Prayers.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE CONSTITUTION

REFERENDUM QUESTION—CONCURRENCE IN MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. P. Michael Pitfield: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of personal privilege.

As I stated in my speech last Tuesday, I agree with the text of the referendum question. Unfortunately, when the vote on the issue was taken, I was absent from the Senate because I had been informed that there would not be a recorded vote. Consequently, the impression may be abroad that I abstained or changed my mind. That is not the case.

I should like to make it clear that, had I been able to vote, I would have voted in support of the text of the referendum question.

MIDDLE EAST

PEACEMAKING EFFORTS OF PRIME MINISTER OF ISRAEL

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, it is not always easy to find reasons for optimism about the international scene. It is rarer still to find cause for such positive sentiments in the Middle East.

I therefore cannot refrain from expressing my immense satisfaction and appreciation for the noble and wise leadership of the new Prime Minister of Israel, General Yitzhak Rabin. Thanks to his dedication to peace, there now exists hope where gloomy foreboding once dwelt. Conversations between Israelis and Palestinians are becoming real exchanges of view. The tough, brittle issue of the Golan Heights is now being considered. The United States-Israel rift has been healed. It is not even preposterous to suggest that a summit meeting between President Assad and Prime Minister Rabin could take place.

In this chamber, Senator Murray and I are the only remaining members of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs who met Mr. Rabin over dinner in Jerusalem at the time of our visit to the Middle East. He did not impress me then as a likely reformer. But he has moved with audacious alacrity on many age-old problems. Upon more careful reflection I am now convinced that he is in fact the very person to take the risks of real peacemaking.

A great military hero, he could never be accused of softness. Having passed the three score and 10, like some of the rest of us, and achieved many great honours and positions in the military, and in politics and diplomacy, he seems to have but one goal left; but what a difficult one—the building of peace.

It is my hope and prayer that this wise and brave man will attain his goal. All people of good will everywhere should do all in their power to support him in his lofty purpose.

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in the absence of my colleague, the Leader of the Opposition, I must remind honourable senators that the clock is still ticking. My honourable friends will be pleased to know that, if the government of which Senator Murray is a member still respects democracy, there are 59 days before the election should be called. Similarly, if it is a government cowardly and contemptuous of democracy, there are 455 days left before the day of reckoning.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, presented the following report:

Tuesday, September 22, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has the honour to present its

FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-306, An Act to amend the Department of Forestry Act and to make related amendments to other Acts, has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Wednesday, September 16, 1992, examined the said bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

E.W. (STAFF) BAROOTES
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, in view of the simplicity of this bill —

Senator Frith: Look out.

Senator Barootes: — with leave of the Senate, I move that this bill be read the third time now.

Senator Molgat: Is this the bill to change the name?

Senator Barootes: That is all.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CONTRAVENTIONS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

TUESDAY, September 22, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

TWENTY-FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-46, An Act respecting contraventions of federal enactments, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, September 16, 1992, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ
Chairman

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

AN ACT TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS IN RELATION TO PENSIONS

AND TO ENACT THE SPECIAL RETIREMENT ARRANGEMENTS ACT

AND THE PENSION BENEFITS DIVISION ACT

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. C. William Doody, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

TUESDAY, September 22, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

THIRTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-55, "An Act to amend certain Acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, June 23, 1992, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment, but with the following observations.

1. The Committee recognizes that Bill C-55 has been introduced primarily to ensure that the pension plans covered under the various Acts—the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, along with other related Acts—comply with requirements imposed on all pension plans in Canada by changes to the Income Tax Act that were given effect by regulations promulgated in January 1992. As well, the Bill proposes certain important changes affecting issues of fairness to which the government has been committed for some time and which can be implemented without imposing additional costs on the various pension plans. The Committee also notes the statement of the President of the Treasury Board, when he appeared before the Committee on September 10, 1992, that "there are outstanding issues to be resolved that are not addressed in this Bill" relating to the management of the pension plans, the future rate of return to be credited to the pension funds, future protection against inflation and other aspects of plan design, including future survivor benefits and questions about the conformity of the plans to the Pension Benefits Standards Act[1]. It notes the Minister's undertaking that:

> Bill C-55 is only a first step in the public service pension reform process. I am committed to reviewing all the fundamental elements of the plans . . . in consultation with the stakeholders involved.[2]

Accordingly, while the Committee is not amending the Bill, it anticipates that the government will bring forward additional bills in the near future to address these outstanding issues.

views of these groups will receive prompt and serious attention by the Advisory Committee. Your Committee further urges the government to ensure that the Advisory Committee be called to meet as soon as possible, and on a regular basis thereafter, with a view to resolving the outstanding issues that the Minister acknowledged are not addressed in this Bill and that were raised during your Committee's review. It further urges that the government appoint without delay, following the enactment of this Bill, the two proposed new Advisory Committees on the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act

3. Your Committee understands that officials of the Department of Finance and the Treasury Board are currently studying alternative methods of funding and financing public service pension plans with a view to developing options by the summer of 1993. The Committee urges the government to ensure that the Advisory Committees address expeditiously the various socio-economic issues raised during its review of the Bill, and that are outlined in the subsequent paragraphs, without waiting until the review of funding and financing arrangements has been completed. Officials of the Treasury Board should be prepared to return before the Committee in the near future to state the government's intentions in this regard.

4. In particular, your Committee is of the opinion that the existing measures regarding survivor benefits can and should be altered to provide for the possibility, where appropriate application is made, of survivor benefits being paid on a pro rata basis both to the legal or common-law spouse and to any previous spouse or spouses, including separated and divorced spouses without regard to their current marital status. It believes that the practice of deeming a separated spouse to have pre-deceased his or her contributor spouse, if he or she has established a new marital-type relationship, is anachronistic and iniquitous and should be terminated forthwith. Where no such relationship has been established, survivor benefits may currently be apportioned between a legal spouse and a common-law spouse. It is therefore apparent that an apportionment of benefits to all current and former legal or common-law spouses who apply could be implemented without any significant increase in pension costs.

5. Your Committee notes that Clause 46(3) on page 44 of Bill C-55 makes no provision for the participation of members of the reserve forces in the Canadian Forces superannuation plan. Under the total force concept, members of the reserves may be kept on call-up status for several years and may be posted overseas for extended periods of time on peacekeeping and other duties. Many of these individuals may not be members of other employer-sponsored pension plans. The Committee therefore urges the government to investigate the feasibility and cost of permitting members of the reserves to participate in the Canadian Forces superannuation plan during their periods of service.

6. The Committee requests that the Treasury Board provide it with a copy of the regulations to be prepared in conjunction with Bill C-55 as soon as they are available.

Respectfully submitted,

C. WILLIAM DOODY
Acting Chairman

PRAIRIE CRISIS—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, September 24, 1992, I will call the attention of the Senate to the emerging prairie agriculture crisis.

THE CONSTITUTION

MISHANDLING OF ISSUE—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, September 24, 1992, I will call the attention of the Senate to the mishandling of the Constitution issue by the Government of Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 225 residents of Nova Scotia who object to the goods and services tax.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Dated when?

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, I get these every day. I don't know the date. These petitions are mostly from Halifax, Bedford, Sackville and Fall River.

I get these petitions every week, so I don't know the date on any one in particular.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 499 residents of British Columbia who object to the goods and services tax. These petitions are mostly from Kelowna, West Bank, Vernon, Penticton, Terrace, Prince Rupert, Kitsemac and Smithers.

Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 502 residents of Saskatchewan who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitions are from Saskatoon, Prince Albert, Vibank, Moose Jaw and Regina.

Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 531 residents of Alberta who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitions are from Edmonton, Calgary, Fairview, Drayton Valley, St. Albert and Airdree.

Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions by 458 residents of Quebec who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitions are from Longueuil, Lévis, Saint-Lambert, Granby, Île-Perrot, Charlesbourg, Montreal, Sainte-Hyacinthe, Sainte-Thérèse, Sainte-Sophie and Saint-Domininique.

Finally, honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 100 residents of New Brunswick who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitions are from Burnsville, Bertrand, Trudel, Pokemouche, Packetville, Caraquet and Maltenpeck.

I can see many honourable senators opposite thought that Canadians, not being prone to protest, would quickly get used to the GST. They certainly must be surprised to see that two years after that historic debate, thousands of Canadians keep signing petitions objecting to the GST. Senator Simard obviously does not want to listen to the voice of the people. As I said before, to Senator Murray, not a week goes by without my receiving petitions, and those I just tabled were signed by 2,315 petitioners. That should impress a government that is obsessed by figures, including opinion poll results.

Hon. Jean-Marie Simard: Would Senator Hébert entertain a question?

Senator Hébert: Of course, Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: I am sure Senator Hébert has made a detailed study of these petitions, so I would like to know whether he can confirm that the protesting parties whose names appear on these petitions, have no suggestions for an alternative source of revenue, just like the Leader of the Liberal Party, mr. Chrétien.

Some Hon. Members: Order!

The Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I must call the senator to order because we have not reached question period yet.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions from the Royal Canadian Air Force Prisoners of War Association, Ottawa Branch, under the chairmanship of A.J. Little. It contains another 288 signatures in addition to those I have tabled in the last couple of sittings. These petitions are from British Columbia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Ontario, and Nova Scotia. The petitions read as follows:

> WHEREFORE the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to support the activities of the Senate Sub-Committee on Veterans Affairs in examining the authenticity of the aforementioned series of films.

The petitions have to do with the series of films: Savage Christmas: Hong Kong 1941; Death by Moonlight: Bomber Command; and In Desperate Battle: Normandy 1944.

I note with interest that two of the signatures include the former Chief of the General Staff, Ramsey Withers, and former prominent military naval leader, Admiral Mainguy.

QUESTION PERIOD

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN GRAIN CROP—ASSESSMENT OF STORM DAMAGE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Leader of the Government if any action has been initiated to assess the damage that was done to the grain crop in Western Canada from the snow storm in August, and whether or not the government has anyone in the field to assess how severe the damage was?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure that has been done by the minister in the Department of Agriculture, but I would have to ask for a report from my colleague on that matter.

Senator Olson: If the preliminary indication is that the damage is as severe as some people believe it is—that is, that the value of the entire crop has been reduced by 40 or 50 per cent by the loss of yield and the fact that the crops were frozen severely once in August and twice in early September—will the government put together the personnel and machinery needed to make an assessment of the situation? Is the government willing to give some help in this desperate situation?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will convey that question to my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture. However, I should point out that farmers do have a number of safety-net programs that are available to soften blows such as nature dealt the farmers in recent times. There is basic protection against the financial impacts of crop loss through federal-provincial crop insurance programs; and, as a result of federal efforts to bring about new and more comprehensive protection, farmers can supplement crop insurance with revenue protection through GRIP, the Gross Revenue Insurance Plan. Finally, in the event of reduced net income, my honourable friend is aware that farmers can have resort to NISA, the Net Income Stabilization Account, to supplement their income levels.

Senator Olson: By way of supplementary, most farmers are aware of those programs; however, when the minister takes the trouble to recite the programs that are available, does that mean that the government has already taken the position that either a farmer can be a beneficiary of those programs or that is it? We know that if they did not apply for NISA and GRIP prior to May of 1992, they cannot apply for those programs now.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am not sure that the honourable senator should dismiss these programs so lightly. The fact of the matter is that this year on the prairies, it is expected that crop insurance will provide close to $500 million in payments while GRIP payments may be in the $1.2 billion range. If crops continue to deteriorate, farmers can expect increases in the payments from these programs.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I did not in any way intend to diminish the value of those programs. The honourable minister has a bad habit of giving an answer that bears no relationship to the question. My question was: Is it the intention of the government to recycle all of these programs, which farmers had to apply for back in April or May, or was the minister's purpose to inform farmers that that is what will be available and nothing else?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I was making the very valid point that, because of the foresight and cooperation of the federal and provincial governments and the farmers themselves, farmers can have recourse to all of these programs in cushioning the effects of adverse weather conditions. That is the point I was making.

Senator Olson: That may be a good point, but the fact is that farmers must apply for such programs at the time of year they are offered, namely, in February, March or that part of the year. In other words, you have to make the application before you seed the crop. Surely that is sensible.

Senator Barootes: You cannot buy fire insurance after the fire; you must have it before.

Senator Olson: I understand that, but apparently your leader does not understand. That is the point I am trying to make. He comes along and announces all these great programs, knowing very well that unless the farmers had applied for the programs last spring, they would not receive anything from them. I want to know whether the Leader of the Government's purpose today was to advise farmers that the position of the government is that they either applied last spring or paddled their own canoes.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there must have been quite a few farmers applying. I told the senator a moment ago that crop insurance would provide about $500 million in payments this year and GRIP about $1.2 billion. There has been quite a good take-up on these programs. I referred to the foresight of farmers in this respect as well as to the cooperative attitude of various levels of government.

Senator Olson: I will leave it at that for now. The minister is obviously not prepared to even acknowledge that he heard the question, so I will try again later or tomorrow.

THE CONSTITUTION

INTERPRETATION AND SIGNIFICANCE OF REFERENDUM RESULTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I want to read a sentence or two from a newspaper story. I am reading from today's Globe and Mail where Graham Fraser reports that Mr. Mulroney threw some confusion into the question of how the referendum results will be interpreted. The article reads in part:

> In the morning, he referred to the fact that French President François Mitterrand had accepted a 50.7 per cent vote in favour of the ratification of the Maastricht Treaty, then finally, at the end of day, clarified that majorities in each province would be required for that province's legislature to ratify the agreement.

My question to the minister is this: What understanding is there, if any, either written or oral, among the first ministers as to the significance of a majority in a province? For example, is the Premier of Nova Scotia under any obligation arising from an understanding to seek support for the Charlottetown consensus in the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia if the answer in Nova Scotia on October 26, 1992 is a very weak "yes"?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a majority vote of the population, whether in a province or across the country, even if that majority be 50 per cent plus one, is not without significance. To answer the honourable senator's question directly in a word, the answer is no.

Senator Stewart: I want to preface my next question with a newspaper quotation from the Chronicle-Herald of September 12, and I am quoting Professor Duncan Fraser:

Senator Barootes: Where is the Chronicle-Herald?

Senator Stewart: Ask your colleague, Senator Buchanan.

Senator Barootes: London, England. I have it.

Senator Stewart: It might be wise for Senator Barootes to get Senator Buchanan to give him a tour of Nova Scotia.

Professor Fraser says that the referendum is not binding. He then states:

> It is well that the issue has to be resolved by the provincial assemblies. They would be ill-advised to go against a well-authenticated public opinion and this opinion will be validated only if it is certain that there is a clear public understanding of all the issues involved. This can only be ascertained by a legislative examination of the promised legal text in extensive public hearings.

Professor Fraser goes on, quite correctly, to point out that this wise course was not followed in Nova Scotia before the British North America Act was enacted and that the consequences of that failure were felt for many years thereafter.

Assuming a "yes" vote on October 26, is there any understanding, written or oral, among the First Ministers as to when and by what process the provincial assemblies will deal definitively with any constitutional changes based on the Charlottetwon consensus?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the short answer is that I am not aware of any such agreement.

The honourable senator spoke about either "written or oral" understandings. I do not know what the honourable senator would define as an "oral understanding."

My impression is that there is a desire on the part of the various parties to the agreement, the federal government and the provinces being the parties to the amending formula, to proceed quite quickly with the process of legislative ratification so that we do not find ourselves in a similar situation to that which took place between 1987 and 1990 with the Meech Lake Accord.

Senator Stewart: Would proceeding quite quickly preclude the possibility of hearings being conducted, let us say, by the National Assembly in Quebec on the constitutional amendment texts, or by the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia on those constitutional texts?

Senator Murray: Absolutely not.

ENTITLEMENT OF ALL CANADIANS TO VOTE IN REFERENDUM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is with regard to the right of all Canadians to vote in the coming referendum. To put the matter clearly, I will read from a letter which outlines the problem. It is from Mr. Graham Haig and is addressed to Pierre F. Côté, Chief Electoral Officer, Province of Quebec. The letter states:

> Dear Mr. Côté:
> I have recently returned to Quebec after three years in Ontario. I have resided in Quebec since August 1, 1992. I have been informed by your office that I will not be eligible to vote in the Quebec referendum on the Constitution next month.

This gentlemen has also written a letter to the Prime Minister wherein he gives a little more detail of his situation. He states:

> I am a Canadian citizen. I live within sight of the Peace Tower, and when the cannon goes off at noon, my windows rattle. I value my vote quite highly. I have always exercised my vote, and I have taken time off of work in the past to contribute as a poll clerk and as a deputy returning officer.
> I returned to Quebec after three years in Ontario on August 1, 1992. I have been informed by the office of the Chief Electoral Officer in Quebec that I am not eligible to vote in the Quebec referendum because I have lived in Quebec for less than six months and I lived outside of Quebec for more than two years. I am not eligible to vote in the federal referendum because it is not being held in Quebec because Quebec is holding its own referendum.

This being a Canadian referendum, surely every Canadian, regardless of where he or she lives, should be entitled to vote. Could the minister give us an indication of what corrections might be made to ensure that this does in fact take effect?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): No, honourable senators, I cannot do that off the cuff. I can only confirm that, indeed, the referendum in Quebec will be held according to the Quebec referendum laws; there is a six-month residency requirement for people living in Quebec to be eligible to vote in the referendum in that province; however, the legislation does indeed provide that a former resident of Quebec who has left Quebec for less than two years and who intends to return to Quebec is eligible to vote.

Senator Molgat: Would it not be reasonable, this being a Canadian referendum, that every Canadian be entitled to vote?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the arrangement was made not only with Quebec; it was offered to those other provinces which had legislation requiring referendums on any constitutional agreement. We, the federal government, offered to those provinces either to conduct their referendums under the aegis of the Chief Elections Officer of Canada or to do so according to their own legislation. In the case of Quebec, it will do so in conformity with its own legislation. I believe that Alberta and British Columbia will do so under the aegis of the Chief Elections Officer of Canada.

Senator Molgat: Would the government be prepared to make representations to the Government of Quebec to attempt to see to it that any Canadian wishing to vote be entitled to vote?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we recognize that there are some anomalies caused by the operation of the two levels at the same time. Elections Canada, which as honourable senators are aware operates independently of the government, is examining the administrative details in order to resolve as many of these anomalies as possible.

Senator Molgat: The minister has not replied to my question. Is the Government of Canada prepared to make recommendations to the Province of Quebec to try to see to it that every Canadian who wishes to vote is entitled to vote?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not think I can add much to what I have already said. An effort will be made, I am told by the Chief Elections Officer, to try to iron out the anomalies that exist. That is something that will have to be done at his level with his counterpart in Quebec.

Senator Molgat: But not at the government level then, I take it?

THE ECONOMY

INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the Canadian dollar has dropped approximately two cents in the last few days, for a variety of reasons, will the government give an undertaking to let the economic factors work, let the dollar find its own level, and not impose ridiculously high interest rates on the Canadian people in order to defend the dollar, as it did the last time?

● (1440)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator knows that the Bank of Canada intervenes in the marketplace only to ensure that the currency markets function smoothly.

I should say, by the way, that the latest information I had as I came in here today was that the dollar had rebounded quite considerably on international markets. I do not know whether the honourable senator had that up-to-date information when he arrived.

Senator Olson: No. It has been quite a few years since I got that sort of up-to-date information. For that information I am grateful to the honourable minister. It is good news if that has indeed transpired.

Of course, there are some people in this country who believe that the government is directly responsible for what the Governor of the Bank of Canada does. I therefore hope the minister would make representation to his colleague the Minister of Finance, telling him to stay out of the situation. As well, I would ask the minister to inform the Governor of the Bank of Canada that we would like to see a dollar that is based on real economic factors, and not see again these artificial interest rates that landed some people in such dire circumstances the last time around.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Bank of Canada rate, which did increase slightly last Thursday, had undergone reductions in 19 consecutive weeks. I want the honourable senator to understand that.

So far as the distant past is concerned, surely my honourable friend will recall that my criticism was never of the Governor of the Bank of Canada. My criticism was of my honourable friend's government for having created the economic and fiscal position that rendered those drastic monetary steps necessary.

Senator Olson: My criticism was not so much of the Bank of Canada, either. My criticism is that this government has waffled in carrying out its responsibility to act at this time. They do not like what is happening, but they say it is the fault of the Governor of the Bank of Canada. However, we both know that over 30 years ago—in 1961, in fact—it was settled in no uncertain terms that the government cannot escape the consequences of the policies of the Bank of Canada. If they do not endorse such policies, they know what they can do about it.

I am asking the minister now to carry to his colleague the Minister of Finance the message that Canadians do not want to go through the same severe kind of treatment as they did last time, putting hundreds of thousands of people in this country into bankruptcy, all because this government did not take seriously its responsibility and keep interest rates at a level that was within reason.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the record on interest rates in this country speaks for itself. I have already pointed out to the honourable senator that there have been 19 consecutive decreases in the bank rates in recent weeks. I would have hoped that the honourable senator might have applauded, if not the government then at least the results in terms of inflation and interest rates.

As for the relationship between the Bank of Canada and the present government, the honourable senator will be aware that we have jointly set targets for inflation. Because of the support of the fiscal and economic policies of this government, we have more than achieved the inflation targets that we set. Canada currently has the lowest inflation rate in the western world.

Senator Olson: The honourable minister might keep in mind those people who were driven into bankruptcy because, three years ago, prime interest rates rose as high as 14.75 per cent. In fact, there are people who are still trying to dig themselves out of the debt morass they got into because of the actions of this government and its agent, the Bank of Canada.

I would remind this government that Canadians are not a bunch of fools. They can remember what happened three years ago, and they do not want it to happen again. We need a commitment from the government that you will not do that sort of thing again.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, so long as the present government perseveres in the economic and fiscal policy which we initiated on coming to office in 1984, and so long as we decline to follow the example set by honourable my friend's opposition when they were in government, we will never come even close to having a chartered bank prime in this country of 22.75 per cent as we did in 1981.

Senator Olson: You are kidding yourself if you think the Canadian people will believe you if you blame everything on what might have happened ten years ago. They know that three years ago this government condoned a prime interest rate of 14.75 per cent at a time when no one else in the world did. No other country in the G-7 had interest rates like that.

I am asking at this time for a commitment from the minister that his government do not again intend to commit that kind of offence against the Canadian people. That is my question. It is that simple.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, few other countries in the world—and certainly few among our competitors—had the unenviable record that this country had under my friends —and this is the legacy we inherited in 1984—of inflation and deficit as a proportion of gross national product and all the other conditions that dictated a fairly severe monetary policy.

The result of our efforts has been that we now have the lowest inflation and the lowest interest rates. Among our major competitors, according to the IMF and other qualified international bodies, we will lead the world in 1992 and 1993 in terms of economic growth and job creation.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, perhaps most Canadians believe that kind of little discourse that the minister just went through. That is why this government's strength in the Gallop polls has gone down to 16 or 18 per cent and even further, and why it is still going down. If you truly believe that the Canadian people are swallowing that kind of garbage, well, carry on and you will stay under 20 per cent.

Senator Frith: 82 per cent say they don't.

Senator Olson: That's right, they do not believe this.

THE CONSTITUTION

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—AVAILABILITY OF LEGAL TEXTS FOR REFERENDUM

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. When can we expect to have the legal text, or whatever it will be termed, of the Charlottetown accord for the referendum on the 26th? I have here a headline which says:

> La version juridique de l'accord de Charlottetown disponible le 5 octobre.

Since then, I understand that Mr. Clark has said it will not be available on October 5. When can we expect to have the actual legal version, or whatever it is termed?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not had an opportunity to discuss this matter with Mr. Clark, but honourable senators will recall what I said on the matter on earlier occasions. The officials have been instructed to attack this task with all possible speed, but the work of drafting is infinitely complex. It involves all of the provincial, territorial and Aboriginal organizations that were parties to the discussions and the agreements.

I very much doubt that we will have complete and agreed-upon legal texts available within the next month. However, I hasten to add that every effort is being made to produce them as quickly as possible and, if possible, before the referendum.

Senator Molgat: What has happened in the interval? This same news story goes on to state:

[Translation]

> The new deadline for the presentation of the official legal text of the Charlottetown Constitutional Agreement is now October 5, when the chiefs of the Assembly of First Nations will hold their general assembly.
> Federal officials as well as provincial, territorial, and aboriginal representatives had already decided last Thursday to intensify their efforts in order to try to meet that deadline.

[English]

According to this article, all the representatives are there—provincial, territorial and Aboriginal. They agreed as of the Thursday before September 14 that they would meet that day. What has happened in the interval to change the circumstances?

Senator Murray: Nothing has happened, honourable senators. If those can be produced by October 5, that will be wonderful. However, my caution and my experience leads me to be sceptical of such an early deadline.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

DOWNPAYMENT REDUCTIONS FOR FIRST-TIME HOME BUYERS—USE OF RRSP FUNDS FOR DOWNPAYMENTS—STATUS OF PROGRAMS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Last February, CMHC allowed a reduction in the downpayment for first-time home buyers from 10 per cent to 5 per cent. There was also a provision to allow people to use their RRSP funds for downpayment purposes.

Will the honourable gentlemen ask his officials to provide some statistics concerning the program's success?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Yes, I will be glad to do so, honourable senators. I think my friend was referring to two discrete decisions. It is not one program, but two.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Senator Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have answers to questions raised on September 9 by Senators Bonnell and Stewart regarding the P.E.I. fixed link; on September 9 by Senator Olson regarding the U.S. Export Enhancement Program; and on September 16 by Senator Molgat regarding a suggested tradeoff in Saskatchewan of telecommunications jurisdiction for constitutional support.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—STATUS OF PROJECT

(Response to question raised by Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell and Hon. John B. Stewart on September 9, 1992)

> The Department of Public Works does not have a contract with Strait Crossing Incorporated to build the fixed link to P.E.I.
> In July, the Minister of Public Works was authorized by Cabinet to enter into discussions with Strait Crossing Inc (S.C.I.). These discussions have focused around

S.C.I.'s previously submitted financial package. These discussions have not been concluded and must be fully addressed before negotiations can commence. The government will only proceed with S.C.I. if they are fully compliant and meet all the requirements.

S.C.I. have taken it upon themselves, at their own expense and financial risk, to conduct test drilling in the Strait. The test drilling is necessary so that S.C.I. can verify previous information and finalize their particular bridge design.

It is our understanding that S.C.I. has received all required permits and approvals from the various regulatory agencies. These agencies include the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, the Coast Guard, the N.B. Department of Natural Resources, the P.E.I. Department of Transportation and Public Works and Environment Canada.

It is important to note that if S.C.I. is to adhere to its pricing and construction schedules, this geotechnical work must be completed this fall prior to the winter elements.

U.S. EXPORT ENHANCEMENT PROGRAM—INCREASE IN FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. H.A. Olson on September 9, 1992)

The announcement by President Bush on September 2, 1992 regarding the Export Enhancement Program (EEP) contained at least three new elements of concern to Canada:

- total allocations for targeted countries were announced concurrently. In the past, the US announced new initiatives randomly throughout the year. This left some doubt in the minds of importers as to whether new allocations would be made and as to what size those allocations might be. This left Canadian exporters in a somewhat stronger bargaining position than they are in now since all doubt about allocations has been removed;
- certain countries (India, Poland, Romania, Lebanon and Kenya) which were not targeted for EEP in 1991/92, but which had been previously targeted, are now re-targeted. Two countries, Pakistan and South Africa, became eligible for EEP bonuses for the first time;
- the allocations for certain countries where Canada has been the predominant supplier have been increased. Of particular concern in this respect is China where the allocation has been increased by one million tonnes.

Canada views these modifications to, and broadening of, EEP as a most serious matter. As an initial step, Ministers McKnight and Mayer have registered Canada's strong concerns with the changes in a letter to Secretary of Agriculture Madigan dated September 4. In the letter the Ministers noted that under the Free Trade Agreement (FTA) the US and Canada have agreed to take into account each other's interests in the use of any export subsidy on agricultural goods to third countries. They requested clarification from the Secretary as to how the US plans to do that under the recent announcement.

To follow up on this letter, Canada will be seeking early consultations with the US. The purpose of the consultations will be two-fold: to re-register Canada's concerns and to seek clarification of the manner in which Canada's export interests will be taken into account in the administration of the EEP.

At the same time, Canada has also had discussions with the Government of Australia about the possibility of Canada supporting a GATT initiative by Australia against the US.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

TRADEOFF OF TELECOMMUNICATIONS JURISDICTION FOR CONSTITUTIONAL SUPPORT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas L. Molgat on September 16, 1992)

Saskatchewan's request related to a provision in Bill C-62, slated for second reading later this fall; it did not relate to the Constitution as such. The Government has agreed, further to the transition period provision which was already in the Bill, to retain the Province's jurisdiction over Sasktel for another five years.

Telecommunications agreements are to be negotiated with all provinces and the particular needs of any province will be taken into account. There are and will be no secret deals. As part of the Charlottetown undertaking to harmonize and coordinate regulatory policies, the Government seeks to proceed with regionalization of the CRTC in a way which will give the provinces more say in the formulation of communications policy while at the same time preserving and strengthening a national policy in this area.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

DEPUTY SPEAKER OF POLISH SENATE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, with your permission I wish to recognize a distinguished visitor in the gallery this afternoon, Mr. Josef Slisz, Deputy-Speaker of the Polish Senate.

Mr. Slisz owns a 15-hectare farm and has been active in various farmers' organizations since 1980. He became Chairman of the Provisional Executive Council of Farmers Solidarity in March, 1987, and joined Lech Walesa's Citizens Committee in December of 1988, participating in the round table discussion of 1989 that laid the groundwork for the first non-communist government in Poland.

Mr. Slisz was elected senator in June, 1989, and became Deputy-Speaker of the Senate. He was re-elected in October of 1991. He heads the Polish Peasants Solidarity Party, which combines strong attachment to the church with grassroots rural and farmers' interests. Welcome.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

ORDERS OF THE DAY

INCOME TAX ACT

CHILDREN'S SPECIAL ALLOWANCES ACT

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Mira Spivak moved the second reading of Bill C-80, to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act.

She said: Honourable senators, the 1992 proposals for child benefits contained in Bill C-80 are the latest in the number of changes that have been made in the Canadian system over the years.

It has been suggested that these proposals should be seen as within or part of that historical context. Mr. Ken Battle, President of the Caledon Institute of Social Policy, in his appearance before the Commons committee laid out the traditional arguments for Canada's child benefits system that go back to the 1920s and the 1930s and resulted in the first form of child allowance, the Family Allowance Program.

The universalist position or argument for child benefits is that of parental recognition. Child benefits are meant to help acknowledge the contribution that all parents make to Canadian society in raising children, the future citizens of our society.

The second notion behind child benefits, historically, is that of horizontal equity. Child benefits should recognize the financial burden on families with children as opposed to households without children at the same income level.

The third, and the strongest, argument at this point in time is the anti-poverty objective. Child benefits should help to fill the gap between wages and income needs of families with children.

Fourth, there is economic stimulus. This notion prevailed at the end of World War II to prime the pump at that time to ease the transition from a wartime to a peacetime economy.

Social analysts, of course, have pointed out that various changes to child benefits have not always been consistent with these objectives. But they have always been the underpinnings, the philosophical background of the system, and what I would like to think of as the particular Canadian flavour of our democracy.

Bill C-80, the latest of these changes, is designed to replace an existing patchwork of legislation concerning child benefits geared to assist families with children. Specifically, the family allowance, the non-refundable child tax credit and the refundable child tax credit would all be eliminated and a new child tax benefit would be created. The present equivalent to married credit would continue to be available to single parent families for the first child.

The existing federal system has been criticized on a variety of grounds. Since it comprises a variety of measures introduced at different times for different reasons, and often independently of each other, we have some benefits based on family income, others on individual income, some delivered monthly and others annually.

The family allowance introduced initially as a purely universal program in 1945 to recognize the social value of child bearing and rearing and to assist families in raising children was changed in 1974 to make the family allowance taxable as ordinary income. At present, for 600,000 higher income Canadians family allowances must be partially or fully repaid to government when they file their income tax returns.

It is interesting to note that some of the criticisms made of the government's present proposals were made of the then universal family allowance plan in the 1970 study entitled, "Income Security for Canadians". That paper expressed dissatisfaction with the family allowance as a means of relieving poverty -- the payments were too low and did not direct enough help to lower income families.

Since it was deemed that it would be disastrously expensive to increase the then existing allowances to an amount that would be significant for lower income families, because it would have to be paid to all families, an entirely new approach, it was said, was needed, that is, the targeted approach. That approach, known as the FISP proposal was not adopted at that time. Rather, a proposal which made family allowances taxable was adopted in 1974. The refundable child tax credit was introduced in 1979 to provide additional financial assistance to low and middle income families in raising dependent children.

Other criticisms directed at the existing system, and which led to the present proposals, are the following: As the White Paper states, benefits are delivered piecemeal in three different ways—a family allowance cheque mailed monthly, an annual child tax credit that reduces tax liabilities, and a refundable child tax credit mailed as a lump sum payment after tax returns are assessed, although some families receive partial prepayment in November.

There are different eligibility criteria for each program. For higher income families, there is the cumbersome process of having them receive monthly payments for a year and then having all or most of that money recovered at tax time.

Family allowances are taxed and recovered on the basis of individual incomes, which may result in families with similar total incomes receiving different benefits.

Delays in payment mean that modest income families, for whom the Refundable Tax Credit may represent more than half of federal child benefits, may have to wait more than a year to receive full credit. Thus, tax discounters flourish and families sacrifice part of their benefits to meet their immediate needs. I have some intimate personal knowledge of tax discounters from when I was a member of the Social Planning Council staff in Winnipeg.

The most compelling argument for change, however, is the most familiar one—inadequate support for low income families. Greater assistance is needed to help children in lower income families. A recent Senate report, as you will remember, spoke of the national disgrace of our Canadian children living in poverty.

Inadequate support creates barriers to work for low-income families. Families are faced with employment-related expenses and a possible reduction in social assistance when they choose to work. The proposed new Child Benefit, adding $400 million in federal benefits annually to the existing $4.5 billion in programs, has the following features, once the three programs are wrapped together.

The present Family Allowance, Child Credit and Refundable Child Tax Credit will be consolidated into one benefit paid monthly based on income reported in previous years that will be neither taxed nor recovered at tax time. All children under 18 will be eligible.

The proposed benefit will be subject to a reduction formula much like the existing Refundable Child Tax Credit. It would contain an earned income supplement of up to $500, much like that now available through the refundable GST credit. The base amounts set out in clause 12 of the bill at annual rates would be $1,020 for each qualified dependent; $75 for the third and subsequent dependent under 18 years; $213 per dependent under the age of 7, as well as an earned income supplement equal to 8 per cent of family earned income in excess of $3,750 to a maximum of $500 per year.

The supplemental amount for young dependents would be reduced by 25 cents per dollar of claimed child care expenses, while the earned income supplement would be reduced by 10 cents on the dollar per family income in excess of $20,921. The earned income supplement is phased out entirely at a net income of $25,921, the point at which child tax benefits start to be reduced.

After total benefit levels are determined, the result would be divided by 12 to establish monthly payments. The monthly cheque would be received by the eligible individual presumed to be the female parent who would have to be the principal caregiver and reside with the dependent.

To receive the benefit, an individual would have to file a tax return or some other form in lieu thereof. For example, tax benefits for the first six months of 1993 will be based on income earned in 1991 and, starting in July 1993, the benefits will be based on 1992 income. Every July thereafter, the payments will be updated to reflect the previous year's tax information.

All amounts will be indexed according to the "CP less 3 per cent" rule that applies to so many other tax and benefit measures.

According to government figures, the large majority of families will receive more assistance. Average annual benefits for families with incomes below $50,000—about 2 million families—will be $250 higher under the new system. Single parents will retain the present equivalent-to-married credit for their first child; this is worth an average of $1,445 in reduced federal and provincial taxes.

Changes in family status, marriage breakdown, birth of a child, et cetera, will be reflected in adjustments to monthly payments.

Mr. Ken Battle, the director of the Caledon Institute for Social Policy, as I mentioned, and Mr. Pat Johnson, the director of the Canadian Council on Social Development, listed some of the advantages. I want to quote some of the advantages of the latest proposal. Of course they had criticisms, but these are the advantages:

First, the new system will put the child benefit system on a fairer and more consistent family income basis. At present, there is a mish-mash, as Mr. Battle put it. The childcare expense deduction is based on the income of the lower-income spouse. The non-refundable credit and the Family Allowance are based on the income of the higher-earning spouse. And the Refundable Child Tax Credit is based on family income. This legislation, in this respect, is a good thing and a positive step forward.

Second, incorporating three major programs into one benefit responds to the long-standing criticism that the child benefit system is irrational and complicated. It is not a perfect attempt, but it is a response to this criticism.

Third, $400 million of new moneys, added to the $4.5 billion in 1992, will be put into child benefits each year over the next five years. In the present economic context, this is welcome news. It will also incorporate additional support for lower-income working families with children and will target assistance to those who need it most.

Critics of the new child benefit scheme have attacked the proposal on several grounds. I will not deal with all of them, but some of them are as follows: Family Allowance is no longer a universal program. However, in my view, this is not a sudden death. It is a death by a thousand cuts. Surely a system which has taxed back the benefit from the personal incomes of higher income families since 1974 is universal in appearance only, because, since it is taxable, it is selective in its real effect.

Another strong criticism is that, because indexation of the Child Tax Credit will be limited to changes in prices in excess of 3 per cent, families will get less and less every year.

The new system, like the current one, will be partially de-indexed, which means that the values of these benefits will decline over time. That is true not only of the benefits, but also of the magic threshold up to which the maximum benefits are paid, which will be $25,921 in 1993; thus, the threshold also will be de-indexed.

The government response to this criticism is that the best protection against inflation is a commitment to price stability through both social policy and economic policy, and that the government's record in this matter is a good one because it has increased and enriched benefits since 1985 so that the average level of benefits paid to low income families has more than kept pace with inflation.

The earned income supplement has also raised questions on issues of equity. Although working families need more help, it has been suggested that this is not the way to help them. Some families who are poor will get additional benefits while other families who are poor will not.

However, other social analysts have pointed out that, within social assistance programs delivered by provincial governments, a number of benefits in kind are provided to recipients—such as coverage for dental care, for prescription drugs and for eyeglasses, as examples—that are not available to the working poor. This was a point made by Mr. Patrick Johnson. The earned income supplement is a way to try to rectify that imbalance between the working poor and the socially assisted.

There are other troubling issues raised concerning equity. Canada, it is said, apparently has one of the world's highest rates of poverty for single-parent and female-led single-parent families—the most recent rate being 60 per cent. How many of these will receive the full $500 supplement? Also, since this is a child benefit package, the earned income supplement is restricted in this instance to families with children. What about families with no children? It is claimed that approximately 60 per cent of the working poor are in households with no children; 60 per cent would not be able to benefit from the earned income supplement as it is proposed.

So the question is, what would be the impact of the earned income supplement on the poverty rate? For example, how many poor single families would be boosted above the poverty line? I would hope that the committee studying this legislation might address these issues.

The most important consideration to keep in mind, in my view, is the impact of child benefits on poverty, on poor children in Canada, of whom we know there are far too many, as our own Senate committee has found.

I share the concern of those who claim that the new child tax benefit, while a positive step forward, is not a comprehensive program to combat child poverty. We must do better, and I hope that the committee that will study this bill will review some of the issues raised by those citizens and social groups appearing before the House of Commons committee for future changes to the child benefits package so that the rhetoric surrounding the signing of the Convention on Children's Rights and the declarations of those in the political process are implemented into legislation.

The fight against poverty is not just a matter of child benefits. A national child care program is a vital element in that battle. I would hope that that goal has not been abandoned and that Canada will have such a program in the near future.

In its review of this legislation, the Senate committee may wish to revisit this issue, which was the subject of a report by a subcommittee on child care which I had the privilege of chairing some time ago. That was a subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Honourable senators, this legislation should be supported as an evolution in the history of child benefits, a positive step forward but not the "end of history", to paraphrase Fukiyama. We should indeed strive for continued progressive changes to child benefit programs in order to serve the needs of children and their families in Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I would like to be able to say that it is a pleasure to speak in this debate. Unfortunately, it is not. How could I rejoice in the death of the universal family allowance program?

Bill C-80, which is even more odious in that it is being proposed in the midst of a recession, will remove another pillar from the Canadian social security system. When it is passed, a large chunk of the social safety net that Canadians have laboriously constructed since the 1940s will be gone.

This measure is even more unacceptable in that it is contrary not only to the evolution of social programs in Canada but to the formal assurances that the Prime Minister and his government gave us. In its Speech from the Throne on November 5, 1984, the newly elected government said that it has as a high priority measures to support and strengthen the Canadian family, which is the cornerstone of our society.

How nice!

In the same vein, the Minister of National Health and Welfare said on November 15, 1984:

> It is my role to put forward signals and initiatives which will strengthen the role of the family and give it more prominence in society than I feel it has been given before.

Could anyone say it better?

Several years later, this same Conservative government, in the Speech from the Throne on May 13, 1991, admitted that children are both the most important and the most vulnerable members of society and that its objective was to provide better education and better protection for Canadian children. That is almost sublime!

Listening to these fine promises, made with an almost New Democratic quiver in the voice, people might have believed for a moment that the new government would perhaps be more progressive than conservative. They had still not forgotten Brian Mulroney's great pledge in the 1984 election campaign:

> "Our social programs are a sacred trust, not to be tampered with".

True Conservatives must have shuddered on hearing their leader express such faith in our social programs, the work of Liberal governments. But they reassured themselves by saying that once in power, Brian Mulroney's government would quickly set aside this ill-considered little sentence, the result of his tendency to exaggerate. Nevertheless, eight years later, like a nagging feeling of remorse, it has come back to haunt the Prime Minister every time another regressive measure takes away another piece of the "sacred trust". For example, let us recall the changes to unemployment insurance, the end to assistance for cooperative housing, the reduction in aid for social housing, and so many measures that seemed intended to further impoverish the most disadvantaged Canadian families.

Not only has the government abolished many existing social programs but it went back on the only promise that would have given a little comfort to poor families: the child-care program, which for a long time has received less attention than constitutional trivia.

Oh, how I regret not having the late Senator Croll's eloquence and passion in defending the poor and especially poor children. Were he with us today, he would have given us a display of his righteous anger which, one never knows, might perhaps have shaken the tranquil cynicism of the senators opposite whose only mission on earth, it seems, is to pass as soon as possible any bill submitted by their government, regardless of its social consequences.

Once again, for purely electoral reasons, the government decided that C-80 had to be rushed through, so that it could issue cheques starting on January 1. As if by chance, that is the same date as was arbitrarily set for implementing the GST.

In the House of Commons, they started discussing this important bill on June 1. After two days of debate yes, two days of debate!—the government used closure, a measure which parliamentarians with some respect for democracy use only in extreme situations. As has become its habit, this government held public hearings which were a mockery, since it imposed deadlines that were too short to enable witnesses to prepare their submissions and to alert the public.

In fact, most witnesses protested strongly against this show of force which ridicules the democratic process, or what is left of it, in the House of Commons!

Once again, many people who did not get the opportunity to be heard, or many witnesses who did not have the time to prepare their submission, rely on the Senate to correct this injustice. We shall see if the very docile government senators will display a greater sense of democracy than their colleagues in the other place.

In many respects, Bill C-80 is typical of this government. For one thing, this legislation is introduced as a program to improve child benefits. We are told that is simply a matter of combining all the existing benefits into one. In other words, it is just a measure to make life easier for the public, an argument which is not without appeal in this period of increasing bureaucracy.

The other day, by chance I heard the minister Benoît Bouchard explain on television in his reassuring, deep voice that this legislation was just to streamline and simplify. He seemed to be saying: "Come on children, relax! There is nothing to it!"

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: You are going to starve to death tomorrow, in order to improve the system.

Senator Hébert: There! But when the government tells us about "streamlining" and "simplifying", there is reason to be concerned. There is always something suspicious. You only need to search a little to find the real intentions of a government which seems to have but one priority: To reduce, at the expense of the poor, a deficit which, as everyone knows, has simply doubled since it took power.

At first glance, Bill C-80 seems quite harmless and quite reasonable. According to its proponents, it would also have the advantage of combining family allowance, the refundable child tax credit and the non-refundable tax credit in a single monthly allowance.

The government forgot to mention that the real purpose of Bill C-80 is to end the universality of family allowance, despite Brian Mulroney's famous promise that he would never tamper with this "sacred trust", as he said in 1984, in referring to our social programs.

The government seems to be trying to make up for this unpardonable betrayal by saying this is a progressive measure that will direct funds to those who need it the most. It does no such thing. The Minister of Finance maintains that Bill C-80 will raise federal child benefits by $400 million per year or $2.1 billion over five years. The minister seems to forget that his government took more than $3.5 million out of the child benefits system between 1986 and 1991. In other words, families in need will not receive a penny more.

Since 1984, the Conservatives' initiatives have never stopped undermining the security of our families and the foundation on which Liberal governments had built Canada.

Since the twenties, Liberal advances in social legislation continued practically without interruption until this government came to power. Since then, these progressive measures have been dying a slow death.

With Bill C-80, the Conservative government continues to dismantle Canada's universal social security programs. A short overview of our social security legislation will make this clear.

The origins of family allowance go back to 1918, when the government amended the Income War Tax Act and introduced a child tax exemption of $200 for each child under 16, at a time when a quart of milk cost 5 cents. With this new measure, the government recognized the importance of having an income supplement for dependent children. In 1927, the tax exemption was raised to $500 and extended to all children under 21.

The family allowance concept became more widely known and, in 1929, the Striking Committee of the House of Commons started to examine this subject matter. Unfortunately, these developments were interrupted by the Depression and the Second World War and the subject was not resumed until the early forties.

At that time, the House of Commons Reconstruction Committee decided to consider the concept again. Inspired by a study prepared by Sir William Beveridge for the British Parliament, entitled "Social Insurance and Allied Services", the federal government became more sensitive to the need for a social security program in Canada.

According to Beveridge, family allowance was necessary to pick up the slack in a pay system that did not consider family size.

In March 1943, the federal government tabled in the House of Commons a document prepared by Mr. Leonard Marsh: "Report on Social Security in Canada".

According to the Marsh report, the inadequate incomes of employed workers with a number of children was one of the main causes of poverty. The report concluded that the State had an obligation to correct income on the basis of family size. Subsequent to the Marsh report, Prime Minister Mackenzie King's Liberal government announced in the Speech from the Throne, in January 1944, its intention of paying a family allowance, and I quote:

> "The family and the home are the foundation of national life. To aid in ensuring a minimum of well-being to the children of the nation and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity in the battle of life, you will be asked to approve a measure making provision for family allowance."

With this statement, the government laid one of the cornerstones of Canada's social income security system. It also recognized that family allowance was an investment in the children and future of this country.

In his speech on July 25, 1944, when he introduced the family allowance bill, Prime Minister Mackenzie King demonstrated beyond a doubt that he was a great Liberal and was able to lay the foundations of a just and more compassionate society. He said, and I quote:

> ". . . there is an obligation upon the state to assist in the upbringing of children . . . But, up to the present time, that obligation has been recognized only with respect to the more fortunate in our country, those who already have an income large enought to be taxable and to entitle them to exemptions according to the number of children in the family. In other words, where the need has been least it has already been recognized. The purpose of this bill is to recognize a similar obligation where the need is obviously greater than it is in the other cases."

[Senator Hébert.]

The historic speech by the Prime Minister of that time signaled the advent of the Canadian family allowance program. This necessary measure would help spread the cost of raising children more fairly among the whole population. The allowance program would from that time on apply universally to all Canadian children, without exception.

Let us not forget that this happened at the end of the Second World War, when a government that had no money had to face countless priorities. In his memoirs, our late illustrious colleague, the Right Hon. Paul Martin, reveals that not all members of the Cabinet agreed. Even among Liberals, conservatives sometimes manage to creep in! Let me quote you a paragraph from this thrilling work:

> The cost of these changes disturbed some in the cabinet, including C.D. Howe and the conscientious keeper of the public purse, Jim Ilsley. Ilsley's objection was that the report, having been released prematurely, did not carry the official sanction of government and therefore could not be accepted as the basis for legislation. While Ilsley might have based his official objections to the proposals on these grounds, I knew that philosophically he did not favour spending the government's money in this manner. One night he and I talked long into the wee hours arguing the pros and cons of state measures for social security. He honestly felt that the government could not afford these measures and that some of them should be undertaken by the family, the church or the provinces. Ilsley kept asking me: "Why do you want to saddle us with these things?" My answer was: "Because of my liberalism".

[English]

Moreover, during his July 25 speech, Prime Minister Mackenzie King illustrated the importance and need for this program, underlining the fundamental values which prompted the proposal. Again, his words spoke so eloquently and so passionately, ringing as true and sounding as relevant today as they did then, that I feel I must quote them, and quote them to remind the Conservative Government that its actions portend a dark future for all Canadians if it continues tearing the fabric of nationhood.

Senator Cools: Hear, hear!

Senator Hébert: He said:

> This measure . . . is in the general interest rather than in the interest of any particular class. What most of us forget is that, more and more, we are all coming to be dependent on each other, that no man liveth to himself, that no community liveth to itself, that no nation liveth to itself, that we are members one of another, and that, if any part of the community suffers because of subnormal conditions, sooner or later other parts of the same community will suffer likewise. You cannot have one section of the nation undernourished, ill-clothed and unequal to its daily tasks, and not have the rest of the nation sooner or later suffer as a consequence.

Senator Murray: That is why we are targeting the new child tax credit.

Senator Hébert: Oh, yes, we know that!

Honourable senators, I am certain that all of you agree with the basic tenure of this quotation, and that given the scope and implications of Bill C-80, these are words which the Conservatives ought to heed.

In any event, when the House of Commons finally voted on the Family Allowance Bill on that memorable day in 1944, not one single dissenting voice was raised. All members of Parliament seemingly realized that family allowances were the most effective means of providing an income supplement.

Over the years the tax system continued to evolve to the benefit of families with children. By 1972, for instance, the Liberal government introduced a child care expense deduction to help working parents offset the cost of raising children.

Senator Murray: We improved that in the last budget, too.

Senator Hébert: You have improved so many things in the last eight years, it is incredible!

Senator Gigantès: You are pushing us into a depression, and that, too, is evident.

Senator Hébert: Moreover, the Family Allowances Act was amended in 1973 to further ease the financial burden of raising children and to increase equality of opportunity for children regardless of the economic condition of their families. Again in 1978, the Liberal government restructured child benefits to circumvent problems pertaining to low income families. With little or no taxable income, these families could not benefit from existing tax exemptions and deductions. Therefore, the federal government introduced the refundable child tax credit which provided a maximum benefit of $200 per child per year.

Senator LeBlanc: That was Monique Bégin.

Senator Hébert: As you can see, Canada's family allowance programs have followed a very specific course. Since their inception, each change brought to these programs helped alleviate the cost of raising a family. These changes reinforced universality and the commitment of the national government to Canadian families. Unfortunately, since the Tories were swept to power in 1984 —

Senator Murray: And in '88.

Senator Hébert: —this course has been altered and child benefits have been spiralling downwards to virtual oblivion.

Senator Frith: We will sweep them out of power.

Senator Hébert: As I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks, the Conservatives are playing a smoke-and-mirrors game with the figures. For example, the government claims that the new benefit will add $400 million a year to the current annual federal assistance to families, a five-year total of $2.1 billion. This estimate conveniently ignores the fact that the government subtracted more than $3.5 billion from the child benefit systems between 1986 and 1991.

Senator LeBlanc: Shame!

Senator Murray: Talk about smoke and mirrors!

Senator Hébert: At first glance this bill appears to be acceptable. The government claims that Bill C-80 will simplify tax returns, that it will maintain more generous benefits for children under seven and for large families. It sounds good. As well, the government pretends that it will increase the incomes of families with lower revenues. Accordingly, most families in the $30,000 to $50,000 range may expect as little as $4 more a month for their children.

However, all is not as it seems in Toryland. To help illustrate the dishonesty of this bill, I wish to draw the attention of my honourable colleagues to an article from the April 1992, issue of The Catalyst, a publication of citizens for public justice. The article says:

Under the current system the poorest Canadian —

Senator Frith: Words like "justice" make them laugh; did you notice that?

Senator Hébert: Yes, and "human rights". Last week, it was "human rights" that made them laugh.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Who was the author?

Senator Hébert: It reads:

> Under the current system, the poorest Canadian families, those receiving social assistance or unemployment insurance payments will not receive an increase in their benefits. Under the current system, these families receive annual family allowance payments of $419 per child, and a refundable tax credit of $601, for a total of $1,020 per child. The new child tax credit will give them $1,020 per child, exactly the same benefit as the current system. The only additional funds are in the form of an earned income supplement for families that are employed and earn more than $3,750 annually. For every $100 earned over $3,750, these families will receive an additional $8, up to a yearly maximum of $500. Once annual earnings reach more than $20,921, the earnings supplement will be decreased and will disappear completely at the point where annual income is $25,921 or more.

Senator Frith: That is one of the improvements. Another Senator Murray improvement!

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, the government's duplicity is exposed in the glaring light of day. This new scheme evidently does not apply to families on social assistance. Oh no, it does not! It does not apply to those who receive unemployment insurance.

Senator Gigantés: The undeserving poor.

Senator Hébert: Absolutely, and adding insult to injury, the extra money given to average families, about $1,300, is actually less than if the government had not tampered with programs over the last eight years.

Obviously this new plan was devised to help the sagging fortunes of the Conservative government. By providing only the appearance of a benefit increase, the government hopes to curry the electoral favour of a broad cross-section of the Canadian population. How cynical! How manipulative!

Senator Gigantès: How Tory!

Senator Hébert: I wanted to say "How wrong!" but you said it for me: "How Tory!"

Canadians have had their fill of these methods over the last eight years. No amount of tinkering nor fudging of figures can revive this government. Canadians will see through the manipulation and electioneering of the government, and relegate it to where it properly belongs.

Moreover, the partial deindexation of benefits and the complete lack of indexation of the threshold amounts will gradually erode the benefit amounts as well as reduce the number of families entitled to benefits. Had the government seriously considered helping the poor, it would have proceeded differently. It would have indexed benefits fully to the cost of living; it would have included an increase in benefits for families on social assistance and unemployment insurance; it would have converted the child care expense deduction into a tax credit and thereby preserved the universality of the family allowance program. Instead of an improved system, we have a program that is far less than a shadow of its former self.

Moreover, the government has chosen to drastically alter the course plotted by successive governments for social programs since their inception in the early years of this century. Therefore, I must conclude that this bill can only prove harmful to the social fabric of Canada, and that in all good conscience, senators must vote against it.

In closing, I might add that the underlying philosophy implicit in this bill is one of scorn for the people. In his book, the History of Western Philosophy, Bertrand Russell emphasized that the oligarchs of ancient Greece had a motto, which went roughly as follows:

> The people are my enemy, and I shall devise all I can to harm them.

In the same vein, Russell noted that modern Conservatives ought at least to have the same courage in expressing their beliefs.

With Bill C-80, the Conservative government heaps only scorn and contempt on the people of Canada. However, unlike the oligarchs of Greece, it does not have the courage of its convictions.

[Senator Hébert.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the scorn Senator Hébert has demonstrated that this government has for the people it obviously has also for Parliament. This is just one of the examples of that scorn. He has placed on the record our objections to the legislation —

Senator Murray: It has three times as many Tories here to hear your speech.

Senator Frith: Just listen to what you did in this case.

Senator Murray: We are all here to listen to you. Look around.

Senator Frith: I was looking at the particular person who was speaking, namely, the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am looking at him.

Senator Murray: Look at the Tories who are here to listen to you.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: There goes your deputy.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: I notice that is becoming a typical Conservative reaction. When anyone in the press asks the Prime Minister a question, the answer they usually get is, "Ha, ha, ha!" Watch for it all through the referendum debate. That is his answer to most of the questions that the people and the press ask him.

Senator LeBlanc: He caught it from Joe Clark.

Senator Barootes: Table your speech and we will have it published.

Senator Frith: In his remarks, Senator Hébert focused on what the government has done. He described how this heartless government does not care whether hundreds of thousands of families use their income to raise children or to buy toasters. What was as bad as what they did was how it was done. I want to focus on that for a moment because I sense that the government wants to run a bulldozer through the Senate with this legislation, as it did in the House of Commons.

Here is the story of how the government is doing what it is doing—and I intend to look at three aspects of the process. I say it is important to us here in the Senate as we start debate on this bill because I suspect that the government will want to do the same here. The tale turns out to be a tragedy in three acts. The first is the history of the children's benefits, the second is the Government's white paper on children's benefits, and the third is how the government went about what might euphemistically be described as "guiding its package through the other place."

First the history: As Senator Hébert explained, Bill C-80 eliminates three programs. First, the refundable child tax credit introduced by the Trudeau Liberal government in 1979. Second, the Family Allowance Program introduced by the King Liberal government in 1945. Third, the child income tax credit, formerly known as the income tax deductions for children, introduced by the Borden Unionist government in 1918.

On that particular branch, I see in the Ottawa Citizen today a comment about the child benefit changes:

> It's probably just as well the federal government is getting out of the baby bonus business. Since family allowance payments were being clawed back in taxes anyway, the "universal" payments had become a bureaucratic charade, an un-sacred trust. But there's a lot more than $35 per child going out with this bath water. The bill which passed the Commons last week also does away with tax deductions for dependent children, essentially eliminating concessions to child-rearing parents with middle or upper incomes. Parents will still be able to claim daycare expenses, but the deductions of $406 to $812 per child that helped offset clothing and feeding costs disappear in 1993.

Then it lists the figures expressed by Senator Hébert and continues:

> But treating all middle and high income families identically, whether they have dependent children or not, abandons a basic premise of a progressive system: taxation according to ability to pay. It is simply absurd—and inconsistent—to tax a family feeding and clothing four or five youngsters the same as a childless family.
> It's bad enough that today's children will eventually be saddled with the bills for the excesses of today's governments. But ignoring the sacrifices parents make today to provide the country with the next generation of taxpayers only adds to the injury.

It took generations to build up this system of support for Canadians. That is why, or so we thought, it was called a "sacred trust" by Mr. Mulroney when he was a candidate. It seems now that nothing is sacred; certainly not this support system. What took generations to build up will be destroyed in a few short months. Of course, it is much easier to destroy than to create, dynamiting what took 74 years to build. Is it not reasonable for us to ask here, as another legislative body in the Parliament of Canada, whether the government has acted too hastily, and if so, why?

Well, perhaps not. The government will say that it acted traditionally following the tabling of its White Paper.

● (1550)

That brings us to Act II. Let us look at the white paper. When Finance Minister Mazankowski tabled the budget papers on February 25, 1992, he also tabled the child benefit white paper on Canada's new integrated child benefit. Here it is. This is the white paper on the dismantling of 74 years of social building. It is 12 pages, mostly graphs, a little fold-over. It is better described as a pamphlet. That was Mazankowski's answer to those who believed he acted hastily. While this monumental social structure is disintegrating before the nation's eyes and the dynamite dust is still in those eyes, the government points to this little pamphlet as its study of its program of dismantling.

"White paper" has a very specific meaning. I quote from Public Administration in Canada, A Text, Second Edition, Kernaghan and Siegal, Brock University, page 128:

> Coloured papers are an important part of the policy-making process. They are documents prepared by government departments to communicate current government thinking on a particular issue to interested individuals or groups and to stimulate public discussion on the issue. One of Canada's foremost students of the use of coloured papers argues that they have three basic purposes:
> To provide information to interested parties;
> To involve Parliament and the public in decision-making;
> To stimulate federal-provincial consultation.

Further on the same page:

> A white paper

— which this little pamphlet purports to be, or brags to be—

> is a statement of government policy. It usually provides a statement of policy in everyday, non-legislative language, accompanied by an explanation and defence of the particular course of action chosen.

Governments have issued quite a number of so-called white papers since they were first introduced in 1939, including a 1970 white paper on income security, a 1982 white paper on criminal law, and a 1985 white paper on copyright. In 1968, there was a white paper on a somewhat more esoteric subject than this one, but certainly outweighing it in every way. The 1968 white paper on antidumping is a substantial document running to 100 pages, of which our present example would be the equivalent of a page or two.

In dismantling the 74-year-old child benefits program, the government was happy with this little item, 12 pages of scholarship and thought and toil by the Conservatives, and even that probably strained them. Imagine, a white paper with a dozen pages. Take that, you, who thought this government knew nothing and wanted to know nothing about social policy and the problems facing Canadian families. Here is the evidence: 12 triumphant pages of study, research, understanding and scholarship, all leading to the destruction of one of Canada's most envied and caring social programs.

It was these 12 pages that were transformed and presented to Parliament in legislative form on May 13. Now at least Canadians, through their elected representatives in the House of Commons and directly through the committee process, would be invited to examine, debate, and participate in the future course of this legislation. That is the theory. That is what the academics teach our students takes place as Parliament assumes its historic and noble role.

But that is not the reality with the Mulroney style of parliamentary government. Here is what actually happens, political scientists and others, far from the class rooms, the text books and even the editorial rooms. This is how the government guided, if I can use such a kind word, Bill C-80 through the House of Commons. I am going to deal with second reading debate, closure, committees, report stage and third reading.

First, let's examine the second reading debate. Monday, June 1, 1992, at 3:18 in the afternoon, the government brings Bill C -80 forward for second reading. We wait for the minister to explain what the government is doing in dismantling this 74-year-old sacred trust, but he is not there. Instead of the honourable Benoit Bouchard, the Minister of Health and Welfare, rising to explain how the government is proposing to fundamentally restructure the $4.5 billion child benefit system, Mr. Pierre H. Vincent rose to his feet.

$4.5 billion is a major piece of change. That is $10,000 every day for 1,233 years. It is $12 million every single day of the year. We use the word "billion" so cavalierly. If someone two thousand years ago, in the time of Jesus, had $1 billion—sorry. Senator Barootes wants to make a speech.

Senator Gigantès: Who is explaining the mathematics to whom? You are to him, or he to you?

Senator Frith: Senator Barootes is explaining something to Senator Doyle.

Senator Gigantès: It is simple arithmetic.

Senator Barootes: You mentioned cavalier. We are not cavalier.

Senator Gigantès: You only understand subtraction.

Senator Barootes: Look at it again, Royce.

Senator Frith: If, 2,000 years ago, someone had had $1 billion, he could have spent $1,000 every day for two thousand years—no interest, just the capital—and still have had $270 million left over. You can check it. It is very easy. $1,000 a day; 365 days per year; 2000 years. That is $730 million, with $270 million left over. And here we are talking about $4.5 billion.

Senator Simard: I am sure Senator Olson will want to take a look at this.

Senator Frith: I must say you are not unusually mouthy today, sir. Quite normal.

Now, then, who is Mr. Pierre H. Vincent to explain how this $4.5 billion was to be spent? Who is Mr. Pierre H. Vincent?

Senator Murray: He is an excellent member.

Senator Frith: Mr. Vincent is, we hear, an excellent member. But he is not a member of the Cabinet Committee on Human Resources, Social and Legal Affairs. Perhaps a chairman or a member of the Nice Guys Committee, but not of that committee. That committee, in fact, is chaired, I believe, by Senator Murray, and is otherwise known as the Cabinet Committee on Family Values. Mr. Vincent is not a member of that cabinet committee. He is not —

Senator Gigantès: The Dan Quayle of Canada.

Senator Frith: I was hoping that might evoke that analogy. Mr. Vincent is not even a member of the cabinet. It is questionable whether Mr. Vincent has ever attended a cabinet meeting, let alone the meetings that led to the decisions underlying the legislation.

• (1600)

Yet, this parliamentary secretary to the finance minister rose to explain why cabinet, of which he is not a member, had decided to end the 47-year-old Family Allowance Program and the 74-year-old child income tax credit.

This choice of Mr. Pierre Vincent to man the plunger tied to the dynamite caps might be—in fact, is—a good indication of what this government considers important. His decision to expend 10 whole minutes—which will soon be approximately the amount of time that Senator Barootes and others have spent mumbling—to explain and defend the legislation is an even better indication.

Perhaps the best indication is the government's failure twice to maintain quorum during the next two hours of debate on this bill that day. But even two hours of debate was apparently much too long. Here is what happened. Mr. Pierre H. Vincent had explained the government's entire position in 10 succinct minutes, but the opposition went on to squander two valuable hours of house time on this $4.5 billion piece of legislation, dismantling a system which had taken almost 75 years to build—two whole hours they had spent.

Enter Harvie Andre. What? This abuse of Parliament could not be allowed to continue. The rights of the majority and of the government to govern was being trampled. Andre's nostrils twitched, he sniffed conspiracy. This must be another massive filibuster—visions of the GST. Something had to be done. What to do? Closure, of course.

On June 8, the Honourable Harvie Andre, defender of Parliament, explained that he had been unable to reach an agreement with opposition members with respect to time allocation for second reading of Bill C-80, and that, pursuant to their Standing Orders, he was giving notice that there would be only one more day of debate. The evil threat of real and meaningful debate in the House had been averted—thank God.

I was not in on those discussions between Mr. Andre and his counterparts in the opposition parties, and so we can only speculate as to what was said. It might be worthwhile doing so to determine what his colleague, Senator Lynch-Staunton, might be trying to do—although we hope not—in the Senate.

Perhaps the minister argued that opposition members had already spent more than 10 times as much time debating the bill as had the government. Perhaps, he argued, that seeing how the government could wrap up its entire position in 600 seconds, it was an abuse of process for the opposition, who already had 7,200 seconds—two whole hours—to demand even more time. Perhaps he asked the representatives of the opposition parties to publicly apologize for having already wasted so much of the valuable time of the House on the bill. After all, the government members had much better things to do—although no one ever explains what those better things are -- than to provide quorum or to participate in debate.

One can only surmise that, notwithstanding whatever reasonable arguments the minister advanced, the opposition members remained obstinate. One could not reason with them. They would continue their two-hour filibuster. Thus, this defender of Parliament was left with no choice, which is why on Monday, June 8, probably manifesting a heavy heart, he gave notice of time allocation.

On Tuesday, June 9, Mr. Andre actually moved the motion for time allocation. It was voted on almost immediately since the Standing Orders forbid debate on the motion. The House then turned its attention to Bill C-80 and, following another four hours and 20 minutes of debate, the guillotine crashed down. The vote was taken and the legislation was referred to committee.

There it was; less than seven hours of debate at second reading. There are 295 members in the other place, and there was only seven hours of debate. The government believed, I take it, that the 295 members had better things to do than to debate the dynamiting of Canada's premier social program.

If what occurred in the House of Commons at second reading was a travesty of the parliamentary process, which I believe it was for legislation of this importance, at least the contempt shown by the government was reserved for the members of that chamber, including their own members who I suppose enjoy being denigrated in this way. What subsequently occurred in committee was even worse, according to those who wished to participate in the process.

The House of Commons Legislative Committee on Bill C-80 held its organization meeting on June 11. On June 15, it heard from the responsible minister—not the Honourable Benoit Bouchard, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but the Honourable Don Mazankowski, the Minister of Finance. Here we again see the priorities. From the government's point of view, Bill C-80 was not legislation that dealt with the health or welfare of Canadians but, rather, a measure designed to help the Minister of Finance and the government politically.

When the minister had concluded, Conservative member Barbara Sparrow moved that the hearings "... terminate on Tuesday, June 23, and that would be the end of the witnesses for Bill C-80." That quotation is from page 1:41 of the proceedings of the committee.

When opposition members explained that terminating all hearings in only eight days was unfair to all those who were interested in appearing, Barbara Sparrow, at the suggestion of the chairman, finally withdrew her motion. Nice try.

The committee met on seven more occasions that summer before winding up its hearings on July 16. Why did it have to conclude in July when it could not present its report to the House for another two months anyway? Whatever the reason, the decision to conclude in mid-July had unfortunate consequences, because some groups were unable to meet the deadline imposed by the committee.

The National Anti-Poverty Organization submitted a brief dated July 16, which brief began as follows:

> The National Anti-Poverty Organization (NAPO) is unable to appear before your committee. We deeply regret this situation because we believe that Bill C-80 is flawed and dangerous. We would have welcomed the opportunity of explaining our position to you in person.
> However, this is impossible because of the timing of your hearings . . ...
> This is very unfortunate because we have something to say on behalf of poor families . . .
> Your inflexible schedule of hearings has in effect silenced us and we vehemently protest this situation.

That was but one of the consequences. Other groups or individuals who did appear had little opportunity to prepare, and felt insulted and demeaned by the whole process. For example, I refer to a letter received by David Walker, our critic on social policy in the other place, from Barbara Blouin of Tupper Grove, Nova Scotia. Miss Blouin appeared before the legislative committee on June 23, 1992, getting in before the closing of the committee, and this is how she described her experience. She begins by saying that the chairman:

> . . . cut me off just as I was beginning my talk and seemed bored and impatient.
> In fact, the whole experience was most disheartening. I am beginning to understand increasingly the democratic process under the Mulroney government is nothing but a sham, a charade. When virtually all the witnesses called for Bill C-80 criticized it (I had already read about it in the "Globe & Mail"), but nevertheless the bill is rammed through the committee process by the majority of its Tory members, there can be no other conclusion than this: They don't listen, they don't respond, they're not answerable to the people, they'll do what they want because they have the power to do so. I haven't felt so powerless in all my life. To actually have an opportunity to speak to some of Canada's leaders, to have worked very hard to write a brief, and then to realize that it meant nothing, and even that I and others were being used to uphold the propaganda that this is a democratic process—it's hard to swallow.

Senator Gigantès: It is her fault for thinking that she could get a hearing from the Tories. She is poor.

Senator Frith: She is certainly disillusioned.

This is the reality of what occurred; not the theory but the reality of what occurred in the House of Commons' Legislative Committee, at least as far as this witness is concerned.

Moving on to report stage, when the House returned on September 8, 1992, the committee tabled its report and the charade began anew, in a new setting and a new light. On Monday, September 14, debate began on the report stage. After only two hours of debate, the Honourable Monique Vézina, Minister of State for Seniors and for Employment and Immigration, gave notice of motion of time allocation —

Senator Gigantès: Again?

Senator Frith: —for the remaining stages. There would be one more day of debate at report stage and one day at third reading. After two hours of debate, notice of time allocation was given. Two hours of debate was too much for this government.

On Tuesday, September 15, the time allocation motion was moved and voted upon without debate. The vote at report stage was forced at 4:45 that afternoon, after a further three-and-three-quarter hours of debate that day.

On Wednesday, September 16, there were three-and-a-quarter hours of debate at third reading. The vote was forced at 7 p.m. pursuant to the time allocation motion and the bill was passed.

So this was the parliamentary process in the other place on Bill C-80: Second reading, six-and-a-half hours of debate; committee rushed, demeaning the witnesses; report stage, seven-and-three-quarter hours of total debate; third reading, three-and-a-quarter hours. That is it; end of Act III; a very short play.

Parliament, for hundreds of years supposedly a place of debate, study, discussion and informed decision, ground under the government's heel again. Pitiful! Purely a routine, mechanical, levered stamp machine, and a damned nuisance to this government, at that. Will it be the same here?

The government claims that we must work to regain people's respect for Parliament. In its 1991 constitutional proposal, the government said—and I say to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that this was your government—

> Canada's political institutions must be revitalized. One of the important conclusions of the Citizens' Forum on Canada's future was that Canadians are increasingly concerned about the effectiveness, fairness, and responsiveness of those institutions.
> Our objective must be to build upon our parliamentary traditions to produce improved political institutions. These institutions must be democratic; they must be effective; they must be seen by Canadians across the country to represent them fairly . . .

Senator Stewart: That is all before Charlottetown.

Senator Frith: And do you hear those words, Barbara Blouin? You probably heard those words.

[Senator Frith.]

> These institutions must be democratic; they must be effective; they must be seen by Canadians across the country to represent them fairly and responsively . . .

Barbara Blouin writes:

> I haven't felt so powerless in all my life . . . and then to realize that it meant nothing, and even that I and others were being used to uphold the propaganda that this is a democratic process—it's hard to swallow.

Senator Molgat: Who is saying that?

Senator Frith: That is what the witness, Barbara Blouin, said. That is what she, the witness, said as to how she was treated.

So back again to the government's 1990 constitutional proposals:

> These institutions must be democratic; they must be effective; they must be seen by Canadians across the country to represent them fairly and responsively; and they must reflect the diversity of peoples and opinions within the country.

Honourable senators, these big words should be followed by concrete actions. There is still a chance. These big words certainly were not followed by such actions in the other place, but that is what a Senate is for. That is why we have a bicameral system. So if we are to follow these big words by concrete actions, why not start today? Why not have some meaningful committee hearings? We would prefer postponing the hearings until after the referendum vote.

Senator Murray: Why?

Senator Frith: But if the government is determined to press ahead, still let us do it right. No more shams. Let us take time. Let us have comprehensive hearings.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: I want it understood clearly on the record that when I said "No more shams," and "Let us have comprehensive hearings," Senator Lynch-Staunton said "Hear, hear!"

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The sooner, the better.

Senator Frith: And let us treat the witnesses, in the words of the government, "fairly and responsively". This means approaching the hearings with an open mind and being prepared to respond to the concerns of the witnesses and not just to a government timetable.

Honourable senators, I wish to conclude by reading into the record a letter I received from Marcelle Dolment, Réseau d'action et d'information pour les femmes.

[Translation]

> Marcelle Dolment, Réseau d'action et d'information pour les femmes.
> Dear Sir:
> We would like to be heard before the Senate in the debate on Bill C-80 concerning the child tax benefit intended to replace the universal family allowance system.

We have submitted a brief last summer, in the middle of July, a time of the year when almost every one is away on holiday and women are hardly available to examine such a major legislation because of family obligations and the little time afforded them to prepare a brief. We have had to scramble just to have it ready.

[English]

Senator Barootes: Would you entertain a question as to where that brief was presented in July when you told us the committee was not sitting?

Senator Frith: That is not what they said. They said:

[Translation]

We submitted a brief . . .

[English]

Certainly I can explain that. As with the other memoir that I referred to, they submitted it as a written brief, having had no opportunity to present it in the way in which they wanted. A very appropriate question.

[Translation]

We have had to scramble just to have it ready on such short notice, sacrificing many angles and nuances which would have been important in our argumentation. We are amazed at such an undemocratic procedure.

We hope that, as leader of the Opposition, you will be able to convey this to the committee in order to allow us to go to Ottawa before this bill fraught with consequences for women and children, especially those who live in problem families, is passed.

Thank you for your co-operation in this matter.

Sincerely,

[English]

Honourable senators, let us take her words to heart and do our job properly. This might turn out to be one of the final chapters of the work of the present Senate, but let all of us, government and opposition members alike, show that when we talk about a fair and responsive Senate, we mean what we say.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not intend at this stage to enter into a discussion of the substance of this bill. That has been done very capably by its sponsor, Senator Spivak. I will simply say in parentheses, however, that we have reason to believe that this measure has widespread support in the country precisely because it is better targeted to those in need. I rise for the purpose of saying a word about process, since the question of process in the House of Commons occupied so much of the attention of the Leader of the Opposition in his speech.

Honourable senators, we are now at second reading of Bill C-80. It is, I agree, an important piece of legislation. The agenda of the Senate is not very burdensome at the moment. There is only one other piece of major government business before us; that is Bill C-55, which tomorrow will be at report stage and heading for third reading.

Therefore, there is plenty of time to carry on the debate on second reading of Bill C-80 and I assure the honourable senator that the government has no intention whatsoever of trying to bring in a time limitation to curtail debate at second reading of this bill. We can sit evenings, we can sit Friday morning, we can sit all next week. There is plenty of time to hear from every senator, Liberal or Conservative, who wishes to be heard in the second reading debate on Bill C-80. Let me set the mind of the Leader of the Opposition to rest on that point. Everyone who wants to be heard at second reading of Bill C-80 can be heard. There is plenty of time.

Assuming that the bill receives second reading and goes to committee, it will go to the Committee on Social Affairs under our friend Senator Kinsella of New Brunswick.

I presume that after we have dealt with Bills C-55 and C-80 the Senate will adjourn and the committee will begin its consideration of Bill C-80. Committee members will not have attendance in the Senate chamber to distract them. They will be able to sit morning, noon and night for as long as it takes to deal properly with Bill C-80.

Senator Frith: And suiting the convenience of witnesses who might not be able to attend in series, 24 hours a day.

Senator Murray: Of course, but a witness who cannot attend in the morning can attend in the afternoon or possibly at night. The honourable senator, than whom there is none more courteous, will, I am sure, with the assistance of honourable senators, Liberal and Conservative, on the steering committee, want to hear a good cross-section of views from a good representation of witnesses who express an interest in coming forward. All of that can be done. If the bill is reported, then we will deal with it at third reading.

My point is that there is plenty of time to deal with the bill. The only thing that we in the government ask is that the Senate get on with it and deal with it. After the committee hearings have been held, I would expect to ask the Senate to return here to deal with the report stage and third reading.

I hope that will set at rest the mind of the honourable Leader of the Opposition and the minds of any others who may have feared that we were going to try to curtail debate on second reading of this bill. On the contrary, we look forward to hearing the contributions of other honourable senators on this bill and we will take whatever time is necessary to do so.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear! And we will certainly look forward to how the committee treats witnesses with regard to their convenience in attending, in a way that the House of Commons committee did not.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I will not bore you with a long speech. I am glad to hear the Leader of the Government say that the committee will have ample time, under the chairmanship of our friend Senator Kinsella. I hope it is realized that this is not legislation that affects the powerful and the wealthy. Rather, it affects the very poor.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Senator Murray is going to be cut off.

Senator Thériault: I thought you meant what you said, but perhaps you did not.

When the time comes—and I had hoped it would have been after the referendum, but if you are in that much of a hurry, fine—may I suggest that this committee not sit solely in Ottawa, if you want the people to believe that the committee is hearing from the poor and the oppressed, the people who are affected by this bill, because the poor people in my province will not come to Ottawa. I know that that does not bother you people over there.

I do not know who is listening to my suggestion, or who is for it or against it.

Senator Frith: We are for it.

Senator Thériault: I have made a suggestion which I hope the chairman of the committee will heed. Take it upon yourself, senator. Don't ask permission of the high-falutin' people over there, because they will not give it to you. If you just do it yourself, I know you will be doing a good job.

I believe the Leader of the Government suggested that the polls show that the Tories have the support of the majority of people. I am sure there were dozens of polls taken before you embarked on this legislation, but you do not always listen to the polls. If you did, you would resign and go to the people for an election.

I could not let a piece of legislation like Bill C-80 go by without making known my objection to it. I did not hear Senator Spivak, but I have respect for her social conscience. She has always expressed great concern for the poor, the environment and all those issues close to the people.

Senator Gigantès: When she votes, she votes for the blood-sucking capitalists on the other side.

Senator Thériault: I give credit to the government senators. They have learned to listen to their bosses. They vote as they are told. But that is another subject.

The fact is that Bill C-80 is not new. It is the continuation of a philosophy that this government espoused shortly after being elected. What is to be noted is that it is not the philosophy that Conservatives, under Brian Mulroney, preached before they were elected. If you read the speeches made during the campaign in 1983 and 1984 by the honourable Prime Minister, you will notice that very seldom did he make a speech without talking about the "sacred trust" of the universal programs.

When he was about to de-index the Old Age Pension, he met his match on the front lawn of Parliament Hill. He was told the truth and that time he at least had the wisdom to back away for a short time.

This kind of philosophy started with the clawback of the Old Age Pension. With every piece of social legislation they have passed since coming to power they have attacked and gradually destroyed the sacred trust of universal programs.

I believed the Prime Minister when he talked about the sacred trust, because in my opinion universality is a sacred trust. I thought the clawback of the Old Age Pension was bad. But this is worse, because this is virtually an abandonment of the truly poor people in this country. When the unemployment rate is 11.3 or 11.6 per cent, with almost 2 million people seeking work, the government is going to give $500 to those who are trying to get off the welfare rolls and go to work, but will give nothing to those who are stuck on the welfare rolls. Five hundred dollars for those who are trying to get up?

I urge the Leader of the Government to come to New Brunswick. I also urge him to go to Cape Breton, which he knows well. I ask him to take a look and make a short study, then answer the question: How many people will be successful in getting off the welfare role this year and next year? I say to him, very few.

Why discriminate? Why discriminate against those single mothers? As someone said, the philosophy of Dan Quayle is that family values entail having a father and a mother who take care of their kids. Is that your definition of family values? Or is it trying to provide for those who cannot provide for themselves?

Senator Murray: So you agree with targeting, then, do you? You do not agree with universality?

Senator Thériault: What did you say?

Senator Frith: Targeting. You know. That is when you take a gun and shoot somebody with it.

Senator Murray: You do not disagree with doing away with universality, I take it?

Senator Thériault: I do disagree. I do disagree with killing universality. Where is universality in this Bill C-80, as I just said, when you will give $500 extra to a certain class of poor but nothing to the others? Is that your kind of universality? It is not my kind of universality.

My kind of universality was making the Old Age Pension available to everyone who reached age 65. If that means we have to pay a little more in taxes, so what? Universality also involved the family allowance program that you have just destroyed here.

Tell me something: Why would a government embark on such a change in social policy when, at your best in the polls, you are at 20 per cent? Why, when you are, at the most, only 12 months away from an election? Why?

Senator Gigantès: Tory ideology, that is why.

Senator Thériault: That is right. I believe that your Tory radical philosophy against universal programming is telling you that you must do it before you are defeated or it will never be done. That is why.

There is also another reason: You may fool some of the people because of that first cheque in January, but I warn you, people are not easily fooled in 1992.

The government should also realize one other thing: Why are the people of this country so concerned? They are concerned because they have lost confidence. I have been talking with people who are 50 and 55 years old. They are working and they have decent jobs, but they are not spending. Why are they not spending? Because they are concerned that this government will change the system so that, when they reach 65, they will have no Old Age Pension. They are even concerned about their Canada Pension. They are concerned because your government has not kept its word. People are not spending because they have no confidence in you.

Senator Murray: There are members of the Senate receiving Family Allowance benefits. Do you think that is right?

Senator Thériault: I know what I am talking about when I speak of Family Allowance.

Senator Murray: There are members of the Senate receiving Family Allowance benefits. Do you think they should?

Senator Thériault: I live in a small community. I ran a small business. I knew whenever that day of the month arrived when the Family Allowance cheques were received by the mothers, because the mothers spent that money on their children. The Family Allowance was instituted as a mother's program, regardless of whether they were married or single.

Senator Murray: What difference does that make now?

Senator Thériault: The philosophy of this government is the same philosophy that started out in England under Thatcher, in the U.S.A. under Reagan and Bush, and in Canada under Mulroney. Are you surprised when we get reports, month after month, that people are not spending; that people are not buying? Who spends the money, generally speaking?

Senator Murray: There will be more for people with lower incomes.

Senator Thériault: I still cannot understand, after all the years of looking at these problems, why the big business people, the manufacturers, do not realize that if the middle and lower income people do not spend their money, the economy will go down. If they are not buying, the manufacturers will close down. Even the big business people will make less money. But, no! Instead it seems that there has been around for the last 20 years a philosophy that aims at preventing the poor from becoming a little better off and from having a few dollars more to spend.

This kind of legislation—not only this bill, but a number of bills which have been enacted by your government—is one of the reasons why it is taking so long to get out of this recession which really should be called a depression. If it were not for the social programs which were passed and enacted by the Liberal governments over the years, we would be in a real depression, not a recession. However, you do not seem to have given that much thought.

Senator Murray: I do not think you have read the bill.

Senator Thériault: This is bad legislation. I will finish my few remarks with this thought: It is a known fact that programs for the poor quickly become poor programs. Why is it that medicare is so popular? Because every one of us, even here in this chamber, have received some benefits from it. I am sure for a lot of us it would be easier, and cheaper perhaps, not to have medicare because we can afford to pay our doctors' bills and our hospital bills.

Why is medicare so popular? Because everyone benefits. Why was the universal Old Age Pension so popular? Because everyone benefitted from it. Why is the Family Allowance program—which you are destroying here—so popular? Because everyone in the country benefitted from it. I am telling you what is the end result when you have programs only for the poor.

Senator Murray: That is not progressive social policy, whatever you call it.

Senator Thériault: When government policy is only for the poor, what happens?

Senator Frith: Do you think some senators should not get medicare?

Senator Murray: I think some senators should not receive Family Allowance benefits.

Senator Frith: And should they also not get medicare?

Senator Murray: No, no. That is a totally different program.

Senator Frith: Why? You say they can afford to do without it, therefore they should not have it. And that is what you will do with medicare, too.

Let's just watch. They will do the same thing with medical care. It is a giveaway.

Senator Thériault: This is why I protest so loudly: Ten or twenty years down the road, after people have forgotten how bad this government was during its eight years in power, someone will come up with a program that says: We will reduce income taxes. They may even reduce the GST. You will not say why or how, but you will end up cutting off the Old Age Pensions completely if you follow this philosophy to its natural conclusion.

You say you prefer to give the money to the poor. Perhaps then the poor will become poorer once they reach 90. Perhaps you will grant people the Old Age Pension once they reach age 90. You certainly no longer have Family Allowance for every mother in this country.

Senator Murray: The rich will not get it. Senators will not get it.

Senator Thériault: Then the Conservative taxpayers of the country will say, no more of that, and we will be back where we were in the 1930's under the Tories and under the real Depression.

On motion of Senator Cools, debate adjourned.

ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF TIMISKAMING

BILL TO CHANGE NAME—SECOND READING

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government), moved the second reading of Bill C-351, to change the name of the electoral district of Timiskaming.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to change the name of the riding of Timiskaming to Timiskaming-French River.

[Translation]

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Can you say it in French?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I don't know whether it was named after a Mr. French or whether we could say "rivière française". I have not yet looked into the matter.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): I suppose we could say "rivière des français".

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Right now, it is Timiskaming—French River, so maybe it was a Mr. French rather than . . .

[English]

In 1987, following redistribution, the riding's limits were changed significantly to include what is known as the Nickel Belt. This additional population is significantly different in location from the one in Timiskaming, and it was felt that the addition of the name "French River" would more fairly reflect the demographic composition of the riding.

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have just one question. If I am not mistaken, this region has a fairly high proportion of people who are French-speaking. Is there a proposal to add "rivière des français" or is this just the English version? If I am not mistaken the word "Timiskaming" comes from one of the aboriginal languages.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: In the French version, it says Timiskaming—French River, so I assume "French" indicates the name of a person, not a nationality.

Senator Hébert: We could say "Rivière French", in French.

[English]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Senator Murray.]

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Owing to the simplicity of the bill, with leave of the Senate, I move third reading now.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I just want to say that I agree with the bill. The reason I agree with the bill is that a good friend of mine, John MacDougall, represents that riding in the House of Commons. It is a matter of taking more territory into his riding. He wants the name changed so that both parts of the riding are represented in the constituency name. On behalf of John MacDougall, I want to say that we are in favour of the bill. John MacDougall happens to be a Cape Bretoner.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

DAI al-MUTLAQ—BILL TO INCORPORATE—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Norman K. Atkins, moved the second reading of Bill S-13, to incorporate the Dai al-Mutlaq as a corporation sole in Canada.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt this motion?

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: No.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, is the sponsor of the bill not going to give us some explanation about this group?

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, I sense that members of this chamber are interested in an explanation of what Bill S-13 is all about.

Senator Frith: We set that up well for you didn't we.

Senator Atkins: The purpose of this bill is to grant a corporate charter to the holder of a religious office. The Dawoodi Bohra community represents a distinct denomination of Islam, to which there are over 1 million adherents in over 40 countries. The Dawoodi Bohra community is relatively new in Canada, immigration of adherents having commenced in the mid-1970s. Recently the Dawoodi Bohra community in Canada has completed the construction of a mosque and community centre in Richmond Hill, near my home in Markham. There are now over 1300 members of the community residing in Ontario, Quebec and Alberta who preserve and practice this religious belief, language and culture while integrating and assimilating with the greater multicultural fabric of Canada.

In particular, adherents of the community are required by their religious beliefs to be patriotic and loyal to their adopted nation and to participate in its economic, cultural and educational development. Adherents in Canada enthusiastically practise these beliefs.

The Dawoodi Bohra in Canada are mostly professionals, middle managers and small businessmen. They are known as industrious and peace-loving citizens and they strive to implant these qualities in their children. While learning and preserving the community's traditional language through heritage language programs, the children also attend public schools and universities and actively participate in the milieu of Canadian life. Thus, the Dawoodi Bohras in Canada represent a harmonious source of community traditions within the rich blend of Canadian society.

In common with all muslims, the Dawoodi Bohra community affirms the oneness of Allah, follows the Prophet Mohammed and reveres the Quaran. Various denominations arose in Islam after the death of the Prophet Mohammed. The Dawoodi Bohra community is identified as the Shia Fatimi Ismaili Tayyiti Dawoodi denomination of Islam.

Senator Molgat: Would you say that again?

Senator Hébert: Slowly please.

Senator Atkins: The word "Bohra" means traders and has become attached to the name of the community because of the members' historical tradition of being engaged in commercial trade.

The Dawoodi Bohra community believes that its religious leader, the Dai al-Mutlaq, is the representative of the Imam, the direct descendant of the Prophet, during the period while Imam is in seclusion. The Dai al-Mutlaq, in his capacity as religious leader of the Dawoodi Bohra community, is responsible for the spiritual and religious needs as well as for the administration, management and control of the religious property, affairs and interests of the denomination. Each Dai al-Mutlaq during his life appoints a successor by a special act of designation. The current Dai al-Mutlaq, His Holiness Dr. Syedna Mohammed Burhanuddin, is the fifty-second incumbent in an unbroken chain of succession which has spanned over 800 years.

The bill before you would constitute the Dai-Mutlaq as a corporation sole to be known as "Dawat-e'Hadiyah (Canada)". A corporation sole, as senators who are lawyers will know —

Senator Frith: Since we are talking religion maybe you should spell sole: s-o-l-e.

Senator Atkins: Yes, s-o-l-e. As senators who are lawyers will know, a corporation sole is a corporation consisting of one person only, usually a person of high office, who together with his successors in office is incorporated by law. In this way, the officer obtains the legal capacities and benefits of a corporation which, as a natural person, he would not otherwise enjoy.

One particular advantage is that of the continued existence of a corporation over the lifetimes of many successors in office, without the requirement that religious property held by the office holder be specifically conveyed.

It is important to emphasize that the incorporation of the office of the Dai al-Mutlaq would not give the holder of the office any status, rights or privileges in relation to the Dawoodi Bohra Community that the holder does not otherwise have.

Because the Dawoodi Bohra Community includes adherents throughout Canada, it is desirable that the corporation sole be incorporated by Canada rather than by one or other of the provinces. As neither of the two federal statutes of a general enabling nature that govern the creation of corporations, namely, the Canada Corporations Act and the Canada Business Corporations Act, provides for the creation of a corporate sole, it appeared necessary for the Dai al-Mutlaq to petition Parliament for a private act.

I trust this explains to honourable senators the purpose of Bill S-13, and that the bill will receive support in this place.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I rise to oppose this bill.

Senator Barootes: This is not Opus Dei.

Senator Gigantès: This is Opus Dei. This is exactly parallel and identical to what we were asked to do for Opus Dei and we rejected it on the grounds that it could do whatever it had to do by being accredited provincially.

Opus Dei was functioning perfectly well, accredited as it was in various provinces, and through a similar bill it came to the Senate to push for its accreditation as a corporation sole. The reason given for the application was that it was for the prestige. This organization has learned that lesson and has not given that as the reason.

I do not see why we should do for this sect of admirable traders and good citizens—bless them—what we refused to do for Opus Dei. In principle, I do not think that we should mix government and religion. The Parliament of Canada should be conferring as little as possible. Any further encroachment of religion upon the political process of Canada should be resisted.

This organization has no need for this accreditation. It can function perfectly well with provincial accreditation. Therefore, I am opposed to this bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have spoken to Senator Atkins about this bill. He gave me his reading notes and we discussed it before the bill was prepared in its final form. I had not made the connection or the analogy with Opus Dei until Senator Gigantès mentioned it to me earlier today. We must look into that aspect, and I will adjourn the debate in the meantime.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, just let me say one word about this matter. Because of the same type of discussions that Senator Frith referred to, I was aware that this bill was coming forward. However, I have not formed a final opinion on it. Senator Atkins is bringing the bill forward because obviously he supports it, but also because our view is that organizations such as this have a right to petition Parliament.

I am aware that there may be some opposition in various parts of the country to the bill. Those people who oppose it or who have reservations or who wish to ask questions can come before the committee and ask their questions and make their representations, at which point the committee—and ultimately the Senate—would decide.

This is not a government bill, but I thank Senator Atkins for having brought it forward on behalf of the citizens who wish to exercise their right to petition Parliament on this matter. I take it that that is the attitude and the spirit in which Senator Frith also approaches the bill.

Senator Frith: Yes. That is why I suggest we adjourn the debate. The objection that Senator Gigantès has expressed seems to be an objection in principle. I agree that most of the problems, if any, could be looked after in the committee. I am not even suggesting there are problems of a type that the committee could or should look after, but his objection seems to be that the principle underlying this bill is the same as the principle involved in the Opus Dei situation. I am not satisfied that it is. I am not saying that it is not. However, Senator Gigantès has, quite rightly, raised the issue and therefore we should look into it to determine whether that principle is or is not engaged by the bill.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, since it has been decided by the house to allow debate after Senator Frith moved adjournment of the debate, I would like to say a word.

As one who opposed the incorporation of Opus Dei as a corporation sole, I want to be given sufficient time, as do other senators, to look into this matter. I do not want to have to go to a committee unprepared. Second reading is an important stage of any legislation, whether it is run by a private source or a public initiative.

I certainly want to look a little more closely at this institution. I listened attentively and with great interest to what Senator Atkins had to say. He did not say that time was of the essence, for one thing. I do not see why we should be pressured into having the bill go to committee at this time. If it is a good request, and if the request for incorporation as a corporation sole is justified, then it will stand the test of Senate scrutiny at all stages of the legislation.

Therefore, I do not wish to say anything more at this stage. I intend to speak on second reading. I only wished to put those comments on the record so that everyone is well informed of the fact that I intend to participate as the debate progresses in the future.

[Senator Murray.]

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

RAILWAYS

PROPOSED SALE OF RAIL LINES—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Graham, calling the attention of the Senate to the ramifications of the sale or proposed sale of certain rail lines in Canada.—(Honourable Senator Corbin)

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I propose to have this motion stand, but please allow me to bring to your attention—it may be of interest to a number of you—that it was 40 years ago today that the Honourable Louis Robichaud entered the political life of New Brunswick by being elected as a member of the Legislative Assembly for the first time for one of the Kent County ridings.

Order stands.

THE ECONOMY

MISMANAGEMENT OF MONETARY POLICY—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the Government's mismanagement of the economy and particularly monetary policy.—(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.).

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, in the last few days there has been a remarkable monetary change, in that there has been what could be called a run on the Canadian dollar. The Honourable Minister, the Leader of the Government, tells us that that situation has changed and the Canadian dollar has recovered quite a lot of its value just in the last few hours. That may or may not be right, but I accept his explanation until and unless we hear differently. However, we do not know what the market will do tomorrow.

The last time there was a problem with respect to the economy and monetary policy, the argument was made that the dollar was going down. It got down to the low 70 cents. I believe it even went slightly under 70 cents once.

The problem then was that this government and the Governor of the Bank began a program of raising interest rates. The argument they gave was that there was going to be inflation. Of course we know that if the dollar goes down somewhat, all of the imports into Canada of whatever nature, and by the way, they are significant, will cost a little more. I suppose the measurement of inflation will begin to rise. No one disagrees that that is probably the consequence.

What I am afraid of now is that the government and the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. John Crow, will start using the kind of tactics they used the last time this happened, which was only a few years ago; those tactics drove prime interest rates up to 14.75. As a consequence, the devastation in the part of Canada I come from, when both the grain growers and the oil and gas industry were already having problems, was really terrible.

As we know, the interest rate most people pay is a floating rate. There are no fixed rates—well, there may be a few now. I guess you can get some mortgages now for a year or two, or maybe even up to five years on some fixed rates. I would not like someone to come along and challenge me on that. If you want to pay enough, you might even be able to get some longer terms than that, but it would be up around 10 per cent. A one-year floating mortgage or even one for six months is down to less than 6 per cent. The cost of going for a fixed rate is enormous.

My purpose today is to try to persuade the government that for them to repeat what they did the last time is absolutely unacceptable in Canada.

I do not want to be mean about this, but you know that the Minister of Finance at the time, Minister Wilson, claimed—even bragged —that the government had deliberately set out on a program to kill inflation. They created this kind of economic and monetary policy in Canada because they were going to get inflation down.

Honourable senators, you know what they are up to now. The minister said earlier today that they had made a joint announcement with the Governor of the Bank of Canada—I don't know why they would be doing it jointly with him since they are responsible for what he does anyway. We have to keep going back to that.

There was a dispute between the government and the governor of the bank once about 30 years ago when Mr. Diefenbaker was the Prime Minister, and they fired him. We went through all the motions. He got to the Senate here. He wanted a platform. I was around here then, you know. He wanted a platform so he could at least have an opportunity to say what he wanted to say about that situation. The Senate allowed the then Governor of the Bank of Canada to have his say. As soon as he did that, he resigned. Senator Barootes is old enough to remember that, I am pretty sure.

Senator Barootes: I remember it very well.

Senator Olson: I think he can remember that.

Senator Barootes: It was an everlasting disgrace, I remember.

Senator Olson: Listen to this: "everlasting disgrace". The biggest disgrace the people of Canada have known in the past few years is the brutal and ruthless way this government has treated a whole lot of people in Western Canada with its monetary policy. That will be to your disgrace for as long as you are here, and I will tell you why. This generation will never vote Tory again. They got caught in what you did to them when the economy was bad enough anyway.

Senator Barootes: May I ask you a question, Senator Olson, on that subject?

Senator Olson: Any time.

Senator Barootes: You have always favoured low interest rates, low inflation, and a low Canadian dollar.

Senator Olson: Reasonable interest rates.

Senator Barootes: These terrible things that the Bank of Canada has done have resulted in an inflation rate of 1.3 per cent and the lowest interest rates we have had in 20 years,

Senator Frith: And the highest rate of unemployment; the highest rate of bankruptcies.

Senator Barootes: And a low Canadian dollar which helps our exports. What is it that you are complaining about? Are you complaining about the 22 per cent interest rates that you had?

Some Hon. Senators: Jobs, jobs, jobs!

Senator Olson: Senator Barootes must have something wrong with his hearing, because I just said to him that I am afraid of what the government is going to do now. You have a reputation.

Senator Barootes: You are worried about the future.

Senator Olson: You bet I am, and there are a lot of people in this country who are worried about the future of this country. They are so worried about the future that they do not spend money. The government keeps wondering why the economy does not pick up. It is because anyone in this country who has any opportunity to increase the spending in retail, which is where it has to start, is not doing it. You do not you understand that. That is part of the economic necessity of getting an upturn in the economy.

I know thousands and thousands of people in the part of Canada I come from who are just as worried as I am, and maybe a little bit more worried, because this governments has stated—I was just getting into that when I was so rudely interrupted by your speech.

Senator Barootes: I apologize for interrupting. I did not realize you were saying anything. Now, may I ask you another question?

Senator Olson: No, you cannot. There is no use in taking any questions from Senator Barootes because he does not ask any questions. He gets up and makes a speech about something that happened ten years ago. He never asks any questions. I would really like you to make a speech about it after I am finished.

As I was saying, the fact is that there has been what they call a joint statement by the government and the governor of the bank that they are going to beat inflation down to 2 per cent. They got there. I will acknowledge that, but I want to tell you that the price was too high. We have the highest bankruptcy rates in the world.

Do you think those people have just gone away? Do you think they are just statistics? They have gone bankrupt, and businesses have closed up.

Do you know where those people are today? They are still out there. They do not want this government to repeat that kind of performance. In fact, if honourable senators think we have had trouble with the Constitution and all that, they have not seen anything yet. In all sincerity, I say to this government that if it embarks deliberately on a monetary policy such as it did a few years ago and again cause distress to and the bankruptcy of so many people, we will have more trouble in this country than we have ever seen before.

It seems we are now to have a change. We are supposed to be having some kind of a constitutional crisis that is hurting the economy . We now have a Charlottetown package. Western Canadians, in particular those in the province from which I come, really believe they got shafted on that one. We are worse off than we were. Nothing important was dealt with in this constitutional crisis; absolutely nothing was done about the commonwealth of Canada so that trade can be initiated or free flowing between the provinces.

Where is the crisis? The one thing that we know is that Ontario and Quebec will get about 36 more members in the House of Commons and that Western Canada, and in particular Alberta and British Columbia, will not. Thus we will be worse off under this package. It is a net loss in so far as having influence in the Parliament of Canada is concerned.

In case some have not heard, Mr. Getty resigned a few days after he got back to Alberta. Do you want to know why, honourable senators? I talked to some people in Edmonton. He went to his caucus and they told him, "We're not buying it. You sold out. Maybe Bourassa out-negotiated you." I do not know what happened. Alberta is worse off than it was before, yet he comes back bragging, "I finally got a Triple-E Senate. There will be some regional balance in this country from now on."

Honourable senators, Mr. Getty found out in very short order that the people of Alberta are not that stupid. He can go out there and say that it will be better, but it will not. It will be worse.

Honourable senators should think about this: Western Canada has grown up a little bit since 1867. Since that time, there has not been any constitutional change that recognizes regional interests in this country.

If we enter into this agreement, we will have same the kind of problem as we had before, that problem being that the agreement cannot be changed because of the amending formula. It is now contained in that agreement that we cannot change any federal institutions without the unanimous consent of all the provinces. The people of Western Canada do not like it. In fact, they resent it, and they resent Premier Getty for negotiating such an agreement.

[Senator Olson.]

The Honourable Joe Clark came out west and said, "It isn't perfect, but we worked hard on it for a long time. It is probably the best we could get." He shook his fist a bit and said, "But you better vote 'yes' for it, or else." Or else what, honourable senators? What is the "or else"? Or else it is the last chance for Canada? If this kind of shafting of Western Canadians is to go on, I am not so sure they want any more of Canada.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I draw the attention of the honourable senator to the fact that he is speaking to his inquiry which is supposed to be dealing with the economy, and in particular, the monetary policy. He gave notice earlier today of his inquiry regarding the Constitution. I understood he would debate that inquiry on Thursday.

Senator Olson: It is the last chance to save Canada, which is what the Honourable Joe Clark came out to tell us in Western Canada. Do you know what else he said? He said that we must get this Constitution stuff behind us before we can work on the economy. Is that not like being able to walk and chew gum at the same time? Can you not do things about the economy while you are trying to fix the Constitution?

Senator Murray: We are.

Senator Olson: That is the kind of garbage that is being passed around Alberta by the leaders of this government. The people of Alberta are getting sick and tired of it. I talked to a great many people out there over the weekend. My phone was buzzing. I do not care who is in power, I know that those people are just smarting, seething with anger. Representing the province of Alberta we have the Honourable Joe Clark, who was the Secretary of State for External Affairs and who is now responsible for the Constitution, the Honourable Don Mazankowski, who is the Minister of Finance, and the House Leader, Mr. Harvie Andre, who are all in senior positions in this government. Yet, Alberta gets shafted for what they do—what a great country we have!

Senator Murray: Are you voting "no" in the referendum?

Senator Olson: I am tempted to vote "no" and I may encourage everyone else to vote "no". I think it is wrong for Canada.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the honourable senator that his time has expired.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I ask leave to have but a few more minutes to finish my remarks.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Olson: Everyone admits that this constitutional package is not perfect. What they really mean is that it is not worth a damn to anyone. Honourable senators, why not get it right before we pass it?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You should have thought of that in 1982.

Senator Olson: We thought about it in 1982. I want to tell you something about the lies that the Prime Minister of this country has perpetuated across this country respecting what happened in 1982. It is a disgrace that I hope he will carry to his grave. What he says happened in 1982 is that somehow Quebec was left out. That is simply not true. I was there. Who else was there? A man by the name of Pierre Elliott Trudeau who has said just this week that what the Prime Minister is saying about all of that is a damned lie. It is not true.

Senator Barootes: That is pretty strong language.

Senator Olson: That is pretty good language. It was meant to be at least as strong as it sounded.

Senator Barootes: It is not very parliamentary to call people liars.

Senator Olson: I did not say he was a liar. I said the statement he made was a damned lie. That is what I said.

Senator Barootes: It is the same thing.

Senator Olson: No, it is not the same thing. I refer the honourable senator to a debate that took place in November of 1957 when this subject was debated to the point where it was determined that there was a difference. It is an important enough difference that it becomes parliamentary. Perhaps the honourable senator should look that up. It would perhaps assist his view of what is parliamentary and what is not.

Senator Murray: This is on monetary policy, is it?

Senator Olson: Yes, monetary policy. What my inquiry states is that your government has made a mess of governing Canada, does it not?

Senator Murray: Not quite.

Senator Olson: It states:

> . . . calling the attention of the Senate to the Government's mismanagement of the economy and particularly monetary policy.

That is true.

I wish to caution honourable senators that we will have far more serious trouble in this country than they might think if they continue to treat Western Canada, and in particular Alberta and British Columbia, in that manner. You should be joining the other side of this debate in this referendum or there will be another, more serious "or else".

• (1720)

Senator Murray: We had that vote while you were in Geneva.

Senator Olson: I know you had that vote. I am telling you what I found out since I came back from Geneva. By the way, I will make another speech before long about what I heard in Geneva. You might not like that, although it is far more encouraging than what you have been saying to me lately.

I want to thank honourable senators for their indulgence in giving me a little more time to speak on this matter, but I want you to know that we are walking on very dangerous ground. With all of the goodwill that Western Canadians have shown towards Canadians in the rest of the country, this situation is becoming just a little more than they can swallow. Be careful.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: If no other senator wishes to speak on this subject, this inquiry is considered debated.

AGRICULTURE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO CONDUCT STUDY

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes, pursuant to notice of September 16, 1992, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be authorized to undertake a special study on farm safety and farm related health issues.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Could we have an explanation, please.

Senator Barootes: I thank you, honourable senators, for the opportunity to explain the reason for this motion.

Farming is one of the most dangerous occupations in Canada. According to Dr. James Dosman, Director of the Centre for Agricultural Medicine at the University of Saskatchewan,

> More farmers are killed each year than miners; they are just not all in the same place at the same time.

The fatality rate on farms is thought to be higher than in the construction industry, and involves, unfortunately, a proportionately higher percentage of young and elderly people.

Hazards on the farm arise from a number of sources and can result in risk to physical health and even death. Chemical use on the farm, both fertilizers and pesticides, are a hazard if improperly used or stored, or used without the proper protective equipment.

Machinery represents another hazard, since most fatal injuries are thought to arise from machinery use. This situation exists despite design changes that have resulted, for example, in roll-over protection and other changes to power takeoffs.

Further, noise is a factor associated with the operation of farm machinery and is a major cause of hearing impairment associated with intensive animal husbandry.

Waste collection disposal is another area of concern, given the accumulation of toxic gases.

Well-designed containment systems for livestock could reduce the risk to the farmer associated with being trapped between his animal and the side of a barn or the side of a stock cage. Facilities could be designed to avoid this.

Grain workers in elevators and elsewhere are known to be at considerable risk due to grain dust which leads to lung disease.

Finally—and Senator Olson has often spoken of this—the deteriorating financial situation in the agricultural industry and the stress that results therefrom is leading to a poor mental and emotional health situation among farmers and their families. In some cases, this stress has resulted in suicide, marital breakdown, substance abuse and family violence.

Unfortunately, honourable senators, national data and Canada-wide information are lacking on these many hazards and the extent to which they lead to fatalities, injuries and illnesses. While there appears to be some research into a number of the areas, the research does not appear to be coordinated nor the results widely disseminated to bring the educational value of these matters to the attention of our farm communities. We need to know more about pesticides. We need to know more about herbicides as well as other chemicals, and the dangers they cause. We need to know more about protective equipment, and to have advice and training in their correct use passed on to farmers. We need to do more in the way of training and protection in relation to farm machinery. Also important is an examination of noise and the dust hazard for grain handlers. Finally, the effects of emotional stress must be alleviated. These could be lessened in an effort to reduce the mental and emotional breakdown that is experienced by many farm families.

Our committee study could contribute to increasing awareness of the problems both within the farming and the rural communities as well as among the general public, and could lead to a national collation and collection of information. The knowledge gleaned thereby into the causes of these injuries and health hazards could then be passed on to the farm communities. This could help us develop a reasonable, decent research system that would lead to preventive measures for the betterment of health in our farm communities.

I thank honourable senators for their attention, and to our committee for making this request.

Senator Molgat: Would Senator Barootes permit a question?

Senator Barootes: Certainly.

Senator Molgat: Could you tell us how long you expect this inquiry to last, and whether it is the intention of the committee to travel? In order to gather the views of farmers in Western Canada, you would have to be there on the scene and make a proper assessment.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senator, this is true. We do intend to travel. In June of this year, however, some committee members attended an international symposium on occupational health in Regina, and then had a follow-up with farm members and associated government agencies. At that time we gleaned some information, and with that information in hand, we intend to bring to the committee people who have specific and particular knowledge, and then thereafter travel perhaps to Western Canada.

More important, we wish to travel to two areas in the United States, one at Davis, California, and one at Iowa City, Iowa, where two centres of the type I have discussed today have been set up to collate and collect national information and to do research for all of the United States. That is the type of travel that we would like to undertake.

As to the time element, I think the committee will require perhaps a year or more to collect the necessary information and to bring in a decent report for the consideration of this chamber.

Senator Bosa: What about the budget?

Hon. H.A. Olson: As seconder of the motion, I want to say that I attended some of the discussions and meetings to which Senator Barootes referred. I endorse what he has had to say about the motion.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, in view of the very high level of the seconder that Senator Barootes was able to obtain, I find it difficult to oppose the motion, and I do not intend to do so. This is an area that indeed requires study.

When Senator Barootes first started to speak, I was concerned that the committee would look only at the mechanical problems of power takeoffs and other such difficulties. I was heartened when he said that they would look at what is an increasing problem, and that is stress. Quite obviously, the stress is not only on the farmer himself; the stress is very much on the farmer's family, the wife and the children. I would hope that the committee, in its study, will not limit itself purely to the farmer. The question relates to all of the problems of the farm family, and it ought to be studied.

At the University of Saskatchewan, work has been done on this problem. Will people from that area be asked to appear before the committee? Will they be involved in the committee's work? Whatever has been done in that regard ought to be incorporated as quickly as possible.

I am interested in hearing that the committee will be looking at some of the work done in the United States. However, I believe there has also been some Canadian work which we should not overlook. I am prepared to support the motion.

Senator Barootes: Thank you. Your statement was very well made and your question was very well put. Indeed, one of the first witnesses we intend to call is Dr. Jim Dosman from this centre in Saskatoon which has been operating for six or eight years. They have developed a considerable amount of information of a local nature. We also want to see what happens in Prince Edward Island with potato farming, in Ontario with corn farming, in Quebec with dairy farming and in Saskatchewan and Alberta with stock and grain farming.

You are quite right when you say that the stress on families is far greater than we have realized in the past. At meetings we attended we saw tears rolling down the faces of people as they made almost desperate attempts to tell us of the problems their families have been facing these last few years.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, September 23, 1992, at 2:00 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there are 58 days left for the democrats and 454 days for the contemptuous ones.

OPPOSITION TO BILL TO INCORPORATE

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, yesterday we had a bill presented to us by the Honourable Senator Atkins to provide a corporation sole for the Dai al-Mutlaq. I would like to read a copy of a letter that I have received which was addressed to Mr. William Charles Winegard, one of the government's ministers, which states:

> I would very much appreciate to receive the information regarding the application for private act to incorporate the Dai al-Mutlaq as a corporation sole as published in the Globe and Mail (the copy enclosed).
> I would like to know as to why someone would make such application and what would be the purpose and intent of that. How it would affect the community as a whole and the individual members of the community who are citizens of Canada.
> I also would like to know what steps as an individual I can take to oppose this application if it is going to be detrimental to our well being.
> Dai al-Mutlaq who resides in Bombay, India has over the years exploited, blackmailed, outcasted the individuals from the community and carried out religious castration of the members who have not acceded to his unending demands, especially monetary.
> I am afraid if this application is going to worsen our situation. If it is, then I like many others would like to take steps to oppose it.
> I would appreciate your early reply.

Some time ago, when Dai al-Mutlaq wanted to visit some members of his community in Kenya, the Government of Kenya barred him because the community was so divided over his acts and his reputation.

Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate should ask his friend, who is the lawyer for this person, to perhaps reconsider being associated with a man like this.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is not my custom to participate during the period that is reserved for Senators' Statements, but I think I should make a point or two in respect to the intervention we have just heard from Senator Gigantès.

The first point that I wish to make, since he brought my name into it, is that in my view, and I believe I am supported by the authorities, including Beauchesne's, Canadian citizens have a right to petition Parliament in the way this group has petitioned us. As I said yesterday, I have come to no final conclusion on the substance of the matter. I have not even come to any preliminary conclusion as to the substance of the matter.

I am, however, certain that they have a right to petition Parliament in the way they have and, as I did yesterday, I thank Senator Atkins for having brought the matter forward.

This brings me to my second point. The arguments advanced by Senator Gigantès on behalf of someone who wrote a letter to a minister would be better put forward, it seems to me, in the course of the debate which Senator Frith adjourned yesterday and which will be resumed later today, tomorrow or at the first opportunity. He will have an opportunity to express his views and his correspondent will have an opportunity—and I hope Senator Gigantès will so advise his correspondent—to come to the committee and to make representations and ask questions about the application.

I do not think we should allow our views, or the views of anyone else, to colour the process and to interfere with the undoubted right of these people and other Canadian citizens to petition Parliament from time to time.

Senator Gigantès: Would the Leader of the Government permit a question on this?

Senator Murray: I suggest we take it up in debate.

EXCISE TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition) presented Bill S-14, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Frith, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Friday next, September 25, 1992.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 189 residents of the Northwest Territories who object to the goods and services tax.

Most of these petitions come from Spence Bay, Yellowknife and Gjoa Haven.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 505 residents of Saskatchewan who object to the goods and services tax.

Most of these petitions come from Nipawin, Regina, Indian Head, Prince Albert, Battleford, Cochin, Elrose, Swift Current, Carrot River, Duck Lake and La Ronge.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 509 residents of Alberta who object to the goods and services tax.

Most of these petitions come from Calgary, Okotoks and Banff.

Finally, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 520 residents of Nova Scotia who object to the goods and services tax.

Most of these petitions come from Sydney, Inverness, Port Hastings, Troy, Dartmouth, Margaree Valley, Port Hawkesbury, New Glasgow, Chéticamp, Petit De Grat, Arichat, Pictou, Cleveland, Grantville and Evanston.

[English]

There is a grand total of 1,723 fed-up Canadian citizens who have had their fill of nearsighted and mean-spirited taxes such as the GST. Incidentally, for Senator Murray's information —

Senator Simard: Is this in the petition?

Senator Hébert: I am answering —

Senator Simard: Just read the wishes of the petitioners. We do not want to hear that.

Senator Hébert: He does not want to hear what the people have to say. Incidentally, for Senator Murray's information, this petition is hot off the press. I know that Senator Simard does not want Senator Murray to listen to me or to hear an answer to a question he was asking me yesterday about the dates. This petition is dated August 5, 1992, less than 50 days ago.

AGRICULTURE

● (1410)

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, yesterday, I asked the Leader of the Government if any action had been initiated to assess the damage done to the grain crop in Western Canada.

In reply to that simple question, the minister recited a whole list of programs that were available early this spring. I am happy to say that the Prime Minister was in Saskatchewan yesterday. A newspaper article about his visit states:

> After a meeting with Saskatchewan farmers, Mulroney said the federal government may have to put an emergency aid package in place for the province's farmers similar to that given Newfoundland fishermen earlier this summer.

The Prime Minister is quoted as having said:

> For me to satisfy the purists and say I can't deal with the problem of the farmers of Saskatchewan because I might offend the sensitivities of some political commentators, this is not really serious.
> We will deal with problems that are there, problems that are urgent.

Will the minister be more forthcoming today and tell us whether or not there is to be some sort of program? My question is simple. Is anything being done to assess this situation? Will the minister be as forthcoming as the Prime Minister was and say that something might be done about it? Or will he just say, "If you didn't apply before May, you get nothing," which is what he said yesterday.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with regard to that last comment, let me repeat that those farmers who choose not to have crop insurance make a business decision based on their own long-term production and financial situations.

With regard to the statement of the Prime Minister yesterday, as he indicated, the crop situation is being monitored closely as the harvest progresses.

Senator Olson: That is not what the Prime Minister said. According to the quotation I read, he said that he will put in an emergency aid program, regardless of what the purists have to say. I do not know whether the Honourable Senator Murray is a purist or not.

Can the government leader not be forthcoming and tell us a little bit of what they are doing and how they are doing it so that the people who will be affected by any sympathy from this government will know what will happen? Or will the minister keep on saying, "If you didn't buy the programs that were available early in the spring, we are not promising anything else." At least the Prime Minister raises some hope.

Senator Murray: What the Right Honourable the Prime Minister has said, and it should be obvious to the honourable senator, is that we would do in the future what we have done in the past—that is, respond to any need in the farm community in Western Canada. That is our record and no one knows it better than the farmers.

Senator Olson: The minister could have saved a lot of time if he had said that yesterday, instead of dismissing it by saying, "You should have bought the programs that were there, or else."

COST OF CROP LOSSES—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL APPORTIONMENT

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to ask another, related question. Will there be any change in the reduction of cost factors to both the federal and provincial governments? It seems that it will cost the Saskatchewan farmers some $300 million to save $24 million from the provincial treasury. Do you have any interest in trying to fix that?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that is the sort of question which I should relay to my colleague the Minister of Agriculture and report back.

Senator Olson: The Minister of Agriculture is already aware of the situation. You do not need to refer the matter to him because he has already tried to persuade the Saskatchewan government that they are doing a great disservice to the farmers by their actions. I want to know whether or not the government will intervene on this matter. Even the farmers sometimes need to be protected from the provincial governments.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS

APPLICATION OF PRINCIPLE OF UNIVERSALITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition in the Government): I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning something he said yesterday during Senator Thériault's speech on Bill C-80. He indicated at that time that senators should not receive Family Allowance benefits, presumably, it appeared, because senators are employed and receive a paycheque.

Extending that logic, I then asked Senator Murray if senators should also not benefit from medicare, since they are employed and receive a paycheque. His response was that Family Allowance and medicare are two totally different programs.

Honourable senators, I agree that they are two totally different programs. However, they are both based on the same principle; namely, universality.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Murray has made it clear that Family Allowance benefits should not be universal. That is reflected in Bill C-80. Therefore if he is attacking that principle in this program, can we not reasonably assume that he will attack the same principle in medicare?

My question is: If you do not believe in preserving the principle of universality as it relates to Family Allowance benefits, why do you expect us and the people of Canada to believe that you will preserve that principle in relation to medicare?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, I do not think I can improve on the statement I made in the course of the debate yesterday.

Senator Frith: To tell you the truth, I did not think you were capable of improving on it either. I did, however, think it fair to give you a chance.

THE ECONOMY

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL ARRANGEMENTS—PROPOSED SHARED-COST AGREEMENT—EFFECT ON REFERENDUM VOTE

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): My next question relates to capital spending and infrastructure. In last Saturday's Toronto Star, an article appeared concerning the government's plan to spur the economy. That article said:

> Prime Minister Brian Mulroney is expected to announce the mammoth capital-spending program during the referendum campaign to boost the Yes side before the Oct. 26 vote.
> Ottawa would spend $1.5 billion a year and the provinces $1 billion, under a proposed shared-cost agreement between the two levels of government.

Much of that is to be targeted to upgrading our national highways.

That program sounds stunningly similar to the infrastructure improvements Mr. Chrétien has been calling for over the past few months. To give you an example, in a press release dated June 8, Mr. Chrétien repeated his call for a shared-cost infrastructure program among the three levels of government. He said:

> The physical infrastructure of our towns and cities—the roads and bridges and sewers—is literally falling apart . . . Capital improvements are desperately needed now, and so are the jobs and economic activity that would go with them.

Senator Simard: Senator Frith —

Senator Frith: I was not asking you a question, sir, but if you want to interrupt, I will repeat it as soon as you are through.

• (1420)

Honourable senators, under our new rules, we have a limited time for Question Period. Because the clock is watched and the interventions are monitored, when someone asks a question during Question Period and is interrupted with mumblings or other forms of interruption by another senator, the time taken for the interruption should not be at the expense of the questioner. Question Period is a time allocated to the opposition, essentially —

Senator Barootes: Not necessarily the opposition!

Senator Frith: I could not even, for example, get the word "essentially" out before Senator Barootes interrupted. I will say it again, probably not without interruption.

Question Period is essentially a time for the opposition and it is a time taken up mostly by the opposition. I do not think that it should be curtailed and abridged by mumblings and interruptions —

Senator Simard: Please get on with the question.

Senator Frith: —like the one we are now experiencing. Fortunately, I am able to give perfect evidence of an interruption. Go ahead, Senator Simard. You are doing it right now, interrupting and using up the time. I ask the speaker to take into account that fact.

Senator Barootes: What is the question!

Senator Frith: I would love to get it out if you would shut up, sir!

Senator Simard: What is the question!

Senator Frith: He will not shut up. If you shut up, you will hear the question. I am not going to ask the question until you shut up.

Senator Simard: Are you going to answer my question?

Senator Frith: Have you shut up?

Senator Simard: Yes, for the time being.

Senator Frith: I could not expect much more than "the time being" from you.

Now, quoting Mr. Chrétien:

> The physical infrastructure of our towns and cities—the roads and bridges and sewers—is literally falling apart . . . Capital improvements are desperately needed now, and so are the jobs and economic activity that would go with them.

My first question is this: Can Senator Murray confirm whether this is only a rumour or, if not, can he tell us when to expect an announcement formally on the issue?

As for my second question, I wish to know if the Conservatives are planning to steal any more Liberal policies to subsidize their own bankrupt policy branch?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on the specific matter of the Trans-Canada Highway, there have been discussions, going back some considerable time, between the federal government and the provinces. I seem to recall that at a first ministers' meeting, held quite a few months ago, there was a discussion of this very matter. My honourable friend will recall references in Mr. Mazankowski's budget to infrastructure in general and to highways in particular.

Senator Frith: That is quite true, and that was encouraging.

Senator Murray: There have been discussions involving particularly the premiers of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, the Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister and other ministers; but the short answer to the honourable senator's question is that no decision such as described in the Toronto Star article to which he refers has been taken by the government.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSENSUS REPORT—OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—DIFFERENCE BETWEEN ENGLISH AND FRENCH TEXTS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

On September 15 I asked the senator about the translation in the Charlottetown accord under the Canada clause and the use of "attachment" in French as a translation for "commitment". He replied to me then that he would take this up and try to give us the information in due time.

In view of the fact that the Senate may not be sitting for much longer, and, indeed, may not sit until after October 26, when the referendum vote is to be held, and given that this matter is of substantial concern to a large number of Canadians, particularly those of the French minority living outside Quebec, I would ask my honourable friend to look at the Constitution Acts 1867 to 1982, the consolidation as of October 1, 1989, produced by the Department of Justice. At page 66, under item 35.1, the English text reads as follows:

> The Government of Canada and the provincial governments are committed to the principal . . .

I will not read the rest. By the way, as an aside, the word "principle" is improperly spelled.

[Translation]

In French, the wording of section 35.1 is very clear:

> 35.1 Les gouvernements fédéral et provinciaux sont liés par l'engagement de principe—

[English]

Similarly, in 36(1) on page 67, it says:

> . . . together with the government of Canada and the provincial governments, are committed to . . .

[Translation]

The French version also says, at section 36.(1):

> —ainsi que les gouvernements fédéral et provinciaux, s'engagent à:

[English]

Clearly again, the word "s'engagent" is to be the translation for "committed".

A third case occurs under 36(2), still at page 67:

> Parliament and the government of Canada are committed to the principle . . .

[Translation]

And in French, section 36.(2) clearly says:

> Le Parlement et le gouvernement du Canada prennent l'engagement de principe—

[English]

We then have clear precedence for the translation of "commitment" to "engagement". Why is it that we cannot proceed now to make that clear change, in view of the fact that there are clearly precedents in our present Constitution?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a day or two ago I saw a draft reply to the question of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. I approved it for tabling. I thought it had been tabled yesterday. I have sent for it again. I may indeed receive it in a very few minutes. If so, of course I shall table it. If not, I shall do so tomorrow.

My recollection is that the reply makes two points. One is that "attachement" is perfectly proper French for "commitment" and second, that those two words recur throughout the Charlottetown agreement, but I am ad libbing the response which I will table in due course, and which states the case in somewhat more detail than I have done.

THE ECONOMY

BELOW-CAPACITY PERFORMANCE—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is more or less an appendix to my leader's question on the article in the Toronto Star.

I take it for granted that in fact, although you did not say so, there will soon be an announcement regarding the TransCanada Highway and the provinces.

Based on the admission that the government is working on some ways to help get this country out of the terrible economic mess it is in, is the Leader of the Government prepared to comment on an article in the Globe and Mail today headlined, "Short by, oh, about $70 billion"? It says that the economy is performing 90.8 per cent, the 9.2-percentage-point gap in the output being the biggest gap since the last depression.

Yesterday I talked about the depression. The only reason we are not in a depression, and that we are in a state of what is still called a recession, is the existence of the programs that were put in place by former Liberal governments.

[Senator Molgat.]

Is the government now prepared to accept the fact that it has to act and get this economy going again, so that we do not slide into a real depression?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think it is fair comment to say that the economy has been operating at below capacity. Having said that, there are various ways of measuring capacity, and I do not think there is any valid comparison to be made between the situation during the Great Depression of the 1930s and the situation we face today.

Second, it is obvious to most people that what we have been going through in this country—and what much of the rest of the world has been going through—is not just a cyclical downturn, although there are elements of that, but a longer-term structural problem, and that structural adjustment has to take place.

It is the considered opinion of people who study these matters, such as the IMF and the OECD, that Canada is well ahead of many of the other countries in making those structural adjustments. This is demonstrated by our success in curbing public spending, in getting inflation and interest rates down and in providing the basis for a sustained longer-term recovery.

Third, with regard to the question of infrastructure, let me be very clear: The Toronto Star article to which the Leader of the Opposition referred indicates that the government had decided on a rather massive, multi-billion dollar expenditure on infrastructure. I have stated that no such decision has, in fact, been made by the government.

With regard to the TransCanada Highway, there have been many discussions. The most recent that came to my attention involved the Minister of Finance and the premiers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, although other provinces would obviously also be involved. I think that those discussions are coming along well, but I am not in a position to make the statement which the honourable senator attributes to me, namely, that there will be an early announcement on this matter.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate may cite statements by the IMF and OECD, but the fact of the matter is that the countries that are suffering most from the effects of economic right-wing philosophy are going through the worst of this recession, namely, England, the United States and Canada.

It is a known fact that the Americans are suffering from the policies of the Reagan-Bush administration. This country is suffering from the policies of the Mulroney administration and the United Kingdom is still suffering from the policies of the former Thatcher government. I hope that the policies in the United Kingdom are being rectified to some degree by the new Prime Minister, and that economic policies in the United States and Canada will be rectified by new governments.

However, this article says:

> The resulting 9.2-percentage-point gap in output is the biggest since the Great Depression of the 1930s and represents idle factories, closed shops and unemployed Canadians.

In fact, the shortfall of $70 billion would be enough to employ the 1.6 million presently unemployed Canadians at a salary of $44,000 each per year. Is this the kind of economic situation that you say the OECD cites as an example of a country coming out of this recession? We were the first country of the western world to be in this recession and we are the last one coming out of it, because of your policies.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think the honourable senator and I disagree, as his party and mine disagree, on the proper prescription for the current situation. They would spend more money and add to the deficit, to taxation and, we believe, to inflation and interest rates in doing so. Whatever blip in economic growth might be achieved by the spending of this public money, the longer-term effects would be harmful—indeed disastrous—to the Canadian economy and to the real progress that we have made—not without pain, I appreciate—in getting our economy to the point where, according to the International Monetary Fund, in 1992 and 1993 we will have the highest rate of growth in any of the industrialized countries, the lowest inflation rate and, I may say, certainly in 1993, the highest employment growth in the G-7.

This is progress and it has been made, as I said, not without pain. However, people do not want to throw it away by opening the flood gates and spending billions of dollars that we do not have which will again result in increased taxation, inflation and interest rates.

We have seen that alternative under our predecessors. We saw it recently at Queen's Park and the Canadian people want none of it.

Senator Thériault: The honourable senator seems to forget that Queen's Park is also in Canada, and that it is suffering from the policies of this government in the same manner as Fredericton and Halifax. That is the problem. The fact of the matter is not to spend more, but to spend better; and to spend for programs that help people who need help, not rich Tory friends. That is the difference in the philosophy.

Senator Murray: That is exactly why you should be supporting Bill C-80. We are cutting people like yourself and myself off family allowance and targeting the assistance to those who need it most.

Senator Thériault: The same philosophy that implemented the clawback of the old age pension, and now the family allowance, will eventually apply to medicare.

It is true that this is not the first time that there has been a recession. In 1980-81 we had a recession. However, because of the policies of the then government, we were out of that recession within two years.

The Conservatives took office in 1983 at a time when we were experiencing the fastest growth ever in this country. What have they done? They have doubled the deficit in the best economic times we have experienced in ages and, at the same time, more than doubled the debt of Canada. The poor people are suffering because of all the waste and extravagance, such as the recently announced $4 billion dollars which will be spent for helicopters for the defence department. That is the Conservatives' policies.

LABOUR

STRIKE AT PORT OF VANCOUVER—FEDERAL MEDIATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, the government leader will be aware that a legal strike is taking place in the Port of Vancouver affecting, at this point, a foremen's union that exists at that port. Through secondary picketing, that strike could very easily spread throughout the entire port.

The foremen's union has been without a collective agreement for several months. This labour action falls within the jurisdiction of the federal government. I would like to know from the minister whether any special steps are being taken to mediate this particular strike.

The minister will be well aware that Parliament has been recalled in summers past to pass legislation regarding strikes. I would suggest, however, that it would be most inconvenient to do so in this case before the end of October.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, our people from the federal Department of Labour are on the ground out there doing everything they can to try to effect a settlement and a resumption of activity. I do not think I can say more at the moment. I had a brief report on the matter from the Minister of Labour and his officials earlier today, and I assure honourable senators that they are doing their very best to bring about a speedy resolution of the problem.

THE CONSTITUTION

SOURCE OF FUNDS FOR REFERENDUM COMMITTEE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, perhaps I may ask the Leader of the Government a question with respect to financial support for the so-called Yes Committee that was set up yesterday.

Is any money being taken from the federal treasury, either directly or indirectly, to support that committee?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): No, honourable senators.

Senator Olson: Are there any PCO person-years allocated to that committee?

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised on September 15, 1992 by the Honourable Senator Molgat regarding a variation between the French and English texts in the Charlottetown agreement.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSENSUS REPORT—OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—DIFFERENCE BETWEEN ENGLISH AND FRENCH TEXTS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas L. Molgat on September 15, 1992).

The word "commitment" recurs several times in the Canada clause in the context of ideal or values (parliamentary system of government, racial and ethnic equality, respect for individual and collective rights and freedoms, equality of female and male persons) and not just in the context of linguistic duality. In each case, it is translated by the word "attachement".

The use of "attachement" rather than "engagement" in the French version is correct and in accordance with proper French.

The government is satisfied that the courts will not find any substantive difference between the two language versions.

There are no discussions with provincial, territorial and aboriginal representatives on this specific issue.

The government is confident that the linguistic duality clause will enable the further development of official language minority communities throughout Canada.

OFFICIAL RECORD

CORRECTION TO HANSARD

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Yesterday, during our proceedings on Reports of Committees, I reported Bill C-46 without amendment. At the conclusion of the report the Speaker asked when the bill would be read the third time. I recall well, as will Senators Frith and Molgat, that I did not have the courage of my colleague Senator Barootes, so I said, "at the next sitting."

Senator Barootes: No one has my courage.

Senator Nurgitz: We know that—and other things as well.

Senator Gigantès: Will you tell us?

Senator Nurgitz: In any event, as reported at page 2070 of yesterday's Hansard, although the Acting Speaker did not say it, it states: "When shall this report be taken into consideration?" That is an error. The Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate are very clear that the question put was when would the bill be read the third time.

I point that out as an error in Hansard.

[Senator Murray.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY

AN ACT TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS IN RELATION TO PENSIONS

AND TO ENACT THE SPECIAL RETIREMENT ARRANGEMENTS ACT

THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody moved the third reading of Bill C-55, to amend certain Acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I spoke on this bill at second reading before it was referred to committee. At third reading, after some introductory comments, I should like to deal with three points. First, the regulation-making authority that is provided for, and the possibility of de-indexing as a result; second, the pension credit splitting on breakdown of marriage; and, third, disability pensions. I will then have a word or two to say in conclusion.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, when I spoke at the second reading stage of Bill C-55, I referred to the ageing of Canada's population and the role of governments with respect to the financial situation of retirees. I also remarked that the bill deals with this responsibility and was designed to promote fairness and equity in our pension legislation.

Bill C-55 proposes to amend federal pension legislation and, as I said on second reading, deals with problems such as pension-credit splitting on marriage breakdown, allowing part-time employees to contribute to a pension plan and improving leave-without-pay provisions vis-à-vis pension contributions.

At the time, I expressed my concerns about these provisions and hoped that these concerns would be dealt with when the bill was examined by the National Finance Committee, but although certain problems were clarified, others we had pointed out were not.

My first point concerns regulatory authorities. The provisions of Bill C-55 with respect to new regulatory powers were one of the subjects I pursued in committee with the minister. I received quite a few letters from individuals and groups concerned by the clauses on "changes by regulation".

• (1450)

[English]

In a letter to me dated July 28, 1992, E. W. Halayko, National Chairman of the Armed Forces Pensioners'/Annuitants' Association wrote:

> The Bill is theoretically a Bill to have certain Superannuation Acts conform to the Income Tax Act. However, by approving changes by Regulation the Bill gives any government the authority to modify the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act by an Order-in-Council. The changes could include de-indexation, the government enjoying a contribution holiday, even decreasing current disbursements and even increasing present contributions by the Canadian Forces members.

I also received a letter from Diane Strilaeff, from Yellowknife. She asked how we could pass legislation that would let the government take control over the federal public service pension plan away from Parliament. Ms Strilaeff pointed out that under present legislation the government must match the employees' contributions, but that Bill C-55 would allow the Minister of Finance to decide what the government's contribution would be. The bill would also allow interest rates to the pension funds to be established by regulation without the approval of Parliament. She was also concerned that a regulation could be made under the Income Tax Act to limit indexation for any registered plan, thereby getting at the indexation in that indirect but equally effective route.

A March 16, 1992, news release from the Public Service Alliance of Canada attacked the regulation-making provisions of the bill as follows:

> Technically speaking, the adoption of Part IV of Bill C-55 would allow the government of the day to enact regulations under the Income Tax Act, without legislative approval, to, amongst other things, limit indexation of pension plans.

I think any senators who have been concerned with this legislation would agree that in the submissions and letters we have received that was one of the prime concerns; it was not just the de-indexation but particularly de-indexation as a possible result of power given to the government without having to consult Parliament.

> The government would also have the power to enact further regulations, under the Public Service Superannuation Act (PSSA), to conform with the new Income Tax Act regulations.

This led Mr. Bean, the president of that organization, to call Bill C-55 a "gift-wrapped time bomb."

The Federal Superannuates National Association had similar arguments in a news release, also dated March 16, 1992. The news release refers to Mr. Claude Edwards, who is the national president, being available to answer questions. This is what the release says:

> Under the legislation now before Parliament the government would be empowered to amend many important elements of the Superannuation Plans including the following, solely by the passage of a regulation.

We understand, of course, that that is effectively a government legislative act without recourse to Parliament. He continues with the list:

> - Limiting full indexing and other pension benefits.
> - Establishing and controlling with unfettered authority the interest paid on and the employer contribution to superannuation accounts.

One basic thing everyone understands about pensions is that the employee makes a contribution, the employer makes a contribution, and in effect they operate in partnership in assumed consultation to establish the pension fund that the employee counts so heavily on. As this points out, their concern is that, by this regulation, it would have nothing to do with Parliament and they would have no chance to make a submission.

The press release goes on to say:

> Prior to this, changes to the superannuation plans have required the full scrutiny and approval of Parliament.

Remember, honourable senators, traditionally, and we hope still, the participation of Parliament does not just mean debate in the House of Commons and debate in the Senate, but also scrutiny by committees, which citizens have an opportunity to speak to and ask to be heard before.

These are just a few examples of the letters and statements in our files from people who are concerned with the regulation-making authority of this bill.

[Translation]

As I summarized for the minister's benefit at the committee meeting on September 10, the bill gives the government the authority required to issue regulations in this area for two purposes: first, to ensure that the relevant legislation—the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act—complies with the Income Tax Act.

The second is to ensure that the relevant legislation is applied in a practical and equitable manner.

Clause 71 of Bill C-55 will allow the Governor in Council to make changes by way of regulation to various pension plans without consulting the groups concerned or Parliament.

[English]

In his testimony, the minister touched on the subject of the regulation-making power. I quote from the proceedings of the National Finance Committee, Issue Number 32, and this is the minister speaking, Mr. Loiselle:

> Furthermore, the bill clearly states that no regulation made for tax compliance purposes may reduce any benefit, including indexing earned prior to the date the regulation is made.
> I might add that the committee's legal counsel confirmed that any future changes to the indexing provisions > of the various pension plans would require an act of Parliament irrespective of future changes in income tax requirements.

• (1500)

Beyond the many promises the minister has made not to de-index pensions, or alter contribution levels, according to the legal opinion he received, the government could not legally make regulations to de-index pensions or change benefits. However, in the first opinion provided to the minister by R.R. Walsh, General Legislative Counsel, a different scenario was raised.

The General Legislative Counsel wrote, and I quote from documents prepared by him in respect to the regulation-making powers for Income Tax Act compliance:

> It is not clear that amendment of PSSA/CFSA/RCMPSA would be required to reduce or remove indexation as a permissible benefit ... An amendment of the Income Tax Regulations by the Governor in Council (without the involvement of Parliament), made applicable to all pension plans, might be sufficient to reduce or remove indexation without amendment of the statutes governing the plans.

The scheme of Bill C-55 is to amend plans in order to make them comply with the Income Tax Act. The government wants to de-index and, thus, has to amend, since it is being established that the plans must comply with the income tax regulations. The income tax regulations must be amended to de-index, for example, with the result that changes will have been made by regulation.

Senator Bosa: That sounds complicated.

Senator Frith: Does that sound complicated, honourable senators? I must say it again, because it should not sound complicated. Senator Bosa says it does sound complicated.

The problem is that we do not want it to be possible to de-index your pension by regulation, senator. The resultant hope is that, if your pension is to be de-indexed, it will have to go back to Parliament, where it will receive debate and study in committee in both houses.

However, the government does not want to have to do that. The government wants to de-index your pension without having to go back to Parliament. What the General Legislative Counsel is saying is that it would be possible for the government to do that, because the government is establishing, in what is before us, the need to have pension plans comply with income tax regulations. Instead of amending the plan, it simply amends the regulations, the regulations amend the plan and away goes indexation.

It does get a bit more complicated as it applies to this act, but that is the concern that was expressed by all the citizens and that was the information and opinion given first by the General Legislative Counsel, Mr. R.R. Walsh.

[Senator Frith.]

It appears that our fears may be justified in that the government would have the ability to by-pass Parliament in making changes to pension plans by regulation. As honourable senators might expect, in a second letter to clarify his opinion, Mr. Walsh stated that the amendments made to the income tax regulations would only be applicable to pension plans for income tax purposes and that such an amendment would not have the effect of removing or reducing indexation as a benefit under the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canada Forces Superannuation Act or the RCMP Superannuation Act. He went on to say that the removal or reduction of the benefits provided for under any of these acts could only be effected by an amendment to the relative statute by Parliament.

However, I found that less than fully reassuring, because we know the extent to which significant changes can be made by making changes to income tax regulations. For example, we know that something like the most widely subscribed to pension plan in Canada, the Canada Pension Plan, can be wiped out by dealing with it through income tax changes. The government did not repeal the Canada Pension Plan. Nor did it abolish it. It clawed back from certain citizens who had contributed to the plan, and effectively repealed it by changing the Income Tax Act. That was the famous claw-back.

I remember reading a short story by Sir Walter Scott on the subject of imprisonment for debt. In it there was a small debate going on between a learned lawyer and a farmer about the fact that in British law at the time there was no such thing as imprisonment for debt. The lawyer tried to explain that it was not imprisonment for debt, that if one were in debt the Queen sent a notice stating that the debt should be paid. Therefore, what one was imprisoned for was disobeying the Queen, not being in debt.

I remember the farmer saying something like, "Well, it still sounds like imprisonment for debt to me." The lawyer answered by saying, "But you fail to perceive the elegance of the legal fiction."

That is what in effect can be done with the Income Tax Act. The government may say, "It is true you have the Canada Pension Plan, sir or madam, but because you are in a certain income tax bracket we will take it back every month. You still have it, you understand. If you complain, you fail to perceive the elegance of the legal fiction."

Senator Murray: That does not apply to the Canada Pension Plan. You are talking about the Old Age Security.

Senator Frith: Quite right, and I thank you. That makes it worse. I am glad you corrected that, Senator Murray, and I hope the record shows it.

Senator Murray: It takes federal-provincial agreement to make any changes to the CPP.

Senator Frith: Apparently, you fail to perceive the point also.

Senator Murray: No, I do not.

Senator Frith: You were busy talking about something else when I was making the original point.

We must realize that the authority to make regulations under the guise of income tax purposes may actually extend beyond what we are being told it does. The knife which this authority sharpens may be used to cut programs and benefits without ever going to Parliament, which was the primary concern expressed in all the letters received by myself and all other senators.

My question now is this: If the government has no intention of unilaterally de-indexing pensions, reducing other benefits, changing the funding levels or changing interest rates with this regulation-making authority, and if the legal opinion says that such actions would not be permitted under the bill in any event, why will the government not specifically write into the legislation a provision prohibiting it or any government from taking such action?

Why not make the intention clear? In this case we are being asked to trust government guarantees, and it is not the first time we have been asked to take such a leap of faith.

I am pausing because I am catching up to something about which the government assured me. So when I get the CPP and they take it all back in tax, they are taking it back legally. I mean, both my CPP and my OAS.

This, however, is not the first time that we have been asked to take such a leap of faith. We all remember Bill C-22, the pharmaceutical bill, when the government promised greater employment and an increase in research and development. We also remember that some of us, including myself, asked the government to put such requirements into the bill and the government refused. We have seen how these promises have not been kept. In an article which appeared in The Citizen on September 17, Ian Austen reported under the heading, "Patent drug law did not work, report says", at the second paragraph:

> Contrary to the pharmaceutical drug industry's claim in 1987, —

Which is when we asked them to put those requirements in the bill —

> — a draft study for the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs shows limited job gain, little growth in basic research and almost no capacity to produce the active ingredients of drugs in Canada.

So much for the assurances we received in 1987, and probably so much for those we are receiving here today.

We must ask ourselves if this legal opinion that I have referred to and the minister's promises are enough to convince us—and concerned groups and individuals—that the next minister will not unilaterally, through regulation, change the de-indexing provisions for any other benefits provided through the pension legislation. I personally do not believe that Mr. Loiselle would do so. He has gone on record as saying that he will not, and I believe he will not, but what assurance does that give us that the next minister, no matter which government, will not do so?

Now to the second point, the pension credit splitting on marriage breakdown. Another matter that we learned much about in the committee, and also through the many letters I received, is the issue of pension credit splitting in the event of marriage breakdown. Under current law there is no provision for splitting of pension credits. As you know, the essential step these days in the case of marriage breakdown is to determine the distribution of assets. The first step is to decide what are family assets and then the judge or parties, if it is by agreement, determine how those assets are to be distributed.

Bill C-55 in this respect is an improvement because it will permit the division of a plan member's pension benefits at source. However, there are a number of issues that this bill does not address. For example, many women will still be denied access to their ex-husband's pension benefits after having spent many years working in the home and providing support to their husbands, the husband being the plan member.

In one particular letter received by Senator Fairbairn, who forwarded a copy to me, a woman described her situation, one which will not be rectified under this bill. This woman had been married to her ex-husband for 29 years, during which time she worked in the home, raised three children and gave her husband extraordinary support and aid in his career. I say "extraordinary support" because she had a much higher level of education than he—he had only completed grade eight—and provided him with tutoring help throughout his work-related courses. He recognized her help and support, as did many of his colleagues.

Subsequent to their divorce, the husband remarried and died approximately one year after the remarriage. Upon his death his second wife received all of his pension and death benefits.

We would like to be optimistic and say that that situation cannot recur under Bill C-55 because of the pension credit splitting provisions that I have just referred to, but this woman is an example of how and when it can happen. First, she would need a written spousal agreement or court order to have her ex-husband's pension credits divided. When the couple divorced, neither of these alternatives was an option, so there was no court order or written agreement. Since her ex-husband is now dead, she cannot no obtain a spousal agreement.

Shortly before he died, her ex-husband expressed regret that he could not do anything for her with regard to his pension. If the requirement for a court order or spousal agreement were eliminated then women would not be in the situation that this woman is in now. Her 29-year contribution to her husband's career would be recognized and she could receive her fair share of his pension and death benefits.

The Committee for Spousal and Children's Pension Survival appeared before the National Finance committee to discuss this very issue. In its submission to the committee, the issue was explained very clearly. I read from their brief. The heading is "Spouses Denied All Benefits":

> Many spouses who were married 20, 30, 40, 50 or more years, who shared the contribution years, supported all the employment, carried all the family responsibilities, bore the children; lost their own employment, pension and earning opportunities, may have represented Canada side by side; and many who carry exclusive ongoing family medical and other responsibilities; and many who planned for their retirement very responsibly; are increasingly denied all their share of veteran's, public service, military, Canada Pension Plan, Widow's Allowance, Supplementary Death Benefits, insurance and R.S.P. benefits.

They refer to an attached example. This particular issue was discussed on a number of occasions in the committee. The Organization of Spouses of Military Members raised the issue, as did the Canadian Pensioners Concerned Incorporated.

I asked the department officials about that matter in committee on Thursday last, September 17, and we discussed it at some length. In fact, there seemed to be a general consensus among members of the committee that when this situation arises, when a pensioner dies leaving a legal spouse and a common-law spouse, the division of the pension survivor benefits may not be very fair, and there seems to be nothing in the legislation to deal with this issue.

Why was this issue not addressed by Bill C-55? Why was the bill not fashioned so that ex-spouses could collect their fair share of pension and survivor benefits? Of course, in every case where such benefits are an issue, they are an important issue. In every case the dollar sums may seem small, but to the people concerned they can be the difference between ground beef and dog food.

Why include the requirement for a court order or spousal agreement instead of recognizing the inherent right that ex-spouses have to a share of pension survivor benefits, earned by the plan member, to which they contributed.

Are we satisfied to allow this issue to remain unresolved, and do we believe that it will be rectified in the future? The problem was recognized in the committee's report on the bill, item 4 on page 3, where it says.

> In particular, your committee is of the opinion that the existing measures regarding survivor benefits can and should be altered to provide for the possibility, where appropriate application is made, of survivor benefits being paid on a pro rata basis both to the legal or common-law spouse and to any previous spouse or spouses including separated and divorced spouses without regard to their current marital status.

The committee not only recognized the problem but it recommended a solution. The recommendation that the benefits be divided on a pro rata basis was supported by many of the witnesses testifying before the committee.

[Senator Frith.]

Earlier this week, I received a letter from Joyce Stothers, Chair of the Committee for Spousal and Children's Pension Survival and Related benefits, urging that we make such a recommendation in our report. She recommended in her handwritten letter:

> The spouse who shared the largest part of the contribution years should be permitted to remain in the pension plans eligible in accordance with the member's eligibility to a share of the monthly allowance and all the associated benefits of these defined benefits plans, like others in the plan.
> If there are other spousal claimants, spouses who shared a lesser part of the contribution period could be awarded this percentage share . . .

Unfortunately, the committee did not investigate the possibility of recommending an amendment to deal with this issue. I am not quite sure that an amendment to Bill C-55 could rectify this problem, but it should be rectified. I say that because the breakdown of marriages and the resulting legal ramifications are essentially a matter of family law which is within provincial jurisdiction. This bill will allow the federal bureaucracy to respond to court orders made in provincial court, and to spousal agreements.

The problem could be dealt with in two ways: An order by a provincial court or an agreement between the spouses. Then the federal bureaucracy can respond. The end result would be that when one spouse is required to turn over a certain portion of his or her pension, the federal government will issue two cheques; one to each spouse.

The bill does not change existing provincial family law. Perhaps that is where the changes need to be made. If a provincial court would order a pro rata provision of pension credits, this bill may allow the federal authorities to carry out the wishes of that court, really as an administrative and implementing act.

This is an issue that I hope will be taken up by the pension advisory committee when they finally do meet, as the committee urged that they do. I compliment the committee on its report on that phase because these advisory committees have not been meeting, and these issues are all eminently appropriate for consideration by such an advisory committee to the department. I say "eminently", because the people who are and who will be on the committee are all persons expert in the field and, in most cases, experienced in the plans and the problems arising therefrom.

My third and last point deals with disability pensions. We talked about pension credit splitting between spouses, but another area which the committee found a bit worrisome were disability pensions. I raised with the Minister, as did others, the question of how Bill C-55 would affect disability pensions.

I have concerns with the division of disability pensions in the event of a marriage breakdown. We are still talking about the problems of marriage breakdown, but we are talking now about disability pensions. Under the bill, pensions benefits will include any disability pensions. Therefore on the break-up of a marriage or common-law relationship, the bill would permit the splitting of disability pensions.

A disability pension is generally considered to be a wage-loss replacement scheme. In other words, a disability pension compensates the disabled person for the money which he or she can no longer earn because of being disabled. This is important in considering the problems that might arise under Bill C-55 as addressed by the committee.

A disability pension is really a source of income for disabled people and often their only source. In that sense, it is not the same as a pension of the type we were talking about under part two. It is not really a pension as such. It is a replacement of income.

Under the bill, the disability pension will not be treated as a source of income. It will, in fact, be treated as net family property and will be divided retroactive to the date of separation. So when and if divorce proceedings are concluded, a disabled person receiving a disability pension may find that he or she owes half of the disability income collected from the time of separation to the other spouse, who may be fully employed and receiving a full income. That seems obviously unfair, as we can see that the disabled spouse could be left with a large debt owing to the other spouse, and possibly also economically destitute.

Notice that the analogy is to income. It is the same as if there is a marriage breakdown and the claims can be made on the salary of the wage-earner. It is not quite the same as a pension, being a substitute, in the case of disability, for that very income.

This is an unfair provision, and the minister indicated in committee that it is a situation that the government wanted to avoid, and would therefore seek to provide a form of protection for disabled pensioners in the regulations.

Sharon Hamilton, Director of Pension and Special Projects Division at the Treasury Board, indicated to the committee that this is a problem and that there is some confusion.

> There is this sort of confusion because everything is an annuity or an allowance under our pension plan. That which is payable in the case of disability we have not in the past had to characterize as being a different kind of benefit than a retirement pension. But in this situation, where we are looking at credit splitting, it becomes obvious that you are looking at a different kind of benefit in relation to a credit.

The officials have acknowledged that there is a need to protect disabled people in these circumstances. They have acknowledged that this bill does not provide that protection. In fact, the minister agreed that protection is needed. He testified before the committee, at page 32:19, that:

> In the regulation we will certainly want to provide a form of protection because the problem you describe is a very real one for disabled pensioners. We are looking at that problem to ensure that protection is there.

This is a convenient place to note the intention of the committee in its report, as I understand it. The Acting Chairman, Senator Doody, can correct me if I am wrong. The intention of the committee is to monitor this situation and to keep in touch with the Treasury Board officials and, if necessary, to have them come back and say whether they have been able to solve this acknowledged problem through regulation.

However it is still only a promise, and we must ask ourselves whether this promise is good enough. Is it good enough for those disabled people who may lose 50 per cent of the disability pension they have received from the time of separation?

Remember, these people are normally prepared, we understand, to have that disability pension treated as salary and therefore subject, for example, to garnishment and court order, just as any salary is in the context of a separation. What they are concerned about is that it would not be a matter of a court order of garnishment or a court order asking them to allocate part of their income, but that it will have the automatic result that 50 per cent of the disability pension they have received from the time of separation will suddenly become a debt. If it is the minister's intention to provide protection, again why not write it into the bill instead of providing it through regulation?

Honourable senators, when we sent this bill to committee after second reading, we had some questions concerning it. We outlined them in second reading. The minister and departmental officials appeared before the committee—as did a number of other interested groups—to attempt to answer our questions and clarify the bill.

We went through second reading to debate the principle of the bill and raise questions that we wanted the committee to look into. All of that took place here in this chamber. We then come back here at third reading to have a look at how those questions have been dealt with. As I say, the minister and departmental officials appeared before the committee, as did other interested groups, to attempt to answer the questions and clarify the bill. What we found was that a number of issues were left unresolved by the bill.

At the beginning of my intervention today, I discussed the dissatisfaction expressed by many people with the minister's promises regarding regulations and de-indexing. Although he has promised not to use regulations to de-index pension benefits, not many were reassured.

I also talked at that time about the problems brought out in testimony by spousal groups regarding the splitting of pension credits in the event of marriage breakdown. The bill will not help those spouses whose ex-spouses are living in common-law relationships.

Finally, I discussed the problems that may be faced by those receiving disability pensions. The bill does not provide any protection for these people, and again we have another promise from the minister that that situation will be rectified by regulations.

The minister and departmental officials acknowledged many of the problems raised in committee. Mr. Macdonald, the Comptroller General of Canada, told us that Bill C-55 is only the first step in pension reform. We were left with the impression that there are plans for further legislation to deal with the many problems that were discussed. We only hope that when it comes, it comes more quickly than the last pension legislation we looked at, which was about five years ago.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my colleague Senator Frith has given a very broad review of our position on this matter and has covered the subject extremely well. I want to touch on only one particular aspect, and that relates to the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act.

For some time now, the Canadian Forces have been operating on what we call the "total force concept". The principle here is that the reserve forces and the regular forces are essentially one. That means that the two should be treated equally. However, in this bill that is not the case; the reserve forces are not put on the same footing as are the regular forces.

For some time now there has been a system of "calling out" reserve personnel where they go on a permanent basis —normal, full-time hours—with the regular force. It could be a reserve element, but they are there on a full -time basis.

We find in this bill that where this call-out occurs in the case of someone who has previously been in the regular forces and has been subject to the Superannuation Act, but then leaves the regular forces and joins the reserves, and then goes on call-out, that individual is entitled to the superannuation provisions and can re-enter the superannuation system. Yet, a straight reservist who goes on call-out cannot join the superannuation system.

We find people who have now been on call-out for some years—some for six or seven years, and probably some longer than that—who have been full-time serving members—true, as reservists, but still serving full time—and yet they have no means of gaining access to any pension program.

When the question was asked at the committee stage, we were told that these people on the reserve list probably have other jobs, and they therefore may have entitlement to pension plans other than this one. There may be some in that category, but should we not leave that choice to them? If they are working full time for the army, the air force, or the navy; if they are on a call-out, be they previously regular force or straight reservist, should they not be entitled to exactly the same provisions? Honourable senators, I am unhappy that the act does not provide for a coverage in this regard.

[Senator Frith.]

Honourable senators, I point out to you that under the Public Service Superannuation Act, anyone who—

> . . . is engaged to work on average at least twelve hours a week or such lesser number of hours a week as may be prescribed by the regulations . . .

Therefore it could indeed be less than 12 hours per week, if the regulations so provided. Such an individual, under the Public Service Superannuation Act, is entitled to contribute and participate. Where is the fairness here? If you are working for the civil service, you can work 12 hours a week and contribute. If you are in the reserves—and note, again, that we are putting more and more emphasis on the need for reserves in the Canadian military system— and work more than 12 hours a week, you cannot contribute.

Therefore, honourable senators, there is a double standard in the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act regarding call-outs and a double standard vis-a-vis the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Department of National Defence. I submit that this ought to be corrected. It is too late now, and we will not be proposing amendments in this regard. In fact, we cannot propose amendments—at least none that will pass at this point. However, I point out that this unfairness does exist. I hope that when the act is reviewed—and I hope that will be soon—this unfairness will be corrected.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, it had been my intention to speak to third reading this afternoon and to conclude the Senate's dealing with this bill at this time.

Senator Frith: Technically you cannot, but go ahead.

Senator Doody: However, I was impressed by the eloquence of the arguments of my friend opposite, so much so that I thought I had better have a look at the first section of his speech, at least the part dealing with the regulations.

I had been satisfied in committee that the legal opinion provided to the House of Common's committee had dispelled any problems in that area. Perhaps I was overly optimistic or hopeful in that area. In any event, I will read my honourable friend's arguments and respond to them tomorrow, or whenever I get the document.

I have absolutely no problem with the other two questions raised by my friend. On the matter of splitting spousal pensions, I may be partly responsible for the language in the report. On the matter of disability, this is an area of which we are all very much aware, and we will urge the department to proceed with whatever solution it deems fit.

The reserve question is a new question—at least to me it is a new question—and one that surfaced for the first time under the prodding of Senator Molgat. I am delighted to see that it, too, is included in the report. However, we will leave my third reading comments for another day.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

CONTRAVENTIONS BILL

THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Senator Nurgitz moved the third reading of Bill C-46, respecting contraventions of federal enactments.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, before the bill is given third reading, I intend to move that it be not read the third time now, but that it be referred back to committee for further study. My reason for doing so is that the bill has to do with the federal and provincial Departments of Justice. The bill changes the rules and regulations for handling penalties in the provinces, but the provinces were not given an opportunity to present their views at the committee hearings. I asked that they be given that opportunity but was voted down by committee members.

If we pass this legislation without giving the provinces an opportunity to be heard by our committee, we will be exceeding our jurisdiction. We are here to protect the regions and to ensure that they are heard. If they have nothing to say, they can write and tell us that, but let us at least ask them if they have any comments on this bill before we give it third reading.

Provincial representations to Senate committees are covered by Appendix I to our rules, wherein it is stated:

> The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders recommends that the following be observed by committees of the Senate as general practice:
> That, whenever a bill or the subject-matter of a bill is being considered by a committee of the Senate in which, in the opinion of the committee, a province or territory has a special interest, alone or with other provinces or territories, then, as a general policy, the government of that province or territory or such other provinces or territories should, where practicable, be invited by the committee to make written or verbal representations to the committee, and any province or territory that replies in the affirmative should be given reasonable opportunity to do so.

Our committee refused to follow that rule and I ask that the committee chairman reconvene the committee and write to the provinces to see if they have anything to say. Therefore, in amendment, I move:

> That Bill C-46 be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the committee for further study.

Senator Simard: That is up to the committee.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the honourable Senator Hébert, that the bill be not now read the third time but that it be referred back to committee.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Call in the senators.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we would, of course, defer the taking of this vote.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): You would, of course? Senator Bonnell told us yesterday he was going to do this.

Senator Murray: He presented an amendment. It is a referral back to committee for study, but there has been no opportunity to debate his amendment.

Senator Frith: Oh, well, there should be.

Senator Molgat: We are quite happy to debate it.

Senator Murray: In that case, I move the adjournment of the debate on the motion in amendment.

On motion of Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX ACT

CHILDREN'S SPECIAL ALLOWANCES ACT

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Spivak, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kinsella, for the second reading of Bill C-80, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: The Honourable Senator Cools adjourned the debate yesterday in my name. This is an issue which moves us all. It is extremely important, and I think it is central to the general policy that has been followed, not only by this government but by other OECD governments, on how to deal with the turbulences in the economies of the western world and of Japan since the middle seventies.

This is a very serious issue. Hindsight is generally much better than foresight. There is evidence to show that not only our government but other governments have gone seriously wrong and have followed policies that constrain consumption.

The provisions of the bill before us certainly constrain consumption. These policies that constrain consumption and encourage saving in the hope that we will attract investment have produced, paradoxically, a result the reverse of that which was hoped for by the governments of the western world.

Monetarist views have been proven wrong, and favouring saving in the hope that it will encourage investment has only encouraged—as I will demonstrate later—increased speculation in tangible assets such as stock options, bonds, real estate and currencies around the world, and has not produced the investment or the job creation that was hoped for. Not only this government but all the governments of the western world have done this. In consequence, we have also encouraged phenomena that have worked against productivity.

This may sound a far cry from cutting child allowance, but these matters are all inter-related. An excellent study has been done on this subject by a Canadian economist who at this very moment is on his way to the northeastern United States to present it to universities there. He will be returning this coming Monday. I have seen his study. I have the figures, but I have not photocopied them and I do not want to speak about those figures without having before me the full statistical data in case you ask any questions. I would like to be able to answer questions very precisely.

The data I am referring to are statistics gathered by the OECD and Statistics Canada. They are long and numerous, but very instructive. I would not like to deprive honourable members opposite of the benefit of the knowledge of this excellent piece of research.

I do this totally in a nonpartisan spirit because, as I have said, it is not only this government but all governments in the western world that have followed similar policies, forgetting the lessons of the great depression.

I would like to take advantage of the very generous offer made by the Leader of the Government yesterday, as reported at page 2089 of the Debates of the Senate. He said:

> I hope that will set at rest the mind of the honourable Leader of the Opposition and the minds of any others who may have feared that we were going to try to curtail debate on second reading of this bill. On the contrary, we look forward to hearing the contributions of other honourable senators . . .

I have a major contribution to make next week, and in view of that I would like to adjourn this debate until next Tuesday.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It is moved by the honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the honourable Senator Hèbert, that the debate be adjourned until next Tuesday. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the notion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, are there no other speakers who can take part in the debate tomorrow, Friday morning or Monday? Today is Wednesday. Why adjourn until next Tuesday?

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): He explained that. It is because he will not be ready to speak until next Tuesday.

Senator Murray: But are there not others who intend to take part in the debate and can do so?

Senator Frith: It is your turn. It is up to your side now.

On motion of Senator Gigantès, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Atkins, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doyle, for the second reading of Bill S-13, An Act to incorporate the Dai al-Mutlaq as a corporation sole in Canada.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think we want some further information before we send this bill to committee. I have spoken to Senator Atkins about the matter. A good deal of the information we want will be available at committee, but there is more that we may need at second reading, too. I am waiting for that information which will be obtained through efforts that are being made by Senator Atkins. Therefore, I will further adjourn the debate.

• (1550)

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Frith if the information he intends to obtain will be circulated to other interested parties in the Senate, or does he intend to use that information to make an intervention at this stage of the study of the bill?

Senator Frith: Yes, I do. It will form part of the debate, definitely. We want the information in order to proceed with second reading debate. I expect that when I provide the information, other senators may wish to engage in the debate at second reading.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, September 24, 1992

The Senate met at 2 p.m., Senator Gérald J. Comeau, Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

Prayers.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): The clock is ticking and, in fact, chiming, thanks to Senator Doody. According to the calculations, if the government of which Senator Murray is a member respects democracy, using his words, Canadians should be casting their ballots within 57 days. We are getting close to the writ period, I think. However, if the present government is cowardly and contemptuous of democracy, the day of reckoning can be put off for 443 days. We will soon know which category they are in.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable members, before asking for leave to move an adjournment motion, let me indicate that it is the hope of this side that on Tuesday, should we adjourn until then, we can dispose of Bills C-55 and C-46, and can then continue debate on Bill C-80.

If there is general agreement on that, or if there is no major objection, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> THAT, when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until next Tuesday, September 29, 1992, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I listened carefully to what the Deputy Leader of the Government said concerning Bills C-55 and C-46. I should like to point out that we were prepared to proceed yesterday on both matters. In fact, we had understood C-55 was to proceed yesterday to a vote and that we would have Royal Assent, but for some reason or other the program was changed. We were prepared to proceed yesterday, and we are prepared to proceed today, indeed, if honourable senators so wish. However, If it is to be on Tuesday, then I will have to discuss the matter with my caucus, which will be meeting at noon on Tuesday, and we will take into consideration what the honourable senator has said.

With respect to Bill C-80, the debate was adjourned in the name of Honourable Senator Gigantès until Tuesday; however, if any honourable senators on the other side wished to participate in the debate, we would certainly be quite happy to hear them and would give unanimous leave for that action provided the adjournment stayed in the name of my honourable friend. I invite my honourable friends opposite to defend their position on this. I would be very happy to hear them, and I think I can assure them of unanimous consent on our side.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Their position is indefensible. That is the problem.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

PROGRESS OF URUGUAY ROUND—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on behalf of the Honourable Senator Olson, I give notice that on Wednesday next, September 30, 1992, he will call the attention of the Senate to the progress of the Uruguay Round of GATT negotiations that are currently under way in Geneva.

THE CONSTITUTION

METHOD OF PROMOTION OF REFERENDUM BY GOVERNMENT—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on behalf of the Honourable Senator Olson, I give notice that on Wednesday next, September 30, 1992, he will call the attention of the Senate to the biased method being used by the Government of Canada to promote the referendum.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—STATUS AND NATURE OF TEXT FOR REFERENDUM VOTE

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the Charlottetown consensus.

October 26 is the date on which the referendum is to be held. Canadians will be asked on that day to vote "yes" or "no" to the following question:

> Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?

As was pointed out in debate on both sides, the most practical problem in any referendum is to educate the public on what exactly it is they are being asked to vote upon. To do that, the educators themselves must know what the proposition is. That may be difficult because in this case the content of the agreement seems to be in a state of flux.

The agreement reached in August, for example, states that an elected Senate would have the power to ratify the appointment of the Governor of the Bank of Canada and other appointments made by the federal government. This point was raised, but not with this particularity, on another occasion this week.

However, according to an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of last Tuesday, the bureaucrats who are drafting the legal text have changed this provision. The article states:

> But the draft legal text dilutes that power, specifying only the power to ratify the appointment of the head of the central bank while Parliament "may provide" for Senate ratification of other appointments.

That is just one example of a change to the agreement apparently made in the draft legal text. Others include changes to Aboriginal self-government and the double majority provisions.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us, and Canadians who will be wanting to vote on October 26, will the agreement on which we will be voting be the agreement reached on August 28, 1992, or will it be the legal text written by bureaucrats, or will it be some other version?

If it is to be the latter, can the honourable senator tell us when there will be available a text that is sufficiently clear so that the people of Canada will know exactly on what it is they are voting? Second, will this text be available before October 26?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Charlottetown consensus itself is a clear enough statement of principles and intention, I think, for the Canadian people to make an informed judgment as to whether they wish to have the Constitution of Canada amended on that basis or not.

Draftsmen, lawyers and advisors to the federal government for 10 provinces, two territories and four Aboriginal organizations can scribble away between now and then, but Canadians will be asked to vote on the principles set out in the Charlottetown accord. Whatever scribbling the draftsmen and lawyers may do is, of course, ad referendum to the political leaders who came to the accord in the first place.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I cannot say that I consider that an answer, or that the people of Canada might consider it an answer. Let us analyze the situation.

Let us take a concrete example: The scribblings of the constitutional bureaucrats might, to them and apparently to the Leader of the Government, be just scribbling. Suppose, however, that I am someone in the West. I have been given the impression, if I have read any text at all, that the Senate probably will have the authority to ratify the head of the Wheat Board or some other regulatory body, perhaps, that deals with energy because the agreement specifically states the head of the bank and others.

Now it says it "may" be others. That might be just scribbling to some of us in Ontario, but it might not be scribbling to somebody in the West, for example. There may be other clauses. I take it from the answer, that it will be left at that?

In other words, anyone intending to vote on the referendum, and wishing to have an informed vote as to what, in this case, will be the powers of the Senate, must then be told that it was just scribbling.

Are you having difficulty hearing me?

Senator Murray: I can hear you very well. I was trying to find my copy of the Charlottetown consensus, but I do not seem to have it in front of me.

The intention of the political leaders who signed the Charlottetown accord seems to me to be very clear. It was to specify that the new Senate would have to ratify the appointment of the Governor of the Bank of Canada. That is the only appointment that they have agreed upon explicitly, and they decided to put that in the agreement. It is also their intention that the Constitution should be amended to provide the Senate with a new power to ratify other key appointments made by the federal government.

"The Senate should be obliged to deal with any proposed appointments within thirty sitting-days of the House of Commons", and so on and so forth. I think it is clear that there will be an amendment mentioning the Governor of the Bank of Canada, and at the same time, as the text says, providing the Senate with a new power to ratify other key appointments made by the federal government.

I am not sure from reading that whether those other appointments will be specified in the Constitution or whether, as the honourable senator suggests, it will be left to Parliament to decide what other appointments would have to be ratified. However, this matter will not be decided upon by the legal draftsmen, but rather, in due course, by the political leaders who have to bring the constitutional amendment into their legislatures and get it passed.

