was abandoned. Mr. Turner abandoned it.

Mr. MacEachen tried to resurrect it when he was Finance Minister in 1981. Mr. Lalonde did the same thing by putting forward a proposal to reform the federal sales tax system. He then appointed a commission called the Goodman Commission which studied that particular proposal. It came to the conclusion that that was not particularly very good, and that it should look to something more along the lines of what we are doing now. Mr. Bulloch spoke about that series of commissions because he was a member of that commission. That is why he was able to state unequivocally that really the only answer is some form of value-added tax.

With all that support and with all those studies for 50 years it seems to me that now is the time to act—no longer talk about it, no longer study it, no longer have any more commissions and studies. Act. Put a proposal on the table. That is what the government has done.

I am not entirely satisfied with the proposal of the government. I will be the first to say that. I favour fewer exemptions, a broader base and a lower rate. I will still say that the proposal on the table by the government is superior to the existing system. While I will seek some changes along the way, especially in my role as a member of the finance committee, I know that one thing we cannot change is not doing something at all. We must proceed in some fashion.

For this motion to suggest that we do not proceed on the subject is I think, frankly, totally misguided. It does not recognize what 50 years of history has taught us. It does not recognize what individuals have been telling us.

The issue of farming was raised here a few moments ago. I should mention that last week we heard from the Canadian Barley Growers, the Canadian Wheat Growers and the Canadian Cattlemen, among other farm groups. We also heard from Unifarm. Every one of those groups endorsed a value-added tax. They said that, first, they would like a lower rate but that in order to get the lower rate they would like to be part of the system which would make food taxable.

Not only did they endorse a value-added tax, or a goods and services tax, they said that they should be brought into the system as well.

I recognize that people who have been reading newspapers or seeing clips on television may have got somewhat of a different impression. Those clips focus on the negative aspects that a particular group wants to raise when it comes before the committee. It is up to us to hear a group to try to do what we can while maintaining the integrity, over all, of the proposal.

The alternative suggestion that the New Democrats are putting forward deserves some examination here. Their first point is that there should be a minimum corporate tax on profitable corporations. That is fair enough. I think one of the problems we have is that they suggest and continue to quote numbers about there being 89,000 profitable corporations.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Sixty thousand.

Mr. Dorin: A new number we have had recently is 89,000. Somebody has put that number forward. In any event, there are not that many corporations to begin with. If we were to take a definition of "corporation" commonly accepted under the Corporations and Labour Returns Act there are about 2,000 corporations that could be classified as large, profitable and unprofitable.

When we had a study examining those corporations that do not pay tax even though they make a profit—the study is available in case people have not had an opportunity to see it—we found that the largest group that falls into that category includes farmers and small business people .The reason they fall into that category is that they have very cyclical incomes. A farmer may have a large crop one year and no crop the next and then another crop. In any given year he may appear as a person who had a reasonably sizable income. He paid no income tax because for the previous two or three years he had losses. Farmers are allowed essentially an averaging mechanism. The same is true for small businesses. That is why when you talk about a minimum tax and and you talk about profitable corporations that pay no tax the largest number by far is that of farmers and small businesses.

As long as we recognize that and if we want to increase the tax on that group then that is fine. The New Democrats should say that and be up front about it.

We talk about some other things in here, for example, taxation of capital gains and the restoration of inheritance tax. I am not going to go into detail on those, but I would suggest that if we were to take all the suggestions put forward here by the New Democratic Party in its motion today, we would have perhaps $2 billion, $3 billion or $4 billion available in taxes. That should not be disregarded. That is an important number. But it is nowhere near the $18 billion being brought in today by the federal sales tax. Therefore, this is not an alternative at all and should not be regarded as such.

Their fourth point about tax provisions which encourage environmentally sound practices is interesting. I must say that if there is anything at all redeeming about this particular motion it is this one clause which mentions that. I have said on occasion that we should consider possibly looking at how we might put into the taxation system some elements of a tax, if you like, on polluters or pollution, where we could try to address the issue of the environment in an economic way. If they had more suggestions in this area that might be a motion which I and some members of the House might be able to support.

However, given what they have said here it is not possible. It would not solve the problem. It leaves the entire question unaddressed, even after 50 years of studies, and proposes really no alternative that would in any way try to address the problem that we are trying to address. For that reason I and other members of the government will have to vote against this motion.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member started out by suggesting that there was a lot of support for a value added tax and that all it needed was some changes to the act. It is my understanding and the understanding of most people here that the act has already gone to the printer, that the finance committee hearings are a sham, and that there is no chance of any of these representations being any value in the changing of the act. Would the member like to comment?

Mr. Dorin: I would be glad to comment. No, I do not believe that the act has gone to the printer. What may have gone to the printer is the draft legislation.

I think on this part I could be a little bit critical of the Department of Finance because when it brought forward proposals in the White Paper in August it was our understanding that we would also receive the draft legislation to support that White Paper. Then we could have a more informed discussion of the issue when we held our hearings from tax professionals and other people who wanted to see the exact detail, as opposed to the concept which is put forward in the technical paper. We are actually anxiously awaiting that draft legislation because it will allow us to address some additional issues. We are hopeful that we can get it in time to use it and incorporate it into what we suggest in our report.

I would just like perhaps to make one further comment to the member of the New Democratic Party. I know that seated close to him is another member, the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan. I want to refer to a comment he made on May 11 of this year during the budget debate.

This is what that member of the New Democratic Party had to say: "As much as I will fight it and talk about it, between now and the time it is implemented I still want to urge the government to restrain itself in its temptation to give exemptions. Exemptions will not make it more fair. Exemptions will make the tax more difficult to administer. Exemptions will be of greater benefit to those who have more money than to those who have less money. I associate myself with the consumers' organization when they say not to exempt food."

We should ask the members of the New Democratic Party who have put forward this motion today to speak to their colleague from British Columbia who, as we know, was at one time the provincial treasurer in that province when Mr. Barrett was the Premier and when the NDP was the government there. That man knows something about taxes.

He knows something about running a government's budget, because of course he was the treasurer in that province. I think he would have something useful to say and his colleagues should heed his advice. Perhaps they might want to have a discussion with him and see whether or not he could shed some light on the situation for them so that they would not be bringing forward motions like this one today.

Mr. Harb: My question is with reference to a statement that was made by the finance minister on a number of occasions prior to the last election and during the election, that is that value added taxes will be revenue neutral.

Lately, over and over again we have been hearing about the impact the goods and services tax would have on the deficit, implying that it would reduce the deficit.

Could the hon. member tell the House how a revenue neutral tax could have an impact on reducing the deficit when it is revenue neutral? If in fact it is not revenue neutral, would the hon. member persuade his colleagues on the government side to come clean with Canadians and say that it will be the cow that we are going to milk over the years in order to reduce the deficit.

Mr. Dorin: I would be pleased to respond to that question. The reason why a person can talk about a tax as being revenue neutral and talk about the deficit at the same time is that the existing federal sales tax is essentially withering away.

One of the problems with that tax is that it is applied in quite an unfair and arbitrary manner, which has spawned a great many court cases. Right now there are approximately 130 cases within the system which are basically unravelling the existing federal tax system.

If, for example, we were to stop proceeding with this and say that we were going to stay with the existing tax system, we anticipate a loss in the order of about $2 billion in revenue immediately, from just what is in the system right now in terms of people challenging the system or reorganizing their businesses basically to shift away and avoid the tax. We would have a $2 billion loss immediately and further losses over time as business continued to move away from the system.

Another thing I could remind the member of is that the manufacturing sector or the goods sector of the economy is becoming a considerably smaller part of the economy than what it used to be. In 1961 it was 63 per cent of the economy. It is now about 53 per cent. So as that sector continues to shrink and the tax base continues to shrink, the rate must be raised on what is left to get the same revenue.

In order to maintain the revenue that we are currently getting today, or the same level of revenue, we have to make these changes to preserve the integrity of the system. That is why we can say that it is an important element in terms of maintaining our control over deficit reduction, as well as say at the same time that it is budget neutral.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): I am speaking on the NDP motion that would ask the government to scrap the goods and services tax. In order to put it in perspective I would like to go back for a few moments, for my own benefit and for the benefit of some of my colleagues, to make a thumbnail sketch of precisely how we arrived at this position with respect to the goods and services tax and to give you some indication in my opinion as to why the government has had to resort to this measure.

We have to go back and examine why we have taxes. The classical definition of taxes is: compulsory payment by individuals and corporations to government, levied to finance the government services, to redistribute income, and to influence the behaviour of consumers and investors.

It goes back to the Constitution Act, 1867 which gave Parliament unlimited taxing powers and limited those of the provinces to direct taxation. The federal government, under this act, was responsible for national defence and economic development which was extensive back then. The provinces were responsible for education, health and local matters, which then involved only modest expenditures. For more than 50 years customs and excise duties provided the bulk of federal revenues. By 1913 they constituted over 90 per cent of the total.

• (1710)

To finance World War I, in 1917 Parliament introduced personal income tax, corporate tax and in 1920 the manufacturers' sales tax and other sales taxes.

The Canadian tax structure changed profoundly during World War II. In 1941 direct taxes accounted for more than 56 per cent of the federal revenue, and the provinces received grants and the yields from gasoline and sales tax that increased substantially over the years.

From 1947 to 1962 the provinces with mounting reluctance accepted federal grants as a substitute for levying their own direct taxes. In 1962 this changed again and the federal government reduced its own personal and corporate income tax rates to make room available to the provinces. Between 1962 and 1977 the provincial share of income tax revenues increased significantly.

A tax system, I believe, is judged on a number of factors. We could spend the rest of the day discussing these factors, but I think it is safe to say that the major criteria are equity, efficiency, economic growth, stabilization, and ease of administration and compliance.

What it boils down to is that individuals should be taxed on their ability to pay or, as it was put by Mr. Kenneth Carter in the royal commission report on taxation, appointed in 1962—and his report was in 1966—fairness should be the foremost objective of the taxation system. The poor should not pay more than their fair share, and the rich should not be allowed to avoid taxes through various loopholes.

In 1986 the Conservative government, stampeded by the extensive tax reforms under way in the United States, announced plans to proceed with a comprehensive reform of the Canadian federal tax system in order to keep our tax system competitive with that of the United States. Their intentions, as stated, were to broaden the income tax base to enable a reduction in personal and corporate taxes, and the sales tax would be replaced by what was referred to then as the business transfer tax that was to be a broadly based, value added tax system in which the value added to a product would be taxed at each stage in the production process.

The big objective was to lower tax rates and in particular to reduce reliance on the personal income tax by improving the revenue balance between personal income and other taxes. A simplified tax system was expected to be the offshoot of all these plans, and this would all combine to stimulate economic growth. It sounds good on paper.

What had really happened, I would suggest, was that in the first few years after the Tories were elected they began to worry. Taxable corporate income had been eroded by a sea of losses, investment credits, capital cost allowances, and other tax breaks. The manufacturers' sales tax eventually applied to only one-third of the goods and services sold in Canada because many had won exemptions through legislation and tax decision.

In other words, a tax base was developing that had become dangerously narrow. Increasingly, the personal income tax was left to carry the weight and rates were being pushed progressively higher and higher. I think we all know in this House that Canadian tax revenues come mostly from three places: corporate income tax, personal income tax, and sales tax. When too much dependence is placed on one of these three the tax system goes berserk and it starts to collapse.

There is no magic mix, but let us look at the record. In 1965 corporate income tax accounted for 20 per cent of federal revenues; personal income tax, 30 per cent; and sales and excise tax, close to 40 per cent. In 1987, 22 years later, corporate tax had gone from 20 per cent to 11 per cent; personal income tax had gone from 30 per cent to 47 per cent; and sales and excise tax was 20 per cent.

As I suggested earlier there is general agreement that there is no magic formula. What you do is you take action, you monitor, you adjust, you watch international competitive trends, and you ensure that there is minimum damage to the economy.

The finance minister's advisers seem to have a sense of mission in which the only prescription seems to be to raise more taxes while the government continues to grind to a certain extent on the expenditure side. We look at the 72 per cent increase since 1984 on personal income tax and, if we do not get some Tory back-benchers to vote against Bill C-28, we are going to have about 90 per cent by 1991.

The Tories don't seem to want to offend big business, so whose left? It is the little guy. To make matter worse, they are also concerned that the gap in corporate tax rates between Canada and the United States is causing a revenue drain. Multinational companies can shift taxable profits to the United States while maintaining deductible expenses in Canada.

The estimates are that for every percentage point of the goods and services tax Ottawa will reap between $2.5 and $5 billion. We do not know exactly. This means that the tax will raise between $22.5 billion, at the very least, or it could raise as high as $27 billion. I think all of us in this House have heard figures greater than that. We have a windfall of between $4.5 billion and $9 billion per year. That could be reduced for a number of reasons or it could be increased for a number of reasons.

This tax is a dream of this government because it will be less visible than income tax and it will be difficult to evade. It is also a revenue money machine that can easily be adjusted to maximize political benefits.

For example, if the goods and services tax were set at the 24.5 per cent, as it is now in Sweden, the Tories could abolish their federal income tax for individuals and still collect about the same revenue. If it were set at Britain's rate of 15 per cent, they could half all the income taxes.

If we look at the $9 billion that may be a windfall, the income tax could be reduced next year or the year after the introduction of GST by 15 per cent. Guess who is going to look like the good guys? Guess who is planning to look like the good guys? I am suggesting that the Tories are hoping to avoid this measure as their death-knell and they are hoping to turn it into trump card.

Let us have no illusions. Every tax has a natural history. It begins with a wide base and a low rate, but as demands for special treatment grow louder the rates inevitably rise and the base narrows. I am just waiting for the Prime Minister say: "Watch me".

I opened my presentation with a serious definition of taxes. I would like to close with another. Taxes have been defined by some as a method used by the government in power to artificially induce the rainy day everybody has been saving for. Is this really what the government is doing? I am not prepared to watch this, neither are my colleagues on this side of the House and I would suggest over there. I hope that there are some of my colleagues from across the House who are going to say the same thing. The Canadian people will not accept this, and we are going to fight and fight to make sure that we do not see it pass.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the hon. member on a excellent presentation. It is one of the best speeches that I have heard for a long, long time. The hon. member has certainly done his homework. He mentioned something about the government really supporting business and listening to business concerns. I would like to make a correction here that on the goods and services tax issue.

I have a leading businessman in my riding by the name of Mel Hartman who is a very capable individual. He has been involved in seeking the opinion of the business community concerning the issue of the goods and services tax.

We sent out a survey to the business community and I would like to report to my colleague that we heard from people who are against the goods and services tax who are bankers, hotel executives, pilots, tour operators, travel agents, legal assistants, retail store owners and managers, self-employed people, stock brokers, electrical contractors, architects, social workers, homeless, and unemployed. These are people from my region from all walks of life. The majority of those people who replied to this particular survey were in fact business people. This government, with this particular initiative on the goods and services tax, I can assure you, my colleagues, has cheesed off pretty well everyone.

• (1720)

Mr. Mifflin: I thank my colleague for Ottawa Centre for his confirmation of my concerns. I have to explain that in my riding the average income is somewhere in the vicinity of $24,000. At the last count it was $24,500, but I think that is a little bit lower than the poverty level in Canada. I would have to inform my hon. friend that I do not have many big businesses in my riding. I am always ready to be instructed on how big business feels about these kinds of things.

In a way, I am delighted to hear that big business is as concerned about this as he indicates. Certainly it is somewhat comforting to me as a member of the Liberal party fighting these measures, the goods and services tax, unemployment insurance, Bill C-21 cuts, the problems with the fisheries, the lack of concern for the Atlantic region, and all these things that are driving nails into the coffins of Atlantic Canadians that are of concern to them as well. I am interested in learning that big business at this time in our history is also on the side of the people who are fighting for the little guy.

I can assure you, Madam Speaker, and all my colleagues in this House that as we go forward with this very unpopular tax measure, a measure that has been described by people who have been in politics a lot longer than I have been, as the most despicable and unpopular measure that has been taken by any government in their memory.

We are going to count on big business and, I hope, chambers of commerce, business councils of national interest and all the people who perhaps were looking a little askance at our intonations and our revelations on the goods and services tax and the free trade concerns that we had the last time around.

I am delighted to hear this and I am looking forward to getting their support as I go around and talk in this country and to support my colleagues in having the government reject this very unpopular measure that is going to hit the little guy. I have a lot of little guys in my constituency and I would suggest that a lot of my colleagues do as well.

Mr. Crosby: Madam Speaker, with your permission I would like to make a comment or two and then to put a question to the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

The hon. member reviewed taxation history in Canada. I hope he realizes from his historical review that taxation is a changing concept. We have to build our taxation system to meet the needs of the very day. He mentioned the income tax. The income tax started out as a means to support the war effort. That does not suggest that all the income tax revenue should be used to fuel a defence machine or instruments of defence for Canada. No, it has changed. The proceeds of income taxes have been used for other purposes. We are always changing, but not the opposition. They do not change. They just want to stay right where we are and never move. Keep the deficits going, keep pumping through the services, don't pay for them.

The whole point of the exercise is to change the tax system to meet the needs. What has been done in the taxation system, in the goods and services tax, is to balance the taxation system, to collect money and to reimburse those in need.

I want to ask the member who described himself as the representative of the little people of Newfoundland, those low wage earners, does he object to those people getting millions of dollars? Nine million Canadians are going to receive rebates under the goods and services tax. Is he objecting to that? Does he not want them to receive those funds? Does he want to wipe out those rebates, lower the tax level, lower the tax, let the rich get richer and the poor people get even poorer than they are today? Is that what he wants?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There is very little time, but I will allow the hon. member a short rebuttal.

Mr. Mifflin: Madam Speaker, I thank you very much for your indulgence. I knew that you would want me to respond to my hon. friend for Halifax West. He and I have traded comments on the floor before and I always look forward to his constructive comments on those things that I have to say.

Of course I am not against rebates. He talked about taxation being an evolving thing. I agree, it is evolving. But one of the things that we on this side of the House would not want to do is to evolve something that gets rid of universality. Yes, I want to get myself involved in tax rebates, but you know as well as I, and the hon. member knows as well as I, that when you consider deindexation and all the other things, it will not make up for the difference in the money coming out of the pocket of these little guys.

I am not going to go on about universality, but if we are talking about how tax evolves, we should not evolve taxes by penalizing senior citizens, which is what this government is doing with universality. I have a lot of senior citizens in my riding who watch these comments and who are going to remember it in the next election.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I will have to cut short the hon. member's intervention.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton): Madam Speaker, I rise with pleasure to speak again on the subject of the goods and services tax. Since the subject seems to be getting a little dry with the air in this place this afternoon, I thought I might introduce a little bit of levity. As I was preparing notes for taxation, I happened to come across two sayings that pertained to taxation. I hope that these will not be considered sexist comments in any way. They are not intended to, they are intended to be well-balanced.

Joan Rivers was quoted as saying to the women of the world that: "They should love their husbands, adore their husbands, but get everything possible in their own name".

Oscar Wilde replied to that with a famous quote in which he said: "Bachelors should be taxed more than other people, because it is not fair that one segment of society should have more fun than the others".

I hope that will just introduce a little bit of lightness this late in the afternoon. Some of the members of the opposition are getting so burdened with the prospect of the goods and services tax and dealing so much with the negatives of it that they cannot see the positive nature.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Should the Chair considers the start of this statement as entertainment today from the House of Commons?

Mr. Bird: Madam Speaker, that is what it was intended to accomplish.

I think it is only natural that Canadians, probably every one of us, will dislike a new tax program of any kind. I do not see us out to sell Canadians on a goods and services tax or any other kind of a tax program, but rather I believe that most Canadians are honest, intelligent, responsible people and they can be persuaded to accept or even to support a new tax program if it makes sense and if it is necessary to achieve our objectives as a nation. That is what I am convinced to be the situation in this case.

I would like to go to the background for the GST and to address it briefly. I know that the opposition in particular tire of hearing about deficits and debt. The current financial strategy of the government is intended to direct our nation toward the elimination of deficit in due course and ultimately to the beginning of the repayment of our national debt.

Over the past five years, through the programs of the hon. Minister of Finance, we have been working our way slowly toward a reduction in the deficit and with the budget program and the strategy that was placed before us earlier this year, we are pointing in the direction of a balanced budget in the years of the early 1990s, and perhaps before the year 2000, to even a surplus where we can commence to pay down that debt and to start to reduce the burden on future generations.

There is only one way to stop that debt from growing larger. That is to reduce the deficit and work toward a balanced budget and eventually to achieve a surplus. I think we must give credit where it is due. The financial strategy that Michael Wilson introduced in 1984 has produced some positive results. Since September 1984 the total number of new jobs in Canada amounted to 1,535,000. The unemployment rate has dropped from 11.2 per cent in 1984 to 7.3 per cent in September, 1989. That is a dramatic accomplishment, a drop of close to 40 per cent in that period.

Canada's competitive position has gone from eleventh place in the world economic forum in 1983 to fourth in 1988. I think that the strategy that we have embarked upon does hold promise for Canada, a promise that will make us financially strong and responsible by the turn of the century, 10 years from now.

Unless we as citizens do accept the importance of our national responsibility, unless we are either willing to pay for the excellent standards of living we enjoy or to bear the restraint in reductions in the present levels of services, or a combination of both, then I am deeply convinced that the consequences of undisciplined continuity of deficits and debt will eventually lead us to the economic tragedy of hyperinflation, of currency devaluation, and a severe erosion in the future quality of life for coming generations in this country. The signs of that can be seen in countries like Bolivia, Argentina, Mexico and post-war Germany.

I believe it is paramount to understand that the goods and services tax is a critical and major component of the government's financial strategy for the 1990s. It is considered to be a most reliable and fair source of government revenue, essential to supplement the income tax program which itself was beneficially reformed in the past two years.

The goods and services tax is a value-added tax on consumption which will grow with the economic activity of our country. It has well become the most favoured consumption tax in the world and is now being used in some 48 countries, including 19 of the 24 members of the OECD, generally all among the world's most successful economies.

The motion today does not indicate whether it would terminate the existing federal sales tax, but we must recognize that this new tax replaces an existing federal sales tax that is hidden, that is regressive, that impacts on our competitive effectiveness for international export. It is really a failed tax, the elimination of which is long overdue. Because it occurs on many capital costs and operating expenses which are not possible to isolate in our export pricing it, makes us less competitive in international markets and it indirectly favours imports to the disadvantage of our domestic producers.

By comparison, the new goods and services tax will be applicable broadly at the consumption level to all Canadians and on a very wide range of commodities, with relatively few important exceptions. Instead of different rates which are currently applicable to the FST, ranging from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent, the new tax will have a standard rate of 9 per cent.

Based on the economic assumptions in the April budget, and in terms of comparable values in 1991 dollars, the existing federal sales tax collects tax revenues of $18.5 billion. The new goods and services tax will collect revenues of $24 billion. The difference at the beginning of $5.5 billion will be applied directly to fund special provisions of the GST program. This is the significant aspect of the GST program. It is an integrated tax reform system. It touches on increases in the income tax credit program, and of the $5.5 billion in new revenues, $2.4 billion will go to 9.3 million Canadian families who will benefit from increased tax credits at the lower income levels.

Another $700 million will provide for income tax reductions of 1 per cent in the middle tax range. Lastly, about $2 billion of that $5.5 billion will be required to cover the index benefits of indexation which the 2.5 per cent or 2.25 per cent inflationary impact of GST will bring about for those at the lower level of the income tax range for family allowance benefits and for old age pensions.

Finally, of the total of $24 billion, $200 million, or less than 1 per cent, will be required for administration of the new program. I believe that this tax program does shift the burden from those least able to pay to those most able to pay. The discretionary income of Canadians as is reflected in consumer purchases will support the tax, and the food exemption ensures that low income families will not be paying a disproportionate ratio of their income which is directed to basic groceries in the form of the new tax.

That alone is another measure that shifts the burden from those least able to pay to those most able to pay. The income tax credit does the same thing. The reduction by 1 per cent achieves a similar purpose. I should add that the unemployment insurance changes as embodied in Bill C–21 with the shift of premiums to employers and employed in high growth areas of Canada with the benefits payable to those who are unemployed in the lower growth areas of Canada also have the effect of shifting the tax burden to those best able to pay. This is a principle that this motion by the opposition calls for. I believe that that is already being accomplished.

I would like to wind up by saying that I believe the new goods and services tax program is not only a critical element in our nation's long–term financial strategy but a distinct improvement over the regressive federal sales tax which it is eliminating. Perhaps most important of all, because the GST does integrate effectively with the income tax program through the provisions of refundable tax credits and because it tends to balance the fairness of the total tax program more effectively away from those least able to pay, it is an instrument of financial fairness as well as of financial responsibility.

I believe that this motion is redundant and that its purposes are very significantly addressed in the government's current program.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Saint–Boniface): I would like to ask the following question of the member opposite. If one looks at the increases in taxes during the last five years on income, excise taxes, on the manufacturers' sales tax, and if one looks at the unemployment insurance changes that will place a greater taxation burden on Canadians and small companies, as well as at the impact of the goods and services tax, could he tell me how these measures and the budgetary measures such as the claw–back will be fair to seniors, most of whom are women, and to youth who want to upgrade but will have to pay more for an education now?

Will it be fair to families with children who we know will be penalized unduly, to small businesses including farmers, to the unemployed and I think, perhaps in particular to people such as VIA Rail employees, over 2,700 of whom will no longer have employment? Will it be fair to the poor in this country?

There are between 3.5 million to 5 million poor. There are almost 800,000 families who are poor. There are almost one million children, and over one million unattached adults who are within this category. How will it be fair as well to the poorer regions, like the Atlantic provinces and the north?

I would like to understand how these people will benefit from this ensemble of tax measures that have been proposed by the government. I really cannot understand the logic of anyone trying to argue for it.

Mr. Bird: Madam Speaker, the hon. member must simply ignore in his question the reality of the tax credit program which is part of the goods and services tax system that will bring net expense relief to 9.3 million families in this country.

I do not understand how he can talk about 800,000 poor and ask that question without acknowledging, just in fairness, that 9.3 million Canadians under the GST program will have less net family expenditures as a result of the goods and services tax program and the goods and services tax credit.

I would ask him to explain why he ignores the shift in unemployment insurance premiums to those who are employed in the boom areas of this country in favour of the unemployment insurance benefits being paid to those who are unemployed in the less active areas of the country. I fail to understand how political representatives can stand and ask such questions and make such statements without at least acknowledging the facts as they are set out in the papers and in the estimates.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, since the government of which the hon. member is a member came to power in 1984, sales and excise taxes combined rose from 19 per cent of total government revenues, about $12 billion to about 25 per cent of all federal revenues for 1988–89, about $20 billion. That is a rise of 66 per cent. And the effect of these changes is that an average family with two wage earners and two children and an income of about $40,000 a year will pay about $1,140 more in sales and excise taxes and about $1,081 more in income taxes in 1989 than would have been the case under the 1984 tax system. And this he calls fair? Where is the fairness in this?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): A short answer from the hon. member.

Mr. Bird: Madam Speaker, I think that if the hon. gentleman checks his statistics, and I do not have them at hand, he will find that the combination of economic growth and inflationary growth, as modest as it has been, exceeds the rate of growth of those taxation revenues. I do not believe that any Canadian resents paying his fair share of increased income taxes or increased sales taxes so long as he is paying them out of proportionately increased earnings.

The hon. member should be pleased that the economy is growing at such a rate that it generates those kinds of revenues out of increasing incomes.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I have listened with great interest today, as I am sure other members have, to the defence of the government against this resolution. In defence of the party which sponsored this motion, I say that at least it has the right objective. That is to say, they wish to talk about tax reform.

The response from the government was one mindless defence after another of the GST. The GST is only a minor component and I think it is the last resort for this government, a government which has found itself in great taxation difficulty. So, we must ask: "How did we get ourselves into the jackpot in the last five years? Why are we at this intellectual bottom of the pit, in terms of trying to deal with a very important problem"?

Canadians are not involved in a tax revolt because they do not want to pay taxes. Canadians are very happy to pay taxes if they feel that there is service at stake and that they are getting something back for their money. The great anger within Canadians right now is that they are not getting anything back.

In region after region across the country, whether we are talking about armed forces bases, whether we are talking about VIA Rail, whether we are talking about services for pensioners, whether we are talking about services and ERDA agreements for the different regions, we are seeing cut-backs, one after another. Once people feel that their government has abandoned them, then they ask: "Why should we pay taxes?". We have not heard the government answer that question. When the finance committee travels across the country what is it that it sees in one city after another? It sees that government's position is being rejected and that the government has lost any moral authority in this country to govern because the tax issue is over-burdening all other issues. After the next election a new government will be formed, hopefully not the same government, and the primary question it will have to face is what to do with $350 billion worth of debt. That is just a staggering figure, and as it begins to sink in on Canadians, it is going to traumatize all of our politics.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): With deep regret, I must interrupt the Hon. Member.

It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply, pursuant to Standing Order 81 (14).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

An Hon. Member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

The hon. minister on a point of order.

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Immediately following these proceedings six Canadian women will be honoured in the other place for their outstanding contribution to women's equality in Canada. The occasion is the presentation of the Persons Awards celebrating Alberta's famous five. This is the sixtieth anniversary of the Persons case and therefore a very special occasion indeed.

I would like to invite all members to attend the reception immediately following that ceremony in Room 200, West Block, shortly after 7 p.m. I can promise them that status of women throw the best parties.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to join with the minister responsible for the status of women in commending her invitation to all members of the House and hoping that, as persons themselves, they will join in the celebration.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, we too join in celebrating 60 years of personhood for women. We would urge that all members join us in that celebration later this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker: It being 6.14 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.14 p.m.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Tuesday, October 10, consideration of Bill C-20, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee; and the motion of Ms. McLaughlin:

Motion No. 10.

That Bill C-20 be amended in Clause 8 by striking out line 10 at page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

"8. Non-bio-degradable laundry detergents."

and the motion of Mr. Kindy:

Motion No. 11.

That Bill C-20 be amended by deleting Clause 8.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on this critical motion. The point is that the government wants to include laundry detergent in the schedule of goods which are taxed under the manufacturers' sales tax. I think it is time that we start looking at our tax system as a way to accomplish priorities that we set as a Parliament.

I believe that there is a lot of rhetoric these days about the concern regarding environmental deterioration which we see in almost every environmental area. Perhaps the government ought to give consideration to taxing only those detergents that are harmful to the environment and to giving a tax incentive for or not taxing soaps which are environmentally friendly.

In other words, if people have a choice between using detergent that will obviously harm the environment and using a detergent that is friendly to the environment in the sense that it will not do damage, why would we not then take the advantage and not tax that environmentally friendly detergent?

It would send a very clear signal that we are serious, that we are prepared to give up revenue in the hope of altering people's purchasing patterns and encouraging people to purchase environmentally friendly products and at the same time send a clear signal to those firms which are marketing goods that are in a sense against the environment to reconsider what they are doing.

It seems to me that this provides us with an excellent opportunity to send that signal, both in terms of encouraging an incentive to purchase environmentally friendly products and a signal against those firms that continue, in spite of the evidence, to market very unfriendly products.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, I too want to say a few words about this motion. I think, as my colleague from Kamloops said just a few moments ago, this is quite an opportunity for the government to actually put into action some of the things that it has been talking about.

There is very little that is more important to us than the environment right now. The point is that here we have an opportunity to actually use our tax system to promote a healthy environment here in Canada. We have a situation where the Conservative government is now asking us to include laundry detergent in the schedule of goods which are taxed under the manufacturers' sales tax provisions.

As much as we have argued in other debates in this House that the manufacturers' sales tax is a bad tax and a killer of jobs, as the Minister of Finance has indicated if it is going to amend it, it should do it in such a way that the entire country benefits since the tax itself is such a negative tax to begin with.

We argue that this government should tax only those products which are harmful to the environment and should in fact provide a tax incentive for those laundry detergents and other products which are environmentally friendly.

The government, I think, should increasingly be including environmental incentives in its tax policy in order to encourage companies to devise less harmful products, rather than just using the system to encourage manufacturers to do whatever they wish and to meet consumer demand.

As we know the consumers are not always correct in our system. In an economy such as ours they tend to buy the cheapest product, the product that is most easily available to them and is not always the most environmentally friendly.

• (1010)

This amendment before us today is a fine opportunity for us to deal with putting some action to the words that have been spoken, not just by members of the opposition but by many members of the government as well.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest and even touches of joy as the hon. Minister of the Environment stated after the last federal general election that every piece of legislation placed before this House, every element of the government's program, would be subject to rigorous testing against its environmental effects and the advisability of that program or legislation from an environmentalist point of view.

I was willing to herald this and in fact did so in my riding on a number of occasions, as a major advance by an otherwise, let us say, at best tepidly enthusiastic government at least in this regard.

Mr. Milliken: That is very generous.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): I am a generous man by nature. It is for this reason that I rise to state my certainty that this amendment will enjoy support on all sides of the House.

I cannot imagine that a government, which numbers among it so passionately eloquent and obviously dedicated a minister as is the hon. Minister of the Environment, would conduct itself in any other fashion when confronted with so sensible, reasonable and unobjectionable an amendment as that proposed by the hon. member for Yukon. It seeks to penalize no one. It seeks to prevent no consumer option. It merely attempts to foster the use by the Canadian people in one small area of a buying pattern that will be the less environmentally destructive.

Biodegradable laundry detergents are not the answer to the pollution problem in this country. By encouraging consumers to move to biodegradable laundry detergents we will not thereby have solved the environmental problems that confront this Chamber but we will have taken one small step. As the Chinese have noted a journey of a thousand li begins with a single step.

Given the pronouncements of the hon. Minister of the Environment, I assume the desires of the members opposite, and certainly those of the members on this side, I look forward to the unanimous support of this amendment in this Chamber.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The question is on Motion No. 10 standing in the name of the hon. member for Yukon. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred. We will now move to Motions Nos. 17 and 18 which will be grouped for debate. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 17 obviates the need to a vote on Motion No. 18, and a negative vote on Motion No. 17 necessitates a vote on Motion No. 18.

Is there consent for somebody else to move the motion presented by the hon. member for Yukon?

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was wondering if I might seek unanimous consent of the House to move Motions Nos. 17 and 18, seconded by the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, I have no problem with the member moving Motion No. 17, but I do have a problem with the consent for Motion No. 18. We will give consent for Motion No. 17 but not on Motion No. 18, standing in the name of the member for Calgary Northeast.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): I cannot let the occasion go by, Madam Speaker, without noting that the government is disavowing one of its own members, but the Liberal side will have no objections to unanimous consent being given to the member who wants to propose this in the absence of the member in whose name the motion is.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Motion No. 18 is dropped.

Mr. Ross Harvey (for Ms. Mclaughlin) moved:

Motion No. 17

That Bill C-20 be amended in Clause 14 by striking out line 9 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

"come into force on April 29, 1989."

He said: Madam Speaker, the point of this amendment is obvious. The provisions of the clause, the coming into effect provisions, should be back dated to the date where those provisions became public; this is to say, the night of the famous press conference budget.

A lot of stores, in fact almost all of them, that night increased the price of cigarettes to the amount noted in the finance minister's budget before they actually needed to. Therefore, they stand the possibility at very least of reaping a windfall profit on a day's sale of cigarettes that the government given the current dating of these provisions will not collect.

It is in the interest of fairness, as well as that of fiscal responsibility for the government, to change the effective date of the act to April 27 so that it is the government that achieves the benefit of the boost in the tax rather than cigarette vendors. That is the simple and entire point of the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The question is on Motion No. 17 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Yukon. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Normally at this time the House would proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of the bill now before the House.

However, pursuant to Standing Order 45(6) the recorded divisions will stand deferred until six o'clock p.m. Monday, October 16, 1989.

MULTICULTURALISM AND CITIZENSHIP DEPARTMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, October 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mulroney that Bill C-18, an act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to get up and speak on this bill if for no other reason than I hail from a riding and indeed a city that is in many respects a microcosm of the multicultural reality which many in Canada seek to see this nation become.

Edmonton is, in the term once popularized by the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs, "a community of communities". There are numerous language groups, numerous individual communities in Edmonton comprising members of cultures from around the globe, all of whom in Edmonton have come to live in a kind of harmony, a kind of over-all co-operative civic spirit that I think does the city proud and I think can act as a model for the rest of the country. This is not to say that we do not have problems in Edmonton. We do. But we have many assets in consequence of this fundamental fact.

This is most obvious in the annual heritage days festival in Edmonton. It occurs every August and is a three-day long weekend extravaganza in which the various cultures present in Edmonton get together, establish booths down in William Hawrelak Park and spend those three days marvelling at the richness and variety of each other's cultures.

I would note as well that in Edmonton, indeed in Edmonton East, there is a variety of publications in various heritage languages. We have two Italian newspapers; we have three Chinese language newspapers; we have two newspapers that are published partly in Cree; we have a Portuguese newspaper; we have a Ukrainian newspaper; and we have The Prairie Link, which is devoted to the furtherance of all these multicultural perspectives.

In the last two months I attended ceremonies to mark African Awareness Day. I attended the founding meeting of the Keiping Association of Alberta. I attended the opening of the new headquarters of the Hakka Association, and of course last summer I attended at the celebration of the Veisakha by the Sikh community in Edmonton.

This is not to say, as I noted earlier, that we are devoid of frictions in Edmonton. They are there, just as they have been there historically in Canada and I must say especially in western Canada.

There are such shameful episodes as the Komagata Maru incident, the imposition of the Chinese immigration head tax and thereafter the Immigration Exclusion Act; the systematic discrimination against Ukrainian settlers at the beginning of the century; the appalling crimes committed against the Japanese Canadian people during the Second World War; and more recently the real racial discrimination faced by new immigrants such as the Vietnamese, the Latinos, especially Chileans and El Salvadorans, people from the Arab countries and the Sikh community.

All these are witness to the fact that racial discrimination has not been abolished from our communities, not even in a community as young and essentially open-minded as that which one will find in Edmonton.

And of course always for some reason, lurking in the background, is that particular European curse, anti-Semitism, which continues to raise its ugly head from time to time in acts of vandalism in Edmonton and across Alberta.

There is no question, therefore, that in this bill we have a proposal for an act which is commendable in that it celebrates the fact of diversity in Canada and which is necessary because it seeks to foster public celebration and acceptance of that fact.

In this regard I commend, without reservation, the efforts of the government and of the minister. I note as well that on the day that this bill was moved for second reading we had the introduction of the heritage languages bill. This will create the institute, centred in Edmonton most appropriately, and is as well another commendable piece of legislation by this government. I will have more on that at second reading of that bill.

I would just like to close by noting that the term multiculturalism, that field of attitude which is intended to cover the openness of spirit, generosity and goodwill expressed toward people who are apparently different from us or toward people who apparently pursue different cultural values, is and always has been a fundamental precept of the party of which I am proud to be a member.

From the days in which the CCF opposed the Exclusion Act in B.C. and from the days in which the CCF opposed the relocation of Japanese Canadians in the Second World War to the present, our party has always stood for justice for and a welcoming of people from around the world into the project that is the building of the Canadian nation.

In some senses this was best expressed by our founding leader James Shaver Woodsworth who concluded his grace before meat with the words: "What we desire for ourselves we wish for all." That is the spirit that animates this bill, and I celebrate it.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, were there no objections at all to the bill? I want to double check on that because I thought that we would probably end up with a vote.

Mr. Gauthier: No objections at all.

Mr. Cooper: Because it is now 10.30 a.m. and the House would normally adjourn at this point, we would like to have the House adjourn for a few moments and come back in time for Question Period, which would then be followed by Private Members' Business.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the parliamentary secretary. I have not heard anyone speak against the bill being read the second time so it has carried.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): If everyone has agreed I will suspend the sitting until eleven o'clock.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 10.31 a.m.

• (1100)

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 11 a.m.

Mr. Speaker: It being eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 35, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

S. O. 31

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S.O. 31

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we learned with amazement and indignation of the resolution proposed by aldermen Darrel Kent, Jacquelin Holzman and Michael McSweeney and passed by a committee of the City of Ottawa to abolish the French services advisory board.

This reprisal for Bill 178 is frightfully and unacceptably cynical. Nothing is more vicious and two-faced than an elected bigot who holds a minority group hostage and punishes, or seeks to punish, it for an action beyond its control and for which it is in no way responsible.

In the capital of this country which should reflect Canada's linguistic duality, tolerance and generosity, it is unacceptable for some city councillors to show such ignorance, narrow-mindedness and intolerance.

Mr. Speaker, if these elected representatives of the people are unable to act with dignity and understanding, they should resign and be replaced!

[English]

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, national unity is one of the most important topics of our time. Our challenge as Canadians is to find a balance between our need to express our uniqueness and our need to identify with the common national purpose.

It is important to express our individuality. It is important to show others what makes us special as Canadians. In some cases it may also be appropriate to promote the differences among us. Indeed, most Canadians will agree that it is our differences that have in fact given our country its strength.

However, rather than dwelling on our differences let us focus instead on what makes us the same as Canadians. Now is the time to celebrate our national identity. Now is the time to work together in the national interest. Let us all work together to face the economic challenges in Canada.

Let us work together as one Canada to build a better future for our children. Let us all, Canadians from sea to sea, work together to build a better Canada.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize an El Salvadoran woman of courage and dedication, Magdalena Hernandez, who is currently visiting Canada.

Ms. Hernandez is a member of the village council and president of the women's council of the village of Las Vueltas in El Salvador. Ten years ago the people of many villages in El Salvador, including Las Vueltas, fled their homes because of bombings and death squads.

Two years ago today these refugees started returning to their homes from the Honduras refugee camps, from San Salvador and elsewhere. Indeed, just next week over 1,600 people will be going back to their home villages from the refugee camp of Mesa Grande, which I had the privilege of visiting last month. This will be the fourth return of these people.

Given the increasing level of violence in El Salvador since Christiani came to power, I call upon the Government of Canada to support these people in their courageous return. I call upon the Government of Canada to condemn the human rights violations which have been taking place in El Salvador, the wave of assassinations, of abductions, of disappearances.

Finally, I urge our government to call upon the United Nations to provide all the necessary support so that the people of Las Vueltas and the people of other villages throughout El Salvador can join with courageous villagers, such as Magdalena Hernandez who is in the gallery, today in rebuilding a new El Salvador, an El Salvador of peace, an El Salvador of democracy and of justice.

ADDRESS BY KING HUSSEIN

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, this week witnessed an historic moment in this chamber when His Majesty King Hussein of Jordan became the first head of state of an Arab country to address both Houses of the Canadian Parliament.

Those of us who have favoured dialogue and promoted moderation were particularly impressed with the eloquent, reasonable and pragmatic approach to peace outlined by our guest.

I also commend our Prime Minister for reiterating Canada's support for the concept of land for peace.

To bring peace to a region fraught with violence, the voices of moderation such as those of King Hussein deserve our unconditional support.

The peaceful resolution of the Israeli–Palestinian conflict, the crux of the problem, can be attained by the creation of an independent Palestinian state to complement all of the others in the region.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, a secret document prepared for the Premier of Nova Scotia is nothing short of a scathing indictment of this government's policies on regional development and its pure deception in trying to mislead the people of Atlantic Canada about the activities of ACOA.

On May 17 the minister responsible for ACOA told a Commons committee that ACOA had spent nearly $600 million in Atlantic Canada. This claim was repeated on July 4 by the then president of ACOA, and again on October 6 by the minister responsible.

However, this confidential document that I have clearly shows that the actual investment by ACOA was some 40 per cent less than that claimed by the minister and this government. The credibility of this minister and the ACOA officials is now being seriously questioned as is this government's stated commitment to regional development. To quote from the premier's document: "At the moment, Atlantic Canada is practically depraved of incentives to attract industry and investment—this is not acceptable and cannot continue. We demand equal fair treatment in this Confederation".

I now call upon this government to initiate a full public inquiry into the operations of ACOA and this government's actions, not rhetoric, as it relates to regional economic development.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, since the announcement of VIA's new reference levels, the 11 government members of southwestern and western Ontario have consistently and unrelentlessly asserted the importance of passenger rail service for our area.

The retention of both the north and south line routes in southwestern Ontario as part of VIA's new national network has reaffirmed this importance for both my riding of Sarnia—Lambton and southwestern Ontario in general.

