Hugh, quietly.

· What you wish ?-- 'began John. 'I wish you to keep your promise,' interupted Hugh; 'you vowed to preserve my secret.

'I did,' said John; 'but I fear I have encumbered myself with a very stifling !oad.'

'You must endeavour to bear it, said Hugh: ! Do you think I would I laugh'd with the sunny bright hours buy her love with my gold? Howev. And vow'd they could never be- er, we will let that pass now. I have a proposal to make to you if you will accompany me home.

'Willingly,' replied his companior. They walked on together, until they reached Mr. Sherwood's temporary residence, where they were shown in-

· You have succeeded in unravelling the tangled skein of my late uncle's affairs, and everything s smooth now, said Hugh, motioning his friend into a chair, and tak ng one opposite to him. · Yes,' replied John , 'thanks to the great sacrifices you have made.'

'I have arranged with Sir Everard to his entire satisfaction,' said Hugh John Rudderforth cast a look of compassion at his companion, 'Oh,' continued Hugh, 'he was no:

so hard to manage after all. But now for my proposal. John bowed in acquiescence, and honestly and worthily for many years. FLOUR, BREAD, The early prosperity of the bank owed much to your zeal. When reversecame, you stood like a faithful watchman to your post. My uncle was the victim of a too blind security. Hi hazardous speculations and lavish ex penditure ruined him; but you had no share in either. You recollect 1 told you I might have a fancy to tu n ng banker myself?'

'I do,' replied John. Well, that idea I have abandoned, said Hugh. 'Indeed!' exclaimed John.

'Yes, in favour of another,' said Hugh. One who possesses great tal ent, a spotless reputation, and trien ability: Tell me, now, what capital graph Company, as tenants, rould be required in such an enter-