Senator Frith: Let us have it clear on the record what the wording is. It may be that the political leaders "have to do this" or "have to do that". However, in the meantime, citizens, assuming they have gone to the trouble of obtaining a copy of the Consensus Report, and we hope they will have, are being asked to say "yes" or "no" to a package that provides that an elected Senate would have the constitutional power to ratify the appointment of the Governor of the Bank of Canada "and other key appointments made by the federal government".

The word "and" is quite important there. Mr. Clark has touted this as a significant, and I think he said "real", power for the Senate. But the draft legal text dilutes that power, specifying only the power to ratify the appointment of the head of the central bank while Parliament "may" provide for others.

There is a difference between saying "Bank of Canada and other key appointments" and saying "Bank of Canada and Parliament may". It can be, and is, important to the citizen who is asking.

I made it clear in my speech, as did others, that it is very important for us to be as forthright, open, and detailed as we can in this historic referral to the people of this issue. I take it that nothing is going to happen between times to tell them that this is what will happen, that Parliament "may". Are we going to say to them: "When we, the political leaders, asked you to say "yes" or "no" to a package that provided for the appointment of the Governor of the Bank of Canada and others, it will not be that. It "may" apply to other appointments, if Parliament ratifies it."

I am not saying that that is a wrong result, but I think the people are entitled to know which it is, and this is only one example.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think the intention of the 11 first ministers, two territorial leaders and four, I think it was, aboriginal leaders is clear enough. They are putting to the people of Canada, in a referendum, a power for the Senate to ratify the appointment of the Governor of the Bank of Canada and certain other, as yet unspecified, federal government appointments. That is what they are asking the people of Canada to approve in the referendum.

Senator Frith: No, "maybe certain others" not "and". "And" is the present.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I said already, various draftsmen can scribble away, but the second paragraph of chapter 15 on page 6 of the Consensus Report says:

> The Constitution should also be amended to provide the Senate with a new power to ratify other —
> — and I say, as yet unspecified—
> — key appointments made by the federal government.

I think that is enough.

Senator Frith: I take it, then, the answer is that the people who want to know exactly what they are voting for, either "yes" or "no", will be told that that is what we are askinge, but that there may be some scribblings. It seems to me the scribblings in this case could make quite a change.

Another point I raised in my speech on this subject is the importance of not threatening or using scare tactics in our explanation to the people. I want the minister to respond to a step that is being taken—which I think is a wrong one—in the education of Canadians about this agreement.

In particular, I quote the Constitutional Affairs Minister, Mr. Clark. He said:

> When the (United Nations). . . looks at all other countries and says this is the best place in the world to live, we should take that seriously.
> And we should recognize that, once, Beirut was one of the best places in the world to live, and it gave in to anger—that so many of the things that we see on the news today used to be whole communities until they gave in to anger.
> That could happen here.

Now that seems to me to be a threat that a "no" vote could result in a civil war, or at least the kinds of things that we have seen happening in Lebanon.

Is this just an accident or is it the government's intention? That seems to me to be hiding behind a debate of fear, employing scare tactics at every opportunity and bringing up the possibility of a civil war. That is short of what I understood the Leader of the Government to mean, and certainly what I meant when I spoke of our obligation as political leaders to educate the people. I do not think that is the kind of education either he or I had in mind. Is it what he had in mind?

Senator Murray: During the debate I endorsed quite warmly what the Leader of the Opposition had to say in that regard. I continue to believe that our chances of winning this referendum are infinitely greater because our case is so much stronger when we put before Canadians the benefits of a "yes" vote.

As for Mr. Clark, the Leader of the Opposition perhaps has not seen statements attributed to him within the last 24 hours in which he said that he felt it was a misinterpretation of his remarks to suggest that violence and civil war would be the result of the rejection of this Charlottetown consensus.

He had made the point, however, that the recent and not so recent history of the world is tragically littered with cases of countries that were once strong and united but gave in to factionalism and division and were unable to maintain their unity, and that the result has been very disadvantageous to their peoples economically, socially, politically and with regard to the influence of those countries in the world.

However, he has elaborated on that statement within the past 24 hours and I saw a quotation to that effect in the Montreal press this morning.

RESULT OF REFERENDUM VOTE—RELATION TO ECONOMIC RECORD OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: This week in London, Ontario, my birthplace, the Prime Minister defended both the Charlottetown Consensus Report and the government's economic record. Will the Government of Canada consider a "yes" result of the vote on the referendum to be a vote of confidence in the government?

• (1420)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, let me welcome Senator Grafstein back to the Senate, having delivered himself of a speech apparently against the referendum and the referendum question and having declined to say whether he would vote "yes" or "no" in the October 26th referendum.

Senator Corbin: That is a very private matter! It is none of your business! It is time you learned some manners!

Senator Murray: It is a very public matter that the honourable senator did not show up for the vote. Honourable senators, Prime Minister Mulroney dealt with that matter in London, Ontario, also.

This referendum is a referendum on the Charlottetown consensus in respect of which we are glad to have the support, if not of the honourable senator, then at least of his leader, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, and of the Honourable Audrey McLaughlin, leader of the New Democratic Party, and of many others who dissociate themselves from other policies of this government. However, most of us are maintaining a strong common front in support of constitutional renewal on the basis of the Charlottetown consensus, and I hope that before the campaign is over, the honourable senator may see his way clear to join us.

Senator Grafstein: The fact remains that the Prime Minister, during the course of the referendum debate, defended the government's economic record. The only question I wish to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate is whether, in doing that in the course of a referendum debate, the Government of Canada, in the person of the Leader of the Government of Canada, is in fact seeking a vote of confidence from the Canadian public on its economic record? If the people of Canada, in any part of Canada, choose to reject the accord by voting "no", will the government consider that a vote of confidence for both the referendum and the government's economic record?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have answered the question.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIER OF QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, on Tuesday, September 15, Senator De Bané and I asked questions concerning certain alleged correspondence between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Quebec. The Leader of the Government in the Senate said that he had seen a copy of La Presse and that he therein read that La Presse had obtained copies of an exchange of correspondence between Prime Minister Mulroney and Premier Bourassa. He then went on to say:

> I would have to make inquiries as to whether there has been such an exchange of correspondence, after which I might then be in a position to answer the rest of the question as to whether the two governments think it appropriate to table that exchange of correspondence at this time.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is the one I asked some nine days ago: Was there such an exchange of correspondence? If there was such an exchange of correspondence, will the government table that correspondence at this time?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the short answer is "yes" to both questions. I saw the letters in question between the Prime Minister and Premier Bourassa. The Prime Minister is perfectly willing to have his part of the correspondence tabled. I do not have explicit permission from Quebec to do this, but I have reason to believe that they tabled their part of it this correspondence the National Assembly. So I must assume that they would have no objection to our doing so here, and I will do so as soon as I can get the copies together.

Senator Stewart: I thank the minister.

COST AND MEANS OF FINANCING REFERENDUM

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have another question. Is the Leader of the Government able to tell the Senate the government's calculation or estimate of the cost of conducting the constitutional referendum?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I am sorry, but I do not have those figures in my head. I would have to check, but there must be an estimate—I would think there would be. We would have to bring in a Supplementary Estimate—or something of the kind—for the Chief Electoral Officer, if it is not already covered in his budget.

• (1430)

Senator Stewart: To some extent the minister has anticipated my follow-up question, and that question is: To what vote in the appropriation acts enacted earlier this year will the cost of the constitutional referendum be charged? If no provision has already been made in the Estimates, why was an appropriation bill not brought in to cover this important expenditure before both houses adjourned for the duration of the referendum campaign, and is it the intention in the interim to finance the referendum by Governor General's Special Warrants?

Senator Murray: Good questions, honourable senators.

Senator Stewart: The implication being that there is no answer available at this time.

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—DEFINITION OF SUPPLY BILL—REFINEMENT OF DEFINITION IN SUBSEQUENT ACCORD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. When I spoke on the referendum bill, I raised the possibility that, because of the wording within the Charlottetown accord, it was possible that an appropriation rider could be added to what was otherwise an ordinary bill, thereby turning it into a supply bill under the definition of the act. Of course, if that happened and that bill were defeated in the Senate, it would not go to a joint sitting. All the Senate could do is give it a 30-calendar-day hoist.

The government leader has raised the point that the language of the Charlottetown accord is clear, and that therefore that sort of process could not occur because the definition of supply bills would be confined to budgets, major borrowing bills and the appropriation bills arising out of the Main or Supplementary Estimates.

The problem I have with that explanation is that a decision as to whether or not a bill is a supply bill is made by the originator of the bill, which in most cases would be the government, and the appeal is to the Speaker of the House of Commons, who may make the final decision, and who only has to consult with the Speaker of the Senate.

I believe that the result of a legal interpretation would be that the decision of the Speaker of the House of Commons would dispose of the matter and it would not be subject to further appeal or judicial reckoning. In that light, can the government leader tell us whether there will be a subsequent accord in respect of this matter, so that the definition of supply bills will be confined to that very narrow definition that he considers to be in the accord but which under legal interpretation, I am sure, is not in the accord—that is, that supply bills will only refer to budgets, the major borrowing bill and major appropriation bills arising out of the Main and Supplementary Estimates?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not know whether the further definition which obviously will be required here will be the subject of a federal-provincial, territorial, Aboriginal accord, and therefore be put in the Constitution, or whether it will be a matter for Parliament to decide under its own rules. However, I should like to read paragraph 13, page 6 of the Consensus Report, or at least the relevant part of the paragraph:

> Revenue and expenditure bills ("supply bills") should be defined as only those matters involving borrowing, the raising of revenue and appropriation as well as matters subordinate to these issues . . .

So far so good. Then there is this next sentence which I think is important because it gives an example of the sort of thing that the definition of supply bills should exclude:

> This definition should exclude fundamental policy changes to the tax system (such as the Goods and Services Tax and the National Energy Program).

So there would not seem to be any danger that by bringing in that kind of tax initiative, say under the heading of a budget or appropriation bill, a government could get away with having them defined as supply bills. The intent is very clear; that is, to narrow the definition of what constitutes a supply bill.

Senator Everett: I agree that it should not be the subject of a further accord between the provinces, the federal government and the Aboriginals, and that it is sufficient for the federal government to declare its intention in that regard.

However, as the government leader well knows, the definition of appropriation bills as we know them today includes a number of ordinary bills to which an appropriation rider is attached, and Royal Recommendation is received thereby. He would be right in his interpretation if there were not a further clause saying that the decision as to what is or is not a supply bill is made by the originator of the bill, with appeal for final decision only to the Speaker of the House of Commons.

I would certainly recognize that this government probably would not misuse that right, but I think it is important, so that at least we have a usage, that this government go on record as saying that the definition of "supply bill" is confined to those major matters so that it will not, in the hands of an aggressive government, be used to turn ordinary bills into supply bills, thereby changing the power of the Senate so that it could only handle what would otherwise be an ordinary bill on the basis of purely and simply a 30-calendar-day hoist.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I take it that the honourable senator agrees that that definition should not be part of the Constitution, but rather, that it should be for Parliament to decide. In that context I would take the honourable senator's point, and I will inquire as to what the state of the drafting on that particular item may be. If there is some further information that I can usefully and properly bring in here, I will do so.

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—DEFINITIONS OF FINANCIAL BILLS—RELATION TO POWERS OF SENATE

Hon. John B. Stewart: As a follow-up question, may I ask if it would not be true that the definition of an appropriation bill—or indeed of a tax bill which would make a fundamental policy change—relates directly to the powers of the Senate? Since the powers of the Senate are a matter of constitutional law, those definitions should be included in the constitutional law, rather than as matters subject to the rules of the House of Commons or left to the discretion of the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I appreciate that point, too, which is why I ducked the earlier question of whether this further definition will be put in the Constitution or whether it will be a matter for Parliament to decide. The honourable senator knows that the role of the present Senate is defined to some extent in the Constitution Act, 1867, but also in our own rules, procedures and conventions that have grown up over years.

Senator Frith: "Our" meaning the Senate, or including the House of Commons?

REFERENDUM QUESTION—REQUEST FOR COPY OF TREASURY BOARD MEMO

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I understand that a memo went out recently from the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Loiselle, regarding the participation of civil servants in the referendum debate and issuing warnings to them. Can the minister provide us with a copy of that memo?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall make inquiries.

UNITED NATIONS

PEACEKEEPING IN YUGOSLAVIA—EMERGENCY AID IN SOMALIA—COMPARISON OF CANADIAN CONTRIBUTIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, we heard on the news this week that the United Nations would like Canada to send an additional contingent of 1,200 men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces to the conflict area of former Yugoslavia. Has cabinet made a decision on that request?

• (1440)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): No, honourable senators.

Senator Corbin: Recently, with respect to that same conflict, the view was expressed that there is—and I do not belittle the fact—a hard winter awaiting the citizens of the area, and therefore an appeal was made for extra help.

In the southern hemisphere there is the situation in Somalia, where, it has been said, as many as 1 million people risk starvation and death.

Is the Canadian effort to relieve hunger in Somalia as eager as the Canadian effort to help abate the conflict in former Yugoslavia? I am not belittling either of the efforts, but it seems to me that we have been lying a little too low with respect to Somalia, in view of the very real need there. I think the need there is much greater than it is in the war-torn zone of former Yugoslavia. Besides, who are we Canadians? Europe has some of the richest nations in the world. Are they doing their fair share in trying to abate that conflict? Instead of sending additional troops to that zone, should we not be focusing on the plight of the approximately 1 million Somalis who risk death?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, perhaps my friend would permit me to go back to the first part of his question, relating to Yugoslavia. There has been no new decision taken by the government in this respect. There was a decision announced some time ago to send 1,200 additional troops to Bosnia. I think the honourable senator was aware of that, because it is a matter of public knowledge.

[Senator Murray.]

I may also say that 15 RCMP officers have been sent there to join 30 others who have been there since May. They will remain for eight months to work with local police forces to help the residents.

With regard to Somalia, we were among the very first countries to provide humanitarian aid. Further to that, we are at the forefront in providing troops in order to do what we can to ensure that the humanitarian aid gets through to the people for whom it is destined.

I can give the honourable senator the pertinent figures. Since January we have provided over $18 million in emergency aid; we have pledged our fullest support to the Secretary-General of the United Nations for U.N. efforts to bring the fighting to an end and to bring relief to famine victims; we are providing up to 750 Canadian forces troops to protect humanitarian operations in one of the four zones for U.N. operations in Somalia.

Of course, as I think the honourable senator knows, we have also provided refuge to more than 11,000 Somalis who have fled from the war in their country.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I wish to advise honourable senators that the time for Question Period has expired.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

AN ACT TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS IN RELATION TO PENSIONS

AND TO ENACT THE SPECIAL RETIREMENT ARRANGEMENTS ACT

AND THE PENSION BENEFITS DIVISION ACT

THIRD READING—DIVISION DEFERRED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Oliver, for the third reading of Bill C-55, to amend certain Acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, yesterday, after Senator Frith spoke, I adjourned the debate, with the cooperation of my colleagues, to examine the text of Senator Frith's comments in order that I might be able to reply with some assurance and comfort that I knew exactly what he had said.

I do not have a great deal to add to the comments made by Senator Teed at second reading of this bill; however, there are a few things that I should like to emphasize.

The bill was never intended to cure all of the problems, real or perceived, with the pension plans that are the federal government's responsibility. From the outset, the government has stated that the bill has two purposes: the first is to ensure that the federal pension plans comply with the rules of the Income Tax Act and the regulations as they apply to registered pension plans in Canada—so this bill is primarily a compliance bill; the second purpose of the bill is to deal with a number of long-standing fairness issues which affect the financial security and well-being of both active and retired plan members.

Some examples of this are as follows. Pension coverage has been introduced for part-time public service employees, many of whom are women who are trying to balance the demands of family and career. Also, the bill provides for an early retirement program for the operation of employees of Correctional Service Canada who work in a particularly stressful environment.

I should also like to mention the proposed changes to the leave-without-pay provisions for the public service, Canadian Forces and RCMP pension plans, as well as improvements to the life insurance coverage provided under the supplementary death benefit plans for the public service and the Canadian Forces.

Honourable senators, I believe that the Pension Benefits Division Act that would be enacted by Bill C-55 is an encouraging step toward the modernization of the public service pension plan. Pensions are viewed as family property in most, if not in all, provincial jurisdictions in Canada and the Pension Benefits Division Act would recognize this by permitting a plan member's pension credits to be divided on marriage breakdown.

Bill C-55, as senators are aware, was studied by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. At this point, I should like to express my thanks to the senators and witnesses who participated in that process. Witnesses voiced concerns that they wanted to bring to the committee's attention.

It seems to me, honourable senators, that criticism of the bill was mostly toward that which was not in the bill rather than that which the bill contained. The exception to this general pattern was the so-called regulatory nature of the bill, in particular the regulation-making authorities relating to tax compliance to which Senator Frith referred yesterday, which gave me pause and resulted in my delaying the third reading motion until this afternoon.

Several people, both in letters and in personal appearances, voiced concerns about the regulatory powers of the bill. Having read the "blues" and consulted yesterday with department officials and people in the minister's office, I find that these concerns are the very concerns that were raised in the committee and addressed by amendments that were approved by the House of Commons legislative committee. The amendments specifically limit the scope of regulations enacted to accomplish tax compliance to the requirements of the Income Tax Act and regulations as they stood on January 15, 1992.

They also state that no regulation made for tax compliance purposes may reduce any benefit, including indexing, accrued prior to the date the regulation is made.

A letter from Mr. Walsh, who is legislative counsel to the House of Commons committee, confirms that, and there was a press release of the Minister around mid-April which also reinforces that statement. The amendments made in the House of Commons, of course, clarified the government's position on this matter.

Some witnesses requested improvements to the survivor benefits that are provided under the public service pension plans, and some raised questions about the discretionary powers that the existing statutes confer on the Treasury Board in certain circumstances for the purposes of determining who shall receive the surviving spouse's pension.

This matter is dealt with in the report of the committee, and the committee very strongly urges that the department deal with this matter as quickly as possible. It seems to be a matter of basic fairness that the pro rata treatment of spousal benefits should be put into effect as soon as possible.

Indeed, it is not a matter that would cost the government or the pension plan more money, as was pointed out in the brief that was presented by the Committee for Spouses and Children's Pension Survival and Related Benefits. This should not cost more but less, as latter-day partners are known to be statistically younger with a longer anticipated mortality factor than the longer-term spouse. It would seem not only to be a matter of fairness but, in matters of proper management of the plans, this item should be dealt with as soon as possible.

There were other, more complicated matters that were raised that perhaps the Treasury Board may have to wait longer to enact, but I would urge them to deal more expeditiously with this and other items that are not matters of great cost, or matters that have not been investigated in terms of cost.

Other witnesses were heard who did not feel that the proposed Pension Benefits Division Act went far enough, although they conceded it was a step in the right direction. There were witnesses, too, who felt that the proper way to deal with the pension plan was through a joint employer-plan member pension management board. In light of the previous pension advisory board's consultation record, this seemed to make a great deal of sense to the committee. The previous advisory board, we were told, had not been consulted since 1986, and had not been involved at all in the recommendations that are enacted in this particular bill.

It would seem, however, that now the newly-appointed board will be involved in a far more comprehensive manner—they could hardly be involved in a less comprehensive manner—and they will be consulted on an ongoing basis. I think that might go a long way towards meeting the concerns of many of the groups that we listened to.

There is another concern, of course, and that is that small groups, people who are not represented by powerful groups such as the public service unions and so on, are not represented in person on the advisory board. Perhaps the ministry might consider a series of open meetings where representations could be made by these groups so their concerns could be heard during the compilation of further changes to the Pensions Act.

There were various private witnesses from whom we heard who had grave concerns. Several of their cases were very complicated indeed, and are deserving of a great deal of investigation and inquiry. Perhaps this might be a good subject for the National Finance committee to look at in terms of a study.

There was a particular witness, Mr. Lewis, who gave a most articulate and touching presentation on his own particular case. Then a Mr. Black spoke of the disabilities side. There was another gentlemen who felt that we should turn over the management of the pension funds to the individuals involved so that they themselves could make their own decisions as to how they wanted funds invested, whether they wanted to put them into RRSPs or into savings accounts or into whatever.

Some of these concepts were so far-reaching, new and outgoing that the committee felt this was not really the time to —

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): "Outgoing" in this case is not a synonym for "far out"?

Senator Doody: "Outgoing" in this case is exactly what it says. I appreciate the editorial effort, but I will not take the honourable senator up on it.

Let me conclude by saying that the minister and the officials have described this bill as being only the first step in the public service pension reform process. The minister has promised us that once this bill is passed, a comprehensive review of the fundamental elements of the public service pension plans will be conducted. We are hopeful that this will occur sooner rather than later.

With these few comments, honourable senators, I commend this bill to the Senate for passage and third reading.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Will the Honourable Senator accept a question or two?

Senator Doody: I will accept a question, but I cannot guarantee a reasonable answer.

Senator Gigantès: You said that in matters of indexing, a regulation affecting indexing cannot have retroactive effect. Is that what I understood?

Senator Doody: I do not know what you understood, but I think that is close to what I said, yes.

Senator Gigantès: Does that mean that a public servant who resigned on August 1 cannot have his future indexing affected?

Senator Doody: That is a technical question that I do not intend to get involved in.

Senator Gigantès: Surely it is important.

Senator Doody: Of course it is important.

Senator Gigantès: Someone who resigned several years ago cannot have increases in his pension due to indexing taken away from him. That is what you said, as I understood it. Can someone who retired before the regulation was instituted have his future indexing affected? It seems an important question to me.

I have another important question. Has there been any thought of letting the public servants whose indexing is being taken away start their own indexing fund? It is a very small amount of indexing that is actually affected by these changes. I believe it amounts to about 1.2 percent of the salaries that public servants are paid. What if existing public servants were to say, "Okay, we will take over the government's share of that contribution. We will pay it, and we will continue the indexing system at no cost to the public purse." Has such an alternative been considered?

Senator Doody: The whole indexing question is a hypothetical question that has not really been taken into consideration in the legislation. The question was raised as a possibility. It was dismissed by Mr. Walsh, the legislative counsel, as being impossible except through legislation, and that is where it remains. As to what might happen —

Senator Frith: That is overstating Mr. Walsh's opinion a little bit, senator. It was not exactly dismissed.

Senator Doody: I suppose I should have been wise enough to use the preamble of Senator Gigantès and say that in my opinion Mr. Walsh makes it quite clear that deindexing can only be done through legislation, that it cannot be done through amendments to the Income Tax Act or through amendments to this particular —

Senator Frith: In his second opinion, after they talked to him about his first opinion. That is when he started to tighten it down a little bit.

Senator Doody: Senator Frith can prefer to use the first letter, but I would prefer to use the second one. It has a later date. That is the opinion that I have before me, and that is the opinion that the minister has accepted, that the department has accepted, that the committee has accepted, and that I hope this Senate will accept on third reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: It was a bit like Groucho Marx's statement, "Those are my principles. If you don't like them, I have others." That was Mr. Walsh.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Oliver, that this bill be read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

• (1500)

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, pursuant to the Rules of the Senate, I move that the vote be deferred until Tuesday next at 5.30 p.m.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, do the rules provide for deferring the vote until next Tuesday?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The rule states, ". . . until the next sitting of the Senate . . .", which in this case is Tuesday.

Senator Frith: Except that the adjournment motion has not yet been passed.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes, it has.

Senator Frith: The motion that has been passed is that when we adjourn today, we shall adjourn until Tuesday, September 29, 1992 at two o'clock in the afternoon. The actual adjournment motion has not been made. You will make that at the end of the sitting.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No, I made the motion.

Senator Frith: No, you did not. The motion you made was that when we adjourn today, we shall adjourn to September 29. The adjournment motion is made when you stand up at the end of the sitting and say, "I move that the Senate do now adjourn." A motion stating that we are adjourning until —

Senator Murray: When we adjourn, or simply rise at 12 midnight, we will have adjourned.

CONTRAVENTIONS BILL

THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the third reading of Bill C-46, An Act respecting contraventions of federal enactments.
> And on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, that the Bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Committee for further study.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, I am sorry our friend Senator Bonnell, who presented this amendment yesterday, is not in his seat at the moment. I will have to oppose his amendment and to make some comments on it. Those comments, I think, will not be terribly contentious.

The amendment that Senator Bonnell proposed yesterday states, in part:

> . . . the Bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Committee for further study.

There is plenty of precedent for this kind of amendment at third reading, and thus the proposed amendment is perfectly in order. Having said that, however, I want to suggest to honourable senators that there is a sense in which the amendment proposed by Senator Bonnell is rather irregular.

In his brief remarks before proposing the amendment, Senator Bonnell explained that he wanted to send the bill back to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs so that the committee could consider inviting representatives of provincial and territorial governments to appear before that committee to give their views on the bill.

However, I find that this very matter had already been considered by the committee at its meeting of September 22 — indeed, on a motion put by Senator Bonnell -- and that the committee had rejected that motion.

Further, unless I am mistaken, the committee had unanimously agreed to report the bill without amendment. I therefore find it a bit irregular that Senator Bonnell would return to the charge again when the bill arrived here for third reading and attempt to send the bill back so that the committee could consider something that it had already considered and resolved at a previous meeting.

I underline this because the particular course that he wanted the committee to consider, that is, inviting representatives of territorial and provincial governments to appear before the committee to give their views on the bill, is covered in Appendix I of the Rules of the Senate, which states:

> That, whenever a bill or the subject-matter of a bill is being considered by a committee of the Senate in which, in the opinion of the committee, a province or territory has a special interest, alone or with other provinces or territories, then, as a general policy, the government of that province or territory or such other provinces or territories should, where practicable, be invited by the committee to make written or verbal representations to the committee, and any province or territory that replies in the affirmative should be given reasonable opportunity to do so.

Appendix I of the Rules of the Senate makes it quite clear that it is the opinion of the committee that determines the decision whether provincial and territorial governments should be contacted on a particular matter. As I say, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs had already expressed its opinion on that matter on Tuesday, September 22.

Senator Frith: In a report to the Senate?

Senator Murray: The report was on the bill itself. The bill was reported without amendment, but I am sure the minutes of the committee would show that Senator Bonnell had made a motion to have the provinces and territories contacted and invited if they wished to appear, and that the motion had failed in the committee.

Senator Frith: So it is your opinion that the Senate has no jurisdiction in this matter whatever, is it?

Senator Murray: That may be putting my opinion a bit more strongly than I would myself. However, I do find it a bit irregular, because the committee had already taken that decision.

In this regard, I refer to Beauchesne's Sixth Edition, Citation 822, which states:

> Procedural difficulties which arise in committees ought to be settled in the committee and not in the House.

Further to that, and just by way of discussing this practice of inviting representatives of provincial and territorial governments to appear before committees, when the Honourable Senator Molgat was chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, and that committee brought in this Appendix I back on May 28, 1985, the report stated, first, that the motion should not become a formal rule of the Senate but that it should be observed by committees of the Senate as a general practice.

When he was commenting on his report on May 30, 1985, Senator Molgat said, as reported at page 956 of the Debates of the Senate:

> To make this practice effective, of course, will be the responsibility of individual senators and particularly that of committee chairmen, who would be expected to look at all bills coming before their respective committees to see whether or not there are provincial or territorial considerations and, where applicable, to so notify the affected provincial and territorial governments and arrange for their appearance before the committee.

Honourable senators, as I say, I do not wish to make a federal case of all this, the committee having already decided the matter. However, I do not think it appropriate or useful to send the bill back to the committee to ask that committee to consider something that it has already considered and decided in the negative.

I have not had the opportunity to discuss the matter since yesterday with the chairman of the committee, Senator Nurgitz. It may be that as chairman of the committee he will want to make some comments additional to those that I have made. Since we have already agreed -- or certainly since we have an understanding — that we would probably dispose of the bill today or Tuesday, perhaps the best course for me would be to adjourn the debate in the name of Senator Nurgitz against the possibility that he might want to add something to what I have said.

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have no objection to having the debate adjourned in the name of Senator Nurgitz. I will have some comments to make at that time because I find myself in disagreement with Senator Murray's proposal that the Senate is a captive of its committees, that, the committee having made a decision, the Senate is then obligated to accept it and cannot send the matter back. I am, however, prepared to have the debate adjourned.

On another point, I do not think an agreement exists that this will be disposed of on Tuesday. It was proposed, and we will consider that, as I have brought the matter up with my caucus. I do not want any misunderstanding to the effect that I have made an agreement.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, for Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

AN ACT TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS IN RELATION TO PENSIONS

AND TO ENACT THE SPECIAL RETIREMENT ARRANGEMENTS ACT

AND THE PENSION BENEFITS DIVISION ACT

THIRD READING, ON DIVISION

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Oliver, for the third reading of Bill C-55, to amend certain Acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I may return to the matter of Bill C-55, I should like to make a small point with respect to the deferral to Tuesday. The rule book says that either Whip may request that the standing vote be deferred. I did not realize that my honourable friend the Deputy Leader of the Government was also the Whip of the government.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): I do stand corrected, honourable senators. I should have checked the rules first. Senator Doyle is the Acting Whip in the absence of Senator Kelly. Perhaps he could regularize the motion which I should not have made.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: I apologize for my dereliction and make the appropriate motion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): The rule says that the Whip may request—not move, but request. It does not refer to anyone other than the Whip. There is nowhere in the rules that says "Whip" shall include Acting Whip or someone acting on his or her behalf.

Do I understand that the Chair has made a ruling that the deferral of the vote on Bill C-55 was properly made under rule 68? The request was not made by the Whip and could not be made by either Whip because neither of them is here.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: There was no motion made on Bill C-55.

Senator Frith: There was a deferral of the vote, which was moved. That is not, however, a proper motion, because the rules do not say that such a vote can be deferred on motion. Rule 68 says it shall be deferred at the request of either Whip.

The deferral of the vote then is irregular unless made at the request of either Whip—an impossibility here because neither Whip is here.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, may I have a few minutes to confer with the officers of the Table?

Senator Molgat: I suggest that, rather than making a ruling under a very strict time schedule, it would be more advisable if you took the time and reported back at the next sitting.

I propose that because, under our rules, when a decision is rendered by the Speaker, it becomes a precedent; hence I do not think we should establish precedents on the spur of the moment. It will not change the situation whether you rule now or on Tuesday.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Rather than prolonging this debate, which I do not find very edifying, on the issue of whether we have Acting Whips or no Whips, I suggest we just move to the vote at this time. We withdraw our request to defer the vote.

Senator Frith: To clarify the record, we only need consent to withdraw the request for deferral. You have unanimous consent to withdraw that. That brings C-55 before us again. Please put the question, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the honourable Senator Oliver, that Bill C-55 be read the third time now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

Some Hon. Senators: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

JUSTICE

ELIMINATION OF RACISM

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella rose pursuant to notice of Monday, June 15, 1992:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to steps that can be taken for the elimination of racism and all forms of racial discrimination and the setting in place across Canada of a common standard of zero tolerance for racism under any of its ugly guises.

He said: Honourable senators, we use this inquiry to draw the attention of the Senate to steps which can be taken for the elimination of racism and all forms of racial discrimination and the setting in place across Canada of a common standard of zero tolerance for racism under any of its guises.

Racism is a contradiction to the Canadian adventure in this global community of our era. It is noteworthy that the common standard that we seek can be found in the Charlottetown Consensus Report, for on page 1, under the proposed Canada clause, we read that the Constitution of Canada will be interpreted by the courts, including the courts' interpretation of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, in a manner consistent with a number of fundamental characteristics. One of the fundamental characteristics is found in section (e) which states:

Here we have the articulated norm to be the guide, the light, in a reinforced, renewed fashion in our renewed Canada.

When I placed this inquiry on the Order Paper last spring before we recessed, I did not expect that events would unfold in the way they have—indeed to the extent that we would find the first ministers from across Canada, the leadership of the Aboriginal peoples and the leadership of our two territories binding together and articulating for us the kind of national norm which I believe needs to be set in place.

Canadians are also committed to the building of a strong Canada that reflects our cultural and racial diversity. That, too, is a constitutional guiding norm which the Charlottetown accord articulates for us. Therefore, in a very special and timely way, we have the Charlottetown constitutional accord upon which Canadians will be called to vote on October 26 as to whether or not to accept this vision of a renewed Canada.

In the renewing of any institution there is always a certain amount of fear, anticipation and reservation. The renewal, during the early sixties, of the Roman church, was met with great hesitation and fair anxiety. Indeed, they had their Monsignor Lefebvres, and we will have ours as we go through our renewal, our aggiornimento.

I believe, honourable senators, that we have here in the Canada clause a major achievement in the putting in place of a national norm. The courts will be guided by this norm in their interpretations of our entire Constitution, including the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which also articulates in section 15, clearly and directly, that all Canadians are equal before and under the law, irrespective of race. We also have section 27 which says that the courts are to be guided in the interpretation of our charter by our multicultural heritage.

However, the constitutional expression of the Canadian norm or value relating to the rejection of racism must find expression in the neighbourhoods of our great land. It must find expression on the street corners. It must find expression at the grass-roots level of Canadian society.

We have been witness, over the past several months, to far too many racist incidents: the desecration of Jewish tombstones, the spread of hate literature against minority groups, tensions in the workplace and difficulties in policing a culturally diverse society. These acts of racism run counter to the democratic values which Canadians not only hold dear but are now prepared to see expressed in the renewal of our Constitution.

Honourable senators, in order to give everyday expression to our rejection of racism it is necessary to take steps to combat racism at all levels of our society. The first step in the battle against racism is a frank acknowledgment of its existence in our communities. As parliamentarians from all parts of Canada, whether in the Senate or in the other place, each of us should use every opportunity to denounce the evils of racism.

Honourable senators, we know that the mere admission of the existence of racism in our midst is not enough. All sectors of our society must be activated in the attack on racism, and this can be prosecuted on at least three levels.

The first level is that of our self-perception. Canadians need to see themselves as a pluralistic group bound together not by the colour of their skin, but rather by their shared values and the challenge of nation building. Again, the articulation of that shared value in the Canada clause is a happy occurrence, in my judgment.

Honourable senators, in 1986, visible minorities in Canada accounted for 3 per cent of the population. Demographers tell us that by the turn of the century the number will be more like 13 per cent of the Canadian population. That is obviously a remarkable growth. The implications of this diversity —

Senator Frith: "Visible" means non-white, does it?

Senator Kinsella: Not non-white.

Senator Frith: It means not non-white?

Senator Kinsella: Exactly. As we walk the streets of Toronto today and reflect upon a few years back —

Senator Frith: Or better yet, ride the subway.

Senator Kinsella: Indeed.

Senator Simard: Stop mumbling, Senator Frith, please.

Senator Kinsella: We can look at this as an awesome, fearful experience, or we can see it as an exciting challenge for a metropolitan society. Our Constitution will express a value that says we are guided in a direction that will lead us to follow the route of the latter: an exciting challenge in a global community, a metropolitan society, the great Canada that shares orientations of peoples from all corners of the earth.

It is encouraging to learn, honourable senators, that a 1991 survey demonstrated that nine out of ten Canadians said that shared values are more important than differences in skin colour and that our shared values are important in bringing people together as a nation. Two-thirds of Canadians said, right off the top, that discrimination against non-whites is a problem in Canada. So in terms of self-perception, this awareness is growing.

The second level of action in the elimination of racism and the setting in place of zero tolerance for racism under any of its ugly frameworks is the need to build on the enacted human rights and anti-discrimination legislation that has been set in place over the past 20 years. Anti-discrimination legislation in the provinces and at the federal level was a major achievement of the late sixties, seventies and early eighties, but we must build on that infrastructure. We must build on the Canadian Multiculturalism Act, an act passed by this chamber a couple of years ago. We need to see the seed of growth that underlies the law, whether it be statutory or through jurisprudence. The norm and the value that the Canada clause will give as guidance to the courts will help in that growth.

Honourable senators, we must be proactive by increasing public awareness of the evil of racism through public education initiatives, helping institutions to become more open and to eliminate systemic discrimination. We must also be open to partnerships by supporting advocacy and being a partner with the many voluntary organizations and coalitions made up of Canadians who give so generously of their time in their communities.

Honourable senators, we must discover more about racism and how to combat it. We must take action against racism within government itself, working with all levels of government.

Canada became party to the International Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination and joined the world community by marking March 21st each year as the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. Those programs initiated by the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship to take place on and around the March 21st date in our own country must be encouraged. I would certainly encourage the continuance of the public education activities developed in the past few years and focused around March 21st.

The third level of practical action is to be prepared to deal effectively with any manifestation of racism. Honourable senators, it is disconcerting when we find it necessary—but on the other hand somewhat reassuring—to find voluntary groups across Canada prepared to be frank and open about what we are dealing with here. The League for Human Rights of B'Nai B'rith published a pamphlet called "Guidelines for Community Action: Responding to Anti-Semitism." It gives practical steps in the area of community liaison and legal and legislative activities. It draws the attention of Canadians to the dangers of standing back and accepting any manifestation of racism.

We are talking about zero tolerance for racism or anti-Semitism. If there are any acts of vandalism relating to a synagogue, school or cemetery, one should call the police and be quick to remove any of the graffiti and secure a local response. One should not tolerate harassing telephone calls; one should not ignore literature appearing in mailboxes that is racist and anti-semitic in thrust; and we should not stand by idly when groups gather to promote activities of this sort.

One area of front line action is in the field of policing. More and more we are realizing that policing minority relations must be continually worked on. Helpful in this regard is the recently opened Canadian Centre for Police Race Relations, where the centre's mandate is to promote positive relations between the police and members of Aboriginal and visible minority groups. It is to do this by assisting in the prevention of incidents characterized by racism or racial discrimination, and by encouraging more appropriate and effective police response to diversity.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform the honourable senator that his time has expired.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I suggest, honourable senators, that we give the honourable senator leave to continue.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Kinsella: In closing, I would emphasize that what we are speaking to here today, in our desire to set in place zero tolerance for racism in our country, is the responsibility of each and every Canadian. I close by underscoring the happy coincidence that the Charlottetown accord lends weight to our proposal that there be set in place a national norm for zero tolerance of racism.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: If no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, September 29, 1992, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, September 29, 1992

The Senate met at 2 p.m., Senator Gérald J. Comeau, Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

Prayers.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR

CLERK OF THE PARLIAMENTS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to present to you a distinguished visitor whom we are honoured to have serving at our Table today—Mr. Michael Wheeler-Booth, Clerk of the Parliaments of the United Kingdom.

Michael Addison John Wheeler-Booth was appointed Clerk of the Parliaments of the United Kingdom in 1991.

He was born on February 25, 1934, the son of Addison James Wheeler and Mary Angela Wheeler-Booth, née Blakeney-Booth. Mr. Wheeler-Booth was married in 1982 to Emily Frances Smith and has one son and two daughters.

Michael Wheeler-Booth was educated at Leighton Park School and attended Magdalen College, Oxford, where he obtained his M.A. His career with the House of Lords has been of longstanding. He entered as a clerk in the Parliament Office in 1960, was seconded as Private Secretary to the Leader of the House and Government Chief Whip in 1965, and was again seconded as Joint Secretary to the Inter-Party Conference on House of Lords Reform in 1967. He then served as Clerk of Journals from 1970 to 1974, and again from 1983 to 1990. He served as Chief Clerk of the Overseas and European Office in 1972, became Principal Clerk in 1978, served as Reading Clerk in 1983 and was appointed Clerk Assistant in 1988.

Honourable senators, please join me in welcoming Michael Wheeler-Booth.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, in the absence of the Government Leader in the Senate, Senator Murray, who is detained at a cabinet meeting, I wish to join in welcoming Mr. Wheeler-Booth, and tell him how delighted we are that he is with us here today.

I find it particularly interesting that Mr. Wheeler-Booth is here in this country at a time when we are actively discussing constitutional proposals which include many that touch upon the reform of the Senate, but none on the role or responsibility of our Table Officers. No doubt this is a tacit recognition that whatever the composition and responsibilities of a legislature, the stability and continuity provided by its key legislative officers must remain.

I know that we will benefit a great deal from his presence here, and I trust that the shared experiences will benefit him as well.

I would also add that we have the pleasure of having Mrs. Wheeler-Booth in the gallery, and although it is against the rules for me to recognize her, honourable senators, I hope I can make an exception and say that they are both welcome in this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I join my honourable colleague the Deputy Leader of the Government in extending a warm welcome to Mr. Wheeler-Booth, the Clerk of the Parliaments of the United Kingdom, and to Mrs. Wheeler-Booth, on behalf of myself and the Liberal Party.

I must point out, of course, that this is not the first visit to Canada by Mr. Wheeler-Booth. Indeed, he was a resident of Canada as a child and has some long-time connections with our country.

Mr. Wheeler-Booth will be visiting us for the week, during which time he will be sitting at the Table in the chamber as a visiting Clerk. As we can see, he is here in his full regalia. As some of us observe our own foreheads lengthening, we might conclude that it is suitable garb for others in this chamber.

This is the first occasion on which a visiting Clerk will sit at the Table in the Senate. In fact, it is the first time a visiting Clerk will have sat in either of our chambers, the House of Commons or the Senate. The House of Commons has never had a visiting Clerk. It seems to me that, once again, we in the Senate are in the forefront. We senators are not surprised at that, although our colleagues in the other place might be.

Our own Clerk, Gordon Barnhart, has sat at Tables in other legislatures as a visiting Clerk during various parliamentary visits. The provincial and territorial legislatures of the Northwest Territories, Yukon, Alberta and Saskatchewan have welcomed him at their Tables as a visiting Clerk. Governments in Zambia, Zimbabwe and Sri Lanka have welcomed him at the Tables in their chambers. On a trip to Great Britain, Mr. Barnhart sat at the Table in the House of Commons.

However, although this occasion is not entirely without precedent, this is the first time we have had a visiting Clerk sit at our Table in this chamber.

It is our hope, Mr. Wheeler-Booth, that you will enjoy your visit here.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the election clock is still ticking. If the government of which Senator Murray is a member respects democracy, Canadians will cast their ballots within 52 days. However, if, in the words of Senator Murray, the present government is cowardly and contemptuous of democracy, the day of reckoning remains 438 days away.

Perhaps this would be a good time to add a note that might be the subject of some further debate or question. Since the minimum election campaign period is 50 days, the government has already come close to showing contempt for Canadians by not dropping the writ. Even if the writ were dropped today, Canadians would not have an opportunity to vote until the middle of November.

It may well be that the cabinet is now discussing that very subject and so detaining Senator Murray. Perhaps he can tell us about that when he shakes himself loose from those other obligations.

TRANSPORT CANADA

CANADIAN COAST GUARD—STATION CLOSURES IN NEW BRUNSWICK AND NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise to make a statement mainly because the House of Commons is not sitting. I therefore think the Senate should take this opportunity to bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport the concerns of the people who work at the Letete Central Monitoring Station in Charlotte County, New Brunswick.

I am sure that in recent days a number of senators have received correspondence concerning this matter. In any case, I should like to put on the record the first few paragraphs of a statement which indicates the concerns of these Canadians about the decisions which are in the course of being taken with respect to their roles.

> The Canadian Coast Guard is again cutting services and jobs. This time the immediate targets are closure of the monitoring centers at Letete, N.B. (Carlton-Charlotte) and Cape Forchu, N.S. (South West Nova) —

I believe our honourable speaker knows where that is.

> — and the elimination of 8 full time lightkeeper positions. These centers monitor the unmanned lightstations in each area. This work is to be given to Saint John, N.B.
> Further unannounced cuts are planned. In Charlotte County, look for the unmanning of Gannet Rock and the long term shelving of the vessel traffic radar for the Fundy Isles area. On a wider scope, aids to navigation (buoys, etc.) will be reduced, as well as service to those aids remaining. Jobs and services are being cut while our local needs are increasing.
> This area has hundreds of fish cages —

These are cages in which fish are raised.

> — at dozens of fish farms [on the main land] and growing traffic by fishing and aquaculture interests. Heavy shipping is increasing through local channels as Eastport, Maine and Bayside, N.B. expand as ports. Tourism and recreational boating are both promoted and expanding. This is also a selected site for a federal marine park.
> With handicaps like high unemployment (16.8 per cent in July '92), how can local business and industry be developed if government departments dismantle the infrastructure which supports growth?
> It seems difficult to impossible to impress with Transport Canada just how severe an impact these station closures have in mostly rural areas. Hardly any person, service, business, or community organization is untouched when an area loses a manned light station.
> Repeated rounds of cuts and reviews have cleared all the deadwood. Any savings have been realized.

DAI AL-MUTLAQ

OPPOSITION TO PRIVATE BILL

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to know, and perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government could find out, what justification the Leader of the Government had in asking Senator Atkins to put forward a private bill accepting a petition from a non-citizen. The right to petition Parliament is reserved to Canadian citizens. Yet, the Honourable Senator Atkins presented to us a petition from the Dai al-Mutlaq, for Shiite sects in Bombay, from a man with a record which half his community considers criminal. He wrote and signed the petition in Bombay. It was given to a Tory lawyer; that Tory lawyer convinced the Leader of the Government in the Senate to give the petition to an obviously insufficiently informed, but good-hearted, senator, Senator Atkins, to present to us.

It is disgraceful to have such a petition from a foreigner —especially one with a bad public record, whom half his community abhors, and who is accused of horrible acts, including castration of those who disagree with him—- presented to this honourable chamber. Not only does he not deserve to have his petition heard, but he is not a Canadian citizen as the law provides.

BALANCE OF REPRESENTATION IN ALBERTA AND BRITISH COLUMBIA—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, October 1, 1992, I will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that Alberta and British Columbia are entitled to a better balance of representation in the revised Constitution than the Charlottetown Accord provides.

THE CONSTITUTION

NEED FOR EXTENSION OF TIME FOR REFORM AGREEMENT—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, October 1, 1992, I will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we need more time to reach an agreement on constitutional reform.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have some petitions similar to previous ones, reading in part, "The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your Petitioners in the certain assurance that your Honourable Senate will therefor provide a remedy."

The petitions then recite the details of the iniquitous goods and services tax and pray and call upon the senators, those that are true representatives of the people, to do everything possible to abolish the new goods and services tax, and demand a general election immediately.

The petitions are from the following locales in Canada: From Ontario; Larder Lake and New Liskeard; from Alberta, Donnelly, Fairview, Falher, Girouxville, Jean-Coté, Manning, Nampa and Valleyview.

The list of cities on petitions from New Brunswick includes Anse-Bleue, Bertrand, Burnsville, Caraquet, Grande-Anse, Le Goulet, Maisonette, Maltampec, Chatham, Connors, Moncton, Nelson, Newcastle, Paquetville, Pointe-Brulée, Pokemouche, Pokesudie, Red Bank , Shippagan, Six Roads, St. Basile, Ste Cecile, St. François, St. Isodore, Tracadie, Trudel and Village Blanchard.

Those from Quebec are from Danville, L'Avenir, Lac Simon, Melbourne, Richmond, Rouyn-Noranda, St. Felix, St. Nicephore, Ulverton and Val d'Or.

The numbers are as follows, honourable senators: From Alberta, 3 petitions with 69 signed names; from Quebec, 12 petitions with 150 names; from New Brunswick, 34 petitions with 684 names; and from Ontario, 2 petitions with 22 names. The totals: petitions, 14; names, 925.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 513 residents of Alberta who object to the goods and services tax.

Most of these petitions are from Pincher Creek, Calgary, Edmonton, Lethbridge, Two Hills and Long View.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 125 residents of British Columbia who object to the goods and services tax and especially its application to newspapers, periodicals and books.

Most of these petitions are from Vancouver, Victoria, Vernon, Nanaimo, Burnaby, Surrey and Richmond.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 275 residents of Ontario who object to the goods and services tax.

Most of these petitions are from Burlington, Owen Sound, Walkerton, Markdale, Waterloo, Kingston, Ottawa, Orléans, Cornwall, Orillia, Toronto, Pickering, Mississauga, Coldwater, Ajax and Welland.

Finally, honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 283 residents of Nova Scotia who object to the goods and services tax.

Most of these petitions are from Louisbourg, Sydney, New Waterford, Glace Bay, Reserve Mines, Dominion and Cleveland.

For the benefit of Senator Murray, whom I do not see here today, I would like to point out that these petitions were signed one month and twenty-one days ago on August 8, 1992.

I know he is interested in these details.

[English]

That makes a total of 1,196 Canadian citizens who feel that the more recent miseries in their lives are due to Mulroney's GST.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER—REFUSAL TO DEFER QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am sorry that the Leader of the Government is not here today. I have a question on the constitutional process relating to the absence of a text, and the presence of documentation indicating that the government has discussed the preparation of a text and the possibility of withholding that text until after the referendum. I want to ask him about that, but I should wait until he is here. I will give him that much notice.

I also have some questions about the Prime Minister's involvement in the Westray mine development in Nova Scotia, and some questions about NAFTA.

I would hope that when Senator Murray arrives, we will be able to revert to Question Period so that we can ask about those issues and get his response today, rather than having to settle for the Deputy Leader of the Government, understandably, being unable to answer questions or having to undertake to refer them to the Leader of the Government.

So I ask now: Will we have an opportunity to ask the Leader of the Government about those subjects later today when he arrives?

● (1420)

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is one Question Period during which questions are to be asked.

Senator Frith: That is what I thought; shut it all down and hide.

THE CONSTITUTION

BUDGET OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—BREAKDOWN OF EXPENDITURES

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I have a short question for the Deputy Leader, and I will ask it because it requires a small amount of research.

During the meetings of the special joint committee on the Constitution, there were five conferences. Senator Beaudoin recently submitted the final budget of the joint committee. On inquiry, I have been unable to obtain any information other than the fact that $8.96 million was allotted for the five conferences. I have been unable to obtain a breakdown of the nearly $9 million—as to how much was spent, whether it was more or less, or just how the money was dispersed. I would be interested in obtaining that information.

FUNDING OF REFERENDUM COMMITTEE—COST OF ADVERTISING

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to ask a further question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to the $20 million that the Government of Canada is spending on TV advertising. I asked a similar question the other day. The question, as recorded at page 2105 of Debates of the Senate was:

> Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, perhaps I may ask the Leader of the Government a question with respect to financial support for the so-called Yes Committee that was set up yesterday.
> Is any money being taken from the federal treasury, either directly or indirectly, to support that committee?

The Leader of the Government rose to his feet, and his answer was straight and simple: "No, honourable senators."

Honourable senators, an analysis was done by one of the TV networks with respect to advertising techniques, and involving some of the leading personalities in Canada. During that analysis, this very question was discussed. It seems that you can watch TV on both networks at almost any time of the day or night and you will see ads, paid for by the federal government, respecting many things. However, most of them are about unity in Canada, and indirectly refer to the constitutional debate that is going on right now.

The parties involved in the discussion all agreed that there was no ambiguity at all in these ads—not even slightly hinted; that all of them directly involved whether the viewer should vote one way or the other, and that most of them were for the "yes" vote. Here we have the minister answering a flat "no" to my question on that very point.

I then asked him one other question:

> Are there any PCO person-years allocated to that committee?

Senator Murray again said, "No, honourable senators." I would ask the deputy leader to enquire of the Leader of the Government, when he comes into the chamber later today or tomorrow, whether or not he would like to revise that answer a little bit. I do not need to draw a picture for him; he knows the consequences of misleading the house.

● (1430)

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): In reply to Senator Stollery, I certainly will make the necessary inquiries and hopefully come up with an answer that will satisfy him.

In reply to Senator Olson, I am satisfied with the government leader's answers and I see no need to pursue that topic with him any further.

Senator Olson: Well, I am not.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Perhaps the honourable senator should ask the leader directly.

Senator Olson: Will the deputy leader convey the notice to him? That is all I ask.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I am not going to be your spokesman.

THE ECONOMY

INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, on September 22, I asked Senator Murray a question about interest rates and the government's policy concerning them. As reported at page 2075 of Hansard, Senator Murray stated:

> I should say, by the way, that the latest information I had as I came in here today was that the dollar had rebounded quite considerably on international markets. I do not know whether the honourable senator had that up-to-date information when he arrived.

Then Senator Olson stated:

> No. It has been quite a few years since I got that sort of up-to-date information. For that information I am grateful to the honourable minister.

Since then the dollar has dropped even further. It is now down to slightly over 80 cents, whereas, at the time of my asking that question it was at approximately 81 cents. Do not misunderstand the question. I am not arguing about that. I make the argument that the dollar should find its own level based on economic factors and that the government and the Bank of Canada should not intercede, which disadvantages some of the people across this country.

However, I should like to ask him if he will give us a little better information than that, because later that week—in fact, on Thursday—the government did allow the Bank of Canada to intercede and to raise interest rates, with all of the consequences of that action; that picked the dollar up for a few hours, but it is now plunging. Is there any relationship between that and the fact that the Prime Minister is going about the country telling everyone that if we do not vote "yes" there will be dire consequences coming to Canada and its economy and the value of its dollar?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): These are all questions that the honourable senator wishes to address to Senator Murray. In the time I have been here I can count on the fingers of one hand the number of times that Senator Murray has missed Question Period. He does not miss Question Period on a whim; he misses it because he has a very important meeting elsewhere. I am sure he will be present tomorrow, Thursday, Friday, and next week, if need be. If the honourable senator will be a little patient, he can address those questions to him upon his return.

Senator Olson: In my view there is no higher priority for the Leader of the Government than being here when this house is in session, especially when the other place does not meet at all. Perhaps the honourable senator could also convey that message to him.

THE CONSTITUTION

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—INDIAN SELF-GOVERNMENT—PARAMOUNTCY OF INDIAN LAWS—AVAILABILITY OF LEGAL TEXTS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I too had some questions for the Leader of the Government. I will ask those questions, but first of all I will simply say that I am quite surprised and, frankly, disappointed that the deputy leader would not agree to defer Question Period until later in the day, which is a common practice here. Had he given us that assurance, I think everything would have worked much more smoothly. We understand that the leader has other obligations and cannot always be here. It seems to me that deferring Question Period would have been an easy answer to the problem; so I am disappointed.

I will put my question in order that the deputy leader can ask the leader to proceed to obtain the information.

My question has to do with an article in a Winnipeg newspaper of September 20. Apparently, Mr. Mercredi, the leader of the Assembly of First Nations, in speaking to a gathering of Manitoba chiefs, said that self-government, guaranteed under the deal, "means Indian law will come first." That is the statement of the press. However, there is a quotation on which I should like some clarification, because there are many questions as to exactly what self-government will mean and many Canadians want that matter clarified.

When speaking to the Manitoba Chiefs, Mr. Mercredi is quoted as saying:

> One of the powers you will have is to make laws to displace federal and provincial laws. There will be a paramountcy of Indian laws.

Could my honourable friend find out if that is true? I suppose this is another case in which the legal texts are very important. If we had them, we could verify whether that is exactly what the legal texts state.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will be very happy to find out for the honourable senator.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIER OF QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, on September 24 I had an exchange with the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning letters between the Prime Minister of Canada and Premier Bourassa. In his reply, Senator Murray stated:

> I do not have explicit permission from Quebec to do this,—

That is, to table the correspondence:

> — but I have reason to believe that they tabled their part of this correspondence in the National Assembly. So I must assume that they would have no objection to our doing so here, and I will do so as soon as I can get the copies together.

Have the copies been brought together, or is the correspondence so voluminous that five days did not suffice to achieve this end?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Obviously, I do not have the answer to that question either, but I will be happy to follow it up.

COST AND MEANS OF FINANCING REFERENDUM

Hon. John B. Stewart: I asked another question on that day. I asked the Leader of the Government to tell the Senate the government's calculation or estimate of the cost of conducting the constitutional referendum. Senator Murray commented, "Good questions." Flattered by that comment, I now ask the acting Leader of the Government in the Senate—if indeed anyone is acting on behalf of the government—will that information be available today or will we have to wait until tomorrow?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Same answer.

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—EXERCISE OF DEMOCRATIC RIGHTS—AVAILABILITY OF LEGAL TEXTS

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, the Secretary of State for External Affairs for Canada made what I thought was quite an appropriate speech at the U.N. in New York last week. I suppose one could call it her "state of the United Nations speech." She alluded to our Canadian context, and shortly I will quote from her statement.

I should like the government leadership to take good note of the words of the Honourable the Secretary of State for External Affairs for Canada. She said many good things; it was a good speech. I do not wish to deride it or belittle it in any way. It was in the good Canadian tradition. She said:

> We, in Canada, at this very moment, are engaged in our own process of rebuilding, rededication and renewal. In four weeks, millions of Canadians will exercise the ultimate democratic right by deciding through their votes whether to accept or reject a proposal for fundamental reform of our constitution.

She then went on to say:

> If accepted, and I have no doubt that it will be, this reform will build on the values and rights that are already a proud part of the Canadian reality. It will strengthen existing guarantees and protection for the rights of minorities, improve the functioning of our already highly regarded democratic institutions, bring greater social and economic justice to our native peoples, and reallocate fundamental roles and responsibilities between levels of governments.

She also said:

> I am confident that a strong majority of Canadians will support this reform because it is based on fundamental values to which every Canadian subscribes:
> unswerving respect for the rights of the individual, supported by the rule of law;.
> a strong and deep attachment to democracy, its values and institutions;

Then she said:

> As Canadians, we have learned that democracy and freedom can only be maintained by vision and constant vigilance.

With respect to this national exercise which we are going through, she entered into the wider debate of strife among and within nations. She said:

> The Secretary-General also made the important link between peace among nations and peace within nations when he pointed out that —
> . . . there is an obvious connection between democratic practices—such as the rule of law and transparency in decision making—and the achievement of true peace and security in any new and stable political order.

My question is the following: When will the government present the legal text of the Charlottetown consensus so that Canadians can properly exercise their God-given democratic rights?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that same question is being asked by many people, in and out of this chamber. I hope an answer to that question can be given, but the person now speaking is not the one who can answer that question today.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, there are many nuances to this same question. One is that the Deputy Premier of Alberta has said, and, I quote:

> Alberta will drop its support of the "yes" side of the constitutional referendum campaign if a full legal text is not available well before the October 26 date.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Who said that?

Senator Olson: The Honourable Jim Horsman, Deputy Leader of the Government.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: He is not the premier.

Senator Olson: He is not the representative of the government of Alberta? I wish you would say that out loud so that it will appear in Hansard. I would like to send him a copy.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Why don't you quote what Mr. Getty said?

Senator Olson: I heard what Mr. Getty said. Do you know what Mr. Getty is right now? He is a lame duck premier—"lame duck" being the operative words.

Senator Frith: Even then, Horsman was doing all the negotiating.

Senator Olson: I would like to add one other thing: Mr. Horsman says that having the full legal text available is an absolute necessity, and has rejected suggestions that the release of a partial text would be satisfactory.

Just in case you do not think that is enough, he goes a little farther. Mr. Horsman is pushing for the release of the legal text by October 1. That is only a couple of days away.

Mr. Horsman has already seen drafts of the legal text, and I think he thinks that the drafters of the text are fiddling with the agreement in writing the legal text. I will make a speech on that subject a little later on. Bureaucrats down here are fiddling with it.

We want to know from the Leader of the Government if he thinks Canadians are stupid enough to buy some "pig in a poke" while the government fiddles with the legal text. That is really what is going on, and I want to give you notice that I object to some of the things that are happening right now.

Will you carry that message to the Leader of the Government?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I would never dare improve on the answer that Senator Olson has given to his own question.

Senator Olson: I did not ask you that question, though. Thank you for that reply, but that was not the question. The question was whether you, as Deputy Leader, will convey that information to the Leader of the Government so that he can be prepared to give us a straight answer to that question.

Senator Frith: You got a smart-alec answer.

Senator Olson: We got a smart-alec answer, and we do not need any more of those. I am just asking you plainly: Will you convey the information accurately to the Leader of the Government, so that he knows to what question we want an answer?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I am sure the senator can convey the question himself to the Leader of the Government when he is in the house tomorrow for Question Period.

Senator Olson: He needs to know the contents of my question in advance, otherwise he will not be able to do all of the necessary research.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

REFUSAL TO DEFER QUESTION PERIOD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate; not for the leader, but for the deputy leader.

Earlier today, the deputy leader made the decision that there will be no reference back to Question Period. My question to him is: Was he told to say that by the Leader of the Government or somebody in higher authority, or did he make that decision himself?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): The answer is no.

Senator Bonnell: The answer is no? No, you did not make the decision yourself, or you were told to do so by a higher authority?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: All by myself.

Senator Bonnell: Were you told by the Leader of the Government or a higher authority, or did you make that decision yourself?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Having not had notice that deferral of Question Period would be requested, how could higher authorities tell me what to answer to a question they did not know would be asked?

Senator Bonnell: I have another question, then. My supplementary question, honourable senators, is this: I have sat in this chamber for approximately 21 years. In all of that time, governments of either stripe have asked to revert back to Presentation of Petitions, or Notices of Motions, or Notices of Inquiries. Each time, there was always unanimous consent from both side of the house. In all those 21 years, this is the first time that leave has been refused by the Leader of the Government in this house to refer back to an earlier order of business.

Since that decision was made today by the deputy leader rather than by the leader himself, will it be the policy of the deputy leader from now on that there will be no more referrals back?

If that is to be the case, I would remind the deputy leader that, on many occasions, such referrals have been made at the government's request, rather than that of the opposition. We can certainly say "no" in future, and hold up the whole business of this house if that is to be the policy.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Talk about red herrings! There is no policy of obstruction. The request was made as to whether we could defer the Question Period. My suggestion was that the Leader of the Government is not here today, and it is unlikely that he will be here today. None of these question are so pressing that they must be answered today. Therefore, we will have Question Period tomorrow, since we are sitting tomorrow, or at another time. Why do these questions suddenly become so crucial? From what I have heard, they are not questions at all but merely provocation, for the most part.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on that point, the matter is much more serious than the deputy leader supposes. He has refused a legitimate request from this side, by the Leader of the Opposition, to revert back to Question Period at a later time.

As my colleague just pointed out, every time that request has been made in the past, to my knowledge it has been acceded to by both sides. We have always been prepared to revert back. This time the deputy leader had decided that he would not give leave. That is, in our opinion, a regrettable step; one that does not assist in the management of this house, and one that I suppose I have to say we will keep in mind in the future.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

STATUS OF WORK OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I do not want to be provocative, but I am quite straightforward, believe me. I would ask the chairperson of the Standing Senate Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders what is happening with respect to the work schedule for that committee.

At our last meeting, we agreed to retain the services of a person—or words to that effect—who would come up with what I suppose we should call a redraft of the current Rules of the Senate.

● (1450)

I should like to know if that has taken place, as well as what progress is being made. Is it the intention of the chairperson to call a meeting of the committee soon?

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I would gladly call a meeting of the committee every week the Senate is not sitting, if a quorum could be achieved. However, my assessment of the membership of the committee is that the members would not come in for a meeting of the Rules Committee when the Senate is not sitting.

As soon as we resume our regular sittings, it is the intention of the committee to continue its work.

The Library of Parliament was able to place with the clerk of the committee a gentleman who is presently working with him in looking at the rules in order to bring forward recommendations for the committee when we meet.

As soon as I have additional information, honourable senators, I will circulate it to the members of the committee in anticipation of the debate that we will have. Before the next sitting of the Rules Committee there will be a meeting of the steering committee to consider other recommendations for the approval of the committee.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I thank the Honourable Senator Robertson for her answer, although, in my opinion, she was rather provocative, and possibly presumptuous in concluding too hastily that no senator on this side of the house would agree to attend a meeting of the committee when the Senate is not sitting. I, for one, am prepared, and ready on reasonable notice, to attend a meeting of the committee so long as it does not conflict with other current assignments of the Senate that I may have.

Senator Robertson: I thank the honourable senator. I certainly did not mean to suggest that no senator would come to a meeting of the committee. Perhaps I was in error, but I felt that it would be difficult to achieve a quorum if a meeting were called. However, I would be glad to call a meeting of the committee at any time, although I do not intend to call a meeting until after the referendum vote.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, for purposes of clarification could the chairperson of the committee clarify for me what she said in answer to Senator Corbin? She said that this employee is working with the clerk. Does she mean the clerk of the committee of which she is the chairperson or the Clerk of the Senate?

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, the person who has been assigned from the Library of Parliament is working with the clerk of the committee.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of Senator Robertson. She said in answer to Senator Bonnell that she does not plan for the committee to meet before the referendum vote because it would not be proper and because people will be away. Does she think that other committees of the Senate—for example, the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology—should wait to meet until after the vote on the referendum?

Senator Robertson: Honourable senator, no, I think not. The Rules Committee is not dealing with any legislation that the government is requesting. I believe if there is legislation before a committee then that is another matter. I have always felt that legislation is the first priority of any committee, although I am not sure I am correct in that assumption.

Certainly, if the committee had before it legislation that the government felt important for the work of government, then it would seem to me appropriate that the committee meet, work and dispense with such legislation as expeditiously as possible.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have responses to questions asked on September 16 by the Honourable Senator Frith regarding taxation of low-income earners, and on September 23 by the Honourable Senator Olson regarding the cost of crop losses.

REVENUE CANADA

TAXATION OF LOW-INCOME EARNERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

While I do not have enough information to comment specifically on the situation of the individual referred to by the Honourable senator, I would like to note that an elderly person earning $12,500 of income would normally pay $506 in federal tax and $255 in provincial tax. Of course, any special circumstances such as disability, pension income, or amounts transferred from a spouse, would serve to reduce this $761 tax burden further.

In more general terms, the government's tax reform initiative in 1988 reduced the overall tax burden for all income ranges. Moreover, the greatest beneficiaries of reform were those at the lower end of the income scale. One of the main principles that guided our reform initiative was that the tax system should be fair and should respect Canadian views of social justice. The system should be consistently progressive, imposing little or no burden on those least able to pay. This continues to guide us in our ongoing assessment of tax policy.

The government has followed a consistent economic and fiscal plan designed to restore its financial health. While our focus has been on the expenditure side of the budget to reduce the deficit and control the national debt, since 1988 some tax increases have also been necessary to assist in the deficit reduction effort. These increases have been instituted with attention to the same principles that were used to guide the tax reform initiatives.

We are now beginning to see the benefits of our economic and fiscal plan and are in a position to begin lowering the tax burden on Canadians. As the Minister of Finance announced in the February 25, 1992 budget, the personal income surtax will drop from 5 per cent of basic tax to 4 per cent on July 1, 1992 and again to 3 per cent on January 1, 1993. This will increase Canadian's after-tax income by $500 million in 1992/93 and by more than $1.2 billion per year thereafter.

The government continues to review and analyze its tax policy in the context of our overall economic and fiscal plan with the objective of reducing the tax burden and ensuring that it is shared in a fair and equitable manner.

AGRICULTURE

(Response to question raised by Hon. H.A. Olson on September 23, 1992)

In March 92, the Saskatchewan government was advised that changes to the 1991-92 GRIP would result in reduced coverage to farmers in low-yield situations.

The 1992-1993 GRIP in Saskatchewan did result in farmers receiving lower protection as a result of low-yield.

A $40 million offer has been made to Saskatchewan under a Yield Protection Plan. The offer provides additional assistance under GRIP to producers facing lower yields as a result of adverse growing conditions.

The offer of about $40 million is equal to the amount the federal government would have contributed had Saskatchewan not changed the 1991-92 GRIP design.

The offer has two conditions: 1) Saskatchewan must provide about $23 million; 2) Saskatchewan must work with the federal government and other provinces toward a future GRIP design that addresses the issue of low-yield protection and minimizes regional differences.

To date, Saskatchewan has not responded to the offer.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I wish to raise a slightly lighter matter, albeit still on a somewhat serious note. I rise on a point of order at this time.

I refer to some comments made last Thursday, September 24, by the Honourable Senators Frith and Molgat, having to do with the fact that my colleague Senator Hébert and I were not present. Both being Whips, somewhere along the line we found ourselves in difficulty. I wish to try to explain, because I believe I am primarily responsible for the fact that, in error, a motion was moved to defer the taking of a vote.

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

I think I might be excused for assuming, when I first read Senator Frith's intervention, that he was being mischievous. He has been mischievous from time to time. However, in rereading his intervention, he was perfectly correct. I suppose I was presumptuous in assuming that he would ever misread the rules.

To explain the situation from this side, when I accepted the responsibility of being a Whip, I recognized that no one is immortal, not even Whips, and I made arrangements with a fellow senator, Senator Doyle, to function in my absence. I advised my Leader of this fact and had his approval. What the Leader and I failed to do was to notify the Clerk of the Senate of this fact.

The appointment of a Whip does not have much ceremony. I believe in the case of Senator Hébert the Leader of the Opposition announced in the chamber that Senator Hébert would be the Whip. In my case, I believe the Clerk received a note from our Leader stating that I would be the Whip. I do not think the Leader saw fit to announce it. However, that did not hurt my feelings too much.

The fact is we did not take the step we should have taken last week. There will be cases when Senator Hébert and I cannot be here. In such instances, it seems to me, the respective leader should be able to stipulate to the Clerk who the Whip for the day should be; if he does so, then that person is indeed Whip. He is not Acting Whip, he is the Whip.

I think that would solve the problem and avoid situations such as developed last week.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

CONTRAVENTIONS BILL

THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the third reading of Bill C-46, respecting contraventions of federal enactments.

And on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, that the Bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Committee for further study.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a few brief comments to make.

I was absent on Thursday last when debate continued on the motion of Senator Bonnell to have this matter sent back to the committee. I have a few things to say, having been present and having chaired the committee.

What Senator Bonnell would like the committee to do it has done already. That is to say, it has considered the appendix to the rules which deals with giving notice to provincial jurisdictions that may be affected by legislation where it is advisable to give notice.

From the flavour of the debate, I take it that the committee considered that there had been an overwhelming amount of provincial consultation and, as a result, felt it was not necessary to give notice to the provinces in this instance.

In the presentation of Bill C-46, the sponsor, Senator Balfour, said, and I quote from page 1960 of the Debates of the Senate for September 9, 1992:

> In discussions between the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Kim Campbell, and her provincial and territorial colleagues, it was agreed that an inordinate amount of time is spent by prosecutors, court administrators and enforcement officers on the prosecution of minor regulatory offences, resulting in a waste of valuable resources, backlogs in the system, and an undue burden on the courts. This is not only inefficient, inconvenient and expensive, but inappropriate when dealing with less significant transgressions.

Honourable senators, there has been a Supreme Court ruling indicating that courts are not dealing as expeditiously as they ought with serious criminal offences. In fact, the Supreme Court ruling has had the effect of having serious crimes dismissed against accused persons because they were not dealt with as quickly as they ought to have been, in the view of the Supreme Court. This is partly a result of the clogged court system.

The officials gave evidence that this has been roughly an eight-year consultative process between the provinces and the Department of Justice. Without going into the long history of the matter, the short history is that in about April of 1991, as indicated by the departmental officials, the first meetings took place between the Department of Justice and officials of the Province of Ontario. That is only one province, but that was the start.

I should like to point out, honourable senators, that at the committee hearing it was pointed out to us that this is merely the adaptation of legislation that exists in every province. Every province has a ticketing procedure for Highway Traffic Act violations, and for minor offences under the liquor acts. This is the adaptation of that system with respect to breaches of federal law. It has been agreed by Senator Molgat in responding, and by others on the committee on both sides, that this is a step in the right direction.

However, the point I would make on consultation is that the officials have pointed to many meetings throughout the year 1991, and to a coordinating committee of senior officials that has been established with officials from the provinces, the territories and the Department of Justice to deal generally with matters relating to criminal justice, and specifically with this matter.

In fact, on the morning of December 9, 1991, the day that Bill C-46 was introduced in the House of Commons, a letter was sent by the Minister of Justice to every provincial and territorial Minister of Justice, informing them that the government was about to table the legislation on that day, and requesting comments. Following that letter, there were a series of meetings of deputy ministers, after which there was a conference on uniform law attended by officials from all of provinces and this legislation was the subject matter.

When all of this was being explained, Senator Bonnell gave it as his opinion that, in the last three or four years, the provincial ministers had been too busy on constitutional matters to be considering these matters; they would not have had time to do so.

Honourable senators, what is the point of all of this? Really, the point is that the committee did not see the need to have further hearings or to extend further invitations because already there have been so many consultations. The situation has now culminated in bilateral meetings. The officials of the Department of Justice have now been to the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario with a view to implementing this legislation, but that implementation goes further down the road than just the bill itself.

I should say that the provinces did express some concerns, and both of their major concerns resulted in amendments being made to the bill in the House of Commons legislative committee, which corrected the concerns of the provinces. I do not recall the details but, for instance, one change concerned judicial discretion in giving time to pay a fine.

Honourable senators, I suggest that there has been an overwhelming amount of consultation. We are adopting a provincial system. The minister wrote to her counterparts, all provincial and territorial ministers. Senior officials have met at various senior levels. That is the kind of consultation we look for, and that is the kind of consultation that we have already had.

For that reason, honourable senators, I think frankly that this motion is frivolous. The committee has already considered the matter and decided that it lacked merit and, indeed, defeated the suggestion that officials be invited. I should say that, in my view, the committee was unanimous that the bill be reported without amendment.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, if my colleague the chairman had not concluded by saying that this motion is frivolous, I may not have been tempted to speak.

Senator Nurgitz: Then I withdraw the comment.

Senator Stanbury: If it were a frivolous motion, then why would the chairman spend 15 or 20 minutes struggling to justify the actions of the committee? The fact is that the Senate committee has not consulted with the provincial governments of Canada on a bill regarding which the provincial governments have already expressed concerns. There is no doubt that my friend is right, that there have been attempts to satisfy those concerns, but we have nothing on record to say that the provincial governments are satisfied with the way in which those concerns have been addressed.

How can the Senate committee accept the protestations of the officials that they have consulted? We cannot delegate our consultation to other people. We need to find out for ourselves. Before we put the final seal of approval on this legislation, we need to find out whether the provinces have legitimate concerns about it which, if we knew about them, perhaps could be repaired.

A long time ago, we went to the trouble of putting together that appendix which indicates that this is the normal way in which the committees must act. What has happened, of course, is that there is pressure from the government to pass this legislation right now. This is after eight years of consideration! All this nonsense of having to pass it immediately without consulting the provinces—now, that is frivolous. That is a frivolous justification.

Honourable senators, it really is ridiculous not to send this matter back to the committee, in order to allow them the opportunity to consult with the provinces and to get their answers.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, perhaps His Honour should tell you that if I speak now, the debate will be closed.

Senator Doody: It always has that effect on me.

Senator Molgat: Because he always convinces you immediately.

Senator Bonnell: I know. Honourable senators, since Senator Doody is now convinced that I am right, I would like to say that this is not a frivolous motion. The chairman of the committee said that it had no merit, but it has much merit.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker Honourable senator, you may only speak once on an amendment.

Senator Bonnell: I am closing the debate.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: This is an amendment, senator. You are not closing a debate. You can only speak once on an amendment.

Senator Bonnell: It is a substantive motion and I can close the debate on a substantive motion.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: You may only speak once on an amendment.

Senator Bonnell: I can, however, ask questions of the chairman here all night. Let me ask you this —

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Under rule 38(1), any senator can only speak once on an amendment. Another speaker will have to speak now if the debate is to continue.

Senator Bonnell: If no one else wants to speak, I will ask the chairman a question.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: If no one else wishes to speak, I will now put the question.

Senator Bonnell: You mean we cannot ask the chairman a few questions?

[Senator Stanbury.]

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: No.

Senator Bonnell: At any time?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: We are on debate now, honourable senator. Either it is the question or further debate.

Senator Bonnell: I do not understand the new rules at all. You cannot ask a question of a committee chairman at any time in the Senate.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It was moved by the honourable Senator Nurgitz —

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, we are not passing this bill. I am sure there are other people around here who want to speak. I do not care for this attitude that you are going to shut off the debate.

An. Hon. Senator: Speak up.

Senator Olson: I do not intend to speak up. I think we will reorganize ourselves. If the Speaker is going intercede and prevent the members on this side of the house from asking questions of the chairman of the committee, then you have introduced some new rules and we are not ready to accept those new rules. We know that you went off to a committee by yourselves and made up a whole new package of rules, but at least you had the decency to bring them in here afterwards. Now you are introducing a new rule that people cannot ask questions, without even asking the Senate whether such a rule is acceptable or not.

Senator Barootes: You are quite welcome to make a speech.

Senator Olson: I am, eh?

Senator Barootes: On the amendment.

Senator Olson: On the amendment or the main motion. May I make a speech on both of them?

Senator Bonnell: You can adjourn this debate.

Senator Barootes: You will find a way.

Senator Olson: Maybe the best thing we could do, honourable senators, would be to adjourn this debate so that we can consider what the new rules are going to be.

Senator Nurgitz: That is frivolous.

Senator Olson: It is frivolous to deal seriously with a program that is going to throw out, forever, a social program in this country?

Senator Nurgitz: It has nothing to do with that.

Senator Olson: Why did you not explain that to me? I thought we were on Bill C-80.

Senator Nurgitz: Come in and join us.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, with respect to Bill C-46, it seems to me that this is a very poor time to be making even the slightest suggestion that we did not make the very last possible effort to consult the provinces.

The honourable Senator Bonnell has told us that this is an issue that has not been treated sufficiently. You may be sure that there are people in certain provinces, and particularly in mine, who will feel that they have not been sufficiently consulted. This is not the time for flexing federal muscles. We are trying to sell a constitutional accord in which we are allegedly being preferentially respectful of provincial rights.

Surely, this is not the time for the government in the Senate to refuse to consider the possibility that the provinces may want to be consulted some more. It must at least make the gesture as proof that what the government is saying, in trying sell the constitutional agreement, is what the government means, that this agreement is a process that shows more respect than heretofore for provincial governments.

We are told that it is a frivolous suggestion. Admittedly, Senator Nurgitz, who is a very nice man, withdrew the term, but it was a Freudian slip. People may say that in his heart of hearts, if that is what he uses to reason, or maybe his gut, the idea of consulting the provinces did not sit very well; it was not easily digestible; it caused a certain amount of heartburn; probably it heightened his blood pressure, lowered his blood sugar, gave him cold sweats at night, made him feverish, and put him in a mood of depression.

We know what a jolly, wonderful and pleasant man he is, and we all love him. Even during the great GST debate he was one on whom even I did not pour scorn. I used to single him out by saying that I did not mean him. And here he is now, in this circumstance, for reasons that are very difficult to understand, trying to play tough and not wanting to give the provinces one more chance to express their opinion on this issue, on which some provinces—certainly mine—might prove to be extremely sensitive about some kind of sneaky, back-handed, back-door, federal infringement of their jurisdictions.

Whatever the merits of the case and regardless of how Senator Nurgitz and the cabinet feel about it, appearances are important during this campaign for the hearts and minds of the people of Canada, which is being conducted on the basis that this is a better deal for each of them and for their regions, that this is a sweeter, gentler, kinder government than before and that the Constitution is going to make Ottawa a more pleasant pussycat.

Senator Barootes: You are out of order. You are just jawing and mouthing to kill time. Sit down and let us get on with the bill.

Senator Gigantès: Staff, my dear friend, have I ever heckled you? Have I ever said anything bad about you?

Senator Barootes: I disown you.

Senator Gigantès: Here we are, two senators of Greek descent, and you pick on me.

Senator Barootes: I will become a Macedonian in your eyes.

Senator Gigantès: We are probably related. I have relatives who came from the part of Turkey where you were born. You cross yourself. The good Lord is not going to forgive you for your intemperate attack.

Senator Barootes: Are his fifteen minutes up?

Senator Gigantès: When my fifteen minutes are up, the Speaker will get up and tell me. Meanwhile, you can listen. You have in the past put up with me for much longer periods than that. There was one occasion when you were here in three different shifts and heard me. So what is your problem? You do not really want your side to show generosity and understanding towards the provinces? This is what Senator Bonnell is asking for in his amendment. It is a legitimate amendment, made much more timely and much more important by the circumstances we are facing.

You need only read the headlines in the newspapers coming from all the provinces, even from yours. Your premier is a socialist member of the party that prevented you, Senator Barootes, from stopping medicare in this country, as you wanted to do. That is true. He will not deny it. He is proud of it even. He did not want the poor of this country to have free medical care. Now his premier is defending the deal, but there are people opposing it in his province, as in Alberta, and as in British Columbia. A lot of this opposition is based on the presumption by some that this is weakening Ottawa, and by some others that this is a power grab in some ways and a show of indifference towards regional sensibilities. This is what Senator Bonnell wants to avoid. He wants to avoid anyone being able to say that Ottawa, at this particular time, is showing a lack of regard for regional sensibilities.

It is very important as far as Quebec is concerned. Quebec is very touchy about this point, especially at a time when those advocating a "no" vote in Quebec say that Ottawa is totally indifferent to the wishes of their province, lacks respect, humiliates them and so on.

Accepting Senator Bonnell's amendment would be a small indication that you are prepared to show a little respect towards the provincial governments. What would you lose by doing that? Nothing at all! It is not so urgent. It is something you can accept even if it passed in the next session of Parliament. It would not change the fundamental character of the country. It would not stop your government from being defeated in the next election.

So why this stubbornness? My dear friend Senator Barootes (whom I like so much!) is shaking his head. He is shaking his head because he does not want to see that some things may not go exactly as he would want them to, that the way this fine country operates may not be the way he has in mind. I am talking about Bill C-46!

I would ask you, my dear colleagues opposite, to give on this point. It is not even a part of your party's basic program, which is to make the poor poorer and the rich richer! It has nothing to do with that. You can easily make this concession.

I do not see why you are so stubborn. It would give people the impression that you are prepared to be reasonable from time to time and not dogmatic as conservative parties usually are.

So why would you not give in on this point which is not central to your government's policy and your ideology? It has nothing to do with it. Be a little generous, a little patient, a little respectful and considerate of provincial governments, as Senator Bonnell asks you. You did not consult them. They did not come here.

You know my opinions. With all due respect to Senator Bolduc and the other former deputy ministers here who are an exception to the rule, I think that deputy ministers are a bad lot! They are dictators. Consulting some officials does not mean that you consulted those who really hold power in the provinces, who are and should be the politicians. What is it to say, as Senator Nurgitz said, that you spoke to some senior officials? Very often, senior officials do not inform their minister. Senior officials arrange things among themselves because it suits them. Perhaps it does not suit the people's elected representatives. I do not find acceptable the answer that we consulted because our senior officials spoke to their senior officials. When? At a golf game? Did they have lunch together at a parliamentary restaurant here or some restaurant in the Quebec legislature? Did you talk about it to the minister? What would you answer if someone told you that Ottawa was passing some legislation that would infringe even a little on Quebec's jurisdiction?

When this was mentioned in the Senate, when Senator Bonnell said to make sure again that you had fully consulted them, the answer was that it is frivolous. Is it frivolous to consult the provincial governments at this stage in our constitutional history? Really, I find that surprising, even bizarre. We are running risks that we should not run.

I will spare you the rest of the fifteen minutes alloted to me and sit down. Thank you.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I have a very short statement to make. Once again, my friend the Honourable Philippe Deane Gigantès has presented, in my opinion, the best testimony for the abolition of the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX ACT

CHILDREN'S SPECIAL ALLOWANCES ACT

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE SUSPENDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Spivak, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kinsella, for the second reading of Bill C-80, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, this bill belongs to a certain family of legislation—certain moves, one might say, not only by the government of Canada, but by several other Western governments—meant to deal with deficits by compressing consumption. This is not a partisan speech. It is an economic speech.

Since the middle seventies, when we were in power, this policy has tended towards trying to cure the economic problems of the Canadian economy, the British economy, the German economy, the French economy and the American economy by reducing the money that goes to those who have the highest average propensity to consume—in other words, the poor—and reducing, conversely, the taxes on the rich, those who have the lesser average propensity to consume.

The reasoning followed by central bankers and ministers of finance everywhere in the developed world was: "Okay, you have inflation; what causes inflation? People are buying too much. What do we do to stop people from buying too much? Well, we compress wages; we compress the money that goes to those in the lower reaches of the economy who buy too much. To get the economy stimulated, we will give the richer stretches of the economy more money to invest."

Now, honourable senators, a problem developed. It was not possible to identity this problem, except in hindsight. As you can see, I am being fair. I could not have foreseen it. Most economists did not foresee it. If you give people, who normally invest, more money by reducing their taxation and increasing incentives to invest, but demand has been compressed at the same time, those people would have to be economically backward if they did invest, because they would be investing in a plant to turn out more products when demand for those products was falling.

In retrospect, the eighteen to twenty years of statistics show that that is exactly what has happened. More money was put in the hands of the class that normally invests in new plant and equipment and creates jobs, and they did not invest in new plant and equipment because the demand was falling. What did they do with that extra money? We now know what they did with that extra money. They had to put it somewhere, and they put it into various things. One was real estate speculation. Another was the purchase of tangible assets, such as shares. Much more—in many ways more destructively—was put into money market funds.

Every two and a half days, the amount of money traded on money markets equals $1 trillion. That means that every one and a half days, the amount of money traded on money markets by these people, whose taxes were reduced so that they would have more money to invest, exceeds the total amount of world trade. Therefore we have not been getting the stimulus to the economy that supply-side economists said we would get, and because we have not been getting this stimulus, the amount of money or the amount of wealth generated in the country that the government could tax has fallen and, therefore, deficits have increased. In addition, because there was no job creation, the number of unemployed has grown.

There were blips. The unemployment rate would go down every now and then, but generally, in all the western countries after each recession, big or small, we never returned to the employment highs of before. Unemployment has been climbing steadily, unevenly but steadily, which means that the costs of unemployment—welfare—have been rising, which means of course that there has been a further fall in the ability of governments to balance their budgets and that deficits have been growing, which has made money markets much more vulnerable to turmoil as the rich—to whom we gave more money to invest, and who invested in money market funds—are trying to shift the money in anticipation of which currencies they can play with so as to increase their own wealth.

These same people, of course, said to themselves that globalization was not a bad thing. They started investing in other countries. Harpers gave an excellent example about Nike shoes. Nike closed its plant in the United States and moved its operation to South Korea. The people thus thrown out of work in the United States could no longer buy Nike shoes. After a little while, the workers in South Korea organized, formed a union and asked for more money, so Nike closed its plant in South Korea and moved its operation to Indonesia, where a worker receives $37.14 a month producing Nike shoes, and $37.14 a month will not buy you a pair of Nike shoes. Therefore Nike are selling fewer shoes here and fewer in South Korea, but they are getting by to some extent because they are making more profit by lowering their wage bill. Meanwhile, back here in their home country, so to speak, unemployment grows.

There is another aspect. These firms that are investing in money market funds, in stocks and shares around the world and also indulging in globalization, have to face an input of information so varied and so difficult to handle that they have been hiring—and this is documented by statistics which I have—more and more accountants, tax lawyers and planners, none of whom produce anything. They are overhead. Further, these people use electronic equipment which quickly goes out of fashion or becomes obsolete within a shorter and shorter span of time. Consequently, succeeding generations of the equipment required by all of these bean counters comes more and more frequently onto the market, with the result that they never have the time to amortize their original equipment before they have to buy new equipment. In consequence, overhead grows.

Profits coming in, however, do not grow. The amount of product produced here is less because consumption is less, and therefore productivity goes down. This is one explanation of productivity that has not been given before but was put forward this past weekend in New York at Bard College by a Canadian economist.

It is very difficult to continue in that way because what it shows, believe it or not, is that Keynes was right; if you want to break a downward spiral, you have to stimulate consumption. In other words, you have to create jobs at home—infrastructure jobs, social service jobs, anything. That is where you go in order to get the economy rising again. If you go in on the supply side, on the investment side, the people whose taxes you have reduced and to whom you have paid incentives will use that money, as I have told you, on foreign money markets. They will use it to invest in Indonesia but they will not use it to invest here, and consequently the economy of Canada, the United States, Britain, France or Germany will decline. This is what we are facing in the western world today.

What I object to in this bill is that it is in line with this policy of hitting at consumption by reducing the amount of money that goes to certain people. Child allowance is an example. The amount of this kind of help to the poor has been steadily reduced in standard dollars after inflation, and therefore consumption has been reduced. In the face of low consumption there will not be investment, and therefore investment will not create the jobs, jobs, jobs that we are always talking about.

Senator Hébert: Nobody listens when you talk about the poor. Talk about the rich and they will listen.

Senator Gigantès: The rich are all right. In the big corporation, if you look at the situation of the people in the positions numbering from one to ten, you will notice that they are doing better all the time. However, even those globalized corporations are now firing middle managers in order to keep themselves, and to be able to afford more bean counters and more lawyers. If you are operating in 22 different countries as a multinational, all of them with different regulations and taxes, you will have an enormous amount of overhead.

Therefore, honourable senators, it is no use continuing with the policy that favors the rich from a tax point of view and that cuts allowances for the poor, who consume and create demand, because the rich do not put their money here. If I were rich, I would not do so, either. It makes more sense to play the money market funds and invest in Indonesia, if I am the head of a company and care about my money.

However, we as a house of the Parliament of Canada, and this government and ours, which will come next, should look at what is happening to this country. The way to start this country up once more, it has been proven, is by increasing consumption.

● (1540)

However, honourable senators, a bill like this further decreases consumption. It gives a little more to the working poor, but the benefits of that have been negatived by all of the other measures, such as the taking away of universality. For example, the family allowance has been taken away from those who have the highest marginal propensity to consume, and has been given to those who have the lowest marginal propensity to consume. In consequence, we are in a recession from which we do not seem to be able to emerge.

It is not just this country; the same is true for France and Belgium. After a while, Japan adopted those policies under American pressure and now it is also in a terrible state.

We have to realize that we can no longer continue with the same policies that put the world into the Great Depression. That is exactly what was being done then: Cut taxes and cut out government spending. Consumption fell, investment did not occur, and stagnation and deflation raged. That is what we are facing.

This bill reflects the whole policy of this government and of other governments in the western world. I oppose this bill because it is part and parcel of a policy that has not worked. The figures are now in; supply-side economics have proven to be a failure in this country and in the United States. In the United States this has been camouflaged because of great military spending, but that is now being reduced and the U.S. is going into a deeper recession than before.

I beg you, honourable senators, change this policy for the sake of the country and for your own sakes. You will also do better , even the rich among you will do better, if you go back to thinking in terms of consumption; in other words, of demand rather than supply. This bill is an anti-demand, anti-consumption bill, and therefore, we should oppose it.

Debate suspended.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL

September 29, 1992

Mr. Speaker,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Beverly McLachlin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in her capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 29th day of September, 1992, at 5:00 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,

ANTHONY P. SMYTH
Deputy Secretary,
Policy, Program and Protocol

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate

Ottawa

INCOME TAX ACT
CHILDREN'S SPECIAL ALLOWANCES ACT
FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE RESUMED

On the order:

Resuming the debates on the motion of the Honourable Senator Spivak, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kinsella, for the second reading of Bill C-80, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, after listening carefully to the speeches of Senators Spivak, Hébert, Frith and Thériault, I realized that Bill C-80 was another in a long line of measures designed to reduce the impact of social programs and to reinforce the Conservative government's rhetoric as we approach the next election. I apologize for referring to Senator Spivak in her absence, but in fact, she had a difficult case to argue. I wonder whether she was a little embarrassed at having to repeat, not the arguments of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Mr. Benoît Bouchard, as one would have normally expected, but those of the flunky of the Department of Finance, Mr. McDermid, Minister of State (Finance and Privatization).

Senator Hébert's tight and irrefutable reasoning clearly demonstrated the impact of this legislation and especially its role in a long series of attacks against the social policy we are proud of on this side of this Chamber.

In the early fifties, I taught school in a rural community where women have always had very few opportunities to earn a little money. I can assure you that not many have become bank presidents. This was at a time when medical and dental services were still very average. Public schools offered only the strict minimum of extra-curricular activities, like music. Mothers who received very little money other than family allowance really looked forward to this monthly cheque. In most cases, necessities like shoes and clothing were purchased. In some cases, a mother might be able to set aside a little money to help develop a child's talent for music or painting, for instance.

[English]

The universality of family allowances was an acknowledged reality. With time, it was understood that above the basic allowance more money might be needed for the children who lived in poverty or on the borderline.

My colleague in government at the time, the honourable Monique Bégin, supported by the present leader of the Liberal party, Mr. Chrétien, brought forward the child tax credit which gave mothers and other guardians of children some considerable help for those who could not improve their own lot; that is, the deprived children. Yet the principle of universality was preserved. Madam Bégin would sometimes remind us that mothers and children do not have a lobbying organization comparable to that of senior citizens. Children do not vote and their voices are not heard, at least not in government circles. This government has eroded the concept of universality in Bill C-80 as it attempted to do with the senior citizens' social measures until Madam Denis took on the Prime Minister on the lawns of Parliament Hill.

In his speech, Senator Hébert demolished the claim of the Minister of Finance and his surrogates in this house. He stated:

> The Minister of Finance maintains that Bill C-80 will raise federal child benefits by $400 million per year or $2.1 billion over five years. The minister seems to forget that his government took more than $3.5 million out of the child benefits system between 1986 and 1991. In other words, families in need will not receive a penny more.

Senator Frith gave an historical perspective of the different legislation to help families in the protection and development of their children.

• (1550)

In fact, he gave some credit to the Borden Unionist government of 1918.

Others, rightly so, have spoken of the contribution of our good friend, the late Honourable Paul Martin.

The Liberal social policy critic in the House of Commons, Mr. David Walker, as reported on page 13221 of their Hansard, told the House about an excerpt of the Honourable Paul Martin's book A Very Public Life. It describes a discussion on social measures in the mid-1940s between Mr. Martin and the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Ilsley. I quote a few lines from the Hansard of the House of Commons at page 13221. "Mr. Ilsley," says Mr. Martin:

> ... honestly felt that the government could not afford these measures and that some of them should be undertaken by the family, the church or the provinces. Ilsley kept asking me: "Why do you want to saddle us with these things?"

Mr. Martin says:

> My answer was: "Because of my liberalism".

There is another document I would like to recall. In 1919, there was a leadership convention for the Liberal party of Canada. One candidate offered the delegates a long list of policy proposals, some of which reflected the young man's interest in labour matters. Thus, he proposed some progressive steps. Two of the measures that were proposed then—and this was 1919 —were the abolition of child labour and the imposition of such limitations on the labour of young persons as would permit the continuation of their education and assure their proper physical development; and the principle—and this one is still a matter of discussion—the principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value.

The quotation that I am interested in that that young candidate for the leadership of our party presented at that convention, and which relates to the subject matter of this bill, is the following:

> That in so far as may be practicable, having regard for Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability, which would include old age pensions, widows' pensions, and maternity benefits, should be instituted by the Federal Government in conjunction with the Governments of the several provinces ...

The man who proposed these policies in 1919 and repeated them in the federal election of 1921 was William Lyon Mackenzie King, the longest serving Prime Minister of Canada.

Senator Martin's discussions about the 1945 period were obviously influenced by the document of 1919. In fact, pieces of major social legislation, like CMHC creation, the Technical School Federal Assistance Program, which, in a province like mine, New Brunswick, meant the opening of high schools, especially technical departments in rural areas, were a great source of progress even before the then Premier Louis Robichaud's program of equal opportunity.

May I remind you that in 1945 the then young Colonel David Croll sat in the federal Liberal caucus of Mr. King, and I am sure that he was pushing for the benefits that we are discussing today. In fact, I suspect if he were here today, he would oppose this bill with the same eloquence with which he protected so many of our social programs in this house, in his caucus, and everywhere else.

Fellow senators, with your permission, I should like to make one last remark. The NDP and its predecessor the CCF have always claimed credit for all of the social legislation adopted by this country. In 1919, when Mackenzie King was proposing what I have read in the excerpt from Canadian Party Platforms as a program for the leadership which he then used again for his election in 1919, the Regina Manifesto was still 12 years away. Mr. Woodsworth first came to the House of Commons in 1924. In fact, in 1919, the CCF was not even an abstract thought.

MOTION TO ADJOURN DEBATE NEGATIVED

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is the only major piece of government legislation that we have before us, Bill C-46 having been adjourned until the next sitting. I am wondering why we cannot continue with the debate. It is only 10 minutes to 4.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Let's hear from your side.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Our side has spoken through Senator Spivak. She made a very eloquent and detailed analysis of the bill.

Senator Frith: Is there nobody else in favour of it over there?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Everyone is in favour of it, but no one intends to speak on it at this stage.

Senator Frith: Nobody wants to defend it?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It can be defended at committee, and it can be defended at third reading. We are only at the second reading stage.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That is the principal stage.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is the principle stage, that is correct. The principles are being discussed. I understand there are speakers on the other side who wish to speak to them. We are not even close to the adjournment hour, so I suggest that we continue the debate.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, if that is the attitude of the government house leader, I suppose he knows what he will have to do about it. I can tell him that I have a few things to say about this iniquitous piece of legislation that is going to deprive a lot of people of programs that have become part of our whole tradition, particularly family allowances. It is going to repeal that act completely. Therefore, it takes a little time to do all the research that is necessary to try to persuade members of the Senate opposite that they should not do this. I am asking for a little more time. I heard some speeches today —

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Is this your speech?

Senator Olson: No, I am just making an argument that we need a little more time to put together —

Senator Barootes: You already had all of Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of last week.

Senator Frith: They'll tell you when to make the speeches. They'll tell you when you should be ready. They'll tell you when you should speak, but won't get into the debate themselves. They'll just sit there and tell you how you should do it. They don't know what debate is.

Senator Olson: I want to tell you this, honourable senators: I have quietly and politely sat here. Now I would like to make some comments. Some of my colleagues would, too.

Senator Frith: We spoke on the bill every day the Senate was sitting, and they did not. Now they propose to sit there and tell us how we should conduct our business.

Why don't you get involved in the debate instead of yapping like that?

Senator Olson: I want to say again that there are some things I would like to say. Some of my colleagues, too, will have some very important things to say about this matter. This is something that has been on the books since —

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

Senator Barootes: Sit down.

Senator Olson: We have changed the rules again. Senator Barootes decides when I am ready to make a speech.

Senator Frith: Get his permission as to when you should speak. He will tell you when you are allowed to speak. You may speak when it suits him.

Senator Olson: If that is what you are going to do, let's find out. I am just telling you that I, and indeed several of my colleagues, have some speeches to make, and there is a little more research we need to do. That is why I asked that the debate be adjourned.

• (1600)

Honourable senators, I ask again: Let us adjourn this debate now. We might even have to adjourn it again tomorrow.

Senator Barootes: No. No adjournment.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I am surprised that Senator Olson says he needs more time. He must be reminded, if he has forgotten, that this government policy was announced in the budget of February, 1992.

Senator Olson: I did not know what the arguments were until now.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If Senator Olson is deciding only today that he needs to gather up the arguments on a policy that was announced months ago, and which was the subject of extensive consultations by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, that is not the problem of the government.

That having been said, our friends opposite know that this bill, should it pass, would go into effect on January 1, 1993.

Senator Frith: What do you mean it has to be? Did God tell you it has to be then, or did you decide?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The bill, if passed as is —

Senator Frith: "If".

Senator Lynch-Staunton: —is to go into effect on January 1, 1993. That is in the bill. For this to be done, because of the major changes which it will bring about —

Senator Frith: So Senator Olson should speak on September 30, 1992.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: —recipients, current recipients, future recipients and those whose benefits may or may not change for better or worse, must be alerted ahead of time. That is something that requires an information period that could take up to two months.

Senator Frith: Sorry, it is inconvenient for the government to debate, Senator Olson.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Therefore, as the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has been informed on a number of occasions, in order to allow this information period to take place, the bill, should it pass, must receive Royal Assent before the end of October. Therefore, on a number of occasions we have asked for agreement on having a debate at this stage, which is second reading, in order to send the bill to committee no later than Friday, in order to give the committee plenty of time to hold hearings and —

Senator Frith: What does the government consider is plenty of time? Will it tell us when we are allowed to go to committee?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The government does not determine the committee's schedule.

As I was saying, this must be done for the bill to come back in good time in order for the house to study the committee's report and to vote on third reading by the end of this month at the latest.

Senator Hébert: By the end of this month?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes, by the end of this month.

That has been the priority of the government, and that has been brought to the attention of the other side. I had hoped that by raising the matter today, we could get some reaction as to whether the opposition is willing to abide by this schedule.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to say something to honourable senators opposite, and in particular to Senators Barootes and Lynch-Staunton. There happens to be one or two other matters before the people of Canada that are pretty important. There is this referendum which is really doing a job on Western Canada. I have spent a lot of time on that matter. As a matter of fact, I spent all morning on it.

I want honourable senators to know that I spent a few days in Geneva and in London trying to find out whether or not there was any hope or any light at the end of the tunnel respecting the international grain market, which is such a disaster for the prairie region of Western Canada. It is unbelievable how bad it is. I have great sympathy for the fishing industry because, for another set of reasons, it is in approximately the same economic situation as are the prairies, and apparently, asking questions in this chamber will not get one any satisfactory answers at all.

I do not know if the government of the day, which is responsible for the economy, has done anything about the international grain market situation. However, I, too, have a report to make on that matter before long. There are some hopeful signs. But because of the fact that this government had not taken any of the actions that were necessary, I went over there to see for myself just what the situation was.

I hope that the deputy leader understands that this piece of legislation he is rushing through this chamber is a major piece of legislation. He expects everyone to say, "Aye, aye, sir," but they have a few other things to do.

Therefore, I ask once more that honourable senators accommodate us and several other senators by adjourning the debate today so that we will have a little more time to give this bill the kind of attention that it needs.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I think the government has been extremely accommodating to date. Senator Gigantès just reminded honourable senators that he adjourned the debate last Wednesday until the following Tuesday, which is today. Senator Murray, who was in the chamber then, said, "If you feel this item is so important and that so many people want to get involved in the debate, we can sit this evening, Thursday, Friday and Monday." The reply from the other side was, "No, we are not ready. We have a lot of speakers who are not ready."

Senator Olson: That is legislation by exhaustion.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: And we are told again today that no one is ready.

Senator Frith: What do you mean "no one"? We have had two speakers on this bill today. What do you mean no one is ready? You have had none. What are you talking about?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We do not have any speakers at this stage. The bill is only at second reading.

Senator Frith: We have had two speakers, so don't talk about us not being ready.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You have no more speakers ready to speak today?

Senator Frith: Not enough, no. How many more would you like? How many more would the government allow us to have?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You may have as many as you wish. We can sit this evening. We can sit tomorrow morning, tomorrow afternoon and tomorrow evening, if we are all in agreement.

Senator Frith: At your schedule, in other words?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No.

Senator Frith: A senator is telling you he will be ready to speak on the bill tomorrow, but the government will not permit it.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Inasmuch as Senator Olson wants us to be accommodating, which we are and have been, I am asking the opposition to be understanding of the schedule which we are trying to meet in regard to implementing the necessary measures to have this bill go into effect in January of 1993, which requires its disposition at second reading by the end of this week. I am still waiting for a reply.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I am not speaking to the bill. I am speaking to the point raised by my honourable friend.

I am surprised to hear the Deputy Leader of the Government say that we have to abide by a schedule. Since when is Parliament limited to a schedule? That may be what the government wants. That may be what the minister wants. However, the minister does not determine the schedule in this place, nor should he determine it in the House of Commons. He is only able to do so in the House of Commons is because of that massive majority under the thumb of the Prime Minister. That is not democracy. This place certainly does not operate by a schedule.

If the Deputy Leader of the Government thinks I will propose to our group that we abide by a schedule, then he better have another think on what democracy is all about, and on how this house operates. That is not the way it works.

It is true that the Deputy Leader of the Government told me that the government wants this bill passed by October 30. That is what the minister wants. That is what the government wants. That does not mean that that is what the Canadian public wants.

We are talking about the government's schedule. You are not government. This house is not government. The government is the cabinet—not the House of Commons, and not this house. We will not be subjected to a schedule. That is not the way the system works.

My honourable friend said that that is what he wanted. I told him that we had many speakers who wanted to be involved in the debate. Frankly, I am disappointed that there has been no response from the government side. Every time the bill has been called since it was introduced for second reading, we have had at least one speaker every day on this side. We had two today and three the other day, and yet you say we are not quite prepared to debate.

Senator Barootes: You had none on Thursday.

Senator Molgat: Senator Barootes is prepared to sit and yack. Is he prepared to defend the bill? No, he has said not a word. There has been not a substantive word from the man. There has been just his constant yapping like a rat terrier, instead of enough conviction on the issue to get up and debate it.

When you say to us that we are not prepared to debate, I say we are prepared to debate. However, we would like to know from your people where they stand on this major issue.

Let us be clear about this: The greatest difference between the views of the Conservative Party and that of the Liberals is with respect to the question of the social standards in this country, the whole question of the social fabric.

Senator Barootes: Now you are speaking to the bill.

Senator Molgat: We know where we stand on this matter. We believe in a good social charter. We will defend that charter and fight for it. That is what we are doing here. We will not be subjected to any kind of arbitrary rule as to when we can speak.

Having said that, we have other speakers who will continue the debate. When they are finished, there will be others.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Do I understand, then, that the opposition can give no indication as to when this debate can come to an end so that those responsible for the implementation of this legislation, should it pass, can have enough time to get the machinery in motion to have it implemented in time? Is this what I am hearing?

Senator Molgat: You are hearing quite clearly that we will not abide by any arbitrary schedule set by you, or set by the government. We are prepared to debate and we will continue to debate. We have speakers who are prepared to debate this bill every day of this week, and perhaps even next week for all I know. I cannot speak for every one of my colleagues. They are free to do as they want. I do not exercise any control over them as to when they wish to speak. I can assure you that we have further speakers and that we will continue this debate.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: I wish to rise on this motion. That, however, does not preclude me from speaking on the bill later on.

Next year, I will have been in Parliament for 25 years. I have seen a gradual erosion of the right to speak, the right to state their views and opinions of the members of Parliament in both houses. The latest attempt to curtail, to erode that right to speak was the introduction of the so-called new rules in the Senate, which some of our people consider to be unconstitutional.

The government is complaining because we will not put up more than two speakers today. I intend to speak on this bill; however, my research is not quite completed.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Corbin: It is funny. I worked on the other side of this building for 16 years and some months, and rarely if ever did we push the opposition to limit the time it needed to put its views across. Debates would last for days and weeks. We did not fool around with the democratic right to speak of members who were sent to the House of Commons to do just that; to express the views of their electorate.

Here in the Senate, we used to have a reasonable amount of time to make a speech. That has now been reduced to 15 minutes, except for the leaders of the parties. I, for one, find myself constrained in that respect, first of all because I am a slow speaker, as you can all observe. I do not believe in rushing through a text just to say, "Well, it is on the record. Good night, and have fun, boys and girls."

As has been said, we are dealing here with what has been recognized as fundamental social legislation. In the past we have had many delegations from around the world come to the Canadian Parliament to sit down with us and study what we were doing in the way of child benefits, family benefits, health benefits, or hospital benefits.

How many such delegations do we see these days? Very few indeed. Because those programs for which Canada was renowned have been, and continue to be, subjected to constant erosion to the point where they become, in my opinion, practically insignificant. They certainly do not reflect the type of social justice that was one of the major considerations at their birth.

I do not take kindly to pressures on the part of the Deputy Leader of the Government in suggesting that we put up all our speakers today, tonight, tomorrow morning, and get on with the job of sending the bill to the committee.

We on this side do not have the benefit of the government's bureaucracy to do our research and write our speeches. We have to do it with the limited resources which the Senate finally came around to giving us a few years ago. The whole process entails a great deal of work, because a senator is accountable for whatever he or she says in this house and can be challenged on his or her statements. Proper research does take time.

We have already heard from a discontented public with respect to this legislation, even after its passage in the House of Commons. I received documents — we all have—as recently as last Friday on this matter. Senators are expected to do a proper job of arguing the fundamentals of the legislation at second reading and, certainly, to take whatever time is required to hear out public concerns.

Now the government has an agenda. They would like to have a nice little package wrapped in blue ribbon in time for Christmas.

Senator Olson: Some Christmas!

Senator Stanbury: What a present!

Senator Corbin: The Canadian public ought to be wary of Christmas-giving by Tory governmentse, because very few people in this country know what is about to hit them. They will find out in due course.

And also in due course, they will ask us in this chamber, because we will still be around here. I am forecasting that we will still be around here in 16 or 18 months. They will point to the Senate and ask us, why didn't you people do a proper job? The bill was pressured through the House of Commons. There was very little debate. The minister hardly participated in the debate. The white paper had been brought down with the infamous Mazankowski budget. What a context in which to bring change to social legislationt!

Of course, government supporters in the House of Commons were told last summer, "Look, everybody is on vacation. We are celebrating the 125th anniversary of the birth of Canada, of Confederation. Get on with your work in the committee. Do not make too much noise in committee, and hurry up and report." That is how the bill got through the system without sufficient opportunity for the public to participate. There was certainly not sufficient notice for the public to prepare themselves adequately, in spite of the fact that those who did show up before the committee, I thought, performed rather well under extremely trying circumstances.

My speech is here in this folder. I will not give it to you today because there are one or two matters I want to check out. I expect you people over there to respect my democratic right to speak when I want to speak, if I want to speak, and to say what I want. It is bad enough that you have limited me to 15 minutes. Do not force me to speak when I do not want.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It is moved by the honourable Senator Olson, seconded by the honourable Senator Stanbury, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Senator Kelly: We would request a 20-minute bell.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the honourable Senator Olson, seconded by the honourable Senator Stanbury, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion of Senator Olson negatived on the following division:

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, pursuant to the provisions of Rule 49(2), I move, seconded by Senator Beaulieu, that the original question be now put.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Corbin: Never!

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I am not ready to speak to this motion. That is just as true now as it was 30 minutes ago. therefore, I yield the floor to my deskmate, who has graciously agreed to speak on the motion.

However, while we have the Leader of the Government here, could we revert to Question Period in order to get some answers to the questions asked earlier today?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is a motion on the floor, of course, but I regret that I cannot give leave to revert to the period of Oral Questions.

Senator Frith: You should look more convincing about how much you regret it.

Senator Murray: Well, I do regret it. Honourable senators know that I attend for Oral Questions virtually every day. I am not able to do so today because of other commitments, but I will certainly do my utmost to be here tomorrow.

Senator Olson: We will look forward to seeing you then.

Senator Stewart: A headless government!

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, there is a long history of federal governments working to eradicate poverty in Canada. Unfortunately, that history has been characterized by frustration. No government has been able to offer a comprehensive solution to stop the scourge of poverty dead in its tracks. Nevertheless, for many years there was—and I stress "was"—a comprehensive effort to control, if not solve, the plague of poverty. Perhaps the approach to poverty was piecemeal, but at least the work was constant and few doubted the commitment.

Many of those involved in finding solutions have given extraordinary amounts of energy and imagination, such as our late colleagues, the Honourable David Croll and the Right Honourable Paul Martin. I applaud them for their work and their patience; without them I shudder to think where we would be today. I also shudder when I realize how far we have regressed in our mission in the last eight years under Conservative leadership. I am distressed that we have not done more to maintain their legacies and the legacies of the policies they helped engender.

Today, honourable senators, we continue an innocuous little debate on Bill C-80—innocuous in the sense that the government will pay it no attention. As a matter of fact, the members on the government side will not even participate in the debate.

Bill C-80, by the way, is not at all innocuous itself, despite the picture the government has tried to paint at every opportunity. This bill proposes a further backslide in our established social infrastructure that has served us so well; it does nothing to take us forward—there is no serious attempt to confront child poverty in Canada as demanded by the Honourable Lorna Marsden's tremendous report on child poverty written by the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology just one short year ago. No, in fact all this bill signals is the unabated continuation of an eight-year regression in social policy engendered by Conservative philosophies which frankly have no soul.

I know that my leader and whip have already addressed themselves to the process by which this bill has reached the Senate, but I feel I must add to their words and express my concern. I will not bore you with a diatribe about the nature and function of a parliamentary democracy, but I will tell you that the abuse with this bill has been flagrant. This bill, as with others before it, was introduced to Parliament with a deadline for passage. The other place was given this bill just before summer adjournment, and the members have been forced through time allocation to deal with every aspect of the bill on the fast track.

You have had eight years to dream up this legislation, but still you introduce it with haste and expect its equally hasty passage through Parliament. This modus operandi has become far too commonplace and, especially with this bill, it is totally unacceptable and offensive.

After bullying this bill through the other place—the chamber of this Parliament to which the public pays some attention

—the Government Leader in the Senate has graciously said that he would allow an exhaustive study of the bill in the Senate. Of course, his government insists that this study take place at a time when parliamentarians were told by the Prime Minister to go to their constituencies to campaign for Canada in the referendum, and, more important, when the national media are entirely preoccupied with that same referendum. And still Senator Murray limits the length of time for consideration. He says that the Social Affairs Committee can deal with the bill 24 hours a day, if it wishes. But can the committee wait until potential witnesses have had an opportunity to prepare adequately? No. Can the committee take the time to organize meetings outside Ottawa, as Senator Thériault suggested last week? Again, no. Will the government consider any worthy amendments that the committee may suggest, stemming from its analysis and the testimony of witnesses? No. Honourable senators, this is a parliamentary farce. This is an embarrassment to the legislative institutions.

Perhaps someone more cynical than I would go so far as to say that this bill is on the fast track because, one, the government wants to avoid debate of a bad policy; two, the government wants to pass the bill before the media discover the issues; and, three,—and this is really cynical—because the government is going into an election year, and it knows that the much larger monthly payments will come into effect and overlap with the old system in the early months of 1993, when the last of the 1992 tax-refund payments and the first of the larger monthly child benefit payments will both be made—just as Canadians head for the polls. No wonder Canadians are losing faith in their institutions of government, and specifically this government, to such an alarming degree.

Nevertheless, let me move on to the debate of the substance of Bill C-80. I have had an opportunity to hear or read much of the debate that has already taken place here last week. Much of the discussion has been illuminating, and even provocative in some instances. In her remarks introducing the bill last week, Senator Spivak—who I am sorry is not here today—attempted to defend the government's move to rob family allowance of its universality, saying that the current system is not universal any more anyway. She said, and I quote from page 2079 of the Debates of the Senate:

> Surely a system which has taxed back the benefit from the personal incomes of higher income families since 1974 is universal in appearance only, because, since it is taxable, it is selective in its real effect.

I can appreciate the senator's point of view, and she may theoretically be correct in her statement, but I do not share her view of the family allowances' "real effect". I know that the senator is personally quite sincere in her concern for the less-privileged and the position of women in our society, so she will perhaps excuse me for mentioning that there is a further point she failed to address.

There are essentially three things that universality accomplishes that are quite separate from the simple sending out of cheques to every mother. The first is that the family allowance is a recognition of the cost of raising a family. A couple with children face many more expenses than a couple without children. The family allowance has been a visible and prominent recognition of this reality to Canadian parents. The whole idea of family allowances was to recognize the added strain of child-rearing on all families regardless of class or status. It provided a separate supplement that a mother could use to feed and clothe her children, or set aside for their education. It had nothing to do with the tax system. The parents continued to pay taxes based on their overall income but their children were not penalized because of their parents' class or status. It sent a message to parents that the government understands the extra burdens, and although the monthly cheque does not bridge the gap between income and expenses, it is an important and appreciated acknowledgement.

The second point has nothing to do with the bottom line, but everything to do with practical effect. At present, the family allowance cheque is mailed to every mother, regardless of her family's means. Bill C-80 would introduce a means test to the equation to determine who gets the benefits. I understand the simple logic that those who can afford to live without the help should not get it, and I can understand the extension of that logic—that if they are getting the benefits taxed back, then why go to the trouble of giving it to them in the first place—but there is more to it than that.

I am not sure that I can adequately convey the idea, but when you send the cheque to everyone, you are treating everyone equally, or at least giving that appearance to the recipient. However, when you send the cheque out to only those with meagre means, there is a monthly reminder of the inadequacy of those means. There is almost a condescension. Stemming from that can be a sense of embarrassment or even shame that I, as a recipient, am getting a hand-out every month.

There is a third point to which I want to draw your attention, and especially Senator Spivak's attention. Again, it may be a subtle argument and therefore difficult for me to articulate, but still, I think it is important. As all senators know, the family allowance cheque is made payable to the mother. Certainly, where a family's means allow them to receive the cheque, the cheque will continue to be made out to the mother. However, we should realize that in every household where families no longer receive the benefits, the mother will lose an independent source of income. You may say that if the family does not need the money, then that means that the mother does not need the money. Unfortunately, that is not always the case.

The unfortunate reality is that there are too many situations where the husband controls all of the family income except for that one monthly cheque, and if that cheque is gone, so is that small but hugely important amount of independence for women and their children. There are cases where that cheque is desperately needed in a household for necessities for children, and mothers need that money because the overall family income that the government uses to judge the needs of the children does not match the reality. In a home where the husband is domineering and indeed abusive, it is quite likely that he is not about to make up the difference in a monthly allowance to his wife.

Marcelle Dolment, of the Réseau d'action et d'information pour les femmes, told the legislative committee in the other place:

> It is (in)conceivable that a government is prepared to deprive mothers at home of family allowances, the only amount of money to which they have access, and children of the only safety net that protects them, not only in (low-income) families, but also in families (of reasonable means) with problems where one parent is at the mercy of the other.
> Family income is very misleading. Indeed, just because family income is decent or even high does not mean that the mother and children have what they need, when the mother has no income. There are fathers who earn a great deal but who deprive their families. This behaviour is found as well in low-income families. For these women, family allowance is a life-saving buoy.

I know it is sad, but it is also reality. Those cheques are not only important in poor families. I admit that I do not have statistics for you to prove these assertions. All I have is anecdotal evidence that I have no reason to doubt. Although I cannot tell you exactly how many, I know there are many women who will be adversely affected by the changes suggested in this bill.

Just one final note on the universality question. I noted with some interest an innocuous little exchange between Senator Murray and Senator Frith last week while debating this bill. While Senator Thériault was delivering his speech on the bill, Senator Murray interrupted, asking Senator Thériault—this is on page 2091 of Hansard, September 22—whether he thought senators should receive family allowance benefits. After five more intrusions by Senator Murray, Senator Frith responded by asking Senator Murray whether he thought senators should receive medicare. Senator Murray quickly said that medicare is a totally different thing, but offered no real response. No doubt that is because the only logical response, given the government's policy on universality as shown through Bill C-80 and as argued by Senator Murray, would be that no senators should receive medicare.

Senator Frith: Therefore, medicare should not be available to everyone.

Senator Stanbury: If those who are well off do not need family allowance, then do they need medicare? Why not make it accessible only to those who can not afford it? That is the very clear message Senator Murray has articulated.

Senator Frith: It is the "President Bush" formula.

Senator Stanbury: I do not see how you can have it both ways. Why does the government not do the honest thing and tell Canadians straight out that their Conservative philosophy will eventually lead to the end of universal health care in this country?

[Senator Stanbury.]

Senator Baootes: Rubbish.

Senator Molgat: Why don't you get up and debate?

Senator Stanbury: I look forward to Senator Baootes' formal rebuttal.

Of course, there are other concerns about the legislation beyond the resultant death of the system's universality. During the brief meetings of the legislative committee in the other place—even with the short time allowed for preparation—many other criticisms were focused on the bill. These criticisms include the following points: Assistance to the poorest families will not increase; partial de-indexation of the benefit, and a complete lack of indexation of the threshold amounts —

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I regret to inform the honourable senator that his time has expired.

Some Hon. Senators: Carry on.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Stanbury: Thank you. Partial de-indexation of the benefit, and a complete lack of indexation of the threshold amounts will result in the gradual erosion of the benefit amount, as well as lessen the number of families eligible for the benefit. There is a complete lack of a proper mechanism to ensure that dramatic changes in family income are reflected in the monthly benefit amount. As it stands now, it could take up to 18 months for the benefit to be adjusted. There is no federal-provincial arrangement, which means that hardship could result if the provinces decide to cap welfare payments. The long awaited and promised national child care strategy—a significant deterrent to child poverty—has been completely abandoned, creating additional financial hardship on low and middle income families, especially single parent families. There is also the regressive nature of the increased child care deduction, and the unknown cost of administering the new benefit.

The proposed child benefit reform was introduced and heralded by the federal government as an anti-poverty measure. The reality is that the last eight years have been marked by profound inaction to alleviate poverty. Perhaps more than anything else, Bill C-80 is a blunt reminder of missed opportunities for progress, and the continual regression of our social safety net —all as a result of harsh conservative social policy philosophies, hastened by the fear of the Reform Party. The government has been in power for eight years and the record is unfortunate. Bill C-80 is only the most recent example of how that harsh philosophy is de-humanizing Canadian society.

MOTION TO ADJOURN DEBATE—VOTE DEFERRED

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Pursuant to the rules, we will defer the vote until after Royal Assent.

Honourable senators, I wish to inform you that, pursuant to Rule 136(8), I must now interrupt the proceedings so that we can proceed with Royal Assent.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, as I understand it, the bell for the vote will be deferred until after Royal Assent.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: That is correct.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Beverly McLachlin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in her capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable Deputy Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Department of Forestry Act and to make related amendments to other Acts (Bill C-306, Chapter 44, 1992)

An Act to change the name of the electoral district of Timiskaming (Bill C-351, Chapter 45, 1992)

An Act to amend certain Acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act (Bill C-55, Chapter 46, 1992)

An Act to amend An Act to incorporate the Royal Society of Canada (Bill S-7)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of his Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

• (1710)

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, as I said earlier this afternoon, I am not quite ready to speak today but I will still share with you the thoughts that I have put down on paper in the last few days since the debate on second reading of Bill C-80 began.

Unfortunately, you will not have the benefit of my conclusions because, as I said earlier, my research is not complete. For this reason, the debate in this house should continue later this week. This is the case not only for me but also for several of my colleagues who wish to speak on this bill.

Bill C-80 had to be part of the Conservative government's legislative agenda. The social programs so dear to Canadians' hearts are the favourite target of a government—

Mr. Speaker, I will stop my speech until the noise in this Chamber ceases! I hope that this time will not be counted. The rules say that hon. senators who wish to converse should leave the Senate Chamber. I see that at least three conversations are going on—

[English]

I hope the Table is listening to what I said. I do not want this time to be taken off my speaking time.

Senator Forrestall: Yes, it will.

Senator Corbin: Senator Forrestall, if you want to make a speech, get up and make one.

Senator Forrestall: Stand up and get on with it, will you?

Senator Corbin: I will not get on with it with conversations taking place on the other side of the house. It is against your rules. Have a little decency. I know you are eager to hear me out, but please ask your colleagues to get out if they are not interested, which is obvious.

[Senator Speaker.]

Senator Forrestall: Take that back to northern New Brunswick. Get on with your remarks.

Senator Grimard: You would not have a quorum.

[Translation]

Have you finished interrupting me?

These programs had contributed to Canadians' welfare for nearly half a century. Today, some would make the Senate the accomplice of an uncaring government that is eating away at the social benefits which over time have become a fundamental characteristic of our country, the programs which have contributed to the emergence of our national pride and identity. As much as half-baked constitutional agreements, the dismantling of these social programs is making the citizens of this country lose faith in the leadership of their elected politicians.

The major changes made by Bill C-80 to the family allowance program would have required a well-tried consultation process to better identify the consequences of such changes. But no, as Senator Frith explained so well in this Chamber, the government kept debate in the House of Commons and consultation to a minimum. For the umpteenth time, the government cut off debate in the Commons on a controversial bill of doubtful utility. The Commons legislative committee that should have studied this bill carefully was ordered to work quickly, when Canadians were on vacation, before the truth—the whole truth —on Bill C-80 was known.

Even before the bill was presented in Parliament, the consultation process had been short-circuited. Just look at the White Paper tabled by the Minister of National Health and Welfare on February 25 at the same time as Mazankowski's shaky budget was brought down. This booklet, called "A White Paper", has barely twelve pages. It is entitled A White Paper on Canada's New Integrated Child Tax Benefit. It is a waste of time, because it does not honestly explain the justification for the proposed program and has not moved public discussion on it forward. In fact, we may well wonder whether the Conservative government's purpose was not to stifle debate and just say what it wanted in dictatorial fashion—the shadow of a debate, what!

This is what Ken Battle, President of the Caledon Institute of Social Policy and former Director of the National Council of Welfare, was still able to say on this White Paper when he appeared before the Commons Legislative Committee on Bill C-80 on June 16:

[English]

> One of the things we noted in trying to piece together the proposals as best we could from the white paper on child benefits, which was not a model of how to communicate ideas, and the budget itself, was that, for instance, the new credit is going to have a differential reduction rate for one kid or two.

That is, whether a family has one child, two children or more.

It would have been nice to get an explanation of why and what they were about.

[Translation]

In fact, Bill C-80 restructures the system of social and tax benefits for families with children. This is a very different animal from what Canadians have known over the years. A bureaucratic monster has been created!

For someone looking at it superficially, the new program may seem acceptable because it adds $400 million to the $4.5 billion spent on programs for families.

The misleading part of the new integrated child tax benefit is that it tries to combine three programs—family allowances, the non-refundable child tax credit and the refundable tax credit—into one.

But if we look at the proposal with a little historical perspective, we see that the Conservative government withdrew over $3.5 billion from child benefit programs between 1986 and 1991. This sneaky siphoning off of $3.5 billion results from the fact that benefits are only partly indexed to inflation. This borders on political dishonesty.

We find this same measure in clause 12 of Bill C-80. If the cost of living rises by less than 3 per cent, there will be no increase in benefits. However, if the inflation rate is above 3 per cent, the Conservative government will only grant an increase for the amount over 3 per cent.

I quote an article on the February 25 White Paper in the Montreal Gazette of February 29, entitled "Not so generous as it looks":

[English]

> But the most insidious erosion came from something the government is all set to do again: it did not index benefits fully for inflation. Family allowances rose only by the share of inflation that was beyond 3 per cent each year. It did the same thing with the income level at which it starts phasing out the refundable tax credit— that threshold was allowed to rise each year only by the amount of inflation beyond 3 per cent.
> Three per cent a year may not sound like much. But the result is that now, before Mr. Bouchard's new plan takes effect, the average-income family's net benefits are worth barely half of what they were worth in real terms just seven years ago.
> And Mr. Bouchard's new plan proposes exactly the same thing: indexing benefits only for the portion of inflation that exceeds 3 per cent each year. So year after year, the benefits will continue to shrink. What money there is will be skewed to the neediest families, which is good—but the benefits will shrink each year.
> That makes a fair mockery of the claim that what is planned is a reform for the long term. It looks like the same old shell game.

[Translation]

I also want to quote an article by Ken Battle, President of the Caledon Institute of Social Policy, which appeared in the March 12 edition of the Globe and Mail under the heading "Missing a chance for a solid punch at poverty".

[English]

I quote:

> The fatal flaw of the brave new child benefit is that it will be only partially indexed. This giant step backward in social policy was first taken in Michael Wilson's maiden 1985 budget, and has since siphoned about $3.5 billion from child benefits.
> By retaining this regressive mechanism, which uses inflation to impose automatic and hidden cuts each year, Finance Minister Don Mazankowski ensures that the value of child benefits will fall in the future. Partial indexation hurts the poor especially; the working poor will be hardest hit, since both the refundable child tax credit and the earned-income supplement will shrink steadily.

[Translation]

Another problem is that Bill C-80 will create two classes of poor people in Canada: the working poor and those on welfare or unemployment insurance. It is a work incentive for families that earn between $10,000 and $21,000 and do not depend on social assistance. This benefit is capped at $500.

The new benefits will not give a cent more to poor families and only a few cents more per day to those who are fortunate enough—considering the present state of the economy and the bleak outlook for next year—to be able to work. It is political fraud, pure and simple.

As I said earlier, honourable senators, I did not have time to finish researching my speech, and I reserve the right to speak later on. I therefore move the adjournment of this debate.

[English]

MOTION TO ADJOURN—DEBATE NEGATIVED

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Corbin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rizzuto, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Your Honour, I do not believe we can have another adjournment motion. Have we had an intervening proceeding?

Senator Molgat: Yes, I believe we had Royal Assent.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I wanted to make sure. But we did vote, it seems to me, after Royal Assent. As far as I know, we have not had an intervening proceeding since that vote, so I am wondering whether this motion is in order.

Senator Frith: The motion on which we had the vote was not this motion. The question before the house at the present time is the previous question. That is the motion, and that is the motion he spoke to.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes, but he is moving the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Frith: There was an intervening proceeding because the debate was suspended for Royal Assent.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If we could clarify that, I am certainly willing to abide by the Chair's decision.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, we did have Royal Assent, at which point we had a vote on the question of adjournment. This is a new motion for adjournment moved by Senator Corbin on the previous question. So it is in order.

It is therefore moved by the Honourable Senator Corbin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rizzuto, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is there agreement on the length of the bell?

Senator Kelly: Fifteen minutes.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Corbin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rizzuto, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion of Senator Corbin negatived on the following division:

SECOND READING, ON DIVISION

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, pursuant to Rule 13, in view of the hour, the Speaker must leave the Chair until 8 p.m.

• (1750)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are now on the question, and I would like to say a few words.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Are we ignoring the clock?

Senator Molgat: I am in agreement with that.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Molgat: In the summer of 1991, when the government side used its new found majority to change the rules in the Senate, much against, I believe, the traditions and the welfare of the Senate itself, one of the rules introduced put in place the closure motion. The government has used the closure motion once since then. We objected to that rule. In our view it is a draconian rule which should not be in here. It is an over-reaction to the events of the GST debate. One single debate in the 125 years of the existence of this body and the government over-reacted and introduced the closure rule.

However, if we thought that the closure rule was bad, this rule that the government has invoked today is even worse. At least under the closure rule there is one day's notice. The government has to introduce it and it does not take effect until the next day, and at least six hours of debate is guaranteed. Using this technique today the government has used a power that is absolutely out of character for a house of debate.

Senator Frith: Draco would have been insulted to have such action named as Draconian.

Senator Molgat: To put it clearly, the government simply refused to debate this question. There was one short speech by the mover, Senator Spivak, and since then utter silence from the government side. That is supposed to be debate in their view. Now, when we are prepared to put up speakers, the government has decided to use this rule.

The closure rule is like the guillotine, but at least you have a day's notice of what will happen. But this rule is like a mugging or a stab in the back. You don't even know it will happen and suddenly it happens and debate is cut off. My honourable friends may think it is a good rule. I do not think so. Those opposite ought to think about that; some day they may be on this side of the house.

Senator Cools: Soon. Very shortly.

Senator Molgat: They have the idea that the purpose of the Senate is to do what the government wishes. That is not the purpose of the Senate.

You have put yourselves under the thumb of the government. You have made this body an instrument of government and it is not intended to be an instrument of government. It is intended to be an instrument of regional voices and to be able to make the government change its mind. You people do not want that at all. All you want is to rubber-stamp what the government wants.

We are helpless under the rules we have now. There is no way we can do anything. The senators opposite control the whole issue and with these new rules we have no leeway.

I want you to know that we object. You are doing the wrong thing for yourselves and the wrong thing for this body. You are going against the whole purpose of the Senate as it was originally intended to be. We cannot do our job in the way that you are proceeding. Therefore, my group objects to what you are doing, but we are helpless to do anything about it.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of —

Senator Frith: Are you not going to say anything?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I will say a word, since I have been invited to by my friends opposite. My friend the Deputy Leader of the Government moved that the previous question be now put. The Deputy Leader of the Opposition talked about the new rules and about how he and his friends are helpless in the face of the new rules. A motion that the previous question be now put is one of the oldest rules in the book and it has been there for many years and governments have resorted to it in exactly the sort of situation in which we find ourselves today. There is a body of literature on this point in —

Senator Frith: Not even one day's notice!

Senator Murray: —Beauchesne and elsewhere to the effect that, under circumstances similar to these, moving the previous question is the recourse that governments invoke.

Senator Frith: Worse than closure!

Senator Murray: Let me say a word about the effect of a motion that the previous question be now put. The effect of that motion is that all honourable senators, including those who have already spoken on the previous question, can take part in the debate. That is the effect of it.

Senator Frith: It can be adjourned, except that you have refused the adjournment.

Senator Murray: It can be adjourned, but we have refused the adjournment for good and sufficient reason. Let me explain. The bill that we are talking about arrived here on September 17. Our colleague Senator Spivak moved second reading on September 22. There followed quite comprehensive speeches on the matter by Senator Hébert, the Leader of the Opposition and Senator Thériault, as well as a brief intervention on my part having to do with the process. The Leader of the Opposition had expressed concern that we were going to try to ram the bill through in a day or two, impose allocation of time and have to resort to those kinds of drastic measures. I indicated —

Senator Frith: I was naive enough to think you would impose allocation of time instead of closure.

Senator Murray: —in an intervention on September 22 that we had no intention of doing any such thing. As I said:

> We can sit evenings, we can sit Friday morning, we can sit all next week. There is plenty of time to hear from every senator, Liberal or Conservative, who wishes to be heard in the second reading debate on Bill C-80.

A bit later I said:

> The only thing that we in the government ask is that the Senate get on with it and deal with it. After the committee hearings have been held, I would expect to ask the Senate to return here to deal with the report stage and third reading.

The next day, September 23, Senator Gigantès spoke for a few moments and then adjourned the debate. He adjourned the debate on Wednesday, September 23. He did not adjourn it to Wednesday evening, or to Thursday or to Friday morning or to Monday, but to the next Tuesday. I asked at the time whether there were any other honourable senators who wished to take part in the debate then, and there were none.

Senator Frith: At that time.

Senator Murray: At that time, but surely with a debate of that kind —

Senator Frith: In other words, we do not adjourn the debate to Tuesday, because you do not want to adjourn it to Tuesday. Tell us how reasonable you are, but we must do it your way!

Senator Murray: The honourable senator adjourned a bill from Wednesday until the next Tuesday. There is not a legislative assembly in the world that would let you get away with that sort of thing.

Senator Frith: We keep straying from the way you want things done.

Senator Murray: So we find ourselves here today with Bill C-80 before us. We have had no signal from honourable senators opposite as to when we might expect to have a vote on second reading, no signal whatever, no undertaking on their part, no possibility of an agreement between the parties, which was sought, as to the conclusion of second reading and reference of this bill to the committee.

• (1800)

Under the circumstances, we took a responsible position in moving that the previous question be now put. It is not a motion that closes off debate. It is a motion that allows for all honourable senators, including those who have already spoken, to take part in the debate. We have had an adjournment from September 23 until today. That is a very lengthy adjournment, almost one week, and surely enough time for honourable senators to prepare themselves for the debate. I simply ask honourable senators to be reasonable.

Senator Frith: Let the record show that he sat down with a broad smile.

Senator Molgat: Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate permit a question?

Senator Murray: Of course.

Senator Molgat: The honourable senator has not been present in the chamber throughout this afternoon. Does he realize that three requests for adjournment of the debate were refused on a standing vote by senators opposite?

Senator Murray: Of course. I was here to vote with the majority on that matter. What is the purpose of a further adjournment? There has been an adjournment from last Wednesday until this Tuesday. For what reason would we adjourn the debate?

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Frith: Someone might want to speak tomorrow. You will not even give one day's notice?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, pursuant to the provisions of Rule 49(2), that the original question be now put.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

Senator Frith: On division.

Senator Molgat: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It was moved by the Honourable Senator Spivak, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kinsella, that this bill be read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Please call in the senators.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Teed, that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the motion is adopted, a number of suggestions have been made by senators on this side of the house as to the way the committee, in our opinion, should work.

We believe that there should be at least a week before any hearings begin so that the persons who wish to appear before the committee will have an opportunity to know when the committee will meet. If they do not have that kind of opportunity beforehand, it will be impossible for them to be prepared and to appear.

Second, a suggestion was made by my colleague, Senator Thériault, that the committee might consider holding some hearings outside Ottawa. As this is a measure that affects mainly the poor people of the country, and since they are the people who will be unable to attend hearings in Ottawa, I think the committee should give the matter serious consideration.

I believe there should also be some advertising carried out, advising people that the committee will be holding hearings, which will give them an opportunity to appear. A good number of groups who wanted to appear before the House of Commons committee were turned down. They were not heard by the committee of the House of Commons. I think it is important that our committee in the Senate hear from them.

Senate committees have a long tradition of providing an opportunity for the Canadian public to be heard. If there is a main source of pride in the work of the Senate it is the work done by our committees. I hope that the workings of this committee will not in any way be adversely affected, or that the length of time the committee is given in which to hold hearings will not be shortened, leaving us facing the majority on the other side pushing through this process in a short time.

Senator Balfour: Just like Senator Buckwold did.

Senator Frith: Let's do exactly what we did on that bill. That would be just fine. We travelled and we took about six months. Senator Balfour has the right idea. I vote for the Balfour formula.

Senator Molgat: Senator Buckwold gave an opportunity to Canadians to be heard. I recommend exactly the same procedure for this committee. I do not know if this committee will be prepared to spend six months on its study as did the committee on the GST. That should certainly be ample time. If the government does anything less than that, it will be continuing the same guillotine-like measures it imposed in the House of Commons, just as was imposed here today in the government's refusal three times. It is fine for the Leader of the Government in the Senate to say that this gave the opportunity for debate. However, they ensured that there would be no debate by voting against every motion for adjournment.

The Leader of the Government says that this rule has been on the books for a long time. Let him tell me when it was used in this chamber to do what he did today. Give me one instance. I have been here for 22 years now and never has the previous question been used to muzzle the opposition.

Senator Murray: You had a reasonable opposition when your government was in power.

Senator Molgat: Never has such a rule been used in this chamber and you, today, used it to muzzle the opposition.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, in my role as the Acting Chairperson of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, I thank the Deputy Leader of the Opposition for his counsel and for sharing some of the principles that are important to him. We shall do a thorough study of the bill. We hope to proceed with our work in an expeditious manner, but still allow ample time for the witnesses to prepare. Hopefully, we will be assisted in that work by the participation of all honourable senators.

Senator Molgat: I appreciate very much the comments of the chairman of the committee. He shows a very reasonable attitude. I take him at his word that there will be ample time for the witnesses to prepare and to be heard, and that all witnesses who wish to appear will have an opportunity to do so. On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill referred to Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask leave to revert to Government Notices of Motions.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I am surprised that my honourable friend is asking leave to revert to Government Notices of Motions.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: May I give an explanation so that I may move an adjournment motion?

Senator Molgat: We will be prepared to consider the arguments that my honourable friend may advance. However, he was not prepared to consider many arguments when we asked earlier to revert on a most reasonable proposition. Nevertheless, we are reasonable people and we are prepared to listen to him.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Not before we agree, reasonably, to revert to Question Period, since the Leader of the Government in the Senate is now here.

Senator Molgat: Why only a single reversion?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Perhaps I will state my arguments and then Senator Bonnell may state his.

It would appear that after the Orders of the Day have been completed this afternoon, we can then adjourn for an indefinite period. I should like to make a motion that we adjourn until December 1, 1992. It should be understood, however, that once the committee has studied Bill C-80, heard the witnesses and completed its report for presentation to the Senate, we will reconvene at that time to dispose of Bill C-80. That would be some time after Thanksgiving, the date to be determined following the completion of the work of the committee. If that is in order —

Hon. John B. Stewart: Before leave is given, honourable senators, may I ask a question? Earlier today I revived a question concerning letters between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Quebec, and asked a question concerning the cost of the constitutional referendum.

These are matters that relate to the referendum now in progress, and I believe that it may be possible for the Leader of the Government in the Senate to answer those questions now. If he could do that, it would remove at least one obstacle to leave being granted.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with regard to the correspondence, I do not know what has happened to it or why it has not been tabled. I will get hold of it and send it to the honourable senator within the next few hours, certainly by tomorrow at the latest.

As I indicated to him the last time we had an exchange on this matter, I had seen the correspondence myself. I cannot understand what has held up its tabling.

With regard to the other matter, and speaking from memory, I had an opportunity on the margins of another meeting to speak to some of the officials about the cost of the referendum. My recollection is that the national referendum will cost somewhere in the vicinity of $150 million, that the funds are in Treasury Board Vote 5 and that they would be transferred to the Chief Electoral Officer for the purpose of conducting a referendum. In due course, Parliament would be asked to sanction this expenditure in the usual way.

Senator Stewart: The minister refers to Treasury Board Vote 5, the contingency vote. Would it be the intention of the government, in due course, to recruit that fund back to its normal level?

Senator Murray: Yes, honourable senators.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I presume my honourable friend the deputy leader is not proposing that we adjourn indefinitely, but that he intends to adjourn to a set date.

We ran into a problem today with Question Period. I do not blame the Minister in any way. I know he has other obligations, but it does present a problem for us. As we gave you notice, we have many questions which we wanted to ask. We have to recognize that, right now, Canada is going through a very sensitive time; let us put it that way. We have a number of questions to which we believe we need answers; for example, when we will have the legal texts, and a number of other such items.

We gave notice today, but we could not get the answers. It would be preferable by far for us if we were to meet tomorrow and proceed with the Question Period which we were unable to have today and then adjourn to a set time. We would very much prefer a Question Period opportunity tomorrow which we were unable to have today.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I believe the Leader of the Government is quite agreeable to answering questions. Now that he is here and he is willing, we can revert to Question Period.

The only reason I refused originally was because I did not know whether or not he would be here. We can return at 8 o'clock or we can do it tomorrow.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe that we should have had the opportunity to have Question Period today and to have it tomorrow. Since we did not have it earlier today, we are suggesting that we have Question Period tomorrow, at which time I intend to ask three questions on the subjects which I mentioned and which will then be on the record. We will also have an opportunity to prepare other questions for tomorrow.

I understand that the government is not anxious about Bill C-46. That is understandable. I agree with the Deputy Leader of the Government that it does not seem that there is any other business, but nevertheless, we are requesting Question Period for tomorrow.

However, Senator Olson would like to make his speech this evening.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Just a moment, honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Oh, no, of course, I knew as soon as I said it, it would not go. It was a very tactless suggestion.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You keep saying we want things done our way because we do not do them your way.

Senator Frith: Go ahead. You will do what you intended to do, anyway.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Not at all, Senator Frith. Leave to revert to Question Period was refused because I did not know whether or not Senator Murray would be here today. He indicated to me that he could only be taken out of his meeting for a vote. It was only just now that I asked him whether or not he had to return to his meeting.

Senator Frith: I understand that, and I am accepting it.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Just a moment. Please let me finish. I also told him, "They had asked for leave. I refused it, and they got rather upset about that. But since you are here and they have their questions ready and are anxious to ask them, would you mind if we reverted? Are you ready to answer?" Senator Murray replied, "Certainly." So now he is prepared to do what you wanted to do at 2:30 in his absence. Your questions are ready, I assume?

Senator Frith: I want both.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Everybody was anxious to ask their question.

Senator Frith: We are speaking now about the motion to adjourn today. I have said that I want a Question Period tomorrow. If you are saying that we will have it today and tomorrow, then I am prepared to ask my questions now, but I also want a Question Period tomorrow.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I understand that that is what you want. When we say what we want, it is because we like your terminology.

Senator Frith: I am asking for it. I do not expect to get it.

Senator Murray: We will sit tomorrow, if you want to sit tomorrow.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted to revert to Notices of Motions?

Senator Molgat: I understand that the Leader of the Government has indicated he is prepared to have us sit tomorrow. If that is the understanding, then tomorrow we would adjourn to whatever set date the government wants.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, let us be clear: I had understood that we could have adjourned tonight until sometime later, as Senator Lynch-Staunton outlined.

Under those circumstances, I was prepared to revert to Question Period, as I had thought honourable senators wanted to do, for the purpose of facilitating the adjournment until December 1. It now appears that honourable senators, or at least the Leader of the Opposition, prefers to come back tomorrow at 2 o'clock. As far as I am concerned, if that is what they want we will be back here at 2 o'clock and my friend will simply move the adjournment of the Senate.

Senator Frith: That will give you time before tomorrow, if you want time to consider my questions.

Senator Murray: I think we can cover them all tomorrow.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Senator Olson: What business do you have to move the adjournment before the rest of the Order Paper is called?

Senator Murray: It is always in order.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We will be here tomorrow, anyway. I have made a motion which has been refused, so let us carry on.

Senator Molgat: We would like to carry on with the Order Paper.

THE GOVERNMENT

RECORD OF GOVERNANCE

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition) rose pursuant to notice of June 18th, 1992:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the disastrous record of the Conservative government.

He said:

I am prepared to yield to Senator Olson, if he would like to speak to this Inquiry today.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to say a few words about this motion. It says that we will call the attention of the Senate to the disastrous record of the Conservative government. To be more specific, the record that I want to talk about is the way they have handled this constitutional fiasco. I am extremely disturbed —

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Senator Olson: Well, can I get into my speech? You are great at anticipating, senator, but I have to tell you, I do not know what the question could possibly be at this stage.

Senator Murray: It is very relevant.

Senator Olson: I want to tell you that Western Canada—Alberta, in particular, and B.C., too—really got shafted on the so-called Charlottetown accord by the Mulroney government, and Western Canadians do not like it.

Senator Murray: May I ask you a question, then?

Senator Olson: Go ahead. I do not know what it could be. Are you trying to wreck my speech?

Senator Molgat: He is taking your time.

Senator Cools: Just stop the clock.

Senator Murray: I will just take a minute. The other day, when the honourable senator was speaking on this general subject, I asked him whether he intended to vote "no" in the referendum. A number of us here distinctly heard him say, "I will vote no and I will do what I can to persuade others to vote no." I said fair enough, and the moment passed.

Later, according to the Debates of the Senate of that day, the honourable senator is reported to have said, "I am tempted to vote no".

I am wondering whether the honourable senator fiddled a bit with the "blues", or what his position is on the matter. I hope he will take this opportunity to clarify whether he is still tempted or whether he has yielded to the temptation.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am having some problems with the implication that I "fiddled" with the blues. I respect the integrity of the reporters in this house and believe that they write what is said. If you want to fix up the language a little bit to make it more accurate, they will do that. I know of several cases where Senator Murray has done it. If he denies it, I will go and look him up.

Senator Murray: Go ahead.

Senator Olson: There is a much more important aspect to that question. My understanding is that this vote will be by secret ballot. I am going to go into a voting booth and vote for one side of the question. If anyone expects me to say in advance how I am going to vote, that is an invasion of my democratic rights. As a matter of fact —

Senator Frith: Did you not realize that the private ballot does not apply to public persons? That is what he is saying. If you are a public person, you are not entitled to the benefit of a secret ballot.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: I hope you do not ask people whom they are going to vote for in the next federal election. Is that what you are going to do?

Senator Frith: If you are a public person, apparently you do not get the secret ballot.

Senator Olson: Do you not have any respect for the secrecy of the ballot anymore? Why are you asking me how I am going vote? You want to violate my right to a secret ballot.

That is a pretty bad way to start off a speech. It makes me a little annoyed that I do not even have my right to a secret ballot anymore.

Senator Gigantès: On a point of order, the minutes wasted because of the intervention should be added to Senator Olson's allotted time.

Senator Olson: Thank you very much senator, I agree.

We need a redress of the balance of power for Western Canada, and especially Alberta, and it is not in this accord. A majority of the people in Alberta now do not believe it is fair. That is why I am speaking on this matter. I intend to use some pretty straightforward language. It will be plain and simple and straightforward enough that even Senator Murray will understand what I have to say.

Perhaps you do not understand that Western Canada has grown up a little bit since 1867. Between British Columbia and Alberta, we now have approximately six million people. There are about 2.6 or 2.7 million in Alberta and a little over three million in British Columbia. Under this new accord, Ontario will wind up with, I believe, 120 seats in the House of Commons, adding 18 to what they have now. You can do a mathematical calculation on that.

Quebec is going to add 18 to, I believe, 75. That is 93. Have you added up how many British Columbia and Alberta would get under this new deal? Alberta has 22, I believe. British Columbia has about 30. We get a little fewer than 60 with approximately the same number of people as Quebec, which gets 93. Is that fair? You are not fooling people in Alberta. They realize what kind of a shenanigan is going on here.

I want to tell you a few things about what has happened since the Prime Minister went out to sell the "yes" side. Between September 22 and September 24 Angus Reid polled 1522 adults. In Canada as a whole, support for the "yes" side slipped to 42 per cent, with 41 per cent for the "no" side. I am told that is a drop of 22 per cent in about ten days.

Let us take a look at Alberta. I am going to confine my remarks mainly to Alberta. At the present time, 34 per cent there say that they are going to vote for this constitutional accord while 50 per cent say that they will vote "no".

That happened during the period in which the Prime Minister was telling Western Canadians that, if they don't vote "yes" for this deal they are something less than a good Canadian. My phone line burned up. People asked me, "Who is this man, this Brian Mulroney, to come out here and tell us that we are not good Canadians unless we vote for the very unfair thing that he is advocating?" That is what we are faced with. I do not know what you expect of us out there.

In addition, the Prime Minister, the Honourable Joe Clark and the Honourable Don Mazankowski are saying that all this confusion is driving the Canadian dollar down and creating uncertainty in the Canadian economy. I have heard all kinds of people in Alberta say that the Prime Minister's preachings of doom and gloom from one end of this country to the other unless we vote "yes" is causing more trouble in the international market than any other single factor.

Albertans do not want to be told that they are not good Canadians either. That ought to be clear.

In Alberta, and in fact all over Canada, this is turning into an elitist campaign. Only the big-shots are going to run this campaign for the "yes" side. They are going to tell all of us good Canadians that, if we don't vote "yes", we are going to break up Canada. Do you know who is leading the campaign in Alberta? The president of Nova and the senior vice-president of Nova are the two people who have been selected to lead the "yes" vote there. Peter Lougheed, the former premier of Alberta, is out there too. He goes to Toronto and says that the people of Alberta should vote "yes".

I will tell you a little story about that. Peter Lougheed was the Premier of Alberta in 1981, when they put together a corporation called Novatel. That is where the Nova comes from.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Tell us about the National Energy Program.

Senator Olson: I will tell you about that, and I will get it right. Anyway, according to the Alberta Auditor General's report of a couple of days ago, Novatel is going to cost taxpayers of Alberta a minimum of $614 million because of what the Nova Corporation and Peter Lougheed, who are now the champions of the "yes" vote, put together.

There is no mistake that Novatel stinks a little bit in Alberta right now. It stinks to the tune of $307 million. I will explain why.

• (1850)

Nova Corporation was a 50-50 partner with a crown corporation called Alberta Government Telephones from 1981 until 1988, and Nova Corporation slithered out of that with the agreement of the government of Alberta. In fact, they even got money for their 50 per cent share of Novatel just a little while before it went belly up. These are great guys to tell Albertans how to vote! Not only do they get some money, but the people of Alberta are left with paying $614 million because of the incompetence of the management of this corporation that Nova and Peter Lougheed, who was Premier, put together at that time on behalf of the government. Do you not think that the people in Alberta understand that? Well, I want to tell you, when you see the polls dropping like a rock, you understand why this elitist campaign is not popular in Alberta.

Honourable senators, I was told by good authority today that Senator Twinn is saying that all Indian bands in Alberta will vote against the Charlottetown accord. Why? All of them—not some of them—will vote against it because it is a rotten deal as far as they are concerned. They did not get what they asked for: an inherent right to self-government. When they saw the agreement, they said, "Well there is nothing for us. It says that we must abide by all provincial laws across this country. That is not what we thought we had. That is not what Ovide Mercredi told us we would have by way of an inherent right to self-government." A great way to handle that part of Canada! I do not know what to say.

We have other problems as well, honourable senators. The Right Honourable John Turner got into the act in B.C. with Dave Barrett. He said that we must coax the people of B.C. to vote "yes". What does he know about Western Canada? When Prime Minister Trudeau turned the Liberal party over to him, there were 160 Liberal seats; two and a half months later, there were 40.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is quite the party you have there.

Senator Olson: A great idea for some of these so-called "elitists" to tell ordinary people how to vote!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Condemn your former leader; that is nice!

Senator Olson: You can say what you like.

Then there is Senator Castonguay. He is gone. I wish he was here.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is why you are mentioning him.

Senator Olson: Where has he gone? He does not want to hear this.

Senator Murray: Your Whip is a member of the "oui" committee in Quebec. I saw his name in La Presse the other day.

Senator Olson: I do not know what all of these interventions are for. I am talking about what will happen in Alberta.

When former Prime Minister Trudeau wrote his essay about the blackmailers in Quebec and the subsequent situation, I saw Senator Castonguay on television responding to Mr. Trudeau's remarks. Do you know what he said? "But former Prime Minister Trudeau is not with it anymore."

Senator Frith: Unlike Castonguay.

Senator Olson: "He does not understand what the people of Quebec feel, so you must dismiss his comments." I want to tell you something about Pierre Elliott Trudeau. The last time he laid it on the line and asked for the support of Quebecers, he got 74 out of 75 seats. And to have someone in this chamber say that Trudeau does not know what Quebecers feel! I do not think Senator Castonguay's credentials stand up to Pierre Elliott Trudeau's at all.

Honourable senators, the Royal Bank has now gotten into the act.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Chrétien, your leader, will be happy to read those remarks.

Senator Olson: While we are on that subject, perhaps I should tell the great Senator Lynch-Staunton—who seems to think he has a right to heckle everyone —that I had a discussion with Jean Chrétien and we have an understanding. He understands what I feel this is doing to Western Canada and Alberta in particular. He has given me room for some dissent in this discussion.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Some dissent?

Senator Olson: I can understand that no one in your party would understand, because dissent is not tolerated in your party. "Out the door!" We have Mps from Alberta who got the boot. I am thinking of Mr. Kindy from Calgary and Mr. Kilgour from Edmonton. Boot them out of the party as soon as they dissent. We do not do that in the Liberal party.

Senator Murray: Our loss is your gain.

Senator Olson: Now we have the Royal Bank in the act as well, these elitist big shots telling ordinary Canadians how to vote.

Senator Bonnell: How many bankruptcies does the Royal Bank have in Alberta?

Senator Olson: The bank has been vicious on bankruptcies all over Canada. We now have the worst bankruptcy rate in Canadian history. It is not only the Royal Bank, but a whole lot of others as well.

We have the new president of Nova telling Albertans how to vote. Do you know what else he is? He is Chairman of the Business Council on National Issues. His flunky, Thomas d'Aquino, runs around the country saying —

Senator Murray: Formerly of Mr. Trudeau's office.

Senator Olson: Never mind that. He runs around the country bragging to everybody that the BCNI is composed of 150 of the biggest corporations in Canada. Isn't that nice! And they are telling us how to vote? Now we have the biggest bank telling us that we better vote "yes" or else. Or else what? It is ridiculous! Then Mr. Allen Taylor says, "I am really not trying to influence anyone to vote one way or another." That is what he said.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I wish to inform the honourable senator that his time has expired.

Senator Olson: Well, I have a few more things left to say.

Senator Murray: He has a few things left to say.

Senator Olson: If you want to call me, I do not give a darn. Just call the next item and we will go on to it. Suit yourself.

Senator Murray: As you wish.

Senator Olson: I would rather finish my speech now.

Senator Murray: Certainly, you can have a few minutes.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: No, not a few minutes; as much time as I need!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Murray: He can take a few minutes.

Senator Olson: No, way. If it is going to be a few minutes, stuff it; I will wait.

Senator Murray: You can have 15 minutes.

Senator Olson: By the way, there are three more items on the Order Paper that I can call, so I can get 45 minutes more if you want; but if you want me to finish now, I may finish in about 15 minutes. If you are not willing to do that, then call the next item.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I want to tell you a bit about big shots, presidents of big banks like the Royal Bank and the president of the BCNI. I used to deal with people like that. When I was Minister of Economic Development in Canada, I used to have meetings with those people on a regular basis. Nice men; do not misunderstand me. They are competent men, intelligent and pleasant. However, every time I went to those meetings, I knew that I had to be careful, because big shots look after big shots' interests. They do not give a damn about whether Alberta is getting a fair shake in this matter. They think there are dollar signs involved in all of this.

As far as Nova is concerned, it is worse. They have been into the provincial treasury for about half of $600 million or $700 million. They have already slithered out from an amount of over $300 million. What is it they want? Do they want into the trough again? Why appoint to the "yes" committee two people from Nova? What comes to mind is that they could not get anyone else. Where are all the other people in Alberta.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the "yes" committee, wherever it is, it is not a government committee.

Senator Olson: It is a committee of big shots.

Senator Murray: The government does not appoint the members of the "yes" committee.

Senator Olson: Are you saying that Mr. Nearing is not on that committee?

Senator Murray: Who?

Senator Olson: Nearing or Near, or something like that. He was the campaign chairman for the Conservative party in the last campaign, and he has been appointed to do the job on the "yes" committee.

I also understand that he has been appointed as the Conservative campaign manager in the next federal election. That is who you have on there.

• (1900)

Senator Murray: I do not know about the latter point but the fact of the matter is that the law provides that groups of people can form themselves into "yes" or "no" committees and register. I have a list here of various "yes" and "no" committees that have registered; what they are, their heads and the people who have registered.

Senator Stewart: They sprang up spontaneously.

Senator Murray: Certainly, the government has nothing to do with who is on the "yes" committee in Alberta.

Senator Olson: Are you trying to tell me that the Conservative Party had nothing to do with it either?

Senator Murray: That is a different thing. We are talking provincially.

Senator Olson: I beg your pardon, not federally?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the government had nothing to do with the membership of the "yes" committee in any of the provinces.

Senator Olson: That is a bunch of baloney.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator can say that, but I am telling him that the government has its own role in the referendum. The Chief Electoral Officer runs the referendum, the government takes upon itself the responsibility —

Senator Olson: I wonder if you are subtracting time for all this.

Senator Murray: —to make copies of the agreement available to people. Ministers, MPs and senators of the Conservative Party are, of course, campaigning in favour of the "yes" or "oui".

Senator Olson: Of course, you are spending $20 million of taxpayers' money too. If you do not believe that, we can have it out tomorrow.

There are one or two other things that have to be said about this referendum campaign. Let me quote from the Calgary Herald of September 24:

> Alberta will drop its support of the Yes side in the constitutional referendum campaign if a full legal text is not available well before the Oct. 26 vote, Deputy Premier Jim Horsman says.

The article goes on to say:

> "The necessity for (a full legal) text is absolute," he says, rejecting suggestions that release of a partial text would be satisfactory.

The article also says that he is pushing for release of the legal text by October 1. I am not sure whether he will withdraw the support of the government of Alberta on October 1, but he is suggesting that we at least need to know what the text will be.

Let me give you one other comment. Federal Justice Minister Kim Campbell says that a legal text is not necessary for Canadians to decide which way to vote.

Senator Cools: Fire her.

Senator Olson: That is what we face. I want to tell honourable senators about one other thing that is fairly important. The federal bureaucrats who are trying to write the legal text are fiddling with it. They are putting things in that are not in the agreement. Do you know how Jim Horsman knows? A women's organization had obtained a copy of the first or second draft of the legal text, and they came to the conclusion that some people down here were fiddling with it.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators —

Senator Olson: Will the honourable senator sit down? I hope he will make a full-length speech when I have finished.

Senator Murray: You are probably the only person in the Senate who hopes that.

Senator Olson: I will just tell you that Jim Horsman as the Deputy Premier, by the way, is also the person who has been leading the discussion for and on behalf of Alberta. I am not sure whether he is Attorney General of Alberta. In fact I do not think he is, but he is the person who needs to take the legal text and check it against what he agreed to.

Senator Murray: Yes, and he and 16 other people have a veto.

Senator Olson: Sit down for a while!

Senator Murray: You understand that the legal text is not what the Government of Canada says it is. The legal text will be —

Senator Olson: I know it is not; it probably will not be what the document says it should be, either.

Senator Murray: The legal text will be what the Government of Canada, ten provinces, two territories and four aboriginal associations say it is. Each of them has a veto over that legal text. So do not speak of it as if it were a Government of Canada responsibility or document.

Senator Olson: The Leader of the Government as usual has completely lost the point. He never grabbed it in the first place. What I am trying to establish is that Jim Horsman has probably been sent the first draft. That is why he wants the rest of it, before people have to vote on it. He is more diplomatic than I am. He did not say in the newspaper that you had been fiddling with it, but other people who have seen the document are saying that. You are messing around with the agreement. You are putting emphasis that was never intended on certain aspects.

Senator Murray: Such drafts as are in circulation have been worked out by all the parties, including Mr. Horsman's officials.

Senator Cools: Why can't we get one?

Senator Olson: Why can't you get it done so that the people of Canada will know what they are voting on? We could vote for this so-called package, and then when the legal draft comes out it could be sufficiently different that a lot of people will say, "Oh, but you voted for it."

Senator Murray: No.

Senator Olson: That can happen, and you know it can happen.

Senator Murray: Alberta has a veto; the government has a veto on the text.

Senator Olson: Many people I know are afraid that that will happen. But the government of Alberta does not have a draft; does not have the text.

Senator Murray: Their officials are involved in working on the draft as we speak. They have been meeting all day today in Ottawa—the federal government, ten provinces, two territories and four aboriginal associations have been meeting all day, working on the drafts.

Senator Olson: When will we get the draft? Why are we voting on something that is not ready? Anyhow, at least I hope we know —

Senator Frith: They are working on it.

Senator Olson: They are working on it. I will tell you one thing you are not working on; you are not working on the numbers. Ontario gets 18 more seats. Quebec gets 18 more seats. Alberta gets two. Will you fiddle with those, too? That is not fair. That gives absolutely no consideration to the redress of the balance of power and influence in the Parliament of Canada, and people do not want it. That is why the support for the "yes" side is dropping like a stone.

I told you the other day that I would not go around telling people whether to vote yes or no, but I would like them to be informed on what is going on. What is going on is that we in the West have really been shafted on the distribution of the seats, and you do not intend to tell us the rest of it. Then what do you do? You send out a bunch of big-shots to tell the ordinary people in Alberta how to vote.

Senator Bonnell: Not only in Alberta but all of Canada.

Senator Olson: Are they doing it in P.E.I., too?

Senator Bonnell: Not yet.

Senator Olson: They are doing it in Alberta, and I think it is sad that a Canadian government would do that to any part of the country.

I will not go around preaching gloom and doom. I want to tell you one other thing: In the past three weeks the intensity of Western alienation has reached its highest level ever because of what you are trying to do to us. You should be ashamed. Yet here you want to sneak in a legal text sometime after the people have voted for it. I hope that senators all over

[Senator Murray.]

Canada, but particularly in Western Canada, will do what I am doing and go out and tell people what they are getting. People are coming to me and saying, "Bud, what is going on? It looks like we are getting beat, and that we are worse off than we were. We can't find out."

● (1910)

All the Prime Minister and Joe Clark ever say when they come to Alberta is, "Vote for it, or break up Canada. This is your last chance!" What type of an argument is that? Those people out there are intelligent. They would like to be persuaded that it is a good deal. The more they look at it, the worse it gets. I think it is pretty sad.

I intend to order several thousand copies of the text that the government has put out. In fact, I have ordered 2,000, and I intend to send them all over Alberta so that people can see the explanation of the Charlottetown accord that the government has put in a pamphlet.

Senator Murray: We are sending it to every mailbox in the country, so you can save yourself the trouble.

Senator Olson: I am sending out a few, too, but I intend to insert a letter to caution the people to look at certain parts carefully.

I am not advocating a negative vote. If there is to be a secret ballot, people should make up their own minds, but they need to be informed.

Senator Murray: They need some leadership from honourable senators, too.

Senator Olson: They tell me some organizations have done an analysis and that there are 45 to 65 things in that so-called agreement that are subject to more negotiation. We will be having more discussion on this, and more negotiation on that. If you want me to go through it, it will take me an hour. Even in the paper that the government prepared there is no final decision included therein. Yet they want the people to vote, and they are asking them to vote "yes". Talk about a pig in a poke!

I hope that the government has enough respect for certain parts of Canada, such as Alberta, that it will at least be precise about the matters that it intends to negotiate. What is the government's intention with respect to all those parts of that so-called agreement that are subject to further negotiation? We have to discuss it a little more. That is great.

I hate to say this because it is mean, but people in Alberta no longer trust Mr. Mulroney. They do not believe anything he says. They no longer believe what Joe Clark says.

Senator Frith: What about the other parts of the country?

Senator Olson: I do not pretend to speak for other parts of the country.

Senator Murray: How about Mr. Chrétien?

Senator Frith: A lot more. They do in my province, but mind you, it is not hard to be more trusted than Mr. Mulroney.

Senator Olson: Perhaps Senator Murray should make a speech so we can have the benefit of the full weight of his opinion as to what is good in this agreement.

The senators do not say very much because they think it is self-serving; that if we try to defeat this motion we might save our places in the Senate. I do not how many there are, but I know there are many people who feel this way.

Senator Thériault: I'm not one.

Senator Murray: You are in favour of it.

Senator Thériault: That's right.

Senator Olson: As far as I am concerned, that is a pretty insipid, sterile argument. I did not come here to be a nice guy. It just happens that I am nice most of the time.

My purpose is to stand up in this chamber and tell senators what people in Alberta think about the issues. That is my job. I intend to pursue it as vigorously as I can, and the all snippy, snide remarks of the Leader of the Opposition really will not —

Senator Frith: Leader of the Government.

Senator Olson: Sorry, you are absolutely right.

Senator Murray: Delusions of grandeur.

Senator Olson: He will not deter me from what I consider my most important duties; that is, to tell the government when it is doing a serious disservice to a part of Canada.

I thank the honourable senators for their attention. I would like to express my appreciation to senators opposite for allowing me a little extra time in order that I could complete my remarks and describe how annoyed most people are in Alberta about the way in which the government is handling this situation.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator used a number of names from Alberta in connection with the "yes" committees. I simply want to place on the record the fact that as of yesterday, the "yes" committees that are registered from Alberta are the Alberta-Canada Committee whose chief and whose agent is Mr. C. Kent Jespersen.

Senator Olson: I know him very well. He used to work for me.

Senator Murray: Well, his address is there.

Senator Olson: He is a senior vice-president of Nova. That is his job, and I explained how Nova is regarded by people in Alberta.

Senator Murray: I am sorry my friend has such a dim view of this man. I cannot defend him because I do not know him.

Senator Olson: I have a good view of the man, but he should not tell us how to vote in Alberta.

Senator Murray: His address is in Calgary, and I assure you that whoever appointed him, the government did not.

Senator Olson: Wait a minute. How come you have all these names if the government is not involved? Who do you think you are kidding?

Senator Murray: Then there is the Together for Canada Calgary Association. It is another "yes" committee, and its chief agent is Brian Felesky.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator is reading from a government document.

Senator Murray: This has come from Elections Canada; it is public information.

Senator Olson: Is Elections Canada not part of the Government of Canada; part of the institution of the Ottawa scene? Good heavens!

Senator Murray: Everyone knows that Elections Canada is independent. In this case, periodically its information division puts out, for the benefit of the public and the media, a list of the committees for the "no" and the "yes" sides that have already registered. Because the honourable senator used various names from Alberta, I wished to place on the record the names of apparently two Alberta "yes" committees that have registered to date, their chief agents being Mr. Felesky and Mr. Jespersen, neither of whom is known to me and who formed their "yes" committee on their own volition and initiative.

Senator Olson: It is obvious that the Leader of the Government does not know anything about what is going on in Alberta. Everyone knows that it is the two senior officers of the Nova Corporation that are leading the "yes" campaign. If you want to deny that, at least you should come to Alberta and listen for a while.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Have you read Senator Fairbairn's remarks, your fellow senator from Alberta?

Senator Olson: No, I have not read them. When were these intelligent remarks made? I was out of the country for a while. I know what senators opposite are attempting to do; they are attempting to put words into my speech and degrade me. Let me tell them they will not make it.

Senator Frith: They cannot handle your arguments, that is why.

Senator Olson: I would like to tell senators something about Albertans, if you think they are stupid or fools —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Read Senator Fairbairn's speech.

Senator Olson: I did not say that. If you want to say that you can take responsibility for saying it. I do not know what she said. I know what my responsibility is and that is to stand up in this chamber and tell you what the people of Alberta are telling me, and that's exactly what I have done —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: And that is her responsibility, too.

Senator Olson: —and the people of Alberta resent the government dismissing them as being fools; that the government think they can do this to Western Canada without suffering some of the consequences.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Like the Trudeau government did?

Senator Olson: Is he not a great guy?

Senator Frith: They do not want to deal with the issues.

Senator Olson: They do not want to deal with the issues at all. Unfortunately, these are the kinds of asinine remarks that are typical of Senator Lynch-Staunton. He apparently does not know how to act in any other way and that is too bad. Whether you like it or not, I intend to say what I have on my mind.

I am very grateful for the time, and I hope that honourable senators will understand what is going on in that part of Canada. I did not speak about British Columbia, but I could mention some figures. The support for the "yes" side is also dropping like a stone in that province. Do senators opposite know why? The Prime Minister went out there and told them they were a bunch of poor Canadians for not voting "yes". Do you think those tactics work? Perhaps you should convey that message to the Prime Minister.

Senator Murray: The Prime Minister never said anything of the kind, and you know it.

• (1920)

Senator Olson: He said all kinds of people. You are against Canada if you —

Senator Murray: Put it on the record. Bring it in and put it on the record.

Senator Olson: Will you give me a chance tomorrow?

Senator Murray: Sure.

