SECRET

Your telegram No. 614 [of April 7th: plan for the defence of the Portuguese mainland].

His Majesty's Government have carefully considered the Portuguese comments on the Anglo-Portuguese plan for the defence of the Portuguese mainland transmitted in your despatch No. 98 [of March 24th].

2. From the military point of view there are no good reasons why His Majesty's Government should abandon the present position under which they are obliged to do nothing more than to prepare a plan. His Majesty's Government are opposed to the assumption of definite military commitments in regard to the Portuguese mainland, however remote the circumstances which would evoke their application. At the same time they are anxious that nothing should be done or left undone which might lead the Portuguese Government to circumscribe or detract from the facilities which they grant to us in the Azores. It is operationally vital to exploit those facilities to the utmost.

3. In these circumstances His Majesty's Government do not favour the suggestion in paragraph 4 of your despatch No. 98 that it might be desirable to agree to the extension of their commitments in the defence plan to cover the event of an attack developing on Portugal as a result of her breaking off relations or declaring war on our enemies.

4. In any case, as you suggest in your telegram under reference, there can clearly be no question of considering the Portuguese proposals while Dr. Salazar maintains his present attitude over wolfram. You may think it best to return no reply at all to Dr. Salazar's note of March 16th until the wolfram question has been settled. If you consider it desirable to make some acknowledgement, you should merely inform Dr. Salazar that the moment when he has refused to meet the requirements of His Majesty's Government over wolfram is hardly an appropriate time to ask them for a serious extension of their undertakings in regard to the defence of Portugal.

5. You also suggested in your telegram under reference the possibility of withdrawing the British Air Mission from Lisbon as a mark of displeasure at the behaviour of the Portuguese Government. I doubt whether the withdrawal of the Air Mission would in fact be likely to influence Dr. Salazar over wolfram and after consultation with the appropriate Service authorities I consider that the matter should not be pursued further for the present.

Moskovski Bolshevik May 8th contains article by V. Linetski entitled "Fascist Empire Ring of Universal Hatred". Red Army successes had been great stimulus to the struggle of the oppressed European nations and Germany's rear had become a furnace of hatred. The resistance movement had upset the theory of abstention from the conflict and unnecessary losses upheld by international reactionary circles. Resistances were described in Yugoslavia, France, Denmark and Belgium where the movement benefited from the example of Russian partisans. The National Army of Liberation in Yugoslavia and the Greek Elas were holding German divisions and weakening the defence of the European fortress. Explosive material in the West would make itself felt with the first blow from the sea. The Anglo-American invasion forces would meet experienced warriors schooled in the bitter struggle with the Fascists. Germans were exhibiting anxiety at the growing French resistance which they described as "a real menace". The power of Fascist Germany had been undermined and the Garrisons in the West were weakening. Transfers of German divisions Eastwards were creating favourable conditions for blows against the European fortress from the sea and from the French resistance movement.

MOST IMMEDIATE

My telegrams Nos. 811, 813 and 814.

I fear we can only infer that Salazar's obstinacy remains unshaken as regards embargo. I have little doubt that our own efforts to bring him to reason supported by those of the Brazilian Government and of General Smuts and the intervention (so far as it went) of President Carmona will have decided Dr. Salazar to go to what he will regard as the furthest possible limit in the way of reduction of German quota. If he were not the man he is, he might yet retain some measure of British goodwill whilst preserving his principle and saving his face by reducing German quota to a purely symbolical figure. I doubt however whether having decided not to go the whole hog he will take this course.

2. When he sends for me he will presumably announce the extent of the reduction he has decided on. If I see him before you have had time to get specific instructions to him [sic: ? to me] and decision is unsatisfactory, I propose to go over the ground with him once more; make a particularly urgent appeal to him on humanitarian grounds (prolongation of the war in all its aspects) and for the sake of the alliance; and then beg him not to make public a decision which will let loose a storm of indignation in England and must lead inevitably to consequences of the gravest character until you have had time to communicate with him once more.

3. This might be the moment for a personal letter from the Prime Minister (with which the Dominion Ministers might perhaps associate themselves) warning Dr. Salazar of the consequences which must follow if he maintains his decision. There is perhaps an off-chance that it may move him where other methods have failed.

4. Before however that course is adopted, we must decide what steps would be taken and carried through if it failed and whether we should stand to gain or lose in the long run.

6. There may be advantage in my having no (repeat no) instructions for the coming interview except such as you may wish to give me for my own guidance.

7. Since drafting the above, I have received your telegram No. 668. I do not think that broadly speaking it need modify what I propose to say to Dr. Salazar except that I will be a little more circumspect in speaking of the consequences if the reduction proposed [? grp. omitted: ? appears] to offer anything like a tolerably acceptable settlement. I have just been summoned for 5.00 p.m. this afternoon.

IMMEDIATE

Your telegram No. 443.

Following appears to be relevant passages as reproduced in Algiers Press.

[Begins].

2. What has been accomplished during the last 341 days from the point of view of rallying the immense mass of Frenchmen in the war round their Government will reassure certain anxious friends who it appears are sometimes fearful lest they will find during the course of liberation a France which is still feudal and which will split up under several different administrations. In truth we Frenchmen cherish none of these doubts or fears. For we know where France is; we know she exists in her people openly or secretly formed up against the invader; in an army; in a fleet; in an air force eager to strike the enemy and entirely under the orders of a National Government; in this traditional diversity of sentiments and tendencies which is to-day merged in unexampled unity and which sweeps away at the appropriate time all intrigues and all divisions.....

3. At the moment when the armies of freedom are preparing to bring to our soil vicissitudes and the destruction of battle; at the moment when our population is stoically undergoing air bombardments preparatory to landings; at the moment when ideas and sentiments from which the future world order will emerge are taking shape we ardently desire that French realities should be firmly recognised. In the beginning they alone will be able to serve as a basis for practical arrangements which will permit the Allied armies and their command when they set foot on Metropolitan soil to concentrate on their task which is, and should remain, exclusively strategic. It is all the more regrettable that interruption of communications between the French Government and its diplomatic and military representatives in London creates a situation which makes it clearly impossible to make any arrangements in this respect. But despite this obstacle like all others we are perfectly confident of the issue of the great battle which will put to flight the detested enemy.....

Buenos Aires telegram No. 492. to you.

I asked the Secretary General of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs today whether the honours paid by the Argentine Government to the late Brazilian Ambassador were likely to affect the present general attitude towards the Argentine Government. He said that he saw no reason why that attitude should be affected and implied that one more complication in an already anomalous situation did not really matter. In general he seemed more depressed than when I last discussed the Argentine situation with him for with the passage of weeks he seemed to see less and less prospect of finding a way out of the deadlock. I asked him of he thought the May 25th celebrations would bring the matter to a head but he did not seem to think that would be the case.

Incidentally he told me the Argentine cruiser would remain here until after the Ambassador's funeral.

In view of Madrid telegram to Foreign Office number 707 (repeated to Tangier as 51) I should be grateful to receive a directive as to how you wish British United Kingdom press to treat Tangier [grp. undec. ? German] question in order that I may give advice to such local press correspondents as seek it. Meanwhile I understand certain rather violent articles have been sent from here. Mr. Yencken apparently wishes agreement to be hushed up so as not to humiliate Germans and Spaniards. While I can of course understand this from Madrid standpoint we here would like to make as much capital out of it as possible through our publicity organs.

2. B.B.C. and Gibraltar radio have been giving out that Dr. Reith is still in his Consulate General Tangier. Might they be informed that Reith left Tangier October 1943 and has not returned since because we stopped him from doing so. Mohr is present Chargé d'Affaires.

My telegram No. 160.

Feeling of immense satisfaction which had permeated this zone immediately following the statement which you made in the House of Commons on May 2nd is now becoming divided. British and foreigners of all nationalities are openly criticising lack of implementation by the Spaniards of the Anglo-Spanish agreement and we shall soon become a laughing stock unless the Spaniards can be induced to take action and close the German Consulate. The average comment in Tangier to-day concerning our agreement with Spain is "this is all very well but how and when?" If we cannot soon secure satisfactory action against the Germans, what should have been a notable victory for the United Nations will be turned temporarily at least into an ignominious defeat. German strength in resisting the closing of their Consulate is the keynote of German propaganda here.

IMPORTANT

My immediately preceding telegram.

Following is text referred to in my immediately preceding telegram.

[Begins]. Mr. Moose requested His Majesty's permission to discuss certain matters which he wished to submit to His Majesty. He began by referring to United States Government's proposal that an educational mission composed of five students should be sent to the American university in Beirut at the beginning of the coming scholastic year at the expense of the United States Government. The students would remain for a period of two years to take a course of university studies. His Majesty thanked the United States Government for their decision in this matter.

2. Mr. Moose next read out to His Majesty a memorandum which he had received from his Government containing an exposition of United States Government's oil policy as regards world oil which had been formulated on the occasion of the current talks in London on the subject of oil. The text of this memorandum is as follows:

Memorandum.

The United States Government will strive to ensure that those Governments which obtained concessions shall derive reasonable profits from oil wells operated by American concessionaires. Exploratory talks are at present taking place with the British Government on the technical side, and the latter wish to come to an understanding as regards principles of the whole question before entering into discussions between ministers of the two countries concerned.

3. The reasons why the present discussions are restricted to these two countries only are

(1) because of the existence of vital and urgent questions which directly affect the interests of these two countries only and

(2) because of the necessity for reaching an agreement regarding mutual interests of the concessionaires of the two parties concerned.

4. No decision or action will be taken which might prejudice or otherwise affect the rights of a third country. The United States Government desires to reach a general agreement on oil at an early date which will include all parties concerned in the oil question. The United States Government have therefore decided to arrange with the other countries concerned for a general conference to be held to do with oil. When the United States Government announced that discussions would be held with the British Government they at the same time announced their preparedness to hold similar discussions with any other Governments in order to conclude agreements embracing mutual oil interests of these Governments and the United States.

5. The above communication was made to His Majesty by Mr. Moose who went on to raise yet another question, namely the laying of an oil pipe line in Saudi Arabia. Mr. Moose stated that this question would not be discussed in London although it might be mentioned by chance. It would not be aided by [grp.undec ?rapid] [grp.undec] as a matter for discussion. The United States Government will, at such a time as a definite scheme will have been elaborated, discuss details thereof with the Saudi Arabian Government.

6. His Majesty in reply thanked Mr. Moose and stated that he would discuss the question of the pipe line when a detailed scheme had been submitted to him.

7. Mr. Moose then spoke about the 10,000,000 rials to be minted for the Saudi Arabian Government for sale to the United States Legation and to the oil company. As regards dollar equivalent payable in respect of this sum, 60% thereof would be retained in the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and it was considered in American programme amounts could be used to obtain interest annually in view of His Majesty's objection to using it for the purpose of capital appreciation. It was therefore thought that the best way was for this sum to be invested in United States shares and bonds rather than left to lie idle in the bank, the interest being paid to the Saudi Arabian Government. His Majesty replied that he was strictly opposed to the idea of capital appreciation but that he agreed to the proposal to obtain interest by investment in shares and bonds as this was a legitimate procedure.

8. Mr. Moose next mentioned the 50 lorries which were ready in Egypt for shipment under lease-lend to Saudi Arabia and which were expected shortly as he had already informed Sheik Yusuf Yassin a month or so ago. His Majesty pointed out the difficulties confronting his Government as regards transport owing to the number of vehicles requiring repair and the death of large numbers of camels. His Majesty emphasised that if assistance to the Government was not immediately forthcoming in respect of any transport the whole supply question in the country would be gravely affected and there would be danger of famine. Mr. Moose replied that the question of transport was one of three questions which he wished to discuss namely transport, finance and supply matters. He stated that United States Government were anxious to assist Saudi Arabia and that they had decided to increase their Lease-Lend assistance to Saudi Arabia so that it at least equalled the help afforded by the British Government. This decision had been taken before the United States Government had received any recommendations from Mr. Moose and had formed the subject of a decree issued by President Roosevelt.

9. Mr. Moose added that in his opinion the basis they should work on was to draw up a definite estimate of the requirements of the country and then consider how far United States Government could meet these requirements under existing war-time conditions. Mr. Moose considered it would be best to compile a list of the country's requirements over a number of years, say four or five, so that no time would be lost by discussions and everything could be delivered in time.

10. Mr. Moose went on to enquire whether the British Government had as yet reduced their assistance to Saudi Arabia. His Majesty thereupon expressed his gratitude to the United States Government for their decision with regard to his country and proceeded to praise the assistance granted to him by British Government when times were hardest. His Majesty referred to the ties of firm friendship which had for so long bound him to the British Government and which had stood whether their help was great or small. His Majesty considered the help he had received from British Government and latterly also from United States Government was but one of many proofs of friendship uniting Saudi Arabian Government with the two friendly powers.

11. His Majesty then summarised the position regarding the assistance afforded by the British Government during the present year and intimated that no final decision had yet been taken in the matter but that discussions were still proceeding regarding limitation of quantities of foodstuffs supplied to Saudi Arabia. The question of finance was also under discussion but no final decision had, it appeared, yet been reached.

12. His Majesty went on to refer to relations between the three countries stating that their mutual interests lay in collaboration with one another. He did not think, as some thought, that the interests of his country were served by rivalry between Britain and America. The present and future interests of his country depended on friendship between Britain and America and anyone who endeavoured to act otherwise was bound to fall into error.

13. Mr. Moose thanked His Majesty for his statement and declared that this was indeed the wisest course. He concluded by requesting His Majesty's permission to discuss details of the three questions he had raised with Yusuf Yassin and Fuad Hamza.

14. Talks subsequently took place between Yusuf Yassin and Fuad Hamza and Mr. Moose. The latter was informed that Saudi Arabian requirements were as stated in the budget which Mr. Moose had seen. Mr. Moose replied that the budget dealt with present requirements without taking into consideration possible future requirements of Saudi Arabian Government. In reply he was told that greatest requirements were those given in the budget and that if any additional items were subsequently needed they would be ordered as and when required.

15. Mr. Moose agreed to arrangements on this basis and promised to submit them to his Government.

ECONOMIC POLICY

MR. CHURCHILL invited the Conference to discuss economic, monetary and financial questions. There were certain differences on these subjects, though he felt sure adjustable differences, between United Kingdom Ministers representing the various political parties in the National Government; and he was well aware of the complexity and difficulties of the matters in issue. He hoped that everyone would state his views quite frankly. If there was the chance of agreement in the outcome, so much the better; if not, he felt that the absence of unanimity could be kept in the background until the world had settled down further and victory been assured. Far more important matters were happening in the world today.

SIR JOHN ANDERSON said that he need not go into detail about the scheme for an international monetary fund. Discussions on the technical level had taken place only a few weeks ago, at which the technical representatives of the Dominion Governments had been present, and at which the monetary plan, and other connected subjects which had been considered with the official representatives of the United States, had been examined. The position of H.M. Government in the United Kingdom had been that they were very ready to take part in such discussions, but without committing themselves on the issues involved. That was still their position. The House of Commons had been informed that no commitment would be made until the matter had been fully debated and the point of view of the Dominions ascertained.

He assumed that the general lines of the proposed international monetary fund plan were familiar to all those present. The latest position as between H.M. Government in the United Kingdom and the United States Government was that Mr. Morgenthau, with the support of Mr. Cordell Hull, and the approval of President Roosevelt, was urging us to take part in a further conference on the subject in the near future. We had not so far informed the United States Government whether we would be prepared to do so, nor had anything been said finally as to the status of any such conference. The scheme was to be debated in the House of Commons on Wednesday, 10th May. H.M. Government would be greatly helped in the debate by hearing the general view of the Dominion Prime Ministers on the scheme.

The scheme set out in the White Paper (Cmd. 6519) differed in certain respects from the earlier plan which had been drawn up here, and which was known as the Keynes plan. It looked, however, as though the plan now under consideration represented a greater measure of agreement on the technical level between the United States and Dominion and U.K. experts. But there were certain reservations which H.M. Government in the United Kingdom had thought it necessary to make. First, that the international monetary fund should not operate in respect of the transitional period. It was felt that the general plan could not be regarded as complete, unless supplemented by a scheme for an international bank which would make funds available for reconstruction. Secondly, that if the scheme was accepted, the full obligations under it which would fall on H.M. Government in the United Kingdom could only be undertaken gradually.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he had already stated his views on the proposals for an international monetary fund in the Canadian House of Commons at the time when he had tabled the draft principles for the fund as recommended by experts. The views he then expressed were the views he held today. He did not think he could do better than repeat to the present meeting the remarks he had made in the Canadian House of Commons. He had spoken as follows:-

> "This statement of principles on international monetary relationships is conceived as part of a general plan of international economic co-operation which as a whole will have for its objects the progressive expansion of international trade, high levels of employment, improved standards of living, reasonable stability of prices and machinery for orderly exchange arrangements. The Canadian Government is thoroughly aware of the importance of establishing international monetary arrangements favourable to the expansion of trade and employment, and is keenly sympathetic with the particular objects to which this statement of principles is directed. It is equally anxious that common views should be reached on other parts, also, of a general plan of international economic co-operation, particularly on a reduction in the barriers to trade expansion, a reduction vital to Canada's welfare, and necessary if conditions favourable to stable monetary arrangements are to be achieved. The view which will ultimately be taken by the Canadian Government of any proposed monetary arrangement will be greatly, perhaps decisively, influenced by the progress which it is possible to make in achieving agreement on other aspects of international economic policy with which monetary arrangements are inseparably linked."

MR. CURTIN said that the Australian Government was in the same position as was, he gathered, the Government of the United Kingdom. They had been represented in these technical discussions, and they hoped that success would attend their outcome. They entirely favoured co-operation for the purpose of expanding trade and commerce, and overcoming the instability of exchanges. The Australian Government would have to face a political dilemma in the domestic arena similar to that which Mr. Churchill indicated might have to be faced in the United Kingdom. Continuing, Mr. Curtin said that he was obliged to speak very frankly. In the first place unless agreement was reached between the U.S. and U.K.Governments, any scheme would be doomed to defeat and would not work. More than an outline of principles was in issue - faith without works was no good. Commercial and monetary policy could not in practice be disentangled from one another, except by economic experts. The ordinary public did not understand, and would not give a political mandate to any Government putting forward, a plan with intricate terminologies beyond the grasp of the man in the street, who was apt to think that the interests of his country were being sacrificed to some general theoretical plan. That attitude was apt to be confirmed by the criticisms that would be levelled against any plan, by those experts who were opposed to it, and who would suggest that its acceptance involved the sacrifice of particular countries or of very representative sections of those countries. He felt grave doubts whether the United States would achieve a drastic reduction in their high tariffs, and he wished to make it clear that any scheme such as that now under discussion would have to be sponsored in the first place by the Great Powers. They could not expect a smaller nation, such as the Commonwealth of Australia, to go out as a pioneer in a matter of this kind. The Australian Government would certainly not negate the principle of agreements of this nature. Its attitude would be to support them. But it was not in a position either to frame or to take the lead in contracting out of such a scheme. The larger Powers must show that they regarded the scheme as sound and valuable, and that they intended to proceed with it.

His second point was that the success or the failure of the general objective would depend essentially, not on the theoretical soundness of a particular scheme, however carefully worked out by experts, but on political decisions by the Governments concerned. The experts would be fully capable of devising arrangements to give effect to a political policy laid down by individual Governments for high political reasons. And Governments, in reaching their decisions in regard to a particular set of proposals for achieving monetary stabilisation, must have in mind matters such as exchanges and tariff ceilings, and must be satisfied that their plan would not admit of being defeated by subsidies or by excessive depreciation of exchange rates. That was the decision that Governments would, he felt, have to make in the first instance, before the technical experts got to work to frame the details of a plan.

The scheme as drafted, in his judgment, omitted one major requirement. He had no doubt that it would be of value as oiling the machinery, and it might be an excellent plan for the world after the transitional period. Where it failed was that the transitional period was the real and immediate problem. Rehabilitation was more important than the long term problem, and a more urgent matter by far than the devising of the machinery of the post-transitional period. It was essential to get something working without delay which would avoid the mistakes of the last twenty years.

The scheme now before the meeting could look for the warmest and most sympathetic consideration from the Australian Government. But he could not exclude the relation of this matter to the issue of Imperial preference. Australia had a trade agreement with Canada and a commercial understanding with New Zealand. With the United Kingdom she was linked by the scheme of Imperial preference, which she was certainly not going to throw away for any doubtful Utopia of some world agreement. Some countries were inclined to press for declarations of high policy on the basis of the open door in every country which they might wish to exploit. He quite agreed that barriers to trade were provocative, and in the abstract he would prefer the trade of all countries to be free. But we must face the facts. The Australian Government had had to build up its secondary industries, and, indeed, had it not done so, could not have provided the steel, iron and many other goods which had been so essential to the conduct of the war; and, because of the difficulty of import during the war, Australia would have found herself defenceless at a critical moment. A country geographically placed as Australia was not in the same position as countries which were close to, or contained, great seats of industry; and with a view to building up its industrial capacity it might have to adopt whatever policy in regard to tariffs, subsidies or the like would be helpful in the consolidation of that capacity. Moreover, Australia was anxious to see a large increase in her population. But that increase would mean a market for goods and additional products which would have to be sold. He was opposed to a Chinese wall around each country, but we must be realist. His faith in the Sermon on the Mount was real, but he liked to see the policeman outside. The Australian Government would be quite ready to commit itself, in the maximum degree that present circumstances might appear to justify, to such course of action for the good of the world in respect of trade and monetary stability as they might at the present time be satisfied was in their interests. But he must make it clear that it was impossible for him to pledge future Commonwealth Parliaments not to adopt a course of action that might be at variance with whatever course of action they subscribed to now, if famine, flood, or other unforeseen circumstances made it necessary for them later to change their attitude. The statement which Mr. Mackenzie King had just read to the meeting roughly expressed the views of the Australian Government, but he thought rehabilitation more important than getting the normal pre-war machine a little better oiled than it was. The United States, he observed, were ready to give all possible help over relief, but they were adopting a somewhat difficult policy over rehabilitation.

SIR JOHN ANDERSON said that he thought that this was because the United States Government felt that rehabilitation should properly be reserved for the development of the International Investment Bank scheme. H.M. Government in the United Kingdom had pressed the United States Government to say whether they accepted the principles in respect of employment which had been recently advocated by the Australian Government, but they had explained that they were not ready with their other plans, and thought that the monetary plan by itself did not afford a sufficient basis for the discussion of the Australian policy as regards full employment, which would better be taken up at a later stage.

MR. CURTIN continued that full employment and rehabilitation was the pedestal on which we must work out a good monetary policy. It was impossible to expect countries to abandon separatist treatment of a situation in which they found so many of their own people without ultimate employment. In such conditions a Government must be prepared to take steps to deal with the situation.

Experience showed that the type of action which they were disposed to take, in the absence of any better scheme, was to put a penalty on imports, and to make agreements with other countries in respect of the marketing of such goods as they had to offer. He recognised that it had been our hope that the present monetary scheme, by providing a measure of stabilisation, would ensure a better exchange of goods and services all over the world, which would contribute to the ideal in view. But he remained strongly of opinion that the technical experts could not work out a satisfactory arrangement unless there had been a preliminary direction on the high principles involved, based on political decisions by the Governments concerned. The Australian Government would be very ready to assist in framing such political decisions.

MR. FRASER said that he was generally familiar with the various schemes that had been under discussion by the experts. Some of them had caused him some alarm. Each country had to study its own economic set-up, and must expect that other countries would do likewise. New Zealand, with its export of primary products, had an entirely different range of problems from certain other countries. Any international scheme which would help trade generally, without destroying the interests of our separate communities, and which would make for peace, would be acceptable. He recognised the high ideals underlying the schemes that were now before us, and he congratulated all who had been associated in the efforts to put them into shape. While there were still points requiring adjustment and agreement, much had been done, and a great step forward taken, for which he desired to express his gratitude.

Employment

As regards full employment, he was in agreement with the Australian point of view as put before the Conference, and he felt that full and adequately remunerated employment should be our main objective. He felt that the Commonwealth of Australia had performed a real service by bringing forward and pressing this ideal.

Imperial Preference

As regards Imperial Preference, Mr. Churchill, in 1941, had clearly safeguarded our position in the Mutual Aid Agreement with the United States by securing the insertion of the words "subject to existing obligations". The President had touched on this matter with him recently in a very friendly way, when he (Mr. Fraser) had made it clear that the United Kingdom was New Zealand's market, and had asked whether, even if there was to be a reduction in the United States tariff, he could be guaranteed markets by the United States which would make up for the loss of existing markets in the United Kingdom. He was not interested in abstract theories; nor did he wish New Zealand's problems to impede the solution of world problems. But New Zealand could not sacrifice the substance for the shadow. He had been glad in that connection to see Mr. Amery's recent statement at Birmingham. Like the Australian Government he felt that any discussion must start from the assumption of an adequate social and economic basis. That was fundamental to a general agreement, and he felt himself that there was a greater clarity of view on that subject in the British Commonwealth than in the United States, even if our intentions were no better than those of the United States. He was very ready to discuss Imperial Preference, but he would not be prepared to surrender it, unless something better were forthcoming which would make the surrender worth while. He had been strongly opposed to the United States' suggestion that we should abandon quantitative control of imports. Limitation of imports was essential to New Zealand if she was to live at all. It was essential for New Zealand to safeguard her sterling funds. Owing to the increase of the burden that had fallen on New Zealand, imports, if not controlled, would have used up all the sterling funds at her disposal, and her standards of living, so far from being raised, would have been depressed in an extreme degree. Control of imports in the circumstances remained essential. Its disappearance would break her economy. The words in paragraph 3 of the paper on Commercial Policy (P.M.M.(44) 1), that "any country would be free to restrict imports to any extent necessary to defend its balance of payments on the basis of an objective criterion relating to reserves", to a large extent met his point.

Bulk Produce

The greatest security that we and the United Kingdom could have for our produce would be long term agreements with the Governments of the responsible countries through the restoration years. He was glad that the new draft made it possible to take action on these lines. That was a great improvement.

List of Organisations

He was a little uneasy at the large number of organisations which appeared to be operating in this field, e.g. the I.L.O., the Commercial Union, the Monetary Union, the Commodity Organisation, etc. Would it not be possible, by combining them, to reduce them to two or three? It would tax the resources of the smaller countries to find a large number of delegates, and the tax on their funds would be equally great. He suggested that the existing organisations should be examined and reclassified.

Monetary Fund

The great fear in connection with the monetary fund proposals was that they represented a return to the gold standard. He thought that, in fact, that position was adequately protected under the new scheme, and on the understanding that the issue was one that would be fully discussed in Parliament before any agreement was come to, he saw no objection to discussions being entered into with the United States. He understood that the State Department attached great importance to an arrangement being come to before the election conventions.

In general his attitude was much the same as that of the other Dominions. He favoured international schemes of regulation, subject to the safeguarding of our position, and the position of New Zealand. He would be reluctant to agree to surrender Imperial Preference, save possibly in return for something that was substantially more advantageous. If the schemes now under discussion resulted in bringing the nations closer together, that was all to the good. But a condition of acceptance should be that the standard of living should not be reduced; for if we accepted these schemes, and the result was to be a reduction in the standard of living, we should be adopting a short-sighted policy on the long view.

MR. CHURCHILL said that he thought that it would be of advantage that the Conference should know what had passed between him and President Roosevelt in 1942 in connection with the Mutual Aid Agreement. He had then taken particular pains to safeguard the position as regards Imperial Preference in its entirety. In his telegram of 8th February 1942 (No. 904) he made it clear to the President that the War Cabinet felt that if we bartered the principle of Imperial Preference for the sake of Lease-lend, we should have accepted an intervention in the domestic affairs of the British Empire that might lead to very embarrassing results, and might play into the enemy's hands. On 12th February, 1942, the President, in his telegram (No. 105), had replied in sympathetic and entirely satisfactory terms, and had said that he was asking for no commitment in advance that Imperial Preference "would be abolished, and I can say that Article VII (of the Mutual Aid Agreement) does not contain any such commitment. I realise that that would be a commitment which your Government could not give now if it wanted to". He had readily accepted this very full and frank assurance from the President, and the Meeting would agree that its terms were such as to leave the hands of H.M. Governments in the United Kingdom and in the Dominions entirely free and fully safeguarded as regards Imperial Preference, and to bind the United States in respect of that issue.

There were two aspects of Imperial Preference. The first was what he might call the sentimental aspect. He attached the greatest importance to that, and felt that its significance could not be under-estimated, and that we should not lightly do anything that might undermine it. The second was the practical question of its importance in terms of the prosperity of the United Kingdom and the Dominions. He was not for departing in any way from the principle of Imperial Preference built up over so many years, and he felt strongly that we should not agree to depart from it unless in return for some such offer by the United States as full free trade, or the reduction of United States tariffs, at an international conference, to a negligible level. If there were to be an offer that, if we were to throw open our vast market, others would do the same, that would be a matter which might be worth very grave consideration by all the Parliaments concerned. But was there in fact any chance that such an offer would be forthcoming, or that the United States would abandon its high tariff protections? He felt that to that question there could only be one answer. Imperial Preference was a religion to some people, and a strong bond of unity to a much larger body to whom it represented an expression of the deep feelings that had led to our fighting as a United Empire in two tremendous wars. We should be careful how we touched a matter that closely affected so many. Considerations other than immediate profit and loss had to be borne in mind. He was satisfied, and he felt sure that the Meeting would agree, that his correspondence with the President had kept the door open and had ensured that the issue was not compromised in the slightest degree.

Imperial Preference

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that he was very glad that Mr. Churchill had read to the Conference his correspondence with President Roosevelt, for it clearly and explicitly linked Imperial Preference with the United States tariffs. If we were called upon to forego Imperial Preference, we could say that if the United States were prepared to abandon its high tariff wall, the two might be considered together. The United States had built up their tariff wall over a long series of years. Behind it they had consolidated a great industrial fabric. They were not likely, in his judgment, to destroy that tariff wall suddenly, or to lower it to any great extent. He felt that, if that was the case, it was unnecessary to disturb ourselves unduly about the prospect of any abandonment of Imperial Preference. If, however, the United States were in fact prepared to abandon its high tariffs, and replace them by low tariffs, we might consider the question of Imperial Preference also. He agreed that a sentimental value attached to Imperial Preference, but its economic value was, he thought, its most important aspect. If the United States were prepared to open their market to the British Commonwealth, his own feeling would be that at that stage there would be a case for considering the wisdom of maintaining Imperial Preference. After all we had been driven into Imperial Preference in self defence against the United States, and the Ottawa Preferences had been designed to offset the outrageous United States tariff rates. United States tariffs and Imperial Preferences were historically closely linked together.

Monetary Fund

As regards the monetary fund he was prepared to leave it to the experts. The matter was highly technical. If the scheme was proved to be good, he, and he thought also his country, would be prepared to accept it without hesitation. But would the scheme in fact be generally accepted? Many schemes looked well in theory, and to the experts might seem a way out. But the experience of a life time had made him cautious in these matters. He had seen the United States build up their great position on the opposite policy of a high tariff wall. In our day we had seen an extraordinary phenomenon in the way in which Russia had raised herself from the depths by methods which were politically a negation of the present scheme. Germany, which in 1924, had been down and out, had risen to an immense strength and authority by methods other than free trade. It was evident that Italy had used protective measures to build up her position effectively. Reduction of tariff barriers and the promotion of free trade was thus clearly not the only solution. Was this scheme going to be generally accepted? That was the question - that, and whether the United States would reduce their tariff wall, what Russia would do, what Germany and other great countries would do in the future. Those countries had rehabilitated themselves, and had built up great economic and industrial power, on an entirely different basis. He was prepared to wait and see if the world would go in for this more scientific and theoretical scheme. But unless the scheme was generally accepted - if Russia and other great countries stood out - it could not work and would be destined to fail. If there was no general consensus of support for it, it would fall to the ground whatever amount of expert opinion there might be behind it. That was his doubt and a very real doubt. We should walk cautiously in this matter.

MR. CURTIN said that it was true that the United States had built themselves a high tariff wall, and that Germany and other states had given extensive production to their industries. We should also bear in mind that there were those masses of people whose consuming power was in present circumstances far less than it should be, and to whom it was important to give, by whatever means seemed practical, a reasonable standard of living, so that they should be able to get what was essential in a world expanding to full power and capacity. The slackness of demand in the thirties suggested that consumption power lacked some stimulus.

He wished again to urge what he had suggested earlier in the discussion, that all these technical schemes must be preceded by political decisions, and by political agreement on the major principles of action. He was apprehensive that the experts would approach this plan rather as economists, than as executants of Government policy. He could not advise what answer should be given to the United States request that we should attend a further conference. That was a matter on which he would, he thought, have to consult his Government further. The United Kingdom Government would have to decide for themselves whether to attend the conference and what line should be taken at that conference by the United Kingdom Delegation.

Was the conference now in view to be a conference of Governments, and would the Dominions be asked to send representatives to it? He felt that instead of the elaborate papers that had been laid before the present meeting, there would be great advantage if the Chancellor of the Exchequer could prepare a short memorandum in the form of a Cabinet document for the Dominions. While that was being done, this Meeting of Dominion Prime Ministers could have a political review of what was involved, and if a political decision could be taken here, the view of the Australian Government could be ascertained.

In all this matter let us not forget that at the end of the War, the United States would be the one great creditor country, and all the rest of us, in greater or less degree, debtor countries.

MR. ATTLEE said that we were working for an expansionist policy, but that it had to be worked out in a world composed of countries with very varied economic systems. The position of Russia and of New Zealand were quite different. In elaborating our schemes we had had to consider these differences and secure the greatest measure of common agreement possible.

SIR JOHN ANDERSON, replying to the points raised by Mr. Curtin, said that Mr. Morgenthau had expressed the hope that the team at the conference would be a team, not merely of experts, but of representatives of Governments. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, on the other hand, thought that there was a case for a further conference of experts, to clear up many outstanding points, and in particular to ascertain the view of several countries, such as France, the Netherlands and Belgium. It was certainly hoped that the Dominions would send representatives to any such Conference.

MR. CHURCHILL said that he thought it might assist the meeting at this stage if he mentioned certain fundamental points that as recently as 3rd March last he had brought to the notice of the United Kingdom War Cabinet†, and which seemed to him to stand out in discussions on Article VII. They were as follows:-

"First, no fettering of our country, direct or indirect, to a gold standard.

Second, no abandoning of Imperial Preference, unless, or until, we are in presence of a vast scheme of reducing trade barriers in which the United States is taking the lead.

Third, no international agreement destructive of the principle of the Wheat Act, 1932.

Fourth, no policy of artificial dearness or scarcity of basic foods by tariffs or quotas."

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he had already expressed his views on the proposed international monetary fund, but the turn of the discussion was leading to examination of the second issue before the meeting viz., Commercial Policy. His views on that subject were as follows:-

He did not think that the full employment and higher national income which Canada must seek to achieve could be secured within a restricted imperial trade system - nor could they be attained by a series of bilateral deals with individual countries.

For these reasons Canada was, he believed, strongly in favour of the widest development of international trade as soon as possible after the war.

Canada needed to expand her reciprocal trade with the countries of the Commonwealth, with the United States, and with Europe. For this reason Canada welcomed the multilateral approach to freer trade through a general commercial convention - to which all countries could adhere.

We should strive for a simultaneous reduction of protective tariffs and the removal of quantitative restrictions. At the same time we must be prepared to offer freer access to our own markets, in return for greater export opportunities.

In this effort we would require the active co-operation of the United States, which should be helped and induced to reverse her traditional commercial policies. We must recognise that the United States tended to attach exaggerated importance to the elimination of Preferences in the field of commercial policy. Some of us were perhaps inclined - for different and complementary reasons - to attach a similarly exaggerated importance to their integral retention. He thought that we must face the fact that serious reductions in protective tariffs in other countries of the world must involve a corresponding reduction of tariff preferences.

In the discussion on foreign policy last week, we had all been concerned about the possible spread of social disturbance after the war. He believed the best way to check it was by co-operating in parallel policies designed to bring about full employment, and higher real incomes for our people. This we could not do in national isolation nor within an Empire group. We needed to carry the other countries with us in these policies.

Field Marshal Smuts had spoken wisely of the importance we must all attach to the restoration of western Europe. The difficulties in the way of a purely political solution of their problems were great. He believed they could be partly overcome if we were to offer them our economic co-operation in terms of generous reciprocity.

These problems were difficult and very complicated. Bold solutions involve risk-taking which we would all wish to avoid if we could. He felt however, that postponement of new departures in the field of commercial policy until the end of a "transitional period", which he heard might be as long as five years, would be to accept defeat in advance. If we were to make a fresh start - our great opportunity would follow close on the end of hostilities. We should be prepared to seek it. If we waited, special interests in each of our countries - in Europe and in the United States, which have been subordinated to the pressing needs of a war economy, would assert their special claims. Each of us must inevitably face grave problems of industrial reconversion when hostilities end. He felt that these very difficulties would give us an immediate opportunity to build up our most efficient industries on firmer foundations than before. In so doing we could remove many causes of international friction and rivalry, and make sure that the economic bases of a world security organisation were securely laid.

MR. FRASER said that he would be grateful for information on two points. The first was commodity controls. The existing draft scheme provided for control of primary products. He felt that that was inequitable, and that if primary products were to be controlled, secondary products should be treated in the same way. But under the commodity scheme as it stood New Zealand products, which were essentially primary, would be controlled, but not her imports. His second question was as regards international cartels. What was the attitude of the Board of Trade on that subject, and did that attitude coincide with the attitude of the United States?

SIR JOHN ANDERSON said that as regards Mr. Fraser's first question the commodity control scheme had been worked out with great care by a group of economists; but he did not himself feel that the scheme was by any means yet sufficiently clear in respect of certain important aspects, and more work would, he felt, have to be done on them, and in particular on the point that had been raised by Mr. Fraser.

DR. DALTON, replying to Mr. Fraser's enquiry about cartels, said that H.M. Government had not yet settled their policy. They were inclining now to the view that there ought to be greater power to investigate the working of cartels, and to take action in cases in which their operation was shown to be harmful. The whole matter was being gone into by a Cabinet Committee in connection with the proposals for endeavouring to maintain full employment.

Continuing, DR. DALTON said that on the general issue of commercial policy, United Kingdom Ministers were not themselves as yet entirely agreed. He could say, however, that they were all concerned to foster and promote Empire trade in all practical ways. The United Kingdom must increase her exports by a figure estimated at 50% over her pre-war exports if she was to obtain the imports of raw materials and food necessary to employ her people, and if she was to hold her position in the post-war world. We had lost our overseas investments and our invisible assets. Unless an increase of the order he had mentioned could be ensured we could not be confident of bringing about full employment, or indeed even of restoring pre-war standards of living. Our concern was to extend our markets in the Empire, and also outside the Empire. That was the general object of the sketch which had been circulated to the meeting. H.M. Government in the United Kingdom and the Dominion Governments were in no way committed to the proposals in that sketch, which were based on the discussions which had taken place between United Kingdom officials and officials of the Empire earlier in the spring. But it could be taken as settled that no one would propose any abolition of Imperial Preference unless that was the unanimous desire of the Dominions, or for that matter, any reduction of preferences, save in return for a real and substantial quid pro quo. By that he meant not merely a better entry into the United States market, but entry into other markets from which we had been blocked out in the pre-war period by quota restrictions. The scheme also contained provisions around our safeguard; the position of infant industries; while it also allowed scope for state trading.

SIR FIROZ KHAN NOON said that India was interested both in the international monetary fund and in the proposals for commercial policy contained in the memorandum (P.M.M.(44) 1) that had been circulated. As regards the first she was very ready to take part in any discussions for the further and closer examination of how monetary stabilisation could best be secured. But naturally, given the low standard of living in India, any scheme which was likely in practice to result in India, as part of the British Empire, providing funds to keep up exchange, which would in practice be used by debtor countries, and which might in the outcome be a dead loss to the Indian taxpayer would be one which she was not likely to regard with favour. Industrially she was a new country, and her policy must be a policy of more employment for her people, and a rise in their income per head per annum. She certainly could not afford to abandon Imperial Preference, under which she had gained as much as she had given, and the provisions embodied in Article VII of the Mutual Aid Agreement that the economic arrangements to be made must be "mutually advantageous", and the reference in that agreement to "existing commitments" had been a great satisfaction to India as protecting her against possible United States competition. We should, he felt, be most cautious in our handling of these matters with the United States. India stood by the Imperial Preference Scheme, but she would, of course, be ready to enter into any discussions on these matters which Great Britain and the Governments of the Commonwealth wished her to attend.

MR. CHURCHILL, in adjourning the discussion, said that the range of topics covered in so short a time had been very great; but he felt sure it would be agreed that the discussion had been of great value.

[EN CLAIR] WAR CABINET DISTRIBUTION.

FROM CAIRO TO FOREIGN OFFICE.

Lord Killearn. D. By bag 9th May, 1944.
No. 103 SAVING.

VERY CONFIDENTIAL.

Abboud Pasha called this morning. He came ostensibly about his prospective business visit to London. He was aware of the reasons entailing delay but hoped it would not be too long.

2. He then disclosed the real object of his visit to me. Nahas Pasha was most anxious that whilst in London the Pasha should on his behalf enlarge upon the difficulties of the Egyptian Government's present position and more especially the pernicious role being played by the Palace which was rendering the work of administration of the country, the whole Government machinery, difficult if not impossible to work.

3. Abboud Pasha had told Nahas Pasha he was willing to undertake this provided the British Ambassador saw no objection. He then proceeded at great length to enlarge upon the iniquities of the Palace and the lack of responsibility shown by King Farouk. It would be part of his secret mission to say all this whilst in London on behalf of Nahas Pasha.

4. I said that from my angle I saw no reason to prevent the Egyptian Prime Minister putting his case before London through any channels he deemed appropriate. Indeed, from my own angle, it seemed no bad thing that the case should reach London without necessarily having first gone through the sieve of the Embassy. Actually the Foreign Office knew most of the facts and considerations already; but repetition through a non-official business source might be found helpful at home. It was however essentially a matter the Egyptian Prime Minister must fix up for himself.

5. Abboud Pasha then referred to the recent crisis and the absurdity of the Palace proposals. Being a close personal friend of Ahmed Maher he could tell me that the latter had been aghast at the suggestion of a Hassanein Cabinet: the inclusion of such names as Amr Pasha could only be regarded as a bad joke and the levity with which King Farouk had provoked the whole crisis. Ahmed Maher much preferred the continuance of the present Ministry, manifest though many of its faults and shortcomings were.

6. Abboud Pasha made no special comment on the arrest of Makram Ebeid yesterday, save that the latter had asked for trouble and had got it. I gathered there was no sympathy for him from Ahmed Maher.

IMPORTANT

My telegram No. 432 paragraph 3.

Seyed Zia has attained central position on the political stage. Everyone is either for or against him. Opponents most in evidence are the Russians who apparently consider him a British tool, the Tudeh party who follow the Russians, the Shah who thinks Seyed Zia wishes to dethrone him, the ruling classes and intellectuals with Left sympathies. Who his supporters are is more difficult to see. In the background there is a secret party formed on the cell principle. He is believed to have won over some officers in the army and Razmara, now Chief of the General Staff, is believed to have suppressed some elements in the army that were hostile to Seyed Zia. He is angling for the support of the tribes and in the long run this may alienate the army. Wealthy friends from Yezd have paid over £30,000 for premises for his political headquarters and rich manufacturers of Isfahan who fear the violence of the Tudeh are looking to him as an ally.

2. It was [grp. undec. ? I learn] Seyed Zia's intention not to announce his disagreement until his party should be firmly established on a basis of personal loyalty. It may be that he has not yet decided upon his platform but some of the planks can be discarded. He favours exact and narrowly defined Shah powers. He is for giving Millspaugh Mission a fair chance. He considers the tribes a good element (which they are at least physically) and says that he does not blame them for keeping their arms until they are assured of fair treatment. He is against the Tudeh party. This was inevitable. They have attacked him ferociously as a tool of foreigners and a would-be dictator and a gang of their supporters smashed his car after he had won the vote in the Majlis. Moreover Seyed Zia is a keen nationalist and therefore could only oppose a party which is notoriously run by Russians. Seyed Zia is accused by many of being a reactionary in the matter of social development, but it is possible that he is merely unwilling to alienate the Mullahs until he is strong enough to dispense with their help or at least their neutrality.

3. Seyed Zia appears to be very obstinate and to judge by his supporters a poor judge of men. On the other hand he has many qualities which the ordinary Persian lacks, moral courage, financial honesty, and the will to act upon his ideas. He also has a practical acquantance with agriculture. His greatest liability is hostility to the Russians. Even if they did not consider him to be sponsored by us they would dislike a Persian statesman who was both strong and honest. In the circumstances it is unfortunate that Seyed Zia is on bad terms with the other leading nationalists influential in the country [grp. undec.] the Shah. The Prime Minister is doing his best to bring them together but Seyed Zia distrusts the Shah profoundly, the Shah fears Seyed Zia so that prospects for collaboration are not good.

4. I have hitherto steered clear of Seyed so as not to give colour to the tale that he is a creature of ours and because there is danger of his being driven into anti-labour camp. Nevertheless he is already a power to reckon with and members of the staff of His Majesty's Embassy see him from time to time and give him some sound opinions on affairs and on personalities. He avoids foreign missions both in order to show his independence and because the Russians have ignored him to the extent of refusing to return his card.

SECRET

My telegram No. 309 to Foreign Office from Cairo.

Enemy activity during the past week has been confined to harassing operations in most areas. In Bosnia and Eastern Serbia however there are signs that large scale drives are being prepared.

2. In Croatia fighting has been limited to the area between Zagreb and Varazdin. To the east an attack has been opened from Daiuvar on the sixth corps of Partisans in Papuk but no details are available.

3. In Slovenia and Western Croatia several attempts were made to penetrate liberated territory. Enemy columns pushed south from Ljubljana and from Bostanj and north from Karlovac. Drives appear to have been successfully held.

4. Continued efforts are being made by the enemy to push south-west from Mrkonjicgrad and to clear communications between there and Banjaluka. There has been sporadic fighting on the road from Knin to Bihac. At Bihac itself and at Bos Krupa and Bos Novi to the north-east strong enemy concentrations are reported possibly mustering for attack on Bos Petrovac. Prijedor to which a Partisan brigade had succeeded in penetrating has been reinforced.

5. Serious inroads have been made by 13th S.S. division into Partisan-held areas of eastern Bosnia. Enemy succeeded in reaching Vlasenica but a general withdrawal north to Tuzla has since taken place. To the west Kaldanj and possibly Vares and Olovo have been retaken by the Partisans. It appears possible that the enemy has diverted his attention from the main third corps area to Fruska Gora.

6. In Montenigro Partisans have regained most of the ground lost in recent operations. Bijelo Polje and Berane are included in areas recaptured. Further north Partisan second corps has recaptured Brodarevo and is advancing on Pljeuxja. Bileca and Stolac are said to be surrounded by Partisans who have also successfully attacked the railway lines from Dubrovnik to Metkovic.

Togliatti had interesting conversation with Caccia to-day and showed most sensible grasp of the situation here. He had spoken with the Marshal on the three main points of the Government programme.

(1.) Improvement in Italian war effort. Marshal had said this entirely depended on the Allies who alone could say how many troops could be used or equip them.

(2.) On the economic side there was little the Government could do unaided. A good harvest must be ensured and a reasonable price established for wheat. This question the Cabinet were taking energetically. Togliatti thought that the lot of the workers might be improved by organised payment in kind, more communal feeding and setting up of canteens rather than by increasing wages. The clothing position was bad, especially boots.

(3.) Third point was épuration which the Government were going to carry through with thoroughness. A decree will be passed probably this week and Togliatti thought sensible action of Government should have good effect abroad.

2. Togliatti expressed opinion that the Government had been well received abroad though there was a natural tendency to wait to judge them by their deeds. He was sceptical of initiative which some of his colleagues wished to take in raising the status of Italy vis-à-vis the United Nations. While the Government should go slowly with such demands he thought the Allies should not adopt a negative attitude. He suggested that the Allies might make specific requests to the Italian Government and give them publicity.

3. The Government, said Togliatti, had been approved by the Italian people in general and particularly by the Communist Party; messages of approval having been received from the Party in Rome, Milan and Turin where the real strength of the Party lay (c.f. last part of paragraph 3 my telegram No. 28). Togliatti scoffed at the Communists in the South of Italy. The doubtful quantities in the present Government were Socialists and Action parties. Finally Togliatti affirmed that the Communist Party, far from having an eye on the distant future, were entirely concerned with the immediate problems of the day and intended to maintain this attitude.

IMPORTANT

Your telegram No. 546.

Having ascertained Minister for Foreign Affairs could not see me until Thursday May 11th (there is a political flurry over Gil Robles going on) I sent the First Secretary to ask the position of Head of European Section of Ministry. On my instructions he pointed out that you had given assurances to the House of Commons that the German Consulate General was to be withdrawn from Tangier forthwith, but that although a whole week had elapsed since the conclusion of the agreement it appeared general O. was still without instructions. In the circumstances he added that I was perturbed at the effect in London when it was learned that the Minister for Foreign Affairs could not receive me for another two days and it [? grp. omtd.] essential that when I did see him on Thursday he should enable me to telegraph you a definite date by which the Consulate General would finally have left Tangier.

The Head of the European Section was most insistent that I shall not worry at all. He said not a day had been lost by the Spanish Government in implementing their part of the agreement. On May 3rd Minister for Foreign Affairs had addressed an official note personally to the German Ambassador informing him that in accordance with the agreement reached with United Nations (sic) the Spanish Government had decided that the German Consulate General should be closed. This note the German Ambassador had acknowledged. Pressed to say whether Minister for Foreign Affairs' note had stipulated a time limit for the Consul General's departure official replied that the time and detailed arrangements remained to be settled. In due course His Majesty's Government would be approached for facilities to enable the Consul General and his staff to cross into Spain whereupon they would be sent straight to Germany. He thought he could promise this would have been accomplished by the end of May.

He feared meanwhile the atmosphere at Tangier might be somewhat tense. On the one hand General O. was impatient at not getting instructions, and although realising that the matter must in normal course of events be handled at the centre as between the Minister for Foreign Affairs and the German Ambassador, [2 grps. undec.] Mr. Gascoigne had been no doubt put out by the failure of Spain in particular to authorise publication in the Tangier Gazette of the full text of our statement, not realising in his turn the understanding reached here whereby your statement would be for English consumption and Minister for Foreign Affairs' statement for Spanish consumption. Insistence on Spanish statement at Tangier was in the long run to our advantage since it helped the Spanish authorities to implement their undertaking in an atmosphere of calm.

IMMEDIATE

My telegram No. 815.

After saying that an embargo was impossible Dr. Salazar said that in an attempt to go as far as possible to meet His Majesty's Government, (United States Government) he wished to make the three following alternative suggestions:

(i) Close down the free mines, each side (Great Britain and the United States on the one hand and Germany on the other) retaining production of its own mines as at present recognised,

(ii) Keep the free mines going and allocate the whole of their output to Great Britain and the United States:

(iii) Keep the free mines going, store their output in Portugal and sell to Great Britain and the United States after the war.

2. I said that I knew that you had been confidently hoping for an embargo and that none of these solutions would therefore be staisfactory. I was not authorised to discuss any solution whatever involving coninuance of exports to Germany and if I asked for certain elucidations it was merely in order to enable me to throw further light in certain respects when reporting to you.

3. In answer to my questions Dr. Salazar replied (i) that he put the output of German mines at 900 tons or a little under and that it was steadily decreasing.

(ii) that he had not contemplated spacing out export licences by monthly or other periodical instalments (without committing himself he did not appear to close the door to some such suggestion.)

(iii) that means might be found of delaying export of 150 tons due to the Germans under (grp. undec. ?expired] agreement.

4. We got on to this last point when Dr. Salazar after putting German exports (including the 150 tons) at 1550 tons for the last wolfram year emphasised the substantial character of the reduction represented by a drop to 900 tons (which might be an overhead limit) or possibly 800 or even as low as 700 if the fall-off in ouput continued at the expected rate. I said that we were not interested in percentages. What mattered was absolute quantity ofwolfram that went to Germany (particularly in the next few months) and pointed to the satisfactory character in that respect of the Spanish agreement. We did not, I continued, admit the German right to the 150 tons since although it was true that we had held back from the free pool some of our own production the Germans had cheated us by diverting on to their concessions, and thereby succeeding in exporting the whole of, considerable quantities of wolfram which should have gone into the free pool and been divided with us. It was at this point that Dr. Salazar said that the means might be found of delaying export of these 150 tons. I have mentioned this in detail because of the largeness of this amount which is not blocked the Germans would be able to export immediately.

5. Dr. Salazar stated that since the close of their last wolfram year the Germans had been allowed to export only the output of their own mines. It was actually, he added, existence of British owned and controlled mines and German owned and controlled mines that made his problem more complicated than that in Spain where all wofram was open to free competition.

6. My immediately following telegram contains the comments of the Economic Advisor. Fuller report of the interview follows later.

IMMEDIATE

My immediately preceding telegram.

Leaving aside the question of whether a limit of 900 tons of slightly less is politically acceptable to His Majesty's Government, the Economic Adviser's comments on the three alternative solutions offered are as follows.

2. In all three cases the first question is whether there would be a sufficient desire on the part of the Portuguese Government to ensure that the limit was not exceeded. Without a radical change of attitude the limit would be exceeded, as the result of graft and ill-will on the part of officials by at least 600 tons which the Germans obtained last year in excess of officially recorded exports. The extent and period of shuffling of officials, Customs officers and police, strict control over German finance and expulsion or supervision of principal German and pro-German civilians and smugglers would help and could be made conditions of our acceptance; but we should still reckon on the actual offer of at least 11/1200 tons.

3. It would be essential to fix the limits on a monthly not annual basis and to reckon German exports according to amounts leaving Portugal not export licences granted.

4. The first solution would be impracticable. The mining and collection of free wolfram cannot be stopped as long as there are buyers and we cannot hope to control German activities so closely as to prevent them from buying outside their mines.

5. The second solution would give legal sanction to our present policy of buying to corner all free wolfram. We should still have to compete with German buyers but could do so on advantageous terms so long as the Portuguese Government admitted a necessity to pay more than the legal price. The expense would be great (an extra £1 or £1½ million a year) but could be partly at least off-set by damping down production of our own mines still further, Portuguese could be asked to agree to this.

6. The third solution has all the disadvantages and none of the advantages of the first two.

M. Hoppenot called on Sir R. Campbell on May 8th. He stated the interruption of communications was a cause of considerable embarrassment to the French Committee of Liberation especially in connexion with discussions over civil affairs in France with Eisenhower. Koenig had left Algiers before the promulgation of new regulations and therefore had only very general instructions. Points might well arise which it would be difficult for him to put to the Committee through other than French channels. Sir R. Campbell told him that he imagined that discussions with Eisenhower would be carried on very much on a bloc basis. In the light of your recent statement in the House of Commons therefore, it did not seem likely that the main question of principle of interest to the Committee would arise. Hoopenot still thought discussions would be hampered.

2. As far as the Committee's delegation in Washington was concerned, Hoppenot said that they were very much in the dark on the present position as regards civil affairs in France and that in view of the interruption of communications, he would be most grateful for any information on the position and on the progress, in any of the discussions with Eisenhower which you could give me for transmission to him. He had seen in the Press that M. Vienot had been received by the Prime Minister as well as by yourself and if we could tell him anything of what passed it would help him.

Information given in first paragraph of my telegram No. 131 was result of very careful investigation which shows that last Allied raid on targets in Rome during March was on March 14th. Fact that second wave of aircraft on March 18th was not attacked suggests further that raid was a put-up job by the enemy.

We duly pass on to A.F.H.Q. the numberous appeals by the Vatican that Italian cities and towns containing religious and artistic monouments and treasures and isolated buildings of special religious and artisitic importance should be spared from damage. We did so in the case of your telegram No. 115 and have done so again in the case of your telegrams under reference.

2. In informing Vatican of the above you should take the opportunity of explaining to them that at the beginning of the campaign in Italy the Supreme Allied Commander in Chief, Mediterranean, issued a special order to all commanders making it clear that Italy is a country which has greatly contributed to our common cultural inheritance; that it is rich in monuments whose creation helped and now illustrate the growth of our common civilisation: and that in so far as military necessities permit, these monuments should be spared from all damage. Lists of such monuments have been issured for the information and guidance of all commanders. The Vatican can therefore be assured that in so far as the Allied air and ground forces are concerned every possible precaution is being taken to preserve from the effects of military operations Italian historic and artistic monuments.

3. As you will appreciate German reply about Orvieto is far from satisfactory.

Following is text of question and answer in Parliament on May 10th.

Mr. Gammans - To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, if he is yet in a position to make any statement regarding the relations of the Greek Government towards the underground movement in Greece.

Secretary of State - The Greek Prime Minister is about to hold a conference with delegates from the political parties and resistance organisations in Greece with a view to forming a national Government which will be fully representative of all patriotic opinion in the country. This conference may well be decisive for the future welfare of Greece and His Majesty's Government much hope that M. Papandreou will be successful in his efforts to establish political unity on a firm and lasting basis.

Your telegram No. 485 [of May 6th: Argentine situation]

Please telegraph your estimate of your United States colleague's fears that a further deterioration of the situation might result in embargo on exports to United Nations. Can you confirm "Daily Telegraph" report that Argentine Government are insisting on withdrawal of Costa Rican Embassy on the ground that Costa Rican Government do not recognise them? Recent telegrams from you and His Majesty's Ambassador Washington suggest to us that there is a danger of situation developing on following lines:

(1) Brazilian Government recognise Argentine Government either implicitly or explicitly as a result of Brazilian Ambassador's funeral arrangements

(2) Argentine Government demand before May 25th withdrawal of foreign Missions which do not recognise them

(3) Mr Hull rather than appear to weaken withdraws United States Embassy and calls upon us to follow suit

(4) Argentine impose partial or total embargo on exports to United Nations.

2. How seriously do you take this danger and have you suggestions for action on our part which would prevent it developing?

Confidential Annex

POST-WAR WORLD SETTLEMENT

MR. ATTLEE, who presided at the opening part of the meeting, explained that Mr. Churchill had been delayed in the House of Commons and would therefore be absent from the opening part of the meeting.

MR. EDEN explained that the papers circulated under P.M.M.(44) 4 on a Future World Organisation had been prepared in the Foreign Office to facilitate discussion. No decisions had been taken on them by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, and they had not in fact yet been taken in the Cabinet, although they had been examined by a Committee of Ministers.

The United States Government had suggested that informal discussions of an exploratory and non-committal character, on the official level, should take place in Washington next month between representatives of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, the United States Government and the Soviet Government. No documents had yet been exchanged, but we were anxious to let the United States Government have, before these discussions took place, the papers now circulated, subject to such modifications as might result from discussion with the Dominion Prime Ministers, and we understood that the United States Government were likely to reciprocate with papers of their own on the same subjects. We were not yet aware of the intention of the Russian Government.

During Mr. Stettinius's recent visit there had been discussions in general terms which had left the impression that the mind of the United States Government was moving very much on the lines of the papers now circulated by the Foreign Office. We did not, as yet, know what line the Soviet Government were likely to take or, indeed, their attitude towards the proposed conversations, except that M. Molotov had indicated at an earlier stage that he thought the idea of conversations a good one. It was relevant that the original suggestion at Moscow for carrying the Four Power Declaration further had come from the Russian side. He (Mr. Eden) had then supported it. Mr. Cordell Hull had been a little reluctant to commit himself to it at that stage, as he was not then certain of the attitude of Congress; but the latest information both from our Ambassador in Washington and from Mr. Stettinius was that Mr. Hull now felt that if agreement could be reached on general ideas about post-war organisation, and if, in the course of the late autumn, an announcement of a provisional character could in consequence be made, there was little chance of the Republicans going back on any such declaration, and that there would be a better chance of getting United States opinion behind it.

It would be seen that the scheme set out in these papers embodied the best features of the old League organisation. We had aimed at laying down principles rather than elaborating rules or definitions. The fundamental conceptions which we believed were shared by the United States Government were a fully representative world Assembly and a small World Council, the composition of which would have to be discussed, but the bases of which would be the three Great Powers (with, perhaps, China) who would have to carry out military decisions at the request of the World Council.

There were two points to which his League experience led him to attach considerable importance. In the first place, the proposed World Council, if it worked, was, he thought, a conception of great significance and importance. The Council of the League had worked very well - better indeed than any other organisation of that body. He had never regarded it as being unrepresentative. It was satisfactory from the Dominions point of view since it secured representation for them. It was easy to overdo the criticism based on South American representation on the Council, for, while the South American members might not have made any positive contribution, at any rate they did no harm, and their presence there was not a handicap. It would be observed that Mr. Churchill, in his paper P.M.M.(44) 5, was in complete agreement with the idea that there should be such a Council, although in connection with it he had developed the idea of regional committees.

His second point was that if these arrangements for the future world organisation were to work, they must have the necessary force behind them. If that force was lacking, they could not work. The big failures of the League of Nations were due to the lack of force - possibly to some extent to the lack of the will to use force. The absence of the United States was, of course, also a very relevant factor. The co-ordination of military forces to be placed at the disposal of the World Council was an important point which would have to be carefully worked out.

The scheme ensured that the burden of supplying forces to give effect to or provide backing for the decisions of the World Council would be widely distributed. Any organisation of this nature, if it was to live, must have the confidence of the small powers, and he thought it would have that confidence, in proportion as the small powers contributed to the working of the organisation.

The functional Committees proposed in the scheme contained in P.M.M.(44) 4 were also important. They would play their part in conjunction with the political organisation.

The only other point on which he wished again to touch, since it was not perhaps sufficiently clearly brought out in the papers, was that we were still at a stage in which His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom had reached no final decision about the details of the organisation suggested, although they were entirely settled in their minds that they wanted a world organisation. As he had already explained, what they had in view was conversations between officials in Washington in June. Our representative would be headed by an official of very high standing, probably Sir Alexander Cadogan. Discussions would be non-committal, but if they were successful, and the representatives of the United Kingdom, the United States and Russia were able, as a result of them, to come close enough to agreement, then something might be put out as a scheme in the late summer, before the American Elections.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he had not yet had time to study these important papers, which had only just reached him, but that on such consideration as he had been able to give them, the approach embodied in them seemed to him to be excellent. He wished to express appreciation of the care with which the Foreign Office paper had been prepared, and also of the tentative manner in which some of the proposals embodied in them had been put forward. Speaking generally, this document gave a sound basis on which to work. He would not like to be regarded as committed to any special features, for he had had insufficient time to consider the papers. He thought, however, that the main features would be generally satisfactory to Canadian opinion, and would be accepted by it pretty fully. He agreed that there would be advantage in further exploratory discussions at Washington next month.

In reply to a question by MR. EDEN as to whether, on the matter of tactics, he agreed with Lord Halifax and Mr. Stettinius that there would be advantage in some announcement before the American Elections, MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he thought this would depend on how far the Republicans agreed to make the matter one of common policy. In the last Election the President had been fortunate in having agreement on foreign policy with Mr. Willkie. If a similar agreement could now be reached with the Republican candidates, there was everything to be said for it, but it was very difficult to say what the attitude of the Republicans would be. Mr. Willkie had earned great praise and considerable support as the result of supporting the President on foreign policy in the last Election campaign; and failure on the part of the Republican Party to take a similar line now might be turned to their disadvantage.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS suggested that the argument was that if the matter were put forward before the Elections, the Republicans would be unlikely to wish to contest it, because the case for a world organisation was so clear, and had so much support in the United States. If proposals for a world organisation were put forward at this date, he thought it unlikely that any political party would think it wise to contest them; while if they refrained from criticising them when they appeared, it would not be easy for them to do so after the Election had taken place.

MR. CURTIN said he had dealt with this general issue in his speech at Canberra on 14th December, 1943, and doubted if there was anything which he could usefully add to what he had said then. On the question of tactics, he asked himself how a Government could enter into discussion with another Government before deciding what it sought itself, and how it proposed to achieve its objects. It might be taken for granted that the Dominions and Australia, and all the smaller countries, would be anxious for a world organisation. In the nature of things such an organisation would not succeed if, like the League of Nations the controlling body contained a large number of members. If it did that, it would lack a central core of effectiveness and ran the risk of turning into a debating society, the resolutions of which carried no authority.

It seemed to him that His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom were anxious to achieve an agreement with the United States and Russia which also committed China, by including her in such arrangements as were made. He remained of the view he had expressed earlier about China. If Russia, the United States and the British Commonwealth were not each of them part of the nucleus of the world organisation, the world organisation would exist only on paper and would be a replica of the League, unable to deal with the problem of security, which would have to be handled in some other way. The best course for us to take at this stage would be to bless the general scheme for a world organisation, and to do our utmost to bring it about, without concerning ourselves too greatly about the precise details. After all we, the nations of the British Commonwealth, were the oustanding example in the world of effective association for security. He was as much concerned with security as with the world organisation. He did not want a label without any substance in it. We could look forward hopefully, and he was quite agreeable, to discussion in Washington provided that Russia was present, and on the assumption that any talks would be non-committal and would be on the official level. Papers of the type now circulated by the Foreign Office could be put in to a pool for examination with papers by the United States Government and perhaps of Russia. Out of the three, we might get agreement on the essential, viz. the adhesion of those three countries to the world organisation once it was established.

If, however, Russia or the United States stood out, he would prefer, while favouring and supporting the proposed world organisation in all appropriate ways, to get on with studying the security of the British Commonwealth.

As regards the content of the Foreign Office paper, he was unable at the short notice available to him, to express any firm opinion. In any event, he did not feel that on a matter of this kind it was appropriate that he should offer a personal opinion. He would wish to speak on behalf of his Government. The opinion of his Government had, he thought, been expressed in his speech on 14th December last at Canberra. He had urged in that speech the importance of co-operation within the British Commonwealth. Our effectiveness in the World Council would be related to the degree of co-operation that we had independently been able to bring about and consolidate among ourselves.

The Foreign Secretary had observed that the small powers would be more interested in the world policy if it fell to them to make a contribution to the world police force. He thought it wise to sound a note of warning on that point. Careful study would be needed of the disposal of the forces to be earmarked for the world organisation. Australia had a huge problem in the Pacific, where there were dozens of islands, and she must be at pains to ensure that there was no risk of Japan using them as bases for her own rehabilitation. The Australian Parliament would wish to know to what destinations Australian forces, made available to the world organisation, would be liable to be despatched. MR. EDEN. explained that his remark had been directed to the countries of Europe outside the Big Three and that he had not had the Dominions in view.

/At this point MR. CHURCHILL entered the meeting and took the Chair/.

MR. CURTIN continuing, said that the world organisation must be dependent on the great powers. The regional problem was one with which the Dominions themselves, either in the world organisation or in association with the British Commonwealth, could usefully deal. In any event, the British Commonwealth must not put all its money on the uncertain horse of 'world organisation' which did not win too many races.

The order of priority in which we would place our objectives might be as follows:-

First, the security of any part of the British Empire. That was the responsibility in the first instance of a system of national defence which was a matter for the political government concerned.

Next, the extent and nature of that system would be influenced by the degree of Empire co-operation that could be established, and by the extent to which a reasonable system of collective security could be organised throughout the world.

He would illustrate what he had in mind as an example. The primary responsibility for the defence of Australia must fall on Australia. But Australia could not stand by herself, and hence must look to her historic association as part of the British Commonwealth, and therefore make an arrangement with the British Commonwealth. The British Commonwealth as a whole should decide the nature and necessity of the arrangements to be made within itself, having regard to the strength, or lack of strength, of the world organisation.

The order in which he had stated his argument was different from that which had been adopted in the papers before the Meeting. But in fundamentals it conformed to the principles of those papers. He would only add that every community in the future, so far from welcoming military or policing burdens, would try to lessen military expenditure and would prefer to farm out responsibilities of that order to someone else, so far as practicable.

MR. CURTIN asked Mr. Churchill what was the nature of the Regional Council for Asia which he had in view, and whether its limits would be continental, or would be the boundaries of the Pacific world. The Dominions inevitably took a more active interest in certain regions of particular geographical and strategical concern to them than in the world at large. It would be presumptuous, he felt, for them to expect to have a decisive voice in the handling by the United Kingdom Government of the problems of Europe. On the other hand, there were practical problems in the Pacific on which, because of Australian familiarity with that area, he felt that the Commonwealth might be better able to advise than the advisers immediately available to His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom.

MR. CHURCHILL said that he had an entirely open mind as to whether the body which he had tentatively suggested as a Council of Asia should be called the Council of Asia or the Council of the Pacific. Russia and India were both great nations in Asia. In his conception all the Dominions which had an interest in the area, and also the United Kingdom because of her interests in Asia, would be represented on the Council, and a substantial bloc would thus result. The Dutch and the French must be associated with it. As regards the Pacific islands, the United States, after their lavish expenditure of money in connection with the war, would expect their strategic position and security in the Pacific to be adequately safeguarded. He felt, himself, that if they captured individual islands which hitherto had been in the possession of the Japanese, there was no reason why, by arrangement, they should not hoist their own flag over them. It might well be that we should see a position in which a number of islands would be under a world body with varying classes of trusteeships, assigned to different States. The principle of bases going under the safeguard of the United Nations and thereafter held by a particular nation under one flag or another with a variety of arrangements for local dispositions was an important one.

MR. MACKENZIE KING drew attention to the importance of the part played by geography in finally deciding what should be done and how best it could be done. Canada was next door to the United States, and the result was that during the present war, when a common peril faced them, defence arrangements had become very closely interlocked. The Canadian Government had in fact established a permanent Joint War and Defence Board with the U.S.A. The use of the word "permanent" was significant in relation to the discussion that was now taking place. He felt a little doubt, himself, that this Board would remain in existence after the war. Certainly, Canada was anxious in present circumstances that it should do so. The two nations did their share in preventing the enemy from crossing each other's territories. For that reason, it might perhaps be possible to work out a stronger combination if we were careful not to make anything exclusive. Canada was able to bring the United States into co-operation with us as part of the British Commonwealth. The United States, on the other hand, were happy to have the British Commonwealth playing its part in the Pacific. It would be unwise in our ideas for a world organisation to over-emphasise the idea of a bloc, and it might be wiser to concentrate on how the most effective co-operation could be worked out.

MR. FRASER said that he must study the documents, which he had not had time to examine closely, before he could make any real contribution. But he thought them, on such perusal as he had been able to give them, a sincere and comprehensive effort to meet the situation in the light of experience and in the light of the history of the League and the lessons which had been learned from its working. There were one or two matters that would need close examination, in particular the regional proposals. It was not possible to get security in any region without world security.

He added that he found it difficult to see what the Council of Asia, proposed in Mr. Churchill's memorandum (P.M.M.(44) 5) could do without the risk of splitting up the world on the security issue. The proposed Asia Council looked to him rather like a replica, on a lower level, of the proposed World Council; and the Great Powers who would compose the World Council would be predominant in the Asia Council. We ought to consider what questions could with real advantage be referred to the Asia Council for settlement. The world was so linked up today that Africa, for example, had very close points of liaison and contact with certain parts of Asia. He was apprehensive that the multiplication of Councils might create rather than smooth out difficulties, and his own instinct was to concentrate on the proposed World Council.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that the meeting had before it a very interesting set of papers on the future world organisation prepared by the Foreign Office, and a very striking paper on somewhat different lines by the Prime Minister (P.M.M.(44) 5).

THE PRIME MINISTER said that while there were differences of emphasis and degree between his paper and the paper circulated by the Foreign Secretary, there was no difference of principle, and that the Foreign Secretary had, of course, seen his paper before it was circulated. There were certain points to which he personally attached great importance, in particular the idea of Regional Councils and the idea of a United States of Europe. But there was much in the two papers that ought to be read together.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that it was the emphasis given in the Prime Minister's paper which attracted him, and the stress which it laid on fundamental issues. The question of a world organisation involved, as he saw it, two great issues - the first, responsibility for taking effective action, and the second, the general organisation and function of the new system.

The League had been in principle a good body, and on the whole the scheme underlying it had been well thought out and had worked well. It had come to grief on the first point he had just mentioned, viz. taking responsibility for effective action when danger arose. Responsibility for effective action to see that peace was maintained must be definitely assigned. He liked Mr. Churchill's idea of saddling the World Peace Council, and especially the three Great Powers, with this responsibility. No scheme could be successful unless this issue was settled, and he favoured the allocation of this responsibility from the outset to the World Peace Council and to the three Great Powers. This idea was common to the Foreign Office papers and to the memorandum circulated by Mr. Churchill.

The second issue was the constitution and function of the new organisation. He had a good deal of sympathy with the regional suggestion which Mr. Churchill had put forward on this point, if the difficulties could be overcome. No difficulty arose in the case of the Americas. The unit that would embrace the Continent of Europe was the crux. What was Europe? Was it the Continent of Europe? Surely it was something more than that. Surely North Africa and the Middle East and the Arab world should be included in the Council of Europe. He doubted if we could take our stand merely on an area bounded by the boundaries of that Continent: a re-definition of this block would be needed.

MR. CHURCHILL said that what he had had in mind was the Powers of Europe.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS, continuing, said that Mr.Churchill's regional scheme had dealt with continents. But interests were so interlocked, and the overflow over continental boundaries was such, that he felt in the case of any European Council it would have to be considered whether North Africa and the Middle East and the Arab world would not have to be attached to it. Again, when we came to Asia it was really a question of the Pacific and of all countries that bordered on the Pacific. Examination of the composition of these units suggested therefore that their basis could not wisely be regarded as strictly continental.

Africa was something apart and he regarded it as a quite separate and special problem and he had nothing to say about it today. Apart from its north coast and the great areas held by the French in West Africa, it was really essentially a British interest. He did not overlook that it contained important Belgian and Portuguese colonies, but those countries were really in present conditions essentially appendages of the United Kingdom, and their African possessions so fell within the British sphere. Africa could on that assumption, with the exception of the substantial French areas, fall within the British sphere and need not be dealt with separately. But if other continents were to be considered as units, a re-definition would have to be considered. If something like that could be worked out satisfactorily, he would be inclined to favour the scheme of regional units which had been suggested by Mr. Churchill in his paper. On top of these regional units there would be a world body constituted from the three Great Powers. All this appealed to him, and he thought that it might well have a strong appeal to the United States which might be greatly attracted by the idea of an American block. In particular he greatly favoured the idea of a European group.

Field Marshal Smuts added that the organisation sketched in the Foreign Office paper followed the old League model, but with very great improvements. The League organisation had needed amendment in many important respects, and the line taken in the suggestions which the Foreign Office had laid before the meeting was in line with the trend of the best opinion as regards the world organisation. His tentative conclusion was that he would adopt the Foreign Office scheme, but would be inclined in doing so to stress the points taken in Mr. Churchill's separate memorandum, and in particular that responsibility for action would lie in the first instance with the Great Powers. It might be worth considering a closer welding together into a single structure of the suggestions contained in the Foreign Office memoranda and in the Prime Minister's note, though he recognised that, as the Prime Minister had explained, the difference between those two sets of papers was essentially one of emphasis.

MR. EDEN referred to the regional problem and to the proposals for Regional Councils which had been put forward in Mr. Churchill's memorandum. He said that the chief difficulty he saw in the working out of the regional plan, attractive as its conception was, was how to define the authority of these Regional Councils. Thus, would the European Council proposed by Mr. Churchill be the normal machine for dealing with European problems, and would the World Council be brought in to deal with those problems only exceptionally? Which would be the "top dog"?

His second question was what would be the composition of the European Council: Clearly it must contain the United Kingdom and Russia. Was there any risk that Russia might feel some doubts as to what might lie behind the proposed organisation and possibly some suspicion that it might be directed against her?

Finally, he asked what would be the position in relation to the European Council of the United States? That was a most important consideration. Ought we not to consider whether there were any dangers in the appeal which the idea of Regional Councils might make to the United States, and a risk that it might distract them from world problems.

MR. ATTLEE said that he was a little afraid that under this regional scheme the United Kingdom and Russia would be the only Great Powers in Europe. Between them would be a mass of smaller States gravitating into the orbit of one or the other. From that might arise a clash of the British and Russian styles of living. The United States might take the line that their interests were more in the Pacific, and that they could leave Europe to itself and to its Regional Council.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that it seemed to him essential that Britain and Russia should be members of any European Council. If they were not, the effect would be, at some point in the future, to hand over the Continent to Germany. He felt that the United States must also be associated with the European Council. He repeated that he liked the idea of the European Council since it was essential to stabilise Europe. Europe was in fact an entity, but it was most necessary in present conditions to restore self-respect to a Europe which was going to pieces.

MR. CHURCHILL said that his anxiety in regard to Europe was to safeguard the interests of the small States and preserve their individualities. The trend of Russian policy would be, he thought, to favour a large number of petty States, probably with a strong element of Communist influence, and susceptible to pressure from Russia through ideological contacts. He was anxious to see all the historic units on the continent of Europe retaining, so far as practicable, their separate individualities and not sinking to the position of satellites or subordinates of a Great Power. For that reason he would like to see them all sitting together in a Council of Europe, in which Russia and the United Kingdom would also be present with the United States, and which would try to give these smaller States a chance of life. The 16-unit concept of the U.S.S.R. was a formidable and carefully thought out conception, which he must frankly admit alarmed him, and which in some ways was as great a potential menace as Germany had been at an earlier stage. He was concerned also that Europe should be able to handle affairs of particular interest to her, without the need for States from South and Central America, or Siam, or China, which were unfamiliar with the nature and complexities of those problems, to be associated with their solution. And all this was of great importance to the Dominions, since unless some such arrangement could be come to they would again inevitably be drawn into wars arising from the terrible and deep-seated quarrels of Europe.

The World Peace Council would be concerned only with the keeping of peace. He had never suggested that it should interfere in any way with the sovereign independence of countries except for the purpose of preventing them from attacking each other. He hoped that we could develop a certain European consciousness. As to Russia, let us remember that we spoke of Russia in Europe and Russia in Asia.

In the Council of Asia the British Commonwealth would be strongly represented, and it would be its business to build up a machinery to prevent trouble arising with the yellow races. On the World Council there would be Britain and the United States whose interests could not clash. It would be seen that inside this scheme the British Empire would be represented beneficently on all these Councils. His object was to preserve the conscious identity of the small Powers, and for that the British Empire was a model.

MR. CURTIN suggested that we might be getting too deep into detail. He asked whether there was not a risk that by doing so we should give rise to suspicions that this was a plan to keep certain of our present Allies from becoming too strong, and thereby defeat the whole object which we had in view? The basis of the world organisation, as he saw it, was the three Great Powers which would have won the war and which would make it their responsibility to keep the peace. Washington, as he understood it, was pressing for a meeting to discuss the general question of an organisation to ensure peace. Surely the right plan was to enter those discussions without any formalised set-up as the view of the British Commonwealth, and to say that if for political reasons the United States thought that this was a favourable time to secure general United States adhesion which would commit both Parties even before the Election, we should be all in favour of their doing so. The less we complicated any such general scheme with issues such as regional dispositions, the more likely we should be to get the United States and Russia to agree to it. While he understood that the United States had asked for an exchange of documents and accepted that the Foreign Office papers did not carry us beyond the Moscow resolution, was there any risk that if we allowed the Foreign Office document to go out in advance of the proposed Washington Conference we might alarm the Russians. He would like to know whether the British spokesman at the official conference would speak for the United Kingdom only or for the Empire? If there was in fact a general consensus of views at the present meeting, it ought to be possible for us to reach a view in principle, knowledge of which would be of value to the British spokesman in the forthcoming conversations.

MR. BEVIN said that he felt that Europe would want to know the price of non-aggression. The last time the basis had been President Wilson's Fourteen Points. The answer might have a great influence on the masses of people in Europe.

MR. FRASER suggested that the Dominion Prime Ministers might take away and study the Foreign Office paper and the memorandum which Mr. Churchill had circulated, thereafter giving Mr. Eden their opinions in writing. Very grave issues were involved and further thought was needed; but the procedure suggested would enable the Foreign Secretary to send his representative to Washington with some knowledge of the mind of the Dominions on this issue.

MR. CURTIN suggested that the timetable would admit of the Dominion Prime Ministers consulting their Governments and formulating agreed views.

MR. CHURCHILL said that the first difficulty which His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom had to face was that they were under continual pressure in Parliament for their answer to the world problem, and that it was not possible to postpone an answer indefinitely, though he recognised the force of the point that had been taken as regards consultation by the Dominion Prime Ministers with their governments. Secondly, we could not take our stand entirely on generalities or expressions of goodwill - something more positive would be demanded here as well as for the forthcoming conversations in Washington. He had hoped himself that before this most important meeting, on which the eyes of the world were fixed, broke up we might be able to reach some general degree of tentative agreement among ourselves.