In my riding a group of community representatives have already taken another step forward. Rather than dwell on the supposed demise of passenger rail services, they have become involved in a local task force to help ascertain what type of new schedule and equipment could best address the area's travelling needs. Coupled with my personal meeting with VIA officials, I believe that this group will provide a valuable forum through which viable suggestions can be offered for optimal local passenger rail service.

The efforts of this task force, I think, are both timely and constructive. Certainly they demonstrate that some are fully committed to a national and local rail system that is sustainable and affordable, and one that can be built upon in the future.

KIDS' HELP PHONE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge the government to meet the needs of Canadian children by approving the funding application for the Kids' Help Phone.

Since May, this line has handled 45,000 calls from children across the country. More than 3,000 calls have been from children reporting abuse. More than 1,300 calls have been threats of suicide.

Without federal funds, the Kids' Help Phone is in jeopardy. At first they requested $1.3 million. Now they need $2 million just to keep up. Meetings with the Minister of National Health and Welfare have resulted in nothing.

Make no mistake, Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting that the government can get off lightly in its responsibility to Canadian kids by only providing funds for this one help line. What this line tells us is that there is a desperate need for more services for our children, especially in rural, remote and isolated areas.

If this govenment can spend millions to advertise the trade deal, $2.7 million to advertise its budget and take out full page ads to laud a tax bill not yet passed by Parliament, then surely it can provide money to a service responding to the pleas for help from our children.

SPORT

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to Michel Juneau of Val d'Or. In 1982, 3,000 feet underground, the platform on which he was working gave way and Michel fell 50 feet. This accident was to change his life painfully: at 27, he became a paraplegic.

Recently, he confided that the first year was the hardest. "Still wearing pyjamas at five in the afternoon is not living. I had to get out of my shell." That is what he did. He regained his taste for sport with the Val d'Or Passe-partout, a wheelchair basketball club.

In the most recent Canadian championships on June 18 in Winnipeg, he finished only 26 seconds behind André Viger. On November 5, he will be at the world championships in Japan, but Michel says: What I am proudest of is not the victories and the travel. It is rather that I managed as a disabled person to join the rest of society. Most people now see me as a real athlete.

Mr. Speaker, that is a true champion and a model of perseverance!

APARTHEID

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs are misreading the intentions of the South African government to provide real change in South Africa.

The Canadian government should not let up on the pressure just because South Africa is talking a good story. There must be some real change.

Canada, by not proposing new sanctions in Kuala Lumpur, is telling the world that South Africa is prepared to make changes. I ask the Prime Minister, where are these real changes? Actions speak louder than words. Real change would be to release all political prisoners and to say when there will be real elections in South Africa.

The Prime Minister has advocated total economic sanctions against South Africa if it did not make progress toward dismantling apartheid. This government should show real leadership and call for more sanctions to show the South African government that it will not accept petty apartheid talk as concrete indications of its willingness to make real change in South Africa.

KIDS' HELP PHONE

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, Canada's first hotline for troubled children, the Kids' Help Phone, averages 800 calls a day. These calls range from suicide threats, fights with their parents, teen pregnancies and many other problems associated with being a troubled child.

Kids' Help Phone will have to end its service if this government does not come through with a $1.3 million dollar grant by the end of the month.

The best statement department officials could make was that the proposal was under review. Is the government reviewing whether the little girl who gets beaten by her drunk parents needs help, whether the teenager who finds out she is pregnant and has no where to turn needs advice, or whether the young boy who is having problems dealing with the fear of drug addiction needs guidance? Or is it reviewing whether $1.3 million is too high a price to pay to reach the seven million children in Canada?

Kids' Help Phone needs the government's help. Kids in this country need the government's help. I urge this government not to let them down.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, during hearings of Bill C-21 by the unemployment insurance committee much rhetoric was heard from opponents about money being taken out of the UI system.

In fact, this money is being reinvested to assist unemployed or laid-off Canadians to prepare for, find and achieve full-time permanent employment, something for which this government has an enviable and impressive record.

In particular, 50 million additional dollars will go for the Community Futures Program and 15 million additional dollars for the industrial adjustment service. Used this way, these funds represent a valuable, long-term benefit for currently unemployed Canadians.

I urge the government to target much of these additional funds for use in areas hit hard by the downturn in the Atlantic fishery or impacted by base closures. In particular, I urge the immediate designation of Shelburne and Queens counties in Nova Scotia for the Community Futures Program.

CASH ADVANCES FOR GRAIN PAYMENTS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in my office I received a telephone call from a farmer who works in northwest Saskatchewan near The Battlefords. He told me to pass a message to the government across the way. He said he is a long-time Conservative who is now a former supporter of the government party.

The government, he said, has forgotten about the farmer. Grain is not moving from the elevators. He cannot sell his grain and his debts have to be paid. The situation leaves him in a heck of a spot.

If the government realized the true situation, it would maintain the cash advance payments for grain. The cash advance is not a loan and should not be subject to the interest payments. The program was put in place to provide payments for grain, some of which cannot be sold because quotas are off or elevators are plugged.

If this government wants to help western farmers, it would bring forth the statutes under the existing legislation to allow advance payments to be made and at the same time bring in legislation to reduce interest rates for all farm loans for Canadian farmers.

INDUSTRY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, yesterday 2,700 workers at the General Motors plant in Scarborough were told by the company that the plant's operations are under review.

I contacted General Motors last night to express my concern about this announcement. I will be holding further meetings with their officials early next week.

The General Motors plant has been an important part of Scarborough's economy for over 35 years. In that time it has changed its production lines three times. However, yesterday's announcement has raised serious concerns among the workers and their families about the status of the plant.

In my meetings with General Motors I will urge the company to work closely with the workers to ensure that the Scarborough facility remains an important part of our community.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, yesterday a committee of three aldermen of the City of Ottawa, three well-known Conservatives, including the "babysitter" alderman Michael McSweeney, passed a resolution to eliminate the city's advisory committee on official languages.

Mr. Speaker, this gesture was apparently as a form of reprisal against the Quebec National Assembly's passage of Bill 178.

Ottawa is the capital of our country and as such has an important role to play in preserving and promoting Canadian unity.

S. O. 31

Mr. Speaker, I want to appeal to all Members in the House of Commons and all my colleagues at the provincial and municipal levels in the National Capital Region to dissociate themselves from the comments made by the three aldermen. I think it is high time the Prime Minister told his friend Michael McSweeney about Canada's linguistic duality.

COMMONWEALTH GAMES

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport is in the House.

Next week at the Commonwealth Prime Ministers meeting there will be an opportunity for the Government of Canada to persuade other governments in the Commonwealth to follow the sports policy that this government has introduced in respect of apartheid in South Africa. I would urge the government to use this opportunity and to ensure that from here on the Commonwealth Games are boycott free.

TAXATION

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, Canada must adjust to current economic conditions and adopt a fair taxation system. Our new approach to taxation must include changes in the present federal sales tax. This is what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) had in mind when he proposed a new sales tax system called the goods and services tax. It is widely agreed that our present system, which puts a 13.5 per cent tax on most products manufactured and purchased in Canada, no longer reflects the economic situation in this country. The tax is obsolete and is detrimental to business development.

The system proposed by our government is modern, more flexible, and, most important, takes into account the situation of senior citizens and families on incomes below $30,000 annually. Mr. Speaker, it is clear the new system must be implemented as soon as possible.

Mr. Duhamel: Eighty per cent of Canadians don't agree.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INDUSTRY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will pose my question to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion.

We learned yesterday that 2,500 jobs at the General Motors plant in Scarborough, plus hundreds more in the auto parts industry that supplies that factory, are now being put on the chopping block as a direct consequence of the free trade agreement.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I want to point out to the House that the loss of 2,500 jobs is no laughing matter. The Tories should not laugh about it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I want to ask the minister a very simple question. What does the government intend to do to prevent the loss of these jobs in the vital auto industry in this country?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I should first point out that in automobiles there has been free trade since 1965.

In the last few years this particular company has invested about $8 million in Canada, quite a lot of it in the constituency of the member for Oshawa. This is a van production facility. There were two equal sized facilities, one in Ohio and one in Scarborough, which they are phasing out.

Mr. Riis: Guess which one they're keeping open.

Mr. Andre: They are closing both of them, as a matter of fact. They are closing both lines and consolidating in Flint, Michigan. In the meantime, they are looking for an alternate product line to produce in Scarborough.

What happened yesterday was the prudent kind of indication to employees that changes are coming. But that is a part of the operations of this company which has been operating under free trade since 1965, much to Canada's benefit.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre) Mr. Speaker, I want to simply point out to the minister that there was an auto pact in this country. It is this government that removed the safeguards and removed the tariffs. It is this government that is responsible for the loss of jobs.

As a consequence, we want to know from this government what proposals it is going to make at the automobile working group. Is it supporting a 60 per cent content rule? What proposals will the government make to provide for the protection and enhancement of jobs in the vital automobile industry?

This government has the responsibility. This government has to take some action. This government cannot avoid the basic consequence that it signed a rotten deal.

Mr. Andre: If the hon. member is assigning responsibility for these things, presumably he will equally assign credit to this government for the over million and a half jobs generated. Surely he will assign credit to this government for the tremendous automobile trade surplus we have been enjoying and continue to enjoy because of the policies of this government. Perhaps he will recognize all of those factors.

• (1120)

As his colleague and former finance critic had indicated, the Liberals will attempt to blame every sparrow that falls on the free trade agreement. This is another attempt in this regard.

I remind him again, in terms of trade in automobiles, the operation of the automobile industry, the rules in place today have been in place since 1965.

[Translation]

Mr. Axworthy: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The Minister says there will be more jobs. However, according to the report based on serious studies on free trade conducted by this Government, and according to other studies by the private sector, and also according to the Canadian Labour Congress, 60,000 jobs have already been lost as a result of free trade. When will this Government start taking seriously the right of Canadians to know what the consequences are of free trade? I request a public examination by Parliament on the subject of free trade and Canadians jobs.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and Shirley Carr are surely the only two people in Canada who take that list and those numbers seriously. That was a pathetic, ridiculous list. I am surprised that an aspirant to the leadership of his party would be so naive as to repeat those numbers.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Where are your studies?

Mr. Andre: Our studies show that since free trade was introduced, the number of new jobs created in Canada is 189,000. The hon. member over there is talking about the studies. These are Statistics Canada numbers. These are not inventions of Shirley Carr. They are Statistics Canada numbers.

Mr. Duhamel: Are they your invention?

Mr. Andre: The numbers indicate the economy is continuing to percolate along, as it has over the last five years. As long as we are saved from the kinds of policies the hon. member would introduce, the economy will continue to percolate along.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a question for the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. I want to say to him that his words are no consolation for the 2,500 Canadian workers in Scarborough who are going to lose their jobs because of the government's lack of commitment and action.

I also want to say this to the minister: Does he not realize he is not here to make excuses for General Motors? I ask the minister, therefore, why will he not make a commitment today to preserve those 2,500 jobs at Scarborough? Why will he not on behalf of the government stand up today for Canada and Canadian workers?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, what happened yesterday was a corporation, General Motors, indicated that it is changing the production because of changing markets, because of changing needs in its company. The vans that had been produced there and in Ohio in roughly equal numbers will no longer be produced. They informed their employees of that fact. They are looking for other operations.

General Motors is well aware, as are most Canadians, that Canadian auto workers are very productive. In fact, that is the reason we enjoy a tremendous surplus in automobile trade with the United States.

General Motors has a facility there with very productive workers. It is searching for a replacement for the van. It is in their interests to find that replacement.

I do not know why the hon. member feels it is appropriate today to do the Chicken Little routine and say the sky is falling. It may not be falling.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, before this government came into office and before this minister became the minister, the automotive industry was sufficiently competitive that jobs were moving to Canada and staying in Canada.

[Translation]

I want to ask the Minister to acknowledge that since the Government's free trade agreement was implemented, we have lost jobs and plants to the United States. Why won't the Government admit today that the Free Trade Agreement is a disaster for our country?

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the unemployment rate is lower than it has been for some eight or nine years. Since January there have been 189,000 new jobs created in Canada to add on to the over 1.5 million over the last four years. I realize that it is disappointing news to the opposition to have the economy continue to perform that way, but we do not think that is disappointing news.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. I choose my words with care. Just a minute ago he misled the House. I want to find out if he did it deliberately or inadvertently. I want to give him a chance to clear the record.

Mr. Charest: Order.

Mr. Broadbent: That is perfectly in order. I want the minister to clarify it.

He said that we are operating under the same rules today as we were in 1965. In 1965 investment requirements were established in Canada for U.S. firms in this industry to make sure we got our jobs. As a result of the free trade agreement in place now, those investment requirements are gone. That is to say the rules are different today because of what the Conservative Government did than what they were in 1965.

Will the minister confirm that the rules have changed, that there are no longer Canadian investment requirements, and that they have been removed by this government? Second, what is to prevent in the future GM, Chrysler in Brampton or Ford in Oakville from moving lock, stock and barrel if it is in their financial interest out of Canada into the U.S. as a result of the removal of the investment safeguards by the Conservative Government?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, this debate was had last year. We went over it ad nauseam last year.

The hon. member is talking about safeguards which are so far away from the reality today as to be totally meaningless. That debate was held last year. The people decided. I do not understand. Is he a sore loser? Why does he keep coming back to something that is over and done with and established?

He surely is not claiming that the decisions announced yesterday had anything to do with that safety mechanism that was there in 1965 which was proven to be unnecessary, irrelevant and totally divorced from the reality of what is going on.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that his own government ministers since 1984 have cited the investment requirements—they used to—and correctly pointed out that General Motors normally exceeded the requirements. Now that the government has removed the requirements they pretend they are useless.

I want to ask the minister this. Given the great rationalization that is going on in that industry throughout this continent, why should any Canadian now working in the industry, and there are over 100,000, believe that when future investment decisions are made, whether by General Motors, Chrysler or Ford, that these investments will take place in Canada? They are no longer required to do it. Immense political pressure is building up in the U.S. Why, I ask again, will the industry—given the choice between expanding in Canada and the U.S.—not move to the U.S.? What is going to keep those jobs?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member is not suggesting that the $8 billion of investment by General Motors was because of the safeguards and I hope he will agree with me that that money was invested by GM because it recognized that Canadian workers are very productive, that it can make a good profit margin on production in Canada. That is why it made the investment.

The hon. member seems to suggest the only way we can keep investment in Canada is by putting up barriers and forcing people to stay. Today's The Globe and Mail has an interesting article which states: "Freightliner Canada Ltd. plans to build a freight truck assembly plant in the southwestern city of St. Thomas and should eventually employ up to 1,200 people". They are not forced to do that. They are doing it because it makes good sense to them. Those 1,200 people are going to appreciate the work.

[Translation]

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, today it was reported that Chrysler, which currently has plants in Brampton, is about to make a decision to transfer its production to the United States within a few years. My question to the Minister is quite straightforward: Tuesday, the Government refused to entertain the findings of to studies on the impact of the FTA on employment in this major industry. Would the Minister be prepared to talk directly to the presidents of Chrysler, General Motors and Ford about their intentions for the future, in order to protect investment and employment here in Canada?

• (1130)

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, we have an ongoing dialogue with the automobile industry, both the big assembler and the pack-parts companies and so on, to ensure that Canada remains a good place to do business and to ensure that they continue to invest here. The success of those kinds of discussions is evidenced by the tremendous investment we have had in this industry. For instance there is the indication from Freightliner of a new truck assembly plant in Canada. We will continue to do that in the future.

I would ask the hon. member to have more confidence in Canadians, we can compete. We have shown in the past and we will show it in the future.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of the Environment, the minister who is acting on behalf of Canadians.

This week we learned that contaminants which potentially cause cancer and brain damage are being found in the Great Lakes. The situation is so serious that the minister of health himself pointed to problems with foetuses, native populations and others.

Can the Acting Minister of the Environment explain who in the federal government authorized the dredging in the St. Clair River, the dumping of contaminants which are potential cancer causing contaminants directly into the open waters? Who authorized that and why was there not an environmental assessment done?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, some of these questions were raised yesterday and it was pointed out that the government has acted, monitoring has taken place. The results of this monitoring process, which has been ongoing for some time, does not give rise to the kind of alarmist statements that have been made by the hon. member and by others. In fact, one of the authors of the report pointed to the need for further research before some of these so-called health effects can be substantiated.

It would behove us to get behind the new programs that have been worked out with American jurisdictions, the provinces and municipalities in the area and, indeed, the industry, to make sure that the $125 million that has been announced to address some of these questions; the health effects, remedial action and preventive action, is used to lever similar initiatives from other jurisdictions and that we get on with job.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, Canada was embarrassed on the international stage yesterday when the Council of Three Fires of Walpole Island told the IJC that they are forced to take the Canadian Government to court to stop the dumping of hundreds of contaminants, which have the potential to cause cancer and brain damage, in the drinking water of approximately 45 million people living on the Canadian and American sides of the border.

I would like to ask the Acting Minister of the Environment; who authorized the open dumping of the contaminants that are now being dumped by the Canadian Government, by the Department of Public Works, into the St. Clair River? Who authorized that and who is going to take the responsibility for the potential health damages?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that my colleague the minister who—

Ms. Copps: He's in Paris.

Mr. Oberle: —is on an urgent trip to Europe to consult with environment ministers there. She herself would admit that the issue of the environment is a global issue, an international issue. We are recognized as having assumed a leadership role in certain critical areas. My colleague would want to verify the evidence that has been induced before we would want to examine it any further.

Ms. Copps: It's in the courts.

MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. In Newfoundland there are approximately 49,000 homes without adequate water or sewers. This will only be remedied if $1.3 billion is found.

Is the Deputy Prime Minister aware of raw sewage being dumped into lakes, rivers and harbours across Canada and would his government today, in this House, make a financial commitment to Canadians to address this potential environmental disaster as recommended by the Institute for Research and Public Policy?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, the government is aware of situations where municipal sewers are discharged into harbours and into other environments. I can tell the hon. member that, yes, we take this situation very seriously. We have signalled our concerns to the provinces and municipalities which have the principal responsibility for the clean-up and the adherence to the environmental standards that we have already.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa-Centre): Mr. Speaker, using the minister's own words that the provinces and the municipalities should pay for the repairs of their sewage systems, where does he expect the people of Newfoundland to come up with $1,300,000 to repair their sewer systems? The total package is $5.7 billion to repair the sewage systems in Newfoundland. Where does he expect the people of Newfoundland to come up with that kind of money?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): I do not want to appear flippant or parenthetical about my answer, but the people of Newfoundland have the same sources to come up with money as has the federal government. As the hon. member knows, we are in a very tight fiscal situation. Unfortunately, there is only one source of money and that is the taxpayers of Canada. We are dipping into the same pocket that the province of Newfoundland would have to dip into.

I should, however, point out to the hon. member that there are programs that the federal government has engaged in with the province of Newfoundland, such as transfer payments and other assistance, that help the provinces to maintain certain minimum standards that are desirable throughout our country.

HOUSING

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Housing. Yesterday the minister announced the release of federal lands at Vaughan near Toronto for housing.

The minister indicated that only 25 per cent or 600 units of the 2,500 homes, will be affordable housing. Is the minister aware that already this morning four respected Toronto housing groups have, in a press statement, criticized him for not specifying how many co-operative and non-profit housing units will be built. Will the minister now tell this House how many non-profit and co-operative housing units will be built on the lands at Vaughan?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, as I am sure the hon. member is well aware, the whole process of developing land for housing entails the putting together of a plan of development and the obtaining of approval of that plan from the local municipality and all of the other authorities that are involved in that process.

Obviously until the firm plan is settled and has been worked out with the town of Vaughan, the region of York and the province of Ontario, it is impossible to designate specifically where the housing that will be available for non-profit groups and for co-operative housing groups will be located.

But we are committed to providing a minimum of 25 per cent affordable housing in accordance with the province of Ontario's guidelines. We will be doing our best to maximize the amounts available not only for first-time home buyers but also for the non-profit groups.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, the minister is aware that the 25 per cent affordable housing provision is simply the minimum requirement of Ontario. Why is the minister acting like any other developer? He is only doing what is required by Ontario. How can he justify a policy that subsidizes the rich and slams the door on the poor?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has stated, the 25 per cent is indeed a minimum. That is what the announcement I made yesterday indicated, that it certainly was a minimum and that we were going to do our best to make sure that it was much higher than that. Affordable housing, in the definition of the province of Ontario, does not just include non-profit and co-op housing but, of course, includes housing for first time home buyers.

We would hope that we would be able to maximize the number of homes available for first time home buyers and also for the social housing groups as well. I am sure the hon. member and all Canadians will be most happy when this development has been built and completed.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the finance committee is currently holding hearings in Ottawa and across the country on the goods and services tax. These have been and continue to be very productive meetings across the country. However, rumours and reports today indicated that the Minister of Finance is about to introduce GST legislation. Would the minister assure the House that this is merely a draft bill for discussion purposes?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that to the hon. member. We are proposing only to release draft legislation. The draft will put into legal language a number of elements that were set out in the technical paper. We have been encouraged to do this by the chairman of the finance committee, as my colleague fully understands, as well as by the legal and accounting communities who are anxious to see what the legal words of the technical requirements of the proposal are so that they can make specific comments on the technical aspects of the proposed bill.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the Minister of National Defence quoted a statement from an editorial in the Summerside Journal–Pioneer to support his decision to close CFB Summerside. It was a misrepresentation of the newspaper's position and the minister knew it. He also deliberately misled the House when he quoted these—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McGuire: —search and rescue statistics.

A statement from the Journal–Pioneer last Tuesday really demonstrates how the paper feels, and I quote: "Defence Minister Bill McKnight has displayed both arrogance and truculence while questioned in the House. But he added a new ingredient during Question Period on Friday, deception".

Will the minister apologize to the Journal–Pioneer for his misleading statements of last Friday. Will he stop playing politics with people's lives, and will he open a public inquiry to determine what the real situation is in regard to search and rescue?

Mr. Speaker: I want some clarification from the hon. member who just put the question. I heard "misleading". I did not hear "deliberately". I want a clarification of that.

Mr. Jelinek: He said "deliberately".

Mr. McKnight: I want an apology, not a clarification.

Ms. Copps: Oh sit down.

Mr. Gauthier: How about Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Now you're being arrogant and truculent again.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, I would like to know what the hon. member said and then I will decide whether there should be an apology.

Mr. McGuire: If I used the word "deliberately", I did not mean it, but I did mean "misleading".

Mr. Andre: You said he knowingly mislead the House. That's what you said.

Ms. Copps: Well he did.

Mr. Jelinek: You have it written down right on your notes. Liar. You have it written down on your notes.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I serve notice now that I will raise a question of privilege at the conclusion of Question Period.

Mr. Jelinek: He has it written down.

Mr. McKnight: The hon. member suggests that I misled the House. Mr. Speaker, the article is under the heading called "Editorial", located where the editorial is usually located in the Journal–Pioneer. It was not an Op–Ed. There was no attribution to another newspaper that would suggest that this was not. What it does say is: "It is unfortunate, however, that one shall benefit—" There is one line, "but we are ready to receive it nevertheless, says the Halifax Chronicle–Herald."

This does not say in any way that it was an editorial reprinted from the Halifax Chronicle–Herald. It says,

> It is unfortunate, however, that one shall benefit while another suffers. Nova Scotia did not seek the major source of Summerside's pride and economic support, but we are ready to receive it nevertheless, says the Halifax Chronicle–Herald.

What I am saying and what I will continue to say—

Some Hon. Members: Apologize.

Mr. McKnight: Hon. members are yelling "apologize". If I implied there was any intent to the lack of editorial integrity or the lack of editorial ability by the Summerside Pioneer–Journal, which has to take an editorial and place it as an editorial from another newspaper, I apologize.

What I would like to say to the hon. member and to the people of Summerside is, this decision was not an easy decision. This decision was made because $2.74 billion was reduced from the defence department's budget. The $2.74 billion meant we had to change what we were doing. Operational efficiencies have not been jeopardized. A savings of some $900 million will be acquired by the Government of Canada over the next 15 years to use in the security of Canada through the Department of National Defence.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who is also the chairperson of the federal—provincial task force looking into the closure of CFB Summerside.

Since the announcement of the closure approximately six months ago, the economy of Summerside and area has been devastated, mainly due to lack of confidence. Immediate action is required. The people of Summerside need a real federal commitment, otherwise the damage may be irreversible. When is the minister going to make an announcement that will provide jobs and will restore the much needed confidence within the community?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. We have been working very hard on this issue, together with the province.

We have three federal—provincial working groups looking at alternate uses of the physical assets of CFB Summerside, potential alternate public sector activities for the Summerside area, on which I am working very closely with my colleagues here, and industrial incentives and activities necessary to attract private sector investment to Summerside.

I have had two meetings of the federal—provincial joint committee with Mr. Morrissey. The task forces have been meeting and Mr. Morrissey and I will be meeting again in the very near future to discuss our progress.

Like the hon. member, I am anxious to work with the province so that the two of us can come up with something that will be helpful to the future of Summerside.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

In prisons across Canada over 1,000 workers, including correction services officers, parole officers, recreation and training programmers have been without a contract for over two years. Next Friday they will be in a legal position to strike, erecting picket lines that guards will not cross. With the security of Canadian prisons at stake, why has the minister let things get so far out of hand, and what will the minister do now to settle this lengthy dispute?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we negotiated in good faith with all the groups in the Public Service Alliance of Canada and reached a settlement that was not ratified by this particular group of some 1,500 employees. They elected to ask the PSSRB to appoint a conciliation board. That conciliation board has yet to report, and until it does, I think it would be inappropriate for me to give a government response to a report that we have yet to receive.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the member did not ask for a response to the report, the member asked for action. My supplementary question is directed to the Solicitor General.

If these workers do go on strike, as may happen, 8,000 parolees will be without supervision in towns and cities all across Canada. Inmates in prisons will be without training or recreational opportunities and, in my view, lives will be endangered. When is the minister going to act?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I can say that Correctional Services Canada is well aware of the situation. We are waiting for the report, as my colleague, the President of Treasury Board said earlier. We already have a contingency plan, which includes the assistance of police authorities, to ensure the security of Canadians, because the security of our citizens is paramount. Furthermore, my officials, both at Correctional Services and those involved in the contingency plan, have assured me that in any case, if anything happens and people cannot be supervised in the usual way, the security of our citizens will be guaranted at all times, Mr. Speaker.

PORK INDUSTRY

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, late last week the Alberta government decided to step in and clean up the mess left by Peter Pocklington at his Gainers meat packing plant in Edmonton. At least 1,200 jobs have been saved.

Now we read where Bill Janklow, the former governor of South Dakota, and the man who called out the state troopers to block Canadian hogs from his state, says this bail-out is countervailable under the free trade agreement. He wants new duties imposed against Canadian hogs. And the American National Pork Producers Council is watching.

In the absence of the Minister for International Trade my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. What is the government going to do to let our American cousins know, with all due respect, that actions taken by our governments to preserve our meat packing industry and the jobs of hundreds of our citizens is none of their business?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is aware that there is, at the present time, a 3.6 cent per pound countervail that has been imposed as a result of a countervail claim that was made by the United States of America. That issue is being fought by the Canadian Government and by the pork producers and the Meat Council of Canada through two specific areas, through the GATT and through section 19 of the free trade agreement.

Thanks to the free trade agreement, we have an opportunity now to deal with this dispute in an objective and an impartial way, and I am confident about the outcome.

The fact that the Alberta government has taken over Gainers certainly has no bearing upon this at this particular time. Just because there has been a change in ownership, I do not believe that would constitute an action for countervail.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, thanks to the free trade agreement, as the minister well knows, we have the opportunity now to find out whether or not the Americans are applying their own law fairly according to their law. He knows, further, that especially the $10 million guarantee that the Alberta government is giving to Gainers is precisely that which, among others, the American Pork Producers Council is considering as to whether or not it is countervailable.

Again I ask the minister. What is this government going to do to stick up for Canadian jobs in Canadian meat packing plants against the predations of Americans?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Well, I am making progress, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member now says the American government is considering. It is quite well in order for producers in America to make representations to their government, as producers in Canada make representations to this government.

The producers in this country know very well that this government stands up for them, and we are working together in fighting this issue. It is based upon a GATT decision but fortunately we have a free trade dispute resolving mechanism which will be more effective, more impartial, more objective, and more successful.

FISHERIES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade but, in his absence, I will address it to the minister responsible for small business and tourism.

There is considerable concern among lobster fishermen in southern Nova Scotia about a protectionist piece of legislation now before the U.S. Congress and supported by Senate majority leader George Mitchell of Maine, that could block the export of Nova Scotia lobsters to the United States.

Clearly the bill represents a trade distorting action that violates both the GATT and the free trade agreement. What action is the Government of Canada prepared to take to protect Nova Scotia's $100 million lobster industry?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, in reply to my hon. friend, I remind him that of course this is just a proposal. It is not a passed piece of legislation. It is a proposal which we find objectionable on scientific grounds. We also find it objectionable in terms of enforcement. We do not find it consistent at all with GATT or with the FTA and we delivered a message to that effect a week ago today. We will continue to pursue this very vigorously.

FAMILY VIOLENCE

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the status of women. In June, 1988 this government committed $40 million to a so-called family violence initiative. Twenty-two million dollars of this was to go to CMHC for something called Project Haven. As of 9.30 this morning, 16 months later, the total moneys taken up in Project Haven amount to $803,120 for a total of 20 rooms.

One million Canadian women can expect to be assaulted in this country in the near future. Could the minister tell us how much good she thinks 20 rooms will do?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, we commissioned a report which was released at the meeting in Montreal. We find it very helpful in aiding our understanding and raising awareness of the issue. We share the very serious concerns that the authors have raised and we will use our program effectively in combating those most disturbing attitudes and practices.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that is very reassuring to the one in four women in this country who are assaulted before the age of 17.

The Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women says that workers against family violence across this country are saying, "Where is the money, what has been done with the other $18 million?"

My question again is for the minister responsible for the status of women. Would she commit herself to report to the House what is being done with this money, can we see where the money is going and can we do something rather than raise the awareness? The awareness is there. Let us have some action and let us see where the dollars are.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's concern, and I think that she knows it is shared by myself and the members of this government.

The $40 million that we announced in June, 1988 was the largest single increase ever in funding on family violence issues. There are a variety of components in it, as well as public awareness. I will be very happy to look into the particular issue that she has raised, and she knows that I have done that before and will continue to do it.

However, I do want the House to know that this government has made very strong efforts on behalf of the women who face these very terrible difficulties.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Recent cut-backs to VIA Rail services, combined with curtailment of other railway activities, intentionally promoted by this government in the past have caused undue hardship throughout my province of New Brunswick and Canada.

If the government persists with these actions, can the minister explain what economic adjustment programs will be put in place to assist communities and those segments of the population, like senior citizens and students, which will be severely affected by these cut-backs?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, indeed the government is aware of the different applications of decisions that we have made. We have at different levels and different departments, like employment and immigration, regional development, ACOA, and so on, different ways in which we will be able to help people.

However, I do not believe that it is basically something which has anything to do with the cuts at VIA Rail. I believe, once again, that the decision has been made in the best interest, and if there are any hardships anywhere, they will be considered under all government programs.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche): I have a supplementary question. New Brunswick needs financial assistance from the federal government to repair and improve its highway system, which is in pitiful condition.

Following the VIA Rail cuts, can the Minister explain to us what he intends to do to help New Brunswick and the other provinces whose highway systems are in the same deplorable condition?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that my colleague is aware that Canada's highway system is in provincial jurisdiction. So the responsibility for such an initiative rests with the province of New Brunswick.

However, at the last meeting of provincial transport ministers and myself a few weeks ago in Calgary, we decided to continue work on a national highway policy. We are at the third stage of determining some technical points.

Obviously, the federal government in its present financial condition cannot make any commitment to give money to the provinces.

Nevertheless, as this policy is developed, some points are taken into consideration and I think that when the time comes, we will be able to have the necessary discussions.

Once again, I do not want to leave the impression that we will invest any money, for now. We cannot afford it. We will continue to work with the provinces, as was agreed in Calgary in September.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I have a copy of a study done by Tristad Resources based on a Statistics Canada model. It shows that after one year of GST, 100,000 poor people who got the tax credit the first year will receive nothing in terms of a tax credit and after five years of operation, because of partial indexation, some 400,000 families will not receive a tax credit.

What I want to know from the Minister of Finance is whether or not he will confirm those figures and that because of partial indexation the poor people of this country, some 100,000 families, after one year will receive nothing, and after five years 400,000 families will receive nothing from this Minister of Finance.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let us start from ground zero. When we came into office there were no refundable sales tax credits to low income Canadians to offset the burden of sales tax. We introduced a refundable sales tax credit in 1986. We increased the threshold from $15,000 to $16,000 a year later—to $18,000 recently—and it will be going to $25,000 with the introduction of the goods and services tax.

I think the hon. member will acknowledge, I am sure, that the number of people who will be receiving this sales tax credit has increased considerably over the years and will increase even more as we move toward the introduction of the goods and services tax.

Just to put a dollar amount on this, the federal sales tax credit is $1.2 billion now and will be $3.6 billion with the introduction of the goods and services tax credit.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the refusal of the minister to answer the question of course confirms that the GST means that after five years 400,000 families that are poor will lose the entire tax credit, and another 300,000 families will lose part of their tax credit.

I want to know from this Minister of Finance why he is taking a mean spirited approach in attacking poor people in this country by introducing the GST which will take money out of their pockets.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how he can characterize me as being mean spirited when I have been at the heart of the introduction of the refundable sales tax credit that is providing the offset to those people in low income brackets.

Now in specific response to the question, surely he understands that we review these matters, these thresholds on a regular basis. As I have indicated, the threshold was originally $15,000, then we increased it to $16,000, then to $18,000, and with the goods and services tax credit we will be proposing to increase it to $25,000. With the amount of people who are benefiting from the reform of the income tax system as a result of the review of the thresholds at which people start paying tax, 850,000 Canadians were taken off the tax rolls. This is an indication of how this government is responding to the needs of low income Canadians.

STATEMENTS ARISING FROM QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to ask the House and to ask you to review a question that was put by the hon. member for Egmont. He is a member with whom I have no difficulty in putting forward the cause of his constituents and those who sent him to this House. However, in suggesting when reading from an editorial of September 26 from the Summerside Journal–Pioneer that I have deliberately mislead this House, I ask you, Sir, to let me read from an editorial of October 10 from Summerside's The Journal–Pioneer entitled, "An Apology and Clarification from Minister McKnight is now in Order". I will read one part. "Speaking of an error in judgment perhaps The Journal–Pioneer learned a lesson as to how not to do things in the future. If one is going to reprint an editorial from another newspaper that is opposite of the editorial stance, and in this case, The Journal Pioneer, one should choose carefully the position on the editorial stage to which to reproduce that editorial. If it is reproduced at the top left–hand side of the page under editorial heading, then perhaps there should be a lead paragraph emphasizing that the comments are being reflected and reflect the editorial position not of The Journal Pioneer. Perhaps more than one credit line should appear throughout the reproduced editorial so there would be absolutely no doubt that the editorial was being reproduced from another newspaper."

I believe that the hon. member who read his question into Hansard may wish an opportunity to observe what he said. Again, I emphasize that I have no problem whatsoever with the hon. member putting forward a position on behalf of his constituents, but I do request that the rules and traditions of this House be maintained.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Egmont.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in the same editorial that the minister just quoted from, they also make it clear that in their editorial The Journal Pioneer clearly attributed the reproduced article to the Chronicle Herald.

In the answer last Friday, the minister did not give any credit to the Chronicle Herald. He gave the full credit to the The Journal—Pioneer and its editorial stance. This is why we asked for the apology. The minister had to know since last spring that The Journal—Pioneer in no way supported the move of the 880 Squadron or the 413 Squadron from Summerside to anywhere else in Canada. The minister knew that and when he answered my question last Friday I think he misled the people of Canada, the people of Prince Edward Island, and the people of this House that this was not the editorial stance of The Journal—Pioneer.

But if I said "deliberately" earlier in Question Period, I withdraw those remarks and apologize.

POINT OF ORDER

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, perhaps you would permit me to set the record straight in a response to a question from the hon. member for Hamilton East. In that answer perhaps I was too evasive. The reason is that the matter of the dumping or the dredging of the St. Clair River is a serious issue, but it is before the courts so I was intentionally evasive.

However, I should have pointed out to the specific question of the hon. member that the area where the material is being dumped is under the jurisdiction of the Ontario Ministry of the Environment. It is that agency that issued the permit for the dumping of the material.

The Departments of the Environment and of Public Works did examine the material and there is no evidence of any toxicity within it.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENTS ARISING FROM QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Earlier today in the Question Period the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion made a mis–statement. I said that he misled the House—and I did not say at the time when I raised it whether it was deliberate or otherwise—when he said that the rules in place in automotive trade between Canada and the U.S. today are the same as they were in 1965.

That, of course, as I pointed out in my question is totally false. They were changed. From 1965 up to the trade deal there was a Canadian content requirement in law, in the agreement, between the two countries. The trade deal negotiated between the Government of Canada and the United States removed that Canadian investment requirement, i.e., the rules have changed. They are not the same today as they were in 1965. I gave the minister an opportunity to correct that statement. He did not so in the answer. I give him the opportunity again right now.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, in my reply to the hon. member's question earlier I did indicate that the safeguards to which he is referring are totally irrelevant to what is, in fact, happening now. For example, if Canada were only to produce to the level of the safeguards that were in the Auto Pact Agreement, we would have one-half of the number of people employed in the auto industry that we have today and one-third the activity.

• (1210)

In other words, these safeguards are totally irrelevant to what in fact is happening. That there are safeguards is beyond dispute. We argued that ad nauseam for months and months and had an election where that was the sole issue.

Mr. Broadbent: The rules are different now.

Mr. Andre: The question is whether, in fact, those safeguards had anything to do with the decision today. I maintain emphatically that the decision announced by General Motors had nothing to do with safeguards. The safeguards are irrelevant and they have been for 20 years.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. leader of the New Democratic Party has raised, by way of a question of privilege, what is essentially a disagreement between two hon. members of this place, the minister and himself. I do not know that it is going to be settled at this time. Both the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party and the hon. minister have given explanations of their positions. I think it is for others to judge how that is to be resolved. I must advise the hon. member that it is not a question of privilege.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a point of order.

STATEMENTS ARISING FROM QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, today the Acting Minister of the Environment, the Minister of State for Forestry rose on a question of privilege or a point of order in relation to an answer he had given during Question Period. The hon. member for Hamilton East who had asked the question has left the House and I would simply like to reserve, on her behalf, her right to address the House should there be a continuing point arising out of the minister's statement.

Mr. Speaker: We have a situation here where a minister, very properly, in order to clarify something that he had said in answer to a question from the hon. member for Hamilton East, rose at the first opportunity to give clarification. Naturally, if the hon. member for Hamilton East wishes to respond to that and she was not able to be in the House at that moment because she was, no doubt, busy with other duties I will, of course, hear her.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TABLING REPORT OF THE COMMISSION TO REVIEW ALLOWANCES OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(1), I have the honour to table in the House, in both official languages, a report of the Commission to Review Allowances of Members of Parliament.

As has been the custom in the past, I would presume that this report be referred to the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services pursuant to Standing Order 32(5).

Routine Proceedings

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

TABLING OF DRAFT LEGISLATION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I wish to table at this time, in both official languages, copies of the government's draft legislation for the proposed goods and services tax and comprehensive explanatory notes.

This document fully reflects, in draft bill form, what the August technical paper would look like if it were put into bill form. I am tabling this document simply to fulfil our promise made in August when we released the technical paper to do so.

By translating the technical design of the proposed GST into legal language, the draft legislative provisions elaborate on the mechanics of the proposed tax and give greater precision to its operational detail.

As we indicated this summer, this is a further step in the GST consultation process and will assist the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance as well as the professional community in their study of the GST technical paper.

To be clear, this is not a bill introduced into the House. That step must await the government's consideration of the report of the finance committee on the goods and services tax.

HOUSING

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, since my appointment as Minister of State for Housing, I have always been concerned about the problem of affordable housing. I try to help prospective homeowners and Canadians who are having trouble becoming homeowners.

[English]

We are all aware that some housing markets, such as the greater Toronto area, are overheated with demand outstripping supply. There is a serious affordability problem within the Toronto region and an important factor in this is the limited supply of suitable land available for housing.

Some months ago the federal government announced that 50 hectares, that is 135 acres of surplus federal lands at the Downsview Airport site in North York would be made available for housing, and at that time Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the federal housing agency for which I am responsible, was given the responsibility for the development of that site.

Yesterday, I had the honour of announcing that the federal government has released another major site within the greater Toronto area in order to help address the housing needs of the region. The surplus land which the federal government is releasing on this occasion is a parcel of approximately 43 hectares, 106 acres. It is located in the town of Vaughan. This is expected to provide for up to 2,500 new homes.

Again, in keeping with the government policy with respect to the Downsview lands, it is our intention to serve a wide range of types of households. I anticipate that the new neighbourhood will be the home of between 6,000 and 8,000 people. The federal government expects that at least 25 per cent of the homes will meet the needs of young couples just starting out, of senior citizens and of disabled persons. What CMHC is striving for is an income-mixed community, providing a broad range of housing forms.

I might just say at this point that certainly that 23 per cent figure is a minimum, as I indicated in Question Period, but it remains to be worked out with the town of Vaughan as to the exact mix and the exact kind of community.

[Translation]

The federal Government will develop this land in close co-operation with the Town of Vaughan, the York region and the Ontario government, to ensure that this project is a success and benefits all concerned.

[English]

The town of Vaughan has been most interested in how this land would be developed since the time that it was declared surplus by Environment Canada with the decision to relocate the facilities of the Atmosphere Environment Service. I have therefore offered my assurances to the mayor and members of the Vaughan council that we will be working closely with them and their officials toward the realization of common objectives.

[Translation]

This land is being released as part of the Government's current policy of better management and reducing its land holdings, while taking steps to meet the housing needs of Canadians. These measures have made individual parcels of land available, like the Downsview property which CMHC is now developing.

[English]

As I have said since I was appointed Minister of State with the responsibility for housing, I have been looking for ways to address the very urgent needs for affordable housing in certain high-cost areas of our country. It was for this reason that I was particularly pleased to make this announcement. For me this is another step which I hope will bring really tangible results.

I want to thank my colleagues in the government for making this possible. It is a product of co-operation as well as a reflection of our commitment to sound management and the leadership role we are playing in housing in Canada.

The release of the Vaughan land is a result of a CMHC analysis of the development potential of the site which was conducted for the Treasury Board with the support of Public Works Canada. If we are to meaningfully deal with the housing needs of Canadians it will require the same spirit of co-operation on the part of all levels of government as well as from private and non-profit sectors, indeed from all Canadians.

• (1220)

At this time I would like to invite all Canadians to make their concerns known to individual members of Parliament and to the Government of Canada with respect to housing.

I would like to add special thanks to some of my colleagues, including the President of the Treasury Board, the Hon. Robert de Cotret, the Minister of Public Works, the Hon. Elmer MacKay, all the Treasury Board Ministers, my colleagues in the cabinet from the Toronto region, the Hon. Michael Wilson, the Minister of Finance, the Hon. Barbara McDougall, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Hon. John McDermid, the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization, and to say that this would not have happened without their help and co-operation.

One other very brief point I would like to make, Madam Speaker, is to point out and congratulate a former member of this House, the former member for Willowdale, John Oostrom, who played an important role in bringing this particular parcel of land to the attention of the House some many months ago. If it had not been for Mr. Oostrom's efforts at that time this land undoubtedly would not have been used for housing, and I think it is appropriate that we all express our thanks to John Oostrom and to all of our colleagues who have played a part in this announcement of yesterday.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, the decision announced by the Minister of State for Housing regarding the transfer of the Vaughan lands is to be applauded. The principle of surrendering unused government lands for housing development must be encouraged. It is unfortunate that no action is being taken elsewhere in the country where the needs are also acute.

In his statement the minister states that he is concerned about the problem of affordable housing, but nothing in his announcement guarantees that a good portion of these new homes will respond to that very need. What will these homes cost? What type of homes will they be? For whom are they really intended? How does the minister define affordable housing? There is no indication except to parrot what has been said, very properly, in Ontario. How much real consultation has there been with the municipality? The question is, what is the substance behind this announcement?