Senator Olson: I bet you will. I bet you are trying to adjourn the debate as quickly as you can. Thank you very much, senators.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: If no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Before the adjournment motion is put, I wish to invite honourable senators to the Speaker's Chamber after the adjournment, if they wish to have a few refreshments.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, September 30, 1992

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, a democracy-respecting government as defined by Senator Murray has 51 days to Election Day. Since I believe there is a 50-day minimum for the election writ period, that means one day. That may be a bit too strict, so let us say there are 51 days for the respecters of democracy. Even at that, we would be holding the election sometime in the middle of November.

However, if it is any comfort to those who do not respect democracy, but rather are cowardly and contemptuous of democracy, they have 437 days left.

TRANSPORT CANADA

CANADIAN COAST GUARD—STATION CLOSURES IN NEW BRUNSWICK AND NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Yesterday, I drew your attention to the concerns of the "Keep Letete" committee from Charlotte County, New Brunswick, which questions the decision of the Canadian Coast Guard to close the Letete Central Monitoring Station, as well as the Cape Forchu centre in Nova Scotia. Both centres monitor the unmanned lightstations in each area.

I will continue reading from this letter, which many of you have received, in the hope that perhaps the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communication will want to study this whole matter.

I regret that government-imposed rules do not permit me to read all of the letter in one blast.

Some of the issues are:

> The direct economic loss from Lightkeeper lay-offs . . .
> The dismantling of infrastructure necessary for healthy economic growth . . .
> The Coast Guard refusal to reveal or acknowledge long term intentions.
> Secret preparations for cuts and lay-offs at district level, contrary to political assurances.
> Employment of unethical tactics to deflect and mislead both public and employee concerns.
> Service cuts and/or changes based entirely on political expediency, instead of sound fiscal and user needs.

Some of the solutions are:

> An unambiguous commitment and policy from Transport Canada to maintain existing lightstations and other short range navigational aids . . .
> An acknowledgment from Transport Canada that lightstations and their staff have an intrinsic value to their areas that is substantially greater than their narrow mandate of ensuring proper operation of navigational aids . . .
> An open minded review of individual stations, with the intent that each shall perform as many roles as the local needs and conditions allow.

Then the conclusion:

> Lightkeepers, as a group, have proven their ability and willingness to provide maximum service with any resources available. Only employment uncertainty in recent years has affected recruitment of people who maintain the deep commitment seldom found outside the light service. Remove that uncertainty and the lightkeepers will maintain a 200-year tradition of superior service.

THE CONSTITUTION

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—WESTERN REPRESENTATION

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words about the problem I am having in relation to this referendum. Some of you will know that I made a few remarks yesterday.

Senator Doody: I thought you had finished that.

Senator Olson: Pardon me? I have only three minutes. I hope, that Your Honour will keep track of Senator Doody's interruptions, so that I am not robbed of any portion of my three minutes.

Senator Doody: I did not stop your flow. You did.

Senator Olson: I always listen when somebody else starts talking.

I want to say that, ever since I found out what was in this deal for Western Canada, I have been constantly haunted by a thought. I think of the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, and what he would have done if he had seen his part of the country being shafted in the manner that we in the West are experiencing at this time. If he were alive today, do you know what he would do? He would stand up in this Parliament and everywhere else and tell everyone who would listen that it was his belief that his people need to be represented accurately in the halls of Parliament. He would not be intimidated by the powers of central Canada, and he would represent them accurately.

I appeal to the senators from Western Canada. I am sorry that a number of them who were here yesterday are not here now, especially from the other side of the house. I would exhort them to get up on their feet and defend our part of Canada. We are going to get shafted on the numbers in the Parliament of Canada, and then this package is going to fix the amending formula so that we cannot repair it.

Is it not time you got up and told the people in Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba, or wherever you are from, that this deal is not good for Western Canada? We are worse off, not better off, as far as representation is concerned.

What is more, we have just about 6 million people now in British Columbia and Alberta, and yet we are getting 32 plus 26 plus 6 members. Do you know how many the provinces in central Canada are getting with 6 million people? They are getting 50 per cent—93—or 30 per cent more. Is that fair? If you think it is fair, sit still and let it pass; but I don't think it is fair.

When there was something to be said for the interests of the part of Canada from which he came, Mr. Diefenbaker, whom I knew well, who brought the Conservative Party out of almost complete oblivion and made it a national force, got up and said it in the House of Commons. He didn't just sit there on his hands because of problems he was having with the much superior forces in central Canada. He did something , and I remember Mr. Diefenbaker saying a number of times, "It is the right thing to do", and "I stood alone in this Parliament."

If you people opposite think that sitting still is the way you should represent Western Canada, you should hang your heads in shame. Get up on your feet and defend our part of Canada, which is getting shafted. Or will you just let it go?

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, just to respond to that, if I understand what has been happening in this country in terms of propositions for the reform of the federal parliamentary system on behalf of Western Canada, it was a demand on their part that there be a new Senate that is elected with equal representation from the provinces.

Senator Olson: No, there is an "E" that stands for "effective" too.

Senator Gigantès: You did not want them to interrupt you, sir. Could you give me the same courtesy. Please, do not count the time of interruption.

To continue what I was saying, the theory is that there should be equal numbers of senators per province. The West always said that this was because the House of Commons was represented by population.

If senators from the West were to take a calculator and use Statistics Canada's June, 1992, edition of historical statistics to find the proportion of the population for each of the provinces, and then the proportion of MPs they will have in the new reorganized House of Commons of 337 members, they would find that central Canada—in other words, Ontario and Quebec—will still have a little less than the proportion they should have according to their population.

[Senator Olson.]

I have done these calculations and I have them in my office for anyone who wants them. Eastern Canada will remain a little over-represented. Those are the figures. I am not giving you theory; I am giving you arithmetic.

● (1410)

Senator Doody: How far east is "east"?

Senator Gigantés: Western Canada, after 1996, will be dead on. I do not think that this particular change in the election of the new Senate will take place much before 1995. So they might be disadvantaged for one year.

As for the effectiveness of the Senate, the proof of the pudding will be in the eating. It is very difficult to tell in advance how effective this new Senate will be.

Senator Thériault: It will be.

Senator Gigantès: There is no doubt that, because of the fact that they will be elected and each of them will represent a much greater number of people, elected senators will speak with much greater authority than we are allowed. Thus, if you wanted "rep by pop" in the House of Commons and "rep by province" in the Senate, that is what this new agreement is giving you almost dead on the nose, like it or not.

Senator Olson: That is crap!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I would like to attend one of your caucus meetings.

Senator Olson: You do not know how to multiply.

Senator Frith: His arithmetic is good.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as indicated yesterday, the business of the house being what it is, we can assume that we can adjourn this afternoon or sometime later today. The knowledge that we have of any business coming from the other place being what it is, we feel that this house can stand adjourned until December 1, 1992. The only exception to that is that we will be called back sometime after Thanksgiving, after the hearings on Bill C-80 by the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science, and Technology, to deal with its report and deal with the bill on third reading.

Honourable senators, with that explanation, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, December 1, 1992, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIER OF QUEBEC—DOCUMENTS TABLED

Leave having been given to revert to Tabling of Documents:

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, for some days there has been a question before us concerning correspondence exchanged between Prime Minister Mulroney and Premier Bourassa. That correspondence was tabled in the National Assembly of Quebec on September 16. As I said earlier, there would be no objection, therefore, on the part of the government of Quebec, as there is certainly none on the part of our government, to tabling these documents in this place.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 338 citizens of Nova Scotia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Margaree Valley, Margaree Forks, Antigonish, Little Judique, Mabou, Dartmoth, Creignish, Port Hastings, Inverness, Bras d'Or, George River, Cheticamp and Sydney.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 198 citizens of Alberta who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Manning, Peace River, Nampa, Grande Cache, Dixonville, Grimshaw, Berwyn, Calgary, Valleyview and Grande Prairie.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 100 citizens of Saskatchewan who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Regina, Saskatoon, Moose Jaw and Fellmore.

Finally, honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 501 citizens of Quebec who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Lachine, Ile Perrot, Vaudreuil, Pointe-Claire, Montreal, St-Lambert, Val Racine, Brossard, Ste-Sophie, Knowlton, Lac Brome, St-Alphonse, Drummondville, Chicoutimi Nord, Ste-Foy, Alma, St-François-de-Sales, St-Hyacinthe, St-Dominique, St-Honoré, Jonquière and St-Ambroise.

These petitions reached me in July, in case that might interest Senator Murray!

This makes a grand total of 1,137 Canadians who are unhappy with the government and its GST, and there are millions more like them!

[English]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present several petitions —

Senator Hébert: Against the GST?

Senator Marshall: —comprising 215 names; individual signatures from the provinces of Ontario, Alberta, Saskatchewan, New Brunswick and British Columbia, praying and calling upon Parliament to support the activities of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs in examining the authenticity of the series of films under the title: The Valour and the Horror, namely, Savage Christmas: Hong Kong 1941, Death By Moonlight: Bomber Command, and In Desperate Battle: Normandy 1944.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

REFERENDUM QUESTION—STATEMENTS OF PRIME MINISTER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have some questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but before posing them, I wish to make a few general comments. One such comment is that a quick reading of the Order Paper indicates there will not be very much other business today. Therefore, I hope that we can extend the Question Period a little, if it becomes necessary. I have no indication at this time that it will be, but it might be.

I say that because I have questions on three subjects: One on the Constitution referendum where I am seeking some clarification, one on the Westray issue and one on NAFTA. When I am finished with my questions on the constitutional process, other senators on either side may wish to join in, so I will yield at that point with the hope that I can continue on and ask my other questions after that subject has been exhausted.

Honourable senators, on Monday of this week the Prime Minister appeared in Sherbrooke, Quebec, to speak about the referendum. At that time he warned, according to a press report of that event, as follows:

> "A No will not mean 'business as usual'. It will mean the end of negotiations and the end of the process that lead to Charlottetown. A No will mean —

and I underline that.

> A No will mean as (PQ leader Jacques) Mr. Parizeau admits, the beginning of the process of dismantling Canada."

He then proceeded, in a somewhat circus-like fashion, like a circus strongman—and perhaps that is how we sees himself—to rip the Charlottetown agreement in two.

Senator Gigantès: Only three pages.

Senator Frith: The next day in Halifax he denied saying what he had, in fact, said. Later, in a television interview, a question was asked as to whether he felt any personal responsibility for the falling dollar.

• (1420)

Mulroney replied:

> Of course not. What I was doing yesterday, I was referring to Mr. Parizeau, not me.

However, in the speech in Sherbrooke, he said: "A No will mean, as Mr. Parizeau admits, the beginning of the process of dismantling Canada." It was very explicit that, in the opinion of Mr. Mulroney, a "no" means the beginning of the end for Canada and that Mr. Parizeau admits it. It was not, as he was implying, simply a matter of that being what Mr. Parizeau believed. He said, "This is what I, the Prime Minister, say, and it is something Mr. Parizeau admits to be true".

On that subject, I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, does he agree with the Prime Minister and Mr. Parizeau?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think you have to look at the reference to Mr. Parizeau and indeed to the "no" forces in Quebec in the light of the strategy that they adopted almost immediately upon the calling of the referendum. At that point, Mr. Parizeau and his colleagues were trying to advance the somewhat insidious, in my view, argument that a "no" vote in the referendum would be absolutely without consequences; that a "no" vote was not really a vote on sovereignty; that a "no" vote was simply for the continuation of negotiations. Thus did Mr. Parizeau hope to attract the support of people who are federalists.

Since that time, Mr. Parizeau and some of his supporters, notably the Honourable Lucien Bouchard, have really let the cat out of the bag. Mr. Parizeau, when speaking to a group of students within the past week or so, trumpeted the fact that a "no" vote would, indeed, get the last impediment out of the way and the road would be clear to sovereignty.

What the Prime Minister was doing in his speeches in Sherbrooke and in Halifax, and in some other interviews that I saw referred to, was to highlight the fact that Mr. Parizeau and his colleagues had now taken the veil away; they had disclosed what had been their objective all along, and their true objective in this referendum, as in their political activity generally, is to bring about the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada.

Senator Frith: I do not know whether other honourable senators are having the difficulty I am having in understanding whether that was an answer to my question, although I must say that I appreciate the Leader of the Government's wanting to get those words on the record; but perhaps we could get back to my question.

The statement I was asking him about was:

> A No will not mean 'business as usual.' It will mean the end of negotiations, and the end of the process that led to Charlottetown. A No will mean . . . the beginning of the process of dismantling Canada.

My question was: Does Senator Murray agree with the Prime Minister and Mr. Parizeau that a "no" vote will have that result?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, quite a number of us have said—and of course I support what I believe is the obvious conclusion—that a "no" vote on October 26 will, indeed, be the end of the process that led to Charlottetown.

Nobody with any knowledge or experience in these matters truly believes that a "no" vote would be followed by a resumption of negotiations among the federal government, 10 provinces, two territories and four Aboriginal associations. To expect such a thing to happen would be totally unrealistic in political terms.

• (1430)

As for it being a step towards the dismantling of the country, yes, I have no doubt that the forces of separatism in Quebec, led by Mr. Parizeau and Mr. Bouchard, would immediately interpret a "no" vote as the first step towards separation. I think that the demand for a referendum on sovereignty would increase quite considerably, and that Quebec and the rest of the country would be in a difficult position indeed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think I detected a hint, at least, that the answer to my question is yes, that the Government Leader does agree with the Prime Minister and Mr. Parizeau. Let me just try to tighten it up a bit to be sure that I do understand.

What will happen if the referendum results in a "no" vote in this context? If the government calls an election between now and October 26, that would have the result, of course, of derailing the whole referendum process under the legislation we passed. However, assuming that this government is still in office on October 27, and there is a "no" vote, will constitutional negotiations end, as Mr. Mulroney has said—and as apparently Senator Murray agrees—and will the government then begin negotiating the dismantling of our country? Would that be their policy on that occasion?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I hope the honourable senator understands, the statement I have made, and which has been confirmed by many of the parties to the Charlottetown agreement, including Premier Rae in the last few days, is that it would be totally unrealistic to expect that constitutional negotiations could resume on the ashes of the Charlottetown agreement.

Second, the answer of course is no, we do not intend to negotiate the dismantling of the country, but I have already pointed out that that is the option of the separatist forces under Mr. Parizeau, and I have no doubt they will do everything possible to bring it about.

Third, I may say, perhaps to the disappointment of some honourable senators opposite and to the surprise of others, that I fully expect the results of the referendum on October 26 to be a resounding "yes", nationally and in every province and territory.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if I understand the answer, the government would not, in those circumstances, initiate any dismantling, but would have to respond to any initiatives taken by another government.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Parti Quebecois is the opposition party in Quebec. Mr. Lucien Bouchard leads a small group in the House of Commons. I am stating that in terms of their public positions and their parties, they would take new encouragement—and why would they not from a "no" vote—that their option was in the ascendancy, and their objective is the dismantlement of the country.

I take it that that objective is not shared by the honourable senator, who I presume will be taking part in this campaign on the side of the "yes" forces, however faint-heartedly. That option is not shared and will be fought against by all those who are true federalists.

Senator Frith: We do not really know what the government will do in that case because they cannot contemplate the possibility, and of course our position and this party's position is that we do not want that result, either. However, we understand that the government is certain it will not happen, and therefore has no particular position as to what it will do if there is a "no" vote either in Quebec or in some other provinces. The government is not thinking about that.

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—AVAILABILITY OF LEGAL TEXTS—DESIRABILITY AND DATE OF ISSUANCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Let me turn to one other aspect, then, that has been the focus of a good deal of attention, and that is the question of the legal texts. Some governments, including those that were negotiators at Charlottetown —

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): And all governments were.

Senator Frith: Yes, of course, they all were. I am just underlining the fact that they were members of the negotiating team.

Messrs. Getty and Wells have stressed the importance of having the legal texts prior to October 26. Mr. Horsman, I understand from what our colleague Senator Olson told us yesterday, is quite firm on this point. However, Premier Rae suggested that Canadians do not need the legal texts in order to make an informed decision.

I would like to know this from the government leader: Have there been discussions between the representatives of the federal government and the provinces about the desirability or the advantages and disadvantages of releasing the final legal texts before Canadians have a chance to vote on October 26? Second, was the question mooted as to whether or not we should issue the legal texts before that date?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the only answer I can give to that question is that all of the governments involved have been working diligently to conclude the legal texts. The officials representing the federal government, ten provinces, two territories and four Aboriginal associations met three times prior to this week and are meeting all this week —and will have met four times this week—with a view to reaching an agreement on all of these legal texts.

Of course it must be stated that the political leaders who negotiated the Charlottetown agreement will, as a group, have to give final approval to the legal texts. The texts would be brought into Parliament and into the various legislatures for ratification.

Senator Frith: Again, I have some useful information, but that really was not my question. My question was based on a memorandum of September 15, which states:

> Heads of delegations reviewed the advantages and disadvantages of releasing legal texts during the referendum campaign.

We now know from the answer given by the Leader of the Government that they have been discussing, preparing and reviewing legal texts. My question was whether those involved, including the government of which he is a member, discussed the disadvantages or advantages of releasing legal texts during the referendum campaign.

I assume that the Leader of the Government is familiar with that memo. Its existence was confirmed by Mr. Mark Entwistle of the Prime Minister's office.

My question is: Did this government and the other governments actually consider the advantages or disadvantages of releasing any text?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, views may have been expressed on one side or another on that matter, but the discussion would be purely hypothetical, and still is since the governments do not know whether texts would be concluded and approved prior to October 26.

Senator Frith: That is still not dealing with my question. Let me ask if the Leader of the Government will obtain that document and table it for us.

Senator Murray: Which document?

Senator Frith: The memorandum of September 15, 1992, confirmed by Mr. Mark Entwistle who, according to a Canadian Press story, described how some wording was revised in the final version of the memo. I wonder if we could have a copy of that.

However, I am still asking—and I again detect that the answer is yes—whether the parties involved actually considered the possibility of not releasing a text even if they had one. This is not conditional on the question of whether they have one or not. They were discussing the advantages and disadvantages. I want to know whether the government considered the possibility of not releasing a text since the government apparently discussed with the other governments the advantages and disadvantages of releasing texts.

Senator Murray: I honestly cannot imagine what disadvantage there would be in releasing legal texts that had been agreed to by all the parties. I cannot imagine how anyone could see any disadvantage in that. I would see some disadvantage in having 17 different drafts flying around, leading to all sorts of confusion and misinterpretation.

I see no disadvantage, and I do not know anyone who does see any disadvantage, in making public the texts that are finally agreed to by the parties concerned. Was that the question?

Senator Frith: No, it was not. The question was: Did the government and the others negotiating consider and review the advantages and disadvantages of releasing the texts? The answer given by Senator Murray was, "I cannot imagine any disadvantages." The question was, "Did they consider it?" I suppose I will have to assume they did, because he has not challenged the authenticity of the document.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator did ask for a document. My answer to that is this: The government will be happy to table any document which the federal government, 10 provinces, two territories and four Aboriginal associations have agreed to place in the public domain.

Senator Frith: The answers I keep getting do not deal with whether the advantages or disadvantages of releasing the texts were considered. I will take it that the document is not being challenged thus far. We have only the opinion of the Leader of the Government in the Senate on the question pertaining to whether he thinks there are advantages or disadvantages.

Let me go on.

> The memo is a record of a Sept. 10 meeting between federal and provincial officials, and contains legal text proposals that could alter or expand on key parts of the Aug. 28 constitutional accord.

That is not a quote from the document, but a quote from the report.

Senator Murray: From the newspaper?

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Frith: Yes. What I shall read next is an alleged quote from the document.

> Heads of delegations reviewed the advantages and disadvantages of releasing legal texts during the referendum campaign . . .

What does that say? It is not the answer I got. I repeat, it states that they actually considered whether they would or would not release those texts.

I go on:

> It adds, however, that the officials decided to make "best efforts" to finish the texts by the end of September regardless of whether the governments decide to release them before or after the referendum.

This is what I would like to know: Is it true that at the same time as they were making their "best efforts" they were saying, "Even if we succeed, we may not release them to the people before referendum day"?

May I have an answer to that question?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know the answer to that question, because —

Senator Frith: You do not know about the document?

Senator Murray: —I cannot confirm the authenticity of the report from which the honourable senator quotes.

Senator Frith: You do not know about the document to which I am referring, and you do not know whether or not it is authentic.

Senator Murray: No, I do not, honourable senators.

"OUR FUTURE TOGETHER—AN AGREEMENT FOR CONSTITUTIONAL RENEWAL"—HIGHLIGHTS AND SUMMARY OF CHARLOTTETOWN CONSENSUS REPORT

Hon. H.A. Olson: In the same vein, honourable senators, I hold in my hands a pamphlet entitled, "Our Future Together." As the Leader of the Government told us the other day, the government plans to print and mail enough copies of this little pamphlet in order to put one in every mailbox in Canada. Its full title is, "Our Future Together—An Agreement for Constitutional Renewal".

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Is that the text of the Charlottetown agreement?

Senator Olson: It is what the government has, or will, put in every mailbox in Canada.

Senator Murray: Is it the text of the Charlottetown agreement?

Senator Olson: No, I will get to that. I also have in my hand a document entitled, "Consensus Report On the Constitution, Charlottetown, August 28, 1992, Final Text". I received it from the government, too, by the way. The two documents are not the same.

Is the minister aware that this little blue-coloured pamphlet that was sent out to every mailbox in Canada, allegedly being the text of the agreement, contains significant differences from the so-called Consensus Report On the Constitution?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Send it over with a page and I will look at it.

Senator Olson: These two documents, the first to which I referred and which was sent to every mailbox in Canada, and the other one that I received from the government and which states that it is the text of the constitutional review, are not the same. This is a rewrite of the whole thing.

Senator Stewart: It is a spiel!

Senator Olson: There are a few words that are the same, but there is a whole lot that is not the same as the so-called Consensus Report. Do you think it is fair to mislead people by saying that this little blue book contains the review?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the document entitled "Consensus Report On the Constitution" is the actual text of the Charlottetown agreement. The other document to which the honourable senator refers is a summary.

Senator Olson: Why do you say it is the text, then?

Senator Murray: It does not state that it is the text.

Senator Olson: You say it is the renewal.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we will send out this pamphlet. We will also send out the text.

Senator Olson: They have not seen the text yet.

Senator Murray: They will see it. The honourable senator should at least take the trouble to read the first sentence of the pamphlet. It does not purport to be the text. It is clearly not the text. It states:

> This document provides highlights of the unanimous constitutional agreement of August 28, 1992.

Each heading in the pamphlet, whether it be "Quebec's Distinctiveness", "Senate Reform", "The Inherent Right of Self-Government", describes the provisions of this text. The pamphlet is descriptive and is a summary. It is not the text. It does not pretend to be the text.

The honourable senator should not become unnecessarily indignant for no reason at all.

Senator Olson: I think every person in Canada ought to know that this little pamphlet you sent out is not the agreement.

Senator Murray: Unlike the honourable senator, most people will read the first sentence and see that it contains highlights and is not the text.

Senator Olson: I want the Leader of the Government to admit that this pamphlet is not the agreement.

Senator Murray: That is what I said.

Senator Olson: It is someone's interpretation of the text of the agreement.

Senator Murray: Right. It says so in the first sentence.

Senator Olson: You had better let a few people know that what you sent out is not the agreement. You pretend that it is.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No, you pretend that it is. You are the great pretender.

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—AVAILABILITY OF LEGAL TEXTS—POSITION OF PREMIER OF NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, arising from a headline in this morning's Montreal Gazette, which quotes the premier of my province. I do not always agree with him, but I state my agreement when I can.

The headline reads, "Flap over legal text is red herring: McKenna". I agree with him.

I believe that a legal text resulting from a negotiation such as the one we have seen regarding the Constitution will be made available, if and when it is ready. Some 11 to 16 people negotiated that agreement. The only thing that will bring the agreement into force is a legal text. I am sure it is the wish of the negotiators to have that legal text. I also understand that that process can take time. I hope the government can produce it—not that many people would read it. However, it would prove to the naysayers that they were wrong, if it is produced before the vote takes place.

I wish to quote for honourable senators some of what my premier had to say. The article explains why he thinks the flap over the legal text is a red herring. It states in part:

> While federal politicians talk of doom and gloom if the No side prevails, McKenna said the New Brunswick Yes campaign will accentuate the positive.
> It will emphasize why people should vote for the Charlottetown accord, not why they shouldn't vote against it.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Will he kindly ask the Prime Minister to tone down his rhetoric so that people will not vote "no" when in fact they want to vote "yes"?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we all have our own way of bringing issues to a head and conveying what is at stake. The Prime Minister's dedication to the cause of national unity is beyond any doubt. He sees this referendum as a watershed in our history. This referendum will be a defining point in the history of Canada. He believes—as I do, and as I think most of us do—that our future political stability and economic prosperity are riding on the outcome.

Senator Thériault: I do, too.

Senator Murray: Then the honourable senator should not, and obviously does not, disagree with the case the Prime Minister is making.

With regard to the texts, I have had occasion twice this week, and most recently this morning, to speak with some of the officials involved on behalf of the federal government in the discussions with our provincial, territorial and Aboriginal counterparts. Very good headway is being made in ironing out hundreds of technical details in this drafting process, but the fact remains that the legal texts will be what the 17 political leaders unanimously agree they are.

COST AND MEANS OF FINANCING REFERENDUM

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a couple of questions on the constitutional referendum.

Yesterday, the Leader of the Government in the Senate answered a question I had asked earlier. I had asked him for the government's estimate of the cost of the constitutional referendum. His reply, as given at page 2158 of Hansard, is as follows:

> My recollection is that the national referendum will cost somewhere in the vicinity of $150 million, that the funds are in Treasury Board Vote 5, and that they would be transferred to the Chief Electoral Officer for the purpose of conducting a referendum.

My question now is: Am I correct in assuming that the $150 million does not include the costs for printing the pamphlet which was discussed so illuminatingly earlier this afternoon, the cost of printing and distributing the copies of the Charlottetown accord, and costs of the advertisements the Government of Canada will be placing in the media?

If I am correct in that assumption, to what votes will these several additional costs be charged, and what is the government's estimate of the total cost of these promotional activities, which are quite distinct from the $150 million required by the Chief Electoral Officer for the purposes of the referendum?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator is correct in his assumption that the $150 million relates to the conduct of the referendum by the Chief Electoral Officer. I do not know exactly to what vote the other activities will be charged or, indeed, off the top of my head, what the estimate is of the expense involved in these publications and related activities. I would have to make inquiries.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am advised that, according to our rules, the 30 minutes for Question Period are up. However, at the request of the Leader of the Opposition, would honourable senators agree to extend the Question Period?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in view of the fact that we were unable to have a Question Period yesterday, I would request that we extend today's Question Period.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I would agree with that, so long as the extension is not indefinite. I do have other commitments.

[Senator Murray.]

POST-REFERENDUM PROCESS—RECALL OF PARLIAMENT—AVAILABILITY OF WITNESSES TO SENATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, my second question is prompted by the motion of which the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate has given notice, namely the motion concerning adjournment. We are to adjourn for two months.

On September 22, I asked the Leader of the Government about the process in this Parliament and the several legislatures after October 26, assuming a "yes" vote in the referendum. At that time, Senator Murray said, at page 2074:

> My impression is that there is a desire on the part of the various parties to the agreement, the federal government and the provinces being the parties to the amending formula, to proceed quite quickly with the process of legislative ratification so that we do not find ourselves in a similar situation to that which took place between 1987 and 1990 with the Meech Lake Accord.

We are being told that great progress is being made in drafting the actual amendment texts. Assuming that those texts are available before October 26, why should the two Houses of Parliament not return here in November to proceed, as Senator Murray has said, quite quickly with the process of legislative ratification? In Nova Scotia, for example, a provincial election is pending. A federal election is in the offing.

Will this matter be left over so that we can ascertain the outcome of these several elections, or will the government proceed with it quite quickly?

I have another question about the parliamentary process. I refer now to an address made by the Honourable Eric Kierans in Halifax last Friday. Perhaps I had better read a paragraph or two from The Chronicle-Herald of September 26, 1992.

> The man who chaired Nova Scotia's public hearings on the Constitution last year told a Halifax audience Friday he opposes the agreement being voted on Oct. 26 both in content and principle.
> But after a half-hour public tirade against the deal, he said he'll vote for it anyway.
> The one-time Quebec cabinet minister said that regardless of the deal's content, Quebecers will take No as a rejection by English Canada.
> "There is only one reason why I wouldn't vote no and that is that people in Quebec could use the vote to say I didn't like Quebec."

Then later on in the story, he is reported as saying:

> "Nothing is going to happen in either event . . . I'm not voting for or against this stuff, I just don't believe in it."

My question is: When the proposed amendment texts have been made public and are before us, perhaps in November or early in December, will the Senate have an opportunity to call witnesses such as Eric Kierans? Will we have an opportunity to hear this experienced witness with regard to the advisability of adopting several proposed amendments?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, how we proceed at the time of ratification is a matter to which I have not really given much consideration, but of course we will want to discuss that with honourable senators opposite. We will be open to suggestions with regard to hearings and witnesses and so forth.

So far as the schedule of ratification is concerned, yes, all of us, the federal government and the provinces, are anxious to move ahead as quickly as possible.

We are proposing an adjournment to December 1, but it is a relatively simple matter to bring the Senate back earlier than that by way of an instrument of advice to His Honour, the Speaker of the Senate.

Senator Frith: After agreement or consultation?

Senator Murray: No, bringing the Senate back earlier simply requires a request from the government to His Honour. We intend to bring the Senate back before December 1st in any case to deal with third reading of Bill C-80 after the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs has completed its study of that bill.

Senator Molgat: Which may not be till after December 1.

Senator Murray: I would hope and expect that the committee would be able to complete its work before the end of October, and that we would be back here to deal with that matter during October.

After that, I have left the month of November open, but I note that at the present time the plan of the House of Commons is to return only on November 16th. If they were to begin the process of ratification right away, we might want to come back a bit earlier than December 1st, and if they decided to come back prior to November 16th, the likelihood is that we would follow them here earlier.

We have all the leeway in the world to convene at an earlier date. The difficulty arises when we adjourn to an earlier date and bring senators back here only to find that there is not sufficient business to occupy them.

Senator Stewart: The answer is, then, that there is a real possibility that both houses of Parliament will be brought back by the government to deal with the ratification of the constitutional amendments early in November, or perhaps by the middle of November. It is quite possible that we will be back here to deal with the amendments early in November or by the middle of November?

Senator Murray: A real possibility, yes.

REFERENDUM—METHOD OF REPORTING VOTE—EFFECT OF WESTERN PREVIEW

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. I am disturbed by a story that appeared recently in the Globe and Mail regarding the manner in which the vote on the referendum will be reported. The headline is "West to get vote preview. Quebec results can be out early". I will read the first two sections so that my honourable friend will understand exactly what the article is about.

> Westerners will be able to know the results of the Quebec constitutional referendum before they vote on Oct. 26.
> Jean-Pierre Kingsley, Canada's chief electoral officer, told a news briefing yesterday that no blackout will be imposed on broadcasting the Quebec referendum results in other parts of the country.

That means that polls in the western provinces could still be open one, two or three hours after the time that the Quebec vote comes out. I understand that because it is a Quebec referendum and not a national election, the results can be broadcast. Therefore people in British Columbia will know three hours before the closing of the polls exactly how the vote went in Quebec.

I think this poses some very serious problems for the referendum. There ought to be some measures taken which would rectify that situation because it could have a very serious effect on the referendum. Is the government considering anything like that?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not sure what could be done to create a blackout of the Quebec or the eastern results until polls close in the west of the country. The situation is not identical to that of a national election. I would ask the honourable senator to take some comfort from the high probability that the results from Quebec and elsewhere in the east will be such as to encourage an even bigger "yes" vote in the western part of the country.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, is the government looking at this situation and contemplating doing something about it?

Senator Murray: Not that I am aware of, honourable senators, but I will make inquiries.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I agree with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. I think this matter is extremely important. It should be looked into very seriously by the government. If necessary, the House of Commons and the Senate should be reconvened simply for the purpose of enabling a declaration of a "yes" or a "no" at the same time on October 26 from east to west. This, in my estimation, is extremely important.

REFERENDUM—"YES" CAMPAIGN—EFFECT OF PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENTS

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, although I did not intend to speak to any extent, I would like to say that I intend to vote "yes" on October 26, and I know why I will be voting "yes". I would like people to stop confusing the issue by creating all sorts of questions.

We will continue as a country after October 26. It may not be the country that we loved. I am convinced that it will be, but an accident can happen, and if an accident should happen, it will be a temporary accident. Canada will continue.

Senator Frith: You disagree with the Prime Minister, then? Yes, I agree.

Senator Robichaud: I disagree with the Prime Minister. This is the point that I wanted to make. At the moment the worst salesman for the "yes" proposition is the Prime Minister. Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate please tell him to stay home and let the people decide on October 26? If he lets the people decide, they will vote "yes".

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if the Prime Minister were not out campaigning very vigorously and effectively in favour of the "yes" side, the honourable senator would be the first on his feet to complain that the Prime Minister and his ministers are not doing their duty by Canada.

In that respect, I must say that the whole "yes" side could do with something more than the rather faint-hearted participation of the Leader of the Liberal Party and his constant exhortations to "hold your nose and vote for it."

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, does the Government Leader believe that the speech made by the Prime Minister in Sherbrooke is helping the "yes" cause?

Senator Murray: Absolutely, honourable senators, and I invite my friend to wait for a few days, first of all to see how the campaign is going and where the "yes" side is gaining and the "no" side is losing, and then wait to see the results on October 26 which, I am confident, will be resoundingly "yes" in ten provinces and two territories, and nationally.

Senator Molgat: So we have it on the record, then, that the leader accepts that a fear campaign is the right campaign.

UNITED NATIONS

EMERGENCY AID TO SOMALIA—DELAY IN DELIVERY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have follow-up questions to put to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On September 24 he answered some of my questions about the conflict in Bosnia and the famine in Somalia, and I would like to quote him from page 2120 of Hansard. He said:

> With regard to Somalia, we were among the very first countries to provide humanitarian aid. Further to that, we are at the forefront in providing troops in order to do what we can to ensure that the humanitarian aid gets through to the people for whom it is destined.

[Senator Robichaud.]

A little further down the honourable leader said:

> . . . we are providing up to 750 Canadian Forces troops to protect humanitarian operations in one of the four zones for U.N. operations in Somalia.

According to a story in today's Citizen, not many troops are moving. The story is headlined, "Somalia, Dithering at U.N. delays Canadian peacekeepers". I quote:

> Funding problems and diplomatic snags at the United Nations have forced Canada to delay sending peacekeepers to Somalia.

The situation in the drought-ravaged country is worsening. One hundred thousand people have already died. Half a million children risk death within the next few months while the U.N. is dithering. According to armed forces top brass:

• (1510)

> A 750-man battalion from the Canadian Airborne Regiment in Petawawa will be prepared to leave anytime after Sunday . . .

Can the honourable leader inform this honourable house just what the problem is, and can he give any guarantees, within reason, that the troops will be moved to Somalia sometime after Sunday?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The problem, honourable senators, is that there is no government in that country. There is no central authority. Bands of armed gangs are terrorizing the countryside and making it extremely difficult for relief efforts to succeed and, henceforth, for supplies to get through. That is the essential problem.

Yes, we will provide up to 750 troops to protect humanitarian operations in one of the four U.N. operational zones in Somalia. As you know, three of our military aircraft began airlifting supplies to the interior from Kenya on September 12. All I can say is that we are working hard in collaboration with Somalis in Canada and in collaboration with other countries, particularly in the G-7, to overcome some of the major problems in that country.

EMERGENCY AID TO SOMALIA—METHOD OF DELIVERY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a further question in that regard. While I want to thank the leader for his answer, I quote again from the story in today's Ottawa Citizen.

> Another problem is that UN officials haven't decided whether the Canadians should go quickly by air or by sea, which would add weeks.

Now that, I find, is a stupid consideration. Help is needed there now. It was needed there some time ago, and because of this dithering and procrastination, we still do not know how or when people will get there. Surely if the air is clear, whatever political or military authorities are in charge in Somalia, we will not put our troops on ships and expect them to get to Somalia in some weeks' time. Surely we will put them on planes and get them there quickly. I hope the government has enough judgment to see the decency of doing that, even if it costs a little more.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is not a lack of decency, and it is not so much a question of cost. It is a matter of effectiveness in getting aid through. There is no government there. There are countless armed bands operating in an uncontrolled manner in that country. We are involved, as are the Americans, the Italians, Germany, the U.K., Japan and France in responding with supplies. In addition to Canada, the United States, Germany, France and Italy are providing aircraft for the airlifting of relief supplies.

I repeat, honourable senators, that this is an extremely dangerous and difficult process. We have all seen on television reports of what has happened on occasions when some of these armed bands have taken over the airport and helped themselves to the supplies and used them for their own purposes or sold them in the black market, effectively preventing the supplies from getting through to the people who need them. However, I want to assure the honourable senator that all of these countries are making a concerted effort to solve the problem to the extent that we can.

Since at least August, Prime Minister Mulroney has been in touch with President Bush, and with the Secretary General of the United Nations. All of our responsible ministers and officials, both here and abroad, are doing their utmost to see that the needed relief is brought to those desperate people in that unfortunate country.

PEACEKEEPING OPERATIONS—EFFECT OF DEMANDS ON CANADIAN FORCES

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have one final question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Mr. Alex Morrison of the Canadian Institute for Strategic Studies made a statement recently that was published in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of September 3, and I have seen no denial of that statement in any paper since that time. That statement was made following a Canadian commitment for an additional 1,200 Canadian peacekeeping troops to be sent to Bosnia. Mr. Morrison said, "we are starting to stretch it." The article goes on to say:

> Demands on Canada for military personnel to serve in peacekeeping have reached a point where some worry the Armed Forces are being spread too thin.

My question is this: Does the government share that concern, and have we, in fact, reached that limit?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would have to ask for a considered reply to that question from my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, but I think Colonel Morrison is saying no more than the truth when he speaks of the extraordinary demands that have been placed in recent times on our forces by peacekeeping operations old and new.

NOVA SCOTIA

DEVELOPMENT OF WESTRAY MINE—PARTICIPATION OF PRIME MINISTER —APPOINTMENT OF ELMER MACKAY AS MINISTER IN CHARGE OF ACOA

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I said yesterday, and again today, that I have questions on two more subjects, one of which relates to Westray. My question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and it deals with the interest that the Prime Minister took in promoting the development of the Westray mine in Nova Scotia. Is the Leader of the Government aware of a Curragh Resources document that suggests that not only was the Prime Minister directly involved in the promotion of Westray, but that he told then Premier Buchanan that Westray was one of the reasons why he put Elmer MacKay in charge of ACOA?

I should refer to the document more particularly for the sake of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is a document headed "Westray Coal Inc., Memorandum, Confidential." "Note To File (See Attached Distribution List)." It is from Marvin Pelley, Executive Vice President, Mining. "Subject: Meetings with the Premier of Nova Scotia and Don Cameron." In the third paragraph it says:

> The Premier said that he talked to the Prime Minister on Monday and the Prime Minister was disappointed and surprised that the deal was not yet done. The Prime Minister stated that this deal was one of the reasons that Elmer MacKay was put in charge of ACOA.

My first question on that subject is this: Is it true that that was a significant factor in his decision to appoint Elmer MacKay as minister in charge of ACOA?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not the faintest idea, nor do I have any knowledge, of what the honourable senator has indicated is an internal document from a private company.

Senator Frith: Yes. The document is dated March 3, 1989. The Leader of the Government states that he has not the faintest idea.

Is the Leader of the Government now able to acknowledge the Prime Minister's direct interest in the Westray development?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, of course, and for more detail on that, I would refer the honourable senator to the House of Commons Hansard of June 1st, where the Prime Minister dealt with this matter in considerable detail.

Senator Frith: Thank you, I will do that and pursue the matter when we come back.

WESTRAY MINE DISASTER—JUDICIAL INQUIRY—CONSTITUTIONAL JURISDICTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): My third question on this subject is this: Does the government support the position taken by private corporation counsel that the inquiry on this subject cannot consider criminal responsibility because of the fact that the constitutional responsibility for criminal law lies under section 91 and not section 92 of the Constitution?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the short answer will be no. I hasten to add that I do not believe the Attorney General of Canada is intervening in the matter, but if she has anything to add to my short answer I will bring it in.

Senator Frith: The short answer being, "No, the government does not support that position." My question was does the government support —

Senator Murray: Section 91.

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Murray: No.

Senator Frith: The application of section 91 being that the inquiry therefore has no jurisdiction to consider criminal responsibility arising out of the events at Westray. I understand that the answer is —

Senator Murray: As I understand it, there are several grounds on which a group of people have launched a case in Nova Scotia, that being one of them. My understanding is that, no, that is not our position.

Senator Frith: I hope it is clear that I am not limiting it to that ground. I was expressing the ground simply as information on the question. What I really want to know is whether the Government of Canada supports the position, for whatever reason, that the inquiry cannot deal with the question of criminal responsibility. The government is not saying that they are unable to consider the question of criminal responsibility.

Senator Murray: Let me be clear. The position of the Government of Canada with regard to Royal Commissions and inquiries of that kind, appointed by the provinces, is as it was in the 1970s at the time of the Keable Commission in Quebec, a commission which, as I understand it, was upheld by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Senator Frith: I hope everybody can understand that answer, which was supposed to be one of clarification. In any event, the Leader of the Government apparently will take up with the Attorney General and the Minister of Justice what the government's position is on the jurisdiction of this body to consider criminal responsibility.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: If she has anything to add to my short answer, I will bring it in.

Senator Frith: Yes. I recognize fancy footwork when I see it, although I thought it was fairly unfancy at first. It is getting a little more like toe tapping now.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

EFFECT OF FREE TRADE ON EMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning NAFTA. The government is spending $3 million to publish a four-page newspaper to sell Canadians on the NAFTA agreement. It asserts that the free trade agreement has helped attract foreign investment and create jobs. Investment Canada, however, reports that between June 30, 1985, and June 30, 1992, 93.2 per cent of the $115.8 billion of foreign investment in this country went to take over existing businesses. Only 6.8 per cent launched new enterprises. Currently, I believe, there are more than 1.5 million unemployed Canadians—double-digit unemployment, and a further 600,000 have dropped out of the labour force. That being so, is the government, with this document, again trying to fool the people or—and I hope this is the answer—does it have information that it will share with us that contradicts Investment Canada?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition is relating statistics that we put forward with regard to foreign investment in Canada in the period during which the Free Trade Agreement has been in force. The Investment Canada report to which he is referring deals with the period from 1985 to 1992, I believe he said. The free trade agreement came into force in January 1989.

Senator Murray: The period was from 1985 to 1992.

Senator Frith: Yes, which includes the period just referred to by the Leader of the Government. Let me repeat the figures in the four-page, $3 million newspaper. It asserts that free trade has helped attract foreign investment. It has had from 1989 to 1992 to do so, but, according to Investment Canada, only 6.8 per cent of that investment launched new enterprises.

I am asking whether there is some information that the government has that contradicts Investment Canada, because otherwise what they are saying in this newspaper is false.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the only point I want to make is that the relevant period is since January 1, 1989, and I will obtain an analysis from the Department of International Trade and Finance with regard to foreign investment and the purposes to which it was put for the period since the free trade agreement came into being.

Senator Frith: You will ask Investment Canada, I hope.

Senator Murray: And Investment Canada, if the honourable senator wishes.

Senator Frith: That is what I am asking you about, not the Department of Finance.

Senator Murray: I hasten to add that foreign investment that buys up an existing Canadian company is not, as it were, a loss to the Canadian economy. That puts money into the hands of the sellers of the company —

Senator Frith: Yes, so they can go to Florida.

Senator Murray: —which they do not put under a mattress.

Senator Frith: And often they subsequently close it down after they have acquired it.

Senator Murray: This money is frequently used to invest in new, expanding, businesses and other economic activity across the country. The honourable senator surely does not think that the seller of a company takes the cash and puts it under a mattress.

Senator Frith: No, I do not think they do that. However, I am quite sure they do not often take it and immediately go out and create new jobs.

Senator Murray: How do you know?

Senator Frith: I don't know, but neither do you know that they do not put it under a mattress; so it is one speculation for another. Let's get to the important point and that is that only 6.8 per cent launched new enterprises. I take it that the Leader of the Government is smilingly asserting that there is no difference. When they acquire presently existing industries and companies, that is just as effective in creating new jobs as launching new enterprises. If so, why do we still have 1.5 million unemployed and 600,000 dropping out of the labour force?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it would depend on the particular case; it also depends on what the seller does with the proceeds of the sale.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is another answer. I had all these questions and I cannot say I am going into the adjournment with a handful of answers, but certainly a handful of evasions.

THE CONSTITUTION

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—INDIAN SELF-GOVERNMENT—PARAMOUNTCY OF INDIAN LAWS—AVAILABILITY OF LEGAL TEXTS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday I asked a question of the Deputy Leader of the Government to pass on to the leader regarding statements by Mr. Mercredi. I wonder if the leader is in a position to answer.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I am sorry, I am not, honourable senators.

Senator Molgat: Then I will ask the question again. Mr. Mercredi was speaking to a gathering of Manitoba chiefs. The newspaper report has him saying that self-government guaranteed under the accord means that Indian law will come first. Admittedly, that was the press reporter's interpretation.

• (1530)

There is a quotation in the article, which I presume is accurate. Mr. Mercredi stated:

> One of the powers you will have is to make laws to displace federal and provincial laws. There will be a paramountcy of Indian laws.

Is this in all fields? Exactly what does it mean "There will be a paramountcy of Indian laws"?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not think that I or any minister should be asked to comment on a press report of part of a statement made by Mr. Mercredi at a meeting in Manitoba or anywhere else.

With regard to the application of Canadian laws or Aboriginal laws, the honourable senator can read the Charlottetown Consensus Report for himself and see the extent to which the inherent right to self-government exists within the context of Confederation, is subject to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and is also, as I recall, subject to the powers of Parliament and the provinces in the realm of peace, order and good government in the country.

There is nothing more that I can say on this matter.

Senator Molgat: If we had the legal texts, we could find out exactly what it states. I have read the accord and I did not find there an answer to my specific question.

Unless the paramountcy of Indian laws displacing federal and provincial laws is explained, it may cause problems for many Canadians who are wondering what the exact meaning is of the inherent right to self-government. I think that should be explained before October 26.

Senator Olson: Much before.

Senator Murray: The Charlottetown agreement effectively set out the inherent right to self-government, subject to the considerations that I mentioned, and set out a political framework for the negotiation of the inherent right to self-government by the different Aboriginal groups in the country, as well as the province and the federal government.

Hon. H.A. Olson: I should like to ask a supplementary question. All the Indian bands and Indian chiefs in Alberta have looked over that clause. I understand that they have decided to vote against it because that is not what they had been asking to have negotiated. Do not be surprised. You are saying that there is to be paramountcy of Indian law, and that is what they expected. However, that is not what is reflected in the end result, so take your chances.

Surely the Leader of the Government could give us a little indication of whether there is to be paramountcy of aboriginal law or paramountcy of provincial law. Can you tell us?

Senator Murray: I invite my friend to read either the Charlottetown Consensus Report or even the summary which the government has prepared for his convenience.

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—INDIAN SELF-GOVERNMENT—PARAMOUNTCY OF INDIAN LAWS—APPLICABILITY TO MÉTIS POPULATION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have one further question. I assume that once we have an explanation of exactly what rights have been granted under the inherent right to self-government, the same deal will apply to the Métis population. My question then will be: Who will determine who is a Métis?

Senator Gigantès: We all are.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: More than we realize.

Senator Molgat: Does the minister not intend to reply?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will ask my colleague Mr. Clark whether he has any information to provide in that regard.

Senator Olson: He will tell you to vote "yes" or else.

Senator Molgat: This, again, is a very important question which should be answered prior to October 26. As my honourable friend knows, there are many levels of mixed bloods in this country. Who determines who is or is not entitled to be Métis? I would think this would be an important question that people would have in their minds when they are determining how they see the vote.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable Senators, I have delayed answers to questions asked on September 15 by the Honourable Senator Bonnell regarding the status of Concessionaires at Wood Island, on September 16 by Honourable Senator Molgat regarding a proposed meeting of the Prime Minister with big city mayors, and on September 22 by Honourable Senator Olson regarding the assessment of storm damage on the western grain crop.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—STATUS OF PROJECT

(Response to question raised by Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell on September 15, 1992)

The redevelopment of the Wood Islands and Caribou ferry terminals are related to the government's commitment to keep these facilities open. The operators, Northumberland Ferries Limited, made a decision to upgrade the service by purchasing a new ferry which will replace two aging ferries. Several changes in the terminal configuration had to be made in order to properly service the special capabilities of the new ferry. The need for these changes prompted the re-developments.

[Senator Olson.]

In developing the new terminal layout for the upgraded service, Transport Canada tried to facilitate all existing businesses and operations within the new facility. This task was accomplished with the exception of the provincial infrastructure. The province decided it would be best if the scales, decontamination depot and the tourist bureau were relocated in a new complex off the ferry terminal site. The reasoning behind this decision was to try and help alleviate traffic congestion and confusion within the terminal area.

The proposed terminal layout makes for a safer and more practical operation. These changes were the result of discussions and consultations between Public Works Canada, Transport Canada, the Province of Prince Edward Island and local businesses. The last meeting was held on April 13, 1992 in Charlottetown.

It was never the Federal government's intention to affect changes that would not be acceptable to the local businesses or to the province. At present further discussions are planned to try and resolve any outstanding matters.

JUSTICE

SOCIAL UNREST—PROPOSED MEETING OF PRIME MINISTER WITH BIG CITY MAYORS AND FEDERATION OF MUNICIPALITIES

The concerns of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities (FCM) and, in particular, the Big City Mayors' Forum, about urban safety, crime prevention and the need for federal leadership have been and continue to be of on-going importance to the Prime Minister and the federal Minister of Justice.

Long before last spring's disturbances in Toronto, a pattern of regular meetings between the Minister of Justice and Canada's big city mayors had been established. On May 29, 1991, the Minister of Justice met, in Ottawa, with the mayors of Toronto and Montreal; on November 29, 1991, in Toronto, with its newly elected mayor; on December 8, 1991, in Montreal, with its mayor; on April 9, 1992, in Toronto, with the mayors of Toronto, Vancouver, Calgary and Montreal; and on April 25, 1992, in Vancouver, with the mayors of 19 of Canada's big cities. This pattern of meetings continues with a meeting scheduled for October 16, 1992 in Vancouver between the Minister of Justice and representatives of the Vancouver city council.

In concert with the consultations by the Minister of Justice, officials from both the Department of Justice and the FCM are working together to develop and recommend effective strategies for crime prevention and urban safety.

Given the leadership of the federal Minister of Justice in this area, and the active involvement of the FCM and big city mayors, a meeting between the Prime Minister and the representatives of the Big City Mayors' Forum has not been scheduled at this time.

AGRICULTURE

The Grains and Oilseeds Branch of Agriculture Canada monitors crop conditions by province and region throughout Canada on a daily basis. In addition, all of Western Canada is monitored using satellite data to determine crop conditions and assess yield potential on a weekly basis. Soil moisture conditions are calculated weekly using a soil moisture model provided by Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration (PFRA).

During critical periods throughout the growing season, analysts embark on crop tours throughout Western and Eastern Canada measuring yield, quality and soil moisture as well as meeting with producers, elevator managers, trade, industry and other provincial and federal government officials.

In the event of sudden and adverse weather conditions anywhere in Canada, the Department of Agriculture can assess immediately the extent and severity of damage. Constant contact with producers in all provinces, provincial government departments of agriculture, private grain companies, the Canadian Wheat Board, Atmospheric Environment Canada, Statistics Canada, PFRA, provincial crop insurance agencies and other federal and provincial agencies plus a myriad of other sources allows Agriculture Canada to be vigilant in its task.

In early August, the Market Analysis Division of Agriculture Canada forecast total production in Western Canada to be 44.9 million tonnes (Mt) taking into account the effects of the drought in Northern B.C., Northern Alberta and Northern Saskatchewan. The current forecast, taking into account the snow and frost in late August, early and mid-September and an area revision by Statistics Canada in early September, is 41.6 Mt, compared to last year of 48.5 Mt and a 10-year average of 43.5 Mt.

Quality of all grains and oilseeds in Western Canada is below average as a result of drought, frost and snow. Higher proportions of lower grades are estimated for Western Canadian grains and oilseeds.

As weather conditions change, Agriculture Canada will update yield, production and quality assessments of grains and oilseeds across the country.

DAI AL-MUTLAQ—BILL TO INCORPORATE—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Atkins, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doyle, for the second reading of Bill S-13, An Act to incorporate the Dai al-Mutlaq as a corporation sole in Canada.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we shall ask that this item be deferred unless Senator Atkins has more information to give us.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 1, 1992 at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, September 30, 1992

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, a democracy-respecting government as defined by Senator Murray has 51 days to Election Day. Since I believe there is a 50-day minimum for the election writ period, that means one day. That may be a bit too strict, so let us say there are 51 days for the respecters of democracy. Even at that, we would be holding the election sometime in the middle of November.

However, if it is any comfort to those who do not respect democracy, but rather are cowardly and contemptuous of democracy, they have 437 days left.

TRANSPORT CANADA

CANADIAN COAST GUARD—STATION CLOSURES IN NEW BRUNSWICK AND NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Yesterday, I drew your attention to the concerns of the "Keep Letete" committee from Charlotte County, New Brunswick, which questions the decision of the Canadian Coast Guard to close the Letete Central Monitoring Station, as well as the Cape Forchu centre in Nova Scotia. Both centres monitor the unmanned lightstations in each area.

I will continue reading from this letter, which many of you have received, in the hope that perhaps the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communication will want to study this whole matter.

I regret that government-imposed rules do not permit me to read all of the letter in one blast.

Some of the issues are:

> The direct economic loss from Lightkeeper lay-offs . . .
> The dismantling of infrastructure necessary for healthy economic growth . . .
> The Coast Guard refusal to reveal or acknowledge long term intentions.
> Secret preparations for cuts and lay-offs at district level, contrary to political assurances.
> Employment of unethical tactics to deflect and mislead both public and employee concerns.
> Service cuts and/or changes based entirely on political expediency, instead of sound fiscal and user needs.

Some of the solutions are:

> An unambiguous commitment and policy from Transport Canada to maintain existing lightstations and other short range navigational aids . . .
> An acknowledgment from Transport Canada that lightstations and their staff have an intrinsic value to their areas that is substantially greater than their narrow mandate of ensuring proper operation of navigational aids . . .
> An open minded review of individual stations, with the intent that each shall perform as many roles as the local needs and conditions allow.

Then the conclusion:

> Lightkeepers, as a group, have proven their ability and willingness to provide maximum service with any resources available. Only employment uncertainty in recent years has affected recruitment of people who maintain the deep commitment seldom found outside the light service. Remove that uncertainty and the lightkeepers will maintain a 200-year tradition of superior service.

THE CONSTITUTION

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—WESTERN REPRESENTATION

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words about the problem I am having in relation to this referendum. Some of you will know that I made a few remarks yesterday.

Senator Doody: I thought you had finished that.

Senator Olson: Pardon me? I have only three minutes. I hope, that Your Honour will keep track of Senator Doody's interruptions, so that I am not robbed of any portion of my three minutes.

Senator Doody: I did not stop your flow. You did.

Senator Olson: I always listen when somebody else starts talking.

I want to say that, ever since I found out what was in this deal for Western Canada, I have been constantly haunted by a thought. I think of the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, and what he would have done if he had seen his part of the country being shafted in the manner that we in the West are experiencing at this time. If he were alive today, do you know what he would do? He would stand up in this Parliament and everywhere else and tell everyone who would listen that it was his belief that his people need to be represented accurately in the halls of Parliament. He would not be intimidated by the powers of central Canada, and he would represent them accurately.

I appeal to the senators from Western Canada. I am sorry that a number of them who were here yesterday are not here now, especially from the other side of the house. I would exhort them to get up on their feet and defend our part of Canada. We are going to get shafted on the numbers in the Parliament of Canada, and then this package is going to fix the amending formula so that we cannot repair it.

Is it not time you got up and told the people in Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba, or wherever you are from, that this deal is not good for Western Canada? We are worse off, not better off, as far as representation is concerned.

What is more, we have just about 6 million people now in British Columbia and Alberta, and yet we are getting 32 plus 26 plus 6 members. Do you know how many the provinces in central Canada are getting with 6 million people? They are getting 50 per cent—93—or 30 per cent more. Is that fair? If you think it is fair, sit still and let it pass; but I don't think it is fair.

When there was something to be said for the interests of the part of Canada from which he came, Mr. Diefenbaker, whom I knew well, who brought the Conservative Party out of almost complete oblivion and made it a national force, got up and said it in the House of Commons. He didn't just sit there on his hands because of problems he was having with the much superior forces in central Canada. He did something , and I remember Mr. Diefenbaker saying a number of times, "It is the right thing to do", and "I stood alone in this Parliament."

If you people opposite think that sitting still is the way you should represent Western Canada, you should hang your heads in shame. Get up on your feet and defend our part of Canada, which is getting shafted. Or will you just let it go?

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, just to respond to that, if I understand what has been happening in this country in terms of propositions for the reform of the federal parliamentary system on behalf of Western Canada, it was a demand on their part that there be a new Senate that is elected with equal representation from the provinces.

Senator Olson: No, there is an "E" that stands for "effective" too.

Senator Gigantès: You did not want them to interrupt you, sir. Could you give me the same courtesy. Please, do not count the time of interruption.

To continue what I was saying, the theory is that there should be equal numbers of senators per province. The West always said that this was because the House of Commons was represented by population.

If senators from the West were to take a calculator and use Statistics Canada's June, 1992, edition of historical statistics to find the proportion of the population for each of the provinces, and then the proportion of MPs they will have in the new reorganized House of Commons of 337 members, they would find that central Canada—in other words, Ontario and Quebec—will still have a little less than the proportion they should have according to their population.

[Senator Olson.]

I have done these calculations and I have them in my office for anyone who wants them. Eastern Canada will remain a little over-represented. Those are the figures. I am not giving you theory; I am giving you arithmetic.

• (1410)

Senator Doody: How far east is "east"?

Senator Gigantès: Western Canada, after 1996, will be dead on. I do not think that this particular change in the election of the new Senate will take place much before 1995. So they might be disadvantaged for one year.

As for the effectiveness of the Senate, the proof of the pudding will be in the eating. It is very difficult to tell in advance how effective this new Senate will be.

Senator Thériault: It will be.

Senator Gigantès: There is no doubt that, because of the fact that they will be elected and each of them will represent a much greater number of people, elected senators will speak with much greater authority than we are allowed. Thus, if you wanted "rep by pop" in the House of Commons and "rep by province" in the Senate, that is what this new agreement is giving you almost dead on the nose, like it or not.

Senator Olson: That is crap!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I would like to attend one of your caucus meetings.

Senator Olson: You do not know how to multiply.

Senator Frith: His arithmetic is good.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as indicated yesterday, the business of the house being what it is, we can assume that we can adjourn this afternoon or sometime later today. The knowledge that we have of any business coming from the other place being what it is, we feel that this house can stand adjourned until December 1, 1992. The only exception to that is that we will be called back sometime after Thanksgiving, after the hearings on Bill C-80 by the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science, and Technology, to deal with its report and deal with the bill on third reading.

Honourable senators, with that explanation, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, December 1, 1992, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIER OF QUEBEC—DOCUMENTS TABLED

Leave having been given to revert to Tabling of Documents:

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, for some days there has been a question before us concerning correspondence exchanged between Prime Minister Mulroney and Premier Bourassa. That correspondence was tabled in the National Assembly of Quebec on September 16. As I said earlier, there would be no objection, therefore, on the part of the government of Quebec, as there is certainly none on the part of our government, to tabling these documents in this place.

[Translation]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 338 citizens of Nova Scotia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Margaree Valley, Margaree Forks, Antigonish, Little Judique, Mabou, Dartmoth, Creignish, Port Hastings, Inverness, Bras d'Or, George River, Cheticamp and Sydney.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 198 citizens of Alberta who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Manning, Peace River, Nampa, Grande Cache, Dixonville, Grimshaw, Berwyn, Calgary, Valleyview and Grande Prairie.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 100 citizens of Saskatchewan who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Regina, Saskatoon, Moose Jaw and Fellmore.

Finally, honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 501 citizens of Quebec who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions reached me in July, in case that might interest Senator Murray!

This makes a grand total of 1,137 Canadians who are unhappy with the government and its GST, and there are millions more like them!

[English]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present several petitions —

Senator Hébert: Against the GST?

Senator Marshall: —comprising 215 names; individual signatures from the provinces of Ontario, Alberta, Saskatchewan, New Brunswick and British Columbia, praying and calling upon Parliament to support the activities of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs in examining the authenticity of the series of films under the title: The Valour and the Horror, namely, Savage Christmas: Hong Kong 1941, Death By Moonlight: Bomber Command, and In Desperate Battle: Normandy 1944.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

REFERENDUM QUESTION—STATEMENTS OF PRIME MINISTER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have some questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but before posing them, I wish to make a few general comments. One such comment is that a quick reading of the Order Paper indicates there will not be very much other business today. Therefore, I hope that we can extend the Question Period a little, if it becomes necessary. I have no indication at this time that it will be, but it might be.

I say that because I have questions on three subjects: One on the Constitution referendum where I am seeking some clarification, one on the Westray issue and one on NAFTA. When I am finished with my questions on the constitutional process, other senators on either side may wish to join in, so I will yield at that point with the hope that I can continue on and ask my other questions after that subject has been exhausted.

Honourable senators, on Monday of this week the Prime Minister appeared in Sherbrooke, Quebec, to speak about the referendum. At that time he warned, according to a press report of that event, as follows:

> "A No will not mean 'business as usual'. It will mean the end of negotiations and the end of the process that lead to Charlottetown. A No will mean —

and I underline that.

> A No will mean as (PQ leader Jacques) Mr. Parizeau admits, the beginning of the process of dismantling Canada."

He then proceeded, in a somewhat circus-like fashion, like a circus strongman—and perhaps that is how we sees himself—to rip the Charlottetown agreement in two.

Senator Gigantès: Only three pages.

Senator Frith: The next day in Halifax he denied saying what he had, in fact, said. Later, in a television interview, a question was asked as to whether he felt any personal responsibility for the falling dollar.

• (1420)

Mulroney replied:

> Of course not. What I was doing yesterday, I was referring to Mr. Parizeau, not me.

However, in the speech in Sherbrooke, he said: "A No will mean, as Mr. Parizeau admits, the beginning of the process of dismantling Canada." It was very explicit that, in the opinion of Mr. Mulroney, a "no" means the beginning of the end for Canada and that Mr. Parizeau admits it. It was not, as he was implying, simply a matter of that being what Mr. Parizeau believed. He said, "This is what I, the Prime Minister, say, and it is something Mr. Parizeau admits to be true".

On that subject, I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, does he agree with the Prime Minister and Mr. Parizeau?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think you have to look at the reference to Mr. Parizeau and indeed to the "no" forces in Quebec in the light of the strategy that they adopted almost immediately upon the calling of the referendum. At that point, Mr. Parizeau and his colleagues were trying to advance the somewhat insidious, in my view, argument that a "no" vote in the referendum would be absolutely without consequences; that a "no" vote was not really a vote on sovereignty; that a "no" vote was simply for the continuation of negotiations. Thus did Mr. Parizeau hope to attract the support of people who are federalists.

Since that time, Mr. Parizeau and some of his supporters, notably the Honourable Lucien Bouchard, have really let the cat out of the bag. Mr. Parizeau, when speaking to a group of students within the past week or so, trumpeted the fact that a "no" vote would, indeed, get the last impediment out of the way and the road would be clear to sovereignty.

What the Prime Minister was doing in his speeches in Sherbrooke and in Halifax, and in some other interviews that I saw referred to, was to highlight the fact that Mr. Parizeau and his colleagues had now taken the veil away; they had disclosed what had been their objective all along, and their true objective in this referendum, as in their political activity generally, is to bring about the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada.

Senator Frith: I do not know whether other honourable senators are having the difficulty I am having in understanding whether that was an answer to my question, although I must say that I appreciate the Leader of the Government's wanting to get those words on the record; but perhaps we could get back to my question.

The statement I was asking him about was:

> A No will not mean 'business as usual.' It will mean the end of negotiations, and the end of the process that led to Charlottetown. A No will mean . . . the beginning of the process of dismantling Canada.

My question was: Does Senator Murray agree with the Prime Minister and Mr. Parizeau that a "no" vote will have that result?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, quite a number of us have said—and of course I support what I believe is the obvious conclusion—that a "no" vote on October 26 will, indeed, be the end of the process that led to Charlottetown.

Nobody with any knowledge or experience in these matters truly believes that a "no" vote would be followed by a resumption of negotiations among the federal government, 10 provinces, two territories and four Aboriginal associations. To expect such a thing to happen would be totally unrealistic in political terms.

• (1430)

As for it being a step towards the dismantling of the country, yes, I have no doubt that the forces of separatism in Quebec, led by Mr. Parizeau and Mr. Bouchard, would immediately interpret a "no" vote as the first step towards separation. I think that the demand for a referendum on sovereignty would increase quite considerably, and that Quebec and the rest of the country would be in a difficult position indeed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think I detected a hint, at least, that the answer to my question is yes, that the Government Leader does agree with the Prime Minister and Mr. Parizeau. Let me just try to tighten it up a bit to be sure that I do understand.

What will happen if the referendum results in a "no" vote in this context? If the government calls an election between now and October 26, that would have the result, of course, of derailing the whole referendum process under the legislation we passed. However, assuming that this government is still in office on October 27, and there is a "no" vote, will constitutional negotiations end, as Mr. Mulroney has said—and as apparently Senator Murray agrees—and will the government then begin negotiating the dismantling of our country? Would that be their policy on that occasion?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I hope the honourable senator understands, the statement I have made, and which has been confirmed by many of the parties to the Charlottetown agreement, including Premier Rae in the last few days, is that it would be totally unrealistic to expect that constitutional negotiations could resume on the ashes of the Charlottetown agreement.

Second, the answer of course is no, we do not intend to negotiate the dismantling of the country, but I have already pointed out that that is the option of the separatist forces under Mr. Parizeau, and I have no doubt they will do everything possible to bring it about.

Third, I may say, perhaps to the disappointment of some honourable senators opposite and to the surprise of others, that I fully expect the results of the referendum on October 26 to be a resounding "yes", nationally and in every province and territory.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if I understand the answer, the government would not, in those circumstances, initiate any dismantling, but would have to respond to any initiatives taken by another government.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Parti Quebecois is the opposition party in Quebec. Mr. Lucien Bouchard leads a small group in the House of Commons. I am stating that in terms of their public positions and their parties, they would take new encouragement—and why would they not from a "no" vote—that their option was in the ascendancy, and their objective is the dismantlement of the country.

I take it that that objective is not shared by the honourable senator, who I presume will be taking part in this campaign on the side of the "yes" forces, however faint-heartedly. That option is not shared and will be fought against by all those who are true federalists.

Senator Frith: We do not really know what the government will do in that case because they cannot contemplate the possibility, and of course our position and this party's position is that we do not want that result, either. However, we understand that the government is certain it will not happen, and therefore has no particular position as to what it will do if there is a "no" vote either in Quebec or in some other provinces. The government is not thinking about that.

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—AVAILABILITY OF LEGAL TEXTS—DESIRABILITY AND DATE OF ISSUANCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Let me turn to one other aspect, then, that has been the focus of a good deal of attention, and that is the question of the legal texts. Some governments, including those that were negotiators at Charlottetown —

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): And all governments were.

Senator Frith: Yes, of course, they all were. I am just underlining the fact that they were members of the negotiating team.

Messrs. Getty and Wells have stressed the importance of having the legal texts prior to October 26. Mr. Horsman, I understand from what our colleague Senator Olson told us yesterday, is quite firm on this point. However, Premier Rae suggested that Canadians do not need the legal texts in order to make an informed decision.

I would like to know this from the government leader: Have there been discussions between the representatives of the federal government and the provinces about the desirability or the advantages and disadvantages of releasing the final legal texts before Canadians have a chance to vote on October 26? Second, was the question mooted as to whether or not we should issue the legal texts before that date?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the only answer I can give to that question is that all of the governments involved have been working diligently to conclude the legal texts. The officials representing the federal government, ten provinces, two territories and four Aboriginal associations met three times prior to this week and are meeting all this week —and will have met four times this week—with a view to reaching an agreement on all of these legal texts.

Of course it must be stated that the political leaders who negotiated the Charlottetown agreement will, as a group, have to give final approval to the legal texts. The texts would be brought into Parliament and into the various legislatures for ratification.

Senator Frith: Again, I have some useful information, but that really was not my question. My question was based on a memorandum of September 15, which states:

> Heads of delegations reviewed the advantages and disadvantages of releasing legal texts during the referendum campaign.

We now know from the answer given by the Leader of the Government that they have been discussing, preparing and reviewing legal texts. My question was whether those involved, including the government of which he is a member, discussed the disadvantages or advantages of releasing legal texts during the referendum campaign.

I assume that the Leader of the Government is familiar with that memo. Its existence was confirmed by Mr. Mark Entwistle of the Prime Minister's office.

My question is: Did this government and the other governments actually consider the advantages or disadvantages of releasing any text?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, views may have been expressed on one side or another on that matter, but the discussion would be purely hypothetical, and still is since the governments do not know whether texts would be concluded and approved prior to October 26.

Senator Frith: That is still not dealing with my question. Let me ask if the Leader of the Government will obtain that document and table it for us.

Senator Murray: Which document?

Senator Frith: The memorandum of September 15, 1992, confirmed by Mr. Mark Entwistle who, according to a Canadian Press story, described how some wording was revised in the final version of the memo. I wonder if we could have a copy of that.

However, I am still asking—and I again detect that the answer is yes—whether the parties involved actually considered the possibility of not releasing a text even if they had one. This is not conditional on the question of whether they have one or not. They were discussing the advantages and disadvantages. I want to know whether the government considered the possibility of not releasing a text since the government apparently discussed with the other governments the advantages and disadvantages of releasing texts.

Senator Murray: I honestly cannot imagine what disadvantage there would be in releasing legal texts that had been agreed to by all the parties. I cannot imagine how anyone could see any disadvantage in that. I would see some disadvantage in having 17 different drafts flying around, leading to all sorts of confusion and misinterpretation.

I see no disadvantage, and I do not know anyone who does see any disadvantage, in making public the texts that are finally agreed to by the parties concerned. Was that the question?

Senator Frith: No, it was not. The question was: Did the government and the others negotiating consider and review the advantages and disadvantages of releasing the texts? The answer given by Senator Murray was, "I cannot imagine any disadvantages." The question was, "Did they consider it?" I suppose I will have to assume they did, because he has not challenged the authenticity of the document.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator did ask for a document. My answer to that is this: The government will be happy to table any document which the federal government, 10 provinces, two territories and four Aboriginal associations have agreed to place in the public domain.

Senator Frith: The answers I keep getting do not deal with whether the advantages or disadvantages of releasing the texts were considered. I will take it that the document is not being challenged thus far. We have only the opinion of the Leader of the Government in the Senate on the question pertaining to whether he thinks there are advantages or disadvantages.

Let me go on.

> The memo is a record of a Sept. 10 meeting between federal and provincial officials, and contains legal text proposals that could alter or expand on key parts of the Aug. 28 constitutional accord.

That is not a quote from the document, but a quote from the report.

Senator Murray: From the newspaper?

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Frith: Yes. What I shall read next is an alleged quote from the document.

> Heads of delegations reviewed the advantages and disadvantages of releasing legal texts during the referendum campaign . . .

What does that say? It is not the answer I got. I repeat, it states that they actually considered whether they would or would not release those texts.

I go on:

> It adds, however, that the officials decided to make "best efforts" to finish the texts by the end of September regardless of whether the governments decide to release them before or after the referendum.

This is what I would like to know: Is it true that at the same time as they were making their "best efforts" they were saying, "Even if we succeed, we may not release them to the people before referendum day"?

May I have an answer to that question?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know the answer to that question, because —

Senator Frith: You do not know about the document?

Senator Murray: —I cannot confirm the authenticity of the report from which the honourable senator quotes.

Senator Frith: You do not know about the document to which I am referring, and you do not know whether or not it is authentic.

Senator Murray: No, I do not, honourable senators.

"OUR FUTURE TOGETHER—AN AGREEMENT FOR CONSTITUTIONAL RENEWAL"—HIGHLIGHTS AND SUMMARY OF CHARLOTTETOWN CONSENSUS REPORT

Hon. H.A. Olson: In the same vein, honourable senators, I hold in my hands a pamphlet entitled, "Our Future Together." As the Leader of the Government told us the other day, the government plans to print and mail enough copies of this little pamphlet in order to put one in every mailbox in Canada. Its full title is, "Our Future Together—An Agreement for Constitutional Renewal".

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Is that the text of the Charlottetown agreement?

Senator Olson: It is what the government has, or will, put in every mailbox in Canada.

Senator Murray: Is it the text of the Charlottetown agreement?

Senator Olson: No, I will get to that. I also have in my hand a document entitled, "Consensus Report On the Constitution, Charlottetown, August 28, 1992, Final Text". I received it from the government, too, by the way. The two documents are not the same.

Is the minister aware that this little blue-coloured pamphlet that was sent out to every mailbox in Canada, allegedly being the text of the agreement, contains significant differences from the so-called Consensus Report On the Constitution?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Send it over with a page and I will look at it.

Senator Olson: These two documents, the first to which I referred and which was sent to every mailbox in Canada, and the other one that I received from the government and which states that it is the text of the constitutional review, are not the same. This is a rewrite of the whole thing.

Senator Stewart: It is a spiel!

Senator Olson: There are a few words that are the same, but there is a whole lot that is not the same as the so-called Consensus Report. Do you think it is fair to mislead people by saying that this little blue book contains the review?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the document entitled "Consensus Report On the Constitution" is the actual text of the Charlottetown agreement. The other document to which the honourable senator refers is a summary.

Senator Olson: Why do you say it is the text, then?

Senator Murray: It does not state that it is the text.

Senator Olson: You say it is the renewal.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we will send out this pamphlet. We will also send out the text.

Senator Olson: They have not seen the text yet.

Senator Murray: They will see it. The honourable senator should at least take the trouble to read the first sentence of the pamphlet. It does not purport to be the text. It is clearly not the text. It states:

> This document provides highlights of the unanimous constitutional agreement of August 28, 1992.

Each heading in the pamphlet, whether it be "Quebec's Distinctiveness", "Senate Reform", "The Inherent Right of Self-Government", describes the provisions of this text. The pamphlet is descriptive and is a summary. It is not the text. It does not pretend to be the text.

The honourable senator should not become unnecessarily indignant for no reason at all.

Senator Olson: I think every person in Canada ought to know that this little pamphlet you sent out is not the agreement.

Senator Murray: Unlike the honourable senator, most people will read the first sentence and see that it contains highlights and is not the text.

Senator Olson: I want the Leader of the Government to admit that this pamphlet is not the agreement.

Senator Murray: That is what I said.

Senator Olson: It is someone's interpretation of the text of the agreement.

Senator Murray: Right. It says so in the first sentence.

Senator Olson: You had better let a few people know that what you sent out is not the agreement. You pretend that it is.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No, you pretend that it is. You are the great pretender.

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—AVAILABILITY OF LEGAL TEXTS—POSITION OF PREMIER OF NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, arising from a headline in this morning's Montreal Gazette, which quotes the premier of my province. I do not always agree with him, but I state my agreement when I can.

The headline reads, "Flap over legal text is red herring: McKenna". I agree with him.

I believe that a legal text resulting from a negotiation such as the one we have seen regarding the Constitution will be made available, if and when it is ready. Some 11 to 16 people negotiated that agreement. The only thing that will bring the agreement into force is a legal text. I am sure it is the wish of the negotiators to have that legal text. I also understand that that process can take time. I hope the government can produce it—not that many people would read it. However, it would prove to the naysayers that they were wrong, if it is produced before the vote takes place.

I wish to quote for honourable senators some of what my premier had to say. The article explains why he thinks the flap over the legal text is a red herring. It states in part:

> While federal politicians talk of doom and gloom if the No side prevails, McKenna said the New Brunswick Yes campaign will accentuate the positive.
> It will emphasize why people should vote for the Charlottetown accord, not why they shouldn't vote against it.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Will he kindly ask the Prime Minister to tone down his rhetoric so that people will not vote "no" when in fact they want to vote "yes"?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we all have our own way of bringing issues to a head and conveying what is at stake. The Prime Minister's dedication to the cause of national unity is beyond any doubt. He sees this referendum as a watershed in our history. This referendum will be a defining point in the history of Canada. He believes—as I do, and as I think most of us do—that our future political stability and economic prosperity are riding on the outcome.

Senator Thériault: I do, too.

Senator Murray: Then the honourable senator should not, and obviously does not, disagree with the case the Prime Minister is making.

With regard to the texts, I have had occasion twice this week, and most recently this morning, to speak with some of the officials involved on behalf of the federal government in the discussions with our provincial, territorial and Aboriginal counterparts. Very good headway is being made in ironing out hundreds of technical details in this drafting process, but the fact remains that the legal texts will be what the 17 political leaders unanimously agree they are.

COST AND MEANS OF FINANCING REFERENDUM

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a couple of questions on the constitutional referendum.

Yesterday, the Leader of the Government in the Senate answered a question I had asked earlier. I had asked him for the government's estimate of the cost of the constitutional referendum. His reply, as given at page 2158 of Hansard, is as follows:

> My recollection is that the national referendum will cost somewhere in the vicinity of $150 million, that the funds are in Treasury Board Vote 5, and that they would be transferred to the Chief Electoral Officer for the purpose of conducting a referendum.

My question now is: Am I correct in assuming that the $150 million does not include the costs for printing the pamphlet which was discussed so illuminatingly earlier this afternoon, the cost of printing and distributing the copies of the Charlottetown accord, and costs of the advertisements the Government of Canada will be placing in the media?

If I am correct in that assumption, to what votes will these several additional costs be charged, and what is the government's estimate of the total cost of these promotional activities, which are quite distinct from the $150 million required by the Chief Electoral Officer for the purposes of the referendum?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator is correct in his assumption that the $150 million relates to the conduct of the referendum by the Chief Electoral Officer. I do not know exactly to what vote the other activities will be charged or, indeed, off the top of my head, what the estimate is of the expense involved in these publications and related activities. I would have to make inquiries.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am advised that, according to our rules, the 30 minutes for Question Period are up. However, at the request of the Leader of the Opposition, would honourable senators agree to extend the Question Period?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in view of the fact that we were unable to have a Question Period yesterday, I would request that we extend today's Question Period.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I would agree with that, so long as the extension is not indefinite. I do have other commitments.

[Senator Murray.]

POST-REFERENDUM PROCESS—RECALL OF PARLIAMENT—AVAILABILITY OF WITNESSES TO SENATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, my second question is prompted by the motion of which the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate has given notice, namely the motion concerning adjournment. We are to adjourn for two months.

On September 22, I asked the Leader of the Government about the process in this Parliament and the several legislatures after October 26, assuming a "yes" vote in the referendum. At that time, Senator Murray said, at page 2074:

> My impression is that there is a desire on the part of the various parties to the agreement, the federal government and the provinces being the parties to the amending formula, to proceed quite quickly with the process of legislative ratification so that we do not find ourselves in a similar situation to that which took place between 1987 and 1990 with the Meech Lake Accord.

We are being told that great progress is being made in drafting the actual amendment texts. Assuming that those texts are available before October 26, why should the two Houses of Parliament not return here in November to proceed, as Senator Murray has said, quite quickly with the process of legislative ratification? In Nova Scotia, for example, a provincial election is pending. A federal election is in the offing.

Will this matter be left over so that we can ascertain the outcome of these several elections, or will the government proceed with it quite quickly?

I have another question about the parliamentary process. I refer now to an address made by the Honourable Eric Kierans in Halifax last Friday. Perhaps I had better read a paragraph or two from The Chronicle-Herald of September 26, 1992.

> The man who chaired Nova Scotia's public hearings on the Constitution last year told a Halifax audience Friday he opposes the agreement being voted on Oct. 26 both in content and principle.
> But after a half-hour public tirade against the deal, he said he'll vote for it anyway.
> The one-time Quebec cabinet minister said that regardless of the deal's content, Quebecers will take No as a rejection by English Canada.
> "There is only one reason why I wouldn't vote no and that is that people in Quebec could use the vote to say I didn't like Quebec."

Then later on in the story, he is reported as saying:

> "Nothing is going to happen in either event . . . I'm not voting for or against this stuff, I just don't believe in it."

My question is: When the proposed amendment texts have been made public and are before us, perhaps in November or early in December, will the Senate have an opportunity to call witnesses such as Eric Kierans? Will we have an opportunity to hear this experienced witness with regard to the advisability of adopting several proposed amendments?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, how we proceed at the time of ratification is a matter to which I have not really given much consideration, but of course we will want to discuss that with honourable senators opposite. We will be open to suggestions with regard to hearings and witnesses and so forth.

So far as the schedule of ratification is concerned, yes, all of us, the federal government and the provinces, are anxious to move ahead as quickly as possible.

We are proposing an adjournment to December 1, but it is a relatively simple matter to bring the Senate back earlier than that by way of an instrument of advice to His Honour, the Speaker of the Senate.

Senator Frith: After agreement or consultation?

Senator Murray: No, bringing the Senate back earlier simply requires a request from the government to His Honour. We intend to bring the Senate back before December 1st in any case to deal with third reading of Bill C-80 after the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs has completed its study of that bill.

Senator Molgat: Which may not be till after December 1.

Senator Murray: I would hope and expect that the committee would be able to complete its work before the end of October, and that we would be back here to deal with that matter during October.

After that, I have left the month of November open, but I note that at the present time the plan of the House of Commons is to return only on November 16th. If they were to begin the process of ratification right away, we might want to come back a bit earlier than December 1st, and if they decided to come back prior to November 16th, the likelihood is that we would follow them here earlier.

We have all the leeway in the world to convene at an earlier date. The difficulty arises when we adjourn to an earlier date and bring senators back here only to find that there is not sufficient business to occupy them.

Senator Stewart: The answer is, then, that there is a real possibility that both houses of Parliament will be brought back by the government to deal with the ratification of the constitutional amendments early in November, or perhaps by the middle of November. It is quite possible that we will be back here to deal with the amendments early in November or by the middle of November?

Senator Murray: A real possibility, yes.

REFERENDUM—METHOD OF REPORTING VOTE—EFFECT OF WESTERN PREVIEW

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government. I am disturbed by a story that appeared recently in the Globe and Mail regarding the manner in which the vote on the referendum will be reported. The headline is "West to get vote preview. Quebec results can be out early". I will read the first two sections so that my honourable friend will understand exactly what the article is about.

> Westerners will be able to know the results of the Quebec constitutional referendum before they vote on Oct. 26.
> Jean-Pierre Kingsley, Canada's chief electoral officer, told a news briefing yesterday that no blackout will be imposed on broadcasting the Quebec referendum results in other parts of the country.

That means that polls in the western provinces could still be open one, two or three hours after the time that the Quebec vote comes out. I understand that because it is a Quebec referendum and not a national election, the results can be broadcast. Therefore people in British Columbia will know three hours before the closing of the polls exactly how the vote went in Quebec.

I think this poses some very serious problems for the referendum. There ought to be some measures taken which would rectify that situation because it could have a very serious effect on the referendum. Is the government considering anything like that?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not sure what could be done to create a blackout of the Quebec or the eastern results until polls close in the west of the country. The situation is not identical to that of a national election. I would ask the honourable senator to take some comfort from the high probability that the results from Quebec and elsewhere in the east will be such as to encourage an even bigger "yes" vote in the western part of the country.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, is the government looking at this situation and contemplating doing something about it?

Senator Murray: Not that I am aware of, honourable senators, but I will make inquiries.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I agree with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. I think this matter is extremely important. It should be looked into very seriously by the government. If necessary, the House of Commons and the Senate should be reconvened simply for the purpose of enabling a declaration of a "yes" or a "no" at the same time on October 26 from east to west. This, in my estimation, is extremely important.

REFERENDUM—"YES" CAMPAIGN—EFFECT OF PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENTS

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, although I did not intend to speak to any extent, I would like to say that I intend to vote "yes" on October 26, and I know why I will be voting "yes". I would like people to stop confusing the issue by creating all sorts of questions.

We will continue as a country after October 26. It may not be the country that we loved. I am convinced that it will be, but an accident can happen, and if an accident should happen, it will be a temporary accident. Canada will continue.

Senator Frith: You disagree with the Prime Minister, then? Yes, I agree.

Senator Robichaud: I disagree with the Prime Minister. This is the point that I wanted to make. At the moment the worst salesman for the "yes" proposition is the Prime Minister. Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate please tell him to stay home and let the people decide on October 26? If he lets the people decide, they will vote "yes".

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if the Prime Minister were not out campaigning very vigorously and effectively in favour of the "yes" side, the honourable senator would be the first on his feet to complain that the Prime Minister and his ministers are not doing their duty by Canada.

In that respect, I must say that the whole "yes" side could do with something more than the rather faint-hearted participation of the Leader of the Liberal Party and his constant exhortations to "hold your nose and vote for it."

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, does the Government Leader believe that the speech made by the Prime Minister in Sherbrooke is helping the "yes" cause?

Senator Murray: Absolutely, honourable senators, and I invite my friend to wait for a few days, first of all to see how the campaign is going and where the "yes" side is gaining and the "no" side is losing, and then wait to see the results on October 26 which, I am confident, will be resoundingly "yes" in ten provinces and two territories, and nationally.

Senator Molgat: So we have it on the record, then, that the leader accepts that a fear campaign is the right campaign.

UNITED NATIONS

EMERGENCY AID TO SOMALIA—DELAY IN DELIVERY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have follow-up questions to put to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On September 24 he answered some of my questions about the conflict in Bosnia and the famine in Somalia, and I would like to quote him from page 2120 of Hansard. He said:

> With regard to Somalia, we were among the very first countries to provide humanitarian aid. Further to that, we are at the forefront in providing troops in order to do what we can to ensure that the humanitarian aid gets through to the people for whom it is destined.
> [Senator Robichaud.]

A little further down the honourable leader said:

> . . . we are providing up to 750 Canadian Forces troops to protect humanitarian operations in one of the four zones for U.N. operations in Somalia.

According to a story in today's Citizen, not many troops are moving. The story is headlined, "Somalia, Dithering at U.N. delays Canadian peacekeepers". I quote:

> Funding problems and diplomatic snags at the United Nations have forced Canada to delay sending peacekeepers to Somalia.

The situation in the drought-ravaged country is worsening. One hundred thousand people have already died. Half a million children risk death within the next few months while the U.N. is dithering. According to armed forces top brass:

• (1510)

> A 750-man battalion from the Canadian Airborne Regiment in Petawawa will be prepared to leave anytime after Sunday . . .

Can the honourable leader inform this honourable house just what the problem is, and can he give any guarantees, within reason, that the troops will be moved to Somalia sometime after Sunday?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The problem, honourable senators, is that there is no government in that country. There is no central authority. Bands of armed gangs are terrorizing the countryside and making it extremely difficult for relief efforts to succeed and, henceforth, for supplies to get through. That is the essential problem.

Yes, we will provide up to 750 troops to protect humanitarian operations in one of the four U.N. operational zones in Somalia. As you know, three of our military aircraft began airlifting supplies to the interior from Kenya on September 12. All I can say is that we are working hard in collaboration with Somalis in Canada and in collaboration with other countries, particularly in the G-7, to overcome some of the major problems in that country.

EMERGENCY AID TO SOMALIA—METHOD OF DELIVERY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a further question in that regard. While I want to thank the leader for his answer, I quote again from the story in today's Ottawa Citizen.

> Another problem is that UN officials haven't decided whether the Canadians should go quickly by air or by sea, which would add weeks.

Now that, I find, is a stupid consideration. Help is needed there now. It was needed there some time ago, and because of this dithering and procrastination, we still do not know how or when people will get there. Surely if the air is clear, whatever political or military authorities are in charge in Somalia, we will not put our troops on ships and expect them to get to Somalia in some weeks' time. Surely we will put them on planes and get them there quickly. I hope the government has enough judgment to see the decency of doing that, even if it costs a little more.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is not a lack of decency, and it is not so much a question of cost. It is a matter of effectiveness in getting aid through. There is no government there. There are countless armed bands operating in an uncontrolled manner in that country. We are involved, as are the Americans, the Italians, Germany, the U.K., Japan and France in responding with supplies. In addition to Canada, the United States, Germany, France and Italy are providing aircraft for the airlifting of relief supplies.

I repeat, honourable senators, that this is an extremely dangerous and difficult process. We have all seen on television reports of what has happened on occasions when some of these armed bands have taken over the airport and helped themselves to the supplies and used them for their own purposes or sold them in the black market, effectively preventing the supplies from getting through to the people who need them. However, I want to assure the honourable senator that all of these countries are making a concerted effort to solve the problem to the extent that we can.

Since at least August, Prime Minister Mulroney has been in touch with President Bush, and with the Secretary General of the United Nations. All of our responsible ministers and officials, both here and abroad, are doing their utmost to see that the needed relief is brought to those desperate people in that unfortunate country.

PEACEKEEPING OPERATIONS—EFFECT OF DEMANDS ON CANADIAN FORCES

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have one final question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Mr. Alex Morrison of the Canadian Institute for Strategic Studies made a statement recently that was published in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of September 3, and I have seen no denial of that statement in any paper since that time. That statement was made following a Canadian commitment for an additional 1,200 Canadian peacekeeping troops to be sent to Bosnia. Mr. Morrison said, "we are starting to stretch it." The article goes on to say:

> Demands on Canada for military personnel to serve in peacekeeping have reached a point where some worry the Armed Forces are being spread too thin.

My question is this: Does the government share that concern, and have we, in fact, reached that limit?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would have to ask for a considered reply to that question from my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, but I think Colonel Morrison is saying no more than the truth when he speaks of the extraordinary demands that have been placed in recent times on our forces by peacekeeping operations old and new.

NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I said yesterday, and again today, that I have questions on two more subjects, one of which relates to Westray. My question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and it deals with the interest that the Prime Minister took in promoting the development of the Westray mine in Nova Scotia. Is the Leader of the Government aware of a Curragh Resources document that suggests that not only was the Prime Minister directly involved in the promotion of Westray, but that he told then Premier Buchanan that Westray was one of the reasons why he put Elmer MacKay in charge of ACOA?

I should refer to the document more particularly for the sake of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is a document headed "Westray Coal Inc., Memorandum, Confidential." "Note To File (See Attached Distribution List)." It is from Marvin Pelley, Executive Vice President, Mining. "Subject: Meetings with the Premier of Nova Scotia and Don Cameron." In the third paragraph it says:

> The Premier said that he talked to the Prime Minister on Monday and the Prime Minister was disappointed and surprised that the deal was not yet done. The Prime Minister stated that this deal was one of the reasons that Elmer MacKay was put in charge of ACOA.

My first question on that subject is this: Is it true that that was a significant factor in his decision to appoint Elmer MacKay as minister in charge of ACOA?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not the faintest idea, nor do I have any knowledge, of what the honourable senator has indicated is an internal document from a private company.

Senator Frith: Yes. The document is dated March 3, 1989. The Leader of the Government states that he has not the faintest idea.

Is the Leader of the Government now able to acknowledge the Prime Minister's direct interest in the Westray development?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, of course, and for more detail on that, I would refer the honourable senator to the House of Commons Hansard of June 1st, where the Prime Minister dealt with this matter in considerable detail.

Senator Frith: Thank you, I will do that and pursue the matter when we come back.

WESTRAY MINE DISASTER—JUDICIAL INQUIRY—CONSTITUTIONAL JURISDICTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): My third question on this subject is this: Does the government support the position taken by private corporation counsel that the inquiry on this subject cannot consider criminal responsibility because of the fact that the constitutional responsibility for criminal law lies under section 91 and not section 92 of the Constitution?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the short answer will be no. I hasten to add that I do not believe the Attorney General of Canada is intervening in the matter, but if she has anything to add to my short answer I will bring it in.

Senator Frith: The short answer being, "No, the government does not support that position." My question was does the government support —

Senator Murray: Section 91.

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Murray: No.

Senator Frith: The application of section 91 being that the inquiry therefore has no jurisdiction to consider criminal responsibility arising out of the events at Westray. I understand that the answer is —

Senator Murray: As I understand it, there are several grounds on which a group of people have launched a case in Nova Scotia, that being one of them. My understanding is that, no, that is not our position.

Senator Frith: I hope it is clear that I am not limiting it to that ground. I was expressing the ground simply as information on the question. What I really want to know is whether the Government of Canada supports the position, for whatever reason, that the inquiry cannot deal with the question of criminal responsibility. The government is not saying that they are unable to consider the question of criminal responsibility.

Senator Murray: Let me be clear. The position of the Government of Canada with regard to Royal Commissions and inquiries of that kind, appointed by the provinces, is as it was in the 1970s at the time of the Keable Commission in Quebec, a commission which, as I understand it, was upheld by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Senator Frith: I hope everybody can understand that answer, which was supposed to be one of clarification. In any event, the Leader of the Government apparently will take up with the Attorney General and the Minister of Justice what the government's position is on the jurisdiction of this body to consider criminal responsibility.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: If she has anything to add to my short answer, I will bring it in.

Senator Frith: Yes. I recognize fancy footwork when I see it, although I thought it was fairly unfancy at first. It is getting a little more like toe tapping now.

EFFECT OF FREE TRADE ON EMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning NAFTA. The government is spending $3 million to publish a four-page newspaper to sell Canadians on the NAFTA agreement. It asserts that the free trade agreement has helped attract foreign investment and create jobs. Investment Canada, however, reports that between June 30, 1985, and June 30, 1992, 93.2 per cent of the $115.8 billion of foreign investment in this country went to take over existing businesses. Only 6.8 per cent launched new enterprises. Currently, I believe, there are more than 1.5 million unemployed Canadians—double-digit unemployment, and a further 600,000 have dropped out of the labour force. That being so, is the government, with this document, again trying to fool the people or—and I hope this is the answer—does it have information that it will share with us that contradicts Investment Canada?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition is relating statistics that we put forward with regard to foreign investment in Canada in the period during which the Free Trade Agreement has been in force. The Investment Canada report to which he is referring deals with the period from 1985 to 1992, I believe he said. The free trade agreement came into force in January 1989.

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Murray: The period was from 1985 to 1992.

Senator Frith: Yes, which includes the period just referred to by the Leader of the Government. Let me repeat the figures in the four-page, $3 million newspaper. It asserts that free trade has helped attract foreign investment. It has had from 1989 to 1992 to do so, but, according to Investment Canada, only 6.8 per cent of that investment launched new enterprises.

I am asking whether there is some information that the government has that contradicts Investment Canada, because otherwise what they are saying in this newspaper is false.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the only point I want to make is that the relevant period is since January 1, 1989, and I will obtain an analysis from the Department of International Trade and Finance with regard to foreign investment and the purposes to which it was put for the period since the free trade agreement came into being.

Senator Frith: You will ask Investment Canada, I hope.

Senator Murray: And Investment Canada, if the honourable senator wishes.

Senator Frith: That is what I am asking you about, not the Department of Finance.

Senator Murray: I hasten to add that foreign investment that buys up an existing Canadian company is not, as it were, a loss to the Canadian economy. That puts money into the hands of the sellers of the company —

Senator Frith: Yes, so they can go to Florida.

Senator Murray: —which they do not put under a mattress.

Senator Frith: And often they subsequently close it down after they have acquired it.

Senator Murray: This money is frequently used to invest in new, expanding, businesses and other economic activity across the country. The honourable senator surely does not think that the seller of a company takes the cash and puts it under a mattress.

Senator Frith: No, I do not think they do that. However, I am quite sure they do not often take it and immediately go out and create new jobs.

Senator Murray: How do you know?

Senator Frith: I don't know, but neither do you know that they do not put it under a mattress; so it is one speculation for another. Let's get to the important point and that is that only 6.8 per cent launched new enterprises. I take it that the Leader of the Government is smilingly asserting that there is no difference. When they acquire presently existing industries and companies, that is just as effective in creating new jobs as launching new enterprises. If so, why do we still have 1.5 million unemployed and 600,000 dropping out of the labour force?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it would depend on the particular case; it also depends on what the seller does with the proceeds of the sale.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is another answer. I had all these questions and I cannot say I am going into the adjournment with a handful of answers, but certainly a handful of evasions.

THE CONSTITUTION

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—INDIAN SELF-GOVERNMENT—PARAMOUNTCY OF INDIAN LAWS—AVAILABILITY OF LEGAL TEXTS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday I asked a question of the Deputy Leader of the Government to pass on to the leader regarding statements by Mr. Mercredi. I wonder if the leader is in a position to answer.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I am sorry, I am not, honourable senators.

Senator Molgat: Then I will ask the question again. Mr. Mercredi was speaking to a gathering of Manitoba chiefs. The newspaper report has him saying that self-government guaranteed under the accord means that Indian law will come first. Admittedly, that was the press reporter's interpretation.

• (1530)

There is a quotation in the article, which I presume is accurate. Mr. Mercredi stated:

> One of the powers you will have is to make laws to displace federal and provincial laws. There will be a paramountcy of Indian laws.

Is this in all fields? Exactly what does it mean "There will be a paramountcy of Indian laws"?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not think that I or any minister should be asked to comment on a press report of part of a statement made by Mr. Mercredi at a meeting in Manitoba or anywhere else.

With regard to the application of Canadian laws or Aboriginal laws, the honourable senator can read the Charlottetown Consensus Report for himself and see the extent to which the inherent right to self-government exists within the context of Confederation, is subject to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and is also, as I recall, subject to the powers of Parliament and the provinces in the realm of peace, order and good government in the country.

There is nothing more that I can say on this matter.

Senator Molgat: If we had the legal texts, we could find out exactly what it states. I have read the accord and I did not find there an answer to my specific question.

Unless the paramountcy of Indian laws displacing federal and provincial laws is explained, it may cause problems for many Canadians who are wondering what the exact meaning is of the inherent right to self-government. I think that should be explained before October 26.

Senator Olson: Much before.

Senator Murray: The Charlottetown agreement effectively set out the inherent right to self-government, subject to the considerations that I mentioned, and set out a political framework for the negotiation of the inherent right to self-government by the different Aboriginal groups in the country, as well as the province and the federal government.

Hon. H.A. Olson: I should like to ask a supplementary question. All the Indian bands and Indian chiefs in Alberta have looked over that clause. I understand that they have decided to vote against it because that is not what they had been asking to have negotiated. Do not be surprised. You are saying that there is to be paramountcy of Indian law, and that is what they expected. However, that is not what is reflected in the end result, so take your chances.

Surely the Leader of the Government could give us a little indication of whether there is to be paramountcy of aboriginal law or paramountcy of provincial law. Can you tell us?

Senator Murray: I invite my friend to read either the Charlottetown Consensus Report or even the summary which the government has prepared for his convenience.

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—INDIAN SELF-GOVERNMENT—PARAMOUNTCY OF INDIAN LAWS—APPLICABILITY TO MÉTIS POPULATION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have one further question. I assume that once we have an explanation of exactly what rights have been granted under the inherent right to self-government, the same deal will apply to the Métis population. My question then will be: Who will determine who is a Métis?

Senator Gigantès: We all are.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: More than we realize.

Senator Molgat: Does the minister not intend to reply?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will ask my colleague Mr. Clark whether he has any information to provide in that regard.

Senator Olson: He will tell you to vote "yes" or else.

Senator Molgat: This, again, is a very important question which should be answered prior to October 26. As my honourable friend knows, there are many levels of mixed bloods in this country. Who determines who is or is not entitled to be Métis? I would think this would be an important question that people would have in their minds when they are determining how they see the vote.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable Senators, I have delayed answers to questions asked on September 15 by the Honourable Senator Bonnell regarding the status of Concessionaires at Wood Island, on September 16 by Honourable Senator Molgat regarding a proposed meeting of the Prime Minister with big city mayors, and on September 22 by Honourable Senator Olson regarding the assessment of storm damage on the western grain crop.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—STATUS OF PROJECT

(Response to question raised by Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell on September 15, 1992)

The redevelopment of the Wood Islands and Caribou ferry terminals are related to the government's commitment to keep these facilities open. The operators, Northumberland Ferries Limited, made a decision to upgrade the service by purchasing a new ferry which will replace two aging ferries. Several changes in the terminal configuration had to be made in order to properly service the special capabilities of the new ferry. The need for these changes prompted the re-developments.

[Senator Olson.]

In developing the new terminal layout for the upgraded service, Transport Canada tried to facilitate all existing businesses and operations within the new facility. This task was accomplished with the exception of the provincial infrastructure. The province decided it would be best if the scales, decontamination depot and the tourist bureau were relocated in a new complex off the ferry terminal site. The reasoning behind this decision was to try and help alleviate traffic congestion and confusion within the terminal area.

The proposed terminal layout makes for a safer and more practical operation. These changes were the result of discussions and consultations between Public Works Canada, Transport Canada, the Province of Prince Edward Island and local businesses. The last meeting was held on April 13, 1992 in Charlottetown.

It was never the Federal government's intention to affect changes that would not be acceptable to the local businesses or to the province. At present further discussions are planned to try and resolve any outstanding matters.

JUSTICE

SOCIAL UNREST—PROPOSED MEETING OF PRIME MINISTER WITH BIG CITY MAYORS AND FEDERATION OF MUNICIPALITIES

The concerns of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities (FCM) and, in particular, the Big City Mayors' Forum, about urban safety, crime prevention and the need for federal leadership have been and continue to be of on-going importance to the Prime Minister and the federal Minister of Justice.

Long before last spring's disturbances in Toronto, a pattern of regular meetings between the Minister of Justice and Canada's big city mayors had been established. On May 29, 1991, the Minister of Justice met, in Ottawa, with the mayors of Toronto and Montreal; on November 29, 1991, in Toronto, with its newly elected mayor; on December 8, 1991, in Montreal, with its mayor; on April 9, 1992, in Toronto, with the mayors of Toronto, Vancouver, Calgary and Montreal; and on April 25, 1992, in Vancouver, with the mayors of 19 of Canada's big cities. This pattern of meetings continues with a meeting scheduled for October 16, 1992 in Vancouver between the Minister of Justice and representatives of the Vancouver city council.

In concert with the consultations by the Minister of Justice, officials from both the Department of Justice and the FCM are working together to develop and recommend effective strategies for crime prevention and urban safety.

Given the leadership of the federal Minister of Justice in this area, and the active involvement of the FCM and big city mayors, a meeting between the Prime Minister and the representatives of the Big City Mayors' Forum has not been scheduled at this time.

AGRICULTURE

(Response to question raised by Hon. H.A. Olson on September 22, 1992)

The Grains and Oilseeds Branch of Agriculture Canada monitors crop conditions by province and region throughout Canada on a daily basis. In addition, all of Western Canada is monitored using satellite data to determine crop conditions and assess yield potential on a weekly basis. Soil moisture conditions are calculated weekly using a soil moisture model provided by Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration (PFRA).

During critical periods throughout the growing season, analysts embark on crop tours throughout Western and Eastern Canada measuring yield, quality and soil moisture as well as meeting with producers, elevator managers, trade, industry and other provincial and federal government officials.

In the event of sudden and adverse weather conditions anywhere in Canada, the Department of Agriculture can assess immediately the extent and severity of damage. Constant contact with producers in all provinces, provincial government departments of agriculture, private grain companies, the Canadian Wheat Board, Atmospheric Environment Canada, Statistics Canada, PFRA, provincial crop insurance agencies and other federal and provincial agencies plus a myriad of other sources allows Agriculture Canada to be vigilant in its task.

In early August, the Market Analysis Division of Agriculture Canada forecast total production in Western Canada to be 44.9 million tonnes (Mt) taking into account the effects of the drought in Northern B.C., Northern Alberta and Northern Saskatchewan. The current forecast, taking into account the snow and frost in late August, early and mid-September and an area revision by Statistics Canada in early September, is 41.6 Mt, compared to last year of 48.5 Mt and a 10-year average of 43.5 Mt.

Quality of all grains and oilseeds in Western Canada is below average as a result of drought, frost and snow. Higher proportions of lower grades are estimated for Western Canadian grains and oilseeds.

As weather conditions change, Agriculture Canada will update yield, production and quality assessments of grains and oilseeds across the country.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the election clock is ticking, but with a slightly different sound now. If the government of which Senator Murray is a member respects democracy, Canadians will cast their ballots within 38 days, but if they are cowardly and contemptuous of democracy, that cowardly and contemptuous group has 424 days.

The thing is that Canadians cannot cast their ballots within 30 days because the minimum election period is 50 days. Therefore for 12 days now, according to the criteria laid out by the Leader of the Government in the Senate himself, this government has displayed cowardice and contempt for the democratic process.

DRAFT LEGAL TEXT TABLED

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the honour to table, in both English and French, the draft legal text, projet de texte juridique, based on the Charlottetown accord of August 28, 1992. It is a "best efforts" text prepared by officials representing all of the first ministers and the Aboriginal and territorial leaders.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Best efforts, that is the problem. That is the best they can do.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he calls it the Charlottetown accord or the Charlottetown agreement?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am reading from the title page: "The attached draft legal text is based on the Charlottetown Accord of August 28, 1992."

Senator Frith: It is a debatable point as to whether you can call it that.

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, presented the following report:

TUESDAY, October 13, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to present its

TWELFTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-80, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act, has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Tuesday, September 29, 1992, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

NOEL A. KINSELLA
Acting Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): At the next sitting of the senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a point of order, that motion should really be made by the senator in charge. That is what the rule says.

Hon. Mira Spivak: At the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, perhaps the chairman might give an outline of the report?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Senator Bosa has asked that the chairman give an outline of the report. The report, as I understand it, recommends that the bill be brought back to the Senate and reported without amendment. If the honourable senator wishes to give leave that we proceed now with debate on third reading, of course Senator Kinsella would be quite prepared to discuss the contents of his report.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the rules provide that a bill reported without amendment stands adopted and that the senator in charge of the bill—I am simply quoting your own rules—must move third reading of the bill at a later date. That has been done.

Senator Murray: I was replying to Senator Bosa.

Senator Hastings: Take it easy!

On motion of Senator Spivak, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

EIGHTY-EIGHTH CONFERENCE, STOCKHOLM, SWEDEN—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I give notice that at the next sitting of the Senate, I will draw the attention of this chamber to the Eighty-eighth IPU Conference, which took place in Stockholm, Sweden, from September 5 to 12, 1992.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to point out to the Honourable Senator Bosa, with respect to his Notice of Inquiry, that rule 58(2) says:

> . . . notice is required of any inquiry not relating to a bill or other matter appearing among the Orders of the Day or on the Order Paper.

There is a 48-hour notice requirement. Therefore, we will place this Notice of Inquiry on the Order Paper for Thursday instead of the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Bosa: I wish to abide by the rules, honourable senators.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 160 citizens of Nova Scotia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Glace Bay, New Waterford, East Bay, Louisdale, Petit de Grat, West Arichat and Pictou.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 280 citizens of New Brunswick who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions come mainly from Pokesudie, Saint John, Caraquet, Burnt Church, Saint Léolin, Lagacéville, Rogersville, Tracadie, Lamèque, Grande Anse, Bas Caraquet, Saint Isidore and Saint Simon.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 150 citizens of Alberta who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions come mainly from Calgary, Banff, Red Deer, Edmonton and Canmore.

Finally, honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 500 citizens of Quebec who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions come mainly from St-Hyacinthe, Chandler, St-Ambroise, Woburn, Ste-Sophie, St-Jérôme, Montreal, Scotstown, Longueuil, St-Thomas d'Aquin, Ste-Agathe, St-Urbain, Granby, Île Perrot, Quebec City, Lévis, St-Lambert and Dollard des Ormeaux.

Honourable Senators, in case Senator Murray is still concerned about it, I am pleased to tell him that these petitions go back to this summer. They were signed in June, long after the GST was imposed on Canadians in the undemocratic way we know. The total number of petitions presented today is 1,090; they come from a large number of citizens who continue to oppose the GST and are just waiting for election day to show their discontent more effectively than by presenting petitions to a government that has long since stopped listening to them, as Senator Simard has just shown again by his snickering!

BILL TO AMEND—USE OF CLOSURE IN COMMITTEE TO CURTAIL HEARINGS—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on Tuesday, September 29, 1992, Bill C-80 was given second reading and referred to committee. During the debate on the procedure that day, Senator Lynch-Staunton, the Deputy Leader of the Government, said at page 2145 of the Debates of the Senate:

> . . . on a number of occasions we have asked for agreement on having a debate at this stage, which is second reading, in order to send the bill to committee no later than Friday, in order to give the committee plenty of time to hold hearings . . .

Then he said:

> The government does not determine the committee's schedule.
> As I was saying, this must be done for the bill to come back in good time in order for the House to study the committee's report and to vote on third reading by the end of this month at the latest.

To which Senator Hébert said:

> By the end of this month?

Senator Lynch-Staunton replied:

> Yes, by the end of this month.

• (2010)

Senator Murray, on Tuesday, September 22, 1992, said:

> I presume that after we have dealt with Bills C-55 and C-80 the Senate will adjourn and the committee will begin its consideration of Bill C-80. Committee members will not have attendance in the Senate chamber to distract them. They will be able to sit morning, noon and night for as long as it takes to deal properly with Bill C-80.

An Hon. Senator: One day.

Senator Frith: In fact, there was less than 12 hours of testimony by the public. Of the 30 or 31 witnesses who wanted to appear, only nine were heard. Two witnesses appeared on Wednesday night and seven on Thursday—a total of 12 hours and nine witnesses. Is that what Senator Murray meant—

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: This is not third reading, is it?

Senator Frith: Do you want to hear the question? Was that what Senator Murray meant?

Senator Barootes: Is this third reading of the bill?

Senator Hastings: It is a question.

Senator Barootes: Talk to your friends; they understand.

Senator Frith: As I was saying, less than 12 hours of testimony by the public was allowed.

Senator Barootes: Not the seven hours you allowed on the GST.

Senator Frith: Oh, I see.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh!

Senator Frith: Now you have decided that what we did on the GST was right?

Senator Barootes: No.

Senator Frith: Is that what you are doing now? You are following our example, are you?

Senator Barootes: You set up much more.

Senator Frith: You are blaming that on the poor, too, are you? You are in favour of what happened in the GST. You are following that example, are you?

Senator Barootes: I am?

Senator Frith: Are you not? Then be quiet.

Senator Barootes: I almost died in this house.

Senator Frith: Is that not what you are suggesting?

Senator Barootes: Ask your friends there.

Senator Frith: It seems like we have a bit of thin skin over there today; there's a bit of seepage out of the ears there, senator.

Senator Barootes: No. Your three minutes are up.

Senator Hastings: What three minutes? Read the rules!

An Hon. Senator: Ask the question!

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: If you allow me to ask it, I will. Less than 12 hours of testimony by the public was allowed. Nine witnesses were heard—two on Wednesday night and seven on Thursday.

Senator Simard: Ask a question!

Senator Forrestall: We are not in court.

Senator Frith: We are hearing from Elvis over here. Sing us a song, Elvis. Two witnesses were heard on Wednesday night and seven were heard on Thursday. That is a total of 12 hours and nine witnesses. Is that what Senator Murray meant when he said that the committee would meet for as long as it took to deal properly with Bill C-80? Is that what Senator Lynch-Staunton meant when he said:

> Therefore, on a number of occasions we have asked for agreement . . . in order to send the bill to committee no later than Friday, in order to give the committee plenty of time to hold hearings . . .
> The government does not determine the committee's schedule . . . this must be done for the bill to come back . . . by the end of this month.

Although that is what Senator Lynch-Staunton said, we had less than 12 hours of testimony from the public. He referred to ample time, but then gave less than 12 hours. We provided a list of 33 potential witnesses. Why were 13 of those groups not even called to see whether they would be interested in appearing? Why do you bother giving us such guff and then, having shut off debate through closure in the committee and having brought us back here, you stand up and make all these statements. Is that any indication of what we can believe when you stand up, smiling as you are now, and say, "We have lots of time. Of course, we will give the committee lots of time." Those are your words. Is that what we can assume will happen in the future when you give us such assurances? I think it is.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I look forward with the keenest anticipation to the debate on third reading of Bill C-80, when this discussion can more properly be held.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that has become the typical answer; a smirky, arrogant answer, showing complete contempt for the Senate. We see complete contempt for the leader's own undertakings to the Senate through his own words of only a short time ago. He does not look like he is suffering from short term memory loss. Those were his words. When asked to give these undertakings, why was he not at least forthright, saying, "Look, we're not going to give you time to do this. We want this bill back before the referendum is over so that nobody will notice what we are doing to these social programs while their attention is on the referendum." Why not be at least straightforward and manly and tell us, "Look, we intend to shove this thing through"; because that is what they intended to do, and that is what they have done.

I don't know why he did not do that. Instead, we were given those silly undertakings, then brought back and shown that the Leader of the Government had no sincere intention of fulfilling the undertakings at all.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, again, we can have this discussion within the rules on third reading of Bill C-80, and I propose to take part and to deal with the arguments that the honourable senator has put forward —

Senator Frith: What about answering the question?

Senator Murray: —in the course of the oral Question Period tonight.

Senator Frith: The question being asked is not, "Are you looking forward to the debate?" which relates to the answer that was given. I might ask that question sometime: "Dear Senator Murray, are you looking forward to the debate?" Then you could stand and give that answer, and it would look like an answer to the question being asked. The question being asked is: Why did you not tell us the truth when you gave us the undertakings that you gave?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition should not really leave all his fight in the gym. He should save some of this synthetic indignation for the debate on third reading.

Senator Frith: Again, is that the answer to the question? The answer to the question is, first: I am looking forward to the debate—nothing to do with the question at all. The next answer is a comment about what I should do, not an answer to the question. Therefore we will not have an answer to the question. I can understand why, because it would be so embarrassing to face the question instead of smirkingly avoiding answering the question.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there are 14 other Liberal senators present.

Senator Frith: So that is the answer, that there are 14 other senators.

Senator Murray: I should hope that the Leader of the Opposition will give some of his colleagues an opportunity to ask a question.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, let's make sure that the record is correct. The record will show that the answer to the question is that there are 14 other senators. The question is a clear question, phrased in three different ways. The answer, as given by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who is here to answer questions during Question Period is, first, I am looking forward to the debate—some answer that is—second, that I should behave in some way and, thirdly, that there are 14 other senators. That is the kind of answer we get from the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Why does he waste his time by making these silly assertions, these bland assurances and blandishments when he has no intention of fulfilling them or answering questions about them?

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, since the Leader of the Government in the Senate was not present at the committee hearings, he may not be aware of a suggestion that I made which would have accommodated the concerns expressed by government members on the committee. We could not have extended hearings because we are in the midst of a referendum debate, and we should be out on the hustings trying to promote a "yes" vote, which is a very legitimate concern.

The officials of the department stated that they needed to send out publicity advertising this new program on November 2. I moved an amendment to the motion that was put at that time to postpone the hearings from Thursday to October 27, the day after the referendum. That would have given us an opportunity to call the other witnesses who wanted to appear before the committee. It would have accommodated the government agenda and also the aspirations of the opposition.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate give us a commitment that he will consider that suggestion? There is still time to change the closure motion that was moved in committee. Will the leader consider that?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the committee is master of its own deliberations. I am not about to substitute my judgment for theirs on a matter of this nature. If the honourable senator has a quarrel with the way in which the committee reached its decision, this is a matter that he can properly raise in the course of the debate on third reading, and at that time he is free, as are other senators, to move amendments, if they so wish.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, since the committee is the master of its own proceedings, according to the leader, perhaps we should question the acting chairman of the committee. As reported at page 2158 of the Debates of the Senate on Tuesday, September 29, Senator Kinsella, the Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, stated:

> We hope to proceed with our work in an expeditious manner, but still allow ample time for the witnesses to prepare.

We heard less than 12 hours of testimony from members of the public. Is this the ample time to which he was referring?

We provided a list of 33 potential witnesses. Why were 13 of those groups not even called to see if they were interested in appearing?

I hope that we will receive an answer to that question.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, first and foremost, the role in which I served was acting chairman of the committee. Rather than commence hearings the day after the committee received a reference from the Senate, we waited until the following Wednesday before we commenced our hearings.

Colleagues on both sides who were members of the committee suggested names of potential witnesses. We had a list of 31 names, and the clerk commenced calling the names that were on that list. He was successful in reaching 18 of the 31, two of whom did not wish to appear.

It seems to me that, in this way, a few days were provided in which those potential witnesses were able to prepare to appear before the committee. However, rather than the committee commencing its examination of the bill on the next day or the day after receiviving its reference, we proceeded on the following Wednesday.

In terms of what then happened on the Wednesday, that is all recorded in the proceedings of the committee, and was a very open process. The questions at that time were: What new witnesses would the committee call, and under what time frame would the committee operate? That is all recorded in the proceedings and was not a decision of the steering committee but of the whole committee.

Senator Frith: The acting chairman of the committee will remember that the Deputy Leader of the Government wanted the bill sent to committee by Friday so that the committee would have plenty of time to hold hearings. He will remember that the Senate did not send the bill to committee on Friday, but on that very day, Tuesday, and still the government members would allow only one and a half days of hearings for the public.

Why was that?

I take it the chairman of the committee is saying that nobody spoke to him about getting it through at all. All of a sudden some motion came forward from one of the senators to, in effect, put closure on the hearing of witnesses.

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, it was before the weekend that the bill was referred to the committee so it could commence its hearings. We did not commence our hearings the day after we received the reference from the house. We waited a few days into the following week. Indeed, it was Wednesday. That was the time frame, and it allowed witnesses from out of town to appear before us.

As to other witnesses, we had published the agenda that was adopted, which contained the nine, as the Leader of the Opposition counts them. They did appear. The question then was what other witnesses would be called. The whole committee addressed that question, not the steering committee. It was the decision of the committee.

Senator Frith: You say it was the whole of the committee. I take it you mean a vote by the government members of the committee.

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, some —

[Senator Kinsella.]

Senator Frith: Are you suggesting that the Liberal senators supported cutting off the witnesses?

Senator Kinsella: I merely refer all honourable senators to the proceedings of the committee. All decisions that were taken in the committee are recorded there.

Senator Frith: I cannot ask the members of the committee questions in Question Period, but I can ask you. I am asking you in your position as the chairman of the committee. I am asking you about the conduct of your committee. What was the basis for the decision to cut off hearing witnesses that the committee knew wanted to be heard?

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, as I said, the list was presented, and we were able to arrange for a number of them to appear for the two days of hearings. The question as to what other witnesses would be called was a decision to be taken by the members of the committee. The Chair did not exercise that judgment.

Senator Frith: I am asking you what reason was given for cutting off those other witnesses. That is the question I have asked you three times. I think you perhaps have a good chance of becoming Senate Leader, because you have learned very well from your leader about answering questions, and that is not to answer them at all. The question is: What reason was given in the committee for cutting off approximately two-thirds of the witnesses from the public who wanted to be heard? What reason was given in the committee for doing that?

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, the reasons which motivated the committee, and the reasons as articulated, are those which are recorded in the proceedings of the committee.

Senator Frith: Why can't you tell me, then?

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, I suggest you get a copy. It is available to all honourable senators. I could read the proceedings, but the reasons that were given are those which were articulated and that were —

Senator Frith: The answer is that you are not going to answer. That's what I thought.

Senator Kinsella: And that were recorded. I am not a bad psychologist, but —

Senator Frith: Did you not hear what the reasons were?

Senator Kinsella: —I do not presume to know what people's reasons were other than the reasons they articulated. All the reasons that were articulated were recorded by the scribes and are contained in the proceedings.

Senator Frith: Can't you tell us what they were? Is there some reason that your mouth is stopped up, that you cannot tell us what those reasons were? We can ask you questions in the Senate about that, and I am asking you, as chairman, what the reasons were, because this deals with a decision made by your committee. In my opinion, you are responsible for an explanation to the Senate at large as to why that decision was made. Otherwise, there is no reason in the rules for the chairman of a committee to be subject to questioning. I am asking you the question, but I take it the answer is that I have to read it. You are not going to tell the Senate. You are telling all the senators to go read it. As chairman, you are not accepting the responsibility of telling the Senate why that happened. The answer is no answer, as with your colleague.

Senator Kinsella: As chairman of this committee, this particular chairman made every effort to be open with all honourable members of the committee.

Senator Frith: That's not what I asked you.

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, if the questioner is allowed to make a preambular comment in phrasing the question, surely the senator responding to the question is allowed to put it into context.

Senator Frith: But you are not going to answer. You are not going to tell us why.

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, the reasons for all decisions taken by members of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology with regard to this matter are contained in Issue No. 21, the issue that deals with the proceedings for Wednesday, October 7, 1992, and, in particular, I refer you to pages 52 and page 53. It is there in black and white. Everything that was said was recorded. In answering, I simply say that the answer is the answer that is provided therein.

Senator Frith: So there is no real point in the rule that provides for questions being asked of a committee chairman, because the chairman simply stands up and says, "Read the report. I am not going to answer your question." That is what this chairman has refused to do now four times.

TIMING OF HEARINGS—AVAILABILITY OF WITNESSES

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): In answer to a statement that the committee was unable to find a single individual or group which would speak in favour of the legislation, and that the government chose after only 12 hours of testimony from the public to muzzle anyone and everyone who had anything to say, someone from Senator Murray's office said that the committee could have called more witnesses if it had started its hearings earlier in the week.

That is interesting in view of the fact that the bill was sent to the committee on the Tuesday, and the chairman himself said he wanted to take that time. But the public is told that the Liberals did not want to start until Wednesday. That is not true.

That spokesman denied that the government could not find any witnesses to speak in favour of the legislation, and named one she said had done so. There was one. I hope it wasn't poor Adele again that had to be the one person in favour of it. Do we have to read the report, or would the chairman tell us who that one witness supporting the government was?

No answer? Let it be noted that the chairman shakes his head. The rules provide he can be asked questions, but he won't answer.

CANVASSING OF WITNESSES

Hon. Jacques Hébert: I will try to ask a simpler question of the chairman of the committee. Why is it that you did not order the clerk to make phone calls to these 31, 32 or 33 witnesses that we thought should be heard? Why is it that only a few were called and not all of them?

• (2040)

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, the clerk of the committee started at the top of the list, or wherever, and began to call all of the witnesses. There is no doubt that when making a phone call, you do not always get the person you are calling. There were those kinds of problems.

Let us be perfectly clear, honourable senators. The agenda for the first two days of hearings was packed full. We had a good number of witnesses.

Senator Frith: We are asking about the other ones.

Senator Kinsella: The committee then took a decision. It was not a decision taken by the chairman. The committee took a decision and it is recorded in the proceedings of the committee.

Senator Frith: You wash your hands like Pontius Pilate. "Nothing to do with me; the committee did it all."

Senator Hébert: I wish to ask another question of the chairman of the committee. Senators opposite are giving the impression that, for some reason or other, it was Liberal senators who delayed the process starting last Wednesday.

Does the acting chairman of the committee remember that I asked the same question of the nine witnesses who appeared before the committee? I asked each how long they had to prepare their briefs. Am I right in saying that the answer given in each case was approximately 48 hours, or something of that sort? Do you think it is right to ask witnesses, who have boards to assemble before they take a decision on a brief, to do so as quickly as that? When some of these witnesses said that they could not come, was the reason for their refusal the fact that they could not produce a brief in 48 hours?

Senator Kinsella: I think the answer to the question is yes.

Senator Frith: Senator, this is your last chance to state for the record that you are ashamed of what the committee did, and I bet you are.

NON-APPEARANCE BEFORE COMMITTEE OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Hon. Lorne M. Bonnell: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Why is it that the Minister of National Health and Welfare refused to appear before the committee to explain the bill?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not aware that that is the case. I should point out that the Minister of National Health and Welfare was not the sponsor of the bill in the other place.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, since the Minister of Finance was the sponsor of the bill in the other place, does that mean that the Government of Canada, the Mulroney government, now has the Minister of Finance dictating social policy in this country, rather than the Minister of National Health and Welfare?

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators.

Senator Frith: To which read, "Yes."

CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES ON LEGISLATION

Hon. Lorne M. Bonnell: My next question, honourable senators, is directed to the chairman of the committee. The chairman of the committee being a senator who is presumably conversant with the Rules of the Senate and aware of the fact that, with respect to legislation that touches on the jurisdiction of the provinces, the provinces should be notified and asked if they wish to appear or to write a letter stating whether they are for or against such legislation, did the chairman contact all of the provinces and ask for their views on this bill?

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, the answer to that question is no, the chairman did not do that.

Senator Bonnell: Did the chairman ask that question of any province?

Senator Kinsella: The answer to that question, honourable senators, is also no.

The chairman of the committee also hastens to underscore, once again, that he is there as the servant of all honourable members of the committee, and that it was the committee which took the decision.

Senator Frith: Senator Pontius Pilate.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, as I understand this particular case, Appendix I of the Rules of the Senate state that that is the way in which such a matter is to be handled. The chairman of the committee cannot blame his non-performance on the poor clerk. The clerk is doing the job that he is told to do by the chairman. The chairman should follow the rules and automatically contact the provinces when dealing with legislation that touches upon their jurisdiction.

MAINTENANCE OF LEVEL OF PROVINCIAL WELFARE PAYMENTS

Hon. Lorne M. Bonnell: Honourable senators, I should like to ask another question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Since this bill will provide money to certain members of the public on a monthly basis—and I am not referring to the family allowance, which will be killed on January 1 under this legislation—has there been any agreement reached with the provinces that they will not use these new monthly payments as an excuse to cut back on social assistance payments that they deliver to people who are on welfare?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is another point the honourable senator might wish to raise or elaborate upon in the course of the third reading debate.

Senator Bonnell: I am asking the question now. I will certainly elaborate when the time comes. However, I do not want to elaborate on something to which I do not have the proper answer.

What I want to know is this: Have the provinces agreed that they will not treat as income this increase of under $4 that will be paid to poor people on social assistance, and thereby cut back on their social assistance payments to those in need, namely, the one-parent families and those living in poverty?

Senator Frith: Give him some facts to help in the debate to which you eagerly look forward.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am not aware that any of the provinces have made any commitments with regard to the passage of this legislation, or to what their future policies or programs might be. I would be rather surprised if they had. They never do.

Senator Bonnell: Let me ask another question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate: Did any member of the cabinet of Prime Minister Mulroney, including either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of National Health and Welfare, ever think about those poor people on welfare, the one-parent families, and ask the provinces not to tax back that money as income, as it relates to social assistance? Did they ask for any such agreement?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is greatly to be regretted that my friends opposite chose to stomp out of the committee rather than stay and put those questions to Minister McDermid, who appeared as a witness before that committee.

Senator Frith: Stomp out of the same charade you are performing here today.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have great respect for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. He is generally a pretty fine chap, except when he does not answer questions quite correctly.

The minister who came before the committee was the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization. He has nothing to do with social services. He probably never collected welfare in his life, and probably does not know anything about it. Yet, the government sent him to the committee to answer questions on health and welfare.

Senator Frith: After cutting off all the other witnesses.

Senator Bonnell: What respect does the minister expect such a committee to have for a government that sends a minister responsible for privatization to discuss health and welfare issues in Canada?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the comments of my friend might be more valid had he stayed and tried to find out what the minister knew. The Minister of State for Finance is an experienced minister and an experienced parliamentarian. I need say no more about that.

I can well recall, as can a number of honourable senators, I am sure, seeing important bills from the Department of Finance coming over here, but never seeing a minister. In the old days, we were lucky to see a Parliamentary Secretary.

Senator Bonnell: The opposition we had in those days was so weak that they did not ask for it. Do not blame that on the government of the day. However, in this particular case the opposition asked for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Finance to appear. Instead, we got the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization, who knew absolutely nothing about the issue.

Senator Frith: After they cut off all the other witnesses.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I could ask a dozen questions, but I will leave it for debate later.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I remind honourable senators that, some time ago, the 30 minutes allotted for Question Period expired.

Senator Frith: A waste of time, at any rate. These people do not want to answer questions.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Senator Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have answers to questions raised on September 22 by Senator Bosa regarding the use of downpayment reductions for first-time home buyers, on September 24 by Senator Stewart regarding the cost and means of financing the referendum, and by Senator Molgat requesting a copy of a Treasury Board memo on the referendum question, on September 29 by Senator Stollery for a breakdown of the expenditures of the Special Joint Committee, and on September 30 by Senator Molgat on the method of reporting the vote of the referendum and its effect on western Canada.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

DOWNPAYMENT REDUCTIONS FOR FIRST-TIME BUYERS—USE OF RRSP FUNDS FOR DOWNPAYMENTS—STATUS OF PROGRAMS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Peter Bosa on September 22, 1992)

The two year CMHC initiative was announced February 3, 1992. As of September 25, 1992, 48,092 housing units have been approved with the 5 per cent downpayment under the First Home Loan Insurance Initiative. This represents some $4.3 billion worth of insured loans.

A survey conducted by CMHC in June 1992 indicated that 73 per cent of those surveyed would not have been able to purchase a home if it had not been for the First Home Loan Insurance Initiative.

Households who have taken advantage of this initiative have a total debt loan (housing debt: 24%, total debt 32%) that is virtually the same as for CMHC clients with higher downpayments).

The Home Buyers' Plan was announced by the Minister of Finance in his February 25, 1992 budget. Under this program almost 46,000 applications were received by the end of June for withdrawls of RRSPs to buy or build a home.

The two initiatives together have had a positive impact on residential investment.

New construction grew 4.4% in the second quarter as housing starts increased to 167,000 units from 153,000 units. In September, housing starts rose 15.2 % to 174,000. The sale of existing homes rose about 10% in July. Preliminary data for August indicate that sales for the two months were on average 2.9% above the second quarter level of 332,000 units. The sales of existing housing are expected to rise by more than 5% both in 1992 and 1993.

COST AND MEANS OF FINANCING REFERENDUM

(Response to question raised by Hon. John B. Stewart on September 24, 1992)

The Chief Electoral Officer has estimated the cost of the referendum to be about $120 million.

Parliament has appropriated the necessary expenditures by virtue of section 33 of the Referendum Act which states that the costs of the Chief Electoral Officer shall be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

The amount which is actually spent will appear as an information item in Supplementary Estimates, in this case likely those to be tabled in March of 1993.

REFERENDUM—METHOD OF REPORTING VOTE—EFFECT OF WESTERN PREVIEW

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas L. Molgat on September 30, 1992)

The Chief Electoral Officer, Mr. Jean-Pierre Kingsley, has now made regulations which will prohibit publication of the results of the Quebec referendum in the west before the polls are closed.

These regulations will resolve the anomaly caused by the operation of both the Quebec and the federal referenda laws at the same time.

BUDGET OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—BREAKDOWN OF EXPENDITURES

(Response to question raised by Hon. Peter A. Stollery on September 29, 1992)

Following is a breakdown of expenditures incurred during the five constitutional conferences held in Halifax, Calgary, Montreal, Toronto, and Ottawa, each weekend from January 16 to February 16:

Direct Institute costs	$ Ks	$ Ms
Atlantic Provinces Economic Council	285
C.D. Howe & Institute for Research on Public Policy	200
Canada West Foundation	315
The Niagara Institute	760
Sub Total	1 560
Fifth Conference (the Institute and the Federal Government)	300	1.860
Participant costs (travel, accommodation, expenses, conference material. Average cost per participant—$2,000)		2.0
Host broadcast function and other, Media support costs (includes 1-800 number, advertising, media facilities)		1.8
On-site costs (facilities, translators, interpreters, administrative support, security)		1.0
Secretariat and other costs (salaries, computer systems, professional services)		2.3
Total		$8.960 M

Budget items under major headings are provided as examples and are not exhaustive.

REFERENDUM QUESTION—REQUEST FOR COPY OF TREASURY BOARD MEMO

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas L. Molgat on September 24, 1992)

Following is a letter sent to the Public Service Alliance of Canada from the Secretary of the Treasury Board, Mr. I. D. Clark:

September 17, 1992

The upcoming federal and provincial referendums on the constitutional accord have raised questions about the participation of Public Service employees in referendum-related activities. The purpose of this letter is to offer some advice that you may find helpful in providing guidance to employees in your organization.

The Referendum Act makes it clear that the political activities section of the Public Service Employment Act shall not restrict the right of an employee to participate fully in a referendum.

In respect of the day-to-day responsibilities of public servants, there is a distinction between an election and the forthcoming referendums. Public servants remain responsible in carrying out their duties to provide the same kind of non-partisan support to the government with regard to the constitutional accord as they would in respect of any other policy of the government. As with any government policy, public servants should, in the course of their official responsibilities, avoid public speculation and expression of personal opinions.

With respect to activities outside their employment, public servants should ensure that any public involvement or statements about the referendums do not impair their ability to carry out their duties. As the Supreme Court pointed out in the Fraser case, there must be a balance between the right of public servants to speak publicly and their duty to fulfil their functions as employees of the government. In making any decisions about personal involvement in activities related to the referendums, employees must carefully consider their responsibilities and duties in the Public Service. They must determine whether their ability to perform these would be—or would be seen to be—impaired by such involvement.

It should also be noted that any personal involvement by Public Service employees in referendum activities must take place only during non-working hours and outside the place of employment.

Concerning the granting of leave to employees who wish to attend meetings and participate in a referendum campaign, collective agreements contain clauses dealing with leave with and without pay for "other reasons". Where leave is granted to any employee under the "other reasons" provisions for the purposes stated above, it should be leave without pay.

I encourage you to communicate with your employees on this matter. A copy of this letter in the other official language is attached.

Yours sincerely,

I. D. Clark

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the present government—we now know accurately described by Senator Murray as cowardly and contemptuous of democracy—is already 13 days into that cowardly and contemptuous mode, that being the difference between 39 days and 52 days.

THE ECONOMY

FINANCIAL CREDIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to bring to the attention of the house some current events affecting the financial credibility of the Government of Canada.

As some honourable senators may know, according to the Dow Jones wire this morning, Standard & Poor's has downgraded its ratings on the Government of Canada's senior long-term foreign currency debt and on the foreign currency debt ratings of three sovereign-guaranteed issuers: Export Development Corporation, Federal Business Development Bank and Farm Credit Corporation and the government-guaranteed debt issues of Petro-Canada Limited. The downgrading is from Triple-A to Double-A-Plus.

In the Standard & Poor's evaluation of the Government of Canada's financial situation, I should like to quote from the Dow Jones wire, which states:

> The downgrades reflect the progressive deterioration in Canada's current account deficit in recent years, a consequent sharp increase in its already sizable external debt burden and the prospect of only a moderate improvement in the balance of payments in the medium term. A key contributing factor is the high level of total government debt, which slows the pace of external adjustment.

I will go on with some background information. Standard & Poor's stated:

> Canada's current account deficit reached $25.5 billion or 4.3 per cent of gross domestic product (GDP) in 1991, up from 3.8 per cent in 1990 and an average of less than 2 per cent in 1985-1988. The deficit has widened despite a modest economic upturn and stands in sharp contrast with improving external accounts typical at this stage in past cycles. As a result, net external debt is projected to rise to the equivalent of 148 per cent of exports this year from an average of about 100 per cent during the second half of the 1980s —considerably higher than any Triple-A-rated sovereign issuer. The overall foreign net liability position is even larger, at a projected 166 per cent of exports in 1992, with the falling share of equity investment in the total a further constraint on balance of payments flexibility.

I should like to continue with an additional statement from Standard and Poor's:

> To a significant degree, the growth of the foreign debt burden is being driven by total government sector borrowing. Total net government debt doubled over the past decade to 50 per cent of GDP, while net public sector external debt has risen from 30 per cent of exports to 80 per cent.

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to advise the honourable senator that, pursuant to the rules, his time of three minutes has expired, but perhaps senators would allow the honourable senator to finish.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Austin: In the Dow Jones wire there is an additional comment, which is:

> Canadian Finance Minister Don Mazankowski said he was disappointed with the downgrading of Canada's foreign currency debt by Standard & Poor's Corporation.

Honourable senators, clearly Canada's creditworthiness has been in a continuing decline for some period of time—actually almost four years. The government has been on a stay-the-course policy, to quote our government leader here who likes the phrase "stay the course" and has used it in answering questions from me in the past in this area.

Senator Frith: Answering? Responding. I am sure that he did not really answer.

Senator Austin: Perhaps responding rather than answering.

I would ask Senator Murray—and perhaps he can take this as background for Question Period, so I do not need to go over it again—to tell us whether the Government of Canada is planning any stimulative measures with respect to the Canadian economic infrastructure.

THE ECONOMY

POVERTY IN CANADA

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, since today is to be a very important day in the history of Canada when the senior citizen senators of this country take the food out of the mouths of little children by doing away with the universal family allowance program, I thought it might be a good day to inform honourable senators of how many people are poor in Canada today.

Poverty is much more widespread in Canada than most people realize. More than 3.821 million Canadians, or about one in seven, were living below the poverty line in 1990, and the number of poor Canadians has grown by 334,000 since 1989. These numbers underestimate the number of poor Canadians because they do not include native people on reserves, residents of the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, and people who live in homes for the aged or other institutions.

The current poverty rate is 14.6 per cent. In other words, 14.6 per cent of all Canadians are poor.

We all face some risk of poverty. Poverty is often brought on unexpectedly because of the death or disability of the family breadwinner, loss of employment, family breakup, or increased costs because of a major illness or mishap in the family. However, members of some groups in our society face a greater risk of poverty than others because of discrimination, unequal opportunities, lack of recognition for the work they do, paid or unpaid, higher living costs, and inadequate income support for people who are unable to work or to find paid work.

Some families are more likely to be poor than others. Young families, where the head of the family is under 25 years of age, and female single-parent families are at increasing risk of being poor. In 1990, 38.4 per cent of all young families were poor—up from 28 per cent in 1989; 60.6 per cent of all female single-parent families, where the mother was under 65 and the children under 18, were poor, up from 52.9 per cent in 1989.

Women's continued dependence on men for their financial well-being is reflected in poverty statistics. For example, more than a third, or 39.3 per cent, of all unattached women live in poverty, while 28 per cent of unattached men are poor. Among single-parent families, 47 per cent of those headed by mothers are poor, while 18.8 percent of those headed by fathers live in poverty.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must interrupt Senator Bonnell unless there is unanimous agreement.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Senator Austin.]

Some Hon. Senators: No.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Daniel Hays: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Seventh Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources.

WEDNESDAY, October 14, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources has the honour to present its

SEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized by the Senate on Friday, February 28, 1992, to study and report upon the policy options available to the government to achieve the objective of containing emissions associated with energy production and use in Canada with a view to improving the environment and to make recommendations thereon, respectfully requests that the date of presenting its final report be extended from November 30, 1992 to no later than 12th February 1993.

Respectfully submitted,

DANIEL HAYS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Hays, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

● (1410)

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Dan Hays, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources have power to sit at four thirty o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 508 citizens of British Columbia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Surrey, Campbell River, Aldergrove, Richmond, White Rock and Squamish.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 360 citizens of Nova Scotia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Bras d'Or, Georges River, Cape Breton, Ingonish Beach, Florence, North Sydney and Alder Point.

Finally, honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 500 citizens of Quebec who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from St-Dominique, St-Hyacinthe, Wickham, Belœil, La Présentation, Montreal, Alma, St-François-de-Sales, Chicoutimi, St-André, Drummondville, Île Perrot and Plessisville.

These petitions (as Senator Murray will be delighted to know, won't he!) were signed in late July 1992, less than three months ago.

The grand total for today is 1,368 signatures from Canadians who continue to energetically oppose a tax that afflicts the less fortunate without bothering the rich—a typically Conservative tax!

QUESTION PERIOD

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

QUESTION PERIOD—REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN DESIGNATION TO QUESTION AND ANSWER PERIOD

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have but one question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate today. Is there any chance that the heading "Question Period" under "Daily Routine of Business" could be changed to "Question and Answer Period" so that it will not remain simply, as it has been under his administration, a question period?

THE CONSTITUTION

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—DRAFT LEGAL TEXTS—AVAILABILITY OF FRENCH TEXT

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate when I may have a draft legal text of the Charlottetown agreement in French. What I have in my hand was distributed to my office. It is in English only. I am a senator from Quebec and entitled to have a text in French. When I have to defend the Charlottetown accord, as I do, and when I am asked questions about this text, I want to be able to quote the words in French.

Surely, it was possible to supply me with a copy of the text in French. If it was possible to give Mr. Parizeau a copy in French, which he was given before the debate, why is it not possible to give it to federal legislators?

[Translation]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, I tabled the legal texts in both official languages yesterday evening. I hope that both versions are available to the honourable senator. In any case, I will make sure they are soon.

[English]

CHARLOTTETOWN CONSENSUS REPORT—TITLE OF FINAL TEXT

Hon. Lorne M. Bonnell: Honourable senators, I notice in the Quorum that, according to the Globe and Mail, our beloved Prime Minister went down Charlottetown, the cradle of Confederation, the place where that agreement, that accord, that whatever it is, was agreed upon.

First, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government to tell me what it is called. I do not want to call it an "agreement" if in fact it is an "accord". I do not want to call it an "accord" if in fact it is only an "agreement". Therefore, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate verify that point for me?

I see that in the legal text, which was finally supplied to us yesterday, the word "accord" is used. Until yesterday everyone was talking about the "Charlottetown agreement". I know that the Premier of Prince Edward Island would like to have it called the "Charlottetown accord". I should like to know from the Leader of the Government what to call that "talk" they had down in Charlottetown.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, if the Premier of Prince Edward Island would like to have it called the "Charlottetown accord", then the "Charlottetown accord" it is.

Senator Bonnell: That is settled for all time. Honourable senators have heard it from Senator Murray right here in the Senate.

REFERENDUM DEBATE—ATTACK ON PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Lorne M. Bonnell: My next question is this: Yesterday, while the great Prime Minister was down in Charlottetown promoting the "yes" vote, an irate senior citizen, one who I suppose had had his old age pension clawed back, attacked the Prime Minister. I hope the Prime Minister is not hurt. Is he all right? Is he well?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can report that, as usual, the Prime Minister is in excellent health and excellent humour. From time to time we have cases of slightly, or more than slightly, deranged people trying, physically, to attack public figures. In the case of the gentleman in question, he wished to manifest his opposition to the fixed link. In that respect at least he has taken a stand, something which my honourable friend has not yet done.

• (1420)

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, let me say to you that I have taken many stands but, until I graduated from medicine, I never took a stand on who was deranged and who was not. But now the politicians are saying who is deranged in the province of Prince Edward Island and who is not. Why do you say that the poor senior citizen was deranged just because he wanted to talk to the Prime Minister about the Constitution, or the fixed link, or the fishery loss, or the economy, or whatever his problem was?

Senator Barootes: The potatoes; you left out the potatoes!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: And the missing island on the map.

Senator Bonnell: Let me also ask this of the Leader of the Government in the Senate: Yesterday, also in that great city of Charlottetown, the Prime Minister said that, after they lost the referendum, he would still act as leader of the government and would still run the next election as Prime Minister.

Senator Simard: That is not what he said.

Senator Bonnell: I heard that. You say that he did not say that and that I am misquoting. Maybe I am, but it was reported—

Senator Simard: That is no proof.

Senator Bonnell: Your Honour, can you keep that man quiet over there? He thinks he is at home with the wife.

Senator Hébert: He thinks he is in his own backyard.

Senator Bonnell: Let me put this in perspective as quoted as a fact in the Globe and Mail. If I am wrong, then the Globe and Mail is wrong.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Cools: Senator Doyle is sitting here in the chamber. He knows the Globe and Mail is never wrong.

Senator Bonnell: As printed in the Globe and Mail on October 14, 1992, when the Prime Minister was asked by a reporter, if he plans to lead the Progressive Conservative Party into the next federal election regardless of the result of the October 26 vote, Mr. Mulroney responded:

> "That has nothing to do with the next election. Lookit, René Lévèsque lost the 1980 referendum and he led his party into the next election . . . I plan to do exactly the same thing."

[Senator Bonnell.]

Senator Frith: He sounds like his government leader in the Senate when he is answering questions. His answer misses the point of the question.

Senator Bonnell: So the Prime Minister said that after the referendum, after admitting he will lose it, "I plan to do exactly the same thing."

Senator Simard: Finish it. You are leaving out part of the quote.

Senator Bonnell: If you want to ask a question afterwards, you can ask your question. In the meantime, I am asking this one. You are curtailing my time here.

> When Mr. Mulroney realized his faux pas of admitting defeat in advance for the Yes side in the referendum, he quickly added that he planned to win both votes.

Senator Murray: Then he is in good humour.

Senator Bonnell: Perhaps by that he means that he will win the vote of his party to support him for leadership, and also the vote in the next election. Let me tell you, he will not win in Prince Edward Island.

Senator Simard: What is the question?

Senator Bonnell: The question is: Is the Prime Minister admitting defeat beforehand and confusing the people of Canada?

Senator Cools: Yes, do tell us what goes on in that dark mind of his.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, all of us continue to believe that the "yes" side will win this referendum and win it in all ten provinces of Canada on October 26. I think my friend will not have long to wait before he begins to see some appreciable turning in the tide.

Senator Gigantés No, no, please, don't go campaigning. Please do not do a Meech on this. Please, I want it to win.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator, as I pointed out earlier, is somewhat ambivalent about the fixed link. I am beginning to believe, from what he said a few moments ago, that he is also somewhat ambivalent about the Charlottetown agreement.

Senator Gigantés: But do not establish a link between you and the Charlottetown agreement, please.

Senator Murray: I hope that the honourable senator can confirm to us that, if not on the fixed link, at least on the Charlottetown agreement he is on the "yes" side.

So far as the Charlottetown agreement is concerned, it is an accord which bears the signatures of the Prime Minister of Canada, ten premiers, two territorial leaders, and four Aboriginal leaders, as well as receiving the approval of the leaders of the major parties in the federal Parliament. I would hope that the honourable senator would take every opportunity to point this out to his friends in Prince Edward Island and elsewhere.

With regard to the first part of the honourable senator's question as to whether the person who tried to physically attack the Prime Minister is deranged, all I can say is that if someone tried to hit the honourable senator over the head with a boom microphone, he too would think that person was deranged.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government must have been hit over the head because he is the one who made the decision that the man was deranged. Sure, if I got hit over the head I would think the fellow was deranged. I guess the Prime Minister thought his attacker was deranged, but you said he was deranged.

Senator Gigantès: Who was deranged, the Prime Minister? Let us get this clear. What are the facts?

Senator Hébert: We are confused.

Senator Gigantès: Could you repeat the facts?

Senator Barootes: Why are you asking the missing link to answer that question? He is not a fixed link, he is the missing link.

Senator Gigantès: I would rather have a missing link than have the Leader of the Government linked with the Charlottetown accord. He'll sink it like Meech.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, you are wasting my time. If you have something to say, get up and say it like men, but don't be wasting my time.

I think the Leader of the Government in the Senate believes that, after the next election, I am to be the new Leader of the Government in this place because he is already starting to ask me questions. The only people of whom we can ask questions in this house is the Leader of the Government or the chairman of a committee. I am not a chairman of a committee so he must think I am to be the Leader of the Government over on this side. I do not know where he will be moving to.

Since you want to talk about the fixed link, is it true that the premier of Prince Edward Island was promised the fixed link, and that the premier of New Brunswick was promised a four-lane highway, and that the premier of Newfoundland was promised money for Texaco Oil to start up Hibernia again? Are these all promises made by the Prime Minister to these premiers to support the "yes" side?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if my friend will reflect on his question, he will quickly see how offensive that inference is, if not to the Prime Minister of Canada then certainly to the premiers whom he has mentioned.

Senator Bonnell: What is the answer to the question? Never mind the speeches.

Senator Gigantès: That's offensive? What about the old gentleman whom you say was deranged? Or did you say he was deranged?

Senator Murray: I will say to Senator Gigantès what I said to Senator Bonnell: If someone tried to hit you over the head with a boom mike you, too, would think he was deranged.

Senator Gigantès: No one has ever tried to hit me over the head with a boom mike.

THE ECONOMY

FINANCIAL CREDIBILITY OF GOVERNMENT—EFFECT ON POSITION IN WORLD MONEY MARKETS—GOVERNMENT OPTIONS

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to return the attention of the Senate to the increasing "derangement" of the Canadian economy. I made a statement earlier to provide a background to my question. However, I will not ask a long question of Senator Murray at this moment. I will simply ask him a question I have raised with him before, namely, what are the government's options in dealing with the deterioration of the current account balance, and in dealing with the international recognition today that, amongst the G-7, Canada's sovereign credit risk is the weakest so far as the money markets of the world are concerned. We are also looking at a decline in capital investment from abroad, which is not assisting in our current account balances.

In our common interest in the good management of the Canadian economy, will Senator Murray tell us what the government's options are at this time? Does one of them include a program of fiscal stimulation as announced by John McDermid, the Minister of State for Finance—or at least as hinted at by him; that is, a $2.5 billion capital works project that includes the provinces?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it seems to me that the course is clear. It is to reinforce our reputation for political stability, which I hope and believe can and will be done on October 26th with the support of some honourable senators opposite, to improve our competitiveness, to continue to get our deficit and debt under better control and, indeed, to reverse the growth in our national debt.

Senator Austin: I think Senator Murray will probably agree with the proposition that the government has done as credible a job as possible with respect to squeezing down the Government of Canada's operating account, and that the Government of Canada has done its best to raise all the taxes that can be raised from the Canadian taxpayer. The Canadian taxpayer is screaming quite loudly at this stage, which is certainly a sign that limits have been reached.

If there are no new savings in expenditures and no room for more taxes, what is the government's choice in terms of making the Canadian economy grow?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I referred already —and my friend did not pick up on it—to the constant need to improve our productivity and our competitiveness. Our fiscal and economic policies and our policies in terms of privatization and deregulation, among many others, are all directed to that end.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, Senator Murray and I are missing one another in this question and answer session.

I took him to be referring to longer-term issues when he talked about improving competitiveness. However, my question really relates to what can be done in the short term time frame, say within the next week, two weeks, four weeks, six weeks or three months. Is there nothing we can do in that time frame with respect to the management of the economy?

Senator Murray has not addressed the specific question I asked, which was with respect to a rumoured $2.5 billion stimulation, something that does not sit well with his own predilections but which the government is apparently considering.

In addition, what would be on the agenda of a first ministers meeting dealing with the economy in early November, a meeting which, I believe, has been announced is to take place?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there were three or four questions included in the statement the honourable senator has just made. First, with regard to a first ministers meeting, this has been announced by the Toronto Star and the Toronto Star only. No one whom I have been able to contact in the Department of Finance, the Office of the Prime Minister or at the Office of Federal-Provincial Relations knows anything about this. No such decision has been taken or is under active consideration at the moment. I think I can safely say that.

With regard to the $2.5 billion capital works program, this again is a media report several weeks old which, in the oral Question Period some time ago, I indicated is not imminent, is not planned. There have been discussions, as I have indicated to several honourable senators, concerning improvement to the highway system. Those discussions have gone very well, but they are not now at a stage where we can say they are concluded, or that an announcement of any kind can be made.

There are also such matters as the fixed link and other infrastructure programs that are under active consideration, but to say that a $2.5 billion or any billion dollar announcement along those lines is imminent, or that decisions have been made, would be quite misleading.

With regard to the decision taken by the Standard & Poor's agency, the honourable senator knows that when a decision is made to change the credit rating, that decision will not be revisited in the short term. However, in fairness, I should point out two things: One is that such a change affects about $8.5 billion of our total external debt which is of the order of $495 billion. Second, the other major rating agency, Moody's, quite recently confirmed our Triple-A rating.

REFERENDUM QUESTION—EFFECT OF "YES" VOTE ON ECONOMY—STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As I move around New Brunswick trying to promote the accord, I find that the people of New Brunswick's lack of faith in politicians is alarming. Politicians are not held in very high esteem by the people of my province.

● (1440)

When I am asked questions about the accord, I try to explain the accord as best I can. I honestly believe that most of the people in New Brunswick are inclined to support it, but they do ask questions. I was asked a question last weekend, and I will repeat it to the Leader of the Government in the Senate so that he can give me an answer to relate back to those people. As a matter of fact, I am meeting with them tomorrow.

According to the Toronto Star, and certainly all of the newspapers in New Brunswick, The Prime Minister is quoted as saying in Winnipeg last week that, if the people vote "yes" to the accord, by the year 2000 the annual income for a family of four will go up to $91,000. In the province of New Brunswick, that is more than double the annual income for a family of four today. People are asking me what those predictions are based upon.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is not fair to say that the Prime Minister said that a "yes" vote would result in these increases in family income. That is not what he said. I cannot give you the statistics, because I do not have them in front of me, but the point he was making is that this country does have a good economic future, that a "yes" vote would enable us to put behind us a debate that has preoccupied us for too long, and enable us to turn the page and concentrate our energies more fully on realizing the economic promise of this country; whereas a "no" vote would simply add to the uncertainty and ensure a continuation of the uncertainty and political deadlock that has characterized the constitutional debate for too long and has distracted the country from other important priorities such as economic priorities.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I did not expect a clear answer, because I do not think there is a clear answer.

Senator Gigantès: Even if there were, it would not be given in a clear manner.

Senator Thériault: I was unable to find economists who could support the statement made by the Prime Minister. My concern expresses the concern of the people of New Brunswick. When will politicians start telling it as it is?

The Prime Minister went on to say that there would be an increase of $20,000 per family, saying that the national income average for a family of four today is $71,000. That is the figure he quoted. In fact, the information I have indicates that the average income for a family of four in Canada is about $51,000. That is a spread of $40,000 or almost 100 per cent.

Those are the kinds of statements that are being made left, right and centre, and they are causing problems. Fundamentally, the people of Canada believe that the accord is a good accord. It has been agreed to by the ten premiers, the leaders of the two territories, the native people and the Prime Minister. But why not tell it as it is? I cannot tell people truthfully, because I do not believe it, that a "yes" vote will put an end to the recession. I think it will be helpful.

I hope there is a "yes" vote, but October 27 will be a day like October 25, the day before the referendum. Moreover, I do not believe that a "no" vote will lead to a doomsday scenario. However, if politicians of all stripes respect the fact that the people of Canada are intelligent and know what is going on, the "yes" vote will carry hands down.

POST-REFERENDUM DISCUSSIONS—CONTINUATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I live in downtown Toronto. I must say that, unlike my colleague from New Brunswick, I find an increasing scepticism in Ontario about the "yes" side, to the extent that I wonder if the "yes" side will carry the day. There are many reasons for this scepticism.

We all remember that after Meech Lake there was a doomsday scenario, and the dollar was going to collapse. In fact, however, the day after Meech Lake failed, the dollar actually went up. Those same predictions are being made about October 26 and the terrible catastrophe that will arrive on the 27th. The same things that were said about Meech Lake are now being said more flamboyantly about the 27th. This is leading to scepticism.

My question to the Leader of the Government relates to a newspaper that is now being circulated. It is being circulated at great expense by the "yes" committee. I received one at my house yesterday. It said that one of the reasons for voting "yes" was that the constitutional problems would end and that by voting "yes" we will have dealt with all of this.

How does the Leader of the Government square that with the fact that there are 14 unresolved items in the so-called accord, including residual powers? How will those be dealt with? After October 26, will there not be an ongoing series of constitutional negotiations to deal with the unresolved issues that are laid out clearly in the so-called agreement?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as a result of the Charlottetown accord and the amendments to the Constitution that will follow, there will have been agreement on the roles of the federal government and the federal Parliament, of the provinces, and of the Aboriginal peoples. There will have been agreement on the place of Quebec in Canada. There will have been agreement by Quebec to the Canadian Constitution, which we have not had since the 1982 exercise. A framework will have been established. It is fair to say that the major issues will have been resolved.

Will there be negotiation? Of course there will be negotiation within the framework established and according to the principles that have been laid down on establishing the Aboriginal governments.

There will be negotiation of the federal-provincial agreements in the various areas where that is provided for in the Charlottetown agreement—forests, mines, tourism, recreation, immigration and so forth. We will have placed in the Constitution a provision allowing for federal-provincial agreements in the field of immigration. Those agreements will be negotiated over time according to the needs and priorities of the different provinces. The framework and foundation will be there, and the major issues that have bedeviled us on the constitutional side for some years will be effectively behind us.

Senator Stollery: Honourable senators, I thank the leader for his answer, and it leads me to another question. As I understand the Constitution of 1982, it is the Constitution of 1867 which the Canadas agreed to plus an amending formula and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I would have thought it would have been argued that the only part that Quebec disagreed with in 1982 was the Charter and the amending formula, because the Constitution is the same.

In that Constitution, as the Leader of the Government will recognize, are two areas that were so important that Sir John A. Macdonald in 1865 made a very eloquent speech on the sovereignty of states and why the Canadian Constitution differed from the American Constitution. I am sure the leader is aware of that speech. Two of the items to which he referred, the residual powers and the declaratory powers, are mentioned in the Charlottetown agreement. Essentially, they have agreed to do away with the declaratory power, which has been used about 500 times in this century. It has been used primarily to declare something in the federal interest, such as the Cape Breton Development Corporation, in order to assist a region of Canada. That declaratory power will be abolished.

The Charlottetown agreement says that the other important area referred to by Sir John A. MacDonald, the residual powers, will be dealt with afterwards. However, it is listed therein, and it is not something I am just making up. That power is fundamental because, without it, Confederation as we know it will not exist. The declaratory powers and residual powers, as John A. MacDonald pointed out, are the very fabric of the difference between us and the United States. As we all know, our Constitution was written at the end of the U.S. Civil War.

What happens after October 26, when October 27 comes along? The story is being circulated by the "yes" forces that everything will be okay. What about the residual powers which are fundamental to Canada's Constitution, and which are on the list of unresolved issues? How will that issue be resolved? Will the residual powers provoke another constitutional crisis? How does the government intend to deal with that aspect without provoking even more controversy and a sense, possibly, of crisis?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question except to say that the question of residual powers is one, as the honourable senator has indicated, of a list of matters that have been left for consideration at some uncertain time in the indefinite future.

Senator Stollery: Honourable senators, if these fundamental powers that are of the nature and fibre of the Canadian Constitution, particularly the residual powers, are left on a list to be dealt with at another time, that causes me some concern. What will happen? Say, for example, that the "no" vote wins. There are people who think the "no" side may actually carry the day.

Senator Gigantès: I will hold you responsible.

Senator Stollery: What is the government's program? What happens then? We can all sit around and say, "Of course, the 'yes' vote will win and there is no problem." What happens if they do not win and some provinces vote no, the accord does not proceed and the premiers do not become the new power elite of Canada? Does the government have something ready in that event?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must advise you that under rule 23(7), the 30 minutes allotted to Question Period has elapsed. It is up to honourable senators to decide whether or not to give unanimous consent for the continuation of Question Period.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the question is too hypothetical to answer in the oral Question Period.

Senator Stollery: There is a 50 per cent chance.

Senator Murray: I appreciate the point the honourable senator is making, but this reinforces the argument that there is a very large burden of proof upon those who are advocating the "no" side in this debate. What is their alternative? What will happen if the vote is no?

Senator Stollery: Of course, they are not the government.

Senator Murray: Some of them, such as Mr. Parizeau and Mr. Bouchard, think it is a step on the way to independence for Quebec. Mr. Preston Manning thinks it will result in a moratorium on constitutional matters. I think these people have a lot of explaining to do, and they should be called to account.

Senator Stollery: Honourable senators, I will be brief. I would like to know what the Government of Canada has to say —

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators —

Senator Stollery: —because it is the Government of Canada that is responsible.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. Unless there is unanimous consent, we will have to proceed to the next item.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have answers to questions asked on September 24 by Senators Everett and Stewart regarding the Charlottetown accord, on September 30 by Senator Corbin concerning the Canadian Forces and the demands of peacekeeping, by Senator Frith on the North American Free Trade Agreement and by Senator Molgat on the Charlottetown accord.

[Senator Murray.]

THE CONSTITUTION

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—DEFINITION OF SUPPLY BILL—REFINEMENT OF DEFINITION IN SUBSEQUENT ACCORD — GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Douglas D. Everett and Hon. John B. Stewart on September 24, 1992)

The draft legal texts make clear that the definition of "supply bills" is to be provided for in the Constitution. Under S. 32(1), supply bills contain only provisions dealing with the following:

"A) the raising of revenues, including the imposition, repeal, remission, alteration and regulation of taxation,

B) the appropriation of public money,

C) charges on the Consolidated Revenue Fund,

D) the Public Debt, including Borrowing Authority,

E) the guarantee of any loan or other debt or obligation, or

F) subordinate matters relating to any of the matters set out in paragraphs (A) to (E), but does not include a bill that contains provisions that would result in fundamental policy changes to the tax system."

Since the Constitution will make clear that supply bills are to be carefully defined as dealing only with the above matters, it will not be possible to "tag" an appropriation item onto an ordinary bill, and thus subject to a 30 day suspensive veto by the Senate.

UNITED NATIONS

PEACEKEEPING OPERATIONS—EFFECT OF DEMANDS ON CANADIAN FORCES

(Response to question raised by Hon. Eymard G. Corbin on September 30, 1992)

As stated by the Chief of the Defence Staff on numerous occasions, the Canadian Forces can still cover all missions they have been assigned.

However, because the number of peacekeeping missions has been increasing at the same time that we are rationalizing the numbers of members within the Regular Forces, Canada now has to be selective in the tasks it might undertake with any new commitments, to ensure that it does not jeopardize any existing missions or any other engagements.

Before a commitment is made, the Department of National Defence evaluates each proposed new peacekeeping operation. Operations are assessed on, among other things, the basis of their requirements for personnel and equipment, and on the expected duration of our commitment. No commitment is made without first considering the impact it will have on other CF operations.

In addition, although the Regular Force component of the CF is being reduced, a corresponding increase in the numbers of the Reserves and their integration into Total Force will ensure that the capability for all CF operations will be maintained. Increasing numbers of Reservists are already taking part or preparing to participate in peacekeeping operations. For example, 189 Reservists will deploy with 3rd Battallion Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry (3 PPCLI) in the next troop rotation to meet our commitment to the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR) in Yugoslavia.

Therefore, resources may be stretched but the Department makes sure it can always fulfill its responsibilities and respect its engagements.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

EFFECT OF FREE TRADE ON EMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Royce Frith on September 30, 1992)

The Government is not trying to fool anyone. Investment Canada figures cover acquisitions of companies in Canada by foreign investors, and the establishment of new companies by foreign investors. What these figures do not include are loans to existing businesses for working capital, and expansions for existing businesses.

Statistics Canada figures provide a comprehensive picture of foreign investment coming to Canada. The figures show that acquisitions accounted for only 35% of the net inflows of foreign direct investment to Canada from the time of the signing of the Free Trade Agreement to the end of 1991. The bulk of this inward investment, over 65 per cent, was investment for the establishment of new businesses, loans to existing businesses for working capital, and expansions for existing businesses. Acquisitions as a percentage of net foreign investment to Canada has fallen even in the last year. In 1991, acquisitions accounted for less than 25 per cent of the net inflow of foreign direct investment to Canada.

Loans and business expansions are extremely valuable indicators of the confidence foreign investors have in the Canadian economy. They are the type of business decisions that lead to a more vital and efficient Canadian economy, and can help stimulate employment.

Finally, the implication that acquisitions are necessarily bad for the domestic economy should not go unchallenged. Studies undertaken by Investment Canada conclude that foreign direct investment has generated benefits for the Canadian economy, particularly in the form of technology transfers, international management expertise, production know-how and production innovation, and access to international markets.

THE CONSTITUTION

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—INDIAN SELF-GOVERNMENT—PARAMOUNTCY OF INDIAN LAWS—APPLICABILITY OF MÉTIS POPULATION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas L. Molgat on September 30, 1992)

In the proposed constitutional amendment on self-government, governments are committed to negotiating self-government agreements with the Aboriginal peoples of Canada—the Indian, Inuit and Métis.

Through these negotiations, the beneficiaries to each particular self-government agreement will be determined in discussions with the Aboriginal peoples directly concerned.

With respect to the Métis Nation, a Métis Nation Accord, which applies to Ontario, the four western provinces, and the Northwest Territories, has been negotiated by the Métis National Council, relevant provinces and the Federal Government, which provides a definition of who is entitled to be "Métis" for the purposes of the Métis Nation. This definition is contained in the Métis Nation Accord, which has been released as part of the constitutional proposals.

The Accord also provides for an enumeration process by which the Métis Nation will be able to clearly identify its constituents. The enumeration process, which will include a right of appeal, will be determined through multilateral negotiations among the parties to the Accord.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

INCOME TAX ACT

CHILDREN'S SPECIAL ALLOWANCES ACT

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Mira Spivak moved third reading of Bill C-80, to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, when I spoke to Bill C-80 at second reading, I told of how the legislative history to that date was a tragedy in three acts. Act I was the history of children's benefits in this country. Act II was the story of the government's white paper on children's benefits, a document of 12 entire pages of strained Conservative thought that underlies the destruction of the 74-year old child benefit program.

● (1500)

That brought us to Act III, which was the story of how the government guided or, rather, misguided—that is, rammed the bill through the other place. That was the end of Part I of the story and the government's contempt for the House of Commons. For Part II, we look at part two of Parliament, namely, the Senate.

To continue the metaphor, Act I of Part II will set the stage for what will happen to Canadian families immediately after this bill passes, and will tell the sad story of how passage of this bill will affect the lives of Canadians.

The second act delves a little deeper into the effect of this bill on Canadians in the longer term.

The third act, the most pitiful of all three acts, is the tale of the contempt which this government holds for the democratic process and for Parliament. It is about the contempt that this government holds for the House of Commons and its members, and for this chamber and its members. Perhaps even more importantly, it is about the contempt the government continues to heap on the people of Canada, who want to participate in the work of their institutions by expressing their views to parliamentary committees.

Let us begin with Act I; what will happen to Canadian families after, and if, this bill passes? What will be the immediate consequences to Canadian families? The first event will occur shortly after November 2. Departmental officials have told us that there will be a mail-out on November 2 informing Canadians of the changes to come into effect. I believe the mail-out will take the form of an insert to be included with the family allowance cheque. It will be similar to a pink slip which will say to mothers and families, "Enjoy this cheque. It will be your last under this very worthy Canadian program."

Although the officials appearing before the committee could not be specific about other advertising plans, they did indicate that they would also be using other measures to get their propaganda across to Canadians. Pierre Fortier, the Director General of Income Security Programs with the Department of Health and Welfare Canada, indicated that the strategy may include advertisements in ethnic newspapers across the country to accommodate newly arrived immigrants.

If the schedule proceeds as planned, some Canadian families will receive the first of the new cheques by January 20, which is the same day that cheques are received under the current family allowance program. Each family will receive a detailed statement of how the government calculated the amount that was sent or not sent, as the case may be.

Therefore, come January, Canadian families will no longer receive the baby bonus cheque of $34 per child each month. It will be replaced with a cheque reflecting one-twelfth of the total amount of benefits to be received over the year. The amount of the cheque will vary according to different circumstances.

[Senator Frith.]

The government likes to call this "Targeting: taking from those who do not need to give to those who do." This pious pseudo-Robin-Hoodism is, as is to be expected from this government, a grotesque lie. The poorest of the poor, namely those on social assistance, will receive not one penny more than they now receive over the course of this year. So there may be some "taking from," but there is no "giving to."

Those slightly better off, namely poor families with a parent who works, will be classified as poor working families and will be eligible to receive up to $500 annually in an earned income supplement. That could potentially add approximately $41 to the monthly total, and I will explain why I say "potentially".

The amount of the benefit will be based on the income recorded on individual income tax returns. The benefit to be received from January 1993 to July 1994 will be based on income reported for 1991. Come July 1993, the benefit will be based on income reported for the 1992 taxation year. Modifications for new additions to the family, or a change in marital status, are expected to be accommodated relatively quickly. According to department officials, those changes reflecting such things as additions to the family should only take about one month.

Modifications for changes in employment will take longer. That is because the benefits are to be paid according to what is reported on income tax forms. If someone becomes unemployed in January 1993, this will not be reflected until April 1994, more than a year later when the income tax returns have to be completed. The benefit, if any, will not change until July 1994 when the government will reassess benefits based on the most recent income tax returns available.

If a moderately well-off family not receiving benefits under this scheme suddenly finds itself on unemployment insurance or social assistance, because of the government's inept economic policies causing the continued loss of jobs, it should not look to the government that caused the problem for assistance for the children. The family will continue to remain ineligible for months on end, even as its economic position deteriorates and children want.

Rod Hagglund from the Department of Health and Welfare Canada assured us that there would be a 1-800 number for confused Canadians to call and ask questions, verify calculations or lodge complaints. That 1-800 number will be of little use or consolation for the family I have described. They will not receive the money, but there may be a place that they can phone for an explanation as to why they are not receiving the money. They will have trouble putting that in the oven and feeding it to their children.

That brings us to the second part, namely, how Canadian families will fare in the future longer-term, and especially how poor children will fare in that term. Parents will notice the effect of this bill in April 1994 when they prepare their 1993 income tax returns. The first thing they will notice is the complete absence of tax deductions for children. They will find no place on their income tax forms, no page, no line, absolutely no place to record the fact that the income they are earning is being used to raise and nurture their children.