As regards the position of Europe, this was the storm centre, the place where the weather came from. It was essential therefore to take the greatest pains to make satisfactory arrangements for handling its problems, and, in particular, to give some life to the area west of a line running south from the Curzon Line to the Black Sea. If no provision was made for Europe we ran tremendous risks. He wished in that connection to touch on the interesting and important suggestion which Field Marshal Smuts had made at an earlier meeting, that Holland, Belgium and perhaps the Scandinavian Powers might be more closely associated with the United Kingdom. He had thought about that, but in the outcome he did not see how we could undertake such a responsibility. The fact that we were an island had saved us in the past: if we had to maintain a continental foothold, we would need a great standing army, which the people of this country would not be willing to maintain. He felt little doubt that the Dominion Prime Ministers would find themselves confronted with a similar reaction if there were in their country to be a demand for maintaining a substantial standing army for general security purposes. He could not ignore the probability that the United States Government would be under strong and continuous pressure from America to withdraw troops from Europe, and that after one Presidential election we might find there were no United States troops left in that continent. It was in those circumstances that he felt that one of our endeavours must be to build some entity in Europe and to give a sense of self-preservation to the countries of that continent. It must be remembered that at Tehran both Russia and the United States had been strongly in favour of the dismemberment of Germany.

Continuing, MR. CHURCHILL said that he attached the greatest importance to the three Great Armed Powers acting as a Peace Executive or Steering Committee. That was the essential difference between the scheme of the League of Nations and the present scheme, and the establishment of this Committee was the real remedy for the weakness that had proved fatal to the otherwise well thought out scheme of the League. Regional arrangements were of relatively secondary importance as compared with it, though he did attach great importance to regional arrangements. As for the division of responsibilities between the European Regional Council and the World Council, he thought some subjects would have to go before both. In a particular case he could conceive that the European Council, where it felt that there was a threat to peace which had come to its notice in Europe, would proceed to lay the case before the Supreme Peace Executive of the World Council. By the World Council, facts would be established, action taken and warning issued. If that warning was disregarded orders would be given to the States of the world to call up the forces which they were under obligation to provide against the offender. Once that great machine was set in motion, with the power at its disposal, he felt that there was little danger that a larger State would persist in action likely to lead to the breaking of the peace.

He had already made it clear that, under the World Peace Executive or World Council, he contemplated a World Assembly of which all States, other than the guilty States who had been responsible for and defeated in the war, would be members. That Assembly might perhaps establish sub-committees for the studying of the interests of particular regions.

What derogation from national sovereignty would be involved. In his scheme the only derogation was for the prevention of war. The scheme entrusted responsibility for preventing war to the three Great Powers at the top. But there was no question of the World Council, which those Powers composed, interfering with the internal affairs of any countries in the world or with their relations with one another, save only to such extent as those relations might threaten world peace. There would be no need, for instance, for treaties between countries, subject always to that reservation, to come before the World Council, and it was only if the World Council had reason to believe that a particular treaty or a particular action had in view or was likely to constitute a threat to world peace that there would be any question of its moving.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that the more he thought of the Regional Councils and the World Council the more he thought that very careful further consideration of this concept would be called for. He quite accepted the special position of Europe as Mr. Churchill had defined it. But the emphasis, if there was to be a Regional Council as well as a World Council, ought to be very strongly on the World Council, and anything done on the Regional Council ought beyond question to emanate from the larger World Council. If we began to build on the foundations of the Regional Council there was a real risk that we should develop a regional feeling. Public opinion in the United States and Canada would welcome a Regional Council for the Americas and Regional Councils for the other parts of the world, since they would construe such an arrangement as meaning that the Americas were safe and that they were rid of Europe and Asia and their problems. Nevertheless, he still felt that Regional Councils would serve a very good purpose, but the emphasis must be on the world organisation.

MR. FRASER thought that Mr. Churchill's suggestion for regional sub-committees of the World Assembly for studies of the interests of particular regions might well be the solution.

MR. BEVIN suggested the taking of power to establish regional bodies which would have responsibility delegated to them, and the letting of these regional bodies grow by experience. They might well grow into something of value, but the main constructive power should remain with the central organisation.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS thought that the real point was, as Mr. Churchill had said, the Steering Committee of the three Great Allied Powers, and that the regional aspect was secondary.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he assumed that by the three Great Allied Powers Mr. Churchill had in view the three Great Powers established during the war. During the war they in the Dominions had all accepted the leadership of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and of President Roosevelt. Would the World Council be composed of those countries or of something wider; would the United Kingdom or the British Commonwealth be the member? That raised a very big question.

On the matters that had been under discussion at this meeting, he felt himself that what was needed was the view of Dominion Cabinets rather than of Dominion Prime Ministers. To-day's discussion had brought out very well the issues involved. He thought that the wise course would be to take them up as soon as might be for consideration by Dominion Cabinets, and that the time-table for the Washington talks would enable this to be done.

MR. FRASER felt that if His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom were pressed in Parliament they could give the tentative opinion which United Kingdom Ministers had formed on the world organisation.

MR. CHURCHILL said that on the point taken by Mr. Mackenzie King, it would be a very serious thing if we could not be united when it came to the point. We must take some part in the arrangements designed to prevent the recurrence of wars, and he hoped that we would be able to agree on that. That was why he had been so concerned to keep the World Council a small body with the simplest possible composition. He suggested that in any event before the meeting of Dominion Prime Ministers concluded its deliberations, it would be desirable that the terms of some parting statement to cover the work that had been done should be considered. Immense attention was centred on these discussions; the meeting of Prime Ministers from so many parts of the world was the subject of the admiration and the watchful attention of the nations. A document should, he felt, issue which, while guarded and in general terms, should contain something of leadership.

MR. MACKENZIE KING entirely agreed and suggested that drafts should at once be prepared which could be considered by the Conference before it broke up. He was anxious that as long a time as possible should be given to the Dominion Prime Ministers to consider the draft in advance.

MR. CURTIN said he too agreed, and suggested that there might be formulated a consensus view of the observations previously made during this session. So far as the world organisation was concerned he still felt that we should be careful not to take a line that might lead to misunderstanding on the part of Russia. The wise course would be to formulate a statement of principles which could be adopted by this Conference, leaving the machinery of the world organisation to be worked out separately.

COLONIAL QUESTIONS

MR. CHURCHILL invited Colonel Stanley to open the discussion.

COLONEL STANLEY said that, while he did not know what other questions the Prime Ministers would wish to raise about Colonial matters, he expected they would want him to say something about the establishment of regional bodies in colonial areas. He recalled correspondence with Dominion Governments a year ago, when, he thought, general agreement on certain principles had been reached. Similar agreement in principle had been reached with the United States regarding our proposals for the establishment of regional colonial bodies. The divergence of opinion we had had with the United States had been over their proposal for the issue of a Colonial Declaration. This had recently been further discussed with Dr. Bowman of the U.S. State Department.

Since the exchange of telegrams a year ago with Dominion Governments, the position regarding regional commissions had developed in some directions. A year's further experience had been obtained of the working of the Caribbean Commission, which was in effect an embryo regional commission. The Australian and New Zealand Governments had made known, in their recent Agreement, their views regarding the establishment of regional commissions in the Pacific which we had welcomed as being in accord with our own.

COLONEL STANLEY regarded the establishment of these regional bodies as the most important development contemplated in the Colonial field, for the following reasons:-

(1) He thought they would be of real practical value. It was of the highest importance that the Commissions should achieve practical results, in order to allay possible suspicions on the part of the inhabitants of the more advanced territories. In the West Indies suspicion of the Caribbean Commission had been dispelled because, by concentrating on practical objectives, the Commission had been able to accomplish beneficial results which were obvious to all.

(2) He believed that the establishment of regional bodies with practical objectives in view would be an effective answer to the desire expressed in some quarters for the establishment of some form of international control of Colonial territories. So far as the British Empire was concerned, we had nothing to fear from criticism, and it was the intention to revert as soon as possible to the publication of full annual reports of our administration. But, while we welcomed constructive criticism, we were anxious to avoid ill-informed and academic interference.

He did not regard the mandate system as wholly satisfactory. It was out of date in the present day world, being largely negative in character, in that its aim was to lay down negative principles, e.g. the prevention of the use of forced labour. The system had served its purpose, but it had become more of a hindrance than an assistance. Large scale development was generally beyond the local resources of a colonial territory, and without any guarantee of permanency of sovereignty, the parent power was naturally reluctant to provide for large scale expenditure from its own funds. This had been brought home to him in a recent visit to West Africa where he had found that the Cameroons and Togoland were, for this reason, the most backward areas in the territories with which they were amalgamated. He therefore hoped that the mandate system would be abolished.

COLONEL STANLEY also pointed out the disadvantages he saw in the subordination of the proposed regional bodies to any central international organisation. Such a central organisation would contain representatives of powers who had no colonial experience and whose views on the subject could only be academic. In any case, control of colonial territories throughout the world would be a gigantic task and any supervision which was attempted by the central organisation could only be theoretical and superficial.

In his opinion, provision for third party opinion could best be made by the association with the regional commissioners of Powers which, although they had no direct interest by virtue of possession of territory in the area, were concerned because of strategic, economic or other interests. Such Powers would, he hoped, be prepared to assume a certain amount of responsibility in regard to the area.

(3) A third point was that any functional bodies established in connection with a central world organisation, such as the International Labour Office, should be encouraged to set up branches in the areas of the regional commissions to work in close co-operation with the commissions.

These were the main considerations we had in mind. Before action was taken to implement the proposals, they would require to be worked out in detail. Certain problems arose, for example:-

(a) Which areas were suitable for the establishment of regional commissions? In the Caribbean there was already an embryo organisation. In the South Pacific the Australian and New Zealand Governments had suggested another natural division. There was ample scope in South East Asia for the establishment of a commission. Africa presented more difficulties. He felt that the territories South of the Sahara presented too great and varied problems to be handled by one commission and that the solution might be the establishment of two or three bodies.

(b) Whether defence should be included in the scope of the functions of the proposed regional commissions? On further consideration he inclined to the view that it would be inappropriate to include defence. The areas suitable for the establishment of regional colonial commissions were not necessarily the most suitable areas for defence zones. Moreover bodies charged with defence responsibilities would require to exercise some form of executive powers or control, which in his opinion would be inappropriate in the case of regional colonial commissions.

(c) In what manner should the local inhabitants be associated with the regional commissions? This was not the least difficult of the problems which had to be faced. In the Caribbean it had not so far proved possible to find a representative of the local inhabitants acceptable to all the islands. No hard and fast rules could be laid down regarding the manner in which the local inhabitants should be represented on or associated with the regional commissions; this would have to be left open for decision in the light of local conditions.

MR. CHURCHILL said that Colonel Stanley had made a concise and cogent introduction to the subject. He invited his Dominion colleagues' views.

In reply to Mr. Curtin, COLONEL STANLEY explained that he contemplated the establishment of a regional commission in the South Pacific which would include New Guinea, the New Hebrides and Dutch New Guinea. He regarded Australia as the principal parent state in this area. United Kingdom territories would be represented by the High Commissioner for the Western Pacific. He assumed that France would be represented as parent state of New Caledonia.

MR. FRASER quoted the relevant portion of the Australian-New Zealand Agreement which read as follows:-

"The two Governments declare that, in applying the principles of the Atlantic Charter to the Pacific, the Doctrine of trusteeship, already applicable in the case of the mandated territories of which the two Governments are mandatory Powers, is applicable in broad principle to all colonial territories in the Pacific and elsewhere, and that the main purpose of the trust is the welfare of the native peoples and their social, economic and political development.

The two Governments agree that the future of the various territories of the Pacific and the welfare of their inhabitants cannot be successfully promoted without a greater measure of collaboration between the numerous authorities concerned in their control and that such collaboration is particularly desirable in regard to health services and communications, matters of native education, anthropological investigation, assistance in native production and material development generally.

The two Governments agree to promote the establishment at the earliest possible date of a regional organisation with advisory powers which could be called the South Seas Regional Commission and on which, in addition to representatives of Australia and New Zealand, there might be accredited representatives of the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States of America and of the French Committee of National Liberation."

Mr. Fraser pointed out that the Agreement omitted the Dutch. He understood that they would be willing to come in. MR. CHURCHILL said that they would certainly wish to be associated with any regional colonial body in the area.

MR. FRASER went on to point out that New Zealand, and he thought Australia too, desired above all else to see the United Kingdom play her full part in the Pacific. His country was willing to help to the utmost of its abilities and could, he thought, contribute in practical ways, e.g. health services.

MR. CURTIN explained that his Government had contemplated two areas for regional colonial commissions to the northward of Australia. The more northerly area might include S. East Asia and the Dutch East Indies, the southerly area might be delimited as suggested in the Australia-New Zealand Agreement. Mr. Curtin called attention to the welfare and social development of the native inhabitants as one of the primary objectives. In New Guinea the local inhabitants had proved themselves loyal. This was no doubt partly due to the excellent foundations of administration laid down by Sir Hubert Murray. But his information was that in the Dutch and Portuguese territories the position was not so good. The Japanese had received a certain amount of aid from the local inhabitants and he did not think that the same loyalty had been shown to the Dutch and Portuguese authorities as had been the case in British territories. Another aspect to which he would like to call attention was the opinion voiced by certain sections in the United States, typified by the recent senatorial mission, that the United States should hold on to territories re-occupied by American arms at the cost of American lives. While he - and he thought he could speak for Mr. Fraser too - would welcome the intrusion of United States influence between their countries and Japan, they did not wish this to occur at the expense of British territory, but at the expense of the Japanese and if need be the Dutch and the French. Australia and New Zealand had not the resources to cater for such far-flung defence lines as the Marshalls and the Carolines. He hoped that the United States would undertake responsibility in such areas, but at the same time his Government had felt that some declaration of its claim to have a full say in matters affecting their interest was called for. This had been one of the reasons underlying the Australia-New Zealand Agreement. He was not altogether happy about the possibility of allowing large colonial territories to remain the responsibility of weak parent states which had not the resources to provide adequately for defence. The position could not but remain precarious and, if the Japanese succeeded in building up their power again, it would become dangerous. For this reason he hoped that the United States could be persuaded to undertake definite defence commitments abutting on Malaya. Subject to these considerations he was in agreement with the general principles enunciated by Colonel Stanley.

MR. CHURCHILL pointed out that the future of the islands to which Mr. Curtin had referred was bound up with questions of strategic security. He contemplated that all islands removed from their original possessors should pass under the authority of the United Nations for strategic purposes. Some might be held by the United States in trust for the United Nations. In reply to questions regarding the precise nature of the sovereignty which the United States would exercise, Mr. Churchill said that he thought the matter should be approached as a question of high principle. All over the world there were islands of great strategic consequence. These would come under the authority of the world organisation and be allocated amongst the great powers, which would undertake strategic responsibilities to be carried out as a duty on behalf of the United Nations. The Azores and Dakar, for example, might come under the strategic control of the United States. In his view the United Kingdom should seek no territory. If pressed we might agree to undertake certain responsibilities in certain areas, but only on condition that the cost should be met from United Nations' funds.

He felt that the matter should be approached on high principles. The peace and safety of the world should be our object. But with the assumption of strategic responsibility, the Power concerned would also have to undertake to maintain certain standards of native well-being. There must be no question of despoiling the weak. The British Commonwealth was the only body of nations still in the struggle which had drawn the sword for honour alone. We must take care not to tarnish it. He would like himself to see some statement of the principles he had in mind made to the world.

MR. FRASER said that he entirely agreed with Mr. Churchill. The only honourable course was to approach the matter from the point of view of peace and safety for mankind. As regards the Marshall and Caroline Islands, they fell naturally into the United States sphere of responsibility. This suited New Zealand, as it safeguarded her outermost defence line. It should suit the United States as it secured their route to the Phillipines. He did not think that the United States would contemplate assumption of sovereignty. He thought that they would prefer to assume strategic responsibility on behalf of the United Nations as Mr. Churchill had suggested. He agreed with Colonel Stanley's remark that the United States probably hoped to have world absolution for occupation of the islands but did not wish world supervision. He felt that the objectives which they had in mind would be assisted by some statement on the lines Mr. Churchill had suggested. As regards areas in which regional commissions should be established, he hoped that provision would be made for Australian association with the more northerly area which had been mentioned, as Australian and New Zealand interests were involved as far north as Malaya. His Government would co-operate as fully as possible in the South Pacific where they were already contributing to the best of their ability towards the defence and development of the neighbouring British territories. In his opinion the Dutch and the French must be associated with the work of the commissions. One point on which he sought clarification was the manner in which it was proposed to ensure that a reasonable standard of administration was maintained, particularly in areas like Indo-China if restored to their former owners. He felt that there must be some central international body to which parent states should be required to report. For our part we had nothing to fear from such supervision, and the local inhabitants in other colonial territories would surely stand to gain.

COLONEL STANLEY explained that he contemplated an obligation being placed on colonial powers to make reports, but felt that the question of supervision could best be left on a regional basis.

In reply to questions by Mr. Fraser and Mr. Curtin, MR. CHURCHILL assured them that no change was contemplated in our sovereignty at Hongkong. It would, of course, be for the proposed World Council to indicate the points at which they considered it strategically necessary for facilities to be provided. At such points the parent Power or the Power which assumed responsibility on behalf of the United Nations would undertake the provision of such facilities as were required by the forces of the United Nations. In the Pacific the main burden must inevitably fall upon the United States.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS agreed with the policy outlined by Mr. Churchill and Colonel Stanley. It appeared to him to be the only wise and sensible course. As regards Africa, he would first call attention to the value of Madagascar and its magnificent harbour at Diego Suarez. How were we to apply the principles which had been described? Were we to hand back the island to France and inform her that the United Nations would regard her as responsible for the provision of facilities and for the safety of the island? He foresaw dangers in such a course and suggested that the interest of the United Kingdom and of his country in the future of the island was comparable to the United States' interest in Dakar.

MR. CURTIN agreed and said that the position was analagous to that of New Caledonia.

MR. CHURCHILL felt that the solution lay in supervision by the proposed World Council which would be empowered to address the French Government if necessary and request the provision of proper fecilities and defences. He recalled that at the time of the negotiations for the release of bases to the United States in the West Indies, his thought had been not so much of the immediate benefit to us in the shape of destroyers, but rather of executing an arrangement to the common advantage of two powers whose only concern was mutual security. These islands were only of strategic use to a power which wished to attack the United States or to the United States for her own defence. We had regarded the defence of the United States as part of our own safety. In Madagascar facilities could be claimed for fleets moving under the authority of the United Nations, and the French could be required to ensure that the island did not fall into the hands of possible aggressors.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that he would like to have the views of the naval and military authorities regarding the Madagascar problem. In Africa itself the only territories where a change of sovereignty would be called for were the former Italian colonies.

MR. CHURCHILL said that he had been careful not to commit himself to any suggestion that Italy should recover her overseas empire. He thought that the solution might lie in some of these territories being placed under the care of the proposed World Organisation which could delegate its authority and the responsibility for administration to powers of good repute.

COLONEL STANLEY pointed out that the Italians, having only a small overseas empire, had been able to spend money on development on a scale far exceeding that of which we were capable. The territories, which lacked resources, would be a considerable burden to any power undertaking their administration.

Comment was made in general discussion upon the manner in which Powers such as Italy had produced easily demonstrable results in the shape of roads, buildings and other public works in their territories, without any real endeavour to achieve progress towards freedom and social betterment for the native inhabitants.

COLONEL STANLEY remarked that the northern frontier of Kenya had been more peaceful during the Italian administration of Abyssinia than when that country was under the Emperor.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS reverted to the problem of parent states which lacked the resources to develop and defend their Colonial possessions and instanced Portuguese possessions in Africa. He assured Mr. Churchill that South Africa had no territorial ambitions in that direction.

MR. CURTIN raised the same question in regard to Dutch possessions in the East Indies.

MR. FRASER thought that the Dutch would be our most willing collaborators and MR. CHURCHILL said that he would be most unwilling to see them dispossessed. Mr. Churchill added that the proposed world organisation might be empowered to require any nation, which proved unable to maintain a reasonable standard of administration and defence, to place its colonial territory in trust and at the disposal of the United Nations. He agreed that the regional commissions would have responsibilities in this direction. He also agreed that we should seek the collaboration of Powers with real strategic and economic local interests in the work of the commissions, but he could not agree to any unwarranted interference in the affairs of the British Empire.

MR. FRASER thought that it was essential to make provision for reports on colonial administration to be submitted to and discussed by some central international body. Neither COLONEL STANLEY nor MR. CURTIN favoured this suggestion.

MR. CHURCHILL said he regarded the discussion which had taken place as remarkably valuable. A great measure of agreement had been reached. He thought that some expression of the principles they had so whole-heartedly accepted should find a place in the document which was to be issued as a result of their conferences. Perhaps Colonel Stanley would prepare, in consultation with the Dominion representatives and Lord Cranborne, a few carefully framed paragraphs which would bring out the high moral principles they had in mind, demonstrate the high spirit of unity within the British corporate body, re-assure the powerful peoples with whom we had to work about our intentions, hold out the light of hope to the unfortunate and the weak whom we wished to succour and lay stress on the all-important objectives of peace and security, law and order throughout the world.

Mr. Churchill's suggestion met with complete agreement and FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS suggested that a draft might be prepared by officials for consideration by Prime Ministers with a view to inclusion in a statement for publication at the conclusion of the conference. MR. CURTIN added that in his view this statement should deal with all the subjects they had discussed. It might begin with the conduct of the war and what the British Commonwealth would do to ensure victory, deal with the future of the world and what the British Commonwealth was prepared to do to prevent further wars, suggest machinery for achieving these objects, including the well-being and security of backward peoples, and make some reference to the machinery for collaboration within the British Commonwealth for these purposes. This last subject would not, of course, be discussed until further discussion on the nature of the post-war settlement had taken place.

Programme of Meeting

After discussion, it was agreed that the item - Defence Co-operation within the British Commonwealth - should be postponed until further discussion on the nature of the post-war world settlement had taken place, and that the item - Transport and Communications - should form the Agenda for the meeting on the following day at 5.30 p.m.

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX, Minute 2.

SHIPPING

LORD LEATHERS referred to the paper which he had circulated - P.M.M.(44) 6 - summarising a number of important points in the shipping position. Post war shipping policy must be considered first in relation to the transitional period and, secondly, in its long-term aspects. In the transitional period, His Majesty's Government in the U.K. felt that it was essential to retain control of shipping if we were to meet the requirements of the war with Japan. An outline of the plan was already in the hands of the other Commonwealth Governments, and he hoped to be able to submit it shortly to the Allied Governments.

As regards long-term policy, the position was not yet sufficiently clear to enable him to formulate any definite proposals and it would be wise to postpone final decisions until later. There were, however, a number of points of interest, on certain of which he had touched in his note:-

United Nations' Control of Shipping and Shipbuilding Facilities of ex-Enemy Countries

We had ourselves in the pre-war period scrupulously observed the rules of fair play, but the enemy countries had not reciprocated. This was a point which must be borne in mind when we were making our plan.

It was proposed that during the transitional period enemy shipping should be put under the complete control of the Allies. If what were now enemy States were then to be allowed to own and operate ships, it should be under a code of rules of fair play which would prevent a recrudescence of this unfair competition.

Utilisation of Tonnage Built During the War

He had in mind, in particular, the large surplus tonnage in the United States which by the end of 1944 would probably have 3½ times as much tonnage as in 1939, and a dead weight of say 47½ million tons or 33½ million gross registered tonnage. The United States was likely to offer some portion of that surplus tonnage to the United Nations, although we had not yet got far on that subject. Possibly, a biggish block of 'Liberty' ships might come to us after the smaller Allies had been dealt with, but until there were more definite indications of the intentions of the U.S.A. there was little that could usefully be said. We should ourselves be faced with a very considerable shipping shortage. He would welcome any suggestions in this connection by the Dominion Prime Ministers.

Reconstitution of Fleets of Maritime Powers

We should have a programme of reconstruction and development for shipping registered in the Commonwealth, on both economic and defence grounds. The amount of tonnage now building here would go only a very small way towards replacement.

Re-establishment of Shipping Services on an Economic Basis

He suggested that the general aim of the Governments of the British Commonwealth should be to enable British shipping to provide the Commonwealth and other parts of the world with efficient shipping services at a competitive price. Before the war, the Liner Conferences had played a useful part in this connection. He had it in mind that we should re-establish that system.

LORD LEATHERS added that he had said nothing in paper about Air Transport. He recognised that the development of air travel might create a new form of passenger traffic, but he was not at this stage disposed to think that air transport would make a big inroad into passenger traffic by sea.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that all Lord Leathers had said commended itself very strongly to him. The Canadian Government welcomed the initiative taken for providing for orderly shipping in the transitional period. The Canadian Government had an Advisory Committee on Shipping which he would like to consider the points raised by Lord Leathers, after which a carefully considered opinion could be formulated. He agreed that post-war Commonwealth shipping policy could best be taken up at a later stage by Governments. LORD LEATHERS said that the lines between Canada and Australia might want some financial support. It was very desirable that these lines should be run. Nothing that he had said would rule out such support.

MR. CURTIN said that the Australian Government would endorse the views expressed in Lord Leathers' memorandum in their entirety. He wished to mention certain points, though not in contradiction to the views expressed in that memorandum. They were as follows:-

(a) It was essential for Australia to maintain an adequate mercantile marine. This involved the continuation of the Australian Navigation Act which reserved Australian coastal traffic to Australian ships.

(b) Australia must have her share in shipping services between Australia and the Pacific, and the Netherlands East Indies and Malayan areas. Before the war there had been a good deal of alien infiltration in these areas, and it represented a menace to security, as well as being undesirable economically. Australia proposed to continue to develop shipbuilding, both by way of developing her mercantile marine and as a measure of security. She must be sure of ships and must have continually available skilled craftsmanship and capacity to repair ships of war and ships of the mercantile marine, which could only be guaranteed by the continual provision of work of that nature in Australia.

(c) She must be self-reliant so far as possible as regards repair and building facilities.

(d) It was essential to maintain British shipping, especially in the Pacific and the Far East.

(e) And also to maintain shipping communications at reasonable rates between the various Empire countries. In the pre-war period the rates had been extremely high.

(f) The speed of communications between the U.K. and the distant Dominions should be increased. There had been no increase that mattered over the last forty years.

LORD LEATHERS referred to the extent to which 20 knot ships had been built over the last 10 or 15 years and expressed his surprise that the position should be as represented by Mr. Curtin. He undertook to examine the matter.

MR. CURTIN went on to say -

(g) There should be no discrimination against the flag of any country which did not discriminate against the British flag. Australia had been a party to the 1923 Convention and would like that Convention revived, if necessary, as part of the general shipping policy of the United Kingdom.

(h) There should be co-operation with the I.L.O. on the matter of seamen's accommodation. That accommodation was still very far from being what it ought, and the war service of seamen had given them a strong claim to consideration. Coloured seamen could be employed, if paid Australian rates.

(j) He was strongly in favour of the revival of the Imperial Shipping Committee.

(k) We should ensure conditions under which the shipping of the world could be efficiently and economically carried out, and ensure the best conditions of employment possible.

MR. CURTIN added that, though he had urged the importance of air power in the discussions on that subject, sea power was indispensable, for the trade which the units of the Empire had to carry. We should get the best we could out of the developments in the air without sacrificing sea power.

MR. FRASER said that British Services between Pacific Coast via Honolulu, Fiji and New Zealand and Australia were long-established, and for many years had been maintained entirely by New Zealand enterprise. It was essential that a British main line of communication should be re-established both for trade and travel, and as a means of assuring the existence of a national shipping asset providing also employment for ship construction in Great Britain and for Colonial manning on service.

Pre-war British Trans-pacific trade comprised

(i) LINER,
(ii) CARGO SERVICES.

The former was represented by the C.A. Line - four-weekly service between Vancouver, B.C. and Honolulu, Suva, Auckland, Sydney. This important "all red" Liner service was the subject of close examination by the British Governments concerned vis-a-vis U.S.A. State aided competition immediately before the war, when "pencilled" agreement was understood to have been reached for a comparable British project involving Government financial assistance combined with Company capital.

He strongly recommended that this proposal be revived on a modified basis. It should provide ships which - having regard to the future carriage of first class mail at high speed by air, - ought to have a speed of, say, 18/19 knots to cover the proposed schedule (including Melbourne). Provision should be made for fewer passengers, say, 300/350, with rather simpler accommodation than previously planned.

The Trans-pacific distance of 7,500 nautical miles Vancouver/Melbourne at liner speed would involve two vessels costing more post-war than private enterprise could provide from the limited revenues accruing from that paid for requisitioned tonnage and the enhanced cost of replacement building would also require special attention.

U.S.A. Trans-pacific liner policy will be an important factor, since there was a limit to the total likely traffic, and it would be desirable to know whether the U.S.A. approach to the South Pacific problem would be that of equal frequency, i.e., 50/50 British and American, each running separately.

If pre-war U.S.A. Pacific Liners survived, America would have at hand larger and faster vessels than British interests will likely be able to afford, and U.S.A. present Naval transport building promises further to supplement this type of ship. Consequently some measure of understanding between British and American Governments should be secured, to which end an agreed British Commonwealth attitude would be helpful.

As regards Cargo Services, such as were previously provided by Union Line with vessels manned in New Zealand, it would probably take a little while to determine what commodities required to be carried post-war between the countries concerned. This traffic would probably be handled by vessels of lesser speed and lower cost and the service would probably be within the scope of private enterprise. There was, however, an important competitive element present in the shape of some seven Swedish vessels which were invited into the Trans-Pacific trade to serve principally Australian war needs. These are running in relatively safe waters and earning large sums for their Owners who were enjoying all the fruits of neutrality. It was to be hoped that since they have been very well paid for whatever they have done, some steps can be taken to discourage their growing influence in this cross trade, which should normally be shared by U.S.A. and British interests.

He desired strongly to support what Mr. Curtin said about the conditions of living of seamen. The New Zealand Government attached great importance to this for many reasons. One result of the improvement of conditions was to increase the self-respect of sailors. An improvement meant a revolution in their social standards.

He wished to add that negotiations had been proceeding with the United States in relation to their claim that Hawaii fell within the definition of coastwise traffic. A Bill had been approved for introduction into the New Zealand Parliament but had not yet been granted. The New Zealand Government had hinted that they were quite ready, if the United States maintained their attitude, to treat the trans-Tasman traffic as coastwise traffic. As regards the future, New Zealand was ready to co-operate in every possible way. The sea was of more fundamental importance to her than even to Australia, and no country depended more on the sea than did New Zealand. He supported the proposal to carry on negotiations with the United States and hoped that they would prove reasonable.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that it was clear that there would be a greatly increased United States mercantile marine after the war. Shipping was basic to the prosperity of the Empire. Was there any risk that the United States would cut in on our old routes? In South Africa the United States had, for example, cut out the United Kingdom in the motor trade, and had built themselves an impregnable position. It would be a very serious matter were they to do the same over marine transport.

SIR FIROZ KHAN NOON said that the prosperity of India's import and export trade was largely dependent on the strength of British shipping which carried all her international trade, coastwise trade being largely Indian. What was the policy of His Majesty's Government in the U.K. for maintaining the British Merchant Navy? Did they mean to have state owned shipping or subsidies to private enterprise?

LORD LEATHERS said that no decision had yet been taken on that point by His Majesty's Government in the U.K. who were postponing consideration of these problems until they put forward full plans for the post war period.

SIR FIROZ KHAN NOON enquired whether it would not be possible, given the extent to which the United States were now pressing for reverse lend-lease, for His Majesty's Government to aim at retaining any United States mercantile marine units that had been made available to us.

LORD LEATHERS said that no American ships had been handed over to us, except under charter for the war period. We were under obligation to return these under the terms of the understanding, and no analogy could be drawn with lend-lease goods.

MR. AMERY said that the United States had derived great advantages in the Pacific by subsidy and by their interpretation of cabotage. He felt much sympathy with the idea that New Zealand and Australia might, if the Americans did not behave reasonably in this matter, treat their coastal traffic as one.

MR. MACKENZIE KING pointed out that shipping depended upon trade. We should not overlook the great importance to shipping of an international commercial policy as liberal as could be devised.

LORD LEATHERS replying said that on the point raised by Mr. Amery, up to now all flags had been allowed to use our coast and we had not claimed Colonial cabotage. So far this policy had worked out with advantage to this country. It might well be that the matter might need further scrutiny, but he would prefer to leave matters as they were until it could be seen what sort of arrangements would emerge with the United States.

As regards Field Marshal Smuts' point, he was not unduly concerned at the risk that the United States might cut in on our old routes. Their operating costs were nearly double those of European shipowners, and they could not, therefore, hope to compete with a great number of ships without a large subsidy. The employment of cheap Asiatic labour was not open to them. There was a difference of view in the United States as regards the development of their mercantile marine. Realising that there was an anxiety in some quarters in the United States to develop it he had tried so to shape his course that any such expansion should be a share in the services which the enemy had run before the war. Moreover, there had been a very big increase in the United States Navy, which felt that it would have to operate much more away from shore bases than in the past. That, under the United States organisation, required and would require a very large number of merchant ships. That would tend to reduce the number of ships available for regular merchant service use at the end of the war, because apart from the post-war needs of the Navy, those which were surplus to Naval uses would require structural alterations, which might be very costly. He felt that we should be able to reach an agreement with the United States in respect of a great deal of this surplus shipping. We should not overlook, incidentally, that if we did take over a large block of merchant shipping from the United States, the effect on our ship-building industry would be serious. These matters must be kept in a measured relationship. The whole position was fully under review and he would be glad to report progress from time to time.

1. CIVIL AVIATION

C222755

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL reviewed developments in relation to post-war arrangements for Civil Aviation and in particular gave an account of the recent discussions with Mr. Berle of the United States State Department. It was clear from those discussions that the United States Government would not accept any plan for the international operation of trunk routes. Further, they were not prepared to subscribe to the principle of international control of air services by an international air authority on the lines of the plan worked out in the Draft Convention recently prepared by the Canadian Government. Mr. Berle had agreed that the outline plan adopted at the British Commonwealth discussions last autumn would be used as the basis for future international discussions, but it seemed clear that the United States would wish to interpret that plan in the sense of securing the greatest possible measure of freedom from control. Mr. Berle had also accepted the principle that cabotage traffic between e.g. the United Kingdom and the Colonial Empire could be reserved.

The Lord Privy Seal suggested that in the light of the above the next steps should be to pursue the course of international discussions in the hope of securing general agreement to some form of international control and at the same time to prepare, in technical discussions between competent authorities, a plan for the establishment of a British Commonwealth air route.

In the course of subsequent discussion the following points were made:

(1) It was important for Australia and New Zealand that a British air route should be opened across the Pacific. For this purpose an effort should be made to reach agreement with the United States for landing rights, etc., at Honolulu, on a basis of reciprocity with United States services to Australia and New Zealand. Alternative routes could be explored, but the stages involved appeared to be so long as to prevent the carriage of an adequate pay load.

(2) Plans should also be made for the re-opening, when practicable, of the pre-war route via Singapore, in which India would wish to participate on equal terms.

(3) The Canadian Government were still engaged in examining the various possibilities. They would wish to participate in international air services through the medium of their chosen instrument - Trans-Canada Airways. They had agreed that each country or group of countries in the Commonwealth should take responsibility for developing the air routes important to them. They had not contemplated handing over such routes in which they were interested to a joint operating body.

(4) It would be necessary to pay attention to the subsidy costs involved, since, at any rate as far as Australia was concerned, the cost of the essential internal air services would not leave any substantial margin available for subsidising external services.

IT WAS AGREED:-

That the next step would be to endeavour by international discussions to secure agreement for as substantial a measure of international control as appeared practicable. Meanwhile arrangements should be made for discussions between experts for drawing up plans for British Commonwealth and Empire Air routes.

2. SHIPPING

THE MINISTER OF WAR TRANSPORT referred to his paper circulated as P.M.M.(44) 6 and briefly amplified the main points made therein.

In the course of subsequent discussion the following points were made:-

(1) General agreement was indicated with the proposed short-term plan and with the principles suggested in P.M.M.(44) 6 for dealing with long-term policy.

(2) Great appreciation was expressed of the services rendered by the Merchant Navy during the war. Emphasis was laid on the need for improvement of accommodation for seamen on board ship. It was suggested that there should be co-operation with the I.L.O. on maritime labour questions.

(3) The Australian Government attached great importance to the maintenance of an adequate Australian merchant navy and shipbuilding and ship-repairing industry. For this purpose it would be necessary to maintain the reservation of the coastal trade to Australian ships.

(4) Reference was made to the importance of improving the speed of shipping on the route to Australia.

(5) Reference was made to the possibility that the immense quantity of shipping which the United States would have available at the end of the war might be used to enter trades in which British shipping had previously been engaged. On the other hand it was hoped that it would be found practicable to come to some reasonable arrangement with the United States Government for the disposal of their surplus shipping. In any case United States operating costs were high in comparison with British costs, and, with greater efficiency, there was good ground for hope that British shipping could hold its own.

(6) It was suggested that the Imperial Shipping Committee should be revived.

IT WAS AGREED:-

That the suggestions made in the paper P.M.M.(44) 6 would afford a suitable basis for further inter-governmental discussions as occasion arose.

The "Diario de Lisboa" of the 6th May under the headline "Gil Robles replies to the Accusations of 'A.B.C.' " publishes the following statement.

[Begins].

Gil Robles, the former Spanish political chief, who has been living in our country for some years made the following statement to us to-day:-

For the first time in nearly eight years of residence in Portugal I am appealing to the good offices of the Portuguese press to explain my attitude in relation to a report published in the morning papers, quoting an extract from an article in the "A.B.C." of Madrid in which I am described as a traitor and the request is made that I should be deprived of my nationality.

Had it not been for this public attack, I should have persisted in my attitude of abstaining from public affairs out of respect for the noble welcome which Portugal has given me in days of misfortune. I am not going to refute in the columns of the "Diario de Lisboa" the absurd accusations which, under the protection of a complete monopoly of freedom of expression, a newspaper of my country makes against me. I am only concerned to make it clear that as soon as I know the terms of the article - of which the only knowledge I have is from a telegram of the German Agency D.N.B. - I propose to appeal to Generalissimo Franco to submit all my past political activities during and after the National Movement to whatever examination and judgment he may consider appropriate. Before world opinion, I ask to appear together with my accusers before whatever judge or court, ordinary or extraordinary subject to one condition only:- the greatest liberty and publicity for both the accusation and the defence. This is all that I wish to say to-day in defence of my honour".

Similar statements are published in the morning papers of May 7th.

The D.N.B. report to which Snr. Robles refers is published as follows in the "Seculo" of May 6th.

[Begins].

Madrid, 5. The former leader of the Popular Catholic Action, Gil Robles, is described as traitor to the country in an article in the "A.B.C." which asks that he should be deprived of his Spanish nationality. The article refers to statements published by the Argentine daily paper "Ahora" together with the statements made by the emigré politicians of the Left, Madariaga, Araquistan and Ossorio y Gallardo. In all these declarations, the government of Franco is attacked in an ignoble manner.

The Spanish paper refers to the "moral inferiority of Gil Robles, who, at the moment in which the electors had greatest need of him, in the month of June 1936, fled to Biarritz, to place himself in safety, in order to see who was winning. The "A.B.C." adds that Gil Robles is especially to blame for having furnished the electoral lists of the Catholic Action to the Spanish Soviets, with the result that the assassination of many electors by the Bolsheviks was due to him.

Your telegram No.58.

During visit of Commander-in-Chief Middle East to Ibn Saud, the latter raised the question of Military Mission and stated that he was anxious to have someone to assist his son Amir Mansour in placing the Saudi Arabian army on a more modern footing. He insisted on Sunni Moslem officers because in the course of their duties they would have to visit the holy places of Mecca and Medina. He emphasised his request for Sunni Moslems since Moslems of any other sects whose religious practices were different from those of his countrymen might create friction. He realised the difficulty of finding suitable persons in wartime but hoped that we would be able to supply even three or four suitable officers soon.

2. The Commander-in-Chief's only comment was that we were examining the matter sympathetically.

3. I fear that it will be difficult to persuade Ibn Saud to accept any Christian instructors either British or American and I doubt the wisdom of trying to do so in view of his attitude over even different Moslem sects.

Madrid telegram No. 727 to Foreign Office.

In my opinion there are two separate questions at issue.

(a) closure of the German Consulate-General and

(b) departure of German personnel.

2. I submit "functioning" of the German Consulate-General should cease immediately, that the flag and shield should be removed and that all the Consulate official activities should be suppressed.

3. As to the departure of personnel, I submit that should take place within a maximum of a fortnight from to-day.

4. It is the continued functioning of the Consulate-General which is so galling to all the Allies here and which is doing us so much harm in the prestige line and also the knowledge that both the Spaniards and the Germans are laughing at us. It would be a calamity from our local standpoint if the German Consulate-General were to continue tofunction until the end of May.

5. As for "impatience" of General Orgaz to take action in this matter, I am convinced that he will delay action as much as he possibly can.

6. I hope to see General Orgaz again on May 15th.

PRINCIPLES OF WORLD ORGANISATION

Draft Directive for U.K. representatives at Washington Discussions

In the light of the discussion at the meeting of Prime Ministers on Tuesday, the 9th May, it is suggested that the following Statement of Principles should be given to the United Kingdom representatives for guidance in the proposed informal discussions with United States and Russian representatives regarding plans for setting up a future world organisation.

(1) The essential aim is the establishment of a world organisation for the maintenance of peace and security on the basis of the continued collaboration of the United States, the U.S.S.R. (and possibly China) with the British Commonwealth.

(2) It is essential that the central organisation should ~~possess~~ and be prepared to use adequate force for this purpose.

(3) Regional political organisations should be constituted under the aegis of a world political organisation. Their exact functions might differ as between region and region.

(4) Details of world organisation should be considered in the light of the above.

Covering Note to Memorandum prepared for Discussion with the Dominion Prime Ministers.

IN Article 4 of the Moscow Declaration of November 1943 the Four Powers state—

> " that they recognise the necessity of establishing at the earliest practicable date a general international organisation, based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving States, and open to membership by all such States, large and small, for the maintenance of international peace and security."

2. When the Declaration was discussed at the Moscow Conference Mr. Hull suggested that it might be signed at a later date by the other United Nations. M. Molotov subsequently proposed that a Commission of the Three Powers should be formed to study Article 4 of the Declaration. At a later session Mr. Hull suggested " an informal understanding to acquire material for constituting the Commission," and in reply to M. Molotov agreed to an " unofficial Commission." He added, " that they could gradually select persons to work together and decide on the peace : sometimes in Moscow, sometimes London, sometimes in Washington." Mr. Hull emphasised the secrecy which should surround such discussions. Agreement was incorporated in the Secret Protocol of the Moscow Conference, para. 2 (b), as follows :—

> " It was recognised as desirable that representatives of the United States of America, the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union should conduct in a preliminary fashion an exchange of views on questions connected with the establishment of an international organisation for the maintenance of international peace and security, the intention being that this work should be carried out in the first instance in Washington, and also in London and Moscow."

3. On the 19th November, 1943, a note was received from the United States Chargé d'Affaires in London suggesting, on instructions from the State Department, that the Four Powers should announce that they would welcome the adherence of all peace-loving States to Article 4 of the Declaration. A corresponding communication was made to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and China. In reply His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom suggested that this step was premature in view of the agreement at Moscow to have preliminary Three-Power discussions. The Dominions were informed of the proposal, and the Canadian Government in particular thought that a longer document should be prepared before the signature of the other United Nations was invited. The United States Government accepted the British suggestion and the Soviet Government also, though the latter had agreed to the original United States proposal. The United Kingdom and United States Governments exchanged agenda for the Washington discussions which were communicated to the Soviet Government, and the United States Government suggested a preliminary exchange of papers. Subsequently the United Kingdom Government proposed that memoranda should be written on the five main topics enumerated below. The United States Government agreed that our papers should be written on these topics, though their own might have somewhat different titles. The Soviet Government also agreed generally to the suggested procedure, reserving the question of priority of topics. The five topics are as follows :—

A. Scope and nature of an international organisation.
B. Guarantees and the pacific settlement of disputes.
C. Security.
D. Co-ordination of economic and political international machinery.
E. Method and procedure for establishing a world organisation.

4. These, therefore, are the subject headings of the accompanying Memoranda, which are designed, subject to any observations on the part of the Dominion Prime Ministers, to be handed to the Americans and Russians. An attempt has been made to sketch the outline of a workable World Organisation in the light of experience of international institutions. The proposals do not provide a complete solution of all the problems discussed because many of the premises on which such conclusions could be based do not yet exist. It is suggested, however, that our first aim should be to bring the World Organisation into existence. When it has been established, it should be able to find out by its own experience the methods by which international problems may be solved.

5. The Organisation suggested has much in common with the Covenant of the League of Nations and, in accordance with the expressed intention of the Prime Minister, it tries to retain all the best features of its predecessor. But it is meant to be more flexible, less bound by rigid definitions which hamper or prevent necessary action, and above all endowed with the machinery to make action effective. In short, our plan is based on the acceptance of certain essential principles and we leave the means by which these principles shall be carried out to be adapted to the varying circumstances of human intercourse which cannot be foreseen.

6. It is thus that the institutions of Britain and the Commonwealth have grown, and it is this method that their peoples will best understand. Our method of approach may possibly make less appeal to the more legally minded people of the United States, who attach so much importance to the details of a written constitution, or to the Russians, whose way of thinking is very different from our own, or to the peoples of the Continent of Europe, who have a different system of law and have always desired explicit undertakings no matter how often they have been broken. But, though changes may have to be made to meet these points of view, we believe that something like what we suggest represents the maximum of effective international co-operation that can be secured at the present time.

7. The most essential point is to obtain an organisation embracing the United Kingdom and the other Members of the British Commonwealth, the United States and the U.S.S.R., and, it might perhaps be added, France. This, therefore, should be our primary object and no minor consideration should be allowed to stand in its way.

8. The establishment of a centre where the policies of the principal States of the world can be harmonised is in the great tradition of British policy, and we believe that the present proposals carry on a development which was supported by Castlereagh, Palmerston, Salisbury and Grey before the last war and by Lord Balfour, Sir Austen Chamberlain and Mr. Arthur Henderson in the period between the wars.

9. We attach great importance to the establishment of some permanent machinery by which rapid and effective action may be taken against any threat to world peace. The world has seen so many promises broken that faith in the new institution can only be obtained if the means of action are visible, and will, perhaps, only be confirmed after such action has taken place.

10. It is essential to the interests of the British Commonwealth that the Organisation should be world-wide. We have, therefore, subordinated the creation of regional organisations to this end. But we believe that in due course regional organisations (which will probably develop naturally) may play an important part in the world and that if they are suitably guided within the World Organisation their advantages will outweigh their disadvantages.

11. In Memorandum A we have assumed that the World Council will consist of the Four Powers and a number of other States. We have left open the method by which these States are chosen because we think that it would be premature to put forward a cut-and-dried scheme at this stage. We have not even laid down the principle that one of the members of the Commonwealth other than the United Kingdom should always have a place on the World Council. Such a demand may very likely provoke a counter demand from the Soviet Government that one of the constituent republics of the U.S.S.R. should always have a seat on the World Council. Whether it can be ensured that another British Commonwealth country in addition to the United Kingdom shall always have a place on the Council must obviously depend on the number of Council members. But we recognise that it should be our object to obtain this result.

12. We have also left open the questions of the Secretariat and the seat of the Organisation, problems closely interrelated. They raise issues on which it is likely to be difficult to come to an agreement and we think that it would be better to postpone them to a later stage of the discussions.

13. Under our proposals, great power would rest in the hands of the World Council. It would, for instance, take the initiative in action to maintain peace, and other members would be bound to follow its decisions. We have, however, left open the question of placing permanently a special responsibility on the Great Powers for the maintenance of international peace and security. By doing so the association of the United States in the burden would be more explicitly obtained, but it may well be possible to secure that advantage without such definition as might seem to imply too great a recognition of the position of the Great Powers in the Organisation.

14. We have not mentioned the Colonial question and prefer to leave it to the United States Government to raise the question if they so desire.

15. In Memorandum B the machinery for the pacific settlement of disputes and the maintenance of peace and security has been made as flexible as possible. The members of the British Commonwealth have always been opposed to such guarantees of territorial integrity and political independence as those contained in Article X of the Covenant. Our proposals contain three main propositions :—

(i) That the members of the Organisation shall promise to settle all disputes in such a manner as not to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security without, however, guaranteeing the territorial integrity and political independence of member States. (We have attempted in this manner, so far as can be done at the present stage of international relations, to throw the balance rather more in the direction of change.)
(ii) That the World Council shall be given the initiative to take action for the maintenance of peace and security. (It is only in this way that machinery can be set up to make the promises of the members effective.)
(iii) That action by the Organisation shall be based on principles rather than on elaborate definition (which we believe defeats its own purpose.)

16. In Memorandum C we have merely edited in a form suitable for communication to the Americans and Russians the two papers already blessed by the Chiefs of Staff as suitable to be used as a basis for discussions. The way is thus left open to utilise existing machinery for co-operation in military matters if it is found possible to do so at the end of the war. We have suggested that the members should be prepared to place military forces at the disposal of the World Council, by which means we hope the burden on the Members of the British Commonwealth may be reduced.

17. We have only made a passing reference to the regulation of armaments, which the United States Government have placed on their list of topics. But our own proposals would enable this country eventually to deal with this question constructively as part of the process for sharing the burden of the armaments necessary to maintain international peace and security, rather than by the negative means of limitation of armaments by scales and numbers.

18. In Memorandum D we have endeavoured to find a method of giving the necessary co-ordination to the new and untried economic and technical organisations without depriving them of the necessary control over their own actions. Here again the questions of organisation must be worked out in the light of experience, but it is essential that these institutions should be co-ordinated in order that the problems of full employment and the proper use of resources may be solved.

19. The United States Government will naturally decide for itself the best methods by which an international organisation can secure the assent of Congress. But we have put forward the proposals contained in Memorandum E as an assistance to their thinking on this subject, and we attach considerable importance to choosing the right method of associating other States with the work of the Four Powers.

20. Before Memoranda A to E are given to the United States and Soviet Governments, we should like to feel sure that other British Commonwealth Governments agree that these papers are on the right lines as a basis for the preliminary and informal discussions, which it is hoped will take place at Washington at the end of May or early in June. It is suggested in Memorandum E that the aim of the Washington talks should be to reach a measure of agreement which could find expression in a Draft Declaration to be referred to Governments and subsequently published. It is contemplated that the progress made in the Washington talks would be the subject of further consultation between British Commonwealth Governments before any such declaration were published.

MEMORANDUM A.

SCOPE AND NATURE OF THE PERMANENT ORGANISATION.

I.—The Principles and Objects of the Organisation.

1. The World Organisation will consist of independent States freely associated and working together for the better realisation of the common good of mankind.

2. The principles and objects of the Organisation should be stated in the preamble of the document which brings it into existence. The Organisation should be as simple and flexible as possible. Thus the statement of its principles and objects becomes specially important, since they lay down the conditions in which action is taken by the members of the Organisation.

3. Article 4 of the Moscow Declaration lays down that the Organisation shall be based on the "sovereign equality" of States. Two principles follow from these words. In the first place members must agree to respect each other's political independence, and secondly all members enjoy equality of status, though not necessarily equality of function.

4. Members should not be entitled to receive the benefits of the Organisation unless they are prepared to accept the obligations that go with them. Moreover, it is the assumption of such obligations by all members that ensures to all the benefits of the Organisation. This should be recognised, therefore, as one of the principles of the Organisation.

5. The object of the Organisation is stated in Article 4 to be the "maintenance of international peace and security," and this must be regarded as its primary purpose.

6. But if recourse to violence is ruled out, means must be provided by which members of the Organisation can settle their disputes by other than violent methods; and the establishment of machinery for achieving this must be one of the objects of the Organisation.

7. Moreover, in order that international peace and security shall be maintained there must be in the world some means by which States meet together to review and harmonise their political action. One of the objects of the Organisation, therefore, must be to create a meeting place where statesmen can come together for that purpose.

8. But international peace and security must be made positively, and not only kept by the negative means of suppressing violence. They will be confirmed and strengthened by guarding the right of man to seek his freedom, and by increase in the well-being of human society. Statesmen of the United Nations have declared this to be both the purpose and the condition of development in international order.

9. It will be necessary, therefore, for the Organisation to create institutions to promote the betterment of world-wide economic conditions and the removal of social wrongs, and to support and extend institutions which now exist for these purposes.

10. Thus the principles and objects of the Organisation, and consequently the conditions in which its members receive its benefits and accept its obligations and on which actions taken under its authority are based, may be described as follows:—

11. Principles.

(i) That all members of the Organisation undertake to respect each other's political independence.
(ii) That all members are equal in status though not necessarily in function.
(iii) That all members undertake to fulfil towards each other the obligations which are the conditions of receiving the benefits of the Organisation.

12. Objects.

(i) To ensure that peace and security shall be maintained so that men shall not live in fear of war.
(ii) To provide means by which all disputes arising between States may be so dealt with that peace and security are not endangered.

(iii) To provide a centre in which the political action of States can be reviewed and harmonised, and directed towards a common end.

(iv) To promote the betterment of world-wide economic conditions and the well-being of all men by international agreement so that the fear of want may be removed from the world.

(v) To guard and enlarge the freedom of man by institutions for the removal of social wrongs.

II.—The Nature of the Organisation.

13. In Article 4 of the Moscow Declaration it is laid down that the organisation is to be founded on the sovereign equality of its members. Its members will, therefore, retain control of their own actions except so far as they are limited by the obligations into which they freely enter and by international law.

14. Nothing has been more clearly proved during the present war than the interconnexion of peace and security in all parts of the world. The future organisation must recognise this fact and be a world organisation in which all peaceful States in every part of the world can co-operate together for their mutual benefit.

15. Though the status of all members is equal and all will enjoy the same rights and undertake the corresponding obligations, their differences in power make necessary some recognition of differences in function. The initiative for the formation of the organisation has come from the Four Powers, the United States, the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom and China, and it is generally recognised that its success will depend more upon their continued co-operation than on any other single factor. The machinery of the organisation should make it possible for them to carry out the responsibilities which they will have agreed to undertake. The same principle applies to all other States. The more power and responsibility can be made to correspond, the more likely is it that the machinery will be able to fulfil its functions.

16. We look forward to the liberation of France and her restoration to the ranks of the Great Powers.

17. It is presumed that there will come into existence a number of specialised technical organisations through which States will combine together for various purposes. There are already such organisations in existence as part of the system of the League of Nations. The relations of these bodies to one another and to the main organisation are considered in Memo. D. Here it need only be said that such bodies are unlikely to survive as effective instruments in a world from which reasonable security is absent.

18. Just as there are special functional organisations, so there may be regional associations for various purposes when there is obvious advantage to be obtained by limitation of the sphere of action. Such regional associations might come into existence for security, for economic co-operation, for the promotion of welfare in colonial territories or for other purposes. It is, however, essential that they should not conflict with the world-wide organisation but rather assist it to carry out its purposes.

III.—Constitution of the Organisation.

19. It is generally recognised that it will be necessary to set up two main bodies, one as a centre of discussion on which all States are represented and the other, a smaller body, as a centre of action. It is suggested that these bodies be termed the World Assembly and the World Council respectively.

20. Membership.—It is assumed that at the outset all the United Nations will be invited to be members of the Organisation. What States now neutral shall be admitted and at what period is a matter for consideration. The enemy States cannot be admitted until they have shown by their conduct that they accept the objects of the organisation and intend to pursue them.

21. All the members of the organisation should share in some manner in the admission of new members. It will have to be considered how far it is necessary to lay down conditions under which a State shall cease to be a member of the Organisation.

22. World Assembly.—The sovereign equality of all members should be recognised by their representatives meeting together on a footing of equality in a World Assembly at least once a year. The right of information and criticism should belong to all members of the organisation.

23. It is not suggested that this body should have all the powers that were possessed by the Assembly of the League. The specialised and technical bodies should undertake some of the duties which that body performed and the initiative in preventing breaches of the peace should lie with the World Council.

24. It is a matter for consideration whether the World Assembly should have the control over finance and the admission of new members which the Assembly of the League possessed; but it is suggested that the States cannot be expected to contribute to the finances of an organisation without some share in their determination, nor to belong to a society to which other States may be admitted without consultation with them.

25. World Council.—This body should be sufficiently small and compact to ensure action and of such a character as to possess the confidence of all members of the organisation.

26. The constitution of this body raises many difficult problems. The relation between the Great Powers and other States have been matter of dispute for over a century. The principle has been generally accepted that where the interests of any State are specially affected it should have the right of representation on the Council. It is also clearly necessary that the Four Powers, which between them are directly responsible for the peace and security of nearly two-thirds of the world's inhabitants, should always be represented on it.

27. The number and method of representation of other States is a matter for grave consideration and the manner in which the decisions of the Council shall be made may depend on the method adopted. The object should be to ensure that the other States on the World Council command general confidence. Some form of election is probably essential and the World Assembly can obviously be used for this purpose.

28. Some means must be found to ensure that the various regions of the world are adequately represented. The size and area of States vary so greatly and are so unevenly distributed over the Continents that some agreement on this subject is essential. Thus, the Caribbean area has more independent States than all the rest of Latin America, which includes Brazil, Argentina and Chile. Both Europe and South America have many more States than North America or Asia. Hitherto States as different in power and status as Canada and Panamá have had equal rights of representation. The principle of rotation has deprived the Council of experienced statesmen, while the creation of "semi-permanent" seats was much resented by some of the States that did not enjoy the privilege.

29. If the principle which governs the election of the Governing Body of the I.L.O. could be accepted, a more satisfactory result might be obtained, but it is difficult to find the principle to apply to a political body.

30. Should Regional Associations of sufficient importance be formed they might furnish a basis for representation on the Council. But for the most part States do not recognise other States as "representing" them on institutions in which they have a major interest.

31. It is clear that this subject will need careful examination—not only amongst the Four Powers themselves but with the other States whose wishes must be taken into account.

32. The main function of the World Council will be to ensure such intercourse between the statesmen of the countries represented on it as to enable them to secure solutions of international problems by discussion and co-operative action. For this purpose regular meetings with an appropriate procedure and secretariat are indispensable. No other single factor is likely to be so influential in producing harmony between the policies of States. The experience of the last thirty years shows that there is no adequate substitute for it.

33. The functions suggested for the World Council as the body responsible for the peace of the world are described in Memorandum B.

34. It will also be necessary for the World Council to give some common direction to the functional bodies. This question is considered in Memo. D.

35. In general it is hoped that the Council may become a centre where Governments reconcile their attitudes towards major international problems so as to be able to act decisively towards a common end.

38. Permanent Court of International Justice.—It is assumed that there will be general agreement that a Permanent Court of International Justice will be set up. The proposals of the Informal Inter-Allied Committee which recently reported on this question seem to indicate the general lines that should be followed.

37. Secretariat.—A permanent secretariat will be indispensable. The experience of the League of Nations and the I.L.O. should be utilised. It is assumed, however, that a number of new specialised technical bodies will come into existence. Further consideration of this question might, therefore, await more definite information concerning them.

38. The suggestion that the head of the Secretariat should be given the right of bringing before the World Council any matter which in his opinion threatens the peace of the world might well be incorporated in the rules of the Organisation.

39. Specialised and Technical Organisations.—This question is considered in Memorandum D. The position of the International Labour Organisation will need special consideration.

40. Seat of the Organisation.—This problem should be left open until further information is available on the number and character of the functional organisations.

41. Name of the Organisation.—The term "United Nations" is now in general use and there does not seem to be any strong reason to substitute any other for it.

MEMORANDUM B.

THE PACIFIC SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES, THE QUESTION OF GUARANTEES AND THE CONDITIONS IN WHICH ACTION SHOULD BE TAKEN FOR THE MAINTENANCE OF PEACE AND SECURITY.

I.—Introduction.

IF war is to be prevented there must be in existence a means to make those decisions which in the past have been made by violence. If an organisation is set up to achieve this end there must be some guarantee that its members will be protected should States, inside or outside it, threaten to subject them to violence. For the purpose of providing protection, action may have to be taken against an offending State, and this necessitates some statement of how and when such action shall be taken.

2. The maintenance of peace and security is not merely an end in itself but a means by which an ordered and progressive community of States may come into existence. The principles and objects of such a society have been indicated in Part I of Memorandum A, and it is on them that all action by the Organisation should be based. A state of peace should be regarded as not simply the acceptance of the status quo but active co-operation between States for the objects and principles of the Organisation.

3. Such ends cannot be obtained by any system of procedure however skilfully designed. Everything depends on the unity of purpose of those States which possess the greatest means of carrying out their purposes. It is impossible to ensure that these States will always be in agreement, and no set of rules will do so. But an agreement to act under certain specific principles in a World Organisation will make their co-operation easier and will enable other States to be associated with them for their common purpose.

4. If all the Great Powers are members of the Organisation and show their intention of acting in accordance with it, all States will be more ready to accept the responsibilities commensurate with their power. The absence of the United States and, for a long period, of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics from the League of Nations caused the United Kingdom to review its responsibilities. For the same reason smaller States were often reluctant to accept full responsibility.

5. For the same reason also there was great anxiety on the part of many States to define very closely the occasion for action by the organs and members of the League of Nations. As is explained below, this attempt failed in its purpose. Moreover, public opinion did not understand the elaborate safeguards against arbitrary action that existed. It is suggested that the methods embodied in the constitution of the Organisation should be simple and flexible. They should be extended and elaborated only as the result of experience.

6. It is believed also that, whatever procedure be adopted, it is only by setting up some definite security system such as is suggested in Memorandum C that reality will be given to the promises made and that the States of the world will come to believe that by accepting the rights and responsibilities given to them by the Organisation they will be spared such sufferings as they are now enduring.

II.—The Pacific Settlement of Disputes.

7. Disputes between States are divided into two main categories, those, often termed "justiciable," that can be settled by a legal tribunal, and those in which other considerations are predominant.

8. It is the second class which produces the most intractable and dangerous disputes, including those in which the legal position is entirely clear. In the past, States have promised not to attempt settlement of their disputes by violent means, but they have not promised to settle their disputes. It is suggested that it might be well if they now promised to "settle" their disputes in the sense that they will not allow them to endanger peace and security.

9. Justiciable Disputes.—It would seem that there is likely to be general agreement that justiciable disputes should be generally settled by a Permanent Court of International Justice. The Informal Inter-Allied Committee suggested in its recent report that the Court be open to all States, whether they accept compulsory jurisdiction or not. It would be possible for the International Organisation to make the acceptance of such an obligation a condition of membership, but in such a case it would be necessary to allow States to make certain reservations.

10. The difference between accepting compulsory jurisdiction with reservations and retaining full freedom of action is likely to have more psychological than practical effect, especially if the World Council can obtain Advisory Opinions from the Court on some point in a dispute, which has been submitted to it.

11. Other Disputes.—Reference to the World Council is the obvious method of dealing with other disputes. Though other elaborate methods of conciliation have been set up they have hardly ever been used and they have the disadvantage of placing the case in the hands of persons who are not responsible for the consequences of failure to preserve peace. It is only in the World Council itself that a body of rules and a technique of procedure can be gradually established as the result of accumulated experience.

12. It should be for the World Council to decide what method should be used for dealing with the dispute. Any decision of this nature should be regarded as a decision of procedure and consequently be adopted by a majority vote.

13. There have been suggestions that even on questions of principle (as opposed to questions of procedure) decisions should be taken by (say) a two-thirds majority of the Council rather than by unanimity. We leave this important question open, but it seems desirable that in all such cases all the Four Powers should be included in the majority. In any event, the votes of the parties to the dispute should not, of course, be taken into account.

14. States are not likely to bind themselves to accept the decision of the Council in all cases. Nor would it be likely that they would undertake the obligation to enforce it on other States in all cases. But it would still be the function of the World Council to see that disputes did not threaten peace and security and for the other States to co-operate with it to the utmost of their power for that purpose, so that there would still be large opportunities for action to deal with even the most difficult disputes.

15. For, as has been indicated, if peace and security are to be maintained, some method must be devised for the settlement of all disputes between States. "Settlement" in this sense may, as is often the case in domestic disputes, show that no remedy exists for a legitimate grievance. But if States promise to "settle" their disputes in the sense defined in paragraph 8 above, the balance is thrown more in the direction of change. The status quo is sufficiently safeguarded by the mere existence of a universal system for the maintenance of peace and security. Should the dispute be such as to threaten peace and security, it will be for the World Council (and in such cases action will depend largely on the Great Powers) to decide what action should be taken to deal with it.

16. If the dispute involves the Great Powers themselves the machinery for decision may prove inadequate; but there is hope that the habit of co-operative leadership in the settlement of other disputes and the restraints imposed by their own promises to one another and to other States may suffice to achieve a settlement, even where the machinery seems to be inadequate to do so. Much will depend on whether a sufficient number of States, great and small, come to attach so much importance to the preservation of the system that they are prepared to run risks and make sacrifices to support and preserve it.

17. There was considerable agreement in the period between the two wars that the vague words of Article XIX of the Covenant of the League of Nations were hardly a sufficient recognition of the fact that there must be a change in the world. When, in the thirties, it was perceived that there was no great desire in some countries to go to war to defend some of the frontiers erected by the Peace Treaties, there was much discussion of a process which became known as "Peaceful Change." Examination of this concept shows that it cannot be obtained by a clause in a Covenant, but can only be a continual process achieved through discussion and compromise between the Great Powers and, in their due place, the smaller States concerned. But it is essential that such a process be guided by principle and subject to an ordered procedure, and it is necessary, therefore, that it should take place within an international organisation.

18. It may be hoped that the international functional organisations which are being brought into existence will contribute to furthering the process of peaceful change in an orderly manner.

III.—The Question of Guarantees.

19. In considering this question the history of the guarantees given in the Covenant of the League of Nations must be taken into account, since it throws great light on the nature of the problem. For by Article X the Members of the League "undertook to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all Members." The formula had first been devised by President Wilson for the Western Hemisphere and it was at his instance that it was applied universally. No method was laid down as to how the obligation should be carried out except that the Council should "advise" upon the question.

20. Territorial Integrity.—There was much opposition to the proposed Article, attention being concentrated on the question of "territorial integrity." Lord Cecil suggested that the guarantee should be withdrawn if the State concerned refused to accept a modification of frontier desired by a large majority of the members of the League of Nations. The vague phraseology of Article XIX of the Covenant was all that resulted from this proposal. Mr. Lansing and Dr. Miller were also opposed to inserting Article X, though the latter came to believe that it made little difference. Sir Robert Borden tried to abolish it before the Covenant was signed, and the Canadian Delegation renewed the attempt at the First Assembly. In 1923 an interpretative resolution was adopted by the Assembly (though as Persia dissented it had no legal force) which laid down that it was for each State to decide how it should carry out its obligations under this head, while the Council was to take into account, in any advice that it might give, the geographical situation and special conditions of each State.

21. In fact, Article X was hardly ever used in the disputes which came before the League of Nations. But it was constantly referred to when some State wished to remind others that its existing frontiers were guaranteed by them. It was also constantly used by critics of the League of Nations to show that its members had guaranteed for all time frontiers which they possessed no legal means of changing without the consent of the State concerned.

22. Much smaller attention has been paid to this subject in recent discussions, though there may, of course, be a shift of interest when the treaties that register any changes of frontier which may be made come into existence. There is, however, reason to think that many States will be more interested in the establishment of some concrete security system ready for immediate action than in guarantees of frontiers which in themselves do little to prevent the invasion and occupation of territory by the armed forces of another State.

23. Many other States would be likely to refuse to accept an Organisation which committed them to a guarantee of the territorial integrity of all States.

24. It is suggested, therefore, that no such guarantee be included in the obligations undertaken by members of the Organisation.

25. Political Independence.—The question of "political independence" raises issues of a rather different character. The Moscow Declaration has already based the Organisation on the "sovereign equality" of all States, which implies that the Members of the Organisation will retain legal control over their own actions except in so far as they agree by treaty to limit it. All States naturally attach the highest value to their political independence, and the principal statesmen have made repeated declarations that they intend to respect the independence of other States.

26. But an undertaking to respect the political independence of other States does not necessarily involve a commitment to guarantee it. It is, moreover, not easy to define exactly what political independence is. One State may control the actions of another State by indirect means. It is impossible to distinguish the line which divides such actions from what is generally regarded as the legitimate influence which one State may exercise on the actions of another. The objection to any guarantee of "political independence" is that it could only extend to external and legal forms. It could not take into account more indirect methods.

27. For this reason the inclusion of a guarantee of political independence in the obligations of the Organisation seems undesirable. But it should be recognised that mutual respect for the political independence of its members is one of the essential principles of the Organisation as already pointed out in Part I of Memorandum A.

28. The Maintenance of International Peace and Security.—By the Covenant of the League, States undertook to inflict sanctions on another State which broke its promises to submit a dispute to pacific settlement and resorted to war. It was for each State to determine its own actions after the Council (or Assembly) had declared that the occasion for action had arisen. Doubt was constantly expressed as to the sufficiency of this promise, though, so far as words can guarantee action, a definite promise was made. But the duty of enforcing action to be taken were laid on the members.

29. Also by Article XI of the Covenant the duty of safeguarding the "peace of nations" was laid on the League, but no specific obligations as regards the action to be taken were laid on the Members.

30. The Four Powers have already, by Article 4 of the Moscow Declaration, laid down that the main purpose of the international organisation is the "maintenance of international peace and security," and have asserted by Article 5 that "they will consult with one another and, as occasion requires, with other members of the United Nations, with a view to joint action on behalf of the community of nations" for this purpose until a system of general security is inaugurated. It would seem that it is along these lines that any guarantee should be given.

31. The duty of co-operating to the utmost of their power in the maintenance of international peace and security should be undertaken by all members of the Organisation. The degree of such co-operation must obviously depend on the geographical situation of States, the amount of their resources, their own internal situation and possibly other factors which cannot be accurately weighed in advance. But the duty of co-operating to the utmost of their power in an Organisation which is essential to the peace and security of all should be laid upon all members.

32. The duty of maintaining international peace and security should be laid in the first instance on the World Council acting on behalf of the other members of the Organisation. It will be for the World Council to take the initiative to give effect to the undertaking to maintain international peace and security. The head of the Secretariat should, however, as suggested in para. 38 of Memorandum A, be given the right of bringing before the World Council any matter which in his opinion threatened international peace and security.

33. It is for consideration whether any special obligations for the maintenance of international peace and security should be explicitly assumed within the permanent Organisation by the Four Powers who have undertaken such a responsibility pending the establishment of a general system.

34. If regional organisations are set up for security purposes, part of the responsibility in the first instance might fall on them, but, as is suggested in Memorandum A, paragraph 18, not in such a manner as to conflict with the final responsibility of the World Council for the maintenance of peace and security.

IV.—The Conditions in which Action should be taken for the Maintenance of Peace and Security.

35. It is generally recognised that there must be some statement in the constitution of the Organisation as to the conditions in which action is taken to maintain international peace and security. In the Covenant of the League of Nations and in the attempts to elaborate the Covenant great attention was given to this question.

36. In the Covenant the sanctions of Article XVI came into force only if there was resort to war after a Member had broken the promises made in Articles XII–XIV. Even then each State necessarily determined for itself whether the casus fœderis had arisen.

37. In Article X the guarantees were against "external aggression" only. It was by this article that the unfortunate word "aggression" was introduced into the Covenant and became the subject of so many debates at Geneva. But the more the word was discussed the more difficult it became to define exactly what it meant. The definition of aggression was considered important because it was thought that it might affect the right of the Council to advise that sanctions be employed. The most notable contribution to the debate was the suggestion that aggression should be determined by the acceptance or refusal of arbitration or some other peaceful method of settling disputes. But this did not cover the preparations for aggression, nor did it take the time element sufficiently into account. Moreover, the discussion and analysis of aggression enabled States to use a procedure calculated to defeat the objects of the Covenant. Illustration of this fact was given by the Japanese attack on China in Manchuria.

38. In Article XI sanctions were not mentioned, and the obligations of the Council were stated in the most general terms. These obligations could be interpreted as giving the right to take drastic action, but in the light of other articles it was difficult to find in them any right to use force against a State. In actual practice a number of dangerous situations that arose between small States were dealt with successfully under Article XI, and a technique which involved such matters as the setting up of commissions of enquiry and the establishment of neutral zones was gradually developed.

39. In the Protocol of 1924 an attempt was made to make the sanctions "automatic" by setting up an elaborate set of rules. But the discussions showed that such a course was impossible. Sanctions depend upon the will of Governments and peoples and cannot be automatically brought into existence.

40. As has been noted above, one test of aggression is the acceptance or refusal of some method of settling the dispute. But the acceptance may be merely a method of delay while preparations for aggression are being made (as in the case of Italy's attack on Abyssinia) or actual force is used (as in Japan's attack on China). It can be argued that in both these cases the lack of effective action was due not to any defect in the Articles of the Covenant but to the lack of will on the part of the other States, and notably of the Great Powers involved, to go to war with the recalcitrant State. But it was also true that Japan was able to use her right of veto under Article XI to place obstacles in the way of the necessary enquiry, and that preventive action against Italy, before she attacked, was difficult to take legally under the Covenant. Under the Locarno Treaties the signatory States could act without League authority in the case of "flagrant aggression," but not preventively. If the question of Germany's rearmament had been brought before the Council it is not easy to see what sanctions could have been taken against her under the Covenant.

41. In actual fact there was never any doubt, in the cases in which the League of Nations was concerned, as to the identity of the aggressor, though sometimes as to the character of the provocation to aggression. States, it is true, adapted their actions and procedure to the language and resolutions adopted at Geneva and later to the Pact of Paris. But in no case were the real intentions and motives of the aggressive States concealed from the Governmnts of the other members of the League or from public opinion. The discussions at the Council and the Assembly made them sufficiently clear.

42. This experience suggests that too rigid a definition of the occasion for action is as likely to hinder as to facilitate the maintenance of peace and security. If the World Council is given power to act for this purpose it will be able to work out for itself the necessary procedure in the light of experience. It will be easier also in such circumstances to refer matters to regional associations if any such come into existence which can be used for that purpose.

43. At the same time the principles and objects governing the actions of Members will have been laid down in the Preamble to the document bringing the Organisation into existence. These, as suggested in Part I of Memorandum A, should include not only the maintenance of peace and security but also respect for the "sovereign equality" and "political independence" of its Members. If, therefore, it is laid down that the World Council shall only take action in accordance with these principles and objects, action for other purposes will be excluded. It is suggested that States will be protected from arbitrary action by the World Council as much by this safeguard as by elaborate definition, while the World Council will be more free to act to protect States from violence.

V.—Conclusions.

44. As to the Pacific Settlement of Disputes—

(i) That all States should promise to settle their disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security are not endangered.

(ii) That justiciable disputes should generally be decided by a Permanent Court of International Justice.

(iii) That other disputes should be subjected to a process of discussion and conciliation in the World Council, which should have power to determine the procedure to be followed without the consent of the parties to the dispute.

45. As to Guarantees—

(i) That all Members should undertake to co-operate to the utmost of their power in the maintenance of international peace and security, and that the World Council should be required to take the initiative for this purpose.

(ii) That no guarantee should be given of the territorial integrity of Members.

(iii) That no guarantee should be given of the political independence of Members, but that respect for it should be recognised as one of the principles of the organisation.

46. As to the conditions in which action should be taken for the maintenance of peace and security—

That there should be no attempt to lay down in advance any rigid definition of the occasions on which such action should be taken, but that the Members of the Organisation and the World Council should only be empowered to take action in accordance with the principles and objects of the Organisation.

MEMORANDUM C. C222780

SECURITY.

THE MILITARY ASPECT OF ANY POST-WAR SECURITY ORGANISATION.

I.—INTRODUCTION.

THE Moscow Declaration on General Security contemplates the creation, at the earliest possible date, of an international organisation charged with the maintenance of world peace and security. This organisation is to be founded on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving States, and all such States are to be eligible for membership.

2. An attempt is made in the present paper to sketch out the general lines on which the organisation of International Security might be attempted after the conclusion of the present war. The proposals deal, however, with the form which the Permanent Security Organisation might eventually take and do not relate to the intervening period. During this last period it is evident that some temporary arrangements will have to be made, but these will be obviously affected if there is some previous general agreement as to the form which the permanent organisation might assume.

II.—GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS.

Nature of the Organisation.

3. The proposed world organisation, whatever its form, is bound to fail unless :—

(a) The United Kingdom, United States, U.S.S.R. and China continue to co-operate whole-heartedly in its support.
(b) The Governments and peoples of those Powers at least retain the will to enforce peace.
(c) The organisation is simple, its objects are clear-cut, and the machinery is of a kind to which member States are already accustomed.

The Objects.

4. The objects should be :—

(a) To disarm Germany and Japan;
(b) To keep them disarmed; and
(c) To prevent them or any other aggressor from again upsetting the peace of the world.

The Means.

5. The proposed organisation will have to rely, in the main, on the combined military forces of the United Nations and, in particular, of the Four Powers, working together to a common end. Most of the States concerned are already accustomed to such a system.

6. Economic measures, also, may operate to deter potential aggressors, but unless backed by force or the effective threat of it are unlikely to prove an adequate check on a State which is, itself, ready to resort to force.

The Idea of an "International Police Force."

7. In some quarters it is contended that the co-ordination of military forces could best be expressed in a completely international "Police Force." Whatever its theoretical merits, this postulates a greater advance in international co-operation than States are yet prepared to make, as it implies the existence of a world State. Practical questions of size, composition, maintenance, location and command would give rise to controversies on which international agreement would almost certainly be unobtainable.

8. We conclude that the time has not yet come for the creation of such an international force.

C222781

III.—PROPOSALS.

Higher Military Organisation.

9. The proposed world organisation implies the existence of some sort of World Council. This Council will need military advice, and this advice will have to be given by States, not individually, but in concert. Apart from the "strategic" side of the work, e.g., the preparation of plans to resist potential aggression, there are a number of general questions such as the regulation of armaments on which combined military advice will be required.

10. If the Higher Military Organisation is to advise the World Council and provide machinery whereby plans can be made in advance and the efforts of the forces of member States co-ordinated, it follows that it must form part of, and receive directions from, the World Council.

11. It thus becomes clear that there will have to be a Military Staff Committee serving the World Council.

Composition of the Military Staff Committee.

12. Since for many years to come the Four Powers will have to play the predominant part in safeguarding world peace, the permanent members of this Committee should be the military representatives of those Powers. The co-operation of States other than the Four Powers will, however, be essential in providing forces and making available bases, shipping and other facilities, and these States will expect to be given a voice corresponding to their obligations. These States should therefore be associated in some form or other with the work of the Military Staff Committee. The form which this association should take raises difficult problems, and must depend to a considerable extent on the form which the World Council itself takes. As a beginning, the Committee might be strengthened, when dealing with particular security problems, by the addition of military representatives of States having special concern with the question under discussion.

13. It is important that the members of the World Council should not receive military advice from more than one source. It is therefore essential that the members of the Military Staff Committee should be the supreme military authorities in their own countries or their representatives.

Functions of the Military Staff Committee.

14. The primary duty of the Committee would be to prepare and keep up to date plans for the prevention of any renewed aggression by Germany or Japan, or by any other State which might at any time give signs of becoming an aggressor. The Committee would also be responsible for any necessary co-ordination of the national forces of the member States.

Force at the Disposal of the World Council.

15. For the purpose of dealing with major aggression, it is contemplated that, when necessary, the full resources of all member States would be made available. To deal with minor emergencies, part of the obligation to be assumed by member States would be the earmarking of a quota of their national forces or other reources to be at the disposal of the Council. It would be for the World Council to decide, on the advice of the Military Staff Committee :—

(i) What the size and composition of the quotas of individual States should be.
(ii) In the event of an emergency arising, what particular forces should be called upon to deal with it.

16. The mere existence of national forces and their availability in emergency would not, however, by itself, suffice to ensure the maintenance of security, even if plans for their employment were made in advance by the Military Staff Committee. It would be essential that these forces should have worked together in time of peace if their co-operation were to be smooth and efficient in time of emergency. In this connection it is difficult to exaggerate the psychological effect of constant co-operation.

Co-operation between Forces of Different States.

17. In time of peace co-ordination could best be fostered—

(a) By the joint garrisoning or occupation of certain areas; and (b) By means of joint cruises and flights and other joint exercises.