For several weeks now the Liberal task force on housing has been covering the country. Everywhere we have gone groups have denounced this government's withdrawal, its lack of interest in housing, its obvious lack of leadership in solving what is a fundamental crisis of poverty, affordability and accessibility in the country, the budget cuts which have crippled Canadians who seek affordable housing and the high interest rates which have added and exacerbated the very real problem.

For example, last spring this government announced the end of the rental program, the RRAP. This program was vital in order to renovate the existing low quality housing stock in the country. It was a program vital to allow families to live in decent and affordable housing.

No government which cut that basic program can claim to have any interest in the housing crisis in this country.

When I heard of the most recent announcement—I understand the Minister made many references to Downsview and I wish I could quote his comments on the lack of attention to Downsview when he was a private member as opposed to the minister—it really did bring to mind the inaction of this government. In that case, despite the statements, the good intentions, the laudable declarations, the heartfelt promises that we have heard, not one thing has been done. Not one unit has been constructed. Not a thought has been given to sewage systems or any of the tremendous costs of providing infrastructure. We do not know who is going to develop the land, who is going to pay for it or who is going to supervise it. This government makes announcement after announcement and then does nothing about it. There is no execution, no implementation because there is no commitment to solving the problem.

Is this what is in store now, Madam Speaker, for the Vaughan land? Must the community simply sit around and wait as people have waited for the Downsview implementation? When are we going to see something concrete coming out of this announcement? What Canada needs is a comprehensive housing policy that recognizes the real needs of this country. The government's decision to apply this land is one we all welcome, but it must ensure that it is done within the framework of a coherent policy, one that responds to the expectations of the people and to their socioeconomic problems.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, Canadian men and women need affordable housing. The Government's programs should be aimed at filling this need.

[English]

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I am new to this House, and I guess I am a little bewildered. I had thought minister's statements were used to announce significant policy changes or significant programs, not used to do basically a small PR job which was already done in a press conference yesterday.

The minister has announced the release of the Downsview lands on which there are going to be 600 affordable houses. Canada has 1.2 million children living in poverty. Canada needs 100,000 affordable houses built every year, this year, next year, for the next five years, and the minister is announcing 600.

When asked by the press how he defined affordable houses he said, $150,000 to $200,000. What are we talking about in affordability? He has made no commitment that any of the 600 units will, in fact, be non-profit housing or co-op housing. He says that the government is going to meet the 25 per cent minimum required by Ontario. Where is government leadership? Why is the government not talking about 50 per cent or 75 per cent of the housing being affordable? We have a serious problem in this country. Thirty per cent to 40 per cent of Canadians do not have access to affordable, good quality housing. There are 1.2 million children living in poverty, and the minister is talking about fiddling around with 600 housing units.

When I heard yesterday that the minister was going to make a statement I thought we were going to have a statement that the government was embarking on a bold program that was going to attack the question of affordability of housing across Canada.

The Canadian Real Estate Association says there are 27 regions in this country which have severe affordability problems. The minister has made two peanut announcements dealing with one of them, in his own backyard of Toronto. This does not do anything for people in Edmonton, Calgary, Halifax or Vancouver.

There is an increasing question of credibility emerging around the Minister of Housing. When he was a backbencher he spoke eloquently. Since he has become minister he has taken no action. His announcement is like someone sitting on a sinking ship and bailing with a teacup—it is not even a teacup, it is a spoon.

Six hundred units of affordable housing does nothing to alleviate the problem across this country. I had hoped he was going announce a program where interest rates or mortgages were going to be reduced by 4 per cent, or that the government was going to fund municipal infrastructure, or triple or double the number of co-operative or non-profit housing, or bring in his favourite pet, a speculators' tax which he advocated before he was a minister or restore the RRAP program. But we heard about none of these.

I am left with a bewildered feeling, and I think most housing organizations in Canada are being left with that same feeling. Where is the leadership? Where is the commitment? How long is the minister going to think that platitudes and inaction are going to really solve the problem?

UNITED STATES CONGRESS BICENTENNIAL

Hon. Jean Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to present a motion anticipating the anniversary of an institution that is well known to the U.S. government and U.S. citizens, and with which Canada and Canadians are also familiar. I introduce this motion in a non-partisan spirit, Madam Speaker, since it refers to an event that a major institution will be celebrating very shortly, and that is the bicentennial of the United States Congress.

I shall now read the motion:

[English]

> That the Speaker of the House of Commons convey to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives and the President of the United States Senate the good wishes of the House of Commons of Canada on the occasion of the bicentennial of the Congress of the United States of America.

[Translation]

Those were the contents of the motion, Madam Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I want to simply say on behalf of the New Democratic Party that once again a similar motion has come before the House. We are quite prepared to support it and to send a message to our American friends.

I must say that it is tempting to enter into some debate, which of course we could do, to point out the advantages of the American system in terms of its checks and balances on the powers of the executive when it is acting not necessarily in the best interests of the people.

Since perhaps this is not the appropriate time to carry on with that debate, I simply say on behalf of our party that we are quite prepared to join with the government and with the Official Opposition in sending our greetings.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is an honour for me to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of Kamloops, British Columbia, pursuant to Standing Order 36 and certified correct by the clerk of petitions. These people are very concerned with the government's intention to curtail VIA Rail service.

VIA Rail service plays an important role in our community. Many businesses depend upon it and thousands of people use it each year.

The government has not curtailed the service totally but has essentially gutted it. People are asking the government to reconsider this decision, to consider upgrading VIA Rail with new equipment, and to give it a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The petitioners note with dismay the activities at the National Arts Centre in Ottawa this week. They call upon the government to take steps to resolve the difficulties that seem to be plaguing the National Arts Centre to save this jewel in Canada's cultural crown.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition under the provisions of Standing Order 36. This is one of many from my constituents.

This petition is from the communities of Rossland, Trail, Warfield, Nelson, Fruitvale, Slocan and Winlan on the subject of the goods and services tax. It has been approved by the clerk of petitions.

The petitioners ask that Parliament reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

They further ask that Parliament cause the government to cease with the proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through our aggressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 to bring to the attention of the House the serious crisis being faced by the National Arts Centre and the National Arts Centre Orchestra, which is considered an excellent world-class orchestra that has brought fame to Canada and its capital city.

There is the belief that the National Arts Centre Orchestra is in imminent danger of being damaged or even destroyed, and the petitioners call upon this House to implore the minister to see to some settlement of this very serious matter and ensure that the National Arts Centre maintain its orchestra at its current size and present standard of excellence.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I have petitions with respect to the goods and services tax.

The grievance common to your petitioners is in the certain assurance that the House will pay some attention and provide remedy to the petitioners who believe that the goods and services tax is an unprecedented tax.

It is a grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them with not only higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates, and higher unemployment. They plead with the government to withdraw this tax.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present to the House this afternoon two petitions, both duly signed and authorized.

These petitions come from one of the small businesses in the Vernon area of my constituency, Athens Pizza, a number of whose customers have signed their concerns regarding the goods and services tax.

They feel that it is an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for the taxpayers' ability to pay. They call upon the government to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and to cease with this proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax rather than through real tax reform.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have here a petition in which petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I stand here today pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition duly certified by the clerk of petitions.

I am pleased to present this petition on behalf of some of the small businesses in Nepean and on behalf of their employees who are in strong opposition to the proposed 9 per cent goods and services tax. These constituents strongly oppose the tax as something that would have a deleterious effect not only on the economy but would cause inflation, unemployment and higher interest rates.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the GST.

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I have a petition to present pursuant to Standing Order 36 with regard to patrons of the National Art Centre and its fine orchestra, the National Arts Centre Orchestra.

They are very concerned that different measures being taken at the National Arts Centre in terms of its administration and in terms of the effect on the orchestra are going to have a very serious effect which they will not be able to overcome.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament or the Minister of Communications to take steps that will eradicate this very difficult problem.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I too am honoured to present additional petitions duly certified to be true and correct as to form and content pursuant to Standing Order 36.

On behalf of my constituents of Winnipeg North and of other Canadians beyond my constituency these petitioners oppose the proposed goods and services tax. They are convinced that the proposed tax will impose serious and unfair hardship on low and middle income Canadians. They further believe that it will impose onerous problems on small businesses.

The petitioners trust that this House will provide the necessary remedy and that the remedy is for Parliament to reject this proposed goods and services tax. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to take the appropriate action.

• (1240)

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and privilege, pursuant to Standing Order 36,to present a petition duly signed by a number of constituents who are protesting the government's grief and suffering tax.

These Canadians call upon the government to rescind this most unfair tax immediately.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, I ask that all the questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall all questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): As agreed earlier today, the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business.

Do I understand that there is unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of providing long-term regional planning for the Atlantic region through an expanded Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is with some fear that I rise today to bring this motion before the House, because last May 15 I had a similar motion before the House.

As the member for St. John's East will remember, government members talked about the need for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, its importance, and what great demand there was for that agency. They agreed with me about the subject matter that we were dealing with. They talked about the thousands of requests that were out there, and how important it was to the businesses in Atlantic Canada, how important it was to each of the provinces and the communities in Atlantic Canada. Unknown to them, I believe, at the same time the minister responsible for this agency was in front of a committee of the House of Commons announcing that he was cutting the budget for that agency.

I do not know how government members felt that day, but I think a number of members on the opposition side felt betrayed by the actions of the minister. Three government members rose to speak that afternoon. I suspect that government members felt very awkward having defended the agency that afternoon in the House of Commons.

They went through that exercise, explaining the need for that agency, only to find out that their minister, a minister from Nova Scotia, was in a committee room of this House saying that for budgetary reasons the agency was going to have to use its money over a much longer period of time, effectively reducing the amount of money available in each and every year for the next five years.

Obviously the demands which the members of all three parties had spoken about with some eloquence were not going to be met.

Since that time other announcements have been made by this same minister which have restricted the ability of the Atlantic agency to deal with the problems in that region. I remember the member for St. John's East getting up and saying that it is very important that decisions be made in Atlantic Canada by Atlantic Canadians. He made that one of the focal points in challenging the motion I had put before the House.

What I find interesting is that not only did the minister cut the funding which the Tory members had found to be so important for Atlantic Canada, he decided without consulting the board to change the criteria with regard to whom and what corporations are eligible for funding.

Let me explain that. Under the new criteria only certain firms will be eligible for funding. Only proposals that would require funding for over $200,000 would be eligible for grants. Well, that is a change in the emphasis of the program. It was a change made by the minister and by his officials in Ottawa; not by people in Atlantic Canada; not with the knowledge of the Conservative MPs, I suspect; not with the knowledge of the Conservative Premier of Nova Scotia; not with the knowledge of the people who are on the board, the people who are supposed to be "making the decisions on behalf of Atlantic Canada, by Atlantic Canadians", to quote Conservative members.

I am quite interested to hear the speeches later today to see what the minister might do to reverse himself yet again in the future.

I wanted to speak seriously about the importance of providing more funding to Atlantic Canada and how important it is to restrict through change the program criteria that the minister announced last spring.

One of the documents I want to refer to is a leaked document prepared by the Nova Scotia Government. It reads:

> ACOA's focus on very small companies weakens the ability of the province to attract medium and large industrial development.

That is a quote from the Nova Scotia Conservative government's response to what the federal Conservatives have done. In other words, it has said that the new criteria restricting the funding to less than $200,000 is preventing development of medium and large operations in Atlantic Canada.

It is not a New Democratic statement. It is not a statement on behalf of the Liberal party. It is a statement of the Nova Scotia Conservative government attacking the cut-backs and the change in criteria made by the minister responsible. I have forgotten his riding, but it used to be represented by the Prime Minister when he was looking for a seat before he received a seat in Quebec.

I remember going out to campaign against him in the by-election. One of the things the Prime Minister said at that time was: "Elect me and we will look after you. Elect me and I will make sure that the concerns of Atlantic Canadians are on the front burner. Elect me and I will make sure that you have the funding that you need".

That is not what the government of Nova Scotia or the Premier of Nova Scotia who campaigned for the Prime Minister in those days are saying. They are saying that by cutting back the funding, restricting the amount of money that is available and changing the criteria you are preventing Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, P.E.I, and "the rock" from developing in the way that they need to develop.

Let us look at the other cut-backs. Which part of the country was hurt most by the VIA cuts? Atlantic Canada. Where does the most vociferous protest come from with regard to the cuts? Atlantic Canada. Which area has improved its usage of VIA in response to the Deputy Prime Minister's challenge? It was Atlantic Canada. Which area of Canada feels most betrayed by this government with regard to the VIA cuts? Again it is Atlantic Canada.

Let us consider other areas of economic development. The federal government basically announced this fall that there will be half as much money for tourism in Atlantic Canada as there was in the past, in an area which is starting to boom, where there is growth. There are more American tourists coming up and more Canadians going to Atlantic Canada. This is a sector which employs people, where small businesses do very well, where the local communities all benefit, and the federal government says: "We are cutting that back".

Not only is it cutting it back by half but it has decided that from now on it will not be a separate fund. It has to come from the funding for ACOA. In other words, the funds that were just cut on May 15 not only have to cover all existing programs, all existing requests, but now have to look after tourism as well because tourism will not be a separate development.

• (1250)

I had a press conference on these issues in September and I called it a triple whammy. The federal government is socking it to Atlantic Canada time after time after time, and it is doing all it can to make sure that the economy of Atlantic Canada is devastated by the budget measures of the Minister of Finance.

After being betrayed by their own Prime Minister and by their own cabinet minister, I wonder how Conservative members of Parliament will have the courage to get up yet again in this House and say that my motion is going in the wrong direction.

How will they be able to say that the federal government, the federal Conservatives would never hurt Atlantic Canada? The last time they got up to speak, to defend their minister, to defend their Prime Minister at the same time, without telling them the minister was down the hall in a committee of this House taking money from Atlantic Canada. He was taking money that had been promised to Atlantic Canada, taking money that was supposed to be part of an agreement with Atlantic Canada. He said: "You are not getting it in the next three years. We will give you the same amount over the next five years". I do not know how some of those Conservative back-benchers feel, but I suspect they feel betrayed.

Certainly their constituents feel betrayed. Certainly there is a growing feeling in Atlantic Canada that they are being ignored. It does not matter whether it is the fisheries. It does not matter whether it is tourism. It does not matter whether it is those people who rely on VIA Rail. It does not matter whether it is the seniors who look at their pension plans being eroded by this government. There is a very strong growing sense that this government has ignored, betrayed and is abandoning Atlantic Canada. That feeling was there. I do not think any Conservative member is going to deny that feeling because it is growing and they must be hearing it back home.

What I am calling for in the motion is a positive approach. First, we have to get rid of the cut-back mentality of the federal Conservatives. In its place we have to make sure that those agencies which are established actually have the power to make decisions affecting Atlantic Canada, and that those decisions are, again to quote the Conservatives, "Made by Atlantic Canadians". That is not happening. The area feels devastated.

The government is producing programs which are hurting people in that region. The government is showing it has absolutely no concern for Atlantic Canada. What we need is a statement by this House in the form of a motion which I hope the Conservative members present can support. It is a votable motion. We can vote on it if the Conservatives agree to it. We can vote on a motion that states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of providing long-term regional planning for the Atlantic region through an expanded Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

This is not a motion condemning the government. This is a motion giving direction to the government. This is a motion saying that we want an expanded role. It does not even mention extra money, only an expanded role. It calls for "long-term regional planning", and it explains that the agency that should do so is the very agency Conservative members got up and spoke about with such eloquence just a few short months ago.

I do not want to take all the time available in this debate. I want the Conservative members here to have a chance to explain why they too support this motion and why they too believe that we need an expanded role, that we need long-term regional planning for Atlantic Canada, and that we cannot have a continuation of the betrayals of the Prime Minister and the betrayals of the minister responsible for the agency as we have had in the past.

We no longer want to be in a situation of such short-term planning as we had in the past where a Conservative member is speaking in defence of an agency in the House, not knowing that the cabinet minister is down the hall cutting the funding for that agency. Stand up for your region, stand up for funding for Atlantic Canada, stand up for long-term planning for that region.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Speaker, I rise with great pleasure today to participate in this debate. I thank the hon. member for Churchill for providing an opportunity for myself and other members of the House to get up and talk about the excellent things that are being done by this government in Atlantic Canada.

The member's motion calls for long-term planning. That is precisely the role that the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency plays. He calls for an expanded Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. There is absolutely no question that the overwhelmingly positive response that has been received from business across Atlantic Canada to ACOA means precisely that it is an overwhelming success, and I hope some day we will find more funding.

It is a fact that $1.05 billion were committed, were made available, by this government. In the first two years $600 million of those dollars were committed already and in this year $400 million will be spent by ACOA. This indicates that the government in fact has a very impressive record in Atlantic Canada and that this government has and will continue to have a very substantial commitment to Atlantic Canada and to long range planning for Atlantic Canadians.

Needless to say, as with any agency there is an ongoing review and dialogue taking place. As new needs occur they will be responded to, and I was particularly pleased to see this government's response earlier this year to the burgeoning crisis in the Atlantic fishery in setting up a special cabinet committee which will assist ACOA and other agencies in responding to the needs of Atlantic Canada.

ACOA, quite simply, is an Atlantic Canadian success story. It has been a tremendous value to the economy and to the people of Atlantic Canada. I might say, Madam Speaker, that credit for this has to go to the individual whose vision led to the establishment of ACOA, and that is the Prime Minister of Canada. We as Atlantic Canadians and I as a member of Parliament from Atlantic Canada, and I am sure my colleagues on this side from Atlantic Canada, are proud to stand with that Prime Minister and recognize the leadership he has provided in bringing about ACOA and the fact that he knows our region so well.

We have also benefited I might say from leadership from three ministers—the minister from the other place, the Minister for Federal-Provincial Relations, the now Minister of Veterans Affairs, and indeed the current minister of ACOA, a man who I might say is probably as well respected and popular as any person in the province of Nova Scotia for the leadership that he has provided many, many years in this Parliament, in the governments of Canada, and the tremendous leadership that he has provided for our province.

ACOA's staff have worked diligently. The problem that the 300 people who work for ACOA have had has been keeping up with the volume and demand for the opportunity to participate in the many programs of ACOA. I look forward to ACOA playing a very positive role under its new president, Mr. Lesault, who I know will maintain the quality of leadership that we have had from ACOA.

The basis of success of ACOA, unlike any other regional development program to date, is the fact that ACOA is based in Atlantic Canada and the decisions for ACOA are made in Atlantic Canada. ACOA, naturally as an agency of government, receives its funding from the government of Canada.

Just as any other department of government, decisions are made by cabinet, funds are allocated, structures are created. The significant thing about ACOA is that it is based in Atlantic Canada. The project decisions and the various other co-operative efforts in which ACOA gets involved are made by Atlantic Canadians in Atlantic Canada. There is nowhere in Canada where there are people with greater initiative, greater energy or better ideas than the people of Atlantic Canada. The result is that we are seeing on a daily basis the benefits coming from the 1.05 billion new dollars that were brought in.

My hon. friend made reference to a document that was released in Nova Scotia. I am sure that it was not his intention to in any way mislead this House by suggesting that it was a document of the government of Nova Scotia.

I just want to set the record straight. The Minister of Development of the province of Nova Scotia commissioned a study of ACOA by an outside person, a professor from Acadia University who did a study and submitted it to the government of Nova Scotia. In the opinion of the minister it was so outrageous that he sent it back and refused to accept the document. He suggested that there be more facts and less opinion in the document.

• (1300)

Instead of revising the document, as should have been done, he released it to the New Democratic Party. The Leader of the New Democratic Party of Nova Scotia got up and made all sorts of statements about ACOA based on a document that had been rejected. It was indeed not the document of the Government of Nova Scotia. I think we should refer to that as the document of the New Democratic Party of Nova Scotia. It is not by any means a document of the Government of Nova Scotia.

The action program of ACOA has had a profound impact in supporting new ideas, expanding businesses and facilitating the diversification of industry throughout Atlantic Canada. It has been particularly helpful to small business. It has also been beneficial to large businesses.

From time to time people ask me why the government makes grants to business. Are business people not wealthy? Why do they need money from the government? People do not understand that the role of an industrial incentive program is to make things happen where we want them to happen, in this case in Atlantic Canada as opposed to other places. Funding and support through the various means that come with the action program means that industries and expansions happen in Atlantic Canada and not somewhere else where they might otherwise happen. That is the concept of incentive.

If ACOA makes a contribution to the development of a business, it is only a contribution towards that happening. They are not giving money to somebody. They are creating opportunities for Atlantic Canada. The people who own those businesses make investments. They are no more interested in losing on their investments than are the Government of Canada or the people of the maritimes in terms of those investments. We have to understand that the benefit that comes back is a benefit to all Atlantic Canadians. In employment opportunities the money eventually comes back to the government through taxation and through expenditures in those communities. Everybody wins all around.

Reference was made to the suggestion that the ACOA decisions are made in Ottawa rather than in Atlantic Canada. Decisions in ACOA are made by a highly competent team of public servants. Some people suggests that ACOA decisions are made by politicians. There are times when it might be very helpful to me and some of my colleagues from Atlantic Canada if we had funds to dispense for encouraging businesses and so on. It does not work that way. Everything is done above board. Decisions are made in accordance with clearly established criteria.

Suggestions are made with respect to the fact that there has been a modification in the process by which ACOA's funds are being spent. Members opposite seem completely unaware that in this country we have, as a result of many years of overspending, a serious debt problem. All Canadians are aware of that debt problem. All areas of government have to participate in dealing with that debt problem. All regional development agencies in Canada, as with all other aspects of the government, have had to participate in coming to grips with this.

The important thing to note is that the money that was committed at the beginning of ACOA is still there. The $1.5 billion to assist in job creation in Atlantic Canada is still there. It will be spent in Atlantic Canada for the benefit of Atlantic Canadians.

I recall last spring when the budget came down hearing from members opposite that there would be no money for other regional development. The term "cut" is constantly used. They said there would not be any money for ERDAs or co-operative agreements. It is interesting to note that the minister responsible has now reached agreements in all four Atlantic provinces.

Newfoundland recently announced agreements for coastal Labrador and rural development.

Several agreements in principle have been reached in Prince Edward Island. One was the signing of a $25 million agri-food agreement.

A package of agreements involving a commitment of $97.7 million by the Government of Canada in New Brunswick, including a $32 million agri-food agreement, was signed by the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Veterans Affairs just last week.

In my province of Nova Scotia we now have five co-operative agreements, including a $200 million-plus agreement to deal with the Halifax harbour pollution problem, an agri-food agreement and most recently, forestry, fishery and mining agreements.

Between ACOA and these co-operation development agreements, this government has committed over $2 billion to regional development in Atlantic Canada. It is indeed a very impressive record.

I have no reservations at all in going back to Atlantic Canada as a member of Parliament in support of this government. No government in the history of this country has done as much for Atlantic Canada as this government is doing and will continue to do.

In closing, I want to quote from a statement made by the Prime Minister of Canada in Halifax this summer. He said: "ACOA is about the future, about helping business people improve productivity, exploit new technology, develop new markets and create new jobs. ACOA represents a new approach and a new commitment on our part to Atlantic regional economic development".

That approach is working. That commitment is producing results. ACOA is here to stay and our government commitment, reinforced by success, is even greater.

Atlantic Canada and Atlantic Canadians have never been better served than they are being served and will continue to be served by this government.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise and speak in this debate concerning the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

You are no doubt aware, Madam Speaker, that Atlantic Canada depends heavily on federal regional development assistance. Indeed, the federal government established ACOA to help alleviate the economic disparity which has plagued Atlantic Canada.

However, in looking at ACOA's record I cannot help but feel that the agency possesses serious shortcomings. The motion put forward by the member for Churchill states very clearly that the government ought to consider implementing long term regional planning in Atlantic Canada by expanding the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

While the motion seems very good, and I can very easily support it, the truth is that although ACOA was launched by the Conservative Government amid a great deal of fanfare, it has fallen far short of the mark. My hon. colleague from the other side quotes the right hon. Prime Minister. I have a quote here also.

When addressing the Saint John Board of Trade in October of last year, the Prime Minister said: "The federal government has a responsibility for regional development in the interests of national unity and as well in the interest of fairness. We will not have two Canadas in the economic sense anymore than in the constitutional sense. We will not have one Canada that is prospering at the centre while other regions do not receive a fair share of economic opportunity".

They are great words. Everyone in this House I am sure would agree with them. They sound fantastic. But words are cheap.

Let us look at what the government has been doing not only to Atlantic Canada but right across the country. First, there is VIA Rail, the recent announcement by the Minister of Transport on VIA Rail, the cut-backs. We look at the new proposed tax. Speaking of taxes it is this very same government that increased taxes 31 times since 1984. The hon. member talked about the deficit, the debt. Since 1984 this government has doubled it. We talk about UIC and the changes proposed to it. Again, it is going to affect Atlantic Canada.

The hon. member from the other side sort of praised ACOA and all its benefits. To be honest, there are some benefits to ACOA. There is no doubt about it. We need ACOA. We need other programs as well. But there are some problems with ACOA. There are some problems with the direction the government is going in.

I have a few articles. I want to point out some of the headlines that have come out since the budget and since the announced cut-backs to ACOA. What amazes me is how members on the government side seem to say that ACOA has not been cut. Well, here are a few headlines with regard to statements made by the hon. minister responsible for ACOA.

One is from The Toronto Star. It states: "Ottawa slashes Atlantic funding". The article is about the proposed changes in ACOA.

Here is another one from a local paper in New Brunswick. It states: "ACOA cuts called sell-out of Maritimes".

I have another one which states: "Tories to slash cash for regions by $2 billion". Down below there is a little sub-article entitled: "Budget leak suspect may not be charged".

Another article states: "Ottawa cuts Atlantic Canada development aid", again referring to the hon. minister and his program of spreading the same amount of money over a period of seven years rather than the original five years.

Here is a good one, Madam Speaker. It states: "Half-baked ideas and half-measures". There is a big question mark there. They are talking about the regional development policies of this government.

Another one states: "Atlantic Canada, the nation's economic wasteland gets wasted again". The article goes on to explain how Atlantic Canadians are not being treated fairly or equally, as the Prime Minister indicated it should be throughout Canada.

• (1310)

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I have another article here from l'Acadie nouvelle, New Brunswick's francophone newspaper, and the headlines are incredible: The ACOA has no way of knowing whether the funding it provides is spent on the projets submitted. All this doesn't make sense. The article quotes the Minister responsible for ACOA as saying: We don't have the financial and human resources for providing follow-up. A projet follow-up would be very expensive, and I am not convinced it would be worthwhile.

[English]

The minister is telling us in his own words that they have no way of checking to see if the money that he is giving out through ACOA is actually being spent on those projects. He says: "We do not have enough personnel, and even if we did, I do not even know whether we would check. It may not be a good idea".

I want to go to a more localized problem that has been underlined just recently in my own riding. The article that I am referring to is an article that appeared in a local paper of the city of Campbellton. The headline here states: "ACOA tactics jeopardizing developments in Ccunty". The mandate of ACOA was to develop industry, to develop enterprises. The article goes on to quote the industrial commissioner of the Restigouche Industrial Commission. This is a neutral group, a group that has the good of the region in mind. It is a group that is trying to do exactly what ACOA is doing.

Here is what the industrial commissioner had to say: "Clients have been kept waiting for months. We are being kept in the dark and they have made so many changes to the program, it is unbelievable". That is what the industrial commissioner in one of the regions in New Brunswick is saying.

Another point that the article goes on to explain is that the old mistakes of changing the regional policies in mid-stream is creating havoc. It is the same old problem that we have had before whereby the government announces a program. It sounds great. There is a big fanfare. The Prime Minister gives a big speech. A year or so down the road, there is a change. They have all sorts of reasons. There is the debt, the deficit, whatever, all sorts of reasons that they can well explain.

I should also point out to show the seriousness of it—and I do not want to discuss the case—that ACOA is being taken to court in the region as well because of problems created by the agency.

When we look at ACOA in general, it sounds as if I am very critical of it. I am. I am critical because it should have been a good tool. It should have been the answer to our problems. But it is not. There are a lot of problems with the ACOA program as it now stands.

One of the things that I want to point out is that I am not criticizing the personnel. The personnel are doing their best at whatever they do, whenever they do it. They do not have the backing of this government. That is the problem. They do not have enough personnel or the finances.

When we talk about a long range plan, this government has no long range plans. It has no long range for anything in Canada, let alone for Atlantic Canada. Maybe the motion should have been expanded to include other areas. They have been in government since 1984, which is actually too long. They have ruined the economy. There is no doubt about that. They are ruining the transportation system across Canada. Now they want to investigate it while they are ruining it. When the investigation is over, we are just going to find out that it is ruined. It will be too late.

I have a few constructive ideas, if hon. members are listening. Perhaps we could increase the personnel of ACOA. Another constructive idea is to go back to the original five-year commitment, rather than a seven-year commitment.

One other thing that I should point out, and the hon. member opposite also mentioned it, is that decisions for ACOA are made by civil servants. The new president of ACOA has already stated publicly that the $200,000 limit on the action plan was a mistake. Let us see that changed as soon as possible.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Madam Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to participate in the debate this afternoon. As a member from Atlantic Canada, I have watched over the years a state of economic decline, fortunately reversed by the government elected in 1984. I can tell you, Madam Speaker, that I serve with a great deal of enthusiasm as the member from Fundy—Royal, and I am in total support of the types of policies that this government has initiated over the past five or six years.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the mover of the motion, as well as to my hon. colleague from New Brunswick, the member for Restigouche—Chaleur. I must say that I find a similarity that develops among opposition members that is rather strange, particularly in view of the historic relationship that the party of the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur had with Atlantic Canada, which was to put it into a desperate state of morass and decline for all of those years when they were in charge. The correlation that I draw between the two members' speeches is that it is more significant of what they have not said, as opposed to what they did say.

It is to the credit of this government that in a period when restraint is obviously the key word—and it is difficult to find funds of any significance to go into disadvantaged regions, such as Atlantic Canada—that this government was able to come up with in excess of $1.2 billion for a program of great vision through the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency when previous administrations were able to do nothing but recycle old funds again, again, and again. of dollars going into Atlantic Canada. There have been thousands of jobs created. Hundreds of families which were previously disadvantaged and are now able to provide themselves a decent standard of living, something which before just simply did not exist.

I want to remind you that it was not that the previous administration had not attempted from time to time to deal with the discrepancies and the disparities in Atlantic Canada because, indeed, it paid lip-service. The disturbing thing is that during a great deal of that time the party of the member who moved the motion, the NDP, was supporting and propping up the Liberal government which continued to contribute to such a deplorable state of the economy in Atlantic Canada.

I think it is important to recognize that there are some substantial developments over the last few years that perhaps are not given the profile they deserve.

• (1320)

I want to talk particularly about education and research. My hon. colleague from South Shore only had a short time to deal with some of the problems and some of the positive things that have taken place with reference to his area. Education and research are as important to Atlantic Canada as it is to the rest of the nation.

The best and the brightest of young Atlantic Canadians are often forced to leave home. We saw a lot of that during my earlier years when it was the norm that young Atlantic Canadians left Atlantic Canada. I had to leave Atlantic Canada because I was unable to find a job. Many hundreds and thousands of other young people during that period of time found themselves in the same situation. They are often forced, even today, to leave home to seek opportunities elsewhere. However, that is changing because of the initiatives and the foresight of this government.

The region which has been deprived of the talent, ambition and vigour of part of its younger generation, could not possibly continue to survive under those types of conditions. Atlantic Canadians, like all Canadians, are loyal to the province of their birth. Given equal opportunity they would gladly stay home and participate to make whatever contribution they could to its wealth. Part of ACOA's task, as this government saw and perceived it, was to give them the opportunity to do just that.

Let me mention today just a few of the projects, particularly in the field of education, which are being or will soon be undertaken with at least partial funding, if not total funding, from ACOA that will make it possible for Atlantic Canada's brightest and best to stay at home, to grow and to contribute.

The programs designed to educate the next generation of entrepreneurs must be effective. We must first describe the strengths and weaknesses of the present public school system and university curricula and we must do this in relation to the field in which the initiative is directed. By so doing we can discover how the educational system can foster entrepreneurial spirit by teaching the necessary appropriate skills.

Entrepreneurship Project, PEP, is a research program undertaken jointly by Mount Allison University and the Université de Moncton. Its work will establish what attitudes toward and conceptions of entrepreneurship are prevalent in the school system, both among students and teaching personnel; what courses and entrepreneurial skills are being offered and how they are taught; how school curricula may be modified to give the students the opportunity to increase their knowledge and ability in the field of business development; and how the subject of entrepreneurship is treated in the teacher training institutions.

PEP is designed to attack the roots of the economic problems in the Atlantic provinces. New products, new production methods and new markets do not create themselves. They are created by people but people need the tools to exploit those opportunities, to discover new products and markets. ACOA believes that PEP is Canada with the tools they need to achieve economic equality with the rest of Canada.

Another project which complements PEP at the university level is the establishment at the University of New Brunswick of a chair of technological management and entrepreneurship. Too often, students of engineering and other applied sciences, while well educated in their particular discipline, receive no training whatsoever in the entrepreneurial skills which would enable them to exploit to the fullest, and to the benefit of their community as well as themselves, the practical knowledge they have gained at the cost of long, hard studies.

Innovative ideas, because of the lack of ability to create a market for them, are lost. The chair of technology management and entrepreneurship will develop courses designed to give these students the business development skills to complement their scientific knowledge. The University of New Brunswick will assume the funding and ensure the continuation of the chair of technology management and entrepreneurship after ACOA funding for the project expires.

In addition, a chair of international marketing has been established at the Université de Moncton. This chair is also partially funded by ACOA in collaboration with the province of New Brunswick and the private sector. Once again, the university will pick up the funding after the ACOA program expires.

Telemedicine and Educational Technology Resources is a joint project of the Telemedicine Centre and the School of Continuing Studies of Memorial University of Newfoundland. The goal of this project is to establish and operate a facility providing a network of educational communications, using the latest electronic technology, throughout the province of Newfoundland.

The communications network will be capable of delivering training programs to remote areas of that province. These programs will be directed toward a variety of groups, including industry, business and professional associations, as well as community groups and others requiring specialized training.

There is one industry which is important equally to all of us in Atlantic Canada and that is the one of tourism. In fact, it is an important source of revenue for all of Canada, both provincially and federally. In the Atlantic provinces it is equally important. It is certainly an important employer.

Therefore, ACOA is proud to contribute, in co-operation with the province of Nova Scotia, the private sector, and Mount Saint Vincent University, to the funding of an expansion of the tourism and hospitality degree program offered by that university.

These are just some of the education projects that ACOA is working with and developing in Atlantic Canada. I would like to say, in closing, that I am convinced ACOA will continue to build on the excellent start it has made and it deserves the continued support of the people it serves and the support of this Chamber.

Mr. Darryl L. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Madam Speaker, like my hon. colleague who just spoke, I also welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate this afternoon. I think that if we look at past events and consider other regional development programs introduced by this Government since 1984, it is all very reminiscent of our Plan de l'est in the Gaspé, in Eastern Quebec. I think we can find a parallel with the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, in the way it works in disadvantaged areas where a tool is needed, as the Hon. Member said earlier. In order to stimulate the economy in our regions, it is very important that the federal Government be able to provide, not only human resources, but also the funding we need to develop our own economy as we see fit. With the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, we already have some concrete examples. We can talk about Cape Breton Island, where Micronav Ltd. will create 120 new jobs providing systems for airports throughout our country and even internationally. Madam Speaker, I think it is important that all Canadians understand that in regions like ours, the Atlantic, the West, the Far North, new technology will help us provide more jobs for our youth and we have something to offer.

Also, Madam Speaker, for sure not all Canadians want to live in Montreal or Toronto. Programs like ACOA in the Atlantic today are the way to keep our young people where they live.

[English]

It is very nice for the opposition always to shoot and attack.

• (1330)

I am very familiar with the Atlantic region. My colleague mentioned Mount Allison University. I was fortunate enough to have good professors and I graduated from there many moons ago. I am glad to see that that university is taking part in the ACOA program.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine): I am not sure whether that applause was for my graduation or for ACOA taking part in Mount Allison. As you are very well aware, Madam Speaker, that in terms of spending federal dollars, the dollars must come from somewhere. We shall never have enough money to have everyone drive a Cadillac. But we shall all drive Cadillacs when the federal government continues with programs such as ACOA and the eastern Quebec plan, to use two examples. With continued federal help in the regions, with programs such as ACOA along with the dynamism that we have in the Maritimes and other areas outside central Canada, we shall prove that the money of the federal government has not been poorly spent, and we shall continue doing that.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak again on ACOA, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, in this House. My hon. friend across the way keeps coming up with suggestions for ACOA that are inherent in ACOA today. I need not remind hon. members that the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is the first attempt, after a number of attempts by a variety of governments, to deal specifically and effectively with the problems of regional development in Atlantic Canada.

The fundamental problem with programs in the past has been that the direction, the policy framework, and the decisions came from the centre, from here in Ottawa. I need not remind any member in this House of the problems of developing policy inside across the country. There have been problems. ACOA is so successful, as my friend from the South Shore has pointed out, because the decisions are made in the region by people from the region who are dealing every day with the problems, the challenges, the innovations, the imagination of people in the region. It has four components. The first is action and we have seen that in the action plan. The second is co-operation. The third is co-ordination and the fourth is advocacy.

I think it is important to get on the record the success of ACOA, what ACOA has been able to do in the 19 or 20 months since it has been active. Up until early September ACOA had approved 6,336 projects, committed $607 million and leveraged, seen other people invest, $1.7 billion. That is co-operation. That is using federal government programs and federal government resources to generate other resources, to increase investment in co-operation with the people who live and work in the Atlantic provinces. We have helped to create 16,714 jobs and maintain another 18,936 jobs. Those are results. That is progress. In 19 months of existence, close to 70,000 inquiries have been received, 13,000 applications have been received; 10 times the rate of any other program.

The other thing that I think is particularly important is to recognize that what has happened in the last 19 or 20 months is that this government has provided more funding assistance to assist business than has been provided in the last 25 years. If that is not results, if that is not commitment, if that is not progress, then, Madam Speaker, I do not know what is.

We have, as my hon. friend has said, seen 22 new co-operation agreements put in place. We have seen the federal government sitting down with the individual provinces and saying: "Okay, what is important to you is to develop in the longer term the economic base of your province, and how can we, as the federal government, with our money, with our knowledge, with our expertise, help you do that?"

We have seen 22 new co-operation agreements; $274 million, and there are more to come. That is one of the roles of ACOA in developing and providing that long term strategic approach—that hands-on at the table, what's the problem, how are we going to solve it, approach—to try to deal with economic development, job creation and expansion in the Atlantic provinces.

Seventy-five per cent of the approved projects of ACOA had a capital investment of less than $200,000; small projects, one or two people, six or seven people, maybe much larger but the government's participation was much less smaller, or that was what was asked for. Twenty-two per cent were from that level up to $2 million.

Two of the missions of the agency, two of the things that the agency is said to have to deal with, are co-ordination and advocacy. Unfortunately, you do not see that all the time. There are not press releases, there are not news clips. You do not see it every day as you walk down the street as sometimes you do with new plants and new jobs. I see it all the time in my dealings in Newfoundland and Labrador in how we come to deal with our problems. ACOA is at the table dealing with the challenges that we have in the short term and in the long term with our fish problem, in advice to the Clark committee, in active, strong participation with the Stein group. Hibernia and offshore oil development has the full participation of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. They are providing the big picture. They are providing the longer term view. They are providing the other side to economic development as opposed to just the immediate problem at hand.

The youth strategy is such a critical step to dealing with the long term problem that the young people in my province have had in getting from school to work. ACOA is playing a substantial role in how to make that happen, not only in providing advice, but in bringing together other departments of this government and of the province of Newfoundland and Labrador with the people dealing with the youth strategy and with the private sector. How can we deal with the problem together in the longer term? How, over time, can we attack the problem of young people not being suitably employed, young people not getting from school to work? What is the problem? How do we get through it? We see it in forestry.

I had the privilege of being at the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council meetings last week in Moncton where the new president of ACOA, Mr. Leseau, who has been referred to here today, is bringing a fresh approach. He recognizes clearly and stated before these people that we have a particular challenge and that ACOA has a role to play in developing a strategy. ACOA has a role to play in moving the Atlantic provinces ahead. That role that this motion calls for is very much there with the vice-presidents and with the people who work for them in each of the regions.

A number of my colleagues have been able to illustrate projects which have been very successful. There is one that I am very proud of and that is a project sponsored by the Newfoundland and Labrador Status of Women's Council under the direction of Anne Bell and the participation of people like Wendy Williams.

What we are doing through that program is saying, here is $800,000 plus—I think that is the right number—go out and hire people. They will hire six people to work as field workers. Women are badly under-represented in this economy and badly under-represented in the Newfoundland economy, and there is no question that they have a huge contribution to make, not just to women but to the whole economy and to the whole society. But women are not getting taken care of by the system. Their ideas and their innovations are being lost.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): With deep regret I must interrupt the hon. member. The time provided for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

ORDER IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), they are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet I move:

That the House do now proceed to Orders of the Day.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Mr. Nystrom: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You are aware that this morning at eleven o'clock I wanted to move concurrence in the finance committee report which criticizes the Bank of Canada for high interest rate policies in this country. By moving Orders of the Day the government has avoided a very serious debate on a very serious issue, on a day when there is great instability in the stock markets around the country. My point is—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am willing to hear the point of order, but I would not want any debate.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, by doing what it has done the government has shown contempt for members of this House and cowardice for members of this House.

It has prevented us from moving a motion on a serious issue, from presenting petitions to the House, from moving bills in the House of Commons, and from doing what we should be doing as serious minded members of Parliament. I suggest to you that that is contemptuous.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion moved by the government was in order.

SPEAKER'S RULING—MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There are 53 motions in amendment set down on the notice paper in relation to Bill C–21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act.

I have generally reviewed the motions, and I am prepared to make a preliminary ruling at this time so as to allow the House to commence report stage debate.

I will come back to the House later today to rule on the remaining motions.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14 are in order. They will be grouped for debate and voted on as follows:

(A) Since Motion No. 5 arises from Motion No. 4, a vote on Motion No. 4 will also apply to Motion No. 5.

[English]

B) An affirmative vote on Motion No. 6 would obviate the need to put the question on Motions Nos. 8 and 11, but a negative vote on Motion No. 6 will require putting the question on Motions Nos. 8 and 11.

[Translation]

(C) A vote on Motion No. 7 will also be applied to Motion No. 10.

(D) Motions Nos. 12, 13 and 14 will be voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 15, 16 and 18 will be grouped for debate, and a vote on Motion No. 15 will be applied to motions Nos. 16 and 18.

[English]

Motions Nos. 17 and 20 will be debated and voted on separately. I shall now put Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14 to the House, and as I said earlier I shall come back to the House to report on the remaining motions.

The Hon. Member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce on a point of order.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the first grouping of motions you have announced to the House, in other words Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, you have grouped together 10 motions for purposes of debate. I submit to you very seriously, Mr. Speaker, that just to read the content of those 10 motions would take up the 10 minutes of speaking time that we have under the report stage.

I would like to urge very seriously that grouping 10 motions together is too much and cannot be handled properly in a 10-minute speech.

I note that Motions Nos. 4 and 5 have to do with new entrants, whereas Motions Nos. 6 to 14 have to do with parental benefits, maternity benefits, and medical benefits. One could see some reason in grouping Motions Nos. 6 to 14, but I do not see the reason in grouping Motions Nos. 4 and 5 with these other motions.

In addition, as I pointed out, just to read into the record what is attempted by those 10 motions would take up the entire time allocated to members to speak at the report stage. I do not think that is acceptable. I would ask that you reconsider the grouping for the motions that are put together in this first grouping.

• (1150)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would like to remind the House that rulings of the Speaker are not debatable.

However consultations are still continuing in preparation for a final ruling, so what I have given already will stand for now.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn) moved:

Motion No. 4

That Bill C-21 be amended in Clause 5 by striking out lines 40 to 42 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) An insured person qualifies to receive benefits under"

Motion No. 5

That Bill C-21 be amended in Clause 5 by striking out lines 7 to 29 at page 4.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved:

Motion No. 6

That Bill C-21 be amended in Clause 9

(a) by striking out line 22 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"(3) Subject to subsection (7), the maximum number of weeks for"

(b) by striking out line 34 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"(4) Subject to subsection (7), the maximum number of weeks for"

(c) by striking out line 24 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"of benefit shall not exceed thirty.