Parents may wonder if, indeed, the government cares whether or not they have children. Looking at the income tax form, they would find no evidence that the government does care about the raising of their children. As far as the government is concerned, income tax forms simply are not the place where one takes one's children into account.

In a society that puts the burden of child raising on the family, as our society does and as most societies in the western world do and have done for generations, this stupid government wants to organize its finances in a way that tells parents that child-rearing has no effect on family income or expenditures. This is what will be reflected in the official document that families will receive from that government.

In addition to no deductions for children, parents will have one page less to fill in on the income tax return. They might think it is a bonus to have to fill in fewer pages than before, but, if they get any comfort or pleasure from that, it will be short-lived. There will be one less page because there is no longer a refundable child tax credit. Parents will not have to do the calculations to determine what that credit would be because it will no longer exist. That is small consolation.

Though there will no longer be a child tax credit or deductions for children, however, parents will notice that there is a place on the income tax return to deduct business expenses such as smoked salmon, pasta, martinis and wine at Hy's or Café Henri Burger. They will notice that though there is no place to reflect the responsibility to the children, there is a place on the income tax form to deduct the cost of private booths to watch the Blue Jays, booths that cost hundreds of thousands of dollars. However, there will no longer be a place to deduct the expenses of raising children.

We know where Senator Lynch-Staunton's heart is—not with the children, but with the Blue Jays, wishing he was in one of those expensive boxes this very moment.

Children are to be the continued responsibility of parents, but not with the help from society those parents have come to depend on.

That is not the only change occurring as a result of this bill. There is a fundamental tax policy which is also being abandoned. Senator Forrestall stated this very succinctly in the committee meeting on Wednesday, October 7. He said:

> We are, in fact, changing a very fundamental and basic tenet of tax law and social policy. We are moving away from recognition of the responsibility, if you will, to level this war against child poverty. We are moving away from the principle that people should be taxed in some relationship to their ability to pay.

Senator Forrestall realizes this. Canadians will realize it. They will realize that they are being asked to pay more than their ability to pay. Parents will realize they are paying the same amount in tax as their single friends and neighbours who earn the same income, who have more disposable income, who have fancy cars and bigger houses and take more trips than they do. Now, that is all good solid Conservative policy: good for the government and its prosperous well-nourished-in-every-sense friends, but not good for average Canadians, and certainly not for Canadian families.

Dr. Robert Glossop, Director of Program and Research of the Vanier Institute of the Family, also noted this change when he appeared before the committee. Dr. Glossop pointed out that Canada risks falling behind the United States in respect of family policy. He also pointed out that while neither the U.S. nor Canada will have a program of family allowances, the United States still offers a tax exemption of $2,100 per child per year to parents. Canada will offer zero, a goose egg. The principle of equity between taxpayers with and without dependent children will have been destroyed. The Government of Canada now refuses to recognize, in the words of Dr. Glossop from the Vanier Institute on the Family:

> . . . that the parents of dependent children have less disposable income with which to pay tax precisely because of the investment they make in paying for the food, clothing, shelter and care of the next generation of the nation's citizens.

Dr. Glossop's testimony on the elimination of the income tax deduction for children was devastating for this government's policy. At page 69 of Issue 21, he had this to say:

> With the elimination of taxable family allowances and the non-refundable child tax credit, it would appear that it makes little or no difference to the government whether or not adults spend their money on Florida vacations, fancy cars, or on nurturing the next generation of citizens, the generation upon which all adults and this society will depend ultimately. In fact, if you choose to invest in your own individual future by purchasing RRSPs, there are substantial tax benefits to be realized. However, if you choose to invest in the future of the nation by committing yourself to the next generation, you will soon be on your own.
> While there can be no doubt about the need to increase substantially the level of benefits provided to poor children and poor families, the decision to do so by simply reallocating the benefits previously distributed to parents, poor and non-poor, places the burden of fighting childhood poverty squarely on the shoulders of parents, albeit those who are modestly better off. Surely, the responsibility for improving the circumstances, opportunities and life chances of poor children might have been shared by all taxpayers. According to the logic of the new policy, the fastest growing group of citizens in the population—those without dependent children—will not be obliged to contribute to the reduction or elimination of childhood poverty in equal measure to the contribution that will be made by the parents of young children. This is despite the > fact that it is those income earners without dependent children at home who enjoy the highest incomes and accumulated wealth.

So this is what Canadians will notice when they prepare their income tax returns.

The next major effect that Canadians will eventually notice is that the real value of their benefits will decline because they are only partially indexed. This is the sneak attack. De-indexation is, of course, a hot topic of debate. Almost every witness before the committee discussed de-indexation, and many questions were asked about it. Most of the witnesses, excluding departmental officials and the junior minister who appeared before the committee, argued in favour of full indexation of these benefits.

One of the witnesses, Richard Shillington, an individual who has worked in the social policy sphere for many years, provided us with some statistics concerning de-indexation of benefits in the past. In 1984, the annual family allowance was $359. If the family allowance had maintained its level relative to inflation, it would currently be $503. However, with only partial indexation of the benefit, the actual real value of the family allowance in 1992 is $419. Even if we were to include the increases made to the benefit from 1984 to 1992, they were not enough to keep up with inflation. Thus, the partial indexation of family allowance meant that their real value was almost $100 less than it would have been with full indexation.

When we look at the refundable child tax credit, it was worth a maximum of $367 in 1984. This credit today is worth $601. This has in fact kept up with inflation. However, the income threshold where the child tax credit begins to be reduced was $26,330 in 1984. This income threshold was not indexed to inflation. That is important, because if it had been, it would now be worth $36,862. In fact, the current threshold is $25,000, even less than it was in 1984. It has in fact gone far below the 1984 level. This means that those who make more than $25,921 but less than $36,862 have lost the ability to take full advantage of the refundable child tax credit.

In total, between 1986 and 1991, the federal government withdrew approximately $3.5 billion from the child benefits system. Remember, to understand $1 billion, you could spend $1,000 a day every day without touching your income for 2,000 years, and you would still have $270,000 left over. This is $3.5 billion, so you could spend $3,500 every day for 2,000 years and still have that $270,000 left over. It was achieved primarily through what? The sneak attack: De-indexation. This we can compare to the $2.1 billion that the government says it is going to put into the system with this bill over the next five years. After withdrawing $3.5 billion, they will put in $2.1 billion.

Canada's children and Canada's families would have been far better off today if the government had left well enough alone. As has been said in this chamber before, benign rather than malicious neglect would have been preferable to the emphasis this government has placed on Canada's children. Rather than benign neglect we have now malicious action. These children are being used cynically and fraudulently as shock troops in the phoney war the government is losing, as we found out earlier today, against the deficit.

So much for Acts I and II. So much for what will happen to Canadian families soon after the enactment of this bill, if it is enacted, and what will happen in the long run, especially with the sneaky and pernicious effect of de-indexation.

Now we come to Act III of this farce. A good place to raise the curtain would be as Senator Murray was saying:

> I presume that after we have dealt with Bills C-55 and C-80 the Senate will adjourn and the committee will begin its consideration of Bill C-80. Committee members will not have attendance in the Senate chamber to distract them. They will be able to sit morning, noon and night for as long as it takes to deal properly with Bill C-80.

Senator Murray: They chose not to.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Murray: They preferred the adjournment.

Senator Frith: That is not even evasive; it is just plain wrong.

Senator Murray: They chose not to.

Senator Frith: Read the material. Listen to what happened. Listen to your own chairman. That is not what happened.

Senator Murray: They preferred adjournment.

Senator Frith: The Leader of the Government in the Senate is probably actually asking us to believe that the committee made some unanimous decision to do that.

Senator Stanbury: The devil made them do it!

Senator Frith: Of course, he knows that the government members—and you will find out if you will listen—of the committee were obviously told what to do and did it. Just wait and you will see. Just stay tuned.

Senator Murray: I am listening.

Senator Frith: Senator Murray would then be followed by his deputy leader, Senator Lynch-Staunton. What would this new player on the stage say? He would say:

> . . . on a number of occasions we have asked for agreement on having a debate at this stage, which is second reading, in order to send the bill to committee no later than Friday, in order to give the committee plenty of time to hold hearings and —

And at that point I would be interrupting to say:

> What does the government consider is plenty of time? Will it tell us when we are allowed to go to committee?
> Senator Lynch-Staunton: The government does not determine the committee's schedule.

Not much. Senator Lynch-Staunton goes on to say:

As I was saying, this must be done for the bill to come back in good time in order for the house to study the committee's report and to vote on third reading by the end of this month at the latest.

Senator Hébert: By the end of this month?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes, by the end of this month.

Senator Cools: He confused his times.

Senator LeBlanc: Today is October 14.

Senator Frith: Finally, the acting chairperson of the committee, Senator Noel Kinsella, would join his colleagues on stage to give his own carefully memorized line.

Incidentally, I must say for myself that I blame the government leadership in the Senate for corrupting, in my opinion, the record and reputation of Senators Kinsella and Spivak. Their record and reputation for social caring was abused in order to lend credibility to this mess known as Bill C-80.

Senator Hébert: Exactly. That is a shame.

Senator Frith: Surely the government they could have enjoined somebody else. I blame them partly for allowing themselves to be manipulated and having their fine reputations tarnished in this way.

Senator Hébert: They could have chosen Senator Forrestall.

Senator Frith: Surely, they should have suggested that the government get someone else. There are many on the other side whom they could have chosen on the basis of how they behave in this chamber; of how they respond when they hear petitions; of how they turn a deaf ear; and of how they shout and squirm in anguish whenever they have to hear whatever the people have to say. Why did they not get them to do this job?

Senator Cools: Yes, why not Senator Barootes?

Senator Hébert: Yes, Senator Barootes would have been nice.

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Cools: Or Senator Simard.

Senator Frith: Yes, Senator Simard would also have been a good choice. But it is too late. They did not ask us our advice. We could have given them names that would not have involved the tarnishing of those records.

Now we have Senator Kinsella who states—and listen to this wording:

> We shall do a thorough study of the bill.

Yesterday, when he was asked questions about it, he was not talking about "we". He was like Pontius Pilot. He said, "I had nothing to do with it. I find nothing here. I am blameless. It was the committee. I had nothing to do with it." He was using the pronoun "I" yesterday. But when he was trying to persuade us that we should get this bill to committee, did he say "I—that is, providing the committee agrees with me"? Did he say, "I have no responsibility for the committee?" No. He stood as chairman of the committee and said, "We shall do a thorough study of the bill." I repeat, "We shall do a thorough study of this bill." Those are his words. The next sentence reads as follows:

> We hope to proceed with our work in an expeditious manner, but still —

And this was still "we", incidentally:

> . . . but still allow ample time for the witnesses to prepare.

Senator Hébert: To prepare?

Senator Frith: To prepare. Not just to be heard but to prepare. He went on to say:

> Hopefully, we will be assisted in that work by the participation of all honourable senators.

And he was. In fact, we did provide him with names of potential witnesses. Senator Molgat continued after Senator Kinsella spoke for the "we"—that is, the royal or the committee "we". Senator Molgat said:

> I appreciate very much the comments of the chairman of the committee. He shows a very reasonable attitude. I take him at his word that there will be ample time for the witnesses to prepare and to be heard, and that all witnesses who wish to appear will have an opportunity to do so.

Now, please remember that that was Senator Kinsella speaking with the "we", not the "I" that he referred to yesterday, blaming it all on the committee.

Senator Cools: He is a blemished man.

Senator Frith: Senator Kinsella did not dispute what Senator Molgat said. We sent the bill to committee with every expectation that we would be able to take him at his word. We had every expectation that we would have thorough hearings where everyone who wished to appear would have an opportunity to appear.

So there we have it, these three kings—that is, Senators Murray, Lynch-Staunton and Kinsella—exit stage right with the sound of heavy applause, having given us these undertakings on the record clearly and with evident sincerity, expecting us to believe them. And, as you will see from reading the record, we applauded them for that attitude. Well, there we have the three kings.

The kind of comedy we saw in the House of Commons hearings could only be orchestrated by the three stooges, not the three kings. These were the three wise men. They knew the importance of proper committee hearings in our parliamentary system and they promised to deliver, every one of them. And we believed them, not the least of them the chairman of the committee—not the least by any means.

When I spoke to this bill at second reading I read into the record a letter from Barbara Blouin of Tupper Grove, Nova Scotia. She found her experience with the House of Commons legislative committee, to use her words, "most disheartening", and had come to believe that "the democratic process under the Mulroney government is nothing but a sham, a charade."

● (1530)

I read those words in debate at second reading before the bill went to committee. Senators Murray, Lynch-Staunton and Kinsella heard them. They heard what the experience had been before the House of Commons committee. That was when they gave us the blandishments, "It won't be like that here."

We thought that, in the Senate, Act III would be something very different. We thought that there would be time to do a proper job, particularly since the government's own timetable—not one pressed upon it, but one which it volunteered — did not require Royal Assent on the bill before the end of October. There was a whole month ahead of us, or so we thought.

Senator Kinsella, speaking as the chairman, and on behalf of the committee, asked us to cooperate. We did. We provided to the chairman a list of witnesses who we believed could provide some insight into the government's new policy. There were 33 names on that list. We, of course, assumed that government members would produce a list as well. Their list would include individuals and groups that supported the bill. We knew that it would not be easy to find such people, but surely it would not be impossible.

After all, Senator Murray, you may remember, honourable senators, was able to find two or three individuals who had put their names to a pro-GST petition.

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Frith: It is true that he found them in his own office, but the fact remains that he found them. The ones he produced for the GST were not again conscripted to publicly support this bill. No one that I know of came forward to support Bill C-80. Yesterday I tried to get from the chairman of the committee the name of a rumoured supporter of the bill. The chairman did not refuse to provide it, but just sat and shook his head.

In any event, we thought it was possible that there might be found some witnesses willing to speak in favour of this legislation. We had our own list of 33 who we knew wanted to speak to it. As it turned out, I do not think there were any individuals or groups who wanted to support it publicly. At that time, however, in our naiveté—it is amazing how often we take these people at their word — we looked forward to hearing from the witnesses who would be found to support the bill.

Public hearings began on Wednesday morning, October 7, one week ago today, with officials from the Departments of National Health and Welfare, Revenue Canada and Finance.

Senator Murray: Eight days after the bill was referred to the committee.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: At the conclusion of their presentation, the acting chairman noted that a minister—I underline the word "a"—was available to appear before the committee on Friday morning. He then asked in all innocence, "Where do we go from here?"

The Leader of the Government likes to keep interrupting, telling us what happened after we sent the bill to committee three days earlier than we were asked, or even required, to send it. We were encouraged to cooperate with the chairman, and we did. I think Senator Murray should accept that his chairman—and for this I do not blame the chairman—followed a schedule that was a collaborative and cooperative schedule.

Senator Murray: Eight days later.

Senator Frith: There was not any blocking. There was not any foot dragging. Senator Kinsella and our side worked together at that stage.

But returning to the conclusion of the presentation by departmental officials on Wednesday, we have the acting chairman noting that "a" minister was available to appear before the committee on Friday. Picture the scene, honourable senators. We hear from the government officials, and before anything else happens the acting chairman says, "A minister will be available to appear before the committee on Friday morning." He then asks in all innocence, "Where do we go from here?"

Senator Di Nino, not one to miss a cue, immediately chimed in. What was his reply to the question: "Where do we go from here?" Before I provide it, remember where we are, honourable senators. We are starting these hearings that will give witnesses ample time. We have the names of 33 potential witnesses. We hear from the government officials and the chairman says, "Where do we go from here?" It seems to me it would be a simple question for the chairman to answer himself—we start listening. But then he says, "A minister will be available on Friday." He did not mean a week Friday, or two weeks Friday, not even later in the month Friday. He meant this Friday, three days later.

Into the breach comes Senator Di Nino with a suggestion. "Can we not convince the minister to come tomorrow night?" What about all these witnesses? "What witnesses?" they would say. We just heard from the officials. We will hear from the minister on Friday. That is the "ample time." That is the careful, long consideration contemplated by Senator Kinsella when he spoke on behalf of his committee. The "we" must have included Senator Di Nino who is a member of the committee. The "we" must have included all the others.

So, Senator Di Nino, who was one of the "we" who would give ample time to witnesses, does not even want to work until Friday. Does he expect to hear 33 witnesses between then and Friday? He says, "Gosh, can we not convince the minister to come tomorrow night? Then we could complete our hearings tomorrow evening, in one day." That is how quick Di Nino wanted it. That is the ample time Di Nino wanted to give. That is the careful study that Di Nino wanted to give.

The chairman, of course, managed to persuade him that maybe he could wait until Friday. Di Nino, generous of spirit, wishing to give ample time, wishing to maintain his reputation and the reputation of other senators for careful study, careful listening and careful reporting, yielded. He said, "Okay, Friday it is," and Friday it was.

The cat was out of the bag. Everything we heard in this chamber about this bill receiving traditional, careful study by the Senate, about careful attention being paid to the people, was nothing but a lot of guff, as usual. The bill was to be hammered out of committee with all possible speed. The acting chairman finally convinced Senator Di Nino that Friday morning was the earliest the minister could be available, but even so, we are not sure whether Senator Di Nino was satisfied. I assume that he would want to go home and have some sleep. However, we are not even sure whether Senator Di Nino was happy with that, because the chairman said, "We might not be able to get anyone here until Friday. We might have to wait that long for our careful study and our ample time."

Whatever his feelings at this setback, Senator Di Nino then moved that the committee conclude its hearings—he brought down the guillotine, having looked around to ensure that he had enough votes to win his motion—with a clause-by-clause study immediately following the minister's appearance on Friday morning, and that the committee report the bill on Tuesday. How would he know that the bill would be reported on Tuesday? Even at that stage, we did not know that the Senate would be called back on Tuesday, did we? No one told us. No one told the Senate. This bill is now in the Senate; it is not in the committee. No one told the Senate that it was coming back on Tuesday.

Can you imagine, honourable senators, that Senator Di Nino knew we were coming back on Tuesday? I take it that the "we" Senator Kinsella was talking about all knew the Senate was coming back on Tuesday. How do you like that? It was all planned well in advance. We have to assume that while we were sitting here listening to these honeyed words, they knew very well what the plan was: Get the bill out of committee on Thursday night, if Di Nino has his way, but no later than Friday, and back to the Senate on Tuesday. At that point, no one had heard about the Senate being recalled for Tuesday. So it was all a part of a plan.

In any event, that was his motion and it was carried by the government majority on the committee at 4:20. The committee had sat a grand total of 2 hours and 16 minutes. It had met at 2:04 p.m., listened to the departmental witnesses, discussed future business, had a closure motion introduced, passed the closure motion and suspended its sitting at 4:20 p.m. That is the "ample time". That is the "careful study".

This was not a committee meeting, honourable senators. It was a race track. In alphabetical order, here are the names of the people who were there: Atkins, Balfour, Cochrane, Di Nino, Forrestall, Lynch-Staunton and MacDonald. They all voted for this "ample time" and "careful study" of a day and a half. Perhaps they are proud of their participation.

Senator Simard: Who was not there?

An Hon. Senator: You were not there.

Senator Simard: No.

Senator Frith: I hope you are apologizing. I am prepared to have recorded that Senator Simard was not there because he would not participate in such a fraud.

The committee resumed its sitting at 7:03 p.m. It heard from Dr. Robert Glossop —

Senator Simard: What about Senators Bonnell and Hébert and Stanbury?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You are at the wrong time. They were not there at that time.

Senator Simard: So that was before that.

Senator Frith: Sorry, you got it wrong as usual. You never bother getting it right. Why don't you try and see if you can get your brain and the facts in gear before you put your mouth in motion.

Senator Simard: Why don't you go fight somewhere else and stop wasting our time.

Senator Gigantès: You are getting paid to be here. You could not get paid to do anything else.

Senator Frith: The committee resumed sitting at 7:03 p.m. It heard from Dr. Robert Glossop of the Vanier Institute and then from Richard Shillington of Tristat Resources before adjourning at 8:53 p.m. The total time for the two witnesses was 1 hour and 50 minutes.

Before turning to the next day's proceedings of the committee, I would like honourable senators to consider comments made by Mr. Shillington about the government's White Paper on the child benefit.

During my second reading remarks, I described how this 12-page tome—it was a very thin document as you will remember—was evidence of Tory scholarship, study, research and understanding on the problems facing Canadian families, evidence of the Tory brain trust at its finest. And I was not wrong. Mr. Shillington found it so misleading that he stated this at page 21:95: "If the owners of the BRICK did this, they would go to jail." The Tory brain trust at its finest.

The committee resumed its hearings on Thursday, October 8 at 9:03 a.m. The first witness was Madame Marcelle Dolment, from Réseau d'action et d'information pour les femmes. On September 22, I read into the record a letter which I had received from Madame Dolment which condemned as undemocratic the process that was followed in the House of Commons with this bill.

She hoped that the Senate would do better. But it did not take long for her to conclude that the Senate hearings were an even greater travesty.

Senator Simard: What a waste of time.

Senator Frith: Of course. You have to listen to the people. That is always a waste of time for you.

Senator Simard: No, no, you are not the people.

Senator Frith: It is always a waste of time for you to listen. Well, here is what they said. You will have to listen to it. I am sorry, the Rules of the Senate have not changed to make it quite that convenient for you.

Madame Dolment, who had hoped that the Senate would do better, stated at page 22:22:

[Translation]

> . . . We deplore the fact that this issue was examined during the summer. A number of women's groups were unable to appear, since it was the middle of the summer. The whole thing was pushed through at a ridiculously fast pace.
> Within the space of a half-hour or hour, all of the clauses had been adopted. And here again, we were given barely one week's notice. We are very much involved in the constitutional debate. Women are very busy with this issue, as you know. Therefore, we apologize for not submitting something a little more original or very different, although we realize full well that we are dealing with the same bill.

[English]

And when Senator Hébert explained to her how, at Senator Di Nino's instigation, the committee would be concluding with witnesses that very evening, she said, at page 22:

[Translation]

> Ms. Dolment: This is not democracy.
> Senator Hébert: It has absolutely nothing to do with democracy.
> Ms. Dolment: Are we living with Pinochet?

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: No, we are living with Brian Mulroney!

[English]

Senator Frith: In addition to Marcelle Dolment, the committee heard from the Caledon Institute of Social Policy and a joint presentation from the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto and the Child Poverty Action Group before breaking for lunch at 12:17.

It resumed its sittings again at 2:05 p.m., hearing from the Canadian Association of Schools of Social Work, the National Anti-Poverty Organization, and the Canadian Association of Food Banks before again suspending its sitting at 4:55 p.m. It resumed at 6:18 to hear from the National Action Committee on the Status of Women and adjourned for the day at 7 p.m.

[Senator Frith.]

That was it—seven witnesses on Thursday, total time taken 6 hours and 42 minutes. Add to that 1 hour and 50 minutes on Wednesday, and you have a grand total of 8 hours and 32 minutes devoted to hearing from the public.

Senator Barootes yesterday wanted to say that it was the same as was done on the hearings for the GST. However, it seems to me that he cannot have it both way. He is either saying that what was done on the GST was right, and therefore they are doing it now; or it was wrong, and therefore what they are doing is wrong.

But let us look at the comparison. Remember the figure I have just given of 8 hours and 32 minutes devoted to hearings for the public. How do the hearings on the GST compare? Senator Barootes likes to say that the GST hearings were the same as the C-80 hearings. He argues that his side is entitled to do what it did with Bill C-80 because of what the Senate did during the GST hearings. In reply, I will read from the report presented by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce when it concluded its examination of the GST legislation. Do you remember the number of witnesses and do you remember the 8 hours and 32 minutes on Bill C-80?

An Hon. Senator: We remember very well.

Senator Frith: For the GST, there were 380 presentations made to the committee, compared to Senator Di Nino's 9 presentations maximum, and he only begrudgingly gave that. You have to blame Senator Di Nino because the chairman of the committee will not take any responsibility for it now. So it is all Senator Di Nino's fault.

We have Senator Di Nino's eight hours and 32 minutes, and we have Senator Barootes explaining that it is the same as it was for the GST. Do you remember how he barked that out yesterday? Well, for the GST:

> Three hundred and eighty presentations were made to the committee in Ottawa and all ten provinces and two territories during approximately 200 hours of public hearings. This report presents the conclusions of the Standing Committee on Banking Trade and Commerce on Bill C-62.

If Senator Di Nino had known that, I do not think he would have taken an appointment to this body. Can you imagine how horrified he would be to think that a committee of the Senate would go so far as to hear 380 presentations? He might want to look at the names of all those groups and individuals who appeared before the Banking committee. Maybe I should read them into the record. There are pages and pages of them. It starts off with the Department of Finance and the C.D. Howe Institute. There is a full page of very close type. These are the people who appeared. I am sure that Senator Di Nino and his friends on the committee would have fainted to think of that. Look at the pages. There are 380 presentations and it shows where they all took place. Senator Barootes says that the Di Nino formula is the same as that. I am still turning pages.

Senator Murray: I hear that the Blue Jays are leading two to zero.

Senator Frith: That certainly gives us a clear indication of what you care about, sir. It is too bad you are not in one of those boxes which your host could write off. In any event, it is clear that Senator Murray would much rather listen—and I do not blame him—to the Blue Jays game than to listen to this description of the travesty he and his colleagues are perpetrating. Why don't you go and listen to the game? I know how hard it is for you to choke this down.

Senator Barootes: Not travesty; trash.

Senator Frith: Down Fido. How did you like your comparison, Senator Barootes? You thought that the Di Nino formula and the GST were the same but you weren't here to listen to the facts. You were out listening to the Blue Jays. Before you walk in here and make comments, at least stay and listen to the debate. Go on out and cheer the Blue Jays and heckle the Oakland A's, where you may—and I emphasize "may"—have something to say.

Senator Barootes: Where are the other Liberals?

Senator Frith: I don't know, they can be where they want. I am talking about you, sir, not about them.

Senator Barootes: Where are the Liberals? A dereliction of duty.

Senator Murray: Only half a dozen of them here to hear their leader.

Senator Frith: They know it is a travesty. You have to listen to it and hear it.

That is, of course, an example of what is happening. In the debate all the interventions were from this side, except that of Senator Spivak. There were no interventions from the other side at all. They had nothing to say, no answer for what they are doing. They had nothing to say to support Bill C-80 and could not find any witnesses to support it. And what do they do here? They talk about the Blue Jays. They talk about where other Liberal senators are.

Senator Barootes: Where are they?

Senator Frith: What has that to do with it? What does that have to do with what you are doing here? What does it have to do with the bill? Do you have any idea where you are, sir? You are a senator, you are you sitting in the Senate, you are listening to debate on legislation, and all can you talk about, as you come in and honour us with your presence between innings, is some nonsense about where Liberals senators are.

Senator Barootes: The same dereliction of duty that you showed at the committee when you walked out.

Senator Frith: There are plenty of Conservative senators who are not here either.

Senator Barootes: You have a duty here too.

Senator Frith: Why don't you go back and listen to the Blue Jays if you have nothing more useful to say? You are asking questions. Why did you not get up during second reading debate and say some of these things?

Senator Barootes: Our case was well put by Senator Spivak.

Senator Frith: Your case was so strong you could not get anyone in the country to support it. When we ask for the name of an alleged supporter of the bill, you do not have it. That is how strong your case is. Of course you have not said anything. Of course no one on that side said anything. Of course Senator Barootes just comes in between innings and barks. Of course he does not stand up.

Senator Barootes: You are saying the same thing over and over again.

Senator Frith: He is still barking. He is still at it.

Senator Barootes: Filibuster some more.

Senator Frith: Don't worry, sir, I don't need your permission to go ahead. I will go ahead when I am ready to go ahead, and when you have stopped barking. I thought you were about to get up and say something about the legislation that is before the Senate, instead of coming in between innings of a ball game and making comments on attendance of senators. Talk about someone who ought to be ashamed of himself. However, if there is one thing we can be perfectly sure of, it is that Senator Barootes is not ashamed of what he is doing today. However, I think that underneath it all he is pretty ashamed about what the government is doing with this legislation.

Notice, incidentally, that the GST report, which Senator Barootes wanted to compare, comprises 197 pages. What do we have on Bill C-80? The GST report was supported by the evidence. What have we here? Nothing. Absolutely nothing. There is nothing in this report to support the conclusion of the committee. There is nothing referring to the witnesses heard by the committee. The committee's report on Bill C-80 is not based on any evidence. It has no basis. It has basis only in the barkings of the type we just heard from Senator Barootes between innings.

These hearings and the unsupportable conclusion of the committee is a charade. For how much longer, honourable senators on either side of this house, can we expect witnesses to come to these hearings when the unanimous conclusions of those whom the government deigns to hear, in the Di Nino formula, are summarily rejected and other witnesses wanting to come are told to get lost? Why does the government insult them and all Canadians? Those who want to speak to the Senate are tolerated only because they provide a veil of legitimacy to an illegitimate process.

This government's ham-fisted stupidity is ruining the country. Everything it touches, it botches. It is ruining the country. It is ruining over a century of hard-earned Senate reputation and the reputation of its honourable committees for listening, for careful study and for thoughtful report.

We are taught that compassion is a virtue. That is hard to muster for this government's pitiful performance but perhaps we should remember that it is in its dying days. It is drowning in the thick pool of its own mistakes, of which its performance on this bill is just one more example and, we can only hope and pray, one of its last.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: The question before the Senate is one of awful moment for the families of this country, and one whose outcome ought to be guided by conscience, not political machination nor electoral design. With the introduction of Bill C-80, the Conservative government has ushered in what will likely be the winter of Canadian discontent.

The wages of this action, the reward for fomenting this sentiment, is certain relegation of its architects to electoral oblivion. In this regard, honourable senators, the currents of Conservative fortunes will inevitably turn awry.

Passage of Bill C-80 will make Canada one of the few countries in the western industrialized world which provides no financial support, through cash benefits or the tax system, to many parents in need. For instance, parents with one or two children between the ages of seven and seventeen and income levels of over $66,721 will no longer receive direct cash benefits in the form of a family allowance—something to which they have been entitled since 1945.

• (1600)

Words hold little power either to express my amazement at a government that would introduce such a measure, or, in fact, to convey my utter disbelief at the quailing of those Conservative senators who chose to disregard the democratic process, to rush this bill through the Senate, as was so convincingly demonstrated by the Leader of the Opposition.

What kind of motivation could have prompted them to be the willing puppets of a moribund and morally bankrupt government, in one of its most cynical manœuvres to date? It could not have been courage, for they have none!

Perhaps an overview of the history of Bill C-80, with special emphasis on its consequences, will help my colleagues opposite appreciate my discomfiture.

The Conservative government announced its intention to overhaul the Canadian child benefits system in its last budget. The proposal was spelled out somewhat more specifically in a flimsy 12-page document, pompously entitled "The Child Benefit—A White Paper on Canada's New Integrated Child Tax Benefit".

Imagine, if you will, a government policy which involves billions of dollars, a policy which dismantles Canada's 74-year-old child benefits program, addressed in a paltry 12-page document!

As Senator Frith pointed out so eloquently in his speech on this bill on September 22, white papers are more substantial documents, some running to 100 pages, designed to express government thinking on a particular issue. Given the magnitude of the changes proposed by Bill C-80, this white paper underscores the poverty of the government's thinking and the maliciousness of its actions.

[Senator Frith.]

Not only does this meagre pamphlet illustrate the misery of the Conservative approach to child benefits, it also testifies to the government's underhandedness. For example, Mr. Richard Shillington, a well-known authority on social questions and one of the few witnesses who actually appeared before the Senate committee studying Bill C-80, staunchly denounced this trickery. He said:

> This white paper . . . is absolutely a new low in terms of a policy document designed to guide people who want to understand the legislation, as well as its impact . . . This document was designed, not to inform, but to mislead . . . Showing families that monthly cheques are going up, while ignoring what happens to annual benefits, is selective in the extreme. It is inexcusable in a document that purports to explain to families what would happen to their annual benefits.

Moreover, this blunder, according to Mr. Shillington, was intentional and not the result of some administrative oversight or sloppiness.

[Translation]

Furthermore, the government had the audacity to distribute 350,000 copies of this phony white paper to the public, which is already confused by this ambiguous, very complex bill.

Obviously, the Conservative government acted that way because it did not have the courage to tell the people honestly that it was going to undermine a cornerstone of Canada's social security system.

Now, the white paper shows clearly that three programs will be abolished, namely family allowances, the non-refundable child tax credit and the refundable child credit. These programs will be replaced by a single new benefit.

The Conservative government pretends that at the very most it is combining all existing benefits into a single one, on the pretext of making life easier for Canadians.

We know their proverbial compassion!

However, that is all nonsense and a smoke screen that the government is putting up before Canadians. The real purpose of Bill C-80—why not admit it outright—is to end the universality of family allowances, despite Brian Mulroney's famous promise that social programs were a sacred trust that would be safe from budget cuts. Empty words, of course! Broken promises, obviously!

Moreover, the government had the audacity to claim that this odious measure was progressive, since it should direct money to those who need it most. You have heard that a hundred times! This statement does not stand up to scrutiny, is it any wonder?

As Richard Shillington said on analyzing Bill C-80:

[English]

> The targeting of child benefits was sold on the idea that bank presidents shouldn't get family allowances.

> Well, we have succeeded in taking family allowances away from bank presidents—and the tellers, and the clerks, and the people who sweep the floor of the banks.

[Translation]

This witness also asked why the government will pay less, after this bill is passed, to families whose income is between $25,000 and $35,000 or between $35,000 and $45,000. Why will less fortunate families receive less money?

The alleged streamlining effected by C-80 in no way increases the income of the poorest families. Families on welfare gain nothing from it. The increase in the monthly child benefit only replaces the money they would have received at the end of the tax year. That's clear! Low-income families must earn at least $3,750 to be entitled to the earned-income supplement. To receive the maximum benefit of $500, families will have to earn between $10,000 and $20,921. The supplement will disappear once the family income reaches $25,921. After that, no more! This means that Canada now considers assistance for poor children to be dependent on their parents' participation in the labour market. Thus children whose parents are unemployed will receive a smaller benefit than other children.

I think that is worth repeating because, for me, it very well illustrates the spirit of the law: children whose parents are unemployed receive a smaller benefit than other children whose parents work.

With a national unemployment rate around 11.6 per cent, putting a work incentive in the new child benefit will only hurt the most vulnerable families, namely those that depend on welfare through no fault of their own. Moreover, a $500 supplement in Toronto, for example, does not even cover the annual cost of a bus pass, which is $816 a year.

Andy Mitchell, program director of the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto, had this to say about the earned-income supplement when he testified in Parliament:

> Not only does it make distinctions between upper and lower-income people in the way the benefits are delivered, but it makes invidious distinctions between low-income families. Those who are working are seen, I suppose, as sort of the deserving poor and are eligible for the supplement, while those with little or no earnings—this is what you might think of as the undeserving poor, I guess, in some people's books—get nothing.

This is strangely reminiscent of the old British laws on the poor. Are we so short of ideas in this country that we must draw on the pitiless nineteenth century?

Paradoxically, the deductions for child care expenses for children under seven years old will increase from $4,000 to $5,000. This means that upper-income families will receive a benefit of over $5,000, while low-paid workers with two incomes and two children will receive only $2,540. The wealthier families will receive twice as much in benefits as the low-income families.

I cannot imagine Senator Spivak, who is taking notes at this moment, accepting such things; I cannot understand it!

Furthermore, targeted programs have the bad habit of becoming less effective with time. In this regard, the research done by Andy Mitchell is revealing. He reports that when the child tax credit was implemented in 1978, it went to families with above-average income. However, this threshold has steadily gone down, owing to inflation, over time. At present, benefits stop far below the middle income level and the targeting is more and more restrictive.

That is the plain truth for all to see about the Conservatives' so-called rationalization. The poorest get no benefit from it. That is the truth.

Besides, the Conservatives claim that C-80 will raise federal benefits for families by $400 million a year, or $2.1 billion over five years. That is a wonderful example of the hypocrisy of the government, which quite simply forgets to say that it took more than $3.5 billion out of the child benefit system between 1986 and 1991.

Since they came to power, the Conservatives have quite simply gutted the child benefit system. According to Ken Battle, president of the Caledon Institute of Social Policy, the most harmful of these changes was the decision to partly deindex child benefits.

Since 1986, family allowances have no longer been fully indexed. In fact, they are only indexed for inflation in excess of 3 per cent. The other child benefits, like the refundable and non-refundable credits, are not indexed either.

These changes have had the effect of steadily eroding child benefits. As I just said, it represents a loss of $3.5 billion. So how can the government pretend that Bill C-80 is progress? Is it an improvement to raise benefits by $2.1 billion when they have already been cut by more than $3.5 billion?

• (1610)

[English]

Furthermore, Mr. Battle confirmed before the Senate committee last week that an additional $3.5 billion will be slashed from the tax benefit by the year 2000 because of inflation and partial indexation. He described the effects of partial indexation as follows:

> Of any single change made to social policy in Canada in the last decade, that is the most important feature. It is ignored because it is hard to understand. However, it has been applied successfully to the income tax system, to child benefits, to the GST refundable credits, et cetera. Partial indexation is a regressive cut. Lower income Canadians are hit the hardest, in proportional terms, because they suffer the effects of losing child benefits as well as increasing income taxes.

Interestingly, according to Mr. Battle, the poor are the only Canadians who will pay more GST every year. Since the GST refundable credit is only partially indexed, as is the income threshold proposed by Bill C-80, fewer people will receive the maximum credit which, in any event, will continue to shrink.

This nasty legislation is the final nail in the coffin of universality of child benefit programs. It confirms that the government has washed its hands of child benefits, that it completely ignores the fact that that helping families raise children is an investment in the future of our country. Moreover, C-80 establishes the government's capitulation in the fight against child poverty. Need I remind my colleagues opposite that the Conservative party unanimously endorsed a resolution, debated in the Commons in 1989, to eliminate child poverty in Canada by the year 2000.

Members of the Child Poverty Action Group who appeared before the Senate committee studying Bill C-80 effectively outlined the problem of child poverty in Canada. They said the following:

> Since current economic policy has created a recession resulting in decline of family income, the need for a richer child benefit is more urgent than at any other time in our recent history.

In fact, child poverty is one of the principal plagues affecting Canadian society, and many of the government's policies have exacerbated this situation. During the 1970s poverty hovered at approximately 14 per cent. In the 1980s, despite considerable economic growth, it exceeded 15 per cent. Today, because of the dismal state of the Canadian economy, this figure stands at an appalling rate of 17.4 per cent.

Unfortunately, Bill C-80 fails to address the need for a richer benefit which would help reduce child poverty. Integrating family allowances and refundable and nonrefundable child tax credits does nothing to improve the incomes of the poorest families with children.

Obviously, the government has failed in its attempt to target benefits to Canada's neediest families. As well, it has run roughshod over the democratic process, demonstrating its unequivocal contempt for Canadians. For example, Conservatives introduced closure at second and third reading of Bill C-80 in the House of Commons. Furthermore, the House of Commons committee which studied the legislation provided no time for witnesses to prepare briefs. As a result, many groups which sought to express an opinion on the bill were denied that privilege.

As we know, the charade has continued in the Senate. I thought the closure motion was for 12 hours, but I learned from my leader that it is only for eight and a half hours. These undemocratic and opportunistic manœuvres were summed up succinctly by Mrs. Marcelle Dolment, the coordinator of the Réseau d'action et d'information pour les femmes, who was quoted a moment ago by Senator Frith. When she appeared before the Senate committee last week, she said:

> The Conservative government took advantage of the summer and of the constitutional brouhaha to quietly dismantle—one might say working behind the scenes—the most significant component of Canada's social system, namely equity toward parents and a social safety net for parents.

[Senator Hébert.]

Unfortunately, the dismantling of this program will only serve to tear the social fabric of Canada by widening the gulf between the rich and the poor; creating, as it were, two nations within the Canadian state. Benjamin Disraeli, the 19th century British Prime Minister who engineered sweeping social reforms, spoke of these two nations in very evocative and lyrical terms, and I quote:

● (1620)

> Two nations; between whom there is no intercourse and no sympathy; who are as ignorant of each other's habits, thoughts, and feelings, as if they were dwellers in different zones, or inhabitants of different planets; who are formed by different breeding, are fed by a different food, are ordered by different manners, and are not governed by the same laws—the rich and the poor.

Conscience, as I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks, should have guided the outcome of the bill now before this house; unfortunately, because of political expediency, Conservative members opposite were unable to face theirs. As a result, they have signed the death warrant of Canada's universal child care program, ensuring that rich and poor continue to dwell in different zones and to be governed by different rules. Thus, with apologies to Shakespeare, inability to face their conscience does make cowards of them all. I am sorry, Senator Spivak.

[Translation]

I hope their conscience torments them every time they see a poor child, if only they can find one in their neighbourhood.

[English]

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I am pleased to take part in this debate and I wish to register a number of concerns that I have with Bill C-80.

On October 9, the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, agreed to report Bill C-80 back to the Senate without amendment.

I would point out to honourable senators that this decision was not supported at all by the opposition, and neither was it supported by the witnesses who appeared before us. In fact, it should be known that no one witness who appeared before the Senate committee studying Bill C-80, except for the officials from the Department of Health and Welfare Canada, and only one or two witnesses who appeared before the legislative committee studying this bill in the other place, could support Bill C-80.

It is important for members of the Senate, and indeed for all Canadians, to know that this bill has been criticized not only for its content but for the very process through which this bill will soon become law in Canada. Some of my colleagues have spoken on this bill in the chamber, and because many are aware of its contents and the implications of those contents, I will only make brief references to them, after which I will address the matter of process.

The witnesses who appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology told us that they had been contacted only days before the hearings on this bill commenced at the committee level. I would like to remind my colleagues that many of those organizations operate on the basis of volunteer labour, and that many of them are strapped for both time and money. Yet they agreed to appear before us, even though they had very short notice. I would suggest that their reasons for doing so are directly related to the fundamental changes which they see taking place as a result of Bill C-80.

They share the concerns of myself and my colleagues that Bill C-80 will give no additional moneys to those families who may be most in need in this country, recipients of social assistance; that the lack of indexation will erode the value of any new moneys put into this program over the years; that the use of an earned income supplement introduces a notion of "deserving" and "undeserving" poor in this country; that increases in the child care expense deduction will give greater benefit to families with higher income levels at the expense of a system of universal, affordable and accessible child care in this country; that the bill, reported to be part of the government's strategy to address the disgraceful level of child poverty in Canada, will do nothing to assist many children and very little to help other children.

These concerns reflect some of the problems with the content of Bill C-80, but there is another matter that disturbed the witnesses, as well as myself and my colleagues. This is the matter of process. As senators, we need to ask ourselves: How did this bill come to be? Who was consulted in the course of preparing the various components of this legislation? How much credence did the government give to the models which the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology explored in our report "Children in Poverty: Toward a Better Future."

How is it that the Department of Finance was so prominently involved in a bill which is profoundly social in nature? Why is there such a hurry to implement a package of changes so extensive as this? Finally, why did the government begin hearings on Bill C-80 in the middle of the summer when little, if any, attention was being directed to this bill? Why, after the Government House Leader in the Senate had assured us that we would have plenty of time to study this bill, plenty of time to hear witnesses and ample opportunity to review the important aspects of this legislation, did the government senators invoke their own form of closure at the committee level by limiting the number of witnesses called? These are important points, and my colleagues and I would like the Canadian public to know how concerned we are over the answers to these questions.

When it became apparent that only a limited number of witnesses were to be called to appear before the committee, and senators wished to be in their own provinces working on the referendum, I suggested that we reconvene our hearings on Bill C-80 on October 27. I submitted that we could give more careful consideration to the complex nature of the bill at that time, and that we could also hear from those additional witnesses who wished to appear before us.

This suggestion would not have delayed the government's agenda. The officials themselves wanted the bill not later than the end of the month, but my suggestion fell on deaf ears. I suggest to members opposite that they still have time to change their minds by adjourning this debate and reconvening on October 27, hold a further two and a half days of hearings and then proceed with final third stage.

Senator Frith: Or even send it back to the committee, by consent.

Senator Bosa: It could be sent back to committee.

We are giving third reading to a piece of legislation that it would appear is endorsed by neither social policy groups, researchers nor practitioners in Canada.

While we were able to hear from only a fraction of those witnesses who would have contributed greatly to the complex debate on Bill C-80, we did hear from some of those who have the longest attachment to issues of child and family benefits in the country. These programs are intricate. The possible consequences of changes to them need to be analyzed through the use of computer models. The committee learned that indeed there are a few Canadian researchers and policy analysts who can fully grasp the range of issues involved. We were lucky enough to hear from several of these experts, and I would take this opportunity to quote from the text submitted by one of Canada's leading experts in the field, Mr. Ken Battle. Mr. Battle is a former head of the National Council of Welfare, and is now the President of the Caledon Social Policy Institute. He stated:

> The proposed package of child benefits simplifies the system to a certain extent.

He did make a couple of positive comments. He also stated:

> It replaces three programs with one and it standardizes the basis upon which the child benefits—aside from the child care expense deduction—are calculated. The Earned Income Supplement also addresses a major gap in the income security system by providing financial assistance to some of Canada's working poor, that is families with children.
> Unfortunately, the weaknesses of the proposal outweigh its strengths. The new scheme will do little to fight child poverty. Working poor families will gain only $500 the first year, and most welfare families—the poorest of all—will get no more than they do under the current system. Yet, middle-income and some very affluent families with children will see modest improvements in their child benefits.
> Moreover, these small gains will be short-lived: child benefits will steadily drop in value over time, due to the effects of partial deindexation. In addition, fewer families > will receive assistance over the years because the income levels used to determine eligibility are not tied to the full increase to the cost of living.

The Caledon Social Policy Institute supports the principle of increasing financial assistance to families most in need. Poverty afflicts more than one million children in Canada, including two in every three children in lone-parent families led by women. Yet the government proposal does little in the short term and virtually nothing in the long term to make a dent in child poverty.

In order to protect child benefits from inflation we propose that full indexation be restored to rates and the income thresholds used to determine eligibility. We recommend the elimination of the regressive child care expense deduction to help generate new funds for a more generous child benefit for poor families. Child care needs are better met through an increased supply of licensed child care spaces than through tax breaks which favour well-off families.

I should like to note that the issues raised by Mr. Battle were supported and reiterated by Mr. Richard Shillington, by Dr. Robert Glossop of the Vanier Institute of the Family, by Reseau d'action et d'information pour les femmes, by the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto, the Child Poverty Action Group, the Canadian Association of Schools of Social Work, the National Anti-Poverty Association and the National Association of Food Banks.

In our brief deliberations on Bill C-80 we were told that the government's white paper, which was designed to explain the new system of child and family benefits, was confusing and even misleading in its content. One witness went beyond that by emphasizing and denigrating the word "misleading" even further. Expert witnesses told the Senate committee that the aims of the new system, as explained in the white paper, are not met by the new legislation.

I quote from Mr. Ian Bennett, the Senior Assistant Deputy Minister, Tax Policy Branch, Revenue Canada, who said:

> While the Child Tax Benefit has several important features, the development was driven by two main goals. The first was to increase the financial assistance going to low- and modest-income families, particularly the working poor. The second was to streamline and rationalize the existing patchwork and complicated system of child benefits.

In response to the government's claim that the new system is more streamlined and rational, I quote from Dr. Robert Glossop, the Director of Research at the Vanier Institute of the Family; he states:

> As you may know, the government's white paper on this new child benefit is extremely short; however, I do not think brevity should be confused with simplicity. Indeed, the proposed changes are themselves complex and promise to create, in my opinion, a system of family income support that would be more difficult for ordinary Canadians to comprehend and to count on in terms of being able to anticipate and estimate from year to year the actual levels of their benefits. No longer will we have five programs; but we will still have four programs, each with different qualifying criteria, distributional consequences and benefit rates, depending upon the age and number of children and the incomes of the families, that will vary from year to year.

[Senator Bosa.]

In referring to the government's first goal—that is, that of increasing the financial assistance going to low- and modest-income families, particularly the working poor—Dr. Glossop had this to say:

> . . . the distributional impact of the new legislation tells us that the anti-poverty impact of the new system will be negligible and will provide benefits inequitably to different categories of the poor . . . If the earned income supplement is indeed a good idea and in fact long overdue, there is nevertheless a question as to whether or not it should be introduced in such a way as to confuse it with the child benefit system and the administration of the child benefit system. Fully 60 per cent of the working poor in Canada will not benefit from this particular earned income supplement that will be introduced with the child benefit.

Thus, I should like to point out that the two main goals of the new system have not, according to many witnesses who have appeared at both the House and Senate committees, been achieved by this new system. It would seem to me that these groups are among the most valuable experts available on child and family benefits in particular, and social policy in general. Yet none of these groups were widely consulted on the contents of Bill C-80.

As I have indicated before, our report entitled, "Children in Poverty: Toward a Better Future", offered two alternative program models for revising the current delivery of child and family benefits in Canada. Neither model was adopted, despite the fact that either one of them would have substantially enriched the amount of benefits recipients can now expect from Bill C-80.

If the government will not listen to the work of Senate committees, I would implore them at least to listen to those experts who have many years of experience in this field as well as direct and firsthand knowledge regarding the burden of poverty in Canada.

I thank honourable senators for the attention that they have given to my remarks.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Would our honourable colleague take a question?

Senator Bosa: Yes.

Senator Corbin: A voice in the desert.

Senator Di Nino: It is not quite the desert yet.

We have heard a great deal about universality and the principles of universality. I am grasping in my own memory as to when the first taxing back of the family allowances took place.

Hon. Mira Spivak: It was in 1974.

Senator Di Nino: Pardon me?

Senator Spivak: In 1974.

Senator Frith: As I told you, Senator Spivak knows a lot about this subject.

Senator Di Nino: Is that the case? It was in 1974?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Order!

Senator Spivak: I am reviewing the situation.

Senator Di Nino: If that is the case, when we talk about the principles of universality, it really was on the slippery slope of 1974 when the Liberals taxed back for the first time the family allowance.

Senator Stewart: It was barely unfair to the rich people.

Senator Frith: That is right, but there are not enough rich people in the country according to Mr. Wilson. We do not want them to be upset.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable Senator Spivak answered your question.

Hon. John Buchanan: Who was in government then?

Senator Di Nino: The Liberals.

Senator Buchanan: Was it the Liberals?

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, if no one is going to make a speech, I will take a few minutes to tell you about the bill.

To answer Senator Di Nino's question, they might have taxed back the rich people and the bank managers might have paid income tax on the family allowance, but at least they got it. It was universal for all.

• (1640)

Every child in Canada should get it. If they have too much money, then tax it back. Give them a chance to receive the cheque. Many of these husbands make a lot of money, but the wives and children do not get it. These bank managers might be very rude to their wives and keep their money in their pockets or banks.

Senator Di Nino: What do you have against bank managers?

Senator Bonnell: There are some people in this country I do not trust. Some of them are Prime Ministers and others are bank managers.

Senator Di Nino: I was in the banking and trust industry for 30 years.

Senator Bonnell: Now I know why he made the motion to put on closure to kill the family allowance which was for the children and women of Canada, many of whom are members of one-parent families. This is the man who did it. Now we know why. He is a financier. He has all kinds of money and he does not know what it is like to be poor.

The bill, honourable senators, will effectively end the universality of the family allowance program in Canada. This is a dark day. It is Wednesday, October 14, although I thought it might be Friday the 13th. Senior citizens were getting cut back some years ago, but they rallied on the hill and said, "Yes, Charlie Brown," and the Prime Minister backed off. However, children cannot organize. Some of them are infants, many of them in their cradles. They cannot come to Parliament Hill to defend themselves. Nevertheless, this is the time that the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and Senator Di Nino cut them down, doing away with the family allowance. Some day these people will be old enough to vote. They will remember and Senator Di Nino's name will be stuck in their minds as that Toronto financier who cut them off the family allowance.

In 1944, the Family Allowance Act was passed. The new program began on July 1, 1945, and paid, without any means test, a monthly allowance for every child under 16. The program solely recognized the special needs associated with having children.

As stated so clearly by representatives of the Vanier Institute of the Family:

> For years and years, Canada was able to justifiably take pride in its tradition of investing in the wellbeing of children through its system of universal family allowances. Indeed, the point was often made that the United States was alone among the developed nations of the world as being the only one that did not have such a program . . .
> While neither the U.S. nor Canada will have a program of family allowances, the United States still offers a tax exemption of $2,100 per child to parents, thus preserving the principle of equity between taxpayers with and without dependent children.

And I would point out that, although the recent report of the America's National Commission on Children proposes to replace the exemption with a credit in order to ensure a more equitable distribution of benefits across income groups, the commission's proposed policy will still benefit all parents.

As I say, this is a sad day for Canadians, in particular for the children of our great country. The federal government has effectively shut the door on Canadian children with Bill C-80. My only hope is that my colleagues opposite recognize the grave danger facing our future generations and will join with us on this side in opposing this piece of legislation. Only then will we be able to design an effective child strategy, which, I add, must include a nationally planned child care program.

Honourable senators, the Senate has studied the issue of problems facing children and, most recently, the issue of child poverty. In our report entitled, "Children in Poverty: Toward a Better Future", released in January of last year, we noted the following:

> While Canada's child poverty rate has remained relatively constant (at approximately 16%) over the past number of years, among industrialized nations, Canadians have very little of which to be proud when it comes to the measures we have taken for safeguarding the well-being of our children.

This government had a chance to really fight poverty here. Unfortunately, it missed its opportunity.

The government has missed many opportunities to correct its wrongdoings. We continually listen to the rhetoric of this government as it attempts to convince Canadians that it has all the answers. It is true that high-skill jobs, a competitive economy, economic prosperity and a good quality of life are interdependent. Yet, if we consider what the federal government has done to EPF transfers, which help substantially to fund our post-secondary education system in Canada and the changes made to the unemployment insurance program in relation to job training and retraining, we must seriously challenge their assertion that they want to create a prosperous society.

Honourable senators, allow me refer again to the Senate's child poverty report. At page 5 of the report is the following statement:

> All too frequently poor children grow up to be poor adults. At least part of this process is attributable to the rates of school dropout among poor children and adolescents. Using current Statistics Canada information, research undertaken for the committee projects that over the next 20 years, approximately 187,000 students will leave school due to poverty.
> These high dropout rates will cost Canadians an estimated $620 million in Unemployment Insurance costs and an additional $710 million in social assistance payments. If these high dropout rates were eliminated, research estimates that federal and provincial income taxes would rise by $7.2 billion and consumption taxes by $1.15 billion. Finally, research indicates that incomes would be $23 billion higher if poverty-induced dropouts had gone on to complete an average level of education.

For a federal government so stuck on the notion of deficit reduction at the expense of the well-being of Canadians, I only hope that they are able to live with the consequences of what they are doing to Canadian children today.

This bill has been discussed as to its contents in some detail. While it will not surprise honourable senators to hear that I will oppose this bill when it comes before the Senate in its entirety, I want to take a few minutes to highlight the areas which I believe to be of severe consequence.

I must raise the issue of the lack of a federal-provincial agreement stipulating that the provinces will not decrease the amount of the proposed benefit. I am concerned that the provinces will cap welfare payments as the new combined benefit provides a larger monthly amount to families. We were told in our committee meetings that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has brought up the issue with his provincial counterparts and that there is no agreement with the provinces that they will not cap welfare payments.

Honourable senators, my question is this: If there appears to be so much goodwill, as we have been led to believe, why can we not ensure that Canadians actually benefit from this income which they are to receive and that their welfare payments will not be cut?

Second, honourable senators, is the issue of partial indexation. As pointed out by the Canadian Institute of Social Policy, and I quote:

> Unfortunately the weaknesses of the proposal outweigh its strengths. The new scheme will do little to fight child poverty. Working poor families will gain only $500 the first year, and most welfare families—the poorest of all—will get no more than they do under the present system. Yet middle income and some very affluent families with children will see modest improvements in their child benefits.
> Moreover, these small gains will be short-lived; child benefits will steadily drop in value over time due to the effects of indexation. In addition, fewer families will receive assistance over the years because the income levels used to determine eligibility are not tied to the full increase in the cost of living.

The benefit, in addition to the threshold amounts, must be fully indexed. We have witnessed what partial de-indexation has done over the last number of years, where they cut $3.5 billion off the children of this country. If we want to truly help children, we must ensure their benefits are worth something.

Before continuing on the substance of the bill itself, I want to make some brief comments on the legislative process involved in the deliberations of this bill. I take my position as a senator in this Parliament very seriously. I am quite proud to have served here for over 20 years. Yet I must echo the frustration which has been expressed by many senators before me with regard to the amount of time given to consideration of this bill.

In particular, I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate why he misled this chamber. In his comments to the chamber at page 2089 of the Debates of the Senate of September 22, 1992, Senator Murray stated:

> My point is that there is plenty of time to deal with the bill.

Concerning the committee, the Leader of the Government in the Senate responded to my leader's question and said:

> . . . the honourable senator, than whom there is none more courteous, will, I am sure, with the assistance of honourable senators, Liberal and Conservative, on the steering committee, want to hear a good cross-section of views from a good representation of witnesses who express an interest in coming forward. All of that can be done.

Well, my friends, for the record, this did not happen. It did not happen, Mr. Leader. It did not happen. We did not get what you said.

After hearing only a very few of the many witnesses who wanted to appear, the committee concluded its work. Senator Di Nino—we will never forget that name. At one time when he was new here, I could not get his name, but I will never forget it now.

Senator Hébert: And the poor will not forget it, either.

Senator Bonnell: Yes, Senator Di Nino. He is the man who killed the children's income.

On top of this insult to the Canadian people, the Minister responsible for children, that being the Minister of Health and Welfare, did not appear before either committee. He refused to come.

Senator Frith: Too ashamed.

Senator Bonnell: Rather, the Minister of Finance appeared in his place. I do not think he was ashamed. He was probably busy out fighting for the "yes" somewhere. But I think the Minister of National Health and Welfare should have been here. He should have been anxious to be here if he wishes to protect the children, and if he has any interest in social welfare in Canada. But no, it is run now by the Minister of Finance. We were fortunate, though. We had the Minister of Privatization. He came.

Senator Murray: His title is Minister of State (Finance and Privatization).

Senator Frith: That is right. The children of the country will be grateful for that correction. It will make a big difference. They will say, "Oh, we do not mind now, not getting our money. It is the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization. That changes everything."

Senator Bonnell: This minister agreed to come, I suppose, because he was rather embarrassed that no other ministers of the Mulroney government were appearing. Somebody had to come. It has become a financial issue now, the children's little cheque that they get each month.

Needless to say, we do not accept this charade and the obvious lack of responsibility shown toward this very critical issue. Honourable senators, I do not accept the government's method of social policy development. I do not accept this government's lack of respect for Canadian families. I certainly do not accept the outlandish notion that this bill will fundamentally help fight child poverty in Canada.

I am not alone in my disappointment with this bill. The National Anti-Poverty Organization, in its written brief to our committee, stated:

> NAPO's greatest and most persistent objection to this new program is that it is creating two categories of poor people in this country—what people are beginning to call the "deserving" and the "undeserving" poor. These two categories are created by virtue of the fact that an earned income supplement will be provided to the working poor only, while families with children who get all or most of their income during any given year from welfare, unemployment insurance, or other government programs will not qualify for the supplement. These families will see no increase in their benefits at all and they may well be the families who are most in need of extra resources so as to provide for their children.

As I mentioned before, universality of all social programs in Canada is in danger. Medicare is next on their list, I think. As pointed out by the representatives of the Canadian Association of Schools of Social Work in their presentation brief:

> We cannot help but wonder whether the abandonment of family allowances is but the first step towards the dismantling of the principle of universality in social programmes as a collective response to human suffering.

That includes medicare, unemployment insurance; they are all going.

Canada is often considered to lead the industrialized world in the treatment of its citizens. As pointed out by the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto and the Child Poverty Action Group of Ottawa and Toronto:

> . . . the passing of Bill C-80 is likely to make Canada the only country in the Western industrialized world where those who bear the extra responsibility of bringing up children are no longer receiving family support through the tax system or direct cash benefits . . . Tax credits for dependent children are a common feature of tax systems around the world and family allowances are paid in 62 nations including all 27 European countries.

Furthermore, it was stated by the National Action Committee on the Status of Women:

> We argue that, in comparison with the countries of western Europe, Canada's record with regard to children's programs and benefits is not especially laudable. Further, we believe that this legislation and other government policy initiatives lead us away from the kinds of children's benefits and programs Europeans enjoy, and towards the targeted and mean-spirited programs of the United States.
> We argue that Canada's role in the development and promotion of the United Nations Conventions on the Rights of the Child should lead us, as a nation, in the opposite direction from that in which we are moving.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senator Bonnell, I must advise you that, pursuant to rule 38(4), your time is now up.

Senator Bonnell: I have a very short speech remaining. Perhaps honourable senators will allow me to finish my speech.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bonnell: I had to stop to cough, and that made the difference, but it is getting to the point now where you are not even allowed to cough.

When will this government recognize that the future of our country is at stake? Is it so difficult to understand that poor children come from poor families, and our emphasis must be on ending family poverty? Bill C-80, as so many have stated, will not help those who desperately need more money to survive.

On November 24, 1989, the other place unanimously passed a motion stating that:

> . . . this House express its concern for the more than one million Canadian children currently living in poverty and seek to achieve the goal of eliminating child poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000.

If Bill C-80 is the response to this motion, I reject the effort made by the government.

Honourable senators, in conclusion, Bill C-80 will not help fight child and family poverty in this country. We need a strategy which includes, but is not limited to, sound employment creation with full pay equity for both men and women, with particular assistance to Aboriginal peoples and minority groups; affordable housing; support programs to end violence and abuse; consumer, nutrition and home economics education programs for parents; and a system of affordable and accessible child care.

I believe, honourable senators, that these goals are the ingredients of a good, sound strategy to help the children of our country and I urge you to vote against Bill C-80. Only then will we be able to properly address the terrible situation facing so many of our children.

I thank honourable senators for giving me an extension of time.

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

NOTICE OF MOTION TO INVOKE PROVISIONS OF RULE 40

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before the motion to adjourn the debate is put, I wish to point out that, as has been indicated in this chamber, in committee and in discussions with both the Deputy Leader and, no later than this morning, the Leader of the Opposition, this bill, if passed, will go into effect in January 1993. To make it effective at that time, certain administrative measures must be taken to advise beneficiaries of the changes and to obtain all the information needed so that all those eligible will receive what is due to them under the new legislation in January.

The timetable of the government was that as soon as the committee finished its hearings the Senate would be recalled, which was indicated when we adjourned until December 1. We feel that this bill can be fully debated and voted upon by Friday. The Leader of the Opposition could not agree to such a deadline this morning as he felt that more time might be needed. This side, however, does not agree with that.

Therefore, since discussions between the parties have not led to any agreement on the allocation of time for consideration of the third reading stage of the bill, I give notice of the following motion:

> That, pursuant to the provisions of rule 40, in relation to Bill C-80, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act, not more than six further hours of debate be allotted to the consideration of the said bill at the third reading stage;
> That, when the debate comes to an end or when the time provided for the consideration of the third reading stage of the said bill has expired, the Speaker interrupt, if required, any proceedings then before the Senate and put forthwith and successively every question necessary to dispose of the said stage of the said bill; and,
> That any recorded vote or votes on the said questions shall be taken in accordance with the provisions of rule 40(4).

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on the orderliness of the motion, before the motion is put. The notice is, of course, one day, as contemplated, I believe, by the Deputy Leader of the Government.

I have just two points. The first is about the use of the word "must" as it applies to the passage of this bill, that is, that the bill must be passed in order for certain things to happen. Of course, there is a difference of opinion on that subject. Conditions as they exist now would be infinitely better than they will be under this bill, in our opinion.

Second, I wish to acknowledge on the record that the Deputy Leader of the Government came to see me today, in the absence of Senator Molgat, and asked if we could—quoting from rule 40 (1)—"agree to allocate a specified number of days or hours for consideration of" third reading of Bill C-80. I told him that since our caucus is determined to do everything we can to oppose and, we hope, defeat this bill, I could not give him any such agreement. Therefore, I have to acknowledge that he is clearly within his rights to give notice under rule 40(1).

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, may I put a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government? The Deputy Leader of the Government said that the reason he is imposing time allocation is that the officials need to advertise this program in order that the beneficiaries of it will be notified about the cheques that are going to be mailed out on the January 20.

If I understood the officials correctly when they testified before our committee, they said that this mailing would go out on November 2. It appeared to me that they had everything in place, that they only had to turn the key and all the literature would go out on that date.

This is October 14. We are two weeks away from that deadline. Is it really necessary that this bill be passed by the government on closure?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: When Senator Bosa brought up this argument at the committee hearing, I pointed out that we are in an unusual situation at this time in Canada. We are faced with a referendum in two weeks and many senators in this chamber want to get away from here as soon as possible in order to be involved in the campaign until the deadline provided before referendum day.

I think that following the referendum it would be quite difficult to get senators back here. Because of the effort and time which will be taken up, there will be a need for staying away from this place. If it were not for that, we would be in agreement to go or for another week, but I know that many senators on both sides, if not all of the members of this chamber, want to leave this place as soon as possible and be away all next week. The following week is referendum week and I do not know whether we could get the Senate back to discuss any item at that time.

Senator Bosa: We have no problem with the fact that everyone wants to get away now in order to take part in the referendum, but what about October 27, the day after the referendum? All we need is a quorum to hear the witnesses and the provincial premiers. In the meantime, the clerk of the committee could advise them that we will be hearing them.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We are just repeating what has been said before. The provinces have already been consulted and heard. Bill C-80 is not a new bill as far as its content goes. It has been discussed for years. I can quote you statements from Liberal Ministers of Finance about merging the various child benefits into one package. This has been going on for years. Bill C-80 was discussed in the white paper earlier this year. It was part of the budget in February. It was part of a House of Commons legislative committee in 1991. This is just the normal culmination of years of discussion.

Certain senators want the Senate to restart the whole debate, to get the same witnesses back and redo all the hearings and do the same things as have been done more than once elsewhere.

Senator Hébert: We do not need the Senate, then.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is your opinion, Senator Hébert. We feel that enough time has been given to study this bill; therefore, we give notice of time allocation.

On motion of Senator Cools, debate adjourned.

CONTRAVENTIONS BILL

THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the third reading of Bill C-46, An Act respecting contraventions of federal enactments.

And on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, that the Bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Committee for further study.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I thought that Senator Hastings was rising to speak.

I would like to speak on the motion in amendment of the Hon. Senator Bonnell. It reads thus:

> And on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, that the Bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Committee for further study.

The purpose of further study of this matter would be to ensure that the provincial and territorial governments have nothing to add concerning the contents of the bill.

I was not on the committee that examined the bill, but I took the trouble to read the whole transcript of the meeting of the Legal and Constitution Committee held on Tuesday, September 22, 1992.

I was able to note that several of our eminent colleagues, may I point out, like Senator Stanbury, supported a motion by Senator Bonnell to ask the provincial and territorial governments to indicate to the committee whether or not they wished to appear before the committee to point out the benefits of the bill or express any concerns they might have about it.

When the bill went through the various stages of consideration in the House of Commons, two western provinces, I believe, expressed some concerns and the committee of the House of Commons was therefore able to amend the bill accordingly or to take account of the points expressed by these provinces.

In the Senate, we have a convention that appears as Appendix I to the Rules of the Senate.

I think that it would be worth reading this appendix, entitled "Provincial Representations to Senate Committees", to you.

I do not really like that title, but anyway, the appendix, as formulated, is: Extract from the Second Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, May 28, 1985. The report was adopted by the Senate on May 30, 1985.

As all my hon. colleagues on both sides know, the party sitting opposite us today imposed an untimely reform of the traditional rules of the Senate.

I am quite surprised that these new "wise men" saw fit to include this appendix. If it was thought worth including when the Rules of the Senate were revised, we may well ask what it really means.

I will read you what it says:

> The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders recommends that the following be observed by committees of the Senate as general practice:

By the way, the practice was already established even before the recommendation, convention and tradition were expressed in the following terms:

> That, whenever a bill or the subject-matter of a bill is being considered by a committee of the Senate in which, in the opinion of the committee, a province or territory has a special interest, alone or with other provinces or territories, then, as a general policy, the government of that province or territory or such other provinces or territories should, where practicable, be invited by the committee to make written or verbal representations to the committee,. . .

Hon. Jacques Hébert: That is what they did with Bill C-80!

Senator Corbin:

> . . . and any province or territory that replies in the affirmative should be given reasonable opportunity to do so.

You are quite right, Senator Hébert. Despite the time limits that will be imposed on us tomorrow, I hope that I will be able to return to the aspect of this question that concerns family allowances.

It is strange, is it not, that this government, which wanted to clean up the Rules of the Senate, still decided to keep this appendix!

If it is part of our rules, I think that we should respect it.

Did the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee in fact respect this convention, this tradition, this rule, this recommendation? As far as I know, it did not!

I stand to be corrected if I am not presenting things as they actually happened. Nevertheless, I read carefully the report of the proceedings of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee.

I was going to say that Senator Stanbury, a distinguished senator with many years of service in the Senate who has always been especially concerned with legal and constitutional issues, asked the committee to respect this convention. It was not done. Indeed, the government majority simply rejected out of hand the motion of a senator from the Official Opposition requesting that we contact the provinces and ask them to give us senators in the Senate their comments.

I think it is serious. Putting this in the context of the referendum debate, we are right to wonder, if the present Senate is not abiding by its own rules, what will happen in a new Senate with greatly reduced powers.

Will provincial interests be protected then? We must raise the question.

I for one am concerned, especially if that party were to remain in power. Every day, we see how cavalierly the government brings out its steamroller to override the opposition's right to speak, in order to rush through its bills, very often for quite frivolous reasons.

I just heard Senator Lynch-Staunton tell us that we have to leave this place to take part in the referendum. I do not agree. I think that the national Parliament should have stayed in session in order to elucidate many unclear and disputed points in the so-called Charlottetown agreement.

It is here, on the floor of the two Houses of Parliament, that these matters should be cleared up. But what is the government doing? Pressed in on all sides, it closes down Parliament. It wants to close the Senate and send us out for the referendum. I think that the referendum will go ahead without Mr. Murray, Mr. Frith, Mr. Corbin and anyone on the other side.

The time has come for Canadians to speak. They are very well informed.

I believe that as a general rule, the media are informing Canadians fairly well in this referendum. Canadians are not fools. They know what is going on. What I fear most about going out to take part in a referendum is partisanship. I fear narrow-mindedness. I fear propaganda. The Canadian people are not stupid. They do not need politicians to tell them how to vote. All they want are clear, precise, specific texts. That is why both Houses of Parliament should have continued to sit throughout the referendum period in order to clarify some contentious points.

I come back to Bill C-46 which is on the agenda. The government majority rejected the committee's request to communicate with the provinces to obtain their opinions.

Mr. Roy and Mr. Berlin are excellent public servants, I believe, if I go by all the praise given to them both in the House of Commons and in the Senate committee.

They told us: "We have contacted the provincial authorities, that is, our provincial counterparts. We are satisfied that they have nothing else to add." Well, that does not satisfy me because, ultimately, it is not the civil servants that will have to account for a bad piece of legislation. It is the legislators; it is the members of Parliament; it is the senators.

The House of Commons feels that it has done a good job and I say fine! But us, in the Senate, have the right to take a second look. This right must be exercised in the respect of regional considerations. We represent regions here. At least, I represent the province of New Brunswick. I am one of ten senators that represent not a small corner of New Brunswick, but that province as a whole.

In Quebec, they have constituencies, for what these are worth. Indeed, many senators have never set foot in their two square acres worth $4,000, but that is another story. In any case, I represent the interests of New Brunswick and I would like to be satisfied, and not by what some civil servants may say, that the province of New Brunswick is completely pleased with the content of this complex bill.

The content of this legislation is simple but the bill is complicated as regards its provisions and its structure. For instance, if you bother to look at the analytical table, you will find that there are three pages of titles. Do not try to have me believe that the federal civil servants are in control. It is certainly not my intention to depreciate them. I recognize that in exercising their duties, they may have done a good job with their provincial and territorial counterparts. But who controls the provincial and territorial governments? It is not the civil servants: it is the elected politicians or, in our case, the appointed ones. It is us who, ultimately, have the last word regarding the content of the legislation.

Today, I do not have the satisfaction, after reading what was said in committee, and after glancing through the proceedings of the committee of the House of Commons, that the provincial government of New Brunswick is perfectly comfortable with this bill.

It is also strange that, at the same time as we are examining this bill in the Senate and, pardon me, even before the bill got to the Senate, officials from the Federal Department of Justice are already starting negotiations with their provincial counterparts on the implementation of the provisions of this bill, as if the Senate was blindly going to comply to the will of the government without questioning anything. I do not accept that. We expect officials to do their work, nothing less. But senators also should do their work and do it well.

As long as I will not have a guarantee from the Attorney General or the minister of Justice of my province of New Brunswick and of the other provinces, I believe that the bill should be returned to the committee in order that an appropriate consultation with provincial and territorial governments takes place, as provided for in Appendix I of the Rules of the Senate.

I thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the honourable Senator Lewis, seconded by the honourable Senator Bosa, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

Senator Hébert: On division.

Motion of Senator Lewis to adjourn debate negatived, on division.

THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the motion in amendment was moved by the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert that the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee for further study. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

Senator Hébert: On division.

Motion in amendment negatived on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we now come to the main motion. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

Is this on division also, honourable senators?

Senator Hébert: Yes, on division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment motion, I should like to make one suggestion.

Since tomorrow we will only have one government item, namely, Bill C-80, which will be subject to time allocation if the motion is approved, may I suggest that we meet tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock? The rules require that the debate on the motion for time allocation can last up to two and one-half hours. And if approved, the debate on the main motion, third reading of Bill C-80, can last up to six hours.

I make that suggestion on the assumption that, if the entire time is used up, we can dispose of the bill some time tomorrow afternoon or early afternoon, have Royal Assent and adjourn until December 1, the date stipulated in the original adjournment motion. I make that suggestion to colleagues on both sides.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): As I said earlier, honourable senators, the position that our caucus has taken on Bill C-80 is that we do not want to collaborate in any way that will help passage of what we consider to be an iniquitous bill.

Time allocation having been imposed—and youwill notice that I pick that euphemistic description for closure in the spirit of ecumenism—it would involve a change of decision by our caucus as to the granting of any leave to speed this bill in any way. As Senator Lynch-Staunton has pointed out, time allocation having been imposed, the question of the six hours and the distribution of that six hours is brought up again. If we can suspend the sitting for 15 or 20 minutes until perhaps just before six—and if I am ready we will come back sooner—in order to have a quick caucus to discuss the matter, then I am prepared to bring the matter up to our caucus within that rough time period.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: We shall adjourn, then, until 5.45 p.m.

Senator Frith: Yes, 5:45 should do it. If we are not here sharp at that time, please wait for us.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the issue is clearly one of simply moving blocks of time. Once the closure is engaged, the clock ticks for a maximum of two and one-half hours on the closure motion. Once that is terminated there can be no adjournment or deferral of the vote. So that two and one-half hours is a time that is certain. That, then, in turn clicks into the six hours.

The real question is whether we want to have those clocks started at 2 o'clock, or at 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning. Since the dye is cast, as long as the government sticks to its course and has the numbers, there is little difference. If the government forces a vote in due course, whether it wins or loses the vote, the matter is clearly with us within that eight and one-half hour period. The suggestion of the Deputy Leader of the Government to start those clocks ticking at 10 o'clock tomorrow instead of 2 o'clock does not involve any surrendering on our part of our adamant opposition to this bill and adamant opposition to hurrying it. We are not hurrying or abridging the time of debate.

We therefore accept the suggestion of the Deputy Leader of the Government, and we grant leave for sitting tomorrow morning. We have already discussed the possibility of 10 o'clock. We would like to have a Question Period tomorrow, although most of the time will be spent on the closure motion, which must start immediately. Senator Murray has advised that he will find it very difficult to be here at 10 o'clock tomorrow because of a meeting that starts earlier than that, but he probably can be here with us by 11 o'clock. There will be unanimous consent to interrupting the proceedings to allow for a Question Period when Senator Murray arrives.

If I have properly stated our conversation and have been clear about the consent that we are giving, then the Deputy Leader of the Government is obviously free to move, with leave, for adjournment of the Senate until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I rise simply to confirm that I will be a little late tomorrow because of a meeting that begins at 9 o'clock. That meeting is normally over by 10.30 or 10.40. It is prudent to suggest that I would be available for Question Period at about 11 o'clock.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that being the case, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, October 15, 1992, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 10:00 a.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, October 15, 1992

The Senate met at 10 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the clock is still ticking. If the government of which Senator Murray is a member had respected democracy—by his definition, Canadians would be casting their ballots within 36 days; but, of course, Canadians cannot cast their ballots within 36 days because the minimum election period is 50 days. So for 14 days now, according to the criteria laid out by Senator Murray, their leader in this chamber, the government has displayed, to quote him, "cowardice and contempt for the democratic process". But it is not too late. An election could still be called.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 510 citizens of Alberta who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Calgary, Edmonton, Spruce Grove and Stony Plain.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 501 citizens of British Columbia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Chilliwack, Sardis, Abbotsford, St. Albert, Aldergrove, Vancouver, Victoria, Prince George, Surrey, Quesnel and Burnaby.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 500 citizens of Quebec who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Terrasse Vaudreuil, Saint-Germain, Saint-Dominique, Saint-Ambroise, Saint-Honoré, Falardeau, Saint-Cyrille, Sainte-Rosalie, Wickham, Huntingdon, L'Avenir, Amos, Huntington, Knowlton, Kirkland Lake, Drummondville, Sainte-Sophie and Saint-Charles.

Finally, honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 170 citizens of New Brunswick who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Shippigan, Saint Louis de Kent, Atholville, Grand Falls, Saint André, Edmundston, Tracadie, Bathurst, Legault, Le Goulet and Haut Shippigan.

A grand total of 1,681 petitioners all across the land. These petitioners are fed up with the contemptuous attitude of a government that has long since stopped listening to them.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Murray, may I suggest that Question Period be postponed until he returns?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SPORTS

AMERICAN LEAGUE CHAMPIONS—TRIBUTES TO TORONTO BLUE JAYS BASEBALL TEAM

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Senate's leave to hear from Senator Keith Davey, who is probably the most qualified person here to speak on that remarkable exhibition in Toronto last night.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Keith Davey: Senator MacDonald is correct. I learned this morning that last night the Blue Jays did, in fact, win the American League Championship Series. Having been able to attend all of the games in Toronto, I am now trying to find some way now of getting to Atlanta.

The Blue Jays put on a remarkable demonstration, a demonstration not only of baseball, but of the strength of Toronto.

A number of senators, a week or two ago, attended a game at SkyDome. Thanks to Senator Eyton, a number of us were there.

Senator Frith: They had their names in lights whether they were there or not.

Senator Davey: They had their names in lights. If you will recall, that was a great game. I became quite annoyed at Senator Atkins at that game because, into the ninth inning, the other team had a no-hitter and all of a sudden Senator Atkins, a Blue Jays fan, decided that he would pull for the enemy, and they did win the game.

Senator Frith: But not a no hitter.

Senator Davey: Baseball, as Senator Frith knows, has been my lifelong passion. I was a commissioner of the Canadian Football League. I know I was a lousy hockey player. My affection has always been for baseball. The fact that a Canadian team is in the World Series is of enormous value.

Senator Frith: And the commissioner's job is vacant!

Senator Davey: I did not want to say this, but I have put your name in for that position. Now, let's win the world series!

ORDERS OF THE DAY

INCOME TAX ACT

CHILDREN'S SPECIAL ALLOWANCES ACT

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION TO INVOKE PROVISIONS OF RULE 40—CARRIED

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved, pursuant to notice of October 14th, 1992:

> That, pursuant to the provisions of Rule 40, in relation to Bill C-80, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act, not more than six further hours of debate be allotted to the consideration of the said Bill at the third reading stage;
> That, when the debate comes to an end or when the time provided for the consideration of the third reading stage of the said Bill has expired, the Speaker interrupt, if required, any proceedings then before the Senate and put forthwith and successively every question necessary to dispose of the said stage of the said Bill; and
> That any recorded vote or votes on the said questions shall be taken in accordance with the provisions of Rule 40(4).

He said: Honourable senators, I have just a few remarks to make in support of this motion. More particularly, I want to reply to the allegation that not sufficient time has been given to debating Bill C-80, since a number of senators opposite have maintained that we have not lived up to our commitment to allocate sufficient time for debate.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Corbin: Right on!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I would suggest strongly, and perhaps even convince many senators oppisite, that this is a gross exaggeration, to say the least.

Sufficient time has been made available; the opposition simply has not taken advantage of it.

Let me illustrate this point. The first reading of the bill was on Thursday, September, 17. Second reading was on Tuesday, September 22, at which time Senator Spivak, the sponsor of the bill—-

Senator Frith: And I might add that she was the sole government speaker.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: —-made an eloquent statement regarding the substance of the bill. She was followed by Senator Hébert and Senator Frith.

• (1010)

Senator Frith: Liberals, or the opposition; any others?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Senator Murray then intervened, and Senator Frith expressed concern that there would not be enough time, that we would follow what he said was the same short schedule as the House of Commons. Senator Murray said during that debate, as recorded at page 2089 of Hansard:

> We can sit evenings, we can sit Friday morning, we can sit all next week. There is plenty of time to hear from every senator, Liberal or Conservative, who wishes to be heard in the second reading debate on Bill C-80. . . There is plenty of time.

Senator Frith: There was plenty of time to complete the debate, but it is the committee hearings we complained about.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: On Tuesday, Senator Thériault then spoke and Senator Cools adjourned the debate. On Wednesday, Senator Gigantès said he was not ready, and adjourned the debate until the following Wednesday.

Senator Gigantès: Tuesday.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes, Tuesday.

Senator Gigantès: Get your facts straight.

Senator Frith: They never do.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I then asked why we could not continue with the debate, since there was so much time left that afternoon, and we were told by senators opposite that they were not ready. Senator Murray again asked, as recorded at page 2114 of Hansard:

> Honourable senators, are there no other speakers who can take part in the debate tomorrow, Friday morning or Monday? Today is Wednesday. Why adjourn until next Tuesday?

So, again, there was sufficient time. The opposition simply did not want to take advantage of it.

We came back on Tuesday, September 29, and Senator Gigantès and Senator LeBlanc spoke. Senator Olson moved to adjourn. I again asked why we could not continue the debate at that time. Again, we were told that the opposition was not ready. So the previous question was then moved, Senator Stanbury and Senator Corbin spoke and the bill was sent to committee, on Tuesday, September 29.

Senator Kinsella can intervene at this point or later if he wishes to back me up. My understanding is that an offer was made to get the committee hearings moving immediately, the following day. The opposition replied, "No, we need more time". Therefore the committee did not meet until Wednesday, October 7.

What does this all mean? It means that ample time was available but the opposition did not want to take advantage of it. There were six days available for debate and the opposition used only part of three days, and only a fraction of those three days.

Senator Simard: They have been unmasked.

Senator Frith: The government used none; not any.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators are all aware that the new child tax benefit proposal is to take effect on January 1.

Senator Frith: According to your schedule.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: According to what is stated in the bill.

Senator Frith: A government bill.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is a bill passed by the House of Commons, but the senator may want to make an amendment to it.

Here is what Minister McDermid said to the committee:

> The government wants to have Bill C-80 enacted by the end of October . . .

Senator Frith: Now we know; we are getting somewhere.

Senator Cools: Now we know.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You have known this for some time, since last February when it was announced in the budget.

> This is necessary to ensure adequate time to put in place the administrative infrastructure needed to provide the first monthly cheques to Canadian families by January 20, the day on which family allowance cheques are normally delivered.
> For example, to get cheques into the hands of all families by January 20, the printing run must begin before the end of December. We also have to develop and test computer systems, train personnel, publish manuals and implement operational systems. Moreover, we have to mail out an advance notice of entitlement to all families on November 2, which is not that far away.

In summary, honourable senators, the Senate has had ample time to debate this bill, both here and in committee, and did not see fit to make use of that time. We have a deadline —

Senator Frith: Come on! When Senator Murray says things like that, he smiles.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: —imposed by a provision in the bill. We also have a referendum in less than two weeks in which many of us, if not all, want to participate, hopefully all on the same side.

It has been suggested that we might come back after the referendum. If we came back on Tuesday, October 27 and followed our normal schedule, we would only have three days available for debate, since the notices have to go out on November 2, which is a Monday. Those three days have already been made available to the Senate, and the opposition did not see fit to take advantage of them.

Therefore for all these reasons, honourable senators, I urge you to support this motion.

Senator Cogger: Here is Senator Frith, and I think he is going to agree with you.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Draco was an Athenian legislator whose harsh codification of the law in 621 BC has given us the word "draconian". With death being the penalty for almost every offence, the code was so unpopular that it was largely abolished by Solon. There was a happy ending then, however, because Solon, an Athenian statesman, lawgiver, and poet, as chief archon —

Senator Gigantès: And a liberal!

Senator Frith: —and a liberal, as Senator Gigantès states—enacted many economic, constitutional, and legal reforms, and, unlike Draco, paved the way for the development of democracy at Athens and her emergence as a great trading state. Enslavement for debt was abolished, a new currency instituted, and citizenship was granted to foreign craftsmen settling in Athens. Draco's inhumane legal code was largely repealed.

Honourable senators, the debate on this motion is largely academic, because once rule 40 is invoked, a powerful mechanism starts grinding towards an eventual death-blow to debate. A maximum of eight and a half hours later the guillotine, once hoisted, must fall.

This might be an occasion for us to look at rule 40 in the context of the new rules. That might not be without interest to all senators, not only those in the opposition, because the present government party will be on this side soon. Although it might temporarily have a majority, it will soon find itself looking up at the guillotine rather than sitting in the bleachers knitting with Madame Defarge waiting for the thud that ends its lightning descent.

I say that it is largely academic, because no party without a majority, and, therefore, the assurance of winning a vote, would ever evoke the rule. It is possible that very special circumstances might exist where it would strategically be used by a minority, but even then only by motion by the Leader or the Deputy Leader of the Government as provided for in the rule.

It is not, however, irrelevant to make the point about strategy, because the rule itself is a strategic or tactical device and is not a substantive motion; it is a purely procedural one. While the rule provides for a maximum of two and a half hours of debate, it is difficult to imagine any occasion when that whole two and a half hours would be used. The members of the minority against whom it is used would, to quote the late Senator Eugene Forsey, "be dreaming in technicolor," if any of us here thought that anything we had to say in that two and a half hour period would persuade the senators on the majority side to change their minds and desert the government leader who had invoked the rule.

I say the debate is academic, but it does give us an opportunity to look at rule 40 in the context of the new rules. It is one that, on the record of the Senate, we have not taken a very close look at. What does it provide? Rule 40(1) states:

> At any time while the Senate is sitting, the Leader of the Government in the Senate or the Deputy leader of the Government in the Senate, from his or her place in the Senate, may state that the representatives of the parties have failed to agree to allocate a specified number of days or hours for consideration of any stage of consideration of any adjourned debate on any item of government business.

Yesterday, Senator Lynch-Staunton pointed out that he had come to see me and he had fulfilled those conditions by asking for an agreement, which I did not give him. The rule continues:

> If so, at that time the said Leader or Deputy Leader may give notice of the terms of a motion to allocate a specified number of hours or days of debate on the said stage of consideration of the said item. Such motion shall be placed on the Orders of the Day under "Government Motions" for the next sitting day.

● (1020)

Rule 40 then goes on to provide for time limits in the government's motion. It says that such a motion shall provide for at least a further six hours debate on any substantive motion; a further six hours debate on a motion for second reading of a bill; and then one calendar day for committee reports. We then come to the one that applies here, which is sub-paragraph (d).

> (d) a single period of a further six-hours debate, in total, to dispose of both the report and the third reading stages of a public bill.

There is then a limitation:

> (3) Except as provided in sub-paragraph 2(d)above —

— the one that applies to us —

> — no motion moved pursuant to rule 40 shall allocate time to more than one stage of consideration of any item of government business.

There are really two stages here; that is, report stage and third reading stage, but of course that is the one exception when the two stages can be made the subject matter of one motion.

Rule 40 then says:

> (4) Except as provided below, the provisions of rules 67 and 68 shall apply to the taking of any standing vote in relation to every Order of the Day to which time is allocated for debate, pursuant to rule 39 or 40 and shall be considered in accordance with the following provisions:

There then are some special provisions with regard to debate and the time of the vote.

Then when the Order of the Day has been called to which a period of time has been allocated for its consideration, and is under consideration, there are a whole series of "i"s dotted and "t"s crossed to make sure that nothing can happen: No amendments, no deferral of votes. Absolutely nothing can happen.

As I say, once that guillotine is hoisted, the mechanism goes on relentlessly to the maximum of eight and a half hours. It is only if we think that we could actually persuade the government to change its mind, to let the guillotine down gently, to stop the mechanism that drives us relentlessly to the death blow to debate, that we could consider using the two and a half hours.

There is one third point. What about a new Senate? Surely it is realistic to assume that, no matter what happens to the Charlottetown consensus, a new Senate—an elected one, one hopes—is inevitable. I have been preaching for that new Senate for over ten years now, one that would be elected by proportional representation, non-simultaneously and therefore not controlled by—though not able to defeat—the government. Would such a Senate hold still for this rule, or many of the other rules that have been imposed on it by the government majority? In my opinion, it would not.

There are three main centres of abuse of Parliament in the new rules imposed on this place unilaterally by the government side, the government majority. The first is the excessive powers given to the Speaker, the second is the excessive government control of business, and the third is time allocation and closure.

There will be a better time to discuss the two other centres of abuse, that is, the Speaker's powers and the government control of business. Just in passing, I should say that I do not think a new Senate of elected senators would permit the Speaker to have the powers imposed by the new rules, and certainly not unless that Speaker were freely elected. If, however, the government did not control the Senate, such a Speaker would not be under the thumb of the government and, therefore, might be given by the new Senate some of the additional powers he has now been given by unilateral action of one side of the house.

For the same reason, the second area of abuse, the government's control of the Senate's business, would also never be accepted by a new Senate elected by proportional representation and non-simultaneously. If it were not elected at the same time as the House of Commons, the government not having control, the Senate would not be under the government's thumb. As the old Senate did, in my opinion, the new Senate will want to have control, and would want to return to the situation where senators ran the business in the Senate and ran the Senate through its Internal Economy committee.

• (1030)

Now, honourable senators, there are three centres of control as things stand. The first is the leadership of the government, the second is the Speaker and the third is the Clerk of the Senate. But I am picturing a new Senate, one not controlled by any government, with no power to defeat that government, but with an absolute veto on legislation. If elected by proportional representation, all experience shows, there would be no majority party. Thus, there would be true representation of the regions. There would not be the situation we have now, where the government appoints government leaders in the Senate who have all these powers under the new rules, and which also appoints the Speaker with no consultation.

As is the case now, one of the senators walks in and says, "I have the honour to inform you that I am your new Speaker; like it or lump it." Under the old rules, that being the case, senators for 125 years have said, "If that is the way it is, you are imposed upon us as Speaker; you sit there and we will call on you when we want you to intervene. Call the Orders of the Day and when we want you to intervene we will call on you."

That is the second centre of control. So there is the leadership of the government, which dominates the Senate; then the Speaker is given powers to dominate, and the Clerk, who is also appointed by the government, has powers of administration. All three are imposed on the Senate by the Prime Minister of the day. I do not think a new, independent-minded Senate would accept those three centres of control.

On the third area of abuse of Parliament by the new rules we have the one that is before us now. It is time allocation. Similarly, I cannot imagine a new Senate, one not controlled by the government, accepting such a Draconian rule.

For all these reasons the whole issue may be academic, applying as it does only under these special circumstances of rules that were violently changed, although in effect for a century and a quarter, putting the Senate entirely under the thumb of the government.

I hope that such rules would be changed quickly by a new Senate, wiping them out altogether and starting with the old rules. Then, as a fresh start from those old rules, any changes appropriate for the new context in a new Senate could be made.

After all, the rules that were imposed recently on the Senate by the government majority were rules that were not brought into effect with a view to the long term interests of the Senate and its future. They were brought into effect as a reaction to what happened in the GST debate and solely for the purpose of making sure that never again would the government be able to be challenged effectively in the Senate. It is that simple.

I say that as someone who may soon be sitting on the government side. I believe that in the meantime, before there is a new Senate, these rules under which we now operate, are completely inappropriate for a second chamber that should have a veto power over all legislation but no power to defeat the government.

I hope rule 40 will not be used frequently in the meantime, that is, before we get it changed. It is true that the government has not used it frequently up until now. As Senator Lynch-Staunton pointed out, they have preferred to use the mechanism of the "previous question", which is an even more Draconian and vicious piece of closure than is rule 40. Rule 40 is soft compared to the "previous question".

I will not say anything more about what Senator Lynch-Staunton said in trying to defend all the ample time that the government gave on this legislation in the Senate. Anyone interested can read what took place yesterday when we set out the entire record of just how ample was the time the government allowed for debate. It did give time at second reading. I agree with Senator Lynch-Staunton in that regard. We did not complain about the time given at second reading. In fact, in that case, as he said, they used the "previous question" to shut it off anyway.

As far as the committee is concerned, honourable senators, look at the record and look at how that record was recounted in the Debates of the Senate of yesterday and you will see what a joke it is to suggest that ample time was given and was not taken advantage of.

If you want other references, honourable senators, speak to the legions of Canadians who wanted to give evidence before that committee, having heard that the Senate's committees did listen, did study, did take care in analyzing evidence and in reporting. Ask them whether they think ample time was given.

For all these reasons, I will be asking my colleagues on this side to vote against the motion. However, I doubt that any senators opposite will join us in order to defeat this iniquitous use of this iniquitous rule to ram through an iniquitous piece of legislation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I do not intend to indulge in a long discussion. However, I must respond to a couple of things said by the Leader of the Opposition.

First, let me say that I welcome his comments about the new rules that would have to be in place for an elected Senate. Those of us who have supported an elected Senate for many years are looking forward anxiously to a time when the Senate is elected.

I can only say that I have alerted already the clerk of the committee and intend to meet with the steering committee soon after October 26 to put on the agenda of the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders the drafting of tentative new rules for an elected Senate. It seems to me this would be a progressive and positive thing that our committee could be doing in anticipation of an elected Senate.

Senator Frith, I certainly hope that we will have a better response from your members on the committee in designing new rules for an elected Senate than we have had in obtaining your recommended amendments to the old rules. We have been asking for any amendments you may have. You complain bitterly about the rules, but so far we have not seen a single recommendation for an amendment to the rules. This is something we have requested on a number of different occasions. Hopefully, we will get a better response in the future.

Senator Frith: But you know that our amendments exist.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, it is absurd and insulting on the face of it to our elected successors, if the "yes" passes, to suggest that the honourable senator opposite will sit down with her knitting machine at the foot of the guillotine and produce the rules for the elected Senators. They will be elected. They certainly will not want her rules.

The typical arrogance of Tory thinking goes, "We, the elite, will tell those awful, elected, smelly, people how to run their lives. We will tell them to hold their little finger up when they drink their tea."

This rule under which we are now suffering comes at the end of something which started over the GST debate.

• (1040)

In all parliaments of the British persuasion, delay is the only weapon left to a minority. When the Tories rang the bells in the House of Commons, Madame Jeanne Sauvé, then the Speaker and a Liberal, of course, let it go on for almost three weeks because she was reluctant to remove from the opposition the only weapon it had.

We rang the bells here for an hour and a half. What happened then? The Speaker of the Senate told the Tories that the vote would take place at 5:25, and told us that the vote would take place at 5:30. They locked the doors and they voted in the absence of the opposition. That is the only time such an incident has taken place in any parliament of British ancestry, anywhere. It is typical of the sort of arrogance displayed a little while ago by the honourable member opposite, who wants to knit a Madame Defarge set of rules for the elected senators who will follow.

Anyway, as soon as they had voted—and one must go back to that. The press never understood it. The people never understood it, because the spin doctors of the Tory party managed to obscure the truth, that this was a major and dreadful attack on all parliamentary principle—they then said, "We have now established the principle, the principle being that we can now vote in your absence."

[Senator Robertson.]

Members on this side of the chamber pleaded with them for eight hours in speeches all night, saying, "You cannot do this. You are destroying the very essence of parliament." Parliament is a place to talk. That is what the word means, that the two sides must talk to one another. They were adamant. The only thing left for us to do on this side, and all of us felt awful about doing it, was to show them that they could not go on with that particular rule because we would not accept it. We would make as much noise and provoke as much chaos as possible in order to defend the right of parliament to talk. And you cannot talk to yourselves, ladies and gentlemen. You will not be interesting. You do not have anything interesting or intelligent to say.

They gave us their word finally—and it was through the use of psychological aggression on our part. They gave us their word that, yes, there would be some new rules and we could resume the debate. Then they broke their word and they imposed closure.

Senator Murray broke his word. Senator Roblin broke his word. They made the promises formally. I do not even speak of the Speaker. He broke his word. He always does.

Senator Cools: Tory bandits.

Senator Gigantès: So now we are continuing in the spirit of that outrage to parliamentary democracy. We will have guillotine. The debate will be ended on something that is very important. I will come back to it when I talk on the substance of the bill after they impose the guillotine.

The Tories do not want to talk. That is what they did when they lied to us about what time the sitting would take place, and voted in our absence. That is what they want to do at all times. We were told only recently by the Leader of the Government and the deputy leader that we would be given all the time we needed. "Ample time" they said. "Ample time" they will give us if we are prepared to verbally sort of shake some incense towards them, perfume them. We will not.

Senator Cools: They are beyond that.

Senator Gigantès: You have lied to us. That is an un-parliamentary word, but I am saying it. You have lied to us. You have shown yourselves not to be true parliamentarians. You are not true democrats. You are proving it again today. You are doing exactly what Charbonneau did when he told the Liberals to come in at 5:30 and let the Tories in at 5:25.

I want to mention here that one of your colleagues said to me, "Why do you people not go to Charbonneau's parties?" I do not have the permission of the person to quote her, so this remark is not made for the purpose of attribution. I will not give her name. I said, "We people do not go to Charbonneau's parties because we think he did something dreadful." The person then said, "Yes. You, too, do dreadful things in the Senate." I said, "Of course."

But think of a hockey game. In a hockey game, people from both sides check one another against the boards, but the referee does not play for one team or the other. But the Speaker played for the Tory team. It is as if, before an overtime period, he told one team to come in 5 minutes early to score goals when the opposition team was not there.

Senator Frith: And were locked out.

Senator Gigantès: Today, you are continuing in the same spirit. This is unconscionable. It is un-parliamentary. I cannot describe what people must feel. I hope the press picks this up, that Senator Robertson, with true Tory arrogance, is suggesting that she will make the rules—and probably with the help of Senator Doyle—about how elected senators must behave. Oh, dear!

I remember one of the senators opposite criticizing me for having bad table manners during the GST debate because I put a piece of a tangerine in my mouth. I was told that "One does not talk with one's mouth full." Never mind decency. Never mind imposing misery on the people and the poor. Never mind lying about the sacred trust. Universality is a sacred trust. There goes universality with this bill and other bills. Never mind the recession you have caused.

A soft landing, said Mr. Wilson; a soft landing. Go and ask those who have lost their jobs how soft the landing is. Never mind all that. A piece of tangerine in the mouth of a senator who is talking about an important bill is an offence to Tory manners.

Senator Barootes: It should have been hemlock, not tangerine.

Senator Gigantès: Your manners are not even very good, because manners should be based on sincerity and decency, and you lack both.

Senator Robertson: The honourable senator is speaking a lot of nonsense, as he usually does.

Senator Gigantès: Is Senator Robertson speaking twice on the debate? You are only allowed to speak once on debate, and you have already spoken. Your Honour, please apply the rules.

Senator Cools: They are your rules, after all.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is this a question, honourable senator?

Senator Robertson: May I ask you a question, Senator Gigantès?

Senator Gigantès: It depends. You may if it is polite, and if it is not contentious, and if it is not dishonest.

Senator Robertson: In asking my question, honourable senators, I certainly would not follow the example of Senator Gigantès. However, Senator Gigantès—and please do not take my words incorrectly—do you feel that it is an imposition for the present rules committee to work on some proposed guidelines with respect to rules for the new Senate? They can do what they want with them, but do you not agree that it would be common courtesy to have something to offer by way of assistance to them through their first two of three months in office?

Senator Gigantès: That is like asking innocent sleeping victims on their first night in a new bed to accept some suggestions from some vampires.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I did not intend to speak on Senator Lynch-Staunton's motion, but Senator Robertson, who chairs the Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders, introduced a factor that has nothing to do with this debate. No doubt she did so as a result of Senator Frith's comments.

I cannot help saying that the suggestion she has just given us comes right out of the blue. I do not see why—I will sit down because she is not even listening to me! It is not worth talking to those people because they are frightfully arrogant!

• (1050)

[English]

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, it is not my habit, as you know, to speak on matters in the Senate very frequently.

Senator Frith: Not when you are standing, anyway.

Senator Barootes: I do have occasion to make the odd interjection here and there, but only to bring attention to matters that are either erroneously stated or misstated. However, I do have something that I should like to say on this matter, particularly about rule 40 of the Rules of the Senate. I cannot, unfortunately, speak with the drama of our Shakespearian player on the other side, nor with the emotion of the lost soul, my countryman over there, who speaks nothing but drivel but says it in such a sensational way that it catches the attention of those who wish to scribble about it.

However, I do wish to say that the epitome of arrogance, the epitome of conceit in this house does not come from the poor, silent, benighted people on this side, but from the last two speakers I heard on the other side. No one in all history has shown the conceit or the arrogance that the Leader of the Opposition and his cohort, who has left the room, have shown in here in the past few months.

I want to return to rule 40. Those of us who prepared proposals for the new rules for the house and sat to study them—the rules of which my friend, the Leader of the Opposition, has spoken —had two things in mind. There was not a single day that went by in which we did not hear at least ten times in our little Conservative group this statement: "Will that change to the Rules of the Senate be fair and objective in the future, whether you sit on the side of the government or the side of the opposition?"

Senator Frith: That was the question. We know what the answer was—"No".

Senator Barootes: If that jasper would listen, he might pick up something of use for his next performance for the Ottawa Little Theatre.

The second aspect that we considered on each occasion was that all proposed new or changed rules must hold for a Liberal on that side, a Liberal on this side, a Conservative on that side, a Conservative on this side, or any combination thereof. Of particular importance was whether it would be helpful if the persons on the government side were in a minority or whether they were in a majority. In other words, all four combinations must be covered in such a way that the government side, irrespective of whether it was in a minority or a majority, was able to do one thing—that is, proceed to bring government business to a vote, irrespective of whether it was going to win or lose that vote.

There must at least be the opportunity, on the government side, be it Liberal, Conservative, minority or majority, to complete the government's business in this chamber and not to have it hung up by a bunch of procedural jackasses who are playing, from time to time, William Pitt the Younger and William Pitt the Elder. We have had enough of that. This is a legislative chamber that should bring to completion the government's work, and that is why the government controls the government agenda. Thereafter, other business of the house can proceed for as many hours or for as long as either side of the house wishes.

So I bring to your attention the fact that rule 40 was brought in in that manner. Then, when these proposals were later put to the committee studying the rules and regulations of this chamber, again, I regret to say, honourable senators, there was a total dereliction of duty on the part of our Liberal or opposition friends. They refused to come to the meeting.

Senator Corbin: That is not the truth. You are not saying the truth.

Senator Barootes: Not only is that the truth, and I will stand by it —

Senator Corbin: You are lying.

Senator Barootes: I ask him to retract that statement or that he be named by the Senate.

Senator Corbin: Sit down.

Senator Cools: Never, never.

Senator Barootes: I demand that he be named.

Senator Corbin: I will retract, but you are not saying the truth.

Senator Cools: He will never be thrown out of this chamber.

Senator Barootes: Let me go on. When these proposals were being put to a meeting convened by the honourable senator to my left, Senator Robertson, not only did my friends on the other side not show up, but one member from the front bench of the Liberal Party did inadvertently wander in and was handed this material as we were discussing it. Lo and behold, one of the leader's staff noticed this and a note was sent in asking the senator to get out of the room for fear he would be contaminated in discussing the proposals that were being put forward to both sides. That is what I referred to when I said that the opposition was not there.

Subsequently, when it was possible to reformulate—if I may use that term—the rules and regulations committee, and some members of the opposition did appear, we tried again to revise these rules which some members of the house, particularly some in the opposition, found offensive, unworkable or, if I may use your leader's term, "inappropriate". We have had a few meetings and we have agreed to exchange with each other, as we develope these changes, the amendments we would like to see made.

In other words, we would send ours to your group and you would send yours to ours and then we would sit down and see if we could mediate the differences.

We have done our part. We have fulfilled our obligation and have immediately turned over to that side any amendments we have developed. So far as I can find out, Senator Robertson, the chairman, has not received any amendments from the other side, although my friend the Leader of the Opposition says he has a pile of them that thick.

That is fine, but for heaven's sake let us see them. How can we decide how we might improve on these rules without your assistance? It is all right to feed information one way, but apparently it is not all right to feed it the other way. That is one observation I would make.

• (1100)

There is one other comment I wish to make on Senator Frith's observations about the Speaker of this house, which I found inappropriate. This house has continued for 125 years, and during that entire period of time the government side or the ruling party has always appointed the Speaker and apparently the table officers.

If you find it so offensive that we have not elected the Speaker in this chamber, why in heaven's name did you, when you were in power for so many years, not undertake to have an elected Speaker? We did it; the Conservatives did it on the other side in the other place—

Senator Cools: Senator, you do not know the Constitution.

Senator Barootes: Now, all of a sudden, you have seen the light and you want an elected Speaker.

Senator Frith: That is not true. That is wrong.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. According to our rules, your 10 minutes are up. Is leave granted for Senator Barootes to continue speaking?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Barootes: I thank the honourable senators for permitting me to proceed for another moment.

Senator Hastings: We don't want to miss this.

Senator Barootes: I am very conscious of how important it is that the rules be acceptable to all members of the Senate. It is only with the cooperation of the other side in the committee that we can do this.

You, on your side, have some very expert people in this matter. Senator Molgat chaired that committee for many years. He is not here today, but it is upon his shoulders that we have placed, if you will, the responsibility of letting us have your input into this matter. We hope that we will receive it in the future.

I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his turgid remarks, even though they were highly dramatized, and I am glad senators opposite listened to me with such patience.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. John B. Stewart: Will Senator Barootes answer a question?

Senator Barootes: Willingly, if I can.

Senator Stewart: The present session of this house began on May 13, 1991, and the present date is October 15, 1992. A fair number of calendar days have elapsed during the present session.

Today is only the 101st sitting of the Senate in this session, which has lasted about a year and a half.

My question to the honourable senator is this: Do you think that the Senate sits too many days each year and that it sits too many hours on each of the days on which it sits?

An Hon. Senator: Trick question!

Senator Barootes: I wish I had attended St. Francis Xavier University's political science course.

Senator Frith: There is an answer for you. I can only say, "So do we, sir!"

Senator Barootes: I can only say that such ephemeral and esoteric questions are beyond the ken of a poor doctor like myself to answer, but I will try.

Honourable senators, I can remember one session of Parliament that ran almost three years—certainly over two or two and a half years. Who was the Prime Minister at the time? He had the prerogative of proroguing and starting a session. I think the Senate should sit for as long as is necessary to conduct its business in this session, legislative and otherwise.

Senator Stewart: So you will withdraw the motion now before the house?

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Will the honourable senator accept a question? Do you honestly expect us —

Senator Barootes: Did I say I would accept a question from you? My answer is "no"!

Senator Frith: Chicken!

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I have never in 24 years —

[English]

Senator Barootes, will you take your seat, please. I have something to tell you. Your colleague Brenda Robertson left the house as I was referring to her. I have asked to rise on a question of personal privilege. If you do not want to hear me, that is fine.

Senator DeWare, we do not work under New Brunswick rules here. If you want to speak, you should take your seat and await your turn. That is the Senate rule.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, never before in my 24 years here have I called someone a liar. I retract that, but I still live with the shame of having said it. I deeply apologize not only to Senator Barootes but to all my honourable colleagues. This has never happened before.

But it happened because of Senator Robertson's comments in the debate on this motion. I am very sorry that she did not see fit to keep her seat so that we can thoroughly debate the new question she raised.

Honourable senators, I regret that very much and I again apologize profusely for the way I behaved earlier today.

[English]

Senator Barootes: I thank the honourable senator for his gracious withdrawal of those remarks and tell him that I shall continue to honour and respect his judgment in the future.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, speaking to the motion before the Senate, I wish to say that I am not one of those who believe that either the House of Commons or the Senate needs unlimited time to deal with measures proposed by either private members or members of the government. There may be circumstances in which closure is reasonable, but today we have a situation in which the Senate has sat only 104 times in about a year and a half. In addition, I doubt that even the most indolent among us could complain about the length of our sittings. Yet, on this important bill, the government has brought in an allocation of time. Surely it would not have strained even the most feeble and aged among us to have heard more witnesses.

Senator Cools: Absolutely.

Senator Stewart: Surely we could have come back and finished the third reading debate in the normal way, without its being truncated by this allocation of time motion. Is it any wonder that the people of Canada want this house drastically reformed? If evidence showing the need for reform is required, the government has provided it today with this allocation of time motion; the unwillingness to hear witnesses; the unwillingness to defend their own bill. "Drop the guillotine, for we have the numbers to win the vote."

Senator Cools: That is their way.

Senator Stewart: There is no defence for this bizarre motion. What appointments do we have? Can we not cancel our airline reservations? The sun will shine next week as well as tomorrow. We do not have to be out of here. I cannot understand the reasoning of these senators who support the government. Have they no sense of our duty to the public?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

• (1110)

The Hon. the Speaker: It was moved by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kelly:

> That, pursuant to the provisions of Rule 40, in relation to Bill C-80, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act, not more than six further hours of debate be allotted to—

Senator Frith: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, I would ask to have the bells ring for 10 minutes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: That will take us to 11:20. Call in the senators.

• (1120)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it has been moved by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kelly:

[Senator Cools.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): I don't think we have time to read the whole thing. The government is in a big hurry, so we had better dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that we dispense with reading the motion, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE ECONOMY

POVERTY IN CANADA

Leave having been given to revert to Senators' Statements:

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I assumed this morning that we were rushing through the agenda to get to the Orders of the Day in case somehow or other Bill C-80 might not be passed. For that reason, I did not proceed with my statement. Thank you for giving leave to revert. I wish to finish the statement I started yesterday, which the Senate refused to let me complete then because of the time limit.

At this time in our history, when we are taking the family allowance away from our children and doing away with universality, there is great income inequality, with income being shared very unequally. If the income of Canadians is divided up like a pie, the richest fifth of Canadians receive nearly one-half of all the income in Canada, 46.6 per cent; the poorest fifth receive only 3.2 per cent. In other words, the richest fifth received nearly 15 times as much money as the poorest fifth.

At this time in our history, one in six children under 18 years of age, or approximately 17 per cent of Canadian children, live in poverty. This means that over 1.105 million children are living in poor families. Since 1989 the number of poor children has grown by 171,000.

Figures from the 1986 census show that two out of five Canadians with incomes in 1985 received less than $10,000. The percentage is much higher for disabled persons, being approximately 57 per cent. For native people, including Métis and Indians on reserves, it is down to 54 per cent. Nearly one in five Canadians aged 65 and over is living below the poverty line. However, the risk of poverty is greater for women aged 65 who live alone or with non-relatives. Approximately 47 per cent of those women live in poverty, compared to 33 per cent of men in similar circumstances.

I have simply put those figures on the record so that, when voting on Bill C-80, honourable senators will have mercy on the poor children of this country.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

REFERENDUM QUESTION—EFFECT OF RESULT ON CANADIAN ECONOMY—STATEMENTS BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question relating to the referendum and I would like some clarification arising out of some recent reports.

For some time the Prime Minister has been warning that the Canadian dollar would sink, interest rates would climb, and investment would flee the country if the Charlottetown accord were rejected. He has also stated that if the "yes" side wins, family incomes would rise dramatically over the next eight years and "every Canadian, man, woman and child, would enjoy the highest standard of living in the entire world." Parenthetically, I also seem to remember something such as that being said about the result of the approval of the free trade agreement; however, that is another matter.

I see today that the Prime Minister plans to have talks on the economy after the unity vote. A recent article states:

> Prime Minister Brian Mulroney plans to host an economic summit within two weeks after the October 26 referendum, whatever the outcome.

That intention sounds like "business as usual". In other words, whatever the outcome, we will go on with first ministers conferences on the economy, and life will go on. Can the "yes" committee now take the position that the sky will not fall, whether there is a "yes" or a "no" result?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with regard to the possibility of a federal-provincial conference or a first ministers conference on the economy, I believe I dealt with that matter yesterday in response to a question from Senator Austin.

Senator Frith: Yes, but it was not quite in this context.

Senator Murray: I have to tell the honourable senator that no decision has been made in that regard. Certainly, the inquiries that I have made with the Prime Minister's office and the Department of Finance and the Federal-Provincial Relations Office indicate that no decision has been made in that regard. It is always a possibility, I suppose.

The second point I would make is that the honourable senator has attributed to the Prime Minister statements which he did not make, and he has drawn from statements which the Prime Minister did make inferences that are not justified.

First, the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate quotes the Prime Minister as having said that the dollar would fall, that interest rates would rise, that investment would shrink in the event of a "no" vote. That is the not the statement of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has been at some pains to speak very candidly to the Canadian people about the risks of uncertainty that would certainly arise from a "no" vote on October 26.

In support of that, I will only repeat what Standard & Poor's stated yesterday, when it announced that the credit rating in respect of certain Canadian obligations in foreign denominations had been reduced from Triple-A to Double-A:

> . . . uncertainties about the future shape of the confederation, if they persist, could weaken investor confidence and hamper the conduct of economic policy over the medium term.

Finally, the honourable senator again misquoted the Prime Minister with regard to the future of the Canadian economy in the event of a "yes" vote. As I said to Senator Thériault yesterday, the Prime Minister had not said that the result of a "yes" vote would be certain increases in income. What he pointed out was that we do have a good economic future and that it depends upon maintaining our unity as a country. This is covered in a delayed answer which my friend the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate will be tabling in due course.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I guess all of us will be a little hard-pressed to remember what my question was when put in the context of the answer. I will have to read the Debates of the Senate.

I would point out that the statement that I read in the Toronto Star was in quotes, so someone is obviously wrong, and Senator Murray thinks that the Star is wrong. I am not quite sure whether the answer to my question is yes, but I think it is. We will see when we read the questions and the long answer.

EGYPT

CANADIAN ASSISTANCE TO EARTHQUAKE VICTIMS IN CAIRO

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning earthquake victims in Cairo, Egypt. Has Canada sent assistance in the same manner that it usually does when there is a catastrophe around the world?

● (1140)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall have to make enquiries. My information is that assistance has been offered and accepted, but I cannot at the moment furnish the details the honourable senator would wish to have.

THE CONSTITUTION

COST AND MEANS OF FINANCING REFERENDUM

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning a delayed answer given on October 13, 1992.

I had asked how the cost of the constitutional referendum is to be met. In the response given on behalf of the government, the Senate was told:

> Parliament has appropriated the necessary expenditures by virtue of section 33 of the Referendum Act which states that the costs of the Chief Electoral Officer shall be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Is the bill that eventuated as the Referendum Act a bill that would be regarded as an expenditure bill under the reformed constitution?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I think not, honourable senators.

Senator Stewart: But you will take it under consideration?

Senator Murray: Yes, but I would continue to think not, on the basis of recent exchanges that we have had on this matter among the honourable senator and Senator Everett and myself some weeks ago, as well as on the basis of the Charlottetown agreement and the legal texts which seek to define quite narrowly the definition of a supply bill or the purposes of the 30-day suspensive veto by the new Senate.

[Senator Murray.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NOVA SCOTIA—STATUS OF PROPOSED SALE OF TRURO-SYDNEY RAIL LINE

Hon. John B. Stewart: On June 23, 1992, the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications presented a report on the decision of Canadian National Railways to sell the main railway line between Truro and Sydney, Nova Scotia. About two weeks ago, if I recall correctly, Canadian National Railways announced the name of the successful bidder. I believe it was Tex Rail, an American company. I am glad to see Senator Buchanan here, because he will remember the proceedings of the committee vividly.

Members of the committee will recall that the government of the province of Nova Scotia stated that it is adamantly opposed to the sale by Canadian National Railway of this line of railway.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is the following: Has there been any representation, either formal or informal, by the government of the province of Nova Scotia to the government of Canada with regard to the proposed sale? If there has been any representation, what has been the response of any minister on behalf of the government of Canada?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would have to make enquiries about that matter. I am aware, of course, as the honourable senator is, of the representations made by the Nova Scotia government to the Senate committee that looked into this matter. I shall make enquiries about what representations may have been made to ministers or to the government.

Meanwhile, if the government of Nova Scotia or other interested parties have representations to make, they should prepare to make them to the National Transportation Agency, which of course will be considering the application of Canadian National Railways in this respect.

Senator Stewart: Therefore the position of the government is that the Canadian National Railway is free to take this proposed sale to the National Transportation Agency, and that the government will do nothing whatsoever at this time to dispel fears that this sale will be consummated?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the act passed by Parliament has established a procedure in these matters. Canadian National Railways has reached a sale agreement with this company called the Cape Breton and Central Nova Scotia Railway, which, as my friend has pointed out, is a subsidiary of Rail Tex Incorporated of San Antonio, Texas. To effect that sale, CN must file an application with the National Transportation Agency, and the National Transportation Agency will have six months from the date it accepts the application to hear from interested parties and to make a decision.

NEW BRUNSWICK

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE FOR TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John B. Stewart: I know firsthand that the government of the province of Nova Scotia is proceeding to twin the Trans-Canada highway in certain counties in eastern Nova Scotia. When one passes from Pictou County, which is in the federal constituency of Central Nova, into Antigonish County, which is in the federal constituency of Cape Breton Highlands-Canso, one really does not have to have one's eyes open to know that one has passed from a Conservative constituency into a Liberal constituency.

In view of the reported anticipation by the premier of the province of New Brunswick that very soon, perhaps next week, perhaps the week following that, there will be an announcement concerning additional federal assistance for Trans-Canada Highway construction in New Brunswick, can we in eastern Nova Scotia, perhaps next week or the following week, expect an announcement of similar federal assistance to Trans-Canada Highway construction in Nova Scotia?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know the geography of which the honourable senator speaks, and I rejoice with him that progress eastward is being made from the New Brunwsick/Nova Scotia border through to Truro and Pictou. One can only look forward to good things in the future.

So far as Premier McKenna's statements are concerned, I have not seen them. I can only repeat what I said the other day on this matter. There have been discussions with the provinces with regard to the national highways system and a possible federal-provincial agreement on these matters. Those discussions have gone very well, but they have not been concluded. There are still some points of difference here and there, and therefore it would be premature, to say the least, to state that an announcement or even a decision is imminent.

THE CONSTITUTION

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—CONTINUANCE OF SUPREME COURT AS HIGHEST COURT OF APPEAL

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Perhaps the Honourable Leader of the Government might help us a little with respect to a report in the Ottawa Citizen today regarding a continuing divergence between what Premier Wells thinks should be in the constitution with regard to the Supreme Court and what is in the legal text. This article in the Citizen says:

> Wells wants the text to specify the Supreme Court will remain the highest court of appeal for all federal and provincial laws, including Quebec civil law.
> The "best efforts" legal text released on the weekend doesn't rectify his concerns, Wells said.

• (1150)

Is this a mistaken report in the newspaper? Is it something that is being worked on now? Could you tell us what the state of play is on this matter?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, I am familiar with the issue only to the extent that the honourable senator is, having seen references to it this morning and recently in the media. There are a number of areas where I believe the parties to the Charlottetown agreement —

Senator Bonnell: Charlottetown accord.

Senator Murray: Accord.

Senator Frith: "Consensus" is the right word.

Senator Murray: —where the parties to the Charlottetown accord are agreed that some further refinement of the legal texts may be necessary—certainly that some further discussion of the legal texts would be necessary.

I must confess that as a layman I do not understand fully the point that Premier Wells is making. First, I am not aware that anyone has ever suggested that the final court of appeal in this country is elsewhere than the Supreme Court of Canada. In that I include civil matters from Quebec, although I am told, by people in a better position to know than I am, that not many of these civil cases come to the Supreme Court of Canada, for whatever reason.

Senator Frith: When you say "civil", are you distinguishing civil cases from criminal, or do you mean Civil Code cases?

Senator Murray: Civil Code cases, I am sorry. I thank the Honourable Leader of the Opposition.

Secondly, I have to observe that I did not notice any reference of the kind Premier Wells seems to be insisting be put in the legal text in the Charlottetown accord itself.

Senator Gigantès: What is being done to clear this matter up? Unfortunately, from my point of view, and yours, I am sure, these sorts of things are used by the "no" side here and there as saying, "There you are, they have not even agreed on the Supreme Court." It is not true, but any little point of stress of this kind is used by the Preston Mannings, the COR people and the "no" side in Quebec. There are people on the "no" side who are saying, "There you are; Wells wants to impose, to rub it in that we have to go to the Supreme Court of Canada." They have always had to, but what is being done to deal with this issue?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I can only say that the officials representing Premier Wells, as well as those representing nine other premiers, the Government of Canada, two territories and four Aboriginal associations were at the table for a good long time in recent weeks preparing a "best efforts" draft of a legal text. I think I can say with certainty that those officials were in continuing touch with their political principals throughout that process.

The draft legal text, the "best efforts" text, has been agreed to by Premier Wells' officials and by all the others. He himself would not have been taken by surprise by the draft legal text.

I think there is an agreement, as I said, that some of these matters may require some further discussion and, in some cases, refinement, but I think it is agreed to by all that that discussion will have to wait until the referendum campaign is over.

It may be that that discussion will have to take place at the ministerial or prime ministerial level.

SUPREME COURT—DISAVOWAL BY INDIAN NATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I have another question relating to the Constitution.

It seems that Chief Mercredi has a problem with several other chiefs who think that the court takes away from their nationhood because it puts their rights in a framework other than on the basis of the nation-to-nation treaties on which they think all their claims should be based. Let us suppose that Chief Mercredi is disavowed by many of these Indian chiefs and that the referendum passes, can all the various legislatures then proceed to accept the court even though it is opposed by several Indian nations?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is one of the most difficult questions of all. We faced it at the first of the first ministers meetings on Aboriginal and constitutional affairs, which was held under the chairmanship of Prime Minister Mulroney. The question was: What is the extent of Aboriginal approval that is needed for us, the political people, Parliament and the legislatures, to feel that we can and should proceed confidently with amending the Constitution in this respect?

In the event, as I recall, at least the Assembly of First Nations were offside, if I may put it that way. They were opposed to the consensus that was arrived at at that first ministers conference. It was decided that the governments should not proceed.

With regard to the present situation, I believe Mr. Clark met with Chief Mercredi as recently as yesterday. I believe Mr. Clark is meeting today with a larger group from the Assembly of First Nations in Squamish, British Columbia. I think it could be quite harmful for me to speculate on what is at the moment essentially a hypothetical question.

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—RULES OF ELECTED SENATE—STATEMENT BY SENATOR ROBERTSON—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, in the course of debate earlier today, Senator Brenda Robertson suggested that the Senate should write the rules for the new, so-called elected Senate if the referendum proposal is accepted by the people of Canada. Was that a joke, a government initiative or a faux pas de deux on the part of Senators Barootes and Robertson? If it is a joke, why does the government not consider having the members of the House of Commons write the new rules, or the provincial legislatures which will elect the new senators, since the new Senate will be the creature of the latter and subordinate to the former? What is the position of the government in this regard?

[Senator Murray.]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I presume that question was put to the chairman of the committee.

Senator Corbin: No. I am asking it of you as Leader of the Government in the Senate. I specifically asked if this is a government initiative. I think Senator Murray has to stand up and put his comments on the record.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, first, I was not here when the statement which my friend attributes to Senator Robertson was made. Second, it would not be my role to comment on statements she has made in her capacity as chairman of the committee. If she wishes to reply, that is provided for under our rules.

Senator Corbin: I do not care for a reply at this stage from Senator Robertson. She rudely left the house when I wanted to put this question. I am surprised that you, as government leader, Senator Murray, are not informed of everything that is said in the Senate by your back-benchers. You seem to be extremely well informed about what Liberals do.

I take it that it was all a joke. Let us leave it at that for now.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

AGRICULTURE NEGOTIATIONS—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, the trade ministers of the United States, Canada, Japan and the European Community are meeting today in Cambridge, Ontario. Does the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate know whether there has been any progress in the GATT negotiations concerning agriculture?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have up-to-date information on that matter. The honourable senator may know that President Bush has dispatched some of his advisors to Europe to meet with representatives of the EEC. From a political point of view, the President and the United States administration would probably like to have some resolution of this matter before the presidential elections next month, but the honourable senator's guess is as good as mine as to whether that is likely.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one delayed answer to a question asked on October 14 by Senator Thériault regarding the effect on family income of the referendum vote.

THE CONSTITUTION

REFERENDUM QUESTION—EFFECT OF "YES" VOTE ON ECONOMY—STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

(Response to question raised by Hon. Norbert L. Thériault on October 14, 1992)

During a speech on October 10, 1992 in Steinbach, Manitoba, the Prime Minister was quoted as saying "the option is that if we maintain our unity and we vote yes on October 26, that Canada in the year 2000 can be a magnificent country, a country of 30-million people producing approximately a trillion dollars worth of goods and services a year, making Canada one of the richest nations of the 178 countries in the world, a country where the annual average income for a family of four will be as high as $91,000 a year, an increase of 25 per cent from today . . .".

The figures used to illustrate the benefits of a "strong and unified Canada" were all taken from last year's Speech from the Throne. The growth target of 25 percent in real per capita income, which would translate into an average income for a family of four of about $91,000 by the year 2000, is not overly optimistic. It is above the growth achieved during the 1980's (17 percent) but significantly below the growth achieved through the 1960's and 1970's (38 percent in each period).

ORDERS OF THE DAY

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

SEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 1 (Other Business-Reports of Committees):

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Seventh Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources (energy production and use in Canada) presented in the Senate on 14th October, 1992.

Hon. Dan Hays, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, moved that the report be adopted.

He said: I thank honourable senators for granting leave to deal with this matter now. It is uncertain when we will conclude today, and if we do complete the business of the Senate today and do not sit until December, the time that the Senate has allowed for the committee to report on its current special study will have expired.

This particular order is a report of the committee requesting the Senate to extend the time to report from November 30 currently, to February 12, 1993. The committee originally thought that the November 30 deadline could be met. However, it does not now appear that that will be the case. In any event, the February 12 deadline would give us ample time. We are now under way with our hearings and those hearings will probably conclude towards the end of the month. However, the time taken to write the report will take us beyond the November 30 deadline.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

INCOME TAX ACT

CHILDREN'S SPECIAL ALLOWANCES ACT

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Spivak, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cochrane, for the third reading of Bill C-80, to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, it should be recalled that Bill C-80 was introduced to overcome some of the weaknesses of the current child benefit system and, in particular, to achieve two objectives: To streamline the delivery of child benefits and to concentrate greater benefits on low-income families.

I think we need to revisit the roots of this bill. Although I have every admiration for the thespian talents of, in particular, Senator Royce Frith, I think we need to get back to the essentials of the case here.

The basic component of the proposal in the new child tax benefit program will replace the three largest programs currently in place: The refundable child tax credit, the family allowance, and the non-refundable child tax credit. In addition, the new system introduces an earned income supplement for working poor with employment incomes of $3,750 or more.

The National Welfare Council in its press release accompanying its report, The 1992 Budget and Child Benefits, says:

> The new child tax benefit proposed by the federal government is a reasonable starting point for improving the current system.

That is basically my position. The council goes on to suggest modifications in the legislation which in their opinion would improve it. But the important point to note here, before I go on to recount the deficiencies of the current system, is that Bill C-80, in essence, is a continuation of the evolution of changes to the child benefits program by basically rolling three different benefits into one and streamlining the delivery of child and family benefits.

As well, I would like to recap the universalist versus the targeted approach argument that I referred to in my previous address on this topic.

While family allowance was introduced initially in 1945 as a purely universal program, in 1974, as was mentioned here in this house, this was changed when family allowance was made taxable as ordinary income. The 1970 study entitled "Income Security for Canadians" expressed dissatisfaction with the family allowance as a means of relieving poverty. It was said that the payments were too low and did not direct enough help to lower income families—exactly the same arguments that are being made today. Since it was deemed that it would be disastrously expensive to increase the then existing allowances to an amount that would be significant for lower income families because it would have to be paid to all families, an entirely new approach was needed. That is the targeted approach.

That approach, known as the FISP proposal, was not adopted at that time. Rather, a proposal which made family allowances taxable was adopted in 1974. In 1978, part of the family allowance was replaced by a more targeted refundable child tax credit. In the 1980s, resources were shifted from the child tax deduction to refundable child tax credit.

In 1986, family allowance was no longer fully indexed to match inflation, and in 1989, the "clawback" was introduced. According to analysts, an additional advantage to the new system is the elimination of the clawback on family allowances which, while purporting to maintain universality of social benefits, in actuality eroded universality through a complex and cumbersome system of taxing back benefits.

Therefore a more targeted approach has been in the works for years, and a system which taxes back the benefits from the personal income of higher income families since 1974 is universal in appearance only because since it is taxable, it is selective in its real effects.

Let us recount the key problems of the child benefits program that Bill C-80 was designed to address. The delivery system is a mish-mash, as Ken Battle says. Benefits are delivered in various ways: A family allowance cheque is mailed monthly. There is an annual child tax credit that reduces tax liabilities and a refundable child tax credit that is mailed as a lump sum payment, after tax returns are assessed, although some families receive partial repayment in November.

There are different eligibility criteria for each program. There is the cumbersome process for higher income families receiving benefits for a year, followed by all or most of the money recovered at tax time. Family allowances are taxed and recovered on the basis of individual income, which means that families with similar total incomes may receive different levels of benefits. Family income is a more equitable basis for directing benefits to children.

● (1210)

Delays in payment mean that modest-income families, for whom the refundable tax credit may represent more than half of federal child benefits, may have to wait more than a year to receive full credit, thus tax discounters flourish and families sacrifice part of their benefits to meet immediate needs. This is a very longstanding problem. I am particularly familiar with it. It has been a longstanding problem on Main Street in Winnipeg. I once did a report on tax discounters, who prey on low-income families, so I am familiar with the problem.

[Senator Spivak.]

Since the full amount of the refundable tax credit is paid only after tax returns are assessed, families which must pay for their children's needs every month may have to wait more than a year to receive the full credit. The monthly child benefit payment proposed in Bill C-80 eliminates the delays which can be so difficult for modest-income families.

Low-income families with children who move from social assistance to the workforce are often faced with increased financial difficulties as a result of employment related expenses and the possible loss of provincial social assistance benefits. The present system does not address this problem and it has been a longstanding criticism of this system that it does not target the working poor. Assistance to the working poor and low-income families was proposed by the Senate 1991 report, "Children in Poverty" and also in the House of Commons report of December, 1991, on children. It was also recommended by the National Welfare Council, The Department of Health and Welfare and others in the social policy field as far back as the seventies. Note that the earned income supplement does not draw lines based on whether someone receives social assistance or not. The supplement will go to families who receive social assistance and also have earnings.

Therefore, the advantages of the new scheme are the following: First, it rationalizes the delivery system and the eligibility criteria. Most observers applaud this move. It puts $400 million a year, added to the $4.5 billion for 1992, into the child benefit system targeted to lower-income families. Surely this is an improvement over the status quo.

The opposition argument is that while $2.1 billion is being put in, $3.5 billion has been taken out because of partial deindexation. Ian Bennett, Senior Assistant Deputy Minister of the Policy Branch, quite flatly states that the $3.5 billion figure is incorrect. It ignores the fact that the federal government increased by four times the refundable child tax credit and introduced a supplement for children under seven of $213 per year for those parents who do not claim child care expenses. The increase for those at the bottom end of the income scale—a key argument of the opposition here—has more than kept pace with inflation.

I obtained these figures from the tax policy branch of the tax department. These are not my figures, but those of the tax policy branch.

Senator Frith: That is the government.

Senator Spivak: These are civil servants. They were civil servants under the Liberal government.

Senator Cools: No, no.

Senator Hastings: Not that bunch.

Senator Spivak: These are from a chap who spends all his time on computers. They are not even from Ian Bennett.

In 1985, the maximum child tax credit was $384 per child and family allowance was $375, for a maximum total of $759. In 1992, the maximum refundable child tax credit is $601 and family allowance is $419, for a maximum benefit of $1,020. This translates into a 34.4 per cent increase in the level of benefits per child for low-income families between 1985 and 1992, which exactly matches the increase in the Consumer Price Index over the same period. In addition, the introduction of the under-seven supplement to the refundable child tax credit in 1988 has ensured that the increase in the level of child benefits paid to many low-income families has more than exceeded the pace of inflation. The under-seven supplement is worth $213 in 1992.

Ken Battle, for whom I have the utmost respect, in his appearance before the Senate committee said that it was his understanding that the $3.5 billion did not take into account these increases which have protected the lowest incomes from erosion by inflation. He said he would have to check with Richard Shillington, but his understanding was that that $3.5 billion did not take that into account—that is, the increases in the refundable child tax credit and the introduction of the under-seven supplement.

Senator Frith: We know what Mr. Shillington said.

Senator Spivak: Just a moment. I prefer to take my —

Senator Frith: Naturally, but you might read what he said before the committee.

Senator Spivak: This is a debatable point. This is what the tax department says. You can argue with the tax department. I will have more to say on this later.

Senator LeBlanc: That is the tax department's script.

Senator Spivak: You used figures from the tax department when it was in your interest to do so.

Senator Hastings: Never.

Senator Spivak: Give me another source that is better than the tax department. These are complex figures.

Senator Cools: We have seen how reliable they are. Look at the UI committee report.

Senator Spivak: We are making an argument here about the poorest, those with the lowest incomes, and I am as concerned as you are about making sure that their gains are not eroded by inflation. All we are arguing about is whose figures are right. I am only giving you what I have been able to dig up. If you can dig up better figures, great.

The second point made about the new moneys, the $2.1 billion, is that there is nothing in it for welfare recipients. While it is true that this legislation is targeted to the working poor, 180,000 of the 490,000 families on social assistance will receive increased benefits. In fact, 2.4 million families will receive higher benefits. The level of benefits is also higher for larger families. Remember that the $75 for the third child is an addition, although that does not apply to many families. Families on welfare will also benefit from monthly payments, rather than payments on a yearly basis, and from the elimination of tax discounters.

Also, within the social assistance provided by provincial governments a number of benefits in kind are provided to social assistance recipients, such as coverage for dental care, prescription drugs and eye glasses. The earned income supplement is an attempt to redress this imbalance for the working poor.

The last point is that 84 per cent of Canadian families will receive benefits under this system. So it is not exactly kosher to say that the federal government does not —

Senator Frith: Another way of saying it is "tref", which is "not kosher".

Senator Spivak: I do not buy the argument that the federal government does not recognize the extra financial burden of families with children as opposed to those who have no children.

Many of the suggestions made by social policy groups to improve the legislation are entirely valid, but they do not contradict the principle of this legislation. Better targeting of benefits, full indexation, and measures to prevent provincial and territorial governments from reducing the amount of benefits received by families once the new child tax benefit comes into being should all be supported. The federal government should, as the National Welfare Council has suggested, take steps to ensure that all families eligible for the new child tax benefit actually do receive the benefit.

However, we cannot load all of the deficiencies of all of our social policies on this one piece of legislation. It is only a step in combatting child poverty. It does not introduce a national child care program. We need to continue to advocate such a program, which is a vital element in combatting poverty.

Before the committee Dr. Glossop said, as reported at page 21:70 of the Senate committee's report:

> A coherent strategy to address the tragedy of childhood poverty must address the poverty of poor parents with policies and programs designed to enhance economic development and employment creation; to reduce the wage gap between men and women and to eliminate employment discrimination —

Senator Frith: This is the same Dr. Glossop that was adamantly opposed to this legislation?

Senator Spivak: Yes, the same Dr. Glossop. I am quoting from what he said and I agree with him.

• (1220)

Senator Frith: Do you agree with everything he said?

Senator Spivak: I am quoting:

> . . . to reduce the wage gap between men and women and to eliminate employment discrimination against native peoples and other visible minorities; to reform family > law to better protect women and children from the economic consequences of marital dissolution; to subsidize social housing; and, last but not least, to create a system of affordable and accessible child care to which poor parents can turn as they seek to support themselves and their children through their initiative to secure employment, education and retraining.

Senator Frith: Do you agree with what he said at page 69 also?

Senator Spivak: No.

Senator Hastings: She is selective.

Senator Frith: I did not think you would.

Senator Spivak: I have not analyzed what he said at page 69, and I will be happy to do so later.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senator, I wish to inform you that your time has expired. Is leave granted, honourable senators, to allow Senator Spivak to continue?

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I refuse consent. We are working under a time limit, and a number of us on this side want to make sure we get our points on the record. It is not an opposition-imposed time little; it is a government-imposed time limit. I want to make sure that there is time for me to speak.

Senator Murray: There are six hours. You are free to fill them.

Senator Spivak: Does that mean that I cannot finish my speech?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Leave has not been granted. Further debate?

Hon. Anne C. Cools: My sympathies to you, Senator Spivak.

Honourable senators, I am sorry that Senator Spivak did not have an opportunity to complete her remarks. I was listening to them with some interest. I am aware that Senator Spivak is quite accomplished at giving eloquent apologies for the government, so I would have been happy to listen to the rest of her speech.

Honourable senators, I wish to add my voice to those who are opposed to this bill, Bill C-80. I would also say that there is a most interesting phenomenon at work here at this precise moment, because I am standing directly opposite the sponsor of this bill, Senator Mira Spivak, and directly opposite the seconder of the motion on this bill, Senator Ethel Cochrane. I am standing facing four women directly across the way. As I become aware of that, my mind is quickly called to the tablet at the front of this Chamber which has been placed there in memory of women such as Nellie McClung. Nellie McClung was the woman who said that this country, Canada, was "the land of the second chance and the land of the fair deal."

[Senator Spivak.]

Honourable senators, I do not want to review the issues of time allocation and closure and the issue of the lack of respect for the institutions of this country. Senator Frith has dealt adequately with those. However, I would underscore what has been said by stressing the fact that the disrespect of democratic principles in Parliament has been a hallmark of this government. Indeed, it has been a feature of this government and a blemish on this great institution.

I want to begin my remarks by quoting a Throne Speech from 1944, the Throne Speech of the government of the Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King. I read as follows:

> The family and the home are the foundation of national life. To aid in ensuring a minimum of well-being to the children of the nation and to help gain for them a closer approach to equality of opportunity in the battle of life, you will be asked to approve a measure making provision for family allowances.

The intellectual framework behind the concept of child allowances—known as family allowances—was developed by many. However, it was the brainchild of the Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King and was forged in his attempt to implement the Atlantic Charter of 1941. As we know, the Atlantic Charter was based on eight principles, one of which was the freedom from fear and the freedom from want.

The intellectual development of this concept was fostered by the work and reports of Dr. Leonard Marsh and Sir William Beveridge. As honourable members will know, both of these gentlemen were eminent social thinkers of the day. In addition, the concept was supported by Lord Keynes. He was one of the most influential economists of his time.

Honourable senators, we are talking about a concept of our nation adopting in legislation these principles of freedom from want and freedom from fear in the form of allowances for children. I want to reiterate that by quoting from the Throne Speech of 1943, also of the government of the Rt. Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King. Sessions in those days were a little shorter than they are now.

> It is in the general interest that freedom from fear and from want should be the assured possession of all.

"The assured possession of all," honourable senators. That is what the Throne Speech of that day clearly articulates. That articulation was to be embodied in the legislation and, when enacted, was to have the effect of giving cash allowances to mothers for children's needs.

The concept of children's allowances to mothers was drawn originally from the military forces. However, I shall not dwell on that because there is a wealth of information available for those who wish to do research. However, I do believe that within the military such allowances had been administered by the Dependents' Allowance Board.

The Liberal government of the day had appointed several committees to study these matters. These committees included the Committee on Reconstruction, which in turn included a Subcommittee on Women. This particular group reached a conclusion that was written into their report as follows:

> It is the only system yet devised which will remove the poverty arising from the fact that a man's wage must be based on the product of a man's labour and not on the size of his family.

Honourable senators, it is to be noted here that the term "man" literally meant males, because in the development of the original Family Allowances Act, there was a lot of concern that relief be given to men. After all, it was the males of the family who shouldered the responsibility of earning wages to support wives and families. It is a very interesting concept. I hear no talk whatsoever about that among a large sector of the women's movement today. However, the concept was that relief should be given to those men who shouldered the responsibility of being the sole wage earners in the nuclear family.

It is to be noted, honourable senators, that in his sensibility, the Rt. Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King took counsel from the women of Canada. As a matter of fact, it was a certain Mrs. McWilliams who recommended that the apportionment—that is, the money itself —be given to the woman; that it should be allocated to the woman, to the mother of the family. Obviously the government took women's advice very seriously, and implemented it.

For several generations, honourable senators, the baby bonus was the money, the cash that women called their own. It was their money. Anybody who has worked with families understands that fact.

When I speak like this, I wonder how the women Tory senators across the way can sit with straight faces, but they seem quite accomplished at it. They have had a great deal of practice.

My point is that the Rt. Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King's initiative was a statement to women at a time when the country and the world was recovering from a war. I repeat, it was a statement to women. In addition, it was a great advancement towards social justice and natural law. I would like to cite the words of our Late Honourable Senator Salter Hayden. Senator Di Nino is not here, but I noticed yesterday that Senator Di Nino was quick to tell us that he had worked in the financial industries or the financial services sector for 36 years. Honourable senators, Senator Salter Hayden was the most eminent mind in this country on banking. About this particular initiative, in 1944 Senator Salter Hayden said that it was a great advancement "towards social justice and natural law".

● (1230)

This is a banking-minded man speaking. I would add that Senator Salter Hayden, in his remarks, noted that in point of fact legally and technically it should not even have been called family allowance; it should have been called "Income to Children" because, honourable senators, that is what it was. It was a form of a child income. I will quote Senator Hayden on that. He said, "I think this legislation might more properly be termed a child income bill."

Senator Salter Hayden at that time made the distinction between charity and social justice—a distinction which it would do well for the honourable senators on the other side to begin to comprehend. As a Liberal, I am always respectful of our tradition of the combination of money and humanity—that is, business intelligence and social justice.

The Right Honourable William Lyon MacKenzie King's measure fulfilled four objectives: First, it provided income to children and mothers, thus providing for the welfare of children. Second, it provided support and recognition for the advancement of the role of women. Third, it understood the needs of human beings for social justice, and fourth—and no one on the other side ever talks about this, it supported the economy by establishing a minimum level of consumption in the macro-economic sense.

That is very interesting because it is always the tendency of those on the other side to portray us as "bleeding hearts". For example, Senator Hébert has been called a bleeding heart, but in any analysis we Liberals have always been better managers and certainly better economists.

The Right Honourable William Lyon MacKenzie King's initiative supported the economy by guaranteeing an amount of cash money flowing directly into consumption in the economy. It further assured the speedy movement of that cash towards the purchase of goods and services by placing it in the hands of mothers, who saw it as their spendable money and spent it freely on behalf of their children.

This baby bonus was a consistent infusion of money by the government into the economy, assuring a floor under consumption and, consequently, assuring minimum consumption. This, as always, demonstrates not only the differences between the Tory view of government and the Liberal view of government but also the fact that the Tory view of government stands in sharp contrast to the Liberal view. Tories try to become the government so that they may eliminate it. Simply stated, their philosophy is that small government is better than big government. Consequently, no government is better than small government.

Prime Minister Mulroney has placed persons in his cabinet who work for the separation of Quebec from Canada. He brought senators into the Senate chamber to dismantle the Senate! The Tory government embodies some interesting concepts that I would best describe as participation for termination.

Senator LeBlanc: And the cabinet is fairly big.

Senator Cools: Liberals build governments to provide individual citizens with the strength of many—that is, the collectivity–and Tories dismantle protection from the economic loss in the society. That is rugged individualism and survival of the fittest. Honourable senators, that is the law of the brute, the law of the jungle.

Let us look briefly at what Tories were saying in 1943 and 1944. Let us look at who stood where and what was said on each side of the issue. For example, it is historically well-known that Premier George Drew of Ontario was vigorously opposed to the measure. There may be some of us who are not aware of that, but the majority of us know that.

Let us look at the words and views of some of the Tory senators in the Debates of the Senate. We may discover in this endeavour that history does repeat itself. We find in the personages of many senators then sitting in the Senate chamber that they are to today well represented. For example, let us look at one particular Conservative member of the Senate, the Honourable Senator Ralph Byron Horner, an honourable senator from Saskatchewan. I observe that Senator Barootes is sitting over there. I am sure that Senator Horner must have been a hero for him. Let us just look at some of the things that Senator Horner was saying. He said:

> . . . I feel it is my duty as a senator to oppose the Bill. I believe one of the purposes for which the Canadian Senate was created was that measures such as this, when brought down at a time like this, should be defeated. I am going to argue that there is no necessity whatever for the bill.

He continued:

> I would say that in countries which have passed laws like this the children do not belong to the homes, but are creatures of the State. If we pass this Bill, who is going to claim with pride that he raised a large family? A man will no longer boast of how many children he has brought up. Instead, he will have to admit that the Government helped him. He will say, "The government and I raised a family."

Senator Murray: He was your former colleague's father.

An Hon. Senator: Whose father?

Senator Cools: He was the father of the Honourable Jack Horner. But allow me to continue:

> What incentive is there for thrift and industry when such a heavy burden of taxation is piled on us to provide for unemployment insurance, mothers' allowances and old age pensions?

You would think that this was levity but this man was quite serious. He went on to state:

> Some time ago I read an article on successful men of the United States, men prominent in industry and business. It stated that 99 per cent of those men came from large families and had to get out and earn their own living when they were only twelve years of age. If there were family allowances during the boyhood of the Great Emancipator—

Senator LeBlanc: Or working in the coal mines.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I regretfully inform the senator that your time is now up.

[Senator Cools.]

Senator Cools: Well, I am at your mercy. Will my honourable colleagues grant leave?

Senator Spivak: Certainly. By all means continue.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted to extend the time?

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise on the Speaker's Question. I am not sure, but I want to live and die by the rules. Earlier, I refused consent because the Chair informed the house that senator Spivak's speaking time had expired, 15 minutes, as I understood it. Yet I see in our rule book on page 38 under rule 38(3) that:

> The sponsor of a bill and the first senator speaking immediately thereafter shall be permitted not more than 45 minutes each for debate inclusive of any questions . . .

Senator Spivak is the sponsor of the bill. She moved that we proceed to third reading. I am not suggesting that the Chair led us into error, but could we have a clarification of that rule? If she did have 45 minutes, then I had no business blocking consent. I would be agreeable that she continue her speech, if she does have 45 minutes.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: My understanding is that we are into a time allocation motion right now.

Senator Murray: No; we have passed the time allocation.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I should like the Table Officers to ensure that I have the right information.

• (1240)

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on that point the rule is just a little ambiguous, but it seems to me that it is exactly the kind of rule we should resolve in favour of generosity, rather than the other way, as Senator Corbin says.

> The sponsor of a bill and the first Senator speaking immediately thereafter shall be permitted not more than forty-five minutes each for debate, inclusive of any question or comments from other Senators which they may permit in the course of their remarks.

It says "debate"; it does not say "second reading" or "third reading". Senator Corbin, I think those on this side and perhaps many of us feel that, because the rules have become more restrictive than they used to be, we should interpret them as generously as we can. The generous interpretation of that rule, it seems to me, is that Senator Spivak would have 45 minutes at any stage of debate on the bill.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that is the case. His Honour referred to the allocation of time motion. We are beyond that stage; that motion has already been passed. As he has reminded us, however, there is a ten-minute limit on speeches from senators, except for the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government who have 30 minutes each.

Senator Frith: I suggest that we interpret the rule generously, if it is agreeable to Senator Corbin.

Senator Corbin: I am generous.

Senator Frith: Perhaps we could let Senator Cools finish, and then go back to Senator Spivak.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Cools: Let me express my appreciation for the generosity of honourable senators. It is reminiscent of the Senate, pre-GST, and I welcome it most heartily.

I was remarking on the statements of the Honourable Senator Horner about men working at 12 years of age. Obviously, this is a magical number for him. I shall continue:

> If there were family allowances during the boyhood of the Great Emancipator I doubt very much whether he would have developed as he did. At an early age he had to go out and work to provide for his education.

Honourable senators, this man is speaking in 1944. This is not a speech on the pre-reform bill of 1832. This is 1944 in this very chamber. He continues:

> I believe it is the particular and peculiar duty of the Senate to reject this measure. This Chamber was created to prevent the enactment of such legislation. When everybody is earning plenty of money, it is nothing short of a crime to pile this additional burden on the taxpayers of Canada.

The old boy does not end there. He continues:

> How will our boys appreciate the value of money when they do not have to get out and earn it? How can we expect them to develop into great men if the government takes them in hand from the day they are born?

Honourable senators, Senator Ralph Byron Horner provided a tremendous insight into himself when he said:

> This so-called far-advanced legislation may suit a totalitarian state or an old country of small extent, but I do not think it is necessary in a great new country like Canada. If I may make a personal reference: At 12 years of age I was working in the woods handling great logs; I knew many boys at that time who, like our present-day agitators, enjoyed a high standard of living with not very much to do. I am very sorry to say that all of them have passed to the Great Beyond; I am still going strong.

Senator Horner was indeed still going strong, and he lived for many years after that.

I would say that a person must be judged by the company he keeps. Tories are Tories, and modern-day Tories are just as contemptuous of Canadians as were the Tories in those days. I refer in particular to the Honourable John McDermid, Minister of State for Finance and Privatization, who on May 13, 1992, appearing before the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance which was studying at that time Bill C-21, the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account bill, remarked in an aside privately to one of his officials—and I quote this directly: ". . . there is a sucker born every minute . . .", a statement which the committee reporter generously omitted from the proceedings, but which was heard clearly by all those present. I may say, honourable senators, that those of us who heard it were jolted and shocked.

Honourable senators, it has come to pass: Some decades later the Tory senators have had their 1944 wish to defeat the Family Allowances Act fulfilled by this initiative that we are currently debating. Just as the Honourable Senator Ralph Byron Horner has, in his words, gone to the Great Beyond, so will this government. I am quite confident that this government will follow him sooner rather than later.

Honourable senators, it has been said about the Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King that he was a great politician, a great humanitarian and a great Christian who implemented the Atlantic Charter in Canada. Of him it is said that he had a largeness of mind, a loftiness of spirit and a great breadth of heart. In addition, it has also been said that he governed with great diligence, great intelligence, great compassion and that he had a keen sensibility to the principle of freedom from want and freedom from fear.

About the current Prime Minister, no such statements have been made, nor do I think they will ever be made. As a matter of fact, I have observed that our colleagues on the other side of this chamber rarely praise their Prime Minister. There have been occasions when they have mentioned him, but rarely in laudable terms. I have observed that they support him but they never speak of him in praiseworthy or noteworthy terms.

Think, my colleagues, freedom from want and freedom from fear; the assurance that all the people of this land, Canada, may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want. Freedom from fear—fear, honourable senators, is the dominant emotion in Canada today; crippling fear, paralysing fear, fear that is mind, body and soul destroying. Fear has been the hallmark of this present government. Fear has been an instrument for this government.

Senator Spivak and Senator Di Nino have lead on this bill here before us. I gather that it is their intention to say that here, today, has died another important piece of Canada. I do not know, but perhaps it is Senator Spivak's intention to place a plaque outside this chamber, adjacent to the plaque commemorating Nellie McClung, Emily Murphy and others. If she were to do that, I would suggest that the plaque should read:

In Memoriam
Here lie the baby bonus and universality.
Father—the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King and his Liberal government.
Mother—all the women of Canada.
Survived by—27 million Canadian siblings.
Died: January 1, 1993.
Cause of death: The Tory guillotine.
Age: 47 years.

• (1250)

Buried in the Canada Cemetery, in the company of much that is dear to Canada, and finally laid to rest in the burial plot immediately alongside the plot that is the Senate of Canada.

Honourable Senators, it is precisely because of the irreverent nature of this government, led by an irreverent Prime Minister who lacks any humanity, and the irreverent nature of this hard-hearted bill, that I cannot support this legislation, Bill C-80.

Senator Spivak: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his quick thinking and his gracious lead, as well as Senator Corbin, for allowing me to finish my speech.

First, in response to Senator Cools, in Shakespearean thought when there is the death of the old order there is a usually a rebirth. I do not see the family allowance dying without anything to replace it. In fact, that is not the case.

Perhaps I may continue to talk about what needs to be improved in the legislation. We need to continue to ask for strict measures to evaluate the impact of social policy legislation on child poverty. We need to continue to monitor child benefits, as has been done in the past, to ensure that they keep pace with inflation for those with the lowest incomes. That case was most eloquently argued before the committee by Ken Battle.

In terms of whether or not to pass this bill, let me say that $2.1 billion is a large chunk of money for those with low incomes; it is better than the status quo. The child care expense deduction is not in this bill, but in the 1992 budget; it does not form part of this bill. Over five years that child care expense deduction amounts to only $135 million; however, if both the child tax benefit and the child care expense deduction are added together the total is $2.2 billion in increased benefits over the next five years, and 80 per cent of that increase will go to families who earn less than $40,000 per year.

I do not agree with Senator Hébert that this legislation benefits the rich and not the poor. I do not agree with Senator Frith that the status quo is better than passing Bill C-80. I do not say that this is the best piece of legislation that could have been produced. I am simply a supporter of the government. I am not a member of that government and I do not make the decisions. My contention is that one should support improvements and continue to work for more.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, on September 29, I told you that, rushed by the Conservative government's undemocratic tactics, I was unable to complete my research into Bill C-80.

Nevertheless, I showed you, with supporting quotations, that the bill contains serious deficiencies, such as the Conservative government's refusal to index the new benefits to the actual inflation rate and its stubborn insistence on making distinctions among the least fortunate in our society by treating the poorest of the poor differently depending on whether they have income from work or not. This comes during a serious recession when jobs are disappearing before our eyes and we do not even know exactly how many people are without work because this government, to hide its many sins of commission and omission, has changed the way statistics are compiled in order not to have to count those who have given up all hope of finding employment, who therefore are not looking for work are not registered at the employment centre.

[Senator Cools.]

Yesterday Senator Frith gave us a masterly analysis of the cavalier fashion in which our opposite numbers acted in the process of considering Bill C-80. I congratulate him for it, although my ears were shocked to hear to what depths this Conservative government might sink.

I will not mention Senator Murray; we know him too well. I will say in passing that I am frankly disappointed with Senator Lynch-Staunton's performance; it is all very well to be partisan, but there are still limits to subordination.

I will say that I was very, very, very disappointed with the behaviour of Senator Kinsella, the acting chairman of the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee and my dear colleague from New Brunswick. He is a fellow New Brunswicker and for that reason alone, he really let me down. As acting committee chairman, he could have followed through what he told the House after second reading of the bill. But he did not; he submitted to Senator Kelly's urgings. It is very sad that a man of his calibre fell into the trap of partisanship. And where was Senator Robertson, a former minister of youth, welfare and health in New Brunswick? Where was that great defender of Acadian causes, the Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard, a former finance minister, treasury board president and minister responsible for civil service reform in New Brunswick? Do they care about the shortfall for New Brunswickers and the most disadvantaged under this new benefit for mothers, and possibly fathers, with children?

Oh, what a sad time we live in under a Conservative government. The saying "Tory times are hard times" has never been as true. The present Conservative government may even prove to be worse than the Bennett regime.

Well, nothing has changed since September 29. The government used its steamroller in committee to force this bill through and refuse to hear the many witnesses who wanted to be heard. The hearings of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology were only a show put on by the Progressive Conservatives to lead the Canadian public to believe that the democratic process had been respected, the decision having already been made to the proceedings. What a farce! In fact, I think they make fun of the public, whose favour they no longer enjoy.

Alas, this bill will add to the burden that poor families in Canada have to bear.

Honourable senators, I would also like to share with you a note that I received from a citizen of New Brunswick. He says:

> Dear senator, the national social security system left to us by King, St. Laurent and the late Paul Martin is being taken apart. What is the Senate doing about it? Greetings.

With that, he sent me a copy of the Telegraph Journal of Thursday, October 1, 1992. As you see on page 8—I will describe it to you —there is a cartoon in the upper right corner. It is on your right as you look at it. We see the Prime Minister of Canada sweating heavily, wearing a top hat, striped pants and a bow tie and wielding a long-handled shovel as he buries the "baby bonus 1992". Next to him, we see a grave where the remains have already been buried and on it we read "sacred trust". Further on, we see "Via", another victim of the Mulroney gravedigger. That is how public opinion is reacting in New Brunswick.

I will remind you that I spoke briefly about the white paper on the new child benefit and the truncated debate on it in my speech on September 29. I return to this white paper to point out another omission, serious and no doubt intentional: it makes no mention of a national child care program. Nevertheless, such a program was already part of the panoply of promises the Conservative government made in 1984. What has become of this famous program at the very time when day care is increasingly necessary for the well-being of thousands of Canadian families? Has it disappeared with Flora MacDonald? A national child care program should be an important part of a strategy to fight poverty and help young people in Canada. The Conservatives turn a deaf ear.

Here is what Martha Friendly of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women had to say in her too brief appearance before the House of Commons Legislative Committee on Bill C-80 on July 14, 1992:

[English]

> Without access to reliable child care, parents of young children can't go to work, they can't go to school, they can't participate in job-training programs, and they can't leave the welfare and unemployment rolls. In the short term, child care is an essential family support system. In the long term, research documents show how high-quality child care is an asset to healthy development for children from all income groups.

[Translation]

This bill cannot even pretend to offer an acceptable alternative for this major deficiency. No measure is planned to provide at least a child care tax credit. The government's arrogance and lack of social conscience show through particularly when they say that those who work will be rewarded and those who cannot have their children cared for while they go to work, often for low pay, will be punished.

In his white paper, the Minister of National Health and Welfare said that his new child benefit program would simplify the tax system. This is how it is simplified: the formulas for calculating the amount of benefits are so complicated that federal officials will have to calculate them. The minister himself does not understand this formula and could not do the calculation. What irony! And how many parents will be able to satisfy themselves that the officials' calculation is right? Let us hope that the officials are up to the task, as in the past.

The government's so-called simplification is also likely to be unfair, in that the amount of benefits will not necessarily reflect periodic fluctuations in family income. Twelve to eighteen months could pass before significant changes in a household's financial situation lead to a change in the tax benefit. Is that fair?

This is what Ken Battle of the Caledon Institute of Social Policy said when he appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology on October 8, 1992:

[English]

> The problem is one of responsiveness to change of income. The new benefit will, of course, be based on taxable income in the previous year. . . . The problem is that they will not receive those benefits for some time, and the length of the delay will depend on when they lose their income, so there will be a delay between delivery of benefits and testing for the income of the family, and that I can see as a problem.

Senator Frith: That is the Ken Battle who was adopted so enthusiastically?

Senator Corbin: I have many more quotations from Mr. Battle, but time will not allow.

[Translation]

There is another problem on the horizon: the government will have to negotiate arrangements with the participating provincial governments so that the provincial authorities do not consider some benefits under the new system as earned income, which could result in a reduction of social benefits to the families. Only a coordinated approach of the various levels of government will avoid adding to the burden that needy Canadian families must bear. Nevertheless, this much-desired coordinated approach does not seem assured, judging by the testimony given to the Senate committee that studied Bill C-80. Furthermore, no representative of the provincial and territorial governments was invited to appear before the committee. To date, no agreement seems to have been reached between the federal and provincial governments. There are grounds for concern, judging by what Sherri Torjman, a research assistant for the Caledon Institute of Social Policy, told the Senate Committee on October 8:

[English]

> Mr. Battle and I have worked for several years developing models with respect to the welfare system and how people on welfare will be affected by various programs. We found that whenever a benefit is introduced at the federal level and has the effect of increasing benefits to poor families, the provinces have invariably done something to negate the impact of that benefit. They will either not increase their own benefits or they will remove the proportional amount from their benefit. They will not index their welfare benefit. Invariably you have an off-setting effect so that the people generally do not benefit from any increase at the federal level. Therefore, unless you involve the provinces in the discussions or negotiations, there will be no net benefit for people at the lower end of the income scale.

[Translation]

In conclusion, it is clear that Bill C-80 does nothing new to help children living in poverty. This benefit program will not give a penny more to the people most affected, namely single mothers who live on welfare, or unemployment insurance if they still qualify for UI. John Kinlock of the Canadian Association of Food Banks well summarized the effect of Bill C-80 when he appeared before the Senate committee on October 8, 1992:

> — as a representative of food banks in Canada, I would have wanted to tell you that Bill C-80 will meet the needs of Canadian children who are hungry and who are forced to resort to the food banks.
> Unfortunately, this is not the case. Far from it. I would also have wanted to present our brief to you in the company of other representatives of our association. However, my colleagues, and thousands of other citizens, are busy right now organizing food drives, and a large proportion of the food they collect will go to the children who were forgotten by the parents of Bill C-80.

In addition, I share the opinion of those who believe that the government simply wants to use this new program to avoid following up its 1984 commitment to implement a national child care program. Something is wrong with the Mulroney government's social and fiscal policy, not with the family allowance program.

This bill, which pretends to reform a system that has proven itself, is only a trick to fool the most vulnerable Canadians.

This new child tax benefit program will never fulfil the promises that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Benoît Bouchard, made to Canadians. The only purpose of this bill is to give the illusion that the present system is being renewed. Unfortunately, it will not meet the expectations of the neediest Canadian families.

Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, without a doubt Bill C-80 falls within the ambit of Conservative economic philosophy. There is no doubt about that. When the Prime Minister was running for election in 1984, he tried to hide it. In the election preceding that, Mr. John Crosbie, in a moment of candour, said, "If we tell the public the truth, they will never elect us." After eight years of Tory rule, we know that if the public had been told what they were to expect, they would never have elected the Tories.

What is this philosophy, this Tory philosophy? It is supply-side economics. It is that if you make the rich richer, somehow something will trickle down to the poor. Unfortunately, it is a philosophy that has been adopted not only by Canada, as I was saying the other day, but by all the countries of the OECD since the late 1970s. In essence, all those countries increased taxes on those who have the highest marginal propensity to consume—the lower middle class and the poor. Consumption taxes hit those people first— which is one reason why I was fighting the GST.

They shifted the burden of taxation of deriving the bulk of their revenue come from company profits to individual income tax. At the same time, they have enacted over the years all kinds of measures which decreased the income tax burden on the rich. They have created loopholes galore and inducements to invest. They were doing this for the rich while decreasing their clientele.

Give a rich entrepreneur more money and, as I was saying the other day, he is not foolish, otherwise he would not have made money, and he will not invest in putting up a new factory and creating new jobs because the demand is going down. That is because taxation has made consumers poorer than they were before.

What will he do with his money? He invests and overinflates the stock market. He speculates on land, such as the Reichmanns and the Bronfmans have done. He establishes factories abroad to take advantage of lower wages, forgetting that if you pay an auto worker in Mexico $1.40 a day he will not buy a car. The auto worker here who has lost his job will not buy a car. Where is the advantage in that?

One of the reasons people with money like going to smaller, poorer countries is not only that they can get cheaper labour, it is because they feel that they have more clout over government. They do not like government.

I ask honourable senators to cast their minds back many decades. Cast your minds back some 122 years to the 1870 depression. It was a monstrous depression, much bigger than the one in the 1930s. It lasted until 1896. Commodity prices had collapsed—everything had collapsed. What do we see if we look at the taxation policy and the statements of people who were governing at that time? Exactly the same sort of thing that Mr. Wilson and his former stock exchange friends were saying. Every year they were saying, "Next year we will come out of this downturn in the economy." It lasted for 26 years.

How did that depression end? It ended because various governments finally realized what Keynes was to put formally into words much later—you have to encourage employment and give the poor jobs. They will then restore consumption and the economy can start moving again.

Senator Frith: Henry Ford said, "If the workers cannot buy the cars, we cannot sell them and we cannot make them."

Senator Gigantès: Thank you very much, Senator Frith. I would also like to point out—where is Senator Lynch-Staunton when I need him?—something said by Pericles in 449 BC. He made peace with the Persians. Suddenly, he had the whole manpower of Athens on his hands. They had been paid one silver drachma, which was one day's wage in those days, for serving the fleet eight months a year. Suddenly, there was no war. The fleet was cut down tremendously and they were unemployed. Pericles said, and I quote Plutarch's Life of Pericles, "Let us take the money from the basements under our temples, use it to build public works and pay these brave men and make the economy rich."

Pericles understood the situation. The people who brought us out of the great depression of 1870-1896 understood it. Keynes understood it. The Tories have never understood it.

Senator Murray: Where is the money under our temples today, pray tell?

Senator Gigantès: It has been proven that the quickest way to cut the deficit is to provide jobs anyhow.

Senator Murray: To spend.

Senator Gigantès: Where will the money come from? Unemployment insurance. Can you cut existing expenditures and divert them to create jobs? That can be done. The Tories have never tried to do that. A great deal of the care for the elderly could be provided by giving the jobs to people in the 40- to 50-year-old range who have lost their jobs. Things like that can be done, but that does not conform to Tory thinking.

Why? Because it means a role for government, and Tories do not want a role for government. Why do they not want a role for government? Because if you are rich and you have money, you do not like any public servant pushing you around and telling you what to do or enacting regulations.

By the way, one of the features of the 1870-1896 depression and how it ended was regulation. The rich were running amok. The banks in the United States had their own currency and they were speculating in it. They were swindling one another and everyone else. They had produced chaos. Regulation of financial markets was introduced and some discipline was introduced. But it was government discipline; it was not self-discipline.

Milton Friedman said, "If a business person tells you that he is doing whatever he is doing for the public good, he is either lying or he is cheating his shareholders." Milton Friedman went on to say that the one and only objective of a capitalist is to make profits, period. Not jobs; not to pursue the public good, but to make profits.

Bertrand Russell, in his book A History of Western Philosophy says that the world oscillates between two dangers, the danger of dissolution through anarchy by too much freedom which, of course, is the Conservative point of view. They want everyone to be disciplined except themselves. Thus, you have the anarchy of capital. The other danger is too much discipline, the socialist danger. Himself a socialist, Bertrand Russell concludes, nevertheless, that the only hope is liberalism, which is prepared to move between the two as circumstances demand. That is something the Tories do not understand. It is against their nature.

If we go throughout history, we can find examples of this. They always cause problems. Instead of searching for ways to maximize employment, they maximize unemployment. 2

• (1320)

Unless you want to adopt euthanasia and kill the unemployed and kill the welfare recipients, you have to do a minimum thing to feed them. If you do that minimum thing to feed them, that minimum thing is your deficit. I would be delighted to send any members opposite a copy of my book in which I demonstrate with figures that the growth of the deficit between 1967 and 1985 can be entirely attributed to the costs of paying for the unemployed above 4 per cent unemployment. It is there.

Strangely enough, this is not addressed only to the Tory party. It is also addressed to the economic conservatives in my party and we have some unfortunately. It is one of the things that make me doubt the existence of God. If God is good, why does he make people who think like that. Perhaps sometimes He, too, makes mistakes.

Bill C-80 is in that Tory philosophy. But we will not get out of this recession unless we do something to look after the poorest. Those on welfare are not going to get child allowances. They will have less money. There are rules in provinces that cut what these people receive if they try to make a little extra on the side. This is a Dickensian attitude, "the undeserving poor". Bill C-80 is an example of that, "the undeserving poor". If we are rich, God has elected us. Calvin said it. Spencer said it. If you are rich, you are the elect of God. And the rich, of course, immediately conclude that the converse of that is that, if you are poor, it is because God does not favour you and you do not deserve anything, you are the undeserving poor. This is an example of stupid Tory economics. Not just this Tory party, but the Tory party in Britain, Reaganomics in the United States, the policies in the whole of western Europe where unemployment has increased everywhere because of this attack on the role of government.

The attack on the role of government is not due to the fact that government has not produced. It has. It has produced a great many things which are useful—the infrastructures, the bridges, the roads, the health care system here. Compare ours with that of the United States. Theirs is 6 per cent of the gross domestic product, more costly than ours, and 56 million Americans cannot afford any medical care. Even Clinton is afraid to say that he will have a government health care system. Yet ours works better than theirs.

In the United States there is a movement against public schools. Mr. Bush now wants to give people vouchers in exchange for their taxes for schools. He will give them back this money so they can put their children in private schools.

Then you get to the point where you have empty places in the public school system because the more intelligent children are not there, but only the children of the poor, the hungry, the disadvantaged are there. The quality of the private schools falls further down so you give more vouchers and you abolish the public school system to all intents and purposes.