The method by which these objects should be achieved would require detailed study, and the necessary rights and facilities for joint garrisoning or occupation, joint exercise and joint access to ports and airfields, would have to be secured by agreement between member States and, where necessary, by expressed provisions in the peace treaties with ex-enemy States.

IV.—Regions.

18. There is considerable support for the suggestion that, for purposes of an international security system, the world should be divided into fixed regions, each containing forces which, under the supreme control of a World Council, would be responsible for preventing aggression in that region. It has been argued that such an arrangement would limit the military commitments of the smaller States and increase efficiency and rapidity of action.

19. From a military point of view, there are certain objections to a world organisation constructed on a basis of separate regions. These objections may be stated as follows :—

(a) It is impossible to draw a boundary of a region so as to confine within it all military operations which the member States in that region might have to undertake.
(b) If an attempt were made to fix the operational boundary of a region, States on the perimeter would necessarily form part of the neighbouring geographical region. Thus neighbouring regions would overlap extensively.
(c) The defence arrangements of some Powers are based primarily on sea and air power, which do not lend themselves to regionalisation.

The advantages of regional organisation may be summarised as follows :—

(a) The main attraction of a regional political organisation is that it would give the smaller nations a more direct concern in security problems, and so encourage their co-operation in security measures, thus reducing the burden on the Four Powers.
(b) Regional organisation might increase the efficiency and rapidity of both political and military action by member States of the region.
(c) A regional organisation, through its attached military staff, would facilitate military co-operation between the States concerned.

20. An argument in favour of the proposals contained in this paper is that the suggested military organisation is not dependent on the existence of regional political councils, yet could be adapted to a regional system if the latter proved desirable on political grounds. In such a case the Military Staff Committee would serve to co-ordinate the activities of the military staffs attached to the regional organisations.

V.—Conclusions.

21. Our conclusions, therefore, are as follows :—

(a) Any complete international " Police Force " is impracticable in present circumstances.
(b) The success of any world security organisation depends on the whole-hearted co-operation of the principal member States and on their resolution to use force to prevent aggression.
(c) The object, in the first instance, of any world security organisation should be the prevention of renewed aggression by Germany and Japan.
(d) Forces to support the World Council would have to be placed by Member States at its disposal in the manner contemplated in paragraph 15.
(e) Military advice and direction would be afforded to such World Council as may be set up by a military staff composed of the supreme military authorities of appropriate member States or their representatives

(f) National forces associated for the above purpose should train and work together in peace to the greatest possible extent.
(g) There would be some military difficulty in the division of the world for security purposes into fixed geographical regions, but, if Regional Political Councils were set up as part of some world organisation, it would follow that they should have Military Advisory Staffs, and this might facilitate local co-operation.

Note.—It will be noticed that the system proposed above differs from the system which existed prior to the war in the following three main points :—

(a) The establishment of an effective Military Staff Committee of the World Council with power to formulate plans and to co-ordinate the action of national forces prior to any emergency which may necessitate their action.
(b) The joint garrisoning of certain areas by combined detachments of national forces.
(c) The training and exercising together of national forces in peace-time, making use of certain specified seaports and airfields.

Memorandum D.

CO-ORDINATION OF POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC INTERNATIONAL MACHINERY.

THERE will inevitably be set up, as part of the permanent international system, a number of specialised international bodies dealing with economic and social questions. Some of these bodies have already been considered in considerable detail, e.g., the Permanent Organisation for Food and Agriculture. Others are in earlier stages of development. There are already in existence the technical organisations attached to the League of Nations, such as those which deal with Health, the abolition of the Drug Traffic, Transport, &c.

2. It will be necessary to make provision—

(a) To co-ordinate the activities of these bodies on their technical side.
(b) To bring them into relation with the World Organisation.

3. The obvious methods by which these objects can be achieved are by means of discussions both between the specialised organisations themselves and in the world organisation, and by means of an economic and social secretariat attached to the World Council.

4. No doubt some form of consultation will be arranged between the specialised bodies themselves so that their activities may be directed towards a common end. This co-ordination will be assisted by the existence of an economic and social secretariat attached to the World Council. The specialised international bodies should also have the obligation of sending reports to the World Organisation as well as to their constituent members. These reports can be considered and discussed in the World Organisation, so far as it is desirable to do so, in order to facilitate co-operation between the specialised bodies and the maintenance of international peace and security.

5. These discussions will be assisted by the existence of an economic and social secretariat attached to the World Council, and these may thus come into being for economic and social questions as equivalent to the machinery which (see Memorandum A, paragraph 38), will, it is hoped, be in existence for political questions.

MEMORANDUM E.

METHOD AND PROCEDURE FOR ESTABLISHING A WORLD ORGANISATION.

IT may be hoped that the exchange of memoranda and preliminary discussions between the three Powers will result in a considerable measure of agreement. The question thus arises how such agreement shall be recorded, in what form it shall be submitted to the three Governments for their approval, and how and when the views of the other United Nations shall be obtained.

2. In Article 4 of the Moscow Declaration the Four Powers recognised the necessity of establishing an international organisation " at the earliest practicable date," and an obligation lies on them to make every effort to fulfil this promise.

3. Moreover, if agreement can be obtained between the United Nations on a definite scheme to maintain international peace and security a new hope will arise in the world which may do much to render less difficult the painful process of reconstruction. The reception of the Moscow Declaration by public opinion shows how anxious the world is to receive some assurance that such a scheme is ready for adoption.

4. There appear to be considerable advantages in obtaining at the earliest possible moment agreement on the essentials of the permanent International Organisation, leaving the more detailed working out of its several parts to a later stage.

5. If it is decided to set up any regional associations in any part of the world it will be much easier to fashion them in accordance with a general plan after the outline of the World Organisation has been determined.

6. Moreover, the existence of such an agreement will facilitate negotiation for the establishment of specialised and technical bodies. It will also make possible the adaptation of such parts of the temporary machinery set up immediately after the war as it is desired to incorporate in the permanent Organisation.

7. In the Moscow Declaration the Four Powers have assumed a responsibility for the maintenance of peace and security pending the establishment of a general system of security. This duty is likely to be less onerous if the other United Nations, and possibly States now neutral, are associated with the Four Powers for that purpose at the earliest possible date. In this way the new permanent Organisation will more quickly become a reality and take its proper position in the new world community.

8. Moreover, the Treaties of Peace will be more easily made if the form and character of the new permanent organisation are already known. Solutions of difficult problems will be more easily found and there is less likelihood of decisions being made which are incompatible with the terms of the permanent organisation.

9. It is suggested, therefore, that the aim of the preliminary talks at Washington should be to reach such agreement as can be referred to the three Governments in the form of a Draft Declaration, similar to that signed at Moscow but containing in its several clauses a more extended survey of the objects and principles of the permanent International Organisation and an outline of the machinery which it is proposed to set up to obtain them.

10. It may be necessary to omit from the draft Declaration many important particulars, e.g., the exact methods by which the members of the World Council are chosen and their number. Some of these points may perhaps be left to the new organisation itself to determine. But it may be hoped that agreement may be obtained on what political bodies shall be set up, e.g., a World Assembly, a World Council and a World Court; on the principles on which action will be taken for the pacific settlement of disputes and the maintenance of international peace and security; on the necessity for agreeing some permanent method by which the military forces necessary to maintain international peace and security can be co-ordinated; and on the principles which shall govern the relations of the specialised organisations with one another and with the World Council and World Assembly.

11. It will then be for the Governments of the three Powers to determine how far they can approve the draft Declaration and it may be necessary to have a more formal exchange of views between them for this purpose.

12. If agreement is thus obtained it will be necessary to communicate it to the other United Nations for consideration, and immediately thereafter to publish it. After a suitable interval the United Nations would be invited to attend a Conference at which the Declaration, with such amendments as had been found desirable, would be definitely adopted.

13. It should then be possible to set up a body to work out a more detailed instrument in the form of a Convention or Treaty on the lines of the Declaration. It would be the coming into force of this instrument, after the ordinary procedure required for ratification, which would bring the Permanent Organisation into existence. The exact date on which it was put into force might well be left to be determined by the Four Powers who are specially responsible for the maintenance of international peace and security in the interim period.

14. This method would have the advantage that, while the Permanent Organisation can, of course, only be brought into existence with the full consent of the Governments concerned after they have consulted the peoples which they represent, its form and character will have been to a large extent decided in consequence of the adoption of the Declaration. Many of the Governments of the United Nations might find it impossible to sign a treaty at that stage. Some of them may not survive the transition from war to peace. But many of them could record their agreement to a Declaration of the kind described and so prepare the way for themselves or their successors to take part in the preparation and signature of the final instrument.

IMPORTANT.

CONFIDENTIAL.

My telegram No. 492.

Embarkation on cruiser "Argentine" of the Brazilian Ambassador's body yesterday was the occasion for imposing military display and six speeches. The United States Ambassador was introduced to Colonel Peron and Minister for Foreign Affairs, whom he congratulated on his speech. The Argentine "Special Embassy" is also going to Rio de Janeiro on the cruiser.

2. Last night at private dinner party, the Chief-of-Staff General Von Der Becke who is intimate with Colonel Peron asked me my views. During long conversation I urged the desirability of the Government:-

(a) giving fullest publicity to their anti-espionage and anti-smuggling activities;

(b) promising to give no more contracts to German firms;

(c) withdrawing supplies from anti-Allied newspapers and

(d) withdrawing censorship on foreign press correspondents of which the effects have been the exact contrary to their intentions. Points (a), (b) and (c) are points which the United States Ambassador has been considering in view of the Brazilian [grp. undec: ? offers], suggesting to his Government as basis for reconciliation together with the deportation or internment of Axis diplomats.

3. I also said that though I did not know Dr. Baldrich personally his record could hardly inspire confidence and I stressed the belief that the military régime had been working against the United States in other South American countries. The Chief-of-Staff denied the latter, which he said only meant that the Argentine Government wanted closer relations with their neighbours; he said the German firms were employed on their technical merits for certain public works, and that anti-Allied newspapers had no influence regarding opinions about the war, but were necessary organs of opinion regarding purely internal matters. He complained bitterly that when Generals Ramirez and Gilbert broke off relations, they got "most chilling" acknowledgement from President of the United States in contrast with the applause given to Chile.

4. The above reference to United States Ambassador's suggestions to me is most confidential as he is awaiting the arrival of Dr. Spaeth (who may be taking over the Latin American Division in the State Department) to-morrow before submitting any new recommendations.

Your telegram No. 448 reached me this morning of May 10th when the trial of Derrien had already started. It would be impossible now to stop it and official representations to the Committee would therefore in my submission do more harm than good.

2. The invitation to send observers was made officially by Weiss to a member of my staff and to one of the United States mission and resulted from Weiss himself having been invited by our Military authorities to attend the court martial of Italian spies. It would therefore provide rather slender justification for British interference in French administration of justice.

3. I have missed no opportunity of making plain to members of the Committee my own views and those of His Majesty's Government with regard to these trials. I had two members of the Committee Frenay and Grenier to dine last night together with three members of the Resistance Party and instanced to them the case of Marshal Ney who was certainly guilty of treachery but whose execution everybody now deplores. I shall see M. Massigli this evening and speak to him strongly on the subject urging that no extreme measures be taken against Derrien.

4. Jacquinot, Commissioner of the Marines, has done everything in his power to prevent this trial which he fears may have a bad effect on the fleet but he believes he has the situation in hand.

5. I have informed my United States colleague of the decision not to be represented on the trial.

IMPORTANT

Your telegram No. 562.

My United States colleague agreed to my acting at once. I therefore decided to see the Minister for Foreign Affairs to-day.

2. But just before the interview took place we received from the Secretary General the text of the newly signed Turco-Hungarian Agreement (my telegram No. 704) outline of which will follow in a separate telegram. Therefore, after speaking in the sense of paragraph 6 of my telegram No. 672, I remarked that I had seen the Turco-Hungarian Agreement and [3 grps.undec.] for the supply to Hungary of the majority of the commodities of strategic importance mentioned in our note of April 14th. I could only say that the effect on His Majesty's Government would be extremely bad.

3. The Minister for Foreign Affairs interrupted me only to say I was not to take the figures in the Hungarian Agreement as representing an undertaking which would in fact be executed. All these deliveries from Turkey to Hungary would depend on priority delivery of Turkish orders for Hungarian goods. These orders would be passed through the Bureau at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and would be weeded out to the minimum of what was essential and could not be obtained elsewhere. In point of fact, as he had already stated, the Minister for Foreign Affairs intended to reduce deliveries of these Turkish goods to 60% of deliveries last year. I reminded him at this point that not only had he mentioned 50% to me in Istanbul but that we were asking for the complete cutting off of all these goods. The Minister for Foreign Affairs said he was working to reduce the percentage to 50%. Nevertheless Turkish economic life could not be entirely strangled and where essential commodities could not be obtained elsewhere, it would be necessary to rely upon deliveries from Axis countries. We had accepted this in the case of Spain and Portugal.

4. I asked him why, if in fact he did not intend to execute the Hungarian agreement up to the total figures contained in it, he had mentioned these figures at all. The Minister for Foreign Affairs replied in confidence that he was bound to do this because if he had opened negotiations by telling the Hungarians that he intended to cut down deliveries to 50 or 60% of last year's figures he would have failed to secure certain essential imports which were coming forward from Hungary.

5. I again pressed him for a total cutting off.

6. The Minister for Foreign Affairs twice mentioned that he would be ready to enter into a secret agreement with us which would have the effect of further reducing deliveries to Hungary in proportion to essential commodities which we could undertake to deliver ourselves. I said I was not able to give an off-hand answer to this question.

During the past ten days reports have been current here of stoppage of railway communications between Turkey and Bulgaria. Secretary General informed Counsellor on May 6th that for some days before March 4th [sic] railway communication had in fact stopped.

2. Other reports suggest that though greatly reduced, there was still trickle of traffic. In any case my latest information indicates that inward traffic has been resumed, 30 waggons from Germany routed via Hungary having reached Istanbul. Ordinary letter mail from Switzerland has also begun to arrive after a prolonged interruption.

Tangier telegram No. 163 to Foreign Office

You will see from my telegram No. 727 that Minister for Foreign Affairs' intention is to arrange for the withdrawal of German Consulate General with the Germans in Madrid and not to instruct General Orgaz to close it. It appears indeed that General Orgaz has himself been pressing for instructions to cover himself locally. In the circumstances there appears to be little to be gained by pressing him further at present in Tangier. Incidentally Senor Castillo was obviously lying when as reported in Mr. Gascoigne's telegram No. 160 he stated that General Orgaz had received his instructions but was deliberately delaying in carrying them out.

Meanwhile I have sent the First Secretary to see the head of the European Department again to point out that His Majesty's Government's interpretation of the agreement is that German Consulate General should be closed forthwith and to speak in the sense of my immediately following telegram. This matter will prepare Minister for Foreign Affairs for my interview with him to-morrow.

It would be useful if the matter could now be taken up strongly with the Spanish Ambassador in London and he be given facilities to discuss your representations.

Please show this telegram to Sir S. Hoare who might like to add a message of advice to [grp. undec.]

IMPORTANT

My immediately preceding telegram.

First Secretary duly pointed out this morning to head of European Section that while I had no doubt whatever that Spanish Government were sincerely resolved to implement the agreement and while His Majesty's Government would wish to make due allowances for technical arrangements necessary, you would be very unlikely to agree that more than a week or ten days at the outside should be required for the German Consulate General to have packed up and finally left. The Germans had had ample warning and time to prepare to move. Moreover owing to unexpected prolongation of negotiations the Germans had had the advantage of much longer use of their Consulate General as a base for activities against us than had been contemplated. I thought it therefore essential that when I see the Minister for Foreign Affairs tomorrow morning he should be in a position to name definite date and one well before the end of May mentioned yesterday for final departure. We for our part would be ready to issue the necessary safe conducts tomorrow if need be. Minister for Foreign Affairs would realise that these were friendly suggestions because we wanted Spanish Government to receive full credit for agreement and not to see it becoming an anti-climax. He would also appreciate how signs of procrastination on the part of the Spanish Government would appear in England in the fourth year of the war and in view of the coming events and effect of continued presence of German Consulate General and German agents of all kinds in North Africa to spy on our movements. Delay merely meant more difficulties with the Germans and mounting irritation with the Allies. Official took all this in good part and promised to convey it to Minister for Foreign Affairs before I see him tomorrow. Pressed to say whether General Orgaz had in fact yet received any instructions on this subject, official was quite definite that he had not and that he would not receive any until preliminary and detailed decisions had been taken here.

Your telegrams Nos. 567 and 573.

As my telegrams Nos. 733 and 734 show, delay is due not so much to General Orgaz's attitude, as to the Minister for Foreign Affairs' natural desire to bring about the closing of the German Consulate General with as little provocation as possible to the Germans. As the matter is being dealt with in Madrid and General O. has not yet had instructions, my impression is that the pressure being put upon him is only building up and hardening his resistance to no purpose.

Since May 5th I have in fact been pressing at all points including the Under Secretary of State, the head of the European Department Section and through the Technical Committee to the Minister for Foreign Affairs to fix an early date. I have already prepared a letter to His Excellency to bring the matter to a point for me to interview him tomorrow.

Meanwhile in fairness to Minister for Foreign Affairs it should be noted that he acted with great promptitude in informing the German Government in Berlin and the German Ambassador at Madrid the day after the completion of the agreement that the Consulate must be closed and that he has already given instructions for the release of Italian ships and granted visas for the crews. Important progress has also been made by Technicians over the arrangements to stop smuggling of wolfram.

My telegram No. 820.

Doctor Salazar opened the interview by apologising for what he described as a misunderstanding. He had not understood that we were waiting on him and he regretted the delay involved by loss of time between date on which he had handed me his reply to Prime Minister (March 29th) and the date(April 18th) on which I had told Doctor Leitao that we were expecting him (Doctor Salazar) to make next move. I reminded him that acting on instructions I had many weeks ago before that informed him that in the light of value of enhanced importance of wolfram only solution you could regard as wholly satisfactory after expiry of German wolfram year would be a total embargo and had asked him to let me know what he felt able to do in the altered circumstances. Whilst reply to this approach was still long outstanding I had handed to him Prime Minister's letter. His answer to that had been to the effect that he could not give embargo but would give reduction of German quota. Naturally therefore we had been waiting to hear what kind of reduction he had in mind. He again apologised.

2. He then propounded his three alternative suggestions with an air (whether assumed or not I cannot say) of expecting us to be well satisfied. After I had obtained his views as reported in my telegram under reference I asked permission to recapitulate our case. I used the arguments which I used with M. Sampayo and Duke of Palmella (my telegrams No. 811 and No. 813) and after referring to strain on alliance and suggesting that name of Portugal might come to be held in abomination in British Isles and most of Europe for generations to come I said that as the Allies were determined to obtain a complete and decisive victory only right and humane thing to do was for all countries, belligerents, occupied territories and neutrals alike to strain every nerve to bring it about as quickly as possible. More [sic] I said when it became known (which was not yet the case) that our secular ally had refused to do as Turkey had done and had chosen to help our enemy to postpone his defeat you would inevitably be asked in parliament to state what action you proposed to take in face of this unfriendly gesture.

My telegram No. 823.

While we were talking figures, I told Dr. Salazar quite frankly that we did not accept his. I gave him broadly our own figures for exports of wolfram to Germany for the first four months of this year. They were a minimum since we only accepted figures which we had been able to check and control When Dr. Salazar as usual, claimed that figures represented by petty smuggling (which it was impossible to stop entirely) were negligible, I replied that it was not that to which I was referring but to how far exports [?grp. omitted.] on a large scale in which railway company police and other officials and even high Administrative officials were involved.

2. Dr. Salazar said that although anything was possible, he found this difficult to believe since his controls were very stringent. He admitted however that wolfram had corrupted large numbers of people. If he could start again from the beginning, he thought that he would forego the profits accruing to the State and make all mining and collecting of wolfram illegal.

3. I told him that Spanish and Anglo-American experts were now collaborating in the task of devising ways and means of preventing illicit exports in Spain. Without committing himself, he hinted that he might agree to something of kind here.

Increasing tension reported in my Despatch No. 150 came to a head in a series of strikes at individual factories in the neighbourhood of Lisbon on May 8th and May 9th. Movement which was less extensive than that of last summer (my Despatch No.312) did not seriously affect public utilities or shipyards. Authorities immediately took severe measures apprehending strike leaders and a number of those who took part and today conditions have returned to normal except in one or two concerns which remain closed.

2. There have been no reports of trouble in the Oporto district or elsewhere.

3. Primary cause of the strikes was undoubtedly the mounting popular dissatisfaction with food shortage (especially bread rationing) which is variously attributed to bad administration and corruption and to the export of food stuffs to Germany; unpopularity of Dr. Salazar fanned by the publicity given by the British Broadcasting Corporation to the Portuguese Government's policy of permitting continued exports of Wolfam to Germany contributed no doubt to outbreak for which the immediate signal was a manifesto issued in the name of the Underground Portuguese Communist party appealing for a two day general strike in order to force the Government to improve the lot of the workers. The manifesto called upon the Army, Police and Republican Guard not to fight against their brothers and summoned Portuguese people to rise up against Salazarist reign of hunger, terror and treachery. As might be expected the strike move has attracted severe castigation in the press which refers to clandestine activities of the Communists in fomenting unrest and applauds the firm action taken by the Government.

Fact that the stoppage of work was not generally coupled with evidence of state of preparedness of the authorities may point to the outbreak having been precipitated by the latter who would count on ruthless repression now to ward off further trouble in the next few months. On the other hand much will depend on development of food situation and I would not rule out the possibility of deep and widespread discontent with the Government again coming to a head in a more serious outbreak.

Your telegram No. 4057 to Washington.

SECRET

You will have seen from my telegram No. 820 that Dr. Salazar's final offer is a ceiling of somewhat under 900 tons. We might conceivably be able to persuade him.

a) to reduce this to 800

b) to make it retrospective to March 1st thus including the 275 tons exported in March and April, and

c) to apply ceiling on a monthly basis.

On the other hand we shall have the greatest possible difficulty in preventing him from delivering to the Germans, over and above ceiling, the 150 tons which he regards as due to them under last year's agreement.

2. On the unlikely assumption that we succeed on all four points, the result would be monthly exports of 52½ tons as from May 1st. I see no hope of persuading him by any ordinary process of negotiations to reduce this figure to Spanish levels. Indeed I regard it as very improbable that we should be able to get him down so far as 52½ tons per mensem so improbable in fact that I should be reluctant to embark on a discussion of figures unless I were authorised to inform Dr. Salazar at the appropriate moment of specific consequences which would follow a refusal to meet us.

My telegram No. 1201.

Before he left Moscow, Orlemanski talked freely with one American correspondent. He was cockahoop about the relationship he had established with Stalin and about the latter's accommodating attitude towards the church and was convinced he had achieved something important in the nature of the beginnings of a bridge between the Soviet Government and the Vatican. He would not quote Stalin's words but said he was persuaded that Stalin did not wish to see a revolution in Poland and considered the Church to be a useful element of stability. Orlemanski was allowed to put two questions to Stalin for subsequent publication if on his return to the United States, the Bishop of his diocese raised no objection.

2. The questions and answers were to the following effect: Orlemanski. "Do you think it admissible that Soviet Government should pursue a policy of persecution and coercion towards the Roman Catholic Church?"

Stalin: "As an advocate of free conscience and of worship I consider such a policy to be inadmissible and precluded".

Orlemanski: "Do you think co-operation is possible with Pope Pius XII against coercion and persecution of the Church?"

Stalin: 'I think it is possible".

3. Stalin agreed to publication of these questions and answers and indeed seemed eager that Orlemanski should secure the necessary permission from his superiors.

4. Orlemanski has been clearly far more interested in matters of the Church than in the Poles as such. Them,he has largely left to Lange of whom he spoke with disparagement. He told me [grp. undec.] that he himself had had a direct invitation to come to this country from Stalin and that Lange had muscled in on it. He had grumbled about this to Stalin who had sympathised regretting the publicity which Lange's wife was giving to her husband's journey and had suggested Orlemanski deserved some publicity too. Hence photographs, broadcasts etc. My informant who studied Orlemanski closely as an interesting specimen described him as vain and boastful and a mixture of great naiveté and peasants' shrewdness.

5. Orlemanski formed a low opinion of the Vassileewska and said that she and her Communists were quite out of fashion. He spoke well of Mikolaiczyk and hoped that he would break away from his Government in London to become head of the new government representative of the Polish people.

6. Lange has now returned to Moscow and I hope to see him soon. There has been a marked difference between his treatment by the Soviet Government and that given to Orlemanski whom they have been at pains to honour.

7. In the light of recent harsh attacks on the Vatican in the Soviet press, it is interesting to note that Stalin now seems to be willing to parley with the Church.

IMPORTANT.

My telegram No. 2336.

After long conference with Mr. Hull officials concerned are conservatively optimistic regarding despatch of instructions to Armour and early consultation with Brazil and His Majesty's Government.

2. In to-day's press Sumner Welles again pounds at "disastrous non-recognition policy" of the United States Government, in both Argentina and Bolivia; maintains that other Governments are deeply concerned and restive; and urges some American Government to take the lead in summoning a consultative meeting to end "the intolerable impasse".

3. Inter-American Economic Development Conference initiated by Rockefeller, which opens in New York to-day, is expected to increase the demand in business circles for the removal of the political barrier blocking the preparations for post-war economic development of Latin America as an aid to increased United States exports. Canada has been invited and is sending an official observer. The Argentine delegates will also participate and are optimistic as regards the satisfactory "back door" results.

Introduction by Right Honourable Winston Churchill Prime Minister of the United Kingdom

My Lord Chancellor, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, My Lords, ladies and gentlemen:

We are met here to-day to give a hearty welcome to Mr. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada. We have known him a long time, and the longer we have known him the more we have loved him. He comes here from Canada to attend our gathering of Empire leaders; he comes here as one who has played an unrivalled part in the forward march of Canada.

Like most of us here, he is a party politician. Well, there is nothing to be ashamed of in that! But I say without hesitation that there was no other man, and perhaps there was no other career which any man could have followed, which would have enabled our honoured guest of this afternoon to lead Canada united into the heart of this world-shaking struggle.

He has brought Canada to the greatest development of her power. It is extraordinary to think what Canada has done in this war. The unending crash of events, one scene of drama succeeding and overlapping another, the intense absorption of people of every age, sect and class in the war effort, hardly enabling them to draw breath —all this makes us incapable of appreciating a tithe of what is going on, what has been going on in Canada, under its Government headed by one who has been twenty-five years the leader of a party and eighteen years Prime Minister of the Dominion. With all that is being done there, we may well ask to be excused if we have not followed it all in the detail it deserves.

Canada, with her eleven million people, has guarded the heart and citadel of the Empire during the most perilous months in its history. There was a time when the Canadian Corps stood as our principal method of defence between the enemy's gathering invasion hordes and this vast City of London. And Canadians have become a naval people. They have gone to sea. Not only do they build ships, both of peace and war, but they man them, and fight them, and have contributed in a notable degree to the destruction of the U-boat menace.

As for the air, Canada is the home of the British Empire and Commonwealth in central organization. Her geographical and other conditions have facilitated this, and from the fields of Canada have come a race of airmen who have not only gathered unsurpassed honour, but will continue to be an asset for the greater unity which underlies all written or legal constitutions for the British Empire.

My friend, Mr. Mackenzie King, I have known for well over forty years, first in politics and then in personal friendship, and I know well the many steps he has always taken throughout that period leading up to this great climax of the development and demonstration of the power of Canada. Canada has a future which none can measure. The representative of this magnificent people will give us to-day a conception not only of the general participation of Canada in the Empire, but of the particular character of her contribution which, in our vast and varied organization, is always to be welcomed.

Canada is the link which joins together the old world and the new, which links the vast American people with whom, I trust, we shall ourselves develop a fraternal association. Canada, bound by sacred ties to the Mother Country, and also by terms of the deepest intimacy and friendship to the United States, clamps the whole structure of this benignant, unfearing, glorious British Empire together into one homogeneous mass which, when crisis comes for the world as a whole, will never fail in its duty.

I call upon Mr. Mackenzie King.

Address by Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King
Prime Minister of Canada

Prime Minister, Lord Chancellor, Mr. Speaker, My Lords and Members of the House of Commons:

When I received from you, Prime Minister, the invitation to address members of both Houses of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, I found myself at a loss for words in which to acknowledge so high an honour. Your kindness in presiding on this occasion, your words of introduction, the traditions and associations of Westminster, and the presence in such numbers of the Lords and Commons add greatly to my sense of obligation.

I am only too well aware of all that it means to be the guest of the people of Britain, and to be speaking to them, and to others, from the heart of the British Commonwealth and Empire, at this moment of supreme crisis in human affairs. Your friendship and mine over many years of peace, and our close companionship throughout the years of war, to which you have made so kind a reference, afford me a support I greatly welcome in addressing this distinguished assembly.

As to my part in Canada's entry into the war, it was but the discharge of the responsibility which was mine to give expression, in a decisive hour, to the will and spirit of the Canadian people, and to serve their highest interests.

Four years have now passed since you, Prime Minister, accepted the leadership of the people of Britain and the leadership of the cause of human freedom. You and your colleagues have led this country, and the cause for which it stands, from the dark days of extreme peril, to this hour when at last the light is beginning to break. It is a source of confidence throughout the free world that you are continuing your leadership with a vision and a courage which have already become a legend.

I recognize that, for me, this occasion is designed as a welcome to Canada's representative at the meeting of Prime Ministers of the British Commonwealth. For the high compliment being paid Canada to-day, I should like to express my gratitude and pride.

I know that the welcome you accord to me is equally heartfelt and generous towards the representatives of Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. I should like to say to Mr. Curtin, Mr. Fraser and Field Marshal Smuts how great is the admiration of the people of Canada of their leadership, and of the heroic part which their countries have taken in this war. I should also like to say to them how glad I am that our presence in London at this time affords to us all not only exceptional opportunities of conference with the Prime Minister of Britain and his colleagues, but of making clear to the world the oneness of the nations of the Commonwealth in the winning of the war and in seeking international co-operation after the war.

Greetings from Canada

Perhaps I may be allowed to convey a special message from the people of Canada to the people of Britain.

No memory of happiness in the past is more cherished than the recollection of the visit of Their Majesties the King and Queen. In Canada, as in Britain, the years of war have heightened the admiration and increased the affection felt by men and women everywhere for our King and Queen. We have been inspired by their courage and devotion in sharing the dangers and sorrows of the people. In all the nations of the Commonwealth, their example has deepened the meaning and significance of our common allegiance to the Crown.

The heroic endurance of the people of Britain is ever present in our minds. We shall never forget your resolution in the darkest days of the war. Nor shall we ever cease to remember the determination with which, amid destruction of your homes and in peril of your lives, you, the men, women and children of Britain, have continued to carry on your work and to maintain your confidence in the future. Clearly the maintenance of human freedom has depended upon the preservation of the freedom of Britain. It is our greatest pride, as it is the greatest pride of other British nations represented here, that when, for so long a time, you alone bore the brunt of the attack, we stood with you in arms against the might of Nazi Germany. The free nations of the world can never forget that it was the indomitable resistance of the people of Britain that bought the precious time for the mobilization of the forces of freedom around the globe.

The Strength of Britain

Britain has also been an example to the world of the organization of a free people for a common task. You have astonished the world by the marvels of your industrial production and by the skill and efficiency of your workers. You have never lost your faith. A new energy, a new confidence have been generated in your people. These will endure. And your faith, tested and tried in the fires of affliction, will be firmer and stronger than it has ever been.

When victory is won, you will still possess the same initiative, vigour and endurance; the same skills of hand and brain; the same qualities of mind and spirit. These have enabled the people of Britain to make a contribution to the winning of the war which, man for man, no other nation has surpassed. In peace as in war, these qualities will remain. In the building of a better world after the war Britain will be able, by the force of her example, to give the same leadership that she has given in the waging of war.

The Spirit Underlying Canada's War Effort

It is, however, not of Britain but of Canada that I am expected to speak on this occasion. I should like, therefore, if I may, to speak to you particularly of the spirit of Canada, as exemplified in Canada's war effort. I do this with less embarrassment as a like spirit, I know, animates the war efforts of all the nations united in a common allegiance to the Crown. I should like to speak, as well, of what that spirit signifies for the future of the British Commonwealth and of its relation with other nations in the building of a new world order.

In speaking of Canada's war effort it is not my intention to describe our contributions to the present world conflict primarily in terms of men and materials. What I should like to refer to are certain aspects which, viewed collectively, reveal the spirit of the Canadian people.

A Voluntary Effort

I place first the aspect I regard as most significant. Canada's war effort is a voluntary effort. It is the free expression of a free people. Like the other nations of the Commonwealth at war to-day, we entered the war of our own free will; and not as the result of any formal obligation. Ours was not primarily a response to a call of blood or race. It was the outcome of our deepest political instinct—a love of freedom and a sense of justice.

As our decision was a voluntary decision, so the effort of our people in carrying on the war has been a voluntary effort. In Canada, as in other countries, controls and restrictions have been imposed in order to prosecute the war with vigour and efficiency. But at every stage these measures have received the overwhelming support of the Canadian people.

Canada's population numbers eleven and a half millions. Three-quarters of a million of our finest young men are serving in the armed forces. This military demand on our manpower resources has not prevented our country from doubling its pre-war production. Thanks to the skill and devotion of our men and women, Canada is a granary, an arsenal, an aerodrome, and a shipyard of freedom. Our country has become increasingly proud of the fact that every fighting man from Canada serving across the seas, on the seas and in the air is a volunteer. We can say, in very truth, that our effort in this war is a voluntary effort.

An Immediate Effort

Canada's decision to enter the war was an immediate decision. When, in 1939, the last hopes of peace were fading from the world, I announced that, if Britain took up arms in the defence of freedom, our government would ask Parliament to place Canada at Britain's side. When war came, there was no hesitation. As soon as Parliament could act, Canada was at war.

In those days few if any of our people believed our country stood in immediate danger of attack. What we sensed immediately was the issue. We saw that a bitter struggle had begun between freedom and domination and that the conflict would certainly spread. For the second time in a generation Canada went to war to help prevent tyranny in Germany from extending its domination to other parts of the globe.

When the last war ended the people of Canada, like other freedom-loving peoples, hoped and believed that peace and freedom had been assured to mankind for generations. In our National War Memorial, that hope and that faith were symbolized by inseparably joined figures of peace and freedom. But all our history, all our political experience told us that freedom in Canada could not survive in a world that was no longer free.

An All-out Effort

From the beginning, our war effort was so planned and organized that we might reach, as rapidly as possible, the maximum effort our people could sustain during a long war.

We expanded our Navy as fast as we could build or acquire the ships and train the men. We expanded our Army to the highest strength we believed we could maintain in a long war. We expanded our Air Force to the limit of our capacity to secure the needed equipment and to train personnel.

The British Commonwealth Air Training Plan was expedited and expanded beyond all anticipations. The one hundred thousandth fighting airman has just completed his training. The co-operative training in Canada has vastly increased the joint strength in the air of the United Nations.

We have expanded our war industries far beyond the needs of our own armed forces. Despite the withdrawal of hundreds of thousands of men from the farms, the fisheries, the mines and the forests, we have greatly enlarged our production of foodstuffs and raw materials. We are devoting about half our total production directly to the waging of war. We are paying about half the financial cost of our war effort out of current revenue from taxation. Through victory loans and war savings, nearly every family is helping to finance the war.

In fighting men, in weapons and munitions, in food and in finance, we are seeking as a people to make our utmost contribution to the fight for world freedom. Our objective has been a total effort for total war, and we believe that objective is being attained.

A Pioneering Effort

Of the nations of the western hemisphere, Canada was the first to defend in arms the frontiers of the freedom of the new world. For more than two years our country, alone in the Americas, was at war. In more ways than one our effort has been a pioneering effort.

A Co-operative Effort

Canada's contribution to the present war has been the greater because we live side by side with the United States. Without the harmony and reciprocity which exist between our two countries neither could have achieved so much in the common cause. The ability of both Canada and the United States to defend the North American continent and to fight abroad, has been greatly increased by our arrangements for joint defence and by the pooling of resources.

We have sought to make our war effort, wherever possible, a co-operative effort. The extensive military works undertaken in Canada in conjunction with the United States have provided a remarkable instance of close and friendly co-operation. Ours is surely the supreme example of a smaller nation living in the fullest security and harmony side by side with a very powerful one.

As a part of our war policy, Canada is sharing, with other of the United Nations, ships, machines, weapons and other supplies which, as I have said, we are producing far in excess of the needs of our own armed forces. Since the war began we have supplied to Britain, and to Britain's armed forces, war materials and other supplies worth nearly nine hundred million pounds ($4,000,000,000). Almost half of these supplies represent an outright contribution. Under our system of mutual aid, war materials have, for the past year, been supplied without payment to the United Nations, in accordance with strategic need. Canada is now supplying mutual aid to Britain, Australia, the Soviet Union, China and the French Committee of National Liberation.

A World-wide Effort

As the war has progressed, our effort has become more and more a world-wide effort. Canadian-made machines and munitions of war have been used on all the fighting fronts. Canadian 'sailors and merchant seamen have served on all oceans. Our airmen have fought in the battle of the skies around the globe. From the early days of the war our soldiers have helped to guard this island. They have seen active service in the Pacific area, as well as at Dieppe, and in the Italian campaign. To-day our army awaits the word of command to join with their comrades in the liberation of Europe. The morrow will witness Canadian forces taking part in a final assault upon Japan. Canada's effort has truly become a world-wide effort.

An Enduring Effort

I need scarcely say that we are in this war to the end. Canada's fight for freedom will be a fight to the finish. It is clear to our people that this war is all one war: a monstrous conspiracy of the fascist powers to dominate and enslave the world. Having taken up arms of their own free will, the Canadian people will not relax until freedom is secure. Canada's effort will be an enduring effort.

A Long-range Effort

We have also sought to look beyond the war; to make our effort a long-range effort. The Canadian pepole, no less than the people of Britain, whose sacrifices have been so great, need the promise of a brighter future. To sustain us in our endeavours, we all need the vision of a new world order.

By co-ordinated action, by mutual aid, by continuous co-operation, the United Nations are achieving military victory. The widest measure of co-operation will be no less needed in the making and keeping of peace. While our primary aim, like yours, is military victory, our ultimate aim, like yours, is a better future for mankind.

A National Effort

Above all, our war effort must be viewed as a national effort. Our decision in 1939 was more than the free choice of a free parliament. It was the most solemn act of a free nation. Our war effort appeals to our national pride. We have sought to make it worthy of Canada.

Identity of Effort Throughout the Commonwealth

I have spoken of the war effort of Canada. May I hasten to say again that a like spirit has animated the war efforts of each of the other nations of the Commonwealth. With due allowance for varying conditions, the several aspects of Canada's war effort have been paralleled in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. When war came four nations, all of them thousands of miles from the scene of the conflict, ranged themselves at the side of Britain. To each the issue was plain; from each the response was immediate. Each is seeking to put forth the utmost effort. The contributions of all bear the imprint of the initiative and self-reliance of the pioneer. Co-operation has marked their course throughout. Each is making a long-range effort which will prove to be an enduring effort. It is the pride of each that its war effort has been a national effort.

The Spirit of Freedom

Nor have we far to seek to discover the cause of this identity of effort. The spirit of a nation is not readily defined. It is known only as it is revealed. It resembles the flow of waters hidden beneath the earth's surface. From time to time and from place to place the waters having their origin in some secret source reveal themselves as springs, or streams, or rivers. So also, from time to time, a nation's spirit wells up from its source and manifests itself in the collective acts of a people. Such collective action is quickened and heightened at a time of war.

The war efforts of the nations of the Commonwealth owe their inspiration to a common source. That source is the love of freedom and the sense of justice which, through generations, have been nurtured and cherished in Britain as nowhere else in the world.

The terrible events of 1940 revealed how great was the menace to freedom and how suddenly freedom might be lost. So long as freedom endures, free men everywhere will owe to the people of Britain a debt they can never repay. So long as Britain continues to maintain the spirit of freedom and to defend the freedom of other nations, she need never doubt her own preeminence throughout the world. So long as we all share that spirit, we need never fear for the strength or unity of the Commonwealth. The voluntary decisions by Britain, by Canada, by Australia, by New Zealand, and by South Africa are a supreme evidence of the unifying force of freedom.

The Strength and Unity of the British Commonwealth

This common effort springing from a common source has given a new strength and unity, a new meaning and significance to the British Commonwealth and Empire.

Without attempting to distinguish between the terms "British Empire" and "British Commonwealth", but looking rather to the evolution of this association of free nations, may I give to you what I believe to be the secret of its strength and of its unity, and the vision which I cherish of its future. "We . . . who look forward to larger brotherhoods and more exact standards of social justice, value and cherish the British Empire because it represents, more than any other similar organization has ever represented, the peaceful co-operation of all sorts of men in all sorts of countries, and because we think it is, in that respect at least, a model of what we hope the whole world will some day become."

This vision, I need scarcely say, is not mine alone; indeed, the words in which I have sought to portray it are not even my own. They were spoken thirty-seven years ago by one whose fame to-day is not surpassed in any part of the world if, indeed, it has been equalled at any time in the world's history. They are the words of the present Prime Minister of Britain, uttered by Mr. Churchill in 1907. As they continue to reverberate down the years, they bring fresh inspiration to all who owe allegiance to the Crown and increasing hope to mankind.

Visions of youth, sometimes, "die away,
And fade into the light of common day."

They fade not because the vision is ever wholly lost, but because resolution wavers, because determination fails, because of seemingly insuperable obstacles. It has not been so with Mr. Churchill. He has not to ask

"Whither is fled the visionary gleam?
Where is it now, the glory and the dream?"

The glory and the dream—are they not being realized, at this very hour, in the strength and unity of the nations of the Commonwealth?

Means of Consultation and Co-operation

From time to time it is suggested that we should seek new methods of communication and consultation.

I believe very strongly in close consultation, close co-operation, and effective co-ordination of policies. What more effective means of co-operation could have been found than those which, despite all the handicaps of war, have worked with such complete success?

It is true we have not, sitting in London continuously, a visible Imperial War Cabinet or Council. But we have, what is much more important, though invisible, a continuing conference of the Cabinets of the Commonwealth. It is a conference of Cabinets which deals, from day to day and, not infrequently, from hour to hour, with policies of common concern.

When decisions are taken they are not the decisions of Prime Ministers or other individual Ministers, meeting apart from their own colleagues and away from their own countries. They are decisions reached after mature consideration by all members of the Cabinet of each country, with a full consciousness of their immediate responsibility to their respective Parliaments.

Let us, by all means, seek to improve where we can. But in considering new methods of organization we cannot be too careful to see that, to our own peoples, the new methods will not appear as an attempt to limit their freedom of decision or, to peoples outside the Commonwealth, as an attempt to establish a separate bloc. Let us beware lest in changing the form we lose the substance; or, for appearance's sake, sacrifice reality. I am told that, somewhere, over the grave of one who did not know when he was well off, there is the following epitaph: "I was well; I wanted to be better; and here I am."

The Hope of the Future

In the passage I quoted from Mr. Churchill a moment ago I gave only a part of what he said. He set forth, as well, the means of realizing his vision of peaceful co-operation. "Let us," he said, " . . . seek to impress, year after year, upon the British Empire, an inclusive and not an exclusive character."

Like the nations of which it is composed, the British Commonwealth has within itself a spirit which is not exclusive, but the opposite of exclusive. Therein lies its strength. That spirit expresses itself in co-operation. Therein lies the secret of its unity. Co-operation is capable of indefinite expansion. Therein lies the hope of the future.

Commonwealth and World Co-operation

It is of the utmost importance to the Commonwealth that there should continue to be the greatest possible co-operation among its members. In like manner it is, I believe, of the utmost importance to the future of mankind that, after the war, there should be the greatest possible co-operation among the nations of the world.

Our wartime co-operation is not the product of formal institutional unity; it is the result of agreement upon policies of benefit to all. Moreover, they are policies that make an appeal "to all sorts of men in all sorts of countries," provided only they are men of good will.

If, at the close of hostilities, the strength and unity of the Commonwealth are to be maintained, those ends will be achieved not by policies which are exclusive, but by policies which can be shared with other nations. I am firmly convinced that the way to maintain our unity is to base that unity upon principles which can be extended to all nations. I am equally sure that the only way to maintain world unity is to base it upon principles that can be universally applied.

The war has surely convinced all nations, from the smallest to the greatest, that there is no national security to be found in the isolation of any nation or group of nations. The future security of peace-loving nations will depend upon the extent and effectiveness of international co-operation.

It is no less true that it is not the great powers only that are needed to defend, to preserve, and to extend freedom. We should be false to the freedom for which we are fighting if, at any time, we failed to remember that no nation liveth unto itself; and that nations, great and small, are members one of another.

Prosperity like Security, Indivisible

It is not merely the security of nations that is indivisible. Their prosperity also is indivisible. Few would wish to return to the years before the war, when almost every nation sought economic security in economic isolation from its neighbours. What happened was that the economic security of all nations was destroyed. Now is surely the time for the whole world to realize that, just as no nation of itself can ensure its own safety, so no nation or group of nations can in isolation ensure its own prosperity.

For my part, I profoundly believe that both the security and the welfare of the nations of the British Commonwealth and, in large measure, the security and welfare of all peace-loving nations will depend on the capacity of the nations of the Commonwealth to give leadership in the pursuit of policies which, in character, are not exclusive but inclusive. How far such policies can be successfully pursued will, of course, depend on the extent to which other nations are prepared to pursue similar policies. But let us, at least, wherever that is possible, give the lead that is in the interests of the world as a whole.

Canada and the United States

You, Prime Minister, have referred to the importance of strengthening the fraternal association that now exists between the British Commonwealth and the United States.

Over many years Canada's relations with the United States have been especially friendly. Throughout the war, we have followed the path of co-operation. We like to think that our country has had some part in bringing about a harmony of sentiment between the United States and the whole British Commonwealth. That harmony is the foundation of the close military collaboration which is proving so fruitful in this war.

It will ever be a prime object of Canadian policy to work for the maintenance of the fraternal association of the British and American peoples. When peace comes it is our highest hope that the peoples of the British Commonwealth and the United States will continue to march at each other's side, united more closely than ever. But we equally hope that they will march in a larger company, in which all the nations united to-day in defence of freedom will remain united in the service of mankind.

The Supreme Crisis

We are approaching, in the European theatre, the supreme crisis of this long and terrible struggle. In this fateful hour it is imperative that everything be done to maintain single-minded concentration on the achievement of victory. That is our first obligation. It is our duty to the humble people in all the Allied countries whose patient endurance, unremitting toil and ready acceptance of the burdens of war have made possible the immense strength in war materials and supplies of the United Nations. It is our duty, above all, to the millions of fighting men who, with their lives, are defending our freedom and the freedom of mankind.

The assurance of unfailing support to our sailors, soldiers and airmen is the supreme objective of the present meetings of Prime Ministers. We have met here, first and foremost, in order to do everything possible, by co-operation and by united action, to assure that support in largest possible measure on all the fighting fronts.

The present war is different from any war in the past. It is different in scale. In any accurate geographical sense, it is the first world war in history. It is a war that is being fought not only on land and at sea but also in the clouds, miles above the surface of the earth. It is, moreover, a war that is not confined to the material realm. It is a struggle for the control of men's minds and men's souls. Its outcome will shape the moral destiny of the world.

The support of our fighting men and our debt to all who are near and dear to them must extend beyond the theatres of war. It must look beyond the end of hostilities. We owe it to all who bear the heat of the strife; we owe it to those who are crippled and maimed; we owe it to the many homes that are bereaved; we owe it to the memory of those who give their lives; to do all in our power to ensure that their service and their sacrifice shall not have been in vain.

A More Abundant Life

In the past, the sacrifice of human life in war has been commemorated in monuments of stone or bronze. After this war we must create a more fitting memorial. That, I believe, will be found only in securing for others the opportunities of a more abundant life. Already we of the British Commonwealth and Empire are a community of many nations, of many races and of many tongues. Already we have advanced far in the art of responsible government, in the practice of international co-operation, and in the application of the principle of mutual aid. Surely it is ours to help fashion a new world order in which social security and human welfare will become a part of the inheritance of mankind.

The war has been none of our making. We sought, above all else, the promotion of peace, of understanding and of good-will. We deplored the extension of war to all parts of the world. Yet in the perspective of Time this world-encircling danger may prove to have been a blessing in disguise. Only in this way, perhaps, could other nations as well as our own, have come to see that the interests of Mankind are one and that the claims of Humanity are supreme.

Our first duty is to win the war. But to win the war, we must keep the vision of a better future. We must never cease to strive for its fulfilment. No lesser vision will suffice to gain the victory over those who seek world domination and human enslavement. No lesser vision will enable us fittingly to honour the memory of the men and women who are giving their all for freedom and justice.

In the realization of this vision, the governments and peoples who owe a common allegiance to the Crown may well find the new meaning and significance of the British Commonwealth and Empire. It is for us to make of our association of free British nations "a model of what we hope the whole world will some day become."

Mr. Churchill:

My Lords and gentlemen, I call upon the Lord Chancellor to propose a vote of thanks to our honoured guest.

The Lord Chancellor (Right Hon. Viscount Simon):

My Lords and Members of the House of Commons:

Mr. Speaker and I have been asked to express in a few sentences the gratitude which we both feel to the Prime Minister of Canada for his presence and speech. The demonstration which followed the close of his address shows that, indeed, no long argument is needed. We are very grateful to Mr. Mackenzie King for saying, with so much eloquence and vigour, many wise and stimulating and hopeful things. I think we are especially grateful to him for the account which he gave—the brilliant account which he gave—both of the spirit of Canada and of the truly stupendous contribution which that Dominion is making to the common effort. I think Mr. Speaker will join with me if I venture to say to Mr. Mackenzie King, on behalf of this great company, that we do most sincerely express our admiration for all the efforts which this great Dominion is making, and we rejoice to think that we have amongst us the leader of that great people.

It wasn't so many years ago that, when any of us brought visitors into this part of the Palace of Westminster, we were considerably puzzled how to reply to the question, "What is this room for?" The most hopeful answer, I think, was that this large and splendid hall was built in order to find room for two quite enormous pictures which otherwise couldn't be accommodated. That was an injustice to the architect who designed this great hall one hundred years ago. He must have anticipated what would happen. For, thanks now to the way in which Mr. Mackenzie King can leave his country one evening and arrive here the next morning, and other astonishing excursions by other Dominion Premiers, this great hall, lying as it were between the House of Commons and the House of Lords, has become on great occasions such as these a piece of common ground where Members of the two Houses may safely meet and where they can listen to an address without any breach of the ancient and precisely preserved privileges of either Chamber.

We are greatly rejoiced that Mr. Mackenzie King has now been added to the list of those who have thus addressed us. And with all our hearts we thank him for his speech, and wish to express to him in the warmest terms our feeling that that speech and the spirit behind it are all contributing to the unity and the comradeship of the British Empire, which is the surest guarantee of ultimate victory and the best hope of a peaceful world in the future.

Mr. Churchill:

My Lords and gentlemen: It has been my experience over a great many years to await the call of Mr. Speaker, and I am now fully conscious that the tables are turned, and I mean to avail myself of this advantage to the full.

Mr. Speaker (Col. the Right Hon. D. Clifton Brown):

On this occasion, although it may be slightly out of order, I am pleased indeed to obey the call of the Prime Minister.

Now I second this vote of thanks to Mr. Mackenzie King with great warmth indeed. I am only going to utter two sentences to you. In one I want to echo the warm appreciation we have of all that our fellow Britishers have done in the Dominion of Canada, under the leadership of Mr. Mackenzie King. We stand lost in admiration of the effort which they have put forward in this war. That's my first sentence. My second is this: That I believe Canada is building up something even greater than action in this war. I speak now, if I may, for Members of the House of Commons, and I believe for the Members of the House of Lords too,—we are lost in admiration, it has struck our imagination, the Air Training scheme which Canada has set up. Therein you have the cream of all young men, not merely from Canada but from all the rest of the Dominions and from the free nations of the world, meeting together, training together, forming bonds and links which I think the Prime Minister of New Zealand described the other day as "invisible, yet stronger than steel." Those, I believe, are the links which are going to bind our Empire together in the future—of incalculable strength and incalculable value to the British Empire.

For all that work the Canadians and Mr. Mackenzie King are doing on our behalf, I thank him most warmly and for the speech which he has given to us, which I beg to second.

Mr. Churchill:

All in favour of the vote of thanks to Mr. Mackenzie King, say Aye.

Aye!

Mr. Mackenzie King:

Lord Chancellor, Mr. Speaker:

I thank you warmly for the exceedingly kind words which you have just spoken. May I thank you again, Prime Minister, for words that touched my heart very deeply, and which I believe will meet with warm response in the heart of Canada.

I again thank the Members of the House of Lords and the Members of the House of Commons for their great courtesy in being present this afternoon in such numbers. May I thank you especially for the "Aye" which I heard when the Prime Minister put the resolution to this gathering. "Ayes" are always pleasant to the ears of Government.

Following from Ambassador to Greece telegram No.1.

[Begins]

My telegram No.305.

I spent this morning at village in the Lebanese mountains 30 miles from Beirut where the Greek delegates for the conference have now assembled. There I met the Greek Prime Minister, the delegates from E.A.M. and its sister organisations and the delegates from Cairo. The party from Athens arrived after I had left. The atmosphere seemed very cordial in these genial surroundings.

2. M. Papandreou said he had had a discussion last night with M. Svolos and his colleagues from the Political Committee during which he had been well supported by M. Venizelos and others who had come from Cairo. His object had been to impress upon them the fact that the mutineers had acted in the name of the Political Committee, that they had done the Greek cause great harm in the eyes of the world and that M. Svolos and his friends therefore must recognise these facts and accept their responsibilities. M. Svolos said his committee had had nothing to do with the mutinies and that he was horrified to hear what had happened.

M. Papandreou said that he intended to devote to-day to informal discussions, opening the conference properly tomorrow. He would, after his opening speech which would deal with the recent Greek situation in the Middle East and with the objects of the conference, call on E.A.M. to speak. He hoped to devote the first day's proceedings to a condemnation of the mutinies in Egypt and of the civil war in Greece and he would invite E.A.M. to join in these declarations. This would clear the decks for the more constructive side of the conference. He was not without hopes that even if a full agreement were not reached, he might drive a wedge between the more moderate members of the Political Committee and the Communists.

I will try to restrain the Vatican and to explain your point of view. But I fear it will be badly received. Among the counter-arguments I should expect are that the Pope is the Primate of Italy and that he is therefore justifiably concerned in and reliably informed of the sufferings of the Italian people; further that in his rôle of the universal dispensor of charity he cannot reject the pleas of his Bishop [group undec.]; that his sole motive is to save the people unconcerned in the war from unmerited [group undec.] suffering, that the Italian Government capitulated and the Italian people is now accepted as co-belligerent; that the Vatican should not be blamed if it brings to our notice cases in which it believes that aerial attacks have been made without military justification; and that it should rather be applauded for enabling us to vindicate ourselves if we have been unjustly accused.

4. I also had a long conversation with M. Svolos at his request. He is a mild pleasant-spoken professor willing to admit that he is new to practical political life. His case was that the Communists of whom he was not one, were pro-British like all other parties in Greece, that they sincerely desired unity and were not attempting to seize power for themselves. Did I not regard the inclusion of a majority of non-communists in the Political Committee as a proof of this?

5. I replied I had received too much information of a much less pleasant character to be able to accept this rosy picture of E.A.M.'s actions and ambitions in Greece. It would be for the members of the conference to establish the facts and agree upon a solution. As far as His Majesty's Government were concerned they had but one desire, viz, that the Greeks of all parties should achieve the widest measure of unity against the enemy in association with their Allies and leave their internal differences to be settled after liberation. We had been profoundly shocked by the Civil War in Greece and by the mutinies in Egypt, and I hoped that he, M. Svolos, would take a lead at this conference in disassociating himself and his colleagues from recent events both in and outside Greece.

6. I reminded M. Svolos in conclusion that we were on the eve of critical events in the War when the Allies must all keep close together. This was not the moment for internal differences among the Greeks nor, I added for Greeks of any party to try to play off their Russian ally against their British. If my strictures against [group undec. ?Communist] party in Greece were unjust they were based upon their own propaganda. A government of National Unity would become a reality if a new beginning were made not only on paper but in a concrete sincere collaboration. M. Svolos assured me that this was indeed the end for which he was working.

This conversation which was initiated by M. Svolos may have done some good but I am told that he has a weak character and that the Communists will pull the strings.

In his speech in the assembly on May 10th d'Astier again referred rather solemnly to the grave consequences that might arise in the Resistance Movement owing to the interference with communications. I am not telling him as suggested in paragraph 3 of your telegram that his remarks have produced a painful impression as that is probably exactly what they were meant to produce.

2. I avoid discussing the question so far as possible for I cannot tell the French the truth which is that they are notoriously most unreliable in all matters of secrecy and that we shall tell them as little as possible and give them as little chance as possible of repeating what they know. IMPORTANT

At the seventh meeting of the Technical Committee held May 3rd, minutes following by bag, Allied representatives pressed very strongly for sweeping measures to defeat German plans to smuggle wolfram.

2. They point out the heavy German buying during April and consignment to Irun could only be for one purpose and Spaniards were pressed:

(a) to [grp. undec] "Guia" system to prevent movement from the mining area.

(b) to seal German source of raw materials,

(c) to take inventories of all contents and

(d) to confiscate any mineral found in unregistered warehouses.

3. Spanish representatives showed their determination to have the agreement carried out properly and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was consulted about the proposed measures; during the meeting the Minister for Foreign Affairs gave orders to summon a conference of departments likely to [?grp. omitted ? be] affected so that he could explain the Spanish Government's intentions. He has written personally to the Ministers concerned.

4. Financial Adviser has since learned semi-officially the Generals' [grp. undec] presented a memorandum to Franco last Saturday in which he asked for full powers over the departments concerned to enable him to put the measures recommended into practice. The memorandum was very strongly worded and excellent in all respects. It has not been confirmed whether he was granted the powers he asked for but he addressed the departmental conference on May 9th. This confirms our earlier impressions that energetic measures are being taken to see that agreement in regard to wolfram is carried out.

I should have added that Campbell told Hoppenot it would surely be greatest pity and a signal error on the part of French Committee of National Liberation if because of the interruption of communications they threw away the advance gained through the statement you had made based on Hull's speech and failed to take advantage of discussions on a practical military basis between Eisenhower and Koenig. H. said that inability to communicate in French cypher did make these discussions difficult. He added from the general point of view that a friendly word "said with a smile" from His Majesty's Government and the United States Government would be helpful. The lack of this had hurt.

Wheat.

Following from Twentyman.

My telegram No. 2440. May 9th paragraph 4. At resumed discussion, when we were joined by Wheeler, U.S.D.A., and Carr, State Department, Wilson put forward a paper containing six Canadian price proposals. Summary of this paper is in my immediately succeeding telegram.

2. Following comments relate to six Canadian proposals seratim..

Proposal one. United States of America rejected out of hand the proposed minimum price of ninety cents and stated categorically that they would not be able to accept anything below one hundred Canadian cents as a minimum and that they had found great difficulty in accepting anything below one hundred United States of America cents. On the principle of an agreement providing a floor and no ceiling I maintained and elaborated position indicated in paragraph 2 of my telegram No. 2440 and in verbatim notes of council meeting April 27th. Wheeler said that he agreed on broad ground with [sic ? ly] objection in principle to an agreement of this character though he thought he might be able to sell it to the U.S.D.A. if everybody else agreed. I am [grp.undec. ? fairly] confident that neither Appleby nor McCarthy would agree. I commented on this proposal that if the Wheat Council were at this time to tell the world that all they had been able to do in the way of an agreement on price determination was to say that the price should not fall below ninety or one hundred Canadian cents they would become a laughing stock.

Proposal two. Apart from the proviso this proposal is identical with that reported in paragraph six of my telegram

No.2195. I said that under pressure I had reported it to you for instructions but had so far received none - I held out no prospect that you would be prepared to accept this extension of our last proposal. United States of America rejected the proviso as involving them in recognising the existence of a [grp.undec. ? valid] relationship between the United States of America domestic ceiling for food wheat and the Canadian export price. United States of America also said firmly that they could not accept justification (c) at all.

Proposal three. I said that this proposal seemed to me to be the only one offering any prospect of a successful issue to our negotiations but United States of America rejected it.

Proposal four. The United States of America rejected the proposed undertaking by them on the ground that it involved their recognition etc., as in respect of proposal two. I said that we might be prepared to consider an exchange of notes on the lines proposed if the suggested undertaking to give sympathetic consideration could be confined in its application to the price of wheat sold to the United States of America by Canada.

Proposal five. This proposal was first put forward on April 6th, vide paragraph 4 of my telegram No.1800 and verbatim notes of International Wheat Council 6/3, pages 43 et seq. I maintained previous position. I am not altogether sure, however, that an arrangement of this kind might not faute de mieux be preferable to no agreement at all. It is objectionable if considered in the light of Canada's present position in command of unique seller's market but we can fairly presume that they will not be in this position on the cessation of hostilities and that the "last bulk purchase" contemplated in this proposal might well be a freely negotiated purchase. If so there is undoubtedly merit in a proposal to freeze the price of the last bulk purchase for 6 months after the end of hostilities. But I feel strongly that we should not encourage a proposal of this kind at all unless and until we are completely satisfied that agreement is impracticable on the basis of a price range to come into immediate operation.

Proposal six. The United States of America could not agree to this if the last bulk price were to be less than a dollar Canadian and I said firmly that we could not agree to it if it were as much as a dollar Canadian. What in fact it was was not disclosed.

3. The discussion which was amicable and long produced a further tentative Canadian proposal viz. to defer the present discussions for six or nine months in the hope that in the meantime the United States importation of Canadian wheat for feed will have been discontinued and that the essential Canadian difficulty will in consequence have been removed.

4. In connexion with proposals 2, 3 and 4 there was produced a draft note by the State Department to the Canadian Embassy which had resulted from the bilateral discussions arranged at the council meeting of April 28th (vide my telegram No.2195) and a draft Canadian reply. It was made clear that these drafts had not been accepted by and would probably be unacceptable to the Canadian Government. The United States of America draft said in effect.

(a) that the price of United States of America produced wheat was regulated by law under a parity formula and reflected the general price level.

(b) that the general price level was not increased, was not increasing and that it was not the intention or policy of the United States of America administration that it should increase. The draft did not contain anything at all about sympathetic consideration but the covering note from the State Department said that although an effort had been made to include in the draft note an undertaking to give sympathetic consideration, etc., as the Canadian Government had requested, it was regretted that it had been found impossible to do so in as much as such an undertaking would have involved the United States Government in recognising a valid relationship between United States of America domestic ceiling price for wheat and Canadian export price.

5. After a long discussion of this particular part of the problem, which is really the root of it, I succeeded in getting the United States of America and Canadian delegates to agree to consider, before a further meeting early next week, whether a solution could be reached on either of the following bases.

(a) an exchange of notes between United States of America and Canada in which the United States would in effect say (1) that they could not recognise a valid relationship between the United States domestic ceiling price for wheat and the Canadian export price. (2) that for the reasons given in the draft note summarised above it is unlikely that the price of commodities governed by the parity formula will increase substantially in the future.

3. But in the contrary event the United States Government would recognise that any considerable rise in the general price level in the United States would constitute reasonable ground for reconsidering the maximum price of any international range now to be agreed in respect of Canadian sales to the United States.

(4) That.....

(4) That in the event of an increase in the United States general price level bringing about a material increase in the present United States domestic ceiling price for corn (maize) the United States Government would be prepared to give sympathetic consideration to a request by the Canadian Government that Canada's price to the United States for wheat should not continue to be restricted to the international maximum.

(b) the insertion in the proposed international agreement of a proviso to the effect that the maximum price of the agreed range should not apply to sales by anyone of the four exporting countries signatory to the wheat agreement [grp.undec.]

6. The second alternative proposal was attractive to the United States representatives in as much as it avoids dealing in terms as a special case with United States and Canada and also because it avoids specific discrimination against Canada by the United States which the State Department representative found very difficult. My impression was that both United States and Canadian representatives were hopeful about reaching agreement on some such lines. If so we shall have achieved success but wanted a lot of time. See paragraph 8 of my telegram No.578 of February 4th. When I put suggestion (b) above to the United States and Canadian delegates at that time they both said with confidence that it was politically quite impossible.

7. The Canadian position is clearly that

(a) they want a guaranteed floor for a long time in the later war and post war periods.

(b) they do not want to be deprived by an international agreement of the prospective benefits under a rising United States price level of their very lucrative abnormal export trade in wheat to the United States so long as that may last. But it would be unreasonable not to recognise that in the event of a major inflationary rise in United States prices Canada would have to increase their export prices to United States, in view of the increased prices that Canada would be paying for imports from United States, the contiguity of the two areas and the inevitable interrelation of their economies.

8. If this can be recognised, in some way confined to the United States and Canada, and provided we are not led into recognising the United States general price level as an appropriate index for the general purposes of an international agreement I should think it wise for us to encourage such an arrangement but I await your guidance and instructions and meantime shall of course not commit you.

Your telegram No. 442.

In an attempt to clear up some of the misunderstandings here in regard to recent conflicting reports from British and French Representatives in Beirut on the subject of the disorders and subsequent developments, the Counsellor called on Meyrier on May 8th to discuss the position. The Counsellor explained the various instructions which had been sent by you to the British representative and the action which according to the latter's reports had been taken, in case General Beynet had failed to furnish the French Committee with a complete account. M. Meyrier expressed satisfaction as regards the instructions. The following points however emerged from the conversation:-

(1) Meyrier said that instructions sent to General Beynet were to protect French and pro-French elements in case of vindictive action by Lebanese authorities. Use of word "retaliation" in my telegram No. 508 was therefore not quite accurate and reaction of General Beynet reported in Beirut telegram No. 255 to you may thus be explained.

(ii) The presence of British representative at Lebanese Cabinet Council before actual outbreak of disorders of April 27th had been reported by General Beynet. Counsellor then explained position to Meyrier as instructed in your telegram No. 442. Latter stated that British representative may not actually have been present but might have been summoned for consultation while Cabinet was sitting. In this connexion references in paragraph 3 of Beirut telegram No. 252 to you were subsequent to disorders.

(iii) Meyrier stated that Commissariat for Foreign Affairs were a little hurt that when Beynet had taken trouble to go and see British representative (see Beirut telegram No. 255 to you) latter had immediately taken him to task on subject of retaliation. It was felt that it might have been more courteous, if British representative had in first place referred to action which he himself had taken to calm feeling (see paragraph 7 of Beirut telegram No. 255 to you). As a matter of fact General Beynet in his report on the conversation had never mentioned points discussed in that paragraph.

(iv) General Beynet reported that, when he had seen Lebanese Prime Minister on subject of written report from Minister of the Interior (see paragraph 3 of Beirut telegram No. 231 to you) Prime Minister was quite unaware that latter had acted in this way, and expressed view that British Minister might have misunderstood verbal remarks of Minister of the Interior. According to Meyrier, Minister of the Interior had either acted without approval of Cabinet and in that case was not fit for post or that the British representative had himself put into writing views of Minister of Interior and communicated them to General Beynet. This hardly seemed correct procedure.

(v) M. Meyrier assured Counsellor that instructions from Algiers were only sent to General Beynet who then passed them on to all civil and military authorities under his charge. He considered that General Beynet had full control over all concerned and would not have offered to allow British official to take part in the enquiry, if he felt that he had something to conceal as regards any sinister French intentions (see paragraph 6 of Beirut telegram No. 231 to you). It was quite possible however, that personal opinions had been expressed. This was only in keeping with democratic principles.

2. Meyrier concluded by saying that the British representative in Beirut should intervene as little as possible in Lebanese internal affairs except to encourage restraint on part of Lebanese authorities. If latter realised that French and British were allies fighting the same war, they would possibly behave more prudently.

3. The foregoing discussion may be useful in showing present feelings and state of mind of Commissariat of Foreign Affairs and extent to which all our activities in Lebanon are viewed with suspicion.

My telegram No.166.

I visited head of Spanish Nationalist Cabinet this morning who told me the following

a) The Germans had now been verbally notified that they must close their Consulate and leave Tangier but no dates had been mentioned. The German Charge d'Affaires' reply was that he must await instructions from Berlin.

b) Japanese Military Attaché had been similarly notified and told that as he was a member of the staff of his Embassy at Madrid he must rejoin his Mission there and not continue to reside away from that capital. Hasebe had asked for this in writing but the Spaniards had replied that as his coming here had not been arranged for in writing they could give him nothing except a verbal notification of departure. Again no dates had been mentioned.

2. General Orgaz had apparently reported to his Government that during [sic] my interview with him on Monday last May 8th, I had gone away extremely content with the state of things. You will understand that this is a lie. I was however as conciliatory and polite as possible and I shall continue to be so when I see him again on May 15th.

While I note Mr. Yencken's suggestions that we should confer pressure here on the Spanish authorities I feel that I must continue at least to make "enquiries". I should like you to know I have acted and shall continue to act in a most conciliatory manner vis-à-vis Spaniards but I feel that we here must at least show interest in the departure of Germans and the closure of the German Consulate General.

My telegram No. 260.

Replying to a Parliamentary Question on clashes in the Lebanon, the Prime Minister said that the Government's enquiry into events of April 27th was being pursued with complete impartiality and uninfluenced by any rumours. The total number of persons detained was false. Contrary to malicious reports that had been circulated, they were being well and fairly treated.

2. The Prime Minister went on to pay a warm tribute to Beynet, who, he said, had recently given renewed assurances of his determination to implement Catroux's policy and had indeed, ever since his arrival, repeatedly demonstrated the sincerity of his assurances. The Lebanese authorities, for their part, had made known their desire to maintain cordial relations with the French in order to carry on the process of achieving complete independence.

Your telegram No. 330.

There is no Costa Rican Embassy at Buenos Aires but Argentine Consulate General Costa Rica has been closed and the Consul-General who was also Chargé d'Affaires returned on leave and public statement to this effect refers to the Costa Rican Government not having recognised him.

2. Subject to general reservation that there might be at any time change of mind on the part of the Argentine Government or liberal counter revolution inside the army (although there are at the moment no indications of either) I submit the following observations on numbered points in your telegram.

1. General feeling here is that the Brazilian Government have implicitly recognised the Argentine Government and although Brazilian Secretary General apparently thinks otherwise, Brazilian Counsellor will cut ridiculous figure if he relapses into aloof attitude.

2. I do not think the Argentine Government want the Peruvian Ambassador (an ex delegate of Peru) or myself to leave and may be largely for this reason that they have refrained from any open measures to make Mr. Armour's position impossible. Latin American representatives generally have had the impression that their Governments would object to withdrawing them and even European Allied Governments have had the same impression about themselves.

4. I gather that Mr. Armour's fear of embargo on supplies is due to the hints from Latin American colleagues. I personally consider hot heads in and behind the Government might take this risk if they persuade themselves that such action or threat of it would produce rapid change on the part of Mr. Hull and therefore would be of short duration. This was perhaps implied in General Farrell's emphatic warning that the shortage of rubber etc would inevitably result in the drying up of supplies to the United Nations.

3. In my telegram No. 499 of yesterday, I referred to the new proposals which Mr. Armour has been discussing with me. In his contemplated proposals, offer of recognition would be associated with promise of substantial concessions urgently needed for supplies to Argentina; on this basis we ought at least to get the Argentine Government to make a public declaration with convincing details of anti-espionage and anti-smuggling campaign, and effective action regarding Axis diplomatists which would save face for the United States Government. I have so far had no success regarding German contracts or anti-Allied newspapers and cannot say whether firm offer of concessions would be effective on these points.

4. You will appreciate my difficulty in offering any constructive suggestions which do not involve some climb-down from the attitude which the United States Government adopted in February without waiting to hear the views of the Brazilian Ambassador (see my telegram No. 192 of February 25th) or myself; faced by Mr. Armour on February 25th with fait accompli and knowing that His Majesty's Government would follow Mr. Hull's lead I could only register my doubts as reported in my telegram just referred to. As on previous occasions the United States authorities concentrated attention on past records of Argentine ministers whilst I have always considered that the real question was how best to handle them.

5. As regards the danger noted in your point 3 which is increased by the personal reaction of Mr. Hull to Mr. Sumner Welles' criticisms, would it not be possible to suggest to the State Department that for once His Majesty's Government should take the initiative so that Mr. Hull could defend himself by saying that he had had to recognise the special position of His Majesty's Government? Although I only suggest this for special case, I do not know why it has always been taken for granted that His Majesty's Government must be the very junior partner in the Argentine triangle since British trade, British investments, and British colonies in Argentina are all vastly more important than those of the United States and we have admittedly always known better how to deal with the Argentines.

Widespread interest among Argentines has been aroused by document published by Foreigners Association regarding Argentina as reported from New York by Associated Press. Document says "Argentina is proud of her independence and considers trade negotiations with other Latin-American republics as acts of reverence by vassal states of our country. There is no reason to believe that Mexico or Cuba if they were as free of threats of reprisals as Argentina, would adopt a very different attitude. Moreover Argentina as the richest, most prosperous and most modern of the Latin-American nations and as having the highest proportion of white inhabitants believes her natural mission is to assume direction of affairs of continent." The document refers to Argentine army as "a lion without teeth" owing to lack of materials. It concludes United States difficulties must be removed by arrangement under which Argentina would sell to Great Britain but buy from United States, who in their turn would make compensatory purchases in British markets.

2. United States Ambassador considers the publicity given to these views most unfortunate particularly coming on top of further leakages about the impending purchases of Argentine maize and wheat by the United States.

My telegram No. 500 paragraph 2.

In his reply to General Farrell President Vargas stated as reported in press "please accept my grateful thanks and that of the Brazilian people for your message and for all demonstrations of sympathy of the Government which Your Excellency presides over and of Argentine nation on the death of our Ambassador for whom we grieve".

2. If there is any difference between the use of the above words and the recognition of General Farrell's Government I fail to see it.

Trial of Admiral Derrien opened here on May 10th before a military tribunal under presidency of M. Verin assisted by one civilian and three military judges. Prisoner was accused of

(a) having in November and December 1942 as commander at Bizerta capitulated to the enemy and surrendered fortress which had been placed in his charge without having exhausted all available means of defence and having done everything which honour and duty required, and

(b) having on December 8th 1942 in his position as commander of the naval forces been responsible for handing over to the enemy a number of war vessels and other units. These acts constituted crimes which were punishable under Articles 238 and 240 of the Military Code.

2. At the request of General Weiss, Public Prosecutor, the Court decided on grounds of national security that public trial should be held in camera.

Words used were as follows:

"Within their own country Frenchmen wish to be laboriously disciplined and numerous and in a clear, healthy and strong democracy. Towards states, territories and peoples which it is their duty to lead towards a better destiny, and in the first place towards noble Tunisia, they wish to be understanding, active and generous. In Europe, to which they hold fast and to which they are bound by a link so strong that, if Frenchmen are torn, Europe also is torn; and Europe alone without them would be doomed to chaos; in Europe which remains the great source of man's activity and even of his riches, Frenchmen desire, once the enemy has been chastised, to be a centre [? grp. omtd: ? of] direct and practical co-operation in the West; in the East, first of all, the permanent Allies of dear and powerful Russia. In the world where always and everywhere men rediscover their friendships, their influence, their interests, Frenchmen wish to be the model builders of this international and brotherly organisation, of which throughout their misfortunes and divisions all men on earth dream."

My telegram No. 547.

I spoke to Massigli last night. He asked what interest Great Britain could have in the fate of Admiral Derrien. I said that we were interested in two ways. Firstly, we feared that his execution would produce a bad effect on the French fleet at a critical moment of the war. He undertook to consult M. Jacquinot about this.

2. Secondly, I said that we were concerned for the future of France. If the Committee executed all who had felt it their duty loyally to serve Vichy, they would produce a blood bath from which only disaster could emerge. Derrien had acted under orders. Surely the place to draw the line was between those who had given the orders and those who had obeyed them. The credit of the Committee was at stake. They could not wish to be thought bloodthirsty and they could not fear to be criticised for postponing punishment until the whole of the people of France could be consulted.

3. He took what I said in good part and promised to see what he could do but said that he was sure that the people of England would have no pity for an Admiral who surrendered his ships to the enemy when he might at least have sunk them.

4. He did not (repeat not) appear to have heard of Admiral Byng.

Financial Adviser called on the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to ask whether measures had been taken with regard to the prevention of wolfram smuggling since the last Technical Committee meeting when Allied representatives made certain suggestions.

2. In the course of the interview, Senor Pan produced three letters dated May 3rd that General Jordana had sent to the Minister of Finance as controlling Customs; to Minister of the Interior as controlling Civil Guards and Carabineros; and to General Davila as head of Consejo Ordenador. The letters were excellent in every respect and strongly worded. He explained what the agreement meant to Spain and how the agreement would fall down if wolfram exports were not confined to the agreed quota. He pointed out to these Ministers that as the Germans had over 1000 tons already warehoused, it was ridiculous that they should be moving more wolfram from mining areas. He told the Minister of Finance that he was going to deal with the Director General of Customs himself and to advise him that proper precautions should be taken at the warehouses that no wolfram could leave unless by the authority of the Spanish Government within the terms of the agreement. To General Davila he said that he must at once investigate the reason for German buying and consignment of wolfram from the mining area and that as there appeared to be no reason for this, he should take steps to stop all movement. In other words he has adopted our suggestions. We shall endeavour to see that they are followed up.

3. Copies of the letters were sent to Franco.

My telegram No. 828.

I regard possibility of inducing Dr. Salazar by negotiation or smooth words to agree to settlement analogous to that obtained in Spain as excluded for the following reasons.

(1) Having stood up (in refusing embargo) to very strong pressure from many quarters, having nobbled President Carmona (as I have no doubt is the case) by persuading him that our attitude towards the position of wolfram is unreasonable and unfair and having made what he no doubt feels is a good offer (on a percentage basis he could claim that it compares favourably with Spanish settlement) Dr. Salazar feels he is in a strong position.

(2) Divergence (in absolute quantities) between his offer and Spanish settlement is too wide.

(3) There is nothing he would dislike more than a settlement on exactly the same lines as Spanish one as this would do violence to his passion for showing his independence and would give the impression that settlement had been forced on him.

(4) He has just suppressed strikes without difficulty and has got the labour situation in hand at least for the time being.

(5) He is convinced that unlike the Americans we shall always in the last resort refrain from proceeding to extremes. (This has always been the strength of his position).

2. I am as good as certain therefore that he will only yield under threat (and certainty that it will be carried out) of really serious consequences.

3. If we are prepared to make threat and see it through we must decide what form it is to take.

4. I will offer some suggestions shortly.

P.M.M.(44) 11TH MEETING
(WEDNESDAY, 10TH MAY, 1944).

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX, MINUTE 1

CIVIL AVIATION

LORD BEAVERBROOK said that three main points had been under consideration in his recent discussions with the representatives of the U.S. Government about civil aviation. The first, international control of trunk routes; the second, bases, and the third, cabotage.

His general purpose in these discussions had been to make the best possible arrangements for the future while keeping controversial issues out of the way and he thought that the discussions had, in fact, resulted in clearing the air without disturbing the United States.

As regards the first point, the meeting would remember that the Commonwealth conversations six months ago had considered this issue and had been averse from international operation, but when the matter was further considered by a Sub-Committee presided over by Captain Balfour, the Sub-Committee had favoured international control, which had finally been adopted. When he opened his discussions with Mr. Berle, Mr. Berle had asked for what was in fact unrestricted competition. He had first urged on Mr. Berle the Canadian draft Convention which embodied a detailed plan for an international regulatory authority to provide for technical requirements etc., with powers of enforcement. That Convention was set out in a brilliantly drafted document. The United States negotiators had, however, been entirely unwilling to accept that plan, which they felt would infringe the sovereign rights of the United States and, after further discussion, he had abandoned it in favour of the recommendations of the Balfour Sub-Committee, and the proposals for international handling of civil aviation then accepted, which the Americans regarded as sufficiently flexible to provide a basis for an international conference. In the outcome Mr. Berle had agreed to go to an International Conference on the basis of the findings of the Balfour Sub-Committee. He felt himself that at that Conference the United States would insist on a measure of freedom and for a more loosely built structure than we might wish for, and that situation would have to be dealt with when it arose. Meanwhile, the Canadian Government was drafting a document for use in connection with it and we had been asked to join with Canada in getting that document into a shape that would be acceptable both to us and to the United States.