(7) The maximum number of ten weeks specified in paragraphs (3)(b) and (4)(b) is extended to fifteen weeks where

(a) a child referred to in paragraph (3)(b) or (4)(b) is six months of age or older at the time of the child's arrival at the claimant's home or actual placement with the claimant for the purpose of adoption; and

(b) a medical practitioner or the agency that placed the child certifies that the child suffers from a physical, psychological or emotional condition that requires an additional period of parental care.".

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved:

Motion No. 7

That Bill C-21 be amended in Clause 9 by striking out line 31 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"fifteen; and"

[Translation]

Hon. Warren Allmand (for Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso)), moved:

Motion No. 8.

That Bill C-21 be amended in Clause 9 by striking out line 31 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"ten, except for adopted children placed with the claimant for the first time after the child is 6 months old, the maximum shall be extended from 10 weeks to 20 weeks, subject to certification by a provincial child welfare agency of physical and emotional needs requiring the parent to stay at home and"

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved:

Motion No. 10.

That Bill C-21 be amended in Clause 9 by striking out line 41 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"fifteen."

Hon. Warren Allmand (for Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso)), moved:

Motion No. 11

That Bill C-21 be amended in Clause 9 by striking out line 41 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"ten, except for adopted children placed with the claimant for the first time after the child is 6 months old, the maximum shall be extended from 10 weeks to 20 weeks, subject to certification by a provincial child welfare agency of physical and emotional needs requiring the parent to stay at home."

[English]

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn) moved:

Motion No. 12.

That Bill C–21 be amended in Clause 9 by striking out line 41 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"twenty–four."

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce) moved:

Motion No. 13

That Bill C–21 be amended in Clause 9 by striking out lines 3 and 4 at page 9.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn) moved:

Motion No. 14

That Bill C–21 be amended in Clause 9 by striking out lines 9 to 24 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"and (3)."

He said: Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to stand in the House this morning and oppose in the strongest of terms Bill C–21, an act to amend the unemployment insurance program in this great land of ours.

From the very beginning Bill C–21 has to be seen for what this government is doing. Whether we are talking about free trade, deregulation, VIA Rail, or the general sales tax, these programs put forth by this government are couched in the term the government has become so fond of using, that is, "good for Canada". None of those programs that the government has put forth can be construed as being good for Canada.

I would certainly suggest that Bill C–21 is one of the worst of a bad bunch of programs that the government is trying to foist upon the people of Canada. On that basis I move:

That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Hicks: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of an article that appeared in some Canadian newspapers, the implication being that I paid an employee to perform no work, I emphatically deny it.

Mr. Clifford: Mr. Speaker, over the weekend, the media carried stories suggesting that I had hired the offspring of a colleague but no actual work was done. I categorically deny this.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to bring to your attention that during the consideration of this bill in committee and again here in the House, amendments have been dealt with as to whether or not they go beyond the Royal Recommendation or do not go beyond the Royal Recommendation. In committee some of the proposed amendments were ruled out of order because they went beyond the Royal Recommendation, and I note in the bill before us that some of the amendments have the Royal Recommendations attached.

My point of order is the following: According to clause 51 of this bill, the government terminates its financial contribution to the unemployment insurance fund. Clause 51 of the bill repeals Section 118 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Section 118 of the Unemployment Insurance Act obliges the government to contribute to the fund for certain kinds of benefits, regionally extended benefits, fishermen benefits, et cetera.

By repealing Section 118, the government has, in effect, privatized the unemployment insurance fund. As a result of this legislation, the fund will be entirely contributed to by a compulsory check-off on workers and employers. All the moneys in the fund will be contributed in an obligatory fashion by workers and by employers, and no moneys will go into the fund out of general revenue as a result of clause 51 of this bill.

If that is the case, I do not see how we can refer to the Royal Recommendation which is necessary when you are about to spend moneys raised from the taxpayers of Canada in a general way from the general revenue fund. That is not the case here. No moneys will go into the unemployment insurance fund out of the general revenue fund or out of general taxation. What we are dealing with here from now on, if this bill is passed in its present form, is a fund which will be entirely contributed to by workers and employers in a compulsory fashion by a national check-off. That national check-off program was permitted by a constitutional amendment in 1940, following a Privy Council judgment which said a previous Unemployment Insurance Act was unconstitutional.

I want to submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is out of order in many respects. The consideration of amendments both in the House and in committee are out of order because reference has been made to the Royal Recommendation argument. I must say that some of the witnesses who appeared before the committee even raised objections stating that the government should not even amend the unemployment insurance system from now on because it is really a system which belongs to the workers and to the employers of Canada. The argument was made by several serious witnesses before the committee that the government could only amend the legislation with the consent of those who controlled the fund.

Before we discuss the various amendments to the bill, I would like you to consider this point of order with respect to the bill and to the changed nature of the unemployment insurance fund as a result of clause 51 which, in effect, privatizes unemployment insurance in Canada and which, by the way, this party very vigorously opposes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for his comments. There are two points. The first part deals with the fact that the bill itself would have been out of order because of the reason given by the hon. member.

The Chair feels that if that is the case, the motion made now by the hon. member is a bit late and should have been made at second reading stage.

With regard to his point concerning the grouping of the motions today, however, the Chair will take that into consideration and may hear the member further at three o'clock on that point.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, it is my assumption that you have ruled that the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce would speak next. The question is, did you recognize him for debate before the point of order?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think when we get to debate, the Chair will recognize a member, and at that time, whatever motions are appropriate. We are getting to the debate stage quite quickly. On debate, the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

Mr. Gauthier: A point of order, is he recognized—

Mr. Allmand: Would you mind your own business? I have been around here for a few years. I know what to do.

I believe I have been recognized for debate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair did, in fact, recognize the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce for debate, but I have a point of order from the member for Churchill.

Mr. Murphy: I move:

That the member for Mission—Coquitlam be now heard.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I would normally not want to bring this to the attention of the Chair, but once the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce was recognized, he distinctly said, "I have been around here for a few years". This was heard by everybody on our side and even by the Whip, and I think that indicates quite clearly that he started to speak to the motion. Therefore, the point of order of my friend from the New Democratic Party was late.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, on that same point, we all know the standing orders and how, once the Speaker has recognized a member, that member has the floor as soon as he speaks. I was trying to get the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce recognized, because I think he is the next speaker on our list, and that is why we agreed that I should shut up and he should speak. That is what happened, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I have a slightly different version than that of the Whip of the Official Opposition. I clearly heard the member admonishing his Whip for interfering and wanting to get on with the debate.

Mr. Murphy: But he did not start.

Mr. Angus: But he did not start.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair does find the motion by the hon. member for Churchill to be in order.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to finally speak on this bill. I want to thank the hon. members for the lesson that has taken place in the last 10 minutes on parliamentary procedure. I am sure it will serve me well in the future.

I would like to address myself to this convoluted collection of amendments and to try in some kind of rational way to address the many, many things I am not going to be able to address in 10 minutes but that we must address, Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14. This is a very serious piece of legislation that is going to affect Canadians from coast to coast, from the Arctic circle to the 49th parallel, and we are having it compressed into a debate on one motion.

First, I would like to talk about the establishment of a new benefits structure. It is an establishment that replaces the three phase system now in place. The new maximum duration of benefits will be based on the weeks of work and the regional unemployment rate determined in accordance with table 2, et cetera, that is attached to the bill.

The extent of the cuts do not look like much, and hon. members from the other side would have Canadians believe that the primary intent of these amendments is to have Canadians go through some form of behavior modification, to use a term used considerably during the hearings. Behaviour modification is a 1984 Orwellian attitude that has no place in the Canada of today.

To suggest that Canadian workers need to have their behaviour modified; that Canadian workers are not diligent; that Canadian workers are not interested in working, is the cruelest, most despicable kind of PR that this country can do on behalf of its workers. To suggest that Canadians in areas of this country that have unemployment rates of 20, 30 or 40 per cent in some industries, could have their behaviour modified by requiring that they work an extra week or two weeks or three weeks before they are eligible for unemployment insurance, is the most cynical, despicable kind of attitude that I think we can muster for Canadian workers.

I thought that this House was the place where we had the opportunity to make people aware of what the government's plans were for the people. Canadian workers must be made aware of the kind of changes that these amendments to Bill C–21 will make to their lives, not to a piece of legislation that is mouldering in some library somewhere, not just to the regulation books in an unemployment insurance office. These amendments throughout Bill C–21 are going to have a direct and dramatic impact on the lives of hundreds and thousands of Canadian workers.

To suggest that those workers are going to be served—and that is another term that was used a number of times by the hon. members from the other side of the House in committee—is also an insidious type of suggestion. To tell people that you are serving them while you are grabbing something from them suggests to me that maybe we should take into this House a dictionary every day when we come in here and we should be looking up the definition of "serve". We should be looking up the definition of "behaviour modification". We should be looking up the definition of "abusers", because this government would have Canadians believe that most people on UI abuse the system. Possibly if not this government, but certainly a number of the members who have travelled with us on the legislative committee continually inferred that we, Canadians workers, were abusing the system.

I think it might be something that the Speaker's office would consider, to have on the desk of each member a dictionary so that we can be very clear about what we are saying when we are talking to the people of Canada and for the people of Canada.

It is very, very important that we consider the dramatic impact of these amendments on men and women, in our communities and to the communities themselves. What happens when a worker finds himself or herself with unemployment insurance eligibility cut back? What happens to the community? That worker, no longer eligible for the insurance program that he or she has paid for possibly for years and years of will often find himself and his family on the welfare system. Depending on the province, that will have a direct impact on the municipality or on the province.

The fact is that it has an impact. That impact trickles down to the community in every way. It trickles down to the small business people. It trickles down to the expenses of the municipality. It impacts on the school system. It impacts on the voluntary and social services communities.

I suggest that those kind of impacts have not been explained to the Canadian people. Those impacts have not been explained to the municipalities in Canada. Those impacts have not been discussed appropriately with the provinces.

I would suggest that some of the very serious amendments that we have put forward about the ability to bond for adoptive parents, amendments that would put this legislation in keeping with provincial legislation that requires adoptive parents to spend a certain period of time upon adoption with the child before returning to work, amendments that are not being heard, are the kinds of amendments that we should have. If we must live with this cynical, mean–spirited, cruel legislation, at least we could be concerned about the children that this legislation affects in the adoptive process.

The suggestion that we have one standard in terms of the bonding period for natural parents and a different standard for adoptive parents is something that I find very difficult to understand. We introduced an amendment which was ruled out of order because it somehow escaped the parameters of the legislation. I know I cannot question the ruling of the Speaker on that but I would at some later time like to seek an explanation because I do not understand how that goes beyond the parameters of this existing legislation.

The suggestion has been made that this unemployment insurance program is good for Canada at a time when, as a result of the free trade agreement, Canadians in various industries and sectors of this country are finding themselves faced with announcements of lay–offs. We see ourselves facing in the workplaces the uncertainty and the anguish that workers are facing. The suggestion that this legislation is good for Canada, and the hon. member for Saskatoon–Dundurn started on that line of thinking earlier today, also defies one's imagination.

If one were to take a look at the numbers of people who are facing unemployment, if one were to take a look at the impact of the free trade agreement, if one were to take a look and go to talk to the workers who are facing lay-off with VIA Rail, if one were to go to take a look at the workers who are facing lay-offs because of mergers in the airline industry, if one were to take a look and go to talk to the workers from General Motors who have received announcements of layoffs, if one were to go to speak to women in industries that are now moving to the south including high-tech industries, computer-related industries, it would be very, very difficult for anybody in this Chamber to agree after hearing those people that this legislation is good for Canada.

We heard over 200 presentations almost entirely opposing some part or all of this proposed legislation. Yet, at the end of the day, one hon. member from the other side of the House said that that was because our friends did not come before us. When we had business associations, when we had major corporations, when we had groups that represent employers across the country and sectors across the country appear before the committee to oppose the legislation, to suggest that the government's friends did not appear before it is quite silly.

I would like to say, in closing, that it is incumbent upon this House to do everything it can to ensure that every clause of this legislation is debated adequately.

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

SPORT

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, after Maurice Richard and Gordie Howe, today we have the great Wayne Gretzky. Last night in Edmonton, with 53 seconds to play in the third period, he scored and passed Gordie Howe's total of 1850 points. He added a second goal in overtime, giving the Los Angeles Kings a 5-4 win over the Edmonton Oilers.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out this great day to all Canadians. Wayne Gretzky is an example for our youth. Bravo, Wayne!

WORLD FOOD DAY

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, today is World Food Day, a day to remind us that all people everywhere have a basic right to sufficient food to sustain healthy, productive lives.

Each year our world loses 11 million hectares of forest and 25 billion tonnes of topsoil through wanton, destructive ecological practices. Each year vast tracts of the world's productive land become desert. In Canada every year we lose thousands of hectares of our scarce agricultural land through soil erosion, salination, and urbanization.

Current policies of the government discourage family farming, national agricultural self-sufficiency, and the production of food for Canadians.

World Food Day also reminds us of the thousands of hungry Canadians who are receiving totally inadequate support from this government. These Canadians, most of them children, are not lazy; they are hungry. Food banks are flourishing. All of this represents a totally unacceptable way to feed poor and hungry Canadians.

In Canada there are one million people living below the poverty line. They have inadequate food. There are daily too many Canadian farmers unable to continue farming because of this government's defective agricultural policies. Before it is too late, may I remind this government of the woman who 200 years ago ignored her country's poor and declared: "Let them eat cake".

HOCKEY

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, hockey is a Canadian game. Gordie Howe and Wayne Gretzky hold a very special place in the hearts of all Canadians. Last night in Edmonton, the great one did it. No. 99, Gretzky, became the National Hockey League's leading career scorer. He surpassed Howe's 1850 points for goals and assists.

Wayne tied the record in the first period, beat the record in the third period, and in overtime he scored the winning goal. He now has a total of 1852 points. That is teamwork.

Congratulations, Wayne. We wish you continuing success.

WORLD FOOD DAY

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, today marks the ninth annual World Food Day. This year's theme is "Food and Our Environment". The threat to food security is an increasing problem. The need to inform Canadians about global issues is now greater than ever. It is reported that the world produces enough food to feed all the people on the planet. We in Canada contribute substantially to the world's pantry, yet we hear almost daily stories of starvation and malnutrition. The problems relate to environmental degradation and food distribution.

The World Commission on Environment and Development has warned that without strong actions to redress inequalities in the distribution of the world's resources and the persistent abuse of the environment our very existence is in peril.

What is needed is an attitudinal change of dramatic proportions. This government's response to that challenge has been to reduce the amount of aid we give to tackle these issues. The last budget cut multilateral food aid by $32 million and bilateral food aid by $24.4 million.

Rhetoric will not feed the hungry of the world. It is time this government recognizes that Canada has the responsibility to play a lead in addressing the problems of food and our environment.

NATIONAL UNIVERSITIES WEEK

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, National Universities Week is October 14 to October 22. I would therefore remind members of the enormous contribution made to our country by universities.

Universities in Canada have a tradition that goes back more than 200 years before Confederation. They are a rich, democratic and accessible resource devoted to the pursuit of knowledge in all fields, to the challenging of old beliefs and to the exploring of new.

Universities are devoted to developing our leaders of tomorrow. They play a vital role in preserving our culture and heritage and researching social and ethical concerns.

Medical, scientific, engineering, educational and other research have enhanced our lives, our industry, our international reputation, our future and that of the world.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the premature advertising of the goods and services tax is not the first time this government and its officials have usurped the right of Parliament and assumed that whatever the government wants the government will get.

In 1985 an official of the Department of Employment and Immigration took it upon himself to anticipate that Parliament would of course pass legislation to consider pension income as earned income, thereby disqualifying pensioners from receiving unemployment insurance. He wrongly advised a group of public servants who had been cajoled or coerced into taking early retirement not to bother applying for unemployment insurance because they did not qualify.

At that time the bill had not even been introduced in the House. The fact is that those retirees would have qualified for up to $16,000 in benefits each. Instead of correcting its errors the government has dragged these people through five years of court hearings.

I appeal to the minister to accept responsibility for this injustice and to provide the benefits to which these retirees were and are entitled.

CO-OPERATIVE MOVEMENT

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, this week is Co-op Week in Canada. I am pleased to rise and pay tribute to the co-operative movement.

"Together we make the difference" is the co-op theme. It reminds us that this country was built, not by dog-eat-dog competition but by working together. The pioneers of the co-op movement are grassroots men and women with the vision to realize that ordinary people can accomplish great things by pooling their resources and putting democracy into action.

Today 12 million Canadians are members of co-ops. We have the legacy of the Antigonish Movement, the Desjardins Movement, the Prairie Pools, Federated Co-ops and local initiatives from coast to coast in such areas as housing, health, financial, fishing, and worker co-ops. In this era when individuals and communities are increasingly losing the ability to control their own destinies through corporate globalization, free trade, and volatile money markets, co-ops make more sense than ever.

Therefore I call on this government to show some faith in grassroots Canada and to give the co-op movement at least as much support and encouragement as it gives its corporate buddies.

HOCKEY

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a truly exceptional athlete. On behalf of all Canadians I wish to extend congratulations to Wayne Gretzky on scoring point number 1851 last night in Edmonton's Northlands Coliseum, thus surpassing Gordie Howe as the NHL's all time point leader.

While the game of hockey has changed over the years Gordie Howe's all time point total, accumulated over an incredible 26-year career was a record that many believed would never fall. Yet last night it did. What makes this even more amazing is that it was done in just 11 seasons.

As one of Canada's greatest goodwill ambassadors Wayne Gretzky is a unique individual who has personified excellence and dedication to the sport of hockey. Last night's record breaking performance was quite an achievement in his illustrious career.

Even though he is now a Los Angeles King, Wayne continues to represent the sport of hockey and Canada in a dignified and sportsmanlike manner.

ATLANTIC CANADA DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, once again I would like to remind the House of a major project in Atlantic Canada which will have a profound impact on the economies of all the Atlantic provinces but especially upon the areas on either side of the Northumberland Strait. The fixed link to P.E.I. will add almost one billion dollars to the region during construction. It will create new industries and services affecting every corner of the maritimes.

After completion the fixed link will remove barriers between the three maritime provinces and encourage interprovincial trade. It will be one of Canada's major tourist attractions. This privately funded project will be the focus of Atlantic Canada and its potential. It will offset any negative impact from the reduction of CFB Summerside, and it will improve transportation throughout the region.

I urge the Minister of the Environment to ensure that the study now under way will be completed as soon as possible so that the next steps can be taken toward a successful conclusion.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, Elk Island recognizes the importances of the United Nations peacekeeping forces around the world.

Recently in Sherwood Park Alberta the Eric W. Cormack Branch No. 277 of the Royal Canadian Legion dedicated a specially designed wall to the United Nations peacekeepers. The ceremony included dignitaries and a great many military service personnel and was a tribute to the valuable contributions of Canadian soldiers, sailors and air crew in maintaining world peace.

On behalf of all of the people of Elk Island, I salute comrade President Don Crockett and all the members of his branch for their continuing commitment, hard work and dedication to the worthy cause of the Royal Canadian Legion, and I thank them for reminding us of our responsibility as Canadians in working for world peace.

FIREFIGHTERS

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, as a member of Parliament I deem it a privilege to present Fire Services Exemplary Service Medals on behalf of Her Excellency the Governor General.

The award is an extremely important form of recognition for Canadians who have made lengthy, essential and at times life threatening contributions to our communities.

Since the establishment of the award in 1985 the contribution of thousands of individual firefighters has been appropriately recognized. However, the current rules by which the award is made overlook a very important group of otherwise worthy and meritorious potential recipients; namely, those who would have qualified but retired from the fire service before the 1985 establishment date.

This is an injustice that should be rectified immediately even if it means retroactive recognition of some 2,000 or more individuals. I believe the cost to the Canadian taxpayer would be minimal in comparison with the contribution made, particularly by volunteers, to this vital community service.

URANIUM MINING

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of concerned citizens in Rankin Inlet, Arviat, Baker Lake, and Whale Cove in the Northwest Territories. Some 531 people in Rankin Inlet, 293 in Baker Lake, 187 in Arviat, and 72 in Whale Cove have signed petitions opposing the development of a uranium mine near the settlement of Baker Lake.

The petitioners are concerned about the protection of Inuit land, protection of the Inuit lifestyle, protection of the wildlife and renewable resources, and protection of the well-being of the residents of the area.

I urge the Government of Canada to recognize and consider the views of these petitioners who have asked me to bring their concerns to the attention of the House of Commons and in particular the government.

WORLD FOOD DAY

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Huron—Bruce): Mr. Speaker, today 158 member nations of the Food and Agriculture Organization join in an annual observance of World Food Day. It is an occasion to reflect on an unfinished task—the eradication of hunger and malnutrition and the attainment of genuine food security for all people. This year's theme is: "Food and the Environment".

In Canada, World Food Day activities are co-ordinated by a World Food Day Association, an umbrella organization which brings together 235 non-governmental organizations, producer associations, provincial and local governments and many others. The World Food Day Association has from its inception received funding and support from the Canadian International Development Agency and Agriculture Canada.

Agriculture Canada and CIDA also have a long tradition of providing assistance to those in greatest need in the form of food aid. Even in times of financial restraint, Canadians on a per capita basis continue to provide more food in the form of food aid than any other country.

Just last week, the Prime Minister announced a $42 million economic package for Poland and Hungary. That includes $12 million in much needed food aid for Poland.

Let me assure the House and all Canadians that our efforts to help eliminate hunger will continue. Our efforts to educate people about the problem will continue. Our commitment and support are firm.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members would rejoice with me in the freedom that has come to Walter Sisulu in South Africa and many other black prisoners in that country.

While we rejoice at their freedom we also wonder why, at this time when it is obvious that sanctions are having an effect on South Africa, the Canadian government and the Prime Minister in particular would be drawing back from their commitment to impose further sanctions if apartheid is not dismantled.

It is obvious that it is not the intention of the new government in South Africa to dismantle apartheid. It is obvious that it is time for the Prime Minister to live up to his commitment to do that and to impose comprehensive, mandatory economic sanctions on South Africa so that what little progress has been made can be increased.

This is not a time to back down from Margaret Thatcher at the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Kuala Lumpur. Mrs. Thatcher is increasingly becoming marginalized, is increasingly becoming a sort of an international joke who may have been powerful in the 1980s but will not be powerful in the 1990s. The Prime Minister should not become a joke himself by kowtowing to Mrs. Thatcher.

Let us have comprehensive sanctions now and let us bring the day of freedom for South Africa closer, faster.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to bring to the attention of the House that Freightliner, one of the United States major truck makers, will construct a $32 million plant in my riding. This plant will create 600 permanent jobs and is expected to have yearly sales of over $400 million.

Freightliner chose this location because the region's citizens are good workers. Mr. John Mosier, president of the Canadian company, stated that the decision of the parent company in Portland, Oregon to allow Canadian expansion "shows faith in the Canadian operation and how they do business".

The members opposite feared that the free trade agreement with the United States would result in Canadian companies pulling up roots and moving south. The decision by Freightliner demonstrates quite the opposite.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

FREE TRADE

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Recently, the prestigious National Planning Association of the United States published a report which said that the implementation of the free trade treaty could mean "a certain loss of autonomy in two important economic areas: monetary policy and taxation" for Canada.

I therefore ask the Deputy Prime Minister why the government negotiated a free trade agreement which would have such harmful results for Canada's economic independence. Why?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, if I understand the question properly, the hon. member is claiming that the trade agreement has these fiscal and social effects.

What we have seen so far is the following. We have seen tremendous job creation since January 1, under the agreement. We have seen tremendous new capital investment intentions, the highest really in history since they have kept records. There has been a 27 per cent increased capital expenditure in the manufacturing sector in the last six months as a result in part of the trade agreement.

More important, because of this wealth, because of this energy, social programs will be able to be maintained and strengthened in the future.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to draw the attention of the hon. minister to a recent report published by the prestigious National Planning Association of the United States. This report said that the free trade agreement will limit the autonomy of Canada in matters of fiscal and monetary policy. For example, it states:

> Increased capital market integration, as provided for in the FTA between the two countries, should increase the volume of such capital flows and therefore make Canada's exchange rate and trade account more vulnerable to shifts in U.S. monetary policy.

I ask the Minister: Will he not admit on behalf of his government that more and more, day after day, it is clear that the free trade agreement is and will be a disaster for Canada?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, a country's autonomy in terms of fiscal policy and monetary policy is a direct result of the wealth of the country and the productivity of its economy. Under this agreement we have seen enormous quantities of new investment to put in place new plant and equipment for building a stronger infrastructure in our economy in the future. That of course will lead to autonomy in terms of fiscal and monetary policy.

More important, this particular agreement, by locking in a mechanism whereby we can retaliate against American actions which are unfair in terms of trade in North America, gives us additional autonomy that we never had before.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West) Mr. Speaker, the Canadian public will be very surprised to hear the hon. minister's answer. They have been led to believe by the government that there would not be trade difficulties requiring retaliation if this deal went into effect.

• (1420)

I want to ask the minister, specifically when he referred to job creation figures, why he and the government will not provide figures showing specifically how many jobs are created by the trade deal and instead are hiding behind the general Statistics Canada figures which make no distinction between jobs created through the trade deal and jobs created generally.

Why will the minister not take the studies the government produced before the election, which gave specific numerical projections of jobs to be created sector by sector, update them and give us the facts? Why will the government not come clean with Canadians?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that an analysis of this subject takes a proper period to do. The Minister for International Trade made this clear to the standing committee last spring. That analysis should be done carefully.

In the meantime one can look to the future. How does one look to the future? One looks to investment in capital, investment in plant and equipment. It is up 13.6 per cent for business investment, over-all intentions; plus intentions are up 27 per cent in the manufacturing sector.

I know of no better example of the confidence that the business community and indeed the people of North America have in this agreement for Canada's economy than those particular figures.

TRADE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. I have here a copy of a release put out by the Prime Minister's office which states: "The Prime Minister announces growing global trade development strategy".

I also have here another release put out just about a year ago amidst the election by the Minister for International Trade which states: "Minister announces world market trade development strategy".

I also have another announcement made a few years ago by the other minister of trade called the "new national trade strategy".

Canadians would be interested to know, with all these different announcements for global, world, national trade strategies, what is the difference. Where does the difference lie? The programs announced in each of these releases are exactly the same. If anything the amount of money being announced is less than it was years ago because the expenditures have been reduced.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Why does the government keep recycling old announcements, old press releases, and old programs rather than begin addressing seriously the question of how we regain the markets we have lost over the last four years?

Was the Prime Minister's announcement in Singapore just another example of a Singapore sling?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to tell the hon. member that we have some news for him together with a reiteration of what this government has been saying for the past six months.

The important news is that under "Going Global" $65 million will be spent for trade promotion around the world, $15 million of it in the United States. The rest will be spent in the Pacific, Europe and other parts of the world. This is what globalization means. The government has made a commitment to it, and it was announced on Saturday by the Prime Minister.

Something else has been made clear, and I would add this is news for the hon. gentleman. The Pacific Asia Travel Association, the biggest association in the Pacific with 4,000 travel agents, will have its first meeting in the history of that organization in North America. Guess where they are having it, Mr. Speaker. They are having it in Canada in March.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make sure we have the statements by the minister correct. He said that they are announcing $65 million for new trade development promotion in the United States and Southeast Asia.

In 1985, under the national trade strategy the funding was $70 million. Now considering inflation that is about a 20 per cent reduction. In fact what the government is announcing is about a 20 or 30 per cent reduction in the amount of money going into trade promotion and development efforts in the burgeoning Asia markets.

Once again, I ask the government why is it cutting back, why is it reducing and slicing the ability of this country to trade abroad at a time when our export markets have fallen precipitously in the last eight months?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, we will have to confirm the hon. member's statistics. I think he is wrong. I think the important thing for him to understand is the quality of our programs.

If the hon. member takes a look at what this government is doing in terms of international trade, he will see that we have programs that never existed before that are going to help us to penetrate foreign markets. A prime example is the whole border states program. Another program is put in place to take exporters abroad to help them with the new harmonized tariff system.

A third program will allow buyers from abroad, the Pacific, Europe, and the United States, to come to Canada and be matched up with our international trade centres. None of this existed before. These are qualitative improvements in our over-all trade strategy.

[Translation]

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

According to a study prepared by the State of Pennsylvania, and I quote:

[English]

"Canadian firms are finding it easier to locate in the United States where the consumer market is some 10 times larger than her own and export back to Canada".

[Translation]

Will the minister finally acknowledge today that the loss of 60,000 jobs as a result of plant closings and production restructuring was caused by the Free Trade agreement? And could he explain why the United States is able to use the FTA to attract Canadian companies?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member to realize that 30 per cent of automotive production in North America is done out of Canada. Our population warrants 10 per cent and we are producing three times that.

In addition there are announcements every day in terms of this sector of new plants, equipment and expansions in Canada which are considerable.

As announced by the hon. member for Elgin, Freightliner will create 500 new jobs. It is a truck manufacturing firm in southwestern Ontario. I have here a quotation which states: "Hughes Aircraft expands in Canada". They see 500 new jobs. I have a quotation here from Honda Canada's president.

Some Hon. Members: What about GM?

Mr. Hockin: GM spent $8 billion in the 1980s. "Honda Canada's president endorsed the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement", it says here in the Calgary Sun, "while he was in the city to open Calgary Honda yesterday. Free trade is not new for us. Every country should have free trade", he said.

Mr. Samson: Mr. Speaker, let us talk about recent announcements. Let us talk about General Motors.

On Friday 2,500 Canadians who worked for the Scarborough GM plant found out, like 60,000 other Canadians, that their employer thought it was time to close down or rationalize production in the U.S. There is no doubt, however, the auto and auto parts industry is one the state of Pennsylvania has decided to target in its rifle shot strategy to lure production out of Canada.

After giving in to the United States on Canadian content, conceding any right to extract guarantees from firms locating investments in Canada, and refusing to give Canadian firms any further assistance in export promotion, can the minister tell Canadians precisely what he is doing to ensure that firms like Hyundai, which Canada has paid to come here, will maintain production in this country rather than shift their plants and sourcing to U.S. producers?

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, before I respond on the automotive dimension of this, the hon. member is from northern Ontario and I think he would be very interested to know that last week the government under the FEDNOR program announced the establishment of Mirolin Industries in North Bay, a bathroom fixtures manufacturing operation. There are 319 jobs going there because of the strength of northern Ontario and because of the trade agreement.

The hon. member also knows that with the restructuring of GM in North America two things are happening. First of all, they are taking a look at their Scarborough van plant to see if it could be put to an alternative use. They have not announced its closure. They are studying to what uses it could be put. Even more important, Mr. Speaker, important GM facilities which have been based at Van Nuys, California are moving to—guess where—Canada.

WEST COAST FISHERY

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The west coast fishing industry lost an important round when a month ago the free trade panel ruled against us with respect to the landing requirements for west coast salmon and herring.

The government has had a month. The final report is going to be released tomorrow. In anticipation of a similar ruling, does the government have contingency plans to deal with preserving the fishing industry in British Columbia, the 8,000 jobs, the protection of the resource, and the production of the industry?

• (1430)

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has rightly pointed out, the government will be releasing the free trade panel response to the GATT decision. I think it would be appropriate if we waited to see what it says.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, on October 4, the Minister of Transport announced that this government will cut passenger rail service in this country by 51 per cent.

Some Hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Comuzzi: Since then, this government has tried to justify this position. As we all know, it is unjustifiable. In fact, the Prime Minister said in this House that the government was not going to destroy VIA Rail. On the contrary, it was going to save it.

The Prime Minister told Singapore businessmen yesterday that Canada was trying to get rid of VIA Rail. When he realized what he had said, he immediately changed the subject.

Why does the Prime Minister say one thing in Canada and say something else in Singapore? Why doesn't he come clean with the Canadian people and tell the truth?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my friend won't have any objection to my quoting all what the Prime Minister said, not just the part which the member used.

The Prime Minister said, "We are not trying to get rid—" But he said, "We actually have a 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax. We are the only industrialized country in the world that penalizes manufacturers, so we have to scrap the tax". He was not talking about VIA Rail, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Comuzzi: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I thought my question had to do with VIA Rail. I wasn't talking about the sales tax.

The Prime Minister told Singapore businessmen yesterday that he was trying to get rid of VIA Rail. We know that from the remarks that were made. Why does this government not have the honesty to say to the people of Canada what the Prime Minister said abroad yesterday?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister in the last two weeks has said many times in the House of Commons that he wanted to keep VIA Rail. Moreover, he said that we want to keep a national network. It is also what we announced. The Prime Minister was here all the time when answering questions about VIA Rail. At no time did he say that he wanted to get rid of VIA Rail. He said he wanted to keep VIA Rail, but a national, sustainable and an affordable network.

CONNAUGHT BIOSCIENCES

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Industry, Science and Technology. It concerns the government's attempt to finally recognize for Canadians the importance of Canadian-made scientific research and development. On Friday he finally recognized that the proposed takeover of Connaught BioSciences by Institut Mérieux of France would not be of net benefit to Canada.

Why did the minister still give the company another 30 days to try to improve its bid? Why is the minister the only one who cannot recognize the fact that under no circumstances would it be in Canada's interest to have this company taken over by a foreign company?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, as provided under the law, I issued a statement indicating the current bid by Institut Mérieux for Connaught did not meet the test of being a net benefit to Canada. I followed the law. I will continue to follow the law in terms of what is required for reviewing any takeover of any company of any sort and will ensure it is of net benefit to Canada before Investment Canada approves it.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, the government should know that if this takeover is approved, the Canadian people will know that both Investment Canada and the government's rhetoric are jokes.

[Translation]

The minister knows perfectly well that the French government would never allow a takeover of Institut Mérieux by Connaught.

Why is the Canadian Government doing nothing to prevent a takeover of Connaught by Mérieux?

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member without knowing the details of Connaught's operations, without giving any consideration to the nature of the vaccine, biotechnology and biosciences business world-wide, without recognizing the mergers of pharmaceutical companies that are going on around the world, without giving recognition to the advice of consultants and so on has said that we should not look at any of the evidence, we should not look at any bid that we should close our minds and make a decision before we review the facts. A closed mind decision may be appropriate for the hon. member. It is not for this government.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. This morning's Toronto Star says as follows: "In an embarrassing slip of the tongue, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney told Singapore businessmen yesterday Canada was 'trying to get rid of VIA Rail'. Then Mulroney caught himself. Glancing at the travelling Canadian press corps he changed the subject.

The question I have for the Minister of Transport: Which is it, is the Prime Minister out to save VIA Rail or is he out to get rid of it?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I said before. I said that the Prime Minister has been here for two weeks. All the time we were talking about VIA Rail. He answered many questions in terms of maintaining a national service across Canada.

Once again, I disagree with the interpretation given of what the Prime Minister was talking about. He was talking about sales tax which is not the same as VIA Rail cuts.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, throughout the whole debate on VIA Rail, we have been hearing one thing at one time and another thing at another time from this government.

Last night on The Nation's Business the Minister of Transport said that he had instructed management at VIA Rail to deal with laid off VIA employees generously. This weekend we learn that this government intends to weasel out of its contractual obligations of VIA employees. Is this the government's idea of generosity or will the minister stand in the House today and give a commitment, not only to this House and to the people of Canada but to VIA Rail employees who will be laid off, that this government will instruct VIA Rail to adhere to the contractual obligations in the collective agreement that deal with permanent lay-offs of these employees in a positive way? Will he do that?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, if my friend remembers, because he was at my press conference, it is exactly what I said in my statement of October 4. I repeat. I said the government has asked VIA Rail to respect the collective agreement which has been signed with the unions. It will be done. I always said that from the first day that the collective agreement had been signed with VIA Rail that it would, of course, be respected.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Some time ago, an assessment review panel was appointed to assess the environmental impact of the fixed link to P.E.I. Considering that many people in my area of Atlantic Canada are convinced that the fixed link to P. E. I. will have a dramatic positive impact on the economy of all Atlantic Canada, especially those areas of the Northumberland Strait, can the minister tell me whether the assessment review panel is in operation? If it is in operation, does it have any conclusions? If it has no conclusions, when can we expect some?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the assessment review panel has been set up since last April. In May we were provided with a bridge concept assessment by Public Works Canada. In June, the panel held public meetings. In August, the panel requested more information from Public Works. They will get this information and we expect a report from the panel to be filed before next April.

JUSTICE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Immigration. A promising young reformist politician was murdered in the Philippines in 1986 four days after the presidential election. Rodolfo Pacificador is wanted for the murder. Yet this government has refused to deport him. Instead he has been released on bond. He has been given a working permit. Now he walks the streets of Toronto. He is a true fugitive from justice.

Meanwhile, the request of the Philippine government and the Philippine community in Canada to have him sent home to face trial has been unanswered. Why is this government, which deals quickly and harshly with penniless refugees, taking so long to decide whether a wealthy man is to be deported or not for murder? Is this not tantamount to a double standard? When can we expect a definitive answer?

• (1440)

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, let me say that this is one of those cases that, because of the privacy provisions, I am unable to discuss in the chamber today.

I recognize the sensitivity of these issues for people with concerns around regimes that we as a government and as Canadians never supported. Let me say as well that we are not in any way harsh with refugees. Quite the reverse. Our humanitarian approach to refugees is still among the most welcoming in the world. I know there have been occasions when I have worked with the hon. member on some of these cases and I think he knows we do a good job.

Mr. Pagtakhan: My supplementary is for the same minister, Mr. Speaker.

When the new refugee system was put in place the minister promised that the government would have a faster track process to deal precisely with this sort of thing. But what is going on here? An accused murderer is walking the streets in Canada freely.

If the new system is so good, why does it take years to bring an accused murderer to justice?.

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would agree that one of the reasons that people like to come to this country is because we have a system where the law applies to everybody in the same way. If there is due process under way then that process must be allowed to continue.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. As he will be aware, the Minister of Fisheries has refused again and again to say whether there will be a special assistance program for fishermen or plant workers whose lives have been devastated by the fish quota cuts in the Newfoundland inshore fishery alone. There will be 2,500 workers who will not qualify for UI this winter because of the drastic fishery.

Would the minister now admit that it is the government's shilly-shallying which is putting thousands of workers in Newfoundland and Atlantic Canada on the welfare roles? Is he willing to undertake to light a fire under the Minister of Fisheries to bring in a special assistance program without any further foot-dragging?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have been working with the Province of Newfoundland on the current situation in the fishery in Newfoundland. We have now received the advice of the provincial government, which has been working very closely with our officials. I expect that we would have an answer shortly on the situation with regard to the fishery. We are working as quickly as we can on this because we recognize its importance.

Mr. Simmons: I thank the minister for her response, Mr. Speaker. I had intended to put a supplementary to her which I shall.

As she will know, like the cliché the proverbial round peg in the square hole or vice versa, whichever you like, the minister, I submit, with the new job creation regulations which are designed for Canadians in urban areas is forcing many thousands of fisheries workers who want to qualify for these programs on to welfare roles depriving them of a reasonable opportunity to get some income on standard make-work projects.

Would the minister indicate to the House that she recognizes that the job training requirements are not working in rural Canada, certainly not in rural Newfoundland, and would she undertake to bring in a program to cater to the particular needs of rural Newfoundlanders in this respect?

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to admit any such thing because it is simply not true.

Where there is high unemployment, as the hon. member knows, there are no changes or very minimal changes in the unemployment insurance system. The whole role of economic development and training go together. If we are going to develop the economy on a small or large scale, then we need trained people. The two have to go together, and we are working very hard on that. It has had success in areas of Newfoundland just as in other parts of Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, three weeks ago the chair of the Finance Committee referred to seniors as being too old to need to spend money. Two weeks ago he said that Albertans were out to lunch on the issue of GST and suggested that they needed a grade five teacher to educate them.

This weekend our venerable "chair" remarked that business people who object to the proposed goods and services tax must be lacking in education and in competence. I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether these comments about a wide variety of groups and interests in Canada indicate that this government is prepared only to insult those who oppose the GST rather than to listen to them.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to make quite clear that the way the hon. member has expressed the question is not correct. The hon. member to whom he has just referred is not speaking on behalf of the government.

We have indicated on many occasions that we want to listen to as many views as possible on the goods and services tax. One of the ways that we will be listening to those views is through the auspices of the Finance Committee. Other ways we are listening is through our own members of Parliament as well as through opposition members of Parliament and directly through representations that are made to the government.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The recent remarks about business people dismissed the valuable study and research that has been done by the small business community and organizations such as the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and the Canadian Organization of Small Business. Can the finance minister assure this House that the concerns of the small business community in Canada will not be dismissed and that the government will accept the recommendation of the small business community and scrap this proposed tax?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the specific answer to that question is, no, that is not our intent. We have indicated that we listen to the small business community, its representatives and to all people who have a view that they want to express on the structure of this tax.

I think one thing that comes through very, very clearly and all the things that have been said about the goods and services tax is that we must make a move from the existing federal sales tax. The existing federal sales tax as was agreed, in two reports by the finance committee of the House of Commons, must go and the best option that we can look to is the goods and services tax.

We are now in the course of committee hearings and other forms of consultation to see whether there are ways of fine tuning this to make sure that we get the best sales tax system in the world today.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Small business in Elk Island and in other parts of Alberta is concerned about changing the federal sales tax. Small business people say the old way was simpler. Why should small business support the GST?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I say to my hon. colleague how could the old way, the manufacturers' sales tax way possibly be simpler? We have 22,000 different tax treatments of 75,000 different manufacturers' goods. Twenty-two thousand different treatments.

Under the new tax, as the member knows, under the small traders' exemption, we will be exempting over half a million small businesses. Those that will be filing a remittance will be able to do so now—the vast majority of them—on one page rather than on dozens of pages under the manufacturers' sales tax.

Third, the cash flow is much better for small business under this than it is under the manufacturers' sales tax. You can get your credit back on your inputs before you sell your inventory—a tremendous improvement on the former tax—plus we have an administration rebate and we have a generous capital cost allowance for new equipment. Small business is better off under the GST than it ever was under the MST.

GANDER AIR CRASH

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and it concerns the Gander air crash of December 12, 1985.

For four years, members of Parliament have been asking questions on this issue and for four years the government has been telling us that there is not a shred of evidence of any terrorist involvement or anything like that.

• (1450)

For four years the government has been telling us that there was nothing untoward and that it was invisible ice on the wings that caused the Gander air crash.

Why is it that we were not told until an hour ago that CSIS had conducted an investigation into the Gander aircrash years ago? Why were we not told this in the House of Commons? What does the government have to hide on this issue?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I said last Friday about Gander's crash that the government has done all that it needed to do about that crash. In fact, we did more. We asked a former member of the Supreme Court of Canada, Mr. Justice Estey, to conduct an investigation to see if we would have to have another inquiry on Gander. His decision has been very clear at that level.

Mr. Boudria: It wasn't ice on the wings. You are right.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): The member should look at the report by the judge another time. He did not understand it the first time, I believe. I think if you look at the report correctly, you will see what Judge Estey said. He said that it is likely that we will never know exactly what was the cause of the accident. But he said particularly that it is useless to have another inquiry. For that reason he recommended to me and the government to close the file, which is exactly what I did, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, first of all, Judge Estey informed the Government that the crash was not caused by icing on the wings. That is my first point. Second, I want to ask the Minister of Transport or the Deputy Prime Minister why the House was not informed that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service had investigated this matter. Why were we never given that information? I would also like to know whether Judge Estey was aware of this investigation.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, once again, all the facts, all documents and all the necessary information were submitted to a person who has a very high degree of credibility in this country. Perhaps the Hon. Member will agree that we can trust Judge Estey when he says in his recommendation to the Government that since there was no way to determine the exact cause of the accident, he did not see any need for a new inquiry that would reach the same conclusions. We therefore accepted the report, the case was closed, and we do not intend to reopen the Gander case, for very obvious reasons.

[English]

CANADIAN SIKH COMMUNITY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Deputy Prime Minister concerning the integrity of the Canadian Sikh community. Last June 22, I asked a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning the new book, Soft Target, which alleged that a special CSIS report was provided to the Secretary of State for External Affairs which alleges that Indian diplomats were subverting Canadians of Sikh ancestry in this country. No answers to date have been provided.