This bill is the result of the same thinking. This is the government that admired Mr. Reagan and wanted to imitate him. This is the kind of bill we are seeing, too. It is a bill in the Tory philosophy, and that philosophy has never produced good results, although it has produced occasional great depressions, which have been contained to some extent until Tory thinking and Tory economic policy took charge in the western world because the Tories bought the newspapers, TV stations, and radio stations. They bought the professors of economics to whom they gave fat contracts, like Mr. Lipsey, who arrived here as a good Keynesian and was then given lots of contracts to write anti-Keynesian stuff. He has bought his yacht and he is now the great defender of free trade, although I must say his conscience is beginning to tickle him a little and he is turning back again to neo-Keynesianism.

You are Tories. Resign! Get out of here. Don't try to pass this bill. Let the country recover.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate. I should like to commend those who have made contributions to the debate. We might have appreciated a little more contribution from those who support the bill. We heard from Senator Spivak, and I could not help wondering, honourable senators, while she was speaking about all of the great things this bill will do and the great contribution this bill will make to the poorest of our society, how it was that not one witness who appeared before the committee supported the bill—except the government witnesses, of course.

If this bill is of such great benefit and will create all of these good things for the poor in Canada, how was it that the government was unable to produce one witness in the committee hearings to offer some degree of support for this bill?

I do commend Senator Spivak for her spirited defence of a rather dismal cause. We heard about this $400 million per annum that will be put into this program. I guess we will hear a great deal about that. However, the implementation of this program fades into insignificance when you consider the $3.5 billion siphoned off from programs in 1985 when partial indexing was first introduced.

Between 1986 and 1991 the federal government withdrew an estimated $3.5 billion from the system. Notwithstanding the statements of the assistant deputy minister, his own figures, as I intend to show you in a moment, will prove that he was incorrect when he said this was not so.

The Tories siphoned off this money by partially de-indexing all aspects of the child benefit system. They did it by reducing by one half the value of the previous child tax exemption. Finally, they did it by reducing the child tax credit turning point. That is the record of how they removed the $3.5 billion from these programs.

It is true that the government through this period has modified the system a number of times, each time proclaiming that it is targeting benefits toward the low income families. A review, however, of the current system reveals the sham and hypocrisy of that statement.

Honourable senators, the poorest of the poor receive no greater benefit today than they received in 1984. By the government's own figures, in 1984 the benefits were about $4.1 billion. With inflation, this should be $5.7 billion in 1992. However, the government indicates it will spend $4.5 billion in 1992, a slippage in one area of $1.2 billion. That includes these enrichment items to which we were referred and other little benefits that were thrown in along the line.

Clearly, they are spending less and giving no more to the poor. The $1.2 billion in five years is not new money. The new legislation tells us that the anti-poverty impact of the new system will be negligible and will provide benefits inequitable to different categories of the poor.

We have heard two or three times in the debate that 1 million families in Canada, which is about 20 per cent of Canadian families with children, will have a diminished benefit under Bill C-80 and over time, with the partial deindexation of the system, you can envision the day when the majority of Canadian families will receive absolutely no benefit from Bill C-80.

Honourable senators, I take a particular interest in child poverty and family violence. It is an area to which I have dedicated a great deal of time. We had a debate here recently with respect to increasing sentences and putting more people in jail for longer periods of time. I said at that time that we should look at the cause of the problem and make a contribution to solving that blight on society. I was particularly interested in what progress this legislation was making in the war on poverty.

I can do no better than place on the record again the evidence of Professor Peter Leonard from the Canadian Association of the Schools of Social Work. He said:

> In assessing the bill as a response to poverty, we must place it in the context of a number of factors. The first contextual factor is, of course, the extent and severity of child and family poverty as a major social problem which overwhelms the families and also . . . the social agencies whose task it is to help and support them. The most prominent victims are children and their mothers, as the rise in food bank use and the reported demographic distribution of their users clearly demonstrates. The impact of persistent poverty on the health, education and future ability of family members to contribute to society is, we believe, nothing short of catastrophic.

> . . . the unprecedented high levels of unemployment, which offer extremely bleak prospects of betterment to a large population of people who are poor. Despair is often their realistic response to their conditions of existence and their profoundly grim future.
> The lack of a national system of child care which would support and provide opportunities and hope for single parents in particular is itself a major issue. The lack of adequate subsidized child care places single mothers in the position of being unable to take such waged work as may be available, or to upgrade their skills . . .
> These factors in combination result in the production and likely continuous reproduction of an under-class of poor families and poor children, many of whom are attempting to survive well below the official poverty line. The consequences of this situation continuing or even worsening—the escalation of physical and mental illness, crime and delinquency, social disintegration and violence, alienation from and despair with the social system itself—are quite devastating, both for those directly involved as poor people, but also, we feel, for the social fabric of Canadian society as a whole.

He states, finally:

> . . . consider how Bill C-80 meets the situation when it excludes a substantial portion —those on welfare—of the most poor, gives no long-term protection to the value of the child benefits that it proposes, and gives substantially increased benefits in the form of child care expense allowances, for example, to those with high annual incomes of over $100,000.

As a society, we seem to be prepared to tolerate a million poor children. We are presumably being prepared to pay the long-run cost associated with this tragedy. A remedy to this problem, of course, as Senator Gigantès indicated this morning, has to be met on more than just one front. But will this child benefit resolve the issue of child poverty? Will it make a worthwhile contribution? It will not.

In fact, the levels of benefits available will be increased somewhat to the working poor but will be the same for the poorest of the poor. They have received nothing since 1984, and they look to nothing in 1992 from this government.

Those who rely upon social assistance get nothing, including many disabled persons, single mothers and their children. Moreover, because the system is indexed only partially to inflation, the actual value will be decreased.

Honourable senators, what is the record of this government with respect to the war on poverty, or at least solving the problem of child poverty in our society? In 1989, a unanimous resolution was passed in the House of Commons declaring that we would make our best efforts to see that Canada resolved the problem of child violence and child poverty by the year 2000. That did not cost a great deal of money. Then the government took part in the discussions at the conference on children. The Prime Minister voted in favour of a resolution that said, in part, that we would not put child offenders in custody with adult offenders. Of course, when he came home we had to ask to be withdrawn from the declaration because that is exactly what we do in Canada.

That is the record of this government. Neither one of those initiatives cost a great deal of money, but they provided photo opportunities.

The government has reduced its commitment in every area that could be used to address the problem of child poverty. It has limited its cost-sharing of post-secondary education with the provinces. This inevitably increases the burden on the provinces and the students, putting advanced education further out of the reach of poor children.

The government has limited its cost-sharing of social assistance in the three provinces with more than half of the poor population. Child benefits have been reduced in total with no increase for the poor. They are still talking about the child care program. I noticed that Senator Spivak said today that we must continue to support it. Well, we will continue to support it until another government is capable of initiating it.

The government's record with respect to the poor child is dismal and disgusting. I cannot understand how it can put this document forward as making any worthwhile contribution whatsoever with regard to child poverty and family violence.

Honourable senators, the programs of this government in the last four years have driven 2 million people to the food banks to collect private charity in place of public justice. In my own city of Calgary last year, 70,000 hampers were distributed. In Canada we now have 2,000 charitable food outlets. Placing that in context, honourable senators, in 1984 there was one food bank in Edmonton, Alberta. Today there are over 400 food banks in Canada. This government creates the conditions which force food banks, charitable donations, into the front line. This has been referred to as "the dirty secret" by Gerard Kennedy of the Toronto Daily Bread, Canada's largest food bank. Of course, they are mum on this crisis. They clam up about the volunteer army working to satisfy the basic needs, the management of which legally and morally belongs to this government.

● (1340)

In my own city of Calgary, to give you an indication of the growth of the food bank industry, in 1989, 15,000 hampers were distributed to 43,000 people; in 1990, 18,000 hampers to 52,000 people; in 1991, 27,000 hampers distributed to 70,000 people. Doubling, doubling, doubling every year! This is their answer, because this government will not assume its responsibility to the poor, and does not assume its responsibility to anyone, given the act before us now!

Senator Gigantès: Except the rich.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, these people who run the food banks do not slog away in these warehouses because they picked charity as their choice solution for a range of options; rather, they look upon their labour as a practical necessity—a practical necessity, honourable senators, because this government refuses to accept its responsibility. So it has to become a charitable organization. The food bank will stand as a hallmark of Toryism in Canada!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few comments in relation to Bill C-80. I was impressed by the testimony we received from witnesses and also by the speeches that have been made in this Chamber, but one of the things that presented itself to me was that we tend so often—and indeed rightly so—to focus on the terrible problem of poverty in general, and the problem of poverty as it affects Canadian children in particular. This bill was specifically targeted to the matter of streamlining the family allowance program and is not a response to the major problem of poverty in general and child poverty in particular. Hopefully all governments in Canada will keep on the front burner the attack on poverty in our society.

I wish to point out, honourable senators, that the Caledon Institute appeared before the committee and left us with a publication entitled "Child Benefit Primer—A Response to the Government Proposal". On page 9 of that document, they point out strengths of the proposal. It reads as follows.

> The government proposal has the following advantages:
> - the new package simplifies child benefits to a certain extent by integrating three separate programs into one program.

So they have recognized the advantage of drawing together the family allowance, the refundable tax credit and the non-refundable child tax credit.

> - the child tax benefit will be calculated on the basis of net family income, thereby reducing (though not eliminating) the complexities and inequities of the present system in which benefits from family allowances and the non-refundable child tax credit are based on individual income (of the higher-income spouse) and the refundable child tax credit on family income.

They point out another strength of the proposal:

> - the use of net family income as the base for calculating the child tax benefit ensures the equitable treatment of families whose net income is the same even though the income mixes between spouses may be different.

Also as a strength of the proposal, they write:

> - in the 1992 federal budget, the government announced its intention to treat couples living in common-law relationships as married spouses. For the purposes of calculating the child tax benefit, common-law couples will no longer have an advantage over married couples by claiming the equivalent-to-married tax credit for the first child. The new benefit will ensure the equal treatment of married and common-law couples.

[Senator Hastings.]

They speak of another advantage:

> - some lower-income families—the working poor and those with three or more children—will receive a small increase in assistance, although the gain will dissipate over time as a result of the effects of partial indexation.

We have had a comment on that point.

They also point out:

> - families that qualify for the new child tax benefit will receive higher monthly cheques as opposed to one or two larger annual payments under the refundable child tax credit.

A few other strengths are mentioned here as well.

I want to place on the record that the Caledon Institute even saw some benefit to Bill C-80.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: May I ask a question of the senator? I read the same pamphlet he was holding and reading from a moment ago. It is true that out of great courtesy, the authors have set aside a page or a page and a half to list the few advantages that they could find in this bill. However, would the senator agree that the rest of the pamphlet is a total denunciation of this awful bill?

Senator Kinsella: I agree, honourable senators, that this particular witness—and their publication—argued that the bill, in their estimation, was not the way they would have gone, and that they had many criticisms, which are published here. I merely wanted to point out that they also saw, on the other hand, some advantages.

Senator Hébert: But they nevertheless denounced the bill.

Senator Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, to hear our friends opposite tell it, one would think that Bill C-80 had been sprung without warning on Parliament, the provinces and the general public. One would think that the government was ramming this bill through Parliament before parliamentarians, provincial governments or various interest groups had had an opportunity to collect their thoughts on the matter.

Senator Frith: Oh, nobody ever said that.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the truth is that the issues involved in this legislation have been with us for many years. These issues have been thoroughly ventilated in Parliament, in provincial legislatures, in the media, and by the think-tanks and the interest groups and the various organizations interested in public policy, and particularly social policy.

I will not detain honourable senators with a lengthy description of the more distant background—and by "distant", I mean starting 20 years ago—to this legislation. However, for the record, I will mention a few dates to honourable senators, and I begin with the Throne Speech of 1973, which some honourable senators will recall since they supported it. Some honourable senators may even have had a hand in drafting it. I quote:

> A fair and equitable regime of family allowances is fundamental to an efficient social security system. A new family income security program will be proposed that will particularly take into account the needs of the lower income families.

What they were talking about there, and what they have been doing since, and what we are bringing to some fruition with this bill is targeting a family benefits and child benefits program to lower income families. That is the issue here.

Senator Bosa: The situation is different now.

Senator Murray: In 1974, when our friend Mr. Marc Lalonde was the Minister of National Health and Welfare and Mr. Turner was the Minister of Finance, the previous government began to tax family allowances as part of the parents' income because, as you know, tax rates increase with income. This targeted child benefits to the lower income families. By 1979, the same government cut family allowances by about $70 a year and introduced the refundable child tax credit—again, a fairly dramatic shift towards a system of child benefits targeted to lower income families.

That is just some of what I call the more distant background to the legislation that is before us today.

In 1985, the present government put out a consultative paper on child benefits. In 1991, both the Senate and the House of Commons conducted, through committees of our chambers, studies of this matter. You will find that this bill implements the two key features of the committee reports: Streamlining child benefits and concentrating benefits on lower income families.

• (1350)

The immediate background to this bill is contained in the 1992 budget which was brought in by Mr. Mazankowski on February 25 last. When honourable senators feign surprise at Bill C-80 and claim short notice, I have to remind them that the February 25 budget outlined the new policy on child benefits in some considerable detail. If you examine the February document you will find that Mr. Mazankowski said, first:

> My colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has been consulting Canadians on how best to meet the needs of children in Canada. As part of a package of measures he is developing to strengthen support for children, he has recommended a major reform of the existing system of child benefits.

A bit later he says:

> There will be one monthly child benefit. Unlike the family allowance, it will not be subject to tax. Children under the age of 18 will be eligible.
> The new benefit will include a new earned-income supplement of up to $500 per year for low-income working families with children.
> The benefit will be as much as $144 per month for one child, for a total of $1,733 per year. Benefits will be targeted toward lower- and middle-income families.
> The new system will increase total federal child benefits by $400 million per year.
> The single monthly payment will make the system simpler and more response responsive to family needs.

At the same time as honourable senators know and have mentioned, Mr. Bouchard issued a white paper 12 pages in length with even more details on Canada's new integrated child tax credit.

Honourable senators can hardly say—nor can the provincial governments, Canadian interest groups, or anyone else say or claim—that they were taken by surprise by this legislation that was brought in in May, or that there was not enough time for honourable senators —

Senator Frith: And for the witnesses.

Senator Hastings: You mean for the waste!

Senator Murray: — to collect their thoughts. This is nonsense.

Senator Frith: Keep saying that; sure.

Senator Hébert: You gave them 48 hours.

Senator Murray: The witnesses had 48 hours. I told you that the details of this legislation were in the budget of February of 1992.

Senator Frith: We are not talking about the same thing at all.

Senator Murray: How many months is that?

Senator Frith: The Leader of the Government is setting up straw men so that he can knock them down.

Senator Murray: This addresses one of the points made by Senator Bonnell. The white paper that Mr. Bouchard issued was the subject of consultation between Mr. Bouchard and his counterparts last May in Charlottetown. There was a two-day meeting of federal and provincial ministers.

Again addressing a point raised during the oral Question Period by Mr. Bonnell, Mr. Bouchard, on behalf of the federal government, strongly urged his provincial colleagues to fully maintain existing social assistance benefits after the proposed child tax benefit is implemented.

I have just one more point about the white paper. My friends opposite have made much of the fact that it was only 12 pages in length. Would that all government documents were similarly concise! One of the problems is that we put out a great many documents that are far too lengthy and are read by very few people. This white paper that Mr. Bouchard put out at the time of the February budget is a highly readable, precise and balanced document, designed with Canadian parents in mind. Today, over 350,000 copies of the white paper have been distributed.

Senator Hébert: With mis-information in it.

Senator Murray: That makes it one of the most widely read in Canadian history.

Senator Hébert: And it also means that there are 350,000 misinformed citizens out there.

Senator Murray: I should repeat again the parliamentary chronology of this bill.

I remind honourable senators that it first appeared on May 13 as a bill in the House of Commons; was given second reading on June 19, 1992; went to a committee of the House of Commons, which heard representations from 22 groups from across the country and reported.

Senator Hébert: And refused about 35 groups.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is not possible for a parliamentary committee to hear every group that express an interest. Many groups file briefs with such parliamentary committees. Not all witnesses who want to be heard in person are heard. That is the case with any and every parliamentary committee that is appointed in every house of assembly with which I or the honourable senator is familiar.

Senator Hébert: In the case of nine, it is a bit short.

Senator Murray: Approximately 22 groups were heard in the other place.

Senator Hébert: It was only nine in the Senate.

Senator Murray: The report was adopted with some amendments on September 15 and the bill received third reading the next day. It came to this house, to the Senate, on September 17.

Senator Hébert: On closure. You forgot to include that in your script.

Senator Murray: I will come to the question of allocation of time or closure, which is one that was raised earlier on the third reading debates by our colleague, Senator Stewart. I will come to that in a minute.

To complete the chronology in the Senate, second reading was moved by our colleague Senator Spivak on September 22. On that day we heard also from Senator Hébert, the Leader of the Opposition, Senator Thériault, and from me in a brief intervention. There was further debate on Wednesday, September 23.

Senator Stewart has asked whether we believe that the Senate sits too much and whether the hours are too long. Of course we do not. The point I made in my intervention at second reading was that we had virtually nothing else by way of government business on our Order Paper. We could have easily sat and debated Bill C-80 for many days. However, Senator Gigantès spoke briefly on September 23 and adjourned the debate not until the next day, Thursday; not until Friday; not until the following Monday, but until the following Tuesday, September 29. There was no great interest in debating the bill; no great interest at all. That is not the issue with closure or the allocation of time motion that we passed today. Honourable senators opposite were not so much interested in debate as they were interested in delay.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Frith: That is what you always say.

Senator Murray: When we referred the bill to committee on Tuesday, September 29, we were informed that honourable senators opposite would not be ready to begin the deliberations of the committee for another eight days.

Senator Hébert: That was in order to give the witnesses time to prepare their briefs.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that really is a myth.

Senator Frith: Do not talk to him; he is not interested in the witnesses.

Senator Murray: It was eight days before the committee could start its deliberations.

Senator Frith: The witnesses have no time to prepare.

Senator Murray: The point that I make is that delay is quite a legitimate weapon in the hands of the opposition, and they used it. They employed it in the Senate in the case of this bill.

Senator Frith: The witnesses did not get heard.

Senator Murray: They were successful.

Senator Frith: What about the witnesses? They have delayed the bill for a good month.

• (1400)

Senator Frith: What about the witnesses?

Senator Murray: Let them take some satisfaction in their success. I congratulate them in their success in employing this legitimate parliamentary weapon of delay.

Senator Frith: You shut off the witnesses!

Senator Murray: In the end the government must take its responsibility and we really must bring this matter to a vote.

Senator Hébert: Nine witnesses in all; do you call that a delay?

Senator Murray: My honourable friend, so I am told, and Senator Kinsella can correct me, if I am wrong or I misstate the situation, put in a list of 31 possible witnesses.

Senator Hébert: That was the first list.

Senator Murray: Of those, 18 were contacted, I am told; 12 were not able to come or not interested in appearing.

Senator Hébert: They had no time to prepare a brief.

Senator Murray: We are talking about interest groups here.

Senator Frith: That is what the witnesses said.

Senator Murray: Again, I remind the honourable senator, the policy had been announced in detail in February. The bill had been in the public domain since May. How much time do you think they needed? My friends were interested in delay, not in debate. Come now, confess the truth.

Senator Hébert: How many of those 31 were not called at all?

Senator Frith: Let him pour contempt on the witnesses, which is what he continues to do.

Senator Murray: In the event, ten witnesses were heard.

Senator Gigantès: They seem to be interested in poverty rather than wealth.

Senator Frith: He is not interested in what the witnesses want.

Senator Murray: Ten witnesses were heard, plus Mr. McDermid and officials from the Departments of Finance, Health and Welfare and Revenue Canada.

Honourable senators, Senator Gigantès, in both his second reading speech and his speech on third reading earlier today, delivered himself of an analysis and a commentary on fiscal and economic policy generally to which I cannot and should not try to do justice at this stage of the debate on this particular measure. The burden of his message, however, is that to stimulate the economy, governments—particularly this government—should be spending more and more and more. That is an argument that we can have at another time —

Senator Gigantès: You won't find that in my text.

Senator Murray: —perhaps in the course of a budget debate or in the course of an election campaign when his party and mine will be debating these matters. In the meantime I would be very grateful to receive a copy of his book, which I shall read with considerable interest.

I do have to point out to him, however, that increases in government spending, which for many years in this country had been at or near double-digit magnitude, did not succeed very much in keeping unemployment down, because it, too, was of the double-digit magnitude, and, with it, inflation and interest rates, which fall with unequal burden on the poor and disadvantaged in our society.

Senator Barootes: Tell your Keynesian friends that.

Senator Murray: However, if the honourable senator wishes, as he does, to promote Keynesian economics, he should congratulate us on this measure. He seems to believe that the new system will see benefits flowing from lower income families to higher income families. That is not the case; the reverse is true. The redistribution of income is actually from higher income families to lower income families.

As I pointed out to my friend Senator Thériault the other day, there are members of this place who are receiving family allowance benefits. They will not receive them any longer under this legislation.

Families with incomes below $50,000 will receive an additional $250 on average. As I say, the benefits will increase child assistance by $2.1 billion over and above what would have been provided had the current programs remained in place. So it is not trickle-down or supply-side economics; it is Keynesian economics, on which I should have thought the honourable senator would congratulate us.

Senator Gigantès: Keynes is twirling in his grave.

Senator Murray: Keynes was also a monetarist, but a lot of what Keynes advocated has been used very selectively by a lot of people.

Senator Gigantès: I fully agree.

Senator Murray: Let me refer the honourable senator to the recent report of the National Council of Welfare on this child tax benefit:

> One of the striking features of the new proposed child tax benefit is that the vast majority of families would be better off under the new system than they are under the current system. Virtually all single-parent families would do as well or better under the government's proposal.

It has been suggested that targeting these social benefits will create some kind of social stigma on people. I do not know how that can be when 84 per cent of Canadian families will continue to receive federal assistance. I will not feel particularly stigmatised by not being among them, nor do I think that the 84 per cent will feel particularly stigmatised that I am not.

Furthermore, in the 1990s nosey bureaucrats will not be showing up at your door to administer a means test to determine eligibility for the benefits. Rather, benefits will be automatically calculated on the basis of a family's tax return.

The earned income supplement of up to $500 for low income working families will direct limited resources to where they are most needed. The supplement will help to offset employment-related expenses and a possible loss in social assistance for families moving to the workforce. What we are trying to address here is the problem that has been commented upon many times by experts in this field, the disincentive to work that is still present in some of the income support programs for people on welfare.

Senator Gigantès: You would have to have 22 children to offset the loss of welfare.

Senator Murray: No, no. It will not create classes of deserving and undeserving poor as the honourable senator has stated. Again, I call as reinforcement to this view the testimony to the committee of the other place of the executive director of the Canadian Council on Social Development. He said:

> We do not see the earned income supplement as discriminating against poor people on social assistance in favour of people in the workforce. If we believed that to be the case, I can tell you we would not be supporting the legislation.

Honourable senators, I do not doubt at all the sincerity or the feeling of the Honourable Senator Hastings and his comments on the numerous social problems in this country, but I think he has been grossly unfair, not only with regard to this bill, but with respect to the policies and the record of this government in this field.

The present bill will bring annual total expenditures on the child benefit system to about $4.9 billion. In addition, large families will receive an extra $75 for the third child and subsequent children. Families with children under the age of seven will still receive the supplement to the child tax credit of up to $213 per child.

However, there is more to our approach to child benefits and to children than this bill. The Minister of National Health and Welfare announced a little while ago a program entitled "Brighter Futures", a preventive and multi-faceted program directed primarily at intervention in the early stages of the lives of children. This adds another $500 million over five years to the cause of child development. The four program areas of prevention, promotion, protection and partnership include initiatives addressing issues such as low birth weight, injuries, mental health and parenting.

We are working not only with the provinces but with community organizations to ensure that those programs are delivered to the children, especially in the early stages of childhood, who are most in need of those measures.

● (1410)

Since 1984, the child tax credit, as has been mentioned several times in this debate, has been increased by more than 50 per cent from $367 to $601 per child. In addition, a $213 child tax credit supplement for children under seven was introduced in 1992.

The refundable sales tax credit, which was introduced in 1986 to help support low-income families, has now been superseded by the goods and services tax credit with a value of up to $193 for an individual, $193 for a spouse, and $102 for each eligible child. Under sales tax reform, the goods and services tax credit ensures that families with incomes of less than $30,000 will be better off.

The 1988 personal income tax reform removed 850,000 lower income Canadians from the tax rolls altogether.

Honourable senators, this is progressive tax policy and it is progressive social policy; it is good for the country and it is helpful to those with lower incomes.

I have heard in the course of this debate talk about child care. Yes, we had to put off the introduction of a national federal-provincial child care program. What is less well known is the fact that we are now spending $1 billion a year on child care because we are sharing day care expenditures with the provinces and territories under the Canada Assistance Plan to the benefit of thousands of low-income parents and their children.

For working parents, we have announced an increase in the maximum child care expense deduction of $1,000, beginning in 1993, to reflect the child care costs that all working parents face.

[Senator Murray.]

We have policies addressing marital breakdown to better ensure that custodial parents have the financial means with which to support and care for their children.

We brought in amendments to the leave provisions under the unemployment insurance program, and approximately $1 billion is spent on maternity and parental benefits.

We have a family violence initiative—and I know Senator Hastings is interested in this—which commits the federal government to spending $136 million to help eliminate the problem of family violence.

Last March we brought in a national drug strategy, a five-year, $270 million initiative to prevent drug abuse.

Honourable senators, these are important measures that our government has taken and is taking in order to better target our limited resources—when I talk about "limited resources", I am talking about the taxpayers' money—to target it where help is needed most.

Honourable senators, this is sound legislation. It is sound in philosophy; it is sound in economics; it is sound social policy. I commend Bill C-80 to your favourable attention.

Senator Gigantès: Will the honourable senator entertain a question?

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Gigantès: Did I hear correctly when you stated that the extra $500 will be an inducement to get off the welfare rolls and earn some income?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I did not put a particular figure on it. What I am talking about is what will be available to low-income working people to encourage them to stay in the labour force. Yes, those people sometimes give up certain benefits when they leave the welfare rolls. This bill, in various ways, attempts to compensate for that. However, I would not limit it to the $500 that the honourable senator is talking about.

Senator Gigantès: Is this $500 per child or per family?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator has spoken twice in the debate; once at second reading and once at third reading. He may even have participated in the affairs of the committee.

Senator Gigantès: I am asking a question. This is a question.

Senator Murray: If the honourable senator wishes me to reread my speech as to the various provisions —

Senator Gigantès: I do not want you to. Is it $500 per family or per child?

Senator Murray: The bill is based on family income.

Senator Gigantès: If it is $500 per child. In order for someone to go off welfare and yet have as much money, he would have to have 22 children. This is what you are talking about.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Spivak, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cochrane, that this bill be read the third time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

• (1420)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Spivak, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cochrane that the bill be read the third time.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL

October 15, 1992

Mr. Speaker,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Beverly McLachlin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in her capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 15th day of October, 1992, at 4:30 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,

ANTHONY P. SMYTH
Deputy Secretary,
Policy, Program and Protocol

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate

Ottawa

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Government Notices of Motions:

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 59(1)(h) I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, December 1, 1992, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, since Royal Assent is scheduled for 4.30, I suggest we suspend the sitting until 4.25 p.m.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: The sitting of the Senate is suspended until 4.25 p.m.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

• (1440)

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Beverly McLachlin, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in her capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable Deputy Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act respecting contraventions of federal enactments (Bill C-46 Chapter 47, 1992)

An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, to enact the Children's Special Allowances Act, to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof and to repeal the Family Allowances Act (Bill C-80 Chapter 48, 1992)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 1, 1992, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 1, 1992

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

Business of the Senate

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as you know, during the adjournment we lost two well-loved and highly respected colleagues, Senator Rhéal Bélisle and Senator Thomas Lefebvre. The Leader of the Opposition and I have consulted with respect to tributes and, with the agreement of honourable senators, we have decided that today we will pay tribute to Senator Bélisle and tomorrow we will pay tribute to Senator Lefebvre.

The Late Honourable Rhéal Bélisle

Tributes

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Deputy Speaker and Speaker pro tempore of the Senate, the Honourable Rhéal Bélisle, died on November 3 at the age of 73. He spent 48 of those 73 years in public life, in Ontario and Canada.

He served his fellow citizens with distinction and ceaselessly, first as councillor, mayor and secretary-treasurer of Rayside between 1944 and 1955, and then as a member of the Ontario Legislature. He was appointed to the Senate by Prime Minister Diefenbaker on December 10, 1962.

Last November 3, Prime Minister Mulroney made this statement:

> With the passing of senator Bélisle, Canada has lost a truly remarkable parliamentarian and a dedicated citizen.
> Throughout his long and prolific career in municipal, provincial and federal politics, Rhéal Bélisle enriched the lives of all Canadians by serving the common good and by constantly supporting humanitarian causes.
> We will always remember Rhéal Bélisle as a proud and devoted Canadian.

The contributions and achievements of our colleague are so numerous that it is impossible for me to list them all. He worked for organizations such as the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation, the Canadian Wildlife Federation, the Salvation Army, the National Red Shield Appeal, Laurentian University, as well as for associations at the municipal level, old people's homes, chambers of commerce and hospital boards. He also contributed to the war effort as a member of the Canadian Forces during the Second World War.

He was also on the executive of many federations and associations and he received three international honorary titles. Among these honours, he was made a knight of the Ordre de la Pléiade by the International Association of French-speaking Parliamentarians and a member of the Order of St. Gregory the Great by the Catholic Church.

One of Senator Bélisle's greatest contributions to northern Ontario and probably the one closest to his heart was his work for Laurentian University and the University of Sudbury. As a member of the Ontario legislature, he sponsored the bill to incorporate Laurentian University in Sudbury. He did the same for the University of Sudbury, which later became a federated college of Laurentian University. This university subsequently awarded him an honorary doctorate. His contribution to education was recognized publicly when several of his friends created the Senator Rhéal Bélisle scholarship fund. This fund has given scholarships to deserving students and continues to do so.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle was a man of principle and a Canadian devoted body and soul to his country. His constructive, temperate influence was recognized both inside and outside parliamentary assemblies by one and all.

He served as Deputy Speaker of the Senate with distinction, tact and moderation. He made many friends outside the Parliament of Canada among the members of various Canadian and international parliamentary associations.

On November 7, many senators and members of the House of Commons from both parties travelled to the small village of Blezard Valley near Sudbury to join Senator Bélisle's friends and neighbours in a final tribute to our late colleague.

In a church located about a stone's throw from Senator Bélisle's ancestral home, we listened to some vibrant and eloquent tributes to our friend's public career and private life.

I remember especially what was said by his son Claude. He told us how Rhéal was always trying to get people together, both in his own family and in the course of his public career.

Honourable senators, that is how we will remember him: a man who never drove people apart but was always intent on bringing them together.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as was mentioned by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, on November 3 this year we lost a colleague, Senator Rhéal Bélisle, whom we all deeply respected. He died at the age of 73.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate referred to Blezard Valley in Northern Ontario, where our friend Rhéal was born and where he first went to school. He continued his education at the University of Toronto and later at St. Paul's University in Ottawa.

After starting his public career in the Canadian Armed Forces, where he stayed from 1941 to 1943, he became a municipal counsellor in Rayside in 1944. He was elected mayor the following year and was to hold that position for seven years.

Senator Bélisle left the municipal political scene to enter provincial politics when he was elected to the Ontario legislature for the first time in 1955. He was reelected in 1959.

He entered the federal political scene in 1963, when Prime Minister Diefenbaker, as the Leader of the Government in the Senate said earlier, appointed him to the Senate. There, as we all know, he took an active part in the work of various committees including the special committees on divorce, science policy and poverty.

He also represented the Senate on many occasions. In 1964, Senator Bélisle was sent as a Senate observer to the Nineteeth General Assembly of the United Nations. In 1974, he represented veterans and the Senate of Canada at ceremonies commemorating the 30th anniversary of D-Day. In 1982, he was a member of the Canadian section at the Association internationale des parlementaires de langue française in Paris, and in 1988, he was a member of the Canadian delegation to the conference on democracy and the OECD discussions.

Senator Bélisle was appointed acting speaker in 1982 and speaker pro tempore at the beginning of this session.

• (1410)

[English]

He performed his functions in the Chair to the satisfaction of, and with great support from, both sides of the House.

One of the most memorable rulings he made as Deputy Speaker was the declaration of the defeat of the abortion legislation. We all remember that the vote was a tie. Under Senate rules, that meant the bill was defeated, and Senator Bélisle had the historical role of making the declaration that the bill was defeated.

His commendable public career does not overshadow his private contributions. From 1964 to 1974, Senator Bélisle was the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the University of Sudbury, now Laurentian University. In 1965, he was named honourary lifetime president of the L'Association d'éducation d'Ontario. He was also president and director of the Sudbury and District Municipal Association, director of the Sudbury and District Home for the Aged, and director of the Canadian Wildlife Federation.

In 1982, the Pope granted Senator Bélisle the highest tribute paid to a lay person when he named Senator Bélisle a Knight of the Order of St. Gregory the Great, an award which is made for religious devotion. I am not sure of the breadth of this, but at the wake, Senator Bélisle's parish priest told us that Senator Bélisle celebrated mass every morning of his life, and served at mass most mornings.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Bélisle was always very sensitive to the importance of comity with all of his colleagues in life and in the Senate. We remember the famous Opus Dei debates and discussions when there was high controversy on both side of the house, not determined by party lines. Feelings ran very high. I remember that Senator Bélisle, who had a very passionate interest in the subject, remained always calm, the perfect gentleman, even as his plans seemed to be going awry.

At one point, he was rumoured—and a very plausible rumour, as all rumours should be—to be on the list of possible lieutenant governors for Ontario.

Senator Bélisle recognized the value of the Senate. In the Debates of the Senate of January 22, 1968, at page 721, he said:

> I am of the opinion that the majority of the people in this country do not have a proper knowledge of the importance of our legislative contribution and our sincere approach to continue to enhance legislation that will conserve the freedom of all our minorities, which is one of the important functions of the Upper Chamber.

We know that the devotion the displayed on that occasion was not just for the purpose of that debate. It was repeated and sustained throughout his life as a senator.

Senator Bélisle also recognized the need for Senate reform when he spoke at a nomination meeting in Glengarry-Prescott-Russell in 1974. The May 24th issue of the Ottawa Citizen of that year quoted the senator as having told the following anecdote or joke. This is after he had said, "I am from the Senate of Canada." He said:

> That's where formerly active politicians are sent to die, the place everybody criticizes as useless until he or she becomes a member.
> One crusty old guy, when asked about his sons, said one was a Canadian senator and the other was not much good either.

Then he went on:

> But we senators have learned not to pay much attention to people like him; they only repeat what everybody else is saying.

One thing is certain: Senator Bélisle served this chamber with enthusiasm and dedication and, I underline, with the respect and affection of all members of the chamber.

I should like to extend to his family, who are here with us today, on behalf of the members on this side, and all honourable senators who knew and loved him, our deepest regrets.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, Senator Bélisle and I entered this chamber at the same time. He received an appointment from the legislature of Ontario. We were seat-mates for a number of years, and became close friends.

Senator Bélisle, as has been mentioned, was a devout individual. He was very proud of the two knighthoods he received, the Orders of Saint Gregory-the-Great and St. John of Jerusalem, Knights of Malta.

As Senator Frith mentioned, he participated in mass on every occasion that he could. I recall on one occasion suggesting to him that we would like to see him attend a 9 o'clock caucus. He said, "No way. I am serving mass at 9 o'clock, and that has a priority." I did not waste my time arguing with him on that occasion.

Senator Bélisle was also an avid sportsman who enjoyed fishing and hunting. On one occasion when he visited P.E.I., he was successful in catching a tuna. It became a standing joke between us. The tuna weighed about 800 pounds. I used to tell him that each year it grew a bit. The last time I asked him about it, the tuna weighed around 1,200 pounds.

He was also an active supporter of the Canadian Wildlife Federation. He believed that if we were to enjoy the pleasures of hunting and fishing, we had to work to replace the game we took from the wild.

He was proud of the part that he played in the bringing together of the three colleges to form Laurentian University. But He was even more proud of the fact that he had participated in opening a large number of schools in northern Ontario. He told me in a private conversation on one occasion that while he appreciated the many honours that he had received, the fact that he was invited to open so many schools was what he considered his greatest honour.

Senator Bélisle enjoyed entertaining, and I was fortunate enough to receive an invitation to a number of banquets that he hosted. He planned these occasions with the greatest of detail. I recall on occasion receiving the biographies of those who were seated at the same table with me. I always appreciated his attention to detail. He was a courteous, friendly and enjoyable companion on all occasions.

• (1420)

The Saturday evening before his death, I phoned his wife Edna to inquire about his health, and she mentioned the concern of the doctors at DND that pneumonia might be developing. It was still a surprise to me when I heard of his death. I do not think that Edna had any idea of the serious situation on that occasion either. It was a shock to all of us.

To Edna and the family, I extend my sincere sympathy. Like all members of this chamber, I will retain many pleasant memories of Rhéal.

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, since previous speakers have already touched on the details of Senator Bélisle's career, I would rather talk about Senator Bélisle as a friend. He was not one to chose his friends from one side of the House exclusively. He had friends on all sides.

In my case, he and I alternated at different times as speaker pro tempore. The position usually involves one or more trips a year, but there was at least one trip when we would meet the speakers of all Canadian legislatures, at their annual meeting, and since he went to some of these meetings and I went to others, we had friends all over the country.

What always surprised me when I went to these meetings is how everyone seemed to know Senator Bélisle. Every time I went, the first thing people would ask me was: Where is Senator Bélisle?" So I had to explain that in the Senate, there were sometime changes for political reasons, and that this time, I happened to be the speaker pro tempore, but I was sure Senator Bélisle would return very shortly. And he did.

I think that what we appreciated about Rhéal was his friendship, frankness and openness with everyone. I certainly agree with everything that was said by my colleagues, and I would like to say to his family how much we miss him. He was a friend, a great senator, and we are very sad he is no longer with us.

General Election

Number of Days Left in Current Term

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators will be happy to know that the clock still ticks, retrospectively now. Canadians last had the opportunity to vote in a general election on November 21, 1988. That was four years and 10 days ago today.

The Government Leader in the Senate holds a definite and worthy principled view about the duty of the Prime Minister in such a situation. Senator Murray has stated:

> After four years, Canadians are entitled to have their say about the Government. After four years, Canada is entitled to a general election. For all practical purposes, the Government's term has come to an end.
> Considering the fact that for 29 months, public opinion has been turning increasingly against the Government —

I pause here to say, how prophetic! The quote continues:

> — and in the last eight months that percentage has become the majority, Canadians must be allowed to exercise their democratic rights in a general election. There is no justification for further delay.
> Only political cowardice or contempt for the democratic process could explain why, after four years in power, the Government refuses to announce a general election. It has to, if it has any respect for democracy.

I now enthusiastically join with Senator Murray in saying that the Mulroney government is afflicted with "political cowardice" and for ten days now has shown nothing but, to use Senator Murray's words, "contempt for the democratic process".

[Translation]

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, following what we have just heard and have been hearing for a few months now, I have taken upon myself to look for statistics. For instance, I thought we might go back fifty years or so to check how many governments have exceeded their four-year mandates. To be fair to my friends opposite, I have decided my compilation would start in 1945 because, as we all know, during the Second World War, Mr. King's Liberal government exceeded that four-year mandate and this sounds fair and reasonable to me in times of crisis.

Therefore, the statistics I have found date as far back as 1945 and show that eight governments have exceeded their four-year mandates. Senator Frith will no doubt be pleased to hear that five of these eight were run by the Liberals and three by the Tories.

The next question I had to ask myself then was: What happened to these eight governments that had exceeded their mandates when they finally called an election? Always concerned about being fair, I did not include this government in my calculations. While we have no doubt on this side that we will be reelected, I have decided not to include this government. So, I asked myself how many of these seven governments that have exceeded their mandates have actually been reelected?

Again, Senator Frith will be pleased to hear that, out of the seven governments that had exceeded their mandates, five were reelected, and two were defeated. Here is what I gather from all this, honourable senators.

First, we have no lesson to take on this side, especially not from people who have exceeded their mandate, as I have just demonstrated.

The second conclusion, and this does not look good for my friends opposite, is that, based on the statistics to the effect that five out of seven governments that have exceeded their mandates were reelected, our Liberal friends better hold on tight whenever the Prime Minister will decide to call an election.

In closing, I would like to express the wish that it might be a good idea to stop playing the same old tune over and over again like a broken record.

[English]

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, perhaps Senator Frith would be good enough to provide me and other interested colleagues on this side with a copy of the interesting speech he has just attributed to Senator Murray. Perhaps he could also tell us when and where that speech was made.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: Yes, I will save that for tomorrow, when the clock strikes again.

Senator John M. Macdonald

Best Wishes on Recovery

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a few moments ago we had the sad duty to pay tribute to our colleague, Senator Bélisle. On a somewhat happier note, I would like to welcome back to our midst our colleague Senator John M. Macdonald.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Senator John M. Macdonald is the dean of the Conservative caucus. He had a nasty fall some months ago. I went to see him in the hospital then and found him, as I think we all find him today, in excellent spirits, true to himself. Having bounced back fully from this reverse, he is here once again to take part in our deliberations. I want to say how pleased we all are to see him.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I thank the leader for his good wishes, and may I say that I am very happy to be back among you.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Business of the Senate

Adjournment

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before proposing the adjournment motion, I should like to make a few preliminary remarks. It will be recalled that in order to avoid as much as possible Senate committees asking leave to sit while the Senates is in session, it was agreed at a meeting of committee chairmen last June that a new committee schedule would be proposed, in order to minimize the possible conflicts between the workload of the committees and the Senate's schedule.

The results of this study were distributed during the summer and have received the approval of both sides of this house. The main effect on our own schedule is that on Wednesdays, the Senate would sit at 1:30 p.m. for Senators' Statements, Routine Proceedings, Question Period, and urgent government business, and adjourn in time for four committees to meet at 3 o'clock and three others to meet at 5 o'clock, if necessary.

As the Foreign Affairs committee and the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee have scheduled meetings for 3 o'clock tomorrow afternoon, I will move that when we adjourn today, we do so until 1:30 p.m. tomorrow in order to attend to the business just mentioned.

As I have indicated to my friend directly opposite, we hope to adjourn no later than Friday, December 18. To do so will no doubt require that we sit every day until then. There are three major pieces of government legislation that will be given first readings today. We also expect that Bill C-91, to amend the Patent Act, will be with us next week. Therefore we have four major pieces of legislation with which to cope.

With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h)

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, December 2, 1992, at one-thirty in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, following upon the comments of my colleague the Deputy Leader of the Government with respect to the discussion concerning the trial period commencing tomorrow of the Senate sitting at 1:30, that discussion was conducted with all of the chairmen and, I believe, vice-chairmen of committees. That discussion was conducted with our general approval and, I believe, of the other side as well. We presented the suggestion to our caucus, and it was felt that this was worth a trial. I emphasize "trial" because we may find it does not achieve what we hoped.

However, if it works properly, it would mean that committees could use the Wednesday afternoon and be able to schedule witnesses. That has always been the difficulty we faced here. The chairman of a committee would say to the Senate, "I have witnesses coming and they have come from very great distances, and they should be heard." Quite obviously, we want to accommodate such witnesses. This arrangement should help, and we are therefore prepared to go along with this trial period.

Insofar as the adjournment on December 18, I think that is a very good target date to work toward, but I would hope that that will not mean there will be pressure from the government side to push legislation through without adequate discussion, and that there will be full opportunity for debate in the Senate, as well as in the committees.

With that understanding, I hope we can work toward that date of December 18.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Efstathios Barootes: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition from the United Grain Growers Limited of the City of Winnipeg in the province of Manitoba, praying for the passage of an act to restructure United Grain Growers Limited.

Child Poverty

Presentation of Petitions

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I have a petition which reads as follows:

TO THE HONOURABLE SENATE OF CANADA.

The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your Petitioners in the certain assurance that your Honourable Senate will therefore provide a remedy.

HUMBLY SHEWETH

WHEREAS in 1989 the House of Commons unanimously adopted a motion to seek the elimination of poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000, yet poverty among Canadian children and families continues by all measures to be as serious or greater now compared to 1989, and

WHEREAS Canadian child poverty yields enormous and increasing costs: 1) to administrations of health care, education, justice and social welfare, 2) to national productivity through inadequate learning and preparation for employment, and it is thus quite clear that sound national financial management demands the prevention of poverty, and

WHEREAS Canada ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and has a moral obligation to seek the elimination of child poverty in Canada, and

WHEREFORE the undersigned, your Petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate of Canada to do all possible to assist them in eliminating child poverty in Canada by the year 2000,

This is signed by ten residents of Corner Brook, one from Pasadena, one from Hawkes Bay and one from Parsons Pond, all from my province of Newfoundland.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have an identical petition which I received, signed by ten residents of Metropolitan Toronto. It reads as follows:

TO THE HONOURABLE SENATE OF CANADA

The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your Petitioners in the certain assurance that your Honourable Senate will therefore provide a remedy.

And as in duty bound your Petitioners will ever pray.

Date: November 18, 1992.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a similar petition, but in view of the fact that my colleagues have already read the text, I will not read it once again into the record. My petition is in exactly the same wording as that of my two colleagues. It is dated November 3, 1992 and comes from six residents of the City of Winnipeg in my province of Manitoba.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I also received a similar petition which I will not read since the wording is exactly the same as what you just heard twice. The petitioners request that the Senate of Canada do all it can to help eliminate child poverty in Canada by the year 2000.

Goods and Services Tax

Presentation of Petitions

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I also have more common petitions on the GST.

I have the honour to present petitions signed by 419 citizens of Alberta who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Fort MacMurray, Edmonton, St. Albert, Spruce Grove, Winterbourne, Red Deer, Lacombe and Stony Plain.

Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 85 citizens of New Brunswick who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Caraquet, Tracadie, Sheila, Duguayville, Pont Landry, Brantville, Fredericton and Woodstock.

This make a grand total of 504 citizens who continue to fiercely oppose this very unfair tax.

These petitions were signed on August 19, 1992. This information is for Senator Murray (who obviously does not listen to the people!) who is concerned about the age of these documents. These petitions are dated August 19, 1992.

I will not read the preamble because it has already been read. However, I understand that the petition originates from a group called The Partnership Against Poverty. Its convenor in Ottawa is Mr. Brian Weatherdon of St. Andrew's Church.

QUESTION PERIOD

Agriculture

Resolution of Dispute on European and U.S. Grain Subsidies—Government Position

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, my question to the Government Leader relates to the difficulties being experienced by the Canadian grain industry due to the grain export enhancement programs of both the European Economic Community and the United States, and the dispute arising out of that situation.

I am aware, of course, that the problem involved in this dispute is probably far larger than simply the export subsidy enhancement programs. What has happened recently is that a serious dispute has arisen over a more specific matter; namely, the handling of the vegetable oils market in Europe and the access that the United States has to that market. The United States has announced that unless this dispute is revolved, they intend to impose import tariffs of something in the order of 200 per cent on French white wine and other commodities.

The dispute between these two entities over the Uruguay Round involving enhanced export subsidies on international grain causes a very serious problem relating to the international marketing of the grain crops of Canada and a number of other countries. I am not aware of the Canadian government having made any representations to try to separate these matters in order that we can get the international grain market back on an even keel.

Can the minister tell us if there has been any attempt made by Canada to resolve this matter, especially with respect to the grain market?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I doubt very much that it is possible to separate the issues as the honourable senator has suggested, much though we would like to do so.

The honourable senator has raised a number of subjects in his question. One was the export enhancement program of the United States. With respect to that program, I think the honourable senator is aware that we have had conversations with other countries and have raised the matter in the GATT, in the International Wheat Council and in other international organizations. We are also examining carefully our legal options under the GATT and the free trade agreement with the United States with regard to this matter.

As to the deadlock, which we continue to hope and believe has been broken between the United States and the European Economic Community, we recognize there are still some difficult issues to be resolved multilaterally, including market access in agriculture and the issue of tarrifying all non-tariff barriers without exception.

I should add, because I know it would propbably be the honourable senator's next question, that our balanced position on agriculture has not changed. We are continuing to seek a clarification and strengthening of the GATT Article XI, even though we acknowledge that we have limited support for that objective from other countries.

Senator Olson: I understand that, honourable senators. What I do not understand is whether the Canadian government is making a publicly visible effort to resolve these export enhancement programs with respect to grain. That measure is continuing to keep the price at disastrously low levels for countries other than the United States and Europe. Canada, Argentina, Australia and two or three other exporting countries in particular are still suffering.

I understand the complications. I was in Geneva not so long ago, and I intend to make a report soon to this Chamber on that visit.

However, I want to know from the minister whether or not the government intends to make some sincere attempts to get these two giants, namely, Europe and the United States, to modify this arrangement so that the rest of the grain-producing world can have some prospect of a reasonable level of market prices.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we think the emerging agreement on export subsidies is probably a good way to go, and we have supported that. The honourable senator will know that that agreement involves a commitment to reduce export volumes carrying an export subsidy by 21 per cent, and also to reduce export subsidy expenditures by 36 per cent relative to the 1989-90 base. Furthermore, have supported and rejoiced at the apparent unblocking of the impasse between the United States and the European Economic Community.

I do not know that making our representations in a more high profile way, as the honourable senator suggests, would move the file forward appreciably. The honourable senator knows if he has been in Geneva that our people there are making every effort to achieve the result we all want, which is to have the Uruguay round finally concluded by the end of this year, as the G-7 leaders called for last July.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am aware there have been some indications that an agreement might be reached which indeed that Canada has supported. Perhaps I should not say that. I was not aware that Canada had supported it until the minister told me now. However, I am not surprised because it is in Canada's interest that this be done.

However, that is a statement of intention, an indication of what might be in an agreement, but nothing is happening. It is just words.

I think it would make some of our producers feel better if they knew the Canadian government was trying to do something to have some action, not just words. I would hope that Canada could raise its profile in coaxing or encouraging these two giants to take some action to reduce their export enhancement subsidies.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator will have followed news reports of the problems the government of France is having with farmers in that country as a result of the apparent agreement between the European Community, of which France is a part, and the United States. Notwithstanding that, we expect that the multilateral negotiations at the MTN will be quickly re-engaged in Geneva, and that the bilateral differences we have referred to over oilseed subsidies and agriculture will be resolved.

External Relations

Promotion of Democracy in Hong Kong by Governor—Government position

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I wish to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding the visit of the Governor of Hong Kong to Canada within the last two weeks. This is the first opportunity we have had since that visit to question the government in this Chamber.

As the Leader of the Government will know, a very considerable difference of opinion exists between the Governor of Hong Kong and the government of China with respect to the interpretation of the 1985 agreement, and with respect to the basic law which, according to China's enunciation, flows from that particular agreement.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, during the course of the visit of Governor Patten to Ottawa, was quite effusive in her endorsement of the measures which the governor announced to promote democracy in Hong Kong. This statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs has evoked some questioning on the part of not only the Chinese authorities but a number of people in Hong Kong with respect to the specific nature of the Canadian government's policy towards Hong Kong and China.

My question is this: Given that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has made absolute Canada's position in support of Governor Patten, what is the continuing role of the Government of Canada in support of Governor Patten's role? Why are we so effusive in supporting Governor Patten's role, and what statements do we make to the Chinese government with respect to democracy in Hong Kong and in China?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a number of subjects have been raised by Senator Austin in that question. First of all, without necessarily accepting the various descriptions—such as "effusive"—that the honourable senator has employed with regard to our policy, we do support Governor Patten's proposals. We are committed to the well-being of Hong Kong. We expect the People's Republic of China to abide by the Sino-British agreement of 1984.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I will bring with me tomorrow the statements that appeared in the press, outlining the position of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Senator Murray and I may use the word "effusive" differently. In any event, my view is that her position was effusive.

What I do not see in Senator Murray's answer is a policy justification beyond our general support for the development of democracy. I am wondering whether Senator Murray's comment is limited to the notion that we support the evolution of democracy, wherever it should take place.

Senator Murray: That probably would be sufficient. I hope the honourable senator would agree with that position.

Quite apart from that, we have a number of bilateral agreements with Hong Kong and are negotiating several more, such as investment protection and a Memorandum of Understanding on culture. These agreements are designed to extend beyond the period of sovereignty transfer in July 1997.

Furthermore, I am sure the honourable senator knows that Hong Kong is our major source of immigration. Over 30,000 visas will have been issued to Hong Kong residents in 1992.

Pharmaceutical Industry

Effect on Medicare Costs of Proposed Drug Patent Legislation

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I wish to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding the proposed drug patent legislation. Many Canadians feel that medicare is being threatened by this government, and that medicare will be threatened by the NAFTA agreement.

At the same time, they are concerned that this government is proposing Bill C-91, a bill that will give 20 years' patent protection to drug companies. The minister of health of the province of British Columbia has stated that this action with respect to two drugs in particular will cost that province an extra $1.5 million. The windfall to patent drug companies will be around $2 billion if this bill passes.

My question is this: Is the Government of Canada trying to protect medicare or destroy it?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with regard to Bill C-91, my recollection is that it would extend by three years the period of patent protection for these patented pharmaceutical products and put them on the same basis as other patents. In any case, honourable senators will have ample opportunity to debate that bill when it arrives in the Senate and when, if the Senate agrees, it is sent to committee.

With regard to medicare, the honourable senator and his colleagues raised this same scare at the time of the free trade debate. That scare proved to be groundless. The people saw through it. I am sure the apprehensions my honourable colleague is now raising will be viewed in the same fashion.

[Senator Murray.]

Changes to Drugs Patent Regulations—Government Position

Senator Bonnell: On a slightly different point, honourable senators, I understand that the minister of health and welfare has stated that the patent regulations for Canada relating to drug testing will be changed to allow access by Canadians to drugs that are not properly tested in Canada, as long as they are tested in some other country in the world. If that is indeed the case, we must prepare ourselves for another potential thalidomide situation.

I understand that, approximately a month ago, pressure was brought to bear on the government to release for public distribution a new drug for migraine headaches, Imitrex. The researchers involved said, "No, we need more research because people are getting chest pains and they are short of breath. The drug needs more research." The researchers, however, were apparently overruled by the government and the drug was put on the market, due to pressure from the patent drug company. Is that what Canadians are to expect from this government in the future in relation to its drug policy?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend peppers his question with affirmations and allegations preceded by the adverb "apparently". Apparent to whom? Apparent from what? If the honourable senator has some information or documentation to place before the Senate, I invite him to do so.

On the basis of his question, however, I will make the appropriate enquiries of my colleague, the minister of national health and welfare, and bring in a considered reply.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, let us turn to the Montreal Gazette for information. An article entitled, "Ottawa ignored warning about anti-migraine drug", appears in today's edition of that newspaper. A government expert was worried about the side effects of Imitrex, but the documents show that the government overruled the experts in the department.

Senator Murray: What document?

Senator Bonnell: The document put forth by the department scientists who said that the drug should have further testing in Canada before it was released on the market.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is rather irregular to proceed in this way, even in the oral Question Period in the Senate. However, as a gesture of goodwill, and since we have not seen each other in so many weeks, I will take the article from the Montreal Gazette and ask my friend Mr. Bouchard whether there is some information he can properly supply to us on that matter at this time.

Senator Bonnell: What is the procedure in this place? If it is not the correct procedure to ask you a question across the floor of this house, then how should it be done? Should I get down on my knees and beg?

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators, but there is a long-standing rule here and in other assemblies of this kind that ministers are not asked to comment on press reports. However, this is a matter that I recognize as being of concern to my honourable friend. I will obtain a copy of the report and the quotations and allegations therein, if any, and ask Mr. Bouchard, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, to let me have a report on the matter.

Health and Welfare

Drug Patent Protection Legislation—Denial of Request by Manitoba Health Minister to Appear Before Commons Committee

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is part of the same general trend, but of a slightly different nature. The Minister of Health for Manitoba, the Honourable Don Orchard, made a statement yesterday in Manitoba that he was denied an opportunity to appear before a parliamentary committee that was studying the extension of the drug patent protection legislation, the passage of which, he states, will cost Manitoba millions of dollars. He points out that Bill C-91 will cost Manitoba $50 million in new investment right now, and the delay of $35 million for some extensive period of time.

Why would a provincial minister be denied the right to appear before a Commons committee, particularly when his province has generic plants operating, and therefore his government has an interest in this subject matter?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend knows that House of Commons committees do not come under my control; indeed, Senate committees do not come under my control or that of the government. I have no idea whether Mr. Orchard's statement is correct or, if it is, what the explanation may be. I do not think there is anyone I can speak to in order to get a report on the matter, particularly when the deliberations of a committee of the other place are involved.

Senator Molgat: Given that explanation by the minister, I assume that when the bill comes before the Senate and its committee for study, we will have the full opportunity to hear witnesses such as Mr. Orchard and any others who have a presentation to make. The minister is saying it will be up to the committee to decide, and he will use his good offices to ensure that the committee provides that opportunity.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator refers to the committee stage of a bill that has not yet arrived in the Senate. I am very happy to have the implicit undertaking that the bill will be given expeditious passage at second reading. This will assist the committee enormously in making arrangements to hear Mr. Orchard and others who have representations to make on the bill.

Senator Molgat: With the understanding that all witnesses will be heard, we on this side of the chamber may be able to arrive at an understanding that we would be prepared to see the bill go to committee quickly.

Transport

Possible Control of Canadian Airlines International by American Airline Industry—Government Position

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): My next question concerns the proposal that the government has made to PWA and Canadian Airlines concerning their recent troubles. I was tempted to call the proposal a "Bandaid" approach, but perhaps that is going a little too far. Let us say that it is a temporary approach. However, providing $50 million to that company in its present condition does not constitute dealing with its problem.

My question is this: In the statement provided to us by the Minister of Transport, the Honourable Jean Corbeil, he gives us the terms of the agreement between Canadian Airlines International and American Airlines. At pages 6 and 7 of those terms, the agreement states that they will have the right to appoint two members of an eight-member board of directors but that, as opposed to the situation in a normal corporate structure, those two members will have immense powers because they will have ongoing veto rights over certain management decisions.

I do not know what all of the powers are. Some are listed —the appointment of the CEO, which is an important decision; the annual business capital financing plans; the capital expenditures over a threshold period; the mergers or acquisition of assets over certain amounts; and on page 7, that American Airlines will provide for CAI a whole series of things such as operations, planning, pricing and yield management, food and beverage support, technical services, international base operations and accounting. If that is part of the agreement, then surely that does indeed give effective control to American Airlines over the operations of Canadian, if that is part of the agreement. The fact that they will have two directors with those kinds of power in a Canadian corporate structure, sounds as though an independent Canadian company will not be making the decisions. It looks as if the Americans will be making the decisions. Is that the case?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the points that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has made. However, these are the conditions that American Airlines have laid down for its participation in the affairs of Canadian Airlines International.

That is not a done deal at this stage. It was done so the Canadian people will understand what the issues are, and so that there can be public debate on those matters that the minister, with the permission of the parties, has laid out in his statement the conditions American Airlines have placed on its possible investment in Canadian Airlines International.

The honourable senator has expressed an opinion as to whether or not this amounts to effective control. I hesitate in my present position to express such an opinion, but if it came to that it would be a matter for the National Transportation Agency to adjudicate.

Senator Molgat: Then the government is taking no position on that matter? Surely the maintenance of Canadian airlines under Canadian control is something of importance to Canada. I would think that the government would have a position on that, and not simply say that it is up to some board or commission to decide whether or not we are losing control of our airlines. If our airlines are to come under American control, and because of the nature of our population and their population, western flights instead of flying from Calgary to Toronto, might fly instead from Calgary to Chicago and then to Toronto. Bit by bit, the whole of what we, as Canadians, consider to be an essential part of our structure will fall into American hands. What is to prevent that scenario? Surely the government has a position on this, and that it is not acceptable to simply say that some board, competition tribunal, or whatever, will make the decision. Is that not a central government decision?

Senator Murray: The government does have a position, which is incorporated in the law passed by Parliament. It has a position with regard to the limitations on foreign investment in a Canadian airline which is limited, as I understand it, to 25 per cent of voting shares. That is our position. It is in the law. Certain authority is given to the National Transportation Agency to adjudicate these matters, if it comes to that.

I emphasize that no agreement has been concluded between American Airlines and Canadian Airlines International. The Minister of Transport has made public what conditions American Airlines has placed upon its possible investment in CAI: It is to give the employees, the company, their creditors, and other interested parties full opportunity to examine all the alternatives and seek a satisfactory solution that the government has agreed to advance the sum of $50 million to the company.

Senator Molgat: If a deal is concluded, will the Government of Canada agree to the conditions laid down by American Airlines? Does the Government of Canada agree to these provisions?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, any agreement, once it is made, will have to satisfy the policy of the government as set out in the law and in the relevant legislation governing transport and competition law. We have set up tribunals such as the National Transportation Agency and the Competition Tribunal to adjudicate these matters in an objective and dispassionate way, as I am sure they will do.

Senator Molgat: Can I conclude from the honourable senator's reply that the government will not take a position? Will the government continue to take the position that it is up to this tribunal to make such decisions on this matter, and that the government is prepared to accept these conditions? Twenty-five per cent of the ownership, if that is standard practice, does not give the government the type of veto powers set out in this tentative agreement. Twenty-five per cent of the ownership of a corporation means that on an eight-man board the government would have two voices, but no veto.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: I do not disagree with the honourable senator. However, what I am telling him and the Senate is that there is a law which we passed, and that law provides that agreements of this kind would be subject to adjudication and consideration by the relevant tribunals. Under those circumstances, I do not think it is appropriate for me or for a minister of the Crown to express an opinion on the issues raised by the honourable senator.

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to advise honourable senators that the time for Question Period has expired. Is there agreement to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Constitution

Appointment of Senators following the failure of the Charlottetown Accord

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, the resounding defeat of the Charlottetown Accord, and earlier of Meech Lake, has postponed indefinitely any constitutional reform of the Senate.

However, a number of changes are urgently needed with respect to Senate appointments. The democrats among us, and they are to be found on both sides of this chamber, will agree that the Prime Minister should fill empty seats by calling by-elections, in order to restore the tarnished reputation of an institution that some call outdated and give it a certain amount of democratic legitimacy.

In the November 12 Hill Times, Senators Murray and Macquarrie, said, which coming from the latter was particularly surprising that the Prime Minister should simply appoint new senators to fill the vacancies.

My question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Considering the commitments made by the Prime Minister to Senate reform in the negotiations that led up to the Charlottetown Accord, how can the Leader of the government justify the words I just quoted? How can he support reverting to a method for filling Senate vacancies which has now been discredited?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, the Prime Minister of Canada will proceed to appoint senators to fill the current vacancies under the provisions of the Constitution of 1867 and 1982.

As far as an elected Senate is concerned, our position is that this question cannot be separated from the issues of Senate powers and provincial and regional representation in the Senate. Any constitutional reform of the Senate must be comprehensive.

Senator Hébert: That is all very well, but it did not prevent the Prime Minister from appointing the candidate selected by the people of Alberta. If he did it in the case of Senator Waters, what is to prevent him from doing the same in other cases?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the appointment of the late Senator Waters was made within the context of Meech Lake, under which provincial First Ministers had the right to propose a list of names to the Prime Minister of Canada. Since Meech Lake and Charlottetown were not approved . . .

Senator Hébert: It was the people's choice!

Senator Murray: . . . all we have is the Constitution of 1867 and 1982, and I am confident that Prime Minister Mulroney will proceed very shortly to appoint new colleagues to this chamber.

Delayed Answers to Oral Questions

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have answers to questions asked on September 30 by Senator Stewart regarding the financing of certain documents relating to the Charlottetown agreement, on October 15 by Senator Stewart regarding the financing of the referendum, by Senator Bosa regarding Canadian aid to Egypt following the earthquake, and by Senator Stewart regarding the proposed sale of the Truro-Sydney rail line.

The Constitution Cost and Means of Financing Referendum

(Response to question raised by Hon. John B. Stewart on September 30, 1992)

An exact accounting of all expenditures on the Charlottetown Agreement is not yet available.

At this time, the government estimates total printing costs for the Charlottetown Agreement and related documents, including summaries, a tabloid version, and the legal text, at about $10 million. Distribution costs were approximately $7 million.

Estimated costs for advertising the Charlottetown Agreement in all media (print and electronic) are about $25 million.

These costs will all be charged against the department of Supply and Services' Vote 1, consistent with its mandate to print, publish and provide other communications services, including advertising.

Cost and Means of Financing Referendum

(Response to question raised by Hon. John B. Stewart on October 15, 1992)

The proposed section 32 of the Constitution Act, 1867, in the draft legal text of October 9, 1992, provides that a revenue or expenditure bill means a bill that contains only provisions dealing with revenue or expenditure.

The Referendum Act does provide for appropriations, but its main purpose is to provide the rules and regulations for holding a referendum.

It was not, therefore, a bill that contained only provisions dealing with revenue or expenditure and would, as was indicated by the Leader of the Government in his verbal reply of October 15, have been deemed "ordinary legislation" under the reformed Constitution.

EGYPT

Canadian Assistance to Earthquake Victims in Cairo

(Response to question raised by Hon. Peter Bosa on October 15, 1992)

Canada was amongst the first countries to respond to an appeal for assistance to victims of the Cairo earthquake. On October 14, the day after the earthquake occurred, Canada contributed $200,000 towards an appeal by the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies. The Canadian contribution was used to supply blankets and tents.

Several Canadian leaders, including the Governor-General, the Speaker of the Senate, the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, sent messages of sympathy to their counterparts in Egypt.

Canadian National Railways

(Response to question raised by Hon. John B. Stewart on October 15, 1992)

On July 8, 1992, the Honourable Ken Streatch, Nova Scotia Minister of Transportation and Communications wrote to the Honourable Jean Corbeil stating that the province wanted assurance from the federal government of continued service in the case of failure on the part of the private operator, combined with the requirement that the rail right-of-way be maintained in perpetuity. Given these assurances, "the Province would be willing to meet with the potential short line operators to determine whether there is a common goal."

On September 17, 1992, the Honourable Jean Corbeil, Minister of Transport, responded to Mr. Streatch indicating that concerns with failure were premature. It was pointed out that the potential operators were proposing to risk significant capital investment in the line and were not doing so with failure in mind. The line still has a good traffic base and is not being sold as a lost cause.

The Minister has given assurances to Mr. Streatch and to others in the past that the CN selection process would be subject to the required federal review process, specifically by the National Transportation Agency. Additionally, it has been noted that beyond the financial soundness of the purchaser and the terms of the sales and traffic agreements with CN, which will be closely examined during the federal approval process, the province itself will control many of the factors that will create a climate for a financially viable enterprise.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

Private Bill

United Grain Growers Limited—Bill to Amend Act of Incorporation—First Reading

Leave having been given to revert to First Reading of Private Bills:

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes presented Bill S-16, to restructure United Grain Growers, Limited.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am sure that at some stage Senator Barootes will give an explanation on this bill, and I will give an explanation from our side as to why I have granted leave. I want to make it very clear that that explanation is part of my having agreed to grant leave.

Senator Barootes: Thank you very much, honourable senators. I regret, en passant, that my position in the Senate has been changed from where I sat before where I could face my friend Senator Olson at all times and clearly hear what he was saying. Nevertheless, I shall suffer the indignity of being moved closer and closer to the door.

Following discussions we had earlier today, I want to point out the reasons for asking for this extraordinary permission. The Senate is agreeing to do this in order to meet the constraints of Parliament, particularly the House of Commons. If the Senate does not pass this legislation, there could be a delay of several months.

For example, rule 116 of the Rules of the Senate requires that private member bills have a seven-day free period between referral to a committee and the hearing of witnesses. If you add up the days, you can see we are approaching the deadline of December 11th when the other place will ajourn.

The House of Commons agreed to receive this bill and it is my understanding that there is agreement among the parties over there that they will expeditiously handle this bill in order to permit its passage.

Why passage now and not later? The UGG is amending its financial structure to invest in country elevators, enhance its services and upgrade its technology; things that have fallen behind in some of our agricultural transportation and elevating services.

This requires a lot of money. Construction is now well under way for 22 new elevators and next year, if they can obtain the financing, 20 more will be built. This represents about a $20-million investment in western agriculture.

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

Another reason is the logistics and the delay necessary for underwriters to take over after this has been restructured and do an underwriting. The company is not legally empowered to enter into such agreements until this bill has been passed. They are also advised that fund-raising from farmers for the type of undertaking for which they are attempting to raise finances can best be done in the spring, not in the summer. Therefore there is a time element which our investment houses and advisors require.

There are other difficulties, such as the drain that would occur on their cash position if they were not able to do some kind of an underwriting to undertake this new work. A number of farmers in the west have already expressed a considerable desire to invest in this new undertaking. It is desirable to get these farmers to remain within the family.

I thank honourable senators for listening to this tedious explanation.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I believe that my colleague Senator Olson will speak on the bill itself, but I want to speak on the procedure because we have made a major exception on procedure today. I want to explain why it is that we have agreed to that procedure.

If my honourable colleagues will look at the rule book, starting at page 108, the rules regarding private bills, they will see there are many restrictions on private bills, and with very good reason. When Parliament agrees to pass a private bill, it is doing something exceptional, because many of the things really should be done through other means, such as the Corporations Act. With this bill, the Parliament of Canada is giving a private individual or group an immense amount of power, and the support of Parliament for whatever is done. So it is a serious matter.

It is for that reason that all of these restrictions have been put on private bills. Because of the public interest in this matter, I do not think we should ever agree to skipping those restrictions. There could be people who have very good reasons to disagree with what is being proposed, yet once Parliament gives its stamp of approval, this measure is beyond the reach of any of those people.

Although it was not read out, I understand from the Committees Branch, or the individual responsible, that we do have the assurance that all of the technical matters of advertising are in hand. Is that correct, Senator Barootes?

Senator Barootes: That is correct. It has been advertised in advance in the Canadian Gazette, the Saskatchewan Gazette, the Manitoba Gazette, the Alberta Gazette and all the daily newspapers of the major cities in the west for four successive Saturdays.

Senator Molgat: We are satisfied, then, that the technical requirements have been met.

I emphasize again that granting leave on something like this is not just granting leave to revert to an item. Here is one of the articles under "Private bills." It is entitled "Suspension of Rules". It reads:

> 109. A motion for the suspension of the rules upon any petition for a private bill shall not be in order, unless such suspension has been recommended by the Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders.

Therefore the request made today really should not have been made today; it should be made two days hence under the standard practice. Furthermore, at that point the matter should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders for a ruling before returning it to the Senate. There is normally a long delay before it can be dealt with.

Because of the urgency of the situation, and because the Senate was not sitting—through no fault of the UGG or ours—it was impossible for them to make the request earlier than today. This is the first time it could be done, following the meeting of the UGG from the 3rd to the 5th of November, when this matter was agreed to, and many meetings with their locals. We, on this side, have agreed to forgo what you might call the mechanical things within the Senate; things that concern debate within the Senate, to allow it to go forward.

I emphasize again that these are major exceptions to our rule which has very sound reason behind it. Because those sorts of debates are mechanical within our system, we have agreed to make those exceptions. However, from a public standpoint we believe that the other rule in the Senate, which is rule 116, should not be abrogated. That is the rule which protects the public in this affair. It protects the shareholders of UGG or any member of the public who may have an interest in the matter, and allows them the time to appear before us.

That rule is clear. The matter shall not be considered by the committee until one week has elapsed from the date of referral to the committee. We insist that rule 116 be followed, not for our protection but for the protection of the public and anyone who is interested. It is on that basis that we have agreed to the procedure today.

I would also like to point out that UGG has a very particular interest for all westerners. It is a western Canadian company, based in Winnipeg, operating in the three prairie provinces. It also has a very particular interest for the Senate because the first president and the general manager of UGG, later Senator Crerar, was a long-time member of the Senate and the Government of Canada.

In 1907, Senator Crerar became the first president of the Grain Growers Company, which later became United Grain Growers. This was part of the great battle of western farmers against the traders or the grain exchange. Westerners who follow the agricultural scene will have a particular interest in this matter. It is very interesting that Senator Crerar, who spent so much time in this house, was the first president of that organization.

Second Reading

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I rise to speak to the second reading of Bill S-16, an act to restructure United Grain Growers Limited. Some brief comments will illuminate this request for a private act of Parliament.

United Grain Growers Limited is a farmer-owned and controlled Canadian grain handling and marketing company, employing assets in excess of $300 million, and with annual gross sales of over $1 million. UGG is a key player and a vital force in the Canadian agriculture industry.

UGG, as mentioned, was originally incorporated under a special act of the Canadian Parliament in 1911. It is the result of a consolidation of Grain Growers Company, organized in 1906 under Manitoba charter and reincorporated on May 19, 1911 under a special act of Canadian Parliament, together with the Alberta Farmers Co-operative Elevator Company, organized by an Alberta charter in 1913.

Initially UGG was structured with one class of shares. They were called membership shares, evaluated at $25 par value. Under a plan of capital reorganization of Canadian Parliament and as ratified by the shareholders in 1941, shareholders received in exchange for each of these common shares, one new class A preferred share and one new class B membership, or voting share. Under this new capitalization, ownership of a class B share was limited to farmers, lessees and their wives. Class A shares could be held generally and trade today on the Winnipeg stock market.

UGG's business activities are centred around the concept of meeting farmers' business needs. Building upon their business direction, the company operates 266 country elevators across all four western provinces. Combined with its two terminals in Thunder Bay and one in Vancouver, UGG plays an integral role in helping merchandise the grain produced on the prairies.

UGG is an active corporation developing seed varieties for farmers and distributing crop inputs. The company is a major feed manufacturer and is the most prominent publisher of farm magazines and newspapers in western Canada. These include the Country Guide, Grain News, and Cattleman. A whole new series of publications are being undertaken at this time on a test basis.

Western Canada agriculture is in the midst of change. The marketplace for grain has been troubled in recent years as a result of ongoing subsidy battles between the EEC and the United States. The cost of producing grain has continued to rise, and consequently farmers have seen their margins erode steadily through the mid 1980s to a point where there is considerable difficulty.

While recent events may lead in the coming year to a GATT deal, the phased-in nature of any agreement means that it will still be some time before there is stability in this marketplace. Increasingly, businesses that serve the farm community are focusing their efforts on finding ways to help farmers retain more of the limited dollars that are available in the marketplace.

One of the chief ways of achieving this is to gain efficiencies in the handling of grain and in the transportation of that grain to tide water. Simply put, returns at the farm gate are primarily the export market price, less the cost of moving that grain to the export market. Every dollar that can be saved in the handling and transportation sector is a dollar more left in the net return to a producer.

Many of the existing grain elevator facilities in western Canada were built in the earlier part of this century. Times and technology have changed. Cost-effective grain handling today involves the use of equipment, computer technology and inventory management systems—far different from the technologies that existed even a decade ago.

Significant investments are required to build new elevators and to upgrade many of our older facilities so that they can be viable and work to effectively link the farmer with his offshore customer.

Honourable senators, these investments not only represent a response to the tight money situations that face our farmers; they also represent an investment in the future of that industry. While there has been a great deal of pessimism surrounding the grain industry in recent years, world population continues to grow at a significant rate. Land is becoming an increasingly scarce resource in parts of Asia, and environmental problems are mounting in some of the other agricultural areas of the world.

Therefore, the competitive position of Canada in world agriculture markets remains strong. It is distortions in the market that have distorted our own perceptions of the strength of our industry.

Anticipating the changes in UGG's markets, in agricultural economy, technology, and the business needs of its customers, UGG directors and management proposed a capital reorganizing and restructuring plan which was approved by 95.3 per cent majority vote of the shareholder delegates at the company's 86th annual meeting in November of this year.

• (1600)

The plan is envisioned to be implemented through a petition to the Canadian Parliament, which we have just done, to effect the changes under UGG's special act. The legislation before you will see UGG's capital structure change to allow for new capital investment and allocation of the present equity and patronage dividend credits, while still preserving the existing representative membership structure and farmer control.

[Senator Barootes.]

At present the company has two avenues for access to capital—earnings and debt. Earnings would be inadequate and debt too costly to develop the cost effective measures that I have mentioned. This bill therefore provides a logical course for UGG to follow, as it would see them gaining access to equity markets which would become their permanent source of funding.

Honourable senators, to facilitate the attractions of new equity investments, this legislation will cause UGG's capital structure to be changed and the new shares created thereby to be allocated to existing shareholders, to patronage dividend credit holders and to their customers. New classes of common shares and preferred shares will replace the previous class A and class B shares.

Specifically, the existing $1,202,749 class A shares will be exchanged and converted to series A convertible preferred shares on a share-for-share basis. These shares will continue to be listed and traded on the Winnipeg Stock Exchange. The remaining equity in the company represented by common shares will be allocated as follows:

1) to holders of outstanding patronage dividend credits on the basis of the value of such obligations; and

2) to customers who have made grain deliveries to UGG during the six-year period ending July 31, 1992 on a proportionate basis.

As of July 31 this year, the book value of preferred patronage dividend credits was $21,352,000 and holders will be awarded common equity shares on that basis. The remaining equity will be allocated to customers delivering grain in the past six years ending July 31, 1992 on a proportionate basis and is based on the fact that patronage dividends have not been declared during that last six-year period on the basis of the deliveries made. Concurrent with the foregoing, all existing class B shareholders who were members will have their shares redeemed in exchange for the issue of a new membership certificate in UGG. Thereby the 75,840 outstanding class B shares, which presently are membership shares, will continue to constitute, at the beginning, the new membership of the new corporation. Presently these membership shares are 94 per cent held by single shareholders—a single farmer, lessee or wife. Approximately 40 per cent are held by residents of Alberta, 35 per cent by Saskatchewan residents and 20 per cent by Manitoba residents.

The membership structure—that is, the cooperative membership structure they have with a local delegate system—and annual meeting process of the company will be modified slightly to accommodate the changing corporate and capital structure.

The board of directors will be expanded to supplement the existing 12 farmer directors with three non-farmer directors. The farmer directors will, as in the past, be appointed by the delegates at the annual meeting of members, while the non-farm directors will be appointed by common shareholders at a shareholders annual meeting. Certain provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act, relating inter alia to the protection of shareholders, shall be incorporated by reference in the company's amended special act.

On completion of reorganization and restructuring, the company intends to make an initial public offering of its common shares. The common shares and the series A convertible preferred shares would then be listed both on the Toronto and Winnipeg stock exchanges. This initial offering cannot be legally considered or undertaken until this change to the act and the restructuring have been made available.

An advance ruling from Revenue Canada detailing the tax consequences of the plan has been obtained. It confirms that there will be no adverse tax consequences to either the company, the existing shareholders or the patronage dividend credit. This legislation enables UGG to capture new opportunities and thereby better serve its customers throughout western Canada, while at the same time creating a vested interest for its existing and future shareholders.

Honourable senators, I know that my agricultural friends support this legislation overwhelmingly and I hope this chamber will also give its approval.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to rise briefly on this occasion to indicate support from this side of the house for the arrangements that have been made to move this piece of legislation on the modification of UGG's structure in such a way that it can be completed by the time the House of Commons adjourns on December 11. I know that they already have a house order to that effect so that date will not be changed.

I appreciate the explanation given by our house leader, Senator Molgat, as to the arrangements to try to meet that deadline. We are doing everything we can within the confines and constraints of what is just a fact of life. Neither the UGG nor anyone else is to blame. There is no use looking for someone who muddied the waters in this situation. We did not reconvene until today and the House of Commons had obtained a house order sometime ago that they would adjourn on December 11. I believe it was last January or very early in 1992. The specific date is not important.

As pointed out by our house leader, Senator Molgat, the one thing that none of us can be sure of is that there is not someone else who has an interest in this bill. I do not know whether the Alberta Wheat Pool, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool or the Manitoba Wheat Pool have an interest in this bill. I have read it and I cannot see why they would have a particular interest in making representations respecting this bill. Therefore, the seven days that our house leader spoke about is to be maintained so that such individuals or groups have an opportunity to make their interest known to the members of the committee when we get to that stage.

• (1610)

I do not intend to repeat a lot of the technical detail that Senator Barootes so capably put on the record. He has given a lot of the technical detail as to why the UGG feels it needs this bill, or this restructuring. It is also stated in the bill. If you look at the petition at the beginning of Bill S-16, you will see that under the second "whereas," subsection (b), it says it plainly, and I commend them for stating it so clearly.

> (b) those circumstances now inhibit the growth and productivity of the Company and its ability to meet the challenges of the modern day marketplace, and impede access by the Company to new capital;

That is the primary reason they are coming to Parliament, seeking these adjustments. It then says:

> (c) the general laws of Canada do not enable the company to reorganize its capital and restructure itself so that its historic connection with the farmers of Western Canada can be easily maintained, and it is desirable to maintain that connection for so long as those farmers wish to do so;

That is important, too. To put it in plainer, briefer language than that:The local organizations of the United Grain Growers that are situated all over the prairies will still be the ultimate governing body of the United Grain Growers, and that control will not be passed to anyone other than the producers who use these marketing facilities.

The explanation has been given by our house leader as to why we were willing to give as much as we thought was reasonable; to deal today with all of the procedures ordinarily dealt with over four or five days and leave in place that public protection in case there is some other grain company or some members who wish to have some input. I know what the vote was. I point out that the vote of the delegates was 95.3 per cent in favour of doing this, but there may still be a few who believe they ought to have more protection, so they can meet here. The seven days' delay required by the committee is to be maintained for the public. That was well explained by Senator Molgat, and I will not belabour it.

I think we should move on quickly in this matter so we can get more details out during the committee stage. I expect the committee will meet at the earliest possible opportunity so that we can call in the experts. I understand also that the senior officers of the company are standing by, ready to come to the committee meeting as soon as it is called. I hope that we can proceed with the bill with all of the usual protections for people who may be interested in it, such as other companies or other members who were not involved at the delegate meeting.

I hope this bill will be passed by December 11 so that we do not have to lapse into the procedure that would be required if the bill was not passed by then. That would involve re-issue of the bill in a new session, and it would likely be the end of March before the authority for this restructuring would be in place. That would be unfortunate, because the company is ready now to make some of the investments if we pass this bill before we adjourn for Christmas.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, before Senator Barootes closes off debate, I would just like to check on one last item. I assume we have the assurance of the House of Commons, having done what we have today to move this matter forward, that there will be no problems in that place in having unanimous consent to pass this bill next week when it reaches them. Is that correct? I just want to confirm that that is, in fact, the case.

Senator Barootes: I think I went as far as I could.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if Senator Barootes speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Olson: It is a reply to a question.

Senator Barootes: Senator Molgat, as you know, we in this institution hold to our independence as a legislative body. I suspect that the House of Commons also believes in its independence under its jurisdiction.

The best I can do is to tell you what I said earlier. I am informed that steps have been taken amongst the parties in the House of Commons that, should they receive this bill with a few days' notice, they will deal with it expeditiously and have it completed by December 11. In fact, I have every hope that they will. I wish I could give you a guarantee, but of course I cannot do that.

Senator Molgat: Do the house leaders have an agreement on this?

Senator Barootes: I am informed through the departments involved that the House of Commons are prepared, when they receive this, to deal with it within a matter of a day or two. However, I do not deal directly with the house leaders.

Senator Frith: Why not?

Senator Barootes: They have not asked me to do so. This is our bill. This is a bill we are sponsoring.

Senator Frith: But you are asking us to do something. The reason for that request is that they want the bill passed before Christmas. If you cannot give us any assurance about the actions of the other side, why did you bother doing it?

Senator Barootes: It is you who are asking us, and we, in turn, are asking that the House of Commons proceed with this matter. I am sorry, Senator Frith. I may not have made it clear. I have gone about as far as one can go in obtaining just about absolute assurance that they will deal with it as soon as we send it over. It is important that we may be about a week getting the bill there.

Senator Frith: We specifically asked, and in fact were told there was an agreement by the house leaders on the other side, that if they received the bill before they adjourned, they would deal with it on the basis of no more than one speech per party, and in one day. I said, "Well, let us be sure that Senator Barootes puts that on the record." But he cannot, apparently. We are already on the bridge.

Senator Barootes: My understanding is that that is the way they will proceed, but I cannot guarantee that somebody over there is not covered, any more than you can guarantee that every one of your members is covered.

Senator Frith: No, but what I could do in similar circumstances is to say, "Has the leadership an agreement on this matter?" That is all I was asking for. I thought you would be prepared to provide that assurance. Of course you cannot guarantee someone will not stand up and refuse leave. Of course you cannot provide guarantees concerning the other place. But what you can do here is indicate that the house leaders have an agreement. The often have agreements on legislation. I thought there was such an agreement on this particular matter. We thought we should abridge the time for Senate consideration because there had already been an agreement by the house leaders on the other side to abridge their time.

● (1620)

Senator Barootes: It is my understanding as well that they have reached an agreement to proceed with this matter expeditiously. They will probably do it in one day.

Senator Frith: That is not what it was. "Expeditiously" was not the word. It was one speech, one day. That is what we were told. The words used were not "as expeditiously as possible."

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

Referred to Committee

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Barootes, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 1:30 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, December 2, 1992

The Senate met at 1:30 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE HONOURABLE THOMAS LEFEBVRE

TRIBUTES

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, again we start today's proceedings by sharing a sad event: The death of our colleague, Senator Tom Lefebvre. We take this occasion not just to share the sadness of his death, but to celebrate, in our way, his life.

He was a colleague of all of us. I can say "a colleague and a friend" because Tom was one of those human beings who, once a colleague, was soon a lifelong friend. None of us here today, neither myself nor the Leader of the Government, presume to celebrate and pay tribute to his life adequately. However, each one of us can do it, if not here, then somewhere else and otherwise in our own hearts.

Let us touch on some of that life's highlights, hoping to invoke in each of us some fond memories of the ways that his life crossed ours.

Tom Lefebvre was born in 1927 in North Bay, Ontario, and began his public career in the municipality of Temiscaming, where he had purchased a service station in 1959. He served as an alderman for Temiscaming for four years and was a member of the local Knights of Columbus chapter.

Tom was first elected to the federal riding of Pontiac-Témiscamingue in 1963. He was re-elected to the seat in 1968, 1972, 1974, 1979 and 1980; each time with a bigger majority than the previous one.

He served as deputy whip for the government and, in 1972, he was asked to take on the duties of chief party whip.

Just a word about whips. It takes a special kind of person to make a good whip, and Tom was a great one. Every day of a whip's life takes a delicate balance of strength of will, discipline, charm, amiability and diplomacy. Any persons here who are or have been whips can decide whether those characteristics and qualities apply to them. It is a rare and special combination, and it was fully met by Tom, who was appropriately a rare and special man.

He cared deeply about his region and his country. He showed this concern in hundreds of ways, large and small, every year, as all parliamentarians do. I will cite only some illustrative examples. He was concerned with the economic viability of his area. In 1975 he sought the joining of the National Capital Commission with the Ottawa district office of the Federal Public Works Department in order to provide the region with cabinet representation. Then when Canadian Pacific planned to abandon the railway link between Hull and Maniwaki, Member of Parliament Lefebvre strongly objected. He argued that the existing infrastructure could not handle the trucking traffic carrying lumber and if the railway line was abandoned, the area's economy would be detrimentally affected. When the issue of separatism rose in Quebec, he actively fought against it and warned "the danger of separatism comes not in clanking armour, but cloaked in the soft robes of reason, charm and seeming candour. We may not recognize it."

[Translation]

As a federal member of Parliament, Tom Lefebvre made a valuable contribution. In 1975 to 1978, he chaired the Canadian delegation to the North Atlantic Assembly, an organization of parliamentarians which makes recommendations to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, as I am sure many here are aware.

He chaired the Special Committee on Alternative Energy and Oil Substitution in 1980 and the Special Committee on Standing Orders and Procedure in 1982. Both Lefebvre reports—the reports on alternative energy sources and on standing orders and procedure —are always and indeed often quoted as a source and an authority on the subject.

[English]

Senator Lefebvre was summoned to the Senate on July 9, 1984. It was certainly no retirement for him. He never lost a beat, as he continued in the Senate the work he pursued so tirelessly for 19 years in the House of Commons. I know that many, especially members of the Senate committees on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration and Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, will miss his wise interventions and his hard, always well-researched work.

Senator Tom Lefebvre was a knowledgeable, experienced and richly positive addition to the public life of Canada and to the private life of thousands of Canadians. I know you would want me to extend our sympathies to his family, who I believe are here today, knowing that missing him in our way we can partly understand at least how they will miss him in theirs.

● (1340)

Those here today represent many beliefs, faiths and philosophies. None of us knows what lies beyond death. We can believe and can have faith about it, but can never know until we experience it for ourselves.

One thing we can know is that if a good, honest, kind and virtuous life is rewarded by a peaceful and joyous eternity, Tom is even now enjoying that eternity.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, last Tuesday, November 24, a good number of parliamentarians, including the national leader of the Liberal Party, the Honourable Jean Chrétien journeyed to Fort Coulonge, Quebec to bid final adieu to our late colleague, Senator Tom Lefebvre.

To have met any of the large local congregation present for the funeral mass would leave no doubt that these people were mourning the loss of an esteemed friend and neighbour and a true and steadfast defender of their interests.

Their sentiments were articulated during the bilingual service in the homily by Senator Lefebvre's parish priest, Monseigneur Douglas Bridge, and by Bishop J.R Windle of the Diocese of Pembroke.

The Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, Senator Frith, delivered a eulogy at the funeral. He spoke for all of us then as he did today, in praising the character of the public man, Tom Lefebvre, and his contribution to his constituents and to Parliament in both the Commons and Senate over a period of 27 years.

He was, as we all know, a most popular and esteemed parliamentarian among members of all parties.

[Translation]

Our colleague senator Lefebvre always sought a consensus and the best possible solution for all Canadians. Senator Frith just referred to the work done by Senator Lefebvre on the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources. His considerable contribution to the work of this committee and his personal qualities made it possible for the committee to operate effectively in a relaxed atmosphere.

After arriving in the Senate, he showed an interest in energy issues, especially in the field of new and renewable energy sources. Recently, he expected to be actively involved, together with his committee colleagues, in a new and very important study on the environmental impact of emissions resulting from energy production and consumption in Canada.

His absence will be keenly felt, now that we can no longer depend on the invaluable advice of a man of exceptional integrity.

I wish to extend my sincere condolences to his family, on my own behalf and on behalf of the Prime Minister and our government colleagues. We will all miss Senator Lefebvre.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, it is with great personal sadness that I add my words to those of others in memory of our colleague Tom Lefebvre.

We have heard of the rich background of Tom's life as a member of the House of Commons from 1965 to 1984 and here in the Senate over the past eight years. In addition to his parliamentary duties and his devotion to his area, he was also a profound and passionate advocate for the unity of this country.

Without question, he is one person in political life who had made a difference not just in our Parliamentary institutions, but to all those he has represented over 27 years as the member for Pontiac Gatineau and the senator for de Lanaudière.

My personal association with Tom and the friendship which developed from it was forged during his very special contribution as chief whip for the Liberal party at a time when I was working in a legislative role with Mr. Trudeau.

As we all know and as Senator Frith has said, there are very special qualities which are required from individuals who hold that position and, indeed, very high expectations of them. I think it is fair to say that no one really campaigns for the job of whip. Tom held that position not once, but twice in the course of the 1970s, and each was during a minority period in the House of Commons.

Being the whip is a tough job because it deals with organizing one's peers with all the cross currents of emotions, of differences, of constituency and regional pressures that exist among members and senators from across Canada. It requires tremendous patience, fairness, humour, sensitivity, and great strength. It is, I think, a lonely job, and one that requires the absolute confidence of a party leader and, indeed, all caucus members.

Tom was a truly magnificent example, not just for Liberals, but within other parties where he was viewed with genuine respect and great friendship. He walked the minefields of the tight minority situation of the Liberal government between 1972 and 1974 and lived with tremendous tension every day during that period. It never showed on the surface.

He was so effective and so resilient that Mr. Trudeau turned to him again in the months of the government of the Right Honourable Joe Clark in 1979. Tom probably groaned inwardly when asked, but he accepted and thus set himself on a course of action which really became part of Parliamentary and political history in this country.

There are still memoirs to be written about that brief period. I would particularly urge my friend and colleague Senator MacEachen to get on with writing his because he was the opposition house leader in the House of Commons at that time and worked very closely with Tom.

● (1350)

I do not want to revive unhappy memories for my government friends opposite, but Tom Lefebvre was an absolutely pivotal force in the events leading up to December 13, 1979, when the minority Conservative government was defeated on its budget by a slim vote of 139 to 133. Without Tom's work, that vote simply might not have turned out the way it did, leading to the 1980 election.

Mr. Trudeau had already announced his pending retirement as leader at the time, and I clearly remember Tom that very night chuckling in his throaty way saying, "Well, that vote will certainly put an end to that plan," and so it did.

He was a big man with a big voice and a very big heart. His constituents, I know, because I was there, welcomed him and his beloved wife Lea into their homes and to their activities with great warmth and real affection. Already this chamber and our caucus is diminished by Tom's passing. We cannot begin to know the loss felt by the family. I offer each of them my deepest sympathy knowing that they will be sustained by wonderful memories of a wonderful man.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have just a word or two because of the professional and personal association I had with the late Senator Lefebvre in those years to which Senator Fairbairn just alluded.

I led the House on behalf of the government and then on behalf of the opposition in 1972 to 1974 and, later, in 1979. Of course, Tom and I worked closely, as is necessary, in the roles which we played.

As honourable senators know, the Chief Government Whip in the House of Commons always sits behind the Leader of the Government in the chamber because of the necessity of keeping in close touch with what is happening.

Everything that has been said about Tom is absolutely true. He was steady, reliable, loyal, unflappable and had that capacity which a good whip must have; the capacity of getting along with the men and women who make up the caucus and, by whatever technique, enlisting their cooperation and support. Tom had all of that.

One happy period we had together, along with a number of others, was a visit to China in 1979. Mrs. Lefebvre was with us and added greatly to our enjoyment.

Our friendship, cooperation and sense of common understanding continued when Senator Lefebvre and I came to the Senate together. We could not quite understand, after our long service in the House of Commons, why in the minds of members of the House of Commons we had suddenly become different people, to be treated in a somewhat different way than we were when we were members of the House of Commons.

May I conclude my remarks on Tom by saying he proved brilliantly that a member of Parliament can make an outstanding contribution to the country and not become a member of the cabinet.

So many members of Parliament now believe that fulfilment only comes by being sworn in. That is not always the case. Destruction often follows that important event. But Tom proved the continuing validity of being a good member of Parliament.

I was happy to join Senator Murray and Senator Frith and other colleagues in attending the funeral. I can only express my real joy at meeting all the members of his family on that occasion. It was quite moving, and particularly, it was an opportunity to extend to Léa and to all the family my own condolences, which I again offer today.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I want to join with those of you paying tribute to Senator Tom Lefebvre. We worked together as members of the Senate energy and environment committee for almost all of the nearly nine years that I have worked in the Senate. Tom, by virtue of his years in Parliament during times of energy crises, and representing an energy-importing region of Canada, had a strong consumer interest as his motivation for being on the committee, in contrast to my own which is by virtue of my coming from an energy-exporting region of Canada. Without more, this made us adversaries on many of the basic approaches to energy policy. However, there was more and that was Tom's political adeptness at heading off or avoiding the irreconcilable positions which, as one might expect, inevitably arose. In fact, he facilitated the quick resolution of differences not only between ourselves, but also among others on the committee. He was a natural politician in the best tradition of those who practise that art; most comfortable with his constituents, but able to deal with any situation, a champion of the people of Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle, the riding he represented so well for almost 20 years.

On behalf of those who served with Tom on the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and National Resources, we will miss you and always remember your important contribution.

Our sympathies to you, Léa, and to your family, on your great loss.

[Translation]

Hon. Pietro Rizzuto: Honourable senators, I would like to join my colleagues in extending my condolences to Tom's family. I knew Tom when I came to the Senate in 1976. At the risk of repeating what our colleagues just said, I was able to follow his work in the House of Commons as a caucus colleague. Tom did a tremendous job as whip for the Liberal Party and for members of the House of Commons in the late 1970s and early 1980s.

I can say that not only did Tom do an outstanding job as whip, but since he came to the Senate in 1984, Tom has always been available, loyal to his colleagues, loyal to our country and loyal to his people, his constituents and all those who were there last Tuesday. We could see it in the church. We really saw everybody and could realize how involved Senator Lefebvre was in his community, his riding and his region.

We are sorry that Tom will no longer be here among us. I expressed my sympathies to his wife and children and members of his family and told them about the respect we owe Tom. His death will leave a great emptiness in this Chamber. We really wish Tom eternal rest and I again offer his family my sympathies.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, of course I agree with everything that has been said so far about our late colleague Tom Lefebvre. I must say that he had been a member of the House of Commons for a long time and upon his arrival in the Senate, which I think was a year after I came here, I right away struck up a friendship with him and we would exchange a few words or even a wink to express how we felt on some political problem or other.

At caucus meetings of Liberal senators, we were almost always side by side, as if by chance. Despite the calls to order from the caucus chairman, it was quite hard for us not to exchange a few jokes or impressions.

As was mentioned, he had a long experience as whip. When I became whip, which was not a position that I especially wanted, one of the things I did was of course to ask our friend Tom Lefebvre for advice.

I was fortunate to be able to attend the funeral with many of my colleagues on both sides of this Chamber and the House of Commons. I must say that I do not like funerals much.

But, this time, I was profoundly moved by the atmosphere in this small modest church which I did not know and by all those people who were deeply moved by the loss of someone who was certainly much more than their former member of Parliament and who was in fact their friend for as long as they could remember. This feeling was noticeable in the eyes of those people, as well as in their attitude during the ceremony.

In front of the altar, there was a casket covered, not coincidentally, by a Canadian flag. It looked as though it was draped, in that Canadian flag. At the very end of the ceremony, the local bishop came to the microphone and told us that Senator Lefebvre, who believed in Canada with all his might, had requested that during his funeral service the assembly should be invited to sing "O Canada", which is not a common occurrence in the churches of Quebec, and probably not elsewhere either.

For the first time in my life I sang our national anthem with francophones and anglophones, Catholics and non-Catholics in a church. I do not think that I had ever sung "O Canada" with so much emotion.

On that note, I too would like to offer my most sincere condolences to the family of that great citizen of our country.

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, I had forgotten that today's sitting started exceptionally at 1:30 p.m. I am pleased to have the opportunity to say a few words about our colleague Tom Lefebvre.

Every time I look at the Ottawa River these days, I think of our dear colleague, Senator Tom Lefebvre. Not only or not so much because his residence is located along the shores of that large and beautiful river, but perhaps mostly because Senator Tom Lefebvre had one thing in common with this great river: he always knew were he was going. To me, this river will forever symbolize Senator Lefebvre's loyalty to his country, his province and the party to which he belonged all his life.

Powerful as this river which seldom flows over, Tom Lefebvre's loyalty was unshakeable once he was committed. I cherish the years spent together in the Commons where we had met for the first time as a precious memory.

[Senator Hébert.]

We were appointed to the Senate at the same time and had the privilege of working together often on parliamentary business. We also had the pleasure of travelling to a few areas of the world with our wives.

Senator Lefebvre was close to the people. He was very devoted to his people. He was very devoted to his area, his riding, the interests of which were served and very well so by Senator Lefebvre. It was no easy task because, on the one hand, Quebec politicians tend to lose sight of so-called remote areas, in the context of Quebec, such as western Quebec. On the other hand, that area might have been overlooked because it was too close to Ottawa. So, Tom made sure that the interests of his people and his area were always well defended.

As far as I am concerned, Senator Tom Lefebvre was above all a sensible man. I think we all realized that every time we saw him work as a parliamentarian. If some people, and I believe there are very few of them, saw him as a partisan politician, we must hasten to tell them they had the wrong impression: Tom always acted according to his most honest, sincere and profound convictions.

I would like at this time to give Tom's family the assurance of my friendship; also my wife joins me in extending our deepest sympathy.

GENERAL ELECTION

● (1410)

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday I described how, for ten days, the Conservative Government had, in the words of Senator Murray, shown nothing but contempt for the democratic process, and how it was afflicted, again in the words of Senator Murray, with "political cowardice"

Well, it is now 11 days. The contempt shown of the Canadian people grows, and the political cowardice I described becomes more firmly rooted.

Yesterday Senator Davey asked where one would find those wise and astute observations of Senator Murray. I direct colleagues to the Debates of the Senate of February 21, 1984, page 257, where Senator Murray was speaking on the motion for Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

For the record and for the edification of Senator Grimard, I think it is important to note that when Senator Murray spoke those immortal words, the Liberal government was but three days past its four-year mandate. Three days were enough to justify tossing around with abandon words such as "cowardice" and "contempt". One can only cringe when contemplating what Senator Murray would say today had his principles not shifted with the sands of time, and viewed from a different side of this house.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

CANADA-JAPAN INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TABLING OF REPORT OF THIRD ANNUAL MEETING

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the report of the third annual meeting of the Canada-Japan Inter-Parliamentary Group, which was held in Halifax and Charlottetown from August 30 to September 4, 1992.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Friday next, December 4, 1992, I will call the attention of the Senate to the economic statement to be made today by the Minister of Finance.

ROSE/ROTH SEMINARS

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Monday next, December 7, 1992, I will call the attention of the Senate to the Rose/Roth Seminars held in Moscow, Russia on June 29, 1992, and in Tallinn, Estonia on October 28, 1992, and to the participation therein of the Senate of Canada.

CHILD POVERTY

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a petition signed by 15 Canadians who wish to petition the Senate to take action respecting child poverty in Canada. The text of this petition has been read to the Senate a number of times so I will not read it again.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 508 citizens of Alberta who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Pincher Creek, Lethbridge, Calgary and Bellevue.

I have the honour to present petitions signed by 500 citizens of Quebec who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Dolbeau, Trois-Rivières, Shawinigan South, Laterrière, Saint-Honoré, Falardeau, Ile Perrot, Chicoutimi North, Saint-Germain, Saint-Nicéphore, Saint-Odilon, Saint-François-de-Sales, Vaudreuil, Quebec City, Charlesbourg, Drummondville and Jonquière.

These petitions were signed back in June, 1992, in case Senator Murray was wondering.

A grand total of 1,008 citizens that the Goods and Services Tax has been hurting for two years and who have not given up the hope of being heard one day by a more compassionate government than this one.

QUESTION PERIOD

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

REASONS FOR PROPOSED DRUG PATENT LEGISLATION—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. What reason does the government have for bringing before Parliament Bill C-91? I understand that one of the great advisors to the Tory party, Dalton Camp, says he cannot understand why a Tory would ever think of bringing such a bill before Parliament. What is the philosophy behind this bill?

In the Toronto Star of December 2, 1992, Dalton Camp writes:

> Those familiar with contemporary Tory dogma, including true believers, cannot locate the source of the government's deep-seated concern for the patent drug manufacturers, all of whom are from elsewhere. Certainly it has nothing to do with the competition since, in the drug business in this country, there is none. Nothing to do with deregulation since, as with the original bill, this son of C-22 imposes more regulation.

Where did the policy come from? Whose idea was it, and who put it forth in the Tory party?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the short answer to the question is to refer my honourable friend to the draft agreement reached by the participants in the multilateral trade negotiations and contained in the so-called Dunkel report of approximately a year ago. At that time, Mr. Wilson, the Minister of International Trade, announced that we would be implementing the agreement concerning intellectual property rights as of that date, December 1991.

Senator Bonnell: Since you have gone that far back, can you tell me where the Tory philosophy originated to put that measure into the free trade agreement, and to do away with medicare and drug control in this country?

Senator Perrault: They will try to blame Laurier!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, today, as yesterday, the honourable senator has raised the old and thoroughly discredited and deflated Liberal scare about the impact of the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States on medicare. The honourable senator may recall, to his sorrow, that when that scare was raised by the Liberal party during the last election, none other than the Honourable Emmett Hall, widely regarded as the father of medicare in this country, came forward to point out quite eloquently that the assertions of the Liberal party on that subject were absolutely without foundation.

Senator Perrault: And history has proved him wrong.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my reference to a trade agreement was not to the FTA; it was to the GATT, the multilateral negotiations in respect of which there was a consensus report issued by the Secretary General, Mr. Dunkel, last December.

As I said yesterday, effectively what will happen under this bill is that the patent protection will be extended, I believe, for another three years, and patented drugs will be placed on the same basis as other products covered in that section.

There is a great deal that can be said about this matter with regard to research and development investments in Canada, and also with regard to the fact that since Bill C-22 was passed by Parliament a few years ago, the prices of patented drugs have remained below the rate of inflation in this country.

Be that as it may, all of this is material for debate on Bill C-91, which will doubtless take place if and when that bill passes the House of Commons and comes to this house.

Senator Frith: Do not blame us, Lord; GATT made us do it!

BENEFIT TO CANADIAN CONSUMERS FROM PROPOSED DRUG PATENT LEGISLATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, it is nice to hear those words from the Leader of the Government in the Senate. He has a great command of the English language when it comes time to cover up. The fact is that his good advisor and Mr. Diefenbaker's good advisor, Dalton Camp, says this:

> Bill C-22, which was passed with some difficulty (thanks to the Senate) in 1987, created the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board, which was simply a fancy name for an outfit of indolents charged with keeping the generic drug manufacturers at bay so that the pharmaceutical manufacturers could enjoy greater profits for a longer time.

That is what he said.

Senator Cools: What are you reading from?

Senator Bonnell: I am reading from an article in the Toronto Star of December 2, 1992.

[Senator Perrault.]

Dalton Camp writes:

> The cost of drugs is already escalating in happy anticipation of the passage of C-91.
> In October, the prescription drug "Slo-K" (30 tablets) cost a consumer $9.45; in November, the same drug cost $11.17.

Senator Perrault: Disgusting.

Senator Bonnell: Mr. Camp goes on to say:

> Over the same two-month period, the cost of Novosemide (75 tablets) increased from $7.86 to $9.32.

Lanoxin, which many senators are probably taking for their heart, cost $11.35, but in November it went up to $13.30.

Senator Perrault: You are giving us a lethal dose of bad government.

Senator Bonnell: A spray called Nitrolingual, which you put under your tongue after you have had a heart attack, increased in price from $23.01 to $24.41 over the course of two months.

The drug Diltiazem was $38.32 one month, and the next had gone up to $39.72.

Senator Perrault: The whole country needs headache pills.

Senator Bonnell: Isordil, another heart pill, was $14.39 and rose by $1.20 in 30 days.

Honourable senators, the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board is doing no good. The anticipation of Bill C-91 is not helping the situation, either. My question is this: What will the government do to help consumers instead of manufacturers and drug companies in other countries?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I have already pointed out, in the years since Bill C-22 came into effect, the price increases of patented drugs have been below the increase in inflation.

Senator Thériault: Says who?

Senator Murray: With respect to how many products can you say that is the case?

Senator Frith: Flim-flam.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend has quoted at considerable length from a newspaper column written by Mr. Dalton Camp. Mr. Camp is a friend of mine, and a journalist. He is not a minister of the Crown. He is not a public servant.

Senator Thériault: He tells the truth.

Senator Murray: I am no more responsible for his opinions than he is for mine. All I have to say is that the time and place to quote Mr. Camp or anyone else as an authority on these matters is when Bill C-91 comes before us for debate, as I trust it will shortly.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I do not want to say that the minister is wrong, but —

Senator Frith: Why not!

Senator Bonnell: I think he is stretching the truth when he suggests that the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board kept the price of drugs below the cost of inflation in this country, which was down around 1 to 3 per cent.

Senator Barootes: It was not. It was 6 to 7 per cent last year.

Senator Bonnell: You have been telling us how the inflation rate has gone down, interest rates have gone down, the dollar has gone up, and now you have a different theory.

Senator Barootes: This year!

Senator Bonnell: I know that Senator Barootes' patients want him to support me in trying to keep the price of drugs down, rather than asking for the big companies, the Americans and the Japanese to take money away from our poor Canadian taxpayers who are having a tough time. Since that will increase the cost of medicare, what we are really doing in this country is destroying the medical system we are so proud of.

● (1430)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, these are matters for debate. I hope and expect that we shall have a debate at the appropriate time.

INCREASES IN EMPLOYMENT SINCE PATENT ACT AMENDMENT—REQUEST FOR STATISTICS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a further question on this subject. The Leader of the Government in the Senate may not have a reply in his desk to this question, but that well-heeled pharmaceutical lobby in Ottawa could easily provide it by telephone within a few minutes.

How many jobs have been created in Canada since the last round of greedy grasping at additional profits was authorized by Parliament? How many were sales jobs? How many related to original experimentation and development of new drugs?

An. Hon. Senator: Call Judy!

Senator Perrault: This is a valid question, but you are too slow to understand what I am trying to ask.

Senator Simard: Follow the rules.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order! Order, please.

Senator Perrault: The last time this matter came before the Senate committee by way of Bill C-22, I participated in those hearings. We were told at that time that those measures would open up a vast, new area of research in Canada, and that every province would benefit from this great expansion of opportunity for the drug companies through extra profits without extra plants.

Senator Barootes: They went to B.C.!

Senator Perrault: They are now waiving an experimental facility in British Columbia. They are telling British Columbians, "If you get behind this measure and support it, you will get a plant in British Columbia that manufactures headache pills" or something.

Senator Barootes: If you do not want the factory there, we will take it in Saskatchewan.

Senator Perrault: The eight years of Conservative government have placed this population in bad need of pain killers and valium. We should be producing more of that.

How many have been research jobs? That was the promise held out the last time we went through this process. How many of those jobs related to increasing the sales force? How many of them related to testing drugs that had been developed in other countries of the world? Those are three questions and they invite specific replies.

I have no doubt that if Parliament passes the bill now before us, in another two years they will say that "Our profits still are not large enough; we want another five-year extension."

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there should be no difficulty in obtaining the dollar figure of investments in the pharmaceutical industry in the past two years, or in obtaining some reading on the number of jobs that have been created. I do regret that Senator Perrault looks down his nose at sales jobs, however.

Senator Perrault: I do not look down my nose at sales jobs. We were promised original Canadian research facilities in this country. We were told at those hearings that this measure would vastly enhance Canadian science and research. We were told that we would not just be testing the AIDS drugs in Canada, but would be developing new substances to counteract AIDS and other diseases. I want to know whether we have done this.

I should like to know from the Leader of the Government in the Senate the specific illnesses which have seen Canadian researchers develop some answers right here in Canada.

Furthermore, I am shocked to hear members of the medical profession on the other side fighting for higher drug prices.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Senator Perrault: It seems rather disgraceful.

Senator Frith: Doctors, shame!

THE CONSTITUTION

PURCHASE OF MEDIA TIME AND SPACE—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I have a question on a slightly different subject. I realize that the minister may not be able to answer this question now, but could the Leader of the Government tell us how much media space and time was purchased on behalf of the federal government by the Genesis Media company during the months of September and October 1992?

Further, can the minister tell us how much of that money was specifically directed towards supporting the "Yes" side of the constitutional referendum issue? Further, could the minister tell us how much of that money was directed to the following campaigns: the Federal-Provincial Governments want a constitutional agreement; the shop-Canadian campaign; and the Canada 125 campaign?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not know the company that the honourable senator has mentioned, but I can get that information for him.

In answer to the question as to how much money the federal government spent on advertising in support of the "Yes" side of the referendum, the answer is zero.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh!

Senator Stollery: In that case, honourable senators, I have a further question. In addition to my previous three questions, how much time and space was purchased for the federal government by Genesis Media for the week preceding October 26, and how much time and space was purchased for the federal government by Genesis Media for the week following October 26?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will be glad to look into that matter and to bring the information to the house as soon as possible.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DENE CLAIMS RESPECTING LANDS COVERED BY NUNAVUT AGREEMENT— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government and concerns the Nunavut agreement in the Northwest Territories. I want to make it clear at the outset that I do not question the right and the decision of the Inuit people who voted on this matter. The quotes that I am about to read are not a criticism of the decision, but that has resulted in is a serious problem for some of the Dene or Indian bands in northern Manitoba.

To make the decision clear, I want to quote from a few of the leaders of that area. Band councillor Ernie Bussidor of the Fort Churchill Dene First Nation at Tadoule Lake says:

> For a decade or more, Manitoba Dene have been fighting to gain access to their traditional land across the 60th parallel, which separates the western provinces from NWT.

The land had been claimed earlier as part of the Northern Manitoba Dene's land entitlement under Treaty 5, signed in 1910.

Another leader, councillor Jerome Denechezhe, said:

[Senator Stollery.]

> We told them numerous times it was our land. Our elders have used that land and continue to occupy that land.

Chief Harold Turner, chairman of the Manitoba Keewatinowi Okimakanak said that the claims have been consistently ignored by federal Indian Affairs Minister Tom Siddon.

Another chief, Simon Samuel of the Northlands Denesuline First Nation at Lac Brochet, said that the minister and Canada ". . . have slammed every door in our faces when we tried to open the boundary issue."

The problem is that those northern Manitoba bands traditionally have hunted and occupied some of that land, not a large piece of the Nunavut settlement but north of the Manitoba boundary into the Northwest Territories, yet the Nunavut agreement does not include them at all. Apparently the federal government has not been prepared to listen to any of their claims.

Can the minister tell me why the government will not listen to them? Will they not consider the traditional claims of these bands to a small part of that territory?

● (1440)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, what I can do is obtain a report on the matter from my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and bring it to the attention of the Senate in a very short time.

THE ECONOMY

MONETARY POLICY OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government could give some assurance that this government will have a consistent, stable monetary policy —

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Yes, honourable senators.

Senator Olson: —and the interest rates that go with it? In the last little while we have seen the Bank of Canada change its so-called bank rate. It has been going up and down like a roller coaster. The banks themselves have changed their prime rate in the same way. In fact, in October they changed the prime rate by nearly 200 basis points in one week, even in advance of the Bank of Canada changing the bank rate.

This kind of monetary policy is extremely discouraging to anyone making capital investments because they cannot have any confidence that the monetary authorities, led by this government, will provide stability so that they can know what the interest charges will be on the capital they require. It seems to me that it would not be too difficult for the government to indicate that it will be the policy of the government to provide some stability, and do the things necessary to maintain that stability. My question is: When will this government do that?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the assertion of the honourable senator that capital investment has been discouraged by our monetary policy is not borne out by the facts. Capital investment has been increasing quite considerably, and I could put those statistics on the record for the honourable senator, though I will not do so at the moment.

As to the intervention of the Bank of Canada in the money markets and the weekly setting of the bank rate, I do not think it is accurate to say that it has been up and down like a roller coaster. The honourable senator is well aware of how volatile conditions have been in the international markets in Japan, Europe and elsewhere, and he will also be aware of the need to respond to those conditions, as the governor of the bank has done.

I would not describe the fluctuations in the bank rate in recent weeks, or even months, as being akin to a roller coaster. I should also point out that the bank rate is now set on Tuesdays, and I am sure the honourable senator will have greeted with satisfaction, as I did, the fact that yesterday the governor of the bank lowered the bank rate by 55 points.

Senator Olson: It went up 90 points the week before!

Senator Murray: The trend of the bank rate in recent months has been downward, and I hope that the honourable senator will find that this afternoon's statement by the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons will be such as not to place an undue burden on the monetary authorities.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the minister claimed that the bank rate had not been up and down like a roller coaster, then he proceeded to prove that it had been. It did go down on Tuesday; I do not remember the exact number.

Senator Murray: It was 55.

Senator Olson: Yes, and it went up about twice that amount the week before. If that is not tantamount to a roller coaster, I do not know what is.

The Leader of the Government surprises me when he says that capital investment in recent months has been so good, or something to the effect that it was satisfactory and that it could not be improved upon. If 1.6 million unemployed in Canada is a reflection of the level of capital investment that generates jobs in this country, and if that is satisfactory to the government, I think people would be interested in knowing that. Surely the minister did not mean that—or did he?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend speaks about unemployment, and he is right, it is unacceptably high, and we are doing everything we can to get it down. I have to tell him that employment rose by some 64,000 jobs in the last six months. So we are creating jobs fast enough to cover the quite considerable annual increase in the labour force, and then some.

YUGOSLAVIA

REFUGEES SEEKING ASYLUM IN CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Given the deteriorating situation in what was Yugoslavia, which has created hundreds of thousands of refugees, has the Canadian government made provision for accepting some of those refugees, and if so, have there been many requests? How many of those refugees are seeking refuge in Canada?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would have to ask for a report on that matter from my colleague, Mr. Valcourt, the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

UNITED NATIONS

APPROVAL OF U.S.-LED FORCE FOR SOMALIA

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government may know the answer to this question or he may not. I was looking at a report in the Ottawa Citizen concerning the UN Security Council approval of a U.S.-led force for Somalia. The second paragraph reads:

> The force would be charged with disarming the warring factions there and ensuring that international aid reaches that country's starving people.

Is this the first time we have ever participated in such an operation? In fact, it may be the first time that there has ever been such a UN operation. I am referring to crossing the borders to disarm combatants in order to make sure food gets through. I am not making any comment about whether it is good or bad, I just wonder whether that is the first time such an operation has taken place.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe it is, and that it is the first time there has been such an exercise contemplated by the United Nations.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

RELEASE OF INFORMATION BY RUSSIAN AUTHORITIES ON 1983 DOWNING OF SOUTH KOREAN AIRCRAFT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. During the recess, the Soviet authorities released information with respect to the downing of the Korean airliner. Apparently all the communications that were held in the Soviet ministry were released. We hope they will throw some light on how that very tragic event occurred.

At the time, Canada took a very serious view because Canadian lives were lost and Canada-Soviet relations were put in the deep freeze for a considerable time. I also believe we asked for compensation and that at the time the Soviet Union was very reluctant to even answer communications from the Government of Canada. That is in the past.

I wonder whether, upon examination of this additional information, the Department of External Affairs and the Department of National Defence have had any reason to revise the attitudes which were taken at that time based on the information at hand, and whether Canadian interest in this matter is still alive? Are we holding any discussions with Russian authorities subsequent to the new information? Honourable senators, I give the question as notice, if the leader wishes to take it as notice.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Yes, honourable senators, I shall have to make inquiries and report back.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORT OF TASK FORCE ON MILITARY HISTORY MUSEUM COLLECTIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is with regard to the report tabled last year by the Task Force on Military History Museum Collections in Canada. This task force was established by Mr. McKnight back in June 1990. The report is dated January 1991. There was a press release from the minister, Mr. Marcel Masse, in April of 1991.

● (1450)

There has been no response from the government to this task force report, yet I believe the subject matter had been considered urgent. In fact, that body reported very quickly, which is unusual for task forces.

When can we expect the government response to the proposals contained in that report?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will have to make inquiries.

AGRICULTURE

DRAFT REPORT ON GRAIN TRANSPORTATION—REQUEST FOR COPY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): While the Leader of the Government in the Senate is making the previous inquiry, perhaps he could also try to obtain for us a copy of the draft report on grain transportation which was worked on by the provincial and federal agricultural ministers earlier this year. That draft report apparently indicates that Manitoba farmers will have to pay triple the rate to ship their grain. There has been an admission to that effect by the Manitoba agriculture minister. I presume if the provincial minister agrees that it will triple the rates, then that must appear in the report. Could we obtain a copy of that report?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall ask my cabinet colleague what information he can properly table in the Senate on that matter at this time.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that all further orders, motions and inquiries be allowed to stand, on the understanding that the calendar will not be altered.

The Hon. The Speaker: Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, December 3, 1992

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

SENATOR MIGUEL ALEMAN AND JORGE DE LA VEGA

The Hon. The Speaker: Honourable senators, I would bring to your attention the presence in the gallery of Senator Miguel Aleman, accompanied by His Excellency, the Ambassador to Mexico, Mr. Jorge de la Vega.

Senator Aleman is treasurer of the PRI Party, the government party of Mexico, and is here on a working visit. Welcome.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS REMAINING IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, for 12 days now the government has shown, according to the words of Senator Murray, "political cowardice" and "contempt" for the democratic process because of its failure to hold a general election.

Yesterday, I provided all senators with information as to where they could find these wise words of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Those who rushed to the Debates of the Senate of February 21, 1984, and after reading his entire speech, would undoubtedly have checked to ensure that, in fact, it was given in 1984 and not in 1992. I suggest to honourable senators that they think of him giving the speech when he was on this side of the chamber. At that time Senator Murray also stated:

> The new government that will be elected soon—or as soon as the present government has the courage to call the election in this fifth year of its mandate—will have to grapple with many serious problems, chief among which is the dismal state of our economy. The Canadian economy is in a prolonged period of underachievement: underachievement by our own historical standards and underachievement by current international standards. The most urgent problem facing the new government will be to reverse the economic decline that we have known.

I say to the leader of the Government in the Senate "Hear, hear!"

His words, as I will show next week, were misplaced in 1984 but they are very timely today. The sooner that he and his colleagues summon up the courage to call an election, the sooner he will be able to repeat such eloquence from where he belongs, namely, on this side of the chamber.

JAMES ROBINSON JOHNSTON CHAIR IN BLACK CANADIAN STUDIES

ESTABLISHMENT OF CHAIR AT DALHOUSIE UNIVERSITY

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to register my congratulations to Senator Oliver for his part in an event of historic importance to Canada's cultural life, as celebrated last evening under his auspices. I speak of the establishment of the James Robinson Johnston Chair in Black Canadian Studies at Dalhousie University. From the material that was available at the event he hosted last evening, and from other material that I have obtained, I can note for our record those congratulations.

The James Robinson Johnston Chair in Black Canadian Studies is the first chair and related academic program in the country dedicated to the study of Black Canadian perspectives, history, culture and contributions.

I was particularly struck, as were many others, that this occasion marked not only the establishment of a Chair for a professor, but that the program combines a number of vehicles to elucidate Black perspectives of Canadian history and culture for local and national academic institutions and community organizations. These include teaching, research and community service; scholarships for Black graduate students; curriculum revision and development; library acquisitions; and visiting lectures.

I congratulate Senator Oliver and everyone else who had anything to do with this important event. I feel that the fruit of this historic tree will nourish Canada's social, economic and cultural life for countless generations.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

IMPACT ON POOR CANADIANS

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Honourable senators, it is now one day after the so-called mini-budget. Instead of attacking unemployment, the government has attacked the unemployed. There are 3.8 million Canadians who live below the poverty level, including 1.3 million children.

A recent report quotes U.S. branch plant managers as saying that "After the free trade deal passed, of course we rethought our situation and decided that all we needed here was a warehouse, and we would relocate south of the border," as we have seen.

The proposed drug bill will soon be before us. The drug companies will continue to gouge, as they have been doing since 1969.

DAI AL-MUTLAQ

OPPOSITION TO INCORPORATION AS CORPORATION SOLE

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: In times like these, honourable senators, it is outrageous to me that government senators are persisting with Senator Atkins' bill to incorporate the Dai al-Mutlaq as a corporation sole. This is a weird, contentious, querulous sect from Bombay. It is proposed in this bill that the tyrannical and much opposed leader of this sect be recognized by the Senate of Canada as a corporation sole, to be able to handle the money of this sect without any control by a board of directors. Why? Because he has paid a fat fee to a Tory lawyer in Toronto, who happens to know the Leader of the Government, who has asked Senator Atkins to push this thing on us.

They fiddle while Rome burns, doing favours for dubious characters, for dubious clients of dubious Tory lawyers, instead of dealing with more important issues. They want us to send this bill to a committee, taking up the time of senators and of Parliament and wasting money in order to do a favour for somebody whom half of his followers consider a criminal.

TRANSPORT CANADA

CANADIAN COAST GUARD—STATION CLOSURES IN NEW BRUNSWICK AND NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, some time ago I brought to the attention of this house a campaign by the Letete Central Monitoring Station in New Brunswick.

As a follow-up in this matter, Mr. Ralph A. Eldridge, Keeper of the Letete Central Monitoring Station, has again written to all members of Parliament seeking their support to prevent the closure of this station. I would put on the record his brief letter of November 25, 1992, in which he says:

> Honourable member;
> I am again writing to you on the matter of de-staffing lightstations in general and Letete CMS in particular.
> The Department of Transport, on review of the costs of establishing a central lightstation monitoring facility for the Maritimes, now admit that locating at Saint John, N.B. will not save any money.
> The un-admitted truth is that locating at Letete, N.B. will be $40,000 to $50,000 per year cheaper and has the added benefit of maintaining 4 existing jobs in a depressed area —

— an area that I know well —

> — instead of spending money to try to create new jobs.

[Senator Gigantès.]

With Parliament now sitting and the national economy being an agenda priority, I would point out this small but real opportunity to put into practice a bit of the fiscal policy for assisting employment while reducing the cost of government services.

I again ask that you make representation to the Minister of Transport, on behalf of Lightkeepers, and urge the Minister to "KEEP LETETE", and to maintain our few remaining staffed lightstations.

Mr. Eldridge adds:

> P.S.: Received your letter regarding raising this matter in the Senate. Thank you for getting it on the record.

I therefore urge the Minister of Transport, and whoever is taking notes for him out there, to hear the people of Letete. Hear the workers of the central monitoring station.

DAI AL-MUTLAQ

OPPOSITION TO INCORPORATION AS CORPORATION SOLE

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Time permitting, I would turn to another subject and endorse, for other reasons, the comments made by my colleague Senator Gigantès regarding Dai al-Mutlaq and his incorporation as a corporation sole.

• (1410)

I believe this matter to be so controversial that it ought not to go to committee before it receives a full airing of views from senators on both sides of the house at second reading stage. In fact, as one who opposed the incorporation of Opus Dei for other reasons, I have even graver and more serious reasons for opposing this group. I will fight them to the end.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF TRAGEDY AT L'ÉCOLE POLYTECHNIQUE

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, for the past three years at this time, we have set aside a few moments to reflect on the issue of violence against women. Last year, December 6 became a national day of remembrance. I would like to say a few words today because the Senate will not be sitting on that date.

We did not choose December 6 as the day to talk about this issue. Three years ago, that day was chosen for us by a deranged individual with a semi-automatic weapon and plenty of ammunition. He walked into L'École Polytechnique in Montreal and gunned down 14 students. It was a massacre. There is simply no other way to describe it.

What makes his actions even more horrifying and chilling is that the killer segregated his victims by gender and, expressing his hatred for feminists, killed only women before turning the gun on himself.

The 14 young women whose lives ended that day were: Genevieve Bergeron, Hélene Colgan, Nathalie Croteau, Barbara Daigneault, Anne Marie Edward, Maud Haviernick, Barbara Marie Klueznick, Maryse Laganiere, Maryse Leclair, Anne-Marie Lemay, Sonia Pelletier, Michelle Richard, Annie St. Arnault and Annie Turcotte. We remember their names because they are not faceless and anonymous statistics. They represent sisters, daughters and friends. We also remember and pay our respects to the families and friends who still suffer the heartbreak and anguish of seeing those young lives ended so brutally.

December 6 is a day to remember all the other victims of violence against women across this country and the people they leave behind. Recently released figures from Statistics Canada reveal the continuing and shocking reality: 49 per cent of all violent crimes in Canada are committed against women; 34 per cent of all homicide victims are women; 62 per cent of assaults on women and 67 per cent of murders of women take place in their own home; and 48 per cent of women murdered are killed by their spouse. It is estimated that figure could rise upwards of 78 per cent if the attacks of current and former male companions were included.

This is by no means the whole story. It is estimated that less than one-third of all incidents of violence against women are even reported. We do not know about it. It is hidden. It causes untold hardship and indescribable pain. It is rooted in economic difficulties and poverty, in alcohol and drug abuse, in a too easy acceptance of violence as a way to solve inter-personal conflicts. Much of it has its roots in behaviour learned from abusive parents, grandparents and other relatives. It becomes easy to do and easy to get away with. It leads to unequal treatment, discrimination, harassment, assault and rape. The ultimate manifestation is murder.

The gun control law passed about a year ago is in effect. By no means is it perfect. However, it is a step in the right direction. We have also taken steps to protect victims of rape and sexual assaults through the rape shield law which came into effect this summer.

The Canadian Panel on Violence against Women has been holding often agonizing hearings across the country over the past year and will report its findings and recommendations next spring. A private members' bill has been introduced by our women's critic, Mary Clancy, in the House of Commons to attempt to deal with chronic abuse of wives and children.

Now we are seeing women reach the point of fear and despair where they take violent action themselves against an abuser, compounding the violence into a full circle. In some instances, the courts have taken into account in their decisions the overwhelming impact that persistent battering has on a spouse.

I notice today some of our colleagues are wearing the white ribbon. The White Ribbon Campaign initiated last year by men against violence against women has expanded, and it offers a welcome and valuable focus on the issue. It is working in terms of advocacy, but also to encourage men who commit violent acts to seek help to face and understand their situation.

The simple message of this special day, and of every other day, must be that society cannot tolerate acts of violence or terrorism against women, children, and men. As legislators and individuals, we must use every opportunity to make that message a reality, and end the tragic waste of lives and productive futures of thousands of Canadians in every part of this country each year.

[Translation]

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I want to join with my colleague Senator Fairbairn and all the honourables senators in this House to commemorate this day which has been dedicated to the opposition to violence against women, children and society as a whole.

I would rather not go back over the events at the Ecole Polytechnique because I was associated to them indirectly, not to the extent and in the same way of course as the parents whose daughters were killed in that tragedy, but I knew several of the young women who were studying at the Ecole Polytechnique as they were friends of my daughter's. So we have lived those events with some intensity.

Must I remind you that even the Ecole Polytechnique tragedy does not seem to have hit home. I can only talk for Quebec because that is where I live and we do not hear much about what is going on in the other provinces, although the situation in Manitoba comes to mind, where the number of women victim of violent death is very high.

We could talk about violence against native women because this is a very big problem in their communities. Just a couple of days ago, a women killer was found, with an admitted dislike for women since his childhood. He has not been charged yet, but he did confess to having killed two, three women, maybe more. That has not been established as of yet.

I would like to take this opportunity to underscore the move—and it may mean that there is hope after all—the young Virginie Larivière made a few days ago when she came and tabled in the House of Commons a petition signed by 1,250,000 people, if I am not mistaken, calling for concrete steps to be taken against violence.

We could—and I think we should do so in this House —commemorate December 6 year after year. We should really go beyond these kind words which, unless translated into actions, become almost meaningless.

I would like to point out the action taken by the Minister of Health and Welfare who has just granted funds to five universities across Canada—one in Western Canada, one in Ontario, one in Quebec, one in the Maritimes and a fifth one I do not know where —specifically to look for and thoroughly research the causes of violence.

It is time for action. We know the statistics. The saddest thing is that they seem to get higher from one year to the next instead of going down. It is high time we act on this.

I do not know whether the measures announced by the Minister of Finance yesterday will limit the amounts granted to these institutions and to certain interest groups. I do not know and I have some reservations about this. Nevertheless, will these cuts also affect support groups? This may be discriminatory, but I would suggest that serious thought be given to shelters for battered women and to all the voluntary movements fighting against violence so that women will not be affected by it or as little as possible.

At any rate, this is the wish I make here and I am pretty sure it is shared by my colleagues. Thank you, honourable senators.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

EIGHTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX TO MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, the Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations has the honour to present its eighth report regarding section 23 of the Territorial Lands Act.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this House.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day, p. 1533)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Grimard, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable Senators, I have the honour to present the Ninth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

THURSDAY, December 3, 1992

[Senator Lavoie-Roux.]

The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has the honour to present its

NINTH REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized by the Senate on Thursday, November 21, 1991, to examine and report on negotiations for a North American free trade agreement among Canada, the United States and Mexico and any other related trade developments, respectfully requests that the date of presenting its final report be extended from December 17, 1992 to no later than March 31, 1993.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN B. STEWART
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Stewart, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

EIGHTY-EIGHTH CONFERENCE, STOCKHOLM, SWEDEN—REPORT TABLED

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present, in English and in French, the report of the Eighty-eighth Inter-Parliamentary Conference held in Stockholm, Sweden, on September 7-12, 1992.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ATTENTION DEFICIT HYPERACTIVITY DISORDER—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Mabel M. DeWare: Honourable senators, I wish to give notice that on December 10, 1992, I will call the attention of the Senate to a concern among our parents, educators, medical profession and psychologists of a disability affecting a large percentage of our young people called ADHD, Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder.

CHILD POVERTY

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 14 residents from Newfoundland who call upon the Senate to do everything possible to assist in eliminating child poverty in Canada by the year 2000. The petition continues:

> WHEREAS in 1989 the House of Commons unanimously adopted a motion to seek the elimination of poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000, yet poverty among Canadian children and families continues by all measures to be as serious or greater now compared to 1989, and
> WHEREAS Canadian child poverty yields enormous and increasing costs: 1) to administrations of health care, education, justice, and social welfare, 2) to national productivity through inadequate learning and preparation for employment, and it is quite clear that sound national financial management demands the prevention of poverty, and

WHEREAS Canada ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and has a moral obligation to seek the elimination of child poverty in Canada, and

WHEREFORE the undersigned, your Petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate of Canada to do all possible to assist in eliminating child poverty in Canada by the year 2000,

And as in duty bound you petitioners will ever pray.

Senator Gigantès: Let the government resign. That is the best way to save the children from poverty.

Senator Cochrane: Honourable senators, as well, I have similar petition from 10 residents in the province of Ontario who represent the cities of Ottawa, Nepean and Gloucester. The undersigned also call upon the Senate of Canada to do all possible to assist in eliminating child poverty in Canada by the year 2000.

Senator Gigantès: The government has just made the unemployed poorer.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 500 citizens of Quebec who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Dolbeau, Jonquière, Chicoutimi-Nord, La Tuque, Cap-de-la-Madeleine, Saint-Honoré, Tadoussac, Saint-Fulgence, Saint-André, Vaudreuil, Lac Bouchette, Trois-Rivières, Laterrière, Saint-Ambroise, Knowlton et Wickham.

I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 189 citizens of Ontario who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Kapuskasing, Hearst, Belle Vallée, New Liskeard and Val Rita.

These petitions were signed in October 1992, senator Murray.

A total of 689 Canadian citizens continue to oppose the GST and call on the Senate, with wonderful confidence, as though they did not already know that the majority of senators do not want to have anything to do with ordinary people who sign petitions.

QUESTION PERIOD

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

EXPENDITURE CONTROLS—PROPOSED SALARY FREEZE FOR PUBLIC SERVANTS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday in the House of Commons, the Finance Minister, Mr. Mazankowski, made a major statement on the Canadian economy and indicated a number of expenditure controls. On of the controls that he mentioned was a salary freeze for the public service, and he proceeded to list a number of positions which would be affected by that measure: For example, the Governor General, the Lieutenant Governors, the Prime Minister, ministers, members of the Parliament, senators, the federal judiciary, and so on, and public servants. I assume that this means the whole of the public service.

● (1430)

I think that all honourable senators have recently received the poverty profile produced by the National Council on Welfare. They no longer talk about the poverty threshold; they now speak of low-income cutoffs. They indicate that for a family of three, the low income cut off is $24,000 in communities of 500 or more. Statistics Canada, in a report received by me this morning, indicates that in 1990, that threshold for families of four adults would be $26,000; for three adults and one child $24,000; and so on. The range is roughly in that vicinity of $24,000. Yet we find that here in the Senate we have employees who start work at their opening level of $21,000, ranging to $24,000.

Do the minister and the government consider it fair to freeze the salaries of those people who are at the bottom of the salary scale? It is one thing to freeze the salaries of the Governor General, the Prime Minister, the ministers and even senators, but surely people who are down at the poverty threshold should not have their salaries frozen for the next two years. Will the government reconsider this measure?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is a debating point and a matter which we can explore in the course of the debate on this financial statement in the Inquiry to be launched by our colleague, Senator MacEachen, on Friday next.

Senator Molgat: Does the minister not consider that a real unfairness will be visited upon people at the bottom of the wage scale by freezing their salaries for two years? Surely that is not a fair proposition for the government to put forward. Does the minister not agree?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there are many factors that can be taken into account here, including job security that a great many of these people have, and that others now unemployed might certainly envy. However, these are points to be discussed at length when we pursue Senator MacEachen's Inquiry.

CONTRACT FOR THE BUILDING OF FIXED LINK TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, my good friend, the honourable Don Mazankowski, made an elaborate statement yesterday on the economy. He massacred the Canadian public, especially the unemployed and the poor. However, he did mention Prince Edward Island's fixed link. He went on to elaborate on how the government would spend some money there on the environment and engineering, but he did not say if the contract would be put forward for the building of a fixed link, nor did he give proposals one way or the other. He merely left the people of Prince Edward Island confused.

Can the minister elaborate on what the Minister of Finance said yesterday, so that the people of Prince Edward Island will know what is meant by "expenditures in engineering and the environment?"

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the text of Mr. Mazankowski's statement reads as follows:

> Advanced engineering and environmental work on the Prince Edward Island fixed crossing project will be undertaken to allow construction of this $800 million project to begin in the spring. This will directly create an average of almost 1,000 jobs each year over the construction period and will provide enormous spinoff benefits for the economy of Atlantic Canada.

Clearly, honourable senators, the Minister of Finance expects that the advanced engineering and environmental work, as he describes it, would be completed and that everything would be in place for construction to begin on the fixed link this spring.

Senator Bonnell: Can I tell the people of Prince Edward Island that you, as a minister of the government, have announced that here today, and that it will begin this spring regardless of the environmental study and regardless of the engineering study?

● (1440)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think we all know that there is an environmental process underway, and that engineering studies have been done. The honourable senator also knows what state we are at concerning the proposals from the various firms interested in undertaking this work. All it will take now is an agreement, as one of the documents points out, from the province of Prince Edward Island that undertaking this link will absolve future governments of any obligation to retain the Borden-Tormentine ferry service.

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Bonnell: Does that mean that the Government of Canada has accepted the 10 points put forward by Premier Joe Ghiz that will be announced before he leaves office at the end of January? Apparently he has some big job coming up.

Senator Petten: Has he?

Senator Murray: Move over, senator.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Speak to your whip.

Senator Bonnell: Answer my question.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not quite recall all of the 10 points that Premier Ghiz has put forward. I am sure they are all valid points worthy of every consideration, and have received every consideration. I hope the premier will support the construction of the fixed link, and I continue to nourish a hope that by the time the construction begins, we may have a favourable statement from Senator Bonnell.

THE CONSTITUTION

AUTHORITY FOR CONTRACTS RELATING TO REFERENDUM

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I have a brief question for the Leader of the Government. In what office or capacity did the Leader of the Government in the Senate approve or authorize contracts related to the constitutional referendum? What goods or services were to be provided? Who were the contractors? To what appropriations were the contracts charged and, in the case of each contract, what payment is entailed? My question follows from an exchange that took place in the House of Commons yesterday, and a report in the Ottawa Citizen today.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I take it that the honourable senator is giving notice of his questions. They should be put on the Order Paper, and I will reply to them in writing in due course.

TRANSPORT

CANADIAN AIRLINE INDUSTRY—EQUIVALENT TAXATION SITUATION TO AMERICAN INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, the government is inordinately given to proclaiming its dedication to the principles of fair play and equality. The statement made by the Minister of Finance yesterday suggests that this government believes that the poor, dispossessed, single mothers and those who have gone through the agony of unemployment in Canada have been ripping off the system. Perhaps the Leader of the Government will tell us what persuaded him and his cabinet colleagues to designate those people least able to defend themselves in society to bear the brunt of this savage attack on their well-being?

Senator Gigantès: It is because only rich Tories are allowed to rip the system off.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, our colleague Senator MacEachen has done us the service of putting a Notice of Inquiry on the Order Paper to discuss and debate Mr. Mazankowski's economic statement. That Notice of Inquiry would come due tomorrow, or first thing next week. I will certainly be here and I hope to take part in the debate. I hope to hear from my friend Senator Perrault at that time.

Senator Doody: That is something to look forward to.

Senator Perrault: Yes, I plan to be heard from on that occasion.

Senator Phillips: That debate will take place on a Friday.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have another question relating to fair play. In the government's efforts to protect the delicate profit position of the pharmaceutical industry in Canada, we are told that it is only fair play to create a level playing field by establishing protection for pharmaceutical research firms at the same level as that enjoyed in the United States and other countries. This is the prime argument propelling Bill C-91 through Parliament.

However, in the airline industry another standard is applied, and the government has adopted another philosophy and policy. Canadian airlines, desperately seeking to survive, pay far higher fuel taxes and landing fees than airlines in the United States. If it is of fundamental importance to establish a level playing field for pharmaceutical companies to pursue their efforts in world competition in the United States and other countries, then surely it is of equal importance to attempt to establish a level landing strip for the airlines of Canada.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend is anticipating the debate on Bill C-91, which I trust will take place at second reading here in a very short time. Again I invite him to take part in the debate, as honourable senators on this side most certainly will.

With regard to the situation facing the airline industry in Canada, there is nothing unique about it. The honourable senator will know that the gravest financial difficulties are confronting airlines everywhere. He will have seen the financial results affecting virtually all the airlines in the United States. He will also know that we are, and have been for some time, engaged in "open skies" negotiations with the United States administration. Further, he will know that with regard to Canadian Airlines International, the federal government put up more than $200 million last summer to take some aircraft off their hands. Recently we have put up another $50 million in an effort to enable the employees —who have made a very important and generous gesture of their own —creditors, management and others involved in CAIL to examine all possible alternatives for the future. If my friend wants to suggest other approaches we might take, we will be glad to hear from him at the appropriate time.

Senator Perrault: Can I take it from the leader's remarks that the government is giving consideration to the possibility of providing the same tax levels for aviation fuel and landing fees in Canada as those which exist for the airlines of the United States? He said the government was seeking ways to assist the industry. I commend the efforts of the government in that direction, but it would be manifestly fair and would evoke no criticism from the United States or U.S. carriers to establish the same tax levels on aviation fuel and landing fees in Canada as they have in the U.S. It would surely not provoke any kind of a challenge from the other side of the border.

Senator Molgat: Wishful thinking.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Senator Perrault is taking an example of two or three taxes. I do not think that tells quite the whole story. Canadian airlines are not at such a terrible disadvantage vis-a-vis the American airlines in the tax regime, taken as a whole. I think he will also find, if he examines the situation, that we have taken steps in recent years to ease the tax burden on airlines in this country, including taxes on aviation fuel and the like.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the government in many ways operates in the never-never world of complete unreality. In the U.S., travel firms advertise extensively in Canadian newspapers and the message is, "Drive over the border and park your car. You can travel at less cost on U.S. carriers. There will be no taxes, no GST, and you will not bear the airport departure taxes they have in Canada. Join in and have fun." They advertise trips all over the world.

We suggested that this would happen at the time of the GST debate. It is happening now, making it very difficult for the Canadian travel industry, not only in British Columbia but in many other provinces. Thousands of Canadians are pouring across the border to Washington State to avail themselves of the lower cost airfares now available in the U.S.

• (1450)

It is absolutely essential that we address some of these issues if we are ever to solve the problem of creating two profitable air carriers in Canada. I think we would all agree that both Air Canada and Canadian Airlines are two of the best carriers in the world. The initiative of Canadian Airline employees is to be commended, and should be recognized by all of us, but they need more understanding on the part of this government and all of us here.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, at the present time I am informed that 13 per cent of the world's air carriers are in bankruptcy, and that 30 per cent of the fleet in the United States belongs to bankrupt carriers. If they have such a marvellous advantage over Canada, perhaps the honourable senator could explain this.

Senator Gigantès: The results of Reaganism, Thatcherism and Conservatism.

Senator Perrault: The point we are discussing is not the plight of the airline industry world wide. We agree on the fact that all air carriers throughout the world are going through the most difficult time in their history. What I am saying is that surely our special responsibility is to assist those two great Canadian air carriers, Canadian Airlines and Air Canada.

There are certain things that can be done. For example, I would like to see an easing of the GST, or some recognition of the fact that Canadians are still streaming across the border. The lower Canadian dollar has helped in our attempt to compete with U.S. air carriers and companies doing business on the other side of the border. However, there are certain practical steps that can be taken to make this industry more competitive, totally apart from government grants and loan guarantees.

It is unacceptable for the leader to rise in his place and say that it is tough all over fellows, and don't expect too much because Lufthansa and British Airways are going through the same experience. We have a responsibility to do good things for our Canadian carriers, regardless of what is happening elsewhere.

POSSIBILITY OF ADDITIONAL PROVINCIAL GUARANTEES FOR CANADIAN AIRLINES INTERNATIONAL LIMITED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I wish to ask a supplementary question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate on this matter.

At the time it was decided to advance $50 million by way of loan and guarantee to Canadian Airlines, what efforts were made to obtain concomitant commitments from the western provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Manitoba? As yet, I am unaware that they have made any specific commitments of the type made by the federal government.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am aware that there have been discussions informally between representatives of the federal government and those provinces, as well as the province of Ontario where several thousand employees of Canadian Airlines International live. The airlines themselves have also had discussions with those provinces. At the moment I cannot say what the status of those discussions are, but we hope and expect that some of those provinces will indeed come to the party.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

PROPOSED RESTRICTIONS ON UI BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It arises out of the economic and fiscal statement made by the Minister of Finance, and is particularly focused on the part concerning unemployment insurance benefits.

The statement begins by talking about the benefits being frozen, and how this will affect people. Then there is a sentence which almost, but not quite, leaves me speechless. It states:

> As well, persons who voluntarily quit their jobs without just cause, or who lose their jobs because of their own misconduct, will no longer receive UI benefits.

I am saddened that the Minister of Finance would have allowed someone to slip this into his statement; it can only be a proposition that was put together by people in the Department of Finance sitting in a dark and airless room —

Senator Molgat: With guaranteed employment.

Senator Fairbairn: Indeed, with guaranteed employment.

I am upset about this, because the people who are most vulnerable and who will be most affected by this proposal are women at the lower end of the earning scale.

Could the minister explain to me who decides what is the "just cause" and who decides what is the "misconduct" that relieves these people of their rights to unemployment insurance benefits?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am informed that there are already specific provisions in the unemployment insurance legislation to define what is "just cause". Quitting unsafe working conditions, to follow a relocating spouse, and because of sexual harassment are situations which are considered a "just cause" by unemployment insurance legislation.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, that is a very narrow list of just cause and, presumably, misconduct.

May I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate where in his list of exemptions is there a provision for a woman who is unable to either afford or to find child care and therefore must leave a job, presumably to go on welfare and receive absolutely nothing in the way of unemployment insurance under this legislation?

Senator Murray: I speak from recollection, but I seem to think that is also covered. Our friend the Minister of Employment and Immigration, Mr. Valcourt has already made a statement about this matter. I do not have a copy of it in front of me, but I will obtain more information and bring it into the chamber as soon as possible.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Government. When he is bringing back this information, will he tell us in, the case he listed of sexual harassment, what would be an exemption, a just cause? How will a person who must prove the just cause of that type of situation of sexual harassment—which will take an enormous length of time—be treated in the interim? Will he or she be dropped immediately from receiving unemployment insurance, or will it carry on while going through the courts, the Human Rights Commission, or whatever? What are the parameters? It seems a highly arbitrary and offensive measure to be included in any economic statement.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, those are opinions expressed by the honourable senator. We can debate them during the debate on Senator MacEachen's Notice of Inquiry.

When the honourable senator speaks of the time that it takes to prove—as she puts it—a case of sexual harassment, I hope she is not trying to discourage women who are the victims of sexual harassment from calling the cops. I think all of us want to encourage that to happen.

Senator Fairbairn: Absolutely, honourable senators. Far from trying to discourage women to have the courage to come forward and do that, I am suggesting that a sentence such as is contained in this particular document does exactly that; it discourages women who have no other recourse in terms of earning ability from coming forward and going through that process.

• (1500)

Senator Murray: I just told the honourable senator that the UI legislation lists sexual harassment as one of the situations which is considered just cause. The honourable senator wants more information on the process. I will obtain that information for her.

THE ECONOMY

CUTS IN CABINET AND CURTAILING OF SENATE APPOINTMENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Would the honourable Leader of the Government convey to the Prime Minister that an additional way of saving money might be a formal undertaking not to appoint any new senators, thus saving their salary, the costs of the staff, et cetera? You have a comfortable majority. You do not need any new senators.

Further, there was some discussion of cutting the number of ministers. If the United States manages with 13, why do we need 39? If you cut ministers, you will save even more money. Would you kindly transfer this suggestion to the Prime Minister?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): As the honourable senator knows from reading news reports on the subject, our cabinet colleague the Secretary of State, Mr. De Cotret, has completed a study and presented a report to the Prime Minister which is concerned, among others things, with reducing the size of the federal cabinet. That will be taken into consideration, and I think I can say with confidence that action will be taken.

As to the first part of the honourable senator's question, I think on reflection he would agree that it is hardly fair that some provinces should be under-represented for a long period of time in one of the Houses of Parliament. I think he agrees that some of the western provinces, in proportion to their population, are under-represented even when all the Senate seats from those provinces are filled. It will be the Prime Minister's intention to fill the vacant Senate seats within a short time, so I advise my honourable friend to move over and make room.

Senator Gigantès: If that is the case, are you implying that it is fair to cut 3 per cent from the unemployment benefits of the poorest of the poor, and that that kind of unfairness is acceptable so as not to be unfair to Tory friends of the Prime Minister who would like to come to the Senate?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Senate appointments of Prime Minister Mulroney have been of a consistently high order, and I do not think Honourable Senator Gigantès need have any apprehension that the eight or nine appointments which will be announced within the next little while will be any different.

TRANSPORT

CANADIAN AIRLINE INDUSTRY—TAXATION SITUATION—AMENDMENT TO PREVIOUS STATEMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: As honourable senators are aware, I attempt to be meticulously fair in any statements that I make in this chamber. I want to add to remarks I made while posing a previous question regarding the airline industry, to point out that the fault lies not entirely with the federal government in this matter of taxation.

The provinces of Canada have a provincial fuel tax which is far higher than the United States. For instance, the highest state tax in the United States is five cents per gallon, whereas in Canada the provinces of B.C., Alberta and Manitoba charge five cents per litre. Therefore, this problem is not the total responsibility of the federal government; it is not the only villain. The disparity in this case, when one converts gallons and litres, would be approximately a four times higher cost in Canada than in the United States, taking into account that the federal government has a four-cent-a-litre domestic excise tax in Canada and there is no such tax in the United States.

I have a supplementary question for the leader. I know that he attempts to be fair-minded in all things. The Conference Board of Canada undertook a study in 1991 which concluded that Canada imposes excessive taxation on the airline industry, which makes a total "open skies" environment between Canada and the United States inappropriate because of the uneven playing field.

This is what I said earlier. Let us establish a level landing strip for all of the carriers.

In light of the view taken by the Conference Board of Canada and its conclusions in 1991, is any consideration being given by the government to the idea of abandoning this "open skies" environment and restoring a degree of at least some common sense in regulation, instead of the deregulation which has ruined airlines all over the world?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not disagree with the statement that the honourable senator has quoted to the effect that a complete "open skies" regime would be to our disadvantage, but that is not what we are seeking. There are bilateral negotiations underway now between Canada and the United States, led by Ambassador Molgat on our side, seeking to arrive at an agreement which will be mutually advantageous. Those negotiations involve not only terminal privileges, landing privileges, and routes that might be opened to the various airlines of the two countries involved, but a number of other complex issues.

I do not know that these negotiations can be completed before the change of administration in the United States. I fervently hope they can be, because I know that the result our negotiators are aiming for is one that will be of great benefit to the Canadian economy and the Canadian consumer.

Senator Gigantès: As advantageous as the deindustrialization of the country following the free trade agreement?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the time has elapsed for Question Period, unless there is an agreement.

Some Honourable Senators: No.

IMMIGRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino moved the second reading of Bill C-86, to amend the Immigration Act and other Acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators —

Senator Gigantès: Go climb a mountain.

Senator Frith: The axe man cometh.

Senator Di Nino: The debate on Bill C-86 is certainly one of the most important debates we have had in the Senate in recent times. I know the honourable senators will agree that in the face of mounting worldwide migration pressures, reform of our immigration policy takes on even greater significance.

People from other nations who express their desire to become Canadian citizens have the potential to enrich the social fabric of Canada. For that reason, we must ensure that our immigration policies are compassionate and in the best interests of Canada's future.

[Senator Murray.]

Honourable senators, I believe that the immigration and refugee policies of this government are doing a commendable job at balancing the two major concerns. I am referring to the moral obligation of opening our hearts to others while strengthening the nation's character. We are doing this in a way that will win the admiration for Canadians during the remainder of this decade and on to the 21st century.

Honourable senators, except for Aboriginal people, we are all immigrants or sons and daughters of immigrants. For some, this experience is recent, like myself. For others, the immigration experience is centuries old. We have a long history of welcoming people from around the world. Canada has a humanitarian tradition that manifests itself in many ways, one of which is our commitment to helping persons in distress to build a new life as contributors to Canada.

• (1510)

Immigration has built this great nation for more than 125 years. The diversity of Canadian society has strengthened our respect for human rights and helped us to build a prosperous and competitive economy.

We are living in a global marketplace. For that reason alone we are fortunate to have immigrants from a broad range of backgrounds. Naturally, they bring with them diverse talents and skills. What is most important, immigrants bring with them a belief that Canada is a land of opportunity.

Their faith in a prosperous future has helped us make Canada a nation that is envied by many others. We must implement policies that enhance that optimism and give all of us reason to believe in the future.

Canada's immigration policies have evolved over many years. I know honourable senators can certainly appreciate how changing circumstances throughout the world have had an impact on our immigration program. When our Immigration Act was proclaimed in 1978, no one could have foreseen the international political and economic strife that would cause upheaval in the years ahead.

Since 1984, when this government was first elected, it has taken several steps to ensure that immigration serves the best interests of Canada and Canadians. In the past eight years, the government has increased steadily the number of immigrants we accept into Canada, as well as expanded services to help newcomers become productive members of society.

In 1989, the government overhauled Canada's refugee determination system. That work resulted in an internationally respected determination system.

In December 1990, the government introduced a five-year plan for immigration that was a result of a broad consultation carried out across the country.

In January 1991, the government took a new approach to language training designed to give more newcomers greater opportunities to learn one of our official languages, as well as learning Canadian customs and traditions.

The radical changes that have occurred and continue to occur in developing and industrialized nations have resulted in large-scale migration, many of whom want to come to Canada. At the same time, Canadians realize that with increasing economic globalization and the emphasis on the need for enhanced technical knowledge to operate the economy, it has never been more important for us to develop a highly-skilled Canadian workforce. Our immigration policy must support this effort by attracting people with the skills we need.

I would ask honourable senators to consider that today one out of every six Canadian residents was born outside the country. Immigration touches the lives of virtually every one of us.

We do not have, as some countries do, different rights for citizens by birth and citizens by choice. A Canadian is a Canadian is a Canadian. Everyone has equal rights and responsibilities.

With due consideration given to the history of our immigration program, the government has brought forward Bill C-86. This bill is the next evolutionary step in Canada's immigration policy. It gives us the tools necessary to manage effectively Canada's immigration program in the 1990s.

I can assure honourable senators that the basic philosophy of the 1976 Immigration Act is still intact. Canada remains committed to an immigration program that contributes to three fundamental goals; family reunification, refugee protection and economic growth.

I am confident that Bill C-86 will have a positive impact on enabling the government to improve three key areas in managing immigration. We will have the means to select effectively those who come to Canada; the means to better protect Canadian society; and the means to further streamline our refugee determination system.

I would like to address some of the concerns expressed about this bill. Honourable colleagues will be familiar with some of these concerns as expressed in the pre-study report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Senator Gigantès: I would like to see how you guys swallow your own words.

Senator Di Nino: There has been a misunderstanding about the concept of streams for selecting immigrants. Here is how it is intended to work. Immigrants in different classes will be selected and processed under clearly defined principles. This will result in three streams.

Applicants in the first stream might include spouses and dependent children, Convention refugees and investors. This stream would have no limit on the number of applicants, and time standards for processing would be established for each class. This ensures that applicants are not kept waiting for an undue length of time. But this does not give the applicants in this stream an absolute priority over the other two streams.

The second and third streams will contain applicants who will face different selection methods and who will be limited in number. In some cases, however, they may enter Canada just as quickly, or possibly even faster than applicants in the first stream.

As for the placement of applicants in the three streams, Minister Valcourt has made a commitment that spouses and dependent children will be in the first stream. The processing strategy for other classes will be decided following extensive consultation to be held in the new year.

There has also been a misunderstanding regarding the concept of selecting for excellence. Let me use an example of how this provision would work. If we had 200 electricians apply but a need for only 100 at that time, the best 100 would be chosen, rather than the first 100 to apply. The selection criteria will be objective and non-discriminatory with respect to race, religion, gender or other analogous grounds. Canadians want it that way. Our Immigration Act and Charter commit us to that principle.

There has been some apprehension that the interim changes would not be tabled in the other place until the date of the minister's annual presentation of an immigration plan. Minister Valcourt agrees that interim changes should be tabled here and in the other place within a specified time. This will ensure that all concerned are informed of changes in a timely manner.

In its pre-study report, the Senate committee expressed its views on the retroactivity provision of Bill C-86. The minister assures us the provision will not be used to disqualify applicants to whom the government has already made a commitment. However, the government has a responsibility to ensure that the skill levels and occupations of selected immigrants meet the needs of the Canadian economy, and that newcomers will have a good chance of achieving economic success.

Senator Gigantès: In this disastrous economy?

Senator Di Nino: Would the honourable senator hold his questions until I have finished, please?

Senator Gigantès: I am sometimes overwhelmed at the spectacle of your undoing everything you did in your report.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators are aware of the criticism concerning the bill's provision regarding geographic mobility. This is a voluntary program, and we have had similar successful voluntary programs in Canada. The objective of this provision is to ensure that all regions of the country enjoy the benefits of immigration.

Nevertheless, Minister Valcourt is fully aware that circumstances can change. For that reason, he proposed an amendment that will enable landed residents who have agreed to specific terms and conditions, including restricted geographic mobility, to apply for a variance to those terms and conditions.

In its recommendations, the pre-study report of the Senate committee commented on the provisions in Bill C-86 designed to prevent access by criminals, terrorists and others whose entry would not be in the best interests of Canada. The government has a responsibility to protect Canadian society.

● (1520)

Generous support for our immigration and refugee program exists as long as it is under control and does not threaten the well-being of our society.

Canada now welcome three times as many newcomers as it did eight years ago. We have the highest per capita immigration rate in the world. However, there is still a standard that those who want to live here must meet. There will always be those who try to bypass regular immigration channels. For that reason, we need measures to defend the integrity of our programs and protect Canadians from those who would break our laws.

Part of the protection is through the fingerprinting provisions. It is not a Draconian method of keeping control. It will help us evaluate claims and weed out those who should not have access to Canada because of criminal activity. It can also assist the government in curbing multiple refugee claims, which on some occasions have resulted in welfare fraud. Nevertheless, honourable senators, the minister is aware that long-term retention of a claimant's fingerprints is not desirable in a free and open society. For that reason, we proposed an amendment to allow them to be destroyed after an individual has been granted Canadian citizenship.

A real problem has to do with foreign criminals who try to take advantage of our relatively open borders and compassionate legal system. Under our current system, terrorists and persons convicted of crimes in other countries can be refused admissions to Canada. However, this provision does not apply to people who have no criminal conviction, but have been involved in organized crime.

Bill C-86 will give Canadian citizens added protection against admitting individuals who we have reasonable grounds to believe have committed a crime, although they were not convicted. Honourable senators, the government is well aware of the delicacy of these provisions. Minister Valcourt has put forward an amendment which limits the definition to those acts or omissions which are an offence under the laws of the country where they occur as well as being an offence in Canada.

The government has also proposed a similar amendment to the provisions of the bill that deals with less serious crimes, punishable by imprisonment of less than ten years.

As well, the government modified the provision that applies to a person's past or current membership in organizations involved in criminal activities. The scope of that subparagraph would be limited to an individual engaged in an activity that is part of criminal activity, planned and organized by a number of persons acting together. This will enable more precise targeting of individuals and activities intended to be excluded.

I believe that honourable senators will agree that the best way to handle a problem is to prevent it from becoming a problem in the first place. With that in mind, Bill C-86 calls for increased efforts to work with airlines to help them identify passengers with fraudulent documents. The airlines themselves, however, must accept responsibility for the passengers they bring to Canada. Airlines that bring inadmissible and improperly documented passengers into the country will be held responsible for sharing the cost of processing these people. After all, the approximate cost of processing a rejected refugee claim can be as much as $50,000.

Honourable senators, another issue under Bill C-86 concerns the protection of personal information. Foreign governments are sometimes reluctant to share information on an applicant's previous criminal activities. They frequently request that it be treated as protected information. As well, we are often faced with the dilemma of asking the courts to reveal an information source. The information is sometimes necessary to prevent the entry of a person involved in organized crime or drug cartel.

Honourable senators, Minister Valcourt has proposed amendments to the bill's provisions that protect sensitive information received from a foreign government and used by visa officers in refusing application for entry into Canada. The amendments would give the same kind of protection to relevant sources abroad and in Canada.

Honourable senators, I have heard criticism regarding the bill's provisions for detention review. It calls for a review 48 hours after the initial detention and then a further review 30 days later. The Minister has listened to various recommendations and proposed to amend the legislation so that it provides a review seven days after the initial 48-hour review, and then each 30 days following unless circumstances merit an earlier review.

However, honourable senators, Minister Valcourt is not prepared to exclude hybrid offences from inadmissible and reportable classes of the bill because some of these are very serious offences. The existing provisions for admitting individuals convicted of these offences who have not demonstrated satisfactory rehabilitation will continue to apply.

There have been a lot of misunderstandings regarding the proposal to give senior immigration officers responsibility for determining whether or not a person is eligible to access a refugee determination system.

Honourable senators will be aware that the prestudy report of the Senate committee highlighted those concerns. The report says senior immigration officers are certainly competent to determine eligibility, but any decision on ineligibility should go before the Immigration and Refugee Board.

Honourable senators, these decisions are not judgment calls on the part of the immigration officer. The criteria for making these decisions will be clearly spelled out. The senior immigration officers who will receive special training to make these decisions will simply look at five exceptions that would deny access to the individual. If any one of those exceptions does not apply, then the person would automatically have access to the IRB.

More complex issues of admissibility, especially those dealing with criminal activity and security risks, would be decided by an adjudicator at an inquiry with the applicant having a right to counsel.

The Senate committee's prestudy report also expressed apprehension that a claimant may be put at risk if returned to a country where he or she had been previously granted refugee status, or returned to a country where the claim could have been heard. Under Bill C-86, if the country of asylum will not take the individual back, then he or she will be eligible to make a claim in Canada. If the person could return to their country but fears persecution, then he or she is protected under section 53 of the Immigration Act.

The minister assures honourable senators that a senior immigration officer faced with such a situation would defer removal until the matter has been investigated.

Regarding the second concern, if a person cannot be returned to a country that is sharing responsibility for examining refugee claims, then under section 46.03 of the act, as amended by the bill, he or she will be eligible to make a claim in Canada.

Honourable senators, the legislation covers these situations, so that in neither case will a claimant become a refugee in orbit, nor will he or she be at risk.

The Senate committee prestudy report was also critical regarding split decisions of the IRB. Split decisions are now settled in favour of the claimant. Under the amendment of C-86, there will be only three exceptions to the status quo: Claimants who destroy documents without valid reason before presenting themselves to immigration; individuals who return to the country from which they are presumably fleeing; and individuals who claim persecution by a country which the Governor in Council has determined respects human rights.

Honourable senators, Minister Valcourt has given us consideration to an issue raised by the Senate committee chairperson, Senator Kinsella.

Senator Frith: He was there hanging his head in shame. And every excellent amendment he suggested was rejected out of hand.

Senator Di Nino: Refugees who use fraudulent documents are protected from prosecution under the Immigration Act, but not from prosecution under the Criminal Code.

Senator Kinsella argued that there should be greater protection from prosecution for refugees who use fraudulent documents to enter Canada. Minister Valcourt agreed with the honourable senator and proposed that the 1976 act be amended to protect such individuals from prosecution under the Criminal Code.

Another point of contention, honourable senators, is that Bill C-86 opens IRB hearings to the public. This provision was in response to a Federal Court ruling in a particular case. However, it has been pointed out that public hearings might place some claimants in threatening situations. In response, the minister has accepted the recommendations of the Senate committee prestudy report that refugee hearings be held in camera unless there is an application to open them. In those cases, the onus would be on the claimant to establish why the case should remain in camera. Legal experts have suggested this provision would meet the court's requirements.

• (1530)

In closing, I believe, honourable senators will agree that the development of Bill C-86 is a good example of the importance of prestudy. Here we have government amendments that reflect the Senate committee prestudy and have been adopted by the legislative committee. I note that the provisions I have outlined, with consequent amendments, directly address the concerns expressed by the Auditor General in his 1990 report about the immigration program. In fact, honourable senators, in his follow-up report tabled just days ago, on November 24, the Auditor General says:

> We found that the text of Bill C-86 addresses many of the observations and recommendations made in our 1990 report.

Honourable senators, I am confident that when all honourable senators have an opportunity to study Bill C-86 in detail, they will find that it is an excellent bill. Through the prestudy report senators have played a significant role in shaping this extremely important legislation. I look forward to questions and to dealing with this at committee.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, more than a century ago, Lord Acton said that the way a country treats its minorities is the surest way to determine whether that country is really free. For the purposes of this debate, I will add that the treatment given immigrants and refugees is the best way to determine whether a country is truly humane and just.

At a time when the world is troubled, in upheaval and experiencing unprecedented population movements, it is the duty of any free society to open its doors as much as possible and to welcome those searching for refuge from oppression, torture, misery and death.

Throughout the world, some 20 million refugees have had to leave their country because of drought, famine or the oppression of totalitarian regimes. In all good conscience, a rich country like Canada, which is the world's seventh richest country and far from overpopulated, cannot close its eyes to this incredible tragedy. Therefore the government's moral duty is to have the most generous policies and programs possible.

Besides, Canada is a developed prosperous country, as Senator Di Nino just admitted, largely because of its traditional welcoming policy. One might even say that the Canada we know would not exist without vigorous immigration. Indeed, all Canadians, including native people, have come from somewhere else and are therefore the descendants of immigrants or refugees.

As I said on May 17, 1988 in my speech on Bill C-55, the shameful ancestor of C-86, all demographers agree on one point:

> — that without a substantial increase in immigration, this country will not be able to maintain its standard of living, let alone raise it, and how will we support our aging population?

Faced with the many challenges of immigration, the Conservative government could do no better than table Bill C-86, which on the whole is retrograde and unacceptable—and which Senator Di Nino dared to call a revolution!

C-86 contains the most significant changes to our immigration laws since 1976-77. Given the length and complexity of this bill, with its 128 clauses and 113 pages of text, which took the minister and his officials eight months to prepare, we were entitled to hope that the House of Commons would take the time required to examine it thoroughly and make all the necessary amendments. That did not happen at all and I believe it is important to point out the government's poor performance in this regard.

C-86 was tabled in the House of Commons on June 16 and debated on June 18. The government gave the opposition only two days to study this especially complex bill, which as I just said took the minister and his countless officials eight months of work. It was almost impossible to examine this bill properly in the two days before the debate on second reading. Furthermore, even immigration lawyers, NGOs and other groups working in this field, as the Hon. Warren Allmand said last week in the House of Commons, did not have the time to examine the bill seriously; as a result, the House of Commons was unable to benefit from their generally enlightened advice.

This behaviour would justify the opposition's thunderbolts and condemnation. But that is not all. Adding insult to injury, the government—we know how deeply it believes in democracy! —imposed time allocation in a perfectly arbitrary way. As a result, the most important overhaul of the Immigration Act in over ten years was debated for only a day and a half at second reading. On third reading, November 24, the Conservatives were true to themselves. Wielding the club of time allocation again, they limited the debate to one day.

[Senator Hébert.]

In view of the extent of the government's undemocratic actions, I think it appropriate to show what they have done in this regard. Since it took power, the Conservative government has beaten all records for resorting to time allocation and closure. I have some very revealing figures here. Between 1913 and 1981, closure was invoked 22 times in all, 1981 being the last year until the Conservatives took power. Twenty-two times from 1913 to 1981! From 1981 to 1984—you were not there then!—it was not used at all. Since 1984, the government has invoked the guillotine more than 18 times; that is, almost as many times in the past eight years as in the previous 68.

I understand that Senator Murray and Senator Lynch-Staunton find that funny! Some are amused when democracy is violated!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, what amuses me is the low attendance of Liberals in the House today to listen to your speech! That is very funny for me!

Senator Hébert: One does not have to be here to hear an accounting of the government's misdeeds! On this side of the House, we are all well aware of those facts and figures; we know them very well. I give them for your benefit!

Honourable senators, you will agree this is no exaggeration, and I refer to the comtempt with which the government treats our democratic institutions. As for time allocation, the Tory government has used these tactics to crush debate 35 times since it came to power, compared with the previous Liberal government which used time allocation only 29 times in 19 years.

These figures are an indication of the depths to which this government has sunk in its abuse of the standing orders and procedure of the House.