As regards bases, he had in his discussions adopted the formula proposed by the Australian and New Zealand Governments which was supported by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom. He had been at pains to handle the discussions in a non-challenging, though in a fair and determined, manner. The effect was that we should hold firmly to our bases until we could reach a satisfactory international agreement for control, and he had secured acceptance of this point of view by the American negotiators.

As regards cabotage, the reservation to a nation of all traffic within its territories, we had claimed that it extended to traffic between the United Kingdom and the Crown Colonies and the Empire, excluding the self-governing Dominions and India, and after discussion that claim also had been accepted by Mr. Berle. Nor had Mr. Berle contested that in the self-governing Dominions and India the Governments of those countries could claim cabotage. He felt that this was satisfactory since it enabled us to safeguard the position of cabotage in Newfoundland until a Government was restored in that Dominion which could deal with the question itself.

He thought that we should try to establish a Commonwealth and Empire route. He had not laid any specific proposals before this Meeting, but if encouraged to do so, he would at once consult with the technical advisers of the Dominion Prime Ministers. If the results were good, a joint project could result. What he had in mind was a Commonwealth and Empire route round the world, which would not prejudice our present good understanding with the United States and could be used equally by all.

Since cabotage had been conceded by the United States and difficulty was accordingly unlikely to arise over it at the proposed International Conference, Colonel Stanley would have to consider what action in regard to it should be taken in areas of the Empire in which the Dominions were closely interested, as, for example, Canada was in the West Indies.

On the matter of the chosen instrument for civil aviation, Mr. Berle and his friends were for private enterprise and could not be budged from that position. He was unable to say what the attitude of this country would be. Different views were held and some favoured doing without the chosen instrument. He had thought it well to defer that issue until after the war effort had reached its climax, because of its controversial aspect.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that he had no comment to make.

MR. CURTIN said that he was in general agreement with Lord Beaverbrook's statement. He would himself like a chosen instrument. So far as the British Commonwealth line was concerned, he was agreeable to the idea and, in general, was prepared to adhere to what His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom had in view as expressed by Lord Beaverbrook.

MR. FRASER said that an agreement on the whole of this matter had been reached between the Governments of Australia and New Zealand at Canberra on 21st January, 1944. Under that agreement:-

"The two Governments agree that the regulation of all air transport services should be subject to the terms of a convention which will supersede the Convention relating to the Regulation of Aerial Navigation.

The two Governments declare that the air services using the international air trunk routes should be operated by an international air transport authority.

The two Governments support the principles that:

(a) Full control of the international air trunk routes and the ownership of all aircraft and ancillary equipment should be vested in the international air transport authority, and

(b) The international air trunk routes should themselves be specified in the international agreement referred to in the next succeeding clause.

The two Governments agree that the creation of the international air transport authority should be effected by an international agreement.

Within the framework of the system set up under any such international agreement the two Governments support:

(a) The right of each country to conduct all air transport services within its own national jurisdiction, including its own contiguous territories, subject only to agreed international requirements regarding safety facilities, landing and transit rights for international services, and exchange of mails.

(b) The right of Australia and New Zealand to utilise to the fullest extent their productive capacity in respect of aircraft and raw materials for the production of aircraft, and

(c) The right of Australia and New Zealand to use a fair proportion of their own personnel, agencies and materials in operating and maintaining international air trunk routes."

He trusted that Lord Beaverbrook would be successful in the negotiations that lay ahead. New Zealand would stand in with him on them.

The question whether the United States were to be left alone to operate across the Pacific, was a matter of great concern to his Government. It would, in his judgment, be fatal if the British Empire did not have a route across the Pacific. There had been difficulty before the war about landing rights in Hawaii, the United States expressing itself as ready to reciprocate in return for rights in the Trans-Tasman route, but pointing out that if these rights were in fact conceded the Japanese would benefit by them. That difficulty no longer existed, and there was reason to think that the United States would now be willing to let us have reciprocal rights. The United States airways would probably take alternative routes via New Caledonia to Australia as well as to New Zealand. But that would be a United States and not a British service and his Government wanted a British service. He thought that the best course might be to make the Trans-Tasman operating organisation a Trans-Pacific one, making any rearrangement necessary to bring Canada in with Australia and the United Kingdom. While it might be possible to arrange for the requisite landing grounds in Hawaii (possibly at Lord Beaverbrook's proposed conference) he still felt that the British Commonwealth Governments should own their own line, at any rate across the Pacific. LORD BEAVERBROOK said that the possibility of using Christmas Island and Fanning Island might be considered if there was any difficulty over Honolulu. He thought that as things were now shaping aircraft following that route could carry a pay-load. MR. FRASER felt that even if there was no pay-load it was essential to have a service running under the British flag if New Zealand was not to be isolated.

MR. CURTIN said that the Australian Government thought that there should be two routes. They would be glad to see British air interests in the Pacific expanded and would do their best to support though the question of subsidy would present difficulty in view of the heavy demands for expenditure on the essential internal air services. They were anxious also for a British route to Great Britain, possibly via Darwin. The problem of long-distance hops however seemed likely to give rise to serious difficulty.

In reply to Field Marshal Smuts, LORD BEAVERBROOK said that subject to the views of the Dominion Prime Ministers the next stage would be an International Conference, in which we should base ourselves on the findings at the Commonwealth Conversations for the international handling of civil aviation. He thought the wisest course would be to reach agreement with the Americans at that Conference, even at the cost of some concession, but to build up a Commonwealth and Empire organisation in addition to what we arrange with the United States. Commercially the proposition was a sound one. If the Dominions approved it would be desirable that we should get together with the Dominion representatives and try to give life to the Empire route.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that he was quite agreeable to the discussions continuing. Meanwhile we should go on with launching the Commonwealth and Empire route and we should do our best in the conversations with the United States.

SIR FIROZ KHAN NOON said that the Government of India agreed that there should be a Commonwealth and Empire organisation. India would come in and contribute her share, both in personnel and money. The very large number of air bases which had been developed in India during the war were the property of the Government of India and the United States would have no claim to them. He assumed that there would be no international control on the Commonwealth and Empire world route.

SIR GODFREY HUGGINS said that he agreed with Field Marshal Smuts.

MR. MACKENZIE KING said that there was general agreement that Commonwealth air communications should be developed, but it was important that each country or combination of countries inside the Commonwealth should develop those lines that were especially important to them, and that there should not be a single Commonwealth holding or operating company. Each Dominion would be responsible for controlling its own part. He was all in favour of an international authority if one could be secured, and for bringing in the United States. We ought, however, to bear in mind the danger of working up the Commonwealth and Empire line before agreement had been reached with the United States. On a point raised by Mr. Fraser, who expressed the hope that the Canadian Government would come in on the Pacific side, he said that this whole subject was still under very careful consideration by the Canadian Government and that he did not want to commit himself to any particular plan.

LORD BEAVERBROOK said that there was complete understanding with the United States, and that the proposed Commonwealth and Empire line would not be an alternative, but a parallel, to the line which it was hoped to negotiate with them. As regards Sir Firoz Khan Noon's enquiry about international control, if we succeeded in securing at the proposed Conference the degree of international control we had in view, matters such as quotas, frequencies, etc., would be controlled under some International Convention subject to compliance with which the countries concerned would have a free hand as regards operation.

MR. ATTLEE said there seemed to be general agreement that we should go forward both with the International Conference and with discussions for an all-Empire route.

Following declaration is being issued at 17.00 hours BDST tomorrow 12th May simultaneously in London, Washington and Moscow.

2. [Begins]. Through the fatal policy of their leaders, the people of Hungary are suffering the humiliation of German occupation. Roumania is still bound to the Nazis in a war now bringing devastation to its own people. The Governments of Bulgaria and Finland have placed their countries in the service of Germany and remain in the war at Germany's side.

The Governments of Great Britain, the Soviet Union and the United States think it right that these people should realise the following facts:-

(1) The Axis satellites, Hungary, Roumania, Bulgaria and Finland, despite their realisation of the inevitability of a crushing Nazi defeat and their desire to get out of the war, are by their present policies and attitudes contributing materially to the strength of the German war machine.

(2) These nations still have it within their power, by withdrawing from the war and ceasing their collaboration with Germany and by resisting the forces of Nazism by every possible means, to shorten the European struggle, diminish their own ultimate sacrifices and contribute to the Allied victory.

(3) While these nations cannot escape their responsibility for having participated in the war at the side of Nazi Germany, the longer they continue at war in collaboration with Germany the more disastrous will be the consequences to them and the more rigorous will be the terms which will be imposed upon them.

(4) These nations must therefore decide now, while yet there is time for them to contribute to the inevitable Allied victory, whether they intend to persist in their present hopeless and calamitous policy of opposing that victory. [Ends].

My telegram No.448 [of 9th May: trial of Admiral Derrien].

Reuter message from Algiers dated 10th May states that two Allied officers, one British and one American, were present at preliminary session on 10th May, that one of them was a General and that both have the right to be present throughout the proceedings.

2. In view of categorical instructions in my telegram under reference, I assume that above report is inaccurate and that no British officer was in fact present. Please report the facts and action taken by telegram.

IMPORTANT

My telegram No. 79.

Cabinet met yesterday and passed the major part of the decrees regarding purge of Fascists. A Committee was appointed to study constitution of a Consultative Assembly.

2. Most of the time was expended in discussing the interview given by the Crown Prince to representative of the Times (please see Air Mail edition of the Times of April 26th, page 5) in which he indicated that the Italian people could not shirk the responsibility for Italy's entry into the war. The communique refers to the interview and says "holding that it is not in the Constitutional and Democratic idea that representatives of the Crown make political statements not agreed by the Government, the Council unanimously refutes any imputation directed towards the people in regard to any responsibility for the Fascist war."

3. General MacFarlane is seeing the Marshal to-day to warn him against allowing subjects being brought up that might lead to the break-up of the Cabinet (which meets again to-morrow).

King Farouk has been indisposed past few days.

2. I saw him at a charity ball last week - he looked particularly surly. Even his aunt by marriage, Madame Hussein Sirri, told me later that she had purposely refrained from approaching or greeting him.

3. I expect to see him next week, taking the Maharajah of Jaipur (now staying with me) down for a talk.

4. Without some such pretext it is not particularly wise to ask for audiences too frequently. It at once starts political speculation and intrigue and the atmosphere is already charged enough. Furthermore, I have to watch my step to avoid Government suspicion. But I shall as always take any reasonable pretext to see him from time to time.

President of the Republic has been informed accordingly. He would naturally be glad to know as soon as any even approximate indication can be given him regarding date of which M. Shamoun is likely to be able to proceed to his post.

Since Government do not wish to lose Shamoun as a deputy, President's idea was to appoint him officially for 6 months only with faculty of later renewal. It was pointed out to him that this was somewhat unusual from a diplomatic point of view, and he eventually agreed that nomination itself should contain no such limitation, though it might have to be explained in the Chamber that Shamoun's appointment would be reviewed after six months. I presume that there would be no objection to this (not repeated).

Debate on resistance took place in Assembly on May 10th. It was opened by the President of the Assembly who paid a tribute to Belgium and Holland on the anniversary of the German invasion and to Soviet Russia on the fall of Sebastopol. A resolution was adopted containing a message of congratulations to Stalin on the victory.

2. Emmanuel d'Astier, Commissioner for the Interior, gave a moving account of the situation in France illustrated by a description of the acts of heroism and of the suffering shared by the whole nation of men and women alike. He stressed the need of arms and equipment for secret army, acknowledged the effort made during the last few months but regretted the delay which reduced the value of consignments owing to greatly increased measures of repression employed now by the German authorities. Commissioner regretted the new communication arrangements between London and Algiers dangerously limited contact between French Committee of National Liberation and resistance movement. Principle was no doubt justifiable but none the less it should have been applied with more care.

3. A number of delegates took part in the debate but only speech of interest was that of Hauriou a member of the Independent Resistance Group as Vice-President of the Assembly who made an excellent and well-balanced statement criticising lack of a well-defined policy towards National Council of Resistance and pleading for a better organisation of aid in arms and money destined for France. Hauriou's reference to the interruption of cypher communication was of all the most moderate. He emphasised the necessity of absolute military security but expressed the hope that a modus vivendi would be arranged enabling confidential information to be transmitted to Algiers.

4. Commissioner for the Interior wound up the debate by claiming that during the six months he had in office he had already remedied the main criticisms mentioned by the delegates during discussion. An order of the day calling the Government to render all possible help to resistance movement in France was then adopted and the President announced Assembly would meet again on May 12th to hear the Commissioner for Foreign Affairs.

5. Text of debate follows by despatch.

Since conclusion of agreement, the Minister for Foreign Affairs has been pressed by his colleagues in Government about early delivery of rubber. As it has been pointed out before General Jordana hopes to show that the agreement with us, which he supported so strongly, has enabled Spain to obtain certain classes of goods which cannot be provided by Germany e.g. rubber, cotton, and petrol. I notice from Washington telegram No. 942 to M.E.W. that the question was to be discussed in Washington on May 9th. I hope that the case for releasing supplies will be pushed with vigour and that an early decision will be reached as the situation [gp. undec. ? in industry] here is desperate and there is little point in providing gasoline if tyres are denied to road transport.

IMMEDIATE

Your telegram No. 567.

I saw Minister for Foreign Affairs this morning and found he had been informed of the conversation reported in my telegrams Nos. 727, 734 and 739. I opened the conversation by handing him an extract from the "Times" of May 3 with tributes to himself and Lord Selborne's statement that agreement was a victory over the Germans not the Spaniards. He was obviously pleased.

I then told him of your concern over the delay in closing German Consulate-General in Tangier and General Orgaz's attitude and handed him a personal letter in Spanish which began by congratulaing him on the agreement and saying that I had kept you informed of progress made in implementing it as regards the Blue Division, the Italian ships and prompt notification on May 3 to the German Government and Embassy of the decision to close the Consulate. It went on to ask for information as to the steps being taken to expel German agents and then drew attention to the situation created in Tangier by the mutilation in the Tangier Gazette of your declaration and the exploitation of it by the Germans which had been made worse by General Orgaz's uncompromising attitude. This had given rise to doubts about Spanish intentions, and to deal with this situation it was essential that a date should now be fixed for the closing of the Consulate and the repatriation of its personnel.

General Jordana read the letter carefully and then said that he could not possibly fix a date. That would be an ultimatum to the Germans and it would immediately lead to further attacks upon him. I argued that a date must be fixed some time, one did that with a tenant over a house, and it should not have to be an ultimatum.

He said that even if Franco ordered him to fix a date he would object. He knew what he was doing and he must be allowed to handle this situation in his own way. The Germans, on being notified, had naturally protested, but they had showed no signs of wanting to resist. I interjected that the Germans in Tangier were giving very different impression. He replied that that was not his information.

I.....

I then said that General Orgaz kept saying that he had no instructions and would not act without them, and this ten days after the agreement was making a very bad impression. I told him that General Orgaz had been instructed to notify the German Consul-General of the decision to close the Consulate and had done so but he had not yet received any detailed instructions as he, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, intended to handle the matter with the Germans. Pressing General Orgaz in the circumstances merely irritated him and did no good. I said that reports were coming from Tangier to the effect that General Orgaz had no intention of carrying out any instructions sent him. The Minister replied that Orgaz was a soldier and an agent of the Spanish Government: and would have to do what he was told.

As I could not move him I said that none of us could ignore public opinion on this question. If tankers arrived to load and the Consulate was still not closed there would be almost certainly a flare up of public opinion in the United Kingdom and United States. Was this worth it? Would he not now stop the Consulate functioning (see Tangier telegram to Foreign Office No. 166) and arrange for the repatriation of its personnel in the next week or so? The Minister for Foreign Affairs would not however commit himself.

Finally after arguing for an hour [? grp. omtd: ? and a] half he agreed that I should telegraph that he confirms that a definite decision had been taken and that the Consulate would be closed "immediately" which when pressed he said meant as soon as possible. Further he would approach the Germans as to their intentions and let me know the result. They had accepted the decision and he did not expect them to be unreasonable nor could he be unreasonable with them. There was after all no time limit set in the agreement nor even the word "forthwith" used in the protocol.

He finished with a plea that we should trust him. The decision had been made and accepted. It was only a matter of carrying it out decently.

Please repeat to Washington as my telegram No. 201.

Secret.

The contents of your telegram under reference have been discussed with the State Department who have also been given an outline of the course of discussion between Dr. Salazar and His Majesty's Ambassador (Lisbon telegram to you No. 820 and following telegrams). While they emphasise very strongly the interest that is being felt here generally in this matter and [7 grps. undec.] they are prepared to leave the negotiations in your hands for the present, though they are ready to put the United States Ambassador at Lisbon into action at any moment when you feel that this may be of help.

2. The State Department's attitude generally is that we should continue to press for a total embargo, but they appreciate that we are more likely to get our way if Salazar can be convinced that the requisite step is in his real interests, and he is left to take it as a spontaneous gesture rather than if a policy of threat is employed. On the other hand they feel that the matter is of great urgency, and that it may be that it will prove necessary through a press campaign here to persuade Salazar of the strength of public opinion in the United States. It is not, however, proposed to take any action here until your views, following the latest discussion with Salazar, are known.

3. The State Department are anxious to be consulted further before any indication is given to Salazar that we would accept anything less than a total embargo. They have been informed of the type of possible compromise which you had in mind (see paragraph 4 of telegram under reference) but pending your further instructions we considered it tactically advisable not to try and secure their definite consent to that compromise at this stage, since this might only make matters more difficult if you should decide to propose any modification respecting His Majesty's Ambassador's discussion with Salazar.

IMPORTANT

My telegram No. 175.

My United States colleague saw the High Commissioner this morning. Orgaz would say nothing except that terms of the agreement would be carried out with diligence. It is noteworthy that the General did not admit

(a) that he had taken any action to notify Germans that they must close consulate General and go, or
(b) that Germans had notified Head of Spanish Diplomatic Cabinet that they had since then orders to this effect from the German Government (my telegrams Nos. 170 and 171).

My United States colleague entirely agrees with me that Orgaz is out to sabotage the agreement all he can by "going slow."

As M. Papandreou has been confined to bed with slight fever since his arrival here, the conference has not opened. Formal opening may not take place before May 14th. By that time the final party of politicians from Athens should have arrived here. These are of some importance as they include two party leaders, M. Mylonas and M. Sofianopoulos and one member of the Liberal Party, M. Rendis.

2. Meanwhile the days are not being wasted. For the first time probably in the political history of modern Greece, men of all parties find themselves living together in the same hotel and having to get to know one another. This in itself is most healthy. They are living in very agreeable surroundings somewhat resembling as they admit to themselves the mountains of their own country. It will be difficult for any one of the groups to take the responsibility of causing a rupture thus destroying the now alluring prospect of real unity. It is not an atmosphere in which the Communists who are the only possible disturbers of the peace will find it easy to go their own way.

2. Meanwhile the days are not being wasted. For the first time probably in the political history of modern Greece, men of all parties find themselves living together in the same hotel and having to get to know one another. This in itself is most healthy. They are living in very agreeable surroundings somewhat resembling as they admit to themselves the mountains of their own country. It will be difficult for any one of the groups to take the responsibility of causing a rupture thus destroying the now alluring prospect of real unity. It is not an atmosphere in which the Communists who are the only possible disturbers of the peace will find it easy to go their own way.

3. In order to keep in close touch and yet [group undec. ? not] intervene too closely in what I tell the delegates is purely a Greek affair, I have installed myself in the hills fortress between Beirut and the seat of the conference. Here I receive daily visits from those who wish to consult me. To-morrow the Communists at their own request are coming to see me. M. Papandreou sends over his information at frequent intervals to keep me informed and make suggestions as to how to handle my visitors in order to promote a spirit of [group undec. ? unity]. M. Venizelos who is now [group undec. ? play] ing up well is also a frequent visitor.

4. M. Papandreou's position has been greatly strengthened by the fact that every member of the first party which arrived here from Athens on May 10th reported the enthusiasm with which his appointment as President of the Council and his public declarations had been greeted in Athens. This has made a strong impression on all the others and has given him undisputed position [group undec.? as] leader of the conference. It has also enabled him to extract from the Communists a statement disassociating themselves from the recent mutinies. M. Papandreou does not wish to publish this statement until he has produced from the conference as a whole a declaration on the subject but he has promised me a copy for any use the G.H.Q. Middle East may need to make of it meanwhile with the Greek armed forces.

5. British, American, Soviet and French journalists have arrived on the scene. I asked the Greeks to handle the press conference themselves which they did most inadequately at the first meeting last night. To-day all the correspondents including the Russians are visiting me. I propose to tell them that His Majesty's Government set great store on an agreement being reached which will produce a Government of national unity from which no party will exclude itself. I will appeal to them to report in a manner most conducive to achieve this result. I am asking Cairo not to censor political despatches from correspondents and to confine censorship to purely military aspect. With such an assurance, we can rely on the correspondents to play a helpful part. From my own experience of press matters, I would say this is a proper risk to take [group undec.].

Your telegram No. 536 paragraph 1 [of May 7th: restrictions on diplomatic communications].

I cannot help thinking that the French authorities are deliberately putting their case before the world in its most unfavourable light instead of trying by an attitude of helpfulness and co-operation to assist us in our search for some arrangement which would satisfy their legitimate essential needs without impairing the principle of no uncensored communications.

2. It is of course true that the Committee has been treated on the same footing as all neutrals; but so also have China and our other Allies such as Poland, Holland and Norway, and I cannot believe that the Committee seriously consider that they either should or could have been given more favourable treatment than these. The French might, moreover, have been expected to have understook and appreciated the vital importance of not omitting any precaution which might help to secure the necessary secrecy of the operations in which they, more perhaps than anyone, are so immediately concerned.

3. As regards (c) the French have no cause for complaint. All communications between London and France are already carried by British channels and their contents are known to us. There is therefore no reason, except an entirely misplaced sense of amour propre, why they should not avail themselves of the arrangements which were worked out between ourselves and Colonel Passy [my telegram No. 440].

From all this I can only conclude that the French are either deliberately trying to blackmail us into making concessions or else are prepared to sacrifice their own real interests and those of us who are concerned with trying to assist them in their struggle for the sake of their outward dignity.

IMPORTANT

Report of Mr. Gabriel Naville, Swiss Camp Inspector to Stalag Luft 3 on 17th April and 18th April has just reached me. He states that on arrival he was officially informed by the camp commandant of the escape of 76 R.A.F. officers on 25th March by means of a tunnel.

Camp Commandant stated that in subsequent investigation a list was found of 190 officers for participation in this escape. 15 escapers had been recaptured and brought back to the camp where they were punished by 21 days arrest: commandant has been informed that 47 had been killed, some while offering resistance on recapture, and others on a new attempt at escape after capture: 14 were still at large.

When questioned by camp visitor, camp commandant declared that he could add nothing to the statement made by higher authority concerning the death of 47 officers.

My immediately following telegram shows

(1) names of escapers reported by German authorities as having been killed

(2) names so communicated as being still at large.

According to information received by the camp visitor from prisoners, Day, Dodge, James and Long are believed to have been recaptured.

Camp visitor adds that the death of 47 comrades caused great consternation in the camp. Senior British officers consider that the German account cannot correspond to the facts because all officers are well aware of how to act on escaping, and that resistance is quite useless: no escaper from this camp had previously resisted capture. It was of course conceivable that a few might have resisted, but in the officer's opinion it was absolutely impossible that so many should have done so: even in that case not all would have been killed. Further recaptured escapers declared that some 30 fellow escapers were seen leaving Gorlitz prison on a lorry, handcuffed under heavy escort of civilian police. They therefore consider it most improbable that any of these should have been killed during a further attempt at escape and suspect that the 47 escapers recaptured were summarily executed by the Gestapo.

Senior British Officer specially asked camp inspector to inform His Majesty's Government that all concerned volunteered to escape and none were ordered to do so.

Immediately on receipt of this report the Head of Special Division of Swiss Legation in Berlin personally approached the Head of the Legal Division of the German Ministry of Foreign Affairs emphasising the necessity for a searching enquiry in view of the heavy loss of life and expressing great surprise that so great a number should have resisted arrest and been killed since they were all fully aware of how to act on recapture. He insisted on the necessity of a pronouncement by the German Government itself in view of the gravity of this matter, especially having regard to the fact that the Swiss Legation had received no communication from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs although the event was already more than a month old. Head of Legal Division declined to express any opinion but took notes and promised to reply.

In view of the grave nature of this case, it would be helpful if you would instruct me to request Protecting Power to take up this matter at the highest possible level in Berlin and press strongly for an immediate official statement on behalf of the German Government.

1. POST-WAR EMPLOYMENT PLANS

MR. BEVIN gave an outline of the U.K. Government's plans for the re-allocation of man-power between the forces and industry during any interim period between the end of hostilities in Europe and the defeat of Japan.

MR. LYTTELTON described the steps being taken to estimate the man-power requirements of industry during the continuance of the war against Japan.

THE DOMINION PRIME MINISTERS thanked Mr. Bevin and Mr. Lyttelton for their statements and expressed the view that the plans could be regarded as very satisfactory.

MR. CURTIN called attention to Australia's immediate man-power problems and stressed his Government's desire to obtain the earliest possible information and advice regarding the contribution in fighting forces which Australia was expected to make in the war against Japan and the demands which Australia would be called upon to meet in respect of the supply and maintenance of other forces. He pointed out that the continued supply of foodstuffs to the United Kingdom from Australia was dependent on the answer to these problems.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS commented on the difficulty of making any accurate forecast as to the out-turn of the war; he thought it might be a mistake to assume that the war against Japan would necessarily outlast the war against Germany by any considerable period.

2. MIGRATION

LORD CRANBORNE recalled that in a dispatch of April, 1943, Dominion Governments had been asked whether, in principle, they would wish to co-operate with the U.K. in a policy of Government-assisted migration, and particularly whether they would wish to encourage migration of demobilised service personnel from this country. The United Kingdom Government realised the difficulties of Dominion Governments in considering this question in advance of arrangements for dealing with their own personnel on demobilisation and in the absence of a clear picture of the future prospects of employment and trade after the war. But there was considerable pressure in the United Kingdom, both in Parliament and outside, for a declaration of policy, and he hoped that the Prime Ministers would accept in principle the idea of co-operating in some form of Government assistance to migration. In that case they might be prepared to agree that possible arrangements, including the difficult question of transferability of social security benefits, should be examined between officials, with a view to subsequent consideration by Governments.

MR. BEVIN referred to a possibility, which he had been revolving in his mind, of whether certain United Kingdom forces could be stationed in peace time in the Dominions to facilitate training. He felt that this would foster the idea of the unity of the British Commonwealth and might appeal to Dominion Governments; it would in his opinion certainly result in an increase in migration to the Dominions.

The meeting agreed to Lord Cranborne's proposal for an examination on the official level of possible arrangements for migration, on the understanding that the results would be for consideration by Governments and that the Governments were in no way committed.

A full account of the discussion on these two subjects is being circulated separately.

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX, MINUTE 1

POST-WAR EMPLOYMENT PLANS

MR. ATTLEE invited Mr. Bevin to make a statement regarding the United Kingdom Government's post-war employment plans.

MR. BEVIN said that he would deal first with the arrangements which the United Kingdom Government proposed to put into operation during the war against Japan after the defeat of Germany. The change of emphasis in our war effort, which the Japanese war would call for, presented certain difficulties. Against Germany we were compelled to put a large army into the field. The prosecution of the war against Japan would on the other hand call for a preponderance of naval and air forces. The United Kingdom Government had decided not to make use of the term "demobilisation" during the continuance of the war against Japan. It was instead proceeding on the basis that a re-allocation of manpower between the forces and industry would take place. It was important that this idea should be fostered, to avoid possible discontent amongst members of the forces who would be employed in the Far East. With this object in view the United Kingdom Government had therefore carried a Bill through Parliament giving all men and women in the Armed Forces a right to reinstatement in their civilian employment, even though the employer might have found it necessary to engage a substitute during the transition period. General demobilisation would not take place until Japan had been defeated.

Some re-orientation of industry would be effected when Germany had been defeated, but until the precise nature of the military requirements for the conduct of the war against Japan were known it was difficult to forecast the extent to which this could be achieved. Military requirements would, of course, over-ride all other considerations.

During the interim period, the National Service Act would remain in force. The call-up of men to the forces would proceed and it was hoped to release for service in the forces numbers of younger men who had hitherto been reserved or deferred. Men re-allocated to industry from the forces during the transition period would be divided into two classes. The Government believed that a fair and reasonable scheme could best be secured on the basis of release according to length of service and age, but recognised that it would also be necessary to make a limited provision for certain urgent reconstruction work on which a beginning must be made in the interim period.

Those selected for release from the forces according to length of service and age would form Class A. Their numbers would correspond to the reduction in the strength of the forces and would be increased in consequence of the calling up of further new recruits. Men would be released in groups on a basis which combined length of war service and age. The exact weight to be given to age and how many years of age were to be regarded as equivalent to how many months of service, would be settled nearer the time. If the scheme had to operate to-day the proposal was that two months of service should count as one year of age, so that, for example, a man of 22 years of age with 4 years' service would be in the same release group as a man of 40 years of age with one year's service. Men selected from the forces for re-allocation to urgent reconstruction work could form Class B. This class would also include a limited number of individual specialists. The number of transfers in it would be small in proportion to the releases in Class A. Additional new recruits would be called up to offset the men released in Class B.

It was essential to the scheme that there should be a clearly marked difference in the treatment of the men released in Class A in their turn, and the men transferred in Class B out of their turn. Men in Class A would be placed in a special reserve category from which they would be recalled only in an extreme emergency. They would be permitted to exercise their reinstatement rights and go back to their old jobs; in other words, they were virtually free to return to civil life. They would be given eight weeks' leave with full pay and allowances, plus further regular payments at full Service rates and allowances for a period assessed in respect of foreign service. War gratuity and post-war credits (on account of income tax) would be placed to their credit in the Post Office Savings Bank, in the hope that this would encourage men to leave most of their "nest egg" untouched.

Men in Class B would be placed on the reserve from which they would be recalled individually to the forces if they discontinued their reconstruction employment. They would be given a transfer grant of three weeks' pay and allowances. Their post-war credits and any other payments due would be held in suspense until the end of the war. Men selected for transfer in Class B would not be transferred against their wish. It would be open to them, if they so desired, to await their normal turn for release in Class A.

By these means it was hoped to carry the acceptance and goodwill of the forces and the public.

Mr. Bevin added that an aspect to which he would return later in discussion was the possibility of settlement overseas of men demobilised from the United Kingdom forces.

MR. LYTTELTON said that Mr. Bevin had referred to the difficulty of estimating the requirements for the continuation of the war against Japan. The United Kingdom authorities concerned had been studying these during the last four or five months. These studies included examination of the nature and quantity of special weapons which would be required, the extent of the forces which, having regard to physical limitations, could be deployed, and the quantity of munitions we could rely on receiving from overseas. At present approximately 40 per cent of our munitions requirements came to us from the United States and the Dominions, and he hoped that at least the same proportion would continue to be received after the defeat of Germany. The results of these studies should be available within the course of the next few months.

MR. MACKENZIE KING thanked Mr. Bevin for his extremely interesting account of the plans which had obviously been prepared wich such care and forethought. He said that the Canadian Government, whose officials had been in close touch with the United Kingdom authorities, were working on parallel lines and had reached very much the same conclusions. As regards the possibility to which Mr. Bevin had referred of the settlement in the Dominions of demobilised United Kingdom personnel, he feared that public opinion in Canada at any rate would be difficult to convince. Until men demobilised from the Canadian forces had all been re-established in civilian employment, the arrival in the country of immigrants on any large scale might be misunderstood.

MR. CURTIN said that he had listened with interest to Mr. Bevin's account. Australia could not however look forward to making similar plans for some considerable time. Her whole efforts were still directed to the prosecution of the war in the Pacific. As the United Kingdom authorities were aware, the Commonwealth Government had been engaged for some time in study of the manpower problem which had arisen on account of the conflicting demands of the Australian forces for replenishment, the United States forces for supply and maintenance and the United Kingdom for agricultural products. The Commonwealth Government had been forced to contemplate a re-allocation of its man-power, not on account of any transition period, but because of the dictates of the war situation with which this country was faced. His Government found it extremely difficult to take decisions in the absence of firm estimates of the demands they were likely to be called upon to fulfil and of the fighting forces which they would be expected to maintain in the field. These questions had been raised in the telegram which he had addressed to Mr. Churchill in October last, to which a reply was still awaited. Since then the position had been further complicated by the receipt of additional requests, e.g. for the manning by Australia of additional R.N. ships. The situation was an unhappy one and he greatly hoped that it would be possible to let him have at an early date, an indication of the contribution in fighting forces which his country was expected to maintain and of the supply and maintenance facilities which it would be expected to provide for other forces. The continued supply of agricultural products to the United Kingdom was dependent upon the nature of the answers given to these questions.

Mr. Curtin went on to comment that the proposals outlined by Mr. Bevin conveyed to him the impression that the United Kingdom authorities contemplated a lengthy transition period and a small military, as opposed to naval and air, contribution to the prosecution of the war against Japan.

The suggestion that men who had served for long periods should be replaced in the United Kingdom forces by fresh recruits, would, in his opinion, involve further delay in the impact against the Japanese enemy. Even the soldier seasoned in European warfare required at least six months training and acclimatisation for jungle fighting.

MR. ATTLEE explained that until the requirements for the continuation of the war against Japan and for the garrisoning of occupied countries were definitely known, it was impossible to determine the level at which the armed forces would have to be maintained. The United Kingdom Government anticipated, however, that taking the armed forces as a whole, considerable re-allocation between them and industry might be possible. As Mr. Bevin had pointed out military requirements would over-ride all other consideration and the primary objective in our minds was to make the maximum contribution we could to the defeat of Japan. MR. BEVIN added that it must be obvious that it would be physically impracticable to ship an army of three million men to the Far East. It would be wasteful to retain them all in the services. The plans he had outlined for the transition period were primarily designed to make use of the surplus which would be available.

MR. CURTIN said that he did not wish to be interpreted as in any way objecting to the proposals for re-allocation between the forces and industry, but he hoped that the necessity for retraining under suitable conditions would not be overlooked and that the detailed examination of his country's manpower problems would be prosecuted with expedition. He realised that an operation on the scale of OVERLORD could not be undertaken simultaneously with operations on a similar scale elsewhere. An early conclusion to the war depended upon success in OVERLORD and he would not suggest that the scale of effort devoted to it should in any way be weakened.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that he thought that the plans which Mr. Bevin had outlined were a tremendous improvement upon what had been done in 1918 and 1919. The military effort of South Africa in the war in the Pacific would be negligible, but part of the S.A.A.F. might perhaps participate. He thought that any forecast regarding the length of the war against Japan must at the moment be entirely speculative. He felt that provided the maritime strategy was successul the end might not be long delayed. Enormous areas, which it would take months or years to fight through on land, could be by-passed by naval power and it might be possible to bring the Japanese fleet to action at quite an early date. A crushing defeat of the Japanese fleet would make it impossible for Japan to continue the struggle.

IMMEDIATE.

My telegram No. 173 paragraph.

Head of Spanish Diplomatic Cabinet asked to see me urgently this morning and spoke as follows.

2. Ten minutes after he had informed me of notification made by Germans he had announced this to General Orgaz in Tetuan by telephone. General Orgaz's comment was "Tell no one and do nothing".

3. Signor Castillo again warned me that although General Orgaz would be forced to take action in the end, he would go as slowly as possible about it (unless possibly pressure was brought to bear upon him in Madrid) in order to produce a complete anti-climax.

4. Signor Castillo furthermore stated that the longer the matter dragged on the stronger the reaction would be in Tangier and I quite agree, although I do not believe that there will be actual disturbances - possibly a lot of violent comment and a street brawl or two engineered by Germans and implemented by Fascist Republicans and Falangists.

5. My United States colleague is seeing General Orgaz this morning and I am meeting the latter tonight at a public ceremony in Tangier so I hope there may be some developments by [sic] pursuant upon pressure that Yencken will have put on General Jordana in Madrid.

6. Please do not mention Signor Castillo's warning to any Spanish officials. While fully realising that in the circumstances of his present relations with Orgaz Castillo is out to "get" the latter there seems no doubt that Orgaz has gone slowly and will continue to go slowly with a view to assisting his German friends and ridiculing us.

Opening the debate on Foreign Affairs on May 12th Massigli said that during the last session in November he had already indicated evolution in the attitude of the Allies towards F.C.N.L. The recent declarations by Mr. Hull and himself show how much this evolution had tended to crystallise despite certain prejudices and hesitations. The Allies henceforward recognise in the Government of France at war natural defenders of French interests. No doubt the feats of French arms had been the cause of this evolution as also had the attitude of the Empire grouped together in the struggle for liberation of the invaded mother country. The growth of international prestige of F.C.N.L. was evident also in the development of its diplomatic relations; France was admitted to conferences on post-war questions; old friendships were being resumed notably with Czechoslovakia; new ties were being formed. The foreign policy of France was marked by achievements: the agreement with Great Britain and Canada; commercial conventions with Spain and Portugal; in Washington conventions were being studied to prepare for the reconstruction of France. When, on April 9th Mr. Hull proclaimed that the civil administration of France would remain in the hands of Frenchmen he drew his conclusions from negotiations which had been undertaken and conventions which had been concluded. The declarations of British Allies conformed with that of Mr. Hull. Without doubt these declarations had contained reservations but that which had not been granted to the French to-day would be granted tomorrow. More and more the governmental prerogatives of F.C.N.L. were being recognised. The revision of Darlan-Clark agreements had not perhaps been followed up as rapidly as might be desired. Time pressed however on the eve of decisive military operations. None the less a solution which would take into account events which would shortly take place on French soil, would no doubt soon be found.

2. Massigli affirmed that his sincere statement should not be taken either as a reproach or a desire for vain recrimination against the Allies. He wished merely to justify the importance of the role which France must naturally play again in the establishment of peace and reconstruction of Europe.

3. He then spoke of the happy development of Franco-Soviet relations and declared France wished that countries of Europe which had suffered misfortune of war should tighten the bonds of friendship which united them to France. French foreign policy had always been the policy of uprightness. Clarity, frankness and loyalty were the best diplomatic weapon. Trickery and Machiavelism had never served

French policy. Italian policy had been the subject of full written discussions. The changes in composition of the Government of Salerno were not sufficient to justify a change of attitude towards Italy seeing that the government of Badoglio had not even repudiated aggression of 1940 nor the armistice which followed.

4. After the war the question of Franco-German relations would remain essential. It was impssible to conceive that conditions of armistice imposed after this war could be established without the participation of France. The defeat of June 1940 which French had suffered and which would have been the fate of any other nation placed in the same geographical position should not allow her sacrifices and feats of arms to be forgotten. Once France was liberated F.C.N.L. would no longer appear merely as an organ with a vocation to represent France but as the Government of the nation which was still a great power. On the eve of liberation he hesitated to use the word peace or give a definition of organisation of post-war world. However, France could as from now make her opinion heard. Peace would not be established without delays; treaties should not be hastily put together as they had been in 1919; the peace should not repeat the errors of the inter war period; for France had weighed the inadequacies of the legal formulaes of Geneva. However the future peace could not strengthen the role of "directeurs" of certain Powers which hold a leading place in the war; if such "directoire" had to be established France would have to be admitted to it. But great obstacle to peace would be the affirmation of sovereignty of the Great Powers. So that peace might reign the Great Powers themselves would also have to submit to the rules which were its foundation.

My telegram No. 644.

German Ambassador returned and saw the Minister for Foreign Affairs on May 11th.

2. The Minister for Foreign Affairs gave me this morning copy of note handed to him by Herr von Papen. Translation in my immediately following telegram.

3. After handing over the note the German Ambassador asked what intentions of the Turkish Government were as to paying for the goods already delivered in expectation of chrome. The Minister for Foreign Affairs said he did not intend to pay cash. Herr von Papen pressed that chrome should be delivered up to outstanding amount of German deliveries. The Minister for Foreign Affairs refused. The German Ambassador then pressed for other goods. The Minister for Foreign Affairs finally promised to examine the position.

4. The interview was of course somewhat heated. The German Ambassador is to see the President. The Minister for Foreign Affairs told me that his intention is to give him a review of the present European situation and to renew his formal protest against the chrome decision.

IMPORTANT

My immediately preceding telegram.

Following is translation of note.

The Government of the Reich have learnt from declaration of Turkish Minister for Foreign Affairs before the Grand National Assembly on 19th April that the Turkish Government have forbidden unilaterally and with immediate effect the export of chrome to Germany. The Government of the Reich take note that this act signifies a breach of the agreement of 9th October 1941 and is contrary to the repeated assurances of the Turkish Government. By this method of procedure the Turkish Government infringed the principle of good faith, which must form a basis of every contractual engagement, especially as Turkey has received the Reich's counterpart of chrome deliveries namely deliveries of war material which were agreed in agreements of 9th October 1941, and 31st December 1942.

2. Even for a "non-belligerent" nation, as the Turkish Government defines the position of their country in the present war, international law does not give the slightest justification for unilateral denunciation or even the rupture of treaties regularly concluded. The behaviour of the Turkish Government is therefore also in complete contradiction to the spirit and substance of the Turko-German treaty of friendship which the Government of the Reich have always been particularly careful to safeguard in the mutual interest of the two countries.

3. The Government of the Reich therefore protests formally first against the declaration of the Turkish Government of 19th April and further reserves all rights accruing from the above mentioned agreement.

IMPORTANT

My telegram No. 733.

I remarked to Minister for Foreign Affairs that he was in an awkward position. Germany was pressing for delivery of other goods of strategic importance both in place of chrome and on basis of renewed Clodius agreement. We on the other hand were pressing for complete cutting off. I did not think that His Majesty's Government would be satisfied with his suggestion of the reduction to 60% or even 50% of last year's deliveries. Nor could I tell him at present what your reaction would be to Hungarian agreement.

2. Minister for Foreign Affairs argued with some force that chrome decision represented an immense step and begged us to be reasonable as regards other commodities. He again cited Portuguese and Spanish analogies. He said that he would be perfectly prepared in time for an agreement with us detailing all strategic commodities which we had mentioned and fixing what essential goods could be supplied by the Allies to Turkey and what it would be necessary for Turkey to receive from the Axis against compensation in strategic goods. To cut off all these goods to the Axis would mean a rupture of relations.

3. I gave very guarded answer and no encouragement. I reminded him that force of circumstances might compel rupture of trade relations with the Axis shortly as communications might be completely destroyed. Minister for Foreign Affairs said with great emphasis that he only wished we would do this. Such action would have his blessing.

My telegram No, 742.

A high official in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs has informed me confidentially that my conversation with the Minister for Foreign Affairs yesterday had more effect upon him than I probably imagined and that he had immediately after it taken further steps, informant thought in Berlin, to accelerate the closing of the Consulate-General.

Informant said that the reason the Minister for Foreign Affairs had not been able to fix a date was because he was awaiting a decision from Berlin.

Informant added that his advice to the Minister for Foreign Affairs had been that a reasonable date for the closing of the Consulate General would be a fortnight after completion of the agreement and he promised to do everything he could to help. I therefore primed him with suitable arguments.

My telegram No.742

The Minister for Foreign Affairs' statement mentioned in last paragraph of my telegram under reference that no time limit was set up in point 3 of agreement for closing the Consulate and that the word "forthwith" used in your statement in the House of Commons (see your telegram to Washington No. 3,594) does not appear in the text is of course [group undec.? amazing]. Incidentally the word (forthwith) did not occur in the original text of proposed statement given in your telegram No.469 to Madrid.

It is also true that during negotiations General Jordana though he used the word "immediate" in Sir S. Hoare's conversation with him reported in my telegram No.269 paragraph C, mentioned that he said he was to be allowed two or three weeks delay over closing the Consulate in view of inevitable German re-actions over wolfram agreement. He was advised by Sir R. Hoare [sic] in view of the time taken over negotiation not to delay when settlement was reached, but though since receiving your telegram No. 573, I have rained this advice upon him we cannot pin him down on the text of paragraph 3 of the agreement. He obviously feels that pressure being put on him on the point here is unfair and that that put upon General Orgaz has been unhelpful.

P.M.M.(44) 13th MEETING, 12TH MAY, 1944

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX, MINUTE 2

MIGRATION

MR. ATTLEE invited Lord Cranborne to make a statement regarding migration.

LORD CRANBORNE said that Mr. Bevin's statement about the United Kingdom Government's demobilisation plans had covered the whole field of transference of the people of the United Kingdom back from war to peace. Mr. Bevin had also touched on one particular aspect of special interest to the Dominions - namely the settlement in the Dominions of demobilized members of the United Kingdom Forces. Lord Cranborne said he wished to speak about the problems of migration rather more generally. After the vast issues with which the meeting had been dealing during the week, this subject might appear a somewhat limited topic. But he believed that it was important that discussion of it should take place and that some progress should, if possible, be made during the present series of meetings. It appeared to him that we were faced with a new situation and new possibilities in this sphere. The prospects of migration from this country to the Dominions had gradually deteriorated in the last fifty years. It was the fashion now to say that the impulse to migrate was generally of romantic origin and sprang from a spirit of adventure. That may have been true in a few cases, but he believed that as a general proposition it was untrue. The main motives which had led men to migrate were poor conditions at home, the pinch of extreme poverty in the days when there was no machinery for its alleviation, and the wide difference between the opportunities that offered at home and in the newer countries of the world. But gradually this incentive had become less so far as this country was concerned. Standards of wages had been raised, social services improved, the risks of life reduced. As a result, the great majority of people in this country, who were conservative by nature, if not in politics, tended more and more to prefer to stay at home and not run the risks of starting entirely afresh. It had looked as if the great period of inter-Commonwealth migration was over. But it so happened that in the last four years a new state of circumstances had arisen favourable to the stimulation of migration. As a result of the war, a large number of people had been uprooted from their homes, the continuity of their lives had been broken and their minds were receptive to the possibilities of establishing themselves elsewhere. Considerable numbers of young people in the course of their training or on their way to or from the various theatres of war, had passed through one or other of the Dominions and liked what they saw there very much. The minds of these young people were turning to the possibility of making their lives in these pleasant places. He had had evidence of this from many sources. In a recent letter to him, Lord Moyne had stressed the widespread interest of the troops in the Middle East in the possibilities of migration to the Dominions and there was an urgent demand for information on this subject. But this was a temporary phase as a result of the unsettling effects of war. As soon as these people had returned to this country, settled down and taken up jobs - and there would be plenty of opportunities for employment - they would lose the desire to move. The opportunity of establishing them overseas, if lost, might not recur. He did not know whether the Dominions wanted migrants from the United Kingdom. The matter was one entirely for them, but if they did, he would suggest they should strike now while the iron was hot. The two years after the cessation of hostilities would be the psychological moment. After that the possibilities of obtaining migrants would not be so good. The United Kingdom authorities were at present deluged with enquiries, both in Parliament and outside, about the Government policy towards migration, and had been unable to give any information. Over a year ago, he had sent a despatch to Dominion Governments giving the main headings of the problem and seeking their views. So far, no definite indication of the Dominion Governments' views had been received. He did not complain about this, as the Dominion Governments were faced with the same demobilisation problems as the United Kingdom. Moreover, they were no doubt uncertain about the post-war economic situation and the prospects of employment in their own countries. But he felt that it was urgently necessary to look, if not at the long-term arrangements, at least at the immediate problem arising on demobilisation and decide where we stood. Clearly, the question required considerable preliminary study. Migration imposed a double obligation, on the country which sent the migrant and on the country which received the migrant. There must be some assurance, before the individual set out, that he would find suitable employment when he arrived. Any serious failure to do so would prejudice the flow of future migrants and cause distress and friction on both sides.

This raised the question what type of men and women were required; did the Dominions want industrial or agricultural types or both? Another problem of considerable importance was the bearing of migration on social security arrangements. The important point was to avoid a gap without security while the individual transferred from one scheme to another. The United Kingdom authorities were already looking into this matter for their part, but it was essentially one for joint expert examination. He understood that Mr. Bevin, who had long experience of this type of problem, thought it not insoluble. He did not wish to suggest that the Prime Ministers should tackle such questions in detail at the present series of meetings, but he would like, if possible, to make some progress on the subject. He would suggest, with all diffidence, that the Prime Ministers might agree that further discussions should take place on the official level as soon as they could conveniently be arranged, with the object of formulating practicable arrangements, on the understanding that these arrangements were for the consideration of Governments and that no Government was thereby committed. As he had said, this question was one even more for Dominion Governments than for the United Kingdom. If these young people did not leave this country the United Kingdom authorities would not be broken hearted. The birth-rate in the United Kingdom was falling and it was arguable that we could not afford to lose good young men and women in any large numbers. But if they wanted to go and the Dominions were ready to take them, he felt that it would surely be wrong to discourage them. Moreover, the interchange of British blood between one part of the Commonwealth and another must tend to strengthen the whole and to multiply the links that bound it together. It was in that spirit that he raised the subject and he would be very glad to hear the views of the Prime Ministers, particularly on the question what answer could be given to enquiries from the public in the United Kingdom in the near future.

MR. BEVIN said that in the past unemployment had made present in everyone's mind the necessity of finding a solution by creating employment or seeking it anywhere. That had been an incentive to migration. But, if plans for full employment in the United Kingdom in the post-war period were successful, that incentive would vanish. A new factor which, in his opinion, had arisen was defence, a subject so very present in our minds at present. The character of war had changed and new weapons and training methods called for greater facilities than could be provided in the United Kingdom and he had been revolving in his mind the possibility of training British forces overseas in areas where there were not the same limitations of space. He felt that such a plan would assuredly stimulate migration, bind closer the links between the United Kingdom and the Dominions and do much to promote the common understanding and knowledge of one another's problems. Upon completion of a training period or period of service in a Dominion, a young soldier might be allowed to settle there permanently, whilst remaining on the United Kingdom reserve or joining a Dominion reserve. Under such a scheme the British Commonwealth would be assured of a trained reserve of men in each of the countries which comprised it. Opportunity should also offer simultaneously for the development of industrial potential for defence purposes in the different parts of the Commonwealth, and provide an impetus to inter-Commonwealth trade. As regards social security contributions and benefits, he would suggest that the simplest possible solution should be sought. From his experience in the past, he thought that the most practicable arrangement would be for the United Kingdom to continue to bear a man on the United Kingdom scheme, to which he had contributed, for an agreed number of months, whereafter he could be transferred to the Dominion scheme. It should not be a serious deterrent that the benefits were not the same in each country.

MR. MACKENZIE KING thanked Lord Cranborne for his statement. He thought that one of the principal motives in the past for migration had been the hope of parents that they would secure better opportunities for their children in a new country, and that, in the case of migrants from countries on the Continent of Europe, they would escape the perpetual threat of war. In the United Kingdom there had been perhaps, too, some desire to get away from a certain measure of class distinction. He realised that this no longer held good. Nowadays young people tended more and more to work out their own future for themselves.

They were not afraid to take risks and he had no doubt that they would wish to migrate in large numbers, if allowed entry into the Dominions. Speaking personally, he did not think there would be any restrictions imposed in Canada on the entry of migrants from British stock, if they were in a position to look after themselves and not become a charge upon public funds. But one of the main fears in people's minds was the recurrence of a post-war depression and unemployment. For this reason, despite Canada's need to populate her vast territories, he feared that it would be difficult to secure wholehearted public backing for immigration on a large scale in the immediate post-war period. Until local problems of re-establishment of demobilised personnel in industry had been solved, any large flow of migrants might cause friction. A minor point which he thought should be watched was the trouble which had arisen in the past from the activities of transportation companies who tended to encourage migration for the sake of their own immediate profits. He was entirely agreeable to the suggestion that the problems involved, including the question of Government-assisted migration generally, should be examined between officials on the understanding that no Government was thereby committed. As regards Mr. Bevin's suggestion, he doubted whether any scheme for migration which was designed primarily to achieve military purposes would be favourably received. He had prepared a document setting out the position as regards his Government, which had not yet had an opportunity of making more than a very preliminary study of post-war economic and social problems. /This appears as Appendix I/.

An interesting point was that since the Dominion of Canada had been established in 1867, the number of emigrants from Canada to the United States had approximately equalled the number of immigrants into Canada from elsewhere. The flow into the United States generally occured during periods of depression, when people were attracted by the greater possibilities of trade in that country, which was probably the largest area of free trade in the world.

MR. CURTIN said that he found himself in agreement with almost all that Lord Cranborne had said and that, for their part, his Government would welcome the opportunity to take as migrants demobilised personnel from the United Kingdom forces. He would table a full statement of his Government's views. /This appears as Appendix II, and includes separate notes on Child Migration and Maltese Migration/. As regards the ideas Mr. Bevin had thrown out, he agreed that defence was a primary consideration in everyone's mind and thought that, generally, his Government's reaction would be that suitable migrants of British stock would be a valuable accretion to his country's strength. He agreed with the suggestion that the whole question should be further examined on an official level.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS also agreed to exploratory discussions on an official level. The suggestions Mr. Bevin had made raised very wide issues. He would not wish to commit himself at the moment and thought that the issues were such that they should be a matter for consideration between Governments.

SIR GODFREY HUGGINS said that the problem raised rather different issues so far as Southern Rhodesia was concerned. He pointed out that the European migrant in Southern Rhodesia had to fit himself into a quite different economy compared with that of an entirely European country, and that there was not the same scope for the unskilled or untrained man. His Government hoped that a number of men in the R.A.F. would be willing to remain in the country on demobilisation, but the Air Ministry's policy of constant transfers rather militated against this.

APPENDIX I

Note by Mr. Mackenzie King

MIGRATION

The Canadian Government has not yet been able to give any very serious consideration to questions of post-war immigration policy. We have only been able to spare very modest and limited staff for the preliminary study of post-war economic and social policy and in the list of questions which they have been asked to report immigration policy has not been given very high priority. In the circumstances I cannot usefully attempt to forecast what the position of the Canadian Government will be with respect to immigration after the war.

The task of demobilisation of service personnel and their return to useful civilian employment will be a formidable one in every country and will be probably a slower process than we expect. There are 700,000 men and women in the armed forces of Canada and rather more in civilian war industries who will have to be absorbed again into the productive economy of the country. Plans for demobilisation of service personnel have been pretty well worked out and I think are familiar to the competent departments of the other Governments represented at this meeting, who are working on the same problems. On the civilian side plans for industrial reconversion and transfer of employment are less fully worked out.

The speed and success of such plans for returning people from service and war industries to civilian employment will obviously have a great bearing on any Government's attitude towards immigration proposals during the transitional period after the war. Similarly our attitude towards migration questions is bound to be influenced very greatly by the co-operation we can get from other countries in pursuing an expansionist economic and commercial policy after the war. If we can all work together toward the achievement of full employment and larger real incomes in the framework of a multilateral economic policy which will give larger export opportunities for our more efficient industries we can, I think, count on relaxation of the protective attitudes which incline some elements of our country to view with suspicion plans for encouraging the entry of new workers.

AUSTRALIAN POST-WAR MIGRATION POLICY

1. GOVERNMENT ASSISTED BRITISH MIGRATION TO AUSTRALIA

The questions raised by the United Kingdom Government in Dominions Office despatch D No. 24 of 2nd April, 1943, covering the Report of the United Kingdom Inter-Department Committee on Oversea Settlement on Demobilisation and in Dominions Office cablegram D No. 558 of 19th April, 1944, have been considered by Australia and the following statement of the Government's policy on this subject is furnished:-

(a) The Commonwealth Government will welcome the opportunity to accept British ex-Service men and women, wherever demobilised, and their dependents, for settlement in Australia, provided they are medically fit and otherwise approved by the Australian authorities to be suitable for life in Australia.

(b) The Commonwealth Government also agrees with the proposal that in respect of British Service men and women who are demobilised in Australia with the intention of remaining here, they should retain the right to be repatriated (at the expense of the United Kingdom Government) to the United Kingdom within a period of two years after demobilisation, or, alternatively, their dependents in the United Kingdom may be provided with passages to Australia on the same basis as that applicable to parallel classes of individuals. In such circumstances, the right to free repatriation to the United Kingdom would be forfeited.

(c) With regard to the term "dependents", the Commonwealth Government agrees with the definition recommended by the majority of the United Kingdom Inter-Departmental Committee on Oversea Settlement on Demobilisation, but subject to the understanding that so far as "unmarried wives" and their children are concerned, the High Commissioner's Office in London will have discretionary power to decide whether or not they should be accepted as suitable for Australia.

(d) In the case of a wife who is entitled to a free passage on account of war service, the question whether the husband should also be granted a free passage is a matter for the United Kingdom Government to determine, but the Commonwealth Government would be prepared to accept him as a migrant, provided both husband and wife come up to the required standards as regard medical fitness and general suitability.

(e) The Commonwealth will be prepared to share with the United Kingdom Government on a fifty-fifty basis the provision of assisted or reduced passages to suitable applicants not eligible to participate in the ex-Service free passage scheme. In this regard it is considered that the measure of Government assistance should be such that no approved applicant should be required to pay more than £10 sterling, with proportionately reduced rates for juveniles and children. For example, children under twelve to be carried free, and juveniles over twelve and under eighteen not more than £5 sterling. Further concessions might also be made in favour of married couples with children. (The Commonwealth Government is of the opinion, however, that before there can be any appreciable flow of assisted migration, the present tourist or third class rates must be considerably reduced).

(f) The Commonwealth Government considers that, as a general rule, the granting of free or assisted passages should be confined to persons not exceeding 45 years of age, except in respect of parents nominated by children already established in Australia, in which case the age limit might be extended to 60 years.

(g) The Commonwealth Government concurs in the view that the increase in secondary industries in Australia will offer greater scope for the absorption of industrial workers from the United Kingdom than has been offered in the past, and that land settlement schemes should be regarded as of secondary importance so far as British migration to Australia in the future is concerned.

(h) The Commonwealth Government on its part will be prepared to establish necessary machinery for -

(i) the collection in Australia for dissemination in the United Kingdom and elsewhere of information relating to openings and opportunities for employment in Australia; and

(ii) the selection, medical examination and transportation of approved migrants to Australia.

(i) The Commonwealth will arrange for co-operation with the State authorities and approved voluntary organisations in regard to the reception, placement and after-care of all British migrants where necessary. It is appreciated, however, that many British migrants may enter Australia under the personal nomination scheme whereby the nominator accepts responsibility for reception and after-care.

(j) The Commonwealth Government will provide free rail transport from port of disembarkation to place of employment or destination in respect of all British migrants who receive free or assisted passages, and where necessary, accommodation for a limited period.

(k) It will be appreciated that the extent to which migration to Australia can be promoted will be largely controlled by Australia's absorptive capacity, having regard to the housing situation as well as the economic conditions, and the rehabilitation of our own people engaged in war and war industries.

(l) The Commonwealth Government is examining the question of reciprocity as regards social services, but attention may be drawn to the recent legislation which provides for unemployment and sickness benefits after one year's residence. Child endowment is also subject to the same residence test.

(m) The foregoing conclusions have been arrived at without prejudice to further consideration which may be necessary in the light of subsequent developments.

The Commonwealth Government places particular emphasis on the provision contained in item (k) of the above statement of policy, relating to the dependence of any scheme of migration on Australia's absorptive capacity and the rehabilitation of Australians engaged in the Services and war industries.

2. CHILD MIGRATION (BRITISH AND WHITE ALIEN)

The policy of child migration to Australia has the warm support of the Commonwealth Government, who are anxious to give effect to it at the earliest opportunity.

As there is reason to believe that comparatively few British children will be available for migration to Australia other than those who come as members of families, it is considered that an effort should be made to secure suitable alien children if available.

It has not been possible at this stage to consider the question in detail, as it will be necessary to undertake much more exploratory work before any decisions can be taken in regard to the migration of war orphans and other children from Europe, particularly as there is no official information on record as to the number or types of children available. It is known that millions of civilians, including children, have been displaced in Europe, and until some kind of order has been restored, it will not be physically possible to make any satisfactory survey.

In these circumstances, the Australian Government have reached the following conclusions on the question of child migration:-

(a) that child migration to Australia be resumed as soon as transport is available;

(b) that in the earliest stages, the Commonwealth look specially to the introduction of selected children from the United Kingdom, both British and alien;

(c) that full use be made of approved voluntary organisations;

(d) that assisted passages be granted to approved British children from the United Kingdom (children under 12 years to be carried free and those over 12 and under 18 years at a cost of £5);

(e) that in respect of British children the Commonwealth Government contribute 5/- per week towards the maintenance of each child up to the age of 16 years (in addition to the 5/- per week payable under the Commonwealth Child Endowment scheme which it is suggested be made available from date of arrival), and that the United Kingdom Government be asked to contribute 5/- sterling per week for each child up to the age of 16 years. (In past schemes the Commonwealth and State Governments - (with the exception of Victoria) - each contributed 3/6d per week for each child up to the age of 14 years, but the suggested increased payment by the Commonwealth Government would relieve the State Governments of any maintenance payments);

(f) that consideration be given to requests from State Governments or approved voluntary organisations for contributions towards the cost of erection of any buildings considered necessary to adequately house or train children introduced from overseas;

(g) that no restriction be placed on the type of employment to be followed by these children when they reach working age, each one to be given the opportunity to engage in employment for which he is considered most fitted;

(h) that at the earliest opportunity a complete survey be made by the High Commissioner's Office. London, in conjunction with the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees of the situation in Europe in regard to the possibility of securing refugee or displaced children for settlement in Australia.

3. MALTESE MIGRATION

Consideration has also been given to the question of Maltese migration to Australia, following the receipt of a note on this subject from the Commissioner for Malta in Australia, in which the hope was expressed that Maltese migrants would be accepted in Australia on the same conditions as other British migrants and afforded the same measure of assistance.

The Commonwealth's policy on this subject is:-

(1) That, for the purpose of admission into Australia, Maltese be placed in the same category as other white British subjects and be eligible to enter Australia subject to:-

(a) sound health;

(b) good character;

(c) possession of a valid British passport issued by the authorities in Malta; and

(d) satisfying the Immigration Authorities on arrival in Australia that they are not likely to become a charge on public funds in Australia.

(2) That the question of granting assisted passages to Maltese migrants be deferred pending further enquiries through the Commissioner for Malta as to whether the Government of Malta and/or the United Kingdom Government are prepared to make any financial contributions towards the cost of passages, and if so to what extent.

APPENDIX III

NOTE BY MR. MCINTOSH SUMMARISING
MR. FRASER'S VIEWS

MIGRATION

The New Zealand Government recognises the importance of having a larger population not only for development of the natural resources of the Dominion, upon which its high standard of life depends, but also for security reasons.

It is however greatly concerned about the economic position in New Zealand itself following the cessation of hostilities and feels unable at present to formulate or consider any plans for large-scale immigration immediately after the war and during the period of demobilisation of New Zealand Armed Forces.

Above all there is an extreme shortage of housing which can only be made good by extensive large-scale building operations.

The Government conceives as its first duty the housing and rehabilitation of New Zealand ex-servicemen and feels that until the tens of thousands of men now serving overseas are suitably provided for it cannot encourage the belief that the country would be in a position immediately after the war to absorb large numbers of immigrants.

If it would be possible under some planned system to bring to New Zealand quantities of machinery for various industrial enterprises then it would certainly be feasible and desirable to bring in skilled operatives and to assure them of good living prospects. One of the main difficulties in this connection will obviously be the desire on the part of the United Kingdom to retain for purposes of its vast national reconstruction needs, the very type of migrant who would be most useful in New Zealand.

Mr. Fraser has made the point in the press and would wish to emphasise again that in any event those who have fought side by side with our own troops and airmen and sailors would be assured a warm welcome in New Zealand when immigration becomes possible.

Concerning the point raised by Mr. Bevin, I would like to mention that Mr. Fraser at his Press Conference last week stated that the New Zealand Minister of Social Security had specially requested him to endeavour to lay the foundation or start the initial stages at any rate of reciprocity in regard to Social Security, Old Age Pensions and other aspects of any scheme arising from or based on the Beveridge Plan. He mentioned the fact that New Zealand already had a reciprocal Pensions Agreement with Australia and there is no doubt that New Zealand Government would regard favourably any proposals to extend this system to other parts of the British Commonwealth.

Red Star May 11th published article by Hofman entitled "International Survey"

1. Destruction of enemy forces in Tunisia a year ago made Allied military operations in Europe practicable and weakened Hitler's position in Mediterranean. On the eve of the assault from East and West on European fortress it is useful to recall end of African campaign. It was Allies' general rehearsal for invasion of Europe and showed that Allied planning organisation is equal to strategic needs of this war. Decisive part in rapid defeat of enemy in Tunis, and Italy was played by exhaustion of enemy reserves on Soviet front. Germans were still transferring reserves from West to East but situation would change when Anglo-Americans cross channel and after consolidation begin large scale offensive. Invasion would be successful if Allies act with speed and determination as in Tunis.

2. Yugoslav army of liberation was giving substantial help to Russia and Allies by pinning down twenty enemy divisions. Hitlerites and Yugoslav traitors had failed to arrest growth of Tito's army and liberation movement which was becoming more popular among the masses in the Balkans. Yugoslav Nation was trying to widen collaboration with Allied powers.

3. Growing unity between United Nations was spreading fear in disintegrating Hitlerite bloc. In Italy consolidation of nation was continuing. Effort to divide Slav peoples' had failed. Soviet-Czech agreement was landmark in Slav struggle for freedom.

4. Article then referred to economic blockade and criticised recent agreement with Spain and quoted State Department's announcement which said that in view of urgent request by British Government to secure speedy agreement it was an incomplete embargo on wolfram exports. Agreement sanctioned in principle export of raw materials to Hitler. Spanish iron-ore, lead, copper, mercury, were not covered by agreement. Spain could again become channel for American oil supplies to Germany. Such toleration towards Franco cut right across the interests of the United Nations and made easier manoeuvres based on help for Hitler.

Red Fleet of May 11th contains article by Yermashev entitled "Key to the Black Sea". If Germans were able build strong fortifications it was at Sevastopol. But they did not prevent complete defeat. Who can doubt impregnable German walls in France and the Netherlands will fall when Allies deliver determined blow? Fall of Sevastopol was due largely to weakness of German naval forces. Axis Navy has been unable to give protection to land forces hence Germans could not be evacuated from Tunis and the German fleet failed to prevent British evacuation from Dunkirk. Victory has slipped from Germany's hands - this is the lesson to be drawn from the fall of Sevastopol.

Commonwealth and World

Editorial from THE TIMES, London, England, Friday, May 12, 1944.

The address which the Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Mackenzie King, delivered yesterday before the two Houses of Parliament, was the far-ranging estimate of a statesman thinking of the British Commonwealth and the world in world-wide terms.

> I profoundly believe (said Mr. King) that both the security and the welfare of the nations of the British Commonwealth, and, in large measure, the security and welfare of all peaceloving nations will depend on the capacity of the nations of the Commonwealth to give leadership in the pursuit of policies which, in character, are not exclusive but inclusive. . . . So long as Britain continues to maintain the spirit of fredom, and to defend the freedom of other nations, she need never doubt her preeminence in the world; so long as we all share that spirit we need never fear for the strength or unity of the Commonwealth.

These pasages are instinct with the enduring traditions of the British constitution. The doctrine would have been as acceptable to the PITTS or EDMUND BURKE as to MR. KING'S own predecessors, the Prime Ministers of Canada from SIR JOHN MACDONALD to SIR ROBERT BORDEN, and to the Prime Ministers of each of the British nations now meeting in family council in London.

The unity of the Commonwealth and its methods of co-operation, proven, strengthened and given new significance by the common effort of the war, represent, in Mr. KING'S view, though the words he chose were aptly quoted from an address of Mr. CHURCHILL in 1907, "a model of what we hope the whole world will some day become." In Mr. KING'S address, as in that of Mr. CHURCHILL, the Commonwealth and Empire are defined not in terms of a limited association but of the evolution of free nations looking forward "to larger brotherhoods and more exact standards of social justice." Not merely is the security of nations indivisible but also their prosperity; and the nations of the Commonwealth as part of "a larger company" embracing the United States, the Soviet Union, China, France, and all other nations united today in the defence of freedom "must help to fashion a new world order in which social security and human welfare become a part of the inheritance of mankind." In these sentences there is no suggestion of a restricted bloc of British nations seeking to sustain it power in competition with other groups, but a vision of the Commonwealth as the inspiration and precursor of an inclusive and expanding system of free States, sharing the common purposes of security and welfare and serving their own high national interests, conscious and regardful of the interests of other nations. Mr. KING'S address, like those of his associates, is at once a definition of the nature of the Britih Commonwealth and a programme and policy for the Commonwealth and the world, consistent both with the long history of the widening freedom of each British nation and with the spirit of the Atlantic charter and the Moscow Declaration.

Canada's history and Canada's voluntary and unstinted share in this war both symbolize the nature of the Commonwealth and exemplify the world character of its role. "All our political experience told us," said Mr. KING, "that freedom in Canada could not survive in a world that was no longer free" His statement is equally true for every part of the British Commonwealth and Empire. For no world event, least of all if its purport is aggression and domination, can fail instantly to influence some part of the British system; of all groups of nations and peoples, there are none so sensitive to world forces, and for the British Commonwealth to fail to respond to them would in itself be a world failure. Indeed, in this as in so many other respects, the Commonwealth itself is a test of the possibility and hope of an effective, permanent system of international co-operation. With all its advantages of common political principles and unique political capacity and experience, if the Commonwealth fails or allows its own vision to grow dim, there is no other group of nations far flung across the oceans and continents of the world ready to assume its duties and its tasks. For the world as for the Commonwealth, Commonwealth policies should be those which "make an appeal 'to all sorts of men in all sorts of countries,' provided only that they are men of good will," and in the pursuit of such policies, "the way to maintain the unity of the Commonwealth is to base that unity upon principles which can be extended to all nations."

Success, as Mr. KING recognized, will depend on the extent to which other nations are prepared to pursue similar policies. But it remains the duty of the Commonwealth wherever possible "to give the lead that is in the interest of the world as a whole," in security and in welfare—since it is more and more apparent that a broad community of thought and action in social purposes must be one great element in that leadership. To this end, "it is of the utmost importance to the Commonwealth that there should be the greatest possible cooperation among its members," secured through close consultation and effective coordination. When decisions are taken, they will not, it is true, be those of some visible Imperial Cabinet or Council sitting continuously in London. But, what is most significant, the decisions will be taken through a continuing conference of the Cabinets of the Commonwealth, using all the resources of modern communications—"a conference of Cabinets," in Mr. KING'S words, "which deals from day to day, and, not infrequently, from hour to hour, with policies of common concern," and reaches its decisions "after mature consideration by all members of the Cabinets of each country, with full consciousness of their immediate responsibility to their respective Parliaments." The difficulty inherent in centralization of whatever kind has been more clearly brought out in recent weeks. It implies necessarily that some body other than the several Cabinets or Parliament should, in whatever degree, decide the policies of those Cabinets or Parliaments. It is the firm conviction of Mr. KING, and, it may be assumed, of other Prime Ministers, that the other Parliaments no less than the Canadian Parliament would accept no such derogation of responsibility to their electorates. This being so, the unity of the Commonwealth is better nourished and sustained by consistent and improved methods of consulation, by the sense of responsibility of each Government for the interests of all others, and by the deep, firm sense of community founded not in remote authority but in that form of free government where, in BURKE'S words, "the people is the true legislator."

Mr. KING'S address is a fine and helpful contribution to the philosophy of the Commonwealth and Empire and to the thought of all free peoples. Among these free peoples none has more right than Canada to define the purposes of the United Nations or the principles of the unity of the Commonwealth. Canada has not sought and does not wish to influence the policies of her great neighbour and friend or her partners in the American hemisphere, but twice at a solemn moment in world history, the political imagination and experience of the Canadian people, instantly and freely responding to a challenge, physically distant but morally immediate, has anticipated those policies and has anticipated them by a declaration of war that enhanced rather than weakened the unity of the Canadian people.

PROBABLE POST-WAR TENDENCIES IN SOVIET FOREIGN POLICY AS AFFECTING BRITISH INTERESTS.

PART I.

THE probable long-term impact of Russian strategic policy on British interests depends upon Russia's power, her major interests and her general outlook on world affairs. Of her power, and her capacity to use it, if she wishes, there can be little doubt. In, say, ten years in man-power, in economic resources, in industrial capacity she will be immensely strong and, almost certainly, well organised.

2. Of her major interests and outlook in ten years' time it is far more difficult to predict. But certain fixed points can be discerned. Internally, the fixed points are that the U.S.S.R. will remain a highly-centralised federation where all the means of production are publicly owned and centrally planned and controlled; and that Russia's major interest will be to devote her main energies for many years to come to the colossal task of post-war rehabilitation and the further development of her own territories. Externally the fixed point will be in the future, as it has been in the past (at any rate, since Stalin's victory over Trotsky), the search for security against any Power or combination of Powers which might threaten her while she was organising and developing her own domain. In particular, after her narrow escape and tremendous losses she will fear a German recovery.

3. The result of Germany's attack upon the Soviet Union has been (a) to consolidate the régime; (b) to retard her internal development; (c) to face her with a vast task of rehabilitation in the occupied areas which must take her, one would suppose, at least five years; (d) to cause her an enormous loss of man-power in the younger generation; (e) to give her the chance of exorcising for an indefinite time her fear of Germany and Japan; (f) to give her the chance of getting on to terms of equality, confidence and co-operation with the remaining principal world Powers. In other words, the war has complicated or at any rate retarded her task of internal organisation and development, but will have given her the opportunity of devoting herself to it without fear either of aggression from without or of counter-revolution from within.

4. The logical deduction seems to be that, provided the British Commonwealth and the United States do not appear to the Soviet authorities to wish to deprive Russia of the means of eliminating the menace from Germany (and Japan), do not appear to be supporting a combination against her and give reasonable consideration to her views, Russia will welcome a prolonged period of peaceful relations with the British Commonwealth and the United States. She will need at least five years for rehabilitation, and many further years for the development of her internal resources and for industrialisation and social development. During this period it is unlikely that she would be prepared to risk the interruption of a major war, whether during that period she had adopted a policy of co-operation or had decided to play a lone hand.

5. But this prediction is based on the assumption that the Russians do not suspect us of having designs hostile to her security, and that largely depends on whether she is satisfied with the measures taken to render Germany (and Japan) innocuous. Should she not be so satisfied (and her demands are likely to be high and her methods perhaps very drastic to British and American eyes), she will always be in fear of an eventual combination with Germany against her, her attitude to this country will be suspicious and potentially antagonistic, she will be more preoccupied with her own security and will take her own measures to provide for it. She would then probably become an intensely disruptive force in Europe. She would be unlikely, save as a last resort and in exceptional circumstances (see paragraph 37 below), to combine with Germany, for this would lead to a German revival and would thus be dangerous to herself. But she would be constantly manœuvring to increase the strength of her own position in Europe by establishing her influence in European countries through Left-wing Governments and by interfering in their internal affairs both through intrigue and through power politics. Outside Europe, too, she would no doubt follow a similar policy.

6. One may predict, then, with some confidence, that, during a period of at least five years after the termination of the war with Germany, Russia will be preoccupied with her post-war rehabilitation and will constitute no menace to British strategic interests. During this period she almost certainly will experiment with the policy of co-operation with the British Commonwealth and the United States in whatever world organisation may be set up after the war. If this gives satisfactory results from the Russian point of view and in particular if she is satisfied that we have no intention of allowing Germany's power to be restored, this experiment may become an established feature of her foreign policy and the period during which she would constitute no threat to major British strategic interests may be indefinitely prolonged, while she continues her internal development. Even if through the withdrawal of the United States or any other reason post-war schemes for a world organisation should fail, the Soviet Union would not necessarily withdraw from co-operation with Great Britain. If, on the other hand, she finds the experiment of co-operation a failure, she will almost certainly seek to weaken British and American influence, but she will not necessarily become expansionist and her policy may well still not directly threaten British strategic interests, especially if the British Commonwealth can rely on American support. Russia, however, will almost certainly keep herself immensely strong on land and in the air. So far as can be judged at present she is most unlikely to be troubled by internal disorders. Her influence throughout the Eastern hemisphere is likely to be great and she could develop an overwhelming threat to our position in the Middle East.

7. Part II of this paper elaborates the argument of the preceding paragraphs. Part III deals with Russian interests in particular areas.

Part II.

Post-War Position of the U.S.S.R. in the World.

8. The U.S.S.R. will have made immense sacrifices for victory in men and material. The wastage will have been enormous. None the less, the U.S.S.R. will emerge from the war (i) as the strongest land Power in the world and one of the three strongest air Powers; (ii) as the very successful exponent of a new economic and social system and a new type of multi-national State; (iii) as the great Slav Power (as in the past) and the heir to much besides from the heritage of the old Russia. She will have very great prestige and very great pride in herself. All the indications suggest that the régime will have been strengthened by the war; it will be well adapted to deal with the problems resulting from the dislocation caused by the war: it seems most unlikely that it will be faced with any serious internal dissension. Her war record and the achievements of "planned economy" and "socialism in one country" will continue to arouse very widespread sympathy and admiration abroad in many circles.

9. The U.S.S.R. in 1939 contained a population of 170 million—forty million more than the United States, a hundred million more than Germany, a hundred and twenty-five million more than Great Britain. Although Soviet statistics are very unsatisfactory, it is certain that the coefficient of annual increase is far higher than that in West European countries and the United States, and that there is an exceptionally large proportion of young people. (For instance, in 1939 not much less than two-thirds of the population were under thirty). In the U.S.S.R. war losses and general dislocation have been on a prodigious scale and shortage of labour will remain at least for some years a very serious problem; but within the next twenty-five years there will be a very large increase of population in contrast with prospects in the West—an increase which may bring the total (excluding the western regions incorporated in 1939–40) to something between 210 million and 240 million by 1968.

10. The effects on Soviet policy of this potential strength are, however, offset to a considerable degree by various factors, including in particular (a) the gigantic internal reconstruction tasks that confront the U.S.S.R., (b) the prospect of freedom from foreign menace and of co-operation, if Russia desires it, with other Great Powers.

11. The war found the leaders and people of the U.S.S.R. still engrossed in the working out of a great social experiment and of a gigantic economic programme. On the advent to power of Stalin, concentration on the fomentation of world revolution had been deliberately discarded, at least for an indefinite time to come, in favour of the fulfilment of this programme. The fear of attack by Germany and Japan, and the suspicion that other powers including Great Britain would welcome it, dictated a foreign policy designed to avoid being involved in a world war, and an internal policy of which military defence and not prosperity was the first consideration.

Soviet Internal Policy before and after the War.

12. In pursuit of the aim of developing the U.S.S.R. as rapidly as possible for defence, industry had to be built up on a huge scale in a country where agriculture had previously been the first consideration. But, because of the demands of defence, the emphasis had to be on heavy industry; light industry was comparatively little developed. Collectivisation of agriculture was forced through against much opposition. Great efforts were being made to extend the area of cultivation by colonisation, irrigation and other means. The transformation of Soviet Asia and the Arctic was under way. The task of improving inadequate communications was being pushed ahead, but very great leeway required to be made up. Only the fringe had been touched of the task of adapting housing and of building new accommodation in the vastly expanded or entirely new cities.

13. The general result of this unrelenting drive to carry out the five-year plans was that the people had already been living and working at war tempo since 1928, and yet the vast programme remained very partially fulfilled and the high standard of living promised as the fruits of the Soviet system had not materialised, when the war burst upon them.

14. The devastation of war and its all-round effects will have set the U.S.S.R. far back from the goal which she was just beginning to attain, namely, the point at which her developing economy could begin to provide a steady rise in the standard of living of the people without ceasing to expand its capital equipment. The war has resulted in:—

(i) A destruction of material which is still in progress on a scale unparalleled in history.

(ii) The killing of many millions not only of soldiers but of civilians of both sexes, an abnormally high civilian mortality and an abnormally low birth-rate.

(iii) A further dislocation of population and economic life owing to evacuation eastward before the German advance. Estimates vary greatly, but 15 million such evacuees is a possible figure.

(iv) The deportation westwards by the Germans of perhaps 2 million persons and the capture by them of some 3 million prisoners.