Given that this community has had to resort to an open public letter to the Prime Minister in order to get some answers and some justice, I would like the Deputy Prime Minister to inform the House and all Canadians about the facts surrounding this report. If, in fact, this report is in existence, how can this government have condoned the undermining of Canadian citizenship and its full rights by a foreign government in Canada and what action does this government plan to take against this foreign government?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this question has been raised in the House before. It has been responded to by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Of course, the Government of Canada is concerned about these sorts of activities and is very interested in pursuing them.

The Government of Canada does investigate these kinds of issues and they are dealt with in the appropriate manner. I regret that I cannot go beyond that at this time, but if there is any further information on this particular file, I would be pleased to look into it and get back to the hon. member.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the Deputy Prime Minister, the problem is that this House, Canadians, and the Canadian Sikh community have had no information. Therefore, the information that the community has is somehow that the government is either hiding something or not listening to Canadian citizens in this country. That is why the question was posed last June and that is why the question was posed again today.

AIR INDIA CRASH

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is again for the Deputy Prime Minister and it concerns another area of difficulty deeply felt by Canadians of Sikh ancestry.

Since the terrible tragedy of the Air India crash four years ago the government has not seen fit to grant a full public investigation into why and how this disaster occurred. I ask the minister since two special investigations have been initiated in both the Gander and Air Ontario tragedies, why is it that the government steadfastly refuses to conduct a similar public investigation into an accident which is historic and which claimed the lives of over 300 Canadians probably and certainly through the act of sabotage. Why apply a different set of criteria and a different set of standards, vis-a-vis Air India?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asks me why we apply a different set of standards and criteria. The fact is that the two cases are quite different. In the case of Air India, the police investigation is still ongoing. Second, there are attempts to extradite certain suspects in connection with that police investigation.

Surely the hon. member would not want the Government of Canada, or anyone else, to take action that may very well impede the investigation process.

CORPORATE MERGERS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It concerns the activity on the TSE and other stock markets around the country, the jitters that are still there and the tremendous drop on Friday across the continent.

One of the reasons for the drop was a lot of activity in the stock market in the United States and Canada in the last year because of takeovers and corporate mergers and tremendous corporate debts. I know the Minister of Finance does not listen to the chairman of the finance committee. I had a chance to do some reading over the weekend and one of the books I looked at was Where I Stand. The author is a guy named Brian Mulroney.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: Will the Minister of Finance say whether or not he agrees with the Prime Minister who on page 52 of his book says:

> The government should eliminate the interest deductibility provision on non-productive corporate takeovers in Canada to ensure that large pools of capital are not diverted to useless empire building—

Mr. Speaker: I am having some difficulty in finding how that question is directly related to the administration of government. However, the minister may want to deal with it.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me comment first on the general premise. There has been a good deal more activity in the United States on takeovers, leverage buyouts and things related than has been the case in Canada. I do not think we have nearly the same problem here as there has been in the United States.

Having said that, I always listen carefully to what the Prime Minister says, as I listen to what the hon. member has to say. This particular issue is a very difficult one. I think that he and I would probably agree that unproductive takeovers are things that we would like to do without. The difficulty is in trying to define what an unproductive takeover is. That is why we have not been able to do anything to address the particular problem.

FOOD BANKS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a question on another difficult matter for the Minister of Finance. The Vancouver food bank provides 3,200 bags of food weekly; Edmonton's food bank feeds 11,000 people each month; Regina's food bank provides 5,500 meals, 6,000 boxes of food a month and Toronto's food bank feeds 84,000 people a week. A Montreal study shows that one in five kids are hungry. Food banks in Canada are becoming institutionalized.

Is the minister planning to wait until food banks in Canada bar their doors to force this government to act, or is the government going to provide adequate financial support for Canada's hungry?

• (1500)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, during the course of the last five years we have demonstrated a very clear commitment to addressing the problems of those in lower income brackets. Let me just enumerate some of these matters. We have increased the size of the child tax credit quite significantly from what it was in 1984. We were the first government to bring in the refundable sales tax credit. That sales tax credit has been increased on two occasions since its introduction in 1986.

We also, through income tax reform in 1988, made changes that resulted in 850,000 low income Canadians being put in a position where they would not have to pay tax, from a position where they were paying tax. So, in each of these three areas we have been addressing the problems of those in low income brackets.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will know that some discussions have taken place. By consent of the House, I am instructed that the House is prepared to hear the Hon. Minister of Transport on a very unfortunate and unhappy matter. I will hear appropriate comments from the opposition as well.

DISASTERS

EAST COAST MARINE TRAGEDY

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is to my great sorrow that I wish to inform the House of the marine tragedy that occurred yesterday in the waters of the Atlantic, a few kilometres north of St. John's, Newfoundland.

This tragedy took place during a search and rescue operation conducted by the Canadian Coast Guard ship, Sir Wilfrid Grenfell. This ship was called to Middle Cove on the report of the Royal Newfoundland Constabulary that three divers there were urgently in need of assistance.

[Translation]

Upon arriving on the scene, the Sir Wilfred Grenfell launched two fast rescue craft. By then, two of the divers had managed to make it to shore on their own. One of the craft had just recovered the third diver when it was hit by a large wave and capsized, losing all occupants. The second craft immediately attempted rescue, but no trace of the four men could be found.

[English]

I regret that thus, four men were lost at sea; the diver, Leonard Caul, and the Coast Guard crew; Gregory Peddle, Officer in Charge; First Seaman Raymond Welcher, and Engineer Pierre Gallien. Their deaths bring to four the number of Canadian Coast Guard members who have lost their lives at sea in service in 1989.

It was on January 20 that Tom Shelby, of the Coast Guard western region, lost his life while going to the assistance of a tugboat in distress near Port Hardy.

I am sure that all members of this House will wish to join me in extending our condolences to the families of the victims of these tragic accidents. We salute their bravery and dedication.

Their loss is tragic, Mr. Speaker. I believe all members would agree that they shall be remembered as heroes both personally and as representatives of the thousands of men and women across this country who place their lives in peril to save the lives of others. Their daily bravery is testimony to the finest and noblest aspects of the human character.

We are indebted to these men and their colleagues in the Coast Guard and indeed, we are indebted to all of their fellow Canadians who serve in the dangerous professions, for it is the selfless courage of these thousands that provides hope and security to us all.

[Translation]

I am sure that all members of this House will join me in extending our condolences to the families of these victims. We salute their bravery and dedication. Mr. Speaker, we are indebted to these men and their colleagues in the Coast Guard; and indeed we are indebted to all of their fellow Canadians who serve in the dangerous professions, for it is the selfless courage of these thousands that provides hope and security to us all.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a sad note in response to comments made by the Minister of Transport, to relate to the House two tragic incidents that occurred in Newfoundland over the weekend.

The first occurred late last week in the small community of Jamestown, in Bonavista Bay in my riding, where three men tragically lost their lives when they drowned in a motor vehicle that was claimed by the sea.

Yesterday in the community of Middle Cove, just outside of St. John's, in a combined diving accident and search and rescue attempt, a diver and three members of the ship's company of the Canadian Coast Guard vessel Sir Wilfrid Grenfell were also claimed. This is once again a grim reminder of the rigours and the dangers of the ocean that are faced by Canadians who go down to the sea in ships, and equally by those who live by the sea.

I am sure I am joined by my colleagues on both sides of the House in extending our deepest sympathy to the bereaved families and in recognizing the incredible feat of courage involved.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with the Minister of Transport and the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception in expressing my party's thoughts on this weekend's tragedy.

First I wish to extend our condolences to the family, friends and co-workers of the three Coast Guard employees, Gregory Peddle, Raymond Welcher and Pierre Gallien who perished this weekend, as well as Tom Shelby from the western region who died in January of this year.

I also want to express our condolences to the family of the diver, Leonard Caul, who perished as well.

Second, I want to pay tribute to these four men from the Coast Guard and countless others in the employ of the Government of Canada who regularly put their lives on the line in order to protect others. Search and rescue is a dangerous and sometimes deadly occupation. Yet these men and women risk their lives on an ongoing basis in order to save others from injury and death.

The same can also be said of the airborne search and rescue teams, both military and civilian, who log thousands of hours in search of lost aircraft.

They all make an extremely important contribution to this country, Mr. Speaker. In paying respect to these heroes of the Canadian Coast Guard, we are also saying thank you to them and their families for their sacrifice on all our behalf.

I believe it would be appropriate for us to spend a moment in reflection, but I am at your discretion, Sir.

Mr. Speaker: I think the suggestion is appropriate under the circumstances.

Whereupon the House stood in silence for one minute.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS OF MINISTER

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In reply to a question that I put to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on October 5, 1988, the minister said there were not rights written on fishing licences.

I would like to draw to the attention of the members of this House the commercial fishing licence that I have of a P.E.I. tuna fisherman. It states very clearly on the licence that P.E.I. fishermen have the right—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is rising on a point of order but it is actually a question of debate about something a minister may or may not have said. The hon. member may have a point in argument or a point in debate, but it is not a point of order. It is not a procedural matter.

I do not think it is appropriate to enter into a debate at this time. The hon. member, of course, has other ways of raising this matter with the minister or other ministers, if that is appropriate. There are members' statements and there is also Question Period. I am sure the hon. member would want to avail himself of those more appropriate methods of taking up the issue again. Orders of the day.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and on Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14.

SPEAKER'S RULING—MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Mr. Speaker: There are 53 motions in amendment set down on the notice paper in relation to Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act.

Motion No. 1 standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn causes the Chair difficulty because the hon. member is seeking to amend an interpretation section through a substantive motion. This is contrary to Citation 773, subsection (10) of the fifth edition of Beauschene. Therefore, Motion No. 1 will not be selected.

Motion No. 1(a) standing in the name of the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam causes the Chair much difficulty as it does not appear to fit into the bill. Therefore, Motion No. 1(a) will not be selected.

Motions Nos. 1B, 14A, 17A and 38 standing in the name of the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam are attempting to amend sections of the original act which are not included in this bill. Therefore, again in accordance with Beauschene's Citation 773, subsection (8), these motions will not be selected.

Motions Nos. 2 and 2A standing in the names of the hon. members for Saskatoon—Dundurn and Mission—Coquitlam propose a fundamental change to the bill with respect to major and minor claimants. The Chair believes that the hon. members in so doing are going beyond the principle of the bill and, as a consequence, I will not be able to accept these motions.

Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14 are in order. They will be debated together and voted on as follows:

(a) Since Motion No. 5 is consequential to Motion No. 4, the vote on Motion No. 4 will be applied to Motion No. 5.

(b) An affirmative vote on Motion No. 6 will obviate the need to put the question on Motions Nos. 8 and 11, but a negative vote on Motion No. 6 will require putting a question on Motions Nos. 8 and 11.

(c) A vote on Motion No. 7 will dispose of motion numbered 10.

(d) Motions Nos. 12, 13 and 14 will be voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 5A, 5B and 9 standing in the names of the hon. members for Cape Breton—Highlands—Canso, Saskatoon-Dundurn and Mission—Coquitlam each seek to introduce a new concept into the bill. This is contrary to our practice as set out in Citation 773, subsection (1) of Beauschene's fifth edition. Consequently the Chair must hold that these motions not be selected.

Motions Nos. 15, 16 and 18 will be grouped for debate with a vote on Motion No. 15 being applied to Motions Nos. 16 and 18.

Motions Nos. 17 and 20 will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 18A standing in the name of the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam will not be selected as it is similar to Motion No. 18 which has been selected and grouped with Motions Nos. 15 and 16.

Motions Nos. 21, 22 and 23 are acceptable. They will be debated together with a vote on Motion No. 21 disposing of Motions Nos. 22 and 23.

Motions Nos. 19, 24A, 27 and 28 all seek to introduce new elements into the bill contrary to Citation 773, subsection (1) of Beauschene's fifth edition.

In a similar vein, Motion No. 24 moves to set up a board which would be appointed by the Commission. This is a concept which was not contemplated at second reading and is therefore beyond the scope of the bill. For this reason, the Chair has no choice but to declare this motion out of order.

Motions Nos. 25, 26 and 39 are acceptable. They will be grouped for debate with a vote on Motion No. 25 applying to Motions Nos. 26 and 39.

Motions Nos. 29 and 32 standing respectively in the names of the hon. the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce are in order. They will be grouped for debate and voted on as follows: an affirmative vote on Motion No. 29 obviates the necessity of the question being put on Motion No. 32; and a negative vote on Motion No. 29 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 32.

Motions Nos. 30, 33 and 34 are acceptable. They will be grouped for debate but voted on separately.

Motion No. 31 standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn causes the Chair difficulty in that it seeks to add a condition to the clause. This is not in order or consistent with practice. I would refer the hon. member to May's twentieth edition at page 557. Therefore, it will not be selected.

Motions Nos. 35 and 36 are in order and will be debated together but voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 36A, 37, 37A, formerly Motion No. 3, and 40, will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 41 standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn causes the Chair difficulty. It appears to be inconsistent with the principle of the bill as adopted by the House at second reading. Nevertheless, the Chair will give the benefit of the doubt to the member and allow his motion to be put to the House. It will be debated and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 42 and 43 standing in the names of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Dundurn and Notre-Dame-de-Grâce are out of order as Motion No. 42 brings to the bill a new concept not envisaged at second reading and thus it is beyond the scope of the bill, contrary to Citation 773, subsection 1, of Beauchesne's fifth edition.

Motion No. 43 places a condition on the bill that is a direct negative of the legislation, which is contrary to Citation 773, subsection 5, of Beauchesne's fifth edition. I would also refer hon. members in this connection to May's twentieth edition at page 557.

In summary, Motions Nos. 1, 1A, 1B, 2A, 5A, 5B, 9, 14A, 17A, 18A, 19, 24, 24A, 27, 28, 31, 38, 42 and 43 are out order.

Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 29, 30, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 36A, 37, 37A, formerly Motions No. 3, 39, 40 and 41 are acceptable and will be put to the House in the grouping and order I have outlined.

I again want to thank hon. members for their co-operation. Hon. members will know that with a large number of amendments on a bill which is clearly of great interest to the House, a great deal of work does have to go into the selection of the amendments and, as much as possible, this is discussed as carefully and thoroughly as we can with hon. members before the ruling is made. Again, I thank hon. members for their co-operation and I know I speak on your behalf when I extend to the Table our appreciation for their work.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I note that you have grouped together Motions Nos. 21, 22 and 23 for debate. You have also indicated that a vote on Motion No. 21 would take care of Motion No. 22 and 23. I simply point out that Motions Nos. 21 and 22 are on completely different matters and I do not see how a vote on Motion No. 21 could deal with Motion No. 22.

Motion No. 22 deals with whether or not there should be an appeal from certain decisions by the Commission with respect to training, whereas Motion No. 21 deals with the question as to whether or not money should be spent for new businesses, whether a claim for unemployment insurance could use a lump sum of that money to start a new business. I do not know how a decision on whether or not the money should be used for a business will determine the question as to whether there should be an appeal on a whole wide range of questions dealing with training. I simply bring that to your attention and ask that perhaps there be different voting arrangements.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce for raising this matter. Perhaps it would be best to begin debate. But the Chair will consider the remarks by the hon. member and I hope to be able to come back shortly and render a satisfactory answer. The hon. member on debate.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, as you know the legislative committee of this House carried on public hearings on this bill for approximately four weeks in all provinces of this country and also carried on extensive hearings here in Ottawa. As a result of those hearings, 157 out of 202 groups appearing before the committee vigorously, strongly opposed this bill.

As a matter of fact, a great percentage of those 157 groups appearing asked that the bill be withdrawn and sent back to the drawing board to be redrafted. I mention that because a good number of the 50–odd amendments to Bill C–21 that were put before this House arose from the public hearings. These are not amendments that have been created in the minds of Liberals, these are amendments that were strongly urged to the committee by the witness groups that appeared.

Why did these witness groups opposed this bill in such large numbers? They did so because the minister, through the bill, intends to reduce unemployment insurance benefits by between $1.3 billion and $1.5 billion. She intends to take that amount of money away from unemployed workers; money they need to pay their rent, buy their groceries and pay for the necessities of life while they are unemployed.

Several impact studies that have been made on this bill, but the global impact study indicates that 155,000 Canadians would lose their benefits altogether as a result of this bill and that 775,000 would have their benefits reduced. If you have your unemployment insurance benefits cut out altogether or reduced and you are left without unemployment insurance, there are only two alternatives. You have to either go to the soup kitchen or to the provincial welfare system. That is not an option that we, as federal members of Parliament, should be imposing on unemployed Canadians.

In response to that, the minister and the government will say, yes, they are taking between $1.3 and $1.5 million out of the unemployment insurance fund, away from unemployed Canadians, but they are going to use it for training and development.

In many parts of this country unemployed workers are saying, "training for what?" They come from one–industry towns and there are no other jobs in those towns except those that they were doing. They want to know if they will be trained so that they will have to go to Toronto or some other high growth area of this country?

That is a general introduction to this particular bill. This group of amendments which is before us, deals with special benefits, not regular benefits. These amendments deal with maternity benefits, adoption benefits, parental care benefits and sickness benefits. These are unemployment insurance benefits that go to individuals who qualify under those categories.

According to present law, maternity and day care benefits lumped together amount to 15 weeks. A pregnant woman could get 15 weeks of benefits either before or after the delivery of the child. The law also provides 15 weeks of benefits to parents who adopt a child. The present law provides 15 weeks of benefits to people who are sick and cannot work.

As you know, there were several court cases with respect to these provisions. The courts ruled in the Schwartz case and the McGuinness case, that we should divide maternity benefits from parental benefits because maternity benefits should apply only to the woman having the child, and should relate principally to her condition while she is pregnant.

They said child care benefits should be permitted to either the father or the mother, and consequently should be an additional type of benefit. As a result of the court decisions, I give credit to the government but it was obliged by the courts to bring the Unemployment Insurance Act up to date. It will now provide 15 weeks of benefits for maternity and 10 weeks of benefits for child care which can be taken by adopting parents or by the father or mother. It will still provide 15 weeks of benefits for sickness.

That is good as far as it goes, but I want to raise some serious objections to what the government is doing. To begin with, at the present time, adopting parents have 15 weeks of benefits. Under this bill their benefits will be reduced to 10 weeks. That is not acceptable.

I have moved in Motions Nos. 7 and 10 that these 10 weeks of day care benefits or parental benefits be extended to 15 weeks for all parents, natural parents and adopting parents, so that the child care benefits will be the same for all parents and will be the same as they are under the present legislation.

Under this legislation, as well, the government is saying there will be 15 weeks of benefits for maternity, 10 weeks of benefits for parental care and 15 weeks of benefits for sickness. However, under this legislation, if you have to combine them together, the government says the maximum can only be 30 weeks. There were many interventions before the committee pointing out how that provision is discriminatory to women. We are saying that because of their pregnancy they will not have full access to the 15 weeks of sickness benefits.

I refer to the very well prepared brief submitted to us by the National Association of Women and the Law. They say that while clause 9 would improve the act by increasing the amount of combined pregnancy, sickness or accident benefits to 30 weeks from 15 weeks, they state: "It is our belief that sickness or accident benefits should not reduce entitlement to maternity or adoption benefits, or vice versa". They then refer to Section 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which states that there can be no discrimination on the basis of sex. They argue very strongly, and I am convinced by their argument, that this limitation of 30 weeks on sickness, maternity and parental care benefits is wrong. My amendment in Motion No. 13 would do away with that maximum.

My final remark is that the minister herself has introduced a amendment to her own bill in which she attempts to deal in a very selfish way with the brief put to us by adopting parents. The minister said she would be willing to extend the benefits for adopting parents from 10 to 15 weeks but, only if the child were six months old when it was delivered to the home and only if a medical practitioner or an agency that placed the child certified that the child had physical, psychological or emotional conditions that require an additional period of parental care. I think that is very niggardly. I cannot understand why the minister would not simply agree to increase the benefits from 10 to 15 weeks so that they would be the same as they were in the past.

I urge the House, government members and the minister to go the whole distance and permit 15 weeks instead of 10 weeks for adopting parents and for natural parents in taking care of their children. I would also urge the minister to remove this discriminatory clause against women which limits the total benefits to 30 weeks. It in fact discriminates against women because it says because of their pregnancy they will not have the right to the full 15 weeks of sickness benefits. If the minister does not do that, we know that there will be a challenge before the courts sooner and later and she will have to change that section anyway, just as some of the changes in the bill were brought about through decisions of the courts.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to say a few words on the amendments to Bill C–21 before us, particularly those applying to adoptive parents.

One of the individuals involved in the court case referred to by the previous speaker is a constituent of mine. His difficulty was that because his wife was confined to hospital following the birth of their baby, he was denied any kind of benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act because he was looking after the children at home. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the courts ruled that that was discrimination and ordered the government to do something about it. What the government did in this legislation, as I understand it, rather than provide 15 weeks of benefits for an individual such as that constituent of mine, it proposes to reduce everyone's benefits to 10 weeks duration. The government was acting like a bunch of Liberals in trying to bring about that kind of justice to those individuals. It seems to me that if this government is serious about the kinds of things it says about the importance of the family unit, then the first thing this government should be doing is correcting those injustices that were in not only the previous legislation but in this amended legislation which has been before committee and is now before the House.

• (1530)

It is also true that of the 157 groups which appeared before that committee, hardly any did not criticize one or more aspects of the proposed amendments that we have before us, especially the ones that the government has presented.

I heard a spokesman for the Liberal party tell us that it, too, condemns what this government was doing. Prior to coming into the House I looked into my own records from the time that I came into the House in 1980 and from the job that I had prior to being elected, which was a trade union representative. I had considerable time to spend on problems that members in my union and members of the community had had with the Unemployment Insurance Act when the Liberals were in power.

Mr. Harb: Over there, now, over there.

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): One of the Liberal members says, "Over there". I think it is important that people realize that what we are dealing with today are principles that were advanced by the Liberal Party when it was in government. In fact, it is probably fairly accurate to state that this government is finishing the agenda that these guys started.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): They obviously do not want to believe what I am saying so I want to refer to the record and let them answer to that, rather than making noise at us people in the New Democratic Party who like to tell the truth about what various governments do.

I will give in point form some of the history which led us to the point we are at today. In 1976, for example, under a Liberal government, the maximum age for coverage was reduced from age 70 to age 65, cutting off a whole group of Canadians who had relied on that social safety net to provide them with an adequate social income after they left the workforce.

In 1976, also, the benefit rate for claimants with families was reduced from 75 per cent of insurable earnings to 66 and two-thirds per cent. The disqualification period for voluntary quits doubled from three to six weeks. In haste, one year later, in 1977, maximum weeks of benefits were reduced from 51 to 50 weeks. Eight weeks minimum attachment to the labour force for benefits was replaced by a variable requirement between 10 and 14 weeks.

In 1979 the benefit rate was reduced from 66-2/3 per cent to 60 per cent. People whose incomes were 1.5 times the maximum insurable earnings were now required to pay back 30 per cent of the benefits exceeding that threshold. You may be interested to know that that was the first case of income testing under that particular program.

At the same time, the government introduced a section that dealt with repeaters and new entrant provisions which established higher requirements for benefits to new entrants to the workforce, and for people who had claimed in the previous year. Then in 1980, the cost of operating the national employment service was shifted to employees and employers, and employers and employees became liable for all costs of initial and labour force extended benefits. That is not too far off what this government is doing.

I remember when the then Minister of Employment and Immigration made a proposal in the House that took funds from the unemployment insurance program for retraining purposes. That is exactly what the government is doing. The government, however, says to people in Newfoundland, in Nova Scotia, in New Brunswick, and in areas of the country where there is already severe unemployment, that it is going to reduce unemployment insurance benefits to provide retraining funds. Retraining for what, Mr. Speaker?

In effect, what the government is proposing to do is have the highest trained group of unemployed people in the country. use, if it is justified in using unemployment insurance funds, for real job creation in those areas of the country where it is needed.

I had the opportunity to speak in the House on another matter a few days ago and I spoke about a recent visit I had made to Nova Scotia, to Cape Breton actually, a small community just outside of Sydney. In that community something like 60 per cent of the adult population is unemployed, and the average per family income in that community is about $24,000 a year. There is a large coal mine in that community that employs about 1,300 people, but it is threatened with closure. Here you have a community with very serious unemployment problems and this government is talking about reducing the amount of benefits these individuals will receive when they become unemployed, but the government is going to use the money to retrain them. For what? There are no jobs in these communities, and the jobs that do exist are rapidly disappearing.

I beg to ask the question again, and I wish I could hear some member of the government stand up and explain this to me and to people in those communities, what kind of jobs are these people going to be trained for? What kinds of programs is the government going to put in place to ensure that if people are government the benefit of the doubt, what kind of job creation programs are going to be implemented to provide those communities with meaningful jobs?

I have not heard any member of the government explain that to the House, even though there have been numerous questions in Question Period and there have been numerous questions raised before that committee that travelled around the country. Still we have not heard from the government. All we hear about is how the government is going to do the unemployed a favour by initiating job retraining programs but without providing the jobs. Now, that does not make any sense to me, it does not make sense to people in these communities and it certainly does not make sense to the families of those people who are already unemployed and who have very little hope for the future.

I want to add whatever little weight I have and ask the members on the government side to open their ears and their minds and listen to those arguments, especially when we are dealing with this debate on a very serious matter for all Canadians. Even though many people may have jobs which may appear to be fairly secure just now, I would suggest that there are an increasing number of Canadians who do have jobs but who are becoming very concerned about their security in the future, not only for themselves but for their kids, their relatives, for the people who live next door, for the people who live across the street. They all know that in these times in Canada, particularly with the free trade agreement, there is a deep level of concern in the country about employment opportunities.

I see that you are giving me the high sign, Mr. Speaker. Of course, I always have great respect for the Speaker so I will wind down. Thank you very much for your usual kind attention. I would urge the government to get on with the business of the country and act in the best interests of Canadians.

• (1540)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak to this package of amendments, but I should declare to the House that in a sense, I have a special interest in the proposals being debated, first, because the new legislation that deals with adoptive parents is something that I had changed when I was minister back in 1983 and had introduced the 15–week adoptive parent rule at the time because of a number of inequities. I should point out that at the time, it was supported by all parties in the House. I would recommend to members on the opposite side in particular the quite eloquent speech made by the now Minister of Justice, who, in supporting the legislation I introduced in 1983, spoke about the questions of equity and fairness, and the lack of discrimination that should be afforded the parents of whatever child, whether natural or adoptive.

I also want to speak as a parent of an adopted child. One followed the other, and I did not in any way preview in 1983 that I would eventually become a parent of an adoptive child but I subsequently did. While I speak with a special interest, I also speak from experience, and I speak with a special knowledge, and, I would say, with a special concern about this subject.

I do not understand why the government is changing what was a good piece of legislation which provided the same treatment for parents dealing with new children coming into their households, whether by natural means or by adoptive means. It is as simple as that. There is no difference in the requirements. There is no difference whatsoever in the need to establish a bonding with the child, to deal with the very important period of establishment of affection and development of the child during that period of time. It does need a parent in the home for as long a period as one can be established.

It was a recognition, in particular, that the maternity benefits provisions and the parental benefits are not related to a medical reason per se, but are related to the question of the child itself and the relationship of the child developing in that family. The importance that we place in this country upon the development of the family has to be incorporated in legislation.

If the government says there is a difference in that family relationship, between an adopted child and a natural child, then so will the private sector say the same thing. A whole series of benefits will be thereby altered.

I also want to point out that it is very important in terms of the future of the child itself. Why would one want to say that there is different treatment being meted out to an adopted child versus a natural child? Saying that one parent is entitled to 25 weeks and the other to 10 weeks one is immediately saying that there is a difference in the process. There is not, Mr. Speaker, and I can say very clearly that when the child becomes part of that family, there is no difference.

I want, as well, to speak to the amendment that the minister brought in, which in a sense makes it almost worst. Now it is saying that an extra five weeks can be applied if there is a certificate by an agency or a doctor or some other official intervening. That is not the way to create a sense of fairness or equity. We are now introducing a new bureaucratic process into the exercise.

We are now creating a further impediment or barrier to that kind of economic and social well being. Why? What is the point of it? It gives more work to the agencies, to the medical practitioners. It creates more awkwardness, more cumbersomeness. It simply is bad law.

For a government that likes to pride itself on trying to keep things simple, trying to eliminate more bureaucracy, here is an amendment which, in fact, adds to it, makes it more cumbersome, more complex and, in fact, I think provides for an even further discrimination. It is saying that one only gets that extra leave if the child shows mental, emotional or physical problems. Who is the judge of that? Are we going to take a young child and say that that important period of having to be bonded with the parent is somehow based upon a problem and that it has to be certified? Is that the way we want the child to start life in the family, certified by a doctor or by a social worker that he or she is a problem child? Is that something we want on the record as a basis for trying to get leave? Any proper parents will not subject themselves to that kind of requirement. It only provides another major barrier, it is simply providing for an unequal and discriminatory set of questions that have no place in this legislation.

I suppose if we were talking about billions of dollars, one would say that maybe there is a reason for it. We are talking about maybe $1 million in extra costs at most, based upon the benefit period last year. Maybe it was $1.5 million, but the fact is that the amount of money that is involved is nothing, but in terms of speaking of the nature of a child's relationship with the family and the future, it says an awful lot. I say to you that this amendment only makes the matter worse, or at least it does in my view.

Let me bring up another point that was drawn to my attention recently in my constituency office while talking to parents. We all know that at some point soon, we will be seized in this House with the question of abortion and the question of offering a choice on children and what to do with them. Clearly, one of the options, an important option that has to be offered, is the question of adoption. When you are asking a young, unmarried woman or a single parent to face that question, one of the really important problems that many face is whether to keep the child.

Mr. McDermid: Single men.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): And the men, that is true.

Mr. McDermid: I have a friend who is in that position.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): In both cases, and I agree with the hon. member. The question is whether to keep the child or to put it up for adoption. I think one has to eliminate economic and social barriers to that option. If you are going to offer true choice, real choice, then take away the economic or social constraints on that choice, eliminate the kind of problems that a potential parent may see. I will have more to say about that during that debate but, surely, if you are putting a further barrier, a further handicap on the question of adoption, you are adding a further constraint on the choice as to whether adoption is one of the viable choices to be made.

It has repercussions way beyond just unemployment insurance. This particular motion speaks to an important part of family policy in this country. It speaks to how we look at children, how we look at the family and the relationship between them. I do not see the minister in the House, and I am not being critical, but I would hope those who speak to the minister would draw this to the government's attention and would say that it does not change the intent of the bill. This is not something that is going to do damage.

I do not agree with the intent of these amendments. God knows, when I was Minister of Employment, I fought for totally opposite kinds of views because I saw unemployment insurance as an expansive, inclusive kind of legislation and not one that tries to restrict or exclude, so it is a different philosophy.

The government may have that right, but on this measure alone, I think we are dealing with something that Conservative members previously fully adopted and supported in 1983. Why they would change their minds now, I have no idea. Why a worthy and distinguished member like the Minister of Justice would change his mind and vote for something like this, I have no idea, because he was very eloquent in supporting the 1983 amendments.

Furthermore, I would say to members generally, look at what this amendment does. Look at what they are talking about. We are simply saying that there is a discrimination. There is a distinction. There is a difference between the nature of a family relationship if the child is natural or adopted. I do not think anyone in this House or in this country wants to create that kind of discrimination. I would simply ask members opposite as I would ask members of the House generally to be very careful when they come to this series of amendments.

My colleague, the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, has brought in the proper amendment, to simply restore the status quo, to make it clear that all families and all children get treated the same. I would encourage members on both opposition and government sides to vote for that amendment. It makes sense from a family point of view. It makes sense in terms of the basic principles of equity and equality in this society.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I wish I could say it is a pleasure to rise to speak on this bill today. It is not. I wish it were not here. I wish it would go away. I wish the government would go back to the unanimous recommendations that were reached by an all–party committee in the previous Parliament to truly reform the unemployment insurance bill. With the support of government members and opposition members from both parties, the government has chosen to go in a completely opposite direction, to take a punitive and blaming approach toward those who happen to be without a job through no fault of their own.

As we travelled across the country, we heard in city after city and town after town about how this bill will contribute to the growing disparity in our country between those who have and those who have not. It will make people who are the working poor even poorer and those regions which are poor even poorer.

This is exemplified by the fact that those with the lowest incomes lose the most in benefits. Perhaps I could just give a couple of examples. Those earning under $10,000 who are disqualified or limited in their benefits by this bill lose the greatest amount, on average, over $1,000, over 10 per cent of their income, when they cannot meet the new requirements of this bill. Eighty per cent of those who lose under this bill earn under $25,000 a year. In many regions of this country, that is not even a poverty level income for a family.

The growing disparity is demonstrated by the fact that the highest loss per person who loses benefits or fails to qualify for benefits is in Newfoundland. If there are people who can argue that Newfoundland has the most thriving economy of the regions in this country, then I do not think they have their eyes on reality.

I wish to speak specifically to this group of amendments. The few saving features of the bill are not nearly enough to compensate for the tremendous damage it does to those who can least afford it. The few saving features of the bill are here, not from a desire on the part of the government to reform the unemployment insurance system, to make it better or fairer or to make it of more assistance to those who need income replacement when they do not have a job. They arise in fact from court decisions that left the government no option. One of those is the provision of parental benefits to natural parents as well to adoptive parents.

The courts have determined that in fact, it is contrary to the charter if natural parents do not enjoy the same parental and child care time as adoptive parents enjoy.

However, to introduce that equality, the government has chosen not to provide the same benefits to natural parents as to adoptive parents, but to reduce the benefit to adoptive parents. It has shown no interest in doing what is fair and just in providing to natural parents that which adoptive parents have enjoyed for a number of years and that which the courts ruled on.

Many amendments were introduced and many amendments are before the House to try to correct that basic problem. The only right and proper answer is for the government to take the 15 weeks that adoptive parents now enjoy and to ensure that the same benefit is enjoyed by natural parents.

Everything else the House sees before it, including the minister's amendment, are attempts to circumvent and not address the fundamental problem. The benefits should be the same for both and they should not be less than what the adoptive parents now enjoy. Any other amendment requiring certification, any other amendment proposing special adoptive leave are all efforts to try to persuade the government, if it cannot go all the way, to at least go part way. It is not good enough.

In the bill, as amended by the minister's motion, adoptive parents are being robbed of what they now enjoy. Natural parents are not being provided that to which the courts have determined they are entitled.

The other inequity addressed by these amendments is the qualifying period for unemployment insurance. Can anybody give me a logical reason why a woman who becomes unemployed by virtue of a pregnancy and therefore unable to earn income should have a different qualifying period than any other worker in this society? Why should a woman in an area of high unemployment not be able to qualify, with the same number of weeks as any other worker who needs income replacement, when she has an interruption of earnings?

The waiting period is another problem that is addressed by these amendments. Again, the waiting period is a disincentive to use benefits to which the family is entitled. It is an economic hardship which makes it easier for middle or high income families to take advantage of these benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act than for low income families. Low income families simply cannot afford two weeks without income so that they can take advantage, for example, of parental leave benefits.

The argument has already been well made on the maximum period of benefits and I do not propose to make it again except to restate that improvements in benefits are not improvements unless you have every ability to take full advantage of, and to fully utilize those benefits for the purpose for which they are intended. An artificial cap of 30 weeks does not allow that to happen.

Finally I would like to say that the other equity provision that the bill addresses is to allow those over 65 to qualify for unemployment insurance. This again is a change imposed on the government by the courts that determined that discrimination on the basis of age is not allowed under the Charter and does occur under the existing act.

The government has failed to take advantage of this opportunity to correct a problem with legislation that was brought to our attention over and over again during the hearings. That problem is the discriminatory way in which pension income is treated. Persons with pension income have that income treated as earned income for purposes of unemployment insurance. If they have a pension, they cannot qualify even though they are contributing, are available for employment and are intending to remain as contributors to the plan. That is not right. That is not just. In fact, we heard today in this House of a case of people being deprived of benefits that they were entitled to because they were misinformed on this provision of the act.

It is especially unjust when the same pension income is not treated as earned income for purposes of turning it into a pension plan or an RRSP.

I would like to conclude by simply saying that the government had and still has the opportunity with this bill to truly reform the unemployment insurance scheme, to go back to the all-party committee that reported to the House last year and to review again the changes that it proposed to the system, to come up with a scheme that is fair, equitable and recognizes the extent to which the government is responsible for unemployment in this country through various fiscal measures, and that it should continue to assume financial responsibility for unemployment in the regions of this country and for the poorest of the unemployed.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to this bill which unfortunately is before the House at this time. There are so many areas on which one could focus, but I propose to focus on this bill from a general point of view and in particular from the point of view of its effect on Saskatchewan.

This is a bill that hits the province of Saskatchewan and my particular community, the city of Moose Jaw and the area surrounding Moose Jaw in my riding, at a particularly bad time. Moose Jaw, like other communities in the province of Saskatchewan, is suffering through some bad times. Agriculture for the last few years has been very poor and agriculture has a very direct impact on the economy of the province of Saskatchewan. As well, we have a number of small businesses that are closing, not only in Moose Jaw but throughout the province. We have workers who are being laid off.

This is a bill that the province does not need at this time. The policies of the provincial government, the policies of Premier Grant Devine, have added to the problems that exist in the province of Saskatchewan. I would remind you that it was Premier Devine back in 1982 who inherited a province from a New Democratic government, a province that was viable and vibrant and in the black, and indicated that you could completely mismanage the province of Saskatchewan and still break even. How wrong he was. Today, the province of Saskatchewan has the biggest deficit that the province has had in the history of its existence. Certainly the policies of this government have not helped the situation either.

High interest rates have had a disastrous effect on Saskatchewan. This government talks of the deficit and it knows full well that by lowering interest rates one percentage point it could save $1.5 billion a year. But in the province of Saskatchewan small businesses are suffering because of high interest rates and consumers are suffering because of high interest rates. Consumers are less willing to invest their money in consumer goods, especially consumer goods of any significant value, because of the high interest rates. Small business people suffer as well because they do not invest or are more hesitant to invest because of the high interest policy, and this is at a time when many businesses are struggling to simply survive.

The cuts in VIA Rail that are going to be taking effect in January of next year are going to affect the city of Moose Jaw to the tune of $1 million a year. One million dollars out of the economy of a city of some 36,000 people is a lot of money.

The government is further going to inflict harm on the economy of Saskatchewan and the economy of Moose Jaw by the goods and services tax which is going to further hit seniors, small business people, consumers, and workers in the riding and throughout this country. It is one more item that the people of my riding do not need.

The city of Regina recently conducted a study that indicated that fully one-third of people living in Regina are living below the poverty line. This is in a province that was a have province in 1982. It is now a have not province, and it is going down all the time.

This is a government that introduces changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, changes that are going to make unemployment insurance more difficult to receive and, when you do receive these benefits they are going to be at a reduced rate. In the last four years the province has lost 50,000 people; 50,000 people have left the province of Saskatchewan since 1985. As a net loss half those people, or proportionately the highest percentage of those people, has been between the ages of 18 and 24.

The future of our province is leaving. They are leaving because the employment situation is poor and they are waiting for governments, either federally or provincially, to put some investment into that province, to provide some opportunities for that province. Certainly this unemployment insurance bill weighs negatively upon that.

The unemployment bill further affects small businesses by forcing them to pay higher premiums, which is just one more item for many businesses that are struggling to survive. I remind this House that small business creates more jobs in this country than any other sector of our economy.

The city council of the city of Moose Jaw has been so concerned about this bill that it recently passed a motion which it has forwarded to the government. I think it is worth while reminding the House of that motion in which council voiced its opposition to the changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

It has specifically pointed out, first, that changes which reduce the eligibility requirements will restrict low income, seasonal workers from obtaining earlier benefits. Second, it is opposed to changes which increase premium costs for employees and employers.

The city council of the city of Moose Jaw does not pass such motions very lightly, but it represents the unified force that exists against this bill in the city of Moose Jaw and throughout the province of Saskatchewan.

In Moose Jaw housing starts have been drastically cut. Sales of houses are way down. Businesses are suffering and at the same time this government has indicated that the attitude toward regional program development has to be changed, that it has to be bottom line economics. This is a country that was built on regional development, that relies on regional development. Certainly the regions of this country deserve better. They deserve a better attitude from this government than they are getting.

I find it somewhat ironic that my colleagues to the right themselves have been decrying this bill. There is not a single principle introduced in this Conservative legislation which was not pioneered under Liberal legislation.

The Liberals were the first people to take money out of benefits for training, and they even shifted the cost of the national employment service to premiums instead of government funding. The Liberals have been complaining about the way people are being treated with respect to voluntary quits, but it was the Liberals who first doubled the disqualification for those people back in 1976. As well, the Liberals complain about increased requirements to obtain benefits and about reduced weeks of coverage, but it was the Liberals who took both of these steps first in the 1970s. This government is simply completing the task which was commenced under the Liberal government.

We in this party are opposed to this bill. We are opposed to this bill because we like to see Canadians reach their full potential. We like Canadians to have the opportunity to reach their full potential. We like small business people to have the opportunity to invest and to prosper and grow. We also like people to have the opportunity to work in regions where they want to work and to be able to remain in places like Saskatchewan and Moose Jaw in particular, and not be forced to leave the province at the rate they have been leaving. It is an exodus from the province that is unprecedented, and it is going to have very disastrous effects on the future of our province.

We are opposed to this bill because it is not taking the direction in which our society should be heading. Instead of penalizing Canadians who through no fault of their own are unemployed, instead of forcing small business and employers and employees to pay more at a time when they are struggling to survive, we should be putting our effort into developing and maintaining viable regional development programs. Instead of its continuous attack on average Canadians this government should be allowing Canadians to reach their full potential.

We would urge that this bill be defeated.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I want to deal particularly with amendment No. 6 as listed in Votes and Proceedings, because several members have dealt with this matter of adoptive benefits. Indeed, we had several briefs that addressed this matter when the legislative committee was travelling, and the minister with this amendment is endeavouring to answer the requests of the various people who have appeared before the committee on it.

On behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration I am pleased to discuss this amendment to clause 9 of Bill C–21. It provides for an additional five weeks of parental benefits, fifteen weeks rather than ten, in cases where a child six months of age or older enters the home for the first time. To be eligible for this added benefit the claimant will have to submit a certificate from a medical practitioner or the agency which places the child with the parents. This certificate will confirm that the child suffers from a physical, psychological or emotional condition requiring an additional period of parental care.

This amendment addresses the special circumstances parents face when an infant has been institutionalized or otherwise prevented from going home for an extended period after birth. It will also be relevant in adoption cases where the children are six months of age or older. It is estimated that this covers approximately 90 per cent of the adoptions in Canada. When a child six months of age or older is entering a home for the first time, regardless of the reasons, it makes sense that a parent needs an extended period of time to welcome that child, establish daily routines, and develop a secure parent–child relationship.

This amendment is being introduced in response to representations that were made to the legislative committee during its study of the bill by those concerned about the interests of children and parents. Without this amendment adoptive parents would have seen a decrease in their benefits. At the time this seemed to be an unavoidable although not completely satisfactory approach to the government. What had been driving that provision was the need to treat natural and adoptive parents alike, in order to ensure conformity with the equality provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The minister is very pleased that through the work of the members of the legislative committee on all sides and a number of groups which appeared before them this amendment is possible.

The government is committed to ensuring that the UI program is in sync with modern reality and recognizes the challenges parents face in combining family and work related responsibilities. This amendment, along with other provisions in Bill C-21 for maternity, parental and the combining of special benefits, will go a long way toward acknowledging current family and work situations.

I am particularly pleased to see this amendment go forward. I commend members of groups who appeared before us for the dedicated way in which they try to help children who have some disability. I was really impressed with the testimony they gave us and came to understand that it takes a little longer for a child who has a disability to become a part of a family of persons whom he or she may not have seen before.

I want to make a few other comments on the legislation, but before I doing so I would like to say that we heard more than 200 briefs, and many of them several times. I do not know how we are going to deal with this matter in the future. Perhaps the committee, in its wisdom, will decide that it is going to hear one national group give a brief. We had as many as 70 groups repeat almost verbatim the same brief over and over and over again.

Mr. Fisher: Let the people speak.

Mr. Kempling: I do not know whether people consider that productive or not.

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. Kempling: But, of course, when you are doing statistics it makes it appear to be very important.