As far as the Senate is concerned, I hardly need to describe how the government has treated the opposition since the debate on the GST. Even some Tory senators were heard to say recently that the Senate was reduced to the role of a rubber stamp. You saw that in the media! Perhaps they realize it is becoming downright embarrassing for an honest man to be part of the government majority in the Senate. Perhaps they even feel sorry for their so-called leaders in this Chamber, senators Murray, Lynch-Staunton and Kelly, who have become the powerless and subservient puppets of this government! Perhaps they now realize that their real leader is a member of the House of Commons, the unctuous Harvie Andre, who treats them dogs trained seals!

For instance, who decided not more than a few days would be spent debating Bill C-86 in the House of Commons? Harvie Andre, of course. Who decided that Bill C-86 had to receive royal assent by December 18, come what may? Senator Lowell Murray? Of course not. Harvie Andre is the boss, ladies and gentlemen.

Expecting as much, our dear friend Senator Kinsella, acting chair of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, ordered a pre-study of Bill C-86, ostensibly because the committee's recommendations would have some influence on the government. We hastily called a number of witnesses—very few, as a matter of fact—who all admitted they had not had time for a thorough analysis of all 113 pages of an infinitely complex bill.

Nevertheless, the committee managed to produce a report that was well received by all concerned. Surprisingly, this excellent pre-study report was unanimous, and it therefore reflects the opinions of both Liberal and Conservative senators, and more specifically of committee members Kinsella, Di Nino (who as usual isn't listening!), Deware and Ross. We all agreed. It was unanimous. I am not talking about Liberal recriminations. I am talking about a unanimous report from a committee where you have the majority, and about the Senate.

The Tory senators must be as disappointed as their Liberal colleagues to see that their report failed to make much of an impression on the government. I am sure that like the Liberals, they will insist on having C-86 amended to reflect the report's recommendations.

That being said, I admit the government did accept a few of our unanimous recommendations. Unfortunately, it was not enough, and Bill C-86 remains unworthy of a country considered to be civilized and sensitive to the desperate plight of refugees.

For instance, the government amended the provisions on public hearings. Since most groups and individuals concerned agreed on the importance of protecting the life, liberty and security of refugee claimants, their families and anyone who might be at risk, the government made the necessary amendments. It managed to achieve

The correct balancing of the principle that the persons concerned must be protected with the competing principle that Canadian judicial and quasi-judicial proceedings are to be as open as possible. Hearings of the Refugee Division will in most cases be confidential, as explained earlier by Senator Di Nino. The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology proposed this amendment in its report. It is one of the few recommendations the government decided to accept, which is probably why Senator Di Nino made such a song and dance about it!

The House committee also amended the strict detention procedures provided in the bill, under which the case of a person detained on an immigration matter would be reviewed every 30 days only. As amended, the bill will provide for a review every seven days after the first review which takes place 48 hours after detention.

However, although the government made further changes, including those concerning fingerprints which are to be destroyed as soon as the immigrant becomes a Canadian citizen, on the whole Bill C-86 remains unacceptable. In fact, in its haste to get the bill through Parliament, the government ignored most of the recommendations in the pre-study carried out by the Senate, accepting only a few. Need I remind you that these were unanimous recommendations?

Honourable senators, we must let the excellent work done by the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, our committee, be our inspiration. The fourteen proposed recommendations corrected the main deficiencies of Bill C-86, and they should guide us in our analysis of this legislation. Unless, of course, some of us have had a change of heart about the importance of these fourteen unanimous recommendations. Since the pre-study report was unanimous, I assume most of my colleagues on both sides of this Chamber are anxious to see the government make the necessary changes.

To a considerable extent, the report of the social affairs committee was guided by the testimony of the Chair of the Immigration and Refugee Board and the Canadian Representative of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. Their main concerns arose from the proposed changes to the procedures concerning refugee status determination.

Currently, questions of eligibility are decided jointly by an adjudicator and a Refugee Division member in the context of an inquiry, at which the individual concerned has a right to counsel. Bill C-86 proposes to have eligibility determined administratively by a senior immigration officer, called a senior immigration officer even though he has no particular qualifications in the field, without giving the claimant right to counsel. In its report, the Social Affairs Committee expressed its concerns regarding this provision which, in some instances, might be dangerous and offered a solution.

Let me quote what the report, our report, says on this issue:

> "— we agree that eligibility decisions should be made by the Immigration and Refugee Board as a preliminary matter. We see no reason to require the Immigration and Refugee Board to make a determination on eligibility on every case, however. It would seem a practical solution to permit a senior immigration officer to determine that a person is eligible to make a claim, but to leave decisions of eligibility to the Board."

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Who signed this report?

Senator Hébert: The committee members, of course, and among them the acting chairman, Senator Kinsella, and several other Conservative senators. I named them a moment ago, Senator Di Nino, one of the most eloquent members, then there was Senator Cochrane, who was there very often. Anyway, they know who they are. I wonder how they will react when we will have to insist on things which seemed so fundamental not so long ago.

Moreover, the report confirmed that this solution would allay the minister's fears that the process would become more cumbersome, since only problem cases would be submitted to the IRB. I have great difficulty understanding why the government rejected this recommendation, which seemed to us to be a good compromise.

Senator Frith: And which was supported by their colleagues.

Senator Hébert: Yes, it was supported by their colleagues.

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: And signed by Senator Di Nino.

Senator Hébert: Indeed.

Senator Gigantès: The one who just spoke, the one who just renounced.

Senator Hébert: Yes, he seemed to be happy a moment ago.

Senator Gigantès: Three times before the cock crows—three times!

Senator Hébert: He seemed happy, but maybe he had forgotten some details I am now reminding him of in the hope of convincing him.

Senator Frith: That is probably why.

Senator Hébert: Yes, that is why.

Another issue raised by the Senate committee concerns the return to a prescribed country, or a "safe country" as they say in officialdom. It seems obvious to me that Canada should have an agreement with any country to which it will send back a refugee claimant. It is obvious that we cannot send back a claimant without knowing that the country to which he is being sent back will accept him and not send him back to his own country where his life would be in danger. However, Bill C-86 completely overlooks this issue. The committee had this to say in its report:

> Arrangements between Canada and the so-called safe countries can be bilateral or multilateral, but must, . . ., identify the state responsible for hearing the claim and provide that the state in question agree to admit the person. Returning a claimant to another country without a guarantee of admissibility risks putting the claimant "in orbit": and is unacceptable.

End of the quotation from this unanimous report, which is of course "our report—signed by everybody.

Senator Gigantès: It is an excellent report.

Senator Hébert: Unfortunately, the government did not seem fit to amend the bill accordingly. It is as though it does not listen to its own senators.

Senator Gigantès: No, it does not listen to its own senators.

[Senator Hébert.]

[English]

• (1540)

Instead, the minister chose to offer the following flimsy assurances to the Commons committee: ". . . although the bill does not require that a bilateral agreement be in place, that is clearly Canada's preferred arrangement." Trust me!

[Translation]

Trust me, there is no need to include that in the Act. We are all good guys here." Dream on.

Senator Gigantès: It is quite another story when you are a rich claimant.

Senator Hébert: Obviously, we are not talking about those people.

Senator Gigantès: They will have no trouble getting in.

Senator Hébert: The High Commissioner for Refugees also stated the need for concluding arrangements regarding refugees, not with any country in the world, but only with countries that adhere to the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees as a whole, rather than just Article 33. The Senate Committee immediately endorsed this recommendation. Unfortunately, while the Minister had agreed, in his testimony before the Committee, that the law should specify that such countries must actually have adhered to the Convention—so he had told the Committee—he eventually rejected the recommendation made by the Senate Committee in a report signed by the members of this Committee where Conservative senators are a majority.

Our fourth recommendation dealt with all countries to be prescribed as countries to which refugee claimants could be returned. The Committee, that is the Senate Committee, suggested that Bill C-86 be amended to ensure that such countries agree to determine the claims of individuals returned to them on their merits and to have refugee determination systems that comply with Canadian principles of fundamental justice. All the same, the Bill remains unchanged in that regard. It would seem to me that the Conservative Senators and the Conservative Minister, Mr. Valcourt, had their signals crossed.

Senator Frith: You can say that again. The minister sure is conservative.

Senator Hébert: Such lack of communication between people from the same political formation is puzzling indeed.

Senator Gigantès: Is it a matter of lack of communication or was this whole committee process a sham and a publicity stunt?

Senator Hébert: You do not consider Senator Kinsella capable of such a thing, do you?

Senator Gigantès: It all depends on how they vote. That remains to be seen.

Senator Hébert: Exactly. The issue of claimants recognized as Convention refugees elsewhere who claim to fear persecution in a so-called "safe country" was also discussed in the Senate Committee, "our" Senate Committee. This Senate Committee of ours recommended that such claimants be eligible to enter the Canadian determination system. Again, government found a way out. The minister has claimed that section 53 of the Immigration Act provided ample protection for these claimants. In his view, immigration officers who receive such a claim will not be able to have the claimants removed before senior officials in the national head office and that of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees have determined whether the individual is at risk if he or she is sent back to the asylum country. It should be noted that section 53, while applicable, contains no direction regarding the procedure to be followed, neither does it provide for access to the Immigration and Refugee Board. It's just idle talk!

Another serious flaw in Bill C-86 has to do with claimants deemed ineligible because they have been recognized elsewhere (but who prove not to be returnable to the country of recognition). Our sixth recommendation called for an amendment to the Bill to make these claimants eligible to enter the Canadian determination process. Naturally, as could be expected, government decided to reject this recommendation arguing it was unnecessary. That is the extent of the explanation we were given for this rejection.

Bill C-86 would provide that, in certain circumstances, both Refugee Division members would have to approve a claim before it could be accepted. This means that a refugee claim could be rejected in the event of a split decision. This is in contrast to the present situation where, in all cases, only one member's acceptance is sufficient.

Virtually all the witnesses that discussed the issue of refugee status were opposed to this provision. Moreover, the committee on social affairs, our committee, that we described so well earlier—

Senator Gigantès: You are referring to senators Kinsella, Di Nino and others.

Senator Hébert: Yes indeed. Senator Bonnell was also a member of that committee and Senator Cochrane was very often in attendance. So, the committee on social affairs received data confirming that the Refugee Division was dealing appropriately with claims advanced by individuals from countries that respect human rights, another of the circumstances that could lead to a reduction of the benefit of the doubt. The committee's report also emphasized that this measure could constitute discrimination on the basis of national origin, which would be contrary to the Charter. Although the committee proposed the elimination of these provisions, that was our recommendation no 8, the minister rejected it, saying that such exceptions are necessary to give greater transparency to the system, and so on and so forth. You will agree, honourable senators, that this remains one of the deficiencies that we will have to correct and that we all wanted to correct.

Bill C-86 proposes that appeals of decisions of the Trial Division of the Federal Court on judicial review could go forward to the Court of Appeal only if the judge rendering the decision certified that a serious question of general importance was involved, and if the judge stated the question at the time of rendering judgment; there would be no appeal from a refusal to certify. The Senate committee seriously questioned this procedure and made a recommendation to correct it. It explained its recommendation no 9, as senator Di Nino and senator Kinsella will no doubt remember, since it was a recommendation that we all liked. So, the committee explained its recommendation no 9 very clearly, and I quote:

> While we recognize the desirability of minimizing opportunities for unfounded appeals, we believe the method chosen to be contrary to our judicial traditions. In addition to the understandable reluctance that some judges might have to certify their own decisions as appealable, we recognize the necessity of oversight by the Court of Appeal in order to clarify the law in cases of conflicting lower court decisions. For these reasons, we recommend that either the Trial Division judge who renders the decision or a judge of the Court of Appeal, upon application, should be able to certify that a case should go forward to the Court of Appeal.

Once again, alas, the government did not consider the committee's recommendation, which had also been agreed to unanimously by senators from all parties. We were in full agreement on it; there was no discussion we agreed.

As for the protections for refugees, the committee reported its concern about two provisions of Bill C-86, those on eligibility and non-refoulement.

Currently, before a person can be found ineligible to make a claim to refugee status on grounds of criminality, the minister must certify that the person constitutes a danger to the public in Canada. Before a person can be excluded on grounds relating to subversion or future acts of violence, the minister must be of the opinion that it would be contrary to the public interest to receive the claim. Similarly, before recognized Convention refugees may be removed to a country where they fear persecution, the minister must make a finding of danger to either the public in Canada or the security of Canada. All of those safeguards would be removed by Bill C-86 as originally drafted.

The report of the Senate committee made the following observation on the removal of these protections. I should not quote it because Senator Kinsella, Senator Di Nino and the other members of the committee all know it by heart. It is intended for the others —

> The existing provisions recognize that not all activities that come within the prohibited grounds may be serious enough to justify exclusion from the procedure, or deportation from the country, where the consequences could put at risk the person's life, security or liberty. They require the Minister to balance Canada's interest against > the potential consequences to the individual before making such a significant decision. Certain of these provisions became part of the law in 1988 at the instance of the Senate for precisely these reasons. We have been presented with no explanation as to why they are less important now than they were then and we recommend that they be retained.

I am not the one saying that; it is in "our" report. I would even almost dare to say that Senator Kinsella is speaking on behalf of us all.

In this case, I am glad to note that the government has seen the light and endorsed Recommendation No. 10 of the report, which means that the government can sometimes listen to Senator Kinsella and us all when we stand together.

• (1600)

[English]

I am also glad to see that the eleventh recommendation of the Senate committee prompted the government to make a number of amendments to the criminal admissibility provisions of Bill C-86. As originally drafted, the bill could have lead to the exclusion of numerous individuals who in no way threaten Canada. Members of the committee felt it was their duty to anticipate such unintended consequences and to make changes to avoid them. For example, the committee report underlines its concerns pertaining to the vagueness of proposed section 19(1)(k), called the "catch-all" security clause. The report reads:

> What classes of people could be a threat to Canada if they are not spies, terrorists, subversives or violent? As legislators, we should be vigilant about passing laws which prohibit unspecified conduct. We note as well that the definition of terrorism is wider than necessary.

Accordingly, the committee concluded that these provisions ought to be narrowed to cover more specific activities and individuals involved.

Moreover, I would like to underline the amendments the government accepted as a result of the Senate committee's eleventh recommendation. Although it ignored important parts of this proposal, I believe its efforts in this case need to be mentioned. First, an act or omission committed abroad will have to be illegal in the place where it was perpetrated as well as in Canada; second, for membership in a group to bar an individual, the group must have engaged in activity that is part of a pattern of criminal activity planned and organized by a number of persons acting in furtherance of any indictable offence under specified statutes such as the Criminal Code, the Narcotics Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act; third, for permanent residents to be deported as a result of an act or omission committed in another country, the standard of proof would be raised to a balance of probabilities rather than reasonable grounds; fourth, the definition of terrorism was removed rather than redefined as the committee had suggested. Unfortunately, the government chose to ignore the concerns which the Senate committee had raised pertaining to section 19(1)(k). I am sure Senator Kinsella remembers that well, as does Senator Di Nino, who is almost smiling at the other end.

Senator Gigantès: I don't think he is smiling. I think that is an expression of deep shame.

Senator Hébert: You may be right. The minister argued that this provision stood as a counterpoint to the positive discretion to admit people who don't fit in a tidy category and that the government needs to have authority to exclude persons it considers dangerous to Canada—Liberals maybe, who knows! I certainly hope that any of the government's omissions pertaining to that specific recommendation will be tidied up during our study of the bill, because we are planning to study it at length.

The committee's twelfth recommendation, which suggested that a time limit be provided as a condition of landing for a permanent resident relating to occupation and place of residence, was flatly rejected by the government. The bill would require permanent residents to live and work in certain areas of the country as a condition for accepting them. For example, they could not leave Ottawa for five years or whatever. While the Senate committee recognized the usefulness of such a provision to communities and regions throughout Canada, it questioned the lack of a time restriction in the bill. Predictably, the minister suggested that a time limit was unnecessary.

The question of the retroactive application of new regulations was strongly criticized by the legal community as well as by witnesses who appeared before the committee. These proved controversial since they would apply to individuals who entered the country under one set of rules and who might be assessed under another. Moreover the Senate committee argued that it was unable to confirm how narrowly or broadly the regulatory power could be used without careful study of the regulations. It also felt the scope for the exercise of power was so broad as to be troublesome. Our unanimous report had the following to say on this topic:

> When retroactive provisions are permitted, the law should state their parameters clearly. We would therefore recommend that the bill explicitly reflect the intentions and assurances of the government as to the stages of processing to which retroactivity will apply. We also recommend, in view of the very significant changes that the bill makes to applicants' expectations, that retroactivity should be applied only to cases arising after the bill comes into force.

Unfortunately the government again chose to disregard an important recommendation of our committee, one that was unanimously accepted. The application of retroactivity following ratification of the bill, as mentioned in the above quotation, was the subject of the Senate committee's fourteenth and final recommendation. Although no changes were made to the bill in this regard, the minister did confirm that he intended to apply the rule mainly to cases occurring after the adoption of the bill, while retaining the ability to apply it to existing applications—in other words, trust me! He also emphasized the importance of responding appropriately to economic changes which affect the need for skilled immigrants.

Senator Frith: The rule of law is to trust law, not people.

Senator Hébert: He said:

> To blindly ignore the change —

That is typically Conservative, "To blindly ignore the change".

> — and to continue to recruit people whose skills are no longer in demand would be a disservice to the individual who would face poor job prospects on arriving in Canada
> —and to those Canadians who might find themselves looking for work in this field as a result of restructuring in the industry.

Either the minister was inspired by Senator Di Nino or the reverse; I am not sure.

Senator Frith: "Restructuring" means laying people off, I take it.

Senator Gigantès: And reducing their unemployment payments, especially if they have children.

Senator Hébert: It seems to me that the attitude reflected by the minister in that quotation is somewhat cynical, opportunistic, and it seems to me to be playing to the lowest common denominator in Canadian society which harbours numerous fears and misapprehensions about immigrants and refugees.

Senator Gigantès: Typical Tory behaviour.

Senator Hébert: More on that later.

Although the bill has been greatly improved as a result of the deliberations of both the House of Commons and the Senate committees, it still has a long way to go before it is acceptable to most interested parties. For instance, I received a letter a few days ago from the Fundy Refugee Support Coalition which outlined the situation as follows:

> We request that new Senate hearings on Bill C-86 be held since the current bill is substantially different from, not better than, the original text. We strongly support the Senate committee's prestudy recommendations.

It could have been sent to Senator Kinsella. It is very supportive of our committee's report. They go on:

> We are greatly disturbed at the government's apparent disregard for the submissions brought to the legislative committee. We sincerely believe that Bill C-86 as it now stands is a major deviation from the human rights standards traditionally held by the citizenry and Government of Canada.

As I am certain most of my honourable colleagues will agree, we certainly have our work cut out for us in improving Bill C-86, what Senator Di Nino called "a revolution" a moment ago. One of the bill's major flaws is its emphasis on enforcement, as opposed to fairness and humanitarian values. As I mentioned earlier, in drafting this legislation, the government seems to be playing to the lowest common denominator of Canadian society, which fears immigrants and refugees. Indeed, there are too many myths surrounding the effects of immigrants and refugees on our country's economy.

For instance, some people believe they are a drain on the public purse; they fail to pay their fair share of taxes; they take jobs from Canadians; they are responsible for spiralling house prices and for reductions in affordable housing; and they are responsible for driving up the costs of health, education and income security.

I believe that the facts need to be set straight and that these myths could use a good dose of debunking. I would therefore like to turn my attention to three recent studies on immigration which provide the solid evidence needed to shatter those myths. The first two studies were prepared for the Economic Council of Canada, that venerable institution which, alas, has fallen at the hands of the Tory cost-cutting knife. The third was prepared by the Laurier Institute.

The first study, released in 1991, is entitled "New Faces in the Crowd: Economic and Social Impacts of Immigration." This report noted that Canadian residents generally benefit from slightly higher incomes as a result of immigration. As well, it argued that immigration does not increase unemployment, but actually helps to create jobs, since firms must expand to respond to larger markets. Another benefit of immigration, according to this study, is that Canadians become more tolerant as they have more contact with people from different cultures. One of the more interesting conclusions of the report was that increased immigration will slightly lower the per capita tax burden of financing health, education and income security programs. Finally, the Economic Council's two-year study led to the following conclusion on the effect of immigration:

> Those already here gain a little more real income, a more excitingly diverse society, and the satisfaction of opening up to others the great opportunities that living in Canada gives. Among those who come, some gain safety from persecution, some gain freedom from want, some gain a secure future for their children, and nearly all become economically better off.

For those who believe immigrants are lazy and who like nothing more than to soak our system for all it is worth, the second study prepared for the Economic Council of Canada is an eye opener. Published this year, and entitled "Earnings of Immigrants: A Comparative Analysis", this document underscores that the labour force participation rate, adjusted for age differences, is slightly higher for both male and female immigrants than for native Canadians. In addition, the study concludes that the proportion of recent immigrants on welfare is extremely small and tends to be similar to that of native-born Canadians. As for the level of education, this report found that almost 28 per cent of immigrants have some university training, compared to 24 per cent of native-born Canadians.

The third report, prepared for the Laurier Institute in 1991, is entitled, "People, Jobs and Immigration: A Study of Canada's Future Work Force". This study was comprehensive and formulated numerous interesting conclusions.

First, it observed that foreign-born persons in Canada are, on average, better educated, more often of working age, and more likely to be located in large urban centres where their skills are in demand.

Interestingly, the study also noted that immigrants, compared to native-born Canadians, are less frequently unemployed, less often on welfare, and earn higher incomes.

As for the myth that immigrants are a drain on the economy, the report indicated that many of the costs associated with immigration are short-term. Economic productivity, growth, differential employment opportunities, labour supply, skills levels, occupation demand, living costs, and wage rates are among the factors which contribute to the cyclical swing in the economy and influence the well-being of Canadians.

Immigrants, according to the Laurier Institute document, constitute a relatively small proportion of Canada's population and, over time, tend to adopt Canadian economic behaviour. Moreover, they do not tend to displace Canadians workers and, in many cases, fill gaps in the labour force.

The report also concluded that population growth through natural increase is slowing and that this trend will continue as long as the fertility rate remains below the 2.1 children-per-woman replacement level. As well, since the population of Canada is aging, the dependency ratios will increase and the potential labour force will decrease. Therefore, immigration will help Canada deal with this problem and its effects on the country's future prosperity.

As can be observed from the results of the three studies I have just mentioned, Canadians have nothing to fear from immigration, save for the unfounded fear of immigrants and refugees prevalent in certain circles of our society, and promoted by some people on the other side.

Unfortunately, such clear-headed and carefully considered studies reach too few Canadians; instead, abuse of the system is widely reported by the media, while success stories are ignored. According to a 1991 report of the now defunct Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, "Canadians should be assisted in their understanding of what immigration is and what it does for them." Despite repeated calls for an education program on immigration issues, the government has failed to implement a communication strategy to inform and educate the public.

[Senator Hébert.]

Moreover, part of the problem stems from the difficulty in assessing the short-term effects of immigration. The benefits, however, become more evident over the long-term. Historically, the attitude of Canadians concerning immigration has been considerably influenced by the economic conditions of the times. The actual double digit national unemployment rate does not provide the most favourable climate for the integration of immigrants and refugees into our society, I admit that. However, as was noted in the studies previously mentioned, the attitudes against immigration during difficult economic times are based on myth rather than fact.

An interesting finding is that many Canadians believe that "poor" immigrants and refugees have more dependents that their "wealthy" counterparts. In fact, the numbers sketch a different portrait. In 1991, only 20,869 dependents accompanied—

Senator Murray: Order.

Senator Hébert: It is not for you to tell me to be quiet. I still have one page to read and you will listen to me, Senator Murray.

The Hon. the Speaker: No, I say so, Senator Hébert.

Senator Hébert: I did not hear you.

The Hon. the Speaker: I said it three times—

Senator Hébert: You said it three times?

The Hon. the Speaker: Yes, Senator Hébert. So listen, if—

Senator Hébert: I still have one page.

[English]

Senator Murray: Sit down when the Speaker is on his feet.

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: You use closure often enough in the House of Commons and now you are imposing—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. Senator Hébert, the rules say that if there is unanimous consent you may carry on. Is there unanimous consent?

Senator Hébert: Whether there is unanimous consent or not, I will continue anyway.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Hébert, you will continue only if there is unanimous consent.

Senator Hébert: No, I will continue even if there is not unanimous consent.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry but you will follow the rules like everybody else. If there is unanimous consent you will carry on; otherwise you will sit down. Is that clear?

[English]

Senator Murray: When the Speaker is on his feet, you should sit down.

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: Yes, rules that were adopted in the circumstances that we know, with your complicity.

The Hon. the Speaker: There is no complicity. You will follow the rules like everyone else.

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: I would like to put a question to Senator Hébert.

[English]

If you had been allowed to continue —

Senator Hébert: What would I have said?

Senator Gigantès: —would you have said the following—

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry, Senator Gigantès, but rule 38.3 reads as follows:

> The sponsor of a bill and the first Senator speaking immediately thereafter shall be permitted not more than forty-five minutes each for debate, inclusive of any question or comments from other Senators which they may permit in the course of their remarks.

Senator Gigantès: Am I not allowed to ask a question?

The Hon. the Speaker: Not according to the Rules.

[English]

Senator Frith: Let us just get it straight. The speaker, who is the main speaker on our side, has approximately a page and a half yet to go in his 45 minute allowance imposed by these rules, and the Leader of the Government in the Senate tells him to sit down and will not allow him to finish. As long as the record shows that, let us leave it at that.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, why I told the honourable senator to resume his seat was because the Speaker had risen to his feet. It is —

Senator Frith: He asked for unanimous consent, and you said no.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think the point should be made again that when the occupant of the Chair rises, another honourable senator resumes his seat. That point having been made, I will be happy to give my consent, if all others senators give theirs, to hear Honourable Senator Hébert complete his speech.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hébert: In 1991, only 20,869 dependents accompanied the principal applicants in Canada's refugee stream. The same year, 14,000 dependents accompanied principal applicants in the business immigration stream. These figures confirm that on average, the ratio of refugees to accompanying dependents is three to two, while that of business immigrants accompanying dependents is one to three.

Based on the forgoing discussion, I wish to highlight my disappointment with the government for having allowed the myths surrounding immigration, immigrants and refugees, to guide the drafting of Bill C-86, which will be known in the history as the Di Nino revolution. Although the bill does propose some worthwhile changes, we of the Liberal party believe on balance the entire package to be unacceptable for the following reasons: It will make it more difficult for law-abiding hard-working immigrants and refugees to enter Canada; it will put barriers in the way of legitimate refugees; it will open the door to inequity and capriciousness in the selection of immigrants and refugees; it suspends traditional legal safeguards, like deportations without hearings, suspension of rights through retroactive provisions, et cetera. The bill also emphasizes enforcement instead of fairness and humanitarian values. Finally, too much authority has been transferred from the law and Parliament to the minister and his officials, which leaves the whole process open to abuse.

[Translation]

In conclusion, I would have liked the government to show more compassion for refugees, for the outcast of this earth, for those voiceless men, women and children who still believe that Canada is a land of compassion and freedom. To this day, such is the reputation of this country. If Bill C-86 is passed without any amendment, Canada will loose this reputation and will be just like all the other rich industrialized countries who, out of selfishness, closed their heart and their borders to the persecuted in recent years.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: That is not true.

Senator Hébert: Wait for my conclusion. Do not interrupt me! On the perilous roads of exile, they still dream of Canada as their last hope in the madness of this world.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Hébert, I have a hard time understanding why Senator Lowell Murray who, presumably, participates in Cabinet meetings, allowed his colleagues, Senators Kinsella, Di Nino and others to vote for the report, and now tells them to backtrack and change their mind completely? How come it happens this way?

Did Senator Murray have no idea at all of what the plans of his government were?

Senator Hébert: Senator Gigantès, I have no answer whatsoever. I have no idea why. Maybe a mistake was made.

[English]

Senator Di Nino: I would like to pose two quick questions. First of all, I wonder if the honourable senator would share with me the source of the statistics on the dependents. I did not catch that while he was giving it.

Senator Hébert: On the dependents?

Senator Di Nino: The last comments on the ratios of dependents between the investor program and the refugee program.

Senator Hébert: I do not seem to have it here, but I will be glad to provide it for you on Monday.

Senator Di Nino: At your convenience. My other question deals with statistics. I wonder if you are familiar with and if you could recite to me the number of immigrants that Canada admitted on a yearly basis in 1984, before this government took power and the number of immigrants that this country admits now under the Conservative government.

Senator Hébert: That is a bit of a silly question.

Senator Di Nino: It is not a silly question.

Senator Hébert: Yes, it is. At the time that you refer to, in the first place, there were not 20 million immigrants in the world. If we are receiving more immigrants today than 10 or 20 years ago, it is because there are more immigrants knocking at our door. That is the point.

Senator Di Nino: I beg to differ. Just for the record, honourable senators, when this government took power in 1984, I believe there was some 80,000 immigrants annually to this country. There are now 250,000, three times more than there were at that time.

Senator Hébert: In 1965, we admitted 300,000. What are you talking about? What are you trying to say? We are talking mainly about refugees in this bill. In the case of refugees —

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, the point is there is a sanctimonious attitude that some people opposite take on this issue. I suggest that the facts will prove you wrong. We are admitting more immigrants today than Liberal governments did previous to our taking power.

Senator Hébert: That is not absolutely true. I quoted you a figure of 19 —

Senator Di Nino: One year.

Senator Hébert: But that is not what C-86 is mainly about, senator. You know that. It is about refugees. Refugees and immigrants are different matters altogether. If there are more refugees coming in today than there were in 1960, it is because there are more refugees in the world. You should know that.

Senator Di Nino: I think that we can discuss this in more detail during the committee hearings which we hope we will have in the near future, but I think it is important that Bill C-86 not be seen solely as a refugee bill. This is not a refugee bill. Bill C-86 is a major revision with major amendments to the immigration bills. It deals with many issues, not only refugees, although that is an important part of it.

Senator Molgat: I hope Senator Di Nino is not closing the debate with that statement.

Senator Di Nino: I am sorry.

Hon. Mabel M. DeWare: It does not seem as if it will be easy to get into this debate today, but I would really like to take a crack at it.

I am glad to hear the honourable member opposite recognizes the government did refer to our study all through their deliberations and that they did make some amendments due to our recommendations. I think some of our questions and yours could be answered during committee.

I would like to express to this chamber why I feel that Bill C-86 is important. Surely no one can be under any illusion that the status quo in terms of our immigration programs can still adequately do the job. It cannot.

The immigration policies of our industrialized countries must be capable of dealing with the sometimes conflicting pressures of international volatility, unprecedented movements of people, and economic uncertainty.

• (1630)

The administrative resources established in the Immigration Act of 1976 clearly were not designed to address these pressures. That is why the amendments to the act outlined in Bill C-86 are of such importance, and why it is incumbent on us to approve this bill.

Since 1984, the government has undertaken the most thorough assessment of our immigration and refugee policies. This assessment and related action has covered fundamental issues, such as how many immigrants we should accept over a five-year period to meet our social responsibilities, our economic needs and international obligations; how quickly we should bring immigrants to Canada in the context of our ability as a nation to handle the increase; and how best to integrate newcomers into our society.

As important and constructive as our refinements have been, pressures have continued to build on the program, so much so that I believe without the measures that Bill C-86 proposes, the underlying principles of the act are themselves in serious jeopardy. These principles are: The reunification of families; the protection of refugees; and the promotion of national economic goals.

The proposed immigration and refugee framework of Bill C-86 would provide for a stronger, more flexible immigration program and reinforce these basic humanitarian, social and economic principles. As well, the amendments to the act would give the government the ability necessary to fine-tune and adjust the program as circumstances change.

Our consultations with Canadians have left no doubt that they want an immigration system that is more flexible, more effective and more fair—a system which is seen to be balanced and effective. Bill C-86 achieves this through a package of amendments designed to reinforce the integrity of the system, to better help those who really need it, and to entrench greater efficiency and fairness in our immigration and refugee programs.

With respect to the integrity of our immigration system, nothing is more important than reassuring Canadians that our programs are fair and rational, and that abuse will not be tolerated. Bill C-86 includes a number of measures to curb abuse of our system, reaffirm its integrity and protect Canadian society from law-breakers.

Abroad, Bill C-86 proposes further training and technological assistance to immigration staff and to airline personnel to help them identify fraudulent documents. It also extends the rules relating to criminal inadmissibility to deny access to Canada by individuals who may not have a record of criminal conviction, but who are known members of a criminal or terrorist organization.

At our borders, we will give immigration staff the powers to search individuals and to seize documents and vehicles used in smuggling operations. We will expand the authority of our immigration officers to fingerprint and photograph refugee claimants and increase the penalties for people caught smuggling.

Within Canada, we will ensure that criminals can be removed and that their removal is enforced fairly and efficiently.

These amendments represent a more clear frame of reference, both for those seeking to enter Canada and for those responsible for enforcing our laws. By tightening and clarifying enforcement and control measures, they will serve to protect Canadians from those who would abuse our system and, in the process, ensure public confidence in our system that is so essential to its success.

Among other things, Canadians want to be assured that our programs and services are targeted effectively to help those for whom they are designed:family members inside and outside Canada, genuine refugees fleeing persecution, and newcomers with skills and capital to contribute to our economic growth.

Through the improved management of immigration provided for in Bill C-86, we will be able to strike the ideal balance between humanitarian and economic considerations that define an effective immigration program.

Fundamental to these improvements is a more flexible, relevant system of processing immigrants. This streamlineed approach will go a long way toward eliminating the build-up of administratively suffocating back-logs that do so much to drain our resources, frustrate clients and reduce our ability to help others.

These streams, I want to stress, do not contradict or undermine the established categories under the act. They are simply a means to manage the processing of individuals in these categories more rationally and expeditiously.

What this approach does is entrench a long-overdue degree of control in our program, which in turn will mean fewer delays, more predictable processing times and more fairness for newcomers in every category. Greater overall efficiency will also result from our commitment, through Bill C-86, to further streamline our refugee determination system.

The time required to process claims and make decisions is still too long. That is not fair to those who need our protection.

The speed with which we can remove rejected claimants remains slow. That erodes the effectiveness and credibility of our system. The result of all this delay is further pressure on costly support programs, and is certainly not fair to taxpayers.

What Bill C-86 would provide a streamlined refugee determination process that is more clear-cut, more workable and more fair. The amendments put forward under this bill would encompass improvements to the immigration and refugee board level to accelerate processing, improve training and cut administrative costs. It would also encompass new procedures to expedite the landing of Convention refugees, with reductions of up to six months in the waiting time for landed status so they can more quickly become part of the community. It would also provide for more timely, effective and fair removal procedures in cases where claims have been rejected.

As well, the government is proposing extensive administrative fine-tuning to enhance the way our immigration officers deal with clients on a daily basis. Centralized information centres will provide the public with quicker access to information on the status of applications. The department will increase the use of mail-in and drop-off services, and introduce more easily understood information and application forms. The department will also introduce a number of changes to streamline and make more flexible the way that it administers documents for visitors, students and returning residents.

Taken together, these legislative and administrative enhancements will go a long way toward giving Canadians the relevant and effective immigration system they want. Let there be no mistake, they do want programs that are more efficient and more responsible, programs truly capable of meeting the inevitable challenges of the 1990s.

It is worth noting that the follow-up report of the Auditor General, tabled on November 24, stressed that Bill C-86 addresses many of the observations and recommendations made in the 1990 Auditor General's report in which four chapters examined in detail the immigration program.

As with the previous necessary refinements to the act which the government has undertaken since 1984, these changes are consistent with our determination to maintain a system that is true to our humanitarian traditions and managed in the best interest of all Canadians.

The reaction we have solicited and received from all corners has not been unanimous. Unanimity, I dare say, is impossible where a volatile issue such as immigration policy is concerned. But the government is satisfied that Bill C-86 ties together effectively many of the varying concerns of Canadians with the one common thread shared by all—the demand for a better managed, more efficient program.

The government is assured that some of the fears being expressed by those at the extremes of these issues will prove unfounded, as they did when we introduced Bill C-55.

I am sure most of you here today, at least those without selective memories, will remember the hue and cry that went up over the refugee determination amendments in Bill C-55. The fears expressed three years ago not only proved unfounded, the new measures have served to enhance Canada's reputation within the international refugee community.

• (1640)

Bill C-86, I am certain, will be seen in a similar light very soon. It is legislation for the 1990s and beyond. It is legislation that will ensure viability and credibility for our immigration programs at a time of unprecedented pressure.

As such, it is legislation that deserves the approval of this Chamber. We owe it to the Canadians of today and those to come to endorse quickly these improvements in important issues.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I am pleased to speak today on such an extremely important and far-reaching legislation. Bill C-86 is the most comprehensive revision of our immigration laws since Parliament passed the current act in 1976. It touches on literally all aspects of how Canada deals with immigrants and refugees. There are so many aspects to it that, in the limited time available to me, I must, of necessity, focus my comments more narrowly than the bill requires.

Although Bill C-86 has come before the Senate only a few days ago, some of us are familiar with it through the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology of which I am a member. In the summer we conducted a prestudy of the bill and presented our report, a unanimous one, in time for it to be considered by the minister, by the House of Commons committee studying the bill, and by the House prior to the passage.

The minister was very complimentary about the care and deliberations evident in our report in which we tried to identify the most important of the many issues in the bill. Unfortunately the government saw fit to accept only a few of our recommendations. It is the recommendations that have not been acted on thus far that I wish to concentrate on today.

[Senator DeWare.]

First, fairness requires that I acknowledge the beneficial changes made to the bill before it reached this chamber last week.

When we studied the subject matter of the bill, we were concerned, as were many others, that there was to be a blanket rule that refugee hearings were to be open to the public. Closure was to be the exception. We recommended the reverse situation. A closed hearing, except upon a successful application to open it, would be the better choice. I am pleased to see that the government agreed.

We were also concerned that the bill would have eliminated certain protections now available to refugees and refugee claimants before they could be removed from Canada. We felt strongly four years ago that there should be ministerial oversight on such important decisions which could affect people's lives.

We are gratified that the minister agreed and that the bill before us once again contains those protections. Similarly, I recognize the improvements that have been made to the criminal and security and inadmissibility provisions of the bill. While they do not go as far as some would like, they do respond in some measure to our concerns and those of many commentators that the scope of the original drafting was too broad.

I also welcome the changes to the detention provisions so that reviews will take place on a more timely basis, and amendments to ensure that war criminals, among others being deported from Canada, will not have excessive appeal rights.

But there remains much to be done. The bill is still flawed. Many of the criticisms and concerns of thoughtful and knowledgeable commentators have not been remedied. Indeed, I need look no further than the first recommendation reflecting our concern about the proposed new role in the refugee-determination system of the senior immigration officer.

Everyone applauds the decision to eliminate the time-consuming credible-basis hearing. Virtually no one outside the government supports granting to senior immigration officers, alone and outside the context of a hearing, the power to make decisions to exclude people from making refugee claims on the basis that they are not eligible.

I am aware of the government's view that the five eligibility criteria are not subjective and do not involve discretion on the part of the officer. In my view, discretion is not the issue here. Saying that the decision is not subjective does not further the debate. Decision of eligibility requires discerning facts, then applying them to legal criteria and deciding whether a person fits or not. If the individual fits, he or she cannot make a refugee claim and may be swiftly deported.

Fair enough. There have to be rules. But is this a good way to make that decision? A single immigration officer, acting alone, possibly through a translator, is dealing with individuals who may be scared and may understand neither what is happening nor the significance of the questions. Add to that the fact that the assistance of counsel is not guaranteed. The whole process could take place so quickly that such assistance could be impossible.

I feel that the proposed structure is a recipe for serious errors. I urge all members of the Chamber to consider the committee's recommendation that all doubtful cases of eligibility to make a refugee claim should be referred to the Immigration and Refugee Board so that the decision can be made on a quasi-judicial basis in a hearing with full rights of counsel.

I now move to another aspect of the bill dealing with refugee determination that is of serious concern—returning refugee claimants to other countries which the individual had passed through, so that their claims may be determined there. The government calls this "sharing responsibility", but others are less charitable. Regardless of the need, the safeguards for such return are demonstrably lacking in this bill.

I note first that, although the provisions have never been used, the current law contains the essential minimum protections. People to be returned to other countries must be given lawful authority to be in the country of return, or they must have the right to have the merits of other claims determined there.

Those words are in the current law for one reason only: The Senate insisted on them. In 1988, we stood on principle. Are these principles less important now than they were then? I suggest not. Committee recommendation number 4 would see these minimal protections retained in the law.

Continuing on the topic of returning claimants to other countries so that their claim may be determined there, I note that the other recommendations made by the committee have also been disregarded. We felt that no such return should be made outside of the context of a bilateral or a multilateral agreement, such as was developed in Europe.

The minister has stated that this procedure is Canada's preferred arrangement. If this is so, why not put it into law, as our recommendation number 2 suggested, and provide a more solid foundation for a very controversial policy.

We also urge that the conditions for designation by the government of any country as one to which individuals may be returned should be more stringent. Specifically, recommendation number 3 stated that the country should comply with more than just one section of the convention related to the status of refugees. All the provisions of the convention are important. Further, the law should specify that states should have actually acceded to the convention.

I turn now to an issue in the refugee-determination system that may not affect large numbers of people, but could be of life and death importance to some. Under the current law, a person who has been recognized as a convention refugee by another country, but who has a credible basis on which to fear persecution in that country, is eligible to enter the Canadian system. This right will be removed by Bill C-86 consequent of the removal of the credible-basis test. In its place, we suggested in recommendation number 5 that individuals who claim to have that fear, and the numbers are small, should be referred to the board.

The government is on record as believing that the necessary protection for those in this situation is found elsewhere in the act and that it is appropriate for immigration officers, following consultation with others and with the United Nations High Commission for Refugees, to decide whether or not to return the person to the country which has recognized him or her.

Would it not be better to let the experts who determine the fear of persecution in all other cases—members of the Immigration and Refugee Board—make this decision as well? Why have a parallel process, conducted informally outside of the hearing structure, to decide the very thing that the board was established to handle?

One of the most contentious matters in Bill C-86 in the view of many expert witnesses, including the Immigration and Refugee Board and the United Nations High Commission for Refugees, has been the dilution of the principle that refugee claimants should receive the benefit of the doubt. Currently, this principle is reflected in the rule that only one of the two board members must find that the claimant is a refugee in order for the claim to be accepted. The bill would require unanimity in three situations, each of which is problematic in its own way. Further, debate over these issues in the refugee hearing will undoubtedly take up considerable time, yet one of the government's important goals for the bill is to streamline the refugee determination process. The minister has justified these provisions by referring to the need for more "transparency and accountability" in the system. These are popular buzz words nowadays, but in this context I have no sense of what they mean. I urge, as did the committee in recommendation 8 of its report, that this matter be reconsidered.

In restructuring Federal Court appeals in refugee determination matters by removing judicial review from the Court of Appeal to the trial division, the government clearly wished to avoid a flood of time-consuming appeals to the Court of Appeal. It therefore devised an extremely restrictive barrier. The only cases that could go to the next level would be those that were certified as involving a serious question of general importance by the very trial judge that heard the case.

The committee found this to be a highly questionable approach. We made what I believe was a very sensible proposal, one that was more restrictive than that urged by many in the legal community. Our recommendation 9 was to also allow a judge of the Federal Court of Appeal to receive applications for leave to appeal decisions of the trial judge. Thus, either the sitting judge, or a judge independent of the case, could determine whether an issue was worthy of appellate attention.

As I mentioned, the government has made some commendable changes to the bill in the criminal and security inadmissibility area. There is one matter, however, which has not been changed and which I feel deserves serious reconsideration. It concerns the proposed section 19(1)(k), which would permit the exclusion of applicants, or the deportation of permanent residents, on unspecified security grounds.

In response to repeated queries by witnesses and the Senate committee, the government has failed to provide even one concrete example of the kind of person who would be a threat to Canada yet would not be caught by the other security sections. We could better assess the need for such a provision if an actual or hypothetical situation could be presented in which an individual would not be excludable by virtue of the other security categories, but whom reasonable people would agree presented a threat to the security of Canada.

In the absence of such examples, I can only reiterate the committee's view in recommendation 11. As legislators we should be vigilant about passing laws which prohibit unspecified conduct.

Another controversial feature of the bill has been the introduction of conditions relating to the place of residence and occupation of permanent residents. The Senate committee did not oppose such conditions, as did many witnesses. Instead, we realized their potential usefulness in helping Canada achieve greater benefits from immigration. On the other hand, to dictate where people must live and work is a significant restriction on their freedom, one that should therefore be limited in its duration. For that reason, I urge, as did the committee in recommendation 12, that a maximum time limit on any such condition should be legislated.

Finally, I wish to speak about the retroactive features of the bill. Despite the urging of many commentators, the government has retained the option of applying the bill retroactively to applicants in the system now and in the future. I question the fairness of this approach to individuals who have made their application on the basis of the rules that exist currently, yet who may be disqualified by future changes. I urge that such a policy apply only after the bill comes into force so that new applicants after that time can at least be advised that the criteria may change and that nothing in their application may be taken for granted.

I began by speaking on the importance of this bill and I will end the same way. Some 250,000 immigrants will be admitted to Canada in the coming year. Many others will claim refugee status from within Canada. This bill has the potential to affect every one of those individuals, others whose applications we turn down and those permanent residents we deport from Canada using the new criteria. We must not pass this bill until we are satisfied that the best choices have been made. We must be satisfied that the line between the interests of Canada and fairness to those many people who will be affected has been drawn appropriately. While the bill has been improved in some respects since the committee's prestudy, I am not convinced that the best choices have been made in all cases, some of which I have outlined to you.

I welcome the chance to pursue these further in committee.

[Senator Bosa.]

[Translation]

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity to take a few minutes to speak to a bill as important as Bill C-86. First of all, I would like to thank and congratulate my colleagues on both sides of this Chamber who worked very hard to improve a very complex piece of legislation, as was pointed out by many of the previous speakers.

Although not all the recommendations of the Senate Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology were accepted, I believe this exercise was an excellent example of the usefulness of the pre-study process, which lets us play a more constructive role than when we come in at the very end. I think this is very important, and I want to thank my colleagues for making this possible.

I was able to attend one or two initial meetings, but later on I had to leave because of the referendum. However, I consider this a very important bill. It was introduced by a government that has systematically improved the immigration program and admitted increasingly larger numbers of immigrants since it came to power. It is clear this government wants Canada to remain a welcoming nation and a country that is sensitive to the needs of others.

The very essence of Bill C-86 is to ensure that the immigration program is managed in a manner that is fair, effective and even-handed. However, this search for fairness and effectiveness will not be successful if we let people break the rules and take advantage of Canada's generosity. We cannot have a fair and effective immigration program if people feel it is being mismanaged or not being managed at all. We cannot have a fair and effective program if it cannot protect the host country.

In fact, the dilemma facing the government, and this applies to all governments, was how to reconcile the humanitarian goals of the government and the vast majority of Canadians with the feelings of hostility that are aroused in some cases when the Immigration Act is perceived as unable to control abuse by some asylum seekers.

I agree that when we deny people admission, sometimes mistakes are made. However, I think that leaving the door wide open without any controls whatsoever merely exacerbates the feelings of hostility I referred to just now. There was some reference to this earlier, that some people become hostile when immigrants take advantage of the host country.

I think that at this point, the Canadian government has tried to strike the best possible balance between these two situations or perceptions. I think most of my colleagues will agree that the Government of Canada has taken a courageous step. This is not an easy situation to deal with. I certainly will not try to prove the bill is perfect. However, I challenge any government of any political stripe to table an immigration bill that would deal with every possible situation. In fact, this bill is a vast improvement over the previous legislation, and I maintain that we have made tremendous progress and that the legislation will continue to evolve, because, as we pointed out, today's immigration problems are not those of the 70s or even of the early 80s. We are seeing a number of social, economic and political revolutions throughout the world, and as a result Canada has to adapt its immigration legislation to deal with new needs and new problems.

It is clearly something which will keep developing. In a few years, no doubt more adjustments will have to be made. What we have to consider is where we started from, where we are now, and, perhaps, where we will have to go in the future.

Many issues have been raised and I will mention just a few. First, the refugee status determination process. Doubts were expressed about the role of the senior immigration officer as proposed in the bill.

Under Bill C-86, anyone who claims to be a refugee will be granted a hearing on the validity of his or her claim, unless that person is part of one of the five precisely defined exceptional categories. The senior immigration officer will have to determine if the refugee claimant is part of one of those.

The exceptions are clear: persons who have already been recognized as refugees by another country; persons who have been determined by an adjudicator to be criminals guilty of serious crimes; persons who make another claim less than 90 days after their last claim has been rejected; persons already recognized as refugees; persons who come to Canada from a country which is on a list established by regulation and where they could have made a refugee claim.

I am happy today to see that these conditions are clear and that we do not refer to arbitrary criteria. I believe we were all very concerned, at the beginning of the hearings, about how the senior immigration officer would play his role and about what it would be.

To establish if one of the exceptions applies to a claimant, immigration officers will not have to take discretionary decisions. They will only have to answer yes or no to the question which they have to deal with. If they cannot do it with certainty, they will not prevent the person from entering the country, but only transmit the case to the Immigration and Refugee Board.

As I was saying, the criteria are clear, objective and well defined. There is no room for subjectivity.

If there is any doubt in that regard, let me remind you that those officers will be selected and trained to make those decisions. They will be well aware of the role they have to play in the protection of refugees. Their training will be, among other things, on the cultural differences and on Canada's obligations under the Geneva Convention and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Immigration officers will not make decisions on the admissibility of claimants whose case is more complex, for example in the case of persons who constitute a danger to the security or those likely to engage in criminal activities. In those cases, the decision will be made by an adjudicator following an inquiry and in the presence of legal counsel representing the person involved. I think that process answers the concerns we had.

I would like to take this opportunity to answer concerns expressed by women's groups, particularly by the Women's Caucus of the Coalition for a Just Refugee and Immigration Policy.

That group has raised many concerns regarding what happened to women in the past and what will happen to them in the future.

On that point, I would like to reassure them concerning the Women at Risk Program which is not mentioned in this legislation and which has not yet produced the conclusive results that the government hoped for. I was told that the Department of Immigration is in the process of reviewing the program in order to increase its effectiveness and to respond more promptly to the needs of a larger number of women refugees.

With regards to the selection criteria of refugees outside Canada, they do not put women refugees at a disadvantage since they represent 42 per cent of all selected refugees. Women's groups were also concerned about public hearings but, as others have mentioned, hearings will now be confidential.

There is also the issue of freedom of movement. Under Bill C-86, the limitations to free movement are willingly and necessarily circumscribed to the permanent residence period, that is the three-year period required to become a Canadian citizen. These limitations to free movement can be eliminated when and if circumstances render these limitations too restrictive for a permanent resident.

The point is very important. I know that regulations will follow. Our colleague, Senator Grimard, is working very hard on them. I was advised, for instance, that if a woman, who had been assigned to British Columbia or a village in the Abitibi area, was a victim of violence or experienced other such problems it might be very difficult for her to leave the area unless she had completed her three years. It would be very important that the regulations recognize this condition as a very important one.

In the case of women who are sponsored, which is another concern that was brought to my attention, I have been assured that the present process to study sponsored applications for settlement, which now takes 10 months, will be reviewed at the immigration minister's request who asked that this period be reduced to six months.

There are also some concerns regarding the 48 hour, one week and 30 day periods. I know that, safe for exceptional circumstances, it was pushed back to 7 days. I think that this too should reassure women.

The bill confirms and protects the rights given to the province of Quebec in the February 5th 1991 Canada-Quebec agreement. Thus, Quebec's rights to select and to have its rightful share of immigrants are recognized by law. And this is a good example that it is not always necessary to modify the Constitution.

I must congratulate the Government for remembering its commitment and for making the link with the Quebec-Canada agreement.

This bill allows Quebec to set its own conditions, enabling it to improve its efficiency in selecting claimants. Also, the bill will give a legal base to the practice of treating the spouse's application as part and parcel of the main claimant's application.

We added the measures on the processing of refugee claims largely in reply to repeated requests, by the provinces and particularly Quebec, that we improve the control on the flow of immigrants within the country and that we discourage any abuse of the system. While this bill establishes a solid legal base for the Investor Immigrant Program, a program which is of major importance for Quebec, it also includes specific exceptions for Quebec, again because we wanted to respect the provisions of the Canada-Quebec Agreement on Immigration.

I will conclude by saying that no government could have created a perfect legislation in such a complicated area as immigration where complexity is not resolving itself but, on the contrary, is increasing. One could even say that this issue will get increasingly more complex. I wish to recognize the efforts on the part of the minister of Immigration and the Senate committee to improve the bill. If we adopt this bill, the Canadian immigration system will have made not a small step, but quite a few big steps forward.

I thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: May I ask you something, Senator Lavoie-Roux? You were a member of that committee. Therefore, you bear a greater responsibility in the unanimous adoption of a very clear report which made, if I remember well, 14 specific recommendations.

As others did before you, you reminded us that the government had in fact adopted some of our suggestions, thereby improving a bill which, as you yourself said, could never be perfect. But, unless I was distracted, I never heard you mention, not even once, that you were disappointed with the fact that the minister had not strived to improve this imperfect bill by adopting some of the other suggestions you evidently agreed with.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: As I said at the beginning, I unfortunately could not attend more than one or two sittings of the committee because I was engrossed in the referendum campaign in Quebec.

I do not know this bill as well as my colleagues, since they have spent much more time studying it than I did.

However, I have been a parliamentarian long enough to know that no bill is ever perfect. Some worthwhile suggestions may not have been accepted.

At this point, I do not know why they have been rejected. I cannot answer that question. But I think, as senator Bosa and you have indicated, that quite a few of them were accepted. I am told 12 of them, maybe less, were accepted.

Senator Hébert: Oh, no, not 12 of them.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Anyway, I do now want to discuss the matter any further at this point, but that is the figure I was given. Some suggestions were accepted and that is what, I think, is important. You have to remember that we had a lot of ground to cover. We made progress by reviewing the immigration legislation and the bill was improved as a result of the contribution made by senators and others.

Senator Hébert: You said the bill was not perfect and it was impossible to make a perfect piece of legislation. I guess you accept the principle that this bill can still be improved since it has been referred to the Senate. We have a committee to do that job. Hundreds of witnesses want to be heard. If you want this bill to be as perfect as possible, I guess we can expect you, as a member of the committee, to support detailed hearings on this issue.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: I have also learned, during my career as a parliamentarian, that, in the end, it is up to the minister to decide. To this end, he must have as much information as he can. I think you have given him all he needs. I also think the House of Commons has spent ample time discussing this issue, even if procedural measures were taken to cut debate short.

If I am not mistaken, you did say at the very beginning that it took eight months to prepare this bill.

Senator Hébert: The minister?

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Yes, the minister, Senator Hébert. I suppose that he had already got a lot of information and that he took many things into consideration. Ultimately, it is up to him and the government to make the final decisions.

Senator Hébert: Do you mean by that that the Senate is completely irrelevent since it is the minister who will decide?

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Senator Hébert, I told you that what the Senate did was certainly very useful since it helped bring about many improvements to the bill. We will also be able, through the regulations, to specify things that will further improve the bill.

Senator Hébert: Are you aware that on top of a number of recommendations that we made and that were accepted, the new bill before us contains more than 60 new provisions? These are not recommendations made by the Senate, but other technical improvements and so on.

So much so that observers like the one I mentioned to you in my speech earlier say that it is a new bill.

So, if it is a new bill that contains about 65 changes and that, on the other hand, the minister did not seem to be impressed by all of our recommendations, I think that this bill before us is almost new. You will agree that we should study this new bill. It is not the same.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Lavoie-Roux, I must interfere once again. Your intervention has been going on for more than 15 minutes now, but, still, you may reply to Senator Hébert's question. Then, if everybody agrees, we will close the debate.

[English]

Senator Frith: Saved by the bell. You can send us a letter with that response!

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before deciding on that, I have had discussions with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, and the honourable members opposite know that the three bills before us today are priority bills for the government. We are anxious to have them reported by the Senate and decided before the Christmas break.

Senator Hébert: Harvie Andre will be happy with that!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We are agreeable to adjourning the debate and returning. However, since we can sit this evening, tomorrow morning and come back again Monday evening, there is lots of time to continue this debate. Perhaps on Monday evening or whenever we return, we could have some commitment that we could refer this bill to the committee immediately then.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): My honourable friend and I have discussed this matter and I have checked with our caucus members as to who wishes to speak on this bill. I know for sure of one person who wishes to speak on it Monday evening; I know of no others.

I can give an undertaking that we will be prepared to send this bill to committee on Monday evening.

Senator Frith: That is, providing there is a majority vote to do so. We will be voting against that motion. In other words, we will not be sending it; you will be sending it.

Senator Molgat: Concerning the two other bills, we have some speakers on those. I do not believe there will be any delay in sending them to committee. I cannot guarantee that it will be on Monday, but during the course of the week they will go to committee. However, what happens in committee is not under my control.

Senator Frith: They will be full hearings, however.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

BILL TO DISSOLVE OR TERMINATE CERTAIN CORPORATIONS AND OTHER BODIES

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the second reading of Bill C-63, to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies.

• (1720)

He said: Honourable senators, I am happy today to introduce Bill C-63, known as the act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies. This bill, stated simply, implements the decision announced in the February 1992 budget statement to close down the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, the Economic Council of Canada, the International Centre for Ocean Development, the Law Reform Commission and the Science Council of Canada, six organizations in all.

Senator Barootes: It does not include the CBC, does it?

Senator Kelly: There will have to be a special bill for that. The bill establishes legislative authority to wind up each of these organizations and for transferring the rights, assets and liabilities and in some cases the duties of each of these bodies back to the government. The rights of third parties dealing with these organizations, including the employees and others having contractual relations with them, are protected by allowing for the continuance of any legal proceeding against anybody to proceed directly against Her Majesty in right of Canada. The bill, in addition to repealing each organization's special act, also deletes the name of each body as required from federal statutes of general application such as the Financial Administration Act, the Access to Information Act, the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Privacy Act, et cetera.

Honourable senators, that in essence describes the purpose and objectives of this bill. I would like to turn briefly to a description of each organization covered by this bill.

The Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council was established in 1977 to provide independent advice to the Minister of Employment and Immigration on the department's policies and programs. The council consists of a chairman and 16 to 22 members appointed by the Governor in Council, plus support staff. Annual gross appropriations for the council reached $492,000 in fiscal 1991-92 and the council employed nine people. The advisory functions performed by the council have been superseded by the Canadian Labour Force Development Board for the employment side of the department, and analogous consultative mechanisms exist on the immigration side. In addition, the department has a strong strategic policy and planning branch which will continue and which for fiscal 1991-92 accounted for some $11.02 million in appropriations and 131 authorized person years.

The Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security was established in 1984. Its stated purpose is to increase the public's level of knowledge and understanding of the issues relating to peace and security from a Canadian perspective. The institute focused on arms control, disarmament, defence and general conflict resolution. The institute was established as a council corporation and accounted for annual appropriations of some $5 million. Obviously the new geopolitical environment reduces the need for such an institute, at least in the form it has taken up until now. In addition the government can rely more on independent foreign policy research and analysis available from universities and think tanks and can still contract with academics and independent research facilities to provide independent advice, research and analysis as required.

Honourable senators, the Economic Council of Canada was created in 1963 and I do not dispute that its windup is probably the most difficult and contentious issue raised by Bill C-63. Since its creation, the council provided a source of economic analysis and advice on the growth and development of the Canadian economy. In particular it advised on how to "achieve the highest practicable levels of employment and efficient production in order that Canada may enjoy a high and consistent rate of economic growth", in which all Canadians might share.

The quality of its work was unchallenged and its reports and forecasts gained domestic and international repute. By fiscal 1991-92 its budgetary appropriations had surpassed $10.6 million per year and it had a total of 118 person years. When the economic council was established 30 years ago there was a shortage of independent economic research institutes in Canada, what we call economic think tanks. Such is not the case today. At this point in time we have the Institute for Research on Public Policy, the C. D. Howe Institute, the Conference Board of Canada, the Fraser Institute, the Canada West Foundation, La Centre de Recherche et Développement en Economique and the Institute for Policy Analysis, to name a few. This of course does not include the large number of first-rate economic faculties in Canada or academic economists who are available to research and advise the government on economic matters.

The International Centre for Ocean Development was established in 1983. Its mandate was to support ongoing coordination with the developing countries in ocean resource management and development. That centre was established as a Crown corporation, has a board of 14 members appointed by Governor in Council, and by fiscal 1991-92 accounted for $13.3 million in annual appropriations. It is the government's considered view that a separate organizational infrastructure for the purposes performed by the centre is no longer justifiable and the continuing function of this agency will be transferred to the Canadian International Development Agency, CIDA.

[Senator Kelly.]

The Law Reform Commission was set up in 1971. Its purpose is to advise the Minister of Justice on "a continuous and systematic basis" with respect to the "improvement, modernization and reform" of the statutes and other laws of Canada. Everyone here will be aware of and acknowledge the excellent work done by the LRC in the fields of family and administrative law and in amendments to the Criminal Code. In the 1991-92 estimates, the commission accounted for appropriations of just in excess of $4.9 million and 36 authorized person year. Where necessary the work previously undertaken by the LRC will be commissioned by the Department of Justice from universities, private law firms and elsewhere.

The Science Council of Canada was created in 1966. Its mandate is to assess Canada's scientific and technological requirements, to increase public awareness of these requirements, to assist various groups in society in the development and use of science and technology and to advise the government on the best use of science and technology. Operating as a Crown corporation, by fiscal 1991-92 the science council accounted for appropriations of $3.4 million and 29 authorized person years. The government has decided to wind up the council so as to minimize the administrative costs and infrastructure and to maximize the flow of grants to researchers.

Based on the 1991-92 estimates the windup of these six organizations will cut $36.5 million annually from the government's operating costs. In a net sense, the actual savings will be somewhat less since in many cases the functions will be performed elsewhere. What has been cut essentially are the administrative infrastructures and the cost of any organizational duplications or overlaps.

There is no question that the windup of these organizations, several in particular, is contentious and will continue to be contentious for some time. In some cases—particularly the economic council—a gap will be there for awhile. People who previously worked for these agencies will have to find alternate employment, a task that is not easy these days for anyone, but in order to control the deficit the government has been forced to cut back. It cannot just cut back on programs and transfer payments, it must also cut back on operations, which unfortunately means people and organizations. If Canadians are hurting due to the current economic circumstances, as they are, they expect governments and public officials to share that pain.

Ottawa, government agencies and public servants can't be immune from the general economic circumstances and what has to be done to turn the economy around. If I can use a private sector analogy. I do that occasionally though some in this place find such analogies offensive or misleading. A private sector corporation faced with the circumstances in which the government now finds itself, prunes costs, divests of non-performing assets, disposes of redundancies, finds ways to maximize return on the money it spends and streamlines administrative infrastructures. Many private corporations are doing just that today in order to compete or in some cases, to survive. This is what Bill C-63 is doing in the context of government.

There are those who have said—and doubtless will continue to say—that the Economic Council is being wound up because it too frequently took positions or made recommendations which were at variance with current government policy. Honourable senators, I reject this suggestion. Implicitly, it indicates that this is a mean-spirited, ill-intentioned government, overly sensitive to criticism. I reject that suggestion. How a government that has been as low in the polls as much and for as long as this government has been and can still be sensitive to criticism is beyond me. In addition, I can safely say that in all the years I have lived here and been conscious of what has gone on and from my experiences in government, both Liberal and Conservative, I have not yet seen a government that did not do the best it could, and was not doing the best that it could in the public weal within its philosophical boundaries. This government, I can assure you, is no different.

There are those who have said that the wind-up of the "granting councils" such as the Science Council, will remove the so-called arm's length relationship that until now applied to the issuance of research and other forms of grants, subventions and contracts. The obvious concern is that henceforth this process will become politicized.

I reject this notion. First, past experience with arm's length bodies—and I mention as an example TVO in Ontario —shows that the model provides no guarantee that money is dispensed with economy and efficiency. Furthermore, the money dispensed is public money for which ministers are ultimately accountable to Parliament. If accountable, they must at least be able to know how such money is being dispensed, and set general policies and guidelines. Finally, I doubt very much that ministers will interfere in the granting process. I am quite confident that grants will be dispensed by public servants without interference from ministers or their staffs.

As I have said before in this place, I had the honour of being the co-chair of our party's Crown Corporations Task Force in 1983-84. I am pleased that many of the recommendations we made then have now been implemented in terms of rationalizing the Crown corporations sector.

One of the themes that permeated our report was that, in its machinery of government, any government has to be flexible and responsive to changing circumstances and requirements. We found that the Crown corporation sector, which then consisted of some 178 individual organizations, was too large, too amorphous, too diverse and to extensive to be adequately controlled or directed by or be accountable to elected officials. We thought there was great scope for wind-ups and mergers in the sector to dispose of overlaps, duplications and inefficiencies that had arisen over the years as the sector grew like Topsy and, if I may say so, willy-nilly.

Our task force was strongly of the view that the sector should not be perceived or allowed to become fixed, unchanged and unchanging. Instead, we recommended that the sector should be fluid with organizations coming and going, constantly having to justify their existence, and allowing the government to respond effectively and efficiently to changing public policy, circumstances and requirements. Bill C-63, in part, is a manifestation of that orientation and philosophy. I might also say that the proliferation of advisory bodies to the government to an extent usurped the role of Parliament and of Parliamentarians.

Honourable senators, I believe this and the other place can, and should, do much more in analyzing policy alternatives and in making recommendations to the government. Senate pre-study of various bills and special studies have shown we have the capability to do it in this place, and to do it very well. The demise of several of the advisory bodies should be taken by this place as an opportunity to become more proactive and more engaged in the process of public policy-making.

Finally, honourable senators, I would be remiss in presenting this bill were I not to comment on and draw attention to the work these six agencies have done and their contribution to the public policy process. I know the wind-up of these organizations will be interpreted by some as indicating that the government evaluated their contributions and found them wanting. I am sure this is not the case. These organizations have performed an important and valuable role for which their managers and employees justifiably can feel proud. There is no dishonour in Bill C-63 for these organizations, or for their staffs. It is simply that, in these days of very tough economic times and budgetary restraint, cuts must be made and, inevitably, these cuts will hurt.

To the six organizations, to their current and past employees, I think I can, on behalf of this place, express our gratitude for a job well done in the service of Canada and wish each of them Godspeed and all good wishes for the future. I am sure their experience and their work with these agencies will stand them in good stead in proceeding with the next steps in their careers.

With that, honourable colleagues, I commend Bill C-63 to your attention.

On motion of Senator Molgat debate adjourned.

PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYMENT ACT

PUBLIC SERVICE STAFF RELATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Roch Bolduc moved the second reading of Bill C-26, to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other Acts in relation to the public service of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before us today, Bill C-26, the Public Service Reform Act, represents one of the pivotal steps in the reform of a great Canadian institution: the Public Service of Canada.

Our government has helped the public service to take the measures it requires to meet the demands of the 1990s and beyond. This has been a complex, multi-faceted process. We are dealing with the reform of an institution whose basic culture has been in place for three-quarters of a century. We are putting in place the first efforts in a quarter century to modernize and streamline the laws that govern this institution.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance conducted a series of hearings on the Public Service 2000 initiative from November 1991 to May 1992, during which a number of witnesses gave extensive testimony. These witness included senior officials from central agencies, such as the Privy Council Office, Treasury Board, the Public Service Commission, the Auditor General, the Public Policy Forum, and from unions such as the Professional Institute of Canada, the Economists, Sociologists and Statisticians Association, and the Public Service Alliance of Canada.

Honourable senators will recall that the PS 2000 process was launched by the Prime Minister in December 1989. It was nearly two years ago that a White Paper was tabled, outlining the government's vision of a more effective, more responsive, and more efficient public service: a public service with the powers it needed to respond to the needs of Canadians into the next century.

Over the past three years, many of the reforms that respond to the vision of Public Service 2000 have been implemented. Many more are in the process of implementation. Some of the changes have been implemented as a result of administrative reform. We have improved training and development opportunities. We have consulted with our clients and have secured a better understanding of what Canadians require. Other changes have come about as a result of changes in the attitude of public service employees who find themselves empowered into a new corporate culture.

[Translation]

Together, these changes carry out approximately 90 per cent of the process set in motion to modernize the Public Service and to make it more efficient. The other 10 per cent, honourable senators, would require legislative changes.

[Senator Kelly.]

The legislation governing the Public Service of Canada is over a quarter of a century old. It came into force back in the days when information was wired instead of sent by electronic mail. There were no fax machines, no photocopiers or cellular phones in those days, and the state of the information technology allowed neither decentralization nor delegation of powers. And lengthy administrative procedures were not seen as inappropriate then, while they do today in this fast-changing world of ours.

These laws were passed before we actually came to understand the phenomenon by which women were prevented access to the higher echelons of management and the special obstacles encountered by natives, visible minorities and the physically challenged.

They were passed before we realized the true value of career planning to create possibilities of acquiring new skills. In fact, in those days, government employees did not have to upgrade their knowledge and skills continually, as they to today, to do their job properly in a context where everything changes very quickly.

[English]

Over the past decade, many Canadians have recognized the need to update the legislative authorities governing the public service. Royal Commissions, joint committees, and repeated calls for review by the Auditor General have added to the chorus of voices calling for modernization. The bill before us today, honourable senators, is a response to those demands. It is a bill designed to provide the public service with the tools it needs for the future. These changes will help the government provide better services for Canadians at the same time that it protects the interests of public service employees.

Let me briefly address the primary criticisms that have been levelled at Bill C-26 since it was tabled in the House of Commons a year and a half ago.

Some have argued that this legislation will undermine the merit principle in the public service, but merit through competition will remain the general basis for recruitment into the public service and promotion within it. Even the authority to managers to redeploy staff to other jobs at the same level requires their consent, and provision is made for a strong redress mechanism involving the Public Service Commission.

Some fear that the bill will result in many more public servants being excluded from union membership. In fact, the overall effect is likely to be a somewhat higher level of unionization, which is already considerably higher than in the Ontario and Quebec public services.

Some claim that the government and public service managers should not have the power to contract services out when this is seen as being more efficient and effective. But surely any organization must have the ability to choose "make or buy" options.

Some union leaders have argued that the Public Service Commission should be abolished and staffing made subject to collective bargaining. I cannot see this as a contribution to the effectiveness of the public service.

There are many provisions that even the most vociferous critics tend to like: an end to probationary periods other than on initial appointment, because now we also have probationary periods after promotion; consolidation of processes for release and demotion; new machinery for designating essential services; increased scope for arbitration; streamlining of the administration of eligible lists; term employees becoming union members after three months instead of six; notice to bargain extended from 60 to 90 days; new powers to encourage employment equity.

The Auditor General, in his recent annual report, chides the government for the length of time it is taking to pass Bill C-26. I quote him:

> It is my view that current public service human resource management systems—such as those for job classification and staffing—are too costly, and do not provide the flexibility or encourage the adaptability needed today. Legislative change is crucial to modernizing these systems.

Those are the words of the Auditor General.

One of our finest academics, Professor Kenneth Kernaghan, in his submission to the National Finance committee, addressed the most controversial issue, that of deployment. He stated:

> There is a proposal, as you know, to allow deployment of public servants by senior managers so that they can be transferred quickly in order to adapt to changing needs. But the PS 2000 report makes direct reference to the fact that one of the reasons for this is to ensure that there are developmental opportunities for persons who have been historically disadvantaged—the various target groups.

Later in his testimony, regarding his views on deployment, he concluded:

> This is one of the trade-offs that I, frankly, have had some difficulty with. I understand the public service argument on this and I am sensitive to it, but on balance I am convinced that the need to enable management of government to proceed in a more flexible and faster way to adapt to changes that exist overrides that consideration.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, in opening this debate on second reading, I would like to go back in time for a moment. I would like to put this bill in the more general context of the Public Service reform. It often becomes very easy for us to forget to keep a general perspective while we squabble over small details.

I would like to remind my colleagues that Canada is not the only country that wants to restructure its public service. Everywhere in the world, countries seek new ways to enable their public service meet increasingly complex requirements in a context that also becomes more and more difficult and in which everything is faster and faster.

Regardless of where they take place, these reforms are essentially the result of the same forces. Everywhere in the world, governments realize the contribution of their public service to the improvement of social and economic conditions.

Everywhere in the world, governments look for ways to make their bureaucracies put more emphasis on services to the public and be less obsessed by internal mechanisms.

Everywhere in the world institutions from the public sector look for new and cheaper ways to fonction.

I gave here some additional information on on what took place in New Zealand, where they have set up a series of government agencies somewhat similar to the Swedish model, and to what they have in England where there are now more and more special agency operation of government to executive agencies, as well as in France, where there are plenty of different models.

[English]

In my view, this government's reforms of the public service have fallen on the moderate, administrative end of the spectrum. It is not New Zealand; it is not England; it is not France; it is Canada. In December, 1989, the Prime Minister outlined his vision for reforms in a program we have all come to know as Public Service 2000.

Canada has a public service today that has evolved to meet Canadian demands and needs. It is generally regarded as one of the best public services in the world. That is what they say in other countries, and I would agree with that assessment. I myself have been chairman of the Civil Service Commission in the province of Quebec, as well as deputy minister of various departments. As secretary of the Treasury Board, and later as secretary general of the government, I think I obtained a deep understanding of the problems and challenges of managing a modern public service. Since coming to Ottawa, I now appreciate the professionalism and dedication of the public service of Canada. It is an institution of which all Canadians should be very proud.

The Canadian public service has been built up over 75 years on the pillars of merit, equity, and non-partisanship. It is a uniquely Canadian institution, created by Canadians to reflect the needs of the country and its people. Few Canadians understand the breadth and scope of the work done by our public service employees, but I assure you that Canadians value the work of these employees.

Let us take, for example, a typical day in Canada. If we were able to review the work performed on this very day by public service employees across the country, I believe that all members of this chamber would be impressed by the service provided.

By the time this day is over, air traffic controllers will have supervised the safe takeoff and landing of over 13,000 aircraft. Agriculture Canada inspectors will have processed over 35,000 tons of meat. Members of the Department of National Health and Welfare will have provided medical services to more than 16,000 Canadians. These are just a few examples.

Parks Canada, for example, records 18 million visits a year. Revenue Canada processes 18 million tax forms, External Affairs 1.2 million passports, and Canada Customs 119 million travellers in a year. Each year, the Department of Supply and Services issues 112 million Canada Pension Plan, Old Age Security, and Family Allowance cheques.

Over 200,000 public service employees work to provide these and other services. They work in a corporate culture that values service to Canada and Canadians, that values honesty, integrity and non-partisanship, and promotes a spirit of professionalism in carrying out responsibilities.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, civil servants provide these services during a period of budgetary restraints, as the Minister of Finance reminded us yesterday. The government is stuck with a national debt that forces it to spend 33 cents of every dollar on the servicing of that debt.

It must somehow manage to always do more with the 67 cents that it has left. In the nineties, nobody wants a reduction of the services provided by the government. In many important ways, Canadians need more of those services. They need services that will help them meet the requirements of an economy which, because of the globalization of the markets, is more and more based on information technology.

[English]

They need the electronic databases that tell them about export opportunities. They need an automated patent office that will help them keep track of technological innovation. They need remote sensing satellites to help monitor our forests, farms and fisheries.

However, as the government reduces its spending, all these services that Canadians want and need must be delivered at lower cost. The government must balance the demand of Canadians for federal services and the ability of taxpayers to pay for them. We have made tough decisions recently, and we will continue to make them. Canada's public service employees are the front-line workers who must deal with the consequences of these tough decisions.

This has been a very difficult process for Canada's public service. The public service has steadily raised its productivity because it has been making better use of the most important resources at its disposal: The skills, knowledge and talent of its employees. We must not impede them with unnecessary red tape and constraint.

This is part of the vision of PS 2000. We seek to make the existing employment and personnel management regime less complicated and burdensome for managers and employees alike. We seek to reduce central administrative controls so that deputy ministers will have greater authority to manage their departments and clearer accountability for results. We seek to clarify and simplify the roles of central agencies and of systems of personnel and administrative control throughout the government. We seek to control and reward innovative ways to encourage efficiency and improve program delivery.

For government employee, PS 2000 means a spirit of entrepreneurship within the bureaucracy. It means giving managers more flexibility to do their jobs. It means more decisions at the local level on what is the best way to deliver government programs. It means less checking with Ottawa.

For the government client, PS 2000 means less red tape and decisions that can take account of local needs.

For the taxpayer, PS 2000 means more tax dollars devoted to service delivery, less for internal administration. Reducing paper burden, red tape and the number of management levels will reduce costs. It will free up resources. It will help Canada's public employees improve front line services to the public.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the Public Service has already revised those components of its administrative practices which do not require changes in legislation. The number of detailed administrative regulations has been reduced considerably. Policies are now far more succinct. They emphasize major imperatives instead of detailed instructions. For instance, in the field of materiel management, a policy that formerly covered 138 pages has now been reduced to 30 pages, including two pages of general principles and 28 pages of guidelines. That is an improvement.

Departments must submit administrative reports to Treasury Board. Formerly, forty were required, while today, only nine are necessary. The Public Service is decentralizing decision-making. Instead of asking them to follow the rules, we now ask program managers to concentrate on customer service.

Of course, we still have rules, but they are now intended to be a help, not a hindrance.

We make sure that employees receive adequate training to cope with the demands of increasingly complex tasks, to make decisions and be responsible for getting results.

[English]

Honourable senators, the bill before us is an integral part of this process of reform through Public Service 2000. The provisions it puts in place do not represent a major overhaul.

They are neither revolutionary nor risky. Rather, they fine-tune an organization that has already provided exemplary service to Canadians.

Nearly every provision of this bill can be related to the goal of improving services. Some are direct. We will improve the speed with which jobs can be filled. Others are less direct. We will simplify administrative procedures which, in turn, should leave more managerial or employee time for getting their real jobs done, and not jumping through administrative hoops.

Through this bill, we seek a balance between the needs of taxpayers and the needs of public servants. This balance has been achieved through a process of reasoned compromise.

This bill has not reached this stage without its share of opposition. The government has given honest consideration to the issues raised by opposition members in the other place, and a number of early proposals were altered during consultation to accommodate some of the concerns raised by public service employees and their representatives.

We have worked hard to create a piece of legislation that strikes the careful balance between the needs of the public service and the taxpayers of Canada.

Three years after the Prime Minister gave us his vision of a modern, effective public service in Canada, I am pleased to see this bill before us today. I urge honourable senators to support Bill C-26 and give the public service of Canada the legislative authority it needs to build upon the reforms already in place as a result of PS 2000.

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would the senator entertain a question?

Senator Bolduc: Of course.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, if I am not mistaken, Senator Bolduc spent many years in the public service and had a very important job in the public service in Quebec. Is the system in Quebec different from the one in Ottawa? Is it more like the new system being proposed? What exactly was the situation like?

Senator Bolduc: Honourable senators, I am glad the Deputy Leader of the Opposition asked me that. In fact, the present federal system is the same one we have had since 1923 and which existed in Quebec until 1966. In 1966, we made changes to provide more flexibility.

One of the important aspects of this bill is that it provides that flexibility. We have a whole series of specific job categories, so specific that if you add one task, the employee's classification would have to change and that would involve a change in staffing, so that in Ottawa today, we have detailed individual staffing processes, 300,000 a year for 200,000 jobs. This means that every year they tinker one and a half times with people with jobs, so there is also the possibility of grievances. This makes no sense at all, and it was high time we cleared that up and introduced some general categories. As you know, in the present federal public service, on the whole,

[English]

Canada's public service numbers some 500,000 people. Included in that number are about 200,000 civil servants, between 80,000 and 85,000 military personnel, approximately 20,000 employees of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and 200,000 employees of crown corporations and other governmental agencies. We are talking here about these 200,000 people.

In that number there are about 4,000 top managers, 25,000 professional people such as engineers and anthropologists, administrative and middle management people who number about 60,000 people and something in the order of 60,000 clerical employees. Then there are the operational workers and about 25,000 technicians.

Those broad categories will remain, but within them it will be possible to have a broader basis, for example, between categories. I am not talking about broad categories, but the occupational functions within each. For example, instead of having something in the order of 100 categories of technicians, there may be fewer. It will be the same for the professionals, as it will for clerical employees.

This will provide a great deal of flexibility for the management in the system.

Senator Molgat: One of the objectives of establishing the Canadian public service was to ensure an independent service, free from political interference. Will this new system ensure that independence and freedom?

[Translation]

Senator Bolduc: Honourable senators, the foundation, the merit principle, in other words, electing people on the basis of their competence following a competition doesn't change. That will remain, except that in the case of a promotion, where the general principle will of course be maintained as well, lateral transfers can now be made with more flexibility. I think that is what we need today.

[English]

I think that the real foundation of the merit system, which is competition and the selection of the best, either for original appointment and promotion, will stick. In fact, the Public Service Commission will continue to have that supervisory role. The basics are not changed in that regard.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Government Notices of Motions:

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, December 7, 1992 at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that all further Inquiries, Motions and Orders be suspended until the next sitting of the Senate, on the understanding that the calendar remains fixed as it was yesterday.

Senator Molgat: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: I rise on a point of order, honourable senators. When the Deputy Leader rose a few moments ago, I did not hear him say "Senate Public Bills".

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is covered under "Further Orders".

Senator Kinsella: It is my understanding that the rules provide we complete our business. I wish to proceed to Order No. 1 under Senate Public Bills so that I might move second reading of the bill. I therefore suggest that we not see the clock. It will not take more than five minutes. 2

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Just to clarify, government business does have priority, and then the house can decide whether it wants to proceed with further business. If the senator wishes to proceed with his bill and can do it within a reasonably short space of time, I am certainly prepared to give him leave to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted to ignore the clock, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Molgat: As leave is required in order to ignore the clock, we are prepared to grant leave.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella moved second reading of Bill S-15, an act to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act (sexual orientation).

The purpose of this bill is to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act in order to have the act reflect in statutory law the current state of this federal anti-discrimination act as recently modified by the jurisprudence, particularly in relation to the findings of the Ontario Court of Appeal on August 6, 1992 in its decision in Haig v. Canada (Minister of Justice) to the effect that subsection 15(1) of The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms protects individuals from discrimination based on sexual orientation. The Federal Court, Trial Division in the case of Douglas v. Canada made an order to this effect on October 27, 1992.

Honourable senators, the scope of Bill S-15 is quite narrow and very specific. It seeks to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act by codifying in the statute what the courts have now declared to be federal law.

Honourable senators, there are a number of reasons why the Senate as one of the two Houses of Parliament would want, in my judgment, to adopt this bill. One reason has to do with the responsibility of Parliament to respect its legislative role and ensure that the statutes of Parliament are fully expressive of the law for which they provide. Another reason in support of the proposed bill is that by setting out in the statute the proscribed ground of discrimination which the Ontario Court of Appeal has "read into the act" would remove any possible doubt as to the universal application of this provision of the Canadian Human Rights Act in all parts of Canada falling under federal jurisdiction.

It was the Supreme Court of Canada in R. v. Schachter, decided on July 9, 1992, which provided the Ontario Court of Appeal with the guidelines concerning the remedy of "reading into" a statute a provision which, if left excluded, causes the given statute to be inconsistent with the Charter. Of interest is the following portion at page 10 of the Haig judgment:

> The first step in the determination of whether reading in is appropriate is to define the extent of the inconsistency between the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law guaranteed by s.15(1) of the Charter and s.3(1) of the Canadian Human Rights Act. The inconsistency is the omission of sexual orientation from the prohibited grounds of discrimination in s.3(1) of the Act. At pp. 14-15 of his reasons [in the Schachter case] Lamer C.J.C. said:
> > Where the inconsistency is defined as what the statute excludes, the logical result of declaring inoperative that inconsistency may be to include the excluded group within the statutory scheme.
> [The chief justice] points out, however, that since the role of the legislature is to be respected, the court should not read in in cases where there is no manner of extension which flows with sufficient precision from the requirements of the Constitution. In the Haig case, the court held that the definition of the extent of the inconsistency is easily capable of being determined with precision: The omission of the words "sexual orientation" from s.3(1) of the Canadian Human Rights Act.
> The Court's next consideration in determining whether "reading in" is appropriate, is the impact of the available remedies on the objectives of the legislation in question. "For the remedy to be selected must constitute the least possible interference with that legislative objective." If reading in would result in a greater interference with the legislative objective than striking down, it would not be appropriate. It would, however, be appropriate if it enhances the legislative objective more than striking down would do.

Finally, it would be an unwarranted intrusion into the province of the legislature if reading in would bring about a result that is manifestly contrary to the legislative objective. A mere reading of s.2 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, set out above, discloses that to read into s.3(1) the words "sexual orientation" would be less intrusive than the total destruction of the objective that would result from striking the provision down. Reading in not only leaves the purpose of the Act intact but it enhances it by making it conform to Charter values.

Budgetary impact of the proposed remedy is another important consideration in the Supreme Court of Canada's guidelines. The Schachter case was itself a case in which the remedy of reading in directly affected the Consolidated Revenue Fund because it would have resulted in the payment of money to a category of persons not otherwise entitled to payment by the terms of the legislation.

It was held that reading in would be inappropriate if it involved an intrusion into legislative budgetary decisions so substantial as to change the nature of the legislative scheme in question. It is true that extending the protection of the Canadian Human Rights Act to persons who complain of discrimination because of their sexual orientation may well increase expenditures by reason of additional investigation, proceedings and perhaps Commission staff. Although there is no estimate in the evidence before us of this possible increased budgetary burden, it is, I think, safe to assume that it cannot be so great as substantially to change the nature of the legislative scheme created by the Act.

The Court guidelines also require that one consider whether reading in results in an impermissible intrusion into the legislative realm by asking whether the significance of the remaining portion is so markedly changed that it would be unsafe to assume that the Legislature would have passed it. If it were unsafe to assume that Parliament would have enacted the protection to categories of persons enunciated in s.3(1) of the Canadian Human Rights Act if sexual orientation were to be included, the section would have to be struck down. The relative size of the two relevant groups is a significant factor in this determination. At p. 33 of his reasons in Schachter, Chief Justice Lamer said:

> Where the group to be added is smaller than the group originally benefitted, this is an indication that the assumption that the Legislature would have enacted the benefit in any case is a sound one. When the group to be added is much larger than the group originally benefitted, this could indicate that the assumption is not safe. This is not because of the numbers per se. Rather, the numbers may indicate that for budgetary reasons, or simply because it constitutes a marked change in the thrust of the original program, it cannot be assumed that the Legislature would have passed the benefit with the exclusion . . .
> In this case, the group to be added is significantly smaller than the group now benefitting. Given the evidence in the material before the Court [considered in Haig] on this application of the commitment of successive Ministers of Justice on behalf of their governments to amend the legislation to add sexual orientation to the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination, it is surely safe to assume that Parliament would favour extending the benefit of 3(1) to homosexual persons over nullifying the entire legislative scheme.

By supporting this bill the Senate will not only be confirming this assumption of the court, but will also be demonstrating the role of the Senate as an institution prepared to promote equality for all Canadians.

Last December I had the privilege to speak in this chamber on Human Rights Day, December 10th. At that time I argued that there is a direct causal relation, in my view, between the practice of freedom and the control over state power; between the history of liberty in Canada and the role of the Senate and Parliament.

Not only does this chamber serve as an important check on the exercise of state power, but the Senate can play a very special role in the protection of parts of Canada or groups of Canadians, which and who by themselves will never constitute a majority. This role of protecting the minority is especially important where a given minority group of Canadians might be perceived by the majority as a despised minority group.

Honourable senators, I am confident that Canadians will welcome this initiative of the Senate and that they will see it as our willingness to take steps to protect minorities. I am equally confident that members in the other place will also welcome our initiative, since it is consistent with the ministerial statements and those of many members of the House of Commons. We know that a parliamentary committee had made such a recommendation, and we also know that the proposed amendment to the Human Rights Act contained in Bill S-15 has been a recommendation of the Canadian Human Rights Commission for some time.

It is important that our federal statutes not fall behind the statutes of the provinces and territories. Currently, seven of the ten provinces and two territories include sexual orientation in the list of proscribed grounds of discrimination provided for by their Human Rights Acts. The work of Human Rights Commissions over the years, from the early days of the legislation in Quebec, which was the first jurisdiction to include sexual orientation in the list of proscribed grounds of discrimination, to the more recent amendments of the New Brunswick and Nova Scotia Human Rights Acts, demonstrates this is a good equality measure with much to be gained and no downside risk.

I would ask, honourable senators, for your support of this bill and its early passage in order that it might be sent, afterthird reading, to the other place for an expeditious consideration.

I hope that our Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will have an opportunity to examine it in detail.

In conclusion, honourable senators, let us recall that human rights law is inspired by the belief not only that human beings are born equal in their rights, but that they also have an equal and inherent right to be dealt with fairly and without prejudice.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, December 7, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, December 7, 1992

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE HONOURABLE GUY WILLIAMS

TRIBUTES

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, today we mark the passing of two of our previous colleagues, Senators Guy Williams and Michel Fournier — colleagues, but not recently sitting members of the Senate. By co-incidence, they were both sworn in on the same day, December 16, 1971, as shown in the Debates of the Senate of that date at page 498.

Let me say a word or two about Guy Williams. We mark today the passing of a senator, a famous advocate on aboriginal issues and an important figure in Canadian history. Senator Guy Williams brought his versatile knowledge and experience as a Native Canadian to the Senate and contributed to making this Chamber the representative body it was meant to be, thereby helping Canadians from coast to coast to coast better understand each other.

Guy Williams was born on a reserve near Kitamaat Village, British Columbia in 1907. He was taken from his family when he was quite young, on a trip which he thought was to Vancouver but actually was to a residential school. His experiences there over four years led him later to advocate equal access to the educational institutions that other Canadian children had.

After completing Grade 9 at the residential school, he returned home to join the family fishing business. It was in this industry, fishing, that he would first make his mark, eventually going into business for himself.

Before becoming his own boss, he worked for a company called Nelson Brothers. There he learned much about the fishing industry and eventually skippered a salmon-seiner named Jedway. When he was not fishing or skippering, he was building 35-foot-long dugout canoes with his family. That is a long boat. They would build several canoes so that when one was damaged, there would be another ready to take its place. Building canoes was not just a hobby to Guy. He learned Japanese techniques for building larger boats, and boat-building become a part of his occupation.

Guy found another successful calling in the struggle for aboriginal rights. He was a founding member of the Native Brotherhood of British Columbia. The goals of this organization were to work "for the betterment of [Native] conditions, socially, mentally and physically." The brotherhood was instrumental in ensuring that, since Natives paid taxes, they received the Old Age Pension, family allowance and unemployment insurance coverage. In 1960 Guy Williams became the president of the brotherhood, a position he held until 1972. He was named honourary president in 1976 and President Emeritus in 1990.

He was summoned to the Senate on December 9, 1971, almost 21 years ago. We know him to have worked tirelessly here on many issues affecting Native Canadians until his retirement in 1982, and he continued his work after his retirement. I remember when he left the Senate. We missed his well- informed interventions and the value of his experience and unique perspective.

I extend to his family and to all his brothers and sisters in the wider sense, our deepest regrets.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I should like to add a word or two on behalf of this side in tribute to Senator Guy Williams.

Senator Williams was an eight-year veteran when I arrived in this place. I think he had been here since 1971. I got to know him reasonably well as a fellow member of Senator Hastings' pipeline committee. We had occasion to travel extensively in the north, and I was quite taken with Senator Williams' knowledge and wisdom of that part of our country. I am indebted to him, because I learned a lot, and had a much greater understanding of that part of our country than prior to meeting him.

His interests and concerns in the matters of his fellow indigenous people and his arguments and his pleas on their behalf are well known to anybody who has looked at the records of this place. He made substantial contributions, not only to the debate in this place but to debates in Canada generally with regard to Aboriginal peoples.

Senator Frith mentioned Guy Williams' interest in fishing and fishermen, and I am well aware of that. His interests were not only in large canoes, but were with the concerns of the fishing industry and fishermen generally. He spoke often and well, not only of the fishermen in British Columbia, his own part of the world, but of the fishing industry and people associated with it across this country.

We on this side share the regrets expressed by Senator Frith on Senator Williams' passing, and we join with him in sending our condolences to the Williams family.

THE LATE HONOURABLE MICHEL FOURNIER

TRIBUTES

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this past weekend Senator Michel Fournier, who represented New Brunswick, also passed away.

Senator Williams died, I believe, on Friday. Senator Fournier died, I believe, yesterday. We mourn the loss today also of Senator Michel Fournier, an Acadian from Point Verte, New Brunswick.

Michel Fournier also had a long history of active community work. He began his career in the public service as a county councillor from 1935 to 1940. After serving in the municipal sphere, he moved to the provincial legislature, to which he was first elected in 1945. There, under the guidance of our colleague Senator Robichaud, who was then Premier of the province of New Brunswick, he became Minister of Industry and Development in 1960, a position he held until 1963. He then resigned in 1963 to become vice-chairman of the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Michel Fournier played an active role as advocate for the New Brunswick agricultural community. He was a director of the New Brunswick Agricultural Federation and the New Brunswick Federation of Credit Unions. He was also a founding member and first president of the Point Verte Credit Union.

He was named to the Senate on December 16, 1971, along with Guy Williams and Frederick Rowe. Senator Fournier brought his own perspective to the Senate. He helped make the Senate the representative body it was meant to be. Senator Fornier addressed this issue on July 12, 1977, at page 1133 of the Debates of the Senate:

[Translation]

> It was even said that it would have been very difficult to convince Lower Canada and the two small provinces to join had it not been for the promise to create a second House, to be called the Senate, which would have the power, or the special mandate, to represent regions in order to protect the small provinces and defend minorities and which would of course review bills.

• (2010)

[English]

I extend my regrets to Senator Fournier's family. He was a dedicated and sincere person who made many important contributions to our lives as Canadians.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, it is with deep regret that I learned today of the passing of our former colleague, a great Acadian, Senator Michel Fournier. Our colleague, who retired from the Senate on September 29, 1980, gave more than 45 years of his life to his fellow countrymen. His very active career in the public domain started in 1935, in New Brunswick, as a town councilman; he was successively settlement inspector, member of the Legislative Assembly and Minister for Trade and Development from 1960 to 1963. He was later at the helm of the New Brunswick Work Compensation Board for 5 years.

[Senator Frith.]

On December 9, 1971, our assembly had the honour to admit this new senator in our midst and to be able to draw upon the wealth of experience of this devoted and energetic parliamentarian. He fulfilled his mandate as advocate for his region in this honourable institution to the fullest.

The honorable Michel Fournier was a nice, sincere and loyal man who knew how to earn and keep the trust of his peers.

We grieve the loss of a great Acadian. On behalf of my colleagues, I wish to offer my sincere condolences to his family and to his friends.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I would like to join previous speakers in paying tribute to my friend, Michel Fournier. To me, Michel Fournier was more than a great Acadian. He was a great Canadian. He was a quiet man who nevertheless worked with great dedication.

To me he was more than a former senator, more than a former colleague in the legislature and in the cabinet of my boss, Louis Robichaud. He was the father of sons and daughters who are today friends of my family.

If Michel Fournier had been alive last Friday, he would have been very proud to see that the New Brunswick legislature passed a resolution which, I hope, will be submitted to the Senate before the Christmas recess. This resolution will recognize the equality of both language communities of New Brunswick. Michel Fournier worked towards that goal all his life, and that is why I pay tribute to him today.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, if my colleague has no objection, I would also like to express my sincere condolences to the family of the late Senator Michel Fournier.

I had the pleasure of meeting him on Parliament Hill when I was a member of the House of Commons and he was a senator. I had known members of his family when I was a public servant in Fredericton. This was in the Department of Youth, at the very beginning.

What was said just now about Senator Fournier is quite true. He was serious but gentle, unobtrusive but always there where he was needed.

I accompanied him on a trip through his riding when they were developing the mines in northern New Brunswick. He was proud and delighted about what was happening. Not many people here are familiar with the economic situation of the Acadians in that part of New Brunswick. It is thanks to men like Michel Fournier and of course Louis Robichaud that prosperity came to this area. Michel Fournier certainly had a lot to do with it!

Again, I offer my sincere condolences to his family.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

[English]

GREEK-YUGOSLAV CONFLICT IN TORONTO

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, last weekend in Toronto there were unfortunate clashes involving people who consider their ethnic roots to be in the southern part of Yugoslavia and Canadians of Greek descent. The reason for the clash, to people who do not know the situation, would appear puerile.

The people from southern Yugoslavia, the new republic that calls itself Macedonia, tried to hoist their new flag on a Greek church, and the Greeks tried to stop them. The situation degenerated to the point where blows were struck.

Senator Haidasz was here the last time I spoke about Macedonia. He asked why it is that the Greeks do not accept the use of the name Macedonia by this new republic, even though it is a Greek name. What's in a name?

If that was all there was to it, there would not be this continuing feud which, unfortunately, has come over here from over there. During the Second World War and in the six years that followed, there was considerable bloodshed involving fighting over the territory of northern Greece, between the Greeks and the people who call themselves Macedonian in Yugoslavia, and who are Bulgar speakers.

The Greeks in Toronto who are descended from what is called Macedonia in Greece see these Bulgar-speaking of southern Yugoslavia as their conquerors and oppressors in World War II. It is a difficult situation. I am terribly sorry it has happened. It is the sort of situation that has often made me say in the Senate that I deplore some aspects of multiculturalism; that I wish everyone would leave their old feuds back home when they come here. It is a very delicate situation, and it would be deplorable if we Canadians took an attitude that could in any way be interpreted as backing the extra-territorial claims of the so-called Republic of Macedonia over Greece's objections.

The Greeks of Toronto object because the Macedonians have put on their flags, as a symbol, the star of Philip of Macedon, a Greek king. On their new coinage they have put the White Tower which is in Salonika, a Greek city. The Greeks see this as a continuation of the claims by the Bulgar-speaking people to take part of the territory of Greece. It would be unfortunate if we encouraged any tendency to extra-territorial claims in the Balkans. They have trouble enough within their own frontiers. I seriously hope that the Canadian government will not aggravate the situation in any way by taking sides.

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS REMAINING IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this government has forced Canadians to endure for 16 days now, according to the words of Senator Murray, "political cowardice" and "contempt" for the democratic process because of their failure to hold a general election by November 21, 1992.

On Thursday last, I disclosed that Senator Murray, in his now famous speech of February 21, 1984 when he first used the words "political cowardice" and "contempt" to describe any government that extended its stay beyond four years, not only provided us with his measure of a government which insists on extending its term beyond the four years, but also had some interesting thoughts on the economy. In 1984, he claimed that the economy was in a "dismal state" and "in a prolonged period of underachievement; underachievement by our own historical standards and underachievement by current international standards."

On Thursday, I remarked that Senator Murray's words were misplaced in 1984, but timely today, and I promised then to explain why.

In the Department of Finance publication, Economic Reference Tables, August 1992, we find, at page 138, some very interesting statistics. In 1984, while Senator Murray was saying that the economy was in a dismal state and underachieving by international standards, Canada had growth in real GDP of 6.3 per cent, the highest of all G-7 nations. That was the dismal state of underachievement. Last year, growth in GDP was not 6.3 per cent; it was minus 1.5 per cent, the second worst of the G-7 countries. In 1990, we were the absolute worst at 0.5 per cent.

In 1984, when Senator Murray claimed we were underachieving, our employment growth was 2.4 per cent, the second best of the G-7 countries. In 1991, employment growth was minus 1.8 per cent — the second worst.

In 1984, productivity growth was 3.8 per cent, the best in the G-7 from this nation of what Senator Murray wanted to call underachievers. In 1991, productivity growth was 0.7 per cent, third worst in the G-7, and the year before, in 1990, it was the absolute worst at minus 0.2 per cent.

That is the difference between an underachieving Liberal economy in 1984 and an overachieving Conservative economy in 1991. The difference is the difference between first then and last now. By Senator Murray's international standards, the Conservatives, who were left a booming economy in 1984, are now leaving behind them a bust economy.

In order to assist any senator who wishes to make an intervention on those figures I have already quoted, I would be glad to give them an opportunity to examine the figures, and therefore I ask that the material from which I have quoted, namely page 138 of the Economic Reference Tables, August 1992, be made a part of the record.

SENATOR ROBERT MUIR

BEST WISHES ON RECOVERY

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the other day I had the pleasure of welcoming back to our midst Senator John M. Macdonald of Cape Breton. Tonight I want to note, with considerable pleasure, that the Cape Breton contingent is back at full strength with the return of Senator Robert Muir. I want to state on behalf of all of us how very pleased we are to see him back and in such obviously good form.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like at this time to express to all on both sides of this chamber my grateful thanks for their kindness during the time that I was ill. I received cards, letters and visits from all of you from all corners of this chamber, especially from those who are members of the "zipper club", before I ever knew what that was all about. I do not recommend to anyone that they get into this club. After you get into it you do not pay much, other than by not eating very much of anything you like.

On both sides of this chamber I see men who have gone through open-heart surgery. I felt bad for them at the time. I sent them notes and all that sort of thing. I really felt terrible that they had anything wrong with them.

Senators MacEachen and Murray know I have been in the coal mines. I went through a methane gas explosion. I had my spine fractured in four places on one occasion, and seven ribs broken on another. Some 12 years later I became paralysed, ended up in the Montreal neurological institute, and had a nine-inch fusion of my spine.

But that was all play compared to open heart surgery. I felt badly for Senator Phillips when he had open heart surgery, as I did for other senators who had to undergo the same procedure. I am most grateful to all of you and to the Honourable Senator Keon and his team. In Canada we are most fortunate to have teams of men and women such as those with whom Senator Keon works. However, I am sure none of you ever wants to join the "zipper club".

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION

SEVENTH REPORT PRESENTED

Hon. William M. Kelly, Acting Chairman of the Committee of Selection, presented the following report:

[Senator Frith.]

MONDAY, December 7, 1992

The Committee of Selection has the honour to present its

SEVENTH REPORT

Pursuant to Rule 86(1)(a) of the Rules of the Senate, your Committee nominates the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer as Speaker pro tempore.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM M. KELLY,
Acting Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Kelly, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

● (2030)

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1992-93

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-100, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1993.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 500 citizens of British Columbia who oppose the Goods and Services Tax.

These petitions come mainly from Coquitlam, Burnaby, Port Moody, New Westminster and Vancouver.

Honourable senators, I have also the honour to present petitions signed by 138 citizens of New Brunswick who oppose the Goods and Services Tax.

These petitions come mainly from Golden Grove, St. John, Black's Harbour, Pennfield, St. George, Lorneville and Lepreau.

These petitions were signed in October 1992, less than two months ago.

A total of 638 Canadian citizens are not letting up and will not let up until the government that has subjected them to the GST is gone.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

STATEMENT OF MINISTER ON CURTAILMENT OF SOCIAL PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there is a growing body of evidence of uneasiness among Canadians with respect to one of their most treasured and cherished, if not the most cherished and treasured, social programs: Medicare. Concern has also been expressed that this government means to start dismantling medicare as it has many other longstanding and cherished social programs.

I would invite the Leader of the Government to comment on some recent cause for uneasiness resulting from a statement made by the Minister of Health, Benoit Bouchard, who was reported as saying:

> Future social programs in Canada should be directly linked to the economy's ability to support them.
> And this could affect medicare, unemployment insurance and job training as well as social assistance programs such as child benefits and old age pensions.

The article goes on to state:

> "The economy and social policy are two sides of the same coin," Mr. Bouchard said in an interview.

Would the Leader of the Government take this opportunity to assure Canadians whether or not it is a part of this government's program to deprive Canadians of the protection of medicare?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Yes, honourable senators.

Senator Olson: And pensions?

Senator Frith: He would like to take the opportunity to comment, but it is not now that he intends to do so.

Senator Murray: I merely wish to give due thought.

Senator Frith: Let the record note that he passed, demurred.

Senator Murray: I beg your pardon? The honourable senator asked me whether I would like to take the opportunity to provide a certain assurance in that regard, and I said "Yes".

Senator Frith: When?

Senator Murray: I have just done it.

Senator Frith: Very sneaky. I am not reassured; I doubt that many Canadians are.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

CONTRIBUTIONS BY PHARMACEUTICAL MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF CANADA TO CONSERVATIVE FUNDRAISING CAMPAIGN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Since the subject of medicare and the concern of the Canadian people has been raised, could Senator Murray, not only as the Leader of the Government in the Senate but also as an active organizer of the Conservative party and a so-called policy man and right-wing Conservative, inform the Canadian people, through the Senate, how many tables were purchased by the PMAC at the recent fundraising events for the Conservative Party that have taken place throughout the country in such cities as Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, but especially in Winnipeg?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the donors to the political parties in this country and the amounts that they give are, if I am not mistaken, a matter of public record, and my honourable friend can examine that record when it becomes available in due course.

In any case, the honourable senator knows perfectly well that those matters do not form part of my ministerial responsibility, and it is not appropriate to ask questions on matters of that kind in this place.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I am sorry the Leader of the Government in the Senate is troubled by my question, but the fact of the matter is that Canadians across this country know that he forms an integral part of the planning in the Conservative Party. Part of his job is knowing the answer to my question.

Two years down the road the Canadian people will be able to read how many millions of dollars PMAC has provided to the Conservative Party, but it would be important for the Canadian people to know before the next election how many millions of dollars this organization has contributed by purchasing hundreds of $500-tickets for their rich, Tory friends to attend fundraising dinners in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, but especially in Winnipeg.

• (2040)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the answer to that question is the same as the answer to the first question.

Senator Thériault: No answer.

Senator Murray: This is not a matter on which it is appropriate to ask questions of a minister in the Senate.

I understand the frustration of the honourable senator, whose party is $6.7 million in debt and cannot get out of it, but that is a function of their own fiscal incompetence.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I am quite happy that my party is $6 million in debt. I would rather my party be $6 million in debt than $15 million richer from Tory friends who will cost the Canadian people $7 billion over the next ten years.

COMPARISON COST OF DRUGS IN UNITED STATES AND CANADA—EFFECT ON MEDICARE

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It also concerns Bill C-91.

There is a drug called Valium. Generic drug companies in Canada sell 1,000 Valium pills for $6.50. In the United States 1,000 Valium pills sell for $650. It would take 48 years and four months at 10 per cent inflation for $6.50 to become $650. This difference in price is evidence that the drug companies—the big international drug companies which are represented by PMAC here in Canada -- indulge in price gouging. According to many experts, this price gouging will weaken and cripple our health insurance system.

Is the government prepared to damage the most valuable social program in Canada in order to help its rich friends?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the honourable senator may rest assured that if the generic companies are manufacturing the equivalent drug to Valium in this country, at whatever price, they will continue to do so after the passage of Bill C-91.

Further to that, the honourable senator knows that one of the provisions of this bill, which I trust will be here before too long for debate at second reading, is to provide further muscle to the prices review board set up under Bill C-22. These are matters that the honourable senator can raise in debate, in particular at the committee stage when, as I trust will happen, the bill receives second reading in this place.

I remind the honourable senator that he is anticipating debate on a bill which has not yet even passed the House of Commons.

REFUSAL TO PERMIT SENATE PRE-STUDY OF PROPOSED DRUG PATENT LEGISLATION

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, why is it all right for the side of the Leader of the Government in the Senate to anticipate debate by introducing a pre-study of Bill C-86, through the ridiculous charade of telling us, "We want you to improve it. Try to suggest improvements to that bill and we will accept them," and then throwing those suggestions out? It is perfectly all right to go through that charade and consider something before it is passed by the House of Commons, but it is not all right to consider before it is passed by the House of Commons something that is in the interests of the rich friends and contributors of senators opposite.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we would have been very happy to have had a pre-study of Bill C-91 if the honourable senator had suggested it, or if other members of the opposition had shown any disposition to have one.

[Senator Thériault.]

Before the honourable senator rushes to judgment on the effectiveness of the pre-study conducted under our friend Senator Kinsella, perhaps he should wait to hear from the chairman of the committee, whom I am sure will take part in the debate on Bill C-86 before it is over.

AGRICULTURE

RESOLUTION OF DISPUTE ON EUROPEAN AND U.S. GRAIN SUBSIDIES—EFFECTS ON INTERNATIONAL GRAIN MARKET

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to inform this house of the ramifications of the apparent agreement reached between the United States of America and the European Economic Community respecting vegetable oilseeds, as well as the apparent withdrawal of the proposed 200-per-cent tariff on French wines.

My interest in this matter has to do with whether or not we can find the magnitude or scope of this agreement, and if there are any ramifications for other agriculture subsidy disputes that have an important effect on Canadian producers, particularly because of the effects of that dispute in depressing the international grain market.

We know that up until a few days ago, there were protests in the streets of Strasbourg, as there were yesterday in Brussels. There are some severe disputes about this agreement.

Can the minister provide us with an explanation as to what agreement was reached and what the implications or ramifications of that agreement might be on the international grain market? The press reports I have seen, and I do not claim to have seen them all, do not provide that information, which is vital to some of our producers.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my friend will have to bear with me on that subject. I do not seem to have the most recent information on it. I shall try to bring in something tomorrow.

Senator Olson: I appreciate that, honourable senators. I did not think the minister would have the information yet, since I am talking about some of the details and the ramifications of an agreement reached concerning the oilseeds matter, which was reached only last week.

• (2050)

JUSTICE

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT—REQUEST FOR AMENDMENTS

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I would direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. When this party took office, we were left with the legacy of the Young Offenders Act by the previous administration. It was our intention to improve many aspects of that legislation. We intended to do wonderful things with it, but all we did was powder-puff it a little bit. Occasionally, the Minister of Justice makes some comments on that legislation, and members of the opposition raise many questions about it, so I feel it is time to do something which will improve the existing legislation.

No doubt, the Leader of the Government in the Senate is aware of some of the incidents that have occurred on Cape Breton Island and throughout this country. As a strong and influential member of the cabinet, could he please tell us what will be done, if anything, or will we continue to talk about making amendments for an eternity?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we did introduce some amendments to the act, which received Royal Assent last April. Having said that, the government recognizes that this is a very contentious subject on which emotions sometimes run high in response to events that take place.

I can only tell the honourable senator that both the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General of Canada, who are concerned with these matters, do have the act and its application under continuing review, and in that respect we are also receiving representations from provincial Attorneys General.

If Ms Campbell or Mr. Lewis have anything more substantive to offer, I will ask them to let me have a report and I will bring it into the chamber within the next few days.

Senator Muir: The honourable leader talks about emotions running high. I do not feel that my emotions are running high. I am pretty fortunate since no one in my family—my son, my daughter or a relative—has been murdered. However, the emotions of those who have suffered in this manner are running high, and they do not think much of this government for not taking some action.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate assure us that, as a strong and influential member of the cabinet, he will pursue this matter and keep pressing until something is done to straighten it out, make it a firmer law, and correct the present problems?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, this evening I can only offer to bring an early report on the matter which I hope will give some encouragement to my honourable friend and others who are properly interested in this subject.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

LIMITATION ON NUMBERS OF CONTRACT EMPLOYEES IN PUBLIC SERVICE— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is to the leader of the Government in the Senate. On Wednesday last, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance made a major statement in the other place on the Canadian economy. It was a belt-tightening statement.

Could we have confirmation from the minister that included in that belt tightening will be a decision by the government not to take on any further contract employees? If we are asking civil servants to accept no further increases in salary, will the government agree that it should not take on any further contract employees?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, to begin with, my friend would have to give a more precise definition of "contract employee." If he is asking that we undertake not to engage people outside the public service to provide various professional and other services to the government from time to time, I think he will understand that we cannot give such a commitment.

Senator Molgat: A simple definition of what I mean by "contract employees" might be "government supporters." That would be a simple explanation.

Let me make it very clear: The government, having imposed a freeze on employment some time ago, has proceeded to hire people who are not regular civil servants but who are hired on contract. I would like an assurance that, if we are indeed to be belt tightening and if we are asking civil servants, in particular, to tighten their belts, the government will not go behind that procedure and simply hire other people on short-term contracts and add to costs?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there is the rub. My honourable friend speaks of "short-term contracts." Short-term contracts are resorted to by the government to fill short-term needs. The economy there, of course, is that when the job is done the contract is done, and the person involved goes about his or her business in the private sector and we do not have a permanent employee on the books.

Senator Molgat: If it is not such a major problem, would the minister agree to give us a list of all the contract people whom the government has hired since it imposed the previous freeze, in order that we might determine how serious the government is about limiting expenses and keeping growth in the civil service in line? If he can give us a list of the contract employees and how much they are paid, that would probably satisfy the curiosity of Canadians.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will see what relevant information is available on that subject. There could be "contract employees", as the honourable senator calls them, who work five days a week, 12 months a year. I suppose that is possible, and in those cases there is very little difference at all between them and public servants, except they do not have the status of public servants.

In most cases, what the honourable senator is referring to are short-term contracts with people who are brought in to do jobs on a temporary basis. I will see what information is available.

I have heard the accusation levelled previously that we have somehow evaded our own hiring freezes by resorting massively to contractual employees. I do not believe that is the case, and I will seek to bring in some documentation to show that it is not the case.

CRITICISM IN AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT OF GOVERNMENT CONTRACT HIRING PRACTICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. Has Treasury Board conducted a study to ascertain the validity of the criticism made by the Auditor General that, in some departments, certain persons took retirement only to show up very shortly thereafter as contract employees of the government? Has a study been made of this part of the Auditor General's report? If so, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate table a copy of any such report?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I will ask Mr. Loiselle about that, honourable senators.

• (2100)

HIRING OF CERTAIN CONTRACT EMPLOYEES DURING REFERENDUM CAMPAIGN

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: On the same subject, honourable senators, as you know, I supported the referendum to the best of my ability. I am not suggesting that you should have hired me at all. I wrote as well as I could.

I am sure there are public servants working for ministers who could have provided the speeches, yet you hired people to help ministers with their speeches in the referendum campaign at what is reported to be something like $3 million. This particular group includes Bruce Anderson, Nancy Jamieson and Mr. Fox. Their help did not produce any more results than my help. My help cost you nothing; their help cost Canadian taxpayers a lot.

Why did you hire such people when, demonstrably after the fact, they were not able to give you much help?

I know Bruce Anderson. He couldn't write a good speech to save his life.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think my friend should get his facts right. Mr. Fox has not had any contractual relationship —

Senator Gigantès: His firm has.

Senator Murray: —with the Government of Canada, nor has his firm. Mr. Anderson has a polling firm which received public opinion research contracts from various departments of the Government of Canada, as have a good dozen other similar firms in this country. Ms Jamieson is not associated in any professional sense with either of the two people whose names the honourable senator mentioned.

Senator Gigantès: Were all these things that have appeared in the press, purporting to be facts discovered under the Freedom of Information Act, in your view, lies?

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators. On the contrary, I was quoted in at least one of those articles quite accurately. I simply suggest that the honourable senator ought to read the articles more carefully.

NEW-BRUNSWICK

ADOPTION OF CONSTITUTIONAL RESOLUTION ON PRINCIPLE OF LINGUISTIC DUALITY

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question of a non political nature to ask the Leader of the

[Senator Stewart.]

Government in the Senate. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell this House whether the government of New Brunswick has presented to the government of Canada the resolution passed last Friday by the New Brunswick Legislative Assembly?

It is an historic event for the Legislative Assembly to have passed the resolution recognizing the equality of the two peoples of New Brunswick with the support of the Conservatives and the New Democrats. It had been in the works since the days of Louis Robichaud, got up steam under former Premier Hatfield, with Senator Simard and others. I am sorry that my friend Senator Simard is not among us tonight. Of course, coming from New Brunswick, I hope that this resolution shall be passed by the Parliament of Canada, that is to say by both the House of Commons and the Senate.

Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate know if this particular resolution was referred to his government?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, Friday afternoon, in the absence of my colleague Mr. Clark, I had the pleasure of meeting the Minister of Justice from New Brunswick, Mr. Blanchard, who informed me that the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick had just approved a proposed constitutional resolution on the principle of linguistic duality in that province.

Naturally, I congratulated him heartily and undertook on behalf of the federal government to take all necessary steps to deal with this resolution in the Parliament of Canada.

Senator Thériault: Before the recess?

Senator Murray: I am not sure about that. I told him straight out that we were all set to proceed in the Senate but that, at the other place, the agenda was pretty heavy. All I can say for the time being is that Mr. Andre is in contact with the other parliamentary leaders and looking for a consensus.

[English]

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senator, I am informed by the table that the 30 minutes allotted for Question period has expired.

[Translation]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, that is why I rose. I wanted to ask the permission of the Senate.

Honourable senators, last Friday I have received a call from Mr. Chrétien advising me that he too had met with the Minister of Justice Blanchard and that he had assured him of his co-operation.

I would like to add the assurance of our co-operation on this particular issue to that given by Mr. Chrétien.

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Is the question period continued?

[English]

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senator, I am informed that the 30 minutes has expired, and, therefore, unless I am ordered by the Senate to continue, I would call Delayed Answers. Is there unanimous consent to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN INTERVENTION FORCE TO SOMALIA — REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Because of an important matter which arose last Friday, Canadians will be part of an intervention force in Somalia. I do not know specifically what flag or authority they will be under.

Senator Murray: The United Nations.

Senator Corbin: With the United States spearheading, and probably initiating, the whole effort at the request or guidance of the Secretary General of the United Nations.

Does the minister have any precise facts and figures above and beyond what was said at the press conferences last Friday? Has the Minister of State for External Affairs sorted out the difference between peacemaking and intervention?

At one point in her press conference, she referred to this matter as some kind of peacemaking. This is not what peacemaking is all about. When we met a number of top officials at the United Nations three weeks ago, they told us peacemaking is entirely different from what will be happening.

Do Canadians involved in that exercise know precisely when they will be shipped out?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is peacemaking and there is peacekeeping. There is not much doubt that the exercise that the honourable senator refers to is an enforcement action, conducted for humanitarian reasons under the authority of the unanimous resolution of the United Nations Security Council. I expect, as the honourable senator has suggested, that this force would be under the command of an officer of the United States.

I can tell the honourable senator that a team of Canadian officers has been meeting with the United States planners over the past weekend. It is expected that the U.S. forces will arrive in Somalia this week and that the lead elements of the Canadian forces will deploy sometime around mid-December. I am told that equipment is currently being loaded in Montreal.

• (2110)

My information the other day was that up to 900 Canadian troops would be involved. As to the duration of the exercise, I do not think I can state with precision what is expected by our officers.

Senator Corbin: As a follow-up question: Is the Canadian government willing to participate in other interventions of this nature, in other areas of conflict at this time?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the question is hypothetical, and I cannot reply to it.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

CRITICISM IN AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT OF GOVERNMENT CONTRACT HIRING PRACTICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, since Question Period is continuing on, I have a question concerning an answer that was given by the Honourable Leader of the Government. My question relates to a Canadian Press story dealing with information on a matter obtained under the Access to Information Act.

The press report says that a senior public servant who quit his job last December in his first eight months in the private sector received contracts worth $62,000 from his former department. This person had, of course, been given a golden handshake to quit, and then given more than his salary afterward.

I can show this clipping to the Leader of the Government. There are several other indications of that nature in the Auditor General's report. Can the Leader of the Government tell us what the government is doing to put a stop to such practices?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in reply to the question put to me by Senator Stewart, I undertook to get in touch with Minister Loiselle on that matter and to bring in a report as soon as possible.

CYPRUS

CONSEQUENCES OF POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN TROOPS — GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, touching upon what Senator Corbin has said, but in another field, I have a question. I do not normally make myself a spokesman for Greece. However, Greece, which is my country of origin, is now under extreme pressure because of the territorial claims of so-called Macedonians. It is also under threat from the Turks who have occupied more than 40 per cent of the territory of Cyprus, even though they represented only 16 per cent of the population.

For many years, Canadian troops have contributed to peacekeeping in Cyprus. There is great anxiety that if the Canadians go, there will be no restraint on the Turkish mainland troops who are in Cyprus, and that they may try to invade the rest of Cyprus.

Under such circumstances, does the Leader of the Government think it is legitimate to pull out Canadian troops from Cyprus. Is that the intention?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have been there for 28 years. While we do not intend to take any precipitous action —

An Hon. Senator: One more year would not make much difference.

Senator Murray: We will give appropriate notice. However, let there be no mistake about it, we want to withdraw our troops from that assignment.

Senator Gigantès: For 28 years, the Canadians have contributed to saving lives by preventing clashes that could have been murderous. They have acquired a wonderful reputation and are respected for the work they have done.

Is the Leader of the Government prepared to assure this house that Canada will not move its troops from Cyprus unless arrangements are made for other suitable nations—not as good at peacekeeping as we are, I know—to replace the Canadians and to maintain the stability of the situation?

Senator Murray: I appreciate the point the honourable senator has made. We have contributed, as the honourable senator said, to the preservation of an unstable equilibrium on that island for these many years. We do not want to take any action that will cause renewed hostilities there. However, I hope he would agree that we do not want to encourage a perpetual dependence on the presence of peacekeepers. Surely it is time for the Greeks and the Turks to come to some civilized arrangement and not have to depend on outsiders to keep the peace.

We want to get out of there. We will not pull out overnight. We will give due notice and, as always, we will only take action in consultation with our allies and the United Nations.

Senator Gigantès: This statement of the Turks and the Greeks reaching some civilized arrangement reminds me of a statement by Ambassador Warren Austin of the United States. In Rhodes in 1947, facing the Palestinian Arabs on one side and the Jews of Palestine on the other, in exasperation he blurted out, "Why can't you behave like Christian gentlemen?"

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD

POSSIBILITY OF ADMINISTRATIVE AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I would like to know exactly what is going on in the discussions with the provinces following the failure of the Charlottetown Accord.

I have here in front of me a statement made by Mr. Mulroney, which is published in Le Devoir of October 23, 1992.

It says:

[Senator Gigantès.]

> Should the No side win, the Mulroney government will not negotiate a new administrative agreement with Quebec or with the other provinces.

So, there will be no agreement. Mr. Mulroney is quoted as having said this:

> "The idea that we could say NO to the Charlottetown Accord and go back to the table to get more is foolish. It will not happen. This has no appeal whatsoever in English Canada."

So, one concludes that there will not be any agreement at all. Yet, very soon after the Charlottetown Accord, other articles in the newspapers told us that the province of Quebec was trying to seek new agreements. Among others, there was this headline in the Canadian Press —

[English]

. . ."Deal might be dead but Quebec demands for power live on". . .

[Translation]

The article says, among other things —

[English]

"That would include administration of federal unemployment insurance funds and involve the transfer from the federal government to Quebec of almost 6,000 bureaucrats . . .", et cetera.

[Translation]

So my question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Is the government ready or not to begin discussions with the provinces on administrative agreements? Mr. Mulroney was quoted on October 23 as having said "absolutely not". Neverthless, we have heard that some provinces want to talk with the government. Where do we stand?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, in both cases mentioned by the Hon. Senator Molgat, administration of unemployment insurance and labour force training, I think that the Minister of Employment and Immigration, Mr. Valcourt, has already made a statement on behalf of the government.

I would be pleased to obtain a copy and bring it to the attention of the Senate.

Senator Molgat: But given what Mr. Mulroney said in that quotation of October 23 where it was absolutely not, is it "no" or "yes" or "maybe" or does it depend on which province or what field?

What does a province like mine do? Can it come to talk with the government or must we rely on what Mr. Mulroney said on October 23, that it is "no"? What exactly is the situation?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is not appropriate to attempt through administrative agreements what could not be done through a constitutional amendment.

Senator Molgat: Then the Leader of the Government in the Senate supports what Mr. Mulroney said: the answer is "no" and there will be no administrative agreements.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I ask my friend to read carefully what I just said on this subject.

I am talking about the very slim possibility of accomplishing through administrative agreements what could not be done through a constitutional amendment, namely a transfer of jurisdiction.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked on December 2 by Senator MacEachen regarding the downing of the South Korean aircraft in 1983, and to a question asked on December 3 by Senator Fairbairn on proposed restrictions on UI benefits.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

RELEASE OF INFORMATION BY RUSSIAN AUTHORITIES ON 1983 DOWNING OF SOUTH KOREAN AIRCRAFT

(Response to question raised by Hon. Allan J. MacEachen on December 2, 1992)

The Government is actively pursuing Canada's interest in the tragic destruction of KAL Flight 007. Our ambassador in Moscow met with the Russian Foreign Minister Kozyrev to receive a briefing and a set of the newly-released documentation.

This information confirmed Canada's stance at the time of the accident: KAL 007 was a regular civilian flight that strayed from its path and was shot down without any warning.

The Department of External Affairs immediately contacted family members of the Canadian victims, and has stayed in touch with them since.

Government lawyers are examining the new evidence to see how it could strengthen Canada's outstanding claims for compensation on behalf of the victims' families.

The Russian government has invited South Korea, the United-States, Japan and the International Civil Aviation Organization to a meeting on Wednesday, December 8 to discuss additional evidence from the plane's flight data recorder.

Our embassy in Moscow has been instructed to seek Canadian participation in this meeting.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

PROPOSED RESTRICTIONS ON UI BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Joyce Fairbairn on December 3, 1992)

No Canadian who quits his or her job for just cause will be denied unemployment insurance. The term "just cause" is defined in the Unemployment Insurance Act to protect workers who have a legitimate reason to leave their employment.

No woman who leaves her job because of sexual harassment will be penalized. The personnel at the department of Employment and Immigration currently administer these rules with compassion in mind. The benefit of any doubt will be given to women in sexual harassment cases. The Minister of Employment and Immigration will ensure that their training remains up-to-date so that this will continue.

Furthermore, no one who quits his or her job to follow a spouse or care for a child will be penalized; no one who quits because of hazardous or intolerable working conditions, or discrimination will be affected.

The notion is whether the person quit with just cause. The key determination is always whether the person acted as a reasonable person would act in the circumstances.

However, if a person just decides to quit a job without a good reason then the government can see no reason that the rest of the people who pay for the Unemployment Insurance Program should be asked to pay for this person to receive benefits.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

IMMIGRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Di Nino, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton) for the second reading of Bill C-86, An Act to amend the Immigration Act an other acts in consequence thereof.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, this bill is a test case and we should view it in the context of where the Senate is at now and statements by some of the senators opposite about where the Senate should be going. They have given interviews that have appeared in the press saying that the Senate should better play its role of defending the regions. They have talked of regional caucuses. They have talked of escaping the rule of the House of Commons and of the party caucus and giving the Senate something worthy to do.

Well, let us do it. Let us do it with Bill C-86. It is a worthy test case. We were asked by the government to do a pre-study. The bill was sent to the committee presided over by Senator Kinsella. The pre-study was done and during the pre-study there were all kinds of encouraging noises coming from the Conservative side that we would be able to make suggestions for changes, and they would be accepted.

A report was produced that was accepted unanimously by this chamber. It went to the other side and important amendments to the legislation were rejected. Some were accepted. I will not go over the same text. My honourable friend, Senator Hébert, gave you the details of the bill.

Important things were left out. These things were not important only in my view, but for all of us. We accepted it unanimously. These proposals would have clearly improved the legislation. It would not have cost the government more money. It would not have done the country any harm. All it would have taken would have been for Mr. Harvie Andre and a couple of other people on the other side to show a little more humility, more openness and not crack the whip to make you, on the other side, look foolish for having trusted them and having done your work honestly and prepared the report that we backed unanimously.

Why do we not, on this bill, both sides together begin with this bill to transform the Senate to make it a truly effective part of the governments of Canada? I will develop how both sides can work together from now on if you want.

What would it take? It would first take a limitation of the powers of the Senate proposed by us, not by anyone else. We can unanimously propose that we will limit our power to block certain bills for only a certain amount of time. For example, for money bills it may be no more than a month, except for one money bill. On any money bill concerning the Parliament of Canada Act, there should be no limit to our blocking, because then the House of Commons would be able to strangle the Senate by simply cutting off funds. But we should undertake not to stop all other money bills for longer than a certain period. On other bills in general we could have a limit, or decide jointly that such bills should go to a conference of the two houses, whatever we want.

After saying to the House of Commons that we insist on our unanimous report and we are not going to accept the fact that you threw it out, we then make this proclamation limiting the powers of the Senate so that it will not prevail over the House of Commons.

Then let us take another step. Let us decide that there are some things we will do by double majority, a majority of your side and the majority of our side. The first step we should take on that would be to elect a new Speaker by double majority, a person for whom the majority on your side and the majority on our side can vote.

Let us take the next step, which would be to have each side appoint an expert and have those two experts choose a third person as their chairman and revise the rules of this house.

[Senator Gigantès.]

The three of them would bring us a unanimous report. They would revise the rules to make what I am proposing function properly.

Then we can say to the people of Canada that we have no control as to how senators are appointed. We really have no say in it, but we can function under these rules and give the sober second thought that this chamber could provide, use the talents of this chamber, and help toward the better governance of the country, not act as an extension of our national caucuses, not act, in your case, as the play thing of Harvie Andre and his local amanuensis, Lowell Murray.

This is the ideal situation because here, in Bill C-86, is a case in which both sides of the Senate voted unanimously for a report. It was a damn good report, yet they slapped us in the face with it. This is the time to say enough is enough. I am prepared to say enough is enough to my party. I am sure that a majority of the people on this side would go for the sort of thing I am proposing. I am sure that in their heart of hearts a majority of the people on your side would go for it too, and we would be able then to work as a chamber in which sober second thought would be the objective. We would, without partisanship, be able to declare that this legislation can be improved, here are the improvements, we agree on both sides, and if you people in the other chamber do not want it, we will give you the maximum blocking.

● (2130)

At the end of the day, we would hopefully prevail, but meanwhile, we would have given this chamber the chance to mobilize public opinion into studying the case, to mobilize the press, and to make the Senate more meaningful than it now is.

Why am I insisting that this is the time? Because we are rarely in unanimous agreement on something important, on something that touches the reputation of Canada, its past history and its future, and on something that has resonance to the very large numbers in this country who are neither of English nor French nor Aboriginal descent—the newer wave of immigrants—and there are many of us. There are many of us in this house too.

Why do we not do it? Why should we accept that the very good piece of work we produced is treated with contempt? Why should we accept that the sensible, compassionate, carefully worded provisions we put into the law are totally disregarded for reasons that are not even given to us? Why do we not use this occasion to show that the founding fathers of this nation were right when they said the country needed a chamber of sober second thought?

I will forego the pleasure of dumping on Senator Lowell Murray or teaching Greek history to Senator Lynch-Staunton for the opportunity of contributing to the welfare of the country.

We can do it, and this is the occasion to do it. This is the occasion because we were asked to do a job—to take a piece of legislation and improve it. I am sure Senator Kinsella and people on the other side consulted with people of their party in the other house and were led astray like the rest of us. We were asked to make fools of ourselves. They need not have done it. It was not necessary. They could simply have said, "We will use the usual technique. Like it or lump it. We will ram it down your throats. We do not particularly care what you think." But no! This time they went a little further. This time they went to the extremes of total humiliation. They asked us to a job, and we did it very well. There was general agreement that the quality of this particular report was very high. Everybody backed it. But no! Harvie Andre says you can roll it up and put it in your ear.

I say this is enough. Let us stop it. Let us say that the Senate knows how to work as an independent chamber and how to play the sober second thought game. The way to do it is a by a proclamation of independence. The first shot should be the rejection of the version of the bill that has been sent to us and which has thrown out important improvements made by this chamber.

I have already referred to the steps. We elect a Speaker by double majority, someone acceptable to you and to us. We then appoint a committee. One expert is appointed by us, one by you, and the two experts choose a chairman to rewrite the rules in light of the role we want this house to play—not as a servant of the other place; not as the plaything of Harvie Andre or whoever will be in that position after the next election, but as a chamber in which good people, many of them with high qualifications and a good past, can have a good future as senators by showing that country comes first and party comes second.

Let us do it. Let us throw this out. Join us, those on the other side, and let us make the Senate what it was intended to be.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): From Senator Murray's earlier statement I was under the impression that Senator Kinsella would be involved in this debate. Did I misunderstand?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we are now at second reading. Committee stage and third reading are still to come, so I am sure we will be hearing from Senator Kinsella before the end of the debate.

Senator Thériault: We are dealing with the principle of the bill. We should hear from him now.

Senator Stewart: Out of the grave site he will speak.

Senator Molgat: All I can say is that I am deeply disappointed. Senator Kinsella was chairman of the committee that conducted an indepth prestudy of this bill. My honourable friends told us how important and necessary that prestudy was. Although we have had certain reservations on this side about prestudy, we were—well, I cannot say absolutely convinced, but let us say that the other side, with its majority, was able to determine that we would have a prestudy. That prestudy was conducted, with Senator Kinsella as chairman of the committee. I well recall how he said to us on the evening the motion to have the prestudy was passed that he would give it full time and full discussion; that anyone who wanted to be heard would be heard; and that we would get into the meat of this matter.

Senator Hébert: But he gave us 12 hours for public hearings.

Senator Molgat: It did not turn out that way in committee. Nevertheless, we were happy that the committee produced a unanimous report. I commend Senator Kinsella for that result, unhappy as we were that a number of people who wanted to appear were not given the opportunity to be heard.

Senator Frith: Senator Stewart is saying it is at the burial of the report that a graveside eulogy will be given.

Senator Molgat: The Senate should provide the opportunity to all Canadians to speak out on legislation. We are all aware of the present mood of the Canadian people. They have lost confidence in the whole of the government system. Canadians feel they have no say in what goes on in government. All you have to do is look at what happened in the referendum. There was an absolute rejection by the Canadian people of what governments were trying to encourage them to do.

The Senate has a particular opportunity to correct this state of affairs and to indicate to the Canadian people that, yes, there is a body in government that is prepared to listen. There is a body in government where the average Canadian can be heard. We are missing a golden opportunity when we cut off the hearings of our committees and force them to report quickly, as was done in this case.

Nevertheless, in spite of that, there was a unanimous report. I compliment Senator Kinsella and committee members for having achieved that. However, having done so, I am surprised Senator Kinsella will not now share with us his views on this bill. I was expecting, after Senator Murray's statement, that we would hear Senator Kinsella speak on the principle of the bill in second reading. That is the moment to put forth our general attitude towards this concept. However, if that is not to be, then we will have to wait for third reading.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, it was my intention to wait until the committee had concluded its hearings and examination of the bill before us should the bill be referred to committee, although, at this juncture, I might say a few words as to the process.

● (2140)

It was my first experience with the pre-study. As all honourable members on both sides of the chamber have mentioned, it has been a widely-acclaimed study by many segments of the community. Part of what the Deputy Leader of the Opposition was referring to was the process and the hearings that our committee had under Bill C-86. In our pre-study, we followed a different procedure. All members of the committee were satisfied with the manner in which we did our study and were satisfied with the conclusion of the work, which resulted in the report.

It was gratifying to see the report cited so many times in the legislative committee of the other place as it drew on the points that we had underscored; areas of difficulty that we had indicated. In the views of some honourable senators, some of these difficulties continue to be present.

The report was obviously right on the money in so many areas because issues that we identified as being problem areas were the subject of a large number of amendments. I counted 12 or 13 amendments made at the legislative committee level in the other place.

Senator Frith: Made or proposed?

Senator Kinsella: No, made and passed. Approximately 70 amendments were made to the bill and at least 12 of those were issues that we addressed and they referred it back to us.

We drew the attention to 14 major issues because we were studying the subject matter. Of those 14 major issues, two of them found direct amendments in the bill, one of which was reinserting a major achievement of the Senate in dealing with Bill C-55 in the version of the bill we were looking at in pre-study that had been deleted. It found its way back in as a result of our work.

Senator Frith: What happened to the other 12?

Senator Kinsella: The other 12 received different kinds of treatment. I can go through them, but they were touched on by the five speakers that I listened to in this chamber. Obviously these would be some of the areas that I would expect colleagues would want to delve into as we go forward. That is why I would prefer to leave my substantive comments to our third-reading debate.

Senator Frith: They were rejected—just to complete your interjection.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: I wish to ask Senator Kinsella a question.

[Translation]

You said, senator, that there are 14 major points which were proposed or suggested by our committee, your committee, the committee of the entire Senate. Don't you think that it is pitiful for the government to accept only two of these major recommendations upon which we, from both sides of this chamber, had agreed? We cannot stand for this. Are you ready to accept such a thing?

[English]

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, I counted a little differently than the Honourable Senator Hébert. Each of the 14 major issue areas we raised were responded to in a variety of ways, two of which were major amendments to the bill. Other kinds of ideas and responses were brought to bear. We will no doubt want to look into those areas now that we have to address Bill C-86. My own judgment will attend our examination of the bill as we now have it.

[Senator Kinsella.]

Senator Hébert: In the committee that will sit in the coming days, do you think we will still be of the same opinion on the importance of some of these recommendations? Consequently, does the senator see any other way to be honest with ourselves than to propose to this chamber some clear amendments that are missing to make it a decent piece of legislation?

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, it is always much safer to be an historian than to be a prophet. I would rather not pre-judge what would take place in the committee hearings and what honourable senators will or will not propose.

I go into it with an open mind. We have identified some important issues and we have had a shot at two of them. No doubt we will want to delve into that further. One of the good things about the pre-study is that it has helped us to narrow the questions. We can focus our attention and delve into these. To that extent, the work that the committee will have before it will be assisted by the pre-study.

Senator Hébert: The senator mentioned, among other things, that there were 70 changes in the bill. They did not all come from our report; a lot of those were technical changes that occurred probably because the minister,in the eight months of workhe said he gave to this piece of legislation, did not have time to do a good job. Therefore, at the last minute they had to make 70 changes.

The result is that the bill in front of us, according to a lot of people that have written to me is a new bill. I have these letters for your information. It is not the same bill, not only because of the few worthwhile amendments that came from our report, but also because of these 75 or 80 important changes. As chairman of the committee you know witnesses will tell us it is not possible to be called on 24-hours notice to discuss such a huge, seriously-transformed bill.

Will you give us the assurance that these important witnesses, from the bar of this country or from NGO's, will have time to study the new bill properly before they are called before our committee?

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, I that, should the bill be referred to our committee shortly, when the our steering committee would get together to consider those matters.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have been listening carefully to the questions and answers on this piece of legislation because I have great deal of faith in Senator Kinsella because of his background and concern.

● (2150)

As I listened to him I asked myself: Are you giving us a political snow job?

Senator Frith: Say it isn't so.

Senator Thériault: I want to emphasize the question asked by my colleague, Senator Hébert. When I came to this place some few years ago, we embarked on the pre-study of bills. I was never necessarily a great fan of such pre-studies. I know that my learned and knowledgeable colleague, Senator

MacEachen, agrees with me that pre-study is not a way to deal with legislation.

Senator MacEachen: It is an abomination.

Senator Thériault: However, this government, this party in power, has re-introduced pre-study. Although I do not usually get involved in detailed legislation —it has never been my forte —this piece caught my eye. I am, however, always concerned with the principles contained in any bill.

I put a lot of trust and faith in my colleague Senator Kinsella to do what was right as it relates to the principles of this bill. I am surprised at and disappointed in Senator Kinsella because he has skated around the questions put to him.

If his heart is not in that report, then the report is a waste of time. If his heart is in it, and I believe it is, and if his colleagues or his leader will allow him to proceed, or if he takes it on himself to do what is right, then this bill will take a long time to be processed. It will take weeks or months. There is no real rush to get this bill through.

I know a bit about being the leader of a government, since I happen to have been the leader in a smaller house. I know when the pressure is on. If there is a problem in every province of this country, it is that we have too much legislation. Governments have become obsessed with the passage of bills. They think the people judge their performance on the number of bills they pass in one session.

As a matter of fact, quite the opposite is true. New Brunswickers, Quebecers, Ontarians—Canadians—do not often realize the consequences of legislation until it is too late. That is why, when I came to this place, I felt I would be able to participate in a legislative body that would take the time to study legislation, even to delay it, to ensure that it would be better.

I was disappointed. Shortly after I came to this place I was on the government side. The government kept putting pressure on us by saying, "We have to have this bill by the end of the year; by the end of the month." Senator MacEachen was not the leader then, it was either Senator Olson or Senator Perrault.

I believed Senator Murray was from a new and different generation.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Thériault: I know he means well.

Senator Molgat: What a disappointment he turns out to be.

Senator Thériault: He is obsessed with politics, and that obsession will destroy him and his government. As a matter of fact, it has destroyed them. I did not think Senator Kinsella had reached that state of mind.

Senator Molgat: You thought he was still pure.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: He is from New Brunswick.

Senator Thériault: All of us from New Brunswick are good people. We mean well. I would tell my colleague from New Brunswick, that his report is a good report, but what is the sense in producing a good report if it will not be followed through?

Tell us truthfully, do you want this bill to be passed before Christmas?

Senator Murray: I will answer that. Yes.

Senator Thériault: Since you have a majority, it would be a waste of time for us to proceed in committee for two or three days, or even three or four months, unless you are sincere and you believe in your report and that you can improve the bill.

Refugees from around the world are looking to us. We are the envy of the world. Let us keep it that way. Do not rush this piece of legislation through in the next two or three days.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the question is put, I should make a comment about pre-study which has come up in a couple of interventions.

We should remember that this is what we can expect from pre-study. Apparently, from what I hear, we had a shining example of everything good that could come from pre-study. What came from it? A lot of work: 14 recommendations, 12 of which were thrown into the dustbin. That is what we can expect. Why would we not expect that?

If we are prepared to become a sort of sub-committee of the House of Commons, something that is a sort of an adjunct to one of their legislative committees, then we should be prepared to hear: "Dear Senate: We, the House of Commons want you to study this for us. Let us have your views, before we send it to you, before we make our decision."

In innocence, apparently, Senator Kinsella launched this pre-study, and what do we get? We get what we should expect— something to which no self-respecting legislative body would expose itself.

Senator Murray: Do you think we invented it?

Senator Frith: We should un-invent it.

Senator Murray: You invented it.

Senator Frith: Yes, and it is a mistake. It was a mistake then and it is a mistake now. The same things happened then as are happening now. We took the same abject position, the same inferior position, which we ought not to have taken. We ought not to do it again. We ought to remember what is happening to us this time when we have supposedly done the best work that could be expected from pre-study and this is what we have got to show for it.

Let us have the question, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: It was moved by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, for the Honourable Senator Di Nino, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, for the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), that this bill be read a second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

Hon. William M. Kelly: I would ask that we have a 10-minute bell, with the vote to be taken at 10.05.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by Senator Rossiter that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BILL TO DISSOLVE OR TERMINATE CERTAIN CORPORATIONS AND OTHER BODIES

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, for the second reading of Bill C-63, to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I rise to make a few remarks on second reading of Bill C-63, which is an act to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies. In so doing, I would like to comment on some of the specific bodies which are going to be eliminated by this act.

For senators who are not familiar with the background to this act, it has its roots in the budget of last February in which the government announced it would eliminate or consolidate a series of government agencies. Bill C-63 provides for termination of six different institutes or councils, specifically the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, the Canadian Institution for International Peace and Security, the International Centre for Ocean Development, the Science Council of Canada, the Law Reform Commission of Canada, and the Economic Council of Canada.

The reason why Bill C-63 only deals with the six agencies I described, rather than dealing with several other agencies the government proposed to eliminate in its budget, is that they can be eliminated without requiring substantial amendments to other existing legislation. The government has opted to proceed with these six by way of a small omnibus bill and then proceed with the others when the other major pieces of legislation come forward.

In all of the press comments on the decision to eliminate these six agencies, the government essentially said there were two reasons why they were making these cutbacks, eliminating these government bodies. One reason was that each of these bodies had fulfilled its original mandate, therefore it was no longer necessary to keep them. The second reason was that most duties and functions carried out by the six boards and commissions are redundant. The government has said the duties can be performed by universities, independent and private sector researchers.

I will comment on just two of these institutions. It seems to me that one can understand the fallacy of the government's argument by focusing on one or two of these specific examples, rather than focusing on all six as a group. Let me begin by making some observations on the demise of the Economic Council of Canada,.

The Economic Council in fact goes back nearly 30 years. It began in April of 1963. During that time, it is fair to say the council has provided Canadians and governments of both parties with honest, objective, and independent advice.

Having been around in various positions in Ottawa at times when a Liberal government was in power, there is absolutely no doubt that the Economic Council has published reports which were troublesome in a political and a public relations sense, not only to the current government, but to governments over its history. That occurred because the Economic Council was established to provide honest, objective, non-partisan advice even on very sensitive questions.

An indication of that is that two of the issues which the Economic Council is currently studying, for which major reports are under way, have to do with the economics of health care and of education with a specific focus on post-secondary education. I think we will all agree they are two of the most controversial and yet crucially important public policy issues facing the country today, whether one talks about facing the federal government or facing provincial governments. In spite of the Economic Council dealing with these two issues, the government says the mandate of this organization is finished and fulfilled.

I ask you, what other institution in Canada is going to have the resources required to carry out the kind of complicated, expensive and in-depth research which the Economic Council has done over the years or is presently doing on health and education?

Honourable senators, I think the real reason why the Economic Council is being killed has to do with the fact that in the not-too-distant past it published a report on the economic implications to Canada, if Quebec were to separate. To put it very mildly, the results of that particular Economic Council report were extremely upsetting to the government since they contradicted many of the statements that government had made in various fear-driven campaigns since 1987. As a result of that report, the government decided it was not going to put up with this any longer; that it would simply kill the Economic Council.

The problem, of course, is that that is exactly the kind of study, or the studies on health and education, which the Economic Council ought to be doing because there is no other body in Canada capable of carrying out very scientific and professional research of that kind.

If the government says, as ministers have said in the other place, that you need not worry, the government will itself go ahead and do such studies, one is entitled to some doubt as to whether or not the government would do such studies. That is debatable. What is not debatable, obviously, is the fact that if the government did those studies, nobody would believe them. Even if the studies were funded or published by a government department through a minister, the impact and the potential value of the study would be lost because of its clear bias and lack of independence.

So much for the Economic Council.

Senator Frith: Or appearance.

Senator Kirby: Or appearance, exactly. The clear perception would be that this was not an independent and objective piece of research.

Senator Gigantès: Even if they funded it from the pharmaceutical multinationals?

Senator Kirby: They would only farm a drug study out to the multinationals. You are right. Of course that might be our friends' perception, Senator Gigantès, of what constitutes independence.

Let me just make a couple of commentsabout the Science Council. It is troubling to hear ministers and spokespersons for the government say publicly that any of the research which the Science Council has sponsored will now be undertaken largely by universities. That seems to fail to recognize what this government has done with respect to funding post-secondary education since it came to office.

It is an interesting observation that the government has, since 1984, transferred $3.3 billion less to post-secondary education than would have been transferred under EPF, the Established Programs Financing Act, had the government not proceeded to systematically cut back on their contributions by capping EPF payments.

• (2220)

To show what this has done to research in the scientific area within universities, let me point out that, in 1984, 36.2 per cent of total university R&D expenditures came from the federal government. By 1990, that number had fallen by more than 4 per cent to 32.9 per cent.

In the space of four or five years then, there has been a cutback of better than 10 per cent in the level of federal funding. This is excluding inflation. In absolute dollars, there has been a cutback of better than 10 per cent in federal funding to post-secondary educational institutions for R&D.

If you take inflation into account, in fact, the cut has been substantially greater than that.

In light of cuts such as those, it is hard for me to believe that universities will be able to pick up the slack caused by the loss of the Science Council of Canada.

This is occurring at a time when recent data published by the OECD show that Canada, among western industrialized nations, is second only to Italy in lowest R&D expenditures.

Prime Minister Mulroney, as part of his leadership campaign in 1983, published a book entitled Where I Stand. In that book, Brian Mulroney said:

> The importance of increased investment in research and development in designing an industrial strategy is overwhelmingly clear.

He goes on in that same part of his book to recommend increasing the amount of GNP allocated to R&D by 10 per cent in order to create one million new jobs and in order to create $20 billion in additional sales of manufactured products.

Yet, the reality is that, since this government came to power, the percentage of Gross Domestic Product spent on R&D has fallen from 1.44 per cent when the government was elected to 1.34 per cent for the last fiscal year. In reality, the government policy has led to a substantial decline in the amount of money spent on R&D even though, when he was running for office in 1983, Mr. Mulroney stressed in his own book, in his own words, the importance of having an industrial strategy which would add to expenditures on R&D because that would, in fact, create one million new jobs and $20 billion in additional sales of manufactured products.

Honourable senators, it is clearly false to argue that the quality work which has historically been done by the Science Council will now be carried out by universities because the government has cut back very significantly on the amount of post-secondary expenditures—$4.4 billion since this government took office.

It is also clearly false to argue that the research historically done by the Science Council will now be done by the private sector because, since this government has been in office, the percentage of Gross Domestic Product spent by the private sector on R&D has, in fact, been declining, not increasing.

When I look at those two illustrative examples out of the six organizations to be eliminated, and at the government's argument that the mandate of those organizations has either been fulfilled or will be picked up by other available parts of society, and when I see that the work of both the Economic Council and the Science Council will not be replaced, then the reality of the situation becomes clear.

The cutting of these institutions and commissions is not really because they fulfilled their mandate, not really because there are other organizations prepared to pick up the slack, these institutions are being cut because they have, from time to time, criticized the government. They have had the nerve to give non-partisan advice and commentary which has received considerable press coverage across the country. This is one more attempt on the part of this government to silence its critics by taking away money and depriving them of the forum which they and all Canadians need in order to understand the real impact of government policies.

The loss of the two commissions which I have described, along with the Law Reform Commission, will create a significant void in Canadian society—a void which I hope can be restored following the next election.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I want to make a comment or two about this particular bill. It is a matter of regret that the bill provides for the dissolution of the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security and the dissolution of the International Centre for Ocean Development.

No matter what is said in justification of this measure, it is clear that the country will suffer a loss in the dissolution of the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security and in the transfer of the International Centre for Ocean Development, as an independent Crown corporation, from Halifax to be an integrated as part of the Canadian International Development Agency located in Ottawa.

Before I go on, I may say, honourable senators, that I have read the explanations given in the speech. They are related to the subject but they really do not provide very much basis for the dissolution of either institution.

It appears to me that the peace and security of the world is as greatly endangered today, in a different form, as it was in the days when the Institute of International Peace and Security was established. Mind you, the threat to peace and security has taken a different form. One could even argue that, in the present circumstances, the threat is an unstable threat when one looks to Eastern Europe. However, the argument made here is that the geo-political situation has so changed in the world that the Canadian Institute for International for Peace and Security is no longer justified.

It ought to be remarked that, in the intervening period, the ability of the Department of External Affairs itself to provide advice on geo-political matters has been seriously reduced because of very sharp reductions in manpower in the department and the retirement of senior officials who, at the peak of their career, are in the best position to give wise counsel.

I introduced the bill in Parliament that set up the institute. The terms of that bill were carefully negotiated with the opposition parties in the House of Commons. It was an all-party conclusion, even to the point that the Government of Canada at that time would not make an appointment of a director until it had the approval and consent of the official opposition and the new democratic parliament.

• (2230)

The number of directors of the institute was cleared with the opposition, as were its terms of reference. The number of international members in comparison with Canadian members was also negotiated. The negotiations were conducted by the official opposition, by Mr. Nielsen, who later became the deputy Prime Minister, and by the late Pauline Jewett for the New Democratic Party. It was an all-party conclusion because all parties found value in the institute.

Honourable senators, have any of you looked at the last annual report of the institute and examined the range of publications which this institute has produced in its relatively short history? It is impressive. I regret that this is happening because it means that the substance of thinking in this field will be reduced by the removal of the institute. Maybe, as Senator Kirby has said, it will be replaced in the future.

The International Centre for Ocean Development was intended, by its location in Halifax, to take advantage of the Institute of Oceanography, which has a good representation in the field, and the expertise at Dalhousie University, which, in conjunction with the centre itself, would become a significant body in the field of ocean development, particularly assisting the underdeveloped countries. It was a very good, relevant concept, and its location was critical to its success.

Now the government is saying that is no longer justified and we turn it over to CIDA, operating on the banks of the Ottawa River. That body is now intended to carry out the functions of the International Centre of Ocean Development. It is a regrettable move.

I do not think any of us can fight this in a hysterical way. We cannot pound the table and say, "Please change your mind". It is a bad move and regrettable. That is all we can say.

They say that the Deputy Prime Minister went through the government directory prior to his budget and struck out various agencies as he came upon them. That may be apocryphal, but it would seem to me that it would represent the level of cerebration that went into these decisions. They are not justified, unless you were dissolving the country or had a long-term view that this country was not viable and therefore it would be unnecessary to maintain its intellectual capacity to deal with developing problems. That would be the justification for dissolving these institutes.

Honourable senators, as I heard the announcement and went through the bill I wondered why the Institute for Democratic Development escaped the pointed pencil of the Deputy Prime Minister.

Senator Murray: What is it?

Senator MacEachen: It is the institute that is located in Montreal headed by Mr. Broadbent, introduced into the Parliament of Canada when Mr. Clark was Secretary of State for External Affairs. As honourable senators will recall, it came to a committee of the Senate and I believe that both official opposition and government members felt that the bill was ill thoughtout.

The witnesses from External Affairs made a poor effort trying to justify the bill. It was a woolly affair. However, after some adjustments, removing some of the more flagrant deficiencies of the bill, we allowed it to pass.

If I were to rate any of these institutions; the Economic Council, the International Institute of Peace and Security and the International Centre for Ocean Development, I would rate them all higher in performance, because of their history, than this Institute for Democratic Development. I am not arguing that it be dissolved. I am asking what the argumentation was to retain this particular institute in Montreal.

My belief, honourable senators, is that if we believe in the future of the country, it is essential that we build up capacities in various fields of an intellectual character. I had the view that it was an anti-intellectual move, that it was a sign of some form of resentment that there was serious thought and serious analysis going on in the country, that this somehow was improper and we all ought to rely rather on tub thumping, sloganeering and prejudice in resolving our problems rather than careful thought, research and analysis. I hope I am not right, but that is a possible interpretation.

I do not like this bill. I am sure that there must be members on the other side who do not like it. Those of you who have watched the Institute of Peace and Security must agree that it has done a good job and that its publications are worth while.

On motion of Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON A RENEWED CANADA

On the Order:

Resuming debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, dated 28 February, 1992 (Sessional Paper #343-416A).

Hon. Gérald A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I just wanted to take two or three minutes to close the debate on this committee report. On February 28, 1992, the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada started its work.

• (2240)

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, do you realize that the intervention of Senator Beaudoin will close the debate?

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would like to adjourn the debate because I wish to speak on this matter.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Is that right? I do not know that Senator Beaudoin's intervention would close the debate. I suppose it is a substantive motion. The three procedures that close debate are second reading, inquiries, and a substantive motion. This may be a substantive motion.

[Translation]

Senator Beaudoin: Honourable senators, since there has been no intervention for months on this motion, I think this would be the right time, especially after the October 26 referendum, unless Senator Gigantès cares to intervene, in which case I will of course wait until tomorrow or next week.

Senator Gigantès: Tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Does Senator Gigantès wish to speak to the motion?

Senator Gigantès: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Gigantès wishes to adjourn the debate.

On motion of Senator Gigantès, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Atkins, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doyle, for the second reading of Bill S-13, to incorporate the Dai al-Mutlaq as a corporation sole in Canada.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this is a private bill. We will not be treating it as a matter for caucus solidarity or "whippery", whatever the word is.

This bill has become hotly controversial. Some senators have received strongly worded letters attacking the applicant's organization and activities. Senators Gigantès and Corbin have been outspoken in their opposition. My own view, not in any way binding them, is that the controversy should move from this chamber to the committee room where the conflicting views can be aired and where all sides can have as many days in court as it takes. I do not want to support or oppose this bill until there has been such an airing.

The principle of the bill is the rightness or wrongness of incorporating organizations as a corporation sole. I cannot say that I have any serious opposition to that particular principle. I may have opposition to this bill after I have heard the evidence in the committee and the committee's report.

I will not have anything more to say on this bill at second reading. I may have something to say on it at third reading after I have heard what the committee has to say and considered its evidence.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, Senator Corbin and I wish to speak on this bill. I will not take up your time this evening because I believe everyone is tired. However, I want to tell you that there is a judicial inquiry in India specially set up to look into allegations of criminal conduct by the person who is asking to be accepted as a corporation sole. That committee is to report in six months. It seems to me to be prudent that we wait six months to hear whether or not he has been cleared in his own country before we decide to give him the imprimatur of a Senate vote.

Therefore, I am opposed to this bill going to committee. I am opposed to the principle of the bill altogether. It is wasting our time, and I will speak more extensively on this tomorrow, as will Senator Corbin.

Honourable senators, I do not want this bill to go to committee. I do not want this bill to be considered any longer. I am opposed to it on principle and in substance.

On motion of Senator Gigantès, debate adjourned.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

> The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Ninth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs (extension of report date) presented in the Senate on 3rd December, 1992.—Honourable Senator Stewart).

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, the ninth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs simply asks for an extension of the time provided by the Senate for the committee to do its work.

The report appears in the journals at page 1529. It recites that the committee was authorized "to examine and report on negotiations for a North American free trade agreement among Canada, the United States and Mexico and any other related trade developments." We were to report no later than December 17, 1992.

In view of the course of negotiations and the fact that there is now an agreement, the committee is asking the Senate to extend its term of reference from December 17, 1992, to no later than March 31, 1993.

Honourable senators, I move that the report be now adopted.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE CONSTITUTION

MISHANDING OF CONSTITUTION ISSUE—INQUIRY—DEBATE CONCLUDED

Hon. H. A. Olson rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, September 22, 1992:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the mishandling of the constitutional issue by the Government of Canada.

METHOD OF PROMOTION OF REFERENDUM BY GOVERNMENT—INQUIRY—DEBATE CONCLUDED

Hon. H.A. Olson rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, September 24 1992:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the biased method being used by the Government of Canada to promote the Referendum.

BALANCE OF REPRESENTATION IN ALBERTA AND BRITISH COLUMBIA — INQUIRY—DEBATE CONCLUDED

Hon. H. A. Olson rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, September 29 1992:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that Alberta and B.C. are entitled to a better balance of representation in the revised Constitution than the "Charlottetown Accord" provides.

NEED FOR EXTENSION OF TIME FOR REFORM AGREEMENT—INQUIRY—DEBATE CONCLUDED

Hon. H. A. Olson rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, September 29 1992:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we need more time to get an agreement on constitutional reform.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish to deal with Inquiry Nos. 48, 50, 51 and 52 in my name, calling the attention of the Senate to certain views respecting the referendum that is now behind us. I wonder if I could have consent, if that is what is required, to put them all together and have a brief postscript on the issue. As far as I am concerned, they could then be considered debated.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Olson: As a postscript to these Inquiries, comments were made after the referendum respecting certain things that took place in Alberta and British Columbia. They were unfortunate comments that related to allegations or speculation as to why the referendum vote leaned so heavily toward the "no" side. I want to place on the record as a postscript that while I did a lot of campaigning for the "no" side, I was able to obtain some insight into the way people felt about this issue.

I see that Senator Murray has a quizzical expression on his face. Perhaps I should not have said that I campaigned for the "no" side. What I did was I explained the consequences of voting "yes" or "no". What bothered the people in those two provinces was the concept of reducing senators in the central provinces and replacing them with members in the House of Commons. That concept was never discussed prior to the meeting in Charlottetown. In all the discussions that took place across Canada, whether in the citizens' meetings or in the five or six constitutional conferences, that proposition was never discussed.

The fact that was amazing was that so many people in the two provinces saw through that. How it happened I am not sure, but some bartering must have gone on in the in camera meeting in Charlottetown or, to use another term, "horse-trading", to have come to that conclusion. That was an objectionable part of the package, probably the most objectionable part.

These inquiries call for more time to make as many amendments to the Constitution as were in the so-called Charlottetown Accord. If we have learned anything from trying to amend the Constitution it is that you should not put so many completely different aspects of the Constitution in the same package and then put it to the people, saying that they should vote either "Yes" for the whole package or "No" for the whole package because, while there may be several amendments that they may support in the whole package, if they find one highly objectionable, such as the one I have just described, they will obviously vote against it. That is the only way people can stop it from becoming an amendment to our Constitution. If we go through another exercise like this we should take more time and not try to amend as much of the Constitution in one swoop.

With those brief remarks, honourable senators, as far as I am concerned, those four Inquiries can be considered debated.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will not impose on the time and patience of the Senate for too long but, since this is the last opportunity we will have to discuss these matters, I should like to make two points in reply to those raised by the honourable senator.

First, with regard to the proposal in the Charlottetown agreement that the representation of Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta be increased in the House of Commons, the details of that proposal were fleshed out not in Charlottetown but several weeks prior to that at a meeting held in Ottawa. The principle here was that provincial equality of representation in the Senate must be balanced by a return to something closer to representation by population in the House of Commons.

Senator Olson: But this was nowhere near it.

Senator Murray: That principle was not new to the debate; that principle had entered into the debate for as long as there had been a debate on a so-called 3-E Senate. Many people had responded to the demands a 3-E Senate by saying, "Yes, we might accept the principle of equality of representation in the Senate, but only if we move closer to real representation by population in the House of Commons."

Senator Olson: Approximately 90,000 to one in Alberta and 70,000 to one in the central provinces. That is not fair.

Senator Murray: Look at it, honourable senators; it is closer to representation-by-population than we have now in the House of Commons.

Second, the honourable senator said that there was too much in the package. When we tried in 1987 to negotiate a Quebec round to settle the outstanding problems of Quebec with the Constitution and to put off until succeeding negotiations other issues, we were told that the focus was altogether too narrow. This led us in 1991 to pursue a so-called Canada Round in which aboriginal, constitutional rights, Senate reform, division of powers and numerous other subject were negotiated and an agreement concluded on that basis.

Having done that we were then told there was too much in the package. We have been told that tonight. We have also been told tonight we should not put one package like this to the people and ask them to vote "Yes" or "No". The fact of the matter is, honourable senators, that many of the participants and many of the provinces would accept one or other of the provisions that had agreement only on the understanding that it was part of a package. The government asked the Canadian people to make the decision which, at the end of the day, each of the first ministers had to make—that is, to respond to the question: Taken as a whole, is this package good for the country and can I accept it on behalf of the country?

Senator Olson: And you know what the people said about it.

Senator Murray: I know what the people said about it, but I am explaining the process and the principles that were involved. This country is now unable to amend its own Constitution. This is something we will have to conjure with in the months and years ahead. It was easier to do it when the Constitution was located in the Parliament of Westminster than it is today.

Hon. John Stewart: Honourable senators, I do not propose to repeat what I said here on September 15 this year when I spoke against the whole idea of the constitutional referendum and said that it was a risky undertaking for various reasons, but I want to say something about the first point on which Senator Murray focused.

Senator Murray mentioned a 3-E Senate. The truth of the matter is that the proposed Senate would not have been a genuine 3-E Senate. The main power the Senate would have had, as I see it, would have been the power to stop new tax arrangements with regard to natural resources. We know what was meant by natural resources. It was not forestry, it was oil and gas.

● (2300)

That was the real power of the Charlottetown Senate. If that power was to mean anything, the influence, the weight of Quebec and Ontario in the Senate had to be reduced. So, we got the equality element. Of course, the senators would have to be selected outside Ottawa. However, the real function of the proposed Senate, when we came right down to it, was to prevent the enactment of anything like the National Energy Program.

That was the agenda of the Premier of Alberta. Quite understandably, the premiers of Quebec and Ontario said, "Well, if you are going to have equality in the Senate, then we want something in return." So, there was this proposal for an immediate increase of 18 senators for each of those two provinces. The Premier of Quebec felt it desirable to say, "Well, we should have a guarantee of 25 per cent of the membership of the House of Commons, roughly what we had in the Senate prior to this reform."

The whole constitutional package focused on achieving the power of the proposed new Senate to stop new taxation on the oil and gas industries. Someone in my hearing has referred to this as the "Esso" constitution.

If the new Senate had a wide scope of genuine powers, then the application of strict representation by population would have been quite defensible. The key problem with the proposal was that outside the area of taxation, on natural resources and French language and culture, the new Senate was to be nothing but an expensive nuisance. In return for an expensive nuisance, Ontario and Quebec were to get additional members in the House of Commons; and, of course, Quebec was to get 25 per cent of the House of Commons in perpetuity.

It was simply not defensible on a political platform. If it had been a genuine Triple-E Senate, combined with true representation by population in the House of Commons, then it would have been defensible; but it was not. That was the problem with the institutional part of the proposal. I think Senator Olson is quite correct on that. I am a little bit surprised that Senator Murray had not detected this point because I know he is a great expert in these matters.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, these inquiries are considered debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS REMAINING IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, "the political cowardice" and "stubborn contempt for the democratic process" that motivates this government to cling to power has now gone on for 17 days past the date when this government ought to have called an election, according to Senator Murray's principles. I could say that I am sorry to have brought it up again and produced the allergic reaction that we have just witnessed, but I am not.

SENATORS' CHRISTMAS CARDS

PROPOSAL TO DONATE MONEY TO NEEDY FAMILIES

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I wish to thank my colleagues for all the Christmas cards they have sent me and that they have sent to one another. I wish to humbly suggest that next year, instead of sending Christmas cards to one another, we take the money and give it to some poor family. I do that.

Senator Doody: The honourable senator probably noticed that I did not send him a Christmas card.

Senator Gigantès: I am delighted you did not, sir. I have told my secretary not to send such cards to me. However, she did bring me the picture of Senator Janis Johnson's son and said what a handsome lad he is, which indeed he is, but perhaps we might give some thought to my suggestion, and make needy people a little happier next Christmas, rather than send one another Christmas cards.

CITY OF WINNIPEG

TOURISM AWARD FOR ANNUAL FOLKLORAMA FESTIVAL

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to bring to the attention of the Senate a recognition that has been given to my home province and my adopted city of Winnipeg. The city of Winnipeg's annual festival, called Folklorama, has been judged as the number one tourist event in Canada. This was the decision of the American Bus Association which last year, by the way, gave the same award to the Gathering of the Clans in Nova Scotia. I know that my Nova Scotia friends are particularly pleased at that.

The Winnipeg festival is, indeed, a very important Canadian event. Winnipeg was the first of our multicultural cities. Folklorama is a collection of exhibits, entertainment and food kiosks organized by the various ethnic groups in Winnipeg. It has attracted a large number of tourists, but it is essentially a recognition and celebration of the fundamental multicultural structure of Canada. I am delighted that Winnipeg has been so recognized.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

CONSEQUENCES OF PROPOSED DRUG PATENT LEGISLATION IN RELATION TO THE NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate an article in the Ottawa Citizen of December 7, 1992. It deals with a very important issue. The article begins as follows:

> The federal drug bill, which will affect the millions who require prescription drugs, is a precedent: it's the first time that legislation will be passed in Canada, then locked in under free trade.
> It means that, in future, there will be measures that no Canadian government will be able to provide for its own citizens without violating the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) with the United States and Mexico.
> Essentially, that includes made-in-Canada drug legislation.
> The U.S. pharmaceutical industry, one of the richest and most powerful sectors in America, has been fighting for these very changes since Canada brought in its consumer-friendly drug legislation in 1969. Finally, in this round, they won virtually every demand they made of Trade Minister Michael Wilson in the free trade negotiations.

I want honourable senators to realize what a serious matter it will be if this proposed drug patent amendment bill passes, and further, what a serious matter it will be if the NAFTA agreement is signed as it is, and what serious consequences there might be for Canada and the consumers of this country from the NAFTA agreement, which will be signed sometime next year.

Canadians beware! Your drug costs are going up!

THE SENATE

MANDATE IN RELATION TO PRE-STUDY OF BILLS

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I wish to speak briefly on a matter that arose yesterday in the discussion on the question of pre-study. I have some views, and I should like to place them on the record. I happen to strongly approve of pre-study, and I should like to explain why I do.

I want to refer to the original mandate given to all of us when we were summoned to this place. I quote from the scroll that I hope all of you have in your office. I certainly have it in mine. This is what we were asked to do.

> KNOW YOU, that as well for the especial trust and confidence We have manifested in you, as for the purpose of obtaining your advice and assistance in all weighty and arduous affairs which may the State and Defence of Canada concern, We have thought fit to summon you to the Senate of Canada . . .

Honourable senators, were asked to advise and assist, and that is what we are doing, I believe, during the process of pre-study.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): We are a legislature, not an advisory committee.

Senator Kelly: One of our problems is that we are confused as to how we view ourselves now, and how we viewed ourselves when we were appointed. In my opinion, we were not invited here to govern; we were invited to assist and advise those who were asked to govern, namely, the people in the other place.

Senator Stewart: Oh, you sound like Harvie Andre!

Senator Kelly: I do not deny that we are part of the Parliament of Canada, but I make the distinction between the government and the Parliament of Canada.

Senator Frith takes another approach to this whole thing. It is clear what his approach is, and I do not quarrel with him. I understand the adversarial system. Senator Frith has decided that if the government is a Conservative government, as it is today, then he is opposed to whatever they bring forward—not only the bills before us today, but also the bills the government may introduce in the future. That is the basis of the adversarial system, and it works in the courts of law. I do not quarrel with that approach, but it does not happen be mine. There is nothing wrong with us trying to advise and assist; that is quite legitimate, and pre-study does just that.