15. With the huge pre-war programme still unfinished, the Soviet Government will thus, when peace comes, be faced with immense additional problems. The primary essential will be the colossal tasks of repatriation and resettlement, of the rebuilding and re-equipment of the ruined cities, industrial plants and transport, of the reconstruction of villages and agriculture in the devastated regions and of the transformation of the eastern industries to meet peace-time needs. There is every reason to suppose that the U.S.S.R. will not alter the basic pattern of her economic life. She will continue to plan her economy as before, looking primarily to the development of her own resources to provide directly for the increasing satisfaction of her own needs. But the internal problems of relief and reconstruction will cause certain modifications. Despite the efforts of the Government to mobilise resources and reinforce discipline, it is improbable that, after all that the Soviet people have gone through in the war, the immediate tempo of economic rehabilitation and development can be geared to the same pitch of intensity as during the first three five-year plans. If it were, the task of rehabilitation would take at least five years. If not, it will almost certainly take longer. The continued development of her internal resources, industrialisation and social development will occupy the Soviet Union's energies for far longer. Victory will probably bring a certain relaxation and a greatly increased demand for consumers' goods, while there will be at first a greatly decreased capacity to meet such a demand from internal Soviet resources.

16. During the first year or two after an armistice with Germany, the U.S.S.R. will be unable from her own resources adequately to meet the needs either of relief or of reconstruction and one of the objects of her foreign policy will be to get the maximum available help from outside sources.

17. The chief sources from which any immediate supplies of relief goods may be expected are the United States and the British Commonwealth. The needs of reconstruction and of further economic expansion will require substantial imports particularly in the following fields: (i) coal, (ii) electrical and other power equipment; (iii) machine tools and other industrial plant and equipment; (iv) oil and mining machinery; (v) certain non-ferrous metals; (vi) tropical goods and animal produce, such as leather, hides and wool; (vii) certain types of foodstuffs and consumers' goods. In all these fields both the United States and Great Britain and the British Empire could be very important contributors. In the first three categories another source of supply (apart from smaller sources of supply such as Czechoslovakia or Sweden) will be Germany.

18. Germany, together with her allies, is the only source from which the U.S.S.R. can get what she wants without incurring any kind of obligation. She will have no inhibitions about letting Germany get "a foothold in her markets." She will undoubtedly wish to exploit Germany to the full while keeping her as weak as possible. But however great the value of Germany to Russia may be, it will not be such as to neutralise the importance of the United States to the Soviet Union during the years following the war.

19. The need of the U.S.S.R. for relief supplies and capital goods will be so great and her capacity for absorbing the latter (owing to the nature of her economic system) so unlimited that the policy of the Soviet Union is unlikely to be one which would jeopardise the flow of these supplies. Indeed, the United States, and to a lesser extent Great Britain, will, theoretically, be in a position to exercise a considerable influence over the U.S.S.R. so long as they are willing to continue to supply goods on advantageous terms. But in view of the intense competition for overseas markets which may develop not only between this country and the United States but also between United States manufacturers themselves, the Russians may well think that they will get the imports they need, irrespective of the foreign policy which they pursue. Therefore arguments based on the influence of economic considerations on Soviet foreign policy cannot be pushed too far.

20. Increased economic collaboration between the U.S.S.R. and overseas countries will make her additionally interested in expanding her mercantile marine and in security of access to open seas during the period of relief and reconstruction. Thereafter, however, it is possible that the importance of maritime communications may diminish, as Soviet economic internal development progresses. This will depend upon whether the U.S.S.R. ultimately decides upon a large foreign trade expansion or prefers to adopt a policy of comparative autarky. It is not possible to make a profitable prophecy as to which course will be adopted; but it should be borne in mind that the Soviet Union, because of her economic structure, does not look upon foreign trade as good per se and keeps her exports down to the minimum necessary to pay for what she has to import; and that once reconstruction has been more or less completed, (i) the resources of the U.S.S.R. are so great that foreign trade will then play at best but a small part in her total economy; (ii) her dependence on the outside world is then likely to be relatively small; (iii) foreign trade considerations will therefore not be likely ultimately to determine the general lines of Soviet foreign policy.

21. To sum up, for at least five years after the end of the war, the Soviet Union will be occupied in an enormous task of rehabilitation; thereafter she will still have in front of her a considerable programme of internal development. However much or little the advantages of economic co-operation with Great Britain and the United States directly influence her foreign policy during the period necessary for its accomplishment, she will avoid the risk of a major war during the period of reconstruction and is likely, unless her security is threatened, to be predisposed towards avoiding war until her development programme is well advanced, and until her people have attained a comparatively high standard of living and have recovered from the stress of a terrible war following on twenty-four years of great strain.

Soviet Foreign Policy before and after the War.

22. As stated above, the fixed aim of Soviet foreign policy before the war was to avoid war while carrying out her great schemes of industrial and social development. After Stalin's victory over Trotsky all else in Soviet foreign policy was subordinated to this object and the aim of spreading bolshevism or of fomenting the world revolution for its own sake was abandoned. But Soviet Russia feared attack by Germany and Japan, suspected that other Powers would welcome such attacks upon her and, while advocating "collective security," manœuvred to weaken Right-wing forces everywhere in the belief that they favoured her downfall. Throughout the period her foreign policy was entirely subordinated to her internal policy and her Foreign Commissar was not even in the inner circle of Soviet counsels.

23. At the outbreak of the present war the Soviet aim was clearly to stand aside while the contestants weakened each other and, when Germany had overwhelmed Western Europe, to buy time from her. Since Germany's attack upon her, Russia has concentrated everything upon surviving the war with Germany, while maintaining peace with Japan. The Russian leaders are painfully conscious of the shortcomings and inefficiencies of the Russian system and of the Russian people when matched against the Germans. When they look back they must realise that in spite of the whole Soviet system having been concentrated for ten years in preparing for a defensive war, they were unable in '41 and '42 to prevent a nation with 100 million fewer inhabitants than Russia from overrunning in an incredibly short time a greater area than had ever been conquered in history since the campaigns of Alexander the Great. If the tide has now ebbed it is because the Soviet Government has had at their disposal vast reserves of man-power and material and been willing to sacrifice them without consideration for the future. This enormous wastage is going to have its effect not merely upon the material position of Russia after the war, but also upon their mental outlook. The Russians are going to dread the recovery of Germany in a way in which we have never done, even in our blackest moments. This may take two forms, either they will set themselves the task of keeping Germany indefinitely in a state of abject subjection, or, if they find that they are obstructed by the other world Powers from applying this policy, they may decide that the best course is to make friends of their enemy while they are still in the way with them. In that case we may see a close German-Russian collaboration growing up against the rest of Europe and Asia.

24. But without looking so far ahead as that we may expect that from the peace settlement onwards any friction there is between us and Russia will not arise so much out of ideological disagreement but chiefly, if not solely, because we and the Russians may take different views as to the post-war treatment of Germany. There is good evidence that Russia desires the most drastic measures to keep Germany in a permanent state of weakness and wishes to see the complete defeat of Japan. Stalin is an advocate of the complete dismemberment of Germany, and there is little doubt that the Soviet Government propose both to exact from German war criminals, from the highest to the lowest, a terrible punishment and to make Germany render, both in labour and in goods, the fullest possible contribution to the rapid restoration of the devastation she has caused in Russia. In other words, Soviet foreign policy is still based on the search for absolute security until she can render herself impregnable. Nor will the Soviet Government take any chances (such is not their habit) of any strong Power or combination of Powers growing up on her western frontier which might themselves, or in combination with a revived Germany, constitute a preoccupation to the Soviet Union. The Soviet Government have up to the recent past at any rate suspected that the United States and Great Britain wanted to husband their strength while Germany and Russia weakened each other, and that many circles in the United States and this country still desired a barrier between Western Russia and the rest of Europe. It seems to be the Soviet Government's way to apply simple but somewhat drastic tests of the real intentions of foreign countries, even of her Allies. It is very likely that the final test they will apply to these suspicions is the attitude taken up by this country and the United States on the question of the post-war treatment of Germany and the States that lie between Germany and the Soviet Union, and in the post-war period on the zeal with which we enforce the letter of the treaty on Germany and show ourselves ready to knock Germany on the head every time she shows any sign of recovery either military or economic—Russia is likely to view with grave suspicion the argument that a prosperous Germany is necessary if Europe as a whole, and Great Britain in particular, is to be prosperous. Russia's post-war attitude is likely also in the same way to be influenced by the effect upon her own security of our post-war treatment of Japan and the post-war settlement we advocate for the Far East generally.

25. On the other hand, the war has given the Soviet Union the opportunity of transforming themselves from a revolutionary Power, to a great extent isolated from and suspected by the other Great Powers—something of a pariah—into one of the four leaders of the world. If she can achieve a satisfactory co-operation with the other three in ordering the post-war system, this would give her a better assurance than any other of freedom from external pre-occupations, while she was carrying out her own internal industrial and social development. It would also open to her a position of respect and even of admiration throughout the world. There are signs that such a transformation from their previous rôle has some attraction for them.

26. The Soviet Government is now clearly ready to give co-operation with the United States and Great Britain a trial. If the post-war settlement in Europe gives her sufficient reassurance against a German revival and sufficient satisfaction to her desires in other directions, she is likely to continue the trial for at least the five or more years required for the rehabilitation of Soviet territory. If reasonably successful, the experiment might well be further prolonged. Soviet ideas are not rigid and it is possible that, with the lapse of time, with the success of her own internal developments and the successful operation of international organisations in which Russia will be playing a leading part, international co-operation might have become something of a habit with the Soviet Government.

27. But in the initial stages at any rate, the Soviet Government will not be easy to satisfy. They certainly require, in the first place, that their western frontiers should be along the lines of those of 1941. In the second place, a settlement in regard to Germany which will " completely exclude the possibility of fresh aggression on the part of Germany " (Stalin, the 6th November, 1943). In the third place, Russia will wish to be satisfied that nearby European countries are not in a position or in the mood to threaten her territory either alone or in combination or to prevent her getting at Germany, if the Soviet Government think it necessary at any time to employ force to keep her in a state of docility. This latter consideration dictates the whole of her Polish policy. The Declaration of the Moscow Conference on Italy, which originated with the Soviet delegation, may be taken as an indication of Soviet desires elsewhere. The Soviet Government will no doubt continue to suspect Right-wing Governments. But in their conversations with His Majesty's Government they have drawn a distinction between the countries to the east of Germany, which they consider should, in friendly relations with the Soviet Government, form the eastern bulwark against the possibility of a German revival, and the countries of Western Europe who should, led by Great Britain, form the western bulwark.

28. Soviet interests in particular regions are dealt with in detail in Part III of this paper.

29. Whatever precise shape the new international system may take, it is obvious that the U.S.S.R. must be a permanent member of any World Council that may be set up. She will also, no doubt, be consulted in the initial stages as to any international schemes and invited to participate; for instance, in any general and regional defence scheme, such as a North Atlantic, Mediterranean or Pacific security system.

30. In any international regulation of armaments after the war, the air arm will be the crux as between the Soviet Union and the English-speaking Powers. After the defeat of Germany, the Soviet Union will emerge as unquestionably the strongest land Power in the Old World; and she is unlikely, on her side, to question the naval predominance of the English-speaking Powers. But both the English-speaking Powers and the Soviet Union will—potentially—be immensely strong in the air, and, with the increasing range of the air arm, they are likely to find themselves more and more dangerously exposed to one another's air power, supposing that co-operation between them were to break down. Some agreement for the regulation of air power would therefore seem to be as necessary as it will be difficult.

31. If agreement can be reached between the British Commonwealth, the United States and the U.S.S.R. (and China) in regard to a scheme of world organisation after the war, and if it can withstand the subtle underminings and intrigues to which it will be increasingly exposed from a resurgent Germany always looking for opportunities to play off the Four Great Powers one against the other, then the prospects of a prolonged period without major cause of friction with the Soviet Union, while she devotes herself principally to her internal development, would be good. Even if, by the withdrawal of the United States or for other reasons, a world organisation led by the Four Great Powers in consultation is not achieved, good relations might still be maintained between the British Commonwealth and the Soviet Union so long as the peace settlement in Europe and—to a somewhat lesser extent—in the Far East satisfied the Soviet Union. But the progress of Russia in learning the difficult art of international collaboration would in these circumstances be less probable and our position vis-à-vis of the Soviet Union on the one side and the United States on the other might become difficult and delicate.

Probable policy of the Soviet Union if she decides against co-operation with the British Commonwealth and the United States.

32. Given Russia's marked capacity for suspicion on top of 125 years at least of Anglo-Russian hostility, veiled or open, coupled with rapid progress towards self-sufficiency and impregnability, and the fundamental differences of outlook between a weakened, war-weary, kindly and liberal Britain and a vigorous though an intensely nationalistic Soviet Russia, it may be said that a gradual deterioration of relations is almost bound to set in unless confidence can be established during the war and maintained after the war by the constant practice on both sides of consultation, co-operation, and mutual give and take. If confidence is not achieved the Soviet Government may decide within a comparatively short time of the end of the war that a policy of co-operation with the British Commonwealth with or without the United States does not serve Soviet interests. In that case Soviet foreign policy would be directed to giving the Soviet Union the time to attain the main aims of her internal development and the strength to withstand any likely combination of Powers. How long it would take her to achieve this position it is impossible to estimate, but even presupposing that she could maintain the feverish energy of the last fifteen years it could hardly be less than ten years after the end of the war, having regard to her immense task of reconstruction, and might well be a good deal longer. While dropping the attempt at international co-operation she might until these aims were attained be disruptive and selfish in her foreign policy, but not to the point of provoking a combination of Great Powers against her. She would still seek to ensure the weakness of Germany. With Germany and Japan out of account and the British Commonwealth and the United States not in the mood—nor probably indeed in a position—to harbour aggressive designs against the Soviet Union, she would have no interest in hastening a revival of Germany or Japan by combining with them. Nor would she be likely to follow such a policy in Europe as would lead Western Europe to welcome a revival of Germany as a bulwark against Russia. But see paragraph 37 below.

33. With their internal preoccupations the Soviet Government would be most unlikely to follow a purely expansionist policy. They would more probably be passively unco-operative and work steadily against schemes of international co-operation favoured by this country, rather than be adventurous and provocative where British interests are concerned. More especially would this be the case if Anglo-American relations were good and the United States had not withdrawn into isolation but seemed likely to support the British Commonwealth. Even when it became clear—and it might not become clear for a considerable time—that Russia had finally decided against a policy of co-operation, Anglo-Soviet relations would not necessarily undergo an immediate and violent reversal. It is, perhaps, more likely that the deterioration would extend over a number of years as instances of Soviet action antagonistic to the interests of this country gradually accumulated. We should probably little by little fall back into a prolonged period of uneasy relations poisoned by mutual suspicions, which would spread to and divide other countries and would hinder the progress of settlement and recovery in war-devastated Europe. This might well lead to very serious divisions of opinion in this country, to which the Soviet Union would not hesitate to contribute.

34. No doubt the Soviet Union's policy towards British interests will be affected to a major degree by the attitude of the United States both towards this country and towards the U.S.S.R., supposing the United States withdraws from international co-operation in the political sphere. But here it becomes unprofitable to speculate owing to the multitude of factors, internal and external, which would come into play in the United States. Popular feeling towards the Soviet Union is far less favourable now than in our own country, irrespective of anti-Soviet pressure groups such as the Roman Catholics and the Poles. For many ordinary Americans the Soviet Union remains the apostle of communism, and to American organised labour even socialism is regarded as a danger to the American way of life. In the United States, therefore, the Bolshevik bogy is very much alive. This is balanced to some extent by the American respect for Russia's mere size and for her proved but unsuspected industrial capacity. On the other hand, the Soviet attitude towards the United States is not coloured to the same extent as towards Great Britain by a background of hostility or suspicion. There is a reciprocal respect for American productive capacity and technical and organising ability, and the Soviet Union will almost certainly welcome American help in relief and reconstruction. On the other hand, there is a lively appreciation in the Soviet Union of the social forces dividing the United States and probably a fear of American economic expansionism, a hatred of American big business and high finance and distrust of the international part they may wish to play after the war; also considerable ignorance of the workings of American internal politics.

35. After Stalin's victory over Trotsky the doctrine of the world revolution was dropped and Soviet interference in the internal affairs of other countries was directed to subserving the Soviet Union's own national ends, by weakening the internal position in potentially hostile countries. Soviet policy will continue to be nationalistic. The Soviet slogan now is democracy, not communism. The present leaders of Soviet Russia are realists and nationalists rather than ideologues, and the internal trend in the Soviet Union during the war is strongly in the same direction. But the Soviet Government will not abandon the international rôle of the workers' friend. In chaotic conditions after the war the Soviet Union's appeal for Left-wing circles is likely to be exploited for national ends. While she goes in for a policy of international co-operation, interference with the internal affairs of other countries would no doubt be tempered to suit that policy. It will be exploited to the full, if she abandons that policy.

36. The traditional attraction exercised by Russia on the other Slavs (except the Poles) was largely based (i) on the fact that Russia was the only Slav great Power and appeared as the liberator from Turkish or Magyar and Austrian rule; (ii) on the wealth and influence of the Orthodox Church in Russia. There is likely to be some revival of this ecclesiastical influence, but not on a major scale. The appeal of pan-slavism is now again great owing to German domination and the Russian success in resisting it, and the Soviet Government has taken the opportunity to organise the Pan-Slav Conference and other demonstrations of Slav solidarity. The immediate aim of these Soviet moves is obviously to stimulate the Slavs now under German domination to make the maximum effort against their German conquerors. After the liberation of Europe the attraction of Russia is perhaps likely to diminish, if the aftermath of the war does not lead to too prolonged and bloody a chaos in the Danubian and Balkan regions. But in any case the combination of the traditional appeal of Russia with the new appeal of the Soviet Union will remain a powerful potential source of attraction, particularly in Bulgaria and Czechoslovakia.

Part III.

Soviet Union's Interest in Particular Countries.

Germany.

37. The Soviet Union's main immediate interest will be to extract—through compulsory labour and deliveries in kind—as full reparation as possible for the enormous damage inflicted by the Germans. Russia's long-term policy towards Germany is that she should be so completely weakened that she will no longer be a potential menace. To this end Stalin has suggested that Germany should be split up into a number of separate units, which should be kept separate, by force if necessary, and that Germany east of the Oder should go to Poland. Provided the Russians can secure this dismemberment of Germany, the complexion of the Governments of the resulting States would be a secondary consideration. The Free German Committee can safely be regarded as a mere propaganda weapon and its doctrines as no indication of the Soviet Government's real intentions towards Germany. It is to be observed, however, that the Soviet Government, at least in their formal official pronouncements, still qualify the Germans and Germany as "Hitlerite" or "Fascist." It looks as if this were done in case the Soviet Government at some time might wish to reverse their policy and come to terms with Germany when the latter has rid itself of Hitlerism. Such, however, is Russia's dread of a German recovery that such an eventuality seems highly unlikely. However, the Soviet Government might take the risk and seek Germany's friendship if they were to convince themselves that Great Britain and the United States had reversed their present policy and were building up Germany as a defence against the Soviet Union, and if they felt confident of Russia's recovery of strength and her ability to remain the dominant partner.

Unless these conditions obtained, it seems very improbable that Russia would welcome even a Communist Germany, for she might well develop into a dangerous rival. Indeed, as the Soviet Union moves further from communism, the danger to her position as leader of the extreme Left in the world from a Communist Germany would clearly grow. This consideration, combined with Russia's healthy fear of German powers of organisation and of the German capacity for a unified effort under strong rule would almost certainly make Russia fear communism in Germany; it would not be surprising to find that German communism would be stigmatised as Trotskyite. All the same, if Germany were spontaneously to go Communist the Soviet Government would be under severe pressure from the ideologists, as distinct from the realists, to abandon their policy of repression and to befriend the new proselyte, even at the risk of the Communist rulers in Germany proving too strong for the Soviet Government to keep under control. Needless to say, this pressure would be all the greater if at the time the Soviet Government felt that the policy of co-operation with the Western Powers was not going to succeed. If, however, it was working satisfactorily, the realists in Moscow would, it is to be hoped, be able to keep the upper hand.

38. It would be unwise to assume that in Soviet-German affairs the rôle of Germany is going to be an entirely passive one. Germany will be on the look-out for any weakening in the policy of Anglo-Soviet co-operation after the war and will be quick to offer herself as occasion requires to either party as soon as she sees any sign of a quarrel. To the Soviet Government she will present herself as the Socialist partner ready to help to keep the capitalist Western Powers from meddling in Central and Eastern Europe. To the Western Powers she will pose as the champion of European culture ready to join in resisting Russian penetration of Europe from the East. Against these manœuvres the only effective weapon will be a continuance of close Anglo-Soviet co-operation.

Poland.

39. As regards Poland, the Soviet Government's latest statement is to the effect that they are in favour of a strong and independent Poland in good relations with the Soviet Union, with its eastern frontier running approximately along the Curzon Line; if desired there could be an alliance for mutual aid against Germany, and Poland could adhere to the recent Soviet-Czechoslovak Treaty. It appears from the discussions at the Tehran Conference that the Soviet Government wish to have Lvov, but that they agree that East Prussia should go to Poland (possibly less Königsberg, which the Russians may want for themselves), and that Poland's western frontier might be moved westward even as far as the Oder. It is clear that Poland will not succeed in getting a settlement on more favourable lines. A large extension of Polish territory at the expense of Germany would probably so embitter Polish-German relations that Poland would be forced into close association with the Soviet Union. In any case, the Soviet Government is certainly determined not to tolerate a hostile Poland. If satisfied on this score they may well be content that Poland should retain a real independence. But Soviet-Polish hostility has behind it four centuries of deeply charged history, and it must be doubtful, whatever the final settlement, how far the Poles and Russians can overcome their deep-seated hatred of each other and how far the Poles can abandon their historic, almost mystical, conception of Poland's "eastern mission." Russia is concerned to ensure that her forces will always be able to pass through Poland, if necessary, in order to nip a threat from Germany in the bud. This latter consideration dictates the whole of her Polish policy.

France.

40. In the post-war period the U.S.S.R. will probably continue to favour the restoration of France as a Great Power, as a potentially important addition to the encirclement of Germany and as a possible counterpoise to Anglo-American influences. The chief causes that aligned France against the Soviet Union and prevented the implementation of the Franco-Soviet alliance will no longer operate if the forces of the Right in France lose most of their ground and the Polish question does not again sharply divide France and Russia.

The Baltic and Scandinavia.

41. Soviet interests in the Baltic, like Imperial Russian interests in the past, are primarily centred on the defence of Leningrad and North-Western Russia and free entrance and exit to the Baltic. Leningrad, except for the very important fact that it is no longer the capital, is little less important for the U.S.S.R. than St. Petersburg was for Imperial Russia, both as an industrial centre and as a port. About a quarter of Soviet exports and half of Soviet imports pass through it. The Soviet Government will maintain their position that the incorporation of the three Baltic States in the Union corresponds to the wishes of the Baltic peoples as declared in plebiscites, and that it is an accomplished fact which is not open to reconsideration; and they will probably wish to add Memel, Tilsit and Königsberg to Lithuania. They will require at least the 1940 frontiers and conditions from Finland (Viborg, Hangö, &c.); with the possible substitution of Petsamo and the nickel deposits (the U.S.S.R. is at present deficient in nickel) for Hangö and the continuance of present arrangements in regard to the Aland islands. Stalin informed Mr. Eden in 1941 that there should be a treaty between Finland and the Soviet Union giving the latter the right to maintain naval and military bases on Finnish territory. There is no reason to suppose that this view has changed.

42. In view of the commercial and strategic importance of the Baltic to the U.S.S.R., guarantees as to the entrances to the Baltic will be required. Presumably the internationalisation of the Kiel Canal will be favoured.

43. The experiences of this war, even more than those of 1914–20, confirm the importance of the Soviet interest in Murmansk and access therefrom to the Atlantic. In addition, apart from war conditions, the economic development of the Kola peninsula and Soviet Arctic enterprises make Murmansk, the Murmansk and White Sea railways and the Stalin Canal of growing importance. For instance, by the late 'thirties the foreign trade of Murmansk was three to four times that of Vladivostok. The great sums spent on the fortification of Murmansk and the northern (coastal defence) fleet have proved their worth in the war, and an ocean-going northern fleet may perhaps be regarded in Moscow as an essential for the future.

44. There are no indications that the Soviet Government have any territorial designs on Norway or Sweden and in the case of Norway they have recently repudiated semi-officially a report to that effect. It is relevant that in discussion with His Majesty's Government the Soviet Government have suggested that it is for Great Britain to build up the necessary defence system in Western Europe against Germany and in so doing they stated in December 1941 that they would be prepared to support arrangements whereby this country had the right to maintain naval and military bases in Belgium, the Netherlands and France (if she did not revive as a Great Power) and naval bases in Norway and Denmark.

Confederations in Central Europe and the Balkans.

45. Soviet opposition to confederations between the Baltic and the Ægean was stated at the Moscow Conference to be founded (i) on a rooted suspicion of the Poles and of a cordon sanitaire; (ii) on the belief that the antagonisms, divisions and uncertainties in the countries concerned make confederations immediately impracticable; and (iii) on the idea that such confederations might prove over favourable to the satellites of Germany. It is no doubt in reality Russia's determination to take no risk of a strong combination of countries on her western frontiers which might, out of fear of herself, turn to Germany for support that accounts for her opposition. The Soviet Government's attitude is unlikely to change, at least until they have reached satisfactory settlements with the individual States, especially Poland. In the case of Czechoslovakia, they have reached such a settlement in the recent Soviet-Czechoslovak Treaty. As regards Roumania and Bulgaria, they no doubt prefer that these countries should be independent but wholly under their influence, rather than members of a confederation.

The Balkans and Turkey.

46. It is a vital Soviet interest that no strong Power should be able to threaten the Black Sea or to draw on Roumanian oil for aggression against the Soviet Union.

47. The Soviet Government are determined to regain Bessarabia and Northern Bukovina, and in exchange will probably advocate the return of Transylvania to Roumania. They may also want a share in Roumanian oil resources, the right to maintain naval and military bases in Roumania and the conclusion of some sort of mutual assistance treaty, in return for which they might be prepared to guarantee Roumania's new frontiers. The U.S.S.R. will almost certainly not accept any International Danube Commission without strong Russian representation.

48. Bulgaria, whose peasantry has a long Russophile tradition, will almost inevitably end the war under the moral domination of the Soviet Union. This, if accompanied by any form of treaty of alliance, might lead to a serious clash of Turkish and Soviet interests. With the development of air power any foreign air force in control of the Bulgarian airfields would control the Straits whatever régime then governed them and thereby dominate Turkey. Indeed, it is probably true that whereas in the 19th century Turkish foreign policy was focussed on the question of the Straits, it is to-day focussed on the future of Bulgaria.

49. The circumstances prevailing immediately after the first world war were favourable to a rapprochement between the Soviet Union and Turkey. Both Powers were opposed to the victorious Allied Powers, both were isolated and both had interests to defend in common. Many of the old sources of contention that had existed throughout the 19th century had been removed. The Soviet Union no longer held the position of the protector of the Orthodox Christians in the East which in Imperial days had been a thorn in Turkey's side, and, furthermore, the collapse of the Ottoman Empire left few Christians within the borders of the new Turkey. The Armenian question was no longer a disturbing factor. Lastly, the new Turkish régime had no place for pan-Turanianism any more than the Soviet régime for pan-Slavism.

50. This rapprochement was based on opportunism and was probably always regarded by both parties as such. Centuries of antagonism arising from a real clash of interests could not be abolished in a day and even before the outbreak of the present war Turco-Russian differences began to appear, e.g., at the Montreux Conference in 1936.

51. The Soviet Union probably has no major territorial claims against Turkey. It is extremely improbable that any Soviet statesman would advocate physical control by Russia of either the Straits or Constantinople. The only possible claim that might be made in certain circumstances is one for the annexation to the Soviet Union of the Province of Kars, ceded to Turkey after the first world war. The Soviet military authorities may feel that this is necessary for the security of Baku and it must not be forgotten that the Soviet Government, thanks to the disclosures of the Germans, are perfectly aware of Turkish participation in conversations with ourselves and the French regarding the bombing of Baku and the Caucasian oil wells.

52. Russia's real desiderata regarding Turkey are, however, focussed on two points: the Straits and Turkey's relations with other Great Powers. As regards the Straits, traditional object of Soviet as of Imperial Russian policy is to secure unlimited right of egress for Russia's Black Sea fleet and complete denial of ingress to non-Black Sea Powers. The Montreux Convention gave a degree of satisfaction to these aims which no previous convention had given, but the Turco-Soviet negotiations of 1939 showed that it was not enough. What worried the Soviet Government was the fact that in certain circumstances even if Turkey was not at war the Turkish Government had discretion to open the Straits to non-Black Sea Powers. The ideal arrangement in Russian eyes is probably that this discretion should not be exercised without Russian consent. As regards Turkey's relations with other Great Powers it is probably true that the Soviet Government have never relished Turkey's alliance with Great Britain. A hostile Turkey is a threat to two vital Russian interests, her communications between the Black Sea and the Mediterranean and the security of the Caucasian oilfields. Turkey in isolation is a manageable proposition, but any alliance with a Great Power such as Great Britain puts a different complexion on the situation. The Turkish Minister for Foreign Affairs, in unofficial conversation with His Majesty's Ambassador, has probably summed up the position fairly well in saying that Russia does not want to absorb Turkey, but would like to see her in the same position as Belgium after 1830, an independent Power with no ties of alliance to any Great Power. Russia's attitude on this, however, as on so many other points, depends upon the degree of confidence she feels in British policy.

The Middle East.

53. It seems likely that Russia will in the future take a much closer interest in the Middle East, and that this process will be accentuated if she becomes suspicious of our friendly intentions or finds that co-operation with the Western nations does not pay. The war has shown that Russia, being largely (though to a diminishing extent) dependent on the oil resources of the Caucasus, is most suspicious of any foreign interest in or military approach to that area, even by her Allies. Further, in the long run, Great Britain and America will become strategically and commercially more and more dependent on the oil resources of Iraq and the Persian Gulf, which are likely to become the centre of gravity of world oil production. The distance and the geographical inaccessibility of the intervening areas between these two strategically vital areas lying on either side of Persia have largely ceased to matter with the development of modern aviation, and each source of oil is now potentially vulnerable from the neighbourhood of the other. British military or air activities in Iraq and the Persian Gulf, or political activities in Persia, are the kind of thing that may arouse Russian suspicions. Similarly, Russian activities in Persia, Iraq and the Gulf area may be a corresponding embarrassment to us.

54. Though there are large reserves of oil in the Soviet Union, its requirements will very substantially increase as a result of industrial development and the improvement of the general standard of living with its increased demands on transport, &c. Moreover, the Soviet Union, like the United States, may think it desirable for strategic reasons to conserve the oil resources in its own territory. In the peace settlement the Soviet Union may get some oil-bearing territories in the Balkans, but the reserves there are not large in relation to the Soviet's needs. For these reasons the Soviet may be interested in the oil resources of the Middle East, particularly during the immediate post-war period when its coal and power production are likely to be serious bottlenecks in its industrial expansion, and this may lead to conflict of interest with Great Britain and the United States.

55. In any case, Russia is likely to show a permanent interest in the Trans-Persian railway, and in the ports of the Persian Gulf. There is no reason to suppose that she is less interested than formerly in her access to warm water ports, and the Persian Gulf is one means of access to the new industries of Turkestan and Central Asia. But the route, both by rail and road, will always be a very expensive one.

Persia.

56. Soviet policy in Persia during the past two years seems to have been in essentials hand-to-mouth and subordinated to the terrific pressure of war. In the Tehran Declaration the Soviet Union reaffirmed her intention to preserve the integrity and independence of Persia, and she, like ourselves, is pledged by treaty to evacuate Persia after the war.

57. As in the past with the Russian Empire, the proximity and power of the U.S.S.R. and the fact that the Persians fear the Russians more than ourselves are almost bound to give the Union predominant influence in Azerbaijan and the Caspian provinces and to place her in a specially favourable position in Tehran and in Khorasan.

58. Anglo-Russian relations in Persia, in the past two years, were at least infinitely better than they were in 1907 and 1914, when, in spite of the Anglo-Russian entente, they went from bad to worse. M. Maisky has said that Russia could not tolerate disorder near her frontiers. Whether or not a weak and disorderly Persia would be a disadvantage for the U.S.S.R., it would certainly be a temptation. But a comparatively strong and efficient Persian Government would not be either, provided that it was not under predominantly British and American control. If only as an offset to the fear of this last alternative, Soviet policy may be to increase support of the (officially) democratic, constitutionalist Tudeh party, with the ultimate object of being in a position, should co-operation with Great Britain break down, to profit from radical social changes in Persia by attracting the country into the Soviet orbit.

Afghanistan and India.

59. Afghanistan is and always has been of direct concern to Russia because of a long and unruly common frontier, and because of religious and racial connexions between the peoples of Afghanistan and those of Central Asia. These connexions have given rise, both in Imperial Russia and in the U.S.S.R., to fears for the internal security of their Central Asian dominions, and the British have at various times been accused of fomenting trouble there. The Soviet régime in the Central Asian republics now seems to be so strongly consolidated as to remove such fears as a major element in Soviet policy. All the same, it is possible that the U.S.S.R. would not regard with favour the eventuality of a strong Moslem Pakistan, which might have important repercussions in the Moslem world.

60. Afghanistan as an unsteady buffer between the British and Russian Empire has caused much trouble in the past, though the Anglo-Russian entente of 1907 was highly successful for ten years in dispelling the traditional British fears of the Russian "threat to India." The situation now is less favourable in that the U.S.S.R. will greatly heighten her prestige as a result of the war, and in that Afghanistan since 1921 has obtained control of her own foreign relations. The situation is more favourable in that the Soviet Government at present are showing a willingness to co-operate with us in Afghanistan, and in that they have discarded the "world revolution" propaganda among Asiatic peoples which was so prominent a feature during the first ten years following the October revolution. They are not likely to return to this policy unless general co-operation with Great Britain proves unworkable, and their immediate interests would probably be best served by comparative order in Afghanistan and India.

61. Nevertheless, it is true that, so long as India remains closely connected with Great Britain, Afghanistan and the North-West Frontier would be a danger spot in the event of strained Anglo-Soviet relations.

62. We may reasonably hope that Persia and Afghanistan, as well as the other Middle Eastern countries, will be able to preserve their own independent Governments, but in all these countries the emergence of Left-wing movements under Russian influence, which cannot in the long run be altogether excluded, would be harmful to our interests. It is an unfortunate fact that throughout the Middle East the governing régimes are based largely on reactionary classes, and the younger and more progressive elements are out of sympathy with the existing state of affairs.

The Far East.

63. It may be taken for granted that Russia will claim a voice in any Pacific settlement, and in any organisation for maintaining the peace in the Pacific area. As she is one of the largest Pacific Powers, we should have no justification for attempting to oppose this. But her most direct interests will be in the North Manchuria, Korea, Saghalien and the Kuriles, and, if we adopt an understanding attitude regarding her wishes there, she seems unlikely to make trouble for us in the southerly regions where our own interests lie. We could not effectively oppose any measures which Russia might decide to take in the north for her own security, and we should therefore be ill-advised to try. If we did try, she might retaliate by holding out a helping hand to Japan, which the latter would be only too ready to seize.

64. The likeliest ground of conflict within the Four-Power system in the Far East lies in Russo-Chinese relations. The Russians concurred in the declaration made at Cairo in respect of Korea and Manchuria. Even if we assume that this means complete Russo-Chinese agreement on these points (a very large assumption indeed), there remain the questions of Outer Mongolia, Sinkiang and the eventual attitude and behaviour of the Kuomintang towards the Chinese Communists. None of these matters as such is likely to affect British strategic interests. It is, however, conceivable that we might become embroiled with Russia as a result of a Russian policy in regard to these matters violently opposed to Chinese and United States interests and to British and American sentiment.

SOME HISTORICAL TENDENCIES IN RUSSIAN FOREIGN POLICY.

Introduction.

THE U.S.S.R. is the greatest land mass in the world; and its history has been dominated by water. Born in a bog, the Russians grew to statehood along the trade routes of the great rivers; and through the ages the policy of the Russian State has been dominated by pressure towards the open sea. The route to western Europe through the ice-bound port of Archangel was opened up by British traders in the sixteenth century; the ice-free harbour of Murmansk was too far distant to be used as a commercial outlet until the railway age; even more so the Pacific, reached in 1640, but inaccessible until the Trans-Siberian railway was built in the last decade of the nineteenth century. In the Middle Ages the Baltic coast was closed to the trading towns Novgorod and Pskov by the Teutonic knights; and when these towns were taken over by the rising power of Muscovy, the way to the Baltic was still closed by Swedes, Germans, Lithuanians and Poles. It was not until the beginning of the eighteenth century that Peter the Great "opened a window to the west" in hard fighting, and not till the end of the century that the whole coastline from Viborg to Memel was in Russian hands. In the eighteenth century the Russians also established themselves for the first time on the Black Sea. Azov was finally annexed from the Turks in 1739; and by 1812 Russian control extended from the mouth of the Danube to Georgia.

2. Two clear tendencies are apparent in Russian policy since the eighteenth century, which, since they are due to purely geographical considerations, have survived the Tsarist régime. The first is the continuing pressure for access to the open sea. This accounts for her interest in Petsamo (a better port than Murmansk) and in the Persian Gulf, and suggests that she will want a port on the Pacific (such as Port Arthur or Dairen) which does not, like Vladivostok, have to be kept open by ice-breakers in winter. It has also caused Russia to be vitally interested in the Straits, as controlling the exit from the Black Sea. This interest will continue undiminished and indeed increased as Soviet industry recovers and expands; to it may be added a desire for a share in the régime of the Sound, as controlling the exit from the Baltic.

3. A second tendency in recent Russian history, though not always clearly defined, has been a desire to push forward her frontiers (especially her Asiatic frontiers) until they come up against a stable political unit. In distinction to the policy sometimes pursued by Great Britain, Russia has never welcomed an uncertain frontier or neighbours so weak that they may not be able to maintain internal order; and when faced with such a situation she has frequently advanced her own frontiers, less perhaps out of pure acquisitiveness, than from a desire not to become involved in incidents which get beyond her control. This consideration may help to explain Russian intervention at various times in Manchuria, Mongolia, Sinkiang, Persia, Transcaucasia—areas which, with the exception of the last named, she has apparently not wished to annex.

4. In Europe there has been the same tendency to push forward her frontiers or at any rate to increase her influence in the neighbouring States, but the reasons have been mixed. Thus, it was the pressure towards the open sea that brought them to the Baltic seaboard in the eighteenth century and again to-day, and which explains their perpetual hankering for the Straits; and while their nineteenth-century adventures in the Balkans were encouraged by the decay of the Turkish Empire, they were primarily designed to prevent them, and above all the Dardanelles, from falling under the control of any other major Power. Finland, which had never existed as an independent State until the Russians quite readily acknowledged her independence in 1918, was taken over from a rapidly declining Sweden in 1809, and retained a semi-autonomous status within the Russian Empire. Russian interest in Finland to-day seems to be confined to protecting the Gulf of Finland and the approaches to Leningrad, and to reappropriating Petsamo. Poland falls into a category by itself, which is dealt with in paragraphs 11 and 12.

A.—Germany and the Former Habsburg Monarchy.

5. History is of only limited value in any attempt to predict post-war relations between the U.S.S.R. and Germany; too many important factors have changed. Thus, down to 1914 the position was complicated by the existence of the Habsburg Monarchy; whilst from 1917 to 1933, and even later, the French policy (or alleged policy) of supporting a cordon sanitaire of East European States against the U.S.S.R., as well as against Germany, naturally affected the relations between these two States.

6. Subject to these reservations, one or two constants can be discovered in Russian relations with Germany:—

(1) A desire to keep Germany (or any other Power) away from the east coast of the Baltic.
(2) Opposition to a German advance into Poland, which is normally countered by a compensating Russian advance.
(3) Opposition to non-Russian penetration into the Balkans, and in particular towards the Straits.
(4) Opposition to any grouping in Central Europe which might be used by Germany as a weapon against Russia.

7. The last century of Russo-German relations may be summed up in three periods: (a) 1815–1871, the period of the unification of Germany; (b) 1871–1918, the period in which Germany tried for the first time to dominate Europe; (c) 1918–1941, the period between the two wars.

(a) 1815–1871.—In this period Russia, like Great Britain, did nothing to impede the unification of Germany under Prussia: both Powers appear to have viewed it without concern. In the case of Russia this was largely due to the feeling that Russia and Prussia had common interests as the two great autocratic Powers both determined to keep Poland in subjection, and also because Russia thought, mistakenly as it proved, that it was in her interest to see Austria weakened. On the other hand, St. Petersburg regarded the Governments of Berlin and Vienna as strongholds of conservatism in a dangerously radical world, and gave them moral support against liberalism and Hungarian and Polish nationalism, even to the extent of direct intervention in Hungary in 1849.

(b) 1871–1918.—During this period, Russia gradually drew away from the Central Powers into alliance with France and an active pan-Slav policy in the Balkans. The reasons for this were partly a desire to maintain a balance of power against an excessively strong German–Austrian combination, but more specifically the direct Austrian threat to the Balkans considered in paragraph 9.

(c) 1918–1941.—After the war of 1914–1918 the position was exceptional in that the Bolshevik Government of Russia was regarded as an outcast by the Western Powers, who participated in armed attempts to overthrow it. Russia was thus thrown into the arms of Germany (Rapallo Treaty, 1922). A close understanding grew up between the Reichswehr and the Red Army. This understanding, however, was based only on weakness, isolation and temporary convenience on both sides; it broke down as soon as Germany became once more a strong military Power; and from 1934 the U.S.S.R. was a consistent advocate of collective opposition to German aggression. The reversal of this policy by the U.S.S.R. in 1939 was due to a variety of reasons which it does not fall within the scope of this paper to assess, but which probably included fear that Great Britain and France were in no condition to fight effectively against Germany, suspicion that the Western Powers would leave the U.S.S.R. to bear the brunt of the war, a miscalculation as to the respective strength of the ultimate combatants, and a desire in these circumstances to "buy time" from Germany.

The Baltic.

8. From earliest times the land-locked Russian State pressed towards the Baltic, and here she has most frequently come into conflict with Germany. Peter the Great conquered present-day Estonia, Latvia and Western Karelia from Sweden; present-day Lithuania was annexed in 1795. In the early nineteenth century Prussia and Russia tacitly agreed to share control of the Baltic between them.

Although the war of 1914 to 1918 was not caused by German ambitions in the Baltic, Russia's collapse led to her losing her share of the Baltic owing to German occupation of what were to be the Baltic States and virtual occupation of Finland. During the years of peace, the U.S.S.R. was always very apprehensive of German penetration of the Baltic States and Finland; and when war broke out in Europe in 1939 she reoccupied Western Karelia and the Baltic States.

The Balkans.

9. So long as the greater part of the Balkan Peninsula was under Turkish rule, Austria-Hungary and Russia could be allies as well as rivals, compensating each other at Turkey's expense. But as the Balkan States emerged from the crumbling Ottoman Empire this intermittent alliance turned into open rivalry in which each Power aimed at setting up and maintaining in power Governments friendly to itself in the nominally independent or autonomous States. Each Power used such weapons as came to hand. The Pan-Slav appeal won support for Russia in Bulgaria, Serbia and Montenegro and even from the Croats and Slovenes inside the Austrian Empire; the appeal of Orthodoxy was used—though this with less success—in Roumania and Greece as well as in the Slav countries. Austria, who was not in a position to make any such positive appeal to Balkan nationalism, relied mainly on the economic and strategic power given her by possession of the plain of Hungary and the Upper Danube Valley, controlling all the trade routes and railways to Central Europe, and she skilfully played off the Balkan Powers against each other. 1878 is the decisive date. In that year Russia's scheme for a "big Bulgaria" with access to the Ægean—by her influence over which Russia hoped to sidestep the Straits—was checkmated by the combined efforts of the other Powers. In this, Great Britain and Austria-Hungary were protagonists. Germany, so long as Bismarck remained in power, was always reluctant to back her Austrian ally against Russia (with whom she had a reinsurance treaty) in the Balkans. After 1878 Austria-Hungary skilfully used Bulgarian disappointment to lure influential ruling groups in Bulgaria over to opposition to Russia, who had proved to weak to gratify their territorial ambitions. Austria-Hungary's annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1908, and the consequent threat to the independence of Serbia, combined with plans for a Berlin–Bagdad railway, drove Russia to desperate measures to keep the Central Powers from controlling the whole of the Balkans and the Straits. Her first retort came in the Balkan wars of 1912–13, but the triumphant unity of the Balkan League inspired by Russia was upset by the defection of Bulgaria, who, at the instigation of Austria-Hungary, attacked her former allies. Her defeat in 1913 ensured her loyalty to Austria and Germany in the war of 1914 to 1918, and her fresh disappointment in the Treaty of Neuilly left her an easy prey to Nazi influence in the 1930's.

10. Austria-Hungary did not survive 1918; but in the 1930's Hitlerite Germany succeeded to her dominating economic and strategic position vis-à-vis the Balkans, first by means of trade agreements, then more directly by annexing Austria and Czechoslovakia. These moves met with the obvious disapproval of the U.S.S.R.; and even in 1940–41, before the German attack on the U.S.S.R., when the latter was still neutral, the Soviet Government and press encouraged Greece, Yugoslavia and Bulgaria to resist Nazi penetration and aggression.

B.—Poland.

11. Russo-Polish hostility has never ceased since the sixteenth century and earlier. Poland, although a Slav nation, derived its culture and the Catholic faith from Western Europe while the Eastern Slavs were still subjected to the Mongols and Tartars of the Golden Horde. When Muscovy, the successor to Kiev as the major Russian principality and the inheritor of her Byzantine culture and orthodox religion, shook herself free and began to enlarge the area of her authority, she found the Poles, then in alliance with Lithuania and a Great Power, in control of what is now White Russia and the Ukraine and ruling an empire which stretched from the Black Sea to the Baltic. Although in the sixteenth century Muscovy began to clear the Russian lands, at the beginning of the seventeenth century the Poles were in Moscow itself. After incessant fighting, during which Poland appeared in Russian eyes as the hereditary enemy and the hostile Imperialist Power, the tables were finally completely turned at the end of the eighteenth century when, with the assistance of Prussia and Austria, Russia succeeded in destroying Poland in the Third Partition of 1795. Russia has always been obsessed by the fear that Poland might revive as a Great Power and, indeed, after the collapse due to the revolution in 1918, she almost did so. Thus what began as fear and dislike of a foreign oppressor with an alien culture and religion has developed into a rooted hostility (a feeling fully reciprocated by the Poles) and the determination that, indirectly if possible, but directly if necessary, Poland shall be subordinated to Russian influence and policy.

12. The frontier established in 1795, which was retained as the frontier between Russia and Congress Poland(1), corresponds roughly with the Curzon Line and with what Russia has, for 150 years, considered as the western limit of the Eastern Slav peoples. Russia's annexation of Congress Poland in 1815 was a major incident in the complicated and delicate business of redistributing the ceded territories of the French Empire and its client States. The annexation of Poland proper has always proved indigestible; when at last Polish independence was recognised by Russia in 1918, Poland unwisely took advantage of her temporary weakness to push Russia back beyond what Russia considered her due. In consequence of this, the German move eastwards into Poland in 1939 led, as in the eighteenth century, to Russian reoccupation of this line.

C.—France.

13. Since Germany's rise to power in the second half of the nineteenth century, there has been a tendency for France and Russia to draw more closely together. The only exception was the period from 1917 to 1933—a period of the eclipse of both Germany and Russia as first-class Powers—when internal social considerations predominated in committing France to the policy of the cordon sanitaire. But the industrialisation of the U.S.S.R. and the advent of Hitler restored the same relations of power as prevailed in the twenty years before 1914; the U.S.S.R. joined the League of Nations at French instance in 1934 and the Franco-Soviet Mutual Assistance Pact was signed in the following year. The Franco-Russian alliance, moreover, was strengthened by the agreements made by both of them with Czechoslovakia, which, as a Slav Power in the heart of Europe, had most to fear from German expansion into the Danube Valley towards control of the Balkans.

14. But in 1939 France failed to invoke the Franco-Soviet alliance, and Czechoslovakia paid the price. Two reasons for this breakdown stand out among others: (1) France was not united in accepting the Russian alliance. It was ten months before the pact signed by M. Laval was ratified. As before 1914, although for different reasons, there were ideological objections to the Russian alliance, coming now from the considerable section of the French population for whom fear of communism continued to be a very real thing; (2) the military value of the Russian alliance was seriously underestimated, partly in consequence of the great purge of 1937–38 in the U.S.S.R. For both these reasons French policy tended in every crisis to put close co-operation with Great Britain before the Russian alliance, until finally at Munich this preference broke the Franco-Czech-Russian grouping.

D.—Turkey and the Straits.

15. Russia has two primary interests in the Straits, strategic and economic. The latter has been secured since 1829, when the Treaty of Adrianople established that unarmed ships should have unhindered passage through the Straits when Turkey was at peace. It was vital for pre-revolutionary Russia that this right of passage for her wheat and (later) oil exports should be maintained; and though these exports have diminished since 1917, the principle of free passage still remains important.

16. Russia has two strategic aims in regard to the Straits. She always wishes to exclude the fleets of other Powers from the Black Sea; and she may wish to assert a right of egress for her own fleet, as well as desiring to keep the Straits open as a channel for supplies. Which of these aims is uppermost in the mind of the Russian Government at any given time depends on her relations with other Powers. In the Russo-Turkish Treaty concluded at Unkiar Skelesi in 1839 at a moment when Turkey happened to be at Russia's mercy, Russia temporarily attained both aims at once. The first aim was still secured by the London Convention of 1841, which excluded foreign warships so long as Turkey was at peace. But during the Crimean War England and France, in alliance with Turkey, sent their fleets into the Black Sea. Again, in 1878, Russia's vulnerability to sea attack was demonstrated; the despatch of a British fleet to the Dardanelles saved Constantinople and the threat of British sea power was largely responsible for overthrowing the Treaty of San Stefano, by which a pro-Russian Bulgaria with access to the Ægean had been created. In the war of 1914–18, although Russia was not threatened with the passage of foreign vessels into the Black Sea, her inability to control the Straits hampered her in the opposite direction: owing to the adherence of Turkey and Bulgaria to the German side, she could neither send her fleet out into the Mediterranean nor receive supplies through the Straits. In the present war, even with Turkey neutral, U.S.S.R. has once more been cut off from the west by German occupation of Bulgaria and the Ægean Islands.

(1) "Congress Poland" was the Polish Kingdom as it emerged after the Congress of Vienna in 1815. It comprised the kernel of the Polish lands around Warsaw and was included in the Russian Empire with the Russian Tsar as king, but with its own constitution and a large measure of autonomy.

17. In 1915 the possession of Constantinople, of European Turkey up to the Enos Midia line, and of both sides of the Bosphorus and Dardanelles, was promised to Russia by Great Britain and France. This promise fulfilled the most extreme demands of the Russian Foreign Office and was the result of hard bargaining at a stage in the war when Russia had just suffered heavy military defeat and the Allies regarded it as essential to keep her in the war. This secret agreement was upset by the 1917 Revolution, and again Russian vulnerability to sea power was exposed during the period of intervention, when Turkey's collapse allowed the British and French fleets to enter the Black Sea at will. The Treaty of Lausanne (1923) perpetuated this state of affairs by demilitarising the Straits altogether and thus in effect leaving them open to any strong naval Power—a situation which Russia has always regarded as less satisfactory than having them fortified, even by a potentially hostile Turkey. This, for the U.S.S.R., most unsatisfactory settlement was not reversed until 1936, by the Montreux Convention, and then only partially. Turkey was again accorded the right to fortify the Straits. Warships of belligerents were in almost all contingencies excluded, but the Turkish Government had a certain discretion in this matter. The U.S.S.R. is probably not satisfied with the Montreux Convention, although in 1941 she reaffirmed her loyalty to its terms. In 1939 negotiations for a Turko-Soviet Pact of Mutual Assistance were shipwrecked by Soviet insistence that Turkey should promise to use her discretionary powers under the Convention in such a way as to keep the Straits closed to warships of non-Black Sea Powers when Turkey was not herself at war. The ideal solution from the Soviet point of view was perhaps that laid down in the Soviet-Turkish Treaty of 1921, by which the régime of the Straits was to be decided by the Black Sea States only.

18. After the present war, it is possible that the U.S.S.R. may again press for a modification of the Montreux Convention. In the past, Russian policy has normally been to preserve a weak Turkey at the Straits as a lesser evil than control by a strong sea Power or group of Powers, but to press for seizure of the Straits herself if (as at the end of the nineteenth century, and again in 1915) Turkey is either in danger of collapse or at enmity with the Western Powers. The drawback to control of the Straits by Turkey, from the Russian point of view, is exhibited clearly in time of war, when a weak Turkey can be dominated by Russia's enemies, whether they are the naval Powers Great Britain and France (as in the Crimean War, 1878 and 1918–20) or Germany occupying the Balkans (as in 1914–18 and the present war). It should be noted that either the Anglo-French combination or Germany have shown themselves capable of closing the Baltic to Russia as well as the Black Sea, and did so in 1853–56, 1914–18, 1918–20, and 1941–44.

E.—The Middle East.

(a) Turkey.

19. The main problem in Russo-Turkish relations, as we have seen, has always been control of the Straits. But a secondary source of friction, also on occasion involving other Powers, has been the Caucasian frontier. The isthmus between the Black Sea and the Caspian, crossed by strategic and trade routes west and east, has always been of great importance to Russia; and this importance has been much enhanced in the last half century by the discovery of oil at Baku, still far the largest single source of Soviet supply.

20. The present Caucasian frontier was established in 1828–29, and has remained roughly unchanged ever since (Kars, Ardahan and Batum were acquired in 1878; Kars and Ardahan retroceded to Turkey in 1921). From that time to the present Russia's policy has been defensive on this turbulent, mountainous, polyglot frontier. Where she has overstepped the frontier it has normally been for punitive purposes or the establishment of order. In the nineteenth century the main threat came from unruly tribesmen, frequently egged on by the Turks, from gun-runners and subversive agents, often British and still more often believed to be British by the Russians. In the twentieth century there has been added to this anxiety the determination to secure the oil of Baku from annexation or bombing. In 1917–18, Georgia was occupied by the Germans and Russian Azerbaijan by the Turks; from 1918 to 1920 they were succeeded by the British in control of the oilfields. These episodes have certainly not been forgotten by the Russians; and the Soviet Government is also aware of the much more recent conversations between Turkey, France and Great Britain regarding the bombing of the Caucasian oil-wells.

(b) Persia and Afghanistan.

21. Anglo-Russian rivalry in Persia and Afghanistan first developed with the extension of Russia's frontiers between 1864 and 1885 to include what are now the Central Asian Republics. Both Powers were interested in this area less for its own sake than by reason of its strategic significance. There is not sufficient evidence to suggest that access to the Persian Gulf was ever a primary Russian objective. Russia always feared an extension of British influence in Persia, possibly leading to partition: she countered by seeking to monopolise trade with Northern Persia and to establish a preponderant influence over the Persian Government. This activity led Great Britain to fear a threat to her paramount position in the Persian Gulf and hence to the security of India.

22. The seriousness of the Russian threat to India was greatly exaggerated in the nineteenth century, and it is doubtful whether any such scheme was ever seriously entertained by the Tsarist Government itself, although the latter was frequently unable to control some of its more enterprising military commanders and diplomats on the spot. Russian objects in Central Asia were the establishment of civilised government and the maintenance of order along a long and unruly frontier. India was too far distant and communications too difficult, for the inefficient and top-heavy state apparatus of Tsarist Russia ever to have contemplated undertaking its conquest. But fear of Russian aggression was strong in the minds of the British Government and the Government of India, and was among the causes of the unsympathetic British attitude towards Russia in the Russo-Japanese war. The disastrous consequences of this war, coupled with the growing threat from Germany, made the Russian Government willing to listen to British proposals for an arrangement which would put an end to Anglo-Russian rivalry in the Middle East. The outcome was the Anglo-Russian Agreement of 1907 covering Persia, Afghanistan and Tibet. Two spheres of influence were recognised in Persia, Russian in the north and British in the south-east: British predominance in Afghanistan was recognised. This agreement, though unfortunate in its effects on British relations with Persia and Afghanistan (who never recognised it), was successful in preventing Anglo-Russian rivalry in the Middle East from seriously complicating Anglo-Russian relations. In 1915, when Great Britain admitted the Russian claim to the Straits, Russia in return assented to the incorporation in the British sphere of influence of the central region of Persia, which had been left "neutral" by the Agreement of 1907.

23. 1918 to 1926 was a period of active Russian propaganda in the Middle East. By repudiating the 1907 Agreement, by renouncing all its concessionary rights in Persia and by other similar gestures, the U.S.S.R. proclaimed itself the champion of small eastern nations against "western exploitation" in general and "British imperialism" in particular. From 1926 onwards, however, with the victory of Stalin over Trotsky, Comintern propaganda declined sharply in intensity, but Russian commercial penetration continued after this date until succeeded by German penetration in the '30's. During the whole of this period the Russian attitude to Persia and Afghanistan was one of non-intervention and formal correctness, apart from one lapse in 1929, when armed intervention was attempted in Afghanistan.

24. In 1941 common necessity again compelled Great Britain and Russia to take common action in Persia, this time to secure the Russian rear and to establish a channel of supplies. The Anglo–Soviet–Persian Treaty of 1942 provides that all foreign troops shall be withdrawn from Persia six months after the termination of hostilities with Germany and her associates (i.e., six months after the end of the Japanese war). The Tehran Declaration signed by Marshal Stalin, President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill in 1943 reaffirms the desire of the three Powers for the maintenance of Persian independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity. Stalin had already stated in November 1941, that the Soviet Union had no territorial designs on Persia. Nevertheless the Soviet–Persian Treaty of 1921 is still in force: under this treaty Russia has the right to send troops into Persia if the latter's territory is used as a base for military operations against Russia or to threaten its frontiers.

(c) The Moslem World.

25. It should not be forgotten that the U.S.S.R. is a great Moslem Power. Tsarist Russia was never able to make full use in foreign policy of its Moslem interests, or of its Ukrainian interests, because of its internal policy of Russification. The U.S.S.R., however, when all the necessary qualifications are made, has given a certain liberty to its subject populations. What is more important, she has won the reputation abroad of giving even more independence than has in fact been granted, though there has been, and is, a considerable mistrust of Russia by Moslem leaders especially among the Arabs.

F.—The Far East.

26. The Amur Region and the sea coast down to the site of Vladivostok were seized from China in 1858–60, but Russian intervention in Chinese affairs dates only from the end of the nineteenth century, when Russia joined the other European Powers in the scramble for concessions. From that date Russia has consistently intervened when China has been weak, normally to obtain compensation for herself when economic or territorial concessions have been secured by other Powers, occasionally to co-operate with China against other groupings. Thus, in 1895, Russia (together with France and Germany) intervened to stop Japan annexing Port Arthur; she also obtained from China in 1896 the right to build a railway straight across Northern Manchuria to Vladivostok (the Chinese Eastern Railway) and in 1898 the lease of Port Arthur (ice-free all the year round, unlike Vladivostok). The Anglo-Japanese alliance of 1902 and Russia's defeat in the war of 1904–05 were Japan's reply to what she regarded as the increasing Russian menace to Manchuria and Korea. By the Treaty of Portsmouth (1905) Russia yielded the southern half of Sakhalin, Port Arthur and in effect Southern Manchuria to Japan, besides acknowledging Japanese control over Korea. After the war of 1905 there was a Russo-Japanese rapprochement culminating in a secret treaty of military alliance in 1916 clearly aimed against the United States.

27. After the 1917 revolution, there was a sharp deterioration in relations between Russia and Japan (who participated in the ill-fated Siberian expedition). In relation to China the U.S.S.R. succeeded to the position of Tsarist Russia even in Outer Mongolia, and in Sinkiang, which later came under virtual Soviet control in 1934. The Soviet Government was not a member of the League when Japan seized Manchuria and took no action. They have, however, never recognised the "independence" of Manchuria de jure, although they recognised it de facto by the sale of Soviet rights in the Chinese Eastern Railway to Manchukuo–Japan in 1935.

28. Soviet advisers played an important part in the building up of Sun Yat Sen's China, but were expelled in 1927 on suspicion of instigating a Communist revolution, and up to 1931 relations between the U.S.S.R. and China were strained. Only a small Communist army survived in the north-western region of China, and the Soviet Government, in the thirties, became far more interested in encouraging China to oppose Japan, particularly after the signature of the Anti-Comintern Pact between Japan and Germany in 1936. When Japan invaded China proper in 1937 the U.S.S.R. at once signed a non-aggression pact with China, and help on a considerable scale was sent to Chiang Kai-shek.

29. There were constant Russo-Japanese frontier incidents in the 1930's, culminating in major clashes in 1938 and 1939; in each case Japan suffered a decided rebuff. In April 1941 a neutrality pact was signed between the U.S.S.R. and Japan, by which each Power agreed to remain neutral during any period in which the other might be "the object of military action on the part of one or several Powers," and to respect the "territorial inviolability" of the other. The U.S.S.R. pledged its respect for the territorial integrity of Manchukuo (although not formally recognising it de jure) and Japan agreed to respect the status of the Mongolian People's Republic. The pact is effective for five years, automatically renewable for a further five-year period unless one side denounces it a year before its expiration (i.e., before the 13th April, 1945). Meanwhile, the Trans-Siberian Railway has been double-tracked throughout its whole length, and a second railway to the Pacific running much further north of the Manchurian border is under construction. The U.S.S.R. used its increasingly favourable strategic position vis-à-vis Japan, to extract new concessions at each annual renewal of the fisheries agreement and has now, by the protocol of the 30th March, 1944, terminated the Japanese oil and coal concessions in the northern (Soviet) half of Sakhalin granted in 1925: Japan will obtain no more oil from this source other than accumulated stocks until after "the termination of the present war."

Following from Jordan.

Talks regarding Saudi Arabia with Landis, Moose and Gunther are being resumed here.

2. The Americans state that they have received instructions that future assistance to Saudi Arabia will be on a fifty-fifty basis. Is this agreed by you?

3. If this is agreed, there would still be the point that American aid would be on Lend-Lease terms and not a gift. In the case of silver, the Saudi Arabian Government have signed an undertaking as required by Act of Congress to buy and return it within five years after the war. Can you say whether our subsidy is a gift or a credit?

4. Please reply urgently.

Please ask J.S.M. to show you COS (W) 4 of April 21st, Z0105 of April 22nd and J.S.M. 42 of May 8th and numerous telegrams from Sir D. Osborne which have been repeated to you about Vatican proposal to bring food to Rome by sea.

2. We concur in the amendments to joint reply proposed by United States Chiefs of Staff (J.S.M. 42) but on reconsideration we are now inclined to think that it would be unwise for His Majesty's Government and the United States Government to make any public statement about Vatican proposal and terms of our joint reply with intention of fixing responsibility on Germans. When we originally suggested a public statement Germans had not accepted Vatican proposal in principle and in view of that and of lapse of time since Vatican proposal was originally made we think that Germans could make dangerous use of any public statement among Italian population.

3. Please discuss whole matter with State Department and if they concur in terms of proposed Anglo-American reply to Vatican ask them whether they would agree to reply being made simultaneously by Sir D. Osborne and his United States colleague. As State Department can only communicate with United States Representative at the Vatican through Berne would State Department be prepared to send him instructions through us to ensure simultaneous action with Sir D. Osborne.

4. Please inform State Department that instructions have been sent to Commander-in-Chief A.F.H.Q. to ensure insofar as is possible immunity from air attack for convoys of Vatican lorries bringing food to Rome by land.

My telegram No. 112.

The Marshal informed General MacFarlane this afternoon that there was no (repeat no) question of a split in the cabinet. He explained that the original resolution put forward by the Action party was in far more [1 gp. undec.] than to fulfil the terms and that the party had threatened to withdraw from the Government if the resolution were not passed. The Marshal had succeeded in watering it down considerably and the party state that they are satisfied with having registered their protest.

IMPORTANT.

My telegram No. 820 paragraph 4.

Corporation report today that small seizures of immobilised mineral have taken place in North Portugal, apparently under direct instructions from C.R.C.M. Lisbon. While it had been our intention in any event to make token deliveries of about 20 tons this month only 2 or 3 tons had actually been delivered at the time of seizures. It appears too early to say whether the seizures represent a deliberate attempt to extract from us the 150 tons allegedly due to the Germans, or merely indicate impatience at the slowness of our deliveries. It would be difficult at this stage to complain to Dr. Salazar on basis of his statement that means might be effected of delaying delivery without giving the impression that we agreed in principle to ultimate delivery to the Germans of this quantity. The wolfram committee accordingly has decided to defer any action for a few days pending further developments. These occurences however show the importance of reaching a joint Anglo-American decision on the main wolfram issue at the earliest possible moment.

IMPORTANT.

Your telegram No. 77.

Question seems to hinge on two points:-

(1) How great importance do we attach to the continuance of the Badoglio Government and

(2) Having in mind that we must keep military control in our hands until the Germans are expelled, what is the degree of support we must give the present régime so as to avoid political chaos in the country?

2. If we do not sufficiently support the Marshal we run the risks outlined in paragraph 6 of my telegram No. 77. Following are tentative suggestions for helping him in concrete form

(a) More use of Italian fighting troops. This would entail difficult problems but it is thought that Italian morale and enthusiasm have been affected by the fact that we are employing and intend to employ only some of the [group undec. ? crack] troops as combat troops and that these remain armed and equipped almost entirely with Italian weapons and equipment which are naturally short especially as regards ammunition.

(b) Prisoners of war. Feeling in Italy is very marked and is due entirely to the fact that although Italy is co-belligerent we still hold greet numbers of their men as prisoners. If we could find a solution to the difficulty of removing prisoner of war status, the Italian Government and people would be glad to see this personnel used more effectively in the war effort.

(c) Facilitating the return of Italian officials abroad (please see my telegram No. 56) could not security checking be carried out in Southern Italy - culprits could just as well be dealt with by our authorities here or be handed to Italian Epuration Commission who would deal with them effectively (perhaps too effectively)?

(d) .....

(d) Allied Status. [Group undec. ? Suggestion of] Prunas is of course that which Marshal and all Italians would like. It would give Badoglio prestige he wants to have with the Cabinet and people as well as internationally. Can anything be done to meet him?

(1) Would it be possible to tell the Marshal now that Allied status with adequate safeguards will be given at some specific date in the future e.g. when a united Government representing all liberated Italy is functioning in concert?

(2) It might be possible to suggest a preliminary step before grant of Allied status by negotiation, replacement of long armistice terms by something short and snappy which would not [sic] maintain essential control. It would be made plain to the Marshal that military security demanded by the Allies must prove co-operative intentions of the new Government before they could go the whole way to grant Allied status i.e. Italians must pay their passage. In the same way participation at the ultimate peace conference and in lease-lend should be made dependent on results. It might be found feasible to give Italy the benefit of U.N.R.R.A. which would be administered by personnel of A.C.C. I do not think that A.C.C. can be cut down for some time to come both on account of military considerations and because Italian administration is not yet ready for it.

(e) Saving the risk of inflation. Any steps in this direction would be welcomed. Measures are being taken by A.C.C. to avoid a rise in prices e.g. fixing price of wheat at reasonable standard. I am told by experts here that the influence of expenditure of Allied Forces on inflation is apt to be exaggerated and that halving pay would meet with bad reception by the troops in the 5th year of the war.

(f) Increase in food rations. The present bread ration is barely enough for subsistence and General Macfarlane is recommending increase of the present 200 grammes to 300 grammes. This would increase the efficiency of the population and would be well received. With the measures proposed [group undec. ? already] it is not expected that flour requirements would exceed present issues by more than 1/11% while new scale ration plus fixation of price of wheat at the former level holds out hope of solving black market.

3. I agree with Resmin. Med's statement in his telegram No. 648 that with the Italians appearances count for a great deal and the Marshal feels that he must have something tangible to show. Our gesture should not be long delayed. It is clear that the Russians want the initiative in Italy from the statement made by Vyshinsky to Tass Agency claiming the initiative in proposing Resmin. Med's resolution before Advisory Council on April 8th (see Resmin Med. telegram No. 579) welcoming the prospect of a broadly based Government.

4. I have put both sides of the case. I must confess I cannot see anybody but Badolgio encouraging such a Government [two groups undec.]. I do not think it is necessary to go the whole way to Allied status, but I think that in our short and long term interests some move is indicated to keep the new Cabinet "sweet" and avoid giving a second game in the rubber to Vyshinsky.

IMPORTANT.

My telegram No. 115.

The Marshal told General Macfarlane that Sforza, Omodio and Napoli all made violent speeches in support of the resolution and Togliatti also supported it in moderate terms. He decided that it was in the best interest of the government [grp. undec]allies not to oppose the resolution as finally passed.

2. The Marshal condemned the folly of the Crown Prince in giving interview and blamed the Prince's personal staff who approved the report of the interview when it was submitted by the Times correspondent. He intended to replace the Prince's present staff by arranging the nomination of General Pralermo, Colonel Lutini and reliable civilian advisers.

3. It would appear that Sforza is at the bottom of the trouble and the Marshal told General Macfarlane that however much Sforza may claim to be an elder statesman without party ties, he is in fact leader of the Action Party. My United States colleague tells me privately that he has formed very poor opinion of Sforza.

Buenos Aires telegram No. 504 to you.

As was only to be expected, Minister for Foreign Affairs speech at the State funeral to-day of the late Ambassador at Buenos Aires gave full expression to the friendly feelings between Brazil and Argentina. He said the Ambassador's policy in Buenos Aires had not only been that of Brazil but as the Argentine Minister for Foreign Affairs had said, also that of the Argentine. He went on "our unity is unbreakable and if there may arise differences in method of facing or even resolving certain problems of a general nature, these are not of a kind to alter the deep, intimate and traditional feeling of our fraternal and inseparable destinies."

Following from Ambassador to Greece telegram No.3.

SECRET.

[Begins]

My immediately preceding telegram.

Greek first party from Athens visited me yesterday evening. T hey consisted of M. Dragoumis and M. Londos (Popular Party) M. Theotokis (National Popular Party) Colonel Ventiris and M. Stathatos (Nationalist organisation in Athens) and M. Kartalis (EKKA).

2. Main point they put to me was the following. This conference would not satisfy public opinion in Greece unless there were open condemnation of crimes committed by E.A.M. and a demand made for dissolution of ELAS so that a national army could be formed as quickly as possible.

3. They explained that the line taken by E.A.M. and company was that G.H.Q. Middle East require the services of ELAS, and that therefore a national army must be formed out of ELAS who would admit others to join their ranks. They asked me whether this was the correct position and whether in that case there were any objections from the British side to their speaking the whole truth at the conference and formulating clearly what they considered to be necessary in the interests of Greece.

4. I replied that the conference had been called in order that all views might be clearly expressed. The British certainly had no wish to intervene and prevent this purpose from being achieved. We were not tied to any one party or organisation. We were allies of Greece. It was therefore for delegates at this conference to agree on programme which best served the nation and then put conclusions to their allies. There could not be any question of British intervening to prevent any party from expressing its views. If it was decided for reasons which would be fully explained to demand dissolution of ELAS in order to make way for a national army freed from control by any one section the military consequences could be discussed later with British military authorities. I assumed it was the desire of everybody not to interfere with any special operations against the enemy in particular areas and that they would all wish to come to a working arrangement with

G.H.Q. Middle East on this basis.

5. They replied that their wish was to work in closest understanding with the British and they expect no difficulty in allowing existing guerilla units to continue in certain areas where British particularly desired to use their services against the enemy. What was essential was that there should be a formal and public agreement for dissolution of present bands and for their replacement by a national army at the earliest possible date. Any agreement with E.A.M. would be worthless unless they join publicly with others in making a declaration to this effect. Provided British did not intervene in favour of E.A.M.'s claim to preserve their existing bands, they felt reasonably confident that E.A.M. would fall into line with all the others at the conference.

6. I have the impression from many talks I have had during the last three days that E.A.M. delegates have instructions not to let themselves be held responsible for a rupture and that they will therefore accept on paper any conditions agreed to by all other parties in the hope of upsetting the agreement later to suit their own purposes. If this is correct it is clearly in the general interest that any further demands from E.A.M. should be firm and clear cut. Half measures are useless with these people who only respect and understand firmness from others.

7. Both M.Papandreou and the Communists have asked to see me to-day when no doubt these questions will be put to me from their very different angles. I assume that if M. Papandreou takes firm line with E.A.M., which I believe he has every intention of doing, he will receive full backing of His Majesty's Government. My guess, for what it is worth, is that if he does so, E.A.M. will give in. I shall certainly give them no encouragement [grp.undec.?whatever].

Following from Ambassador to Greece telegram No.4.

My immediately preceding telegram.

I visited M. Papandreou this morning. He is much better and will open the conference to-morrow.

2. I reported the conversation I had had with Athenian representatives yesterday and we then discussed the line he should take on the future of ELAS. He agreed that the Athenian representatives should speak their minds freely on the subject of EAM/ELAS, expose crimes committed and ask for dissolution of ELAS. He as the President of the Conference would then see whether the communists intended to provoke a rupture on this point. This he was determined to avoid as he feared that the British and American public would, by his immediate demand for dissolution of the fighting force in Greece, hold him responsible for destroying the possibility of a government of national unity. He would not fall into this trap.

3. He said therefore that if I agreed he would adopt the following tactics. He would demand complete reorganisation of ELAS under orders of the National Government in order that it might be transformed into a national army. At the same time he would demand formally a national army on a non-party basis in areas where it could be most useful. EAM could not refuse this once they had held the principle of a national army. On this basis he would take them into the Government.

4. Although he fully agreed that the existence of ELAS as a party army was harmful to Greece he desired to avoid a rupture now and felt sure that he could in fact achieve the dissolution of ELAS at a later date by the tactics he proposed. Once he had

EAM in the Government they would in fact be under the control of the majority for two reasons

(a) They would have to share responsibility for the punishment of mutineers in the Greek brigade and navy which would in fact discredit them in the eyes of their violent followers;

(b) They would find themselves completely in the wrong if ELAS in Greece took any action against the new national army which was being formed outside their ranks. If the incidents occurred as the result of ELAS provocation, the national government would be in an overwhelmingly strong position in breaking with EAM. If, added M. Papandreou, the British supported his attempt to form a national army by supplying the necessary arms, by sea if possible, he would before long have a force in Greece strongly backed by the population, which at the end of two months would have nothing to fear from ELAS and would give much better co-operation to the British. I told M. Papandreou that provided he could carry his own support with him I thought these tactics were wiser than going all out at once and provoking the chance of a rupture. Public opinion in Britain certainly desired an agreement and I myself believed it could be obtained at this conference. Once it was obtained his own position and that of his government would be very strong both in Greece and abroad, and EAM could then no longer count on any support if they broke or obstructed the terms of the agreement which would have been made public.

6. M. Papandreou assured me that all his followers had given him [grp. undec. ? authority] to adopt tactics he thought fit even if it meant foregoing immediate dissolution of ELAS, provided I agree with this procedure and that subsequently His Majesty's Government would give their strong backing to Greece when represented by a new national government. I told M. Papandreou that he could give an assurance on both points to his followers who now represent everybody here except Communists.

7. In conclusion M. Papandreou outlined the opening speech which he would make to-morrow morning. I thought it excellent and merely suggested a few points likely to capture the imagination of British public opinion, as his speech may be modified before to-morrow and as it will be published after delivery, I will not report its contents meanwhile. It is quite clear to me from my own observations that he is now master of the situation here and has imposed his strong personality in a striking fashion.

IMPORTANT.

My telegram No. 2441.

Strictly Confidential.

Mr. Hull is to-day giving final considerations to instructions to the United States Ambassador at Buenos Aires to discuss privately at an early date with Farrell or Peron following basis for a rapprochement.

(a) repatriation of German diplomats and officials;

(b) effective internment of remaining German agents and Japanese;

(c) no more favours or diversion of supplies to Axis controlled firms;

(d) publication of Statutory and Proclaimed Lists;

(e) effective control of cargo.

2. While not stipulating Cabinet changes the United States Government hopes these may result; and the United States Ambassador may encourage suitable civilians to participate in the Cabinet or Government.

3. Above is of necessity tentative as last minute stand is being made by certain officials led by Wendelen (late of United States Embassy in Buenos Aires) who, with press support, are urging no compromise and using frightening [group undec.] of appeasement.

4. Official directly responsible for the above is therefore not (repeat not) authorised as yet to disclose this plan; and for fear of possible Brazilian duplicity proposals will not (repeat not) be communicated for a day or two to the Brazilian Government or representative in Buenos Aires.

5. United States Ambassador is however to consult with you as soon as he receives his instructions and before taking action.

6. If this attempt at compromise fails Moderates expect to be discredited with Mr. Hull and tough school will have its innings. If therefore you agree and His Majesty's Government have no objection it would seem important to do anything possible without taking undue risks to bring United States and Argentine Governments together on a basis of reasonable compromise.

7. As hinted in my telegram No. 2497 to Foreign Office friendly officials believe the repatriation of German diplomats to be an essential preliminary, both as a public gesture to the moderate United States press and the public by promising more to come and as a step which may bring to a head the fight between the Extremists and the Moderates in the Argentine Cabinet. If the latter win and the focus for German intrigues is thus removed they hope the remainder may follow.

Viénot told me on May 12th that he was much troubled that Algiers was completely misunderstanding the present position. They were completely cut off from information because they relied largely on his telegrams to know what was going on in the outer world. He was quite certain that had he been able to explain the position in the last fortnight de Gaulle's outburst, which he himself much regretted, would never have taken place. The best suggestion he could think of to help in the circumstances was that he might be allowed to send his Counsellor M.Paris to Algiers, not to negotiate anything but simply to give Algiers a clearer understanding of our policy and of the reasons for our action in imposing the ban and generally to try to re-establish confident Anglo-French relations. Massigli was now as ignorant as de Gaulle and could not really give any help.

2. I told Viénot that I felt sure that you would do all you could to explain the position. He agreed but said that this could not be as fully effective as assurances from a Frenchman. I said that the difficulties were, I feared, very great indeed. If I were to agree to this proposal I should immediately be innundated with a series of demands. Either a ban like this had to be maintained almost without exception or it would be so weakened as soon to have to be abandoned.

3. Viénot's second point was that he understood that General Eisenhower proposed to make a proclamation if and when there were an Allied landing in France. He hoped very much that we would look at this for it was of course an important political document. We must not underrate Vichy's propaganda which had recently been carried out under Henriot, with devilish skill. He suggested that General Eisenhower's proclamation might be accompanied by some message from General de Gaulle and he thought that it would be of the greatest value if the Prime Minister himself could, a few days after the landing, speak to the French people as he had spoken.....

spoken to them in October 1940. The words then used by the Prime Minister needed few changes to fit them to present conditions and their effect in France would be profound.

4. Since my conversation with Viénot permission has been given for General Koenig to despatch a cypher telegram to Algiers on the strength of his word of honour. Viénot expressed to Sir A.Cadogan this morning his satisfaction at this development.

My immediately preceding telegram.

Court was requested to deliver judgment on following points.

(1) Did Derrien in November 1943 capitulate to the enemy and hand over Port of Bizerta without having taken all possible measures of defence?

(2) Did he permit capture of certain units of the Fleet on December 8th 1942?

(3) As regards (2) did he act

(a) voluntarily
(b) with negligence or
(c) with incompetence?

(4) Were there extenuating circumstances?

2. Court replied in the negative to number (1) and in the affirmative to numbers(2) and (3)(a), it admitted extenuating circumstances. Points (3)(b) and (c) did not therefore arise. Under Article 240 of Military Code voluntary surrender of the Fleet is punishable by death but in view of the extenuating circumstances sentence was commuted to one of imprisonment for life with hard labour. Owing to the fact therefore that Derrien was over sixty, sentence of hard labour will under Law of May 30th 1854 be remitted automatically. He is deprived of his nilitary rank. The Court also ruled that his name should be removed from the Roll of the Legion of Honour.

3. General Weiss asked for the death penalty but it appears that strong speech by counsel for the defence made a deep effect and may to some extent have been responsible for decision of the Court to forego imposing death penalty.

IMMEDIATE

Your telegram No. 581.

We have had full discussion with United States Embassy.