Mr. Fisher: Very embarrassing for you.

Mr. Kempling: You will have your chance to speak whenever you want to get up on your feet.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, we had many people appear before the committee. Many of their remarks will be featured in this debate by others. We had a witness in Toronto who spoke of the constitutionality of the bill and gave us a long and very learned dissertation on how unemployment insurance became a federal responsibility through constitutional change.

By the same token, the person who made this presentation indicated that she thought perhaps this bill may not be constitutional. But when she was asked if she intended to pursue that point, whether she intended to mount a court challenge to the government on that, she said: "Well, I am not sure whether I want to proceed or not". Others who had her view brought to their attention were not that positive either.

The fact is the government has a legal opinion on the bill. It has been told by the Department of Justice that the bill is legal in all senses. What the whole matter seems to revolve around is what we mean by benefits.

Do we just mean dollars and cents by benefits, or do benefits mean training? Can they mean training? The major point of the opinion that the government received was that benefits can be more than money. They can in fact be training. If that training is going to enhance the ability of the individual to seek and secure employment in the future, then the UI funds may be used for training.

We have discussed the matter across the country with industry groups and small business groups. More than 50 per cent of small business groups say their greatest difficulty is in getting trained people to work in their businesses. We talked to people in industry who said that those who have high tech skills and saleable skills in the future will be the ones they will be employing.

Our attempt through this bill is to broaden the ability of our labour force to react to the demand that will be put on it by industry in the future to produce its products.

We have heard many comments made about mobility. It has been said that perhaps we should not be training these people to gain another skill because they may move away from the city in which they are presently living and seek employment in some other part of the country. For some reason everybody picks on Toronto. I do not know why that is, but I guess it is because unemployment is low in Toronto and what is loosely called the Golden Horseshoe.

The fact is that that is the history of Canada. People do not stay in one place for the rest of their lives. I was born in Grimsby and remember moving to Kitchener, then to Oshawa, then to Toronto, and then to Dundas because that is where the work was.

Some Hon. Members: The Golden Horseshoe!

Mr. Kempling: The Golden Horseshoe; well you've got me there, guys.

• (1620)

If you look at the development of western Canada you will see that people came not from the west to the east but from the east to the west. Read our history. You will see that the success of the country has been in the mobility of people, people taking advantage of an opportunity that they see in another part of the country. That is what made this country what it is today, and that is what will drive it into the future.

I do not believe it should be a responsibility of the government to find an unemployed person in a village which is loosely referred to as a one industry village and keep that person in money until some other industry comes along and employs him or her. There has to be some initiative on the part of the individual to go out and seek employment. I cannot believe there is not a motivational change in an individual who let us say is married, has a job, has a car, has a house, has a mortgage, has some children, and becomes unemployed. Is he just going to sit back and say: "I can't do anything unless the government finds me a job. Woe is me. We will lose the car, we will lose the house, and I guess we will all have to go down to the soup kitchen the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce refers to".

I do not think that is the way it operates in this country. I think that retraining people and putting them into jobs that will be available or are available today—and we have lots of jobs available that cannot be filled—is the wave of the future, and that is the purpose of Bill C-21.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise in the House today to debate Bill C-21. As we have already heard there is great effort needed before the proposed legislation will be acceptable to all Canadians.

Before I get to specifics of the amendments proposed by my colleagues, allow me first to touch on unemployment insurance and welfare. These two safety net programs are very closely linked. Unfortunately, in the attempts to reform unemployment insurance, the government will simply transfer part of the load on to an already overburdened welfare system. Let me explain.

The government's proposed changes make it more difficult for Canadian workers to collect unemployment insurance and shorten the benefit period they are entitled to. Obviously this will result in less people on unemployment insurance and more people on welfare.

For example, of the 83,000 people who are unemployed in Manitoba right now, 4,300 will have to go on welfare because they cannot qualify for benefits under the new eligibility rules. Another 24,000 will have their benefits reduced. In Toronto, as another example, metro taxpayers will have to pay an extra $2 million per year because the change will throw 4,500 people off benefits and on to the municipal welfare rolls.

In my own region of Ottawa-Carleton the regional government has predicted that it will be handling somewhere between 540 and 820 more general welfare assistance cases each month as a result of the proposed changes. At an estimated $550 per case, the increased cost to the region could be as high as $5.4 million per year.

Part of the proposed legislation will simply push many of the unemployed out of one safety net and into another. When we stop and think about the fact that in the Ottawa-Carleton region 67 per cent of all those on welfare are between the ages of 18 and 37, we can see that the second safety net is seriously flawed as well.

These Canadians need our help. It is my belief that something drastic must be done to get these people back to work. You cannot amend UI without improvement to the entire social welfare system.

Today I would like to concentrate on the proposed amendments to Bill C-21, in particular Motion Nos. 7 and 10. These motions have been put forward to correct a serious flaw in the government proposed legislation by re-establishing the 15-week benefit period for all those taking parental leave. This is a matter which is of great importance to many people in my constituency and throughout Canada.

If Bill C–21 is passed as it stands now, biological parents will be entitled to up to 25 weeks of combined maternity and parental benefits to provide care for their new child. Adoptive parents, on the other hand, will be limited to a maximum of 10 weeks to care for a new child. Adoptive parents will have lost five weeks from their previous fifteen weeks entitlement.

It is common knowledge that more and more biological parents are using their combined maternity and parental leave benefits very late in their pregnancy. The simple explanation for this is that they need and want to devote as much time as possible to caring for their baby after its birth. Yet, adoptive parents are not entitled to these maternity benefits and will, on top of that, be losing five weeks of parental leave. The loss of those five weeks is extremely important to any parent, biological or not. In my opinion and in the opinion of adoptive parents across our country this loss is unacceptable.

When we stop and think about it, Bill C–21 means that we will have very different maximum periods of benefits despite the fact that adoptive and biological working parents pay the same premiums for UI benefits. It is easy to argue that adoptive parents do not have the same pre–natal and post–natal needs of biological parents, but this is not to say that they do not have special and very real needs of their own.

In fact, the existing adoption leave benefit was put in place in 1983 to allow adoptive mothers to claim unemployment insurance benefits similar to natural birth mothers. The government of the day recognized that parental and maternity leave was not solely to allow the biological mother a chance to physically recover from pregnancy and birth; the legislation acknowledged the need for special worker benefits to care for a new child.

It is ironic that the member who is now the hon. Minister of Justice stated at that time, and I quote from Hansard of July 2, 1983:

> Parents who adopt children face the same physical, mental, social and economic adjustments as natural parents. They often do not have advance notice of the date of adoption. I am pleased the government has brought in legislation to correct this discrimination.

Yet it is his government today which is putting forward legislation that will reintroduce the discrimination against adoptive parents.

[Translation]

Currently, adoptive parents are entitled to a maximum 15 weeks of benefits to take care of their child. Bill C–21 would limit this period to 10 weeks. The lost of these five additional weeks is a very serious matter for any parent, biological or otherwise. Mr. Speaker, this period should not be changed.

There are those who maintain that adoptive parents don't need maternity leave and benefits. That is not always the case. Everybody knows that more and more biological mothers combine their maternity and parental leave by going on maternity leave at a very late stage of their pregnancy. The reason is quite simple: They prefer to spend as much time as possible with their baby after its birth.

Adoptive parents have the same needs and requirements as biological parents. However, our present legislation prevents them from meeting those needs as natural parents do, because of the resulting loss of income. Ten weeks is not enough to establish a bond with a child that is practically a stranger. Experts in this area are well aware of the problems. Child placement services usually require one of the adoptive parents to stay home for at least six months after adoption. Why can't the government acknowledge this need as well?

Furthermore, the aura of uncertainty which surrounds most adoptions and the timing as well give prospective parents very little time to prepare for this event.

There is a tendency to believe that most adoptions involve newborn infants. That is certainly not always the case. Usually, adoptive parents do not know the age, sex, mental or physical abilities, genetic antecedents and sometimes even the race of the child that will be entrusted to them. Tremendous adjustments must therefore be made by adoptive parents who have to get to know their child after the adoption comes through. The uncertainty does not disappear once the child is placed in a home. Indeed, parents run the very real risk of losing their child if the natural mother changes her mind. In Quebec and Nova Scotia, for example, a natural mother has six months to reclaim her child. Of course, this possibility of losing custody of the child creates a great deal of tension for the adoptive parents. Biological parents, however, do not have to worry about such an eventuality.

Given the short benefit period allowed adoptive parents under Bill C–21, we must conclude that the Government is totally unaware of the many needs of adoptive parents or, even worse, that it has simply chosen to ignore them.

[English]

With Bill C–21 the government also implies that the nurturing needs of an adopted child are not as great as those of a child living with its natural parent. In fact many adopted children require more time for bonding to be established. There are many reasons for this but I will discuss only a few. I can see your hand waving, Mr. Speaker, so I will move on.

Adoptive parents must be social workers, psychologists and parents all at the same time and at the very beginning of their relationship with their child.

If Bill C–21 passes into legislation unamended, the effect will be to discriminate between adopted and biological parents as well as between adopted children and biological children. Obviously this will have a major social and economic impact on adopted families and our communities. The legislation as it stands is regressive and discriminatory. I can only hope that the government will recognize this fact before it is too late and support the amendment as proposed in Motions Nos. 7 and 10.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River, I would like to recognize the parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

AUTHORIZATION TO TRAVEL—STANDING COMMITTEES

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for interrupting the member, but there have been consultations among the three parties and I have a couple of travel motions that we would like to put before the House. The first motion is:

That the Standing Committee on Environment be authorized to travel to Washington, D.C. on October 23–25, 1989, for the purpose of discussions with United States congressmen on acid rain, and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

The second motion is:

That the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs be authorized to travel to Halifax, Nova Scotia from October 22 to October 27, 1989 and to Victoria and Comox, British Columbia from October 30 to November 2, 1989 in relation to its study on Canada's maritime sovereignty and security and that the necessary staff do accompany the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motions. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motions?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motions agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. parliamentary secretary on a further point of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the private member who was to present his bill at five o'clock is unable to do so. I understand also, because of us not knowing of that earlier, that we would need the consent of the House to extend government time through to six o'clock.

In light of that I would therefore ask we can obtain the consent of the House to continue this debate to give members a chance to participate on an issue which all of us see as important and to give us an extra hour of debate during the Private Members' hour from five o'clock to six o'clock.

Mr. Murphy: We do not agree to give up private members' time to the government to change the Unemployment Insurance Act. As you know, Mr. Speaker, we are against this legislation. We think it is horrific. We think it is going to be devastating to regions of Canada, therefore we do not give our consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no consent.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to rise in this House and speak on this motion. It is discouraging to be up here again fighting another rear-guard action as this government attempts to pick apart the safety net that Canadians have come to count on in this country.

Unemployment insurance was introduced in July of 1941. It was a direct result of decades of pressure from our political predecessors, the CCF, the farm labour parties, and so on through the 1920s and 1930s that saw the devastation which forced unemployment and cost individuals and communities. In the atmosphere of needing all the wartime production, all the labour force that the government could muster, unemployment insurance was brought in, in 1941, and has been an important part of our social safety net ever since.

There were two principles that guided the evolution of the unemployment insurance program through the years. First, unemployment insurance should alleviate individual hardship caused by unemployment. This was something that a person had by right of citizenship. Second, there was the principle that the effect of unemployment insurance and this particular aspect of our safety net should have equal impact across the country.

In other words, those regions of the country that were hardest hit by unemployment should be recognized in the way the act is administered so that those people would not suffer unduly because of the regions of the country that they lived in.

However what have we seen happen here? What have we seen the millionaire stock brokers from Toronto come in with now in terms of unemployment insurance? We see a gradual shift to a charity model, back to the poor houses. We see food banks.

The hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam listed the number of people seeking help in food banks nowadays. We see people being forced off unemployment insurance through this measure on to welfare, which places a new and undue burden on municipalities and on the provinces. They also have a deficit problem. It does not help to reduce the federal deficit by increasing the provincial and municipal deficits and all the way down to increasing individual deficits, because individuals in this country are as deeply in debt as the government. Shifting it down to individuals, municipalities and provincial governments does not deal with the problem at all.

Another thing that this movement to change the unemployment insurance program is doing is forcing relocation of thousands and thousands of people. It is no accident that unemployment is high in the regions. It is not a fate of nature, the unseen hand, or anything else. It is the very real fiscal and economic policies that this government has brought in.

For example, policies like gutting regional development programs, especially for isolated communities, and making regional development accessible only to the big companies that already have access to all kinds of government programs. It is the result of an interest rate policy that funnels all the money from around the country into the big trading centres like Montreal, Toronto, and Vancouver. It overheats those economies and then gets into a cyclical process whereby interest rates go even higher. Unemployment then rises in the regions of the country and the economic activity that could be expected there cannot happen because of interest rates.

Now we see a very miserly approach. We saw that when the member for Burlington was making his comments with regard to clause 6, the clause that deals with the relative benefits, paternal benefits between adoptive parents and biological parents.

First, it should be pointed out that this would not be here in the first place or that a government member would not be supporting it if it were not forced by the courts. Second, a approach like this that discriminates between different kinds of parents certainly cannot be said to be an equity provision.

When the member says that the provisions here actually cover 90 per cent of the adoptive parents, why then bring a miserly little motion that would discriminate against the other 10 per cent? That does not make any kind of sense at all, at least not unless you are looking at it from the perspective of millionaire's row.

I would like to deal specifically with Motions Nos. 4 and 5 because they deal most directly with the effects on regions such as the region I represent, Prince Albert—Churchill River, a northern constituency with high unemployment, scattered communities, and an underdeveloped economy.

The loss to this region can be figured in several different ways. The government came out with figures that said that the loss to the Prince Alberta—Yorkton UI region would be $4.4 million over the course of a year, each and every year. Global Economics said that the loss would be $11 million. When I checked into why this difference existed I found out that it was because government members were figuring behaviour modification into the equation. They were not taking into account the real numbers and how much people are actually going to lose; they were taking into account $6.6 million worth of behaviour modification in the region of the country I represent.

Whose behaviour is it going to be modifying? I did a little research on this. There are 600 claimants who fall under the clerical category, such as secretaries and office personnel. Those people often cannot move because they have family responsibilities and certainly cannot, as the member for Burlington suggested, move to Toronto, find a secretarial job and pay for the move with the earnings of a clerical job.

They are losing an average of $430 each. That is $258,000 worth of behaviour modification for secretaries and clerical personnel in northern Saskatchewan. Construction workers also have to modify their behaviour: 930 claimants, $613 or $560,000 worth of behaviour modification for construction workers in this constituency. This is totally unacceptable.

The chronic problem with the unemployment insurance program is determining the unemployment rates in regions such as the one I represent. For the La Ronge CEIC office the official unemployment rate is 13 per cent. That is unbelievable. When you check into how these things are figured you can see why it happens because treaty Indians are not included in this. The surveys are done by telephone and only 20 or 30 per cent of the people have telephones and are inaccessible to any Statistics Canada surveyors. The actual unemployment rate in that area is in fact 25 per cent to 30 per cent, which would put them well over the cut-off line at 15 per cent. However, because of the way the figures are arrived at, that region will not be eligible for benefits that are its right.

Second, I hoped that when the whole Unemployment Insurance Act was being reviewed the whole problem of seasonal unemployment and the type of economy that exists in frontier areas of the country would be taken into account.

When I did research for this particular speech I found that although there are about 400 commercial fishermen in northern Saskatchewan, only 7 of them are registered with the CEIC although there is a commercial fishing benefit program. The reason is that these people not only fish but they do some line cutting. Their other big source of employment is firefighting. What has happened under that provision, as has been pointed out in the House, is that firefighters across the country are paid on a casual basis because it takes so long to get them on the government payroll, and it is easier to get the money by putting them on casual.

Consequently people are working many weeks through the summer. In many cases they work sufficient weeks to collect unemployment insurance, but because they are paid on a casual basis they are not eligible for unemployment insurance. Therefore there is a whole pattern of employment where people do some cutting line fishing, firefighting, and so on. Those people are working very hard.

There is an illusion that people who need unemployment insurance are lazy or not self-motivated. That is unfair. I invite members to go to that part of the country and see how hard people work and under what conditions they live. To penalize them and not deal with the problems in the UI system which affect them very directly makes a mockery of any kind of claim that the government might make in positively reforming the unemployment insurance system through this legislation.

The other argument that the government makes is that this new system is going to cost employers and employees. The government is withdrawing more and perhaps it will force some people to move. However, the government claims that the big benefit will be an increased amount of training, that there will be more money available for training as a result of this legislation.

Many Canadians appearing before the committee made the point that certainly training should be an investment that falls on the country as a whole and not an investment that falls on the backs of the unemployed. Even given that particular criticism there is no guarantee at all in this legislation, nor in any of the comments that I have heard made, that that training will accrue to the regions of the country where the biggest losses are being experienced.

There will be a real loss in our region of the country of $11 million. I know $11 million would buy a lot of training. I would be very surprised, in fact I will be watching very closely to see what portion of that $11 million gets back to that part of the country. The reason I am concerned is that I know that the government promised there would be the finest adjustment programs in the world when it came to free trade; people who lost their jobs would be looked after. The de Grandpré commission was supposed to recommend that all this would be done. It said existing programs should do it. Well, this is the existing program.

What is going to happen in a region like mine where there is a rapidly growing labour force of people who have never held a job and where there are unemployment rates of 50 per cent, 60 per cent or 70 per cent? I predict that the money for training is not going to go there.

The money for training is going to go again into the metropolitan areas where there are very visible job losses, for example to the GM plant in Scarborough, the Inglis plant in Toronto. Those are the types of priorities that the government is going to be setting for retraining because it is politically expedient to do so. That is where the national media is.

The Globe and Mail will report it and everybody will read here in Quorum that the government did wonderful things in retraining, but no one puts in Quorum quotes from the La Ronge Northerner that says that there are thousands of young students coming out of the school system in northern Saskatchewan who need training and have never had an opportunity to participate.

I strongly support Motions Nos. 4 and 5 which would have the effect of equalizing the benefits that are available to people on the basis of the unemployment rates in their region and would not discriminate against people in our region of the country.

I also wish to strongly register that I am ashamed to be part of a House that would even consider taking such a gigantic step backward in Canadian social policies as this bill represents.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, after my hon. colleague has led us off on such a rhetorical note which makes sense nonetheless, it almost shakes the confidence of those who would want to see this House as a place where we would do things that are instrumental for the well-being of all Canadians and upon which well-being we construct a new future for all of Canada.

It is unfortunate that other members, some in my party, have had occasion to refer to some of the elements of these clauses that are absolutely contrary to that particular view. In clause 9, to which these several motions refer, the government is addressing itself to creating a fundamental attitudinal change among workers in the country.

For those of us who were not quite aware what the rest of the country does see in this particular clause, I would just like to briefly refer to a sentence from a September 11 article published in Vancouver. A member of the business community made a representation before the legislative committee studying Bill C-21.

I know my colleague opposite has an aversion to those who repeat positions given before a legislative committee, even though that repetition drives home points that are most valid. The repetition this time came from a member of the business community who said that Bill C-21 should have as its objective the creation of a mobile pool of jobless workers shifting across the country ready to plug into the needs of industry.

• (1650)

There are those of us who believe in an economic strategy, an industrial strategy for this country, one that takes a look at the resources and the needs of our nation and builds upon them for the benefit of all of its citizens, for the benefit of those people who would like to have work, and to create jobs on behalf of those who think that they can engage their energies and their vigour productively. Those of us who have been looking for that kind of initiative see instead Bill C-21 which does quite the opposite.

In fact because I would not dare to use statistics that the government so casually dismisses as being completely incorrect, erroneous, and unfounded, I will use government statistics in referring to the objectives of Bill C-21, especially in clause 9.

For example, this particular clause through its entrants requirements, restrictions of benefits, and lengthening of qualifying periods will have the net impact of causing 41 per cent of all claimants from Newfoundland to suffer reductions in benefits, 46 per cent of all claimants from P.E.I. to lose benefits, 40 per cent of all the claimants from the province of New Brunswick to lose benefits, and 49 per cent of all claimants from Manitoba will suffer a reduction in benefits.

I do not want to go on to the others because many of them fall into a much lower category, but it is important to keep those figures in mind when we address the objective of this government. If the objective is, as the hon. member opposite suggests, to put people back to work, the attitudinal change to which all other members have made reference suggests that the onus is going to be on the worker to locate the job. It will not be the result of any government program, any government strategy or great initiative, or any development of the market-place that generates jobs to which all workers will naturally gravitate. No. In fact I read those specific figures because they have a startling resemblance and relationship to other figures.

For example, using the labour market survey published recently and used as a reference by the government, it does appear that from the fourth quarter of 1988 to the end of the second quarter in 1989 that we are looking at a bill which says: "let's put people back to work by making them look for a job; make them accept the jobs that are there". The natural question then is: Where are these jobs?

It appears that according to the labour market survey they certainly do not exist in Quebec because in those three quarters there was a net drop of 11,000 jobs. There was no growth in Prince Edward Island. There has been no growth in jobs in Prince Edward Island since the fourth quarter of 1987. There was no growth in jobs in New Brunswick. There was no growth in jobs in Manitoba. There was again a loss of 5,000 jobs in Saskatchewan.

My hon. colleague from Saskatchewan noted as well that there was a net emigration of 2,000 people per month. We are exporting the unemployment from regions less advantaged to other areas. This particular bill would suggest that the government is embarking on a grand strategy of job creation, a grand strategy of employment, a great plan to create a new wealth for all of Canada. It attacks those people in those regions where the results have been the contrary to expectations of employment growth.

That does not make sense. It cannot possibly excite the confidence of this House when we look at those government figures. They are not invented by others who would like to look at the gaping holes in this particular legislation. What comes through all those figures is an unfortunate description, and I use the adjective rather cautiously but I do it deliberately. There seems to be a petty viciousness. A less kind soul than myself might have looked at those provinces that I recited from these lists and said: "I think I see a political connection." None of those provinces returned a Conservative majority. There is nothing for the government to lose there politically. If the solutions are political to the problems of Canada, if the solutions are economic with political involvement then the government has nothing to worry about.

Those people have already told them what they think of the government's programs over the last four years. After five years of alleged unprecedented growth, I can stand here before this House and read those kinds of statistics. No, that sort of pettiness is unfortunately reflected in Clause 9 as well when we address what the government is doing in terms of looking for places where it can find funds to save and deposit to reduce its deficit. One of those has to do with people who perform not only a humane service but a social service, a national service.

They take upon themselves a personal responsibility, a great responsibility in my view, one that perhaps people like myself and many others throughout this country might not be able to meet were we put to the test. What they do is to take many young boys and girls, newborn, and provide them with a home. Because they do that, under this particular clause, we are penalizing them. We are penalizing those parents who take that step forward, those parents who want to adopt, who want to provide a home for children, all children, who they can call their own. They want to provide them with an environment where they can grow into mature adults, functional and productive citizens of this nation. We want to give them that opportunity so treat us like all parents.

An adoptive parent is a parent, period. It is unfortunate that before this House some of my colleagues have had to resort to giving a description of parenthood and to giving a description designed to encourage the government to recognize that parenthood is parenthood notwithstanding natural birth or adoptive situations and circumstances. That is a most unfortunate situation.

What we are doing with this particular clause is focusing on adoptive parents. We are going to reduce benefits. We are going to reduce the opportunities that they might normally enjoy under the former act. We are going to reduce their benefits in order to apply them to deficit reduction. It is an additional tax, an onus that we impose upon people for making the decision to do something that is socially worthwhile as well as personally satisfying.

We cannot through this Parliament, through this government, penalize those who have initiative that benefits all of society. Are we talking about a great amount? No, we are not. Several of the organizations and several individuals who appeared before us, and dozens of individuals who have written to me personally and to other members of my caucus have pointed out that we are talking essentially about a trite amount. When viewed in the global sum of $13 billion last year, rounded figures, for UI, we are talking about figures very, very close to $300,000 per annum for adoptive leave.

When we are talking about putting those kinds of parents through that kind of duress, we are talking about a particular principle. That principle says that the parents shall not suffer but the children who are going to be children of adoptive families shall suffer. We have no right. We have an absolute responsibility to make sure that all Canadians are viewed similarly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5 o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

In accordance with Standing Order 94 notice was published for consideration today of the motion standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Brant. Since the member is not present to move his motion at this time the motion will, in accordance with Standing Order 42, be dropped from the Order Paper.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There being nothing more before the House, the sitting will be suspended until 6 p.m. Is that agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 5 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 6 p.m.

EXCISE TAX ACT AND EXCISE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Friday, October 13, consideration of Bill C-20, an act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(6) the House will now proceed to the taking of deferred divisions at report stage of Bill C-20, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

The first question is on Motion No. 1. Ms. McLaughlin moved:

> That Bill C-20 be amended in Clause 1 by adding immediately after line 16 at page 1 the following
> "except for northern residents as defined in the Income Tax Act."

Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I think that the prior decision of the Chair concerning Bill C-20 was that if the vote on Motion No. 1 was negatived we had to proceed to vote on Motion No. 2. In the interest of saving time, and after having consultations with my colleagues from all sides of the House, I would like to propose that the results of the vote on Motion No. 1 apply to all subsequent motions to the bill, except that on the final vote, that is the concurrence vote, that the reverse be taken into account. The government would not want to vote with us and I would give it its way on that one.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it so agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion lost. The vote on Motion No. 1 in the name of the hon. member for Yukon will be applied to Motions Nos. 4, 10 and 17. The result of the vote on Motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Calgary Northeast—

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There is no unanimous consent.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order that may assist the House. I am wondering if the member who just spoke would be agreeable to allowing the preceding vote to apply to all of the votes on the motions and deal with the question of the bill itself as a separate item. If that is acceptable that may save the House some time.

Mr. Kindy: It is agreeable, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to all subsequent motions.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on Motion No. 2. Mr. Kindy moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C–20 be amended by deleting Clause 1.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division.

SMALL BUSINESS

TABLING OF FIRST ANNUAL REPORT–GROWING TO MEET TOMORROW

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2) and prior to the beginning of Small Business Week, October 23 to October 27, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, the first annual report on the state of small business in Canada. It is entitled Growing to Meet Tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this annual report highlights the success of small and medium-sized businesses in Canada and points out their important contribution to the country's economy.

The report also includes a listing of programs offered by various departments for small and medium-sized businesses.

PETITIONS

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition signed by a number of concerned Canadians from the Toronto-Scarborough area. This petition was collected by my friend, the hon. member for Scarborough West.

The petitioners are petitioning Parliament to reject the vicious, nasty and mean measures contained in the bill and soon to be introduced in Parliament providing a goods and services tax, a draft bill of which we received on Friday from the Minister of Finance.

The petitioners call on Parliament to reject this bill notwithstanding the wicked advertisements that this government saw fit to place in Canadian newspapers to convince Canadians that this is a good tax.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present petitions signed by constituents of the riding of Hillsborough and other parts of Prince Edward Island.

They too are concerned about the proposed goods and services tax and ask that this Parliament do reject such.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and my duty to present a petition signed by some constituents in Ottawa—Vanier from Michel Circle and Lavergne, Lebrun and other streets. They claim that the present federal sales tax was increased from 9 to 13.5 per cent by the Conservative Government.

That this same Government wants to impose a new hidden 9 per cent universal goods and services tax on Canadians.

That imposing this new universal goods and services tax will cause serious and unfair hardships for Canadians on low and moderate incomes.

That imposing this tax would be a costly burden for small businesses and that it would be inflationary—

For these reasons, they humbly ask Parliament to reject this new goods and services tax.

• (1110)

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure today to rise and put before Parliament a petition also with respect to the mean and evil goods and services tax that this government has proposed to bring in.

The petitioners ask and pray that Parliament reject the current proposal for the goods and services tax, reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, and ensure that if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers sales tax this reform not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present three petitions.

The first petition relates to the goods and services tax. It is signed by a number of people from New Brunswick and other parts of Canada explaining their opposition to the government's intention to bring in a goods and services tax.

They believe that the House of Commons should reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax, reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, and ensure that if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax this reform must not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab and cause the Government of Canada—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. Murphy: I have two petitions, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member after the hon. member for Vancouver East.

VANCOUVER PORT CORPORATION DEVELOPMENT

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present a petition from a number of my constituents in Vancouver East on matters of great concern to them and to the city of Vancouver.

The Vancouver Port Corporation has entered into a 10-year lease with Elder's Grain Limited, a foreign corporation, as lessee to construct a grain transfer plant without any consultation or notice to the people who reside in the contiguous properties.

Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to direct the Vancouver Port Corporation to stop the development of this Elder's Grain Limited at the terminal dock site and ask that the community develop a comprehensive plan for Vancouver's inner harbour in co-operation with the city and the port which is compatible with the community.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present two petitions to Parliament duly certified as to form and content.

Both petitions relate to the proposed 9 per cent goods and services tax, and they are signed by a total of 56 irate residents of my riding. They are irate because the present government is not listening to Canadians with respect to this sales tax.

They call upon Parliament to categorically and unequivocally reject any legislation brought forward to implement the said goods and services tax.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, today I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by approximately 1,200 residents of Hamilton Mountain. The petitioners have spoken out overwhelmingly against the Conservative government's proposed 9 per cent goods and services tax. The petitioners believe that the tax is unfair.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon this House to reject the Conservative government's 9 per cent goods and services tax proposal.

OPPOSITION TO BILL 178

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by approximately 37 of my constituents.

The petition demands, in effect, that Bill 178 of the province of Quebec be disallowed by the federal government as being contrary to our Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

PORT OF CHURCHILL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two more petitions today. One is signed by 168 residents from Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta who are in support of Canada's only inland seaport.

These petitioners call upon the House of Commons to direct the minister responsible for the Wheat Board to ensure that at least 3 per cent of Canada's annual grain shipments are shipped through the Port of Churchill.

They also request that the government aggressively pursue additional ways to utilize this important seaport to ship exports other than grain.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my last petition is signed by residents of the community of Churchill, Manitoba, along with others in the province of Manitoba.

They are protesting the decision of the federal government to cut back VIA Rail service in Canada. They believe that the government's announcement will only hurt the national rail system. It will cause the lay-off of Canadian workers.

The Government of Canada should make sure that we have an adequate, substantial and modern rail service for all Canadians.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all the questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, October 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-28, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, in the last little while we have had a practice of allowing each party to divide its time and, instead of the usual 20 and 10 minute speech, to use it in two tens and two fives.

I have had informal discussions with the other two parties, and I am wondering if the House would be prepared to give its consent for us to put that practice in place today for the second day of debate on Bill C-28.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, since the opposition was instrumental in implementing this practice of 10-minute speeches followed by 5 minutes for questions and comments, we would certainly not oppose such a procedure at second reading of a bill. I would hope the government would do this more often at second reading to give more members a chance to speak. I think that 10 minute speeches and five minute questions and comments are more constructive.

I have some hesitation because, if I heard the Parliamentary Secretary correctly, he said two 10-minute speeches followed by 5 minutes for questions and comments. I would rather have the rotation that we had: a 10-minute speech and 5 from the opposition, a 10-minutes speech and 5 from the government side and vice versa, keeping in mind there is a 4–1 ratio here of applicability in terms of how often the opposition gets on. Rather than having the 20–minute speeches split into two tens and two fives on one side, I would rather we rotate all day.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, we may have to go back to the drawing board on this one. We still wish to have the option to have a full 20–minute speech from time to time during the day. I think we had better discuss this further.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): May I suggest that the member who rises states whether he will take 20 minutes, plus 10 minutes for question and comments, or 10 minutes plus 5. Is that agreed?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, we do have a substantial agreement among ourselves, and we can arrange for the parties to do that.

We would encourage the members to go with the 10 and 5 in the normal rotation because it is not our intention in any way to rob members of the NDP, the Liberal party or the government of an opportunity to speak. What we would like to do is expand that opportunity at the second reading level as related to the comments made by the Whip of the Official Opposition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Am I to understand that when the member rises he will ask for either a 20–minute speech plus 10 minutes for question and comments or 10 minutes plus 5?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): So agreed. The hon. member for Edmonton Northwest.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, since I did not stay up all night preparing a speech for this morning, I will in the spirit of co–operation attempt to stay to around 10 minutes or so.

• (1120)

Today of course we are debating Bill C–28, the amendments to the Income Tax Act that flow from this year's budget presented by the Minister of Finance in April.

Before addressing the tax matters that are in this particular piece of legislation, one should consider the context in which they are being put forward, because in any budget there are a number of elements.

First, there is the presentation of the government's fiscal plans for the year including its spending plans. From that we can determine the government's financial requirements, and from that the government must determine how they are going to fund those financial requirements, either through borrowing, through taxation, or perhaps through some other means.

If we take a look at the last five years during which time this government has been governing, we have seen a fairly consistent pattern over that time. Government spending in the over–all has been held down to something less than the rate of inflation in the country. At the same time, the economy has grown, but there has also been some need to put in certain tax measures to fund essential programming.

When talking about the spending side we can look at four elements of government spending which are essentially where government money goes. The first element is interest. Unfortunately, we have a large accumulated debt which generates an annual interest bill each year of about $30 billion. That, of course, must be paid through the interest payments, Canada Savings Bonds and other means that the government uses to finance its debt and its borrowing. We have approximately $30 billion a year in interest payments.

The second element of government spending is transfer payments to provinces. That sounds complicated, but what it means is the money that we give to provincial governments to fund social programs in addition to their own tax revenue. By far the largest element is the amount of money that goes to support health care at the provincial government level. It is approximately $25 billion. We can call that the second quarter or second element of government spending.

The third element is transfers to individuals which are essentially for pensions and family allowances, the vast bulk of which are for pensions.

When we look at those three elements of government spending we find that we have a very difficult time in trying to maintain spending or cut spending without diminishing those programs. First, in relation to interest, one would have to default on our bonds, default on our debt, or not pay Canada Savings Bonds. I do not think anybody is suggesting that that would be a very proper thing to do.

The second element of government spending, the transfer payments to provinces to fund health care, most people believe that we should continue to pay. There is a formula under which the government pays that amount based on the growth in the economy each year which means that that bill continues to escalate.

First, we have the interest bill escalating by roughly $3 billion a year due to the continuing deficit, as long as that is there. Then we have the transfer payments to provinces increasing by an amount of about $1 billion a year simply to maintain our existing level of health care and other services. Then we have the third element, transfers to people, which are increasing every year because there are more and more people over the age of 65 in our population. Unless we can somehow stop people from ageing, we are going to have a continuing ageing population. That adds approximately $1 billion a year to the government's requirements.

With all of that, the government must find an additional $4 or $5 billion a year just to maintain those essential services. We often hear people saying that what they should really do is cut their expenditures. That is fine. I think that we would all like to do that. However, we must realize that any significant cuts in government expenditures are going to have to be addressed at those areas because when we come to the last quarter of government spending it goes for everything else. Now, that is the area in which most people want cuts, because they do not monitor it particularly carefully, it is somewhat diffuse, and there are a lot of civil servants out there who think that there is a lot of money available through waste and misuse to be found.

That last quarter of government spending goes to pay all the civil service salaries, offices for them to work in, paper for them to shuffle, and virtually all of the expenditures that go along with the operation and maintenance of the government, including police, customs agents, and for that matter, tax collectors, and I suppose some people think we could do with fewer of those.

That part of government spending has been held down. In fact, over the last five years it has been about 17 per cent of total government spending; it is about $1 billion less in absolute dollar terms than it was five years ago, in spite of the fact that we have had roughly 4 per cent inflation each year. The number of civil servants has been reduced to the 1972 level. That is the area that has borne the brunt of government expenditure cuts over the last five years, in order to support and maintain the other three areas that I described earlier. However, we have reached a point where we simply cannot make substantial cuts in that area any longer without seriously diminishing the services and the operations of the government which people desire.

We have two choices. We can either do something in the two areas, either through transfers to provinces which fund health care, or transfers to people which fund pensions, or we can try to increase taxation. This budget does some of both. In the area of transfers to people it is going to tax back and recover, from people with incomes of over $50,000 a year, the benefits that they received through the family allowance and pension system.

There have been some people who have been opposing this. There have been some people who have come to see me about this. I had a group of senior citizens come to see me about this. I told them what I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker.

In my view it is absolutely unfair for me to ask people who are in the workforce working or even trying to plan for their retirement, making an average income of $27,000 a year, which is approximately the average income in Canada, or perhaps living on an average family income of $47,000 a year, which is approximately the average family income in Canada, to pay more taxes so that we can continue to provide benefits to people who have retired, who are no longer in the workforce, who are over 65, and have substantially enough wealth that they still have an income of over $50,000 a year. We should not continue to pay them the old age security benefits. It would be totally unfair to tax people who are working, supporting families, trying perhaps to buy a home, trying to save a little for their retirement, earning $27,000 a year on average or $47,000 a year as a family, and ask them to pay more taxes so that we can continue to pay benefits to people who are retired and over 65 and who have incomes of over $50,000 a year.

This measure taken by the Minister of Finance, while it is not supported by everyone and while it has not been supported so far by the opposition parties, is a measure of fairness. In order to continue to pay benefits to those people who are receiving pensions and maybe do not have other income or perhaps are receiving pensions and have an income of $10,000 or $12,000 a year, and there are many of these people in my riding, we are going to withdraw benefits from people with substantial incomes.

I am prepared to defend that in any forum. I have told people in my own riding that. I have told that to people who came to meet with me and I have written letters to that effect. We cannot continue to fund more and more benefits for more and more people without finding that money some place.

There was a tax rally in Edmonton a week or two back and it was ostensibly to protest the goods and services tax. The incredible thing that I found was that groups went there to have petitions signed at the same time they were protesting the paying of tax, which is another subject for another day. They were asking people to sign a petition to maintain the full benefits for people over 65, full pensions for people with incomes of over $50,000. I find it incredulous that on the one hand people can oppose paying taxes, then somehow suggest that we should find money from saving it through government expenditures, and then oppose what is essentially a benefit to people who do not need it.

• (1130)

I know that we agreed earlier to only talk for 10 minutes. While I would have liked to have gone on for 20 minutes, I will stop here. I wanted to cover that one point. I have many others I would like to address but I will have to save them for another day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there a comment? The hon. member for Edmonton Southeast.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the member's speech. What does he think the proposal does to the principle of universality? Does it get away from "directions by indirections, fine", I think was Shakespeare's phrase. It has been explained to me that people paying taxes between 1951 and 1972 paid premiums based on their taxable income.

Will the member tell the members of the House and perhaps Canadians at large whether he thinks it is fair to people who were obliged to pay premiums based on income and happened to have provided for their retirement by keeping the OAS as part of their retirement package? Why should they now be penalized, bearing in mind that these people pay taxes on the same basis as the rest of us do based on ability to pay. It is hardly getting a free ride when they say that they are entitled to OAS because it was used in retirement planning and when they are perfectly prepared to pay income tax based on their taxable income now.

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I will try to address some of those questions. First, the point was made that at one time, I believe up until about 1972, a special tax was designed or designated to fund old age security. That has not been there for many years now, at least 15 years. I would think that if we were to look at how much came in through that tax and look at the benefits that have been paid out since that time we would find that what came in has been paid out many, many times since then.

To suggest that money paid 15, 20, 25 years ago is still around to pay benefits is unrealistic. We can all talk about unfairness. There is a certain element of unfairness. I believe it is most unfair to ask people who are in the workforce earning $27,000 a year, perhaps supporting families, to pay additional taxes so we can fund benefits for people who are essentially in a position to not really require them.

If you have an income of $50,000 a year in retirement, you must have a substantial asset base. I just cannot believe for the life of me that we should somehow be suggesting that these people deserve more, but in order for them to have more, people who are earning $27,000 a year in the workforce, struggling to make a living, should be asked to pay more tax. It makes no sense to me.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate with the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt. Is the hon. member going to speak for 10 minutes?

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I will be taking the full 20 minutes.

It is a pleasure to rise today and speak on this bill. I should say right at the outset that since I was elected to Parliament in November of last year, I have had two occasions to rise and speak on bills in a positive vein. From the opposition point of view, that is something that comes too infrequently. Certainly it is a pleasure to be able to do it.

When we consider the present bill before us, historically I should be standing before you speaking positively on the expansion of the universality principle; on the expansion of benefits to our seniors and to our families with children.

On March 7, 1984, our Prime Minister said, "Our position is simple and straightforward. We are in favour of universality and social programs and it shall not be touched". Over the period of time there were attempts, particularly in 1985, perhaps not to touch the universality aspect, but certainly to de-index pensions of seniors. Of course, an outcry arose and, as a result of that outcry, the Prime Minister saw the folly of his idea and backed off.

On October 15, 1988, in Summerside, Prince Edward Island, Mr. Mulroney again approached our seniors and told them, "Let me say a special word to the senior citizens. In the future, Canada will be doing more not less for all of you. As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved not diminished by our government which is committed to social justice and fairness for Canadians".

Now arising out of that particular quote, again I fully expected to be able to come before Parliament and, as an opposition member, pat the government on the back for the expansion of its social programs, for its assistance to the elderly and for coming up with better programs such as daycare and such as a better family allowance assistance for the families of Canada who are struggling today.

When I examined Bill C-28, and the government's approach to the family and to the seniors aspect, I found that this government, that had promised to make things better for our seniors, was reneging on that promise. I would suggest that it is attacking the very principle of universality that has grown so near and dear to us in Canada.

This clawback does not maintain the principle of universality as Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Wilson have contended. It marks the steady erosion—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope that the hon. member would recognize these individuals by their portfolios. Thank you.

Mr. Whittaker: I do apologize for that, Mr. Speaker.

The principle of universality has not been maintained, as the Prime Minister and Minister of Finance have contended. It marks the steady erosion of our social programs, down to a much lower denominator. From now on social programs will be for the poor only. They will be targeted for those in need and, thereby, made selective, not universal. The clawback will move our pension system closer to that of the United States. No pension exists in the United States as a right of citizenship, but it does in Canada for those over the age of 65. This is something that we in Canada, our parents, our grandparents and those before, have worked hard for over a lengthy period of time. And now we have seen the wedge being driven in by this government.

It is interesting to note that in a letter to a person in Edmonton, the chairman of the finance committee said: "We have decided to eliminate universality. While a clawback may be unfair and sneaky, it is there". Well I suggest that this clawback is unfair and it is sneaky. In fact, it does through the back door what this government has promised not to do—attack the very basis of universality that we in Canada have grown to understand as a right.

We do not need and we do not want a system that is based on need, that is based on a means test. We are different in Canada and we are proud of it. Throughout history we have not been the same as our neighbours to the south.

If we in the opposition have anything to say about it, I suggest we will not be the same in spite of how hard this government tries to harmonize those of us who were born and raised in Canada and those of us who have immigrated here and set up homes. It will not be able to suppress that difference in Canadians. In spite of the fact that we now have the free trade agreement, and those pressures within that free trade agreement to harmonize many aspects of our Canadian life that we hold near and dear, we shall not give up or give in without a fight. I suggest that pressures will be so enormous against the harmonization of our social programs with those of the United States, that this government will not be able to quiet the din that they will hear from all across Canada.

It is not just the goods and services tax that will hit our seniors and our families, it is methods such this clawback of old age security and family allowance that threatens the very principle that the basis of universality is built upon. We will hear the arguments in support of the clawback that is proposed in this bill, and have already heard some this morning, that those who make $50,000 a year really do not need the assistance of the old age security or the assistance of the family allowance. But what they fail to point out is that the system that has been set up, with a level now of $50,000, is the thin edge of the wedge. Any future government can drop that level to $40,000, to $30,000,or to $20,000, as it sees fit in order to break down our present system of pensions and family allowances. That is the crux of the argument. Once the door has been partially opened, it is but a small push to open it the rest of the way and create the flood toward the complete destruction of our social programs. We on this side of the House and in this corner of the House will not allow that to happen.

The other factor that we have to look at in this clawback is the fact that it is only partially indexed to the rate of inflation, so that up to 3 per cent is not taken into consideration from year to year.

At today's $50,000 level, as Mr. Wilson says, only approximately 4 per cent of Canadians are affected by the clawback. However, if we look at the facts, we know that within 10 years the number of seniors who will have at least part of their old age security clawed back will be one in twelve, or up 8 per cent from 128,000 to 300,000 persons. In 20 years, that number will be one in four, or one million people, or 25 per cent of those receiving it will now be giving at least part of it back. The amount will drop back so that eventually the average will drop.