Consternation was expressed yesterday about the fact that a committee pre-studying a bill made 14 suggestions, only two of which appear to have been accepted. I believe the others were considered. No doubt we will hear about that when the bill is before the committee. I do not regard advice as a result of a pre-study to be direction. It is a suggestion; it is sober second thought. But all sober second thoughts do not have to be taken into account in a positive way; they merely need to be considered.

Senator Frith: Second thoughts?

Senator Kelly: I believe they are. If they were not even considered I would be concerned, but if they are considered, the job is well on its way to being done.

I dislike the idea of setting aside pre-study as though it makes us a sub-committee of the other place. I do not regard myself as a member of a sub-committee of the other place when I sit on a committee that is pre-studying a bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Kelly, according to the rules, your time is up. However, if there is unanimous consent, you may continue.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Give him some time!

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I have said what I wanted to say.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Kelly is quite right. I have made my position quite clear, and I need not elaborate on it. However, I also want to make it clear that I certainly did not consider myself summoned to some advisory body or to some assisting body. I thought I was summoned to a legislative body as defined in the Constitution. An appointment to the Senate is a constitutional appointment. The role of the Senate is not described in the Constitution as advising and assisting; it is a part of the legislative process.

An Hon. Senator: That decision was made by the Fathers of Confederation.

Senator Frith: The reading of the Constitution that Senator Kelly has given is totally unsupported by its words.

The other point I want to make is: The difference between my position and his position has nothing to do with the adversary role of parties in this place. We may differ on that, too, but it has nothing to do with pre-study; it is based on the role of the Senate as a legislative body.

The question of the adversarial system is another question, and has nothing to do with the question of pre-study.

• (1410)

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, am I entitled to one brief comment on that statement?

Senator Hastings: Please.

Senator Olson: Go ahead.

Senator Frith: Dig yourself in, by all means.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I wish to apologize if I have misunderstood, but I heard Senator Frith say that the duty of the opposition is to oppose. That is what Senator Frith says, and that is what led me to believe his attitude was as I described it.

Senator Frith: That is another issue we can talk about. I know that you and I do not agree on it, but it has nothing to do with pre-study.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I would suggest that this matter might better be dealt with under an inquiry.

Senator Hébert: I don't think we need his suggestions.

Senator Gigantès: Where does it say that he can make suggestions?

Senator Hébert: The so-called Speaker does not have to say anything.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PRIVATE BILL

UNITED GRAIN GROWERS, LIMITED—BILL TO AMEND ACT OF INCORPORATION—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. H.A. Olson, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, presented the following report:

Tuesday, December 8, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has the honour to present its

SIXTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill S-16, An Act to restructure United Grain Growers Limited, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, December 1st, 1992, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

H.A. OLSON
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Barootes, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, to conform to our new schedule, with leave of the Senate and not withstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, December 9, 1992 at one-thirty in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY LAW IMPROVEMENT BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the pleasure to introduce for first reading Bill S-17 to amend the Copyright Act, the Industrial Design Act, the Integrated Circuit Topography Act, the Patent Act, the Trademarks Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

[Senator Gigantès.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading Thursday next, December 10, 1992.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION FOR COMMITTEE TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE DENIED

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology have power to sit at four-thirty o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The motion arises out of a meeting this morning of the steering committee of the Social Affairs committee. We wish to have the full committee adopt our work plan, and also use the opportunity to hear as a witness on Bill C-86 Mr. Chefeke, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, who must return to Geneva and is only available to appear before the committee today.

[Translation]

Hon. Senator Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, we cannot give our consent to this belated proposal. A meeting—also belated!—of the steering committee of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has just been held this morning. The deal our caucus was presented with by Senator Bonnell who attended the meeting along with Senator Kinsella was to the effect that our committee would sit after the Senate would have adjourned for the day, not at four thirty. If the Senate adjourns by four thirty, fine! If it does by four, better yet! We will save half an hour.

In any case, we are certainly not going to adjourn early to rush this.

[English]

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, if leave is not granted, I will convene a meeting of the committee for the aforementioned purposes as soon as the Senate rises, if that occurs later than 4.30 p.m. However, I do hope that we will be able to extend the courtesy of this house to the High Commissioner. I also hope we will have the full collaboration of all honourable senators when dealing with this important bill. We can make an important contribution to the whole process concerning Bill C-86.

The Hon. The Speaker: I gather, honourable senators, that leave is not granted; is that correct?

Senator Molgat: It is not granted.

Senator Hébert: It is not granted.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 504 citizens of Alberta who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Edmonton, Spruce Grove, Calgary, Olds, Carseland, Sundre, Coalhurst, Coleman and Blairmore.

Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 500 citizens of British Columbia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Port Moody, Chase, Sorrento, Enderby, Salmon Arm, Kamloops, Quesnel, Mile House, Prince George, Williams Lake, Langley and Clearwater.

This makes a grand total of 1,004 petitions who continue to vigorously oppose the GST, an execrable, unfair tax that particularly affects low-income people, who will remember on election day.

CHILD POVERTY

PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by concerned Canadians calling upon this chamber to do everything possible to assist in eliminating child poverty in Canada by the year 2000.

CBC MINI-SERIES THE VALOUR AND THE HORROR

PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table a petition signed by 460 veterans from across Canada, as well as the United States and the United Kingdom with regards the CBC mini-series of films, The Valour and the Horror. This is probably the last result of a project initiated by the Ottawa Branch of the Royal Canadian Air Force Prisoner of War Association.

To give a distinctive flavour, I will read one of the "whereas" clauses.

> WHEREAS it is considered that this series of films contains historical errors, faulty research, half truths, incomplete quotations, inaccuracies, damaging innuendoes and that the films, by the use of questionable film techniques, give a false and misleading authority to rumour and unpublished speculation,

I might point out that this opinion was upheld by the ombudsman of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

DELAY IN PRODUCTION OF DEBATES

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I do not seem to have received my Debates of the Senate for yesterday. Is there a problem with the printing?

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): It is difficult to participate in Question Period without the Debates of the Senate of the previous sitting.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I could not agree more with the protest that is voiced today, and has been voiced on previous occasions when Hansard and other important documents are late. I quite agree. Honourable senators need these documents in order to prepare for the day's work. I do, and I know that other honourable senators do, and we have raised this matter before.

I do not know whether there are alternatives to having those documents printed by the Queen's Printer, which is now responsible for the printing; if there are, we should certainly investigate them.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

PROPOSED FREEZE ON PUBLIC SERVICE CONTRACTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I had wanted to read what the minister said yesterday in reply to my question regarding contracts and the announcement by Mr. Mazankowski that everything was frozen with respect to civil servants. I was questioning him on short-term contracts. I wanted to check exactly what he said. However, I will wait until the Debates of the Senate arrive before I do that.

I do have another question on the subject. Will the government also freeze, as of the day of the Economic Statement of Mr. Mazankowski, the amount of money allocated to contracts and also freeze the specific amounts that we agree to pay on contracts? For example, if there is a legal firm, there is normally a set rate. Will the government freeze that rate? The same applies to other types of contracts.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we would love to, but I do not know how it can be done.

Senator Molgat: The government might give a directive to those people responsible for granting such contracts, to the effect that "There will be no contracts above whatever price you paid previously." That is simply an matter of direction.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators must know that engaging a legal firm, which is the example Senator Mogat gives, to represent you in an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada is a different proposition than engaging a legal firm to supervise a construction contract, or some other matter. We are also aware that law firms and lawyers charge a certain tariff for their services, but —

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): They had better not. Be careful with that word. It has ramifications under the competitions policy.

Senator Murray: Different firms and individual lawyers charge different tariffs for their services. I am not aware of how we could try sensibly to put a ceiling on the fees that we will pay for a particular service because a service that is rendered varies so greatly from one case to the next. The honourable senator also knows we have an upper hand if we feel we are being overcharged by any of these people. We have the right, again in the case of legal firms, to have the account taxed. We also have the right not to engage that firm or that lawyer again.

● (1430)

PROPOSAL TO HAVE REQUEST FOR CONTRACT PUT OUT FOR TENDER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, when we were going over committee budgets in the Internal Economy Committee and various committee chairmen have come forward with some requirement for contract arrangements, I recall asking this question of Senator Poitras, in particular, because the rate for his researchers was higher than others. These were set rates. Lawyers were so much per day and that was it, it was a higher rate.

I want to be sure that if that was the set rate before the freeze, then it should be the set rate after the freeze.

Would the government consider putting such requests for contracts out to tender? Let us see what the private market will produce. The government has been in favour of letting the market decide. Why not put these contract requests out to tender? Let us see what happens.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Again, in the case of legal services, I do not know how that can be conveniently or properly done. However, I will convey the suggestion to my colleagues the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board.

I think the Deputy leader of the Opposition is, perhaps, closer to the mark and closer to a solution when he speaks of the global amount that the government might be spending in a particular fiscal year in respect of, let us say, professional services and our ability to freeze them or to keep a lid on them. I think we can do that. I will investigate. I am not sure how all these expenses are categorized. I will investigate to see what the state of affairs is, and bring in a report when I have it ready.

[Senator Molgat.]

WAGE CLAIM PAYMENT ACT

BANKRUPTCY ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER WAGE CLAIMS ARISING FROM BANKRUPTCIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It concerns an agreement which took place somewhat behind the scenes and somewhat in public earlier this year with respect to the passage of Bill C-22.

Some honourable senators may recall that Bill C-22, given Royal Assent on June 23 of this year, dealt with bankruptcies and insolvencies. When the bill was originally introduced in the other place, it was called the Wage Claim Payment Act and the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act. One of the issues that arose when the bill was discussed in committee in the other place was how to ensure that employees who were owed wages in a bankrupt company might have first claim on the assets of the company.

Several propositions were put forward. In committee in the other place, the notion of what ultimately came to be called "super priority" for wage earners was proposed. Under that proposal, wages would receive priority ahead of other secured creditors, including the banks.

The banks rejected the proposal. Ultimately, after a series of attempts to deal with the issue, including looking at various taxing schemes and ways of making these charges through Unemployment Insurance, the government decided it would drop the wage protection portion from the bill and proceed with the insolvency and bankruptcy provisions.

The net result was that when the bill came to this place, there were discussions on both sides of the house as to whether or not the bill ought to proceed in the absence of wage claim coverage. Finally, it was agreed that we would pass the bill so that bankruptcies which occurred over the course of the summer could be dealt with.

In fact, the cooperation on both sides of this chamber was such that in his press release of June 23, Minister Blais, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, said:

> We sought advice and input from all political parties and we were able to work with the House of Commons and the Senate to ensure that the bill would receive speedy passage.

All parties recognized that bankruptcy reform would help save companies and jobs.

The minister then went on to say, and I am now quoting directly from the minister's press release of June 23:

> . . . in this spirit of co-operation the Minister intends to propose to the House of Commons when it resumes in the fall that a Special Joint Committee of the House of Commons and Senate be established to look at the important issue of unpaid wage claims, which would report to the House of Commons by Summer 1993.

I repeat that the minister announced that, in return for cooperation in passing the bankruptcy bill last June, this joint committee would be established, in the minister's words, when the House of Commons resumed sitting in the fall.

I believe the Leader of the Government in the Senate will recall that there were negotiations between his side and our side in both chambers with respect to the exact make-up of such a committee, how many would represent each party, and how many MPs and senators there would be on the committee.

My question to the Leader of the Government is this: Since we are now almost at the end of the fall, and since the minister has not yet announced the creation of this joint committee, will he be announcing it prior to the other place rising at the end of this week? If not, when can we expect the government to live up to agreements we made on the understanding that their part of the bargain would be honoured?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the honourable senator does well to refresh our memory on this matter. I will take up the matter with Mr. Blais right away and try to bring back a satisfactory response within a day or so.

Senator Kirby: Honourable senators, an additional point that needs to be made is one which is of some concern to members on this side of the chamber. The discussions which took place concerning this particular bill obviously were conducted in good faith on our part. It troubles me that an element of the issue with which we were deeply concerned, and which was the part we thought would be taken care of by the joint committee in return for agreeing to speedy passage of the bill, has not been honoured. I hope the Leader of the Government will point out to the minister that cooperation in chambers requires that both sides live up to their part of the agreement.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am absolutely confident that Mr. Blais would have acted in good faith. He does have other responsibilities, as the honourable senator is aware. The agenda of the House of Commons is quite full these days. However, I accept the recitation of the facts that the honourable senator has given. I am sorry that I had not taken the matter up with my cabinet colleague earlier. However, with my memory refreshed, I shall do so right away.

AGRICULTURE

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS CONCERNING POSITION OF CANADA ON ARTICLE XI—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate for an update on the status of the negotiation concerning the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. In particular, is the Government of Canada prepared to broaden the negotiations in the sense of inquiring of countries in Europe that are unhappy with the proposal if they are interested in supporting the Canadian position on Article XI, something which they have not heretofore done, in consideration for some support from Canada for their position?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not think there is much that I can add to the reports I have given to the house earlier on this matter. We continue to hope that re-engaging the multilateral trade negotiations on the basis of the agreement reached, notably on agriculture, between the United States and the European Community, will prove to be successful.

I am not clear on what aspect of the question concerned Canada, but if the honourable senator will repeat it, I will either attempt to answer it now or obtain a report from my cabinet colleague, Mr. Wilson.

Senator Hays: I was asking Senator Murray whether the Government of Canada has any willingness to move on issues now being brought into play as a result of the unhappiness of the Europeans with respect to the negotiations. Will the government move to support the European positions to some degree in consideration of their support of the Canadian position on Article XI? Reports indicate that we have not had a great deal of success heretofore in gaining that support.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I really do not see the connection there. Opposition to Article XI is as it has been. We are seeking a strengthening and clarification of that article as a result of the current round of multilateral trade negotiations.

The impasse has been between the European Community and the United States. An agreement was reached on the question of agricultural support programs. It now appears that France, to put it mildly, is having second thoughts about the agreement. I do not think Canada's position on Article XI is really relevant to those discussions.

Senator Hays: By way of comment on that, it is relevant only because a negotiating dynamic involves give-and-take within the parameters of what the various parties want. In order to get what it wants, Canada may have to give something, and that something may exist in the list of things about which some European Community members are now unhappy, France being at the head of the line.

Perhaps the minister is not in a position to comment on that, I do not know. That was the thrust of my question.

REACTION TO POSSIBLE FAILURE OF CANADA TO MAINTAIN POSITION ON ARTICLE XI—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Dan Hays: The other matter, which I will raise with some regret, really, is that the government has established good credentials in supporting Article XI and in supporting the supply-managed sector. Doubts have been raised from time to time, and, indeed, some now exist, but the government has held firm on that. As someone who supports that marketing option within Canada, I compliment and thank them for that.

However, in the event that there is no success in that area, does the government have any ongoing plan to deal with the reaction within Canada to the Dunkel proposal to replace import restrictions such as Article XI with tarification which would change the way in which we run our supply-managed sectors?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I may not know much about agriculture, but I know enough to duck the last part of that question.

Honourable senators, let me say that we are not the antagonists in the matter between the United States and the European Community. They came to an agreement a little while ago on agriculture. The European Commission issued a statement saying that the agreement was perfectly compatible with the new common agricultural policy of Europe and that it had been agreed upon last May. France disagrees with that interpretation.

The problem perhaps is no longer between the United States and the European Community, it is between France and her European partners. I think there we must leave it for the time being, in the hope that, in the larger multilateral forum which is being re-engaged in Geneva, we can make sufficient progress to bring the Uruguay Round to a successful conclusion.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

EFFECT OF NAFTA ON NEGOTIATION OF TRADE SUBSIDY DEFINITIONS

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has often quoted a provision in the free trade agreement which states that, following the coming into force of the agreement, we will have seven years in which to negotiate definitions of what constitutes an unacceptable subsidy, or what constitutes dumping, so that the matter would be more clearly defined and less left to the arbitrariness of challenges by what one of the witnesses to our committee called "losers" among American producers.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie, one of your principal negotiators, has told us that, through the North American Free Trade Agreement, this opportunity to renegotiate acceptable and unacceptable subsidies will be dropped. Is that so?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am aware that parts of the FTA process seem to have been folded into a new process involving the three countries, but I would have to obtain a detailed explanation of that. I will do so and bring it to the Senate as soon as possible.

AGRICULTURE

APPOINTMENT OF INDEPENDENT CONSULTANT TO STUDY METHODS OF MARKETING CANADIAN BARLEY IN THE UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question to the minister deals with a developing problem in the agricultural community in the West, and that is the handling of barley, particularly insofar as sales to the United States is concerned.

Recently, the Minister for Grains and Oilseeds, Mr. Mayer, announced that he will soon hire an independent consultant to study the alternatives for selling barley south of the border. This is a matter of considerable discussion in the agriculture community. For example, Mr. Sigurdson, a farmer from Swan River, says there is no dissatisfaction amongst farmers on how their barley is being marketed. Yet other farmers are saying that change is essential.

However, the individual most closely associated with this is the Chief Commissioner of the Wheat Board whose function is, essentially, to represent the grain marketers. Mr. Hehn has said that if the board lost control over U.S. sales, it would lose much of its effectiveness as an offshore seller. He went on to say, however, that he has no quarrel with the Ottawa plans to study the issue, as long as the work was carried out by an independent person, such as an academic.

The minister made his announcement in mid-November. Can the Leader of the Government tell us who has been chosen to be the "independent person such as an academic" to do this study; and when may we expect a report?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I shall have to make inquiries, honourable senator.

REPORT OF FEDERAL STUDY ON REGULATION OF GRAINS AND OILSEEDS INDUSTRY—REQUEST FOR COPY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): At the same time as he is making his inquiries, can the Leader of the Government also obtain a copy of the study from the minister? This is a report of a federal steering committee which examined government regulations in the grains and oilseeds industry. Apparently they have made a number of recommendations, one of them being in this direction. Can we be provided with a copy of that study?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): There again, honourable senators, I shall make inquiries.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

THE CONSTITUTION

ADOPTION OF NEW BRUNSWICK RESOLUTION OF AMENDMENT ON LINGUISTIC DUALITY

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I may take a moment to discuss some business to come before us, there were questions raised yesterday, notably by Senator Thériault, about the resolution to amend the Constitution concerning the two linguistic communities in New Brunswick.

I have been told this morning that the house leaders in the other place seem to have arrived at an agreement under which they would expedite the passage of that resolution in the other place, and that we might expect passage as early as this afternoon.

I simply rise for the purpose of alerting honourable senators that it appears we will be receiving the notice on that matter soon, and that the Deputy Leader of the Government will be in touch with us for the purpose of arranging debate on that resolution in this place, in the hope of having it passed before the Christmas recess.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Would the Leader of the Government accept a question on this issue? I think he knows how I feel about such matters, but Ms Coyne says that she and her friends intend to challenge this resolution in court. As I understand the Constitution, if such a resolution is not objected to by any other provincial government and is approved by a province and by the federal government, and other provinces agree that it concerns only that one province, that resolution can then pass.

Have third parties, other than provinces and governments, the right to intrude?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have read section 43 of the Constitution. I am not aware that there is a reference to other provinces in that section, nor am I aware of any process such as the honourable senator suggests involving consultation with other provinces.

My very learned advisor, Senator Beaudoin, advises me that there is no such provision in the Constitution.

Senator Gigantès: It does say in article 43, "provisions applicable to certain provinces only." As I understand the challenge from Ms Coyne, it is: "Who says it applies only to this province?" She claims that it probably applies to, and will have an effect on, other provinces.

I ask you and perhaps Senator Beaudoin: Is this a likely outcome? Do such people have a legal leg to stand on to challenge?

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): I do not want to start taking sides, but the section reads as follows:

> 43. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to any provision that applies to one or more, but not all, provinces, including
> (a) any alteration to boundaries between provinces, and
> (b) any amendment to any provision that relates to the use of the English or the French language within a province,
> may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, to reply to the points raised by Senator Gigantès, I have also read the media articles and the statements attributed to Ms Coyne. The Government of Canada is satisfied with the soundness of its legal and constitutional position in respect of this resolution, and we will proceed with it.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, on the same question, could the Leader of the Government tell us whether we are not sneaking in the back door, bit by bit, what the people of Canada rejected through the front door on October 26?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there are two points I should make in relation to that question. Discussions between the government of New Brunswick and the government of Canada regarding this particular provision predate the Charlottetown accord by quite a few years. Once the Charlottetown accord was agreed to by the first ministers, Premier McKenna asked whether this provision, relating as it does only to New Brunswick, could be included, recognizing that for the provision to be effective it required only the action of the Parliament of Canada and the legislature of New Brunswick. Mr. Clark and the Prime Minister acceded to that request.

Second, it is worth pointing out, if the honourable senator wants to make an issue of the referendum, that New Brunswick voted "yes".

Senator Bonnell: But Canada voted "no".

Senator Murray: This amendment relates only to New Brunswick.

Senator Bonnell: There are a lot of other things in the Charlottetown accord that the people of seven provinces with over 50 per cent of the population agreed to. Will those provinces all be coming in now with separate resolutions and have those resolutions passed?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my recollection is that seven provinces did not vote "yes".

Senator Olson: Six provinces voted "no".

Senator Bonnell: I did not say they voted "yes" on the referendum. I said that they would agree on certain issues contained in it. They did not vote on this matter in the referendum, but it is now coming in through the back door. These other things might come in through the back door as well.

Would you bring them all in now so that we can get them all in one resolution?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there is no point in repeating myself. The agreement on this matter between Ottawa and Fredericton predates the Charlottetown agreement and was added to it for the purpose of legislative convenience. The government and legislature of New Brunswick have overwhelmingly passed this resolution to amend the Constitution. It relates only to that province, in the same fashion as a constitutional amendment brought in here five or six years ago by Senator Doody to amend the terms of union with Newfoundland in respect of their confessional school system related only to that province.

I believe that we are on very solid ground, legally, constitutionally and politically, in proceeding. If the honourable senator wishes to speak and vote against it, he will have that opportunity before Christmas.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

AMENDMENTS TO CONSTITUTION RELATING TO FIXED LINK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I wish to ask another question concerning the Constitution.

• (1500)

The other day I noticed in the press that the premiers of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island had sat down, had a little chitchat, and decided that the fixed link could get the go-ahead sometime this week. There is the possibility that the Minister Public Works in Canada would ask the Premier of Prince Edward Island for agreement to remove from the Constitution the section where we are guaranteed a fixed link and guaranteed a continuous communication to the mainland.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on a point of order, Question Period ended some time ago. I suggest that we move on to the next item.

Senator Bonnell: The leader had an opportunity to speak on this matter. Certainly I should have the opportunity to do the same.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The Honourable Senator Murray, out of courtesy, gave certain information on business coming before the house, and that should not be taken advantage of in order to prolong Question Period.

Senator Bonnell: I am not prolonging Question Period. I am asking a question concerning the Constitution, a matter which he raised.

If Joe Ghiz, the Premier of Prince Edward Island, and the Government of Canada agree to take out of the Constitution the fact that we are guaranteed a continuous communication link with the mainland, will that happen?

[Senator Bonnell.]

Senator Murray: We are guaranteed a steam service, senator.

Senator Bonnell: Continuous communication with the mainland. It does not say steam.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Hot air.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

BILL TO DISSOLVE OR TERMINATE CERTAIN CORPORATIONS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, for the second reading of Bill C-63, to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I rise to add my protest at the closing of the six learned institutions being erased by Bill C-63.

The Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council, the Law Reform Commission of Canada, the International Centre for Ocean Development, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, the Science Council of Canada, and the Economic Council of Canada are all closed.

I telephoned the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security; it is now an answering machine.

As nearly 1,000 Canadian soldiers anxiously await their dispatch to Somalia on a very difficult mission, the government has shut the door of its learned institute on, quoting from its mandate; ". . . disarmament, defence, and conflict resolution . . ."

As world order increases, this Government of Canada retreats from knowledge, retreats from knowing what it is doing in this increasingly disorderly world. If the government's actions did not have such potential for serious damage, it would be laughable. Look at the other organizations: Economics; employment and immigration; ocean development; science and technology; and law reform.

For many Canadians, we are in a depression—the first since the 1930s. People are sleeping in the streets. There are lineups at food banks. "Food bank" is just another phrase for a soup kitchen. Crowds line up at Salvation Army used clothing depots.

Banks in Canada no longer appraise houses when mortgages are renewed because, in so many cases, their internal rules would not allow them to renew the mortgage. They do not want the house, so they do not want to appraise the house. They do not want to use that appraisal as the basis for making the loan because there would be a massive repossession of houses in Canada.

We are living in unprecedented economic times and everyone knows it. Honourable senators, we have all had the experience of talking to our friends, and the phrase "unprecedented economic times" is repeated time and time again.

What does this government do? This government shuts down the Economic Council of Canada, whose overall responsibilities —

Senator Chaput-Rolland: The government fused it; the government did not shut it down.

Senator Stollery: I suggest that you read Bill C-63 because you will find that the Economic Council of Canada has not only been shut down, but any reference to it has been removed from the statutes of Canada. That is the entire purpose of Bill C-63. It was shut down a year ago.

I remind honourable senators that the overall responsibility of the Economic Council of Canada is to act as an independent advisory body, with broad terms of reference to study and report on a wide range of matters relating to medium- and long-term economic development. The council makes an annual review of the country's economic problems and prospects and conducts other studies on its initiative or at the request of the government.

The government has many different ways of avoiding the word "budget", but we have had in this country an interim economic report, which I could only describe as hopefully a short-term report in order to get the government through the next few months without having to acknowledge the reneging on the budget that came out in the spring concerning the deficit, which is increasing massively by the month. The figures are so great,who knows what they will be as the depression continues. The depression is different in different parts of the country, but obviously government revenues have been drastically reduced.

Honourable senators, no government can predict its deficit. As, month by month, the revenues have been reduced, the deficit can only get higher. That in turn affects the rate of borrowing. The rate of borrowing affects interest rates, which ultimately affects people who are trying to pay for their homes.

Now what happens? Because the Economic Council of Canada might have an independent view it has been erased. It has always had an independent view which might not agree with the rigid right-wing approach to government that we have seen over the last number of years. It is incredible, given the economic times we live in, that a government would, in its dying days, abolish one of its major economic advisors. However, that is what this government has done. So we scratch the Economic Council of Canada.

Honourable senators, we now come to the subject of employment and immigration. What do the papers say?

I want to refer to an article in Saturday's Globe and Mail.

> A chill swept downtown office towers across Canada yesterday as the overall unemployment soared to 11.8 per cent and layoffs hit the banking industry, one of the last bastions of job security.

That was Saturday.

What did we read on Friday? One headline in the Toronto Star read "CIBC axes 2500 jobs".

What was the government's response to that besides abolishing the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council?

• (1510)

The other more dramatic act was to abolish unemployment insurance for workers who are dismissed. This was stated in the economic statement that was issued last week. I say "economic statement" because it was claimed not to be a budget; it was an economic statement and much less than a budget. Unemployment insurance for these 2,500 people who are to be axed from the CIBC is now in question. If the newspapers are to be believed, those 2,550 people will presumably be sacked, although that move will, no doubt, be challenged in the courts. The question is: After the ministers statement, do they qualify for unemployment insurance benefits? If I were one of them I would be concerned, as are so many other unemployed people in Canada. The response of the government is, once again, to abolish its main organization which deals with unemployment.

As for immigration, we now have a bill before the Senate which will make it even more difficult for immigrants to come to Canada.

In 1975 and 1976 I was a member of the joint committee on immigration that criss-crossed the country and produced the then new Immigration Act. The establishment of the Canada Employment and Immigration Council was one of the outcomes of that experience. That was one of our first attempts at going across the country to listen to what Canadians had to say about how they saw their country developing from the perspective of immigration. How could we anticipate difficulties?

In those days—and this is part of the unusual situation in which we now find ourselves—the government had input from and strong support in immigrant constituencies. Those of us who at that time were members of Parliament followed the subject of immigration closely because we tended to represent large groups of immigrants, many of whom were not voters but they were residents of our constituencies and we were interested in their problems. This government does not have that kind of support. In fact, at this point it does not have much support of any kind. It certainly does not have immigrant support.

This is a radical, right-wing government whose interest in immigration lies primarily in rich immigrants. That has been one of its problems. Under this government, you can now buy your way into Canada.

The problem with a learned, independent institution like the Canada Employment and Immigration Council is that, even when you stack it with your friends, for example, by having your friends nominated to the board, even right-wing appointees—and, for that matter, all appointees to the board—they suddenly become interested in the subject of employment. They are then critical of the way the government handles unemployment insurance. Then they follow immigration and develop an independent view as to how immigration policy might be formulated, and that sort of thing.

The best thing this government can do is abolish these councils. We are all aware of the phenomenon where appointees to a board start to take an interest in the work of the board. That is what this government fears most, because when appointees start to become interested in not only getting paid but also in the subject-matter before them, they then try to shame the government into doing what is right The only thing to do is to get rid of the council. In other words: Dump the bearer of bad tidings.

This leads to another problem. By not listening to some of the bearers of bad tidings the government gets into even greater difficulty because its popularity then starts to drop in the polls. I do not include my colleagues on the other side of the Senate or members of Parliament, because we all know how members of the House of Commons, and the Senate have been manipulated and used by an increasingly cabinet-type of government. Few individuals in this government tend to rub shoulders with people like themselves when they go home, so that they do not receive any independent views as to what people think of their government. This leads the government into more and more trouble. That is partially the result of abolishing its councils of learned advice.

Who are the first people you get rid of when you get into trouble and you do not want to hear about it? You get rid of anyone with an independent mind. Is that not the nature of man? When you can see that you are less and less popular and you are being criticised by even your own appointees, you get rid of them. Is that not what you do?

Senator Stewart: That is what they do. That is what Machiavelli advised.

Senator Frith: Do not get too harsh with Niccolo!

Senator Stollery: I had forgotten. Remember when Senator Flynn used to sit over there? Senator Flynn must have read Machiavelli a long time ago. Senator Flynn used to get angry with Machiavellian tactics. What would he say now when the government has taken, holus-bolus, Machiavelli's advice and gotten rid of their friends?

Senator Bosa: He would say that he was misunderstood!

● (1520)

Senator Stollery: He was misunderstood.

Senator Gigantès: Are you referring to Machiavelli or to Flynn?

Senator Stollery: If honourable senators start looking down this list of abolished institutions —

Senator Hastings: Disgusting.

[Senator Stollery.]

Senator Stollery: One of my colleagues says it is disgusting. As I read the material to prepare something to say, it became more and more difficult. It is so utterly ridiculous that in a time of depression, the government would abolish the Economic Council of Canada. The country is facing the highest unemployment it has faced in numbers, probably since Confederation. I am sure that during the Depression the actual numbers were not as high as they are today.

The Canadian Council on Employment and Immigration is being abolished at a time when the Minister of Immigration is commenting on the problems of immigration. Everyone is asking, "What has happened since the Cold War has ended? How come since the Cold War has ended the world seems to be in a more chaotic situation than it was when the Cold War was on?" We have more Canadian troops in more countries than at any time, undoubtedly, since the end of World War II. They are in places most Canadians have barely heard of. We now have a battalion heading for Somalia. What happens? The government abolishes the institute that was to deal with these matters, to advise the government and collect information so that there would be some sort of order.

Senator Frith: Maybe it is a death wish.

Senator Stollery: It is a strange affair and, as Senator Frith says, it must be some sort of death wish. It defies logic. This is my twenty-first year in Parliament. It is amazing that I have to stand here and make some kind of sensible observation when the government is abolishing some of its premier institutions. What adds to the amazement is that it is done in the last year of its mandate, after it has had a dramatic loss in the referendum. Its main constitutional proposal was rejected overwhelmingly in the country. Now we have to deal with this sort of thing and with some fairly radical legislation that is to come forward in the next few weeks. One has to ask: "Should a government be doing this in the fifth year of its mandate?" I would argue that it was badly damaged on October 26. What is it at in the polls? It is at the lowest level in Canadian history. I am sure no democracy has ever seen polls so consistently low.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the 15 minutes allotted to the honourable senator has transpired, and he will need leave to continue.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Stollery: Honourable senators, you will notice that I excluded honourable senators from many of these horrible decisions. I will end soon and not try the patience of honourable senators.

I am looking at a "kerfuffle" in moving on to the science council. I have looked at words such as irony, ironic, comic, tragic, ridiculous, stupid and leaves one breathless to describe these acts. When I put them all together I have a "kerfuffle". They do not have the words in my Oxford dictionary to describe this situation.

Senator Corbin: It stinks.

Senator Kenny: How does it translate?

Senator Stollery: "How does it translate", asks Senator Kenny, a shrewd observation. Let us take a look at the Science Council of Canada. We hear this argument for a huge sellout to the multinational drug companies. We are told, honourable senators, that this measure is not being put in place to provide directorships in those same companies for those soon-to-be-defeated cabinet ministers, but to acquire research investment for Canada. This is what we are told. Merck is one of the drug companies. I do like the name of one of the companies, Welcome. "Welcome", they say, "Where is your money? You are in pain, you have some terrible disease, well we will bankrupt you, so it would be better off to die." Welcome.

We are told that we require this drug sellout in order to acquire investment. Mr.Polanyi, the Canadian who won the Nobel prize for science, says, in reference to the closing down of the science council, "the King of Babylon, who had a Royal Astronomer on staff, had more scientific advice than Prime Minister Mulroney will now get." He went on to say that the government is shooting itself in the head by killing the Science Council of Canada. It is terrible.

I would like to add a small observation. This is not a Conservative government; it is a radical right wing government. There was an article in Saturday's Toronto Star by Thomas Walkom on the unemployment insurance fiasco. I agree with it. He said that this is a government of radical right-wing ideologues, that most of their baggage is not Canadian, but right-wing United States and extremely small-time. I will admit that I have mixed some of my observations with the author's in that statement. I would not want any one to think otherwise.

Senator Frith: To our mutual benefit.

Senator Stollery: Exactly. It crystalized my own thoughts of this government as a radical right-wing government, not a Conservative government. It is very American in many ways.

Have you not noticed, honourable senators, that many of your friends say that this is the most American government that we have had. When you look at the contradiction between the drug bill and abolishing our only science council so that the Prime Minister will not have scientific advice, you are forced to think about Canadian history. Remember the annexationist movement at about the time of Confederation. They were very prominent in the middle of 1850s. I am sure my colleagues from Montreal will know more about it than most of us from Ontario. The English-speaking merchants rioted in Montreal and burned down the Parliament buildings in 1849. The troops had to be called out. It was a terrible disaster. Most of those people were annexationists. They were a mixed group. Annexationism never got any where in Canada until the election of the Mulroney government in 1984.

Senator Cogger: Can we withdraw the leave ?

Senator Frith: Only with leave, which we refuse.

Senator Stollery: The more you listen to your neighbours and friends, the more you are impressed by the fact that they may not know much about Canadian history, but they feel we are being sold out, that the country is being sold out.

• (1530)

That is a major reason for government popularity being at 20 per cent in the polls.

Senator Kenny: It is not that high.

Senator Stollery: The figures are becoming so low it is difficult to follow them.

Honourable senators, the International Centre for Ocean Development has been abolished whilst we are in the midst of a major fishing catastrophe; when the government does not know what is happening on the east coast; and when it is basically employing thousands of fishermen in Newfoundland not to fish. It is said to be the gravest disaster that has happened to the Newfoundland fishery since Newfoundland was discovered 500 years ago. The International Centre for Ocean Development has played an important role in many countries and has worked on hundreds of projects on ocean development.

The Law Reform Commission of Canada has made a tremendous contribution to the development of Canadian law. It has also been abolished.

I will end my few remarks by pointing out to my colleagues that there may be a change of government in the next few months. Who knows? My friends on the other side may not be sitting there for much longer. Senator Murray and Senator Lynch-Staunton may not hold those positions for much longer.

It is unwise and certainly arrogant of the cabinet to take such radical steps with important Canadian institutions that have served Parliament and the governments of Canada well for the past 25 years by presenting a bill to Parliament that abolishes them in the fifth year of a mandate. I suspect the loss of that mandate may well be endorsed by the Canadian electorate in the not too distant future.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would like to speak on the same bill, addressing my remarks to the annexationist party opposite. I would like to talk mainly about the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security.

Thinking on international peace and security is important. One thing we cannot ever do, if we remember the Maginot Line, is leave it to the generals. One major sector of Canadian policy that is rotten is our military policy. We have a great need for people who think in global terms about peace and security to tell us that what we have as armed forces is no longer useful; it is a dinosaur.

Of course, we happen to be the country that has the most generals per 10,000 men. We happen to be the country that has more corporals than soldiers, more sergeants than corporals. Apart from this absurdity, as the Israelis and others would describe it, we have an armed force that is all tail and no teeth. We have hardly any combatants. We have paper-pushers galore in the Department of Defence. We could put them all out to pasture at an average pension of $30,000 and we would save $10 billion dollars. There would be $10 billion left over.

Alternately, we could change our defence policy and have some 10,000 fierce fighting men like the Special Air Squadron in Britain and get rid of the rest and follow the Israeli view that everybody, the cooks included, should be fighters.

The Economic Council of Canada could have thought about such matters.

We could use defence money to get through the loopholes of the trade agreements that government members have signed, because the Americans have put in nice large defence loopholes. We could do research and call it military research in high-tech fields such as satellites, surveillance through robot planes and over-the-horizon radar. We could conduct the research here, develop it here, fabricate it here and use our own hardware which would also have, by definition—because that is the only hardware we would research—commercial implications.

The generals or the colonels will not think in this manner. Independent thinkers and outsiders are needed to study the conditions and, I dare say, they would not expect divisions of Russians to trample over the polar ice cap followed by tanks to invade Canada. If the Russians did so, perhaps the U.S. would defend us, perhaps not. It is probably more likely to defend us now that it has bought us than it was before.

The point is that we have totally neglected thought and research and, with the passage of this bill, we will be killing what we had. In 1983 the Prime Minister wrote in his book that he wanted to increase research. He stated that the country would sink, would become an Argentina, if we did not pay more attention to research.

Senator Hébert: Mulroney wrote that?

Senator Gigantès: L. Ian Hamilton wrote it for him and Mulroney signed it. L. Ian Hamilton had some good ideas. I wonder if we will see him soon in the Senate.

At the present time we are abolishing independent research in this country as fast as we can. We will leave it to pharmaceutical companies to do our research. The only research they do here is clinical testing. Have they produced a new drug, a new technique, something that has not already been done in the United States? It stands to reason: Why should one of those major drug companies replicate here research that they have already done south of the border because we have some talented researchers? It is cheaper to say to a talented researcher, "Come on south. We can put you in Palo Alto, Denver, or Los Angeles. You will have less snow—an earthquake or a riot from time to time, but we will give you enough money so you can escape it."

Ever since this government came to office, research in Canada has gone down and now the government has abolished the Science Council of Canada and the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security.

[Senator Gigantès.]

The reason the government abolished the Economic Council of Canada is twofold. The principal reason was that its report over the free trade agreement served to expose the free trade agreement as a terribly badly negotiated deal. The Economic Council of Canada conducted a study which the government proudly presented in the House of Commons and here, which stated that, if the free trade agreement did not go into effect over 10 years, Canada would have 10,000 less jobs than it would otherwise have; and if it went through, Canada's employment would decrease at one-tenth of 1 per cent per year.

● (1540)

What they were demonstrating was that the free trade agreement was not worth the paper it was written on, the way it was negotiated. The important thing for us was to get clear definitions of unacceptable subsidies and dumping, and that we did not get. The important thing for the Americans was the right to buy Canadian companies, move the guts of the company south and turn them into warehouses here, and abolish jobs which the Americans got, as well as the right to our resources and equal right to our rights and now the right to our water.

In the institutes now being abolished, there were some independent thinkers who dared say it in a back-handed way. They wrote a damning-with-faint-praise support of the free trade agreement which showed that it was terrible. That is why I think they were abolished.

There is nothing good that is coming out of your government recently. Decency has left you, intelligence has left you, and you do not know how to manage anything. You are business people mainly. Business people these days seem to be falling over one another to demonstrate how badly they manage.

Senator Stewart: They are not the government. They are the people opposite. They are a subcommittee. They are here to give advice and assist.

Senator Hébert: They are a subcommittee of the government.

Senator Gigantès: I am talking of their party and the Prime Minister.

You are the party of the Reichmanns. They used to be a myth a couple years ago. Where are they now? I hear other friends of yours are falling by the wayside. All these brilliant business people are going bankrupt. Why? Because business people only care about making money and do not care about thought. They do not even care, as my friend Senator Peter Stollery said, to have somebody give them a contrary opinion that might save their lives. They have never had that sense, and the country is paying for it now.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, in its budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, the government declared its intention to "eliminate, consolidate, defer or privatize" 46 semi-public agencies, corporations and commissions.

The reasoning behind this was entirely predictable: The government would be able to make a tremendous savings of $22 million per year, enough to build a couple of toy helicopters, I suppose, to entertain the generals' kids. I am of course talking about scale models. On March 10, 1992, Bill C-63 pronounced the death sentence of the first six agencies.

This measure sounded the death knell of several invaluable organizations, including the Canadian Employment and Immigration Advisory Council; the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, which was discussed at length by my colleagues; the Economic Council of Canada; the International Centre for Ocean Development, which Snator MacEachen mentioned yesterday; the Law Reform Commission of Canada; and finally, the Science Council of Canada.

The government believes that by eliminating these agencies, it will be able to scale down its operations, reduce the size of its administration, save money . . . and probably get rid of the deficit! In fact, it is destroying agencies which would otherwise have continued to provide a very important service to the government and the people of this country. Quite frankly, I think the Tories are anxious to privatize in an attempt to silence criticism, if they can, especially criticism coming from the Reform Party.

Most of the agencies the government is winding up provided information, research services and independent advice. Since it could not control the tenor of the comments produced by these agencies, the government decided to silence them altogether, which means more than 300 employees are out of a job. Oh, well, what's 300 more or less, at this rate!

I think there is a glaring contradiction between the government's rhetoric and what it is actually doing. The government wants to make Canada more competitive, but it eliminates important Canadian agencies that provide or used to provide information, analyses, new policies in other words, what we needed to become truly competitive.

If we ignore the government's pedestrian rhetoric, the fact show that these agencies were of tremendous benefit to the Canadian taxpayer.

The contribution made by the Science Council of Canada is particularly revealing. It recommended creating a Canadian Space Agency; made Canadians aware of the benefits of recycling; published reports on perennial agriculture, water resources, biotechnology for cold regions; and so forth.

Unfortunately, now that the Science Council has been eliminated, Canada no longer has a national agency responsible for analysing policies on science and technology from an independent point of view.

To quote Professor John Polanyi, the Nobel Prize winner for chemistry in 1986, when he appeared before the legislative committee of the House of Commons:

> "The money being saved (by terminating the Science Council), if my information is correct, is about $3 million per annum, which sounds like a lot of money but is a trivial sum compared to the cost of one technological error."

Of course we cannot expect a Tory government to understand the language of a Nobel Prize winner.

The termination of the Science Council has silenced a very respected agency which cast an impartial eye on the less than brilliant record of the Tory government in the field of science and technology. By claiming that the National Advisory Committee on Science and Technology, chaired by the Prime Minister—lacking a Nobel Prize, they had to make do—can take over the functions of the Council, the government admits it does not want an impartial analysis of its science policies.

The Economic Council of Canada is another important agency which Bill C-63 is eliminating. Founded in 1963, it has published reports and made countless recommendations on productivity, competitiveness, education, health, reconversion and, more recently, the economic consequences of Quebec's separation.

Because government was in big trouble in most areas and because this agency had the guts of telling this government it had no clothes, government decided to silence the opposition instead of getting dressed.

Now, who could deny the important role played by the Law reform Commission? Since its creation in 1970, this agency has put out 32 reports, 61 working papers and 76 studies containing recommendations covering Criminal Code reform, hate propaganda, plea bargaining, safeguarding genetic heritage, pornography, euthanasia, sexual assault, arson, mental illness and so on. As of 1990, Law Reform Commission studies have been quoted in 221 Canadian court decisions, 39 of which were in decisions by the Supreme Court of Canada. Obviously, we do not need all that. It is somewhat superfluous!

They dare say that the impact on the people of Canada will be minimal. This organization certainly gave value for the money. It was indeed vital to our judicial system and served all Canadians. What will happen as a result of the dissolution of this agency? There will no longer be studies relating to human rights, the protection of life and administrative law. A vacuum will have been created, a vacuum where this government feels totally at home, in its element.

By eliminating this agency, the Minister of Justice is trying to silence its most vocal critic since 1990. As a matter of fact, that is why Mrs. Campbell has left the Law Reform Commission without a quorum for two years, which has made it impossible for the commission to approve any reports that would have suggested changes to federal legislation. Basically, the Commission was paralysed for two years before it was finally shut down.

The journalist Stephen Bindman says that, with the proposed elimination of the Law Reform Commission of Canada, we will become one of only three Commonwealth countries without an independent law reform body, the other two being Bangladesh and Zimbabwe.

[English]

Moreover, as my honourable colleague Senator MacEachen said yesterday and Senator Gigantès spoke about so eloquently a moment ago, it is indeed a matter of regret that Bill C-63 provides for the dissolution of the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security. Among its numerous contributions, this institute had established a research and information library; developed a school education curriculum program; supported Canadian scholars; and, in general, developed a first-class centre of peace and security offering a Canadian perspective at a time when the world is most turbulent and Canadian governments need up-to-date information.

The Conservative government's elimination of this agency dealt a death blow to serious analysis in Canada of contemporary world events. In fact, this institution played an extremely important role by providing comprehensive analysis and alternative policies to government, Parliament and any agency concerned with foreign affairs. Since the agency was relegated to the ashcan of history by the Tories, Canada no longer receives its invaluable input.

As a result of Bill C-63, Canada will also be deprived of the following benefits: The science council's five-year plan to influence the direction of science and technology for Canadian prosperity and well-being, as well as its studies related to the relationship between technology and local economic development, genetics in health care, and the role of venture capital in financing new technology.

In addition, the findings of the following studies conducted by the Economic Council of Canada will not be released: The Economics of Health Care, The Economics of Education, and an analysis of the effect of government on competitiveness. As well, the Law Reform Commission's "recodification" of the Criminal Code of Canada will cease.

In devising this incredibly short-sighted legislation, the government has failed to indicate clearly who will assume the role these agencies were playing. Accordingly, it is unacceptable for the government to say that Canada can rely on other foreign or domestic organizations for strategic information in the areas of research and development, science, peace and security, et cetera.

An excellent example of the utter ridiculousness of the situation created by the Tory government was provided by a witness who appeared before the Commons legislative committee. Mike McCracken of Informetrica informed the committee that other G-7 countries tend to have agencies which are similar to the Economic Council of Canada. Japan has its Economic Research Centre. The United States has the Council of Economic Advisers and the Brookings Institute. The U.K. has its National Economic Development Council. The point was brought home when Mr. McCracken underlined that Uganda could function without such agencies.

In fact, countless witnesses who appeared before the Commons committee indicated that the agencies sent to the scaffold by Bill C-63 served a valuable purpose. The government has claimed that it was dispensing with these agencies to increase efficiency. I fail to understand how it can become more efficient by eliminating agencies that provide it with an objective analysis of numerous problems affecting Canada.

The Tory government alleges that the work performed by these agencies overlaps with that of other non-governmental organizations. However, in its frenzy to privatize everything in sight, the government has failed to provide examples of the overlap. Therefore, we are unable to judge objectively just how much overlap there is. I believe the record shows that these agencies played important roles, and I suspect that the allegation of overlapping is nothing more than a canard and a red herring.

The facts confirm that every one of these agencies has facilitated the decision-making process for governments. I believe that the Liberal privatization critic, Mr. Derek Lee, summed it up eloquently in the House of Commons last November 26 during the debate on this bill, when he said:

> Drawing an analogy between government and a ship at sea, if I were the captain of a ship, I do not know why I would throw my most effective navigator overboard. I would want a navigator on my ship who was not going to say "yes" to me just because I was the captain. I would want a navigator who would tell me if I was steering a wrong course, and do it boldly and objectively.

By scrapping the Economic Council of Canada, the Science Council of Canada, the Law Reform Commission, the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security, and all the others, the government runs the risk of running aground.

Bill C-63 confirms that the government has grown so tired and cynical that it no longer wishes to heed the advice of objective navigators. All it needs is its own advice. It needs "yes" men. It needs Conservative senators.

We certainly have to ask ourselves what is the underlying philosophy of a government which withdraws the funding from independent institutions all over the country. Unfortunately, time does not permit me to discuss all the implications of Bill C-63. Of one thing I am certain: This measure will undermine seriously the foundation of Canada, as well as undercut its ability to devise innovative solutions to problems created by a rapidly changing world.

In addition, the Conservative government is putting Canada in a position of great weakness. By sending these important organizations to the scaffold, the government is deliberately thrashing the intellectual power and the intellectual capital that they represented and were able to produce on behalf of and for the benefit of present and future generations of Canadians.

[Translation]

If the Conservative senators approve this legislation, under gentle pressure from Harvie Andre, history will judge them harshly. Once again, unfortunately for us, they will have expressed their instinctive, almost sick fear of new ideas and free thinking.

Hon. Jean-Marie Simard: What do you mean "new ideas"?

Senator Hébert: The expression new ideas worries senator Simard. Thank you, honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Crafstein, debate adjourned.

PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYMENT ACT

PUBLIC SERVICE STAFF RELATIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bolduc, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rossiter, for the second reading of Bill C-26, to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other Acts in relation to the public service.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, what is the wrong that this bill seeks to right? What evil does it seek to root out? It seems to be the merit principle in the public service.

• (1600)

At least that seems to be its central target, that hard-fought, finally hard-won, principle: Merit versus patronage in the public service.

How does this bill affect that principle? It seems to drive a stake into its heart. The merit principle distinguishes a public service whose central canons and principles are impartiality and commitment to excellence, from one that can easily be ruled by partisanship and mediocrity through patronage.

The ninth edition of Webster's dictionary, which I choose over Oxford because I will make a brief reference to U.S. history in a moment, defines the word "merit" as "to be worthy or entitled or liable to". Extrapolating from this definition, Webster's dictionary goes on to define the merit system as a system by which appointments and promotion in the civil service are based on competence rather than political favouritism.

Some years ago, I ran across a book called Plunkitt of Tammany Hall. It is not now widely read, but it is deeply rooted in our political literature. To give you the context, Plunkitt was the head of Tammany Hall, and he adopted the habit of dealing with constituents in a place other than his office. There is a picture of him here which is captioned:

> Ex-Senator George Washington Plunkitt, on his rostrum, the New York County Court-house bootblack stand.

A man by the name of William L. Riordon, who at the time was a reporter for the New York Times, went by and heard him as he used to give little pronouncements on various subjects.

Reading from the preface:

> This volume discloses the mental operations of perhaps the most thoroughly practical politician of the day—George Washington Plunkitt, Tammany leader of the Fifteenth Assembly District, Sachem of the Tammany Society and Chairman of the Elections Committee of Tammany Hall, who has held the offices of State Senator, Assemblyman, Police Magistrate, County Supervisor and Alderman and who boasts of his record in filling four public offices in one year and drawing salaries from three of them at the same time.

His little essays were reported duly by Mr. Riordon in the Saturday Evening Post of the time and in the New York Times, and then put into this book. His subjects were diverse and were all on political subjects. The first one here is "Honest Graft and Dishonest Graft". The second one is, "How To Become a Statesman".

The one that is of interest to us is called, "The Curse of Civil Service Reform". Mr. Plunkitt of Tammany Hall was against the merit principle, just as this bill appears to be. He felt that the merit principle was a great fraud and a great attack on democracy.

After the merit principle had been established in New York, he says:

> . . . Just look at things in this city to-day. There are ten thousand good offices, but we can't get at more than a few hundred of them. How are we goin' to provide for the thousands of men who worked for the Tammany ticket? It can't be done. These men were full of patriotism a short time ago. They expected to be servin' their city, but when we tell them that we can't place them, do you think their patriotism is goin' to last? Not much. They say: "What's the use of workin' for your country anyhow? There's nothin' in the game.". . .

He goes on to say that there is nothing left for them to do but to become anarchists.

> That ain't no exaggeration. I have good reason for sayin' that most of the Anarchists in this city today are men who ran up against civil service examinations. Isn't it enough to make a man sour on his country . . .

This is Mr. Plunkitt's attack on the merit system, like the attack that this bill is making.

> Isn't it enough to make a man sour on his country when he wants to serve it and won't be allowed unless he answers a lot of fool questions about the number of cubic inches of water in the Atlantic and the quality of sand in the Sahara Desert? There was once a bright young man in > my district who tackled one of these examinations. The next I heard of him, he had settled down Herr Most's Saloon smokin' and drinkin' beer and talkin' socialism all day. Before that time he had never drank anything but whisky. I knew what was comin' when a young Irishman drops whiskey and takes to beer and long pipes in a German saloon. That young man is to-day one of the wildest Anarchists in town. And just to think! He might be a patriot but for that cussed civil service.

Because the principle of merit, as the central principle of the public service, is such an important one dating back to the beginning of this century, we will look at it in three perspectives: The history of the merit principle and how it developed over the past 80 years; how that principle is affected by Bill C-26; and finally some problems that should be particularly scrutinized by the committee assigned the bill.

First, on the history of the merit principle, the existence of the civil service, now called the public service in Canada, dates to the mid-1800s. Throughout the rest of that century and into the next, reform of the civil service was often a favourite topic of discussion in the public sector. We see a certain parallelism here between the growth and the flourishing of the merit principle in the United States and in Canadian history.

We find today that not much has changed. In fact, many reforms were under way in the United Kingdom in the 19th century which fuelled discussion for reform here.

However, it was not until amendments were made to the Civil Service Act in 1908 that substantial reform was achieved. Until that time, the civil service was commonly staffed by patronage appointments, just as described by Senator Plunkitt of Tammany Hall. Most of the jobs, to use Senator Plunkitt's words, could "be got at" by way of patronage.

Most of the suggested reforms centred around patronage. In fact, the amendments in 1908 could be said to be the first set of reforms initiated to combat the problem. Reform was seen to be needed because it was believed the patronage system could not adequately serve the public. It was commonly thought that politically-appointed servants damaged the efficiency and the ability of the public service to perform its functions.

The two main reasons advanced were that the appointments were based on who knew who and that the positions were not necessarily filled by superior or even qualified candidates. Second, appointees were thought to have sentiments of loyalty to whoever appointed them, affecting the functioning of the public service if the party in power was not the one which had made the appointment.

At this point, it is worthwhile underlining a parallel analysis because this bill may lead to a new form of patronage, in addition to the one dealt with by these earlier reforms; a form of patronage within the public service where the deputy or the departmental head, the bosses in each area, will be the ones dispensing the patronage. This is a very interesting recycling of the principle of patronage.

[Senator Frith.]

Speaking on debate at second reading of the 1908 Civil Service Act amendment bill, the honourable Sidney Fisher, the minister responsible for the bill, pointed to the importance of the public service in the country, which was being threatened by the two reasons I have just given.

● (1610)

He said:

> People hardly realize what a very important part in the government of the country is played by the civil service —by the men who are permanent in office under the government, and who consequently are continually employed in the transaction of public business.

We will see how this bill changes that principle, not in the context used there, that is, the direct context of the elected persons interfering by way of patronage, but within the public service patronage system.

He continued:

> The governments and individual ministers may change, our party may come in and another go out, but the civil service is practically a permanent staff of men engaged in the daily administration of the government system.

That was, of course, the ideal. The fact that the civil service would be running the daily affairs of the country, regardless of which party was in power, argued strongly for a permanent and neutral public service.

Lord Dufferin recommended appointing only those to the civil service who had particular qualifications required in that service. Quoted by Mr. Fisher, Lord Dufferin advised that the civil service remain free of political suasion. This is what he had to say:

> It is necessary that the civil service should be given a status regulated by their requirements, their personal qualifications, their capacity for rendering the country efficient service, and that neither their original appointment nor their subsequent advancement should in any way depend upon their political connections or opinions.

We can read the word "political" in this bill as a small "p" political.

The quotation continues as follows:

> If you take my advice, you will never allow your civil service to be degraded into an instrument to subserve the ends and interests of any political party . . .

The amendments made to the Civil Service Act in 1908 would establish a Civil Service Commission now known as the Public Service Commission. The Commission was authorized to hold open and competitive examinations for entrance into the civil service and to test qualifications of candidates for promotion in the civil service, a role which could be called the watch-dog of the merit principle. Before the bill would pass Mr. Fisher predicted that the reforms of 1908 would have the following effect on the civil service.

He said:

> In the beginning, a man was in the public service because a corrupt and arbitrary king wished him there; at the end, he was in that service because a fair test of his work gave him the place, as the best man to fill it.

That role of corrupt and arbitrary king can be extended to political parties, political officials and, as we will see, could be extended to heads of departments in the public service.

Although the Civil Service Act of 1918 further entrenched the merit principle, it did not include a precise definition of that principle. It did, however, include a description of the mechanics of the merit system. The principle itself seems to have been taken for granted.

Moving ahead to more recent history, the Public Service Employment Act was passed in 1967. The cornerstone of the act, as with earlier versions of the Civil Service Act, is the merit principle. It created the Public Service Commission and gave it the specific mandate to ensure that hiring and firing in the Public Service was based on merit.

The Honourable E.J. Benson, speaking on behalf of the government, explained the importance of the bill.

He said, succinctly:

> We are satisfied that without the merit principle both the public service and the people of Canada would be less well served than they now are.

Furthermore, the Honourable R.A. Bell, who is well known to some in this house, then the Conservative member for Carleton, also expressed the importance of the merit principle when he said:

> With the increasing involvement of government in every aspect of the daily life of the individual, the public service must be composed, I submit, of the very best—not the second best but the very best—and ablest of our young Canadians recruited for service to their nation.

As we can see, the merit principle, the idea that people are awarded positions of employment in the public service on the basis of qualifications and ability, goes back a very long way. The reasons for supporting the merit principle remain the same today as they were in the late 1800s and early 1900s, that is, it ensures an able public service, free from the constraints of political loyalty or internal internecine and other machinations, to serve the Canadian public in the best manner possible.

Two main sections of the bill greatly affect appointment by merit. The first is dealt with in clause 10 of the bill which affects section 10 of the Public Service Employment Act. The second is the issue of deployment. Section 10 of the Public Service Employment Act forms the heart of the merit principle as it stands in the public service today. It reads:

Appointments and Selection Standards

> Appointments to or from within the Public Service shall be based on selection according to merit—

That is the law.

> — as determined by the Commission, and shall be made by the Commission, at the request of the deputy head concerned, by competition or by such other process of personnel selection designed to establish the merit of candidates as the Commission considers is in the best interests of the Public Service.

I emphasize that is a very important role for the commission.

Section 10, as I have just read it, makes it very clear that the section is to be based on merit and the best candidates will be the ones to win competitions and employment. Clause 10 of Bill C-26 before us, proposes to change section 10 of the act by adding a new subsection, namely, subsection 10 (2), which I will read. Bear in mind that the present section 10 guarantees that the deputy head asks the commission to find the best person for the job.

We now propose to add to that:

> (2) For the purposes of subsection (1), selection according to merit may, in the circumstances prescribed by the regulations of the Commission, be based on the competence of a person being considered for appointment as measured by such standard of competence as the Commission may establish, rather than as measured against the competence of other persons.

● (1620)

Understand what that means. I placed the emphasis on the last part of that subsection:

> . . . as measured by such standard of competence as the Commission may establish, rather than as measured against the competence of other persons.

[Translation]

I point this out because today, employees get a position because they happen to be the most competent candidate. If Bill C-26 is passed in its present form, they will be appointed because they meet the requirements, whether they happen to be the best candidate or not. This means it will be unnecessary to select the best candidate and that you can appoint any candidate who happens to meet the requirements. There is no longer any guarantee that the most competent candidates will be selected to fill positions in the public service.

This goes against what Mr. R.A. Bell said about the need to staff the public service with the best possible candidates and I quote;

> ". . . not the second best but the very best."

It even seems to go against the very foundations of the merit principle in the public service, which include guaranteeing Canadians the best possible level of service. We must not forget that our public administration is supposed to exist to serve Canadians. The role of the public service is to serve the public, not only by dealing with the public directly but also by implementing public policy.

By making it possible to select candidates who are second best, aren't we sending a message to the Canadian public that it only deserves second-class service? The new standard set for the Canadian public service is a dangerous one because it radically changes the foundations of the present system and may engender a system not governed by excellence but by mediocrity.

One wonders the purpose of these changes. What does the government hope to achieve with such fundamental changes in the merit principle? After stating that he continues to believe in this principle, Mr. Loiselle, the Minister, recommends getting rid of it.

The bill claims that this revised merit principle will give managers more flexibility in staffing matters. There is no doubt about that. That was exactly the philosophy of Mr. Plunkitt of Tammany Hall. Suppose a deputy head at the Department of Justice wants to fill a vacancy in his office. The Public Service Commission will publish a notice of competition indicating the qualifications: a law degree plus three years of experience in environmental law, for instance, and other eligibility criteria.

Once the competition is posted, suppose 20 candidates applied, including a friend or friends of the deputy head, the Minister or the Prime Minister who happened to hear about the position. Since this person has a law degree and three years of experience, the deputy head can offer him the position, whether or not he happens to be the best of the lot.

[English

Currently, employees earn their job by being the best qualified candidate because they compete against other candidates. If Bill C-26 passes as it currently reads, employees will earn their job by being qualified, whether or not they are the best by that process. The effect of this sentence is to say that no longer must the best candidate be appointed, but any qualified candidate; not the best qualified candidate, but any qualified candidate out of a group of similarly qualified candidates may be appointed. Any one of them may be appointed. There is no longer a guarantee that positions within the public service will be filled by the most qualified candidates.

When asked about the intention behind the changes to section 10 of the Public Service Employment Act, the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Loiselle, speaking on Bill C-26 in the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of Legislative Committee H, Issue No. 2, March 10, 1992, answered as follows:

> Inasmuch as you have selected somebody on merit, he should be allowed to proceed with his work. Each time you give him an assignment you should not test him again.
> If there is a real merit principle and people have been found to be able to perform at a certain level, you must not ask them each time they change their performance to something similar in the next office to go through a huge process again.

[Senator Frith.]

He says that is a denigration of the merit principle.

> If somebody is capable of functioning, let them function. Allow them a chance to try new experiences, to widen their scope, to diversify their activity. Don't keep them prisoner of a particular sector because of a process.

This statement refers to those already employed in the public service. Therefore, once you get in, you can progress to other positions, whether or not you are qualified or the best person for the job, because you will not be going through the "merit test" again.

However, as we have seen, the merit principle will not only be sacrificed in the case of persons already employed in the public service. It will also be sacrificed in the recruitment process.

The merit principle seems to be working well until now. The Canadian public service is said to be second to none. As for the difficulties, listen to this. Ninety-five per cent of all staffing decisions, all made pursuant to the merit principle, are not appealed. One of the justifications given is that there is so much latitude given in the application of the merit principle for people to appeal, that they cannot be hammered into positions, because they appeal and they slow down the whole process. Well, 95 per cent of all staffing decisions, all made pursuant to the merit principle, are not appealed. Why then, if there seems to be no problem with the merit system of staffing, is the government changing the process?

We heard Senator Bolduc say on Thursday last that ". . . merit through competition will remain the general basis for recruitment into the public service and promotion within it." Perhaps it would have been useful for Senator Bolduc to define what he perceives "merit" to be.

The generally perceived definition of "merit", for the most part of this century, has been that the "best" qualified candidate gets the job and gets it in comparison to other applicants, not disassociated from other applicants for the job, as subsection 2 will provide.

Section 10(2) of Bill C-26 redefines merit to be that of any qualified candidate getting the job; not the most qualified or the best of those who are qualified.

We really must examine whether we want to change the definition of the merit principle which has served us so well over the past 70 years.

The only defence the government has been able to offer is that flexibility will be easier to achieve. We must ask ourselves if this increased flexibility in the hands of senior public servants and the government is worth sacrificing the merit principle and first-rate employees in the public service because flexibility, of course, is exactly what Mr. Plunkitt of Tammany Hall wanted. He wanted full flexibility to fill these positions. As he said, there are 10,000 jobs, and we can only get at a few hundred of them. So he wanted more flexibility, which is apparently the justification for this bill.

Although the minister and his government have given their assurances that the merit principle will not be undermined by this bill —

Senator Gigantès: Another sacred trust.

Senator Frith: And we know how sacred that is.

They also say that there is no need for the best-qualified candidates. Is that the reason we are destroying the merit principle?

One section of the bill deals with deployment, which we also must think about. The section I just discussed deals with new entrants to the public service. Deployment deals with those already working within the public service. Deployment is what was previously known as "Transfer Exclusion Approval Orders". I am suspicious of anything with a name such as that. It must be trying to hide something. Perhaps not.

• (1630)

A transfer exclusion order was meant to facilitate the deployment of employees transferring from one position to another, either within the same category or group or into a lower category or group; for example, transferring a senior analyst from the Department of Health and Welfare to a senior analyst position in the Department of Finance. Under the Public Service Employment Act, such transfers are not currently permitted but will be under Bill C-26.

Where we find that this runs against the merit principle is that the transfers can be made without regard to qualifications and without regard to other possible candidates. The transfers are made by the deputy head. You might have wanted that other job, but this bill allows the deputy head to make these transfers.

Under Bill C-26, a deputy head within the public service will have the exclusive right and authority to make deployments. The employee being deployed must give consent to the deployment. However, if the employee accepts the transfer and then subsequently feels there has been an abuse of authority, there is no recourse other than to complain to the deputy head. And who is the deputy head? The very one to make the deployment!

To use the court analogy, the court gives you a decision and you then appeal back to that court, asking it to change its mind.

Deployment with consent does not seem to cause any problems. If any employee gives consent to being deployed to Vegreville, that is fine. However, there is some concern that deployment clauses will be written into contracts and job descriptions in the future, effectively taking away the consent requirement. For example: It is put in the contract or the description of the job. The person accepts that and they say, "You have already given your consent." The clause about deployment is in the job description and then you say, "I do not want to move to Vegreville. You have to have my consent." But they say, "We already have your consent. It was in the job description when you came into the department."

Job descriptions are reviewed every two years. Even though an employee does not have a deployment clause in his or her contract now, such a clause may be added once it comes up for review. That forfeits the guarantee in the bill.

Also, for new employees, will a deployment clause be written into the contract, leaving no room for the new employee to say whether or not he or she would agree to being deployed?

The government claims that the objective of the deployment is to give managers more flexibility to staff positions quickly and promote career development. However, deployment really gives managers more room to appoint their favourites, the favourites of their superiors, the government's own chosen, without regard to the merit principle. That is important, because it is without regard to the merit principle and without providing the employees with an opportunity to appeal. I repeat, "without providing the employees with an opportunity to appeal".

The Federal Court of Canada agrees that deployment runs against the merit principle. It is not just me who thinks that way. It handed down a decision in January 1992 in a case between the Public Service Alliance and the Public Service Commission on transfer exclusion orders, a fancy name for these transfers, which today are called deployments. The court maintained that the transfer exclusion order:

> . . . would permit the Commission to transfer a Public Servant from one job to another in a different Department, without having been determined to be the "best qualified" for the job.

As long as the Commission could find someone who was "qualified". Remember that it just has to be a "degree", or whatever it might be. No thought had to be given as to whether they were the best qualified. According to Judge Rouleau, whom I just quoted, the Commission:

> . . . has always maintained that sections 10 and 21 cannot easily be avoided, since these provisions were specifically legislated for the protection of Public Servants and for the promotion and maintenance of the merit principle.

In the action by the Public Service Alliance, Judge Rouleau also said that if he were to dismiss the action he would be "defeating the whole purpose and object of the Public Service Employment Act which is to ensure that appointments to the Public Service are made on the basis of merit."

This is not just some fanciful idea I have that the merit principle is attacked; that a stake is being driven into the heart of the merit principle by this legislation.

Since the government could no longer allow such transfers to take place following the discussion of the Federal Court, they decided to change the law with Bill C-26.

While the government promises it will not use deployment to promote employees, it could use deployment to move favoured employees to favoured positions, including putting them in a position for promotion without regard to merit.

Senator Gigantès: Tories could not rise with the merit principle applied.

Senator Murray: That is the way the Liberals ran the merit principle.

Senator Frith: I am sure that has also been noted.

When Senator Bolduc spoke to the bill on December 3, he spoke of the categories of employees within the public service. He said that there are about 4,000 top managers; 25,000 professionals; 60,000 people in administration and middle management; 60,000 clerical employees; and about 25,000 technicians.

If I understand Senator Bolduc correctly, there will be fewer levels within these broad categories. If this is true, the power to deploy, which rests in the hands of the deputy head, will be a significant one because he or she will be able to move many more people within categories and levels to new jobs since the categories and levels will be larger than they currently are.

On the one hand, the government is assuring us that this power to deploy can only be used to move people within the same level, while on the other hand they are expanding the levels so they can move many people to many different jobs. Deployment is a great power being given to the hands of senior public servants.

Life in the public service, when this has been passed, will be much closer to life in the military where you do as you are told and the appeals are few when it comes to career choices.

Finally, there is the third of three parts. The focus of my intervention has been the merit principle and how it will be affected by Bill C-26. There were a number of amendments proposed in the other place which would go a long way to preserving the merit principle, both with respect to clause 10 of the bill and section 10 of this bill, which clearly establishes the merit principle; the amendment with the addition of subsection 2, which changes its effect; and deployment, which I have just dealt with.

In the committee in the other place Marlene Catterall proposed that section 10 be amended to ensure that only the best-qualified candidates be appointed to the Public Service. I keep having to harp on those words. We have to underline the difference between a qualified candidate and the best of the qualified candidates. She also proposed that clause 22, dealing with deployment, be amended to subject deployment to the merit principle. That is why our theme has been the merit principle. I recommend that the committee examine these and other amendments in light of Mr. Loiselle's comments about the merit principle. He assured Mary Clancy, who had expressed concern for the merit principle in the other place, that the merit principle would remain intact. He said:

● (1640)

> Mr. Speaker, I hasten to reassure the hon. member since she makes such a fuss about this that the merit principle is not disappearing. Let her rest assured that the best qualified person will continue to apply on recruitment and promotion.

That is notwithstanding what we found in our examination and what a judge of the Federal Court found in the case to which I referred. I urge the committee to look at that matter.

As Mr. Ed Halayko of the Armed Forces Pensioners Annuitants Association points out, we had heard similar guarantees made by the President of the Treasury Board when we were debating Bill C-55. The minister promised he would not use the authority contained in Bill C-55 to make regressive changes.

In a letter written to me on November 6, 1992, Mr. Halayko quotes Mr. Loiselle:

> . . . it can be difficult to secure time on a busy legislative agenda to effect statutory change. The regulatory process is quicker and more flexible and allows for more timely respond to changing needs . . .

Mr. Halayk then goes to say about Bill C-55:

> Now that the bill has passed we do not really expect the government to honour its promises.

I think the people expect the government to honour its promises and the committee had better see that those promises are put on the record. Yet, we hear what those concerned with Bill C-55, the Armed Forces Pensioners Annuitants Association, found on that bill.

I venture to say that not many Canadians have any reason to expect this government to honour its promise given its record.

Mr. Loiselle also expressed that the purpose of the public service is to provide the best possible service to Canadians and again reassured us that the merit principle will continue to apply. He said:

> Merit, that is the selection of the best qualified person, will continue to apply on recruitment and on promotion. One must not forget that merit has never been an absolute concept.

Now we see it qualified.

> It has adapted to the various circumstances and social conditions throughout the years.

As Mr. Plunkitt had hoped for.

> For example, priority for appointment is given to persons facing lay-off. This is not merit. Preference is given to veterans. This is not merit. Canadian citizens, in certain instances and local residents are given preference. This is not merit. Therefore, it has never been absolute.

Here we go now with the qualifying examples. According to Mr. Loiselle, the merit principle will continue to apply but it is not absolute; merit when the boss thinks necessary but not necessarily merit. Perhaps we should ask the minister to come to the committee to clarify what he means by that statement. In what other circumstances will the government put aside the merit principle? Does the fact that it is not absolute mean the government will abrogate it through changes to section 10 and by allowing deployment, whenever it pleases. If not, what safeguards are there in the bill to ensure that it will not happen?

There are other issues in this bill which the committee should carefully study. Contracting out, which came up earlier, is a significant issue in this bill. The government has been increasingly contracting out service without so much as establishing that it is cost effective, although they say it is. Bill C-26 not only sanctions contracting out, but will allow managers to layoff employees because their work has been contracted out to the private sector. You are doing a job, you get laid off in order for there to be a contracting out.

This provision along with Mr. Mazankowski's wage freeze for the public service announced on December 2, will do great damage to the morale of public servants and leave them either scrambling to find a new job or begging to keep their present one. That warrants closer attention.

There is one other point. It has come up as a thread through what we have been finding in our examination of this bill; the Public Service Commission as an independent body advising the deputy head and finding the best person for the job. Concerns have been expressed that the Public Service Commission's role as an independent parliamentary agency will be jeopardized by Bill C-26. The committee should examine what the new role of the Clerk of the Privy Council, as the head of the public service, will mean to the commission. Will the PSC now be required to report to the Glen Shortliffe, instead of to Parliament? Will it do the bidding of Mr. Shortliffe instead of acting on its own accord, as an independent body. We should invite union representatives to appear before the committee. They will be able to isolate these issues and expand on the day-to-day effect the changes will have on their members.

The merit principle has been central to the functioning of our public service for over 70 years. This bill would damage the merit principle as it exists today. We owe it to Canadians to carefully scrutinize the legislation in committee in order to determine why the government believes that increased flexibility, the very thing that Mr. Plunkitt of Tamminy Hall wanted, in staffing decisions warrants the wholesale destruction of the merit principle. The principle has excellence and not mediocrity as its objective.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if Hon. Senator Bolduc speaks now, his speech will close the debate.

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Remember that he is a former deputy minister.

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I would just like to speak on two points. First, Senator Frith, the Leader of the Opposition, said that clause 10(2) could possibly lead to non-competitive situations; that is, there would be no competitive exam for selecting people.

He forgot to tell us that this will only be done under the regulations of the Public Service Commission. Therefore it will not be at the deputy minister's discretion. It will be according to the Public Service Commission's rules. If the Public Service Commission issues a regulation whereby a selection or appointment can be made in some cases without a competitive exam, ranking the candidates in relation to one another, then the deputy minister can act, but it is not entirely at his discretion.

I want to say that because the Public Service Commission is there precisely to supervise the whole system in order to maintain the merit principle.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): That is something we must look into.

Senator Bolduc: I think it is very important to see that discretion can only be exercised within the regulations set by the Public Service Commission. That was the first point I wanted to raise.

Senator Frith: You agree that we can examine this issue with representatives of the Commission who will testify before the committee.

Senator Bolduc: Secondly, he said that people could be assigned anywhere in the public service. That is true. The present system is too rigid. The other day, I said that we almost had a sort of dual system.

● (1650)

[English]

On one side, we have a merit career system such as that at the Department of External Affairs. I am sure the ex-leader of the opposition is quite familiar with that through his experience with the various foreign affairs classes.

On the other side, we have a specific position plan as it relates to the structure of the classification. They want to take that second aspect and try to élargir les classes in order to have the same situation in other parts of the civil service as exists at the Department of External Affairs. That system is much superior.

I suspect that Treasury Board and the Civil Service Commission want the rest of the civil service to move towards that career system. It will facilitate deployment in the sense that an economic analyst could be taken from a group of economists at the Department of Health and Welfare and moved to the Department of Finance or the Department of External Affairs. Although that is possible in some instances, it is not possible for many classes. Diminishing the number of classes within a category will make it possible to move people to carry out various job assignments. Presently, if a position involves two new, relatively unimportant duties, the applicant has to go through an examination or through the whole staffing process. Last year 300,000 of those individual processes were carried out. It is unbelievable.

Senator Frith: You do not look like Mr. Plunkitt, but you are starting to sound like him. "Flexibility", Mr. Plunkitt said.

Senator Bolduc: I am attempting to steer what I would call administrative discretion and to respect the merit principle. That is what the administration is looking for.

That is why it is a good bill. It is a bill that is far away from Tammany Hall and New York. In fact, it is because of Tammany Hall that there was municipal reform in the United States and after that in Washington and then in Canada.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Bolduc, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cogger, that this bill be read the second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the adoption of the Seventh Report of the Senate Committee of Selection.

Report adopted.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MOTION TO ADOPT REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS CONCERNING DECISION TO SELL RAIL LINE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Oliver, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kinsella for the adoption of the Twelfth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications (decision of Canadian National Railways to sell the main railway line between Truro and Sydney, Nova Scotia), presented in the Senate on 23rd June, 1992.—(Honourable Senator Macdonald, (Cape Breton)).

Hon. John. M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I know that it is rather late in the afternoon. I assure you that I will not take up too much of your time.

Honourable senators may recall that on December 11 last, Senator Graham, seconded by Senator Olson, moved that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be empowered to inquire into and report upon the decision of the Canadian National Railway to sell the main railway line between Truro and Sydney in Nova Scotia.

That motion was carried. In due course, the committee made such a study, a very detailed study. The committee heard many witnesses and received and studied many briefs. It is the motion to adopt the report of that committee which is now before us.

On June 23 last, Senator Graham spoke on the motion to adopt that report. He took a strong stand against its adoption and gave many good reasons. It is to support his position today that I wish to make a few comments.

In general, the committee gave a qualified approval of the decision to sell that line. I do not propose to deal with the report in any detail as that has been done by Senator Graham. In my opinion, he is right in opposing the adoption of the report. I too, am strongly opposed to the recommendation that the line be sold. I wish to put my views on the whole matter on the record.

Since the committee made the report, the line has been sold, or agreed to be sold, to what is called Railtex Inc., a United States firm which operates various shortline railways. I understand various approvals have yet to be obtained.

The question was asked why the CNR wanted to sell this line, or any of the lines which it has already sold in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island. The answer was that some years ago the Government of Canada directed the Canadian National Railway to be financially self-sufficient. That meant that it must operate at a profit, and that capital requirements would have to be derived from revenues or from the ordinary financial markets, not from the government. The government wanted a dividend to be paid.

So while it is a Crown corporation, it is operated in the same manner as a private corporation. It is interesting to note that though a crown corporation, the Government of Canada gave it such specific directions.

That rail line was not built as a business venture. It was built to provide a service and has done so. The CNR wants to get rid of that line, even though it is not losing money but is what they call "marginally profitable". I expect they anticipate it will not continue to make a profit.

Apparently, the motive of providing a service has been lost as far as the CNR is concerned. We saw that Crown corporation abandon Newfoundland. We saw it abandon Prince Edward Island. In Cape Breton, we saw it abandon passenger service. Now, the Sydney-Truro line is on its "hit" list.

The company buying that line claims they can make it pay and, at the same time, give as good a service at less cost; they will be able to make a good return on the $20 million they propose to pay for it. How can they do this? From my reading of the minutes of the committee, they claim their operating costs can be reduced in two ways.

Apparently, they think they can manage a non-union operation and be able to pay lower wages than the CNR pays. It will also do away with the classification system so an employee will not have security in his job. He could be an engineer today and a brakeman tomorrow. I do not believe that such a regressive step would ever work in Cape Breton. I certainly hope it will not.

Honourable senators, I am against the adoption of the report of the committee. I do not believe the decision to sell the line should be given approval, even with the conditions the committee attached to it. I believe we need the line for the public good. We should ask if the public good should override economics when the two are in conflict. I believe it should.

In this case, I think it is a serious mistake for the CNR to sell this rail line. I think it is a mistake to believe a rail line which was built for the public good and for economic and social development of a particular region, can be turned into a profit-making operation if the need for such a rail line still exists. It exists in this case.

I see no reason why direct government assistance should not be given. I do not have that veneration for private enterprise and privatization which seems to be coming more and more prevalent today.

Honourable senators, I deplore the sale of the Truro-Sydney rail line. I believe such a sale is detrimental to our present and future development. I believe it is against the public interest.

I would have liked the committee to have made a strong declaration condemning the sale. I would have liked the committee to have made a strong recommendation that the Government of Canada tell Canadian National Railway it must continue to operate that line even at a deficit and that such deficit would be paid by the Government of Canada.

Honourable senators, I cannot approve or support the adoption of the report.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen, P.C. rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, December 2, 1992:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the economic statement made by the Minister of Finance. He said:Honourable senators, as I indicated, I would like to make some comments on the economic and fiscal statement made by the Minister of Finance on December 2, 1992.

Hardly a week has gone by since the statement was made, yet it virtually disappeared from the newspapers and from public discussion. One does not understand why, at this time of economic distress, the discussion of this document has been so short-lived.

Whatever interest the government may have had in the deep concerns of Canadians through remedial measures, that interest, it seems to me, took second place in the framing of the budget to the necessity of reassuring foreign creditors to ensure an inward flow of funds to finance public sector deficits.

The current Minister of Finance has less control than any of his predecessors over fiscal and monetary policy and exchange rate management because of a situation the government has overlooked or ignored in which, gradually, since it took office, it has been financing substantial portion of public sector deficits by foreign borrowings. I believe that, for the first time, the Minister of Finance has directly addressed this problem which has been developing for some years and highlighted it as a matter of concern in his fiscal and economic statement. This new situation which increases the vulnerability of Canadian policy to foreign influences is not an inheritance from his predecessors.

As honourable senators may recall, I have been raising this matter quietly in the Senate for some years now. I got the impression that no one else in the country appeared to be interested in what I was saying.

I have been raising it in the committee on national finance to a similar studied, silent response. Officials were certainly not forthcoming and ready to discuss the matter. They were not ready to engage in any dialogue on the matter and remained largely in their shells. For example, was interested in knowing whether discussions had been held with provincial governments to seek ways and means of limiting their tendency to finance their deficits abroad. That did not elicit any interest, as far as I could make out, nor any response.

The Minister, however, in his statement, dealt with this subject in very serious terms, and I quote him just very briefly:

> Excessive government deficits—both federal and provincial—have contributed to a level of net foreign debt far higher for Canada than for any other G-7 country. This large net foreign debt—public sector and private sector—means that Canadians paid more than $22 billion in interest last year to foreign lenders. That is money that Canadians can't use to develop our economy.

Honourable senators may recall that, in a number of my earlier speeches, I drew a distinction between investments from abroad and productive activities in Canada which would contribute to the wealth of the country and which would obviously be of great value to our development. In fact, that is how Canada did develop and undoubtedly will continue to develop, through that in-flow of investment capital.

But this is quite a different phenomenon as the Minister, quite correctly, points out. Last year $22 billion went out to foreign lenders, money that cannot be used by Canadians to develop the economy.

He then goes on to say, at the end of 1992, nearly a quarter of federal debt was held abroad. Reliance on foreign savings makes both the Canadian government and business vulnerable to the vagaries of foreign financial markets.

Honourable senators, I will not quote at any length the comments I made in the Senate three and a half years ago on June 21, 1989, when I referred to this problem and drew from it some of the implications which have now been expressed several years later by the Minister of Finance in his economic statement.

However, I will make one direct quotation, as follows, from a speech which I made on third reading, I believe, of a borrowing bill on June 29, 1989:

> In 1983, for example, $11.8 billion in government securities were held by non-residents, and that has increased to $50.5 billion in 1988. Honourable senators, that is a dramatic increase, and one must take note of it.

I attempted on one occasion to interest the Minister of State for Finance when he appeared before the Senate finance committee in connection with the debt service and reduction account bill.

● (1740)

I had several questions about the extent of Canada's foreign indebtedness. He did apologize quite courteously for being unprepared to answer them, complaining that the questions more aptly referred to the borrowing bill. However, it is not to make that point that I mention his appearance, but to make another point related to his comment which is as follows:

> If my memory serves me correctly, offshore borrowing is only about 3 or 4 per cent of our total borrowing. Approximately 21 per cent of our funds that are borrowed are held by foreigners but they are held in Canadian funds. In other words, they buy Canadian funds or T-Bills here in Canada in Canadian funds. There is very little going offshore from the federal government as far as borrowing is concerned.

It was a disarming comment because it would lead to the inference that because the securities are held in Canadian dollars, there is no ill effect. Of course the debt service charges on debt held by non-residents is money, as the minister has pointed out, that is flowing out of the country. If those bonds were all held by Canadians, the interest payments made by the government would be income in Canadians' pockets and would either be spent and add to demand in the economy or become part of Canadian savings.

But what does the foreign investor or creditor do with his yield on Canadian bonds? He takes it as income, converts it to his own currency, and spends it or saves it in the country of origin. It may be unnecessary to point out that the danger of relying heavily on foreign borrowing is that Canada is vulnerable to pressure on the exchange rate. As Canadians we now have to take into account the concerns of our foreign creditors, lest they get nervous and sell out which will either drive the value of the dollar down or drive interest rates up, or both.

I suspect that the foreign investor now has his hand on the shoulder of Canada's Minister of Finance in a way that has never happened before. In the early 1980s, the level of foreign ownership of the debt was below 10 per cent of Canadian government debt. On one estimate of the unmatured debt of Canada, it is now more like 25 per cent.

In 1984, rather than borrowing heavily we were reimbursing our foreign debt because at that time our savings rate was at 7 per cent or more. It is a changed situation. It is one that has been identified now by the government in the economic and financial statement as an important one, but the minister has not indicated whether he thinks there is anything we can do about it to arrest our dependence, and particularly that of the public sector, on borrowing to finance current consumption in the form of financing the deficit.

It was a matter of interest to me to notice, on this occasion, a surge of interest in this particular problem which I had not detected in the same way before. Maybe I missed something, but I had never heard it put as directly as it was put by the treasurer of the Montreal-based Laurentian Bank. An article in the Globe and Mail reads in part as follows:

> "Because one-third of the government's huge debt is held by foreigners, Canada must constantly attract capital into the country", he said. He warned that if foreigners get spooked by a rising deficit, they will demand higher interest rates, and all Canadians will pay.

One is entitled, I believe, to speculate that the principal purpose of the economic and fiscal statement was an effort on the part of the minister to allay the concern of foreign investors and creditors, in the face of the numerous reports that the deficit was $6 billion or $7 billion above target. Some action had to be taken to allay their fears and concerns. If one looks at the fiscal and economic statement in a detached way, I think one must conclude that the principal purpose was not to reduce the deficit, but to bring it down from the very high level to which it had risen above the projection made by the minister in his February budget.

That, it seemed to me, was not done to achieve an impact on the Canadian economy or to stimulate growth, because most of us believe that the impact of the fiscal and economic statement generally on the economy will be marginal if not neutral. So that may be the explanation for the timing of this particular economic and fiscal statement. However, apart from that argumentation, the problem of foreign indebtedness is there.

I heard Sylvia Ostry, the former head of the Economic Council of Canada, who is well experienced in international fiscal matters, say:

> We have a $300 billion foreign debt, a larger foreign debt to GDP ratio than Brazil and we don't have much room to manœuvre on monetary policy because the financial markets know how indebted we are.

I have just one more reference to make, and that is to an article that appeared on December 4 in the Globe and Mail, written by Mr. Tremblay who is identified as an economist at the University of Montreal and a former Quebec Minister of Industry and Commerce. He makes the following comment:

> Similarly, the Bank of Canada cannot afford to be perceived as lowering interest rates too fast, because foreign creditors will dump the Canadian dollar and set off a resurgence of inflation.

He goes on to make the following, very important comment:

> One of the most disruptive features of the past few years has been the damage done to the private sector by provincial governments and their agencies, which borrowed record amounts of money abroad. By doing so without co-ordination, especially in 1991, they helped push the Canadian dollar to unsustainable levels, and destroyed many jobs among private exporters and companies trying to compete with imports.

These are all very significant comments made by a number of experienced people. One is forced to ask what policy stance Canada should adopt in response to this particular phenomenon which, if it grows, is going to constrict more and more the freedom of action of the Canadian Minister of Finance.

• (1750)

Mr. Tremblay made a suggestion in his "Eight steps toward a productive economy". The suggestion was that a monitoring agency be set up with the provinces for the purpose of monitoring and coordinating the use of foreign borrowings by provincial governments and provincial agencies. As we know, they have been borrowing heavily. It may be that the federal government borrowings for the deficit have decreased. If so, the provincial governments have increased their borrowing. This is a qualitative difference in the danger of high deficits, because the benefits to Canada are temporary and the long run disadvantages are substantial.

Honourable senators, the government has from the very beginning, established the reduction of the deficit as a principal priority. One has to say that there is no prospect in the fiscal and economic statement made by the Minister of Finance that the deficit is to come down; quite the contrary. The deficit problem is as substantial as it was when the government took over in 1984.

The former minister of finance told us in a statement on November 8, 1984, that "With this set of projections and no policy changes, the deficit for this year would be $34.5 billion." Later he said, referring to the increase in the deficit,

"This is what we inherited . . . If we don't take action [the situation] will be even more serious by 1990".

Well, by 1992, the situation is just about as serious as it was when the minister of finance made his statement in 1984. This will always be a matter of contention, but the actual deficit for that particular year turned out to be $38 billion. Which ever figure you take, it is a benchmark that must be faced in assessing the contribution the government has made to the achievement of the principal priority which it set in 1984.

I have applauded and acknowledged in the past the significant progress made in the reduction of the deficit to a level of $28 billion in fiscal year 1987-88, because that was the actual deficit for that year. The projected deficit this year is $34.4 billion. That is a difference of nearly $6.5 billion.

Mr. Mazankowski became the Minister of Finance on April 21, 1991. He inherited a deficit from the former minister of $30.5 billion. His first deficit was $34.6 billion in fiscal 1992. It is now projected to be $34.4 billion in fiscal 1993. This last figure is up from Mr. Mazankowski's own budget in February of this year when he projected the deficit for fiscal 1993 at $27.5 billion. That is a difference of $7 billion. Those are the facts.

The minister, in his statement, has had to accept, is bound, forced or is ready to accept—however you wish to put it—the high levels of deficit for this year and next. One might conclude that he has concluded that the deficit is an insoluble problem.

To judge the government by its record on the deficit—how well it addressed its principal priority—is to judge it harshly because, by its own goals, it has to be branded as a failure. It must be a disappointment to the government because I am satisfied that there was a solid intention in 1984 to do something about the deficit.

Before I finish, I want to come back to that point: Why has the government failed to address these concerns? The Prime Minister has an easy way out of this problem, if he is quoted correctly in Saturday's Globe and Mail, by saying in Winnipeg that the federal deficit, under a Liberal government would be $82 billion instead of $34 billion, as it is now. That is one of a number of gambits now employed to divert attention away from the fact that the deficit today is substantially the same size as the inherited Liberal deficit.

We have had various estimates of what the Liberal deficit would have been if the Liberals had been in office for eight years. Mr. Wilson said on November 4, 1984, that the deficit would have reached $50 billion annually by the early 1990s under the Liberals. That is what he said. The present minister, in his statement on September 18, 1991, changed that figure to $100 billion.

Senator Gigantès: That is $50 billion for Vegreville.

Senator Thériault: The Prime Minister is known to sometimes exaggerate.

Senator MacEachen: The Prime Minister does not round the figure off. There is $50 billion; there is $100 billion. The Prime Minister, however, is more precise. The figure is $82 billion; not 80 or 90. It is $82 billion.

Senator Gigantès: I write fiction too, sir.

Senator MacEachen: I was somewhat amused by these efforts. The Prime Minister must understand that it is difficult for a minister of finance—any minister for that matter—to predict the current deficit with any accuracy several months down the road. Yet he can do it with assurance for an eight-year period, projecting the existence of a Liberal government attempting to read its mind.

There it is. The deficit is as big as ever, as big as life, and a big disappointment to the government, no doubt, especially now that foreign investors are peering over their shoulders; more than peering, taking them by the neck and shaking them.

"Be careful. We are watching".

The minister made progress—$28 billion—and then it dissipated. The size of the deficit, honourable senators, has a great deal to do with economic performance and with the economic management by the Minister of Finance and the government. There has been very little discussion about economic management. The deficit has been discussed almost in a back room as if there were no relationship to it. A very strong relationship does exist.

• (1800)

Concerning the 1991 budget, in April 1991, I discussed the failed economic management of this government in some depth—at least what I thought were the mistakes and where the errors were made—which put them off the track.

The first major error is that the government failed to detect—and if it detected it then it failed to act on it—the inflationary pressures that developed in the Canadian economy in 1988. It is easy to establish, through the objective analysis of the OECD in its analysis of Canada in 1991, that by 1988 inflationary forces were taking hold in the Canadian economy. In fact, the OECD says that intense pressures on resources were evident in the late 1980s and by 1988 the resulting inflationary pressures were seen by the authorities as a threat to satisfactory medium-term performance.

They may have been seen, but no action was taken. Why? One might be cynical enough to suggest that the upcoming election was a significant factor in the decision of the government not to alarm the country. In 1988, as I put on the record before, the Minister of Finance was issuing soothing messages to the Canadian people about how well the government was on track and how well the medium-term, realistic plan announced in 1984 was proceeding.

The development of this inflation was not a Liberal inheritance. It developed under the noses of the government, though they chose to ignore it until after the election. We have been paying for that ever since. We have been paying for it because of the delay in tackling the inflationary problem.

It was not until 1989 that the Minister of Finance turned his mind to this problem, and it was not until the June 1989 budget that he targeted inflation as a priority. But the Canadian economy was already teetering on the verge of the recession. The policy of attacking inflation belatedly, through aggressively high interest rates, pushed the economy over the brink.

It is possible to establish that. If you looked back, you would find that the peak of short-term interest rates occurred at about the onset of the Canadian recession. They were too late in detecting the inflationary pressures which developed under the very eyes of the ministers. We then had the aggressive, high interest rate policy that helped to put the country into a recession.

I am sorry, honourable senators. I was aware it was late in the day when I started to make my comments, but did I not want to go beyond 6 o'clock. I should like to cease here.

Senator Murray: Are you moving to adjourn the debate?

Senator MacEachen: Yes. I will adjourn the debate and return to it at the first opportunity.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I was so engrossed in the speech I was remiss in asking for unanimous consent after the first 15 minutes. I apologize.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 1:30 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, December 9, 1992

The Senate met at 1.30 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

THE HONOURABLE CLAUDE CASTONGUAY

RESIGNATION FROM THE SENATE—NOTICE AND TRIBUTES

Hon. Claude Castonguay: Honourable senators, in September 1990, the Prime Minister invited me, as he did several of our colleagues, to become a member of this house. After giving the matter some thought, I accepted his invitation, as I hoped I could play a useful role in resolving constitutional issues. However, my appointment to the Senate did upset some plans I had discussed for some time with my colleagues in the Groupe la Laurentienne and especially with my wife.

From 1977 to 1990—part of the time with our colleague, Senator Jean-Marie Poitras—I had the privilege to work in various capacities with the board of the Groupe La Laurentienne. It was a fascinating experience to see how La Laurentienne Mutuelle de Québec turned into a strong and dynamic financial services group, doing business across the country and in the United States, Great Britain, the Bahamas and Hong Kong. However, the demands of a busy schedule and the frequent travelling involved were particularly trying for my family.

For these reasons, and in order to provide for a smooth transition, I decided to resign as chairman of the board at the age of 60. I would go back to consulting, to pursue that aspect of my professional career. I felt this would be a way to maintain a better balance between useful and interesting activities and my personal and family life.

When on October 26 the constitutional question was postponed indefinitely, like many others, I reviewed my position. After weighing the pros and cons, I concluded that the time had come for me to revert to my initial plan, which was to go back to consultancy. Since I didn't think it would be wise to try and reconcile this type of activity with my position as a senator, I also concluded it would be necessary to resign from the Senate. I may recall that in 1990, I made it clear upon entering this House that I did not necessarily consider my appointment as having any degree of permanency.

I admit it was a difficult decision to make, because I considered it an honour to sit in this House. The past two years also gave me an opportunity to get to know some of you a little better and to make new friends.

Before I leave, I would like to make a few comments on the referendum held on October 26.

Canadians were relieved when they heard the results. In fact, they could not be interpreted as a rejection by Quebec, the aboriginal people or any one group. The worst was averted. However, we must realize that the real problems addressed by the Charlottetown Accord have not been dealt with.

Of course, the economic situation and the nation's finances demand that our political leaders at all levels concentrate on the economic recovery and reducing government deficits. Given the size of the problems, the situation can improve only gradually and will take a great deal of time, effort and discipline.

The constitutional question could not be reopened in such a context, even though some aspects of it are very likely to resurface fairly soon. In Quebec, for example, it seems likely that Quebecers will have to decide at the next provincial election on keeping Quebec in Canada or independence. Another example: despite the "no" vote on October 26, the native issue obviously could not be postponed until any future resumption of constitutional discussions.

I share the opinion of those who believe that it is possible, without distracting our political leaders from their primary concern, to make progress on several of these issues without amending the constitution. In a speech I made in September, before the referendum period, to a committee of the Quebec National Assembly, I said:

> The constitution has had limited influence on our development in Quebec over the past 30 years —

And I said:

> — we can expect this situation to be the same in future.

I still believe that progress can be made without revising the constitution.

Here, briefly, are some avenues that I think could be taken without going against the referendum result, which is open to many interpretations in any case.

In the past several years, many senators have put forward some very valid proposals for Senate reform. Adopting some of these proposals could restore the Senate's legitimacy and credibility.

I am thinking in particular of election or appointment of senators for a time-limited term through an open process, and of changes to the rules in order to give senators more independence.

Concrete results would certainly flow from an energetic effort to identify and eliminate duplication in the programs and regulations of the two levels of government. At a time when it is urgent to find ways to reduce public spending it is hard to believe that Canadians could object to such an approach.

The elimination of trade barriers between the provinces must be pursued vigorously. Indeed, Canadians can only benefit from the creation of a real domestic common market.

Given its very great importance for all Canadians, especially the young and the unemployed, the improvement of manpower training programs and policies must be pursued in close cooperation with the provinces, since they have jurisdiction over education. In view of the recession, such an effort is even more urgent.

In certain fields such as the environment and telecommunications, a concerted effort to harmonize effort of the policies and regulations of the two levels of government could only bring about positive results which would benefit all businesses and individuals.

Even if this appointment is not going to take place tomorrow, people would react positively if it was agreed that the appointment of the next Governor of the Bank of Canada would be subject to a consultation and review process in which the Senate could be called upon to play a leading role.

As for aboriginal issues, it would be useful if the Dussault-Erasmus Commission could submit its report section by section, which would simplify and speed up the search for solutions.

Other issues covered by the Charlottetown Accord also deserve further reflection. I am thinking of the invaluable role that could be played by some of our Canadian think tanks and research organizations. For instance, it would certainly be useful to consider the contradiction between the concept of provincial equality and Quebec's distinct identity. If we want to get out of this impasse eventually, we could, for instance, consider whether a Canada based on five large regions, that would be far more equal in every respect, could be the way of the future. I would like to see organizations like the Institute for Research on Public Policy, the C.D. Howe Institute and the Canada West Foundation, to name only a few, getting involved in this kind of exercise.

If we could make some progress in a number of areas, the extremely negative climate prevailing today could certainly improve. Perhaps some day, we could even consider a number of constitutional amendments, supported by a majority of Canadians.

Finally, I am convinced that what Canadians need very badly is information. Many do not know the history of our country, the principles on which it was founded or the history of those by whom it was explored, settled and developed it.

Not only do we not know our own history, we do not really know each other as Canadians, in a country that is so vast, with regions that are so different. Consider the distance separating someone on Prince Edward Island from a rresident of Vancouver Island. It is therefore not surprising to find such diverse and opposite views and such a variety of different groups, each with their own specific concerns. If Canadians are to focus more on their country than on their particular regions or concerns, if they are to develop, like our neighbours to the South,a sense of pride about Canadian, they will have to be better informed. By developing a sense of belonging, it will still be possible to reverse the present trend towards balkanization.

In concluding, I want to thank the Prime Minister for the honour he bestwoed on me when he invited me to sit in this house. I want to thank those colleagues who have been understanding with me and I very sincerely wish you success in your work.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we were very sorry to learn today that Senator Castonguay has decided to leave the Senate. Personally I am not surprised with this decision because our colleague told me a while ago that he thought his term in the Senate whould be relatively short.

Today we are losing one of the pillars of our institutions. Quebecers in particular, but also fellow citizens in other provinces, have come to know this man well, because he has been a public figure since the 1970s. As a member of royal commissions, father of the medicare system in Quebec, member of the National Assembly, Minister of the Crown, business leader, Mr. Castonguay has played important role in Quebec and Canadian society for more than two decades. He has been a prominent figure in the great debates of our times. He was able to gain the confidence as well as the great respect of Canadians.

As I told him in private, a man of his calibre has the right to retire when he sees fit to do so. Many Canadians are familiar with Claude Castonguay, the public man, but here in the Senate we had the privilege of to knowing the person and appreciating his invaluable human qualities, his courtesy, his levelheadedness, as well as his respect in dealings with his colleagues. His calm voice will be missed during our debates.

Fortunately, Senator Castonguay leaves us at a time when he is still in full possession of his skills. He is ready to face new challenges if he so wishes. On behalf of the government and on behalf of your fellow senators, I thank you, Senator Castonguay, for your important contribution to the building of our country, not only as senator but throughout your brilliant career. I wish you health and long life and may God bless you.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I must start by acknowledging that Senator Castonguay has had an influence in my life, even though he is neither a friend nor a close acquaintance. I could better describe his influence on my life as the one a celebrity would have.

I remember that during the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission, Mr. Laurendeau, Mr. Jean-Louis Gagnon, Mr. Lacosse and others referred to Mr. Castonguay. At that time, if I recall, he was a well-known businessman and politician. He had a deep interest in the Constitution and, as I said, generally speaking, in politics.

I must add that at the time he was also known as a Liberal. Therefore, I was quite surprised one day to find myself in here with Senator Castonguay and to see him on the other side of this chamber and I wondered:

[English]

"What's he doing over there?" And I listened when he spoke. Except for the fact that he supported the government, I was able to detect traces of his original faith in some of the things he said. I always cherished the hope that his stout Liberal heart would finally withstand the Tory venom. Perhaps it has. I will not read anything more into what he has said today than that, but I would like to bid farewell to him.

Senator Molgat: He just cannot stand them anymore.

Senator Frith: Maybe that is it. I would just as soon he did not tell me that that is not the reason he is leaving. I would love to think that the reason he is leaving is because he cannot stand being on that side any longer.

We were informed this morning that Senator Castonguay would be retiring from the Senate. He has had a long and dignified record of public service. He was first elected to the Quebec National Assembly in the general election of 1970. He was Minister of Health from 1970 to 1971. He went straight into the cabinet, as I recall, and the newspapers attributed the parenthood of medicare in Quebec to him. In subsequent stories, he was often referred to as the father of medicare in Quebec. He held the positions of Minister of Family and Social Welfare and Minister of Social Affairs from 1971 to 1973.

Those years in the Quebec government gave him his first opportunity to participate in federal-provincial constitutional consultations. I had maintained my interest in these matters even after the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism had reported, because one of my clients became the first Commissioner of Official Languages. Therefore I continued to have an interest while Senator Castonguay was playing a very large role in constitutional affairs at the time. If I am not mistaken, he went to Victoria in 1971 with Premier Bourassa.

Then he left provincial politics and entered his business period. It is not that he had been unconnected with business previously, but he became well known because of his involvement in the Laurentian Group in Quebec. He was chairman of the board of directors of the Laurentian Bank of Canada and the Laurentian Capital Corporation, and director of Laurentian Financial Incorporated and Laurentian General Insurance, among others.

• (1350)

Senator Castonguay was quietly admired in the business community. My recollection is that he never abandoned his interest in constitutional affairs, because I can remember he was a frequent guest speaker at functions of chambers of commerce and was popular with business organizations. Without diminishing his prestige as a businessman, he was, and will always be, linked in that period with constitutional affairs.

[Senator Frith.]

Perhaps the fact of the matter is that if he made speeches in which he did not make some reference connecting business and constitutional questions, they were not as widely reported as the ones in which he did speak out clearly as to his opinions on that subject.

Senator Castonguay is a Companion of the Order of Canada, and he received the George Findlay Stephen award at the Canadian Hospital Association followed by the McGill Management Achievement Award in 1986 and the B'nai Brith Canada 1988 Award of Merit. He was appointed Officier de l'Ordre National du Québec in 1991. Perhaps his most colourful award was the "Great Montrealers" award—an award he received in 1990 as one of three, one of whom I know, Denys Arcand the filmmaker, the other member of the trio being Sister Denise Lefebvre.

Although Senator Castonguay pursued his career in the private sector, he did not stray very far from public life. He was active in supporting the Meech Lake Accord and free trade in Quebec. You will understand if I say little more about that because this is not the time to underline our differences. However, no one will be surprised to know that we were on opposite sides on both of those questions, as were all of my colleagues on this side.

When he was summoned to the Senate in 1990, Senator Castonguay took his political opinions from the private sphere back to the public sphere. He was co-chair of the Senate-Commons parliamentary committee on the Constitution, not a surprising appointment considering the background I have outlined. I am sure many of you probably know more about that than I do. He had many opportunities to participate in the ongoing debate on the Constitution. We recall that he was required to step down because of illness.

I may not always have agreed with Senator Castonguay and his ideas—although I agreed with him more when he was a Liberal—including his ideas on the acceptability of user fees in medicare, but, as I said earlier, he did bring an important perspective to this chamber, and we benefitted from the wealth of his experience during a distinguished career.

We on this side wish Senator Castonguay the best of success in his future endeavours. As I say, I was surprised when he was sworn in and walked down to his chair that he turned to the right instead of to the left. We were ready to welcome him on this side, but we could not talk him into it. We tried to talk Senator Chaput-Rolland into the same turn when she was sworn in, but she turned her back on us. I have a feeling that both of them had already given their undertakings.

We wish Senator Castonguay good luck and a happy and prosperous future, and I underline "prosperous". I am sure that will take care of itself, considering his business acumen. In particular, we wish him a healthy future. We were sad to learn that he had suffered a bout of illness that required him to withdraw from the front line of the constitutional debate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: I would just add the hope that if a replacement is made, whoever replaces Senator Castonguay will be like him; a Liberal, who comes to the correct side this time.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it is the 18th day of the government's contemptible and contemptuous behaviour towards Canadians—"contemptible" is my word; "contemptuous" is Senator Murray's word—18 days of contempt for the democratic process and 18 days of political cowardice, running concurrently, not consecutively.

Again we call—and we will continue to call—on this government to show some courage and respect for democracy by calling an election now.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

CONSIDERATION OF BILL C-86

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I would like to pass on to my colleagues copy of the letter I just sent to the rare witnesses whom the Conservative members of the Social Affairs Committee are willing to invite to discuss Bill C-86, or rather pretend to discuss.

Dear Sir/Madam:

Yesterday, during an organizational meeting of the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee, Senator Consiglio Di Nino, the Conservative sponsor of the Immigration Bill (C-86) in the Senate, told the Committee that its deliberations should be concluded by Monday, December 14th. His announcement showed that the Conservative members had already decided to ram the bill through the Senate before the December 18th adjournment.

It was, of course, crystal clear!

When it thus became clear that the government had no intention of holding meaningful hearings on the Immigration Bill, Liberal Senators decided that they could not participate in a charade designed solely to create an illusion of participatory democracy.

Through the Committee had pre-studied the legislation, the bill now before it is fundamentally different in view of the 87 amendments adopted by the government in the House of Commons.

Consequently, this "new" bill demands thorough study, something that the Conservative members of the Committee refuse to allow.

Furthermore, their demand that potential witnesses improvise a brief on as little as 24 hours notice, is an abuse of Committee procedures.

In these circumstances, Liberal Senators concluded that their participation would only help legitimize a process that is fundamentally corrupt.

If you are one of the chosen few who have been invited to testify, Liberal Senators regret that they will not be present at the Committee during their testimony, particularly since they share so many of your concerns about this deplorable legislation. Unfortunately, their participation would have made them accomplices to a grotesque hoax the government is pulling on Canadians concerned with the world-wide plight of refugees.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

SPECIAL STUDY ON INSURANCE CORPORATION—NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO POSTPONE FINAL REPORT

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Friday next, December 11, I will move that notwithstanding the orders of reference adopted by the Senate on December 17, 1991, June 23, 1992 and September 11, 1992, the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to table the final report on the special study on the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Compensation Corporation and the Property and Casualty Insurance Compensation Corporation no later than March 31, 1993.

SPECIAL STUDY ON DRAFT REGULATIONS—NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO POSTPONE FINAL REPORT.

Honourable senators, I also give notice that on Friday, December 11, 1992, I will move that notwithstanding the order of reference adopted by the Senate on December 17, 1991, June 23, 1992 and September 11, 1992, the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to table the final report on the special study on draft regulations ensuing from the new legislation on Canadian financial institutions, no later than March 31, 1993.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 508 citizens of Alberta who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Fort McMurray, Edmonton, Calgary, St. Albert and Sherwood Park.

Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 480 citizens of Quebec who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Chicoutimi, Howick, La Présentation, Ste-Madeleine, Rougemont, Ste-Rosalie, St-Joachim, Ste-Anne-de-la-Rochelle, St-Damase, St-Hyacinthe, Bonsecours, Laurenceville, Pincourt, Montreal, Granby, Vaudreuil, St-Léonard, Val d'Or, Drummondville, St-Césaire, Huntingdon, St-Félix-de-Valois, Lachine, Mansonville and Sutton.

These petitions were signed in October 1992, in case Senator Murray is still interested.

In all, 988 citizens protest vigorously against a regressive tax that is unfair to ordinary people for whom the present government has nothing but contempt.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

OFFICIAL RECORD

CORRECTION TO HANSARD

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I take a moment to make a correction in the Debates of the Senate for Tuesday, December 8. At page 2349, in the course of an exchange with Senator Hays on the question of the multilateral trade negotiations, I am quoted as saying:

> Opposition to Article XI is as it has been. We are seeking a strengthening and clarification of that article as a result of the current round of multilateral trade negotiations.

The word "opposition" is incorrect. What I said was: "Our position on Article XI is as it has been."

QUESTION PERIOD

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED UPDATE AND EXPANSION OF TERMINALS AT PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, one gets the impression that this government is tidying up and completing a lot of iniquities before it leaves power.

I would ask the minister to focus on the recent awarding of a huge contract to a consortium with government connections, but not solely with government connections, to increase capacity at Pearson airport, at a time when the Minister of Transport is saying that there is a problem of overcapacity in the Canadian airline industry.

We have an overcapacity in the Canadian airline industry, yet the government decides, before it is thrown out, to increase significantly the capacity at Pearson airport with a huge contract, at a time when Terminal 3, which is run by part of the consortium, is losing money. How will that contribute to the building of a viable airline industry? We already know how it will contribute to the coffers of the bidders and the contractors.

[Senator Hébert.]

• (1410)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, surely the honourable senator and others here who are frequent travellers in and out of Toronto are aware of the serious congestion problems we are experiencing at Pearson International Airport.

Senator Frith: Not at some terminals, such as Terminal 3.

Senator Murray: In the past, there have been serious congestion problems. The goal here is to have the capacity in place when we need it. This does not happen overnight. I would have thought the Honourable Leader of the Opposition would congratulate us on our exquisite sense of planning.

Senator Frith: You would have thought wrongly, then, because the problem at Pearson is a problem essentially of air traffic, a problem that is somewhat diminishing because of the over-capacity in the industry that the Minister of Transport has talked about.

Terminal 3 is certainly not excessively busy; in fact, it is losing money. Apparently, however, that terminal is to be the pattern for the additions. We know the new system will benefit the persons who are the successful bidders. However, in spite of the fact that the government will be giving up some revenue thereby, is there any way that the taxpayer and the travelling public will not be picking up the slack?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, all I can say to that is that the business community needs time to develop the next stage of the project, and proposals that were received from various parties were rigorously analyzed and reviewed by a team that included support from private sector financial, technical and business authorities. Before the next stage of the project, the developer will have to satisfy the government that a realistic plan, consistent with the present economic environment of the airlines, has been worked out between all the parties.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, to borrow a phrase from the leader, I thought that might be the answer. Again, we find that the business community is satisfied with this development. I was asking a broader question about airline capacity and the travelling public. It seems we will be getting the worst of that one.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR FORECASTED UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURES FOR 1993-94

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): I have one other question based on the increasing unemployment rate in this country, and the unfavourable comparison of our unemployment rate with that of the United States. Some 1,200 persons are being laid off in Windsor, 800 were laid off at GM in St. Catherines recently, 10,000 were laid off across Canada by CN, 2,000 at Dofasco in Hamilton, 500 at Pratt and Whitney in Montreal—all for whom the recession is really just beginning. Will the minister have his colleague the responsible minister make public and bring to the Senate the forecasts for the relevant department in 1993 and 1994?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am reasonably certain that the Minister of Finance made a projection in his recent economic statement relating to the expected unemployment rate for 1993, if not for 1994. I share the concern of the honourable senator regarding the still unacceptably high level of unemployment in this country. I had hoped he would have taken a more positive attitude toward the proposed redevelopment at Pearson International Airport, which will create many thousands of person years of employment in an area and industry where it is badly needed.

THE ECONOMY

CONVENING OF FIRST MINISTERS CONFERENCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, perhaps I might ask the Leader of the Government a question. It is prompted by a front page story in the Financial Post that premier-designate Ralph Klein will be meeting with the Prime Minister on Monday. My question is: Will the first ministers conference on the economy, the one the Prime Minister promised to call immediately after the referendum of October 26, be called soon? So far, the Prime Minister has not called such a meeting, in spite of all the undertakings given. Indeed, premier-designate Ralph Klein has indicated that the main purpose of his meeting with the Prime Minister is to set up that first ministers meeting.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I must confess that I have no information on the rumoured meeting between Mr. Klein and Prime Minister Mulroney. With regard to a first ministers conference, I can only tell the honourable senator that there are no plans to hold such a conference in the near future.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I surely hope that the Prime Minister meant what he said, that some effort would be made by the federal government and all other first ministers to deal with unemployment and other matters now that the constitutional question is out of the way.

There is to be a meeting of finance ministers before Christmas. In view of the lame effort made in the most recent mini-budget or economic statement which has failed to do anything about improving the Canadian economy, perhaps the minister could tell us whether or not the government intends to keep its word, and convene a meeting with all 11 first ministers, in an effort to do something about the depressed state of the economy in Canada?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with regard to my friend's characterization of Mr. Mazankowski's economic statement of December 2, I can only invite the honourable senator to take part in the debate on that matter which has already been launched by our colleague Senator MacEachen.

Senator Olson: What I say does not help anything; it is what the government does that is important.

Senator Murray: I will be interested to hear not only his analysis of the economic situation and of Mr. Mazankowski's statement, but also the alternatives, if any, that he and his party have to propose.

Senator Frith: They want you to solve their problems for them.

Senator Murray: Second, honourable senators, I can only repeat what I have said: We have no intention of holding a first ministers conference in the near future. We are acting—and this is a subject for debate following Senator MacEachen's notice of inquiry—vigorously and positively within our jurisdiction to bring interest rates down and create conditions for sustained recovery and sustained economic growth. While these are still early days, as they say, there is abundant evidence that Mr. Mazankowski's statement of December 2 is achieving its immediate objectives.

• (1420)

Senator Olson: I agree, honourable senators, that government policy is achieving what he stated it would; it is taking money from the unemployed and other people in Canada who are least able to afford to free up a few dollars. That certainly is being achieved.

Is the minister stating that all those promises and undertakings, whereby the federal government would provide leadership in convening a meeting of first ministers to attempt to do something about this very serious situation, have now been completely discarded?

An election promise is something that most people take with a grain of salt. However, the people of Canada believed the Prime Minister when he said that, once the referendum and constitutional matter was cleared away, we would then address these other problems. It seems as if that promise has been discarded. Is that the extent of the comfort the Prime Minister can offer to Canadians who are looking for some relief?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Prime Minister and the government have been as good as their word. We indicated that, once the referendum was over, we would act swiftly to address the economic problems of the country.

The first very important step in that direction was the "Economic and Fiscal Statement" delivered by Mr. Mazankowski on December 2. Other announcements have been, and are being, made. One of those announcements, concerning Terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson International Airport, a project which will create many thousands of jobs in the construction industry in Toronto and southern Ontario, has just been denounced by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. That is much to be regretted, of course. There will be other announcements as time goes by.

What I am telling the honourable senator is that in the near future there will not be a meeting of first ministers on this matter. I would hope that the honourable senator would accept that, and not pretend there was some unequivocal assurance given by anybody, including the Prime Minister, that there was to be a first ministers meeting on the economy in the weeks immediately following the October referendum. Such a commitment was, in fact, never made.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would ask the honourable minister to answer the question I asked, and not give a whole lot of other answers.

When the Prime Minister and other ministers came from Charlottetown, I remember very distinctly that there were several ministers who wanted to talk about the economy and have a coordinated effort by governments across Canada to do something about the economy. The excuse from the Prime Minister then was that we have to get the referendum and constitutional matters out of the way first.

If the minister cannot remember that, perhaps I had better bring him some newspaper quotes to remind him that there was an undertaking that a great effort would be made by all of those governments as soon as the referendum was over. So far, we have seen no sign of it.

Senator Murray: If in the next little while my honourable friend can produce a statement from the Prime Minister, committing himself and the government to calling a first ministers' meeting on the economy immediately following the October 26 referendum, I will, of course, correct the statement I have made, which is that no such commitment was ever made.

Senator Olson: Your government said they would address the country's economic problems with all the other governments.

Senator Murray: And we have.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

COMMITMENT OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO BUILDING OF FIXED LINK

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, talking about the economy and about commitments reminds me of another commitment; the fixed link to Prince Edward Island. I understood from the newspapers — if one can believe the newspapers, which I understand senators opposite do not—that the Premiers of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island met and said that today, Wednesday, they would probably be signing an agreement with Mr. MacKay, the Minister of Public Works for Canada, to proceed with the fixed link to Prince Edward Island.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell me if that agreement will be signed today, and if the government has decided to proceed with the fixed link to Prince Edward Island?

[Senator Murray.]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have any information on the signing of an agreement today.

The government's intentions with regard to the project were made crystal clear in the economic statement delivered by Mr. Mazankowski on December 2.

Senator Bonnell: I am afraid that what has indeed been made "crystal clear" is that the government is committing $25 million for more environmental and engineering surveys. However, that does not make it crystal clear that the fixed link to Prince Edward Island will be constructed now, in the future, or ever.

Perhaps the Leader of the Government could make it crystal clear: Is the government committed to the construction of a fixed link, and will it proceed with that construction in 1993?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator knows this is essentially a private-sector project. The federal government's financial participation will be to provide a subsidy to the developers equivalent to what we would have paid for the operation of the ferry service from Borden to Cape Tormentine. I think the figure that was announced is in the vicinity of $40 million, as my honourable friend has suggested.

Having said that, I should invite the attention of honourable senators to the statements made by Mr. Mazankowski to the effect that there is every reason to hope and expect that construction could begin this spring.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I do not think Mr. Mazankowski said that there is every reason to suspect —

Senator Murray: Expect.

Senator Bonnell: To expect or suspect? Prince Edward Islanders suspect this government. Prince Edward Islanders have been thinking about a fixed link and continuous communication with the mainland since Confederation. They have been promised that. We even had "the party of the causeway" which promised it. Poor Mr. Diefenbaker is now long gone, but he proposed that and made it "the party of the causeway."

Now we have "the party of the fixed link." So far, all we have are promises of engineering and environmental surveys, and the minister opposite is telling me that I am supposed to believe that means we will be going ahead with the fixed-link project. In fact, we do not even know which company is supposed to construct it.

Senator Olson: It is a company from Calgary.

Senator Bonnell: Apparently, it is to be constructed by a company from Calgary. However, at one time it was stated that the financial package was not in order, and it went to number two, then to number three, and back to number one.

However, time is going on, and we are getting closer and closer to the next election. Prince Edward Islanders are not about to buy this pig-in-a-poke until we know for sure whether or not the Government of Canada is committed to the building of a fixed link, and whether the government will announce that project and sign an agreement to construct it in 1993.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I trust that I am hearing correctly that Senator Bonnell has now declared himself in favour of the proposed fixed link.

Senator Barootes: At last!

Senator Murray: This itself is worth a press release to the Charlottetown Guardian and other Prince Edward Island media. I simply want to repeat that the Minister of Finance announced in his "Economic and Fiscal Statement" of December 2 that the advanced engineering and environmental work on the fixed link would be undertaken "to allow construction of this $800 million project to begin in the spring. This will directly create an average of almost 1,000 jobs each year over the construction period and will provide spinoff benefits for the economy of Atlantic Canada."

• (1430)

The problem with Senator Bonnell is that he cannot take yes for an answer.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I still did not get a commitment. I got a lot of malarkey. That is all we ever get.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

AMENDMENTS TO BILL C-86—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I have another question, this time to another gentleman. He is not in his seat, although he should be here. Perhaps the Leader of the Government can answer for him. This question is for the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

This government is now trying to have the immigration bill passed, and I received a note today that on Wednesday, December 9, at 3.30 this afternoon, on the agenda of that committee will be Bill C-86, to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof. Certain witnesses are to appear.

In the absence of the chairman—who should be here for Question Period because all chairmen should be here for Question Period to answer questions—can the Leader of the Government tell me if members of the committee will be allowed to make amendments, and, further, is the government prepared to accept amendments to this very important bill?

Senator Di Nino brought about closure in that committee. Since he came to this country as an immigrant, does he not wish to allow more immigrants in besides himself?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I think that is a rather inappropriate and offensive personal reference, quite unnecessary in the context.

Honourable senators, it is to be regretted that honourable senators opposite yesterday, by refusing permission to the committee to sit at 4.30 yesterday, almost prevented the committee from hearing from the distinguished representative of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

It is equally unfortunate if, as I am reliably informed, honourable senators opposite stomped out of the committee yesterday and declined to stay there to hear the distinguished representative of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees who came here from Geneva for the purpose of testifying before this committee. It could be that —

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): It was nice of you to allow one witness, at least.

Senator Murray: It could be that they did not want to hear his views because those views were not congenial to the views held by honourable senators opposite.

As for amendments, the honourable senator is a veteran parliamentarian. He knows perfectly well that if he or any colleague proposes amendments at the committee, or indeed during the third reading debate when we come to it in this place, that those amendments will be given their usual careful attention.

GENERAL ELECTION

INTENTIONS OF THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, considering that today we lose Senator Castonguay, is it true what they say, that Mulroney won't stay? Is it true what they spread, that Mila no tears will shed? Is it true what they say, that we shall soon see that day, and when they decide to go, will they also take Charbonneau?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA'S PARTICIPATION IN PEACEKEEPING OPERATION IN SOMALIA

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, before the Senate adjourns for the Christmas break, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate undertake to make a statement to this house defining the nature and extent of Canada's participation in peacekeeping in Somalia?

By "nature", I mean, first, the kinds of personnel we are sending, how many, and so on; second, an outline of the particular aims of Canada's participation; and third, the duration of Canada's participation in this peacemaking endeavour.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be glad to consider that. I suppose I could do it under Notice of Inquiry. I shall have to consult my colleagues the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence before giving a firm affirmative reply.

Senator Stewart: If the minister himself finds that he cannot give this undertaking, and I can understand that it may have the kind of complexity that he does not wish to delve into at this particular time of the year, would he arrange to have the Secretary of State for External Affairs come before a Committee of the Whole House of the Senate to answer these questions, as well as others that might arise concerning this very important new departure in Canadian foreign policy?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my colleague Ms McDougall happened to remark this morning that she is leaving shortly for Europe to attend, among other things, the CSCE conference, so I would think she would not be available here before the Christmas holidays.

However, I will investigate the alternative of having a minister appear, if not before the Committee of the Whole, then before the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. I will also see whether my colleagues would agree to my making a more considered statement on the whole issue in the Senate. I will work towards that.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Make sure you ask Harvie Andre.

WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN PEACEKEEPING FORCE FROM CYPRUS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate find out for us from the Minister of External Affairs what will happen with respect to the peacekeeping force that we have between our two NATO allies, Turkey and Greece, in Cyprus. Do we plan on bringing home our Canadian troops, and if so, when, and what consultation has taken place between our two NATO friends Turkey and Greece?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I had a fairly detailed exchange on this very issue with Senator Gigantès the other day.

In a nutshell, we want to get our troops out of Cyprus. We have been there for 28 years. We regret exceedingly that the latest round of mediated talks between the parties has not succeeded. We will, of course, do nothing precipitous. We will take our action after giving due notice, and in consultation with all the parties concerned.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: In 1967, the NATO allies of Greece, with the participation of Canada, urged the Greek government to remove the 40,000 troops it then had in Cyprus. Unfortunately, the Greek government complied. The NATO allies had indicated to Greece at that time that it was incorrect in fearing a Turkish invasion.

Seven years later, there was a Turkish invasion. A group of Greek Cypriots had temporarily overthrown the Archbishop, took over the island, and their slogan was "Union with Greece". The Greek government immediately said it would not consider union, as was its international obligation. Then the Turks invaded. At that time, 16 percent of the population of Cyprus was Turkish. However, the Turkish troops took more than 40 percent of the island.

Since NATO had asked Greece to remove its troops, leaving Cyprus defenceless—Turkey is only 40 miles away, and the nearest Greek airport is 600 miles away—there is a residual moral obligation on the part of the Greeks, and all the members of NATO, to give protection to Cyprus against the extension of the Turkish invasion.

[Senator Stewart.]

• (1440)

Senator Murray: I appreciate the point made by the honourable senator. There is a lot of history there, some of it even more recent than that mentioned by Senator Gigantès.

In any case, I think it is expecting too much of Canada that we stay there in perpetuity to keep the peace between those two factions. They have to work something out between themselves. At any rate, there are other countries in the world which have a capacity for contributing to these peacekeeping efforts.

Let me repeat, we do want to withdraw our troops from that island.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

CONSIDERATION OF BILL C-86—REASON FOR REFUSAL OF LIBERAL SENATORS TO PARTICIPATE

Hon. Jacques Hébert: When answering Senator Bonnell a moment ago, the Leader of the Government in the Senate put on his best offended expression and went on to misrepresent the action taken yesterday by the Liberal members of the Social Affairs Committee.

We never intended to offend the High Commissioner, as you seem to bitterly deplore. Not only that, but— What is it I hear coming from that side? Was it a grunt, a Simard grunt?

Do not worry. We clarified the situation with the High Commissioner who was in attendance. We explained our actions to the High Commissioner who had understood perfectly what was going on. Our conduct had not offended him at all, especially after witnessing the scene—you know what I am talking about, unless it was not reported to you—following Senator Di Nino's announcement that Monday was the cut-off, that it would all be over Monday by closure.

Are you aware of that, Senator Murray?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): No. What is your question, Senator Hébert?

Senator Hébert: If the Liberal members of the committee got up and left, it was not to offend the High Commissioner but in reaction to closure being imposed on us. That is why we left. All I ask of you is to recognize that.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the absent are always in the wrong.

WAGE CLAIM PAYMENT ACT

BANKRUPTCY ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER WAGE CLAIMS ARISING FROM BANKRUPTCIES—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to follow up on an exchange that I had with Senator Kirby during yesterday's Question Period, in the course of which the honourable senator reminded me of an undertaking that had been given by my cabinet colleague, Mr. Blais, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, at the time of the enactment of Bill C-22 last spring. The commitment was to the effect that the government would proceed to set up a joint committee of the two houses to study wage claims.

Yesterday, I undertook to speak to the minister. I have now received a letter from him, assuring me that he fully intends to carry out that commitment. In that letter, he states:

> At this moment the final form of the committee mandate is being determined and steps are being taken to get the process started.

He says further that he expects to meet with both the government house leader in the other place and our house leader here in the Senate to work out the details pertaining to this committee.

POINT OF ORDER

BILL TO DISSOLVE OR TERMINATE CERTAIN CORPORATIONS—REMARKS OF SENATOR STOLLERY DURING DEBATE

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

Senators who were here yesterday will remember that when Senator Stollery was speaking during the continuation of the debate on second reading of Bill C-63, there was a brief intervention by my colleague Senator Chaput-Rolland to which Senator Stollery made a reply reflecting upon her attendance, to the effect that she should have known about the subject to which he was referring.

I have looked through the Debates of the Senate for yesterday and find no reference at all to the remark of Senator Stollery in that respect. Am I the only one here who heard it?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator MacDonald: Realizing that there are certain privileges given to senators to change the "blues", to change a word here and there, I find it hard to believe that a whole sentence could be expunged from the record. I wonder if the Table can give me an explanation concerning this matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we will have to check on the matter and report back tomorrow.

OFFICIAL RECORD

CORRECTION TO HANSARD

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, now that this point of order has been raised, I wish to mention an error which appears in the Debates of the Senate for December 7, 1992 as reported at page 2342.

Normally, one would have had a chance to read over the "blues" but, as honourable senators know, we sat very late that night and, presumably, the staff had to work well into the early hours of the morning in order to produce the text. I am quoted as having said:

> So, there was this proposal for an immediate increase of 18 senators for each of those two provinces.

Clearly, that was wrong. I said, unless I was confused by reason of the late hour:

> . . . an immediate decrease of 18 senators for each of those two provinces, to be balanced by an immediate increase of 18 members of the House of Commons for each of those two provinces.

I realize that we no longer have a chance to correct the printed debates. I think there should be some new arrangement to make the "blues" available when the Senate sits very late. I do not think we can expect the staff, at that late hour and under the pressure of time, to deal with what may be complicated material. There should be some way of preventing such errors from passing into the permanent record of this house. Perhaps some consideration could be given to that problem. I am referring only to those times when the Senate sits very late.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Wednesday afternoons are usually to be limited to Senators' Statements, Routine Proceedings and urgent government business. However, yesterday it was agreed that Bill S-16, which deals with the United Grain Growers, be put on the Orders of the Day for third reading today.

Because of the urgency of getting this bill over to the other place for a decision before they adjourn, I ask leave that third reading be given to that bill at this time.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

PRIVATE BILL

UNITED GRAIN GROWERS, LIMITED—BILL TO AMEND ACT OF INCORPORATION—THIRD READING

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes moved third reading of Bill S-16, to restructure United Grain Growers, Limited.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

● (1450)

BILL TO DISSOLVE OR TERMINATE CERTAIN CORPORATIONS

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, for the second reading of Bill C-63, to dissolve or terminate certain corporations and other bodies.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, Bill C-63 is a strange and puzzling act. It comes at a rather curious time in our public life. This bill dissolves or terminates six major Canadian institutions: The Economic Council of Canada; the Science Council of Canada; the Canadian Employment and Immigration Advisory Council; the Canadian Institute for Peace and Security; the International Centre for Ocean Development; and the Law Reform Commission of Canada. The list of these organizations reads like an honour roll; an honour roll of some of the most distinguished and publicly credible organizations that so assist us in our public life.

Honourable senators, I say that this is a strange act of public policy, because one would have thought that a government so apparently bereft of ideas, whose economic agenda is in tatters, and which has been so fully discredited in public opinion, while at the same time its constitutional agenda was so recently savaged in a referendum—this government of all governments would welcome a renewal of fresh ideas, a renewal of fresh sources of idea-making.

This government, it appears to the public, seems to be bankrupt of ideas and bereft of actions, other than to mindlessly cut, slash, eliminate, terminate, dissolve. This bill is not only a massive assault on ideas but, more significantly, it is a massive castration of process, of the free flow of thoughtful ideas and researched advice, advice which the government itself sought from its own handcrafted, custom-tooled process commission, the Spicer Commission.

What did Spicer tell this government? Indeed, what did the Spicer Commission tell this Parliament? That both were out of touch with the public, not merely with ideas but the very process, the very credible process, of developing ideas. Government and Parliament is not trusted. The public is wise. It wanted a process that could develop ideas that would ultimately turn into policies and public programs from more independent sources.

The government now, curiously, turns around and makes peremptory strikes to destroy the independent idea factories that have been so carefully and so painstakingly created, and to disperse idea-makers. Rather than listen to what Spicer and the public has said, rather than listen to what the government's own focus groups said—that Parliament and government needed more ideas, more independent ideas, more independent consensus-building—the government introduces this bill which terminates the very agencies that develop the ideas and create a process of consensus.

[Senator .]

Each of these people organizations form an invaluable bridge between our institutions of higher learning, the idea-makers in the private sector, and the government. These are the so-called best brains in Canada. This bill does more damage. It clearly sets out to destroy a Canadian idea, a Canadian concept, a concept that says very succinctly that in Canada we prefer to develop arm's-length, independent advice, so carefully nurtured by a bipartisan process that started well before World War II, and to develop arm's length agencies to explore alternate policies and unite people across the country, around change, around alternative ideas and alternative policies. I am referring to agencies, honourable senators, which would not represent narrow specialist groups, regions, provinces, or special interest lobbies, but would do the opposite. They would winnow out the seedy, narrow ideas, through a process that was arm's length, free of public and private special pleading or prejudice, and free of special interests, ideas to enhance the federal state, ideas to enhance federal policies, ideas to unite Canada.

Are there lessons to be learned? If history cannot guide or inform us, perhaps historians can. We find a rather fascinating debate by Ray Porter, the most distinguished English historian, in his book about historians. Porter chose to draw our attention to Gibbon who wrote The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, and Gibbon's views of three other well-known and distinguished public philosophers of that day, Voltaire, Montesquieu and Hume.

Honourable senators, I will not be referring to our colleague John Stewart today, but I should bring to your attention that John Stewart is one of the world's outstanding experts on Hume's public philosophy, and he has recently published a book called, Opinion and Reform in Hume's Political Philosophy, by the Princeton University Press. I commend it to every Parliamentarian as required reading this Christmas. I hope, in the future, we will be able to come back after everybody has learned the lessons of Hume as projected by our colleague Senator Stewart, and have a useful debate. My references to Hume today will not be from his text. We will leave that to another day.

To return to my flow of ideas, Gibbon gave his view of these three public philosophists. Gibbon believed that the decline and fall of civilizations could best be measured by a straight narrative of main events. Voltaire, he felt, was too much the polemicist. Voltaire wrote that history was "a tale of disaster and darkness and ignorance, terror and error" which led Voltaire to roam freely over historical ideas and pick and choose and write his own personal version of history.

Montesquieu sought to discover the patterns, the deeper meanings behind history through the eyes of a sociologist. Montesquieu looked for the spirit behind the laws, and he argued that the essence of government lies not in our constitutions but rather in the nature of our civic virtue and the nature of our civic debate. Hume took, I think, more of a psychologist's view of history and tried to understand history and public process by his focus on human nature.

Yet all of these public philosophers and historians agreed that free ideas, thoughtful, independent, informed ideas, and the debate of informed ideas, was considered the very best measure against the corruption of public life—not the corruption of personal dishonesty, but the more pervasive corruption of government power that sought to limit, contain, evade, manipulate, censor, dissolve, terminate and control public debate.

The best way to root out this corruption would be by public education, the greatest of all public virtues, and this could only be made necessary to instill in us a vibrant powerful democracy which could operate in the public interest, in informed public education and in informed public debate.

• (1500)

Who in this chamber can take comfort from this bill and these actions by the government? I take no comfort in the decline of the Conservative Party. I believe in a vibrant democracy, composed of contesting national parties containing different value systems, contesting men and women with differing ideas of government. When one of these robust national parties slips into decline and decay and this form of public corruption, democratic government suffers, democracy suffers, because the government forces itself to take desperate measures contrary to the public interest.

Therefore, I find it so strange and so difficult to understand why those who believe in our North American form of democracy with two major contesting, healthy national parties, would not be deeply concerned that the very federal institutions that foster and educate public debate in this country should be debilitated and disabled, and precisely after the public has so resoundingly told us that it does not trust Parliament. What a strange and, if you will forgive me, senators, confused reading of the public mood and mind.

We are told that, at best, $71 million will be saved, but when we read the ministerial statements and examine the text, we find that we will not really save $71 million because many of the functions carried on by these learned institutions, these wonderful organizations, will still be carried on but brought in-house by the government. Many functions will be government functions, not arm's length functions.

The real reason cannot be money. Let me quote from the statement on third reading in the other place by the government representative.

> As well, the activities performed by the organizations being wound up have been reviewed. Those that are consistent with the government priorities and that are not being performed by other government organizations will be continued.

The real reason, therefore, is not the economic saving. The real reason is not the cost benefit to the public purse. The real reason is to control ideas and make only those ideas which conform with government priorities public policy. What a sad state. What a sad state of public debate.

Those of us who have been privileged to serve in government know that government, of necessity, gives priority to the difficulties of the day. It cannot concentrate on the difficulties of next week, next month, next year or the next decade. I find this bill a public tragedy at a time when these very agencies, as other speakers have so eloquently noted, are so vitally needed. What a tragedy that the Economic Council of Canada studying public health care, education and the deployment of capital in a technological society—all vital issues, we are told by the government, of economics and growth—should now be ripped from the public agenda.

I find it incomprehensible that the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security should be murdered at a time when we are told that there is a change in foreign policy, when there is a change toward peace and security, precisely when the old world order is disintegrating before our eyes and each democratic leader and government is seeking to develop a new, complex, different agenda to accelerate the growth of democracy in eastern Europe, Asia, Africa, Central American and South America.

I find it mystifying that the Science Council of Canada should be abolished when scientific research is considered a national priority in every developed nation in the world, let alone the underdeveloped nations.

Senators, I claim no knowledge of oceanic science, but I do sit here and I do listen to the government, and I know and we know that the government announced only a few months ago, for the first time in Canadian history, that the fishery, the life and sustenance of the east coast, should be gutted because of government mismanagement. They could not think ahead. We know now from our own experience in our travels around the world that the oceanic environment will be of crucial importance in the next century. Yet this government eradicates the very international centre for ocean development dedicated to these ideas.

The most mystifying to me, honourable senators, is the abolition of the National Law Reform Commission. I admit my bias. I took some personal pride in the birth of this creative federal institution. I, amongst others, was very actively engaged in the sixties in persuading the government of the day that the federal state required a federal law reform commission and that such a law reform commission should be established.

There was a wide consensus that the law in the hands of the agencies of government, federal and provincial, could not keep up with the rapid changes that were necessary to renovate our federal legal structure. Therefore, an agency that could look ahead, that had the time to look ahead, that had the men and women to look ahead in this vital area of law reform, should be established. And it was established, not just for the sake of faster reform of law, which was so vitally necessary, but to develop a greater consensus to dissolve the two solitudes between our two legal systems, between French and English jurisprudence, between the east and the west, among the judges, the lawyers, the officials, the police and the academics, in the hope that a new and vital federal legal structure with trained legal minds that could understand each other, each in their own language, would make Canada's federal structure one of the leading federal structures in the world.

Honourable senators, I find myself dismayed by the termination of this commission's mandate. I forced myself to read the original debates on the formation of the Law Reform Commission. It was introduced in 1970 by the Honourable John Turner who was one of Canada's most distinguished ministers of justice. At that time he said he was looking to create an organization that would dissolve the solitudes between French and English, that would have not just a bilingual system of law but a bijural system of law where the legal notions of both systems could be taken one from the other and exchanged.

I was told just a few months ago by Canada's leading judicial figure that the most invaluable service which had prepared him to understand the nation, and prepared him to assume the highest judicial office in the land, were the years that he served on Canada's Law Reform Commission with commissioners across the land.

Think of it, senators: Only three countries in the Commonwealth —Canada, Bangladesh and Zimbabwe—will now be without a National Law Reform Commission. Think of the work the National Law Reform Commission brought to the codification of our criminal system. Pioneering studies of law and genetics—a vital issue for the 21st century—and other such tasks will now be brought back into a Department of Justice overworked with the routine of government day-to-day business. The Department of Justice will not have available to it an independent body to plot a course in the complex and vital issues of the law. What a public disgrace.

Finally, what can one say about a government that, on one hand, recognizes the need for a greater understanding of employment and immigration yet, on the other, abolishes Canada's Employment and Immigration Advisory Council?

• (1510)

Something is happening in the government. Whether it is blindness or paralysis, it is most difficult to understand. What is even more difficult to understand is how Parliament, the other place, can sit by so bankrupt of ideas, so roundly discredited by the public, and allow these agencies to go down. What a school for scandal!

What is of greater surprise to me, honourable senators, is that capable, talented men and women on the other side in this Senate, supporters of this government, distinguished academics, public servants, scientists, journalists, lawyers, business people, educators, every one of whom recognizes the necessity for a process of quiet deliberation in order to develop informed ideas, particularly in a world where we are flooded with over-information, would allow these fragile idea factories to be dismantled.

[Senator Grafstein.]

When the history of this government is written, I am confident that observers will point to this bill as yet another self-inflicted wound, an auto-da-fé that finally accelerated the government's demise.

Honourable senators, I take no delight in this measure; I take no delight in this speech; I take no delight in the loss that Canada, whose leaders should be searching out new ideas, finds itself incapable of allowing people with informed ideas to contribute to public debate in a thoughtful, independent process. The fault, honourable senators, lies not in the stars, but deep within the recesses of this government, this Parliament, this Senate, and the little minds that cannot cope with other people's ideas. I pray that wisdom will prevail, and that the Senate will trash this insidious bill as it so richly deserves.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, for the benefit of Senator Lynch-Staunton, I will give a translation of an ancient Greek quotation: "Those whom the gods wish to destroy, they first render foolish."

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, that this bill be read the second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators opposed to the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): We have no objection to deferring the vote, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. William Kelly: A 15-minute bell, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. John B. Stewart: We have rules, Mr. Speaker. We adjourn at 3 o'clock to allow committees to meet. What are you doing?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): We have not changed the rules. We are trying out a new schedule which will hopefully let us out on Wednesdays—

Senator Stewart: You demonstrate that you have no intention of letting it work.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The rules have not been altered. We had agreement on both sides to try out a new schedule on Wednesday afternoons which would allow us to hold committee hearings as close to 3 o'clock as possible. It could be a few minutes before or a few minutes after 3 o'clock. It will be a few minutes after today.

Senator Kelly: A 15-minute bell, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: The vote will be held at 3:25.

• (1520)

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time on the following division:

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the clock ticketh.

Senator Doody: Bong, bong!

Senator Frith: It will chime when you have the courage to call an election. Between times, it ticketh. Let the record show that Senator Doody is ready. That is one heard from.

Senator Molgat: Nineteen days of contempt for democracy.

Senator Simard: But is Mr. Chrétien really ready for an election?

Senator Frith: Try us, sir. Let the record show that Senator Simard wants to try it, too. Speak to the Prime Minister. You will find out whether he is ready or not.

Senator Gigantès: Prime Minister Jean Chrétien. You will be saying it in your nightmares.

Senator Frith: And so, on this day we have the nineteenth day of contempt for democracy and political cowardice of this government. We have on the record also that Senator Doody is ready.

Senator Doody: Ready.

Senator Frith: And that Senator Simard wants an offer made.

Senator Simard: We want to hear from Mr. Chrétien himself, as to whether he is ready.

Senator Frith: You speak to the Prime Minister. I guarantee you that if he makes that offer, and you can speak for the Prime Minister, Mr. Chrétien is ready.

UNITED NATIONS DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

FORTY-FOURTH ANNIVERSARY

Senator Beaudoin: Forty-four years ago today, on December 10, 1948, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted by the United Nations.

This was one of the most significant events of this century. This declaration came after a number of other historical charters and declarations such as the U.S. Bill of Rights of 1789, France's Déclaration des droits de l'homme et du citoyen of 1789 and the Bill of Rights of 1689 in Great Britain.

Several nations voted for this Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Following the Second World War, the constitutions of several newly independent nations would be inspired by this model.

In Canada, the Canadian Bill of Rights, a constitution-like Charter, was adopted at the federal level in 1960 and, in 1982, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms was entrenched in our Constitution.

This Charter was to change the course of history in Canada. Over a period of ten years, the Supreme Court of Canada has based in excess of 200 decisions on it, thirty or fourty of which are considered as milestones, key decisions. This Charter revolutionized our legal system and profoundly altered the lives of the Canadian people.

It is a good thing to protect individual rights and minority rights under the Constitution.

I am pleased that Canada drew its inspiration from the International Declaration of Human Rights in 1960 and again in 1982.

THE VALOUR AND THE HORROR—CENSORSHIP OF NFB FILM—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Monday, December 14, 1992, I will move:

> That the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be instructed to cease its consideration and examination of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and National Film Board series entitled The Valour and The Horror, and that the committee be instructed not to present a report thereon to the Senate.

Senator Doody: Censorship.

Senator Frith: We will all have a chance to speak on this motion. The government supports this, does it?

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 509 citizens of Alberta who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Pincher Creek, Watertown Park, Coleman, Lethbridge, Grande Prairie and Calgary.

Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 500 citizens of Quebec who oppose the goods and services tax, especially on books and magazines, which should bring back fond memories to Senator Chaput-Rolland.

I am sure that her Prime Minister will soon correct that situation!

These petitions come mainly from St-André, Matapédia, Caplan, L'Ascension, Nouvelle, Bryson, Victoriaville, St-Godefroi, Grande-Rivière, Joliette, Longueuil, Chicoutimi, St-Léon, Lévis, Lauzon, Montréal and Quebec.

These petitions were signed in the spring of 1992, so they are relatively recent.

A total of 1,009 petitioners have availed themselves of their ancient democratic right to express their opposition to a cynical, opportunistic and backward measure.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

INCREASING RATES OF UNEMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I will not harangue the Leader of the Government if he decides to take this question as notice, because I would like a considered answer to it as a part of government policy. He may decide that he would prefer to deal with it under the inquiry of Senator MacEachen on the recent economic statement made by the Minister of Finance.

For some time now, the government, persuaded by, among others, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, has been waging a war on inflation. So far as inflation is concerned, I think one must accept that it has waged that war successfully. Inflation has been controlled.

However, most economists agree—and I think the government will agree—that there has been a serious price for that war, and that price has been steadily increasing rates of unemployment, to the point where most people in the country seem to consider unemployment the most serious of Canada's problems.

Having heard the Governor of the Bank of Canada say that price stability is close by, is the government prepared to switch its target and make unemployment its economic enemy number one instead of inflation?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I probably will not be going into that subject in detail when I speak on Senator MacEachen's inquiry.

Senator Austin: Why not?

Senator Murray: Because I have other plans, and Senator MacEachen has raised other important issues which I wish to address. When he has completed his speech, I will enter the debate.

I think that the Leader of the Opposition is mistaken in believing that the old theory of a real trade-off between unemployment and inflation still holds. I think he is mistaken in believing that it still holds to the extent that it once did. The theory itself is under increasing question by economists and others.

• (1410)

Senator Olson: It is about time.

Senator Murray: We can have a situation in which there is simultaneously high unemployment and high inflation. We had it for quite a few years under the government of my honourable friends opposite.

Senator Thériault: Not quite a few years. One year. Maybe two at the most.

Senator Hastings: Maybe three.

Senator Thériault: Maybe three at the most, but not four consecutive years. Only under Bennett and Mulroney was were those two rates simultaneously high for five consecutive years.

Senator Murray: Double-digit inflation, double-digit unemployment, and double-digit interest rates were well known during the early 1980s under the regime of my friend.

Senator Gigantès: Well, we were not selling out to the drug companies!

Senator Murray: The Leader of the Opposition referred to statements by the governor and deputy governor of the bank. When we announced the inflation reduction targets in February 1991, we defined price stability as inflation clearly less than 2 per cent. Therefore the governor of the bank is quite correct, in that context, in saying that we are close to price stability. We agree with this.

Senator Frith: In my question, you realize that I was not arguing about whether he was right. However, we will pursue this matter further.

THE ECONOMY

CURTAILMENT OF SPENDING RELATING TO OFFICIAL LANGUAGES PROGRAM

Hon. Jean-Marie Simard: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. But first the context.

True to the government's promise, the Minister of Finance, Mr. Mazankowski, with his economic statement of December 2, launched a two-day debate in the House on the direction of his future economic policy. The minister also announced a series of measures to control the deficit.

These measures were strongly criticized by the opposition parties and the super-economists in many media, but they did not tell us what measures would have been more appropriate. In short, the critics' slogan was: "Let others tighten their belts."

After enumerating the objectives of growth through job creation and investment in small business, improved support for R&D, investment in human resources and public infrastructure, and enhancing our trade potential, the minister talked about the sound budget policy necessary to achieve these goals. He proposed new measures to reduce government spending, once again.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Question!

Senator Simard: Without going into details, the minister announced measures which should save the government about $8 billion.

Salary freezes for the whole public service, including us, and the employees of Crown corporations.

Senator Frith: Question!

Senator Simard: If Senator Frith will give me a few more seconds, I think he will see the point of my question. In particular, he will see the consequences of a government decision, and the impact it could have on official minority communities.

Being unable to obtain clarifications from individual departments —

[English]

Senator Gigantès: Come on, Barootes, intervene. You are always intervening. The rules say something about preambles. Come on, Senator Simard, be fair. It is not easy, but try to be fair.

Senator Molgat: He is establishing a precedent, and that is fine.

Senator Simard: No, Senator Olson has established that precedent many times.

Senator Frith: We will be following the Simard formula from here on in. According to the Simard formula, "I have the following speech to make."

[Senator Frith.]

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, it will just take a little longer, I would appreciate a little more restraint from our friends opposite. Until we can get further clarification from individual departments on how to interpret these general rules, and particularly the comment that no further restraint will be imposed on the major federal transfers to the provinces . . .

Honourable senators, I think official language minority groups, like many Canadians, are prepared to do their share for the public good and to help control the deficit. However, we must realize that implementing these measures may be almost a matter of life and death in some instances.

I will just give you one example. All our governments recognize the fact that the existence across Canada of official language minorities is a fundamental characteristic of this country and that their enhancement and development is vital. As you know, first of all, minority language education is the key to that development, and second, a number of provinces do not always meet their commitments in this respect, despite a clear and unequivocal judgment by the Supreme Court. We know they are prepared to meet those commitments but would be unable to do so without federal participation. In provinces like Ontario, and elsewhere, everyone recognizes the need to establish post-secondary institutions for Francophones. And finally, it is a fact that federal-provincial agreements on education will have to be renewed by March 1993. I am sure our friends opposite appreciate the fact that I am now going to put my question to the Leader of the Government.

Here is my question for the Leader of the Government: Considering that most Francophone communities have historically tended to lag behind, especially in education, and also considering the Mulroney government's commitment in the Official Languages Act, 1988, to enhancing the vitality and supporting the development of official language minorities, could Senator Murray give us the assurance that this will be a major consideration when implementing the measures announced by the minister, Mr. Mazankowski, on December 2?

And second, can he also give us the assurance that no further restraint will be imposed on federal transfers to the provinces in these areas, and finally, that transfer payments will be sufficient to achieve government objectives?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, when the Minister of Finance said in his statement the other day that no further restraint would be imposed on the major federal transfers to the provinces, he was referring to programs like equalization, assistance to post-secondary education and medicare.

These programs are already covered by the Expenditure Control Plan, pursuant to legislation passed by Parliament following the 1991 Budget.

The other programs like those mentioned by the honourable senator are subject to the cuts announced by Mr. Mazankowski. In general, the projected amounts for 1993-94 are to be cut by 10 per cent.

The programs referred to by Senator Simard are the promotion of official languages and official languages in education. The first program has a budget of $50 million a year, so it is to be reduced by $5 million. The official languages in education program has a budget of $250 million and in 1993-94, it is to be cut by $25 million.

I must say that given the economic and fiscal situation facing the Minister of Finance, these cuts do not seem excessive to me.

Senator Simard: I thank Senator Murray for his explanations. I think that in applying a general budgetary directive from the Minister of Finance, public servants too often in the past suggested some cuts that were generally the hardest for the government to accept. Then the government is stuck with those options which are not really viable. For example, I need only take the suggestion made by officials of the Department of National Revenue, Customs and Excise, who proposed closing the border stations in New Brunswick for seven hours and leaving them open for only about an hour a day and some days not at all and closing U.S. entry points to New Brunswick. Of course, in such cases it is up to the government to decide whether or not the suggestions are acceptable.

On this particular point, I remember reading that Minister Valcourt said, "Look, I think that we will do our job and try to cut somewhere else."

I return to my question. I hope that in all government programs, the government will take into consideration not only officials' suggestions but also how far official-language communities are lagging behind and will ensure that some programs are maintained at a zero-growth level, even if it means cutting others by 15 to 20 per cent.

So I thank Senator Murray for his explanations. To conclude, I now come to my second question. Last night a group of parliamentarians met with representatives of athe Canadian Federation of Francophones and Acadians. One thing they told us it that they were promised a meeting with the Prime Minister eight months ago. I would like Senator Murray —

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order, please. The honourable senator has a point of order.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I want to ask whether the use of all of the Question Period by Senator Simard is designed to prevent this side from asking questions of the government under the rules, or whether the Leader of the Government will agree that none of our time for Question Period has been taken up by Senator Simard's peroration?

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Honorable senators, I can assure you that it was certainly not my intention to do that. In the past, senators have always allowed Question Period to be extended. I would also remind you that senators on this side seldom ask any questions and I hope you will be kind enough to allow me to finish.

[English]

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, this is an abuse of rule 26. Senators are not allowed to make an extensive preamble to a question. For the record, I think this is an extensive preamble and I believe that this is a matter the Speaker should take under advisement, as to whether or not what the honourable senator has done this afternoon is an abuse of rule 26.

• (1430)

I say that with a certain amount of irony. It is something like watching my least favourite relative drive over a cliff in my brand new BMW.

The topic is significant, but the time for this type of speech is not during Question Period. On the one hand, I congratulate the honourable senator; on the other hand, I cannot appreciate what he is doing.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I understand that Senator Austin did make a specific reference to the Chair and to rule 26 of the Rules of the Senate, which states:

> A preamble to a question, whether it is asked orally or in writing, is out of order. Without giving any lengthy ruling, if honourable senators will agree, I would ask Senator Simard if he would pose his question.

Senator Simard: I was on the second question.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the topic Senator Simard is addressing is worthwhile, as is his intervention. The problem is with when he is doing it, because the clock is ticking on Question Period. All we are concerned with is the fact that Your Honour may rise and advise us that we have reached the end of Question Period; and Question Period will have been squandered on a worthwhile point which could have been made under another heading.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Thank you, Senator Austin. I would simply put the following question to the Leader of the government: Could he arrange for the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadiennes to meet and present to the Prime Minister of Canada say, as soon as possible, or after Christmas, its concerns and its proposals so that those have a chance to be fulfilled?

As for Senator's Austin question —

[English]

If Senator Austin feels I have abused the Rules of the Senate as they relate to Question Period, I say to him that Question Period is the time when senators are allowed to put urgent questions.

Last night, as I have said, a group from La Fédération des Communautés francophones-acadiennes met with us and indicated they had a pressing and urgent problem. Thus it is my duty, at the first opportunity—and it is surely that—to raise the question.

Furthermore, if Senator Austin feels I have abused the rules of the Senate, I would ask him to remember that Acadians and French-speaking minorities have been abused by the system and, over the years, have had to pay the price. I am sure Acadians, among others, know what we are talking about when we use the word "abuse", and will probably forgive me if I "abuse" the time of the Senate today.

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to continue with the questions raised by Senator Simard because I too believe that it is a very important issue.

I want to make it perfectly clear that if there were comments from this side of the chamber, it was not because we thought that the issue was unimportant. It is just that it was perhaps contrary to the Rules of the Senate. But perhaps we should indeed have some in applying the Rules.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that in the present case you will be flexible since the Question Period was somewhat truncated by a speech. Granted, it was an important speech, but I do hope that you will not stick to the Rule.

In any case, Senator Simard, I would have many more questions to ask myself but I know that certain of my colleagues have some as well.

I have questions to ask on others topics but I will give the floor to my colleagues now and come back later with more. I must say that I am in total agreement with the seriousness of the problem you raised.

[English]

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I had risen just as Senator Simard rose, and I deferred to him when he put a question to the chamber. This is not the time to answer the points he made, except to say that the single issue before us at the moment is to follow the rules during Question Period, and for the opposition to be given this time, which is its historic time in parliamentary convention, to ask the government to account to the people of Canada for its conduct.

[Senator Simard.]

THE ROYAL FAMILY

FORMAL ANNOUNCEMENT OF SEPARATION OF PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES—CONSULTATION WITH CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government and relates to the announcement made yesterday by the British Prime Minister, John Major, with respect to the separation of the Princess and Prince of Wales. Was the Government of Canada or the Governor General in any way consulted with respect to this change in marital relations of the Prince of Wales who is the Crown Prince of Canada?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no idea.

Senator Austin: Would the government leader undertake to make inquiries? In my opinion, the question of the standing of the Crown in Canada is an important constitutional question.

Senator Murray: Yes, honourable senators.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

CURTAILMENT OF CUTS RELATING TO OFFICIAL LANGUAGES PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, to return to the subject raised by Senator Simard, I listened with great interest to not only his question, but to the answer of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. If there is one place where we should be able to talk about minority problems, especially those related to official languages, it is in this chamber.

I wish our rules were flexible enough so that, when an evidently important subject such as this is raised, we could quickly extend Question Period. Surely, if senators agree on the substance of a question, an extension should be granted promptly.

That being said, I think Senator Murray gave us a very important answer. I understand that when the responsibility of reduction of expenditure seizes a government, it is never a delicate operation. It is not a matter for fine surgery; it is more a matter for the sword and the axe.

However, I am sure Senator Murray understands that those who have the least supply of oxygen should not be cut off at the same level as those who have an abundance of oxygen available. Obviously I use the word "oxygen" in place of the word "culture".

The survival of the official language minorities in this country, as assumed by successive federal governments going back to the Lévesque-Massey Commission in the time of Louis St. Laurent, must be examined very carefully before being subjected to the rather indelicate type of cuts that take place when the mood grabs a cabinet, whatever political parties are involved.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I do not disagree with a word I have heard from the honourable senator, or from my friend Senator Simard, who is himself a former Minister of Finance for New Brunswick and understands some of the pressures that are on the treasuries.

This year, most of the cuts in grants and contributions are being done, I acknowledge, across the board. However, a certain amount of flexibility is allowed. The fact of the matter is that the two programs that we are talking about here have been protected—I say completely—in further cost-cutting exercises, at least in my time in the cabinet.

The two programs are, first, the Promotion of Official Languages Program which, as the honourable senator well knows, provides assistance to official language communities by virtue of the amendments to the Official Languages Act of 1988; and, second, the Official Languages in Education Program which does, as I recall, two things: It assists provinces in the teaching of French or English as a second language; and it assists provinces to provide French language education in nine provinces and English language education in Quebec.

• (1440)

Just for the record, let me give honourable senators the statistics relating to the amounts of money that have been involved in the last couple of years. The Promotion of Official Languages Program, which I described as being worth some $50 million for 1993-94, will be cut by 10 per cent, or $5 million.

In 1989-90, the figure for the program was $43.7 million. In 1990-91 it was $45 million. In 1991-92 it was $46.9 million. In 1992-93 it appears that it was $47.2 million.

The Official Languages in Education Program figure for 1989-90 was $246 million; for 1990-91, it was $256 million; and $265 million for 1991-92. The figure I have here for 1992-93 is $261 million, which would, I think, include the compressions that were announced toward the end of this fiscal year.

That is a fair amount of money. As I say, those programs have been protected completely in previous cost-cutting exercises. The amounts that are involved for 1993-94 do not seem to me to be excessive under the circumstances. The federal government is paying and will continue to pay, a good share of the freight for these programs.

We share the frustration expressed by Senator Simard and others that even with the obligations under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, not all provinces are playing their part.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to continue on this same subject.

What worries me is that I am not overly surprised by the last decision of this government concerning the cultural and linguistic development of the French minority of this country.

It seems we should look at this last event in a more global context. These last months for example, we had the opportunity to experience an attack on French-Canadians with the bill on airport transfer.

Government had to table a bill to maintain some of the rights of the French-speaking employees of the airports managed by Transport Canada.

Recently, Senator Simard announced himself his intention of requesting that government maintain at least the linguistic aspect of the Court Challenges Program.

Just last week we saw what the Minister of Finance wants to cut.

I wonder if this government is still determined not only to maintain the existing programs, but to reinforce them: all the recent figures published by Statistics Canada show that the situation is totally impossible for French-Canadians.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the rules require that I point out that the 30 minutes allotted for Question Period has now expired. If there is leave, then Question Period may continue.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, under those circumstances I ask for unanimous consent to extend the Question Period.

However, if the rules state that it must conclude after 30 minutes, then by the same token the rules also preclude Senator Simard from continuing his preamble for as long as he did, and the Speaker should have interrupted him. I did not object. I do not object now. I think the issue he raises is important, and I have no objections. I simply make the point that if the rule was not applied then, I do not think it should be applied now.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there is a principle involved here. I have objected on many occasions to speeches being made during the Question Period from the other side of the house. I have objected without success to the practice.

I know that Senator Simard could have made his speech during the time set aside for Senators' Statements. His speech, or the partial speeches we have heard elsewhere, could also be made during the debate on Senator MacEachen's inquiry, which concerns the economic and fiscal statement of Mr. Mazankowski. If we extend the Question Period every time a couple of honourable senators go beyond the rules and give long preambles, we will have an extended Question Period every day.

Senator Frith: It's a stupid rule in the first place.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government says he has objected in the past to preambles from this side. I did not hear him object at all today to the preamble of Senator Simard.

Senator Murray: Because I have objected without success every time.

Senator Molgat: If honourable senators will look at the Order Paper for today, they will see that it is not loaded with a whole lot of material that will keep the house going for a long time this afternoon. I ask for unanimous consent to continue with Question Period at this time. I think it is a logical action for the Senate to take.

Senator Murray: I cannot accept that.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is there unanimous consent to continue with the Question Period?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: My understanding is that there is not unanimous consent.

Senator Molgat: Your Honour, if there is not unanimous consent, then I ask that a vote be taken. Let us see whether or not there is unanimous consent.

I move:

> That, by unanimous consent, there be a continuation of the Question Period.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a motion.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That motion is completely out of order. The honourable senator cannot make a motion to ask for unanimous consent.

Senator Molgat: It is clear, Your Honour, that the government side is opposing unanimous consent for granting an extension of the time set aside for Question Period, even though there was an abuse of the rules by one of their members; an abuse to which I do not object. The government is refusing unanimous consent for an extension of the time.

We know where we stand, Senator Murray.

Senator Frith: It is a stupid rule to begin with, and it has stupid consequences.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Rule 59 states:

> One day's notice shall be given of any of the following motions:
> (a) to suspend any rule or any part thereof . . .

Quite apart from that, it is my understanding that there was not unanimous consent, and the rules therefore require that I now read the next order of business, which is Delayed Answers.

Senator Molgat: Absolutely, Your Honour. They are rotten rules imposed by this government. Rotten rules! We object to them. We do not accept them in any way, and the government has again proved today what bad rules they are.

DELAYED ANSWERS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Government): I have an answer to a question raised by Senator Olson [Senator Murray.] on December 7, 1992, regarding the effect of the agreement between the United States and the EEC on the international grain markets.

AGRICULTURE

RESOLUTION OF DISPUTE ON EUROPEAN AND U.S. GRAIN SUBSIDIES— EFFECTS ON INTERNATIONAL GRAIN MARKET

(Response to question raised by Hon. H.A. Olson on December 7, 1992)

Canada warmly welcomes this breakthrough in the oilseeds dispute and in the Multilateral Trade Negotiations (MTN) on agriculture.

This agreement is welcome news for Canadian oilseed producers who have also suffered nullification or impairment of their access to the Economic Community (EC) market.

For the first time, there is now some kind of limit on EC oilseeds production. The new EC oilseed regime, which became official in December 1991 for the 1992/93 crop year, provided for a system of Maximum Guaranteed Areas (MGA) for payments for rapeseed, soybeans and sunflower seed. The total area of 5.621 million hectares consists of 2.377 million hectares (mln. ha.) of rapeseed, 2.735 mln. ha. of sunflower seeds (sunseeds) and 509,000 ha. of soybeans.

The tentative agreement between the EC and the U.S. calls for a reduction in the MGA to a level of 5.128 million ha.

The new MGA is to be effective for the 1995/96 crop year. A special regime applies for the 1994/95 crop year to take into account transitional arrangements for Spain and Portugal. The MGA is to be reduced by the Community set-aside requirement (currently 15 percent), and by a minimum of 10 percent or a maximum area of 4.615 mln. ha. once the agreement is fully in place.

If this maximum hectarage is exceeded, oilseed producers in the EC will receive smaller EC subsidy payments on all oilseed plantings. This will restrain planting and oilseed production. The EC has also agreed to enter into binding arbitration if the United States believes the agreement has been breached.

The agreement on MTN agricultural issues will aid Canadian oilseed producers. The 20% reduction in internal supports coupled with the export restraints, 21% on the volume eligible for export subsidies and a 36% reduction in export subsidy expenditures will create a more stable and predictable market which should help Canadian producers to once again penetrate the EC market while preserving their third country markets.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY LAW IMPROVEMENT ACT

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. James F. Kelleher moved second reading of Bill S-17, to amend the Copyright Act, the Industrial Design Act, the Integrated Circuit Topography Act, the Patent Act, the Trade-marks Act and other Acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to rise in my place today to move second reading to Bill S-17, the intellectual property law improvement bill.

This Chamber is well aware that measures to streamline and modernize Canada's intellectual property protection have been an important part of the agenda for economic renewal that the government has had in place since 1984. This government recognizes that ideas and innovations are the hard currency of today's knowledge-intensive economy. Legislation to protect invention and to reward creativity are integral to Canada's competitiveness and prosperity.

In 1987, we passed amendments to the Patent Act. The following year came important revisions to the Copyright Act. In 1990, we saw the passage of the Integrated Circuit Topography Act and the Plant Breeders' Rights Act. Today we have legislation in Canada that responds to today's needs for intellectual property protection. This is a tribute to the dedication, determination and commitment of this government.

Honourable senators, the legislation before us today is not as far-reaching as the previous efforts to streamline and modernize intellectual property. This bill includes technical revisions rather than sweeping reforms. Its objective is to improve intellectual property administration, practice, and procedures.

Honourable senators will be aware that the government has measures in place to review and revise its IP status. We do not want to be in a position again where decades go by before we can bring IP legislation up to date with modern requirements. This bill complements but does not replace this revision process. It amends various sections of five pieces of legislation: The Patent Act, the Trade-marks Act, the Copyright Act, the Industrial Design Act, and the Integrated Circuit Topography Act. Each of these acts relates to separate and distinct aspects of intellectual property. However, I think that honourable senators will recognize that, from the perspective of the marketplace, the statutes are closely related. Collectively, they provide the framework legislation that governs innovation in Canadian industry and research organizations. I wish to provide this chamber with just a few examples to illustrate the issues involved.

Under the Patent Act, an applicant is required to fully describe his or her invention. Some court decisions have indicated that these disclosure requirements must be satisfied by a written description. Honourable senators will be aware that some of the most important innovations today are in the field of biotechnology. In many situations, it is virtually impossible to use a written description to fully and adequately describe a new biological material. This legislation would permit the deposit of a sample of biological material to complement the disclosures required under the Patent Act.

The amendments would also enable the Patent Office to allow for the full electronic filing and processing of patent documents. This is an important step in creating a fully automated patent office by 1996.

The legislation will also correct a potentially serious technical problem in the existing Patent Act. Senators may be aware that, under the current provisions, the filing of a patent application automatically can, in certain circumstances, withdraw the protection of any previous application. This can create serious problems when protection from an earlier application is inadvertently removed. The internal priority provisions of this legislation remove this danger.

Those provisions will also facilitate the filing of patent applications in that, in certain circumstances and for a limited time, new inventive subject matter can be combined in one application with the subject matter of an earlier application. The application will retain the benefit of the initial filing date for the originally-filed material.

One of the amendments to the Trade-marks Act contained in this bill recognizes changes that have taken place since 1954 when the current provisions were put in place. A generation ago, licensing of trademarks was not a common practice, but today consumers have come to recognize that trademarks often do not identify one single entity, but rather a group of entities. This amendment abolishes the requirement to record licensees as registered users.

In the area of copyright, this bill addresses a few of many changes that the government is contemplating. These amendments will improve the operation and administration of the copyright office.

Finally, certain amendments to the Industrial Design Act are included in this legislation to protect industrial designers. I would remind honourable senators that most of this legislation in this area has been woefully out of date for decades. Successive governments have attempted to bring it in line with modern needs and have failed. The bill would ensure that the validity of an industrial design registration is not affected by failure to mark a protected article when registration was filed in the wrong name. These amendments are viewed as critically urgent by those who work in the field of industrial design.

Honourable senators, these revisions were developed in close consultation with Canadian creators and users of intellectual property. I would like to take this opportunity to thank the Intellectual Property Advisory Committee (IPAC) for its contribution. Since its creation in 1988, IPAC has been the central consultative forum for discussing the modernization of Canada's IP statutes. The committee includes 18 nongovernment members. They bring their experience from organizations and associations that represent the many facets, interests and viewpoints in intellectual property—business, cultural groups, consumers, universities, researchers, and expert practitioners.

The legislation before us today implements the recommendations for which there is consensus within the advisory committee. It relates to five different intellectual property statutes which, as I mentioned before, are closely related and collectively provide the framework legislation that governs the innovative activities of Canadian industries, research organizations and businesses.