2. In our joint view governing factors in this problem are:

a) Turko-Hungarian Agreement is hard to reconcile with assurance in Turkish note of April 17th, and which establishes precedent for similar agreements with Roumania and [grp.undec.? Germany]

b) Application of blockade, originally threatened in our note of April 14th, and therefore before chrome decision, would have adverse political repercussions and might also react against ourselves, e.g. [grp.undec.? by] giving Turks loop-hole for more extensive agreement with the Axis, including perhaps chrome in return for goods cut off by us, such as petrol. Moreover, we must recognise that, in final analysis blockade weapon is far less effective in dealing with Turks than with e.g. Spaniards or Swiss.

c) United States Ambassador states that Minister for Foreign Affairs informed him on May 12th that he is prepared to sign forthwith agreement with United States and United Kingdom engaging Turkey to reduce immediately and unconditionally exports to the Axis of strategic commodities listed in our notes of April 14th by 40% of 1943 figures and to apply this on a monthly basis; and, in respect of remaining 60%, to submit to Allied Embassies through his bureau all orders to Axis for essential commodities which would involve strategic exports as counter value. Under this agreement we should be sure of 40% reduction, and a further reduction corresponding to our ability to replace Axis supplies of essential goods.

d) We have Minister for Foreign Affairs's past record and can assume that he is out to give away as little as possible. We should if possible avoid doing battle on ground of his choosing and in particular should not be lead into statistical discussions which would give him the opportunity for procrastination and bargaining.

e) Time factor is of paramount importance firstly to make the Turks understand that we are in earnest, secondly to prevent renewal of Clodius and other Axis agreements, and thirdly to stop at earliest possible moment present outflow of strategic commodities to Axis Europe.

3. With above considerations in mind United States Ambassador and myself recommend that we be immediately authorised to take the following action:

a) Lodge a protest formally and strongly against terms of Turco Hungarian agreement which so flagrantly ignore the wishes of British and United States Governments as expressed in Allied notes of April 14th and seem to be contrary to assurances contained in Minister for Foreign Affair's reply of April 17th.

b) Take note of valuable contribution which Turkish Government have made to the Allied cause by their chrome decision

c) Point out that even so and in spite of Minister for Foreign Affair's oral explanations of his intentions regarding execution of Turco-Hungarian agreement, the two Governments must ask to have the position clearly stated so as to eliminate the possibility of further misunderstanding

d) Request a formal written assurance from Turkish Government that under recently concluded Turco Hungarian agreement the export of strategic commodities as defined in Allied notes of April 14th shall in no case exceed 50% of quantities exported to Hungary in 1943 and that remaining 50% shall be reduced by any quantities representing counter value of Hungarian goods covered by agreement which, after consultation, can be made available from Allied sources

e) Request a further written understanding [sic? undertaking] that in the event of the conclusion or renewal of any further agreement with Germany or the Axis countries involving the strategical commodities, Turkey's contractual obligations to export these commodities will in no case exceed 50% of deliveries of these commodities made by her to that country in 1943 and that the remaining 50% shall be reduced by any quantity representing counter value of goods which, after consultation Allied powers would provide.

f) His Majesty's Government and United States Government for their part offer to undertake to do their uttermost within their material possibilities and in full consultation with the appropriate Turkish authorities to cater for Turkey's essential needs. With this end in view they would immediately remove all export bans and be ready to enter into immediate discussions with the Turkish Government with a view to programming supply to Turkey of her essential needs. In this connexion stress might be laid on their realisation of the necessity of providing such commidities as Anti-Malarial fever drugs, raw wool, cotton piece goods, yarns etc loading-carrying vehicles, tyres, agricultural machines etc, my telegram No. 192 Arfar.

g) It might also be desirable to indicate that the two Governments would be prepared to discuss the development of their purchase programme in Turkey with a view to cushioning effect of the cessation of Turkish exports to Axis.

4. As has been stressed above speed is a most essential factor and, though we do not suggest that the above course of action is perfect or that if successful it would give us 100% satisfaction, we feel that it is most important that we should act at once in anticipation of German moves, retain initiative, and set ourselves to obtain a result which, combined with chrome embargo, would give us in practice a much greater measure of satisfaction than could have been hoped for a month ago. Moreover, early public knowledge of the conclusion of such an agreement would no doubt be of assistance in dealing with other neutrals. The alternative in our [?grp.omitted? opinion] is prolonged discussion of detail, loss of initiative and of the present favourable tide and continued flow to the Axis at a decisive period of valuable war supplies.

Secret and personal.

The more I think about it, the more I feel that our warning to Dr. Salazar should be as simple and crisp as possible (my previous suggestions have been too complicated).

2. The situation in a nutshell is that Dr. Salazar is posing as a crusader defending the rights of neutrals. In reality he is trying (as I told him heedful of instructions) to preserve at one and the same time the benefits of the alliance and those of a full neutrality. He is pitting his obstinacy against our indulgence and our reluctance to have a quarrel in public with our ancient ally. He told me that the use of broadcasting as a political weapon was playing with fire. We must show him that this applies to the ancient and pleasurable game of tweaking the lion's tail. If we do not bring him to book on this issue (regardless of its intrinsic merits) he may well be excused for thinking that he can permanently continue his present tactics with impunity.

3. I suggest that the best way of doing this is that I should be instructed to inform him in friendly but unmistakable terms that unless he does the right thing His Majesty's Government will be obliged (rather than answer the host of parliamentary questions which it will not be possible to defer much longer and some of which may well be framed in a way which they would deeply regret) to make a declaration in Parliament in which the Prime Minister, after giving Portugal full credit for her response to the alliance over the Azores, will have no alternative but to state that His Majesty's Government cannot regard her action in helping our enemy to delay his defeat as the attitude which one friend (not to speak of an ally) is entitled to expect of another.

4. Something on those lines would I think bring Dr. Salazar to reason. It contains no explicit threat of any kind and would therefore not only make it more easy for him to bow to the inevitable but also difficult for him to rally his people (to whom it would be easy to put across in a few lines) by rousing national pride in face of foreign

5. Whilst likely to be effective it commits His Majesty's Government to nothing but leaves them free to act as may be necessary in the improbable but not impossible event of Dr. Salazar throwing down the challenge.

My telegram No. 853.

Attitude of Americans as disclosed in Washington telegram No. 2478 seems to come to a pretty naive admission that they intend to sit back and watch us take the odium whilst reserving their right to chip in at any moment and egg us on to demand embargo after putting forward a somewhat less drastic settlement (an impossible thing to do anyway). Support which they promised us in such an event could easily (if they were so minded) be given in such a way as to maintain us in the role of villain of the piece. In final result they could claim the credit (vis-à-vis their public opinion) or put the blame on to us as the case might be. This is sitting on velvet indeed.

2. Since Mr. George's visit to Lisbon (my telegram No. 784) attitude of United States colleague has become one of unaccustomed aloofness tinged with a hint of guilt due no doubt to my having always been completely straight with him. But two can play at that game and Portuguese mistrust of American policy and methods and their knowledge of what happened in Spain should make it easier for me to play it than for him.

3. Course of action proposed in my telegram under reference would however stimy American game altogether since we should be putting a proposal to Dr. Salazar which he must accept or reject under pain of statement in Parliament. If my approach meets with your approval could you inform United States Government of your intention without specifically asking their approval. Perhaps you could do this on the score that they might not wish to be associated with it to the extent of blessing it in advance? I fear that otherwise there may be further delays.

Following is a summary of a letter addressed to me and signed by the Presidents of the Saadist, Liberal and Nationalist Parties and by the Secretary General of the Independent Wafdist Group on behalf of its President now interned.

2. "The signatories protest against a new outrage graver than any other against the independence and sovereignty of Egypt.

3. In preventing in the name of the British Government, the recent political crisis from following its normal course according to constitutional and sovereignty rights of Egypt you have trampled on the fundemental principles of the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty and brought Egypt back to the sombre days of the protectorate thus exposing the purely imperialistic objects of British policy.

4. This right of intervention is justified on the ground that British Armies have protected Egypt against the troops of the Axis and have caused Egypt to enjoy exceptional prosperity. The Treaty gives us right to such intervention. The agression of the Axis was not directed against Egypt herself but against Imperial lines of communication and British strategical position in the Middle East. Great Britain was therefore defending herself on Egyptian territory in a war declared against herself. Egypt carried out her part and more than her part of the Treaty obligations. Great Britain in violating the Treaty is evidently designing to put back Anglo-Egyptian relations 25 years.

5. As to the exceptional prosperity which the war and British troops have brought Egypt, this so called prosperity is only artificial and is represented by an enormous increase in the cost of living, by a disquieting scarcity of essential products, a major discrepancy between the different classes of society and by a multiplication of epidemics killing thousands of our fellow citizens. Such is this prosperity which only profits a few families installed in power thanks to Your Excellency.

6. In any case nothing in the law or international practice or logic justifies interference in the internal affairs of a nation on the grounds of prosperity real or artificial. Nothing justifies such a reversion against the liberties of a friendly people except a new outburst of that tyrannical spirit which Great Britain condemns in the Fascist nation, and of which she gives a sorry example in imposing on this country a government whose existence is an unintelligent succession of arbitrary acts, of outrages against liberties and of violations of the most elementary rights of the citizen.

7. Last misdeed of this black series is the arrest of Makram Ebeid former Minister and one of the signatories of the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty, and the arrest of Deputy Mikhail Bishara for no other reason than that they wished to express to the public their opinion on recent events.

8. It is evident that such a crime against the essential civic and political principles could not have been consummated if the present government had not felt itself supported by the British Government, which thus shares the responsibility for the sorry situation in which the Egyptian nation is struggling.

9. It is our duty to point out that Great Britain has no interest in alienating the friendship of Egypt. If the Egyptian people are at present under the yoke of martial law and if all manifestation of free opinion is arbitrarily forbidden, the Egyptian people when the time comes will be able to impose its will and establish its rights."

Gandhi's release has met with widespread approval. Liberal opinion calls it "belated" but bulk of comment is that Gandhi's health must be very weak and that release was prompted by apprehension lest he should die while under detention and become a martyr. Several commentators and broadcasters see in release proof of Japanese failure to arouse Indian masses against Britain and British confidence in victory.

2. Burma

Operations have received prominence. It is now generally accepted that the danger to India has virtually disappeared.

3. Imperial Conference

Comment has been substantial though generalised owing to absence of knowledge of decisions reached at Conference. Extreme right and left wings deplore alleged nationalism or imperialism. The great majority of press and radio between these extremes have emphasised beneficent stabilising effect of Commonwealth and Empire. Friendly papers have also included tributes to the war efforts of the Dominions.

4. Montgomery Ward

(Aloof No. 19 paragraph 2.) This controversy remains dominant topic of home-front. Workers' election has been won and the firm has now been handed back to the management. Great interest is being shown in the forthcoming congressional investigation of the case which will probably develop into investigation of Presidential war time powers.

5. Although fully reported, International Labour Office conference has not aroused any appreciable nationwide comment.

6. Surprise cancellation of almost all meat rationing has inevitably been called "pure electioneering" by Republicans, but seems in fact more related to Administration's efforts to win support for General Price Control Bill now up for renewal.

IMPORTANT.

My telegram No.562.

No mention was made in official summary of Massigli's speech as given in the press of his reference to suspension of cypher communication with London. In point of fact Massigli alludes in moderate terms to this question saying it was his duty to point out negotiations in London over civil administration in France had been rendered impossible by the committees inability to communicate with their delegates. Further, in referring to Russia, Massigli drew attention to the fact that formula of recognition accorded to committee by Soviet Government was more complete than that given by either London or Washington and he also spoke of generous expression of friendship in spite of "crime of Munich" extended by President Benes to General de Gaulle as the representative of French nation. Massigli's speech was moderate throughout and well balanced, but as usual he was not at ease before a parliamentary audience. He was often difficult to follow and his delivery lacked the skill of a practiced orator.

[R begins] 2. Vincent Auriol followed with a speech reminiscent of the old parliamentary days. He wished the Government's statement on foreign policy had been a little more dynamic. France's voice must be heard when the Armistice conditions with Germany were discussed: the departments of the Rhine and the Moselle should return to France. He did not wish to split Europe into competing regional blocks but France's interests with Belgium, Holland and Luxembourg were intimate and above all an alliance with England must be achieved. (Loud cheers). He felt that a pact of friendship should be signed with Soviet Russia and that good relations should be maintained with Greece, Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia. In this way a European Federation would be set up which would constitute a greater guarantee of peace than the League of Nations. Such a federation required friendship with the United States of America. While speaking of the position of the committee during the liberation of France, Vincent Auriol claimed that the Soviet Russia-Czechoslovak agreement was a model instrument. It had indeed, received the blessing of America and England.

3. Senator Cuttoli of Algiers Conseil-Général made a violent attack on the Department of Diplomatic Personnel accusing them of a Vichy taint and of belonging to a close corporation. A complete purge was required. This was received with loud applause. Finally Bohté, the Communist spoke for over an hour explaining how French foreign policy had always taken the wrong turning to the Right instead of to the Left. He foreshadowed in the future an all-powerful alliance between France, Soviet Russia and the latter's satellite states, Czechoslovakia and Poland to be joined by the new Spain and perhaps the new Italy. This alliance, said Bonté, would be a real guarantee for peace and security.

My telegram No. 556.

In the course of his speech on 10th May the Commissioner for the Interior made a brief reference, which is being reported by despatch, to certain steps which F.C.N.L. intended to take to give some status to fighting groups in France. On 13th May F.C.N.L. issued short communiqué to the effect that certain measures had been adopted regarding such status and would be published later. I understand from the Commissariat of the Interior that proposed measures will cover such questions as pensions for next of kin etc., and will not constitute an attempt to regularise the position of resistance groups from international point of view.

IMMEDIATE

My telegram No. 742.

The First Secretary followed up my representations to the Minister for Foreign Affairs with the Head of European Department this morning and gave him copy of my letter to the Minister for Foreign Affairs. The Head of the Department said that the position as regards fixing a date for closing the Consulate was still as the Minister for Foreign Affairs had explained to me. For the Spanish Government to fix a date would be an uncalled for humiliation for Germany and his Minister wished to arrange the matter in an intimate way with the Germans. Bramwell asked if a date could not be fixed with the Germans and communicated to the Embassy but not made public. The Spanish official seemed to think this a good idea and said he would talk to the Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Subsequently [?grp.omitted] lunched with the Minister for Foreign Affairs and he said again he could not humiliate the Germans by fixing a date and if he did they might not accept it. He wished to arrange the matter with the Germans. Was not that what His Majesty's Government would do in similar circumstances. Progress however was being made. He had just had a telephone message from Tangier to say that the German Consul-General would on Monday or Tuesday take down his shield and flag. He still wanted however a few days longer to deal with his archives.

I stressed the importance of terminating the whole business during the conversation and he again assured me he would do his best.

Please repeat to Washington as my telegram No. 204.

Your telegram No. 498

Hungarian Minister called on me a few days ago to say he proposed to go to Lisbon to stay with Hungarian Minister there for a month or six weeks and then return to Madrid. He had assured his return by obtaining from Ministry of Foreign Affairs an entry and exit visa [of] three months for an unlimited number of journeys. I did not raise any objection but reminded him of your view that it was better for Hungarian Ministers to remain at their posts. Hambro called again to-day and told me that after discussing position with his Secretary, Count Bethlen, he had come to the conclusion that going away for so long might look as if he were leaving his post and he had decided therefore to go to Lisbon for a week only as he very much wanted to talk things over with Hungarian Minister there.

He then mentioned very tactfully his and Count Bethlen's - [group undec.] difficulties as all their supplies had been cut off and he wondered whether it would be possible to arrange for funds to be provided for them out of blocked gold belonging to Hungarian Government in the United States. He could manage on pesetas 8000; Bethlen having his wife and children here would need a little more say 10,000 per mensem. He would of course prefer pesetas 10,000 for himself unless we thought that too much.

If funds could not be arranged from blocked gold a possible alternative might be to draw upon Hungarian credit in Polish clearing which has risen out of costs of the maintenance for 25,000 Polish Nationals in Hungary. [Group undec.? These] Poles he pointed out had not been into concentration camps but had been allowed to live in hotels and were generally treated very well. As it is very desirable that M. Hambro should remain at his post it seems to me that we have an obligation to help him and his request appears reasonable as in any case he and his secretary have to live. I trust therefore that sympathetic consideration will be given to it. If there is likely to be any delay in arranging the matter M. Hambro may be obliged to ask for an advance and I should be grateful for instructions on the point.

Weekly appreciation.

A violent anti-British manifesto signed by leaders of the four opposition parties has been issued dated May 1st. It protests against British intervention to prevent dismissal of Nahas and in particular against War Cabinet's message to King Farouk (see Foreign Office telegram No.560). British action is criticised as establishing a situation worse than the Protectorate.

2. Makram's arrest has been the excitement of the week. The opposition deputies in protest withdrew from a sitting of the Chamber at which an interpellation regarding internees was to be discussed. It is rumoured that opposition parties contemplate issuing resolutions similar to those which caused Makram's arrest, but this rumour may be due to above-mentioned manifesto, which has only just become known.

3. The leaders of the four opposition parties (the Secretary General of the Independent Wafdist Group signing for Makram) have addressed to the Ambassador a letter protesting against our intervention in the recent crisis on lines of above-mentioned manifesto and against arrest of Makram which, it is asserted, the Government would not have effected if it had not felt sure of our support.

4. Minister of War has transferred from Cairo 19 officers alleged to be implicated in a plot to assassinate ministers. Chief of the Military Mission, who has grave doubts about genuineness of some of the names on list of alleged culprits, says that these transfers are regarded in the army as victimisation of Attallah's men. Minister of Defence stated in conversation with Oriental Counsellor that he had effected these transfers before Nahas had spoken to him as a result of conversation with Ambassador (see my telegram No.930). Chief of Military Mission maintains that Minister had promised him to transfer now only 8 officers alleged active agents of plot. Minister of Defence also stated in conversation with Oriental Counsellor that he had suspended removal of troops from Cairo area on ground of shortage of tents, but his language seemed to indicate that he had not given up the idea. He said that there were 29,000 troops in Cairo which was far more than necessary.

5. Financial Conference has come in for much criticism, mainly as suggesting measures inappropriate to Egypt and burking real remedy, the importation of more goods.

6. There has been a recrudescence of pamphlets, anti-Government, anti-British and anti-Foreign, two by Young Egypt.

7. There are indications that Nahas may for reasons of internal prestige, play up Palestine question.

IMPORTANT

Weekly Political Summary.

1. Everybody is now waiting for "D-Day". Most popular view is that it will come within next two weeks. Political opinion reflects this pre-occupation.

2. President's return. President's return from his secret recuperating centre, now revealed as Bernard Baruch's estate in South Carolina, has been news of the week. First effect has been to quell rumours that he is too ill to run again. Pressmen came away from his first press conference agreeing that he looked bronzed and fit. He even scolded them vigorously for giving the country a biased presentation of news of Montgomery Ward case, a sure sign to many that he is in battling political mood. Simultaneously Robert Hannegan, Democratic National Chairman, and Senators Truman and Barkley emerged at Jefferson Day dinners as the frontline champions of a fourth-term drive. Hannegan and Barkley did Dewey the honour of selecting him as the butt of their most withering sarcasm, delving into his 1940 speeches for anti-Russian passages and hopelessly inaccurate estimates of America's productive capacity. The lines of strategy of opposing camps are beginning to clarify. Republicans are going to try to make capital out of "The Tired Old Leaders" in Washington, alleged to be patently incapable of undertaking task of peace-building. Democrats are going to stress that experience of the present war leaders cannot possibly be thrust aside in favour of novices like Dewey and his associates. Nomination of James Forrestal, Under Secretary of Navy, to fill Knox's place in Cabinet, ending the wild rumours that Willkie or Strassen were to be given the post, was in some measure unquestionably influenced by both these factors. For Forrestal's relative youthfulness (52) - average age of Cabinet being over 64 - and his experience in war councils, are both assets. In this sense nomination is good politics though not as sensational as the appointment of a prominent Republican would have been. Forrestal is a Wall Street Democrat, roughly of the Stettinius-Harriman stamp, who has made a very creditable record since 1940 supervising the navy's vast expansion programme. His nomination has been well received by both parties, and by War and Navy Departments, and seems certain to be confirmed. He has recently come out as an opponent of plan to merge the armed services under a single command, at least until much further study has been made of the situation.

3. Russo-Polish-American relations. Father Orlemanski's visit to Russia is having varied repercussions. On the one hand, it has given Russophobes, Catholics and Poles something to howl over. Even New York Times has belaboured Orlemanski as a rather shallow cleric fishing in very deep waters. Virtually no one has risked saying anything good about the trip so far, though his statements have been given full and fair publicity and Episcopal Bishop of Massachusetts has called on his critics to be silent till he has explained his position. Orlemanski arrived back in Seattle on the 10th, had an unpleasant brush with inquisitive pressmen at the airport and left without saying anything. In Chicago he revealed Stalin's devotion to freedom of conscience and worship and his opposition to persecution of the Catholic Church. He added "I have wonderful news on Poland, but this will come at a later date". Meantime this Springfield (Massachusetts) News has produced a banner-headline "local priest wins Polish freedom". President - perhaps unchivalrously but certainly adroitly - has referred all questions about the trip to Mrs. Ruth Shipley, Head of State Department's Passport Division. Mrs. Shipley has reputation of a veritable ogre of formality and rectitude, who is not only above reproach but beyond intimidation. On other hand Poles seem definitely to have overshot mark with their agitation and are being accused by sources as varied as Scripps-Howard, P.M., Washington Post and Lowell Mellett [sic] of interfering unjustifiably in American political affairs. Meantime press has got hold of substance of justice department's investigation of Polish Government publicity agencies, which seems to show that Poles have been guilty of a multitude of infringements of foreign agents registration act.

4. Treatment of Germany. Treatment of Germany has attracted fresh attention mainly as a result of attempt of United States Labour Delegate, Robert Watt, to put I.L.O. on record as differentiating between Nazis and Germans and in opposition to economic dismemberment of Germany. Conference opinion especially amongst European representatives led by Masaryk was strongly against Watt, and Sir Frederick Leggett had no difficulty in winning wide support for his proposal that no decisions about Germany should be taken in absence of Russians. At same time press has been featuring despatches from London suggesting that Britain, America and Russia have reached substantial agreement on policing of Germany. Report that Russians were demanding that whole German Army be declared prisoners of war and used as labour battalions has been received without arousing press controversy. Public opinion polls show that Americans especially amongst churches and youth groups, while determined to remove Germany as a military threat are still strongly moved by a desire to avoid imposing "impossible conditions" on German people and so creating grievances that would lead finally to another war. Herald Tribune has pleaded that controversy be brought down from vague talk of a soft versus hard peace to a particularised discussion of various military, economic and political measures necessary to ensure that Germany will never again be a military threat and to provide supervision of her affairs until such time as her militaristic political - social structure and ideology have been reformed.

5. France. Your statement in House that we have no intention of dealing with Vichy in any circumstances has been welcomed for its forthrightness and some commentators (e.g. Time Magazine) read into it an attempt to stiffen American's rather wavering disposition to deal through French National Committee. Meantime de Gaulle has nettled people here once more by his reference to "La chère et puissante Russie" which is viewed as a too obvious attempt to play democracies off against Russians. French Committee representatives here have taken little trouble to hide their injured pride over our diplomatic censorship and insist that they are being left hopelessly in dark as regards civil affairs in France.

6. Neutrals. Discussion of Spanish agreement has subsided. For all State Department's fears wolfram deal never precipitated a major controversy though grunts of disapproval still come from P.M. New Republic and nation. Hope continues that Allies will take an increasingly strong line with neutrals. Revelation of Irish firms included in latest blacklist has been received without controversy. Stettinius told press off-the-record that if Swedes didn't fall in line "some more drastic action would have to be taken."

7. Commonwealth Conference. Press despatches on Commonwealth Conference continue to be prominent. Occasion has been useful in that it has resulted in a number of favourable editorial reviews of nature and importance of commonwealth from friendly papers. Our critics have apparently found no peg so far on which to hang an assault.

8. Gandhi's release. Gandhi's release has been prominently reported in this country but has aroused little controversy. Liberals insist that there is still no change of heart on Britain's part or Nehru would also be freed and that release is simply a manoeuvre to avoid odium of having Gandhi a British prisoner. But other commentators accept move as welcome evidence that there is little left of Indian defeatism which made it possible for Gandhi to get a hearing and that Japs have conspicuously failed to rouse India against Britain. Thus apart from Liberals news is viewed in relation to war and not to any long range political effects. This is in fact characteristic of America's attitude at moment. Talk of rights and wrongs of "India problem" has declined and military expediency is accepted as dominant consideration at least for time being.

9. Lend-lease renewal bill. Senate has renewed lend-lease act for one year by a vote of 63 to 1 reflecting overwhelming support for lend-lease as a war measure. Wadsworth amendment was strengthened by Vandenberg so that President is now prohibited from incurring postwar obligations not only with regard to final settlement but as regards any aspect of lend-lease. As in House, interest of debate lay not only in final vote but in arguments presented by Diehard opposition. Notable, if exceptional, were Senator Eltwnder's [sic] (Dem., La.) blunt statement that "British should realise that this is not our war and that we are giving our all for their preservation" and Senator Brewster's (Rep., Maine) demand to know how Britain was able to loan 50 million pounds to China when she was at same time still requesting lend-lease aid. These arguments have been strongly attacked by Liberal press and enlightened commentators but they represent a latent and unresolved suspiciousness which may yet muddy stream especially when exigences of war are past.

NOISE.

We have been giving some thought to the type of candidate we should like to see appointed as Director-General of the Food and Agriculture Organisation. In our view the Director-General should be a person qualified to secure first-class scientific work from his staff, and to maintain the highest standards in its publications and general advisory work, and one who would fully realise that on the quality of its work the fate of the Organisation must ultimately depend. He should of course have administrative experience and preferably experience of international bodies. He should be able to select and organise a good international team to work under him and develop the organisation along the lines we envisage, i.e. a fact-finding, educational and advisory body. Loveday is an example of the type of man we have in mind. Joseph Davis of Stanford Food Institute, although lacking international experience, would be suitable, but we understand his candidature might meet with strong opposition from the Department of Agriculture.

2. On the other hand, we appreciate the reasons which may be advanced by other countries in favour of a more public figure whose appointment would be expected to give the organisation initial prestige. Present United States administration will doubtless wish to launch F.A.O. in a manner designed to carry on the interest aroused by Hot Springs and so win public support for permanent international collaboration. The smaller and less industrialised nations may take a similar line.

3. The above implies two different views of the post of Director-General. It might be impossible to find the qualifications for both combined in a single individual. We should be glad if you would sound the State Department in a preliminary way for their views on this subject, bearing in mind our views in paragraph 1 above and that we should in any circumstances be most anxious to avoid the nomination of a Director-General who is a political crusader, especially one connected with United States agrarian politics, or the nomination of anyone associated in the public eye with particular social programmes. It is important that we should be kept informed of any names canvassed for Director-General, since if matters get to a stage of formal proposal it might be too late for us to put forward alternative names. For your own information, our minds are moving rather in the /direction.....

2. I understand that Partisan desire to be allowed to recruit in Italy is mainly based on their need for specialist personnel of whom there is a great scarcity in Partisan forces. Partisans are also particularly interested in personnel in Sardinia who they claim are being consistently ill-treated by their Italian officers.

IMPORTANT

My telegram No. 117.

The Crown Prince sent a friend to see me yesterday who said that His Royal Highness was incensed by the Cabinet's resolution and proposed to publish a reply. The Crown Prince feared that this attack on his person would have a bad effect on the morale of the Italian troops in the line who would expect him to vindicate himself. I advised that His Royal Highness should do nothing which might provoke a split in the present government.

2. I immediately acquainted General MacFarlane with this development and asked him to go to see His Royal Highness the same evening.

3. The General found the Crown Prince much upset and most anxious to refute publicly the interview published in the Times which in fact had been passed by a member of his Staff but which he himself had not seen. General MacFarlane finally persuaded the Prince to do nothing provided no further public mention were made of the incident. His Royal Highness undertook to take no action without consulting General MacFarlane.

4. Marshall Badoglio has sent a categorical assurance to General MacFarlane to the effect that so far as the government are concerned, no further publicity will be given to the case unless His Royal Highness himself reopens it. He is also exerting pressure on His Royal Highness to let the matter drop.

5. I am seeing the Crown Prince tomorrow evening and will also speak to him on these lines.

Supplementary to Weekly Political Summary.

1. Primaries.

Presidential and Congress primaries in Ohio and West Virginia have served mainly to confirm prevailing trends. As was expected, all of Ohio's Republican delegates went to Governor Bricker, while all the Democratic endorsed a fourth term. Similarly, West Virginia's delegates went solidly to Dewey and Roosevelt respectively. It is now calculated that both Roosevelt and Dewey have already sufficient support to be nominated on the first ballot at the conventions.

2. State Department.

The House Foreign Affairs Committee has reported out favourably Hull's request for the creation of two new Assistant Secretaries of State. It is now revealed that one will deal with Latin-American affairs, and the other will have "jurisdiction over problems arising in other parts of the world." No nominations have yet been made.

Meanwhile the State Department's other request for authorisation to extend its cultural relations programme to a world-wide basis (see Political Summary of March 5th) seems to be running into difficulties. As hearings were about to start before the Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Bloom expressed doubts about the whole project and the hearings have accordingly been postponed. Congressional coolness to United States Governmental participation in educational and religious affairs abroad, evidenced in the recent UNRRA debate, would be liable to re-appear if this proposal were taken to the floor of Congress.

3. Montgomery Ward.

The Montgomery Ward case is far from settled. The Government has withdrawn the troops from the plant, much to labour's chagrin. The C.I.O. Union has won the company election, and negotiations are due to start with Avery. Avery, however, still flatly refuses to recognise the "maintenance of membership" clause in the Union's contract, and so the case may eventually go back to the War Labour Board.

Following from Ambassador to Greece telegram No. 5.

[Begins]

Secret.

My immediately preceding telegram.

A stream of visitors came yesterday afternoon to see me. The first callers were the only two real communists at the conference with appropriate and inappropriate names Roussos (red) Porphyrogennis (born into the purple) Latter did most of the talking as his companion's French was quite inadequate.

2. M. Porphyrogennis opened with a long speech of pure propaganda of which the main points were the following: the British were the greatest brother allies, EAM had always been solidly pro-British, everything said against EAM by their enemies was false, EAM had alone fought the Germans and had killed 12,000 of them, they had committed no atrocities against other Greeks.

3. After listening patiently for some time I interrupted by saying I was extremely well informed about what had been happening in Greece during the past year, that my sources were British with no axe to grind and that it was really as waste of time to talk unrealities. I said we were far from being satisfied on any point he had mentioned including their claim to have always been solidly pro-British, that on many occasions operational instructions from Commander in Chief, Middle East, had not been carried out by ELAS (in striking contrast with the loyalty of ZERVAS) that golden sovereigns supplied for civilian relief had been used for other purposes that arms supplied by us for use against the Germans had been turned against their fellow Greeks or hidden for future political purposes or smuggled into the towns. Finally I said that the evidence against ELAS in two civil wars against ZERVAS EKKA was too strong for me not to accept it.

4. Having put them on the defensive I then said that in spite of very unsatisfactory past I felt sure that the line offered by this conference to make a new beginning should and could be seized successfully. EAM represented only a section of the population (though a small one) and should be represented in the Government and share the responsibilities of Government. This I found to be the view of all the other parties. Was EAM prepared to play?

5. M. Porphyrogennis, after having said with an air of injured innocence that the distrust shown in them by me and by other parties made things very difficult, stated categorically that they were prepared to co-operate to the full. He said he thought full agreement would be reached at this conference.

6. Before we parted, after they had thanked me for my frankness which as realists they appreciated I warned them what I had said to them was a very mild foretaste of what they would hear from other Greeks at the conference.

My immediately preceding telegram.

Following is text of message for Mr. Churchill from Svolos, Porphyrogennis and Roussos.

[Begins] "As representatives of Fighting Greece to Conference for National Unity we desire to express to Your Excellency our respectful admiration and to thank you for the interest which you take in our country and in her future.

This interest springs from a more than century old tradition which is dear to the Greek people and which actions of so distinguished a person as Your Excellency have made still stronger. We believe that it is this interest, coupled with the sorrow so rightly felt on account of recent events in our Middle East Forces, which evoked your severe judgement of our country. May we be permitted to state however that the resistance and bloody struggle of the Greek peoples in towns and in mountains are such as to exceed in moral importance the madness of the actions of irresponsible persons, which although sprung from a desire for national unity have led to deplorable and disastrous results which must be condemned by all.

Your Excellency may rest assured that we will do all in our power to achieve national unity, which is an essential condition not only for a more successful struggle against the enemy but also for the reconstruction of our country, victim of Italian, German and Bulgarian aggression. We know that the help of our great Allies, and especially of Great Britain under her dauntless leader will not be found wanting". [Ends]

Following is text of message for President Roosevelt from Svolos, Porphyrogennis and Roussos. "We, the representatives of fighting Greece at Conference for national unity wish to express to you our respectful admiration and our gratitude for the friendly interest which you take in our country.

The Greek people who are fighting in the towns and in the mountains against the most barbarous of tyrannies will never allow themselves to be withdrawn from the camp of the Allies and of the United Nations who are fighting for freedom and amongst whom your great country occupies, under your illustrious leadership, so glorious a position.

Though the desire for national unity has led to actions as melancholy as the late mutinies in the Middle East forces, actions deplored and condemned by all, we can assure your excellency that the Greek people by their struggle of yesterday, today and tomorrow and by the help of their great Allies will succeed in rubbing out that dark page.

We rely on your sympathy which you have so often shown towards our country and we assure you that we will do our utmost to achieve that national unity which is an indispensable condition for the liberation, the peace and well-being of our country which has endured so much from Italian, German and Bulgarian aggressors".

My telegram No.5.

Apart from Communists I had visits yesterday from M. Svolos and M. Angelopoulos of the Political Committee and Rendis of the Liberal Party. Each asked for a separate interview.

2. The two members of the Political Committee talked in the same strain. They are both Professors from Athens University - quiet, friendly and rather ineffective. They said they had left Athens to join the Political Committee in order to off-set influence of Communists and to promote a wider unity. (I think this is sincere). Their desire was to represent new and more progressive currents than were represented in pre-war political parties. They both said that they were Socialist and not Communist and that the weakness of Greece was the absence of a strong Socialist Party. They did not wish Communism to have a monopoly of the left wing movement although they considered Communists were now becoming more responsible and sincerely wished to collaborate with other parties.

3. M. Angelopoulos explained he was a personal friend of M. Papandreou for whom he had a high regard. He was quite prepared to accept him as Prime Minister. I said so far as I could gather their ideas for the future were not dissimilar. M. Papandreou had himself told me a few days ago that alternative before Greece was Socialism with liberty or Communism without, but to him liberty was the first essential and Britain was his model in this respect. This struck a responsive chord and he assured me that he would help M. Papandreou in every way possible to reach a general agreement.

4. M. Rendis who only arrived here from Athens during the afternoon was the next visitor. He has instructions from M. Sophoulis the leader of the Liberal Party to back M. Papandreou and to work for an agreement though he is a bitter critic of E.A.M. for what they have done in Greece. He said he had come to see me at once before embarking on any discussions with other delegates in order to be sure that any line he took had the approval of the British. I told him that we desired a general agreement from which no party would be excluded and that it would be much better for the Communists to join the united front and share the responsibilities of the Government with the others. M. Rendis said he appreciated this very British method of bringing all sides together in a special emergency and promised to work for this end.

5. M. Rendis makes a good impression. He is experienced and seems to be well balanced.

M. Rendis also raised the question of a British Commander-in-Chief in Greece backed by a British military mission. If an agreement were reached he thought this might be the best way of preserving peace as it would be difficult to find a Greek Commander-in-Chief in these special circumstances.

He said this was at present only his own idea but he would like to raise it with M. Papandreou if I had no objection.

2. I replied that this idea had already occurred to us and I felt sure that if the new Greek Government when formed approached us in this sense request would receive most sympathetic attention.

Algiers Weekly Summary No. 56.

Italian Front. Renewed offensive in Italy is to some extent distracting attention from the French political scene. The participation of French troops in assault on the Gustav line was announced by de Gaulle at the end of the debate on foreign affairs referred to below. General Juin's moving Order of the Day to the French troops: "you will conquer as you have already conquered in thinking of martyrised France which is waiting you and watching you" has been given considerable publicity.

2. Foreign Policy.

French foreign policy has been defined in two important speeches recently. In his Tunisian speech on May 7th de Gaulle declared that Frenchmen wished in Western Europe to be the centre of direct and practical international co-operation; and in the East first of all, the permanent allies of "dear and powerful Russia" a phrase he first used in his speech at Ajaccio on March 29th after the liberation of Corsica. (My summary No. 25). Massigli's statement in the Assembly on May 12th was less categorical. He pointed out that the progress which had been made in the attitude of the allies to French Committee of National Liberation as a result of your and Hull's recent statements. While speaking of steps to develop Franco-Soviet relations (in particular Russia's more generous recognition of the French Committee of National Liberation) he stressed the importance of Franco-German relations after the war and said it was impossible to conceive of a post war settlement or a European "Directoire" in which France did not take part. After this war treaties should not be put together hurriedly as they had been in 1919. The future peace should not repeat the errors of the inter-war period. France had fully realised the inadequacy of Geneva's legal formulae. He only referred in moderately critical terms to the suspension of cypher communications which de Gaulle at Tunis had said made conclusive arrangements in regard to the liberation of France impossible.

3. Resistance.

D'Astier's opening and closing statements during the resistance debate on May 10th were well received. He stressed the continued need for arms but acknowledged what had already been achieved. Restrictions on communications had however dangerously limited contact between the French Committee of National Liberation and resistance. The principle might have been justifiable but should have been applied with more care. Finally he called for the recognition of the resistance groups, a point which the French Committee of National Liberation took up two days later. The measures taken will probably establish pension and other rights for "soldiers without uniform".

4. Trials.

On May 12th Admiral Derrien was found guilty by Military Tribunal of having on December 8th 1942 surrendered units of the fleet to the enemy and was sentenced to imprisonment for life due to his age without hard labour. General Weiss asked for the death penalty but a strong plea by the defence may have been partly responsible for turning the scales.

Your telegrams No. 742 745 and 752 of May 12th and May 14th: Closing of German Consulate-General at Tangier]

I do not doubt General Jordana's good intentions but his present solicitude for saying German face contrasts unfavourably, as Mr. Gascoigne points out in his telegram No.178, with the lack of similar solicitude for our susceptabilities in 1941. General Jordana also seems to ignore the fact that important elements here and in the United States are sceptical of Spanish good faith. Such scepticism will be strengthened if I am unable to make a satisfactory announcement in the near future. The only result will be that Spain will acquire little credit from the new agreement. Your telegram No.745 is more encouraging but the period of a fortnight mentioned therein will elapse on May 16th when I must answer questions in the House. My immediately following telegram represents the kind of thing I should have to say if situation remains unchanged. You will see that this goes far to meet General Jordana's susceptibilities but I doubt whether it would be well received here and I should much prefer General Jordana to authorise me before Tuesday to give a more definite timetable.

2. As I pointed out in my telegrams Nos.567 and 572 there can be no question of petrol being loaded for Spain before the German Consulate has been closed and the Consul and his staff have left Tangier. As first Spanish tankers are due to reach Aruba on May 21st I shall have to approach the United States Government on the above lines within the next few days. General Jordana should realise that in view of the American attitude on this question such an approach may well revive their earlier scepticism regarding the value of the agreement as a whole and result in further considerable delay in the provision of oil for Spain.

3. You should speak immediately to General Jordana on the above lines, telling him of the lines which any statement might have to follow, and urging him in his own interest to provide me with more satisfactory and definite information without further delay and if possible before I have to make a public statement early on May 16th.

MOST IMMEDIATE.

My immediately preceding telegram.

I should have to make statement on following lines:

I understand that immediately after the agreement reached between His Majesty's Government, the United States Government and the Spanish Government early this month, of which I informed the House on May 2nd, the Spanish Government made urgent representations to the German Government concerning the closure of the German Consulate-General at Tangier and the departure of German officials connected with it. His Majesty's Government had anticipated that it would probably take some days to complete the necessary formalities. The Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs has now informed His Majesty's Charge d' Affaires that the Spanish Government's decision to close the German Consulate-General in the immediate future is definite and that it has been accepted by the German Government. I understand that the Consular Shield and flag are being taken down at once, if indeed this has not already taken place. His Majesty's Government, who are fully alive to the importance of avoiding undue delay, have no reason to suppose that the Spanish Government do not share their desire to dispose of this matter satisfactorily in the immediate future. It is obvious that the reciprocal obligations contained in the recent agreement hang together and that no one undertaking can be carried out apart from the others. In this connexion I am glad to be able to inform the House that satisfactory discussions are proceeding between British, American and Spanish experts in Madrid regarding the technical measures required in connexion with the wolfram clauses in the agreement. The Spanish Government have already given instructions for the release of the remaining Italian ships and considerable progress has been made in regard to the departure of German agents from Spain. The Spanish Government have also recently requested the Japanese Government to arrange for the early departure from Tangier of a member of the staff of the Japanese Embassy at Madrid, who has been residing there in recent months.

2. I shall probably be pressed in a Supplementary concerning oil shipments, in which case I shall say that this is one of the obligations which hangs together with the others, that the first shipments cannot in any case reach Spain until the beginning of next month, by which time there is no reason to suppose that the agreed arrangements concerning Tangier will not have been completed.

TOP SECRET

Your recent telegrams show clearly that there is no prospect of obtaining a complete wolfram embargo from the Portuguese Government in the near future. We must therefore either (a) resort to drastic means of pressure, political or economic or both, in the hope of compelling Dr. Salazar to give way, or (b) accept a compromise settlement analogous to that recently reached with Spain.

2. Course (a) presents long and short term disadvantages. So far as the immediate wolfram issue is concerned we are only interested in quick results. Whatever means of pressure we may adopt we cannot hope to bring Dr. Salazar round for several months. By that time we should be able to stop wolfram exports to Germany by other means. Meanwhile, Germany will continue to receive wolfram at the present rate of 150 tons, if not at an even higher rate. From the long term point of view there are obvious objections, for us as well as for Dr. Salazar, to a deadlock in which all our strategic requirements and more particularly the smooth development of the Azores facilities, to which the United States Government will no doubt attach increasing importance, for ferrying aircraft to the Far East will be gravely prejudiced. Nor is it ultimately in our interest even if we could achieve this, to provoke Dr. Salazar's fall and create chaos in Portugal, which would probably spread through the whole Iberian Peninsula.

3. We must therefore adopt course (b). Dr. Salazar's proposals, summarised in your telegram No. 820 are, however, inacceptable. We cannot accept an offer based on the unpredictable production of the German mines which, once the free market was closed to Germany would undoubtedly absorb large quantities of free wolfram. Such an arrangement would inevitably become the source of constant friction between us. We must, therefore, have a definite figure and we are prepared to meet Dr. Salazar by accepting his figure of 700 tons, to which he thinks the production of the German mines should shortly approximate. We are also ready to take the Portuguese wolfram year as our basis and ignore the 300 tons exported in January and February. But as at least 260 tons have already been exported since March 1st there would remain only 440 tons for export between now and February 28th, 1945. We are mainly interested in the immediate future, and, since Portugal has already exported to Germany so much more than Spain in recent months, we should insist upon monthly instalments of 20 tons a month from May to August inclusive, and 60 tons a month thereafter till next February. We must also insist upon the cancellation of the export of 150 tons claimed to be due to the Germans under the expired agreement and upon adequate measures being taken to permit our co-operation with the Portuguese authorities in preventing smuggling.

4. The above represents the absolute minimum which His Majesty's Government could justify to the British public as being a settlement at least as favourable to us as that recently reached with Spain. Dr. Salazar was wrong in stating that there were no German-owned wolfram mines in Spain. In fact such mines produced approximately 600 tons last year as compared with between 800 and 900 tons from German mines in Portugal. Spanish exports to Germany from March 1st to the end of 1944 will be only 360 tons. On that basis we could legitimately expect the Portuguese to limit their exports to 480 tons, of which 260 tons have already gone. We are, however, prepared to let Portugal export 320 instead of 220 tons to Germany by the end of 1944 and even to agree to a further 120 tons in January and February next, if such exports are practically possible. Moreover, the total figure of 700 tons for the year is Dr. Salazar's own figure for German production. We therefore regard our proposal as erring on the side of generosity and as one which Dr. Salazar should have no difficulty in presenting in a favourable light to our enemies.

5. The question at issue is therefore mainly one of presentation, and you should make it clear to Dr. Salazar that, whereas we cannot make his own offer acceptable, we should do our best to secure comprehension for the Portuguese position if our proposal is accepted. Clearly, however, there can be no enthusiasm here for a settlement in which our Portuguese ally only goes as far as the Spaniards have gone.

6. I realise that you will have to exert strong pressure to bring Dr. Salazar to accept the above arrangement in the near future. I have recently had reliable and most secret indications that Dr. Salazar has been reassured by the fact that we have not hitherto introduced any threat of reprisals. This is clearly a weapon we must use with great care, but I consider that the time has come for a frank statement of the position which Dr. Salazar will be free to construe as a threat or not, as he sees fit. My immediately following telegram contains the text of a further message to Dr. Salazar from the Prime Minister which will, I hope, cause Dr. Salazar seriously to reflect on the consequences of any further opposition to our wishes. You will no doubt wish to develop the Prime Minister's reference to the effects of any refusal upon the Alliance, in the sense of your telegram No. 832. You should in particular point out to Dr. Salazar that, while we may have preferred Portuguese neutrality in the earlier stages of the war, a new situation has since arisen, in which we should infinitely prefer Portugal fully to honour the Alliance and to come into the war. This she could do with very little risk to herself and with great benefit to the future of the Alliance and to the long term interests of Portugal. Our present proposals are only designed to meet what we understand to be Dr. Salazar's wishes and are in no sense ideal from our point of view.

7. While I realise the difficulties about economic sanctions which would affect primarily the Portuguese people, we must face facts. If the Portuguese Government fail to meet us on the basis now proposed it will be impossible for His Majesty's Government to justify to the British public the continuance of special economic assistance to Portugal, such as that provided under the Azores agreement. Nor could they ask the United States Government to make available essential supplies, including oil, under their control. Apart from wolfram we have no essential purchases in Portugal and therefore, after the expiry of our Azores obligations on June 30th, we should make no special effort to produce coal or other supplies for Portugal. If there is again a bad harvest we should equally be unable to release wheat or shipping as we have done this year. I think you should make this quite clear to Dr. Salazar since it is a statement of fact and in no sense a threat - still less bluff.

8. As regards tactics, I am anxious that action should be taken at the earliest possible moment. I approve the proposals in your telegram No. 836 concerning the Duke of Palmella and the delivery of the Prime Minister's letter. You will also see from my telegrams No. 4258 to Washington and No. 229 to Rio that I hope to enlist the support of the United States and Brazilian Governments and you should, therefore, concert your approach to Dr. Salazar with your United States and Brazilian colleagues and ensure that they give you their full and immediate support.

9. You should take no (repeat no) action pending the result of our consultations with the United States and Brazilian Governments.

My telegram No. 752.

Head of European Department in Ministry of Foreign Affairs told me last night that General Orgaz had now been given detailed instructions. He repeated what Minister for Foreign Affairs had told me in my telegram under reference and said that though a definite date still could not be given, he was confident that German Consulate would in fact be closed and the whole affair liquidated much quicker than I (or Mr.Gascoigne) appeared to think.

I said speaking as a friend, I was sure he would realise the importance from the point of view of public opinion in United Kingdom and United States of liquidating the whole affair before the arrival of tankers to load. He said he had thought of that himself and repeated his confidence that everything would in fact be liquidated next week.

Following is a somewhat expanded sketch of the kind of declaration I have in mind:

After referring to the long list of questions on the Order, Paper, the Prime Minister might state that he proposed to answer them in a single statement; say something about the occasion being a less happy one than that on which the House had listened to his announcement of the agreement under which the Portuguese loyal response to the appeal from her ally agreed to grant certain facilities in the Azores; passing to wolfram say that it has been the constant endeavour of His Majesty's Government in friendly agreement with the Portuguese Government to limit the quantity exported to Germany especially since the peninsula became her sole source of supply; say that at the time of the Azores agreement His Majesty's Government refrained from asking that the supply should be cut off altogether because they did not wish to ask the Portuguese Government to repudiate an existing agreement with Germany; when however that agreement was approaching expiry they considered themselves entitled to ask the Portuguese Government not to make a new one but to authorise the embargo; that the Portuguese Government have intimated that they cannot comply with this request; that His Majesty's Government deeply regret this decision which is not that which they had expected from their ally at a time when every ton of wolfram is of vital importance to their enemy.

It is not necessary to settle in advance the precise wording of the statement which of course will only be made in those sort of terms if Dr. Salazar remains recalcitrant but I must be able to give him a fairly close version of the lines which it will follow.

Would you authorise me to add that the statement is bound to be followed by a number of supplementary questions of a searching character some of which may well go so far as to raise the issue of the alliance.

Would it be possible to add that the lines of the proposed reply have been concurred in by the Dominion Prime Ministers?

M. Simic called on me on May 12th his secretary having previously telephoned to enquire whether I could receive "Yugoslav Ambassador". He told me that he had noticed of late distinct restlessness in Soviet official circles where he implied that it was everywhere thought that the time was ripe to clarify the Yugoslav situation. He also said that the military mission from Tito (my telegram No. 977) would remain permanently in the U.S.S.R.

2. Although M. Simic is obviously concerned to see his position regularised as soon as possible, his estimation of the official attitude is borne out by the growing difficulties of the former Yugoslav counsellor Marinkovic since the publication a month ago of the article in "War and the Working Class" suggesting the time had come to break off relations with the emigré Yugoslav Government (my telegrams No. 1059 and 1167).

3. It is also significant that on May 11th M. Simic and his family were given prominent seats at the performance of a Soviet patriotic play to which Allied representatives were invited by the People's Commissariat for Foreign Affairs. Marinkovic was conspicuous by his absence.

Your telegram No. 2478 [of 11th May: Portuguese wolfram].

It is clear from recent Lisbon telegrams repeated to you and from Rio de Janeiro telegram No. 243 that there is no prospect whatever of obtaining a complete embargo. You may now inform the State Department for their most confidential information that our high level approach was through President Carmona himself. You may add that General Smuts also sent a personal message to Dr. Salazar. Although this further pressure has clearly persuaded Salazar to come some ay to meet us, nothing short of the most drastic measures, which would not take effect for several months, could now obtain a completely satisfactory settlement. By th time Portuguese wolfram exports to Germany will we hope be automatically suspended by Allied military action. Nor can we overlook the vital assistance given to the United Nations war effort by Portugal in the Azores. We understand that the smooth development of these facilities will be of increasing importance to the allied war effort, more particularly in re ard to the ferrying of American aircraft to the Far East.

2. We have therefore reluctantly but definitely reached the conclusion that we must accept a compromise settlement approximately equivalent to the Spanish settlement and therefore an improvement upon Dr. Salazar's latest proposals.

3. My telegrams No. 699 and No. 698 to Lisbon contain the text o a further message from the Prime Minister and of covering instructions to Sir R. Campbell. Please show these to the State Department and invite their early concurrence in the line of action now proposed, We think it necessary to act quickly and we hope that instructions will be sent to the United States Ambassador to concert with Sir R. Campbell and support his representations. We hope in particular that the United States Government will authorise us to refer to the probable withholding of United States supplies including oil, a point which the United States Ambassador will no doubt be able to elaborate.

The Voice of Canada in the Empire Conference

By Anne O'Hare McCormick

THE speech of Mr. Mackenzie King before the British Parliament on Wednesday is likely to be drowned out by the thunderous prelude to invasion reverberating in Italy and on the Channel coast. This is a pity, because the statement of the Canadian Prime Minister has an important bearing on a vitally important development. Made in England, before a meeting of the House of Lords and the House of Commons presided over by Mr. Churchill, it lights up in striking fashion the evolution the war is speeding up in the relations of the states of the British Commonwealth with one another and the mother country, on the one hand, and in the relation between the Empire system and the United States on the other.

Made at this time, on the eve of the supreme venture of the war, Mr. King's address is also a sign of the certainty of victory that characterizes all Allied thinking. The Dominion Premiers are meeting in London at this crucial moment for the same reason that all the Governments on our side are so anxious about the post-war period. They dread the cost of winning, but they have no dread of not winning. They are anxious about the future because they have no doubt that they will have to organize the future.

The premiers met to consider the future. The main purpose of the conference was to discuss whether the ties between the Dominions should be tightened and strengthened to meet the shifts the war is making in the world balance. The British are frankly concerned about the post-war power of Britain relative to that of Russia and the United States. Premier Jan Smuts of South Africa voiced this concern in the sensational address in which he advocated among other things that the nations of northern Europe should be federated with the United Kingdom to strengthen the British position on the Continent. Others argue that Britain is not and should never become a continental power but should rather strengthen her position by supplementing sea power with air power.

This view implies the perpetuation of the Empire, or at least the continuance of close bonds with the Dominions. If the suggestion of Premier John Curtin of Australia were carried out, these bonds would be even closer. He sponsored the idea of a permanent secretariat for the Commonwealth, a kind of imperial council, with headquarters in London to co-ordinate the policies of the member states.

Canada is against this plan. According to a report from London by Percy Philip, Mr. King told the Parliament in well-weighed words "what he came to the Prime Ministers' conference to say about the future organization of the British Commonwealth." What he uttered so carefully was a grave counsel to let well enough alone. "Let us by all means improve where we can," he said, "but in considering new methods of organization we cannot be too careful to see that to our own peoples the new methods will not appear as an attempt to limit their freedom of decision, or, to peoples outside the Commonwealth, as an attempt to establish a separate bloc."

The emphasis in Mr. King's address was on two points. While reiterating in the strongest terms his faith in the Commonwealth as the world model for an association of free nations, he declared that the unity and security of the nations of the Commonwealth will be achieved not by policies which are exclusive but by policies and principles which can be extended to all other nations. Pointing out that the war had proved to great and small nations alike that no national security or prosperity is to be found in isolation, he argued in effect for a universal system as the only safe alternative to any separate system, no matter how large or how strong in itself. This must be the conclusion of all statesmen who contemplate the danger of a world divided into competitive power blocs—Russian, American, British—instead of organized from the beginning, however loosely or gradually, into some sort of committee of the whole.

Mr. King's second point of emphasis was on Canada's ties with the United States. He spoke as the neighbour of this country—"surely the supreme example of a smaller nation living in the fullest security and harmony side by side with a very powerful one"—and almost as the voice of America. He left no doubt in the minds of his hearers that Canada must never be confronted with a choice between the United States and Britain.

If this line of policy is clearer to-day than in the past, it is partly because Canadian industrial production is closely co-ordinated with ours as a result of our unique war partnership. Canada has paid cash for purchases needed for herself, but she has benefited by the flow of lend-lease material exported to and through Canada for Britain and other United Nations, and even more from the American policy, embodied in the Hyde Park Declaration of April, 1941, of placing orders in Canada for all kinds of war materials and supplies. Thus Canada has been able to build up an aircraft industry with American help, has manufactured products we have ordered for lend-lease, and in innumerable ways has geared her war industry so closely to ours that it will be difficult to separate them.

The economic links forged by the war will be hard to break. But if Canada speaks in London with the voice of America, it is also because the two countries do live as neighbours in a different world, a new world. They are neighbours without fear of one another, and they share a certain responsibility as well as a vital interest in enlarging the pattern of security and confidence they have worked out together.

DRAFT STATEMENT TO BE ISSUED OVER THE SIGNATURES OF THE FIVE PRIME MINISTERS

We, the King's Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, have now, for the first time since the outbreak of the war, been able to meet together to discuss common problems and future plans.

At this memorable meeting, in the fifty-seventh month of the war, we give thanks that we have been so far delivered from the dire perils which have menaced us in the course of this long and terrible struggle against tyranny. Though hard and bitter battles lie ahead, we now see before us, in the ever-growing might of the forces of the United Nations, and in the defeats already inflicted on the foe by land, by sea and in the air, manifest tokens of our future victory.

On behalf of the peoples of our countries who have shown such bravery and endurance in this long conflict, we do honour to the great feats of arms of the forces of the United States and of Russia and pay tribute to the forces of the other nations joined with us as Allies. Above all, we are not unmindful of the valiant part played by our comrades in arms from countries over-run by the enemy.

II.

Our first task has been to pass in review the plans for the conduct of the war against Germany and Japan. On all these we are agreed. is complete. We seek to bring this about at the earliest possible moment, so that the sufferings of mankind may be speedily brought to an end.

III

We have examined together the guiding principles which determine our foreign policies, and their application to current problems. Here also we have found ourselves in complete agreement. We are united in our determination to continue in association with our Allies a policy designed to give the fullest possible aid to the operations of the armed forces during the war, and thereafter to promote peaceful and orderly development.

IV

In all our deliberations we have been sustained by a lively sense of our unity of purpose, which was never greater than today. That unity finds its strength, not in any formal bond, but in the hidden springs from which human action flows - our common heritage of ideals and loyalties, and our sense of kinship with one another. Our system of free association has enabled us, each and all, to take our full share of the common burden. The methods of democratic Government which we each enjoy have stood the test of two world wars. We believe that when peace returns these same methods, this same free association and this same unity of purpose will be found capable of rendering further service to the cause of mankind.

we shall achieve, should carry with it a sense of hope and freedom for the world. We look forward to the day when we shall play our part in the restoration of liberty and national life in the countries now occupied by the enemy. It is our aim that the peoples of these countries shall be free to decide for themselves their future form of democratic Government.

Our object is to secure fair dealing and honest conduct between the nations of the world. We seek the collaboration of all peace loving peoples, and we ask the help of all in the speedy destruction of tyranny wherever it raises its head. We seek no advantages for ourselves at the cost of others. We desire the welfare of all nations.

VI

We look to the establishment after the war of a world organisation to maintain peace and security. This organisation must be endowed with the necessary power and authority to curb aggression.

VII

The representatives of India at the War Cabinet and the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia have taken part in our deliberations. They share our confidence that, in this great field of endeavour all the countries of the British Commonwealth and Empire will go forward together with untiring resolution.

1. For meeting Tuesday morning United Kingdom submitted draft memoranda on Future World Organisation which they intend to give to United States and Soviet Governments as basis of discussion for talks on implementation of Article Four at Washington in May or June. Memoranda propose World Council for action and World Assembly for ~~xxxxxxx~~xx discussion with principal responsibilities assigned to Four Powers. They include memorandum on Military Aspects of Security Organisation previously sent to us through Post-Hostilities channels. Commonwealth Prime Ministers were asked to say if they agreed that these papers were on right lines for preliminary and informal discussions. The plan was to have Three or Four Powers draw up Declaration embodying fundamental principal which could be submitted to other Powers.

2. As memoranda reached us only the night before the meeting we were unable to give adequate consideration to the proposals. They seem, however, to be very sensible and in accord with our thinking. Prime Minister expressed general appreciation but expressed desire to discuss proposals further with his Government. Discussion was left over for Thursday morning meeting.

3. Mr. Churchill submitted Note expressing general agreement but stressing Regional Councils of Asia, Europe and the Americas, whereas memoranda had suggested that regional organisations should develop later and fit into overall framework. He also explicitly said World Council should in first instance consist of United States, Soviet Union, China and the British Commonwealth and Empire.

4. At Thursday's meeting Prime Minister made statement on the proposals along the following lines;

5. He agreed that there must be some form of World Council and Assembly and that the Four Powers should accept special responsibility for maintaining security but emphasised the necessity of securing the loyal collaboration of the other Powers. Differences should be recognised between the other Powers. We were willing to recognise a difference in power and responsibility between Canada and the Soviet Union and expected a difference to be recognised between Canada and Panama. Recognition of the functional theory of representation would ensure a co-operative attitude.

6. Regionalism should be approached with caution in order not to encourage illusions about continental isolation. Prime Minister approved view expressed in memoranda that the world organisation should be established first and regional associations might later be fitted into it.

7. He took ~~frank~~ issue with Churchill's proposal that British Commonwealth and Empire should be represented as one Power on the World Council. Policies of British countries would no doubt be in substantial agreement, but World Council would have to be executive body capable of prompt and single minded action. Its members would be trustees of world interest. It could not do so if its members were trying to act on instructions of half a dozen governments. United Kingdom is indisputably a great power and must have a place on the Council and a firm and decisive policy which would not be possible if it must decide every issue by majority vote of six countries.

8. Prime Minister then, ~~without quoting source, put forth ideas~~ summarised statement of position contained in paragraph 7 of D.O. telegram No. 705 of September 27th, 1943.

9. He said that prestige of British Commonwealth was never higher, as it was now realised that it represented unique alliance whose interests were those of the United Nations. We must be cautious about rousing old suspicions or losing sight of example of co-operation by free nations we could set.

10. Great Britain and the other Commonwealth countries were strong and respected because of their alliance potential. They might seem less strong to the world if they were bound together in such a way as to magnify their disputes.

11. He considered plans for securing a Declaration by Three Powers to be right procedure to follow. Prime Minister warned against seeming to present a fait accompli to other Powers. He hoped Canada would be able to make constructive contribution.

12. Smuts gave general support, and, in absence of Curtin, Shedden said he thought Curtin would agree. Churchill thereupon withdrew his paper. He said that he had been uncertain himself how much representation could be worked out.

13. It was our view that fundamental differences of view had developed on nature of Commonwealth which should be brought into open. Satisfactory solution seems to have resulted from frank talk

14. Copies of United Kingdom memoranda and Churchill's note were sent to you Wednesday. As latter has now been withdrawn, ~~it should not be circulated.~~ me shall have to ask you to return it.

possible moment, so that the sufferings of mankind may be speedily brought to an end.

III

We have examined together the guiding principles which determine our foreign policies, and their application to current problems. Here also we have found ourselves in complete agreement. We are united in our determination to continue in association with our Allies a policy designed to give the fullest possible aid to the operations of the armed forces during the war, and thereafter to promote peaceful and orderly development.

IV

In all our deliberations we have been sustained by a lively sense of our unity of purpose, which was never greater than today. That unity finds its strength, not in any formal bond, but in the hidden springs from which human action flows - our common heritage of ideals and loyalties, and our sense of kinship with one another. Our system of free association has enabled us, each and all, to take our full share of the common burden. The methods of democratic Government which we each enjoy have stood the test of two world wars. We believe that when peace returns these same methods, this same free association and this same unity of purpose will be found capable of rendering further service to the cause of mankind.

V

We are resolved that the victory, which with our Allies we shall achieve, should carry with it a sense of hope and freedom for the world. We look forward to the day when we shall play our part in the restoration of liberty and national life in the countries now occupied by the enemy. It is our aim that the peoples of these countries shall be free to decide for themselves their future form of democratic Government.

Our object is to secure fair dealing and honest conduct between the nations of the world. We seek the collaboration of all peace loving peoples, and we ask the help of all in the speedy destruction of tyranny wherever it raises its head. We seek no advantages for ourselves at the cost of others. We desire the welfare of all nations.

VI

We look to the establishment after the war of a world organisation to maintain peace and security. This organisation must be endowed with the necessary power and authority to curb aggression.

VII

The representatives of India at the War Cabinet and the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia have taken part in our deliberations. They share our confidence that, in this great field of endeavour all the countries of the British Commonwealth and Empire will go forward together with untiring resolution.

Papandreou was examined this morning by a highly competent British heart specialist who dismissed any fear of a clot of blood. He said he was merely weakened by a sharp attack of influenza and needed two or three days' rest before embarking on the arduous task of the conference. He suggested 17th May for the opening date. This has now been accepted.

2. Nothing is really being lost by this delay. In fact as a result of all these informal conversations prospects of an agreement have steadily improved.

3. At the request of M. Papandreou I have organised excursions for the delegates in the mountains for the next two days.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRIME MINISTER

When the question of Commonwealth post-war defence co-operation comes up this afternoon the main points in any outline of the Canadian attitude are -

Main security problem after the war is world security, not regional or Commonwealth security. It would be unrealistic to consider defence arrangements between Commonwealth countries as in any way an alternative or substitute for a strong world security organisation to which each of us will have to make our appropriate and proportionate contribution.

In the transitional period responsibility for security will rest on the Armed Forces of the Allies in which the forces of the Commonwealth countries have their several parts to play. Questions relating to our respective participation in the Pacific war and the policing of Germany will obviously have to be determined by Governments in the light of strategic plans which are not yet formulated

1. DRAFT STATEMENT.

The meeting had before them the draft of a statement (P.M.M.(44) 9) to be issued over the signatures of the five Prime Ministers. A number of amendments were put forward and discussed; Suggestions were also made for modifications in the form of the statement. It was agreed that these should be reported to Mr. Churchill, with a view to the preparation and circulation of the revised draft.

Arrangements for the signature, release and publication of the proposed statement and of any speeches that might be made on the conclusion of the proceedings of the meeting of Prime Ministers were discussed and agreed.

2. DEFENCE CO-OPERATION WITHIN THE BRITISH COMMONWEALTH

MR ATTLEE asked Lord Cranborne to open the discussion.

LORD CRANBORNE said that defence co-operation within the British Commonwealth was closely linked with the subject of a world security system, upon which interesting and valuable discussions had already been held. Such a world system, if it were to be successful, must have three facets - political, economic and military. The political aspect had been sketched out in the Papers put before the Conference by Mr Eden, and he did not propose to revert to it. It was sufficient to say that the main reason for the failure of the League of Nations was that it had not behind it the sanction of force, so that when its authority was challenged, it was unable to meet the challenge. The World Security Organisation must have teeth, and there had already been some discussion on how these teeth should be provided.

Mr Eden had expressed the idea of a Military Staff attached to the World Council, to draw up plans for preventing aggression, and had explained the reasons in favour of the earmarking by the various member States of certain forces for use in certain areas at the demand of the World Council. If that conception was generally accepted, it immediately raised the question of the part which the nations of the British Commonwealth might have to play in providing these forces. Empire Governments had agreed with the proposal that the main responsibility for the preservation of peace, and for the provision of military forces, would rest on the four great powers - the U.S.A., Russia, China and the nations of the British Commonwealth - freely acting in association. It might indeed be said that there would be only three great powers, as China for this purpose might be considered a big country rather than a great power. In any case, whether or not there were to be regional organisations within the world system, the conception of the four-Power Pact remained unchanged. The nations of the British Commonwealth would remain one of the main props of the organisation. The question was, how could our contribution be made most effective?

The World Council must be able to call upon our whole resources if required, and close consultation would be essential if such resources were to be made available. There was also the possibility that the new world system might fail All would hope that this melancholy thought would not come to pass; but one could not ignore the possibility, and close collaboration within the British Commonwealth would then be more essential than ever.

It might therefore be assumed that, whether the new World Security Organisation succeeded or failed, close consultation between the members of the British Commonwealth, and close co-ordination of their military forces would remain of the first importance. One must ask whether the present system was perfect, or whether it could be improved. Up to the outbreak of war, the main organ of consultation had been the Imperial Conference, which was held with fair regularity every few years. Between Conferences, consultation was maintained by various means, such as occasional visits of Dominion representatives to the United Kingdom, the attendance of Dominion High Commissioners or other representatives at the meetings of the Committee of Imperial Defence in London, and the regular interchange of Military Officers. In addition, the standard system of organisation, training and equipment throughout the forces of the Empire was a factor of the highest importance in correlating thought and action. Was this the best that could be done, or were other measures possible? He fully realised that it was difficult to discuss Imperial defence in isolation. It was inextricably linked with foreign policy. Obviously, no Government in the Commonwealth would be willing to undertake defence commitments, unless satisifed as to the circumstances in which it might be called upon to implement them.

It was equally clear that it might be politically impossible to come to final decisions on peace or war before the event. As Mr Curtin had rightly pointed out, it was not the Governments alone that determined matters of peace or war, but the electorates of the various countries. But subject to these essential considerations, could we improve the methods of collaboration? It was not his intention to dogmatise in any way, but to put forward certain lines of thought which might be worth consideration:-

(a) Assuming that the Imperial Conference remained the main organ of consultation between the nations of the Commonwealth, would it be possible to give some degree of continuity to its proceedings, by establishing a standing committee to deal with strategy and other aspects of defence.

(b) Alternatively, or perhaps in addition, there might be periodic meetings at regular intervals between Defence Ministers and Chiefs of Staff in London or elsewhere. These might possibly be preliminary to meetings of the World Council.

(c) There might be an extended system for the interchange of military staffs. This would be particularly valuable if, as the result of definite obligations under a world security system, the preparation of joint plans became a practical possibility.

(d) There might be a considerable expansion of the training of U.K. and Dominion officers in the principles of Imperial Defence. This would involve an expanded conception of the Imperial Defence College.

(e) Study might be given to the co-ordination of industrial potential throughout the Commonwealth and Empire. This was a matter which had not been given as much attention heretofore as it deserved, but which had emerged as a new factor of vital importance during the present war, when the various parts of the Empire had supplied others with great quantities of war materials. Much experience had been gained which was extremely valuable, and it would be a pity if in another emergency we had to start all over again at the beginning. It was for consideration whether an expert body might not be set up in the near future to consider this aspect.

(f) It would no doubt be agreed that the organisation, equipment and training of forces on a common model throughout the Commonwealth should continue as before.

Continuing, LORD CRANBORNE said that the proposals which he had outlined above were not specific, but were thrown out for the consideration of Prime Ministers as possible lines upon which improvement in the present machinery for consultation and co-ordination might be directed. It might be thought desirable to have them technically examined. Some of them might be considered impracticable, others might be thought politically inexpedient. We should, however, be under an obligation to do all in our power to make the new system of world security a success, and he felt that we should do everything possible to improve the machinery of consultation so that when the day came the British Commonwealth would not be found wanting.

MR MACKENZIE KING said that the statement made by Lord Cranborne would be of great value as a basis for consideration of this matter by his Cabinet in Canada. He was not in a position to express any opinion upon it until he had had an opportunity of discussing it with his colleagues. He could hardly say anything useful upon the various suggestions thrown out unless he could back his remarks with a commitment, and this he could not do unless he was in a position to carry the Canadian Parliament with him. Furthermore, he considered that these were questions upon which decisions could not be reached while the war was in progress. As soon as it was over the situation could be considered.

MR CURTIN said that the subject under discussion was one which had presented itself in an acute form during the present war. The Australian Government had felt obliged at one stage to ask that their views should be given due consideration by the bodies responsible for taking the great decisions on the conduct of the war. During the present Conference, Mr Churchill had made it clear on more than one occasion that he felt that the Empire would carry much greater weight if it spoke as one. We were contemplating a future in which a world security organisation would be set up. The British Commonwealth and Empire would have much greater influence in such an organisation than would the United Kingdom divorced from the Dominions. The Australian Government would certainly give careful consideration to each of the proposals put forward by Lord Cranborne, some of which were in some degree already operating. They had found it necessary to ask for an opportunity to be heard in London when decisions affecting Australia were being formed. There object was to ensure that the Australian arguments would be carefully weighed, and that decisions should be taken after they had been heard. If the decision went against the views of the Australian Government they would be perfectly agreeable because they would know that the arguments on the other side had been judged over-riding. These questions were of such importance that he had thought it right to prepare a statement embodying his views.

Mr Curtin then read to the Conference the statement, a copy of which is at Annex I.

During the reading of his statement, MR CURTIN made certain explanatory comments, as follows.

(a) Referring to the request made by the Australian Government upon the outbreak of the war with Japan, that they should play a greater part in the formulation of policy, and that certain steps should be taken to this end, MR CURTIN pointed out that without full knowledge of the essential facts it was impossible for the Australian Government to take stock of its own obligations, and of the distribution of its own war effort. If it made requests for assistance, and such assistance could only be given by the sacrifice of an essential requirement elsewhere, the Australian Government were entitled to know this in advance. This was a matter which successive Governments in Australia had agreed upon, and his predecessor, before the outbreak of the Japanese war, had sent Sir Earle Page to London for the very purpose of ensuring close contact, and the transmission of essential information. He had, himself, been in entire agreement with this action.

(b) Referring to the examination of the desirability of centralisation of effort, which he had proposed in Section 2(iv) of his Statement, MR CURTIN pointed out that we could not rely implicitly on the capacity of the World Organisation to prevent war. Modern war evoked the employment of the totality of national resources, and he felt that some machinery should be worked out to ensure that the various parts of the Commonwealth would make the best and most economical distribution of effort, whether in the form of forces, of industrial or agricultural production, etc., to meet the particular circumstances arising. This contribution might be different for each Dominion, since some would be closer to the seat of war than others. The essential was that there should be a balanced effort from the Empire behind the strategic recommendations put forward by the Military Staffs. There should be an Empire pool of capacity in war, and this pool must be fed from the various parts of the Commonwealth. This was of course a subject which would not be carried further at the present Conference, but he felt strongly that unless something was done to centralise the effort of the Commonwealth, we should start off another war so far behindhand as to make it difficult to catch up in time. He did not think that the British Commonwealth should be exposed to such a risk.

(c) Referring to the three safeguards for the security of the British Empire set out in Section 3 of his statement, MR CURTIN observed that in the degree of co-operation established within itself, the British Empire should serve as a model to the World Security Organisation.

(d) With regard to the strategical concept for the defence of the South-West Pacific, MR CURTIN pointed out that consideration of the problems involved ought to be continuous. For this purpose, Australia must have a regular association with the United Kingdom as the major component of the Commonwealth, and he felt that the other Dominions should also be associated. The security of Australia was inevitably affected by the security of the possessions of Portugal, France and Holland. The Australian Government could not usefully carry on discussions on these subjects with the Governments of those countries. This would have to be done by the Government of the United Kingdom, but there must be close co-ordination between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of Australia on the principles for the treatment of the questions raised. This emphasised the fact that collaboration within the Empire was no less important on foreign policy as on defence and strategy.

In conclusion, MR CURTIN said that the statement which he had read was put forward, not in any spirit of complaint, but as a straightforward commentary upon the post, and as a study of the lessons which might be drawn therefrom. He wished to pay a special tribute to the work of Mr Bruce and Lord Cranborne. Mr Bruce had worked untiringly for the interests of Australia and of the Empire, and the Australian Government felt that they owed a great debt of gratitude to him for his exertions. They also very much appreciated the manner in which Lord Cranborne had carried out his duties at the Dominions Office. They admired his wide outlook and sympathetic understanding.

MR ATTLEE enquired whether Mr Curtin had discussed with Mr Churchill the proposal contained in his statement that monthly meetings between the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and Dominion High Commissioners should be held for the consideration of the current situation and problems.

MR CURTIN said that he had mentioned the matter to Mr Churchill, who had expressed himself as willing to fall in with the suggestion if it should be generally desired by the Conference.

MR FRASER said that he welcomed the suggestion for the monthly meeting of High Commissioners with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. There had in the past been a question of the attendance of High Commissioners on certain occasions at the War Cabinet, and there had also been various plans for a Pacific War Council in London, though this had given place in the end to the plan for the Pacific War Council in Washington. He would not have refused a suggestion at that time for the High Commissioners to attend the Monday meeting of the War Cabinet. He enquired whether it was Mr Curtin's idea that Mr Bruce should still represent Australia at the War Cabinet.

MR CURTIN said that the proposal was that Mr Bruce should come to the War Cabinet when there was some special matter affecting Australia under discussion. There were some who argued that as the Empire fought together as an entity, there ought to be an Imperial War Cabinet: but there were obvious difficulties in the way of such a proposal. The Australian Government felt that they were in a somewhat anomalous position as being the only one of the Dominions represented in the War Cabinet in the United Kingdom.

MR FRASER said that there was little in Mr Curtin's statement with which he disagreed. His Government had endorsed the statement on the Regional Defence of the South-West Pacific which Mr Curtin had quoted. He (Mr Fraser) had prepared a paperØ which he did not intend to read to the Conference, but which he would circulate, upon the question of the Committee of Imperial Defence. He believed that all the Dominion Prime Ministers would agree on the desirability of continuing collaboration with that body. He would welcome a further examination of the ideas put forward by Mr Curtin and he would be willing to recommend to his Government as great a measure of collaboration within the Commonwealth as would be agreeable to all the Dominion Governments. It would certainly draw the conduct of the war closer in the minds of the people of New Zealand if the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom met the High Commissioners once a month as proposed.

MR ATTLEE emphasised the great value of the daily meetings now held between the Secretary of State for the Dominions and the Dominion High Commissioners. Many useful ideas were interchanged, and much background knowledge of the views of the Dominion Governments were obtained by this means.

LORD CRANBORNE expressed his entire agreement. The daily meetings had established a close relationship and he regarded them as the most important part of his work. He welcomed the proposal for monthly meetings between the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and Dominion High Commissioners.

MR ATTLEE thought that much value would be obtained from periodical meetings between Ministers, other than Prime Ministers, and between officials. A number of Dominion Ministers and officials had visited the United Kingdom, and these had been occasions of mutual advantage. It was possible by personal contact to clear up many points which presented difficulty if dealt with only by correspondence.

MR MACKENZIE KING said that while there was much in Mr Curtin's statement with which he was in agreement, the questions raised would have to be carefully considered along with the whole range of matters connected with world security. All these would be fully examined by his Cabinet. He heartily endorsed Mr Curtin's remarks about Lord Cranborne, in which he would also include Mr Eden. Both had been most understanding of the problems of Canada, and he had great confidence in their outlook and wisdom. He would also like to pay a tribute to Mr MacDonald who, as High Commissioner in Canada, had proved exceptionally helpful, and whom he consulted on many occasions almost as if he were a member of the Canadian Cabinet. He was in full sympathy with the idea of monthly meetings between the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and Dominion High Commissioners. A reciprocal arrangement was already in operation, as, in his joint capacity as Prime Minister and as Minister of External Affairs, he frequently held consultations with the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom.

MR FRASER associated himself with Mr Curtin's remarks about Lord Cranborne, with whom he would join Mr Attlee and Mr Eden who had previously held Office as Dominion Secretaries. He wished to express his gratitude to all three. New Zealand had never appealed to them in vain, and they all had extended most sympathetic understanding and assistance to New Zealand.

LORD CRANBORNE said that the Conference had now heard a number of very interesting proposals on the subject under discussion. Obviously these could not be taken further at the present Conference, but he hoped that when the Prime Ministers had had an opportunity of consulting their Cabinets it might be possible to set up a technical committee to examine the various proposals which had been made. So much general agreement had been displayed at the Conference that if any development of machinery could assist in carrying matters further, he felt it would be a pity not to proceed with it.

MR MACKENZIE KING said that he would certainly have to consult his colleagues on the many important matters which had been brought forward. It was essential that he should be able to return to Canada without having committed his Government in any way upon these questions, and his Service Advisers would undoubtedly feel that their views should be taken by the Government. He would undertake, however, to examine without delay all proposals which had come before the Conference.

MR BEVIN asked that if further study was to be given to the various proposals which had been put forward, the important question of manpower should not be overlooked. He was much impressed by the fact that we had benefited this time from the precedent established in the last war of the system of reserved occupations, and he felt that it would be a great advantage if the employment of the manpower of the Commonwealth and Empire could be looked at as a whole. Mr Curtin had raised the question of the right application of effort whether to the raising of forces or to the production of food or munitions, and there was no doubt that if the manpower of the Empire could be managed on an organised plan much economy might result. There had been a good deal of joint consideration of production problems, but there had been no corresponding study of the manpower problem. He thought that this was one of the points which the technical committee might look into.

MR FRASER agreed that it would be useful to be able to see at any one time how the whole manpower of the Commonwealth was being employed so that resources could be applied to the best advantage. He hoped that the examination of the many points brought up during the discussion would not be side-tracked and that Dominion Governments would give early consideration to the manner in which progress might be made.

The conclusions of THE CONFERENCE were as follows:-

(a) There was general agreement with the proposal put forward by the Prime Minister of Australia, that there should be monthly meetings at which the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom would meet the High Commissioners of the Dominions and the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, to give an opportunity for the Prime Minister to give a review of the current situation and problems, and for the Dominion High Commissioners to raise any questions which they considered should be the subject of consultation with the Dominions.

(b) The Dominion Prime Ministers undertook to consult their Governments, and subsequently to communicate with the U.K. Government, on the various proposals put forward in discussion for the improvement of defence co-operation within the Commonwealth, and as to whether a small technical committee, representative of the United Kingdom and of the Dominions, should be set up to examine further any of these proposals.

ANNEX I

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE MACHINERY

FOR

EMPIRE CO-OPERATION

DESIRED BY THE AUSTRALIAN GOVERNMENT

1. THE ASSOCIATION OF THE DOMINIONS IN THE HIGHER DIRECTION OF THE WAR

If one might draw a general conclusion on the censensus of opinion of these meetings, it is the unanimity of the view that there is no question of greater importance than the development of co-operation and consultation between the members of the British Commonwealth. There may be a variety of views as to the ways of doing it, but there is unanimity as to the objective that we seek to attain.