Right now, if we look at family allowances, we know that the average Canadian income is $45,000. It does not take much imagination to see that within a year or two even those now making $45,000, with the rate of inflation going up at least 3 per cent, will be paying back at least part of what they get in family allowance. We have effectively turned our system into that of a means test. If you need it, you get it.

Our contention is that these people are already paying tax. The unfairness of this clawback is readily apparent. Those with two incomes in a family, perhaps one at $45,000 and the other at $35,000—will be excluded. They will not have to pay any of it back. Yet one person making $56,300 will end up having to pay all of their family allowance back to the government. They pay their taxes which go into this assistance. Now they are going to have to pay back what they are getting as a credit toward having a family. It is unfair. It is discrimination against those with families. They are being doubly taxed.

Similarly, it has been pointed out many times by seniors, that since the 1950s and until 1972, I believe up to 4 per cent of income was paid toward the old age security. In 1972 that was wrapped in and was not taken into account. I suggest that it is, in fact, part of the tax system and has continued to be paid since 1972. Many people point out that they have paid for their old age security. They have set their budgets accordingly and they have anticipated that income in calculating out their savings throughout that period. I would like to read to the House some comments and in one case almost a complete letter. A gentleman has written to me from Penticton, which is in my riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, and has asked if it would be possible to read his letter to the House of Commons. He states:

> The old age pension is a pension. That is how it is defined now. It is not welfare. It is a form of wealth. It was not granted for need, as welfare is, but for merit to deserving people as pensions are.
> The obvious objective of this government is to redefine that pension as welfare. They obviously hope to do that by taxing and treating it like welfare. Once that tax, and its new definition, has been accepted by Canadians the government can decrease it or eliminate it. They are already eliminating some people's old age pensions. Obviously they will not get much additional revenue from those few people so how safe are the pensions? This government obviously knows they may not be able to make this odious tax grab stick if it is challenged. No wonder they are spending millions of our tax dollars trying to trick Canadians into accepting their newly fabricated definition.
> Obviously then Canadians should not let this government tax anyone's old age pension any differently than any other pension. United we stand, divided we fall. Canadians shouldn't be deceived. It is obviously only to reduce the sympathy and support, that other Canadians might give to the first victims of this odious scheme, that the government has put the amount of their current means test high enough so that most pensioners will not be affected at this time. Who knows how much lower that amount will be in the future? Forty, thirty, twenty thousand or will the pension be abolished altogether? That seems most likely.

Cunningly these deceitful people are suggesting that other pensioners might get their own pensions increased from the funds extracted from their fellow pensioners. Is that likely? Can anyone believe that? These people have said they want to reduce the deficit. Are they not now actually cutting back on social programs? Are they likely then to increase anyone's old age pension? Can they be trusted? What is their record? Remember their actions, not their words? Do they deserve anyone's trust? Divide and conquer seems to be their dominant policy in relation to so many things.

Every person getting that pension now could lose it and there might well be no such pension in the future for any other deserving Canadians. No one's old age pension is safe.

Our government can obviously, even now if they choose, increase old age pensions without taking away anyone's pension. All they need do is to collect more taxes from all those people who are not now paying their fair share. Or they can raise the tax rate for all Canadians in the upper tax brackets. Or they can tax the excessive wealth that discriminatory tax policies make possible. How about the excessive wealth of the multi-millionaires and billionaires? Those people can't possibly earn such wealth can they? Do they need it?

It is signed by A. J. Lancey. That gives an idea of how people are viewing government and government policies. One of my constituents in East Gate, Manning Park, states in respect to what is happening:

I am writing you to express my deep concern over the finance minister's proposed shabby treatment of Canadians in their twilight years. I am referring of course to Mr. Wilson's proposed removal of universality of the old age pension through his scheme to grab it back through taxation.

It seems to me that when you contribute all your working life and in fact are obliged to contribute as in the case of old age security tax, that it takes a pretty damned dishonest as well as uncaring person, to seek to snatch away your well earned benefit just about the time you had every fair and reasonable right to start enjoying such benefit.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the people of Canada are not only disappointed with the policies of this government but they are annoyed by what has been laid out on the table for them for the future.

• (1150)

It is clear from many groups throughout Canada that they look upon this as a nasty tax. The National Council of Welfare has stated: "Universality, the principle under which programs are available to all Canadians regardless of income, is dead". The National Anti-Poverty Organization has said that: "The government is obviously ending universality but does not want to actually say those words". One Voice, a seniors group, has stated that: "Changes represent an erosion of universality and would unfairly target senior citizens". The Vanier Institute of the Family has said that: "The proposals effectively withdraw what little support remains for the family".

I will not be the only voice speaking from the wilderness. There are many of us across Canada who are telling this government that enough is enough. Leave our social programs alone.

[Translation]

Mrs. Vézina: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a brief comment and ask my fellow member a question.

I would simply remind him that before I entered politics in 1984, I worked with families and with seniors and I very well know the difference between the principle of universality and the practice of it.

The measure presented by the Canadian Government is fair and equitable.

I met seniors throughout Canada in the last six months and I discovered full citizens who want to share and take part in the Canadian challenge that we are offering them as a Canadian Government.

The measure we are proposing therefore does respect the practice of universality, which for me means ensuring that every Candian who is 65 or over has at least a minimum. Name me just one Canadian (over 65) who does not get an old age security cheque! The very principle of the old age security pension is to provide needy persons with a minimum and as a responsible government, our responsibility is to help the less fortunate.

I would therefore like to ask my colleague to tell me how he can say to Canadians who are 65 or older that the measure we are advocating does not respect universality. We are asking those earning at least $50,000 net to show solidarity and I know that many Canadians I have met agree to take this challenge because together we must have some extra funds to improve our social programs, just to help the seniors who really need it.

[English]

Mr. Whittaker: I am somewhat surprised. I have a great deal of respect for the minister. I think that for the most part, she is an excellent minister. She has the best interests of seniors at heart.

However, having said that, I am somewhat surprised at the minister. She told the House that over the last six months she has spoken to various seniors groups, and perhaps they agree that we have to attack the problem of the deficit and deficit financing, but I do not think that any of those groups have said that they are in agreement, either partially or in principle, with this massive claw-back, this unfair double taxation of what they, as seniors, have worked so hard to gain throughout their lives.

They do not mind paying their fair share and they are very clear on that, but they do not want to have to pay more than their share. They want others who are not paying their share, such as the large corporations, such as the wealthy, such as the high income earners with incomes over $80,000 a year, to pay their share. I suggest to the minister that they are now in their golden years, now in the years that they have looked forward to for travelling, enjoying themselves, relaxing and not having to worry about where their money is coming from. They do not feel that they should have to carry the burden of taxation in Canada.

I agree with them. I do not think that they should, after all of these years of working and assisting the government in bringing taxation into the coffers, have to do more than their fair share. Let us tax those with the ability to pay, as they have suggested. Let us not attack the family. Let us not grab from the seniors when they are least able to defend themselves because I, for one, will stand in my corner and I will kick and I will fight and I will stand up for the rights of those seniors if they cannot do it themselves.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle–Émard): Mr. Speaker, one of the proudest heritages of this country is the fact that we are, indeed, a compassionate and tolerant society. I am very proud to stand up on this side of the House and say that that is the heritage of the Liberal party to this country.

I would like to congratulate the member for his speech and for his very clear enunciation of policies which we in the Liberal party have created since the Second World War. I would like to welcome him in this broad Liberal philosophy that we have created, this philosophy of understanding the needs of the poor and the disadvantaged and the downtrodden.

• (1200)

My question to the member is, could he possibly explain to this House how it is that the Conservative Party has a philosophy which is so alien to that which is held by the vast majority of Canadians? Does he understand why the Conservative Party and this government are prepared to claw back from senior citizens money which they have paid into the government's funding in order to maintain a decent and universal system of pensions in this country?

Does the member feel that the government adequately consulted with seniors in this country before expropriating their savings? I would like to ask the member if he could possibly explain to us how it is that we have elected a government which is so foreign to the needs and the aspirations of Canadians.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his questions. I would like to point out that the social programs that we have seen developed in Canada are the legacy of the likes of M. J. Coldwell, J. S. Woodsworth, Tommy Douglas, David Lewis and Edward Broadbent. We in this party are very proud of those former leaders and the fact that they were able to show the government in power at that time the error of its ways and the ways of the future. We thank them very much for seeing that and for bringing in the legislation that has been near and dear to and a basis of our party for so long.

To turn to the hon. member's question with respect to the government, I often wonder how a government that speaks and talks as if it is caring can then trip the very people that it says it is caring about and tramp them into the mud as it stomps by them. It is truly a shocking policy of an uncaring government.

We have worked so long in the past to try to make equal some of those within our society, and now under the free trade agreement with its various pressures for harmonization, all of the things that have been worked toward since the Second World War in particular, and since the turn of the century with the advent in the early 1900s of some of our old age security systems, are being eroded because of an uncaring government.

I think that we on this side of the House must ensure that the people of Canada well recognize that there is more on the plate of this government for them in the future. We must stand up and ensure that measures that will hurt the poor, measures that will hurt those on fixed incomes, measures that will hurt the family and measures that will hurt seniors will be stopped and blocked now.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I would agree to talk for ten minutes and after to have five minutes of questions to permit others of my colleagues to also have time to participate in this debate.

Also I will talk about Bill C-28, the income tax review.

[Translation]

In fact, about the Income Tax Act and related legislation. Mr. Speaker, I think it is important that taxpayers, that all Canadians be aware of the major aspects of this Bill. In fact, the measures contained in this enabling legislation reflect the commitment made by the Government to reduce the deficit and improve the fairness of our tax system. These measures include a high-income surtax; second, a deduction in respect of part-time attendant care expenses for the working disabled; third, the refundable sales tax credit will be doubled and the income threshold at which the credit starts to be reduced will be increased; furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the new tax on large corporations and modifications to the existing corporate surtax are expected to raise an additional one billion dollars from the corporate sector in the first full year of application of these measures.

Mr. Speaker, those were a few highlights, but the 1989 budget's measures are in line with the objectives of the 1987 income tax reform, and they support—in fact they will provide for a more stable tax base which will help the government deal more efffectively with the deficit. They also help create an investment climate that is a response to economic rather than fiscal considerations. Finally, and most important, Mr. Speaker, they improve the fairness of our tax system by requiring high-income Canadians and the corporate sector to contribute to a greater extent to meeting the government's revenue requirements.

Mr. Speaker, when we talk about raising taxes and reducing the deficit, it is always difficult to explain to taxpayers that they must contribute more to the economy of their country. However, the government's perspective— On the weekend in Jonquière, the riding whose residents I have the honour to represent in this House, I was telling taxpayers that our government was even better than it was in 1984. I explained that in 1984, many of our Tory members had been elected for the very first time. We did not have much experience but we were ready and willing, and we really wanted to help improve the situation in this country and reduce the debt so that we could maintain social programs. Gradually, however, because of our lack of experience and at a time when we might have been able to introduce new legislation and apply new measures, we had to cope with a series of political scandals, which was a very trying time for all members in this House.

The government has now been given a second mandate. It has a very solid agenda, Mr. Speaker, and we now have a chance to implement decisions which had been postponed or delayed. Now we have to do something. We have no choice. The debt is now 324 billion dollars and costs us between 80 and 100 million dollars a day in interest. One hundred million dollars a day! In the Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean region, when we talk about what it costs to build a highway from the Saguenay to Québec City, we are talking about $200 to $300 million. With two or three days' worth of interest payments, we could build a highway so that the Saguenay would have far more convenient and safer access to the Québec City area, for instance. Unfortunately, we cannot pick up those two or three days' worth of interest payments and take them home. The government can't do that, and meanwhile, the whole region may have to wait ten, twenty or thirty years for that highway.

One hundred million dollars a day in interest payments, Mr. Speaker—You know what our social programs cost, including old age security pensions and family allowances. If we didn't have to pay $100 million a day in interest on our debt, we could give a lot more to the taxpayer. One hundred million a day in interest payments, Mr. Speaker, is as if every day, the government sent a cheque for $20,000 to 5,000 people. Do you realize how many people we could pay this kind of salary in one year? That is what our debt costs us every day.

Mr. Speaker, we must understand that when we want to reduce a debt—Remember that in 1984, when we came to power, the debt was $200 billion. Five or six years later, the debt has now increased to $324 billion. Canadians may not realize this but when we came to power, the government's annual deficit was $38 billion. So when we were elected, with this $200 billion debt plus the annual deficit, we were in for $238 billion. The following year, we were able to reduce the deficit from $238 billion to $234 billion, but $34 billion was still added to the deficit, and the process goes on. Now we have managed to keep our annual deficit down to about 28 or 30 billion dollars, but it keeps adding up.

And that is why the government can no longer afford to provide these social programs, unless it takes certain steps that are necessary.

I think that event if my colleagues in the NDP and the Liberal party, are against tax increases, they will understand that, as a responsible government, we have to act, we have to do what is necessary, because otherwise we would be acting irresponsibly towards future generations of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I saw the same thing when I was a member of the Legislative Committee on Bill C–21. I travelled across this country for three weeks. We visited all 10 provinces of this country. I saw provinces with an unemployment rate that was lower than average, and I saw others with an unemployment rate that was higher. In British Columbia, I saw a very prosperous city, Vancouver, a delightful place. However, I saw other parts of Canada like Newfoundland which is not as well off as the other provinces. I met people in St. John's. The economic situation is different.

With a vast country like ours, the government has to try and reduce regional disparity and get the richer provinces to pay for the poorer provinces, so that everybody will be happy in this beautiful country of ours and we can have social programs for all Canadians.

Still on the subject of unemployment insurance reform, and I think this is an important point, about 200 different groups appeared before our committee with briefs in which they explained their views. Across this country, people were saying: "Sure, we agree with your plan to do more through unemployment insurance reform, but not with what you want to remove, what you want to remedy. If you want to use $800 million to train workers, when 30 per cent of our young people drop out before they even finish high school, if you want to spend $800 million more on training, that's fine. But don't take the money from the unemployment insurance fund. Take it out of taxes. Get more money from the taxpayers. Unfortunately, we can no longer afford to do that, either as a government or as Canadians.

We now have to take the money we have to reallocate. Let me give you an example, Mr. Speaker. Let us assume we have 989 different programs in this country. There may be 1,000 or 1,050 but let us say there are 989 different programs. If every time we want to give Canadians a little more, we have to add one more program, there comes a time when we have to ask the question: Where is the money going to come from?

That is the problem. We have to look at these programs and cancel the ones that are no longer effective or not as good as they were, and then take the money and reallocate it to better programs that will meet the needs of Canadians, that respond to the present situation and reflect the Government's new perspective and the new needs of Canadians.

So that was an example of using new funds. Remember what the Liberals said when we cut the Katimavik program. We even had Senator Hébert on a hunger strike in front of the Senate Chamber! He said it didn't make sense to cut the program, that we were doing a terrible job as a Government. However, nobody even talks about the program anymore, and I think everybody will agree we were right to do what we did. We saved money and we took that money and spent it on other programs.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation before the House today reflects the government's policy of trying to maintain the standard of living and quality of life of Canadians and ensure we can keep our social programs. We have to bear this in mind, Mr. Speaker. We have no choice. This is serious stuff! We have this debt and there are no two ways about it.

I want to ask all members of this House to work together so that this bill can be referred as soon as possible to committee, so the government can proceed with the other items on its agenda.

I think unemployment insurance reform Bill C–21, will be particularly important.

I also believe that the goods and services tax, and I will talk about that later because I have a lot to say about it—If my collegues have any questions, I will be glad to try answer them.

[English]

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his speech. I have a question for him. He indicated in his opening remarks that he would like to address the bill so that perhaps Canadians could understand it. I have a copy of the bill in my hand which contains some 84 pages and which proposes to amend a number of different acts. I would like to ask my colleague basically about integrity.

In 1987 the Minister of Finance indicated that the surtax which had been brought in would be removed when a new sales tax was introduced. We know that there is going to be a new sales tax introduced. That is what we have been talking about for the last little while. Lo and behold, if we look at Bill C-28, and I direct my hon. friend specifically to clause 47 of that bill, we see that Section 180.1 of the Income Tax Act is going to be amended, not in fact to remove the surtax but rather—and I wonder how many Canadians really know or appreciate this—to increase it from 3 per cent to 5 per cent across the board, and in addition, to increase it a further 3 per cent for those people who pay over $15,000 in tax in a taxation year, bringing it to 8 per cent.

I would ask my colleague to comment first on the fact that his own Minister of Finance indicated on June 18, 1987 that when the new sales tax was brought in the surtaxes would be removed, and why we have in Bill C-28 not only a failure to remove surtaxes but an increase of those surtaxes. This on top of the sales tax that this callous government is expecting Canadians to pay.

[Translation]

Mr. Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, I understand my colleague is trying to find something in the Bill whereby the government will get more money.

However, my colleague forgets to mention the good points for many Canadians.

I see my colleague smile. He does not seem to find any in the bill! What about the tax credit we have almost doubled, Mr. Speaker! I think that is a very positive measure that our government is presenting just so low-income Canadians can have more money and be able to handle the various cost-of-living and other increases in this country. We propose to do the same thing with the future goods and services tax! Let us remember, and I remind my colleague, that the new 9 per cent tax will replace the old 13.5 per cent tax that is now applied to nearly 75,000 manufacturers. There are about 22,000 different regulations and interpretations to collect the 13.5 per cent tax. We will do away with that and replace it with a new 9 per cent tax.

So that low-income Canadians can absorb this 9 per cent tax, we will send them four cheques a year to compensate for it. For a family with two children, for example, that amounts to about $715. For a single person, it is over $400. That is an example of the tax credit that we will give to low-income individuals to help them with this new tax.

The same thing is in this bill: the sales tax credit is being raised to help give taxpayers the income they need to deal with difficulties and meet their obligations and buy things as they like.

I think that Canadians—I can tell you, I met people from Revenu budgétaire who do tax returns. This is a voluntary organization in my riding that helps low-income taxpayers get the famous sales tax credit and the other amounts the government gives every year to those whose income is under $15,000.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): May I ask whether we are going to have the pleasure of a 20-minute speech or a 10-minute speech from the hon. member for Burin—St. George's?

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I believe I can say what I want to say in 10 minutes. That might come as a surprise to you, Sir, but I will do my very best.

I suppose it is appropriate that the last two Tories who spoke scattered from the chamber very quickly, particularly the gentleman from Jonquière who puts on a very brave front. He is probably still within the hearing of my voice and I want to say to him before he disappears altogether that I admire him for his ability to put on a brave front. I caution him, however, that he ought not to carry that too far because nobody is believing the Tory line on this issue. This Bill C-28 is a disaster from the word go, and the less he talks for the record, the better for him down the road, assuming he has a place down the road.

• (1220)

I want to come just for a moment, to the gentleman from Edmonton Northwest because I found what he had to say to be among the more interesting, if incredible things, said in this debate thus far. I watched him single-handedly bear that public debt for all of Canada and my heart went out to him, that this young man, as virile as he is, should have to carry alone that load of many millions and billions of dollars. carrying it all by himself.

I would like to ask him where he was last November when his Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance were out campaigning, completely ignoring any possibility that there might be a debt load or that it might be crippling the country as we are now being told and, instead, were promising all kinds of things in the billions of dollars. When they were confronted with the possibility that maybe this would cost a few dollars or this might only be election time promises which would be forgotten after, we remember the immortal words of the gentleman who was the Minister of Finance: "These are not even promises, these are spending commitments. We are going to do these because it is within our budgetary framework and our fiscal ability to do them".

That was in November. Now it is the following October. It is hardly a year since and what are we told now? We are told that this nation is grinding to a halt because of the debt. Well, which is it? Is it in good shape as he told us last November, or do we have to attack seniors and families now to claw back every last cent we can to save us from grinding to a halt completely as a country? Which is it? Is it the story we were told last November that everything was hunky-dory or is it the story we are being told now by the gentleman from Edmonton Northwest, he who carried single-handedly that great debt on his own very shoulders this morning?

If they want to be able to meet their spending commitments, as the minister characterized them last fall, if they want to find a few shekels to better finance the public debt, let them do something that is completely within their power, without attacking the widows and the seniors of this country, without clawing back money that people have come to regard as part of their entitlement right back to the 1970s, as the other gentleman from Edmonton Southeast so rightly pointed out just now.

People in the 1970s made certain investments and they ought to be able to count on the return on those investments now in 1989 and years down the road. My point a moment ago was this, if they want to find a few shekels to better finance the public debt, let them do something that is within their power to do. Let them lower the interest rate one-half point or a point. Why is it that in every other matter, we have to be cheek by jowl with the Americans, but on the matter of interest rates, we have to be four points ahead of them?

If they want to ease the public debt situation, the ability to meet payments, they can cut down the payments substantially by lowering the interest rate. They would, in the process, not only eliminate a lot of pain for the government but for a lot of people who are suffering under this high interest rate inflicted by this government or aided and abetted by this government at the very least.

Now the gentleman from Edmonton Northwest also talked about fairness. In courtesy to him, I did not completely laugh out loud, but when he talks about this issue in terms of fairness, he might as well also try and tell us, yes, that Dracula is really a nice fellow.

Old age security is now a fair system. Anybody who tampers with it, as this bill would do, cannot in the same mouthful pretend that he is doing it in the interest of fairness. There is nothing fair about this exercise whatsoever.

This claw-back of family allowance and pensions—we should see it for what it is—is simply and despicably a foot in the door approach. This is just the beginning. Seniors realize this and that is why we are beginning to hear from them again on this particular issue. They saved the issue the first time around when the Prime Minister went back on his now famous sacred trust commitment. In 1985 he tried to go back on it and the seniors saved it. I am depending on them again to save it this time.

They are already mobilizing the so-called grey power out there. They are mobilizing, bless their hearts, and they are going to save the day for us on this one because they see it for what it is. It is not just a claw-back on incomes of $50,000 and over, no, it is more than that. It is the foot in the door.

What guarantee do they have, they ask me as I travel around this country, that the $50,000 will not be $45,000 and then will not be $40,000 in another year. Of course, with inflation and the ever increasing cost of living, $50,000, even if it were frozen there, will not be worth quite what it is now a few years down the road.

What guarantee do my people in Belleoram, Beaubois and Barachois Brook have that the $50,000 will not be $40,000? I am delighted to mention Belleoram because I see right in front of me the gentleman from Labrador who had the good sense to be born in Belleoram.

Why then are the Tories doing this? Why this bill at all, why the claw-back? What is this all about? I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that like almost everything we are seeing in the House these days, whether it is VIA Rail or the sabotaging of job creation programs or the UI changes or the GST or the ruling yesterday on the west coast fishery, it is all part of the same right wing agenda, it is all part of the same kotowing strategy with the Americans.

Do not forget that the Prime Minister's curriculum vitae basically is that of being a branch plant manager for an American multinational. He really never stopped being that when he became the Prime Minister. Instead, he just set about making the country a branch plant operation. We see it here, as insidious as it is, it is here too.

He is aware, and it has been pointed out to him many times, that our social programs, medicare, family allowance and old age security net are much more adequate here than in the United States. The senior who lives in Michigan has not the same support system as the senior in Manitoba. The senior who lives in New Hampshire has not the same support system from the public purse as does the senior who lives in Newfoundland.

It is all part of the old level field commitment that the Prime Minister made to the Americans. "Give me time", he said in effect, "Give me time and I will beat my crowd down to your level. My medicare, my pension, my family allowance will be as measly as yours if you give me time to work on it". This bill is just the latest cowardly manifestation of that gentleman's agenda, an agenda that will reduce us to a branch plant, a shadow, if you like, of what is happening in the United States.

There are a thousand other reasons which I will not go into because I gave the Chair a commitment that I would finish in 10 minutes to allow some others to speak. I thank you, Sir, for your indulgence. I feel strongly about this issue and I urge my colleagues to vote against it for the sake of the seniors across the country.

Mr. Jordan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague for another display of great oratorical skills for which he has become famous. I have a simple question. I know there is no point in presenting this to members opposite; I would not get the answer.

This new tax was supposed to be up front. To me a primary way of having something up front would be having it visible on the sales slip. I understand this will not be on the sales slip. It is hard to believe that every speech we have heard this morning from the opposite side of the House seems to suggest that this is going to be implemented to reduce the deficit. It was supposed to be revenue neutral, but now it is obvious that that cause has been abandoned. It was supposed to be simple, but I can tell you, Sir, that any small businessman is going to be driven completely around the bend on this one.

I wonder if my colleague would care to comment on those three basic, simple rules which were supposed to be held in place but have been totally abandoned.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for Leeds—Grenville. He is so right, of course. Whether we are talking about the clawback on pensions and family allowance or about the goods and services tax, we can see the same pattern. The pattern is one of smoke and mirrors. It is one of we will say we are doing this, while we are really doing that—we will say to pensioners in 1984 that we would never, never tamper with old age pensions and then in the spring of 1985 we will go out and try to do it; we will say to the voters in the fall of 1988 that if we ever have a goods and services tax, I assure you it will be revenue neutral and it will be visible on the sales slip. Then a few months later when push comes to shove, when it comes time to get the legislation before the House, all the talk of visibility is gone, all the talk of being revenue neutral is gone.

We will say to voters when we are looking for their votes in 1984 that we will not only protect and preserve VIA Rail, we will enhance it; but when it comes to the crunch in 1989 of course we will do the exact opposite.

The Prime Minister will say here in the House that we are fighting to save VIA Rail. When we get to Hong Kong we will have a slip of the tongue and we will tell the truth, say we are getting rid of VIA Rail back in Canada. We will say to people in 1984 on the television debate: "Is not patronage awfully shocking?" Then, we will get aboard the plane with the press boys and let our hair down and say: "I would do the same thing if I were there at the time".

That is what we are dealing with—unabashed, bare faced hypocrisy. We cannot believe a word the Prime Minister tells us. We cannot believe a word the Minister of Finance tells us on THIS issue, and that is what makes this bill on clawback so frightening. Even as dastardly as this reality is, we never know if this is only half the punch we are going to get because we never know what this crowd is going to come up with next.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Before I recognize the next speaker, may I ask the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam whether her speech will be a 20-minute or a 10-minute one.

Ms. Langan: It will be 20 minutes, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Then I will have to recognize the hon. member for Nepean, and following her I will recognize the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful for the chance to rise today and speak on Bill C-28, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and the Old Age Security Act. There are 59 different amendments to the Income Tax Act and I could not possibly discuss them in the time allotted. Hence, I will confine my comments to the way in which this government has dealt with the senior citizens of this country.

The clawback proposal puts a special tax on our senior citizens, a tax that does not apply to anyone else in this country. In this way the clawback is anti-senior. I am one who feels that the senior citizens in our country deserve our utmost respect. This government's proposed clawback are the ultimate signs of disrespect.

Beginning in the fiscal year 1990-91 the government will effectively end universality of social benefits in Canada. People who bought and paid for old age securities in the years before 1971 were assured by the House of Commons in debate, when tax reform went through in 1971, that they would continue to be entitled to old age security.

Income Security for Canadians, a document put out in 1970 by the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Hon. John Munro, promised seniors in this country that any payments they were to make into old age security were theirs.

Today we are hearing that in a couple of years from now no longer will those same seniors be allowed to keep the money that they paid in so that they could look after themselves in their old age. Now these same senior citizens are finding that rather than the government looking after them they have to look after the government. This is an absolutely disgraceful situation.

In 1984 the Prime Minister said that social programs were a sacred trust, never to be tampered with. Well, he lied. And those same seniors told him he lied, right here on Parliament Hill. I say that we Canadians are beginning to realize just how loose the government is with the word "trust". We Canadians are beginning to realize just how little we can trust this government.

This government's proposed clawback of old age security is just one example of many showing how this government does not have the best interests of Canadians at heart.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): May I ask the hon. member to repeat. Did the hon. member say that the Prime Minister lied? Did she indicate that in her speech? If she did then she knows what she must do.

Mrs. Gaffney: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the comment. The proposed clawback will tax the benefits of old age pensions at a rate of 15 per cent of an individual's net income over $50,000, rising to 100 per cent for incomes reaching $76,000. The government says that this will affect only 4.3 per cent of seniors.

As I pointed out in the Nepean Clarion, this is but the tip of the iceberg. Because the $50,000 threshold is to rise at a rate of 3 per cent less than inflation, clawback will start at $36,000 by the year 2000, and in 20 years it will start at $28,000 and affect 2 million Canadians.

These same Canadians were the ones who did without in their early years when their children were small. They did not take the trip to the southern climate. They did not buy the new car. They put that money away. These were ordinary people on an average income who were saving for the day when they could take that holiday or purchase that new car, and now that money has to be given back to the government. It is their money.

In an August 1989 article in The Voice, a bulletin by the Canadian Seniors Network, the whole concept of the clawback is summed up perfectly. The article reads:

> The finance minister argues that since everyone receives a cheque the program is still universal, but if you give someone a cheque and take it back a year later that is no more than a short-term loan.

How right they are; a short-term loan. What a disgusting sign of respect for our seniors. Unfortunately the government has refused to take into consideration the recommendations made by the people, and as far as the government is concerned the people do not matter.

Senior citizens in this country have played an integral part in the building of this nation. They have toiled to make Canada the greatest nation on earth. Yet, what does our present government do to show its appreciation? It strips those same senior citizens of everything they have worked for. This government has spit in the collective face of our senior citizen population.

Last year during the election the Prime Minister of this country made repeated promises to keep these benefits for the elderly when he said: "As long as I am the Prime Minister of Canada social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved, not diminished by our government." The Prime Minister of this country made that statement.

I suppose the Prime Minister thinks that clawing back money from our seniors is an improvement in their welfare. What other kinds of mixed up ideas is this government going to introduce? It slashes VIA Rail by 51 per cent and claims to be saving it. It proposes a tax that is supposedly revenue neutral, yet it will raise $24 billion in 1991. Scary proposals.

• (1240)

The clawback to the seniors of this country strikes a severe blow to the programs. It cuts at the quick of Canadian universality, the universality that has been a unifying force in our country, a country that prides herself in being the most successful in the world in taking care of her citizens.

This government has been undermining that approach. It has increased the gap between the haves and the have nots, between the young and the old. It is imperative that this government listen to Canadian citizens and eliminate the clawback.

I would like to quote from Robert Choquette of the French Canadian Academy. I think that he put it extremely well when he wrote:

> It excites me when I think of millions of men and women—different from me and different from one another in origin, language, culture, history and tradition—who, too, think of Canada as their country. And I love the thought that everyone, or almost everyone, has always wanted her to be greater still, more beautiful, more confident of herself and her destiny. Those who discovered Canada felt that way. So did those who came later and toiled to develop the broad expanse waiting for plough and people. So did those who continue to arrive on her shores—because they have faith in her, because for them and for their children, Canada represents security and freedom and is the best answer to their hopes.

We must strengthen that security, not diminish it as this government and this bill are attempting to do.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to open my remarks by suggesting that the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard and the other hon. members in this room might like to talk to Stanley Knowles about the struggle and the fight for pensions in this country. They should think about the history of pensions in this country and they should think about why we have universality in this country. These are all major improvements. Universality in this country took place only after a minority government was forced by New Democrats to introduce it.

I would like to think about the year 1926 when Mackenzie King introduced a pension plan, $20 a month with a means test. If a senior had any savings at all, no pension. I would suggest that the Tory government today is following in that Liberal tradition and moving us back to the means test, back to the kind of pension that you get if you happen to meet a means test. I think hon. members in this room have expressed their respect for

Stanley Knowles and those who went before him by naming him, after 40 years of dedicated service and a sustained fight for good pensions in this country, an honorary officer of the Chamber with a seat at the table.

This legislation flies in the face of that parliamentary struggle, that parliamentary tradition, for which Stanley Knowles stands. This legislation with a claw in the door is a clawback on universality not only in pensions but in family allowances. The hon. Minister of State for Employment and Immigration and Minister of State for Seniors, in the question and comment period, talked about talking to seniors' groups which agree with this legislation. Yet when I challenged that statement last spring and asked the minister to name one, she was unable to do so.

I named in a statement in this House a long list of seniors' groups which oppose this clawback, and I would hope that before this legislation is indeed passed into law, sadly, that the hon. Minister of State for Employment and Immigration and Minister of State for Seniors could give us a list of the seniors groups which indeed support this legislation.

Last spring when this budget was introduced I was so alarmed by what the inference of the clawbacks was that I asked the Minister of Finance to explain to us whether he believed that, while 4 per cent of people have their pensions clawed back today, it is acceptable that in 20 years 25 per cent of people will have their pensions clawed back. His response was that the government would be reviewing the situation and that "we are acting when it is appropriate".

I would suggest that today, based on this legislation, we are indeed reviewing pension programs. In this instance the review is a backward step, a nasty step, a grabby step, and a step that should put all seniors in this country on their guard that their pensions will be continually eroded.

I asked the Minister of Finance, if we are talking about a vague review, how do we as Canadians know which way he is going to review it? The clawback that is being proposed is like quicksand into which more and more elderly Canadians are about to sink.

My question was: Is it acceptable to the minister that in 20 years one in four Canadians would be caught in that quicksand? His response was: "No, it is not acceptable". Yet the projection based on this legislation is that it is what we will be facing 20 years hence.

The hon. member from Edmonton Northwest said during the question and comments that obviously having a $50,000 a year income meant that one was operating with a substantial tax base and a substantial income base. Yes, indeed it does today, but the projections again show that by tomorrow—tomorrow meaning 20 to 25 years from now—we will be faced with over a million Canadians who are eligible today for old age pensions, who would not be eligible under this proposal.

I was so concerned about this—not only from the point of view that over a million Canadians would be faced with this in 20 years but also from the point of view of a two tier system or a breach of the universality to which Canada is committed—that I went to the Library of Parliament and asked if indeed under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms this piece of legislation would be acceptable.

The letter I received back from the Library of Parliament quoted subsection 15(1) of the Charter which reads:

> Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental and physical disability.

The letter that I received back went on to say:

> It is possible to argue that a separate system of taxation for Canadians aged 65 and over is discrimination based on age as one segment of the population would be treated differently from the rest, solely on the basis of age. However, there is an argument to be made that even if such a system is discriminatory it is justified.

I would expect that the government based on the legislation it has introduced would be trying to argue that this is justified under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Many Canadians and I believe that the Charter is very, very clear and very explicit on this point.

Proponents of the budget could argue that the purpose of old age security payments is to assist lower income Canadians. The whole basis on which our Canadian pension system is based is that it is there for all Canadians when they reach a certain age. It has nothing to do with what their income is. With a progressive tax system, those who earn enough would be paying their fair share of taxes in an equitable way and those who are not would receive the full benefit of the pension.

Many of the speakers today have referred to the comments by the chairman of the finance committee about seniors. He said that they live at a slower pace and they do not spend money in the same sense that you and I do. Well, I guess if you do not have as much money as Members of Parliament have, you do not spend as much. He said that older people do not wear out their clothes. Is there some magic fabric that older people have in their clothes so that the clothes do not wear out? He said they do not wear out their furniture. Do older people have some kind of levitation that they do not actually sit on the furniture when they are sitting down, Mr. Speaker? Of course older people wear out their clothes, of course their furniture wears out. The difference is that older people do not have the disposable incomes that you and I have to replace those things so they do not spend as much money. I think it is absolutely shameful that a Member of Parliament should flaunt his good fortune at the expense of the seniors in our country, belittle them and suggest that their needs are not as great because they have achieved a certain age.

The Tory government knows that seniors, because of the very fact that their incomes are less, do not have the means to fight back. However, they have the network and they put that network together in 1984. But, Mr. Speaker, it is hardly fair that the seniors in this country should have to fight the same fight every four years. I would suggest that the government ought to rethink its introduction of this legislation and rethink the kinds of commitments it has made during election periods to the seniors of this country.

I would like to talk for a couple of minutes about how the clawback is really going to work. A worker earning $40,000 a year today and watching his or her income rise with inflation would be earning enough by the time he or she retired to be caught in the clawback for both pensions and family allowance.

For retirees the clawback is more complex, it phases in more slowly,. but a simple rule of thumb is that a worker who earns at his or her age, say a 28 year old worker earning $28,000 or the average industrial wage, will be hit by the clawback by the time he or she retires. This assumes that incomes keep pace with inflation and that retirement income is 70 per cent of pre-retirement income.

If the government is successful, through the free trade deal and other economic factors in keeping workers' wages well behind inflation, then I would suggest that possibly as many pensioners as I am predicting will not be caught in the clawback. But that may suggest yet another piece of the over-all agenda of this government when it comes to working people, retired people, women and children and, in particular, those who are disadvantaged.

The implication is that the clawback of these social benefits will hit average income earners, not just the rich, in a very few years. Average Canadians will lose the benefits of the social programs that make us distinct from the U.S. More and more of our social programs will become poorer and poorer and more targeted and available only to those considered to be in need.

I suggest it is a very, very clever strategy on the part of this government to introduce this legislation by going after those who earn $50,000 or more. Of course we all say people who earn $50,000 or more should be paying taxes. But what the government does not say is how that projects, and who is next, and who is next and who is next. I would suggest that it is the same kind of philosophy that introduces amendments to the unemployment insurance bill, the inference of which is that we must change this, we must get those lazy people to work one or two more weeks before they go on to this program, and that most workers indeed somehow fiddle the system.

It is very clever strategy. It is strategy designed to bring out the worst in all of us, to bring out that in us which says, "I am working hard, why is he or she not?", without ever putting ourselves into his or her boots. I would suggest that these clawbacks on the pensions and the family allowance indeed are indicative of the kinds of over-all policy which the government has.

On family allowances, the proportion of families affected by the clawback will be more than double in 10 years. On old age security, the Minister of Finance likes to point out that his clawback will affect only 4 per cent of seniors. I repeat that in 10 years the number of pensioners seeing at least part of their old age pension clawed back will be one in 12, or 30,000, and in 20 years it will be one in four, or one million pensioners.

I think there are some fundamental questions that must be asked about this legislation which Canadians will be asking. They will be asking, why should an individual be entitled to receive $100,000 in capital gains, tax free, but lose the $4,000 he or she gets in old age security simply because it was paid as a universal social benefit? About family allowances and old age security, Canadians will be asking why the government is introducing a new tax when they are already taxed. Why should a special tax be levied on children and on the elderly?

Mr. Milliken: They are vulnerable.

Ms. Langan: They are vulnerable. That is exactly why.

Canadians will be asking if the intention is to raise money from the rich, why not do it through a more progressive tax system instead of a super tax on children and a super tax on seniors? Why not raise marginal rates at the top to 32 per cent instead of taxing back family allowance and old age security?

Canadians will be asking what will the unique identity of Canada be in a few years when our social programs exist to serve only those in need? Will our social programs not be just like those in the U.S.—leaner and meaner, as all means-tested programs are?

Canadians will be asking how long will the population support the maintenance of social programs from which they are effectively excluded as beneficiaries? Canadians will also be asking will need be redefined downwards as it has been in Britain and in the U.S. and as it has already been with our UI program and other welfare programs?

Many hon. members before me have quoted the Prime Minister's comments on CP wire on March 7 when he said: "Our position is simple and straightforward. We are in favour of universality in social programs and it shall not be touched". Another remark, almost equally as famous, made on October 15 in Summerside, P.E.I., was "As long as I am Prime Minister of Canada social benefits, especially those for the elderly, will be improved, not diminished by our government".

Has the Prime Minister lost control? Has he lost control of the government? I wanted to believe him. The pensioners and the parents in this country wanted to believe him. They even were willing to believe him after the 1984 election when he attempted to mess around with the pension program. But I suggest that although Canadians have now given him a second chance, a third is not likely because actions speak louder than words and this government's actions have very clearly demonstrated that the things the Prime Minister said mean nothing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When we return after three o'clock, the hon. member will have 10 minutes for questions and comments.

It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

VIOLENCE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise the concerns of the citizens of Newcastle, New Brunswick and in fact all New Brunswickers who are in a state of panic due to the series of violent deaths which have occurred there in the last few months.

These crimes have been most violent and most heinous. I understand the RCMP has assumed control of the investigation of these murders, but on the basis of the information that I have been given the RCMP has been extremely short staffed in New Brunswick due in part to its new peacekeeping role.

I am further advised that some members of the force who have an intimate knowledge of Newcastle, New Brunswick have not been utilized in the investigation due to the lack of available personnel.

I urge the minister to commit the additional staff necessary to carry out a full, complete and expeditious investigation immediately.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted with the appearance of the blue recycling boxes provided to all our offices in the House. However, I do believe that it would be much better if much of the material placed in the baskets was never produced at all.

In this time of severe budget deficits I call on every government department and agency to determine if their printed material is absolutely essential.

I believe we could all help save money, paper, the forests and energy by reducing the paper load produced by all levels of government. By doing so we can help reduce the threat to our increasingly fragile environment in a very practical way, as well as help solve our deficit problem.

EAST TIMOR

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, one of the items that is always on the agenda of Commonwealth parliamentary meetings, and indeed when leaders of the Commonwealth get together, is the whole concern with respect to further decolonization.

What I would like to do today is call on the Prime Minister, while he is in that part of the world in Kuala Lumpur, to change the Canadian policy with respect to the colonization of East Timor by Indonesia, something which happened in the mid-1970s and about which Canada has been embarrassingly silent out of respect for our economic interests in Indonesia. I think it is time that this sort of thing came to an end. If we are against illegal occupation of one country by another, if we are, indeed, against genocide, as it has sometimes been called in East Timor, we ought to be against it in every case.

The Canadian record with respect to the Indonesian occupation of East Timor has been a disgrace. I call on the Prime Minister at this point to change Canadian policy, to denounce colonization and terror and genocide wherever it occurs, and particularly at this time in East Timor.

NATIONAL UNIVERSITIES WEEK

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday, I had the honour, with the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Winegard), to give out federal scholarships to university students of the Ottawa-Hull area to launch National Universities Week. This year, 3,400 two-thousand-dollar-scholarships will be granted to students across the country in science and technology related fields; 51 per cent of the recipients are women. These students will have a role to play in the future of our country since they will be tomorrow's researchers and as such, will help Canada compete in the world market. On behalf of the government and myself, I wish to congratulate the recipients and wish them the best of luck in their studies.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has told Canadians of the importance of our education system, how it will determine our competitiveness in the world, and how we must ensure first-class education for Canadians.

Despite the Prime Minister's rhetoric, the Conservative record on education is shameful. There have been deep cuts in transfer payments. There have been reductions to training and retraining programs. There have been no increases in student aid amounts. The application of the goods and services tax will include books and other learning materials. There has been embarrassingly little support for literacy.

There has been the capping of funds for the post-secondary education of natives, the elimination of the postal subsidies for scholarly journals, and the abolition of the citizenship instruction and language textbook agreement.

On Friday, October 13, I held a press conference at which I announced a challenge to the government and its ministers to discuss and debate these issues with me across the country. Canadians want these discussions. Will these ministers participate?

NATIONAL INFECTION CONTROL WEEK

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that this week, October 16 to October 20, has been proclaimed National Infection Control Week in recognition of the many health care professionals who have worked to prevent the transmission of infectious diseases in health care facilities and community based institutions.

The purpose of this week is to focus public and professional attention on both the seriousness of nosocomial and community infections and on the measures that can be taken to reduce them. I particularly applaud the efforts of the community and hospital infection control association in Canada for their efforts in sponsoring and organizing this week across Canada.

Nurses, doctors and other health care workers have long been aware of the problem and of the need for wider application of the effective infection control measures. Scientific evidence has shown that simple measures such as proper hand washing when used by everyone can reduce the spread of infection. Infection control practitioners, community health agencies and others are invited and encouraged to join CHICA Canada in promoting activities which will enhance infection control.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, it is said that a man selling doughnuts will boast about the size of the doughnuts, but the customer will consider the size of the hole.

This should be remembered when the Prime Minister tries to sell us a claim of victory for Canada's sanctions against South Africa. The hole is a big hole—the 80 per cent increase in Canada's trade with South Africa and Canada's resistance to supporting stronger sanctions.

South Africa's new velvet glove and the release of prisoners could be nicely timed to strengthen Thatcher's hand and weaken Canada's already timorous resolve at the Commonwealth Conference.

De Klerk may be simply a good card player. The Prime Minister should remember what Kenny Rogers sang: "Don't count your money while you're sitting at the table. There'll be time enough for counting when the deal is done".