It is fair legislation, necessary legislation, and I urge this chamber to support it and give it speedy passage.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kinsella, seconded by the Honourable Senator Oliver, for the second reading of Bill S-15, An Act to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act (sexual orientation)—Honourable Senator Molgat.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think this bill is not a good idea. Although its motivation is good, it ought to be withdrawn. There are three reasons for that:

I think it is unnecessary and establishes a dangerous precedent in the relationship between Parliament and the courts. Second, it runs the risk of defeating its objective. I think those who support the objective of this bill should quit while they are ahead because they are better off as they stand now without this bill. I will briefly explain why. Third, I think it creates a procedural problem in Parliament that ought to be clarified.

First reason: The starting point is that discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation had no basis in explicit statutory law. The words were not included in the relevant law as to human rights and, therefore, in the jurisdiction of human rights commissions. But the matter was argued before the courts and, as Senator Kinsella explained in his statement, there was a reason for the courts to approach this question and encouragement because of the Schachter case which set out, in general terms in the Supreme Court of Canada, the circumstances and the conditions in which a provision could be read into legislation.

Senator Kinsella's intervention gave us a very thorough and learned explanation of the Schachter case, but the case that is really on point, and directly involved in what is before us, is the Haig case. There was an importance in the Schachter case because, in effect, what the court said in the Haig case was that it would read sexual orientation into this legislation and therefore establish a protection against discrimination, but that a check would be made with Schachter, the Supreme Court case, to be sure that it would not run afoul of its principles.

Having done that in the Haig case, the Ontario Court of Appeal in effect read this protection into the legislation. Remember that both the Charter and the legislation are relevant when it comes to this protection.

There was a lower court decision that went up to the Court of Appeal. That lower court decision was stayed for six months in order to maintain the status quo, to see if the Crown wanted to appeal against the reading in of these provisions.

The case arrived at the Ontario Court of Appeal. The Crown did appeal, asking that the judgment be set aside. The respondents cross-appealed, asking for a declaration "that homosexuals are entitled to equal benefit and equal protection of the Canadian Human Rights Act" and "that homosexuals are entitled to seek and obtain redress against discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation from the Canadian Human Rights Commission".

The judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Krever in the Ontario Court of Appeal was lengthy and closely reasoned. I will just read the highlights that are important for us.

Though section 15 (1) of the Charter does not, in express terms, include sexual orientation as a basis of discrimination against which constitutional protection is guaranteed, Mr. Justice Krever found as a matter of law that:

> s. 15 (1) of the Charter provides protection not only to the enunciated grounds but also to grounds that are analogous to them . . .

Then he cites a 1989 Supreme Court case, and continues:

> — Courts in Canada have acted on the premise that sexual orientation is an analogous ground or is a ground covered by s. 15 of the Charter.

Then he cites some cases.

Senator Murray: We would not appeal that because that is the position that the Attorney General of Canada has taken.

Senator Frith: Of course. I agree with the original position of the Attorney General of Canada and the government on this matter.

Mr. Justice Krever found that while all prohibited grounds of discrimination listed in section 15 (1) of the Charter can give rise to successful actions under the Canadian Human Rights Act, "homosexual persons, who fall within a ground analogous to the constitutionally protected ground of sex, are, by exclusion, denied access".

He concluded:

> The failure to provide an avenue for redress for prejudicial treatment of homosexual members of society, and the possible inference from the omission that such treatment is acceptable, create the effect of discrimination offending s. 15(1) of the Charter.

Therefore the omission resulted in an offence against the Charter. Then the Crown expressly disallowed reliance on section 1 of the Charter, that is, such reasonable limits in a democratic society, et cetera. Mr. Justice Krever goes on:

> . . . the denial to homosexual persons of the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination by reason of the denial to them of access to the remedial provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act must be held to be unjustified in a free and democratic society.

That only left the appropriate judicial remedy. Striking down section 3 (1) of the Canadian Human Rights Act would be, of course, a pyrrhic victory to the respondents, those promoting the need for protection. Not only would they not gain access to the act, but large numbers already covered would lose their access; an absurd result, though this is what the Human Rights Commission, as intervener, was requesting.

The remaining choices were: Strike down section 3 (1), but temporarily suspending the declaration of invalidity in order to give Parliament time to repair the defect, as Mr. Justice MacDonald did, or as the Court of Appeal did, reading into section 3 (1) "sexual orientation" as an additional ground of discrimination. Mr. Justice Krever, on behalf of the Ontario Court of Appeal, chose the latter option. In other words, he read it in. Instead of postponing to ask Parliament to intervene, which is what we are doing, the court said that the better remedy would be to just read it in and it would be a part of the law. Therefore, Mr. Justice Krever ordered that:

• (1510)

> The Canadian Human Rights Act be interpreted, applied and administered as though it contained 'sexual orientation' as a prohibited ground of discrimination in s. 3 of that Act.

What did that mean? It was a complete victory. It meant that the objective of having sexual orientation as a ground was fully achieved without passing another law, without changing the statute, because the court said that was the way it was to be interpreted.

Now to have Parliament say, "You were right, court; we will now pass a law patting you on the head and saying you were right," which is what passage of this bill will do. I was able to find no precedent for Parliament ever having done that. It is very common for Parliament to say, "You were wrong, court; that is not what we wanted it to mean, and that is not what we want the law to be. We want it to be so and so." In other words, legislation to correct judicial interpretation is quite common.

Another common occasion for Parliament to intervene in these circumstances is when the court comes to a certain conclusion, saying that it did not know what Parliament meant and that, if there is a problem, it is up to Parliament to correct it.

The problem here is that there is no problem. There is no problem because the Court of Appeal of Ontario fulfilled the objective. The only problem left is that this law is binding only in Ontario. However, any lawyer would agree that it is persuasive and would probably be followed in any other jurisdiction and, if it were not, then an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada would be required to clarify it.

That is ground number one for asking the sponsor of this bill, in spite of his excellent motivation, to withdraw it because it is unnecessary and creates a dangerous precedent, which is that every time someone likes a decision of a court, they ask Parliament to pat the court on the back and tell them they did the right thing. It is unnecessary, and superfluous.

The second reason this bill should be withdrawn is because it will create risks, which defeats its purpose, and here is why.

The law now stipulates that this is a ground of discrimination. If I were to act as a lawyer in this matter, and complain to a Human Rights Commission that there has been discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, someone representing the discriminator would oppose me, saying, "The law does not say that this is a ground. You have no ground and no right to be here." As a lawyer I would then cite the Haig case. The Haig case sets the precedent not only in Ontario but everywhere else, until a court refuses to follow it outside of Ontario. In Ontario and everywhere else it is law until a court refuses to follow it and the Supreme Court of Canada changes it. Inferior courts—courts of first instance—in all other provinces will not only be persuaded, but consider themselves bound by the Ontario Court of Appeal decision unless their own Court of Appeal changes it.

So there I am; I have everything I could have as if I had it in the Charter or had it in the human rights legislation. My friend has no answer. The law is on my side.

Then my learned friend would say to the court or the Human Rights Commission, "Oh, no!" That is what the Court of Appeal said, but these people would not quit when they were ahead, and it is now before Parliament. There is a bill in the Senate that has not been passed. Now it is not clear. Until this initiative was taken, it was clear. I was a winner relying on the Haig case, but now my opponent says, "We do not know what will happen. We do not know what Parliament's intention is because the bill is sitting in the Senate. It might even be defeated in the Senate." Then the cat is really out of the bag. My opponent will tell me that I do not have a case on the grounds of sexual discrimination because that is not in the Charter. He will tell me that the Haig case, is no longer applicable because we do not know what Parliament really meant. He will say, "They are still thinking about it."

Let us assume the bill is passed in the Senate and is then returned to the other place. We know there are people in the other place who are opposed to this bill. They will let it languish on the Order Paper because the longer it sits and is not passed, the further ahead they will be.

My second ground for asking the sponsor of the bill to withdraw it is that I think we should quit while we are ahead. We have made terrific headway. The Court of Appeal of Ontario, with no other court opposed to it, is saying that the law must be treated as if it is a ground. Leave it alone.

Honourable senators, my third ground is that the government has introduced a bill which further complicates the issue. My opponent will argue, not only is there a bill in the Senate, but there is a bill in the House of Commons. There are two bills before Parliament. No one knows what Parliament wants. The Senate is talking about it; the House of Commons is talking about it. They have not settled on it. I can tell you that is certainly what I would argue if I were on the other side.

The Haig case is immediately put into question by this unnecessary legislation. If I were a lawyer acting for homosexuals who felt they had been discriminated against, I would say, "Please, leave me with the Haig case and do not put the matter to a debate." I do not know how anyone in Parliament will vote, and therefore what Parliament's intention was.

Honourable senators, we then have the procedural problem. If Senator Kinsella does not wish to withdraw the bill—which I think he should for the reasons stated, because I think he is, unwittingly, giving aid and help to his enemy—he is actually helping those opposed to his initiative by bringing forward this bill and rescuing them from the Haig case.

Now we have a situation where we have a bill in the Senate and a government bill in the house. We should be careful because, if Senator Kinsella withdraws this bill, that part of the problem will be solved, but the existence of the bill in the other place will still put the Haig case in question.

Beauchesne's 6th Edition at page 192, citation 624(3), reads as follows:

> There is no rule or custom which restrains the presentation of two or more bills relating to the same subject and containing similar provisions.

Honourable senators, that is exactly our situation.

> But if a decision of the House has already been taken on one such bill, for example, if the bill has been given or refused a second reading, the other is not proceeded with if it contains substantially the same provisions — which it does —

> — and such a bill could not have been introduced on a motion for leave. But if a bill is withdrawn, after having made progress, another bill with the same objects may be proceeded with.

My opinion is that both bills should be withdrawn, and we should let the whole matter evolve with the Haig case. We do not have a problem anywhere in Canada with the Haig case. We might have a problem, but it is an easily solved one. If a court in New Brunswick or elsewhere refuses to follow the Haig case, then the Supreme Court of Canada can deal with it. Parliament's intervention in such circumstances is quite inappropriate and, as it happens in this case, hostile to the actual objectives of the bill.

If Senator Kinsella does not wish to withdraw the bill, we should refer it to the Chair for a ruling on the question of the two bills.

[Senator Frith.]

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Frith: Yes, of course.

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, I want to thank the Leader of the Opposition for joining in the debate on Bill S-15.

The question I have is this: Does the honourable senator agree that the Canadian Human Rights Act deals with a number of areas of activity in addition to employment and the employment relationship?

● (1520)

For example, in the Haig case the court was addressing the employment relationship. Bill S-15 tends to deal with that in section 2, to amend subsection 3(1) of the Canadian Human Rights Act. But another activity that the court did not deal with in the Haig case is the whole area of promoting the end and purpose of the Canadian Human Rights Act. More importantly, the Canadian Human Rights Act provides that the Canadian Human Rights Commission can take steps to promote the welfare of a group of persons.

In section 16 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, which bill S-15 proposes to amend—and you will see this on page 2 of the bill—sexual orientation is now missing from the affirmative action provision. Haig does not deal with that at all. This is a provision which you will find in seven of the human rights acts across Canada. You find this provision in the human rights acts of British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Québec and the Yukon.

We have discussed this, but the Honourable Leader of the Opposition is not very helpful. This bill deals with section 16 and attempts to amend it as well.

Senator Frith: That would be a concern if the court had simply pronounced on the case before it. If the court had simply made an order in the Haig case saying, "On questions of employment discrimination" and so on, it would be different. But by Senator Kinsella's own argument in his presentation, they went much farther than that. They read it in. They have not said, "On the issue before us we think that on employment questions," and so on. They say that it provides protection. That is why I read those things into the record.

The order that was made is the Canadian Human Rights Act, including all the sections that are in it—that is, any section in any of these acts can be interpreted, applied and administered as though it contained sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

I understand the point Senator Kinsella is making, but he is unnecessarily limiting the effect of Haig. Haig is a very bold decision and is very clear. I would have no trouble with it as a lawyer. Anyone trying to distinguish it would have a difficult time. That is what I have to say about point number one. My second point is that it risks hurting itself, the movement or the objective.

We should clean the third one up before we do anything, because we have a problem of parliamentary procedure that, for the moment, transcends all these other issues. In other words, it would apply and should be straightened out even if the bill were about coal mining, or something else.

Senator Kinsella: It is my understanding that, in the other place since last June, they have had a bill which was proposed to amend the Human Rights Act, much along the lines of what we have done in Bill S-15. Happily, the Minister of Justice showed his leadership by bringing forward a bill in a difficult but important area. I was pleased to see her do so.

They have two bills presently in the House of Commons. This is a third bill. However, I have not had an opportunity to examine in detail the other bill, so I do not know how substantially different it is. I know that it is more generous in dealing with other issues, though.

Could you comment on those two bills in the House of Commons?

Senator Frith: That is very relevant to the third point I am raising. If there is a third bill, it should definitely be included in our request for a ruling, as well as anything else like that which will affect the purely parliamentary aspect.

If it turns out, for example, that it all shakes down into a government bill that eventually comes here, then my only problem with it would be that it might set up a precedent for this business of double curing; when a situation is cured by the courts, why then have Parliament come along and double cure it? And how often might we be asked to do the same thing in other cases? We would have to see what the bill said before we could come to that conclusion.

The risk still exists that we will muddy waters that are otherwise clear. One pool that we should clear is the parliamentary question I raised. Senator Kinsella amplified that by saying that if we are to do it for this bill and the bill that was announced this morning, then let us make sure that we cover any other bills on the subject, too. I agree with that.

[Translation]

Hon. Gerald A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I would like to say something (not on the procedural issue, I leave that to senator Kinsella, but on the basic issue) regarding your belief that Parliment should not get involved at this stage because the courts and the Ontario Court of Appeal have concluded, based on the "Reading in" theory, that it was a form of discrimination.

Several provinces have already passed legislation on this issue. Personnally, I do not think that it is a bad thing if the Parliament of Canada, which is clearly within its jurisdiction, gets involved to make explicit, in a statute, what the Ontario Court of Appeal has already declared implicit.

How many times has the Supreme Court of Canada said that Parliament must take its responsibilities regarding rights and freedoms. (We can agree or not with this decision, I am not challenging this statement) but the Ontario Court of Appeal says that it is a form of discrimination.

Personally, regardless of the procedural aspect, I do not think that anything prevents the Parliament of Canada from saying explicitly that it is a form of discrimination. You seem to be saying: "Yes, but let's wait until another provincial court of appeal says the opposite, and then the issue will be brought before the Supreme Court of Canada".

I have a lot of respect for your opinion, but one can just as well claim that Parliament would do a service by assuming its own responsibilities. However, I agree that this certainly does not settle the procedural issue.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the comments made by Senator Beaudoin might apply to another situation. But in this case, it is not a matter of simply saying that it is a base for discrimination.

It is a question of "Reading in", which is not the same as simply saying that, generally speaking, it is a basis for discrimination.

We can read "as if they are there". It is a sure case of "Reading in". It is for this reason that, in my opinion, that it is dangerous in such a case for Parliament to say: You are right, it is there. This is especially true when there is a risk of a kind of "interregnum", when the situation is not clear. Right now the situation is clear right now. It is possible that another province might decide to not abide by this decision. This is a possibility.

This is a problem which is often solved, as you know, between the courts. It is not a problem which requires an intervention from Parliament.

The statutes of the provinces are another issue indeed. It is a field which is not within our jurisdiction anyway.

• (1530)

[English]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise for the purpose of proposing the adjournment of this debate. Before I do so, let me say that I followed with considerable interest the speech delivered by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon on this subject. I heard him say that Senator Kinsella's bill would, it seemed to him, simply give the court a pat on the back; confirm a decision the court had taken as to what the law is on this subject. I was going to ask him whether he would make the same argument against Bill C-108, of which notice was given yesterday in the other place by the Minister of Justice. It was given first reading today. I wanted to ask him that question, hoping the answer would be no. However, it is fairly clear from his speech that the answer would have been yes. He would make the same objection —

Senator Frith: Almost.

Senator Murray: Almost the same objection to the government bill as he has made to Senator Kinsella's bill. Ms

Campbell obviously accepts the law as stated by the Ontario Court of Appeal by having Parliament establish the parameters for that law. She would argue that this is not only legitimate, but a necessary role for Parliament to play. That is for the future.

The situation we are in at the moment is that the Leader of the Opposition has also raised an important point of order concerning this bill, in parliamentary terms. We will have to leave it to the Chair to rule on the point of order in due course. If we still have a bill after the Chair has ruled, I will speak to it, so perhaps I may pose the adjournment.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in case the Leader of the Government does speak, I want to be sure that we are clear. If we were only looking at the minister's bill, then, as long as it passed quickly, it would not create problem number two.

Senator Murray: You have it within your power.

Senator Frith: I am not sure. Although it may be a rumour, I have heard—perhaps it is a vague rumour—about something called a "family caucus" that is part of the PC caucus. I have never heard of it on the Liberal side. I am not trying to be funny about this. The point is, as I have said more delicately, there are opponents; people who have the interest of slowing it down. If they slow it down, they create this interregnum of doubt.

I agree that we will have to see what the bill does. It may be that the government bill may seek to do more than this bill does, which could reduce the potential harm of any precedents There could be more objectives to the bill than simply patting the court on the head.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I shall defer my ruling to a later date. Does the Leader of the Government wish to adjourn the debate?

Senator Murray: Yes, Your Honour, pending your ruling.

On motion of Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

POINT OF ORDER

BILL TO DISSOLVE OR TERMINATE CERTAIN CORPORATIONS—REMARKS OF SENATOR STOLLERY DURING DEBATE—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to address the point of privilege raised by Senator MacDonald (Halifax) yesterday in referring to the speech by Senator Stollery, made on the December 8. We did some research on this and we found that Senator Stollery, when reading the "blues," had scratched out the words to which Senator MacDonald referred, as he is entitled to do according to Beauchesne's, Sixth Edition, page 301, citation 1117(2). It reads:

> Corrections may be made to Hansard. If the correction is of a very important nature the Member shall rise in the House when Motions are called to explain the correction. At this time the House gives its approval to the change. However, if the change is minor the Member should inform the Editor of Debates directly, in order to have the correction made.

[Senator Murray.]

I consider this matter to be relatively minor, so my ruling is that the case should be closed.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I would only add that I am very pleased that Senator MacDonald reads my speeches so carefully and with such great interest. I thank him.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, Senator Stollery should know that the personal affection that I hold for him is second only to the respect, affection and regard in which I hold my colleague Senator Chaput-Rolland. I heard what you said, senator. I should have thought that possibly an expression of regret might have been more suitable at this time.

Senator Hastings: Why?

PRIVATE BILL

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Atkins, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doyle, for the second reading of Bill S-13, to incorporate the Dai al-Mutlaq as a corporation sole in Canada.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Stand.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Might I ask Senator Gigantès, who has stood this item now for some time, what his intentions are with regard to the matter?

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, both Senator Corbin and I have received massive material about this bill from people who have written to us. Some of it is difficult to decipher because the photocopying is poor. I am studying it. So far it only confirms what I have said before. This particular community is bitterly divided. Some in the community accuse the Dai al-Mutlaq of being engaged in criminal activity, that he is extremely dictatorial, often violent. These people object. There is also an inquiry in India.

• (1540)

I would like to further study the material I have received, as would Senator Corbin, in order that we can object more strongly than we have so far. This is not only to object to the principle, but to the business of following past precedents and perpetuating a bad habit, as I stated during Opus Dei. In the past we have allowed religious organizations to come here and get a Senate "blessing", imprimatur or some help in making their affairs easier to run than by applying to the provinces. I object to that, whatever the religion; Greek Orthodox to start with, if you like.

I also object in particular to this case because of the grave disputes in this community and the fact that there are two factions. I think we should stay right out of it. However, I want to say more on this issue when I have studied the material that reached me today. It is very thick.

Hon. Consig[illegible]i Nino: Honourable senators, I am not familiar with thi[illegible]rticular bill. I will attempt to inform myself a little bet[illegible]

However, it would seem to me that the appropriate place for the type of discussion Senator Gigantès and I are looking forward to, since my interest is piqued, would be in committee.

The Senate is not passing the legislation. All that is being suggested is that this particular piece of legislation progress in the normal manner in order that the committee can appropriately study the views of different people on this issue.

Senator Hébert: He wants closure as soon as possible.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, second reading is approval in principle. I disapprove in principle. That is why I am objecting to second reading being given to this bill.

Senator Di Nino: It sounds to me that the honourable senator would rather not give this bill second reading. That is an option that the senator has. If the honourable senator wished to have a vote on the motion, we would be pleased to do that. However, I certainly do not think that we should stall this bill.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, this is not an important bill for anyone except the Tory lawyer who asked his friend Senator Murray, who asked his friend Senator Atkins, to burden the Senate with this ridiculous and improper issue. I do not see why we on this side have to play along to get a fat Tory lawyer a fat fee.

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I would like to clear up certain matters. First, the Leader of the Government in the Senate did not request that I introduce this bill. Second, the honourable senator has stated that if this bill were to go to committee and was passed at second reading that this would be approval in principle.

I refer the honourable senator to Hansard of five years ago, when a similar bill was presented before this place. Senator Stewart rose and made the point that he was prepared to pass it at second reading and refer it, without making the assumption that there was approval in principle. The place to deal with this is in committee.

Third, I do not know what the honourable senator's information is with regard to this inquiry in India. I have now received information from the senior counsel to the Dai al-Mutlaq that he is absolutely unaware of any inquiry that is taking place in India.

I hope that this is an opportunity for this bill to be moved along and referred to committee where all these issues can be dealt with appropriately.

Senator Hébert: With closure and closure and closure.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I object in principle. This is what debate on second reading is about. I am standing this bill in order to come armed with even more arguments than I have so far in order to object in principle to this bill.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, Senator Gigantès states that no one cares about this bill and he made some comments about a "fat fee" for some lawyer.

Honourable senators, I am speaking here without a great deal of knowledge, but I believe there is a group of people behind this bill who care greatly about it going forward. Citizens of Canada are saying to us, "Would you proceed with the bill and let the record show that there are people who care about what is going on."

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. It appears to me that the Speaker has allowed a debate to proceed on a matter that is not debatable. Senators from all sides have risen, and I believe the only question was whether the adjournment would stand.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Are honourable senators suggesting that there should be a ruling? I only attempted to extend the courtesy to senators on both sides to express their opinions on the matter. I believe that is all the Chair can do on this type of debate.

Senator Molgat: I am not seek a ruling. I only want it to be clear to the Senate that sometimes the rules are applied; sometimes they are not.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, rule 76 states:

> The principle of a bill is usually debated on second reading.

That is not at committee stage. Usually that is before committee stage. This is one of the usual occasions, as far as I am concerned, for debate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: My understanding is that unless there is a motion to the contrary, the matter is now stood; it is adjourned. Orders of the Day will continue with the next order.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

CONSIDERATION OF EIGHTH REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Eighth report of the Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations (Territorial Lands) presented on December 3, 1992.

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourables senators, the eight report of the Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations deals with certain orders made by the Governor in Council under paragraph 23(d) of the Territorial Lands Act. According to the committee's reading of this paragraph, the Governor in Council was not empowered to make the order in question. On the other hand, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development brought forward an interpretation according to which the Governor in Council was entitled to make such orders. As explained by the committee in its eight report, these differing opinions result from an ambiguity in the English version of the enabling clause which can give rise to two interpretations.

However, as demonstrated by the committee in its report, the French version of the same paragraph is clear and unambiguous and its interpretation is the one given to the English version by the Committee.

[English]

As we point out in our report, in a case where one version is capable of more than one meaning and the other version is capable of only one meaning, the principle of the equal authenticity of the two versions of a federal enactment requires that the meaning that is common to both versions be chosen as the correct meaning of the enactment.

[Translation]

Following this constitutional principle, our committee came to the conclusion that according to the correct interpretation of the power vested under this paragraph, the Governor in Council had no authority to make the orders in question. In order to prevent any future misuse of the authority delegated by Parliament, our committee recommended to the government to include in the next Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Bill an amendment designed to remove the ambiguity noted in the English version of this paragraph.

For honourable senators who have an interest in this issue, I should also mention that the government has been requested to table a response to the report in the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I would like to add, if I may, that the Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations is a no partisan committee. I have been a member of this committee for two years and have been chairing it for one year, and I have come to realize that it is indeed the case. I take this opportunity to thank all the honourable senators who sit on the committee, particularly the representatives of the Liberal Party, like Senator Lewis and Senator Rizzuto, who are regulars to our meetings and with whom we have no problem reaching a consensus.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to commend Senator Grimard and his colleagues for their work on the committee. I know this is not a very exciting committee to most people. It is not publicized much. It is not the kind of committee that attracts many senators, the fact remains that it is probably the most important one, as the protector of the general public. We pass many laws in this place but, more often than not, it is not the law that is important, but the regulations made under this law.

These regulations do not go before Parliament. They are made by the Public Service.

I am not saying that they do not act out of good intentions or anything like that, but the Public Service does have a function and that is generally to make things go smoothly from their point of view, but the public may not always share their view.

The role of the committee is to make sure that the regulations do not distort, that they are in line with the intentions of Parliament. It is an extremely important role.

Incidentally, as a brief aside concerning Manitoba, I think that the first such committee was set up in my province. The legislation had been initiated by Premier Campbell who was the Liberal Premier at the time. I must say that now, at 97 years of age, he has become a member of the Reform Party. One can have that kind of change of heart when one gets to be 97, I guess. Anyhow, he was a great political reformer and had come to power—he was elected the first time in 1922—with very progressive ideas. The committee was but one of the initiatives he implemented in our province, and other provinces later followed suit.

At any rate, the committee is a most important one. As I said, Senator Grimard, I congratulate you and your colleagues. A lot needs to been done in that area. You are the protectors of the general public. I would now move the adjournment of the debate, Mr. Speaker.

Senator Grimard: Would you not say that we ought to simply adopt the report instead of debating it, considering you were so complimentary in your remarks?

Senator Molgat: I see your point exactly. The fact of the matter is that I did read through your report, but not carefully enough. There are questions I want to raise about this report and the next one you will table.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

CONSIDERATION SIXTH REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE — DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

> The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Sixth Report of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations (nuisances) presented on December 1, 1992.— (Honourable Senator Grimard).

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, regarding my honourable friend's comments, he is perfectly right. We were recently asked to testify before a committee of the House of Commons, and I said that the Scrutiny of Regulations committee was the ombudsman. As you know, there is no ombudsman at the federal level except for certain areas like official languages, secrets, and so forth. You are right, most provinces have what we call ombudsman, and this is more or less what our committee does.

I would like to say the following about our sixth report. It contains a resolution aimed at abrogation by the Governor in Council of certain sections of regulations eloquently referred to as the Public Works Nuisances Regulations. The sections were approved on March 1, 1990, and their purpose is to prohibit, among other things, any demonstrations or distribution of pamphlets within a radius of 50 metres of any entrance to a Parliament building on weekdays.

After considering the matter, the committee concluded that these provisions violated a number of criteria. First, the committee felt it was inappropriate that provisions restricting the rights and freedoms of citizens to such an significant extent should be adopted by regulation. We believe that if such provisions are necessary, they should be legislated by Parliament. Second, the committee concluded that Section 10.1 violated the freedoms of speech and peaceful assembly guaranteed under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Finally, the committee believes that these provisions unduly encroached on the rights and freedoms of the individual.

Considering our serious objections to these regulations, the committee decided to recommend their withdrawal to the House of Commons, which is the purpose of this sixth report.

[English]

Honourable senators will note that this is only the third occasion on which the joint committee has moved that a regulation be disallowed. Being a disallowance report, this report is made to the House of Commons, and is tabled in the Senate for information purposes.

When I presented the third report of the joint committee on November 26, 1991, I gave a detailed explanation of the disallowance procedure in the other place. I will not repeat that explanation today. I would like to mention, however, that while the disallowance procedure is a House of Commons procedure, this does not mean that it is of no concern to the Senate.

[Translation]

In concluding, I wish to stress that the committee, as it says in the report, does not question the good faith of those who recommended adopting the regulations and does not judge the legitimacy of their objectives. However, when such measures are approved, it is incumbent on the ommittee to report, to Parliament, on whether the means selected to achieve certain objectives are legitimate and lawful. Our opinion in this respect is negative.

Finally, I urge all my colleagues to read the committee's sixth report, and I want to thank you for your attention.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

CONSIDERATION OF SEVENTH REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Seventh Report of the Standing Joint Committee for Scrutiny of Regulations (divorce proceedings fee order) presented on December 1, 1992.—(Honourable Senator Grimard).

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, on February 27 this year, I tabled the Fourth Report of the Standing Joint Committee for Scrutiny of Regulations in which the committee reported that the fee order for services provided under the Central Registry of Divorce Proceedings Regulations had produced revenues in excess of the costs incurred by the government for the operation of the registry.

Any law allowing the government to impose fees must be passed by an Act of Parliament. Consequently, the committee informed Parliament that it considered that this order represented an unusual and unexpected use of the authority conferred on the Minister of Justice.

[English]

Following the tabling of the fourth report, the Honourable Kim Campbell, as you know, informed the committee that the financial information given to the committee by the officials of her department, information which the committee relied upon in its fourth report, was not complete. The minister later provided the committee with revised financial information relating to the operation of the Divorce Registry. This new information is set out in our report which was tabled last week.

[Translation]

The honourable senators will therefore have the opportunity to read the report and to draw their own conclusions. Suffice is to say that the seventh report indicates that the committee accepts the excuses presented by the minister concerning the erroneous information provided by her officials. As for the joint committee, it expresses its regrets to the Senate and to the House of Commons for tabling a report based on inaccurate data which, however, had been provided in the first place by the Minister of Justice.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

ADOPTION OF TWENTY-EIGHTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE

On the Order:

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Twenty-eighth Report of the Standing Committe on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (6/12 balance of the budgets—committees) tabled in the Senate on December 1, 1992.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the Twenty-Eighth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

SCOTIA SYNFUELS PROJECT

THIRD REPORT OF ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Third Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources (Scotia Synfuels).

Hon. Gildas Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I adjourned this debate because I thought some members from the region where this is of particular interest, Nova Scotia, might want to speak on this. As no one else has been prepared to take it up, as far as I am concerned, the matter should be considered debated.

Motion agreed and report adopted.

ECONOMIC STATEMENT

INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the economic statement made by the Minister of Finance, on Wednesday, 2nd December, 1992.—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, with the consent of the House, I would like to conclude the remarks I began two days ago on the economic statement made on December 2 by the Minister of Finance.

Honourable senators, in assessing the size of the present deficit, I argued that a full analysis could not be undertaken without examining economic trends and the government's role in managing those trends. In the words of the OECD analysis of the Canadian economy, a vital component of any such analysis must include attention to the surge of inflationary pressures and the absorption of the slack in labour and product markets which occurred in 1988.

I further argued that the June 1989 budget targeted inflation as a priority, but the Canadian economy was already teetering on the brink of a recession and the policy of attacking inflation with such vigour through increasing interest rates pushed the economy over the edge.

As I said, in 1991, the government failed to respond to "... signs of an impending recession, late in 1989 and early in 1990, and pressed on with high interest rates and high exchange rate policies to the point of generating a full-fledged made-in-Canada recession."

I might refer briefly to this process as it was examined by the OECD in its analysis of Canada. These were the words used:

[Senator Lavoie-Roux.]

> As the fiscal consolidation process tended to lose momentum, the burden of controlling inflation fell primarily on monetary policy entailing a severe tightening of monetary conditions

As I read that comment, the OECD is drawing attention to the fact that the process of reducing the deficit ceased when it reached the number of $28 billion, and subsequent to that point, the work of dampening the inflationary process was solely conducted by monetary policy through high interest rates.

Honourable senators, I regard these as critical errors in management. Add to them the free trade agreement and the GST, for which we must hold the government responsible, which were imposed upon an economy struggling with inflation and recession. When we add all these factors together, we find the explanation for the current level of unemployment and the daily announcement of plant closures and retrenchment even in the financial sector of the Canadian economy which hitherto had been regarded as insulated from general trends.

Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance, in his economic statement, absolved the Government of Canada from any responsibility, it appeared to me, for the onset of the Canadian recession. In fact, in his speech on Wednesday, December 2, he referred to globalism and the global recession no less than twelve times. He linked Canada's economic and unemployment woes inextricably to the "stubborn world-wide recession."

However, while undoubtedly the worldwide economy has an impact on Canada, it does not fully explain the movements of the Canadian economy. Not at all. The relentless pursuit of the anti-inflationary objective in the form of ever-increasing interest rates, achieved its objective and more. In the over-aggressive anti-inflation policy, the government virtually snuffed out economic growth, economic activity, so effectively that Canada was in recession well before any other country in the world.

If you go back to the 1981 recession, I believe you will find that Canada and the United States entered the recession at about the same time. In Canada, the recession began in the second quarter of 1990. Real GDP began shrinking in the second quarter of 1990 and continued shrinking until the second quarter of 1991. In the second quarter of 1991, the economy began to grow slightly, but the rate of growth has been very unimpressive. Mr. Mazankowski expects growth this year to be 1 per cent.

If you look at a chart such as the one with which we were presented in the Committee on External Affairs yesterday, which showed the trend of the recession, you will find that even today we have not reached the level of economic activity which Canada experienced in March of 1990.

It is pretty clear that the Canadian recession began two quarters before that in the United States. In the last quarter of 1992, the Canadian economy was still in recession while the U.S. GDP had been growing for four consecutive quarters.

Let us take a look at the OECD. I think it reveals a similar trend. If honourable senators want to examine the analysis for themselves, they will find it in the OECD "Economic Outlook" of July, 1991 which makes it clear that Canada was in recession a year before the OECD experienced a slowdown.

The figures are as follows. Though economic growth fell significantly in the OECD in 1990, based on OECD averages, [illegible] per cent real GNP from 3.3 per cent real GNP in 1989, [illegible] on average, was growing at 2.6 per cent in 1990. C[illegible] actually experienced three quarters of negative growth in [illegible] Her OECD partners were still experiencing growth. Gr[illegible] real GNP for all OECD countries virtually ceased at 0.[illegible] first half of 1991, while again Canada's GNP was still s[illegible]ng.

I think [illegible]e have to understand that the Canadian recession began well before the recession in the United States and before the slowdown in the OECD countries. At one time this recession was described as the Anglo-Saxon recession because the main countries of recession were the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom, while Europe seemed to be excluded. Europe ultimately joined.

It is simplistic to regard the Canadian recession as solely the result of world-wide trends. It is clearly the result, in its duration, of the application of Canadian policy in a way that began the recession early and is keeping the country in recession.

If I were inclined to be overly political today, I would quote the following paragraph:

> It is characteristic of a desperate government to blame its failure on others, or on fate, or on circumstance or on the people themselves, or even on the international economy, the ultimate scapegoat.

Because I do not agree that we can rule out the international economy as a force on the Canadian economy, I will not adopt that statement as my own, even though it was used by the Prime Minister at his nomination speech on August 6, 1984.

> It is characteristic of a desperate government to blame its failure on others, or on fate, or on circumstance, or on the people themselves, or even on the international economy, the ultimate scapegoat.

Therefore, it was to the ultimate scapegoat that the Minister of Finance, resorted to in his economic statement, not once but 12 times. He failed to take any responsibility that I could discover for what had happened in Canada.

Honourable senators, I want to conclude because I do not want to take too much advantage of the indulgence of my colleagues, but I do want to make a few general observations.

The first observation is how different the mood is of this economic statement as the government is into its ninth year of office, campared to the economic statement delivered by Mr. Wilson in the fall of 1984. The mood is totally different, at least to me. The mood reflected in this fiscal and economic statement is sombre, humble and subdued, in sharp contrast to the aggressive and triumphant tone of the economic statement given by Mr. Wilson in November, 1984. The difference in mood is inescapable.

It may be a reflection of a government badly shaken by a second major reverse in its constitutional dossier and by its inability to shape a strategy to address the current economic situation, because there is no strategy in this economic and fiscal statement that is designed to lift the economy out of its present state.

The economic statement is no doubt significant for a number of measures in it. I have not analyzed them all and I do not intend to. Some of these measures are positive, including the expenditures on infrastructure, which is a step in the right direction. Some of them are negative, in my view, including the unemployment insurance changes occurring at a time of such high unemployment in Canada.

However, the specific measures in the statement are not as significant as the underlying philosophy, because the government is clearly still clinging to a philosophy that is proving irrelevant to the concerns of the Canadians. It is clinging to a policy that is now either abandoned or modified, both in the United States and in the United Kingdom. There is no basic shift in policy in response to changed economic circumstances. Staying the course seems to be the battle cry or, as Mr. Simpson stated in quoting a Canadian minister, "we intend to brazen it out", in other words; just blindly go forward with the policies that were put in place in 1984.

Honourable senators, if the economic statement is to be analyzed and judged in light of the projection for growth, unemployment and deficit reduction contained in the minister's budget of February last, the judgment certainly would reflect unfavourably on the minister and his officials. However, I do not think one can assess this economic and fiscal statement on the basis of such a short-term approach. It must be assessed from a wider perspective and from a historical point of view. To neglect such a perspective would be unfair to the present Minister of Finance and would fail to explain how the present harvest of low growth, high unemployment, swollen deficits and massive debt is due to the careless husbandry of his predecessor.

● (1630)

I, for one, cannot blame the Minister of Finance for failing to reduce the deficit in this statement when the economy is experiencing 1 per cent growth. I cannot blame him for that. Moreover, it must be said that, if the present Minister of Finance feels his hands are tied—and he seemed to give that impression—and is ready to accept, without concrete action, the current level of unemployment for what appears to be an indefinite future, in my view that acceptance must be the responsibility of his predecessor and the government as a whole for their lethargy in responding to changing economic circumstances, for their aggressive implementation and over-reliance on monetary policy, for increasing the vulnerability of the country to foreign creditors, and for extending their influence on Canadian interest rates and the Canadian exchange rate.

On December 2, the Minister of Finance stated:

> Canada's economy performed particularly well from 1984 to the onset of the recession [in the second quarter of] in 1990.

That is found at page 1 of the Economic Statement. The economy did perform well during that period. He ought to have included 1983 because everyone else includes 1983 as a year of expansion. It is characteristic of the government and of the Department of Finance now to infer a sharp break between the period of Liberal government and the successor government. In finance documents, that sharp break always appears and, accordingly, it is impossible to rely upon these documents for any objective information and analysis.

Having stated that the Canadian economy had performed particularly well from 1983 to the onset of the recession in the second quarter of 1990, the minister went on to say:

> We led the G-7 in job creation and were second only to Japan in economic growth.

The Minister of Finance was right in referring to those seven years—"six years", he said. There were seven years of economic expansion. Professor Ben Friedman of Harvard talked about "the record length of business expansion that began in 1983 and ended in 1990". Honourable senators may know that the editor of the Wall Street Journal, Robert Bartley, produced a book entitled The Seven Fat Years; and How To Do It Again.

The OECD, on Canada, stated that following seven years of economic expansion, economic activity started to decline in the second quarter of 1990. The OECD stated that Canada had seven years of economic expansion; seven years of uninterrupted economic expansion, an expansion that commenced well before the government took office. As I stated, in 1984 the economic rate of growth in real terms was 4.7 per cent, which has only been exceeded in one year in the seven-year period we are talking about.

The major criticism that one must make of the government is not to criticize Mr. Mazankowski for failing to reduce the deficit with economic growth of 1 per cent and a bit more next year; the criticism one must make of the government is that it failed to make an impact on the deficit in the seven fat years of uninterrupted growth. That is the question that must be addressed. I have tracked this in a number of speeches since 1984, and I have here and there explained why that has happened.

In the perspective of eight years, entering the ninth, one looks at the performance over that year. Let us say, as I have acknowledged, that Mr. Wilson made progress to the point where he had reduced the deficit to $28 billion. If that progress had continued, the situation in Canada would have been entirely different at the onset of this recession when the government would have had some ability to stimulate the economy and bring the country out of the serious recession to which it is still subject.

If I were in the Conservative caucus, I would say, "Ministers and Mr. Prime Minister, tell me, please, why did you fail in those seven fat years to reduce the deficit? "I forgive you . . ." I would say, ". . . for the inability during the period of recession because your revenues were going down, your expenditures were going up, and you were making cuts; but what happened before that?" Seven years! That is an indictment, I believe, of the government. That falls under the category of general observations.

I would make another observation, honourable senators. It is not an observation that I would apply solely to this fiscal and Economic Statement. The statement would apply to the format generally that has been employed in assessing the well-being of the Canadian economy. I cannot see, as I read this economic statement and as I have read others in the past, how they can have any meaning to the people of Canada. The concepts are so remote and abstract that the conclusion must be that they were prepared for a very restricted group of people in our country. Certainly, the citizens struggling with unemployment or poverty or with uncertainty cannot grasp anything in these statements that would give them confidence or hope.

For example, honourable senators, there is no mention in the statement last week about poverty or child poverty. Is it important? It is, is it not? I would say it is critically important at a time when one in nine children eats in a food bank and when one in eight children lives on social assistance. The traditional way of presenting budgets and economic statements is to push that aside from the balance sheet of the nation.

• (1630)

I make the other observation that the operation of governments in the United States, Europe and Canada is increasingly remote from the preoccupations of the population as a whole. It is not surprising that every time the populations of either Europe, Canada or the United States have had an opportunity to register their opinions, they have rejected the views of the governing classes.

The most recent example of that is the most unexpected results in Switzerland on the EEC. They said "no" despite what their leaders told them. This is a serious issue not only for the government, but also for all people in Parliament to consider how we can bridge the gap between the aspirations of the public and their problems and the operations and the statements of government and the performance of Parliament. That is another observation.

I conclude by quoting from a good source, namely, the Prime Minister. This is a quotation which aptly applies. He states:

> I am convinced that we are witnessing one of those special moments when an entire country turns the page on an era that comes to an end. To restore the health of their democracy, the men and women of Canada are preparing to throw off the yoke . . . which is now powerless and has nothing more to offer anyone, except to its friends.

It is true that this economic and fiscal statement really offered nothing to the Canadian people. The same policy was applied: no hope, no confidence, no substantial action. If we judge by this statement, the government has nothing left to offer Canadian people, except its friends.

We are told that we will see the realization of that truism when eight or nine new senators will be sworn in and take their place in this chamber before the Christmas recess.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, far be it from me to begrudge Senator MacEachen the pleasure he so obviously derives from the predicament of the present government and its Minister of Finance. He himself was Minister of Finance in this country for two and one-half years, from March 1980 until September 1982. He brought in three budgets and one mini budget or economic statement.

When his forecasts turned out badly, as they frequently and spectacularly did, his political adversaries showed him no mercy. We can expect none from him today.

Senator MacEachen: I thought I was very merciful. You should see me in full force!

Senator Murray: When his policies lay in ruins, as they did after the October 1980 budget in which he brought in the National Energy Policy; or the November 1981 budget in which he presented 100 tax changes, most of which had to be withdrawn at a later date; his adversaries showed little sympathy for him. I have to confess some feeling of guilt today. We are deficient in that elemental Christian charity that we should have shown under the circumstances.

That being the case, I will not express any objection to him taking some satisfaction in the predicament of the present government.

However, there is some difference when he talks about the seven fat years and the deficit, which I acknowledge is still around the $30-billion mark. There is a considerable difference between a deficit of $38.5 billion in 1984-85 on budgetary expenditures of $109.6 billion, as was the case in that year; and a deficit in the current fiscal year of $34.4 billion on budgetary expenditures of $158.4 billion. There is and has been considerable progress on this front, and Mr. Mazankowski is the first to acknowledge and I am the second, that more needs to be done. I will return to that matter in a few minutes.

When Mr. Mazankowski referred as he did to international conditions, it was not for the sake of blaming the world for the recession in Canada. I do not think that it is a situation where blame can be accurately fixed on any one, or any set of policies or any country. But it is surely relevant to point out that world prices for some of our resource exports have been soft during this period and that demand in our principal export market, the United States, has been slow. These are relevant factors to be considered.

Second, when Mr. Mazankowski refers to international conditions, he has in mind more particularly something that he has to draw to the attention of Canadians again and again: there is an enormous economic restructuring taking place in the world. It is a challenge to the ability of public policymakers and also to the private sector in this country to steer Canada through this period of economic restructuring safely and successfully. I will have a word or two to say about that later as well.

The honourable senator today, as he has done on several occasions in the past, reproaches the former Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson, with not having anticipated the growth in inflation that took place after 1988. He quotes from the OECD as having referred to the fact that the monetary authorities had to bear a large part of the burden of fighting that inflation.

• (1640)

The reproach that the honourable senator makes of Mr. Wilson clearly is that Mr. Wilson and the government did not apply the brakes sufficiently on government spending at that time. The facts belie that accusation. I find that in the fiscal year 1988-89, which was the year Senator MacEachen was talking about, our program expenditures increased by 3.1 per cent. Indeed, the increase was down from the two previous fiscal years. Senator MacEachen has implied that Mr. Wilson and the government had opened the taps of public spending in anticipation of a 1988 election, but it is hardly the case when program expenditures increased by 3.1 per cent against an increase in inflation in the same years of between 4 and 5 per cent.

I would accept Senator MacEachen's or any Liberal's reproach to us about spending with more equanimity if my memory were shorter than it is. In those days when Mr. Wilson and the government were keeping program expenditure increases at 3.1 per cent, well below the rate of inflation, Senator MacEachen and his colleagues in this place and their friends in the other place were calling for more spending. As a matter of fact, I took the occasion today to look at a speech he gave in this place on April 5, 1989 and made a quick list of areas in which he criticized the government for not spending enough; official development assistance, child care, VIA rail and the environment leapt off the page and hit me between the eyes. I am sure there are others if I had more carefully read his speech at noon today. They were always in favour of spending more. From my memory, in the eight years that we have been in office, there has not been a single cost-cutting initiative that they have supported, not a single one.

Senator MacEachen returned in the first part of his speech the other day to a subject he has raised on several occasions, Canada's net international indebtedness, and in particular the financing of public-sector deficits by foreign borrowing. I know it is a very important subject and I am pleased that he has raised it again because it is important to our understanding of the background against which Mr. Mazankowski and the government prepared the economic and fiscal statement of December 2. As the honourable senator stated, he had made several considered and major speeches on the subject in the Senate; one on June 21, 1989 and another on April 9, 1991. He indicated the other day that his speeches on this subject have not elicited very much interest, that they have been met by silence. I want to assure him that they piqued my interest in the subject, that I have tried to follow these matters since that time, to keep myself informed and occasionally to ask for information from our advisors in the Department of Finance. I anticipated that he might return to this subject in the course of his speech on this inquiry, and I therefore took the trouble to look into the matter again last weekend. I retrieved from Hansard the two speeches he has made on the subject. It occurred to me on Sunday morning after Mass —

Senator MacEachen: Your mind was on more lofty matters.

Senator Murray: —as I settled down, having sent the children out to play. I was probably one of the few people in Canada who at that moment was settling down with the speeches of Alan J.MacEachen.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The only one, except for the author.

Senator MacEachen: It would be a good follow up to St. Paul.

Senator Murray: I am not sure I was the only one; there are still some study clubs in Cape Breton who might amuse themselves in this way.

Let me put some numbers on some of the statements Senator MacEachen made the other day about our international indebtedness. I think it is important to get an understanding of the background against which the government worked with this economic statement. Canada's total international indebtedness, public and private, is the highest among the G-7 countries. The net dollar figure is $272.4 billion, 40.4 per cent of our GDP. There is not another country in the G-7 that comes within hailing distance of having such a net international indebtedness that is as high as ours as a proportion of gross domestic product. The comparable U.S. figure is 5.3 per cent. More of our income, 4.4 per cent of net domestic income, goes to servicing the foreign debt. I think Senator MacEachen put the dollar number on the record the other day. It is $23 billion as of last year. This money is going to service the foreign debt rather than to support domestic consumption. This international indebtedness is a significant part of our current account deficit, which is also the worst in the G-7 at 4.5 per cent of gross domestic product.

Senator MacEachen acknowledged something I want to underline, that the federal government, generally speaking, has not and does not borrow abroad. It happens quite in frequently and for relatively small sums. The last such occasion I think was in 1985. If, as Senator MacEachen points out, there is a sizable amount of federal government bonds held by non-residents, it is because they buy them on the open market in Canada; it is not because the federal government floats bond issues in foreign markets. The same is not true of the provinces. I think the provinces do most of their borrowing in foreign markets. They certainly do a great deal of it. I recall that when I was in New Brunswick, in charge of the premier's office there in the mid-1970s, that province and its power utility were then borrowing about $200 million a year, most of it in New York, some of it in Japan and Europe. Senator Simard will remember that. It seemed to me to be a sizable sum then and it still does. The provinces finance a great deal of their borrowings on foreign markets.

This fact in itself reinforces the need for a concerted approach on the part of federal and provincial governments. When Senator MacEachen asks what we are doing about it, the only thing we can do about it is to try to get our deficits under control. That will mean smaller deficits, smaller borrowings; smaller borrowings, and less vulnerability to non-resident lenders.

In October, honourable senators will recall that Standard & Poor's, the rating agency, lowered the federal government's rating on senior long-term foreign currency debt to Double A plus from Triple A. In the announcement they made, Standard & Poor's stated:

> The downgrade reflects the progressive deterioration in Canada's current account deficit in recent years, a consequent sharp increase in its already sizable external debt burden, and the prospect of only a moderate medium-term improvement in the balance of payments. A key contributing factor is the highlevel of total government debt, which slows the pace of external adjustment. The ratings continue to be supported by a diversified economy and skilled workforce, as well as the underlying stability of the political system.

I invite honourable senators to pay particular attention to this next sentence:

> The stable outlook is based on the likelihood that current economic policies will be broadly maintained regardless of the outcome of the next federal election, due by November 1993.

That statement is supportive of the economic and fiscal policies that have been followed by this government.

They further state:

> Continuity is also supported by the Bank of Canada's strong commitment to price stability, which has reduced inflation to well below the industrial-country average.

Honourable senators, let me put some more numbers on the record. Of the $272 billion in net foreign indebtedness, $204 billion is in Canadian bonds held by non-residents. Of these, $69 billion is in federal bonds, $82 billion is in provincial bonds, $4 billion is in municipal bonds and $48 billion is in corporate bonds.

Canada is not a large player on the world financial markets, but, still, our high international indebtedness has left us in quite an exposed position.

In addition to this, there has also been quite a lot of turbulence and volatility in international money markets.

Honourable senators will have noted in September and October the problems that were faced by a number of our allies with their currencies. The British, the Italians and the Swedish had two devaluations; and other currencies that were pegged to the European Exchange Rate Mechanism have dropped out.

I saw a report stating that during September, the German Bundesbank spent $33 billion Deutschmarks to support the British pound. Even with that, the British government finally caved in to interest rate pressures, devalued, and dropped out of the European Exchange Rate Mechanism.

It has been a period of terrific turbulence. While we are not a large player on the world financial markets, the turbulence inevitably spills over to the Canadian dollar, particularly when traders and investors look at our total international indebtedness.

In this place we can look at this problem in terms of its components: Federal, provincial, municipal, corporate. However, the fact is, to the Japanese money trader, it is all Canada.

Barron's magazine, for example, carried an interview with a number of experts in the financial markets who described the Ontario economy, which accounts for 40 per cent of the national economy, as being in the hands of socialists who go back to the days of Russian communism. We all—even those of us who disagree quite profoundly with what the Government of Ontario is doing — regard that type of statement as quite excessive and extravagant. But, still, on such perceptions are decisions made by some people in the world outside.

Other countries are raising their interest rates to support their currencies. The point is that all this turbulence spills over into Canada, especially when investors look at our total international indebtedness, at an economy that is still growing very slowly, and at policies in several provinces which the world regards as wrong-headed from an economic point of view.

Our high international indebtedness relative to the rest of the world has left us in quite an exposed position. There is, as I said, a pressing need for consensus and a concerted approach by the federal government and the provinces. I appreciate the point Senator MacEachen made in quoting Roderigue Tremblay and the need for some federal-provincial monitoring agency.

This exposure would dictate at any time a very careful policy on the part of any Canadian Minister of Finance. If one adds to the unique Canadian exposure the turbulence and volatility of the international markets in recent years and the problems faced by the economies of some of our partners and competitors, one cannot help but conclude that, in the autumn of 1992, Canada was potentially quite vulnerable. A wrong move by the federal Minister of Finance would have been very damaging to our economic well-being.

We have it on the authority of Mr. Jeffrey Simpson, a columnist for the Globe and Mail, that Mr. Mazankowski, in his statement of December 2, could have attacked the budget deficit, or he could have attacked the problem of slow economic growth. But, said Mr. Simpson, he did neither.

Well, honourable senators, such a choice exists only in the land of punditry. Of course we have to do both. We have to attack the deficit in order to keep interest rates from rising thereby killing confidence and growth, and we have to try to contribute to job creation and economic growth. We have to do both, and we are doing both, in a balanced way.

The economy is growing. It is growing too slowly, but it is still growing, and we have to remember that there has been growth in each of the last six quarters.

Real Gross Domestic Product increased at an annual rate of 1.4 per cent in the third quarter. Employment rose 77,000 in the last seven months. The IMF and OECD, both predict that we will have the strongest economic growth of all the G-7 countries in 1993.

Statistics Canada stated in its November Economic Observer publication: "If output and employment continue to improve, this growth could mark the presence of sustained recovery."

The OECD states that:

> . . . the structural framework is in place for stronger economic performance in the medium term. Inflation has fallen sharply and the present stance of monetary policy offers the prospect for further progress towards price stability. Another key to better performance is the authorities' commitment to fiscal consolidation, where the attainment of medium-term objectives will require continued expenditure restraint. The government's accomplishments in the field of structural reform in recent years—

• (1700)

Senator Frith: Where are these statistics from?

Senator Murray: The OECD report.

Senator Frith: You mentioned three or four, and I missed it.

Senator Murray: I quoted Statistics Canada. I am now quoting the OECD, and this sentence is important.

> The government's accomplishments in the field of structural reform in recent years will enhance the economy's growth potential.

The IMF says a solid foundation for a strong economic performance seems to be in place. The IMF expects Canada's real GDP to grow 2.1 percent this year and 4.4 per cent in 1993.

Honourable senators, it is obvious that Mr. Mazankowski's economic statement seems to have had the effect of stabilizing our situation in the volatile international markets. Honourable senators will have noted that the Canadian dollar has stabilized. In anticipation of his statement, the bank rate on Tuesday December 1 went down by 55 basis points and on Tuesday of this week by 51 basis points. The banks are lowering their prime rates.

Other countries seem not to be as well positioned as we are. Look at what the Chancellor of the Exchequer is having to do in Britain, keeping public sector wage increases to well below the rate of inflation in that country and taking other very hard measures. The Treasurers of Germany, Italy and Sweden are taking measures ranging from difficult to drastic in order to restore confidence. I need not go into great detail on these matters.

If you take the United States, where the fiscal deficit of the federal government is 5.5 percent of the GDP, the OECD is telling them they have to cap health spending, they have to tax social security, and they have to raise the gasoline tax by 25 cents a gallon. The fiscal deficit of the federal government as a percentage of GDP is in the same order of magnitude, 5 per cent, but these kinds of drastic steps are not being urged on the Canadian government because I think there is an understanding on the part of these international agencies that the Government of Canada has already taken important steps, is serious about deficit reduction, and has been embarked on a plan since 1984 that seems to be working and, in the words of the OECD, is bringing in structural reforms that will enhance the economy's growth potential.

There has been a recession. It is no secret. It is obvious that there are continuing problems in many Canadian industries, in airlines, railways, steel, forest production, some of the mining industries.

It is also a fact, as I have said, that the economy is still growing too slowly, but there is also an enormous economic restructuring taking place in the world. Germany is facing these horrendous problems arising from the unification; Japan has its financial institutions and asset devaluation, and it appears from reading the international press that that country is not out of the woods yet. A number of these large economies, including the American economy, are described as malfunctioning. We have our external debt problems and our public sector deficits, and we may not be as well positioned as we would like to be, but we are better positioned to survive and to succeed in this uncertain world because of these structural reforms that the OECD refers to that we have taken in recent years.

This brings me to the question of alternatives. The Canadian people have a right to know what alternatives there are to the structural and other reforms, and to the economic policies that we have brought in.

Senator Frith: Call an election. You will find out.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: Our friends opposite opposed every one of them. They have fought every single one of them. They opposed the free trade agreement, as they oppose NAFTA, and Senator MacEachen again today attributed to the free trade agreement the recession, the level of unemployment, and all the rest of it, but he must —

Senator MacEachen: No, no.

Senator Murray: He attributed it to the free trade agreement and the GST. What was the other factor? He attributed to those two the recession and unemployment in this country.

Honourable senators, we are exporting $16 billion more to the United States last year than in 1988. Our trade surplus with the U.S. averaged $16.2 billion for the first nine months of the year, up $2.3 billion from last year. We have increased our share of total U.S. merchandise imports.

Senator Molgat: Tell us about unemployment.

Senator Murray: In the three year period since the FTA was implemented, foreign direct investments in Canada totalled $15.1 billion, an increase of almost 50 percent over the three year period prior to the FTA. The FTA and NAFTA are subjects for debate, and we will have it in due course again in this house, but in the meantime, honourable senators could do worse than read the recent C. D. Howe study as to the impact of the free trade agreement on the Canadian economy.

Senator Molgat: Tell us about jobs, jobs, jobs, that great promise.

Senator Murray: Their position in 1988 was that they would tear up the free trade agreement, and their position has not changed. Mr. Herb Gray recently attended on behalf of the Liberal Party a meeting sponsored by the Council of Canadians at which the New Democratic Party representatives said, yes, we must abrogate and must put an end to the free trade agreement at once. The only difference between the NDP position and the position taken by Mr. Gray was that Mr. Gray said, "No, we go in and tell them we intend to renegotiate it with the threat of abrogation in our pocket." The position has essentially not changed at all.

As for tax reform, we all know how strongly they opposed the GST, and yet every finance minister, Liberal or Conservative, in my adult lifetime denounced the old Manufacturers Sales Tax as being —

Senator Simard: Including Senator MacEachen.

Senator Murray: Including Senator MacEachen when he was Minister of Finance. I think a white paper was issued at that time on that subject. They denounced the old Manufacturers Sales Tax as favouring imports over exports, penalizing our manufacturing industries and so forth, and they went on to recommend its replacement by a broadly-based consumption tax.

Senator MacEachen: Is that from the white paper?

Senator Murray: That is from a Parliamentary committee that I think had a majority of Liberals on it, chaired by the former Senator Buckwold.

They denounced that Manufacturers Sales Tax. They opposed the GST. I hear petitions day after day from honourable senators —

Senator Frith: Call an election and you won't have to hear it any more.

Senator Murray: —assuring us that the GST would be done away with by a Liberal government. We will be back to the Manufacturers Sales Tax which favoured imports over exports and penalized manufacturing, or we will be faced with an enormous increase in income taxes.

Bill C-91, as Bill C-22 before it, builds on patents to bring us in line with other countries and with the GATT, extending patent protection for an average of three years, and attracting hundreds of millions of dollars in research investment to Canada. We will be hearing more about it when the bill comes to us.

• (1710)

They have fought hard against the shift which we made of over $1 billion, perhaps $1.5 billion, in unemployment insurance from passive income support to training. They oppose the deficit reduction measures. They oppose the creation of Investment Canada and the idea of encouraging foreign investment in this country, rather than trying to block it or discourage it.

Senator Frith: And 47 per cent of the people agree with us.

Senator Murray: They have opposed the changes we have made in child benefits and the trend of our social policy away from universality toward a focus and an emphasis on people who most need assistance.

They have opposed all this, honourable senators, and they continue to oppose. They will have to do better than that.

Senator Frith: Call an election and give us a try.

Senator Murray: The Honourable Senator MacEachen concluded by speaking of public opinion trends in this country and other democratic countries. That is also a fit subject for a good debate in this place one of these days.

There is out there an appreciation, more sophisticated than a lot of people understand, of the fact that this country and all countries are going through a worldwide economic restructuring in which we have to find our way and our niche as a country. There is, I think, a good appreciation that it is not possible for us to run up deficits, increase the national debt and our international indebtedness without having to pay a serious price for it all. There is an acceptance, however grudging, that the time is long overdue for us to accept some disciplines that may be somewhat severe, in order to ensure future economic stability and prosperity for the current generation and for our children.

On that count, I believe the economic and fiscal statement of Mr. Mazankowski and the policies we have followed for eight years directed toward that end, will find acceptance in the country, especially when viewed against the lack of any positive alternative from the Opposition.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I appreciate that Senator Murray did make a serious commentary on the question of Canadian foreign indebtedness. I think it is a well-placed emphasis. It is a very complicated subject, as he must have discovered in his Sunday morning meditations, after Mass.

What I have been interested in is what proportion of the deficits, both federal and provincial, are financed by non-residents. I understand fully the process by which non-residents purchase Canadian bonds or treasury bills. They do it on money markets; but the fact that they do it has the implications to which he referred.

On the deficit side, can he give today or at another time, a picture of that and also the trend? I think it is an accelerating trend. At one time we were able to finance these requirements with domestic savings. I wonder whether any thought has been given to a savings policy in Canada.

I am really asking for more assistance in getting a fix on what extent public sector deficits are financed through the purchase of government instruments by non-residents and not Canadians.

Senator Murray: I do confirm, as the honourable senator has said, that the financing of public sector deficits by foreign lenders, as it were, has increased. As the honourable senator has said, it has increased rather considerably in recent years. I will put those figures on the record when I get them. I do not have them now.

Nor do I know whether we will be in a position to take the fiscal deficit of this government and the other governments and indicate what portion of them is accounted for by non-residents. I will certainly ask. If I can obtain the information, I will put it on the record.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I hesitate to move the adjournment of the debate because I thought Senator Murray would take the adjournment himself to give us a second instalment when he will no doubt talk to us about jobs, jobs, jobs.

Senator Frith: Those people are not out of work, they are just restructured.

Senator Molgat: He was obviously only giving us the first part of his speech today. I do not see him rising to his feet, in which case I will move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

LINGUISTIC RIGHTS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard having given notice on December 1, 1992:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the need for the federal government to retain at least the linguistic component of Canada's Court Challenges Program.

Honourable senators, on Tuesday, December 1, 1992, I gave notice that I would call your attention to the need for the federal government to maintain the language component of the Canadian Court Challenges Program.

Before getting to the heart of my subject matter, I would like to go back to a topic closely related to my remarks tonight, to the point I raised during Question Period. In spite of certain negligible differences of opinion, for which I humbly confess my guilt, I must say that the interest raised by my question among our friends in the opposition, especially Senators LeBlanc and Corbin, was such that it seems to me that beyond our party allegiances and political affiliations, when the issue is important enough, a consensus often arises on the need to call the attention of the government on its own decisions, either past or future.

The reason I ask that question is that last night, a few of us met a delegation from the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadiennes. As they put it so well last night, and as they had mentioned it earlier in the morning at a press conference, the announcement by Mr. Mazankowski of a 10 per cent cut in most agencies and interest groups during each of the next two fiscal years was a matter of great concern to them.

In a few moments, I will get back to my enquiry, but first I would like to remind you and some of our colleagues in this place that the Fédération des communautés francophone et acadienne is much more than a minor and insignificant interest group. We can disagree with their ways of working. We can disagree with some of the solutions they propose or some of the projects they put forward. But we have to recognize that they are accredited and recognized spokesperson who have proven their ability. They represent an official language minority recognized by the federal Parliament. So, they are much more than a mere interest group. It is my pleasure to remind you in this time of apprehended crisis (that is too strong a word), let say of serious concern, that some people, regardless of their political stripes, senators and hon. members can come to an understanding and support suggestions such as the one I will be making in relation with the Court Challenges Program.

Honourable senators, during its short life, the language component of the Court Challenges Program did more than help the governments and profit-making corporations. It provided financial assistance to citizens who stood up for their rights in courts, to help pay for public interest cases of great importance to many people.

In this context, we realize that these people provide such a service to society that it would be unfair to deprive them of the financial assistance without which they cannot do anything.

Honourable senators, the language component of this program, the only one during the first half of its existence, has helped to correct numerous injustices. It has helped invalidating several recent provisions which had restricted access to English schools and weakened the status of English before the courts and the National Assembly in Quebec. In Manitoba, it has helped correct a negation of the equal status of French in the legislature, in the legislative process, as well as before the courts. This denial of rights had persisted for almost a century.

However, the work done through the Court Challenges Program remains incomplete. Honourable senators, the necessity of this program is obvious when you think that in a majority of provinces the right to education in the language of the minority is still not respected. Yet, this right is guaranteed by section 23 of the Constitution which has had force of law for more than ten years.

In my conclusion, I will get back, time permitting, to the setting up of the language component of the Canadian Court Challenges Program and the way it worked.

So, the linguistic duality preceded (as we all know) the Canadian Confederation, and the two remain indissociable. The linguistic rights establish the frame in which Francophones and Anglophones cohabitate, and it is one the foundations of the harmonious relations between the State and the population. Those relations are, to a large extent, the basis for dignity and mutual respect.

This is why the federal government has the duty to protect the integrity of the system, especially since it is ordinary citizens who have these linguistic rights, which have the distinctive feature of imposing on the State the positive obligation of giving effect to those rights, rather than simply put and end to discriminatory practices.

In a recent release, the Commissioner of Official Languages said:

> The Canadian government should ensure that Canadians are not deprived, because of insufficient financial resources, of a legitimate access to the courts in order to get confirmation or clarification of their linguistic rights.

I agree, and I suspect that many of our colleagues in this chamber agree, with Dr. Goldloom's statement.

To conclude, honourables senators, let me quote Richard Goreham's final remarks in his report on the subject:

> For more than a decade, the Court Challenges Program has provided vital financial support for important linguistic right cases. However a number of questions remain unanswered to this day. The Program has proven that it > takes many years to clarify and interprate these rights, as well as to implement and fully enforce them and that their interpretation is an ongoing process.

Honourable senators, with this program disappearing, individuals and groups who, as a last resort, want to have the courts assert their linguistic constitutional rights, will face enormous financial difficulties. Unfortunately, many of them could find the burden impossible to bear. What good are such rights if they cannot be asserted? As Madam Justice Bertha Wilson said:

> It is purely illusive to give rights to people who cannot afford to have those rights recognized.

Honourable senators, I call upon the federal government to restore the linguistic component of the Court Challenges Program. If the program had not been expanded in 1985, the linguistic component would probably not have been cut as it was in the last budget.

I think this is another good reason for re-instating that program.

Honourable Senators, I was telling you that I would go back, in conclusion, to section 23, which was at the heart of the linguistic question and of a certain amount of cases pleaded these last few years and which permitted citizens not only to have their rights recognized and protected, but also forced governments to act. We were told, as years went by, that precedents were being established and that the courts would have enough guidance to correct injustices. I spoke just half an hour ago to a lawyer who presented to the Supreme Court last week a case pertaining to minority groups or individuals, and it was certainly not his opinion.

Politics being what it is, even with the best intentions in the world, governments often cannot intervene in sensitive situations which must be corrected, for fear of political reactions. Governments were able, making use of judicial decisions, to say: "Listen, the court forces us to act." So governments took action in certain cases. Will we take away that chance, that excuse from provincial governments to proceed? I believe we have to think twice before doing such a thing.

As far as the principle and the application referred to in section 20 go, I am told only two cases are before the courts. When I refer to section 20, senator Beaudoin and others will know that I am talking about services in both official languages. We know how hard it is for governments that have already made a decision to change their minds.

Honourable senators, I want to remind you that we all want to fight the deficit. But I think governments have a choice to make. Regarding the language component, I understand that, during the first few years, administrative expenses represented 60 per cent of the costs. However, things improved afterwards and we could probably do a lot more with the money that could be invested, if the component was maintained. We could probably reach 95 per cent.

This would involve, at the very most, around $500,000 or $600,000 a year. I ask the government to reconsider what we call the language component or any type of restructuring that would allow us to keep the language component under a new name.

Honourable senators, I know that the Commissioner of Official Languages who preceded Dr. Goldbloom had proposed the establishment of an institute for Francophones through which this program could continue to be useful and to correct injustices done to some Anglophones in Quebec and Francophones elsewhere in the country.

I hope that my comments will not fall on deaf ears. I know that the present government has already had the opportunity in the last eight years to backtrack and to change some of its decisions. I hope that we can applaud such a decision. I also hope to get the support of both sides of this House.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

PATENT ACT AMENDMENT ACT, 1992

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-91, to amend the Patent Act, to amend another Act in consequence thereof and to provide for other related matters.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Monday next, December 14, 1992.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, up until yesterday, we thought Bill C-91 would be voted on by the House of Commons only this evening, which would have required us to come back tomorrow for first reading. Now that Bill C-91 is on the Order Paper for Monday, we can dispense with reconvening tomorrow. I will move in a moment that the Senate be granted leave to sit on Monday.

Before doing so, it is only fair that all members on both sides be aware of the heavy agenda which awaits us next week, particularly if we wish to maintain the 18th as our last day here before the Christmas recess.

On Monday we will have the motion for second reading of Bill C-91 which the government would like to have referred to committee before Christmas. We expect that the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology on Bill C-86 will be presented. We will also have the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Supplementary Estimates, and second reading of the relevant supply bill. Towards the middle of the week, we expect to receive the reports on Bill C-26, which is the public service bill, and Bill C-63, which is the bill on the dissolution of Crown corporations. We wish to dispose of three bills, Bills C-86, C-26 and C-63, before the Christmas adjournment.

Either today or tomorrow the House will be passing, in one day, two bills: Bill C-96, the Nova Scotia Courts Amendment Act, and Bill C-94, which will ratify an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Gwich'in Tribal Council. We can also expect to receive the New Brunswick constitutional resolution.

Since all of these items can be considered urgent government business, I would certainly forgo our 1:30 to 3:00 Wednesday sittings and get back on the regular schedule.

I leave this agenda with the house in the hope that we can dispose of everything by December 18. So far, we have had excellent collaboration from all sides, and I hope this will continue right through next week.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would the honourable Deputy Leader permit a question?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Certainly.

Senator Molgat: I noted he said that in the middle of the week he expects the reports on Bills C-26 and C-63 to be presented. Is he perhaps anticipating the work of the committee, or does he already know the committee has made that decision?

Senator Gigantès: Is that the timetable set by Harvie Andre?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No, that is the timetable set by Senator Olson as Chairman and Senator Bolduc as Deputy Chairman, with whom I have spoken regarding their scheduling of witnesses and their work schedule. The indications are that the reports will be presented in the middle of the week.

Senator Molgat: I just thought that perhaps my honourable friend knew something the committee did not know.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No. I am quite sure, however, that Harvie Andre will be quite pleased to read about that in the Debates of the Senate.

If it is agreed, honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h):

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, December 14, 1992, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, December 14, 1992, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, December 14, 1992

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

CYPRUS

WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN PEACEKEEPING TROOPS—POSSIBILITY OF WARFARE

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, the matter of Macedonia and Cyprus has come up again, and the two are connected. Canadians of Greek descent will feel aggrieved if Canada is seen as not taking into account the dangers both in Macedonia and in Cyprus. They are the same dangers. There is talk in Europe of sending troops to Macedonia to prevent warfare before it starts. The same situation exists in Cyprus. However, it seems that we are about to pull our troops out before the warfare starts.

Why would warfare start? The islands that are close to the territory of Turkey, which include Cyprus—which is independent—and the Greek islands, were formerly territories controlled by the Turks, though populated by Greeks. The Turks have never given up their colonial, imperial ideals and ideas. They are still oppressing the Kurds and other nationalities. They invaded Cyprus when they need not have. They were the first to recognize the Republic of Macedonia. The haste in making that recognition was designed to put pressure on Greece on the northwest, while at the same time exercising pressure on Greece all along the Turkish coast, where there are 180,000 Turkish troops facing the Greek islands.

There is the possibility of warfare there. The Turks are irredentist. Whenever they have economic problems, they bash someone.

Canadians have to remember that, in two world wars, Greece was on the same side as Canada. In the First World War, Turkey was on the opposite side. In the Second World War, Turkey remained neutral and made pots of money, while Greece fought bravely, then collapsed and continued its resistance against the axis powers.

The Greeks look to an ally they love such as Canada, and they look to the service that Canadian troops have given toward peace in Cyprus. They wonder why there is a desire to pull out when the Cypriot government is prepared to pay part of the bill, as is the government of Greece.

Something that Canadians of Greek descent will find very difficult to understand is why the Canadian government is taking steps that could lead to conflict between a force that is militarily much superior, namely the Turks, and a much weaker force, the Greek Cypriots, in one situation; or the Greeks facing troubles in Macedonia and also on the eastern frontier with, again, the Turks in another situation.

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as of today I make it 23 days that this government has held democracy in contempt and overstayed its welcome.

CANADA

COMMEMORATION OF PROCLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, on Friday last, perhaps not being fully informed, I thought the Senate would be sitting at nine o'clock in the morning. As I trudged bravely and pantingly up Parliament Hill, I spied through the dawn's early light the Union Jack flying on our courtesy staff.

I was thankful that someone at least had remembered an important historic event, namely, the anniversary of the adoption of the Statute of Westminster by the Parliament of Canada upon the motion of R.B. Bennett. This statute signified and put into writing something that had been working well for a number of years; something that we Canadians considered reflected the genius of the British parliamentary system.

Many countries have written beautiful constitutions but have failed to live up to them. Perhaps there is nothing wrong with recalling the ancient British capacity for establishing a way of performing governmental operations, and yet not hurrying to make it into a document or a charter.

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX TO MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the fourteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on Supplementary Estimates (A) and (B), 1992-93.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of the report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, p. 1578.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Bolduc, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

IMMIGRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX TO MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Thirteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, respecting its examination of Bill C-86, to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day, and that it form part of the permanent record of this House.

(For text of document, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings, p. 1610)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Di Nino, bill placed on Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE CONSTITUTION

AMENDMENT REFLECTING LINGUISTIC EQUALITY OF NEW BRUNSWICK—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Tuesday, 15th December, 1992, I will move:

> THAT WHEREAS section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982, provides that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies;

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 500 residents of the province of British Columbia who object to the goods and services tax.

Most of these petitions are from Port Moody, Burnaby, Coquitlam, Vancouver, New Westminster, Surrey and Richmond.

Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 50 residents of the Province of Nova Scotia who object to the goods and services tax.

Most of these petitions are from Truro, Bedford, Halifax, Amherst, Coganville and Londonderry.

Finally, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 440 residents of the province of Québec who object to the goods and services tax.

Most of these petitions are from St-Hyacinthe, St-Thomas, Victoriaville, La Présentation, Ste-Cécile-de-Milton, Ste-Foy, Ste-Thérèse, Longueuil, Île Bizard, Québec City, Clarenceville, St-Cuthbert, Ste-Anne-de-la-Pocatière, Gatineau, Cantley, Granby, St-Edmond, St-Barthélémy, Montréal and St-Damase.

These petitions were signed in July, 1992!

It seems that from Nova Scotia to British Columbia, including Quebec, 990 Canadians continue to object to a tax they consider to be unfair. When the time comes they will remember how the Tory government treated them with contempt, and the sooner the better!

POVERTY IN CANADA

LEGITIMACY OF FOOD BANKS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to give the Leader of the Government in the Senate an opportunity to dissociate himself from a comment made by one of his caucus colleagues, Barbara Greene, who is also chair of the subcommittee on poverty in the other place. On the CBC Radio Saturday morning show The House, she said this:

The whole idea of standing in line for food is wrong.

I have no problem agreeing with that statement, but she went on to say that food bank workers were creating jobs for themselves and, in turn, "creating the whole industry". That leaves the impression that this government does not honestly believe that there is poverty, that food banks are necessary, and that it believes that food bank workers are creating the whole industry. Is that the attitude of the government?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition is a keen student of constitutional and parliamentary practice, and therefore would know that, as a minister of the Crown, I am bound by statements of government policy made by cabinet colleagues, but I am no more bound by statements made by caucus colleagues than he is by statements made by his caucus colleagues.

Senator Frith: Will the Leader of the Government not take the opportunity to dissociate himself from those comments?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that would not be an appropriate thing for me, or for any minister, to do.

NEGATIVE IMPACT OF SOCIAL PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT STATISTICS

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: On this issue—which is an issue that disturbs a great many people because it reveals Herbert Spencer and 19th-century workhouse tendencies—will the Leader of the Government enquire whether there are any statistics that divide the poor from the undeserving poor; and any statistics to support an objective conclusion that reliance on food banks increases people's dependency and contributes to their state of poverty?

The Tory theory is that unemployment insurance creates unemployment, that social security creates people who rely on welfare, and that food banks create hungry people. Have any studies been done in this area? Is the Leader of the Government prepared to make those inquiries so that we can settle this issue once and for all?

[Senator Hébert.]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The same answer applies, honourable senators.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

MEDICAL QUALIFICATIONS OF MINISTER OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Would the Leader of the Government please tell me whether Mr. Wilson, the Minister of International Trade, holds a medical degree?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if my friend is interested in the curriculum vitae of any of my colleagues, I suggest that he research that information in the Parliamentary Guide.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I listened to the Honourable Minister say that the prices of medications would go up as a result of the passage of Bill C-91, but that savings would be made if fewer drugs were prescribed. Is the minister substituting himself for the physicians who prescribe those drugs for their patients?

• (2020)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have not seen the a report of that statement which the honourable senator attributes to Mr. Wilson. Until I have seen and verified it, I would certainly not want to take any further action on it.

Senator Gigantès: Are you promising to comment on that statement after you have seen it, sir?

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators. Once I have seen the report and verified it, I will undertake to ask Mr. Wilson whether he has any comments on it.

THE ECONOMY

ENDING OF RECESSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should also like to ask the Leader of the Government whether the Prime Minister was joking or serious when he said that he hopes Mr. Clinton will follow his lead, or is following his lead and, therefore, seeking soft landings and all the other mumbo jumbo about the recession ending yesterday? If so, Mr. Clinton should abandon his policies of stimulating the economy and follow the policies of the Canadian government of aggravating the recession.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is a fact that President-elect Clinton, viewing the recent evidence of new economic growth in the United States, has hedged a bit on whether it will now be necessary for him to apply stimulus to the extent that he earlier thought would be necessary. That is a fact. I am sure the honourable senator will have remarked on it in the media.

It is also a fact, to the extent that one can rely on reports coming from the media in Washington, that the President-elect is committed to such policies as deficit reduction and deregulation, which have been a cornerstone of the policy of the Canadian government since 1984.

Senator Gigantès: Are we to take it that the government of Prime Minister Mulroney and of the honourable Leader of the Government in this chamber will hereafter take credit for everything that Mr. Clinton does right?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend asks how we should take it. He will take it with his usual equanimity.

Senator Gigantès: Does the honourable senator remember the Greek quotation I recited last time?

> Those whom the gods wish to destroy, they first render foolish.

NEW BRUNSWICK

ADOPTION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT ON THE PRINCIPLE OF LINGUISTIC EQUALITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I wanted to ask a question earlier, when the Leader of the Government in the Senate presented the resolution. First of all, I want to congratulate him very sincerely.

I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if the action he has taken, which I fully support, can help correct what happened last Friday in the House of Commons.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, it seems that the House of Commons cannot address this resolution until February 1, 1993, because of problems caused by some members in the other place last Friday.

Therefore I decided to present the resolution here in the Senate so that the Senate could deal with it this week and thus send a message to the people of New Brunswick.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I am very pleased with that and for the second time I want to congratulate the Leader of the Government in the Senate for having foreseen what the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons should have foreseen! Knowing the Bloc Québécois and the Reform Party, one could have expected the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, who is responsible for legislation in that place, to foresee these possibilities and then we would not have to face this situation today in New Brunswick.

I repeat, this can send a message to the people of New Brunswick. I am glad that the Leader of the Government in the Senate is sending this message to New Brunswickers, but it does not repair—I do not want to say the "stupidity" but I can find no other words that really explain what happened in the House of Commons not only last Friday but all last week!

Again I congratulate you and I hope that the Senate will deal with it promptly.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, please note that the events in the other place last Friday were quite unexpected, because the Bloc Québécois had already promised to support the resolution. In fact, the NDP is at least half responsible for the mess that occurred.

Senator Thériault: Unwittingly! But as Joe Clark did not know how to count in 1979, you forgot how to count in the House of Commons!

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

REPORT OF PATENTED MEDICINE PRICES REVIEW BOARD REFLECTING INCREASED DRUG PRICES AND ROLLBACKS—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a question about drug pricing. I know that the matter is before Parliament, but in view of the imminent danger of closure, it may not be possible for me to ask this question at committee meetings.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I am sorry?

Senator Perrault: Charges have been made today by Mr. Raymond Beaton of Burnaby. He says:

> The drug company Lederle-Cyanamid Canada Inc. had a product in their line called methotrexate, prescribed for the treatment of a type of skin cancer. This drug sold to the public for $57 per 100 pills.
> The company discovered the drug had a beneficial side effect in some patients—it greatly reduced the symptoms of rheumatism pain. It therefore decided to market it for this purpose under a new name, Rheumatrex. This drug was sold for $213 per 100 pills .
> The provincial bodies —

The province of British Columbia was a party to this.

> — that pay for drugs for seniors and hospital pharmacies cried foul, and the government entered into discussions with the drug manufacturer.
> A compromise was reached which resulted in a price change. The new price for Rheumatrex and methotrexate (still the identical drug, but with different packaging) was $98 per 100 pills.

That is still more than the original price of $57 per 100 pills.

My question is this: Has the government identified any cases where it has been found that the drug manufacturers have been grossly overcharging in the way that this article suggests? Would it be possible to provide this evidence for the Senate so that we can determine how effective the government's review program has been since Bill C-22 was passed by Parliament two or three years ago?

Mr. Beaton says that the information for his charges came from Pierre Blais, Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The Leader of the Government may not think this is a very serious matter, but this government's attitude toward drug pricing is quite disgraceful. I want to point out for Hansard that the Leader of the Government is laughing at the high cost of drugs in Canada.

Senator Gigantès: Of course, the drug companies give them money for the elections.

Senator Perrault: The matter of drug pricing is before Parliament, but we believe it to be unconscionable that the government, while decreasing transfer payments and dumping responsibility for health costs on provinces, would introduce legislation to make health care dramatically more expensive.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Question.

Senator Perrault: This is one instance where gross overcharging for a drug has been clearly identified. How many other cases of this kind have come to light? What is the government doing to protect the people of Canada from excessive drug pricing?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my honourable friend was not here last week when our colleague Senator Simard asked a question at a length almost equal to that of the honourable senator's question this evening —.

Senator Gigantès: Prevarication. Inability to count well as demonstrated by this particular minister.

Senator Murray: —at which point Senator Austin rose in righteous indignation to protest this abuse of the Oral Question Period. However, we will let it go tonight because I do recognize the seriousness of the issue.

Senator Perrault: It is an abuse of the rights of senior citizens.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator who has made somewhat of a study of this field, knows how the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board has worked since Bill C-22 was brought in.

Senator Thériault: It has not worked.

Senator Murray: We can demonstrate that the price increases of those patent medicines have been below the rise in inflation over that period. The honourable senator will also be aware of the measures that are proposed in Bill C-91 —

Senator Thériault: Yes, to make them more expensive.

Senator Murray: —to make the board even stronger, to increase its power. All I can say to the honourable senator, when he mentions closure in committee, is that the bill has not even been given second reading.

Senator Hastings: He said "maybe".

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Murray: It is my hope that honourable senators would agree to give that bill second reading before Christmas. That would mean that the bill could go to committee. The Senate will not resume for many weeks, and that will give the committee many days to hold hearings to discuss the bill with witnesses, members of the government and so on.

Senator Doody: We could sit on January 2.

Senator Murray: I invite the honourable senator to come to Ottawa and take part in those proceedings.

Senator Perrault: Of course, honourable senators, the Leader of the Government is aware of the fact that this government has invoked closure in the Senate and in the House of Commons more than all of the other preceding governments combined in the history of Canada. We have lost our simple, child-like faith in the integrity of this government and its respect for the parliamentary system.

I ask my question again: Why was no action taken in this case by the board that is supposed to restrain inordinate increases in drug prices? The reduction in the cost of this particular medicine came about only after the hospital pharmacies, the provincial bodies and the seniors' organizations protested. Where was the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board when the people of Canada needed it? How many other times has that body ignored the public interest and proceeded without protecting that public interest?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if the honourable senator had given me notice of the question or had put it in writing, I would have made an effort to investigate the particular situation to which he refers. Surely he does not expect me to carry information about the price rise in a particular product around in my head. I just cannot do that.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that would be expecting too much, but may we be assured by the Leader of the Government that he will bring a report to the Senate outlining the degree of activity by the Patented Drug Prices Review Board since Bill C-22, and, in particular, the number of price rollbacks that have taken place. I am not aware of the existance of any such document. If it does, it certainly has not been given much publicity.

How many companies have been advised that they have been overcharging for drugs? This is of great importance to the Canadian people when they are facing extremely large increases for health care.

Senator Murray: The rollbacks were not authorized under the present law. Rollback power, however, is proposed for the board under the new bill, Bill C-91. I will be glad to bring to the house whatever information is available on these matters.

Again, I urge the honourable senator to attend the meetings of the committee, when that bill is referred to committee, where he will have the opportunity to examine witnesses as to the functioning of the price control mechanism we have in place and the one that we propose.

Senator Perrault: I intend to be at the committee meetings to ask my questions. How many drug companies went bankrupt in Canada last year? There were a number of bankruptcies in other sectors; how many drug companies went bankrupt this past year? Does the Leader of the Government have an answer to that question?

Senator Murray: It may be that a few did or that none did.

Senator Perrault: That's right; he knows the answer to that one.

Senator Murray: If that is a matter of disappointment to my honourable friend, then we have a different set of values.

• (2040)

ALLEGED FRAUDULENT PRICING PRACTICES OF DRUG COMPANIES

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, a recent issue of the Economist stated that, in the United States, drug companies are the most profitable and have been for the past decade. They have relied on constant price increases to increase their profits. They operate with a margin of 35 per cent of revenue over expenses. They spend $10 billion on advertising, and only $6 billion on research. In other words, they spend an awful lot of money to convince someone that one particular firm's .333 milligrams of acetylsalicylic acid is better than another firm's .333 grams of acetylsalicylic acid.

The point Senator Perrault was making relates to the entry price incurred by a firm that changes the name of an existing drug, and markets it at no extra cost. The research costs have already been absorbed in the previous marketing of the drug under another name. The drug is renamed and, zoom, the price is many times more than it was before.

That is fraud and it is against the spirit of the previous bill which the pharmaceutical companies adopted when they promised they would not increase drug prices more than the cost of living. That being so, how does one get around that promise by taking a drug, changing its name and bringing it in again at a much higher price? How does that relate to the cost of living?

Senator Doody: And you criticized poor Senator Simard for a lengthy preamble.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Simard enjoys me criticizing him, as I enjoy him criticizing me. We are in tandem in this place. I also enjoy it when Senator Barootes heckles me, although he is not doing so at the moment.

Senator Barootes: I have not said anything!

Senator Gigantès: That is what I am complaining about.

Senator Barootes: Sit down.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Barootes is the one who encouraged the doctors to go out on strike, rather than stay to take care of the sick, in order to try to stop this country from providing Medicare. Come on, rise to the bait.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Question!

Senator Barootes: Who is asking questions of whom?

POVERTY IN CANADA

LEGITIMACY OF FOOD BANKS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I am sure there is not a senator in this chamber who does not view the increase in the number of food banks in Canada over the last few years to well over 400 as a human tragedy because of the growing numbers of people on welfare, the more than a million children living in poverty, and the more than a million and a half Canadians who are out of work.

I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to take this opportunity to distance himself from the suggestion made by one of his caucus colleagues on the House of Commons side that people who are providing this service and going through the stress of running food banks are in fact trying to create jobs for themselves. It is a preposterous notion and I would expect the Leader of the Government, if not as a member of cabinet, as an individual member of the Senate, would wish to repudiate that suggestion.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I dealt with that matter in reply to the first question asked by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition in the Senate.

Senator Gigantès: You dealt with it in an unsatisfactory manner, which is why Senator Fairbairn is asking the question again.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will follow up my almost entreaty to the Leader of the Government in the Senate for the sake of people who are actually carrying out this function at this time of year; at a time when Parliament should be worried about helping people to discharge the responsibility that has been forced on them through the necessity of having food banks. I know from my own experience that this is an insult to Jenny Skinner and Jock Carpenter who run the two food banks in Lethbridge. I ask the government leader to think about it and perhaps tomorrow he will indicate that this is not in any way indicative of his party's or his government's attitude towards the situation in which our society finds itself.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Member of Parliament who spoke on those matters is considerably experienced in this field of policy. She clearly has a point of view; she clearly wanted to start a debate on the issue, and she has clearly succeeded.

Senator Fairbairn: I would hope that the leader of government would clearly distance himself from the remarks of his colleague, because there are others who are expert on this issue who are appalled at the suggestion.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Ms Barbara Greene, MP, did not purport to speak on behalf of the government. Therefore, it is not for me as a minister of the Crown to associate myself with, or to disassociate myself from what she says.

Senator Gigantès: However, as a human being, does the Leader of the Government not owe it to those people who are working for the poor to say something to encourage them when they are being attacked by a Tory?

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I had not intended to deal with the current subject matter. However, I would like to place on the record the fact that my younger son is a volunteer at a food bank in Toronto. He joined the food bank with no intention of deriving either a job or any remuneration, but merely as a volunteer to assist the general need in Toronto.

Although that is not the purpose of my question, I would like to bring that information to the attention of the government side. Numerous volunteers in the city of Toronto go to the food banks every day, and they do not look upon what they are doing as a job, but as a way of assisting those in need.

CYPRUS

TIMETABLE FOR WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN PEACEKEEPING TROOPS—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Has the government now established a timetable for the withdrawal of the Canadian troops that are now in Cyprus? If so, could he advise us when that might be?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am advised that the troops will be withdrawn by mid-1993. This will not be before the mandate date of June 15 and not after the troop rotation in September. The details will be developed in consultation with the UN.

Senator Grafstein: What steps has the government taken to ensure that, by the withdrawal of these troops, Cypriot citizens involved in this dispute will not be put in harm's way?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the decision in that regard is being taken in consultation with the United Nations.

Senator Grafstein: Is the Government of Canada satisfied, notwithstanding the consultations, that people will not be put in harm's way by the withdrawal of these troops?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will deal with other questions on that matter tomorrow. The time for Question Period has expired.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question raised by Senator Perrault on December 2, regarding the increases in employment since the Patent Act was amended.

[Senator Murray.]

INCREASES IN EMPLOYMENT SINCE PATENT ACT AMENDMENT REQUEST FOR STATISTICS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Raymond Perrault on December 2, 1992)

According to a survey of 48 of the 64 companies member of Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada (PMAC), it can be stated that from 1987-1991, a minimum of 2,481 net new jobs were created in the innovative pharmaceutical industry, a growth of 17.1%. This brings the total employment figure for these companies to 17,002 from 14,521 in 1987. The rate is on target for PMAC's commitment of creating 3,000 new jobs in the innovative pharmaceutical sector in Canada by 1996. These numbers mean that based on the performance of 75% of the companies who committed themselves in 87, the ratio/achievement is near 83%. One could conclude that the goal aimed at has already been achieved, in half the time expected.

The following table provides a break-down as to the type of employment created:

Classification of New Jobs	Number of New Jobs	Percentage of Total
Medical R&D	706	28.5
Manufacturing	–181	–7.3
Distribution	21	0.9
Mark. & Sales	1405	56.6
Administration	530	21.4
TOTAL:	2481	100

R&D jobs includes clinical research on medicines developed in other countries as well as research in the development of new drugs. A further breakdown on the number of new jobs created solely in the clinical research area that had been developed in other countries is not available.

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY LAW IMPROVEMENT BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelleher, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Comeau, for the second reading of Bill S-17, to amend the Copyright Act, the Industrial Design Act, the Integrated Circuit Topography Act, the Patent Act, the Trade-marks Act and other Acts in consequence thereof.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this is the Intellectual Properties Law Improvement Bill. This bill was spoken to by Senator Kelleher on Thursday last, and I have reviewed his intervention.

I was somewhat worried by the title and words he used such as "today's needs for intellectual property protection," the need to "streamline and modernize intellectual property", and its objective is to "improve intellectual property administration practise and procedures." Those are the kind of blandishments that are often used to cover up initiatives that can have harmful effects.

I was disarmed considerably today by a visit from Mr. Alan Troicuk, senior legal analyst, Legislative Division Directorate at Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and Caroline Thibaudeau, a public servant attached to the deputy minister on parliamentary relations.

As Senator Kelleher said, the bill deals with five pieces of legislation, all of them important branches of the law of intellectual property: the Patent Act, the Trade-marks Act, the Copyright Act, the Industrial Designs Act, and the Integrated Circuit Topography Act.

I went over each of these acts with Mr. Troicuk and Ms Thibaudeau. I was suspicious, not of them, but of the possible motivation for some of these changes. This is a technical bill. It is not a simple bill. It has 73 sections, including the "coming into force" section.

These two individuals were very forthcoming. As far as I was able to learn today, the principle of the bill should be supported and it should be sent to a committee for study. I believe that, in a few hours, the members of the committee should be able to obtain satisfaction that all these changes do represent technical and administrative improvements to the law of Canada as it deals with intellectual property.

It is also worthwhile to underline something else I discovered from them today; that the Canadian Intellectual Property Advisory Committee, IPAC, referred to by Senator Kelleher, consists not only of creators, that is, the patent-holders or the intellectual property owners, but also users, consumer associations and other users. They apparently support this bill.

The principle of the bill deserves support. It should get careful study clause by clause in the committee, and then we will see what the committee has to report. Honourable senators, I recommend that we give second reading of this bill now.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, on the question of which committee it should go to, patents and royalties is one of the specific subheadings of Banking, Trade and Commerce, so one would be tempted to send it to that committee. However, it deals with a lot more than patents and royalties. It also deals with trade-marks and with copyright.

I can be persuaded otherwise, but, because it is technical, my intuitive feeling is this bill would be better to go to Legal and Constitutional Affairs. It will be easier to get the basics understood and get on to the technical changes. My recommendation is that it go to Legal and Constitutional Affairs rather than Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Transport and Communications has some experience in the copyright side. If it were more substantive about copyright, I would be inclined to think it could easily go there. However, it is so split and technical that it would be better to go to Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): We agree with the Leader of the Opposition and so move.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

THE PATENT ACT AMENDMENT ACT, 1992

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DABATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Mario Beaulieu moved the second reading of Bill C-91, An Act to amend the Patent Act, to amend another Act in consequence thereof and to provide for other related matters.

Honourable senators, today a very important piece of legislation is put forward to strengthen the Canadian economy by increasing patent protection for pharmaceutical products. Under Bill C-91, patented pharmaceutical products will be protected for the same full period of patent protection as in other technology sectors, thus providing Canada with access to standards used in all other industrialized countries.

This bill will also give the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board more power to protect consumers. Because of the role this board plays, we can be sure that there will be increased monitoring of manufacturers to prevent them from charging excessive prices.

[English]

I am presenting today Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act and to solidify the role of the board that oversees price control, the Patent Medicines Price Review Board. This change will be beneficial for all Canadians. The bill will help Canada in its quest to surge ahead in the search for new medicines and cures. At the same time, we will ensure that prices continue to be affordable for all citizens.

[Translation]

We are convinced this act will bring tangible benefits to consumers and to all Canadians directly involved in this industry either as employees or as research workers. This is what we are trying to show with the supporting figures we brought today.

Our colleagues in the House of Commons have discussed the value of this bill tabled for first reading on June 23, 1992. That first version has been amended and the bill we have received can now be examined on its merits. Bill C-22 dealing with the same subject was submitted to the Senate for analysis more than five years ago. I was not here at the time, but I know that debate generated keen and heated exchanges.

[English]

I was reading the transcripts a few days ago from the 1987 senate debates over the adoption of Bill C-22 with great interest. Some of my esteemed colleagues from the other side were as inventive and active then as they were about the GST provisions last year, when I first entered the Senate.

[Translation]

I want to stress the fact that today, the situation has changed considerably. With the passage of time, we have now reached the point where we can proceed with a more objective assessment of the consequences of the proposed changes, while in 1987, when it was impossible to make predictions with any degree of certainty. Today, we can estimate the investment commitments of the companies involved, the monetary impact of amounts invested in R & D, the number of jobs created, plus a very important factor: the increase in the prices of drugs.

We have these figures, and we will give them to you. As we introduce this bill today, our position is straightforward: Bill C-91 is a proposital that is clear and easy to assess.

The changes involved are far less substantial than they were in Bill C-22. We know the results of introducing Bill C-22, and thanks to these figures, we can pinpoint the impact this new bill will have. I am convinced that after examining this bill, we will all realize it is in our best interests to proceed thoroughly and quickly, because there are also a lot of deadlines involved. Bearing in mind the objectives of this bill, we can say that its passage is vitally important, not only because of the timeframes of eventual agreements under GATT and NAFTA but also because of our firm resolve to ensure that Canada some major investments. The industry is now undergoing dramatic restructuring internationally, and decisions are being made at this very moment on policy and investment. That is why we must act now and maximize our efforts. After due consideration, I am sure you will agree that the bill deserves this kind of urgent attention.

What kind of changes are involved? Briefly, the purpose of this bill is to remedy a situation that puts us at a disadvantage, so that Canada can offer the same conditions as all other industrialized countries. We want innovators in the pharmaceutical field to be able to enjoy the same market conditions that prevail elsewhere.

At the present time, innovating companies are obliged to obtain licences. According to the compulsory licensing regulations now in effect, generic companies still have the right to obtain licenses authorizing the production of copies of patented drugs even before the patents have expired.

We are proposing a new system that would eliminate compulsory licensing and extend patent protection for a longer period, an estimated average of 3 or 4 years, so that producers can enjoy the fruits of their research. We propose a period of full patent protection of not more than 20 years, compared with 17 years at the present time, including time spent on design, and development as well as the period of market exclusivity. In other words, we want to give innovating companies a protection period similar to that given by our GATT partners. As you know, GATT suggests a minimum of 20 years.

We believe the industry, which is nevertheless flourishing in this country, should be able to count on the same development conditions it enjoys in most other countries. As markets become globalized, it is of course unthinkable that Canada should remain the obsolete exception in a competitive market.

This change will improve our competitive position and encourage new investors to settle in Canada once our rules are more in line with those of all other industrialized countries. The increased patent protection will also promote major capital injection by businesses already well established in our country (commitments in excess of $500 million). These are the same corporate citizens who had assured us of their cooperation when Bill C-22 was introduced in 1987. That bill that we have made into law changed the conditions in which pharmaceutical innovation takes place. The players are the same now as they were then. They had promised to act and they did. We have very reason to believe that they will again. Why want to break a combination that is bound to benefit Canadians?

We are looking at a legislation which is doubly stimulating for the economy with, on the one hand, a more competitive context to attract new investments and, on the other hand, the formal promise of injecting immediately several hundred millions of dollars.

We will recall that, in 1987, the businesses involved in pharmaceutical research had promised to create new jobs and to invest in research and development in response to the broadening of the scope of the law.

By 1991, these businesses were spending $376.4 million in research and development. That is much more than promised in 1987. As a matter of fact, it represented 9.7 per cent of their sales for 1991, a 23 per cent increase over the previous year.

We will recall that the level of investments represented 5 per cent of sales when Bill C-22 was adopted in 1987. The companies had promised at the time to raise it to 10 per cent by 1996. They are almost there today, five years early. Since 1987, they have invested over $1 billion in research and development.

Let us not forget that this money is not spent only on their own laboratories. Canadian Universities and hospitals also received millions in funding from pharmaceutical companies. In addition to the 18,000 jobs they provide within their organizations, these companies help to maintain and create thousands of research jobs elsewhere in the country.

In his speech to the House of Commons on September 17, 1992, the honourable Pierre Blais, the minister responsible for this bill, quoted some comments received from all deans of faculty of medicine confirming this fact. You will agree that this is a far cry from the prophecies of prophets of doom who saw all the money flying out of the country to fill the coffers of the international headquarters of these companies.

Of course, these are mostly foreign companies, but they are doing business here, they offer Canadians well-paid jobs and they also honour their commitments. They have kept their promises about to research and development or job creation. Once again, the results have exceeded our expectations. Despite figures showing that only 1,300 jobs have been created, we know that is not the case. In 1987, drug companies promised new jobs (estimated at 3,000 by the government). Up until now, 2,400 jobs have been created, including 700 for scientists. The companies have four more years to create 600 other jobs according to the commitment they made. Here again, we can say we are almost there. As we can see, the drug companies kept their promise.

Let me make a short aside here on the important role that generic drug companies play in this issue. Some will claim that this bill is a death sentence for them. I think that they are the same people who said that would happen in 1987. Instead of dying after the 1987 law passed, these companies have surged ahead, with sales increases of 180 per cent since that time. You should also know that these companies, which love to wrap themselves in the Canadian flag to defend their cause, employ only 2,300 people in all throughout Canada, while the other companies employ 18,000. The generic companies employ fewer people than the 2,400 new jobs created by Bill C-22. My intention is not to denigrate that kind of company, on the contrary, but we must be aware of the relative magnitudes involved.

As for price increases, needless to say, no one was able to predict where the economic situation would take us in 1987. By creating a price control agency, the government hoped to be able to limit excessive increases as much as possible as well as overpricing for new products introduced on the market. The Patented Medicine Prices Review Board has in general met this twofold challenge. While Bill C-91 would give it even more power, it has been outstandingly effective.

With enhanced powers, it will be able to play a much greater preventive role. In general, the Board has kept price increases below consumer price increases since it was created. From 1987 to date, the price of patented medicine has increased by 2.9 per cent a year on average. The consumer price index has risen 4.4 per cent on average in that time. We all know that this index is calculated on the price of common items bought by average consumers. Price increases are relatively low at the manufacturers' level, where the Board has a mandate to act. If some prices rose more, the reasons must be sought elsewhere. Many different players are involved along the line.

We think that the credibility of the companies mainly involved here is generally positive. Before 1987, we all knew that this industry was a potential leader for our economic progress. What we did not know, however, and what was an unknown phenomenon was the immediate future of that industry. The very special situation resulting from the 1969 legislative changes that introduced the compulsory licensing regime made it a unique case.

When it proposed changes in 1987, the government thought it was going in the right direction. But it was just as difficult for the government as it was for the opponents of the initiative to foresee the results. Today we can. Investments have improved and there was a measured growth of the economic impact of that industry on all of Canada. The companies have really generated investments and created jobs and they did it without excessive price increases. They are now proposing a new agreement. This time, they want an additional commitment of more than half a billion dollars, precisely 635 million dollars in investments for the 1992-96 period. The proposed changes are not as drastic as those of 1987. In fact, their purpose is simply to adjust our situation to that of our economic partners. The House of Commons has approved the proposal; the ball is in our court.

To comply with the requirements of the GATT and NAFTA agreements and with our objectives to improve Canada's competitiveness, we must act swiftly.

It is certainly worth it since thousands of jobs are at stake. We see no reason why we should prevent the prompt passage of the act.

• (2110)

[English]

Jobs are at stake as well as solid investments throughout Canada, and yet we see a parade of experts coming here to tell us that this bill will be detrimental to our country. They are coming in from the U.S. to tell us how to organize our patent system, when we know for a fact that the U.S. is seriously reconsidering its whole approach to their Health Care system. This is one of the reasons Bill Clinton was elected president.

Senator Frith: And he opposes this bill, too.

Senator Beaulieu: When the Americans are carefully examining the success story of our Price Review Board because the price of medicines is 32 per cent higher over there, why should we take lessons from their so-called experts?

Senator Frith: He will also examine compulsory licensing and its advantages.

[Translation]

Yet, we have been swamped for weeks with alarming statistics from al kinds of so-called experts trying to convince us that the passage of this law will entail an erosion of the health care system or an explosion of drug prices. These experts generally come from United States where the rules of the game are quite different from ours. At the moment, I would not trade systems with them for all the money in the world. Somehow we do have in Canada responsible and qualified people in our departments who follow things closely and who are in a position to confirm that additional costs related to this measure will not exceed $129 million for the next five years.

You have to admit that this is nothing to make a fuss about. It is less than one dollar per Canadian per year or, if you prefer, less than one twentieth of 1 percent of the total health care costs in Canada. Will we believe our own experts, our own civil servants, or those artists invited over for a weekend?

We were presented with projections over a 17-year period by one of those experts. He told us that costs would increase by $7 billion. As far as I know, nobody can claim to guess demand variations over such a long period of time. I think he should run for the Nobel prize. Nobody I know of can make long-term projections of that kind. Surely, he must resort to crystal gazing and astrology.

That same so-called expert also admitted that he made his analysis over the Thanksgiving week-end. That is how serious he was. When we examined his premises, we found out that he included products that are not even affected by the bill because they are already covered by a licence. The protection of another drug he included expired 11 years ago. We have no need for studies like that when we have those of our own civil servants who are most serious and wrote a most serious bill.

And what about that other guest star from the States who deals with cars and so many other things. He told us that this bill will be the end of our medicare system.

That dominant figure of consumerism predicted that prices will explode. I have to admit that that witness was more cautious than the other one. He did not dare make 17-year projections. He is much more clever, because he has more experience.

That same fellow gave us the same gloom and doom scenario in 1987. He predicted that generic drug companies would go under and that the bad multinationals would take the Canadian consumers to the cleaner. After Bill C-22 was passed, patented drug prices increased by an average of 2.9 per cent a year and generic drug prices increased at a much faster rate.

I could go on and on and give you tens of examples of the same kind. Last week, I was reading a report on price increases of six or seven different types of drugs. Upon examination, our civil servants found out that none of those drugs was affected by the bill, but the report was supposed to describe the evil consequences of Bill C-91. Everybody should be aware that 80 per cent of the drugs used in Canada are not affected by this bill.

Did you know that there are presently 2000 products whose patents are expired and that they are therefore available to generic companies, but have never been copied? No, we should certainly not feel sorry for these companies, even if their American friends or others are asking us to. To this day, I have not heard any really serious arguments to challenge the bill.

This bill brings the promise of profitable investments for all Canadians.

At the beginning of my speech, I reminded you of the positive results that the introduction of Bill C-22 brought about. I want to conclude by bringing to your attention the positive results that Bill C-91 will give us in the short term, because we should also talk about that. These results will be the creation of well-paid permanent jobs and additional funds for researchers both at these companies and at our public institutions. These are people who devote their talents to research for the well-being of their fellow citizens. Let's not forget that they are working to help fight diseases. Moreover, innovative pharmaceutical companies are willing to help a lot by making major investments all across Canada.

It has often been said that this bill was generally meant to favour Quebec, but this is far from the truth! We all know that this is a perverse argument from those who feed on petty regionalism. We only have to look at Bill C-91 to see that, on the contrary, it will favour the whole country. As a matter of fact, continuous pressure from the government in power is bringing future investments in other regions more than ever. Merck Frosst just announced a grant of $15 million to the University of British Columbia, on top of the half million already promised by another company. Glaxo, $15 million to the University of Alberta to which Bristol-Myers has already pledged $250,000 in research funds. Ayerst will invest $60 million to build a new plant in Brandon, Manitoba, and Marion Merril-Dow will invest $1.3 million in Alberta on research on preventing heart diseases.

These are striking examples showing that all areas of the country will benefit from this bill.

[English]

The Canadian government has been active in trying to bring to all the provinces, not just in central Canada but everywhere, a share of the investments in the pharmaceutical industry. Overall, up to date, the commitment of those companies involved in research and development totals more than $90 million in new projects targeted outside central Canada.

Those investments are for the building of new plants and facilities, research and development in hospitals, research institutes, universities and private-sector laboratories. This means high quality employment in an environment where all sectors of industry can grow.

[Translation]

In fact, we have to have an overall picture of the promised investments to understand that we have everything to win in adopting this bill. If we extend our commercial exclusivity from three to four years for innovators, become competitive for the research and development industry. When we announced our decision to proceed with this change at the beginning of the year, the response was not long to come. Innovative companies immediately committed investments totalling $325 million, $80 million for Ontario and $55 million for Québec, the rest being devoted to projects throughout Canada in sites yet to be determined.

When the bill was tabled this summer, on June 23, 1992, the companies made other announcements, and an additional sum of almost $350 million was added to a total which is now estimated at $676 million across Canada. those are the figures I have for the period up until December. The same people who delivered the goods in 1987 are now promising more than half a billion dollars worth of investments.

Should we turn a deaf ear? Should we set this issue aside, as some people are asking us to do? I do not think so. For us, the answer is clear. It is our duty, as politicians, to improve the collective lot of our fellow citizens and to carefully examine the merits of this bill. We must fully understand that we are presently at the eleventh hour for its approval or its rejection. By missing the opportunity to accept this proposal right now, we will jeopardize our chances to expand, in our country, the research market in this field. The rules of the game were announced more than a year ago.

The proposal to abolish compulsory licensing and to introduce the other mechanisms provided for in the bill was unveiled early in 1992 so that all stakeholders could prepare themselves.

In fact, the Dunkel report, from which these recommendations are taken, was tabled on December 20, 1991. Today, this industry is going through a full restructuring. It is now that investment decisions are taken and should be taken quickly. Until evidence to the contrary, in terms of competitive environment, we have less to offer than other countries. We are the only country that imposes compulsory licensing and our protection period for commercial exclusivity is the shortest among all industrialized countries. It is time to act, because we are already behind.

For all the reasons mentioned here, we are certain to be working in the best interest of the country by passing Bill C-91. At least, this is my opinion, that of my party and, I hope, that of the Liberals across the floor. Thank you.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: May I put a question to Senator Beaulieu without that being considered an intervention on my part?

I just want to ask a question. Is that alright? Is there anyone on the other side?

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: We are listening!

Senator Gigantès: Oh! I have your permission, Madam, thank you very much.

Senator Beaulieu, to pass Bill C-86, your party imposed closure on the first hour, of the first day of meeting of the committee.

Here, we are told by the government leader in the Senate that we are going to have days and days of hearings. Why do you do that? Why are you dragging your feet on this one while rushing the other one? Is it for propaganda's sake in Quebec? You are doing it on purpose!

Senator Beaulieu: Honourable senators, I am quite willing to pass it right away, but you can direct your question to the leader of the government in the Senate who will answer better than I could.

[English]

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: May I ask an additional question of the honourable senator? He quoted some statistics in terms of total investment, inflationary increases and percentage related to research. Where do those numbers come from?

Senator Beaulieu: They come from our civil servants. There is no doubt about that. They have studied the case and come up with the figures. In committee we will be able to prove that all those figures are right.

Senator Grafstein: Are these figures public information? Are we able to get the entire financial picture of these corporations, as opposed to just their published conclusion?

Senator Beaulieu: They are already public.

Senator Thériault: From the companies.

Senator Beaulieu: No, no, no.

Senator Thériault: Yes, yes, yes.

Senator Grafstein: Just so we will understand, and to facilitate the debate, will we have available to us, either during the readings of the bill or in committee, the total revenue streams and costs of the generic companies that are seeking monopoly protection from the government?

Senator Barootes: They have no figures. They are private companies.

Senator Beaulieu: The committee will be answering all of those questions with pleasure.

On motion of Senator Kirby, debate adjourned.

THE PATENT ACT AMENDMENT ACT, 1992

BILL TO AMEND—NOTICE OF MOTION TO ALLOCATE TIME

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, for at least a week now there have been discussions with the leadership on the other side regarding an allocation of time for the consideration of the second reading stage of Bill C-91. As has been said on more than one occasion, it is the desire of the government to see this bill go to committee before our suggested date of adjournment, December 18, and certainly before Christmas. Unfortunately, we could not come to an agreement. Since none has been reached, I am giving notice of the following motion:

> That, pursuant to the provisions of rule 40, in relation to Bill C-91, an act to amend the Patent Act, to amend another act in consequence thereof and to provide for other related matters, not more than eight further hours of debate be allotted to the consideration of the said bill at the second reading stage;
> That, when the debate comes to an end or when the time provided for the consideration of the second reading stage of the said bill has expired, the Speaker shall interrupt, if required, any proceedings then before the Senate and put forthwith and successively every question necessary to dispose of the said stage of the said bill;
> That any recorded vote or votes on the said questions shall be taken in accordance with the provisions of rule 40 (4).

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON A RENEWED CANADA

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order of the Day:

Resuming debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, dated 28th February 1992 (Sessional Paper 343-416A).

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I supported constitutional reforms well before Beaudoin-Dobbie. I supported Pépin-Robarts, I supported Beaudoin-Dobbie and before that I supported Meech, I supported Charest and I supported Charlottetown.

I did that because basically, I believe that if we really want to, we can operate under any Constitution. Mr. Rémillard told us the other day that Quebec will be able to operate efficiently under the present Constitution. Mr. Marcel Adam of La Presse wrote: "My God, Canada was turned upside down for nothing. That does not make any sense." But maybe that makes sense; I will come back to that later. The fact is that Quebec's major achievements since the Quiet Revolution were possible without any amendment to the Constitution. What was the first main achievement? Hydro-Québec.

[Senator Barootes.]

Because of Hydro-Québec, firms like Lavalin, SNC, Monenco, and others were able de develop. Did Canada oppose it? Not at all. Did Canadian financial institutions oppose it? Not at all. Mr. Lesage also created the Caisse de dépôts et de placements, an extremely powerful financial tool which made it possible for certain firms in Quebec to develop. No constitutional change was necessary for that.

The fact that Quebecers have usually voted for the party most likely to form the government has ensured them certain benefits. Some of my colleagues who come from the West, for example, will tell you that the National Energy Program was disastrous for them, but we must remember it meant cheap gas for Quebec and Ontario when prices were going up everywhere else in the country. I believe that policy was a mistake, but nevertheless the powers that be in Ottawa didn't do any harm to Quebec.

Hon. Lowell Murray: That policy was bad for manufacturing in Ontario.

Senator Gigantès: Indeed, I do not approve of that policy, but nevertheless Quebec reaped some benefits out of it for a while. So there was no real need to change the Constitution, except for one thing—and Senator Beaudoin agrees with me on that matter—the Charter because of people like Duplessis, Sterling Lyon, Tatcher Senior, or because Japanese were thrown in concentration camps. Certain individual rights could not be left to politicians because some of them, in Canadian history, have shown that they were ready to take advantage of the prejudices and bad tendencies of rednecks found in every corner of the country and in every country of the world.

We have Preston Manning who is taking advantage of those same awful thoughts that pollute people's minds. In New Brunswick, the Confederation of Regions Party is doing the same. All these people are trying to get elected by preaching hatred. So the Charter was a good thing.

Quebec's National Assembly did not like the adoption of the Charter and the Constitutional Act in 1982, but as Marcel Adam said the other day, the people of Quebec wanted it. It is a fact that cannot be denied, and if you do not believe me, look at the polls. The National Assembly did not agree, but the polls indicate that Quebecers did. In 1984, the people of Quebec did not want to change the Constitution. Mr. Mulroney made a bad choice. He let the Brutus of our times, Lucien Bouchard, write a speech for him, saying that he would bring Quebec back in the Canadian Constitution, as if Quebec was not part of it, with honour and enthusiasm. That won him the support of the apparatchiks of the Parti québécois in the 1984 elections, and a whole group of members of the PQ became Conservative MP's that year.

So he was head of the government in the House, and the two were sorcerer's apprentices, prisoners of the demons they had unleashed. I think they pushed Mr. Bourassa a little so he would propose Meech Lake. Apparently, Jean Chrétien had warned Mr. Bourassa that English Canada would not accept the Meech Lake Accord because the veto it gave Quebec would make it impossible to bring in certain reforms that other parts of Canada wanted.

Mr. Chrétien said that they would find a way to kill the accord. So Manitoba did find a way to kill it, with Mr. Harper, and of course everybody blamed Mr. Wells. Mr. Chrétien and the Liberal Party tried, like many of us did, to help the situation through the Charest committee, which produced a good report that was killed by Lucien Bouchard, otherwise it would have been adopted.

You know the rest of the story. The only good thing in all of that was the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee, not Castonguay-Dobbie. Since Mr. Castonguay could not tolerate being considered a monument by the Quebec's nationalist press, he abandoned Mr. Mulroney who had appointed him to the Senate. First he abandoned him by criticizing the Beaudoin-Dobbie report, saying that it was authoritarian. Then, he did not want to tolerate the critics to which a politician is exposed when working on a committee like Castonguay-Dobbie. Fortunately, he was replaced by Senator Beaudoin. I thought their report was good. We could have done without that report, but since we were in the spirit of constitutional change, it was the reasonable thing to do.

Well, the report was rejected after being criticized by Mr. Castonguay and other Quebecers as representing authoritarian federalism. It was not true, but that is what they said. So we entered the next process, a multi-million dollar initiative which sent Mr. Spicer all over the country to listen to what every interest group had to say. There was also another good thing, the referendum which Mr. Chrétien insisted we had because the Constitution belongs to the people and it is the people who must decide if it wants it or not. In the end, the people said no to Charlottetown. There are many possible interpretations, but I think we can safely say that Quebecers, under pressure from the Castonguays of this world, the Bélanger-Campeau Commission and the medias, had formed the opinion that it was not enough. The rest of Canada thought it was too much. I think the referendum proved it. Canada will have to live with the Constitution it has now, and I think it will never be changed because it cannot be changed without it, and no politician in his or her right mind will want to hold another one.

This resulted in a major cleavage in Quebec, and the province will have to decide between going it alone, and having its own this little self-contained business called Quebec, or becoming a partner with 25 per cent of the shares—which means a good deal of control—within a much bigger business concern. That is the decision facing the people of Quebec. Perhaps Bloc members will come to Ottawa for a while to demonstrate that nothing is working, that every thing we do in Ottawa is bad for Quebec. This may give Quebecers an opportunity to vent some resentments they have toward the rest of Canada, but it will not last. In time, they will revert to their usual patterns, except of course if they decide to separate and, if they do, they will have to go about it like Slovaquia, which means independence pure and simple and then negotiate the rest.

We would have been best not touching Senator Beaudoin's report, but we did. All three parties and both houses agreed this was an excellent report. Why did we have to? Because this country was torn by turf wars. There has always been turf wars. Each province has its deputy ministers, its Whilhemys, going to their ministers and telling them: "You know they are really jerks in Ottawa or over there. We want more, we can get more." But the constitutional pie is not big enough to allow everyone to take 100 per cent.

As far as the deputy ministers and various senior officials are concerned but mind you there are exceptions like Mr. Bolduc, who was also a senior official, I would say most of them don't get much respect or friendship form me. I don't trust them. Often they are like sharks in a pool. If one of them bleeds, the others attack. We couldn't stick with Senator Beaudoin's report because there were turf wars and people like Léon Dion who got hysterical and thought their knives weren't sharp enough or weren't used often enough. That's no way to run a country. As a result, this whole experiment was a miserable failure, and we are back to square one, but more upset, more divided and with a public perception that this government's leaders were a bunch of sorcerer's apprentices. The whole country has paid dearly for this mistake. You can't play sorcerer's apprentice with symbols, with deep set feelings, with things we have kept inside us and would rather not. You don't mess with that. And that is what Mr. Mulroney and Lowell Murray did. The country has paid the price, because this has contributed to an economic recession and to the mood of bitterness we find everywhere. It will be difficult to start all over again. There were a few wise men like Senator Beaudoin, but the rest were a bunch of crazies and sorcerer's apprentices. Thank you.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if Senator Beaudoin speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Gérald A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, on February 28, 1992, the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on a Renewed Canada, also known as the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee, tabled its report.

• (2140)

[English]

Ten senators were members of that committee. They are the Honourable Senators Allan MacEachen, Michael Kirby, Gérald Comeau, Nathan Nurgitz, Pierre De Bané, Mario Beaulieu, Daniel Hays, Staff Barootes, Michael Meighen, Donald Oliver, Peter Stollery and Nancy Teed.

Many other senators have also taken part in our deliberations, such as Senator Frith and Senator Lynch-Staunton. Since March 1992, at least 15 senators have made their comments on our report in this chamber.

[Translation]

By and large, the three-party report was unanimous, even if there were, here and there, a few differences of opinion. Today, I do not intend to sum up what some senators have so eloquently expressed in this chamber since March 1992.

Results of the referendum held October 26, 1992, have made the Charlottetown Agreement obsolete. Constitutionally, we will maintain the status quo for the foreseeable future.

Having said that, I think our committee's report was useful. It became the basis for the deliberations of the inter-departmental committee, chaired by the honourable minister Joseph Clark, which held 12 sessions in 27 days during the spring of 1992. Afterwards, four constitutional conferences chaired by Prime Minister Brian Mulroney resulted in the Charlottetown Agreement, on August 28, 1992.

On October 26, 1992, another chapter in our constitutional history was ended. We now turn the leaf.

However, one day, recommendations made by our parliamentary committee will be reconsidered, at an appropriate time, probably in a whole new context. They will then result in constitutional amendments which, at that time, will become the highest law in Canada. I am sure, honourable senators, that all the efforts made by the members of our committee, from both sides of the house, for our country were not useless. Thank you, honourable senators.

PRIVATE BILL

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Atkins, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doyle, for the second reading of Bill S-13, to incorporate the Dai al-Mutlaq as a corporation sole in Canada.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Phillipe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I will gladly speak on this bill.

I object to the principle of this bill. I object not only to the detail of it, I also object to the principle.

We have done this before, namely, given a corporation sole standing, stamp of approval to other institutions. But we refused it to Opus Dei. We should refuse it to this institution, too. They do not need us. They can function perfectly with provincial charters.

Because the property that they will be handling will be in provincial jurisdiction, it is better that we allow this to stay within the provinces, where the various factions in some of these groups can operate on their turf within the province where they will have to seek incorporation. This is one of these groups with factions that dispute the right of the Dai al-

[Senator Beaudoin.]

Mutlaq to be the leader. Perhaps the province will be able to extract explanations from the persons who want to be a corporation so unaccountable to any one, because there is what this person seems to have in his past. If they do not have the sanction of the Senate of Canada, it might be easier for those who oppose them to challenge the way in which they handle the property. There is a lot of property involved. Giving the sanction of the Canadian Senate is, in effect, giving a kind of imprimatur, and I do not think we should get involved. Large quantities of evidence has been sent to us, in the form of respected publications in India and Pakistan which have reported on this Dai al-Mutlaq and the things he has been doing.

• (2150)

In principle, if we should not touch with a barge pole a controversial institution that is bitterly divided with allegations of criminality flying back and forth, we should certainly not refer the bill to committee. Let them clean up their act first. Let them agree among themselves and come to us with a unanimous view. We are talking about a kind of religious mafia. Those who are sending letters to us are alleging that the Dai al-Mutlaq has taken control of properties accumulated by chapters of this brotherhood and is now administering them without giving an account to any of the people who put up their money to build the community centres and so on.

Those people are protesting against this undemocratic, tyrannical and arbitrary rule by this one person, the Dai al-Mutlaq, who in interviews has said he considers himself to be God, no less. In one interview he watered it down and said that he was the equivalent of God. If he is God or the equivalent of God he certainly does not need the Canadian Senate. He should be able to arrange things the way he wants. It is said that there is only one God, in our religion as in theirs so, since he is some sort of reincarnation of God, why should we presume to try to augment God-like power? It makes no sense.

I do not think we should get involved in this sort of venture with any such organization. The Canadian Senate is not here to give out hunting licenses, gambling licenses, licenses to run boarding houses or to sell liquor; that is not our function. Our function is to legislate. This is a personal favour that is being asked by somebody who can afford to pay a very fat fee to a Tory firm. He is very rich. Do not tell me that the lawyer is doing this for nothing. Are you really suggesting that Borden & Elliot are helping this particular Bombay billionaire but are not charging him anything out of the kindness of their hearts? Tory lawyers who do not charge billionaires; you want us to believe that? Just because a Tory lawyer wants to charge a big fat fee the Canadian Senate must get into the murk of this particular situation and deal with someone who is presently being investigated by the justice system in India. We are not even waiting to see the results of the investigation.

I used to say that it was a lawyer friend of Senator Murray who asked Senator Murray who asked Senator Atkins, and then Senator Atkins said, "No, Senator Murray had nothing to do with it".

Senator Atkins: I said that Senator Murray did not ask me to propose the bill.

Senator Gigantès: All right, I would not touch that with barge pole. I am, however, obliged to believe Senator Atkins because he now is a senator and no longer a member of an advertising and public relations firm which, by definition, has to say on behalf of their clients things that might not be exactly on the narrow path of rectitude. He is now a senator. He has said — and I read this in the Quorum the other day—that he is not involved in preparing the next political campaign, so he is no longer into negative advertising, into assassinating the character of the political opponents of his friends. He is now an honourable senator and he says that Senator Murray did not ask him—is that the way he put it?—to do anything about this. Very well, I believe it. However, the fact is that I do not believe that a Tory lawyer is representing this billionaire from Bombay for nothing.

Senator Murray: Would you be happy if he was a Liberal lawyer, for God's sake?

Senator Gigantès: No, I would not like it if a Liberal lawyer were doing it. I would not like it if a lawyer who was a relative of mine—and, Lord knows, I have lots of relatives who are lawyers—were doing it. I think it is improper; I think the whole mess stinks; and I do not see why the Senate should be dragged through it to please a Tory lawyer, or a Liberal lawyer, or even an NDP lawyer.

Senator Murray: Do you know how the United Church of Canada was established?

Senator Atkins: Or the Greek-Orthodox Church?

Senator Gigantès: The fact that we did things in the past that were wrong does not mean we should continue. Let me give you an anthropological example. Until white people went to Australia where they brutalized the Aborigines—there is no doubt about it—it was the rule among Aborigines that fathers should couple with their daughters. They did not know it was eugenically wrong. They were informed that it was eugenically bad. Australian law forbade it and tried to stop it. The Aborigines continued because it had been the ritual.

Just because Bishop Strachan went around beating up people to collect the money he thought they owed to his church, should we encourage our people to associate with tough people with whips and sticks, as he did in his time, just because it was done once? Just because we incorporated various bodies in the past, which in my view should never have been incorporated, must we continue the same practise? We never change, we never improve. We must remain mired in old habits.

Why should we give the imprimatur of the Senate to somebody who is not even a Canadian citizen, who will have the right to administer property here in Canada, property accumulated by people who are Canadian citizens, and who will probably be able to take this property out of the country, to the detriment of those citizens, to the detriment of Canada, and, in a small way, to the detriment of the Canadian dollar?

We have no obligation whatsoever to accede to the request of a Shiite. The Shiite sect has put a price of $3 million on Salman Rushdie. We will sanction a Shiite sect by allowing this man to come here and apply in this country the practices that have him in trouble with the authorities in India and Pakistan, where he is accused, among other things, of smuggling diamonds and of desecrating cemeteries.

I cannot understand why an honourable man like Senator Atkins, just because he has an acquaintance or a friend or whatever who is a Tory lawyer, wants to drag us through this. What if I were to do this for some weird sect from Greece? We do have some weird sects. We have one that embarrasses the Greek government every year by going to the United Nations and stripping to protest the fact that the Greek government has changed the calendar from the old Julian calendar to the Gregorian calendar found in most western nations.

Senator Phillips: Greek Doukhobors.

Senator Gigantès: Greek Doukhobors. At Gregorian Christmas celebrations they enter the churches and disrobe. They then get arrested. They then send video tapes to the United Nations. Believe me, if they came here and asked that we make them a corporation sole, I would oppose it, not only on aesthetic grounds—most of them do not look too good naked—but because I do not see any reason whatsoever for giving corporation sole status to anyone.

• (2200)

Senator Phillips: Were you a spectator or a stripper?

Senator Gigantès: I am not a Doukhobor, no sir. I follow the Gregorian calendar, not the Julian. I do not strip very easily, at least not in public. I have too much respect for the aesthetics and civilities of my fellow human beings. I do not want them to see my knees and feel discomfort.

I do not understand why Senator Atkins, Senator Murray and other senators opposite want to go to such lengths to please one Tory lawyer. Surely that Tory lawyer can make money doing something else. There must be some Canadian-born criminals that he can defend. Does he have to go overseas to find clients? Is business that bad in the law in Toronto that he has to find a character of dubious past who claims to be God, and defend him? Since when does God need a lawyer?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What else is he guilty of?

Senator Gigantès: I do not care whether or not he is guilty.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You called him a criminal. What is he guilty of?

Senator Gigantès: If he were the Archangel Michael, I do not want him to be a corporation sole, on principle. There is no reason why someone should have a corporation with an awful lot of property and no board of directors to report to, no accountability. The corporation sole would give this person the right to dispose of property and money with no accountability to a board of directors.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You called him a criminal. What has he been found guilty of?

Senator Gigantès: He is under investigation for all these things.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: He has not been convicted of anything. He has been accused, not convicted?

Senator Gigantès: I consider, if I may —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We should be careful what we say.

Senator Gigantès: No, I am not careful about religions. I am against established churches of any kind, all of them—except the Anglican because Anglicans are hardly a religion. We Anglicans say we are not religious, we are Anglican.

I do not see why we should grant the status of corporation sole to any religious organization. Although we have done it in the past, that does not mean we must continue doing it. There were times in the past when we were naked in the caves dodging sabre-toothed tigers. Should we continue doing it because we once did? There are no sabre-toothed tigers any more. I do not see why we should continue with a practice that no longer has a purpose, simply so that a Tory lawyer can earn a fat fee.

Senator Di Nino: Nonsense.

Senator Gigantès: This person is not a Canadian citizen.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: So what?

Senator Gigantès: Why should a non-Canadian citizen come here and disturb Canadian citizens; some of them writing to us that they do not want him?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Let's go to committee and find out.

Senator Gigantès: I do not want to go to committee. This is why one opposes it at second reading.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order please, Senator Gigantès.

Senator Gigantès: I am opposed to this on principle.

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the honourable Senator Atkins —

Senator Gigantès: I am adjourning this on behalf of Senator Corbin who asked me to adjourn it in his name.

The Hon. the Speaker: According to the rules, if Senator Atkins speaks now it has the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Gigantès: Then he cannot speak now because Senator Corbin wishes to speak.

Senator Hébert: I adjourn the debate for Senator Corbin.

[Senator Gigantès.]

On motion of Senate Hébert debate adjourned.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

EIGHTY-EIGHTH CONFERENCE, STOCKHOLM, SWEDEN

Hon. Peter Bosa rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, October 13, 1992:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the deliberations of the Eighty-Eighth Inter-Parliamentary Conference held in Stockholm, Sweden, from September 5th to 12th, 1992.

He said: Honourable senators, it is my privilege to report today on the results of the Eighty-Eighth Inter-Parliamentary Conference held in Stockholm from September 5 to 12, 1992. Eight Canadian parliamentarians, including my honourable colleagues, Senators Lewis and De Ware, participated in this conference.

Before commenting on the deliberations of the conference, I would like to tell you about our host country, Sweden. Approximately one year ago, the Swedish political scene changed substantially. For generations Swedish political affairs had been dominated by the Social Democratic Party which had governed Sweden for 52 of the past 60 years. Between the 1988 and 1991 elections, public opinion polls reported a marked shift to the right. The ruling Social Democrats altered their position on several major issues on which right-wing parties were closer to public opinion. They cut income taxes, but raised value-added taxes, the equivalent to our GST. They put off more or less indefinitely the closure of nuclear reactors and announced an intention to join the European Community. They implemented an austerity plan with the emphasis on combatting inflation, rather than maintaining full employment.

Despite having moved to the right on so many issues, the social democrats failed to recover support. In the September 1991 election they and their traditional coalition partners both lost ground.

Following the resignation of Social Democratic Prime Minister Carlsson, and after lengthy negotiations, the moderate Conservative Party leader Carl Bildt formed a minority government with the support of three other non-socialist parties, including the Liberal Party. The present Minister of Finance is a Liberal. The remaining political faction, the populist New Democratic Party, was left holding the balance of power.

There are some doubts as to the durability of the current coalition government, as non-socialist opinion is seriously fragmented. During our visit the Swedish economy was under extreme pressure. Overnight interest rates were raised to 500 per cent to discourage speculators from borrowing kroner from the central bank in order to sell them and then buy them back at a tidy profit after they had been devalued. Once the immediate crisis passed, interest rates sank to a mere 50 per cent.

Swedish foreign policy is based on a longstanding national commitment to non-alignment in peace time and neutrality in times of war. In recent decades, this policy has been supplemented by an equally strong commitment to improving the world order through support for the United Nations, disarmament, environmental cooperation, GATT, and assistance to developing countries. Various initiatives, including large contributions to United Nations peacekeeping forces, and the donation of 1 per cent of Swedish Gross National Product to assistance programs, have won Sweden a special standing in international affairs.

• (2210)

The Swedish IPU group has played a significant role in the Inter-Parliamentary Union and has hosted an inter-parliamentary conference on three occasions; 1921, 1949, and 1992. In his opening remarks, His Majesty King Carl Gustaf XVI, said:

> From many points of view, the situation in the world today is the same as in 1921, when Sweden was hosting the IPU Conference for the first time. Then, just like now, we were looking for a new international order. In 1921, the Union came out in strong support of the efforts of the League of Nations. And on the Agenda of this conference, one of the items is Contribution of Parliaments to enhancing the role of the United Nations.

> Historically, the Inter-Parliamentary Union has made important contributions to the work for peace and cooperation among nations. Over the years, eight of its leading personalities have been awarded the Nobel Peace Prize, a proof of the great quality not only of the individuals but also of their work.

The eight leading personalities of the IPU who received the Nobel Peace Prize were: Frederic Passy of France, Albert Gobat of Switzerland, William Randal Cremer of the United Kingdom, Frederic Najer of Denmark, Angust Beernsert of Belgium, Henry La Fontaine from Belgium, Christian Lange from Norway, and Henri Buisson from France.

Participating in this conference were 500 parliamentarians from 101 countries, a record number of countries. Approximately 16 per cent of the delegates were women parliamentarians, and this figure compared favourably with the percentage of women holding seats in the world's parliaments, approximately 11 per cent. It is interesting to note that the parliaments with the highest proportion of women are all from the Scandinavian countries, including our host country Sweden, where 38.1 percent of its members are women.

Of the three substantive questions on the Conference agenda, two were chosen during the previous conference: The contribution of parliaments to enhancing the role of the United Nations and the need for a radical solution to the problem of debt in the third world. Canadian parliamentarians participated in the debate on these subjects, and, in the case of the one on the United Nations, a Canadian delegate, Mrs. Anderson from the other place, was the rapporteur for the committee which prepared a draft resolution.

At each conference there is an opportunity for delegations to submit a supplementary item for the agenda. This time the Canadian group submitted "Transparency in arms transfers through a global arms register". Honourable senators may recall that Canada played a prominent role in a United Nations study committee on the subject of arm sales. Its report, submitted to the General Assembly last fall, called for the creation of a global arms register. That has received widespread support.

While there was good support for the inclusion of the subject on the agenda, a number of delegations suggested that it may be more appropriate to place it as a major item on the agenda of the next conference. That way, delegations would have sufficient time to study the subject and bring detailed draft resolutions and speeches to the next conference. The Canadian group agreed with this suggestion and withdrew its proposal for a supplementary item. You will be pleased to know that the subject of a global arms register has been placed on the agenda of the next IPU Conference, to be held in April 1993 in New Delhi.

There is also an opportunity at these conferences for a general debate on the political, social and economic situation in the world. As vice-president of the Canadian group, I spoke on this debate and used the opportunity to talk about the need for the protection of human rights and the protection of minorities. In particular, I pointed out how the multiculturalism policy is carried out in Canada.

During this conference, our chairman, Dr. Bruce Halliday from the other place, was elected to a one-year term as vice-chairman of the committee of Parliamentary, Juridical and Human Rights Questions. I wish to congratulate him on being elected to this prestigious committee.

I would be remiss if I did not speak about the work of the IPU Committee on the Human Rights of Parliamentarians. As many of you are aware, our honourable colleague Senator Neiman was instrumental in the establishment of this committee in 1977. From 1978 to 1988, she served as a substitute member and in 1988 was elected as a full member. Earlier this year she was elected chairperson, a post she held on a previous occasion. Regrettably, she found it necessary to resign from the committee because of health problems. Numerous tributes were given to her, publicly during the Conference and individually by a number of delegates.

The Committee on the Human Rights of Parliamentarians meets four times a year and examines the case of parliamentarians subjected to arbitrary action during the exercise of their mandate. During the first phase of examination and communication with the authorities of the country concerned, its work is strictly confidential. If, however, an acceptable settlement is not reached within a reasonable period of time, the cases are made public. During the Stockholm Conference, the violation of human rights of 106 members or former members of Parliament in nine countries were brought to our attention.

Of the 106 persons concerned, eleven had died or are presumed dead. The 101 cases are from Bulgaria, Chile, Columbia, Haiti, Honduras, Indonesia, Myanmar, Togo and Turkey. The cases from Bulgaria, Togo and Turkey were made public for the first time. Myanmar accounts for 65 cases and Turkey for 25.

Since its establishment in 1977, the committee has examined over 750 cases in 60 countries. Supporting action by Parliaments affiliated with the IPU have played a key role in securing positive developments. The types of actions taken, are: Public reports in Parliament; contacting the Ambassador of the countries concerned or asking our ambassadors in the countries concerned to monitor these cases.

As the world organization of Parliament, the IPU has a responsibility to work for peace and cooperation among peoples for the firm establishment of representative institutions. Specifically, it fosters contacts, coordination, and the exchange of experience among Parliaments and parliamentarians of all countries; considers questions of international interest and expresses views on such issues with the aim of bringing about action by Parliaments and their members; contributes to the defence and promotion of human rights; and contributes to better knowledge of the working of representative institutions and to their strengthening.

In conclusion, I would like to refer to the closing comments used by the President of the Union, Sir Michael Marshall of the United Kingdom. He quoted a passage from the speech delivered by his predecessor at the opening of the 38th IPU Conference in Stockholm in 1949:

> This is a Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union . . . It consists of members of Parliaments, but its prime purpose is not to promote any particular parliamentary pattern; it is to use members of Parliament, who are persons of responsibility and influence in their respective countries, in the great cause of peace. This Union was created to promote peace and that is the purpose of gathering here today.

Thank you.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): We are now into the 24th day of this government's political cowardice and contempt for democracy.

How much longer does this government intend to carry on in this contemptible and contemptuous manner? If we were in the Land of Oz, we might ask the Wizard to bring this government the courage to call an election, being as it seems unable to muster the effort to do this itself. However, with Christmas right around the corner, we might just as easily ask that of Old Saint Nick.

It is high time for this government to show some respect for the Canadian people by calling a general election that rightfully should have occurred on November 21, 1992.

"THOSE WHOM THE GODS WISH TO DESTROY . . .."

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, while speaking yesterday, I may have left some false impressions. When I was speaking against deputy ministers, present company excepted, I was referring to all deputy ministers, federal and provincial. I consider them, most of the time, to be very close to what the politburo was under the old Soviet Union.

I forgot to mention that Mr. Castonguay has been the one man most responsible for the constitutional misery this country has gone through in the last 20 years. He persuaded Mr. Bourassa to reject the Victoria proposal, and Mr. Bourassa himself has said that nothing that has been offered to Quebec since that time has been as good as Victoria.

Mr. Michael Wilson's economics are wrong with respect to using fewer prescriptions. If people stop buying the number of pills that are prescribed, the pill companies will make less money and they will increase the prices, so that measure will not achieve what he wants to achieve.

I hope most of you watched Canada AM this morning to see Barbara Greene looking well fed, sumptuously dressed, covered in jewels, trying to explain why it is better not to feed the poor when they are hungry.

I would suggest that the normal conclusion to this kind of Tory thinking would be that euthanasia should become a national policy. In other words, if you quit your job, you do not get unemployment insurance; you are killed, and then we do not have to look after you.

In today's really tragic, desperate economic situation, with the Tories sounding more and more like Herbert Hoover and the bankers throughout the Depression, we have the frivolous, inexplicable, despicable, ridiculous, absurd demand that the Senate of Canada take care of some obscure but terribly rich Shiite somewhere in Bombay. This person wishes to be considered as a god, and also to be given by us the status of corporation sole in order to be able to do what he likes with the property of his benighted followers without giving an account to anybody. This is all in order for a Tory lawyer to earn a fat fee, rather than giving food to the people who use the food banks.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

TWENTY-NINTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

TUESDAY, December 15, 1992

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

TWENTY-NINTH REPORT

Your Committee has examined and approved the supplementary budget presented to it by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs for its consideration on issues related to national security and defence as well as the roles that the Canadian Armed Forces will be called upon to play in future, as authorized by the Senate on Tuesday, February 18, 1992. The said supplementary budget is as follows:

Professional and Other Services $29,732.35

Your Committee recommends that the budget of the Senate Standing Committee on External Affairs with respect to the North American Free Trade Agreement, adopted by the Senate on Wednesday, April 8, 1992, for professional and other services be reduced by $5,000.

Respectfully submitted,

THÉRÈSE LAVOIE-ROUX
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Lavoie-Roux, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: I have the honour to present petitions signed by 503 citizens of British Columbia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Vancouver, New Westminster, Victoria, Burnaby and Aldergrove.

Honourable Senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 500 citizens of Quebec who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Granby, Montreal, Victoriaville, La Sarre, Amos, Longueuil, Dollard-des-Ormeaux, Saint-Albert, Saint-Hyacinthe, Malartic, Val d'Or and Sainte-Rosalie.

These petitions were signed in May 1992.

This makes a total of 1,003 citizens of Canada who oppose the GST, especially as it applies to periodicals, newspapers and books. Senator Chaput-Rolland should be particularly concerned about this and not fail to tell "her" Prime Minister about the purpose of this petition.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as we have seen demostrated by Senator Hébert and others, the opposition to this iniquitous GST abateth not.

I also wish to present some petitions. All are individually signed by Canadian citizens and include their addresses. All oppose the GST and demand an election. They come from the following cities and towns of Ontario: Cambridge, Dobie, Dufferin, Etobicoke, Kapuskasing, Kenogami, Kirkland Lake, Larder Lake, Mississauga, Rexdale, Toronto, Val Rita, Virginiatown.

The list of the cities and towns from Alberta are: Edmonton, Falher, Fort St. John, Girouxville, High Level, Hotchkiss, Manning, Meander River, and Notikewin, Peace River, Radway, St. Albert, and Valleyview. From New Brunswick there are: Campbellton, Cambridge Narrows, Grand Bay, Hampton, Jacquet River, Rivière du Portage, Saint John, Tracadie-Beach, and Young's Cove. From Quebec: Abercorn, Acton Lake, Amos, Asbestos, Barraute, Berthierville, Bolton, Bromptonville, Cookshire, Foster, Frelighsburg, Hemmingford, Howick, Huntingdon, Île Bizard, Knowlton, La Guadeloupe, Laval, Lebel-sur-Quévillon, Longueuil, Melbourne, Mansonville, Montréal, Pierrefonds, Pincourt, Richmond, Rougemont, Rouyn, St-Luc, Senneterre, St-Côme, St-Honoré, Ste-Thérèse, St-Hilaire-de-Dorset, St-Ferréol-les-Neiges, St-Césaire, St-Gédéon, Sutton, Val d'Or, Val Senneville.

Honourable senators, the numbers are as follows: From Alberta, 11 petitions, total names 250; Quebec, 51 petitions, 539 names; again, all individually signed in all cases; New Brunswick, 7 petitions with 125 names; Ontario, 9 petitions with 158 names. There are 78 petitions with a total of 1,072 names.

QUESTION PERIOD

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—ENVIRONMENTAL AND FISHERIES CONCERNS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I read in the good press that the governments of Canada, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are prepared to sign an agreement very shortly on the long-awaited fixed link. Can the Leader of the Government tell me what agreement has been reached between the province of Prince Edward Island and the Government of Canada concerning the fishermen's concerns, the environmental concerns, and the ten commandments of Premier Joe Ghiz?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, what is involved here is an agreement between the parties concerned to negotiate an agreement. It would set the context in which an agreement would be negotiated among the parties.

As to the concerns that the honourable senator has mentioned, these matters will be resolved if and when such an agreement is signed among the parties.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, just last week the Leader of the Government in the Senate told me in this Chamber that our great friend the Honourable Don Mazankowski, in his statement on Tuesday past, said that the fixed link would go ahead, that that was included in the agreement, and that I should understand it. He understood it. Everybody else understood it. Why could I not understand it?

Now he is telling me that what they are talking about is an agreement to agree, instead of an agreement to actually proceed. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us, up to date and up front, what is going on among the governments of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and the the federal government concerning Canada being joined with Prince Edward Island?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, let me repeat what I said several times last week. The government expects that it will be possible to begin construction of the fixed link in the spring of 1993.

PUBLIC DISCLOSURE OF CONTENTS OF AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Senator Bonnell: The Leader of the Government is saying that they can only hope that construction will begin soon. Last week, he was talking about the 100,000 jobs that would be created. Today, it appears that an agreement is likely to be signed.

Discussion on this matter has been going on since 1873. We have been promised a fixed link to the mainland time and time again, but in fact it seems to be getting further and further away. I understand that there is to be another agreement signed today by those great Canadians whom I have just mentioned.

We, the citizens, and we of the Upper Chamber of the Parliament of Canada, do not seem to be in the know as to what this is all about. Does the Leader of the Government not think that the people of Canada and of Prince Edward Island should know what is in that agreement, rather than have one or two individuals sign something behind closed doors which might, perhaps, have the effect of bringing to Prince Edward Island all the hoodlums from other parts of Canada who may want to go there. The best we can is that a fixed link would at least prevent them from arriving by ferry.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, let us be clear about what is involved here. Once again, I will place on the record the remarks of the Minister of Finance as found in his Economic and Fiscal Statement of December 2:

> Advanced engineering and environmental work on the Prince Edward Island fixed crossing project will be undertaken, to allow construction of this $800 million project to begin in the spring. This will directly create an average of almost 1,000 jobs each year over the construction period and will provide spinoff benefits for the economy of Atlantic Canada.

As for the promises that the honourable senator says have been made concerning this project since 1867—

Senator Robichaud: 1873.

Senator Murray: —since 1873, as my friend Senator Robichaud points out, that was the year of Prince Edward Island's entry into Confederation.

The last firm promise that was made on this matter was made by the then Liberal government of Canada in 1965, which went so far as to have a sod-turning ceremony on the site. Senator Bonnell would have a better idea than I as to why the Liberal government which was in power thereafter, almost without interruption until 1984, was never able to follow up on that promise.

At the same time, he might ponder why the then Premier Shaw of Prince Edward Island was not even invited to the ground-breaking ceremony and, as Senator Robichaud indicates, neither was the Premier of New Brunswick.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, let me straighten out the understanding of the Leader of the Government. The reason that project was not followed up by the Liberal government under Mr. Pearson—Mr. St. Laurent, pardon me— was because a fellow named John George Diefenbaker —

Senator Murray: It was the government of Mr. Pearson in 1965.

Senator Bonnell: Mr. Pearson came out and started the project. Then a fellow by the name of J. Watson McNaught started the road construction for the causeway. The trouble was that that the government did not stay in power. The Tories were elected, and that stopped the whole project. John George Diefenbaker became Prime Minister —

Senator Murray: You had another 19 years in office after that.

Senator Bonnell: Yes, and we will have another 19 or 20 years coming up, if you ever call that election.

Senator Murray: We will build the fixed link.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Will you invite us to the opening?

Senator Bonnell: I will tell you this: We will tell the people of Prince Edward Island and the people of Canada what is contained in the agreement and what is taking place so they will know and be able to make those decisions for themselves, rather than having them made in secret behind closed doors with just half a dozen people present.

We want to know what the ten commandments are, and how many of them will be fulfilled. We have a new fellow who has just announced his candidacy for leadership of the Liberal Party in Prince Edward Island whose name is Creed. He believes in going back to the old days of beans and "baloney." They say that Premier Ghiz has the Ten Commandments and this fellow has the "Creed".

What is contained in the agreement that the federal government expects Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick to sign before construction of that fixed link can commence?

THE SENATE

POLICY ON EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, I would have a question for the Chair of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy. It has come to my knowledge in the past few days—make no mistake, I am keeping personalities out of this—that the only woman driver of the shuttles between the various Senate buildings not longer holds that jobs. Not so long ago, as I recall, we had two women drivers.

Apparently, following a competition, the lady in question was dismissed from her job and replaced by someone who had won one competition or another. The bottom line is that there is no women driving our shuttles any more.

How come this person who drove these busses for at least two years is suddenly denied this privilege and transferred to messenger service, if my information is correct?

Is it a Senate policy not to have women bus drivers? Is that our conception of equal opportunities here in the Senate?

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, you could have come and asked this most relevant question to the Committee on Internal Economy this morning, where we happened to be discussing, among others things, employment equity for women.

As regards the particular problem you are raising, you will understand that I am unable to provide you with an answer immediately. I will gladly inquire about the particular circumstances which have led to this lady being transferred to another position.

Senator Corbin: I thank the honourable Senator for her invitation to attend meetings of the Committee on Internal Economy. I wish to inform her one last time that I have no intention of going to those meetings because I have other business to attend to. This morning, for instance, I shut myself away in my office very early to prepare my speech on the incorporation of the Dai al-Mutlaq under Bill S-13, after which I was so short on time that I once more had to be satisfied with eating sandwiches at caucus.

At the meeting of the Senate Committee on Finance—after this afternoon's sitting—it will be sandwiches again for dinner tonight and the same tomorrow.

That is why I do not attend the meetings of the Committee on Internal Economy. I accept what my colleague said. I don't expect the honourable senator to have the information right at her fingertips, even though she is well informed on other matters. If she promises to enquire and to give the Senate some element of reply, I will be satisfied for today. Thank you, honourable senators.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: I would like to say very simply, with all due respect for the honourable senator who cares about the situation of women in the Senate, and rightly so, that he referred to me using the wrong gender in French; he said "mon collègue" instead of "ma collègue".

Senator Corbin: Let's not start splitting hairs. I am very sorry, "ma collègue". What is important here is to keep the gist of my question.

I think no one can accuse me of developing a sudden interest for feminist issues. Women have always interested me. I married one and I have three daughters at home; so I cannot be anything but interested!

[Senator Corbin.]

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY

VISIT OF OFFICIALS TO CANADA—TOPICS FOR DISCUSSION—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I wish to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Is it correct that the British Prime Minister, the Right Honourable John Major, will be visiting Ottawa this week? If that is so, can the leader advise us what the principal topics will be for any discussions arising out of that visit?

• (1430)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Prime Minister Major of the United Kingdom will be here, together with Mr. Jacques Delors of the European Economic Community. The two gentlemen will be representing the EEC. Mr. Major, the British Prime Minister, has assumed the presidency of the commission.

As the honourable senator knows, the presidency of the commission rotates among the countries of the community from time to time. Mr. Major is the current president, and he will be here in that capacity together with Mr. Jacques Delors. I understand that, after they have had meetings here, they will be going on to Washington.

Senator Austin: I appreciate that information. However, it raises interesting questions concerning what is taking place in terms of the economic policy within the European Community. How does that economic policy affect the economy of Canada and the United States? I presume those topics will be raised.

As the Leader of the Government in the Senate knows, Britain has changed its economic policy quite dramatically this fall. It has allowed the pound to float and its interest rates to drop as a matter of deliberate policy. Its economy is beginning to reflate, bringing about a dramatic rise in the stock market.

Will the impact of such policies be the subject of discussion at some time during these meetings?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I would expect so, but I have not seen an agenda.

As the honourable senator knows, the U.K. was not the only country to have dropped out of the European exchange mechanism. I think Spain, Portugal, Italy, and perhaps Ireland, have also devalued their currencies within the last little while.

There are some concerns that would be near the top of Canada's agenda in discussions with representatives of the community. They relate to the multilateral trade negotiations, agriculture and, I may underline, the question of fisheries, where Mr. Crosbie and Ambassador Gherson have been working very hard for some time to achieve some satisfactory agreement with the European Community with respect to fishing in and near our waters.

THE ROYAL FAMILY

CHANGE IN STATUS OF HEIR TO THE THRONE—CONSULTATION ON CONSTITUTIONAL PRACTICE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, on a non-economic subject, I would ask the Leader of the Government a question with respect to constitutional practice relating to the Royal Family.

Is the Leader of the Government in a position yet to advise us what is the constitutional practice when a change in the status of the Royal Family, in particular the heir to the throne, is being raised in the British House of Commons? Is there a practice in existence of informing the Governor General and/or the Privy Council of Canada in advance? Is there a practice of consulting us? Do we have any role to play at all?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my friend asked a question along those lines the other day. I am still awaiting the reply from the appropriate sources.

Meanwhile, I can only tell him that it is not the sort of thing that we would want to discuss in front of Mr. Delors.

EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY

AGRICULTURE—CURRENT STATUS OF SUPPLY-MANAGED SECTOR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question with respect to Senator Austin's question concerning the agenda items for the discussions with the officials of the European Economic Community.

You mentioned agriculture as one of the agenda items. Do you have anything further to add in terms of the Canadian position with respect to preserving our supply managed sector, as Article XI now permits us to do?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I have not much to add, honourable senators. There have been consultations with the provinces most concerned with this issue in the last while. As we speak, there are consultations taking place with Mr. Wilson and probably other ministers and the agricultural industries affected. This will provide a good background for the discussions which the Prime Minister will be having with Mr. Delors.

THE ESTIMATES, 1992-93

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Leave having been given to proceed to reports from committees:

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fourteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, Supplementary Estimates (A) and (B), presented in the Senate on December 14, 1992.

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, Supplementary Estimates (A) and (B) are the first supplementary estimates for the 1992-93 fiscal year, and the Committee on National Finance examined them with its usual care. If you refer to the tables attached to the committee's report, you will find that Supplementary Estimates (A) and (B) together reduce total estimates tabled to date from $161 billion in the 1992-93 Main Estimates to $160.932 billion, a difference of approximately $68 million.

This is due to savings of $1,594.7 million in budgetary statutory expenditures identified in Supplementary Estimates (A), principally from the elimination of family allowance payments and changes, resulting from the passage of Bill C-55, in the funding of Public Service and military pension plans.

At the same time, Supplementary Estimates (A) and (B) request a total of $1,526 million, that is $1,412.9 million budgetary and $113.1 million non-budgetary, to be voted by Parliament. These estimates, spread over 22 departments and 18 departmental agencies, gave your committee a considerable amount of subject matter to examine.

[English]

Honourable senators will note that two tables appear for the first time in Supplementary Estimates (A). The first is a list of expenditures in five departments that the President of the Treasury Board has deemed exempt from the Spending Control Act on the grounds that they are justified by reasons of good management. That is found on page 19 of the Supplementary Estimates.

The second list contains all the items that received interim funding from Treasury Board Vote 5; that is, government contingencies, along with permanent allocation for paylists and other purposes for the same vote. The interim items total $376.9 million, the amount by which Vote 5 will be reimbursed if the Supplementary Estimates are approved by Parliament. The initial level of Vote 5 was approved as $450 million in the 1992 Main Estimates.

● (1440)

This table has been included by the Treasury Board in response to the National Finance Committee's final report on the 1991-92 Estimates, dated March 24, 1992, which dealt with the use of the government contingencies vote in some detail.

As I am sure honourable senators will agree, it is gratifying that the Treasury Board has taken account of the committee's work by undertaking to provide this helpful information to Parliament. Treasury Board officials are also preparing written responses to a number of questions that they will submit to your committee at a later date. These include a summary, across all departments, of the costs associated with the constitutional negotiations and the October 1992 referendum.

[Translation]

I would also like to call the attention of the honourable senators to Chapter 13 of the Report of the Auditor General for 1992 who found inappropriate the procedure followed by the government to account for loan guarantees.

When these loans are approved, they are recognized by the inclusion of $1.00 votes in the Estimates of the relevant departments. Supplementary Estimates (B) contain one such vote (vote 27b) authorizing the Minister of Transport to secure loans of up to $230 million payable to Ridley Terminals Inc., located in the Port of Prince Rupert.

In its explanation of this vote, Treasury Board noted that Ridley Terminals Inc. did not generate enough revenue to fully service its debt of $209.5 million and that it will be short of cash as of December 31, 1992 when it is due to make a debt payment.

The Auditor General mentioned a number of other instances where the government had authorized the provision of loan guarantees for such major and high-risk projects as Hibernia and the Westray Coal Mine. As the honourable senators know, for the Westray guarantee, the government has had to put money where its mouth is. Therefore, the definitive 1992-93 Supplementary Estimates for Industry, Science and Technology will show an expenditure of approximately $80 million to cover 85 per cent of the net loss incurred by the lending bank.

The committee shares the concern of the Auditor General regarding the impact of the major loan guarantee programs and is considering reporting to the Senate on this issue later in the year.

Thank you, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, Senator Bolduc, seconded by the honourable Senator Grimard, moved that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the motion is put, there are a number of important political dimensions—as there always are—to the Estimates and the Supplementary Estimates. They have been examined, I take it, with some care in the National Finance committee. Some honourable senators might notice that, for example, our commitments abroad are heavily dependent on these Estimates. Generally speaking, Canadians support these interventions. When I find, for example, that we spend $88,335,000 on United Nations' peacekeeping operations, I am proud of the fact that we do spend that money, but I am also concerned that our neighbour to the south is seriously in arrears in its contributions to the United Nations and continues to be so. Do we raise in the General Assembly the fact that we are one of the better proponents of the United Nations, in the sense that we do pay our bills and that others, including the United States, do not?

[Senator Bolduc.]

I refer, honourable senators, to the pages of yesterday's minutes where the report of the National Finance committee appears. I believe the government's position is that the Supplementary Estimates are essentially a "remaniement" of funds that have been voted, and that they do not significantly increase the deficit or the debt.

That is correct, the chairman tells me. I was not at the National Finance committee meeting, but it is important.

Honourable senators, we have a very busy week ahead of us. I believe we should encourage more debate on reports of the National Finance committee, not necessarily criticism of it, but debate on the questions raised because it is a very important part of our job as parliamentarians. It is a rather busy week in which to raise questions, but I hope that we will not adopt the report quickly just because we may not have anything negative to say about it.

I know of no Estimates that do not have important political dimensions to them. I hope we will not often receive them in the last week before Christmas. There is a tendency for this government and the previous government to bring Estimates along at the last minute and ask Parliament, particularly the Senate, to complete their study of them by a certain time. In such cases, we do not get the chance to play the role we should be playing.

Our adoption of this report means that the Appropriation Bill is accepted. It is based on these reports. We rarely debate an appropriation bill because we have traditionally taken the position in this place that we do not deny the government supply. However, we tend to get to the point of not denying supply and then never talk about the issues that lead to that supply, even though our rules and practices give us plenty of opportunity to do so.

We will not be voting against the adoption of this report, but I hope that this government and the new government—which all Canadians are awaiting with bated breath—will take more time to debate the Estimates than we have done recently, and that the Senate is not again asked to debate the Estimates at the last minute.

Senator Bolduc: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If the honourable senator speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

[Translation]

Senator Bolduc: Honourable senators, I would like to assure the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate that the Opposition senators on the committee—you know we have a new chairman, Senator Olson, who is a seasoned and well experienced parliamentarian; he is the one who presided over the last meetings.

Secondly, I would also like to recognize here the great skills of Senator Stewart, particularly in the area of public finance and in what I would call the scrutiny of parliamentary controls.

Therefore, I admit no debate took place in this House, but I want to assure the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate that the committee worked very seriously, heard witnesses and, in my view, given the time we had to study the issue, did most of the work, even though I must admit we could still have a debate on that subject right here in the Senate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I believe that explanations should be given to the Senate, even if the bill was examined seriously by the committee.

Report adopted.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1992-93

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton moved second reading of Bill C-100, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March 1993.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before you today, Appropriation Bill No. 3, 1992-93, provides for the release of supply for the whole of Supplementary Estimates (A) and Supplementary Estimates (B) for 1992-93.

Supplementary Estimates (A) total approximately 1.5 billion voted dollars, while the total spending authority identified in this supplementary has the effect of reducing the government's overall forecast spending requirement for fiscal year 1992-93 by $93.7 million.

● (1450)

The major difference represents statutory expenditure reductions of $1.6 million, including a $700-million reduction related to the implementation of legislation concerning the manner in which the government contributes to the various pension plans of employees of the public service, the Canadian Forces, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and a $721-million reduction as a result of the repeal of the Family Allowance Act.

[Translation]

The major expenditures for which approval of new votes in the Supplementary Estimates (A) is asked for are as follows: $199 million for the Department of Fisheries and Oceans for grants to fishermen, of which $164 million are for the two-year northern cod moratorium; $164 million for the Department of Industry, Science and Technology for economic assistance; $97 million for Revenue Canada—Customs and Excise for strenthening imports controls at the borders; $88 million for the Department of External Affairs and International Trade for United Nations peacekeeping operations; $87 million for various departments and agencies involved in constitutional negotiations and consultations; $72 million for Agriculture Canada for farmers' assistance; $45 million for the Department of National Health and Welfare and Revenue Canada—Taxation for the implementation of the new child tax benefit.

[English]

In addition, Supplementary Estimate B seeks parliamentary authority for $25 million in order that the Canada Ports Corporation may increase its equity holdings at Ridley Terminals Inc. in British Columbia.

There are six $1 votes in Supplementary Estimates A and one $1 vote in Supplementary Estimates B. A listing of these votes containing additional explanations for the two miscellaneous $1 votes in Supplementary Estimates A and the miscellaneous vote in Supplementary Estimates B have been provided to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. These estimates were tabled in the Senate on December 1 and were referred immediately to the committee. Treasury Board Secretariat officials appeared before the National Finance committee to answer questions on these estimates on December 3 and again on December 9.

The National Finance committee's report dated December 14 was presented to the Senate on the same day and has just been commented on by its acting chairman, Senator Bolduc.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): There is an undertaking you are supposed to give with respect to appropriations, is there not, that says "the numbers are all the same"? It is a conventional or traditional undertaking.

When I was in the position that Senator Lynch-Staunton now occupies, I usually spoke to the appropriation bill. I seem to remember we were always required to give a certain undertaking to the house as a whole about the figures and the fact that the estimates and the amounts listed in the appropriation bill matched. Let us adjourn it until tomorrow, and I will get that. If I am right, I will ask for that undertaking.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I will look into it.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

IMMIGRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved third reading of Bill C-86, to amend the Immigration Act and other Acts in consequence thereof.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, the Social Affairs Committee tabled its report last night without proposing the slightest change, the smallest improvement, even a single little amendment based on the report of the pre-study of Bill C-86, the report unanimously approved by senators on both sides of the Chamber.

First, let us recall the reasons for which the Liberal members of the committee boycotted the sham that took place instead of public hearings by the Social Affairs Committee. At the very beginning of an organizing meeting of this committee, held on December 8, the Conservative sponsor of Bill

C-86 in the Senate, Senator Di Nino, advised the committee that it would have to complete its work by the following Monday, December 14. His statement showed that the Conservative members of the committee had already agreed to force the bill through the Senate before it adjourned on December 18. That was crystal clear.

Since the bill had been thoroughly changed by the House of Commons committee and several groups wanted to appear before the Senate committee, we were entitled to expect that the Conservatives would give us the time needed for an in-depth review of the bill. Senator Di Nino, with the tacit approval of the chairman, Senator Kinsella, gave us to understand that the guillotine had fallen once again. In practice, the committee held only six hours and twenty minutes of public hearings, excluding the minister's testimony. I think I will repeat that: it was too good to be true! We were promised all the time necessary. The committee held public hearings for all of six hours and twenty minutes. In fact, it was a comedy, a farce, a mockery of the democratic process. Obviously, the government had no intention of holding serious public hearings to look into the immigration bill. The Liberal senators then decided not to take part in this comedy whose only purpose was to give the illusion of a democratic process.

Although it had given this legislation a preliminary study, only on December 8 was the committee presented with a bill that suddenly was fundamentally different, what with the 87 amendments made by the House of Commons.

Common sense and fairness required the committee to examine this new bill thoroughly, but the Conservative members of the committee were opposed.

Furthermore, it was outrageous for the committee to require witnesses to come up with a brief, sometimes on 24 hours' notice. That is not serious!

The Liberal senators therefore boycotted the committee hearings so as not to legitimize a basically flawed process. Any participation would have made us accomplices in this grotesque parody inflicted on Canadians who care about what happens to refugees.

As for the eleventh report of the Social Affairs Committee, the famous unanimous report, and the very valid recommendations that it contains, the report tabled last night by the same committee sets these recommendations aside completely: the Conservative senators caved in and lost face once more. They are resigned to the role of puppets imposed on them by Harvie Andre! It is almost incredible, but the report tabled yesterday contains none, I mean not one, of the recommendations in the pre-study except those which the minister accepted. Can you believe it? Yes, I repeat again that the eleventh report of the Social Affairs Committee was approved unanimously. It therefore reflected the opinion of Liberal and Conservative senators.

The report on the pre-study of Bill C-86 made 14 excellent recommendations and raised 12 other areas of concern. When the House of Commons legislative committee reviewed this legislation, the government accepted two of these recommendations in full, the 7th and 10th. It also accepted the 11th recommendation in part, but only in part. Thus the government rejected outright 11 of the 14 unanimous recommendations of the Senate committee.

Of the 12 concerns raised by the committee, the government accepted five, in whole or in part. So of a grand total of 26 recommendations made and concerns raised by the Social Affairs Committee, the government kept only eight.

Unable to convince the government of the importance of the recommendations in the committee's eleventh report, the Conservative members tried to save face by appending some quite "timid" observations to their final report yesterday. The minister will laugh them off, needless to say, and Bill C-86 will become law in the next few days, if not in the next few hours.

Nevertheless, these observations point out several important issues and serious concerns of the signers. For example, they say:

> The structure chosen by the government to replace the credible basis hearing —

Of someone claiming refugee status —

> — continues to be problematic in the view of many commentators.

It is a rather timid way of saying that, for the majority of the people who discussed this issue, it was an outrage. But instead of suggesting an amendment to remedy this problem, the final report simply states that there is a lack of understanding of the process generally and that — > — We accept the view of the government, therefore, that to continue a full quasi-judicial process in the circumstances would be unwise.

As you can see, the Conservative senators never hesitate to contradict themselves openly just to agree with the government.

In their final report, the Conservatives acknowledge having some concerns with the proposed provisions concerning the planned hearing structure for refugee claimants. Here is what the final report, tabled yesterday, says, and I quote:

> The initial hearing currently in the law has many procedures and protections which the new legislation moves away from, most notably from independent decision-makers to an administrative decision by an employee of Immigration Canada. We accept the Minister's assertion that the five ineligibility criteria to be applied by the Senior Immigration Officer are objective and do not involve the discretion of the officer —

— say the Conservatives, naturally —

> But criteria can be "objective", in that they rely on facts, but, at the same time the facts in question may be contested.

Again, the final report identifies a serious problem with Bill C-86 without suggesting amendments. Capitulation and admission of powerlessness!

● (1500)

[English]

The committee's final report is strewn with suggestions as to how the bill might have been improved. However, there is a strangely conspicuous absence of any amendment which could have corrected its many failings. For instance, the final report notes its concerns pertaining to the return of refugee claimants to a prescribed safe country, most notably the absence of legislative requirement for bilateral or multilateral agreements to be in place with any country to which Canada might return such people. The following, that is, "observation" no. 7, underscores in very clear terms the complete incapacity of Tory senators to be consistent. I quote from their last report, which states:

> We are concerned that the provision in Bill C-86 may imply that Canada approves of unilateral action in these cases, that is returning individuals without agreements in place, and that we are prepared to so act.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, as you can see, they agree there is something wrong. They are concerned as is clearly stated in the pre-study report. And they go on with the unconditional surrender mentioned last night.

[English]

> We fully support the statement of the Minister, therefore, that the return of claimants pursuant to agreements is Canada's preferred arrangement—

[Translation]

That is what Canadians prefer; according to the Conservatives.

[English]

> — and we urge the government to maintain this position in the future. In taking this view, we remind the government of its own terminology in Bill C-86 which speaks in proposed section 108.1 of 'sharing the responsibility for examining refugee claims.' Sharing is not something that may be compelled; we do not feel that claimants should be returned to a country for the determination of a refugee claim without first obtaining the country's consent. We are aware that this could be done on a case by case basis, but the bill would not require it, as the current law does.

Instead of "urging" and "reminding" the government, I suggest the preferred course would have been to table an amendment to address this problem. That is only one example among many. I fail to see how Conservative members can criticize such a point without taking the necessary action and bringing their comments to their logical conclusion.

The conclusion of the "observations" attached to the report of the social affairs committee is striking: It is a veiled admission of defeat before the political whims of Harvey Andre. In fact, Conservative senators admit in the conclusion that the 24 "observations" which precede it may indicate that the committee is opposed to Bill C-86 generally, as it should. However, and I quote this historical conclusion, they "wish to state emphatically that this is not the case." Of course they are not opposed to anything that is asked of them, although they were opposed to some very important issues in the first report.

Moreover, they paper over the obvious cracks in the bill —which they have just finished outlining—by saying that Canada is a country under the rule of law, and that:

> When you add to that the participation of the dedicated and knowledgeable members of the many refugee advocacy groups who serve as watchdogs on the system, we are confident that, under Bill C-86, our ability to say "yes" to those who need and deserve Canada's protection will continue unimpaired.