Methods of consultation and co-operation have been progressively evolved since the World War of 1914/18. In addition, the Imperial Conferences of 1923, 1926 and 1937 were marked by the enunciation of important guiding principles of Imperial Defence.

Notwithstanding satisfactory progress it was recognised that should another war unhappily come, these methods would require strengthening.

At the Imperial Conference of 1937, the Australian Government raised with the United Kingdom Government the question of Australian representation in any Imperial machinery that might be devised for higher direction in war. The matter was noted as one for consideration on the outbreak of war.

After the commencement of the present war, though steps were taken to keep the Dominions fully informed, notably by cables from Prime Minister to Prime Minister, by the increase in the flow of Dominion Office cables, and by the daily meetings of the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs with the High Commissioners, there was no implementation of the suggestion for the association of Dominion Representatives with the higher direction of the war.

Upon the outbreak of war with Japan, the Australian Government felt that it was imperative that they should play a greater part in the formulation of policy, and accordingly asked that the Australian Government -

(1) Should have full knowledge of all essential facts, developments and trends of policy.

(2) Should obtain this knowledge in time to express its view before decisions are taken, and

(3) Should have the opportunity, through its Accredited Representative, of presenting to and discussing with the War Cabinet, the important Committees (such as the Defence Committee), and the Prime Minister, or other senior Ministers, any suggestions as to new policy, or views on the policy under consideration, that Australia might from time to time desire to submit.

In January, 1942, the Advisory War Council in Australia, upon which are representatives not only of the Government but also of the Opposition, when considering proposals for the establishment of a Far Eastern Council in London, with which it did not agree, recommended:

> "That the Accredited Representative of the Australian Government shall have the right to be heard in the War Cabinet in the formulation and direction of policy."

The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom replied to Australia's request indicating acceptance and stating that

> "The fullest opportunity for knowing all essential facts and putting forward suggestions and views will be afforded to Sir Earle Page" who had been nominated by Australia as their Accredited Representative.

Early in 1942, Mr. Bruce, the Australian High Commissioner in London, succeeded Sir Earle Page as the Accredited Representative, and has continued to act in this capacity ever since.

This system of an Accredited Representative has worked reasonably well, but this in considerable measure has been due to advantages which Mr. Bruce enjoyed. He was Prime Minister of Australia for nearly seven years, and at the outbreak of the war had been resident in London as High Commissioner for some six years. The personal relations which he had been able to establish with British Ministers and with United Kingdom Departments has enabled him to carry out his duties as Accredited Representative in a way that would not have been possible to anyone who had not the close contacts here which Mr. Bruce enjoyed.

The system, however, is not an ideal one because the War Cabinet is not an Imperial War Cabinet but the United Kingdom War Cabinet responsible to the United Kingdom Parliament.

In carrying out its duties the Cabinet has to discuss and determine the United Kingdom attitude upon all questions of policy. Anyone with experience of Cabinet work knows that at times differences between Ministers arise, and it is certainly not desirable, and at times extremely embarrassing, to sort those differences out in the presence of an outsider, however discreet and understanding he might be.

In addition to these practical difficulties there is the fact that it is somewhat anomalous that there should be an Australian Representative in the War Cabinet when none of the other Dominions have taken advantage of the invitation of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom to appoint an Accredited Representative in the same way that Australia has done.

While I am loath to propose anything which would add to the tremendous burden which Mr. Churchill is bearing at the present time, I would like to make this suggestion for consideration.

It would be invaluable if the Prime Minister could find the time, notwithstanding his heavy and onerous responsibilities, to meet the High Commissioners and Secretary of State once a month. The object of these meetings would be for the Prime Minister to give a review of the current situation and problems, and to enable Dominion Representatives to raise any questions which they consider should be the subject of special consultation with the Dominions.

In addition to these advantages, such a meeting would give the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom a regular personal contact with the spokesmen from the Dominions and provide the opportunity of hearing at first hand of the problems of those countries.

The adoption of this suggestion, which would give to the Accredited Representative of the Australian Government a contact with the Prime Minister in association with his Dominion colleagues, has such advantages that I would prefer it to the present practice of the Accredited Representative of Australia sitting in isolation in the United Kingdom War Cabinet. In short the Australian Representative would be the Accredited Representative to the War Cabinet and not the Accredited Representative in the War Cabinet, but he would continue to function in the same way as he has done in the past in regard to his detailed activities. Should the circumstances surrounding the consideration of any matter indicate the desirability of the Australian Accredited Representative attending a meeting of the United Kingdom War Cabinet, he would of course be able to do so in accordance with the principle already agreed to by the United Kingdom Government.

I feel that the monthly meeting of the Prime Minister with the Dominion Representatives would be another and a valuable link in the chain of Imperial consultation and co-operation.

2. IMPROVED MACHINERY FOR EMPIRE CO-OPERATION

I would now refer to certain proposals in a speech made by me last December, in which I outlined some ideas for improved machinery for Empire consultation and co-operation:-

(i) MEETINGS OF PRIME MINISTERS

The aim of all machinery must be to provide for full and continuous consultation. This consultation must be consistent with the sovereign control of its policy by each Government.

No machinery which may be established can be superior to, or more satisfactory than the periodical conferences of Prime Ministers of the various parts of the Empire, provided they are held frequently. The Prime Ministers are the heads of their respective Governments, and no one else can speak with the same authority. There can be no substitute for conferences of Prime Ministers on questions of major Empire policy.

MG 26 J 4, Volume 323, pages C222431-C223300

ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES

Difficulties, of course, will arise in arranging such meetings, owing to local circumstances in each part of the Empire, but in normal times, conferences should be possible at fairly frequent intervals. The place of meeting should not necessarily always be in London. Opportunity should be taken to meet in other parts of the Empire. Such a procedure would emphasise to the various parts of the Empire, the reality of the inter-relation of the Governments and people of the Empire in the same way that the King's representative in each Dominion and colony typifies their loyalty to a common Sovereign.

(ii) MEETINGS OF MINISTERS AND OFFICIALS

The meetings of Prime Ministers should be supplemented and reinforced by meetings of other Ministers of the British Commonwealth as occasion may require, to deal with important questions of mutual interest, such as trade and communications. Again, such conferences need not necessarily be held always in the one place.

There should also be meetings at the official level between officers from the various parts of the Empire to deal with technical matters or to carry out exploratory discussions with a view to their subsequent consideration by Governments.

The meetings of Ministers and officials should be summoned as occasion may require and at the most appropriate or convenient place of meeting.

(iii) PROCEDURE BETWEEN CONFERENCES OF PRIME MINISTERS

The procedure to be followed in London between conferences of Prime Ministers would therefore be:-

(a) The monthly meetings of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and Dominion Representatives, as suggested earlier.

(b) The regular daily meeting of the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs and all the High Commissioners.

There is also the ordinary day to day machinery for dealing with the three major groups of important questions comprising Foreign Affairs, Defence and Financial, Economic and Social questions.

(1) Foreign Affairs. The External Affairs staffs in the respective High Commissioner's Office are in close contact with the Foreign Office. Each Dominion will create such machinery and employ such methods as appear desirable in the light of its own circumstances.

(2) Defence. All the Dominions have their Service representatives in the United Kingdom. The position of the individual Dominions varies so greatly that it would seem desirable to avoid attempting to establish a uniform system of co-operation. The essential thing is that there should be agreement to co-operate, not only between the United Kingdom and the Dominions, but between the individual Dominions.

(3) Financial, Economic and Social Questions. During the war there has been a great expansion of co-operation in regard to financial, economic and social questions. It is desirable that this co-operation should be maintained and increased. This will happen as a result of the contacts established during the war, provided the Empire Governments accept the principle and so instruct their officials.

(iv) EXAMINATION OF DESIRABILITY OF CENTRALISATION OF EFFORT

It is suggested that so much individual co-operation has now been established that it would seem that the time is approaching when a start might be made in bringing it under a central direction.

As the term "Empire Secretariat" appears to arouse a certain anxiety, and is liable to create misunderstandings, I do not employ it.

I would suggest, however, that the question should be examined as to whether some centralisation of effort would be desirable.

Such an examination could be carried out by a small Committee to which the United Kingdom and each of the Dominions would appoint representatives.

3. THE IMPORTANCE OF POST-WAR CO-OPERATION IN EMPIRE DEFENCE

The preservation of peace is vital to the re-building of the post-war world which is held out to mankind as the recompense for the sacrifices it is being called upon to make.

We hope to be able to maintain peace by the system of world security which it is our aim to build. Our own experience within the British Commonwealth has shown that the growth of co-operation has been slow notwithstanding that we have so much in common. It remains to be seen how quickly and effectively we can develop and maintain a system of world security, but we dare not fail our own people in providing the security for which they so greatly yearn. In doing so by co-operation amongst ourselves we also contribute to world security at large. The one is complementary to the other.

I would refer to three points which I mentioned at an earlier session of the Conference.

I said that the security of any part of the British Empire in the future will rest on three safeguards, each wider in its scope than the other:-

(i) Firstly, there is national defence, the Policy for which is purely the responsibility of the Government concerned. The extent and nature of a Government's Defence Policy will be influenced by the degree of reliance that can be placed on the second and third safeguards.

(ii) The second safeguard is the degree of Empire co-operation which can be established. This is a matter of bilateral or multilateral planning and arrangement according to the strategical position of the particular part of the Empire concerned, the views of its Government and those of the other Governments that may be concerned.

(iii) The third safeguard is the system of collective security which can be organised on a world and regional basis.

These safeguards are also complementary to each other and none is exclusive of the others.

The need for the co-ordination of Defence Policies for the exchange of information, and for the preparation of plans to ensure the effectiveness of the first two of these safeguards - National Defence and Empire Co-operation - was fully demonstrated by the experience of Australia in this war.

In December 1941 an important decision was taken on global strategy which provided for the defeat of Germany first. Information of this was not learnt by the Australian Government until May 1942, notwithstanding that Singapore had fallen in the previous February, that the Malay - Netherlands East Indies barrier had crumbled, and that the Japanese had advanced to our very doorstep in New Guinea and the Solomon Islands.

On the assumption of the validity of a scheme of Empire Defence on which Australia's Defence Policy had been based, the Government of the day had concentrated on the maximum contribution it could make to the fighting fronts overseas. Three Divisions with a strength of 101,000 men and over 10,000 air personnel were overseas on the outbreak of war with Japan. It therefore became a matter of critical importance to marshal the maximum strength of which we were capable, in order to meet an entirely transformed position in the Pacific Ocean. Part of the A.I.F. returned just in the nick of time. These troops were almost immediately sent to New Guinea without being retrained in jungle warfare, and the threat of invasion was removed by the first New Guinea campaign.

The defence of the Southwest Pacific must be made stronger than in the past. I stated the summarized problem of the regional defence of the Southwest Pacific as follows at the Australian-New Zealand Conference in January last and my views were fully endorsed by the Prime Minister of New Zealand:-

"The fundamental concept of the Australian Government is that the best defence of Australia and New Zealand is to be secured by a system of defence based on the island screen to the north of these Dominions.

The purpose of such a scheme of defence is to preserve the strategical isolation of Australia and New Zealand, whose security is linked with that of the adjacent islands. In the hands of ourselves or a friendly Power and adequately defended, they are a bulwark to the defence of Australia and New Zealand and points of offensive action against an enemy. In possession of an enemy, they are spring-boards for offensive action against our mainlands.

The realisation of the ideal strategical concept involves the following important considerations:-

The strategical location of the bases.

The strength of the Dominion Forces available for their defence, and the assistance that will be forthcoming from other parts of the Empire and other Nations in any system of Empire and International Co-operation.

It is vital that the forward bases should be located where their maintenance can be ensured. They should not be capable of being by-passed, neutralised and ultimately occupied.

The holding of the island screen means sea power, air power and garrisons with installation facilities, such as docks, aerodromes and defences.

The local defence of the mainlands of Australia and New Zealand entails similar demands.

The crux of the situation is the extent of the capacity of Australia and New Zealand to provide for the defence of the screen and, at the same time, for the local defence of their territories. It is impracticable for Australia and New Zealand to defend the area unaided.

In regard to sea power, it is necessary, in order to combat a potential enemy such as Japan, to have a base in a suitable strategical position (such as Singapore), and a fleet which can ensure a command of the sea in the Southwest Pacific Area, apart from the maintenance of overseas communications to this Area.

Australia and New Zealand cannot provide a fleet and equip a base on a parallel of what was contemplated in regard to Singapore as the bastion of the defence of British interests in the Pacific. Co-operation with the United Kingdom is therefore essential. If the base should fall and the fleet should fail to come, as happened with Singapore, the defence of the whole screen collapses and the outlying island bases with their garrisons become hostages to fortune. A power with command of the sea and air could readily subdue them. This was what happened in Timor, Ambon and Rabaul. In such circumstances, the mainlands of Australia and New Zealand become wide open to attack.

The defence of the screen involves co-operation with the United Kingdom and with foreign powers such as the Netherlands (for the Netherlands East Indies and Dutch Timor), Portugal (for Portuguese Timor), the United States (for American possessions in the Southwest Pacific), and France (for New Caledonia, the New Hebrides and other Pacific islands)."

While Australia is quite ready to play its part in a world organisation along the lines mentioned, it is nevertheless a fact of current experience, that, when the peace of the Pacific is broken, Australia's war effort must be concentrated in that area. In the opinion of the Australian Government, it is essential that plans should exist between the parts of the Empire concerned, and also between the other nations concerned, for their co-operation for mutual defence in the strategical area which I have outlined. The Australian people have recently faced the stark realism of a perilous situation. They are determined that everything possible shall be done to prevent a recurrence of a similar danger.

ANNEX II

BRITISH COMMONWEALTH - DEFENCE CO-OPERATION

Note by the Prime Minister of New Zealand

It will be vital to the future security of the British Commonwealth of Nations that in the post-war period there should be the fullest co-operation between the members on questions of Imperial Defence. As high a degree of unity as possible in defensive policy is essential if the maximum value is to be secured from British Forces in ensuring the protection of British interests and the general well-being of the world. It is not considered that his co-operation need militate against the value or the effectiveness of the general International Security Organization which the Declaration made at Moscow by the three principal Powers indicated would be developed. Indeed this unity of Imperial defence should assist in securing the effectiveness of the general International Security Organization.

2. This paper is concerned with a consideration of the means which should be adopted so that we may secure as high a measure of unity in thought and action between the members of the Commonwealth in matters of defence. The necessity of co-operation and collaboration in Imperial defence indicates that it is desirable to establish as soon as possible, or at least to determine now, for adoption as soon as the war situation permits, some procedure for planning inter-Imperial defence which will be generally acceptable to members of the Commonwealth.

3. The Committee of Imperial Defence which functioned in London prior to the outbreak of war had some responsibility in planning Imperial defence. But the plans devised were directed more particularly to the defence of the United Kingdom and the Colonial Empire. No suggestions were made except on specific requests from some Dominion Governments, regarding the general measure of defence which should be maintained by Dominion Governments, although proposals were advanced from time to time by the Overseas Defence Committee of the C.I.D. regarding the scale and strength of coast defence installations which might be maintained in territories throughout the Commonwealth. While Dominions were represented by their Service advisors on the Committee of Imperial Defence, generally speaking participation by Dominion Service representatives in proceedings of the C.I.D. was limited to discussion in Committees where questions affecting some aspect of Defence for that particular Dominion were under discussion or examination.

4. It is suggested that the functions of the C.I.D. should be expanded to include responsibility for:-

(a) The examination of resources of the British Commonwealth, including the Colonial territories, with a view to determining what contribution, having regard to the general world force necessary for security, should be made towards defence by each of the members and colonial territories.

(b) Planning generally regarding the character of the forces to be maintained by members of the Commonwealth and Colonial territories with a view to ensuring that in the event of attack, balanced forces will be available from the British territories in the region for the protection of British interest there.

(c) Preparing plans for mutual reinforcement between members of the Commonwealth and Colonial territories.

ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES

5. It would be desirable, if the functions of the Committee of Imperial defence are expanded in the manner suggested above, that service representation by Dominion Governments in the Committee should be on the strongest possible basis. At the same time it will be important to ensure that Dominion Service Representatives should always be fully aware of defence problems in their own Dominions. Tours of duty should, therefore, be limited and representatives replaced at intervals, of say, 12 months.

6. The Committee of Imperial Defence in London might be complemented by similar committees in each of the Dominions, and where this appears desirable, in the major Colonial territories also. These local Committees would be responsible for:-

(a) Furnishing to the Committee in London information respecting resources in the territories.

(b) Suggesting for the defence of their own territories.

(c) Arranging, under the direction of the Government for the implementation of the major defence plan suggested by the Committee of Imperial Defence and the International Security Organisation and approved by the Government.

7. The general plans prepared by the Committee of Imperial Defence on questions affecting the defence of the British Commonwealth should be examined on the highest plane and as soon as possible after they are submitted. Plans will, of course, be submitted to Dominion Governments for examination locally; but there are many disadvantages in arranging for the major plans to be examined by the Dominion Ministers directly responsible at a special meeting. It is suggested, therefore, that general plans might be prepared by the C.I.D. covering Imperial Defence for a period of, say, two years and that these be examined at a meeting of the Defence Ministers of the Dominions to be held in London at corresponding intervals. If general approval were thereby given to the plans, action would, subject to formal Government approval, be taken in the various Dominions and Colonial Territories to implement them. In the interval, the C.I.D. could prepare new plans, for the ensuing period of two years, based on developments in the political situation, alteration of the resources of any part of the Commonwealth, and any major development in weapons or equipment that may have been made in the interval.

8. In addition to preparing plans for Imperial defence, it will be desirable to provide some organisation which will make detailed plans for co-operation in particular defence regions such as are envisaged in paragraph 13 of the Australian-New Zealand Agreement of January 1944. In the South Pacific Area, for example, this would involve close co-operation between Australia and New Zealand, Fiji and territories in the High Commission for the Western Pacific. As well as securing full co-operation and co-ordination in Imperial defence in this particular region, this local regional defence Planning Committee would complete plans for mutual reinforcement in the event of a threat against any of the British territories in the area. This regional planning organisation would, of course, be but part of the general authority for the defence zone. The latter would be responsible for considering in detail questions concerning the defence of all territories in the area, e.g., from the Netherlands East Indies in the west to the Cook Islands in the east.

9. Nothing that is said above should be regarded as detracting from the necessity for and the importance of an adequate and effective International Security Organisation such as is contemplated in the Moscow Declaration, 1943. This should be developed as soon as possible and receive the fullest support. It is too early at this stage to say whether or not the International Security Organisation will suggest what forces should be maintained inter alia, by members of the British Commonwealth, or whether this authority would expect to receive from the members of the Commonwealth themselves some indication of the forces which they would be willing to maintain. Whatever procedure is employed, and it seems likely that the latter will in fact result, it is necessary to contemplate the existence of some revised Committee of Imperial Defence. Notwithstanding that in the post-war period we must rely very largely on the United States of America for the defence of our common interests in the Pacific Ocean area, it is essential at the same time that we should realise as effective a development as possible of British power. This can be ensured if there is adequate understanding and co-operation in Imperial defence among all members of the British Commonwealth. This can be most efficiently realised through an adequate inter-Imperial defence organisation which might be developed on the lines suggested above.

War Cabinet. In short the Australian Representative would be the Accredited Representative to the War Cabinet and not the Accredited Representative in the War Cabinet, but he would continue to function in the same way as he has done in the past in regard to his detailed activities. Should the circumstances surrounding the consideration of any matter indicate the desirability of the Australian Accredited Representative attending a meeting of the United Kingdom War Cabinet, he would of course be able to do so in accordance with the principle already agreed to by the United Kingdom Government.

I feel that the monthly meeting of the Prime Minister with the Dominion Representatives would be another and a valuable link in the chain of Imperial consultation and co-operation.

2. IMPROVED MACHINERY FOR EMPIRE CO-OPERATION

I would now refer to certain proposals in a speech made by me last December, in which I outlined some ideas for improved machinery for Empire consultation and co-operation:-

(i) MEETINGS OF PRIME MINISTERS

The aim of all machinery must be to provide for full and continuous consultation. This consultation must be consistent with the sovereign control of its policy by each Government.

No machinery which may be established can be superior to, or more satisfactory than the periodical conferences of Prime Ministers of the various parts of the Empire, provided they are held frequently. The Prime Ministers are the heads of their respective Governments, and no one else can speak with the same authority. There can be no substitute for conferences of Prime Ministers on questions of major Empire policy.

Difficulties, of course, will arise in arranging such meetings, owing to local circumstances in each part of the Empire, but in normal times, conferences should be possible at fairly frequent intervals. The place of meeting should not necessarily always be in London. Opportunity should be taken to meet in other parts of the Empire. Such a procedure would emphasise to the various parts of the Empire, the reality of the inter-relation of the Governments and people of the Empire in the same way that the King's representative in each Dominion and colony typifies their loyalty to a common Sovereign.

(ii) MEETINGS OF MINISTERS AND OFFICIALS

The meetings of Prime Ministers should be supplemented and reinforced by meetings of other Ministers of the British Commonwealth as occasion may require, to deal with important questions of mutual interest, such as trade and communications. Again, such conferences need not necessarily be held always in the one place.

There should also be meetings at the official level between officers from the various parts of the Empire to deal with technical matters or to carry out exploratory discussions with a view to their subsequent consideration by Governments.

The meetings of Ministers and officials should be summoned as occasion may require and at the most appropriate or convenient place of meeting.

(iii) PROCEDURE BETWEEN CONFERENCES OF PRIME MINISTERS.

The procedure to be followed in London between conferences of Prime Ministers would therefore be:-

(a) The monthly meetings of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and Dominion Representatives, as suggested earlier.

(b) The regular daily meeting of the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs and all the High Commissioners.

There is also the ordinary day to day machinery for dealing with the three major groups of important questions comprising Foreign Affairs, Defence and Financial, Economic and Social questions.

(1) Foreign Affairs. The External Affairs staffs in the respective High Commissioner's Office are in close contact with the Foreign Office. Each Dominion will create such machinery and employ such methods as appear desirable in the light of its own circumstances.

(2) Defence. All the Dominions have their Service representatives in the United Kingdom. The position of the individual Dominions varies so greatly that it would seem desirable to avoid attempting to establish a uniform system of co-operation. The essential thing is that there should be agreement to co-operate, not only between the United Kingdom and the Dominions, but between the individual Dominions.

(3) Financial, Economic and Social Questions. During the war there has been a great expansion of co-operation in regard to financial, economic and social questions. It is desirable that this co-operation should be maintained and increased. This will happen as a result of the contacts established during the war, provided the Empire Governments accept the principle and so instruct their officials.

(iv) EXAMINATION OF DESIRABILITY OF CENTRALIZATION OF EFFORT.

It is suggested that so much individual co-operation has now been established that it would seem that the time is approaching when a start might be made in bringing it under a central direction.

As the term "Empire Secretariat" appears to arouse a certain anxiety, and is liable to create misunderstandings, I do not employ it.

I would suggest, however, that the question should be examined as to whether some centralisation of effort would be desirable.

Such an examination could be carried out by a small Committee to which the United Kingdom and each of the Dominions would appoint representatives.

3. THE IMPORTANCE OF POST-WAR CO-OPERATION IN EMPIRE DEFENCE

The preservation of peace is vital to the re-building of the post-war world which is held out to mankind as the recompense for the sacrifices it is being called upon to make.

We hope to be able to maintain peace by the system of world security which it is our aim to build. Our own experience within the British Commonwealth has shown that the growth of co-operation has been slow notwithstanding that we have so much in common. It remains to be seen how quickly and effectively we can develop and maintain a system of world security, but we dare not fail our own people in providing the security for which they so greatly yearn. In doing so by co-operation amongst ourselves we also contribute to world security at large The one is complementary to the other.

I would refer to three points which I mentioned at an earlier session of the Conference.

I said that the security of any part of the British Empire in the future will rest on three safeguards, each wider in its scope than the other:-

(i) Firstly, there is national defence, the Policy for which is purely the responsibility of the Government concerned. The extent and nature of a Government's Defence Policy will be influenced by the degree of reliance that can be placed on the second and third safeguards.

(ii) The second safeguard is the degree of Empire co-operation which can be established. This is a matter of bilateral or multilateral planning and arrangement according to the strategical position of the particular part of the Empire concerned, the views of its Government and those of the other Governments that may be concerned.

ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES

C223080

(iii) The third safeguard is the system of collective security which can be organised on a world and regional basis.

These safeguards are also complementary to each other and none is exclusive of the others.

The need for the co-ordination of Defence Policies for the exchange of information, and for the preparation of plans to ensure the effectiveness of the first two of these safeguards - National Defence and Empire Co-operation - was fully demonstrated by the experience of Australia in this war.

In December 1941 an important decision was taken on global strategy which provided for the defeat of Germany first. Information of this was not learnt by the Australian Government until May 1942, notwithstanding that Singapore had fallen in the previous February, that the Malay - Netherlands East Indies barrier had crumbled, and that the Japanese had advanced to our very doorstep in New Guinea and the Solomon Islands.

On the assumption of the validity of a scheme of Empire Defence on which Australia's Defence Policy had been based, the Government of the day had concentrated on the maximum contribution it could make to the fighting fronts overseas. Three Divisions with a strength of 101,000 men and over 10,000 air personnel were overseas on the outbreak of war with Japan. It therefore became a matter of critical importance to marshal the maximum strength of which we were capable, in order to meet an entirely transformed position in the Pacific Ocean. Part of the A.I.F. returned just in the nick of time. These troops were almost immediately sent to New Guinea without being retrained in jungle warfare, and the threat of invasion was removed by the first New Guinea campaign.

The defence of the Southwest Pacific must be made stronger than in the past. I stated the summarized problem of the regional defence of the Southwest Pacific as follows at the Australian-New Zealand Conference in January last and my views were fully endorsed by the Prime Minister of New Zealand:-

> "The fundamental concept of the Australian Government is that the best defence of Australia and New Zealand is to be secured by a system of defence based on the island screen to the north of these Dominions.
> The purpose of such a scheme of defence is to preserve the strategical isolation of Australia and New Zealand, whose security is linked with that of the adjacent islands. In the hands of ourselves or a friendly Power and adequately defended, they are a bulwark to the defence of Australia and New Zealand and points of offensive action against an enemy. In possession of an enemy, they are spring-boards for offensive action against our mainlands.

The realisation of the ideal strategical concept involves the following important considerations:-

The strategical location of the bases.

The strength of the Dominion Forces available for their defence, and the assistance that will be forthcoming from other parts of the Empire and other Nations in any system of Empire and International Co-operation.

It is vital that the forward bases should be located where their maintenance can be ensured. They should not be capable of being by-passed, neutralised and ultimately occupied.

The holding of the island screen means sea power, air power and garrisons with installation facilities, such as docks, aerodromes and defences.

The local defence of the mainlands of Australia and New Zealand entails similar demands.

The crux of the situation is the extent of the capacity of Australia and New Zealand to provide for the defence of the screen and, at the same time, for the local defence of their territories. It is impracticable for Australia and New Zealand to defend the area unaided.

C223083

In regard to sea power, it is necessary, in order to combat a potential enemy such as Japan, to have a base in a suitable strategical position (such as Singapore), and a fleet which can ensure a command of the sea in the Southwest Pacific Area, apart from the maintenance of overseas communications to this Area.

Australia and New Zealand cannot provide a fleet and equip a base on a parallel of what was contemplated in regard to Singapore as the bastion of the defence of British interests in the Pacific. Co-operation with the United Kingdom is therefore essential. If the base should fall and the fleet should fail to come, as happened with Singapore, the defence of the whole screen collapses and the outlying island bases with their garrisons become hostages to fortune. A power with command of the sea and air could readily subdue them. This was what happened in Timor, Ambon and Rabaul. In such circumstances, the mainlands of Australia and New Zealand become wide open to attack.

The defence of the screen involves co-operation with the United Kingdom and with foreign powers such as the Netherlands (for the Netherlands East Indies and Dutch Timor), Portugal (for Portuguese Timor), the United States (for American possessions in the Southwest Pacific), and France (for New Caledonia, the New Hebrides and other Pacific islands)."

While Australia is quite ready to play its part in a world organization along the lines mentioned, it is nevertheless a fact of current experience, that, when the peace of the Pacific is broken, Australia's war effort must be concentrated in that area. In the opinion of the Australian Government, it is essential that plans should exist between the parts of the Empire concerned, and also between the other nations concerned, for their co-operation for mutual defence in the strategical area which I have outlined The Australian people have recently faced the stark realism of a perilous situation. They are determined that everything possible shall be done to prevent a recurrence of a similar danger.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

DRAFT STATEMENT TO BE ISSUED OVER THE SIGNATURES OF THE FIVE PRIME MINISTERS.

WE, The King's Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, have now, for the first time since the outbreak of the war, been able to meet together to discuss common problems and future plans.

At this memorable meeting, in the fifty-seventh month of the war, we give thanks that we have been so far delivered from the dire perils which have menaced us in the course of this long and terrible struggle against tyranny. Though hard and bitter battles lie ahead, we now see before us, in the ever-growing might of the forces of the United Nations, and in the defeats already inflicted on the foe, by land, by sea and in the air, manifest tokens of our future victory.

On behalf of the peoples of our countries who have shown such bravery and endurance in this long conflict, we do honour to the great feats of arms of the forces of the United States and of Russia and pay tribute to the forces of the other nations joined with us as Allies. Above all, we are not unmindful of the valiant part played by our comrades in arms from countries overrun by the enemy.

Our first task has been to pass in review the plans for the conduct of the war against Germany and Japan. On all these we are agreed. We reaffirm the resolve, to which we have held since the days when the peoples of the British Commonwealth stood alone against Germany, to devote all our strength to the war until the defeat of our enemies is complete. We seek to bring this about at the earliest possible moment, so that the sufferings of mankind may be speedily brought to an end.

We have examined together the guiding principles which determine our foreign policies, and their application to current problems. Here also we have found ourselves in complete agreement. We are united in our determination to continue in association with our Allies a policy, designed to give the fullest possible aid to the operations of the armed forces during the war, and thereafter to promote peaceful and orderly development.

In all our deliberations we have been sustained by a lively sense of our unity of purpose, which was never greater than to-day. That unity finds its strength, not in any formal bond, but in the hidden springs from which human action flows—our common heritage of ideals and loyalties, and our sense of kinship with one another. Our system of free association has enabled us, each and all, to take our full share of the common burden. The methods of democratic Government which we each enjoy have stood the test of two world wars. We believe that when peace returns these same methods, this same free association and this same unity of purpose, will be found capable of rendering further service to the cause of mankind.

We are resolved that the victory, which with our Allies we shall achieve, should carry with it a sense of hope and freedom for the world. We look forward to the day when we shall play our part in the restoration of liberty and national life in the countries now occupied by the enemy. It is our aim that the peoples of these countries shall be free to decide for themselves their future form of democratic Government.

Our object is to secure fair dealing and honest conduct between the nations of the world. We seek the collaboration of all peace-loving peoples, and we ask the help of all in the speedy destruction of tyranny wherever it raises its head. We seek no advantages for ourselves at the cost of others. We desire the welfare of all nations.

We look to the establishment after the war of a world organisation to maintain peace and security. This organisation must be endowed with the necessary power and authority to curb aggression.

The representatives of India at the War Cabinet and the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia have taken part in our deliberations. They share our confidence that, in this great field of endeavour, all the countries of the British Commonwealth and Empire will go forward together with untiring resolution.

TOP SECRET

As Minister for Foreign Affairs was unable to receive me to-day I saw Secretary-General. I told him we were hoping for further Brazilian support in the new proposals we were going to make and I, explaining, told him the general nature of the compromise which His Majesty's Government were proposing in order to avoid a deadlock and more especially in order to prevent large exports in immediately following month. Having in mind your telegram No. 704 to Lisbon, I added that there might be some final changes in detail but suggested that these could be ascertained in Lisbon. I then gave him in most general terms sense of message contained in your telegram No. 699 to Lisbon impressing on him the need for secrecy.

Secretary-General told me that he would submit for Minister for Foreign Affairs's approval brief telegram to Brazilian Ambassador instructing him to concert and support Sir R. Campbell in further measures. I will telegraph when approval is given.

I should perhaps explain with reference to paragraph 6 of your telegram No. 698 to Lisbon that, not having received Sir R. Campbell's telegram No. 832 to you and therefore not being certain of context I did not say anything about our preference for Portugal to honour alliance and come into the war. If you attach importance to Brazilian Government being aware of this point, which as I understand it is not a precise invitation but rather in the nature of a hint, I should be grateful for further instructions. In this event I think that the Brazilian Ambassador in Lisbon ought to be warned.

Uruguayan Ambassador who is Doyen, and Nuncio have raised with United States Ambassador question of celebrations on May 25th. These include banquet, Te Deum and State performance at Opera, all traditionally attended by diplomatic body. Uruguayan Ambassador just returned from Uruguay said his President had taken for granted he would attend religious service, and United States Ambassador is of opinion that unless all attend religious service there is a danger of at least some South American representatives attending dinner and opera as well. He also feels (as apparently do all South American colleagues) that abstention from Te Deum would be regarded as national insult by the whole country. He has therefore arranged with the Nuncio that the latter will notify Heads of Missions that service will be held and will inform Argentine Government how many will attend. He himself is asking approval of State Department to attend [grp. undec. ? and I] told him I agreed and anticipated that in the circumstances you would also agree. Attendance at service is, of course, in practice more anomalous, but abstention would create much more serious difficulties. Belgian, Dutch and Norwegian Ministers whom I have informed of United States Ambassador's proposals are very strongly in agreement.

2. As regards five points suggested in paragraph 1 of Washington's telegram No.302, (a) (b) and (c) were practically promised to me by General Farrell and question is really one of publicity concerning (b) and (e). As regards (d) publication of statutory and proclaimed lists has never ceased in English language newspapers and we send 1,200 copies through post without interference, so that publication in purely Argentine papers should not be difficult to arrange. While (c) would be difficult to get thoroughly carried out, I think that an undertaking to give no further contracts to German firms would be quite possible if it were the only outstanding difficulty in the way of recognition.

Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs visited United States Ambassador privately yesterday and after trying to persuade him to attend all three functions on May 25th suggested that he should meet Minister for Foreign Affairs, Colonel Peron, and Minister of Marine, who are the three Ministers most anxious for compromise. MOST IMMEDIATE

Your telegram No. 586.

As pointed out in my telegram No. 747 the word "forthwith" was not included in the original draft sent to Sir S. Hoare in your telegram No. 469, relevant text of which read "The Spanish Government have undertaken to close the Consulate-General, and to arrange the departure of the Consul-General and all his staff".

Paragraph 3 of Sir S. Hoare's letter to the Minister for Foreign Affairs reads "the German Consulate-General at Tangier will be closed and the departure of the Consul-General and his staff from Spanish controlled territory and from Metropolitan Spain assured". The first sentence of the United States Ambassador's letter to the Minister for Foreign Affairs reads "The German Consulate-General at Tangier will be closed; and its personnel required to depart from Spanish or Spanish controlled territory".

The word "forthwith" appears to have been first introduced in your telegram No. 3,594, although the statement contained therein was described in your telegram No. 3,593 as following "the lines of the draft in your telegram No. 469, modified by Madrid telegram No. 625, etc." I fear that in the circumstances the addition was not detected.

I am convinced, and I think Sir S. Hoare will agree, that in any case, General Jordana was not in a position to agree to the word "forthwith" as we interpreted it. Please see in this connexion the latter half of paragraph 2 of Sir S. Hoare's telegram No. 327, and the penultimate sentence of paragraph 2 of his telegram No. 505.

As regards General Jordana's attitude referred to in your telegram No. 584, it is not so much solicitude for the Germans as difficulties in the Council of Ministers mentioned in.....

in last paragraph of Sir S. Hoare's telegram No. 145 Saving. It is for this reason that I doubt whether he could have proceeded in another way, anyway in the first instance, than trying to arrange the Consulate affair in a dignified way with the Germans. He is convinced that His Majesty's Government would have done the same in similar circumstances and he considers that he acted "forthwith" in notifying the German Government the day after the agreement was made.

I am endeavouring as instructed to see him somewhere to-day though it is a festival, the Ministry is closed, and the Minister for Foreign Affairs out of town.

United States Counsellor informed me this afternoon that American oil adviser had received a telegram [?grp.omit] Washington to the effect that Supplies Department had informed F.E.A. that no petroleum vessels available for Spanish loadings of 14,000 tons each arranged for June 1st and June 11th.As the tankers for these loadings had already left they would have to be recalled. In the circumstances the oil adviser would communicate the first date to the Spanish authorities but had been instructed not to communicate the second date until State Department had had time to consider the telegram United States Ambassador was sending.

In this telegram which Counsellor read out to me United States Ambassador points out that Spaniards will find it difficult to believe that supplies are really [sic] available and will regard this as a breach of agreement. Mr. H.A... adds that he is particularly anxious at this stage that nothing should happen which might lead the Spaniards to delay the closing of the German Consulate at Tangier and the departure of its personnel. He points out that the main undertaking of the American and British Governments in the agreement was the resumption of oil shipments, and deplores the effects which a failure to carry out[?grp.omtd] will have on the situation here. He thinks that if no supplies can be arranged the Spaniards should be allowed to ship the crude oil they have already bought to Cepsa Teneriffe for refining there.

There is an ominous sentence in the Washington telegram which suggests intention to keep the Spaniards down to total stocks on May 1st (see my telegram No. 571 Arfar) [grp.undec.? on][?grp.omtd]s that the Spaniard [?grp.omtd.?s]"were only able to hold out so long over the wolfram negotiations because of the two months stocks of oil they held." The move looks therefore like one by unrepentant subordinate officials in Washington to put further pressure on Spain.

I am.....

I am sure you will agree[?grp.omtd] most undesirable that the American and British Governments should be the first to fail to carry out the agreement. If supplies really are short then it becomes a question of priorities. Spain under the agreement, which she cannot yet be said to have failed to implement, is entitled to some priority. Moreover a substantial proportion of the oil shipments in question are vital for the collection and distribution of the harvest. I trust therefore that it will be possible to obtain a reconsideration of this decision even if it is necessary to go to the highest level. I submit that owing to dates and considerations advanced above this question should be dealt with entirely separately from that of the Tangier Consulate as to which our case may be seriously prejudiced by this unilateral American action unless the decision is reversed.

Your telegram No. 584.

United States Counsellor told me this morning that the State Department's attitude was not quite so definite on Tangier Consulate issue and he read me out a telegram to the effect that if closing of Consulate had not been completed when tankers arrived, United States Government would have to "reconsider the situation."

He has agreed in the absence of his Ambassador to support my representations to the Minister for Foreign Affairs when he will urge the necessity of complete liquidation of the whole question not later than this week.

No doubt you have already noticed June shipments include Remedios for 6,700 tons fuel oil and Zoroa [sic] 5,800 fuel oil both from Curaçao. As this source of oil is under British control, I suggest that these nominations should be confirmed irrespective of United States decision for Ar.... loadings. I am all the more inclined to take this suggestion which has been discussed with Berthoud as he assures me that there is at present a surplus of fuel oil at Curaçao.

MOST IMMEDIATE

My telegram No. 761.

I spoke to Minister for Foreign Affairs this evening on lines of your telegram No. 584 and let him read a translation of your proposed statement. He at once said it was very good and that he could not see what more was wanted but we could strengthen it if we wished by saying in the last sentence Japanese Assistant Military Attaché had been "ordered" to leave Tangier and rejoin his Embassy in Madrid.

When I explained that you felt that the statement would not be well received and had instructed me to urge him to provide you with something more definite he replied with some heat he had already made it clear to me that he could not do so and then launched into a tirade against people in England and United States who while he was doing his best and had accomplished a good deal to bring Spain, Great Britain and United States closer together, seemed only interested in attacking Spain. Again very bitterly he complained of the B.B.C. which he said, more than anything was making his task more difficult byrepeating every harmful report about Spain. These people were incorrigible and if he satisfied us now over the agreement they would seek other means of continuing their attacks.

I let him talk himself out and then tried many times and in many different ways to persuade him in his own interests and those of Spain to give me something more definite but to no avail. When I reverted to the importance of closing the Consulate and ensuring the departure of the German Consul and his staff before tankers arrived to load he said sharply that if loading were refused agreement would be broken and we should be back where we were in February. This would of course be a victory for the Germans. Finally I induced him to agree -

(a) that he would send instructions to the High Commissioner that when the German Consular shield and flag were taken down tomorrow all consular prerogatives including the use of cyphers were to cease -

(b) that I might say for your confidential information and not (repeat not) for use in the House of Commons he was convinced that the whole affair would be liquidated within a week.

I may say of this he seemed very confident but I could not induce him to be more definite.

Situation here is obviously very delicate and the repercussions on the [grp. undec:] of American action reported in my telegram No. 763 have yet to come and they will not [? grp. omtd: ? make] his position any easier. My impression and that of all the Embassy staff concerned is that liquidation is well on the way and that it would be unwise to risk a crisis by holding up the loadings if all German personnel have not departed on arrival of the tankers. In any case if the loadings are held up it is essential there should not (repeat not) be any publicity.

He had asked Stalin whether it was permissable for Soviet Government pursue policy persecution and force against Catholic Church to which Stalin replied that as supporter of freedom of conscience and religion he did not consider such policy permissable and it was excluded. In reply to Orlemanski's question whether collaboration was possible with Pope in struggle against force and persecution of Catholic Church Stalin said it was possible. Italian Minister has reported confidentially to his Government through the United States Legation here as follows:

Italian Chargé d'Affaires to Holy See reports recurring incidents between the Vatican and the Germans and Neo-Fascist authorities. The latest of importance was the arrest on May 1st of a Dutch priest on the stairs of Santa Maria Maggiore followed by an irruption of Neo-Fascist police into that extraterritorial building and subsequent protest by the Holy See.

Italian Royalist Chargé d'Affaires confirms widespread uneasiness in Rome and intensifed surveillance. Interest in the "open city" question is still strong and it is hinted that the situation might bring about revision of statute of the Vatican City.

Food situation is still bad and attempts of the Holy See to secure improvement seem to meet with great difficulties.

WE, The King's Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, have now, for the first time since the outbreak of the war, been able to meet together to discuss common problems and future plans. The representatives of India at the War Cabinet and the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia have joined in our deliberations and are united with us.

At this memorable meeting, in the fifth year of the war, we give thanks for deliverance from the worst perils which have menaced us in the course of this long and terrible struggle against tyranny. Though hard and bitter battles lie ahead, we now see before us, in the ever-growing might of the forces of the United Nations, and in the defeats already inflicted on the foe, by land, by sea and in the air, the sure presage of our future victory.

To all our Armed Forces who in many lands are preserving our liberties with their lives, and to the peoples of all our countries whose efforts, fortitude and conviction have sustained the struggle, we express our admiration and gratitude. We honour the famous deeds of the Forces of the United States and of Soviet Russia, and pay our tribute to the fighting tenacity of the many states and nations joined with us. We remember indeed the prolonged, stubborn resistance of China, the first to be attacked by the authors of world-aggression, and we rejoice in the unquenchable spirit of our comrades in every country still in the grip of the enemy. We shall not turn from the conflict till they are restored to freedom. Not one who marches with us shall be abandoned.

We have examined the part which the British Empire and Commonwealth of Nations should bear against Germany and Japan, in harmony with our Allies. We are in cordial agreement with the general plans which have been laid before us. As in the days when we stood all alone against Germany, we affirm our inflexible and unwearying resolve to continue in the general war with the utmost of our strength until the defeat and downfall of our cruel, barbarous foes has been accomplished. We shall hold back nothing to reach the goal and bring to the speediest end the agony of mankind.

We have also examined together the principles which determine our foreign policies, and their application to current problems. Here too we are in complete agreement.

We are unitedly resolved to continue, shoulder to shoulder with our Allies, all needful exertions which will aid our Fleets, Armies and Air Forces during the war and thereafter to make sure of an enduring peace. We trust and pray that the victory, which will certainly be won, will carry with it a sense of hope and freedom for all the world. It is our aim that, when the storms and passions of war have passed away, all countries now overrun by the enemy shall be free to decide for themselves their future form of democratic government.

Mutual respect and honest conduct between nations is our chief desire. We are determined to work with all peace-loving peoples in order that tyranny and aggression shall be removed or, if need be, struck down wherever it raises its head. The peoples of the British Empire and Commonwealth of Nations willingly make their sacrifices to the common cause. We seek no advantages for ourselves at the cost of others. We desire the welfare and social advance of all nations and that they may help each other to better and broader days.

We affirm that after the war a World Organization to maintain peace and security should be set up and endowed with the necessary power and authority to prevent aggression and violence.

In a world torn by strife, we have met here in unity. That unity finds its strength, not in any formal bond but in the hidden springs from which human action flows. We rejoice in our inheritance of loyalties and ideals, and proclaim our sense of kinship to one another. Our system of free association has enabled us, each and all, to claim a full share of the common burden. Although spread across the globe, we have stood together through the stresses of two World Wars, and have been welded the stronger thereby. We believe that when victory is won and peace returns, this same free association, this inherent unity of purpose, will make us able to do further service to mankind.

DRAFT STATEMENT TO BE ISSUED OVER THE SIGNATURES OF THE FIVE PRIME MINISTERS.

We, the King's Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, have now, for the first time since the outbreak of the war, been able to meet together to discuss common problems and future plans.

At this memorable meeting, in the fifty-seventh month of the war, we give thanks that we have been so far delivered from the dire perils which have menaced us in the course of this long and terrible struggle against tyranny. Though hard and bitter battles lie ahead, we now see before us, in the ever-growing might of the forces of the United Nations, and in the defeats already inflicted on the foe by land, by sea and in the air, manifest tokens of our future victory.

On behalf of the peoples of our countries who have shown such bravery and endurance in this long conflict, we do honour to the great feats of arms of the forces of the United States and of Russia and pay tribute to the forces of the other nations joined with us as Allies. Above all, we are not unmindful of the valiant part played by our comrades ~~in arms~~ from countries over-run by the enemy.

II.

Our first task has been to pass in review the plans for the conduct of the war against Germany and Japan. ~~On all these we are agreed.~~ We reaffirm the resolve, to which we have held since the days when the peoples of the British Commonwealth stood alone against Germany, to devote all our strength to the war until the defeat of our enemies is complete. We seek to bring this about at the earliest possible moment, so that the sufferings of mankind may be speedily brought to an end.

III

We have examined together the ~~guiding~~ principles which determine our foreign policies, and their application to current problems. Here also we ~~have found ourselves~~ are in complete agreement. We are united in our determination to continue in association with our Allies a policy designed to give the fullest possible aid to the operations of the armed forces during the war, and thereafter to promote peaceful ~~and~~ and solution and maintain orderly development.

IV

In all our deliberations we have been sustained by a lively sense of our unity of purpose, which was never greater than today. That unity finds its strength, not in any formal bond, but in the hidden springs from which human action flows - our common heritage of ideals and loyalties, and our sense of kinship with one another. Our system of free association has enabled us, each and all, to take our full share of the common burden. The methods of democratic Government which we each enjoy have stood the test of two world wars. We believe that when peace returns these same methods, this same free association and this same unity of purpose will be found capable of rendering further service to the cause of mankind.

V

We are resolved that the victory, which with our Allies we shall achieve, should carry with it a sense of hope and freedom for the world. We look forward to the day when we shall play our part in the restoration of liberty and national life in the countries now occupied by the enemy. It is our aim that the peoples of these countries shall be free to decide for themselves their future form of democratic Government.

Our object is to secure fair dealing and honest conduct between the nations of the world. We seek the collaboration of all peace loving peoples, and we ask the help of all in the speedy destruction of tyranny wherever it raises its head. We seek no advantages for ourselves at the cost of others. We desire the welfare of all nations.

VI

We look to the establishment after the war of a world organisation to maintain peace and security. This organisation must be endowed with the necessary power and authority to curb aggression.

VII

The representatives of India at the War Cabinet and the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia have taken part in our deliberations. They share our confidence that, in this great field of endeavour all the countries of the British Commonwealth and Empire will go forward together with untiring resolution.

WE, The King's Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, have now, for the first time since the outbreak of the war, been able to meet together to discuss common problems and future plans. The representatives of India at the War Cabinet and the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia have joined in our deliberations and are united with us.

At this memorable meeting, in the fifth year of the war, we give thanks for deliverance from the worst perils which have menaced us in the course of this long and terrible struggle against tyranny. Though hard and bitter battles lie ahead, we now see before us, in the ever-growing might of the forces of the United Nations, and in the defeats already inflicted on the foe, by land, by sea and in the air, the sure presage of our future victory.

To all our Armed Forces who in many lands are preserving our liberties with their lives, and to the peoples of all our countries whose fortitude and conviction have sustained the struggle, we express our admiration and gratitude. We honour the famous deeds of the Forces of the United States and of Soviet Russia, and pay our tribute to the fighting tenacity of the many states and nations joined with us. We remember indeed the prolonged, stubborn resistance of China, the first to be attacked by the authors of world-aggression, and we rejoice in the unquenchable spirit of our comrades in every country still in the grip of the enemy. We shall not turn from the furrow of toil and sorrow till they are restored to freedom. Not one who marches with us shall be abandoned.

We have examined attentively the part which the British Empire and Commonwealth of Nations should bear against Germany and Japan, in harmony with all our Allies. We are in cordial agreement with the general plans which have been laid before us. As in the days when we stood all alone against Germany, we affirm our inflexible and unwearying resolve to continue in the general war with the utmost of our strength until the defeat and downfall of our cruel, barbarous foes has been accomplished. We shall hold back nothing to reach the goal and bring to the speediest end the agony of mankind.

We ~~find ourselves in full agreement with~~ the principles which ~~have ruled~~ our foreign policies ~~in various theatres~~, and ~~we give our approval to~~ their application to ~~varied and swiftly-moving situations~~. We are unitedly resolved to continue, ~~hand in hand~~ with our Allies, all needful exertions which will aid our Fleets, Armies and Air Forces during the war and thereafter to make sure of an enduring peace. We trust and pray that the victory, which will certainly be won, will carry with it a sense of hope and freedom for the world which shall not be denied in the end, even to those who have done us wrong. It is our aim that, when the storms and passions of war have passed away, all countries now overrun by the enemy shall be free to decide for themselves their future form of democratic government.

Mutual respect and honest conduct between the nations of the world is our chief desire. We are determined to work with all peace-loving peoples in order that tyranny and aggression shall be removed or, if need be, struck down wherever it raises its head. ~~We gladly~~ make ~~our~~ sacrifices to the common cause. We seek no advantages for ourselves at the cost of others. We desire the welfare of all nations and that they may help each other to advance into better and broader days.

We affirm that after the war a World Organization to maintain peace and security should be set up and endowed with the necessary power and authority to ~~curb and control~~ prevent aggression and violence.

In a world torn by strife, we have met here in unity. That unity finds its strength, not in any formal bond but in the hidden springs from which human action flows. We rejoice in our inheritance of loyalties and ideals, and proclaim our sense of kinship to one another. Our system of free association has enabled us, each and all, to claim a full share of the common burden. ANNEX.

NOTES ON NEW ZEALAND'S WAR EFFORT AND FUTURE PARTICIPATION IN PACIFIC WAR.

As a Pacific Power New Zealand is anxious to participate in the conduct of the war against Japan to the fullest extent. Participation is, however, conditioned by limitations of man-power and other resources and a new phase is developing in New Zealand's war effort.

The emphasis has shifted, so far as we are concerned, as a result of the growing and urgent demands for foodstuffs for Allied Forces in the Pacific and for the people of Britain.

We have had to choose in recent weeks between reducing our armed forces and producing food. We were anxious to do whatever was considered most necessary by those in control of global strategy and placed our problem before them. Following upon the advice of the United Kingdom and United States Chiefs-of-Staff 11,000 men will be withdrawn from our Pacific Division between now and next October for work on farms. This step has been taken with the greatest reluctance and only because there was no alternative. It by no means provides a final solution—it merely reflects the necessity for adapting New Zealand's war effort to changing circumstances.

For more than 4½ years New Zealand has been in the forefront of Allied Nations in making her manpower available to the armed forces, like all other nations at the expense of industry. This process can be carried no further and as already stressed it must now be reversed. With a population at the outbreak of war of 1,630,000, New Zealand has contributed fighting men to fullest extent of its resources. Of the total population 804,000 were males and of those the number between 18 and 45 was 355,000. The strength of the mobilised forces throughout the war, including full-time home defence, has been as follows:—

Date.	Army.	Navy.	Air Force.	Total.
Sept. 1939 ...	1,000	1,000	1,000	3,000
End 1940 ...	37,000	3,000	9,000	49,000
Nov. 1941 ...	60,000	5,000	15,000	80,000
Sept. 1942 ...	125,000	6,000	26,000	157,000
End 1943 ...	80,000	9,000	40,000	129,000

In addition to those in full-time military service, New Zealand mobilised a part-time Home Guard of 124,000 and enrolled a further 160,000 men in the Civil Defence organisation.

The total number at present withdrawn from industry for service in the armed forces amounts to 146,000. Of these 70,000 are overseas.

The total number sent overseas since the beginning of the war has been approximately 110,000.

The use to which New Zealand's man-power has been put may be summarised briefly as follows:—

Army.

(1) Division in Europe.—A division was provided and maintained in the Mediterranean war zone for almost four years. The record of this division needs no elaboration. It took part in the desert campaign in 1940; New Zealanders fired the first shots in Greece; they were in Crete; they were the spearhead of every North African campaign—they were on the Sangro front with the Eighth Army and they have been among the troops who have shared in the recent Cassino fighting.

(2) Forces in the Pacific.—Various garrison forces were provided for Pacific islands and one of these forces was later converted into a combat division, which fought successfully on Vella Lavella, Treasury and Green Islands.

(3) Home Defence.—Home Defence Forces comprising three divisions, along with substantial coast defence, anti-aircraft, and other fixed defences, were built up (and have since been reduced). The Home Guard (now disbanded) was organised and trained, overseas training camps, depots, &c., have been maintained.

The Air Force.

(1) Empire Air Training Scheme and world-wide battlefronts.—Right from the outset partially-trained personnel have been regularly supplied to the Empire Air Training Scheme. Over 7,000 air-crew personnel have been sent to Canada and 3,500 direct from New Zealand to United Kingdom. After training in Canada, New Zealand airmen are fighting under Royal Air Force control in England, in the Middle East, and in the Far East.

(2) Pacific Air Force.—At present New Zealand operates an Air Force of 14 squadrons mainly located in the Pacific Fighting zone, and is in process of expanding to 20 combat squadrons of which 14 will be located at a time in the forward areas.

(3) Defence and Training in New Zealand.—A great deal of initial and also final air force training is given in New Zealand. Defence activities, expanded to meet the Japanese threat, have been reduced.

The Navy.

(1) Men for Royal Navy.—Trained men have been supplied regularly to the Royal Navy since the outbreak of war (except for a period in 1942 during the main period of the Japanese threat).

(2) Royal New Zealand Navy.—Patrol, minesweeping and other activities have been maintained round the coasts of New Zealand and in the Pacific war zone. 9,000 men are serving in the Royal Navy and Royal New Zealand Navy.

Food Supplies.

(1) Foodstuffs have been supplied to Great Britain for the feeding of servicemen, war workers, and the civilian population (approximately 2½ million tons of meat and dairy produce so far).

(2) Foodstuffs have been supplied for the armed forces in the Middle East War zone.

(3) Foodstuffs (including meat, dairy products, fresh vegetables, &c.) have been supplied to the American and other forces in the Pacific War zone.

(4) Foodstuffs have been supplied to the New Zealand and Allied Forces, war workers and remaining civilian population in New Zealand.

Other Supplies and Services.

(1) We have equipped New Zealand personnel in the armed forces with uniforms, boots, blankets, and much miscellaneous equipment.

(2) Eastern Group Supply Council have been supplied with munitions, garments, radio equipment, and many other types of supplies.

(3) We have fulfilled the demands of the United States Joint Purchasing Board for timber, boots, batteries, garments, &c., in large quantities.

(4) Defence Construction. We have carried through a large programme of fixed defence emplacements, camps, aerodromes, stores, air-raid shelters, hospitals, &c., both in New Zealand and in the Pacific for use of New Zealand and Allied troops and civilians.

(5) Ship repairs, ship-building and jobbing services for the American forces in the Pacific zone.

(6) The New Zealand Merchant Navy.

(7) Rail and other transport and provision of facilities for New Zealand and American Forces located in New Zealand.

Civil Defence and Miscellaneous.

(1) Civil Defence Forces, Emergency Fire Service, Traffic Police, &c. (now inactive) were organised and equipped.

(2) Auxiliary Services, including Women's War Service Auxilary, Women's Land Army, and miscellaneous organisations were built up.

New Zealand's battle casualties, after long and active representation on the battlefronts, are extremely high and with the probable exception of Russia are the highest in proportion to population of the United Nations. The most recent estimate of New Zealand casualty figures, including Cassino, is as follows:—

Killed	7,300
Missing	1,850
Prisoners of War	7,300
Wounded	13,400
Total	29,850

We have strained our man-power resources to the limit to maintain these armed forces and are now faced with being unable at a critical time to increase production of food-stuffs in order to meet the continually growing demands of the United Kingdom and the United States Forces.

85,000 single men were eligible for military service: 75,000 have gone into the forces; only 10,000 have been retained in New Zealand and the majority of these are farmers or others connected with farming production.

The total male labour force of the Dominion at the outbreak of war was 520,000. At the end of 1943 it had been reduced to 406,000. The 27 per cent. increase in the number of women in employment (both men and women in New Zealand have been subject to compulsory direction into essential work) is some small compensation.

Over a year ago the last available age-groups were called up for military service, and the classes previously postponed from service have been combed. New Zealand cannot now maintain the flow of reinforcements to the overseas forces without seriously reducing her output of primary products. The man-power requirements of the Air Force and Navy take a higher priority than those of the Army, and their combined intakes will absorb the whole of the inflow of fit men at the youngest military age.

As a result, New Zealand has for some time been faced with the alternatives either of allowing both Divisions to remain in action, and to run down in strength, or of withdrawing man-power from one Division in order to maintain the other at full strength.

With the present urgent demands for increased food production, the whole man-power situation has had to be considered afresh.

Urgent representations were received from Great Britain, requesting the largest possible increase in New Zealand's contribution of food-stuffs (particularly meat, butter and cheese), in order to prevent further cuts in the already meagre rations of these foods available to the civilian population, including the war-time industrial labour force.

Heavy reductions in supplies of these foods, and particularly of butter and cheese, have occurred in the current year from each of the principal countries of supply.

In addition to urgent requests for increased supplies to Great Britain, there have been very large-scale demands from the United States Joint Purchasing Board for food-stuffs for the Forces which are continually massing in the Pacific. The latest estimate of demands is based on 500,000 men, and the requirements for 1944 contain such items as—

	Lb.
Canned meats	187,738,000
Fresh meats, offals, small-goods	183,280,000
Bacon and ham	18,504,000
Dairy products	138,927,500
Dehydrated vegetables	28,511,000
Canned vegetables	107,086,000
Fresh vegetables	274,474,000
Sauces, fats, &c.	11,432,000

The first three items shown in this table, when grouped together and converted to tons, amount to 173,900 tons. Even on a dressed weight basis, this would be equivalent to 33·4 per cent. of the total 1943–44 meat production of the Dominion. Actually, allowing for the difference in basis of measurement, the proportion is even higher. The fourth item similarly amounts to 62,000 tons, which, if converted to a butterfat basis, would form a similar and very substantial proportion of the total dairy production of the Dominion. These new demands are too large to be met from the present or prospective capacity of the Dominion. In so far as they are met, they will tend to take the form of a diversion of supplies away from the United Kingdom, rather than an increase in production in New Zealand.

New Zealand's capacity to produce food-stuffs when compared with the size of the labour force is probably higher than that of any other country. Throughout the war production figures have been at a high level, though the cumulative effects, principally of man-power losses (20,000 farm workers having gone into the armed forces) and fertiliser difficulties have now made themselves felt. A falling tendency in production, already evident for over two years in dairy products, is tending to spread to other farm industries.

Though meat products are 10 per cent. up on 1939, wool 13 per cent. and agricultural products 35 per cent. up, butterfat production is 12 per cent. down compared with 1939. 81,000 fewer cows (which represent 5 per cent. of the pre-war total) are being milked at the present time. The return of farm workers from one or other of the Divisions was therefore essential in order to arrest and reverse the present decline in food production and to prepare for the growing demands.

The disposal of New Zealand's production of food-stuffs is clearly indicated in the following table :—

—	Production.	To Civilian Use.	To Armed Forces (including U.S.A.).	To United Kingdom.
	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.
Butter	122,500 to 127,500	21,000	11,500	90,000 to 95,000
Cheese	87,000 to 89,000	3,000	3,000	81,000 to 83,000
Processed milk	17,000	4,000	6,000	6,000
Meat	485,000	171,000	103,000	211,000

In other words we send to the United Kingdom and to the United Nations forces—particularly American—83 per cent. of our butter, 65 per cent. of our meat, 97 per cent. of our cheese and 74 per cent. of our milk. Consumption in New Zealand is, of course, fixed by rationing.

This, in brief, is the situation as has been carefully reviewed in the last three months. We were most anxious to make a decision which would fit in best with the global war effort and would, so far as lay in our power, help to bring the war to a successful conclusion at the earliest possible moment.

We made it clear to the Combined Chiefs of Staff that we were then, as at all times, prepared to accept the direction of those responsible for global strategy. The Combined Chiefs of Staff have advised us to make a temporary transfer from the 3rd (Pacific) Division to food production of the number of men required—namely, 11,000.* The 3rd Division was in any event due for withdrawal and rest in June next. Under the present plan it is proposed to retain the remainder of the forces—6,000 men—in New Caledonia as a cadre for a reorganised Pacific Division for 1945. The process of transfer of men from the Pacific to New Zealand is shortly to begin. The men will be placed on leave and they will remain under military control and will be liable for recall to active service at any time. This reorganisation is necessarily dependent upon withdrawal of the 2nd Division from Europe at a convenient date.

The reduction of 11,000 men represents only a small proportion of the total New Zealand forces serving on the world battlefronts. We will have a strong force in action on the ground, and our air force will continue to expand in the skies of Europe, in Asia and in the Pacific, and our naval forces will in no way be reduced in size or effort.

For the purposes of record the following statement has been prepared giving the background of New Zealand's war effort. This may be divided into three distinct phases.

The first phase began with the outbreak of war against Germany and lasted until the entry of Japan.

The second phase was the first year of the Japanese aggression, and the third covered the period from the stemming of the tide in the Pacific until the present. Now, with the Allied consolidation in the Pacific, New Zealand's war effort appears to be entering a fourth phase, marked chiefly by the new emphasis laid upon food production for the United Kingdom and for the United States Forces in the Pacific.

(i) The First Phase.

During this period, the major problems lay in the orderly diversion of man-power from industry to the armed forces in such a way as to avoid, on the one hand, interfering with important industries such as farming, coal mining, shipping, &c., yet, on the other hand, ensuring that the principles of universal service and equality of sacrifice were carried into effect.

Maintenance of key personnel and of important industries was instituted right from the very outset of recruiting, through the establishment of Man-power Committees and (later) Armed Forces Appeal Boards. The principle of universal service began to take full effect in 1940.

At this time the dominant factors of the war situation had been the collapse of France and the Battle of Britain. The paramount need lay in the despatch of troops overseas to save what might have been a world-wide disaster. This urgent call was felt right throughout New Zealand, and the whole spirit of the Dominion's war effort at that time reflected the strategic emergency of the British Commonwealth as a whole.

* The advice of the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff, which had the endorsement of the United States Chiefs of Staff concerning the withdrawal of men from the 3rd Division was expressed in a memorandum of the 23rd February, 1944, in the following terms :—

> "Turning to the force of two brigade groups which has been taking part in operations in the Solomon Islands: apart from the fact that operations in this theatre are of secondary importance compared with those in which the New Zealand Division in Italy is engaged, it appears to us that, with the successful conclusion of the Solomon Islands campaign, the immediate need for the maintenance of this force may have diminished. The Pacific war is one in which the availability of land forces is not likely to be a governing factor. Moreover, the transference to New Zealand of these two brigade groups would present less of a shipping problem than any large-scale withdrawal from the Mediterranean, and could be carried out in the time available. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the immediate need for man-power for the production of meat and dairy produce should be met by the temporary withdrawal of the two New Zealand brigade groups engaged in the Solomon Islands. This would enable New Zealand to tide over the period when labour demands are at their highest, namely, from August to December. We may reasonably hope that developments in the European theatre will be such as to allow of the later withdrawal of part or all of the New Zealand Division in time enough to constitute a complete Division for further operations in the Pacific in 1945. We realise the importance which the New Zealand Government attaches to New Zealand forces playing their full part in the Pacific war. We suggest, however, that there will be ample scope for the employment there of a New Zealand Division in 1945, and that in the meanwhile New Zealand can be well represented in that theatre by her Navy and Air Force."

By the end of 1940 49,000 volunteers and balloted men had been accepted by the Forces, this figure rising to 86,000 by the end of November 1941. Despite this withdrawal of manpower, the industries of the Dominion had so far succeeded in reorganising their manpower resources, through the substitution of women for men, the dilution of labour, the working of longer hours, the curtailment of non-essentials, and through an all-round increase of individual effort, that record over-all production was being achieved both in primary and secondary industries.

Year.	Primary Production.				Secondary Production.
	Wool.	Meat.	Butterfat.	Crops.	Persons engaged.	Value of Production.
	Tons.	Tons.	Tons.	Acres.		£
1939–40	138,393	535,000	185,365	432,000	108,722	129,061,826
1940–41	147,991	515,000	200,365	475,000	113,999	147,153,559
1941–42	154,330	535,000	188,720	498,000	117,214	155,566,195

The Dominion's Armed Forces consisted at that time of :—

One division in the Middle East;
A Territorial Force subject to part-time training only;
Air and Naval Training establishments;
A voluntary Home Guard and other auxiliary organisations.

The outlook appeared to be fairly stable, and the tasks ahead, on the man-power front, appeared to lie mainly in the orderly and progressive redistribution of man-power, and the fuller mobilisation of woman-power and other unused labour reserves, so that essential production could be fully maintained or increased in spite of the continued steady withdrawal of men to the Forces.

(ii) The Second Phase.

The sudden entry of Japan into the war broke up the whole of this background.

The rapid progress southward of a formidable enemy threw a sudden emphasis on the organisation of the Dominion for defence against air raid and invasion. Compulsory universal service was introduced into the Emergency Reserve Corps and the Home Guard, women and unfit men entered the ranks of the Army and Territorial Force was mobilised on a full-time basis, and a rapid succession of ballots was held with the object of building up the Home Defence Forces to a level corresponding with the nature of the emergency.

Though all further supplies of man-power to the overseas forces were completely suspended for more than a year, this full-scale mobilisation for defence inevitably resulted in a very substantial withdrawal of man-power from industry. While married men were being drafted into camp in large numbers, single men previously held back from service were being released to the Forces. The importance of the national safety rose paramount above all other considerations, though even during this period a substantial number of fit men, such as coal-miners, locomotive drivers, defence construction workers, &c., as well as indispensable farm workers, had to be retained in their normal employments in order to maintain the industrial life of the community.

It was at this time that the system of industrial man-power control was thrown into operation, with important results in stabilising the labour position and ensuring a supply of workers to the highest priority work.

In order to safeguard the farming industries, an important step was also taken during mid-1942 to release substantial numbers of farm workers from camp, and approximately 8,000 men returned to the land.

Even after allowing for these releases, however, the numbers withdrawn from industry rose between November 1941 and September 1942 from 86,000 to 170,000, i.e., to a figure of 10 per cent. of the population, or 29 per cent. of the males aged 15 to 64. At the same time more than 100,000 men were serving with the Home Guard, and an even greater number with the Emergency Precautions Services.

(iii) The Third Phase.

The transition from the period of emergency to the period of consolidation and readjustment came more gradually, and was more difficult to perceive and to recognise clearly when it came. Though the Japanese had been stemmed at Guadalcanal, there were still risks of naval disaster, and precautions continued to be necessary for some time after the southward drive of the invader had been checked.

During this period of strategic readjustment, a number of fundamental changes began to affect the industrial position of the Dominion.

Allied Forces, now massing in the Pacific, required food, timber, flax, ship-repair services and other supplies and services most readily obtainable from New Zealand, and men began to be taken out of the Home Defence Forces to assist in meeting these requirements. The seasonal upswing of the 1942–43 season in the Dominion's butter and cheese factories and freezing works had to be met by further drawing on the Army.

As the pressure of industrial factors increased, the needs of the strategic situation decreased, and by the end of 1942 it had become apparent that substantial reductions could be made in the Home Defence Forces.

A step had been taken during the period of crisis in the Pacific which contributed vitally to the success of the Allied Forces in Guadalcanal. This was the despatch of a substantial force into the South Pacific Area. This force was later located in New Caledonia and became the Pacific Division. Its provision by New Zealand may well have been a factor in turning the balance and hence enabled large-scale reductions to be made in the Home Defence Forces.

The implications of the new situation were diverse and complicated. The Middle East Division had been without reinforcements for more than a year, and needed men. The Air Force required men for the purposes of maintaining the Empire Air Training Scheme and for establishing a New Zealand Air Force in the Pacific (this being regarded as one of the best contributions to victory of which the Dominion was capable). The resources of the Royal Navy were stretched to the limit and a resumption of the flow of recruits from New Zealand was urgently requested. Each of the principal groups within the Dominion (including farming, saw-milling, construction, railways and many of the manufacturing industries) similarly pressed for a return of men from the forces, and it was clear that large numbers of men should be returned.

A man-by-man survey of the Home Defence Forces was made, and steps were taken to secure the return of men with those types of special skill for which there was an acute need in industry. Virtually all the tool-makers, pattern-makers, saw-doctors, bushmen, shoeing smiths, and many other special types, were quickly released. Within a period of six months the target of 14,000 releases of industry had been achieved.

The fourth or present phase in New Zealand's war effort has already been dealt with in the opening section of these notes. The demands for foodstuffs are reaching such extraordinary levels that they can be met only by further reallocation of men from the armed forces into food production. This process must inevitably continue but at the same time New Zealand intends to participate to the fullest possible extent in military operations in the Pacific.

In addition to our Air Force of 20 squadrons and the New Zealand naval force at present operating in the Pacific, we hope, subject to the European situation permitting the return of our forces from Europe, to reorganise our land forces into a new division for active service against the Japanese.

My telegram No. 176.

Expulsion of German espionage and sabotage agents from Metropolitan Spain and Spanish controlled territories.

I personally presented Spanish High Commissioner with a note this morning containing lists of German agents whom we required to be expelled from Tangier and Spanish Zone and Presidios (latter being part of Metropolitan Spain).

2. General Orgaz promised that all persons in Tangier whose names appeared in the lists would be expelled at the same time as personnel of German Consulate-General (latter to begin to be repatriated within a fortnight from to-day) except for one individual Mathias Goeritz. I said that Mathias Goeritz would I presumed in any case be expelled in conformity with the "spirit" of the agreement i.e. that all Germans who had arrived at Tangier subsequent to June 1940 would be expelled. Orgaz said that he was consulting Ministry of Foreign Affairs on this question of principle.

3. As regards lists of other agents and saboteurs in various parts of Spanish Zone and Ceuta and Melilla, dossiers of men and their activities would be examined by competent local authorities immediately.

4. Might I suggest that Ministry of Foreign Affairs should be kept up to the spirit of the agreement where by all Germans who entered Tangier since June 1940 should be expelled otherwise we shall have numerous Germans left here after German Consulate-General has been closed and its personnel repatriated.

Leading article in La Prensa of 14th May drew attention to Lord Beaverbrook's recent statement in the House of Lords that Britain has no aircraft for a South American service. Article says this is very regrettable and hard to understand since surely after the war Britain will possess bombers capable of conversion to civilian use pending development of specially constructed commercial types. Article concludes "such a solution would be received with pleasure in our country".

Washington telegram No. 589 of 1943.

At the close of Foreign Affairs debate this afternoon, M. Gazier (C.G.T.) moved that French Committee of National Liberation should henceforth be known as Provisional Government of the French Republic. The motion was carried unanimously and with acclamation.

2. President of the Assembly then called upon General de Gaulle to speak as Head of the Provisional Government of France.

3. Although he made no specific reference to the motion de Gaulle appeared to accept it. During the course of his speech he read out, while the whole House stood, two telegrams received from General Juin reporting the latest successes of French troops in Italy.

I agree the French are being foolish about restrictions on travel and communications. They all take their note from General de Gaulle who is abnormally sensitive on the subject of French Sovereignty.

2. It would be useless to send M. Paris here to explain matters unless he has a far more dynamic personality than I remember. He would probably be sent back with instructions to M. Vienot to be less accommodating.

3. On the other hand I think most important Vienot's suggestion, that de Gaulle should be consulted or at least informed before General Eisenhower makes any declaration to the French people. There are two ways in which this could best be done. General Eisenhower might be willing to send out here a representative who would be in full possession of his views and who could confer with de Gaulle on his own level. Such a representative might be accompanied by a staff, who could conclude here negotiations that General Koenig has been carrying out, if they have not already been concluded.

4. Other way would be for de Gaulle to go to London.

Your telegram No. 4258.

Secret.

Proposals contained in your telegram under reference have been submitted to the State Department who have promised a very early reply.

2. Prior to receipt of your telegram I was informed by the State Department that they had yesterday instructed the United States Ambassador at Lisbon to reply to Dr. Salazar's offer to limit wolfram exports to Germany to 900 tons, to the effect that the United States Government are not interested in anything short of a total embargo, that they consider that declaration of such an embargo, affecting both sides, would be fully consistent with Portuguese neutrality and sovereignty and that only in this way can Portugal preserve the goodwill of the American people generally.

3. These instructions to the United States Ambassador do not seem altogether in keeping with the State Department's acquiescence (as reported in my telegram 2478) in leaving us to play the hand for the moment. Apparently however since Salazar had communicated his offer to the United States Ambassador, the State Department felt that some reply from them was called for. They consider that their reply will make Salazar more ready to accept the compromise proposals if it is decided to go forward with these and that in any case, liaison between the two Embassies in Lisbon is so close that there is no danger of getting wires crossed. Thus, if His Majesty's Ambassador considers the instructions to the United States Ambassador as set out in paragraph 2 above may in any way interfere with the presentation of new proposals, he may perhaps be able to postpone former being acted upon until the State Department's reactions to the latter are known.

MR. CHURCHILL: My Lords and Gentlemen, Prime Ministers of the Dominions, we have this morning concluded the formal and official parts of our labours to which we have devoted the last fortnight and I take this opportunity of expressing on behalf of His Majesty's Government in this country the very deep sense of pleasure which this visit from all parts of our Empire and Commonwealth has given to those who have the honour to be the hosts on this occasion. We have found comfort in hours of stress and anxiety. In days when great military operations are proceeding with vigour, and at last not uncheered by hopes of success, we have found pleasure in meeting men whose companionship is a comfort, whose comradeship is strong as a rock. We have got to know each other in some cases much better than we did. For my part I have known Mr. Mackenzie King and F.M. Smuts for about 40 years. I was delighted to meet the representatives who have come to us from Australia and New Zealand, and particularly to meet for the first time Mr. Curtin. My confidence in the future is enormously strengthened by all that has passed round this council board and I am sure that this meeting will in future years be looked back to as one of the important milestones in the history of our united association. We do not know how far we have to go; we do not know how long victory will be denied or what tribulations we shall have to ask our people to endure, but we are absolutely sure that they will not be found unequal to the tests and the trials, however long, however heavy, and that after these are over, we shall preserve in union, in association, that poise and calm for which we like to feel we have been honoured in the world and take at least as large a part in leading mankind out of the miseries into which they have fallen as we took in bearing the brunt of the struggle which broke upon us some five years ago.

His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom trust indeed that their guests may have safe journeys home across the war-scourged seas and with the hazards of the air. We are most grateful to them for the exertions they have made in coming. We hope they will carry back to their countries a good tale of what they found here and tell them that we will all go along together in the fullest war effort till peace and justice have been established on unshakeable foundations.

MR. MACKENZIE KING: Prime Minister, My Lords and Gentlemen, I cannot reciprocate too warmly the sentiments which you have so feelingly and eloquently expressed. I can say with deep confidence that all who are present deeply appreciate the invitations which His Majesty's Government in Great Britain extended to us to meet in London at this time and we all feel that the meeting in this Council Chamber on this momentous occasion has meant much not only to us personally, but will mean a great deal to the Governments which we represent. There has been but one opinion as to the importance of the meetings which we are now concluding; there can be but one opinion. They have been most helpful and useful to all who have participated in the proceedings. Particularly do I value the opportunity they have provided for the discussion of common problems with the other Prime Ministers of the British Commonwealth, with the representatives of India and Southern Rhodesia and with members of the United Kingdom War Cabinet and Government.

I shall never be able adequately to express, Prime Minister, what your own contribution as Chairman and in our deliberations has meant to us. Time and again we have been moved and inspired by your memorable utterances. We shall return to our respective countries more impressed than ever with the magnitude and complexity of the problems which confront the world today, but also with our hopes heightened and with a profound appreciation of the courage and resolution with which they are being faced.

London at this moment in history has been the right and proper place for our discussions. We have all been deeply impressed and affected by the spirit of this country. Since that very different spring four years ago, the will and spirit of the people of Britain have been a source of inspiration to all the peoples of the Commonwealth. At no time was this truer than at the present. I came here fully aware of our oneness of purpose. I was certain there was full agreement on essentials. I know that our soldiers, sailors and airmen have been taken into your hearts and homes and that the High Command under which they serve is worthy of the trust we place in them. During these short weeks, I have been strengthened in that knowledge. I shall be able to tell the people of Canada, at this crest of our collective effort, that the fighting forces are being given full and hearty support and that all is being done well. The singleness of purpose with which the task is being accomplished and with which tasks ahead are being undertaken adds to the assurance of final victory and a constructive peace.

The declaration we sign this morning is a clear and firm indication of what the British Commonwealth means to its members and to the world. The statement will be enthusiastically welcomed in all parts of Canada. Thanks to the swift and smooth machinery of consultation which has steadily improved under the stimulus of the conditions of war, we came to these meetings knowing much of each other's problems and points of view. But I should like to say how much it has meant to hear those problems and points of view explained and interpreted by those who themselves are responsible to their own Parliaments for the conduct of their countries' business.

Since the beginning of the war we have welcomed to Ottawa many visitors from the other nations of the Commonwealth. The Government and people of Canada are looking forward with much pleasure to a visit from Mr. Curtin, the Prime Minister of Australia. It will provide an opportunity to pay tribute to him and to the achievements of his countrymen in this present war. We are eager also to welcome again Mr. Fraser, the Prime Minister of New Zealand, who is happily no stranger to Canada. It is many years since Field Marshal Smuts, the Prime Minister of South Africa, has been to Canada. I speak for all the people of our country when I urge him to visit us again. You, Mr. Churchill, need no assurance of the welcome which will always await you on Canadian soil.

Prime Minister, I cannot depart without expressing my appreciation and that of those who have accompanied me for the cordial and generous hospitality which the United Kingdom Government has extended to us. If I may say so, the arrangements for our meetings have been admirable and businesslike. We have had a good many sessions covering a good deal of ground in a very brief time. That this has been possible is, I am sure, largely due to the efforts of the joint Secretariat provided by the War Cabinet and the Dominions Offices. I should like to convey to them our warmest thanks.

May I add again, no words of mine can express what we all feel of the many courtesies that have been extended to us, and above all, how exceptional has been the opportunity of gaining a wider vision and a clearer and closer understanding in respect of the problems which we have in common. I go away very much pleased indeed with the proceedings of this gathering.