HERITAGE

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, last night the Saint-Férréol-les-Neiges Development Corporation received the Alphonse Desjardins Prize in the "Culture and Heritage" category. The Desjardins Movement thus recognized the remarkable work done by the Corporation to develop the site of the Sept-Chutes hydro-electric plant, a heritage and environmental location that nearly 50,000 people visited this summer.

Like my fellow citizens, I am very proud of this recognition because, as Corporation President Germain Tremblay said, the Government of Canada got the project going. Since 1984, our Government has spent nearly $450,000 through employment programs in Sept-Chutes.

I would like to pay tribute today to Germain Tremblay, Jean-Guy Huot, Claire Boulay and all their team for their wonderful work and I encourage them to continue for the people of Saint-Férréol-les-Neiges and the riding of Montmorency—Orléans.

NATIONAL UNIVERSITIES WEEK

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, this week is National Universities Week when we celebrate all the great things our universities do for their community, their province and their country.

The University of Prince Edward Island contributes greatly to my province and, with its new vet college, to Atlantic Canada as well. The continuing presence of the University of Prince Edward Island allows young men and women in the province to get a high quality education. A well educated workforce allows Prince Edward Island to develop as a province and to reduce its dependency on the federal government.

But by cutting funding to the provinces and to students, the federal government is condemning provinces like Prince Edward Island to a future of dependency and students to a future of debt. Education is a top priority for Islanders and I urge this government to show that it is a priority for it as well.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming) Mr. Speaker, in its submission to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, the Mining Association of Canada made it known to the government that the membership supports the introduction of the GST.

Speaking for the mining community, this association sees that the new GST as a good measure. The bottom line is that mining industries which depend on the exporting of their products will benefit from the tax reforms put forward by this government.

• (1410)

MAC favours our tax policies because they ensure that the burden of taxes and the royalties is consistent with that in other industrialized, mineral producing countries; that taxes do not discriminate against Canadian exporters and in favour of importers; that the cost of tax compliance for industry and of administration by governments are kept reasonably low.

MAC recognizes that today's tax reform decisions made by the federal government will affect the health of the Canadian mining industry tomorrow. Its concern and our concern is to see the goods and services tax implemented and our current tax policies corrected, for the betterment of the mining sector and of individuals across Canada.

DALY BUILDING

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, almost five years ago the National Capital Commission announced plans and issued a contract to redevelop the Daly Building located at Sussex and Rideau Street here in Ottawa. Incredibly the start of construction on the 84–year old building is still months away.

The loss of revenue alone from tenants who should have been in the building long ago is staggering. I cannot even begin to estimate how many potential millions have been lost. I understand that problems have arisen, but for a government which claims to be the champion of fiscal restraint it is only the proving yet again that it is only the champion of rhetoric and overspending.

This fiasco must be stopped. Someone has got to put his or her foot down and take charge of the situation. I suggest that the Minister of Public Works do this. Enough time has been spent; enough money has been squandered. The NCC should put its helmets on and get into the game.

It is high time construction began so the job can be finished and we can begin making, instead of foolishly wasting, taxpayers' money.

TAX REFORM

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, no one likes taxes any less than I do. I know that a large number of Canadians has already made important sacrifices to help keep the deficit under control. Together taxpayers and this government have made progress, but we still have some way to go.

The first part of sales tax reform is to remove the existing federal tax on manufactured goods. Many Canadians are unaware that since 1924 the federal sales tax has been buried in the price of every good and service produced in Canada and consumed by all Canadians. It taxes foreign made imports one–third less than it does Canadian domestically made products.

What sane country would allow such an arrangement to continue at the age of 65. It is time for the MST to retire. Then and only then will we establish the goods and services tax.

Under the GST Canadian exporters will create new jobs. Economic growth will improve living standards and contribute to bringing the deficit down.

I ask you to think about the entire package. The bad old tax out, the GST in, together with all the important fairness measures.

PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, last week I spoke of the ill effects of deregulation on northern Canadian communities with specific reference to skyrocketing air fares.

This week I learned that American aviation fuel is being shipped from Michigan into Canada to service Canadian aircraft, namely, Air Ontario.

If this is an isolated case—and I believe it is not—Canadian jobs are at risk for those involved in the petroleum industry. Why would Air Ontario do this? The vice-president tells me that it is to cut costs.

Pass it on to the consumers? No way. To add insult to injury and at the expense of safety, our harmonious laws permit Canadian A-1 fuel to be replaced with American A fuel. The difference is simple but frightening. American fuel freezes at minus 40 degrees; Canadian fuel freezes at minus 47 degrees. What is the supposed solution? Put in an additive just like we do in our cars.

Canadians should not have to accept American fuel nor American standards. I ask the Minister to investigate this unacceptable situation immediately.

POLLUTION CONTROL

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, at a press conference, the Minister of the Environment announced that the federal Government intends to spend $150 million in pollution control projects, including $100 million to clean up some 50 hazardous waste disposal sites for which the owner is unknown, cannot be found or is bankrupt.

Mr. Speaker, this announcement by the Environment Minister is very important for the people of my riding, especially in Mascouche. The Mascouche disposal site was given as an example in reports on the TVA network last night. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that my constituents are pleased with this decision, this announcement because it is a step forward; it is concrete action for environmental quality and for future generations.

I want to tell the Minister of the Environment and the House that I am fully satisfied with this announcement and I hope that the provinces will follow along at the Environment Minister's Conference this week in Charlottetown.

As for our friends opposite, who reacted to this announcement by saying it was too little too late, I will just tell them that for me and the people I represent, it is never too late and that it is much more than they did when they were able to do something.

HOUSING

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal task force on housing, co-chaired by the Hon. Member for London East finished its cross-Canada tour of nine cities yesterday.

Nearly 70 associations submitted briefs to the task force, and it was apparent that all regions in Canada, without exception, were experiencing severe housing problems.

Whether we are talking about availability, access, the homeless or the fact that it is becoming increasingly difficult for Canadians to enjoy a right that should be theirs as a matter of course, we cannot ignore these problems.

[English]

It is unacceptable in a country such as ours that there are 1.3 million families living in unsustainable housing.

Since taking office the Conservative government has drastically cut budgets and programs. It has abandoned its responsibilities and has generally turned a blind eye to Canada's housing crisis. The new sales tax is clear evidence of this. It has made a very bad situation all the worse.

[Translation]

From our hearings across the country it was apparent that there is no federal leadership in this area today.

[English]

Lack of decent housing is a root cause of poverty. You may rest assured that it will be a principal focus of our report.

ABORTION

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put on record a short letter from Mrs. D. Simons of Orleans, Ontario, concerning abortion:

> I'm ashamed to be a woman. I'm disheartened by how irresponsible, cold-hearted, and extremely selfish we have become. Led by the "women's movement", we have convinced ourselves we are not the loving, caring, nurturing beings we are by nature. We have convinced ourselves that the child in the womb is not a person worthy of respect. Were we not all a foetus in our mother's womb? Are we not the same persons we were then?
> No matter how bad a woman's situation may be, she can survive, and help is there for the asking.

Mrs. Simons went on to say:

> Most abortions, however, are done because the pregnancy is an embarrassment or inconvenience. Is nine months really too much to give for the life of another? Is killing your baby better than giving her to a couple who will love her as their own? Give the baby a "choice" and I'm sure she will choose life.

She concluded by saying:

> I beg women to find courage to take responsibility for their actions and not take the easy way out.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FISHERIES

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans about the decision of the trade panel on salmon and herring.

According to the joint statement by the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister for International Trade, and I want to quote that statement:

> The Panel has accepted the legitimacy of Canada's position—the Panel has fully recognized that it is the sovereign right of Canada to decide on particular conservation policies—

So said the minister. I do not know what decision of the panel the minister has been reading. I read it carefully this morning. My copy states: "The present Canadian landing requirement cannot be said to be primarily aimed at conservation. Therefore, Canada's landing requirement is incompatible with Canada's obligations under Article 407 of the trade agreement".

Does the minister have a different decision than the one that was issued by the panel, or is he relying solely on the opinion of his colleague, the Minister for International Trade who admitted to this House that he had not read the trade agreement under which the decision was made?

Having signed the deal and set up the process under which the west coast fisheries industry has now lost an important decision, why does the minister not have the courage to admit it to the fishermen of British Columbia and the country that his government blew the whole damn affair?

• (1420)

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer the hon. Leader of the Opposition. The panel clearly upholds the sovereignty of Canada's fisheries legislation in giving to the Government of Canada and the Minister of Fisheries the authority in the final analysis to set quotas and to establish regulations from the perspective of conservation of this resource.

If the hon. member had properly read the completion of the panel finding which Canada, by the way, has not yet accepted—we have 30 days to review this question.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): It is not that good.

Mr. Siddon: I would ask the hon. Leader of the Opposition to read the panel report, clause 8.02 sub. 2, where it states:

> The Panel was also of the view that Canada could bring its landing requirement within Article XX (g) of the GATT, by structuring it along the lines described in paragraph 7.40.

Furthermore, if the hon. member would read from page 37 of the report—I think it is important that the House have this complete clarification—let me quote:

> The panel agreed with Canada's position that a state could not be obliged to make its fisheries conservation and management regime dependent on co-operation with another state.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the minister cried "victory". Now he says he has not finally accepted the decision.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): If you read the trade agreement with the United States, Articles 407 and 408, you will know why we lost. We gave up our right to impose an export tax which would have allowed—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, under the Free Trade Agreement, Canada, as I said just now in English, gave up its right to impose an export tax on raw fish. That is the reason for this Government's present problems. Before the FTA, Canada would have been able to take steps to protect the thousands of fishermen in our Pacific and Atlantic fisheries. Today, however, we must abide by the decision of a free trade panel, a decision that was not in our favour.

During the election campaign, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans promised our fishermen they would be protected under the FTA. What does the Minister have to say now to thousands of workers on both coasts who are going to lose their jobs in fish processing plants?

[English]

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition speaks of protection yet he is supposedly a free-trader having embraced the principle of adherence to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade—

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): You gave up the tax, dummy.

Mr. Siddon: —and, therefore, agreeing if he were, God forbid, to be leader of this government that he would accept rulings of the GATT as we did with regard to our former unacceptable and discriminatory export restrictions.

The hon. member cannot speak out of both sides of his mouth at once.

Mr. MacLellan: Listen who is talking.

Mr. Siddon: In fact, this free trade panel has adjudicated on a question of conservation and management and upheld the sovereignty of Canada in making those final decisions with regard to determining fisheries regulations and quotas, and that is a great gain for Canada.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the minister does not yet understand that our sole remedy under the GATT was the export tax which his government abandoned under the trade agreement with the United States. That is why we have this problem.

On November 17, 1987, in Richmond, British Columbia, when questions were put to him by union representatives and members of the industry, the minister stated categorically, and I quote: "I give you my assurance that those jobs are safe". Those were his words as he referred to the workers in the fish processing industry on the west coast.

Yesterday, his response to the same question from a journalist about the same jobs was this, and I quote him again: "It is really not appropriate that you ask such an over-simplified question and expect a categorical answer".

Well, Mr. Speaker, two years ago he guaranteed that those jobs would be saved, now he says, "don't ask me, it is too complicated".

Why did the Minister break his word or is this question too over simplified for him to answer?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the question is certainly over simplified coming from where it arises.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Siddon: But I can certainly answer the question. In the free trade era we are seeing untold increases in the numbers of jobs in Canada and in British Columbia.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robichaud: Not in fisheries.

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I can also assure the House that over the past four years during which this government has presided over fisheries matters, the number of processing jobs in each year has increased over the previous one. This being a record year we have had outstanding employment in the processing sector and, in fact, if one were to break down the 60,000 jobs in British Columbia that have been established since January 1, one would find that large numbers of those jobs are in the fishing and fish processing sector.

An Hon. Member: That sounds fishy to me.

SENATE REFORM

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. Maybe the Deputy Prime Minister would recognize that last evening's election of a Senate nominee in Alberta is a very important historical step for this country. As a simple straightforward parliamentarian he would not want to hide behind obscure answers about lists of names but recognize the election as being a clear question of the will of the people being responded to by this government.

Has the Deputy Prime Minister been in touch with the Prime Minister in his sojourn overseas and can he now say that the Prime Minister will provide the assurance that the prerogative of the Prime Minister will be used clearly to appoint to the Senate the nominee who was elected last night in the province of Alberta for the Senate?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is aware of the process that has been established under the Meech Lake Accord. There are constitutional responsibilities that the Prime Minister has to uphold. There are also conditions that he is obligated to uphold under the provisions of the Meech Lake Accord.

The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition asks if Mr. Getty signed the accord. The answer is, yes. I have it right here in front of me. To enlighten the hon. member in case he has not read the Meech Lake Accord, Article 2, which deals with Section 25 (1) of the Constitution, states: "Where a vacancy occurs in the Senate the government of the province to which the vacancy relates may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Queen's Privy Council of Canada the names of persons who may be summoned to the Senate."

Subsection 2 states: "Until an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is made in relation to the Senate pursuant to Section 41, of the Constitution Act, 1982, the person summoned to fill a vacancy in the Senate shall be chosen from among the persons whose names have been submitted under Subsection 1, by the government of the province to which the vacancy relates and must be acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council of Canada."

There is a clear constitutional obligation.

Mr. Lapierre: How about the people?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): How about the people of Alberta?

Mr. Mazankowski: There is an obligation to uphold the spirit and the letter of the Meech Lake Accord which was signed by the Premier of the Province of Alberta, Mr. Getty. The Prime Minister is fully prepared to honour his obligations and his responsibilities within that context.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would express my disappointment in the answer of the Deputy Prime Minister because when he talks about honouring obligations, there is a much higher obligation to respond to, and that is the will of the people expressed through the ballot box. That is the highest order in this House.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister specifically this in relation to that important first step taken in the province of Alberta last night in terms of Senate reform. Going back to the Deputy Prime Minister's own interest in Senate reform, will the government commit today that it will undertake a joint committee of this House, the Senate and House of Commons, to look at the mandate of the Senate and come forward with a mandate that is more equal, effective and elected than the Senate we have had up until now?

• (1430)

Is this government going to show its commitment to Senate reform as the people of Alberta did last night?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, there clearly is a commitment. Part and parcel of the Meech Lake Accord was the fact that the first item on the agenda after the Meech Lake Accord was adopted—I trust that that is still the official position of the Liberal Party—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: —was to accept the Meech Lake Accord. I know that there are some variations in some quarters—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Are you going to stand up against the people of Alberta?

Mr. Mazankowski: —but I should also remind the hon. member that it is through the Meech Lake Accord that this process was established.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): That is a newy.

Mr. Mazankowski: So, surely, Mr. Speaker, there should be some support over there. The fact of the matter is that there is no one more—

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Are you rejecting the people of Alberta?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would allow me to answer the question. There is no one more supportive of Senate reform than this government and all members from this side of the House.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: When I hear Liberals across the way chirping about Senate reform, let us look at what Senator Hastings says about this process. He says that, "It is a ludicrous and unconstitutional." Senator Olson says, "There is no Senate election. The Prime Minister appoints senators". Mr. Speaker, why don't they get their act together? We have ours.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. Yesterday we had a decision that came down clearly against the interests of the people of British Columbia, and beyond that, in terms of resource management and control, all of Canada, a decision which for the first time restricts Canada's right to set the level of a resource level in this country.

Considering that that decision has been said by representatives of the industry to be a U.S. victory; considering that it has been said by representatives of the trade unions in Canada to be a U.S. victory, and considering that it has been said by the U.S. trade representatives to be a U.S. victory, why is the minister the only man on either side of the border who has the nerve to claim that this is a Canadian victory?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party does not quite have his facts straight. I saw on CBC television last night a female worker on a fish plant line in British Columbia saying that this was a good deal for Canada. She was wearing the union logo.

I think it is unfair to draw conclusions at this point on the basis of a report which the government has 30 days to accept or to dispose of in one way or another. I can repeat, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member, that on page 37 it states clearly that the panel agreed with Canada's position, that a state could not be obliged to make its fisheries conservation and management regime dependent on co-operation with another state.

That ensures that Canadian sovereignty of fisheries management as enshrined in Canadian fisheries' legislation is preserved in this panel finding.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows what is at stake here. It is not simply the issue of conservation. The government gave it away and the trade deal has the right to settle the level of development of resources for industrial purposes in Canada. That is what the government gave away, and the minister knows that.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Yesterday he was describing the decision as a victory. Today in Question Period, the minister is talking about the government taking action, presumably not to accept the decision. He cannot have it both ways. Since the people in British Columbia in particular, and representatives—leaders in industry as well as in the trade union movement—understand the decision for what it is, as threatening their jobs, will the minister now give assurances to the House that the government will exercise its right and refuse to accept this decision?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and his cohorts keep referring to this threat to jobs but they cannot produce one shred of evidence of one job that has been lost to this date in British Columbia as a result of a GATT dispute which was initiated before the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and which I believe the New Democratic Party supports, because the fisheries industry is an export industry.

We depend on access to international markets to sell 80 per cent of our production. We have to play by the rules of international trade, and I believe the New Democratic Party even believes in that. So the member cannot hide behind this notion that somehow we should be able to protect jobs when, in fact, if we are going to export products we have to play by the international rules of trade.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister talks about jobs. I urge him to check with his own officials and he will find out that there was over four million pounds of salmon exported directly to the U.S. unprocessed in Canada.

I say to the minister that that represents a lot of jobs which people in British Columbia would like to see take place in British Columbia and not in the United States.

I want to ask the minister this question and I hope he will be candid in his answer. Given the nature of this ruling with its implications, which are bad enough for British Columbia in the salmon industry, would he not agree that the implication of this decision, if the government accepts it, means that we can no longer set any restrictions on the export of raw logs, that minerals in Manitoba, Quebec and Ontario, for example, can no longer have restrictions imposed on them for development here in Canada? In short, has the minister not given away the whole capacity for us to have a regional and national industrial strategy that would stop us from being simply the hewers of wood and drawers of water for the United States?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I presume the hon. member was wise enough to know that there is no point hewing your trees and drawing your water if you have no markets to access with the products you produce. That is the principle of trade and the reason why we must abide by the rules of international trade. That principle as to whether or not we should be able to protect jobs was decided by a GATT panel finding which Canada accepted two years ago.

Mr. Broadbent: You gave away the export tax.

Mr. Siddon: Now I return to the question which the hon. member asked about jobs that were lost. In fact, we had a bonanza year in the west coast sockeye runs this year. We have been exporting raw fish in three species for years and years which will no longer be freely exported.

I refer the member again to page 37 of the findings of the panel which clearly upholds Canada's right to manage our fishery from the perspective of conservation of a sustainable resource.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. We now know that the Government failed miserably in protecting jobs on the west coast. We can no longer enforce our processing regulations. We can no longer enforce our landing requirements. We have lost across the board, and this will have serious repercussions. And now for my question.

What kind of assurances can the Minister give the House that the same situation will not occur on the east coast and that we will be able to maintain our right to protect our resources and our jobs in the fisheries industry?

[English]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the member would be inclined to draw parallels, but there is actually no comparison between the two situations that are in debate here. In fact, the Prime Minister, in this House on October 5, made it quite clear that we reject any proposed amendments to the Magnussen Act which would impede our right to access the U.S. market with lobsters harvested according to our conservation rules. In other words, the American government cannot, in an extra-territorial way, apply its conservation requirements to Canada. That principle also applies with the FTA panel finding which clearly respects Canada's right to manage and conserve our fisheries resources within Canada which is within our jurisdiction.

• (1440)

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I do not find any assurance in the minister's words. We have given up our processing regulations and we cannot enforce our landing requirements. We have given up, under article 408 of the free trade agreement, any right that we would have to use an export tax. We have given up everything.

What new action or process or even what new trick can the minister find to protect the jobs in the fish processing industry? What new tricks does he have up his sleeve?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I do not recall in the debate on the GATT panel ruling about two years ago the opposition suggesting we apply an export tax on our fisheries exports. In fact, I read from the FTA panel finding which clearly recognizes Canada's right to manage our fish stocks, our salmon and herring stocks on the west coast, in accordance with our sovereign right to do so as flowing from the Law of the Sea and enshrined in Canadian legislation.

The panel report, if he will read it carefully, even provides some guidance as to how we should do that. It suggests we should be able to administer all transportation of fish from our west coast fishery, whether by land or by sea, and ensure that that right is unfettered in any way. We will do that.

SENATE REFORM

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Today the government leader in the Senate said that in selecting Senators, a list of names must be submitted to the federal government by the province where a vacancy exists. He further stated that more than one name must be submitted in order to respect the provisions of the Meech Lake Accord.

Yesterday Albertans made their democratic choice in a Senate election. Today their premier, Mr. Getty, said that he would submit only one name that of the winning candidate in yesterday's election. Will the Deputy Prime Minister defend the democratic will of the people? Will he respect the choice made by Albertans yesterday? Or is he going to snub them and insist on a list that contains more than one name?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think all of us in this House support the principles of democracy. However, we also support the responsibility and the obligation to uphold the constitution and proposed constitutional amendments as was the—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): This was not ratified!

Mr. Mazankowski: If the right hon. Leader of the Opposition wants to get in on the act again he can. He said that this has not been ratified. That is quite true.

What was agreed was that until such time as it was ratified, the spirit and the letter of the Meech Lake Accord would be fulfilled. The Prime Minister is prepared to do that and we expect the premiers to do likewise.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister is not going to accept the democratic choice made by Albertans yesterday.

If the Deputy Prime Minister is going to be so stubborn about a list, I will tell him that there was a total of six candidates in the Senate election yesterday. Would he be satisfied with that list? If so, why in heaven's name would he not select the winning name from that list?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I am not being stubborn at all. What I am saying is that there is a constitutional obligation and responsibility. There is an agreement that is enshrined in the Meech Lake Accord which the Prime Minister and the premiers agreed to follow in spirit and in letter.

It is certainly not the hon. member's responsibility to submit names or to appoint a Senator. It is the responsibility of the premier of the province of Alberta to submit a list of names. I can assure him that when he does it will be considered in appropriate fashion.

ILLEGAL DRUGS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. The rising tide of illegal drug use in this country is an issue of concern to all Canadians. What is the government's answer? We find now that this government has effectively cut back the RCMP's available funds by $40 million for its law enforcement work in drug trafficking. Furthermore, for the last three weeks the RCMP has not even had the funds to rent cars and has to check "home" before it can make long distance telephone calls.

Will the minister assure Canadians that instead of spending money on high profile campaigns to promote the minister and the government, it will give the RCMP the funds to do its job properly?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I think the numbers in the article my colleague has referred to, because it was on the radio this morning, are totally false. This year we have put more money than we have ever put against drug traffickers. As happens from time to time, we need more money, and so we have had to reallocate funds from other parts of the budget. This is what we have done. We have even put more money into the Toronto area where this story comes from. We have put more money this year than we ever have in the past against drug traffickers.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the story may have come to the minister from Toronto, but in fact it is the Deputy Commissioner of the RCMP based here in Ottawa who is quoted. What he says is that the funds for high profile PR campaigns have been transferred from the work on the street where it must take place.

The Solicitor General will have to concede that the last week has not been a good one for him. We have the RCMP running out of money. We have a report that says that CSIS, for which the minister is responsible, is still spying on peaceful Canadians. We have minister's parole officers going out on strike this week. Finally, we have a prestigious international conference in Montreal on urban safety which has pronounced the direction that the minister is taking against drugs is a total failure.

Will the minister, who is also the Minister of State for Agriculture and the government minister responsible for eastern Quebec, admit that Canada needs a full time and not a part-time Solicitor General?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I would need the rest of the afternoon to answer the hon. member's question. However, to be more specific and stick to the question of the war against drugs, two years ago this government set up a national anti-drug strategy in which we invested over $210 million to enable all departments involved in the war against drugs to work together.

Earlier this year, only nine months ago, we implemented new legislation to be able to seize the earnings of drug traffickers. So far we have seized over $30 million, quite an achievement.

Mr. Speaker, I believe our government is doing more than ever before to fight drugs. Like all Canadians, the opposition should join our efforts to give Canadians the assurance that the government is doing all it can to keep drugs from destroying our families.

TRADE

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House in response to a question from the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism made reference to funding called for under "Going Global", Canada's trade strategy. As this is a very important international trade initiative, could the minister confirm these figures please?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to tell the hon. member that yesterday in my caution not to exaggerate, I considerably understated how much is being spent on "Going Global".

The member for Winnipeg South Centre will be relieved when he hears how much more we are spending than I indicated yesterday. The announced "Going Global" trade strategy calls for funding of $93.6 million over five years which can be summarized as follows: the Pacific 2000 initiative which is $65 million; the Europe 1992, which is $19.6 million; and $8.8 million for communications. This is to be added to our over-all program for the U.S.

ILLEGAL DRUGS

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. The bottom line is that the government's national drug strategy is not working and it is becoming abundantly clear that Canada is the weak link in the North American war on drugs.

The CBC news report today indicated that the special RCMP budget used for undercover drug operations, the classified expenditure fund, was either frozen or depleted and that for a period of time undercover narcotics agents were unable to fight the war on drugs.

I would like to ask the Solicitor General whether the report was accurate when it stated that at one point in time the fund was either frozen or depleted, and can he explain why narcotics officers were rendered useless because there was no money in the kitty to fight the war on drugs?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the report my hon. friend is talking about is not true. We have put more money into that budget this year than last year and the year before. The problem is that because we are working harder against drug traffickers this year, we need more money. We have had to reallocate the money from other parts of the RCMP budget. So we have put more money against drug traffickers in this part of the budget. That is the reality. That is true. Those are the facts.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, the facts are that the RCMP had to go to the minister with cap in hand asking for money to rent cars for undercover agents and to rent telephones to monitor drug dealing in Ontario.

A cover story in this week's Maclean's confirms what we said almost three weeks ago, that Canada has become a haven for the laundering of illegal drug money and that Bill C–61 is totally inadequate in addressing the problem. Officials of the drug enforcement administration in the United States have referred to Canada as the Maytag of the drug laundering industry, solid and dependable.

When will the government get serious in fighting the war on drugs and introduce legislation immediately in order to force the banks and other financial institutions in Canada to report large currency transactions?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would caution the hon. member in using possible headlines in the media in articles which are otherwise well balanced. This could bring some discredit to the reputation of our country. What the hon. gentleman refers to is absolutely untrue. His party of the last 20 years did nothing. It is this party which two years ago introduced legislation which is considered to be the best in the world. We are working with all financial institutions, the RCMP to close all the possible holes that exist. It is an ongoing and difficult process but we are capping it. I am very confident that we will win this fight. We have to keep at it, we are at it and we are presently considering other measures that, if they are needed, will be implemented. You will not find us wanting in this regard.

RAIL TRANSPORT

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The minister knows that in the face of mass cuts that have been made to VIA Rail passenger service in this country, many Canadians are now concerned about the loss of freight service in this country. Indeed, the minister himself suggested yesterday that substantial freight cuts may be pending.

Has the minister been advised by either Canadian National or Canadian Pacific of proposed cuts to rail freight service in Canada? Is the minister prepared to give the House a commitment today that those Canadians who have lost VIA Rail passenger service will not find their freight service being cut next?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is obviously no connection between the VIA Rail services and CN or CP services. Any request by CN or CP for branch line abandonments has to be addressed to the National Transportation Agency and not to the Department of Transport. This agency is quite independent of the government. I admit, as I have said before, that CN and CP make many requests to the NTA.

In terms of abandonments, the National Transportation Act is very clear about the process. The NTA has not yet made a decision in most cases, but we are working with the provinces to see what can be done. In western Canada it is a little different because the branch lines are all protected until the year 2000. Eastern Canada has a problem and we are working on it with the provinces, and I believe we can find an answer to the problem.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, this minister has more nerve, I submit, than a severe tooth ache. He wants Parliament and Canadians to believe that this is a matter for the NTA and the NTA is totally at arm's length from the Government of Canada. This is the minister who just used an Order in Council to wipe out VIA Rail and said: "Damn the NTA".

Canadians who live in the eastern part of this country, in particular those in Atlantic Canada, know that the writing is on the wall for the end of rail freight service in Atlantic Canada. The minister knows it. He discussed it publicly yesterday. I want a commitment today, on behalf of those Canadians, that the government will forbid the abandonment of rail freight service until such time as your own royal commission on transportation has had a chance to do its job and report. Is the royal commission worth a damn or is it another bluff?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, first of all the royal commission will work on the passenger service. It will consider the freight system.

The member asks me to overrule the law, but it is the National Transportation Agency which makes that kind of decision. I said before, and I repeat, we are monitoring very closely the question of rail services, particularly on the freight side and we are working with the provinces. They are supposed to provide what they call their substantial or essential network in the country. But once again, as I said yesterday, we face a problem in all transportation modes, but we are trying to fix and address those problems.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The minister knows full well that there is an established pattern in this country when it comes to passenger rail and freight rail. Newfoundland experienced it. They lost their passenger rail and later lost their freight. Prince Edward Island lost their passenger rail then lost their freight.

Given his statement to the transport committee yesterday and his comments in the House today, is the closure of some VIA services not the first step toward dismantling all freight services in Canada, particularly Atlantic Canada? What is going to be next, Victoria to Courtney, Halifax to Sydney?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, there is no connection between the cuts at VIA Rail and requests made to the National Transportation Agency. These are two entirely different problems.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, the minister may say they are disassociated, but history will prove him wrong.

The minister knows full well that when rail lines are abandoned, they are usually sold and dismantled. If the royal commission that his government has set up finds that rail is a transportation mode for the 21st century and that the ties, rails and right–of–ways are gone, it may cost tens of billions of dollars to restore the railways and it may not, in fact, be possible. Given this, will the minister look to the future and halt all abandonments until the royal commission has submitted its report and has been considered by the people of Canada?

• (1500)

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, once again the member is trying to mix up Canadians with a royal commission working on passenger services and with CN or CP branchline abandonments. They are two issues. The first one we answered two weeks ago with the new network we have proposed to Canadians. There is another one that I said we are working on. I believe that once again, do not try to mix up Canadians with two issues which are totally different.

POLLUTION

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. He will be aware that his announcement to clean up contaminated land sites is not enough to address the reality. Only 50 sites will be cleaned up over five years and yet the province states that there are over 3,000 underground and toxic waste dumps in Ontario alone. That does not include sites that have yet to be uncovered through a generation of dumping hazardous waste.

Does the minister not agree that more money is needed to firmly deal with the underground toxic menace, and that a super fund paid for by the industry levies is the long-term answer to this long-term problem?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we in Canada have 1,000 contaminated sites, 50 of them are abandoned sites. With the announcement yesterday I hope to be able, during the next days in Prince Edward Island together with my colleagues, the provincial environment ministers, to strike a deal where we will trigger a whole operation covering all of the country to get rid of the 1,000 contaminated sites. If we can put $150 million from the federal point of view, we will be able to trigger an operation over all of Canada to enable the provinces to adopt legislation and regulatory mechanisms to oblige companies to clean up the 950 sites which we know are contaminated.

Mr. Crawford: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that for 95 per cent of the identified sites the polluter pays, but many provinces have yet to pass legislation to force this penalty. This is a national issue needing national leadership. Does the minister not agree that his clean-up program should be federally administered with enforceable national standards rather than having an inconsistent patchwork of provincial regulations?

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, this is a question of shared jurisdiction. We have in Canada a Constitution where the provinces have jurisdiction. We must respect those jurisdictions, but there are ways to strike agreements with the provinces so as to put in force joint operations, and this we will be doing.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-28, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When the House rose at one o'clock the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam had ten minutes for questions and comments. I will now recognize members on questions or comments. The Hon. Member for Surrey-North.

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague a question on the clawback of family allowances. One of the things that is very noticeable in Canada is that we have changing demographics and our birth rate is dropping. At the same time, the cost of raising children has increased dramatically. One of the things that families have had in this country that is unique is a universal family allowance program. This program has tied families together because every family, regardless of economic circumstances, has had one common universal program which they know they will all receive.

What does the member think this is going to do to the concept of family solidarity in Canada and the commitment that all Canadians have to universal programs?

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Surrey. It is important when we talk about the impact of the clawback in family allowance on the family that we think about it in terms of the whole context of the attack on the family that is being carried out by this government.

We have an attack on the family under the unemployment insurance program. We have an attack on the family in terms of an attack on pensions of seniors who are part of the expanded family. We have an attack on the family with the clawback on the family allowance.

We are facing today an amendment to this legislation that will mean that any family with an income of $50,000 will see a portion of its family allowance clawed back.

Again, expanding and projecting what this clawback will mean in 20 years, one need only take a look at the impact on pensions and transfer it to family allowances. This means that in many cases the family allowance currently going into a home is the only independent income that a mother has in terms of spending for her children or spending for the home, and it is going to be taxed based on her husband's income. It is a total denial of the universality in which this family allowance program was introduced. It is the thin edge of the wedge. I would suggest that it belies an underlying current of attitudes of this Tory government toward the family, toward support for the family, and toward again attacking the poor to protect the rich.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Since there are no more questions or comments, debate. The hon. member for Hillsborough.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address this House on Bill C–28, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post–Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related Act.

This piece of legislation is a myriad of amendments to the Income Tax Act, some 59 amendments aimed at implementing most of the provisions detailed in the government's April, 1989 Budget, a budget that pummeled Canadian families, insulted the voters of this country and penalized the poor even further.

This legislation continues, or more appropriately, cements the government's plan to end the universality of social programs. We know that the government's social program cuts will make up nearly 30 per cent, or $610 million of the $2.8 billion in spending cuts. The Minister of Finance announced these cuts for the 1990–91 fiscal year. This was in addition to the previously proposed changes to the unemployment insurance program which will eliminate the government's contribution of $1.9 billion in the year 1990–91.

We are seeing the end of universality, a long standing principle of the Canadian system of social benefits. I say that because universality is by definition of or belonging to or done by all persons or things in the world or in the class concerned and is applicable to all cases. In other words, regardless of income some benefits have to be delivered to everyone. What the government is proposing in this legislation is to take away all of the benefits over a specific income level, not only for old age security pensions, but for family allowances as well.

• (1510)

Canadians have long been told to consider old age pensions when planning for their retirement. Now they find that the pensions will not be there as expected, and that at this time they have very little chance of changing their financial situation. What happened to the Prime Minister's position of 1984 when he promised that universality was a sacred trust? That sacred trust has been tossed aside by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and this government as a whole.

In 1984 the then Minister of National Health and Welfare stated in the House: "All savings generated from any changes will be redistributed to social programs and will not be applied to deficit reduction". He went on to say: "Benefits from old age pensions will be taxed no differently from any other form of income".

It is not hard to understand why Canadians are angry at this government. I guess the sacred trust has been replaced with the other two words we have had drilled into us lately, those of "deficit reduction". If the senior citizens of this country, individuals who have given many years of hard work and trust, cannot be spared by this government then I guess it is obvious that aside from major corporations no one will be spared.

Bill C–28 brings more tax increases, reduced federal transfers to the provinces for health and post–secondary education and imposes clawbacks on family allowances and old age security benefits, specifically Part 1.2 of Clause 48 of the legislation which implements these clawbacks. The clawback of the family allowances will take $1.686 billion out of the budgets of Canadian families over the next five years. Due to partial indexing, close to one million Canadian families who currently receive family allowances or old age pensions will begin to lose these benefits within ten years.

These clawbacks are anti–family and anti–senior. No matter what the total income for a senior citizen is, the principle of fairness suggests that it should not matter how a person attains this income. It should not matter whether it came from the government or from financial investments. The government's clawback would single out certain groups of people who receive family allowance or old age pension cheques for a special tax. Seniors who receive their income from a pension will pay more tax than seniors who receive their income from investments. This is simply unjust.

Under the aforementioned tax changes family allowances and old age pensions will be taxed from individuals with net incomes over $50,000, not from families. The clawback system is set up in such a way as to allow a family in which each parent or partner works and earns $49,000 to retain all of its benefits because neither individual alone earns over $50,000. In stark contrast, a family in which one parent or partner works and earns $75,000 will lose all of its family allowance or old age pension benefits to the government's clawback system.

In the government's own consultation paper entitled "Child and Elderly Benefits" January, 1985, the idea of clawback on old age benefits was rejected. It stated that it would seriously disrupt the retirement income system.

The fine print of this legislation states that the $50,000 threshold between those who must pay the surtax and those who do not will be indexed each year according to increases in the Consumer Price Index, but at less than 3 per cent. If incomes continue to increase in keeping with the rate of inflation, but the threshold rises less than 3 per cent, then families and seniors will quickly fall to the other side of the ledger and have to pay the surtax.

The Minister of Finance has stated that the government will occasionally restore the threshold since it is only partially indexed. Does he really mean this? He does not seem to realize what universality means, so one can only assume what he thinks "occasionally" means. Perhaps to the minister, 31 tax increases in five years is occasional. If so, it seems he will adjust the threshold, but don't be surprised if no adjustments are forthcoming.

Parents and pensioners make a special, invaluable contribution to our society, in the past, present and future. These clawbacks imply that such contributions are unimportant and that some are worth even less than others. The families and seniors of this country deserve better treatment and more respect than this. We in the Liberal party do not believe in treating valuable members of our society the way that this government is treating them.

At a recent convention of the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation, an umbrella organization for seniors' groups in Canada, members voted unanimously to bring a court challenge against the government clawback. They are furious not only because their incomes will be taxed at a higher rate, but because the minister refuses to fully index the $50,000 threshold, a situation which must give him a sense of déjà vu.

A clawback on old age security pensions will force 54,000 seniors to pay back all of their pensions. Furthermore, 74,000 seniors have to pay back at least some portion of their pensions. How is this government going to explain to seniors why it has taken contributions that were made in good faith? Seniors paid into the program and they have a right to reap the benefits.

Canadians are going to fight this government. We in the Liberal party will fight this government to stop the continued erosion of the very fabric of this nation. We have seen a flood of regressive policies from this government, VIA Rail cuts, unemployment insurance cuts, and base closures that have devastated regions such as my province of Prince Edward Island. They assure us that it is all for our own good. Now we face clawbacks, and the government could never generate enough rhetoric to mask its long hand reaching further and further into the very heart of Canada until it is torn right out.

Canadians cannot trust this government. They are being cheated out of what belongs to them. They are being betrayed after years of contributing to the society in good faith. This legislation is an insult to every man, woman and child, every family and every senior in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On questions or comments, the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, my comment is directed to the Hon. Member for Hillsborough. I want to congratulate him on the excellent speech he has just made. I am sure that his constituents will be very proud of the remarks he has made in defence of seniors in his riding.

I wonder if, during the election campaign, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance had occasion to visit the province of Prince Edward Island, and if, in the course of that visit, they made some of the outrageous promises that they made in other parts of Canada saying that they were going to do everything in their power to protect seniors, that pensions were a sacred trust and items of that kind?

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague for the questions he has put forward. Yes, indeed, a year ago at this time the Minister of Finance was in my riding. He certainly assured the senior citizens, especially the senior citizens in the senior citizens' homes throughout, specifically in the Charlottetown region, that nothing was going to happen in any way to their pensions, and that they could certainly trust this government. Many of them did not necessarily agree with this apparently because of the way the election turned out.

I also have had many, many comments from people who have talked about this clawback provision that is coming about. We have many people in our society today, many seniors, who have worked years and years and years working hard. They have been very prudent and have been able to save some money only to find now that as they reach pensionable age that pension is not going to be there for them.

Yes, the promises were made in my riding and, obviously, those promises are not in any way going to be kept.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker I, too, would like to compliment my hon. colleague from P.E.I. who has raised a very important question in debate today. I would like to have his comments on another component of the whole clawback scheme, aside from the fact that we are moving away from the universality of a concept, a concept that provides security both social and monetary for all of our citizens who have made great contributions to the general wealth of this nation. One of them has to do with a very important and I think legal position that is being eroded by this clawback system. I refer to the many pensioners who prior to the establishment of the larger OAS plan were actually making contributions to a government-sponsored pension program which now these people see eroded. They see now that they can no longer benefit from the contributions that they have made. Those were contributions that had already been taxed and now these people see themselves being taxed yet again. I wonder if the hon. member would comment on that, Mr. Speaker.

• (1520)

Mr. Proud: Mr. Speaker, this very question has been posed to me on many occasions because there are many, many people in our society today who have, for many years, contributed that amount of tax to prepare for their pensions when they reach that age. Certainly this is a violation with respect to these people who, when you talk to them over the years, would say: "Next year I will be 65. I will be getting the old age pension". Pensioners will find that is not going to be a reality for them because this pension is going to be clawed back and the seniors are going to lose it all.

A friend of mine has worked hard all of his life for not very much money, and only in recent years has been able to accumulate some money. He finds that it is not going to be available to him and to his family. This is a breach of trust to the people of this country of ours.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to rise and speak on Bill C-28, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, the Old Age Security Act, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and a related Act. On the various components of this bill I would like to focus my comments in opposition specifically to that which relates to the Old Age Security Act. I therefore rise and speak out against this bill because it proposes amendments which will result in a move away from our tradition of universality in social programs. This is the most significant change in social policy in a generation in Canada.

Part 1.2 of Clause 48 on page 46, Section 180.2 of the bill as printed is entitled "Tax on Family Allowances and Old Age Security Benefits". This particular part implements the clawback of family allowances and Old Age Security pensions. Henceforth individuals earning more than $70,000 will no longer receive old age pensions and family allowances. Those earning $70,000 will receive partial old age pensions and family allowances. The tax-back rate will be 15 per cent. The $50,000 threshold will be partially deindexed. In real terms the threshold will be reduced through time. This measure will be phased in over three years. When fully phased in, the tax increase will be much higher than the $320 million reported by the government.

This clawback is not only unfair and dangerous to universality, but it is a blatant example of the pernicious way this government runs the country. The government said one thing during an election campaign, made all sorts of promises to win votes, and then as soon as it was re-elected it ignores the concerns and neglects the needs of Canadians. It abandons, or, worse, it dismantles social programs which are put in place to promote the social and economic interests of all Canadians, families and seniors included.

This is intolerable. This government is no longer just cutting the fat from our social programs. It is cutting the sinew, the muscle, and even the bone of our social character, of our social well-being. This government is trying to destroy the very foundation of our society by attacking the universality of social programs and by unfairly targeting groups, such as senior citizens who are the most vulnerable to attack, who made it possible for us to be where we are today.

What is particularly frightening is that this government refuses to index the $50,000 threshold for the first 3 per cent of each year's inflation. If we look ahead at maintaining current buying power while evaluating seniors' income in constant dollars, and if we project current inflation rates forward, in eight years the threshold will be the equivalent of only $35,000 or $40,000. By the year 2000, the clawback will start at $35,765; in 15 years from now, the threshold will be down to $30,000; and five years later, when the first of the baby boomers start retiring, it will stand at only $28,000 a year and will affect 2 million Canadians. Eventually the number of Canadians returning their entire benefits to the taxman will be so large that the idea of making payments to everyone will be abandoned. That then will be the demise of universality.

The clawback tax is also frightening because it is unfair. The impact will not only be confined to high-income Canadians, it will discriminate against one-income families and against senior citizens 65 years of age and older. A family with one net income of $55,240 will have to pay back all of its family allowances as a result of this new amendment. But a two-income family, in which one spouse earns $45,000 and the other some $40,000 will not have to pay back anything. By any arithmetic standard the proposed clawback cannot even approximate fair taxation.

The seniors' clawback amounts to age discrimination, since a pensioner earning $60,000 a year will be treated differently by the income tax system than a 64-year-old. Further, the clawback will single out those people who receive family allowance and old age pension for a special tax; such that seniors who receive their income from a pension only will pay more tax than seniors who receive their income from investments.

The clawback is unfair, in fact, unethical for another reason. The elderly have already paid for their old age pensions through a lifetime of paying income taxes. The clawback changes the rules of the game without the consent of those who had paid in the past.

In the 1950s the government insisted Old Age Security would be a contributory plan that paid for itself with each year's benefits funded by matching contributions. A special tax was created for the purpose, and each time the pension was raised the tax was raised. Seniors of today paid for that tax.

That tax was not ended until the 1972 tax reform. Hence seniors, because they had made their contributions, have a legal, moral, and ethical right to collect this pension. For years people have been told to consider old age pensions when planning their retirement income. Now they may find out that it may not always be there at a time when they have little chance of changing their financial situation.