MR. CURTIN: Mr. Prime Minister, My Lords and Gentlemen, it is not very easy for me to say all that is in my heart. The people and the Government of Australia were most anxious that this consultation should take place. They desired it because they felt that the time had come when this council should review the war in the state which it has now reached, so that the heads of Governments could be informed more clearly as to the probable course that it might take and the problems that have to be overcome in order to mount to the summit the strength which has gradually been gathered from all parts of the British Commonwealth and Empire and also the resources and efforts of our Allies. I can only say that we are deeply indebted to you and to your colleagues for the attention you have given, not only to the war itself, but also to those multitudinous difficulties for the Commonwealth which the war has caused. During these council meetings you have given to us the amplitude of your great mind and heart and I know nobody anywhere who could have steered us through these deliberations more graciously, more inspiringly, or more successfully. I count myself, if I may offer a personal word, happy to have taken part in these discussions. I came, not only from a sense of duty, but also with a deep desire to be associated in a humble way with deliberations which I knew would reach conclusions of historic significance, not only to the Commonwealth and Empire, but, I do believe, to the world at large. The declaration which we have agreed upon and which is to be issued indicates broadly the essential unity which marks this Commonwealth and Empire and it expresses to other nations its deep purpose, that is, to be with them with all that we have until the war is over and also our determination to do all we can in the years to come to make the world a safer and a better place. I believe that the episode through which we are passing - I call it an episode, though it is markedly an occasion when aggressors have been able to wage war upon peace-loving peoples - it is an episode which has heartened the evolution of our association, has strengthened it and, as it were, has given much acceleration and greater speed to our complete fraternisation as peoples offering homage to The King and to that association over which he rules as marking the greatest confraternity of governmental relations the world has yet witnessed. Our association is one of kinship, one of common ideals and common purposes, and we say to the world at large that we ourselves feel that a world organisation for peace, for ensuring peace, and for the prevention of war, is an association into which we will enter and to which we will give all those qualities which we have and which we believe have enabled us to play a very, very significant part in the life of the world as a whole. I give you the pledge of my country and I am sure any other Government of the Commonwealth would give you the same pledge of inflexible determination to be with you until the victory is won. That determination shall have imported into it every quality which marks the people of the Commonwealth, those qualities of high endeavour, of endurance, of fortitude and, may I say, of fighting capability which the sons and daughters of our race in the Antipodes have displayed and which I think has been recognised as one of its greatest gifts. I have great pride in the people of Australia. They have great pride in the British Commonwealth and we say too that this occasion when we have gathered here in the midst of this terrible war in order the more solidly to wage the struggle will be regarded by them as one of the great contributions to the earlier termination of the struggle.

I should like to express our thanks for the great aid your officers have given to us and for the arrangements which have been made for our comfort and for our travel and to say we will go back to our respective countries, as I know I shall in Australia, with an even clearer insight into the heroic gallantry and the unflagging endeavour which have enabled this bastion of the freedom of the world to reach its present state when it can look forward to peace with confidence.

MR. FRASER: Prime Minister, my Lords and Gentlemen, this meeting of Prime Ministers has been of great value and I am sure has inspired and strengthened all of us. I am most deeply gratified with the spirit of mutual understanding and co-operation which has throughout pervaded the discussions, as it does the relationship amongst the respective members of the Commonwealth and Empire. It is this spirit more than any other factor, from which our great Empire and Commonwealth derives its strength and upon its continuance rest our high hopes of the future.

As a result of these completely frank exchanges, each of us has an understanding of the point of view and feelings of the other units of the Commonwealth and has been given glimpses of the way our respective governments are likely to consider proposals to meet changing circumstances. This will be invaluable as in our own countries we have from day to day to make decisions on the important questions which continually arise.

It has been a great benefit to me, as I am sure it has been to all of us, to have attended this historic meeting held at this critical period of the war in Europe - at a time which vitally affects the destinies of our own Commonwealth of British nations and is fraught with momentous consequences for the peoples of the world.

We have had an opportunity at this conference to review the strategy of the war, to learn of the plans upon which it is being conducted. We have exchanged views on the world organisation which we trust and pray will be devised to maintain future peace.

Most immediate and overwhelming in importance has been our agreement on the policy of concentrating on the defeat of Germany and Japan and their satellites and upon the building of an international organisation and a world order which will make possible ordered political and economic development and better standards of social welfare, full employment, and good and assured standards of living and culture for all.

We have not been concerned so much with constitutional machinery as with specific purposes to be achieved. Our aim has been to determine in this critical and tragic time in the history of mankind which are the matters upon which it is essential we should stand united in co-operation and then to consider the methods by which we can best achieve these purposes.

I would like to take this opportunity of expressing my very deep appreciation of the manner in which you, Mr. Churchill, have presided over our conference. We have derived the greatest benefit from your inspired leadership, as we have throughout the war, and from your great wisdom as well as from your outstanding courage.

I would like to thank also the Prime Minister's colleagues and the Ministers who have assisted us for the statements they have so ably presented to us. We are also grateful to the efficiency of the secretariat which has contributed so much in time and effort towards the smooth running of these meetings. They have worked long hours and the preparations they have made and the drafts which have been presented have contributed greatly to the success of our meetings.

In conclusion, Mr. Prime Minister, I would only say that, sure of our aims, we have demonstrated, not only the desirability, but the absolute necessity, in the interests of the world as a whole, as well as of the peoples of the British Commonwealth and Empire, of maintaining and strengthening the Commonwealth, not merely as an organisation, but as a mighty instrument for achieving great purposes in the highest interests of mankind.

Strengthened and inspired as I have been with the clear ringing reaffirmation by the conference of the faith expressed in our various declarations since the outbreak of war and particularly in the Atlantic Charter, I repeat and renew solemnly, but with great pride, the pledge given by our late Prime Minister, Mr. Savage, in 1939 - "Where Britain goes, we go; where she stands, we stand".

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS: Mr. Prime Minister, My. Lords and Gentlemen, I wish to express my pleasure and my deep agreement with what has been said by you, Prime Minister, and my other colleagues. This is the end of a very remarkable Conference. I have attended many of the Imperial Conferences of the past, but thinking back to-day over those Conferences I cannot think of one which has had a character like the present. This has not only been an Imperial Conference, but it has achieved a success that is amazing under war conditions. There have been a spirit and an atmosphere at this Conference unlike any that I have experienced in previous Conferences. In a large sense, Prime Minister, that is due to your leadership of this Conference, which has had the same high quality that your leadership has had in your conduct of the affairs of the world in the times through which we are passing. The difference is also due to the importance of the subjects that we have discussed; at no previous Conference that I can remember has there ever been such a range of far-reaching fundamental problems, touching not only this group of ours but the whole world, as at this Conference. We have discussed questions of war; we have discussed questions of international affairs; we have discussed the matters that go to the root of our own society and of all the nations, and it has all been done in an atmosphere, in a spirit of comradeship, friendship and understanding such as I have never experienced before. I go back to my country from this Conference with a renewed feeling of strength, courage and good cheer to meet the heavy tasks that lie ahead. At no Conference has it been more necessary than at this one for us to have personal contact. We have been discussing, we have been writing, we have been corresponding with each other for these four years on problems that have engaged our attention, but it has always been at a distance and never with that personal contact which now, for the first time, we have been able to realise in the war. That personal contact, meeting face to face, has been the greatest value. I am sure we have all been strengthened in our resolve, our minds have been clarified and we have derived a benefit and an advantage from this Conference such as could never have been achieved by long and intricate correspondence. We have discussed our own affairs, we have discussed the affairs of the world; but we have discussed our own affairs in no sense of self-interest; we have always had in view the fact that we are working not only now and here but in a much greater world chain; we are many partners, great and small, and we realise that no success can be achieved, no objects can be realised, unless there is unity, unless the advantage and the welfare of all are kept in view, and in all the discussions we have had we have always been imbued with that spirit, the spirit which looks to the wider human welfare and not to the individual advantage of our own particular group.

We go back to our countries from this Conference with the message that we have signed this morning, a message of good cheer, a message which I hope will put all our peoples in good heart. They have carried heavy burdens, they have carried intolerable burdens, and this message coming to them from this Conference, after nearly five years of war, will help them in the final phase, the climax of this war which we all hope will be the end. Our message will mean to them an expression of the hope, the faith, the confidence, the strength that there is in this group of ours and in the hearts of our Governments.

I thank you for your great service to this Conference, for the leadership you have given, for the help you have been to us. I thank all your colleagues, all our British colleagues, who have been more than helpful, because coming from afar we have had to deal not only with the large problems of war and peace, but in many cases with the problems of our own countries. The United Kingdom Government, the Members of His Majesty's Government in this country, have been most helpful to us in these domestic questions which we have had to discuss with them outside this Conference.

I wish to thank very sincerely also the officials for the work they have been doing for us. By this Conference we have added very largely to their heavy burdens, but they have helped us and they have made their contribution to an achievement which I think will stand out as one of the great successes of this war. This Conference has raised many great problems, but what has been achieved is a victory of great promise, as it opens the prospect of wise counsels and wise decisions and great settlements for our world.

SIR FIROZ KHAN NOON: Mr. Prime Minister, My Lords and Gentlemen, it has been a source of real pleasure for us, the Maharaja and myself, to come here and sit round this table with the Prime Ministers and discuss Empire problems, and we sincerely hope that there will be similar opportunities in the future for consideration of matters of mutual interest. We have many chances of coming to England and making contact with His Majesty's Government, but we feel that for the development of friendly relations and a powerful Commonwealth it is very necessary that we should make contacts with the representatives of the Dominions also, and it is from that point of view that we consider this meeting is of special value. This meeting has also shown to us that in the wider policy of the Commonwealth there are no differences at all between the Dominions and ourselves, or His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and ourselves, and it is on that ground that we can look forward with hope and patience to the growing spirit of this political association.

I should, however, like to mention one thing, that this is all due to one great factor, and that is the characteristics of the British people. I was here in 1940 and I know the troublous times through which we passed in those days, and I for one was enormously impressed by the determination and bravery and sense of duty to freedom displayed by all the men and women of this country; and may I be permitted to say that that determination is typified in the leadership that you, Mr. Prime Minister, have provided personally for this Commonwealth of Nations. It is the clear-headedness of the leader and his policy which enables the various component parts to stay together, and you personally have, through your leadership, taken the Empire and the Commonwealth from strength to strength, and we are confident for the future not only of this country but of the whole Commonwealth and of the Empire, and I need hardly say how carefully the peoples of India have watched the proceedings of this Conference, and how grateful they must all be that their representatives along with the Prime Ministers from the Dominions have deliberated jointly and come to conclusions which are acceptable to all.

SIR GODFREY HUGGINS: Mr. Prime Minister, I would like to say that I rejoice in the spirit of unity displayed at this Conference, and if there is no relapse, when fear departs, this Commonwealth and Empire, which with courage, enterprise and self-discipline has saved the world from barbarians, will remain in the lead and help return this sorely-stricken world to days of peace. The United Kingdom with her associates under the Crown has characteristics which will be required after the war; their love of freedom, their ability to compromise, to give and take, and to play the game. They need have no fear for the future if under Divine Will selfishness is kept in check and goodwill and unity under the Crown are maintained. We saved the world in war, and if we maintain this unity in peace we can preserve the world for the service of humanity and make it worthy of inheritance.

IMMEDIATE.

Your telegram Nos. 309 and 310 [of May 3rd: protection of Vatican lorries].

The matter has been most carefully considered and although no guarantee of immunity can be given, allied military authorities are prepared to afford every reasonable protection consistent with military necessity, subject to the following conditions being observed:-

(a) Convoys not to exceed 30 lorries and to be clearly marked as in (d) below and to be kept absolutely clear of enemy traffic.
(b) Not more than one convoy to be permitted per week unless Vatican show good reason for exceeding this number.
(c) Prior notice, as specified below, to be given to A.F.H.Q. of the number of lorries in each convoy.
(d) Lorries to bear distinctive markings which must be notified to A.F.H.Q.
(e) A time-table to be drawn up in advance and strictly adhered to.
(f) the route to be notified and strictly followed.

2. Notice of numbers, markings, time-tables and route required under paragraph 1 above should reach A.F.H.Q., if possible, one week prior to movement of any convoy but you should make it clear to Vatican that any less notice than this makes it uncertain that pilots can be properly briefed. All necessary particulars should be telegraphed to me MOST IMMEDIATE.

3. You should make it clear to Vatican that any attempt by the German authorities to take advantage of the special treatment which we are prepared to afford to Vatican convoys, e.g. by sending military transport along the same route at the same time will clearly jeopardise safety of Vatican lorries. We must leave it to Vatican to represent this to Germans.

4. You may express regret to Vatican for incidents which have occurred in past, while making it plain that these are chiefly owing to short notice given of movements. From a purely legal point of view, however, as you are aware, we are under no obligation to respect neutral lorries sent into belligerent territory in time of war and technical difficulties imposed on pilots of recognising special markings while flying at great speed are considerable. We are nevertheless prepared to afford protection to Vatican lorries within limits and on conditions described above in order that Vatican may carry out its charitable activities on behalf of population of Rome despite the fact that Germans are responsible for feeding of population and have utterly failed to discharge this responsibility.

TEXT OF SPEECHES MADE AT THE CLOSING MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS,
16TH MAY, 1944

MR. CHURCHILL: My Lords and Gentlemen, Prime Ministers of the Dominions, we have this morning concluded the formal and official parts of our labours to which we have devoted the last fortnight and I take this opportunity of expressing on behalf of His Majesty's Government in this country the very deep sense of pleasure which this visit from all parts of our Empire and Commonwealth has given to those who have the honour to be the hosts on this occasion. We have found comfort in hours of stress and anxiety. In days when great military operations are proceeding with vigour, and at last not uncheered by hopes of success, we have found pleasure in meeting men whose companionship is a comfort, whose comradeship is strong as a rock. We have got to know each other in some cases much better than we did. For my part I have known Mr. Mackenzie King and F.M. Smuts for about 40 years. I was delighted to meet the representatives who have come to us from Australia and New Zealand, and particularly to meet for the first time Mr. Curtin. My confidence in the future is enormously strengthened by all that has passed round this council board and I am sure that this meeting will in future years be looked back to as one of the important milestones in the history of our united association. We do not know how far we have to go; we do not know how long victory will be denied or what tribulations we shall have to ask our people to endure, but we are absolutely sure that they will not be found unequal to the tests and the trials, however long, however heavy, and that after these are over, we shall preserve in union, in association, that poise and calm for which we like to feel we have been honoured in the world and take at least as large a part in leading mankind out of the miseries into which they have fallen as we took in bearing the brunt of the struggle which broke upon us some five years ago.

His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom trust indeed that their guests may have safe journeys home across the war-scourged seas and with the hazards of the air. We are most grateful to them for the exertions they have made in coming. We hope they will carry back to their countries a good tale of what they found here and tell them that we will all go along together in the fullest war effort till peace and justice have been established on unshakeable foundations.

MR. MACKENZIE KING: Prime Minister, My Lords and Gentlemen, I cannot reciprocate too warmly the sentiments which you have so feelingly and eloquently expressed. I can say with deep confidence that all who are present deeply appreciate the invitations which His Majesty's Government in Great Britain extended to us to meet in London at this time and we all feel that the meeting in this Council Chamber on this momentous occasion has meant much not only to us personally, but will mean a great deal to the Governments which we represent. There has been but one opinion as to the importance of the meetings which we are now concluding; there can be but one opinion. They have been most helpful and useful to all who have participated in the proceedings. Particularly do I value the opportunity they have provided for the discussion of common problems with the other Prime Ministers of the British Commonwealth, with the representatives of India and Southern Rhodesia and with members of the United Kingdom War Cabinet and Government.

I shall never be able adequately to express, Prime Minister, what your own contribution as Chairman and in our deliberations has meant to us. Time and again we have been moved and inspired by your memorable utterances. We shall return to our respective countries more impressed than ever with the magnitude and complexity of the problems which confront the world today, but also with our hopes heightened and with a profound appreciation of the courage and resolution with which they are being faced.

London at this moment in history has been the right and proper place for our discussions. We have all been deeply impressed and affected by the spirit of this country. Since that very different spring four years ago, the will and spirit of the people of Britain have been a source of inspiration to all the peoples of the Commonwealth. At no time was this truer than at the present. I came here fully aware of our oneness of purpose. I was certain there was full agreement on essentials. I know that our soldiers, sailors and airmen have been taken into your hearts and homes and that the High Command under which they serve is worthy of the trust we place in them. During these short weeks, I have been strengthened in that knowledge. I shall be able to tell the people of Canada, at this crest of our collective effort, that the fighting forces are being given full and hearty support and that all is being done well. The singleness of purpose with which the task is being accomplished and with which tasks ahead are being undertaken adds to the assurance of final victory and a constructive peace.

The declaration we sign this morning is a clear and firm indication of what the British Commonwealth means to its members and to the world. The statement will be enthusiastically welcomed in all parts of Canada. Thanks to the swift and smooth machinery of consultation which has steadily improved under the stimulus of the conditions of war, we came to these meetings knowing much of each other's problems and points of view. But I should like to say how much it has meant to hear those problems and points of view explained and interpreted by those who themselves are responsible to their own Parliaments for the conduct of their countries' business.

Since the beginning of the war we have welcomed to Ottawa many visitors from the other nations of the Commonwealth. The Government and people of Canada are looking forward with much pleasure to a visit from Mr. Curtin, the Prime Minister of Australia. It will provide an opportunity to pay tribute to him and to the achievements of his countrymen in this present war. We are eager also to welcome again Mr. Fraser, the Prime Minister of New Zealand, who is happily no stranger to Canada. It is many years since Field Marshal Smuts, the Prime Minister of South Africa, has been to Canada. I speak for all the people of our country when I urge him to visit us again. You, Mr. Churchill, need no assurance of the welcome which will always await you on Canadian soil.

Prime Minister, I cannot depart without expressing my appreciation and that of those who have accompanied me for the cordial and generous hospitality which the United Kingdom Government has extended to us. If I may say so, the arrangements for our meetings have been admirable and businesslike. We have had a good many sessions covering a good deal of ground in a very brief time. That this has been possible is, I am sure, largely due to the efforts of the joint Secretariat provided by the War Cabinet and the Dominions Offices. I should like to convey to them our warmest thanks.

May I add again, no words of mine can express what we all feel of the many courtesies that have been extended to us, and above all, how exceptional has been the opportunity of gaining a wider vision and a clearer and closer understanding in respect of the problems which we have in common. I go away very much pleased indeed with the proceedings of this gathering.

MR.. CURTIN: Mr. Prime Minister, My Lords and Gentlemen, it is not very easy for me to say all that is in my heart. The people and the Government of Australia were most anxious that this consultation should take place. They desired it because they felt that the time had come when this council should review the war in the state which it has now reached, so that the heads of Governments could be informed more clearly as to the probable course that it might take and the problems that have to be overcome in order to mount to the summit the strength which has gradually been gathered from all parts of the British Commonwealth and Empire and also the resources and efforts of our Allies. I can only say that we are deeply indebted to you and to your colleagues for the attention you have given, not only to the war itself, but also to those multitudinous difficulties for the Commonwealth which the war has caused. During these council meetings you have given to us the amplitude of your great mind and heart and I know nobody anywhere who could have steered us through these deliberation more graciously, more inspiringly, or more successfully. I count myself, if I may offer a personal word, happy to have taken part in these discussions. I came, not only from a sense of duty, but also with a deep desire to be associated in a humble way with deliberations which I knew would reach conclusions of historic significance, not only to the Commonwealth and Empire, but, I do believe, to the world at large. The declaration which we have agreed upon and which is to be issued indicates broadly the essential unity which marks this Commonwealth and Empire and it expresses to other nations its deep purpose, that is, to be with them with all that we have until the war is over and also our determination to do all we can in the years to come to make the world a safer and a better place. I believe that the episode through which we are passing - I call it an episode, though it is markedly an occasion when aggressors have been able to wage war upon peace-loving peoples - it is an episode which has heartened the evolution of our association, has strengthened it and, as it were, has given much acceleration and greater speed to our complete fraternisation as peoples offering homage to The King and to that association over which he rules as marking the greatest confraternity of governmental relations the world has yet witnessed. Our association is one of kinship, one of common ideals and common purposes, and we say to the world at large that we ourselves feel that a world organisation for peace, for ensuring peace, and for the prevention of war, is an association into which we will enter and to which we will give all those qualities which we have and which we believe have enabled us to play a very, very significant part in the life of the world as a whole. I give you the pledge of my country and I am sure any other Government of the Commonwealth would give you the same pledge of inflexible determination to be with you until the victory is won. That determination shall have imported into it every quality which marks the people of the Commonwealth, those qualities of high endeavour, of endurance, of fortitude and, may I say, of fighting capability which the sons and daughters of our race in the Antipodes have displayed and which I think has been recognised as one of its greatest gifts. I have great pride in the people of Australia. They have great pride in the British Commonwealth and we say too that this occasion when we have gathered here in the midst of this terrible war in order the more solidly to wage the struggle will be regarded by them as one of the great contributions to the earlier termination of the struggle.

MR. FRASER: Prime Minister, my Lords and Gentlemen, this meeting of Prime Ministers has been of great value and I am sure has inspired and strengthened all of us. I am most deeply gratified with the spirit of mutual understanding and co-operation which has throughout pervaded the discussions, as it does the relationship amongst the respective members of the Commonwealth and Empire. It is this spirit more than any other factor, from which our great Empire and Commonwealth derives its strength and upon its continuance rest our high hopes of the future.

As a result of these completely frank exchanges, each of us has an understanding of the point of view and feelings of the other units of the Commonwealth and has been given glimpses of the way our respective governments are likely to consider proposals to meet changing circumstances. This will be invaluable as in our own countries we have from day to day to make decisions on the important questions which continually arise.

It has been a great benefit to me, as I am sure it has been to all of us, to have attended this historic meeting held at this critical period of the war in Europe - at a time which vitally affects the destinies of our own Commonwealth of British nations and is fraught with momentous consequences for the peoples of the world.

We have had an opportunity at this conference to review the strategy of the war, to learn of the plans upon which it is being conducted. We have exchanged views on the world organisation which we trust and pray will be devised to maintain future peace.

Most immediate and overwhelming in importance has been our agreement on the policy of concentrating on the defeat of Germany and Japan and their satellites and upon the building of an international organisation and a world order which will make possible ordered political and economic development and better standards of social welfare, full employment, and good and assured standards of living and culture for all.

We have not been concerned so much with constitutional machinery as with specific purposes to be achieved. Our aim has been to determine in this critical and tragic time in the history of mankind which are the matters upon which it is essential we should stand united in co-operation and then to consider the methods by which we can best achieve these purposes.

I would like to take this opportunity of expressing my very deep appreciation of the manner in which you, Mr. Churchill, have presided over our conference. We have derived the greatest benefit from your inspired leadership, as we have throughout the war, and from your great wisdom as well as from your outstanding courage.

I would like to thank also the Prime Minister's colleagues and the Ministers who have assisted us for the statements they have so ably presented to us. We are also grateful to the efficiency of the secretariat which has contributed so much in time and effort towards the smooth running of these meetings. They have worked long hours and the preparations they have made and the drafts which have been presented have contributed greatly to the success of our meetings.

In conclusion, Mr. Prime Minister, I would only say that, sure of our aims, we have demonstrated, not only the desirability, but the absolute necessity, in the interests of the world as a whole, as well as of the peoples of the British Commonwealth and Empire, of maintaining and strengthening the Commonwealth, not merely as an organisation, but as a mighty instrument for achieving great purposes in the highest interests of mankind.

Strengthened and inspired as I have been with the clear ringing reaffirmation by the conference of the faith expressed in our various declarations since the outbreak of war and particularly in the Atlantic Charter, I repeat and renew solemnly, but with great pride, the pledge given by our late Prime Minister, Mr. Savage, in 1939 - "Where Britain goes, we go; where she stands, we stand".

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS: Mr. Prime Minister, My. Lords and Gentlemen, I wish to express my pleasure and my deep agreement with what has been said by you, Prime Minister, and my other colleagues. This is the end of a very remarkable Conference. I have attended many of the Imperial Conferences of the past, but thinking back to-day over those Conferences I cannot think of one which has had a character like the present. This has not only been an Imperial Conference, but it has achieved a success that is amazing under war conditions. There have been a spirit and an atmosphere at this Conference unlike any that I have experienced in previous Conferences. In a large sense, Prime Minister, that is due to your leadership of this Conference, which has had the same high quality that your leadership has had in your conduct of the affairs of the world in the times through which we are passing. The difference is also due to the importance of the subjects that we have discussed; at no previous Conference that I can remember has there ever been such a range of far-reaching fundamental problems, touching not only this group of ou s but the whole world, as at this Conference. We have discussed questions of war; we have discussed questions of international affairs; we have discussed the matters that go to the root of our own society and of all the nations, and it has all been done in an atmosphere, in a spirit of comradeship, friendship and understanding such as I have never experienced before. I go back to my country from this Conference with a renewed feeling of strength, courage and good cheer to meet the heavy tasks that lie ahead. At no Conference has it been more necessary than at this one for us to have personal contact. We have been discussing, we have been writing, we have been corresponding with each other for these four years on problems that have engaged our attention, but it has always been at a distance and never with that personal contact which now, for the first time, we have been able to realise in the war. That personal contact, meeting face to face, has been the greatest value. I am sure we have all been strengthened in our resolve, our minds have been clarified and we have derived a benefit and an advantage from this Conference such as could never have been achieved by long and intricate correspondence. We have discussed our own affairs, we have discussed the affairs of the world; but we have discussed our own affairs in no sense of self-interest; we have always had in view the fact that we are working not only now and here but in a much greater world chain; we are many partners, great and small, and we realise that no success can be achieved, no objects can be realised, unless there is unity, unless the advantage and the welfare of all are kept in view, and in all the discussions we have had we have always been imbued with that spirit, the spirit which looks to the wider human welfare and not to the individual advantage of our own particular group.

We go back to our countries from this Conference with the message that we have signed this morning, a message of good cheer, a message which I hope will put all our peoples in good heart. They have carried heavy burdens, they have carried intolerable burdens, and this message coming to them from this Conference, after nearly five years of war, will help them in the final phase, the climax of this war which we all hope will be the end. Our message will mean to them an expression of the hope, the faith, the confidence, the strength that there is in this group of ours and in the hearts of our Governments.

I thank you for your great service to this Conference, for the leadership you have given, for the help you have been to us. I thank all your colleagues, all our British colleagues, who have been more than helpful, because coming from afar we have had to deal not only with the large problems of war and peace, but in many cases with the problems of our own countries. The United Kingdom Government, the Members of His Majesty's Government in this country, have been most helpful to us in these domestic questions which we have had to discuss with them outside this Conference.

I wish to thank very sincerely also the officials for the work they have been doing for us. By this Conference we have added very largely to their heavy burdens, but they have helped us and they have made their contribution to an achievement which I think will stand out as one of the great successes of this war. This Conference has raised many great problems, but what has been achieved is a victory of great promise, as it opens the prospect of wise counsels and wise decisions and great settlements for our world.

SIR FIROZ KHAN NOON: Mr. Prime Minister, My Lords and Gentlemen, it has been a source of real pleasure for us, the Maharaja and myself, to come here and sit round this table with the Prime Ministers and discuss Empire problems, and we sincerely hope that there will be similar opportunities in the future for consideration of matters of mutual interest. We have many chances of coming to England and making contact with His Majesty's Government, but we feel that for the development of friendly relations and a powerful Commonwealth it is very necessary that we should make contacts with the representatives of the Dominions also, and it is from that point of view that we consider this meeting is of special value. This meeting has also shown to us that in the wider policy of the Commonwealth there are no differences at all between the Dominions and ourselves, or His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom and ourselves, and it is on that ground that we can look forward with hope and patience to the growing spirit of this political association.

I should, however, like to mention one thing, that this is all due to one great factor, and that is the characteristics of the British people. I was here in 1940 and I know the troublous times through which we passed in those days, and I for one was enormously impressed by the determination and bravery and sense of duty to freedom displayed by all the men and women of this country; and may I be permitted to say that that determination is typified in the leadership that you, Mr. Prime Minister, have provided personally for this Commonwealth of Nations. It is the clear-headedness of the leader and his policy which enables the various component parts to stay together, and you personally have, through your leadership, taken the Empire and the Commonwealth from strength to strength, and we are confident for the future not only of this country but of the whole Commonwealth and of the Empire, and I need hardly say how carefully the peoples of India have watched the proceedings of this Conference, and how grateful they must all be that their representatives along with the Prime Ministers from the Dominions have deliberated jointly and come to conclusions which are acceptable to all.

SIR GODFREY HUGGINS: Mr. Prime Minister, I would like to say that I rejoice in the spirit of unity displayed at this Conference, and if there is no relapse, when fear departs, this Commonwealth and Empire, which with courage, enterprise and self-discipline has saved the world from barbarians, will remain in the lead and help return this sorely-stricken world to days of peace. The United Kingdom with her associates under the Crown has characteristics which will be required after the war; their love of freedom, their ability to compromise, to give and take, and to play the game. They need have no fear for the future if under Divine Will selfishness is kept in check and goodwill and unity under the Crown are maintained. We saved the world in war, and if we maintain this unity in peace we can preserve the world for the service of humanity and make it worthy of inheritance.

My telegram No. 466.

Although the more scurrilous attacks on Millspaugh Mission have diminished if not quite ceased, the criticism against Millspaugh himself is general and I do not think it can be ignored until the arrival of the new Ambassador if as I hear he is not likely to arrive until July.

According to a statement made to me in confidence by the American Chargé d'Affaires he has recommended the speedy removal from Persia of two incompetent employees of the mission and of Dr. Millspaugh's son, an ill-mannered interfering youth of 18, whose contribution to the economic recovery of Persia has been to crash two official Persian cars. Apart from this there is the question, which even some honest as well as able people are asking, whether Dr. Millspaugh is equal to his task in the greatly expanded form it has assumed since his arrival. He came to advise on finance but he is now practically director of the financial and economic affairs of the country.

3. The main charges are that

(1) he acts without sufficient consultation and so makes grave avoidable mistakes

(2) he delays urgent business by trying to do everything himself

(3) instead of concentrating on the control of essential articles tea, sugar and piece goods he has tried to control a large amount of goods with the result that in some cases the control is ineffectual and in others it strangles such benefit of action taken as there might otherwise have been.

4. My own relations with Dr. Millspaugh have been excellent and he has shown a very reasonable attitude towards Middle East Supply Centre [5 groups undec:] above mentioned charges. American Chargé d'Affaires is becoming anxious for he does not see how the required consent from the Russians is to be secured while Dr. Millspaugh has little or no support among the Persians. One suggestion which has been made to the American Chargé d'Affaires is that Dr. Millspaugh should confine himself to work for which he was originally engaged and should hand over his economic functions to some other American e.g. Dr. Black, former head of the Farm Credits Association who arrived recently to take charge of the bread and cereal section. One powerful group however, including a number of deputies, is determined to get rid of Dr. Millspaugh alleging that it would pay Persia to give a much higher salary to some American who knew the job.

5. In spite of qualms about Dr. Millspaugh in his relation not to us but to the Persians and to his own staff we have given him full support. Moreover I know how difficult it would be to raise the question of his competence with United States Government without appearing to be weakening in our support of changes in advisers in general and perhaps exposing ourselves to the charge of obstruction. It is not possible however that the United States Government should not have received criticisms of Dr. Millspaugh from their Embassy here and from Americans who have left the staff of the Millspaugh Mission and they ought therefore to understand that if asked whether, in view of the continued attacks on Dr. Millspaugh, the United States Government were convinced, we could safely press the Soviet Government to gice full support to the American advicer without making sure that there was nothing in the criticisms that called for examination.

Yesterday new Minister for Foreign Affairs invited and received visits of representatives of Holy See, Chile, Spain, Paraguay, Finland, Switzerland, Turkey, Portugal, Lithunia, Sweden Denmark and Bolivia. He also invited Norwegian Minister presumably on account of a reply sent in error during Norwegian Minister's absence at the beginning of non-recognition. Norwegian Minister consulted me and on my advice excused himself to Chef de Protocol. Swedish Minister called to-day and explained to me that he had felt he must go since Sweden had charge of Argentine interests in Germany and Japan, and Albanian and Hungarian interests in Argentina, and consulted his Government who instructed him to do so. He said conversation was limited to courtesies. In reply to question he said that Swedish Government have not recognised Argentine Government.

2. His precise situation is the more baffling as he also recently took a visiting Swedish Editor to call on President.

My telegram No. 768.

In view of the feeling which General Jordana showed at the beginning of this interview (he had been called back for it from Escorial) I did not make the question of closing the Consulate, and the departure of its personnel, before loading of the tankers, an ultimatum. To have done so would have created a crisis from which there might have been no [group undec. ? outlet]. His answer showed emphatically that he knew perfectly well what I meant. He also understood the danger of reopening the question with the Americans.

2. My interpretation of his point of view which has been evident to me by the manner of his ministry, is that he feels that he is implementing the agreement and that the facts mentioned in your proposed declaration (your telegram No. 585) prove that this is so. He says that the Germans feel far more strongly about the humiliation of having to close the Consulate than about wolfram or anything else. For them the removal of shield and flag is a symbolic thing not in the sense of an empty gesture as it is being interpreted in Tangier, but as the thing which matters most and hurts. It is the measure in the eyes of the whole world, of the extent to which Germany's power has weakened, and a pointer for the Germans to the ugly fact that Germany is losing the war. The Germans, moreover, are nervous of its effect upon their satellites. As a result he assures me that the present strain in Spanish-German relations is indescribable, and is being felt at every point. He says that I keep pressing him to fix a date for the final liquidation of the whole [? group omitted] and yet how can he do so when relations with the Germans are as he describes. He cannot get into the position of fixing a date and then finding that he must break faith with the Allies, or ask the Council of Ministers to use force. It is a matter of practical politics. It is not a matter of solicitude for the Germans, but one of handling them so as to secure the quickest results, and that they are not still very strong has yet to be proved.

3. .....

3. With the removal of the shield and flag from the Consulate all consular prerogatives, he says, will automatically cease. The Germans under protest accepted the decision, and they will go, and they will go quicker if they are not further provoked and humiliated.

4. If, therefore, while the Spanish Government is implementing the agreement in every respect and showing progress, the Allies at their first opportunity refuse to permit loadings on May 21st, because all the consulate personnel have not left, that will be a positive breach of agreement, he will be accused of having given everything away and of having got nothing in return, his position will become impossible, the agreement will collapse and the Germans gain a diplomatic victory of the first order. Is this worth it, he asks, simply because of what he calls "the misguided agitation in Tangier and the reflection of it in London and Washington".

5. In these circumstances I feel that very careful consideration should be given to the possible effects of refusing loadings if and when the Consulatehas been closed and solely because its staff have not departed. It is unlikely, I understand that the Spanish tankers would be allowed to remain at Aruba. They would therfore, have to go to some port nearby and pay demurrage or be sent back to Tangier, the effect of which is incalculable. Already the Spanish authorities have been informed that June 1st loadings cannot take place, and they confidently expect to transfer them to June 11th. But we know there is a doubt about those loadings (see my telegram No. 763).

6. It is my considered opinion, and I feel bound to state it, that when the Spanish Government have shown their intention to implement the agreement by the positive steps already taken, His Majesty's Government and the United States Government must for their part respond by permitting this first loading on or about May 21st. If they do not, I fear we shall be risking the whole agreement with all the consequences already set forth in Sir S. Hoare's pre-agreement telegrams.

On being [?grp.omitted ?given] General Orgaz's time-table to read, to bring to [sic ?at] my special request to the urgent attention of the Minister for Foreign Affairs, the Head of the European Department told the First Secretary that he could not himself speak with certainty, but May time-table was likely to [?grp.omitted] out of date in view of my interview yesterday with Count Jordana. Official could not be pinned down to any definite dates but said repeatedly and with evident sincerity that he was personally quite sure that the question of the Tangier Consulate would be soon out of the way, how soon we should know when we received Spanish government's application for navicert for Consulate-General personnel. First Secretary could get no further, but left the official in no doubt of the extreme danger to the whole of the recent settlement if appearance of procrastination on the part of the Spanish, whatever might be the reality, resulted in outburst of public opinion against Spain in the United Kingdom or United States on eve of oil loadings. First Secretary's impression from the interview was that my talk with the Minister for Foreign Affairs may, notwithstanding the appearance to the contrary, have had the effect of stepping up the time-table and that [grp.undec ?time-table] in Tangier telegram under reference is in any case out of date.

SECRET.

Your telegram No. 698 paragraph 3.

As you will see from my telegram No. 820, as amplified by my telegram No. 828, Dr. Salazar in reply to my enquiry specifically admitted the possibility of imposing a ceiling on German exports (presumably round about 900 tons which he estimated to be the maximum production of German mines).

2. Although the existence of a ceiling would not of course prevent illicit exports on a considerable scale, the fact that Dr. Salazar did not exclude it will involve some modification of the text contained in your telegram No. 699. In fact the whole third sentence of paragraph 4 thereof should be omitted. This does not (repeat not) invalidate your reasoning or necessitate any modification of the general line of your instructions.

3. Only comment which I have to make on these is that in computing the production of German mines you take Dr. Salazar's figure of 700 tons (the lowest which he mentioned as that to which production might conceivably drop). Whereas in computing exports for March/April you take our own figure of 260 tons (which Dr. Salazar will presumably contest). If he put his finger on this spot as he probably will, I would propose to say that your object was merely to suggest one way in which he might justify his case to the Germans. All however that you are interested in is the actual figures of monthly exports and that if he prefers to reach the same result by some other process of reasoning it will be all the same to you.

Foreign Office please pass to Rio de Janeiro as my telegram No. 3.

His Majesty's Government are appalled to learn of the killing of 47 Air Force Officers at Stalag Luft III. From the statements made to the representative of the Protecting Power by the senior British officers at the camp, it appears that these officers may have been murdered. This suspicion is deepened by the failure of the German authorities to notify the deaths immediately to the Protecting Power under the agreement concluded between us and German Government in August 1942.

On May 14th, speaking at Congress of Radical Party, Swiss President stated inter alia neutrals were now the object of undesirable attention from belligerents and warned that pressure would become greater, although Swiss war material exports had been reduced voluntarily during the past two years by economic agreements with Germany. Reduction was not due to pressure but in conformity with the country's imperative requirements. It was desirable that armaments output be reduced as much as possible to avoid serious unemployment when production was suspended. This friendly gesture towards the Allies was not regretted but should pressure be renewed, Switzerland would defend her rights to live, as energetically as Sweden. This was received with applause.

2. Two other Federal Counsellors also made speeches during the week-end, emphasising rights and duties of the Swiss as neutrals, and the necessity of being ready to defend the country if attacked.

3. These declarations are due to the following considerations in the minds of Swiss Government.

(a) The Swiss people are apt to think that everything over bar the shouting and many newspapers are adopting tone highly provocative to Germany.

(b) Nevertheless Switzerland is ever more tightly surrounded by German armed forces.

(c) Germans still control Swiss communications with the outside world, their export trade and supply of raw materials especially coal.

Please repeat to Ministry of Economic Warfare.

IMPORTANT

Lisbon telegram No. 794 to you.

Confidential.

Although we did not show telegram under reference to the State Department, they have apparently heard rumours from London that you believe them to be less anxious to take a strong line in Portugal than in Spain. They are unable to understand how this impression could have arisen, and whatever may be the attitude of the United States Ambassador at Lisbon, I can assure you that there is no tendency whatever here on the State Department's part to sit back. They had considered that it was best in this case to leave you to take the lead but they are ready at any moment to go into action. In fact I have no doubt that there will be very considerable reluctance here in many quarters to accept your proposed compromise settlement.

Following from Twentyman.

I have just been informed that the Canadian Government will propose the following amendments to the draft constitution. (A) (B) and (C) are regarded as important, (D) and (E) less important.

(A) To include the following additional sub-paragraph in Article 11.

[Begins] To promote adoption of policies designed to stimulate and expand international trade in food and agricultural products. [Ends].

(B) Article 11 (G) to read as follows:

[Begins] To promote either in co-operation with other international organisations, or on its own initiative, international policies with regard to agricultural commodity arrangements in conformity with the purpose of organisation as set forth in Article 1.

(C) Article 7 paragraph 4. The Canadian Government feels its approval of this Article should be reserved pending a general discussion of the whole question (to cover other international organisations) with the appropriate authorities in the United States and the United Kingdom. It is felt that an international convention might be adopted on this matter which will relate to various organisations already established or to be established. In the meantime, interim arrangements could be made direct with the organisation if it is established before a settled policy is adopted.

(D) Article 12 paragraph 5. Is it intended that South American States should supply copies of all the laws made by member states or provinces, and are all states expected to communicate the regulations, reports, etc., by local Governments, bodies or institutions? It is suggested that an undertaking to make such material available on request might be substituted for undertaking to communicate it.

(E) Article 13 paragraph 3. It is suggested that this might explicitly provide for sharing research and interchanging equipment.

2. You will probably dislike A, but I venture to advise against opposing it. The objective is wholly in line with United Kingdom postwar interests and the wording proposed, like that of paragraph (F) and (G) of Article 11, confines the functions to promote adoption of the policies, and does not confer any direct function or executive power.

3. B seems difficult - being apparently precisely what I have struggled, hitherto successfully, to avoid. But I cannot believe it means what it seems to mean and shall at once discuss it with Pearson and endeavour to secure its withdrawal or modification.

4. C is unobjectionable - and calculated to bring Canadian support for the amendment of Article 7 proposed in my earlier telegram of to-day. I will discuss with Pearson.

5. I have no particular views on D and E.

6. Canadian Government also raises one or two points for clarification but I need not trouble you with them.

Madrid telegrams Nos. 763, 764 and 765 [of May 15th: oil for Spain].

We are at a loss to understand this further example of unilateral American action. We assume from Madrid telegram No. 764 that the United States Government are not postponing these loadings as a sanction against Spain. There would in fact be no justification for sanctions since our latest information shows that the Spanish Government are fulfilling their side of the recent agreement, which on our side committed us to immediate resumption of oil shipments. We hope, therefore, that only two particular loadings are in question and that the technical reasons can be satisfactorily explained to the Spaniards. Otherwise, and more particularly in view of our recent pressure concerning Tangier, this action may well be interpreted in Spain as a sanction, possibly with most unfortunate results. We consider that the Curacao loadings referred to in Madrid No. 765 should be confirmed immediately and that no publicity whatever should be given to the postponement of Aruba loadings, since such publicity would inevitably be misinterpreted.

2. Please speak immediately to the United States Government on above lines. These unilateral decisions of which we are not even informed in advance threaten to become dangerous as well as embarrassing. This is particularly so at a moment when Mr. Berthoud is in Madrid for the express purpose of associating His Majesty's Government more directly with oil arrangements in Spain.

The Ministry of Fuel point out that they have not yet received details of loading programme. Secret

My telegram No. 11.

Before definite opening of conference to-morrow morning the only three delegates whom I had not yet seen visited me. Two of them M. Askoutsis and M. Stratis are members of E.A.M. group though neither is a Communist. They both emphasised E.A.M. was prepared to make sacrifices to achieve unity.

2. Askoutsis is a lawyer from Crete who prides himself on being the only member of the liberal party to have thrown in his lot with E.A.M. Stratis is Secretary General of the Railwaymen's Union and a Socialist.

3. Their story was the familiar one. E.A.M. was a coalition of the left-wing parties who alone fought the enemy while other political parties remained passive; E.A.M. represented youth; their sole desire was to fight Fascism.

4. I admitted that though they had done something in fighting the enemy, they had also done nearly as much in preventing others from doing so, that it was not a virtue to represent youth unless, unlike Hitler, they guided youth on democratic lines and that the fight against Fascism must mean the fight against the enemy and not against their political opponents conveniently described as Fascists. It was this kind of talk which had created Civil War in Greece and mutinies in Egypt. Quite a different approach was now needed. It was not a question of E.A.M. making sacrifices for the sake of national unity (that was the duty of everybody) but of making amends for having obstructed national unity. That was the real spirit for which this conference provided opportunity.

5. M. Papandreou assures me that my policy of telling the E.A.M. group a few home truths has caused no resentment. I think he must be right for members of the group have come one by one to receive this medicine and have all expressed

It is not clear what is intended by this premature action on the part of the Consultative Assembly which only recently adopted an ordinance (see my despatch No. 234) laying down in Article 25 that it would be for representative assembly (representing over two-thirds of France) to elect a President who would then form Provisional Government.

2. It now remains for French Committee of National Liberation to take note of and ratify if they think fit resolution adopted by Assembly. It seems unlikely however that resolution was put without de Gaulle's approval and in to-day's press it is acclaimed as a fait accompli.

3. Encouraged by French successes in Italy and irritated by slights to which they consider they have been submitted Committee no doubt wish to assert themselves in the eyes of other nations and of their fellow countrymen in France at this moment when they believe operations on French soil are imminent of which they have been kept in complete ignorance.

4. It will be interesting to see the attitude adopted by Soviet Government whose representative in Algiers has been lately in very close touch with members of the Committee.

My telegram No. 564.

Foreign Affairs debate continued on May 15th. It was opened by Lapie, former Deputy, whose speech was an uncompromising attack on M. Massigli. He complained that it was impossible to detect any defined policy. No one knew position of France in Allied Councils. Delegate took country by country and asked for informations as to Government policy with regard to each one. He deplored that diplomatic representation in Cairo, America and Russia was hopelessly inadequate. In Russia at least Normandy squadron had contributed to French prestige. M. Massigli's statement on May 12th had been marked by an optimism without results. The Clark-Darlan agreement was still subject of negotiation. No conclusion had been reached over the civil administration in France. No assurance could be given that France would be consulted over German armistice terms. Lapie made four concrete suggestions.
(a) French policy should aim at establishing a link between Russian and American viewpoints.
(b) Rhineland and Ruhr should be internationalised.
(c) France should speak not as metropolis but as French Federation incorporating the whole Empire.
(d) Peace treaties must be based on an economic structure.

2. Last point was developed by Poimboeuf, Resistance delegate who spoke in detail of petroleum situation and argued that internationalisation of production and distribution was a necessary guarantee against petroleum becoming casus belli of another world upheaval. Costa, the Tunisian delegate, criticised the policy of Government with regard to Tunisia, and Aurange from Morocco made a violent attack on M. Puaux, Resident General. Vallon Resistance delegate complained that absence of any French Government representation on Allied Conferences was incomprehensible. He asked what was holding up recognition-was it inadequate representation abroad? Perrin, overseas delegate from United States, supported Senateur Cuttoli's speech on May 12th regarding the Vichy taint in French diplomatic service and pleaded for close co-operation with America in post-war period. Costa during his speech raised Clark-Darlan agreement and asked for further information.. Thereupon General de Gaulle intervened.

"I must state publicly that France does not consider herself in any way bound by arrangements which may formerly have been made between Allied military authority on one side and Darlan on the other. Besides time has passed and many de facto changes - for it was a de facto situation have been made in working of what is called here, I do not know why, the Darlan - Clark agreements". (Ends)

3. Madame Simard, delegate for French Canada, made her maiden speech as a woman delegate in Assembly. With ease and charm she pleaded for sympathy and aid of France for those of Fighting French Committee in Canada who since 1940 had tried to uphold honour and ideals of Mother Country.

4. Gazier on behalf of C.G.T. moved a resolution that French Committee for National Liberation should in future be known as Provisional Government of the French Republic. Amidst acclamation it was adopted unanimously. An order of the day expressing confidence that Committee would, in co-operation with Allies
(a) make all practical arrangements in French Liberated territories
(b) provide for all Armistice and treaty provisions and
(c) set up an international organisation for preservation of peace, was adopted.

5. Debate was closed with a speech by General de Gaulle who had been present throughout. The President of Assembly introduced him as "Chef du gouvernement provisionnel de la Republique Française". The General said it was natural that a debate on foreign affairs at present moment should mark a feeling of dissatisfaction. The desire that France should have a more dynamic foreign policy and, in second place, that her position among World Powers should be defined, was natural. He made point that Frenchmen should not be surprised if even their best friends after 1940 should have their doubts about France. Indeed Frenchmen themselves had had their doubts. But they were justified to-day in saying to the world that there could be no possible doubt as to the real France. That reality was proved by French resistance, by Empire, and by French soldiers fighting in Italy. The general then read extracts from two telegrams he had received from General Juin. He ended by stressing that they had already begun to forge future France and they must continue to do so themselves with their own hands: "Poursuivons donc notre chemin".

My telegram No. 977.

I duly presented Maharajah of Jaipur to King Farouk this morning.

2. After the Maharajah had left us, I stayed on and had half an hour's conversation with His Majesty whom I found in much more genial and receptive mood.

3. I told him that since seeing him I had had a long talk with Nahas Pasha as a result of which I hoped the matter might proceed more amicably and with less friction between the Palace and the Government. I had even ventured to quote to Nahas Pasha King Farouk's remark to me that there could not be two kings in Egypt: a reference to which His Majesty said he was much pleased that I should have made.

4. King Farouk confirmed that so far matters were going better; but it was too early to form opinions.

5. I reminded His Majesty of his other previous remark to me that we two had in the past "crossed words" without raking up the past at all, I did greatly hope that His Majesty would now dismiss any such idea from his head, I could assure him, believe it or not as he liked, that I was genuinely anxious to keep the matter on a truly friendly and co-operative basis. [Grp. undec.] although without offence it would be so much wiser if he could keep in close touch with me and sound me out in advance before landing such things as the recent incident. I always blamed Ali Maher for having poisoned His Majesty's mind against the Embassy. His Majesty did not take any of this in the least amiss - indeed he appeared to concur in it. He was always very ready to see me - as indeed he always has been. And he gladly noted my readiness at all times to try and help to keep things smooth with His Majesty's Government.

6. His Majesty then turned to this imminent [grp. undec. ?opening of] second front regarding which I had of course no information to give him.

Following from Twentyman.

My telegrams Nos.2391 and 2439.

I suggest that I be instructed to accept proposals for amendment reported in above mentioned telegrams except as follows:

(a) Support retention of "the United Nations" in the title in heading and the body of the revised preamble, but not in the opening words of the preamble. Accept majority decision.

Note: "International" is colourless and a little threadbare and to drop "United Nations" now may be politically and psychologically unwise. I know of no really valid objection to United Nations. U.S.S.R. are likely to favour its retention. In last resort choice is largely a matter of personal feeling on which majority view should prevail. But if we drop "United Nations" from the constitution what are we to do about declaration?

(b) Article XV paragraph 2. Proposal here is to insert "technical" before "agencies", but this is not very satisfactory and I suggest that I be authorised to move that this paragraph be omitted.

(c) Article XX. Press for retention of five years and two years, but accept majority decision.

2. You will no doubt have views on the other proposed amendments. I am not happy about those in Article X(3) Article XIII and the signature clause, and should appreciate guidance.

3. I suggest that I be instructed to move amendments as follows in addition to deletion of Article XV paragraph 2.

(a) Article II(2). Add at end "as it may have been amended at the date of acceptance".

(b) Article VII(4). Add at end "or alternatively to accord to those other members of the staff those immunities and facilities which hereafter be accorded to equivalent members of the staff af other public international organisations".

4. I have tried to devise amendments that would

(a) limit the generality of Articles I and XI(j).
(b) restrict the organisation's functions in respect of non-food agricultural products, and
(c) emphasise the non-executive character of the organisation's functions, but I can think of none that would not introduce too much rigidity. In any event I feel sure that such amendments would arouse suspicion, discouragement and opposition and that the net effect of proposing them would be disadvantageous and I therefore recommend that we propose no such amendment. This recommendation is admittedly based on my strongly held opinion that the dangers against which such amendments would be directed are not serious dangers and that to the extent that they may exist they can wisely and effectively be met only the influence we can bring to bear hereafter. See paragraph 6 of Annex WP(44) 161. In particular, I believe the antepenultimate sentence 9 and 7 of that paper to be almost without foundation.

5. I very much hope you will not ask for amendment of Article XI(f) and (g). The Senate Committee's redraft made these read [Begins] The organisation shall promote and where appropriate recommend national and international action with respect to .....

(e) the provision of adequate international credit.
(f) international policies concerning agricultural commodities. [Ends] Whether it was intended or not the effect of this change seemed to be to give the organisation powers not given by the original wording, e.g. a power to promote the provision of agricultural credit could be interpreted as a power to establish a bank where the function "to promote the adoption of policies for the provision etc." cannot be so interpreted. I resisted this change accordingly and the present form of Article XI as proposed by the State Department retains the original wording.

6. If you feel it necessary to give me instructions to press for other amendments, I hope they will be expressed in terms of substance, e.g. "an amendment to provide (a) or to make it clear that (b) "and that you will feel able to leave the actual drafting to my discretion. It would be embarrassing in view of what has happened for me to have to propose merely drafting amendments.

7. It is I believe desirable that I should be in a position to proceed not later than June 1st. if the next meeting of the interim commission is deferred much later than that, it will clash with the U.N.R.R.A. meeting at Montreal on June 23rd, and if possible we should get the interim commission meeting over before then. This meeting will of course be protracted, since delegates will have to consult their governments on proposed amendments during the course of the meeting.

Your telegram Nos. 286 and 296 [of April 26th and April 30th: Vatican request that Assisi be declared a "hospital city"]

You should inform Vatican that, while it is not practicable to declare Assisi a hospital city, every possible precaution will be taken to safeguard its hospitals and art treasures. Allied military authorities are fully conscious of need to ensure that historical and religious buildings in Italy of permanent value to civilisation are not damaged or destroyed and strict instructions to this effect, specifically including Assisi, have been issued to all services. Extent to which this objective can be achieved depends on use which enemy makes of cities and towns in which hospitals and art treasures are situated.

Agents Tangier have just informed me that German Consulate General is officially closed to the public and that "in a few days" personnel will leave Tangier.

2. Asked whether the Germans were forbidden to send telegrams in cypher General Uriate stated that they might continue to send such telegrams until to-morrow night.

3. In answer to my question as to whether I could count on receiving passports of German personnel for the purpose of necessary travel permits he stated that the High Commissioner would presumably be speaking to me about this in the near future.

4. I am seeing head of Spanish Diplomatic Cabinet later to extract, I hope, confirmation of the above.

Your telegram No. 500 [of May 11th Situation in Argentina] last paragraph.

However injudicious the policy of United States Government towards Argentina may have been we see serious objections at present to the course which you suggest. The United States claim throughout Latin America by virtue of Pan Americanism and the good neighbour policy, a paramount position and role which it is not our policy to challenge during the war. In view of this and of the many matters in regard to which we hope United States Government will defer to our views in other spheres, Mr. Stettinius was given a categorical assurance that we would support the United States Government in their Argentine Policy. This need not necessarily debar us, if and when the situation becomes so acute as to constitute a real and imminent danger to our supplies, from asking Mr. Hull very seriously to consider whither his policy is in practice leading us and whether it would help him with United States public opinion and in other ways, if we were to take the initiative in trying to promote a settlement.

2. We cannot at present argue that issues vital to the prosecution of the war are directly and immediately at stake. We could only argue thus if Mr. Hull reverted to the idea of sanctions, or if the risk of an Argentine supplies embargo became more serious.

3. Meanwhile we await the United States approach fore-shadowed in paragraph 5 of Washington telegram No. 302 to Buenos Aires.

It has been suggested in some quarters that Saed is a cat's paw whose business is to get the bill passed and then to retire in favour of a dictator. Your telegram No. 868 [of May 16th: wolfram].

I do not (repeat not) think it necessary to ask the Prime Minister to modify his proposed message to Dr. Salazar as suggested in your paragraph 2. No ceiling was mentioned in Dr. Salazar's original offer as reported in your telegram No. 820 [of May 9th] and I see no reason why the Prime Minister should in his message take account of the fact that Dr. Salazar subsequently quoted a very tentative estimate of the total that would go to Germany under his proposal. Indeed I see definite advantage in retaining this passage in the message since it brings out clearly the difference between Dr. Salazar's approach to the problem and our own.

2. I agree with your paragraph 3.

3. As regards delivery of the message (your telegram No. 869) I think it best that you should deliver it when the moment comes as a telegraphic message. If you think it necessary, a confirmatory copy signed by the Prime Minister could no doubt be sent to him later. For you to await the arrival of the signed original would mean further and dangerous delay, particularly as last minute amendments may have to be made in the light of consultations with United States Government. I see no objection to, and indeed considerable advantage in a preliminary conversation with the Duke of Palmella and to the Prime Minister's message being delivered 24 hours in advance of your interview with Dr. Salazar, as suggested in your telegram No. 836 [of May 11th].

4. Confirmatory copies of my telegrams Nos. 698 and 699 are being sent to you by bag.

My telegram No. 774.

I attach great importance to measures taken by the Spanish authorities to stop smuggling of wolfram reported in my telegrams 558 and 561 Arfar. It has always been the view of the Embassy's experts that paralysation of all movements of wolfram is the only effective way of preventing smuggling of it.

2. These measures are further concrete evidence of Spanish good faith over the agreement and of their determination to carry it out in practice. I feel bound therefore to express the opinion, which we all here [? grps. omitted] steps already taken by Spaniards to carry out the terms of the agreement should be taken as a whole and that not [sic ? now] that as reported in Tangier telegram No. 191 to Foreign Office the German Consulate General has been closed we should show our good faith by permitting loading of tankers when they arrive on May 21st. This first loading has now become symbolic for General Jordana and he hopes and I feel he is entitled to this public justification of his policy. If there is undue delay over departure of consular staff we can reconsider the position over next loadings.

3. While I cannot speak for the United States Ambassador who is in Barcelona the above is also the view of the United States Counsellor.

Please repeat this telegram to Washington as my telegram 214 and my telegram No. 558 Arfar as my telegram No. 215 respectively. Also repeat to Tangier as my telegram 80.

As already notified to you from Beirut we are sending English and Greek text of Papandreou's opening speech at conference. This is an advance copy. We will advise you of time and date of release as soon as known.

[En clair begins].

Text of the Prime Minister's opening address to the Greek Political Conference in the Lebanon on the 17th May, 1944.

The Prime Minister, M. George Papandreou, welcomed the representatives of the Political Parties and of the National Liberation Organisations. The fact he said that we are meeting in this distant and hospitable land and that we have come from so many different starting places proves how critical is the condition of our country. The Greek people is groaning to-day under the yoke of two inhuman tyrants the Germans and the Bulgarians and yet at no other hour of her history has she shown a more heroic national spirit and a greater readiness for self sacrifice. The Barbarian invaders are striking down the body of our people but they are strengthening its soul. It is not the foreign invader but unfortunately civil war which is fatally undermining our future because this strikes at the soul of our people and offends the honour of the nation. The cessation of the civil war and the unification of all our national forces against the Barbarian invaders for the liberation of our country is the reason for our meeting to-day. M. Papandreou went on to explain that on undertaking the office of Prime Minister he had set himself as his principal mission the realisation of national unity and that he had in his initial declarations of policy drawn the general line of the national programme for the fulfilment of which the forthcoming Government of national unity ought to strive.

For the general direction of the discussions he proposed that this national programme should be used as a basis concerning which each of the representatives would express his point of view. M. Papandreou then went on to a wider development of his declarations of policy. The first heading concerned the reorganisation of the armed forces of the Middle East. The Prime Minister described the recent mutiny as a crime against the nation. I will call upon M. Venizelos, he said, who was Minister of Marine and Prime Minister during the days of the mutiny to give to the representatives present a ful description of the criminal mutiny which has harmed the Allied war effort, served only the enemy and deeply wounded the honour of Greece. M. Papandreou announced that already an energetic enquiry is being undertaken to discover the promoters of the mutiny who would be severely punished. He added, I promised in my proclamation that we would without delay pursue the reorganisation, the restoration of discipline and the inspiration of our armed forces. I am in the happy position of being able to report to you that my charge is being executed. The blue and white flag is flying high again, units of our fleet have begun already to be put back into active service, the army is being re-organised and the time will be short before it will be found facing the enemy, in order that the epic of Albania may be renewed. The Prime Minister entered then on an examination of the Guerrilla struggle in the mountains of Greece and of the reign of terror which exists in the Greek countryside. The situation of our country to-day is an inferno, said M. Papandreou. The Germans are killing, the security battalions are killing, the Guerrillas too are killing. They are killing and burning, what is going to be left of this unhappy country, it is the responsibility of E.A.M. that they did not only look towards the liberation struggle but wished to prepare in advance for their own domination after the war. Therefore their first aim was to monopolise the national struggle. They did not allow anyone else to take to the mountains and fight the invader. They prevented Greeks from fulfilling their patriotic duty. An old example of this is Colonel Saraphis who is here to-day. A recent example is Colonel Psaros who is not here. [Ends].

See my immediately preceding telegram.

The second aim which E.A.M, pursued was the terrorisation and the annihilation of their opponents. They made themselves into a State within the State. The opponents of E.A.M. were considered as enemies of the country. Such a condition of affairs only occurs in a Fascist system in which the party is identified with the State, but in democratic countries- and it is our desire to be a democratic country and that is what we are fighting for- the party does not subdue the State, it comes under the State and the army does not belong to the party but to the State. This terrorist activity on the part of E.A.M. and Elas has created a psychological atmosphere which has enabled the Germans to achieve in the third year of their rule what they had failed to effect in the first two years- the creation of the security battalions whose aim was internal strife. This is the way in which the vicious circle was created in whose toils our people are now being tried. Andarte bands, national organisations, security battalions, each neutralises the other. The help which the Allies are giving to the fighting bands is given almost in vain and in vain are the untold sacrifices of the Greek people. Only the Germans succeed in remaining aloof and mock ironically at the Greeks and the Allies. This is the vicious circle from which we must escape as quickly as we can. There is only one way, the abolition of a class army and the formation of a national army. The precise way to achieve this cannot of course be a matter for public discussion, but when once a national army has been formed, when the reign of terror in the Greek countryside has been abolished and when the security of the individual and political freedom have been fully re-established, then not only will a further increase in the security battalions be impossible, but those which now exist will assuredly be rendered of no use, for the Greek does not exist who would dream of setting himself in opposition to a Greek army which was obedient to the orders not of organisations, parties and classes, but of a united Fatherland. An objective appreciation of the situation to-day lends to this conclusion our national interest, and the interest of the common Allied war effort require that we should straightway escape from this vicious circle and that a national army should be formed which obeys the orders of the Government. In this way the Germans will once more find themselves few and alone as they really are face to face with the whole heroic nation.

The Prime Minister after next developing briefly the other points points in his national programme concluded as follows: full national unity between all the political parties of the country and the national liberation organisations already exists. The one outstanding question is whether E.A.M, is going to participate in this national unity and the main question at issue is the military question, the question of material strength. This is a historic moment and we must speak frankly and without periphrasis. If the E.A.M., which in the beginning with its watchword of liberation roused into action the broad masses of the people and excited the enthusiasm of the younger generation, but which to-day now that its political aims and its terrorist methods have been laid bare, represents only a small organised and armed minority confronting the great unorganised and unarmed majority of the Greek people, if the E.A.M. proposes to use that material force which it has gained, thanks to the patriotism of the people and the help of the Allies, as an instrument of civil war and annihilate their opponents, and later, after the war is over under the false title of popular democracy as an instrument for seizing by violence control over the majority of the Greek people, then there is no basis for a common understanding. In that case it would be our duty to call upon the nation and to invoke the help of all our great Allies and their Governments and their public opinion to help us. In this double struggle the invader from without and the enemy within the Greek nation does not discriminate between its tyrants. It rejects tyranny in any form. PILOT

See my immediately preceding telegram.

But if EAM has come to a decision to abandon its designs of domination by force and to be satisfied with the political method of persuasion for the achievement of its domination in the future and if therefore it agrees to give up exerting influence on our armed forces and to dissolve Elas at the same time as the other Andarte bands are dissolved and to the creation of a national army which will belong to the country only and obey the orders of the Government then the participation of EAM in our national unity can be considered an accomplished fact. In that event the question will arise what will be the significance of this collaboration and what will the consequences be in relation to the past? I believe that the fact that we have now succeeded in achieving collaboration cannot mean that we either forget the past or forgive it. Each one of us must retain in full the title under which he has acted and his responsibility before history and before the people and before justice too when it is a question of crimes coming under common law. Our collaboration today concerns the future and it looks towards a common effort to attain the realisation of our two great aims, the liberation of our country and the re-establishment of popular sovereignty. From the conversations I have had in recent days with the representatives of the communist party, of EAM and of the political committee I have received the impression that they have come with the intention not of opposing but of amalgamating themselves with the nation. If these personal impressions are confirmed by their own authoritative statements and if their words are converted into positive and decisive facts we shall then be able from this far country to send a mighty message to our enslaved fatherland; the message that full national unity has been accomplished that civil strife is decisively at an end and that our national forces will be turned against the barbarous invaders to drive them from the soil of our beloved land and that the approaching day of liberation will not be a nightmare but a national resurrection. It is with this glad expectation that I welcome your presence here.

My telegram No. 1198.

Mr. Vyshinski has now written to say that the Soviet Government fully share the wish of His Majesty's Government to start as soon as possible making financial agreement with the Persian Government regarding use by Allies of Persian railways. After careful study Soviet authorities have decided that the British draft can be taken as the basis for further negotiations with the Persian Government, with amendments of certain articles regarding the fixing of tariffs for carriage of Allied military and civilian freight. Soviet authorities consider that in order to facilitate settlement of accounts it would be preferable to establish unified tariff rate to be applied to all forms of military and civilian transport of the Allies on railways as from September 1st 1941 until expiry of financial agreement. They think this unified rate could be fixed at 0.3 (repeat 0.3) rials per 10 kilometres. According to the Soviet transport authorities in Persia, this rate has at the suggestion of the British representatives already been applied in the case of all freight connected with supplies for Allied troops and the Persian Ministry of Communications, when producing the railway budget for the current year, adopted it not only in regard to revenue from military freight but also in regard to income from freight on transit of goods of Allied States. Thus the unified tariff rate proposed by the Soviet Transportation authorities has already been applied in practice in settlements of railway freight of the Allies in Persia.

2. The Soviet authorities think it also desirable that the agreement should cover only trans-Persian Railway with its adjoining lines, in servicing and exploitation of which all parties to financial agreement share.

If His Majesty's Government agree with these points the Soviet Government will without further delay instruct their representative in Persia to take part jointly with British and American representatives in preparation and conclusion of financial agreement with the Persians on the basis of British draft amended in accordance with considerations set out above.

Foreign Office please pass to Washington.

Your telegram No. 1214 [of the 13th May: subsidy arrangements for Saudi Arabia].

Following for Jordan.

The proposal for an approximate fifty-fifty basis has now reached us from Washington (see Washington telegram No. 2504) but was not mentioned in discussion with Stettinius Mission, though we did agree that the larger financial and supply problems of Saudi Arabia ought to be dealt with as far as possible on a joint basis in consultation between His Majesty's Government and the United States Government. The suggestion which we made to Wallace Murray was that a supply programme for Saudi Arabia should be agreed with the Americans through M.E.S.C., and that this programme should be divided between sterling area and United States sources according to supply and shipping considerations. We suggested that the sterling area portion of the programme should be supplied free of charge and should represent (with addition of funds e.g. for Saudi Missions) the United Kingdom subsidy, and that the United States portion of the programme should be supplied on credit lend-lease.

2. If the value of a supply programme so drawn up were deemed to represent too large a subsidy, it would of course be for consideration whether the Saudi Government should be asked to pay for some part either of the sterling area or of the United States portion of the programme. However, from your recent communications and Pinsent's discussions with you and M.E.S.C. in Cairo, it appears that the value of the supply programme set out in paragraph 3 of your despatch No. C of the 3rd May, together with the addition referred to in paragraph 6 of the same despatch, would not be unreasonably high as a subsidy for 1944, and subject to your views we should not wish to raise the question of payment for any part of these supplies by Saudi Arabia.

4. It further appears that the greater part of the proposed supply programme should, on supply and shipping grounds, be furnished from the sterling area. An approximate fifty-fifty split therefore would have the result that the United States would pay dollars to the United Kingdom for a part of the sterling area portion of the programme, so as to equalise the burden. While we should have no objection to such an arrangement we feel some doubt whether it can really represent American intentions. Or is it possible to equalise the value of the supplies from sterling area and United States sources respectively without too much disregard of shipping and supply considerations?

5. We made it clear to Wallace Murray that we had always regarded our subsidies whether in cash or in kind, as irrecoverable.

My immediately following telegram contains text of a statement by Mr. Hull in connexion with the Annual National Foreign Trade Week from May 21st to May 27th. Statement is not (repeat not) for release before 9 p.m. Eastern War Time on May 19th.

2. As you will see Hull has taken this opportunity to restate administration policy of post-war collaboration both economic and political. He mentions production without heavy tariff protection or subsidies and says that there must be international arrangements for currency stability, for investment, for reduction or removal of unreasonable trade barriers and for the abandonment of trade discriminations in all forms. He goes on to say that such an international system of trade must be created and made effective in order to support any international organisation that may be set up to keep and enforce the peace, and preaches the doctrine that in the interests of the United States, other countries must have the opportunity to produce to their maximum capacity and to pay the United States in goods for what they buy from her.

3. The statement is important as showing once again that policy of the administration on various issues of economic and political collaboration after the war forms a connected whole. If we are to hope for tariff reductions and all-round economic sanity from the United States it will be on lines of their programme taken as a whole; and whether programme is realised depends largely on our response to it. If we grasp the hand which the administration is extending to us, we take the best and indeed the only opportunity likely to be open to us of securing an economic policy on the part of the United States which suits our interests, especially on the wider and durable understanding which the Prime Minister has referred to as a fraternal association with the British and American peoples. This is the real issue which confronts us over the currency conference and Article 7 talks and we should face it squarely. I do not (repeat not) believe that there is any comfortable half-way house between responding to administration's overtures with our eye on big prize of a general working partnership with the Americans in a full international [group undec.? framework] and endangering the whole programme of co-operation by blowing cold on what are the essential parts of it.

4. The statement also can be taken as showing once again that the President hopes to go to the country with a record of as much achievement towards international collaboration as possible and believes that this will be a big electoral asset. The re-election of the President, with a record of solid achievement in this field behind him, would be a mandate from the people to continue the same policy. Conversely, discouragement between now and the election would be a deterrent to a new administration whether Democratic or Republican in efforts to pursue international co-operation as a policy for the United States and would be a weapon in the hands of those who would like to be able to say that such a policy is foredoomed to failure by the attitude of the British.

5. I hope that some prominence and welcome will be given to Hull's statement by the British press. If you felt disposed to send him a word of appreciation, I feel sure it would be a great encouragement to him. His statement marks another step in his gradual but progressively increasing boldness in leading the United States public which has been evident since in early 1943 he took his stand against all crippling amendments of Trade Agreements Act on the one ground that they would be a blow to international collaboration in the widest sense.

Following from Twentyman.

Am much distrubed by your telegram No. 4347 and have no idea what is the nature of your difficulty. You of course realise proposed proviso in 5 (b) of my telegram No. 2458 operates only for period indicated in paragraph 7 of your telegram No. 3,271 and relates only to four exporting countries signatory to present memorandum of agreement and that you are not committed for the future. Also that the proposal is recognised as being solely a device to overcome the difficulty of feelings that exist towards an abnormal export from Canada to United States.

2. If you find yourself unable to accept this proposal as a temporary measure you will I feel sure fortify me with very clear and convincing reasons against it to be stated to the Wheat Council in support of your 46. Unless I am in a position to put such reasons convincingly the other members of the Council will be unable to understand why you should object and may well explain our action to themselves as indicative that we did not want an agreement anyway.

3. You may take it as certain that unless we can accept this proviso there will be no agreement.

4. I have again tried unsuccessfully to postpone to-morrow's meeting having already done so before sending my telegram No. 2569 but the chairman is unwilling. It is difficult to insist at short notice on not holding a meeting in view of the inconvenience to Canadian Delegation coming from Ottawa.

SSSSS

The London Press published last week-end stories from Washington suggesting that the Soviet Government are now more inclined to reach some arrangement with the Poles in exile. It is alleged that Mr. Harriman brought back some such proposal from Moscow and that it has been discussed with the Polish and Soviet Ambassadors by Mr. Stettinius. The suggestion is that the Soviet Government might even be prepared to leave Lwow in Poland in return for a reconstruction of the Polish Government.

2. We are not aware of any foundation for this story and tentative enquiries of the Polish Government suggest that they know of no such development. We assume therefore that the story is a journalistic invention but, in view of continued Press interest, please ask State Department whether they can cast any light upon it.

My telegram No. 11.

Considerable German troop movements have been reported during the past week. Unidentified formations have been moving up from the Albanian coast as far north as Kotor. In Serbia, German forces, possibly from Hungary, have appeared in area between Prokuplje and Leskovac. These may be merely in transit or intended for a drive against partisan-held areas in Jastrebac and Radan. There has also been some increase in garrisons on the islands on the Dalmatian coast.

2. British liaison officers at General Mihailovic's present Headquarters report that the latter claim that a number of places have been captured from the partisans. These include Berane, Bijelo Polje, Foca and Gorazde as well as Trebinje area.

3. The drive which caused the partisans to evacuate Berane has however been described by British liaison officer with the partisan second corps. He reported it was carried out by German forces who have since been forced back losing Bijelo Polje in their retreat. Trebinje is in German hands while Foca and Gorazde, if in fact they are held by Cetniks, could only be so held with German connivance. Liaison officers at Mihailovic's Headquarters have heard reports that Cetniks are receiving ammunition from German sources.

4. In Western Bosnia repeated enemy attempts to penetrate partisan-held territory have included a heavy attack from Prijedor towards Ljubija with simultaneous attacks south eastwards from Bos Novi and southward from Blagaj. Partisans have however carried out successful demolitions on railway lines by which these enemy forces receive their supplies.

5. In Slovenia Germans have penetrated to Zuzemberk where street fighting is now taking place.

6. In Croatia there is serious enemy pressure against partisan 4th Corps area. German units have converged on Korenica.

7. In Eastern Serbia partisan forces east of Vranje have been in danger of having their line of retreat to the north cut off but a successful rearguard action has been fought and they have retired north to Crna Trava area. The enemy are obviously making every effort to prevent partisans from building up their forces in this area and from training recruits brought in by recent increase in [6 groups undec:] by partisans has been reported on railway between Sofia and Nis. IMMEDIATE Following from His Majesty's Ambassador to Greece telegram No. 18.

[Begins]

Secret.

My immediately preceding telegram.

The conference opened this morning with a speech by Papandreou. A summary of his speech is being given to Press here tonight. This you will have received already from P.W.E. I gather he spoke at greater length extempore and made a very big impression on all delegates.

2. M. Venizelos followed. His task, as agreed beforehand with Papandreou, was to deal with mutinies. This he did very weakly so as to give the impression to the Communists that he was more conciliatory than Papandreou.

3. It had been Papandreou's intention to call next on Kartalis of Ekka in order to face E.A.M. squarely with responsibility for civil war in Greece. Owing to an intrigue engineered last night by Venizelos's henchmen of Liberal Party, Messrs. Exindaris and Vassileiadis, in order to prevent any hard words being said against E.A.M. today, Papandreou was constrained to call upon Mylonas, Svolos and Sophianopoulos in this order thus giving the impression that Papandreou was harsher towards E.A.M. than the rest.

4. Rendis, also of Liberal Party who recently arrived from Athens is I am told displeased with the behaviour of his Party colleagues and intends to speak his mind to them in the lobbies. Petty jealousies of petty men would not be worth reporting save for possibility of their succeeding in lining up with E.A.M. in order to get Venizelos substituted for Papandreou as Prime Minister. This intrigue will need watching though its success seems to me unlikely.

5. Of other speeches made this morning I hear Mylonas spoke well and though no political supporter of Papandreou, approved strongly the programme he had outlined. Svolos while carefully refraining from any reference to a National Army made the point that he and his associates were first to emphasize the need for a Government of National Unity. Sophianopoulos who is a wordy gentleman and prides himself on his knowledge of Russia which he visited some 20 years ago, indulged in a very gentle flirtation with Communism.

6. Meeting will be resumed this evening when I trust some of the more vigorous speakers will have their say. I have been promised a full report tonight.

Difficulty envisaged in my telegram No. 1091 paragraph 2 has been explained to Mr. Landis. I hope he has accepted this explanation. He has given no indication of having telegraphed to Washington on this subject but has several times expressed wish that State Department would telegraph to him result of Stettinius' discussions in London. My immediately preceding telegram.

As a result of number of talks with members of the Union of Polish Patriots Lange had formed the opinion that they were respectable body of persons representative of Polish opinion in U.S.S.R. and standing well with the Soviet Government (this differs from Orlemanski's view) who did not however appear to regard them as suitable nucleus for a new Polish Government. Lange spoke of Witos as a good sincere man and thought that he and one or two others might be fitted for inclusion in a reconstructed emigré Government.

2. Unlike Orlemanski he was of the opinion that Madame Wasilewska's stock stood high with the Soviet Government and to a lesser extent in the Polish Army (see my immediately preceding telegram). He himself had known her during their days at Cracow University and later at Warsaw and had then regarded her as unbalanced venal bore. He had therefore been agreeably surprised to find that, while retaining her girlish talent for organising societies, she had now settled down into something good and solid. On account, however, of her marriage to an ardent Ukranian he ruled her out from any active part in future Polish politics.

3. Lange had incidentally found that the Union of Polish Patriots was consumed with curiosity about the Polish National Committee's eagerness to enter into contact with it, but apparently in complete ignorance as to its standing and activities. He was persuaded that the Soviet Government had had nothing to do with setting it up and that it was spontaneous movement from within Poland. Like Lange many numbers of the Union feared that when the Red Army entered Poland it would be found that there was nothing left but a vacuum and that all the responsible elements capable of future leadership had already been done away with.

Lange who had so far only seen Molotov, told me he had gained the impression that Soviet Government had not yet made up their minds about their attitude towards a new Poland and would be guided by events and by whatever trends of popular feeling would be found to exist in Poland on its liberation. He felt reasonably sure that Soviet Government would abide by its public declarations unless forced into active intervention in Polish domestic affairs by the folly of exiled Poles in Great Britain and United States to which he constantly reverted. He enlarged on the need to stop anti-Soviet talk and propaganda more particularly in the United States where many Poles aided and abetted the "America first" organisation whose excesses had first prompted her public to advocate a policy of good neighbour understanding between Poles and U.S.S.R. For this "America first" had accused him of being a communist in Kremlin pay.

Lange had no new practical suggestion of his own to offer for resolving present deadlock but told me he intended on his return home to [group undec. ? accept] [group undec. ? assistance] of State Department to work for establishment of a new Polish Government under Mikolacyzk to include some Polish patriots and American Poles many of whom he thought would be ready to revert to Polish citizenship in order to rebuild their country (he himself did not seem to wish to be one of them).

2. Lange also contemplated some direct appeal to Mikolacyzk along lines that he should discard Sosnkowski and his adherences and place himself at head of a new popular movement.

3. I hope to see Lange again before he leaves Moscow at the beginning of next week.

Lange was allowed to spend 4 hours with General von Seidlitz and other members of the League of German Officers (see my despatch No. 97 of 7th October 1943) although most of these prisoners were apostates from Hitlerism. They represented various shades of political opinion and struck him as sober, earnest men but on dissociating Germany from Nazi system and on proving that she deserved a soft peace and an opportunity after the war to establish a genuine democracy. The outstanding figures amongst them were von Seidlitz and a young priest named Kaiser who had always been anti-Nazi.

Angora telegram to you No. 743.

SECRET

Contents of above telegram and of parallel telegram from United States Ambassador Angora to State Department have been subject to preliminary discussion here pending receipt of your comments. Although no firm views have been arrived at here, the following tentative reactions of State Department officials concerned may be of interest:

(a) they considered while we should not actually refuse to discuss the standing specific questions of supplying goods hitherto supplied from Germany, we ought still to maintain our position that we were not (repeat not) prepared to discuss an overall neutrality programme until Turkish Government has agreed in principle to prohibiting exports of strategic commodities to Axis.

(b) In any case (subject to (e) below), it would be undesirable to remove all export bans (see paragraph 3(f) of telegram under reference) prior to commencement of discussions if we had not at that point obtained Turkish agreement to prohibition of exports of strategic commodities.

(c) It is appreciated that the immediate future is the critical period and that there is therefore much to be said for getting a partial agreement immediately rather than becoming involved in long drawn-out negotiations. On the other hand, since we presumably stick to relying on chrome export ban and since copper purchase (see my telegram to Ministry of Economic Warfare No. 995) should cover copper position for some months, it is felt that we should not be risking a great deal in declining to accept an immediate compromise settlement and it would on principle be better to try and force Numan to come out definitely for decision to impose full prohibition on strategic exports.

(d) With regard to paragraph 3(g) of telegram under reference, State Department representatives considered that we should not make an offer of this nature but leave this to come up from Turkish side when we might agree to consider it.

(e) It was felt that decision must largely rest on military view. State Department [grp. undec.] received telegram from United States Embassy London indicating that British Chiefs of Staff were in favour of re-opening economic and other relations with Turkey since this would keep Germans guessing on possibilities of more active Turkish co-operation and so force them to maintain larger forces in Balkan area. If this is in fact likely to be the view of combined Chiefs of Staff State Department would of course regard it as overriding consideration in (a) (b) (c) above.

2. I should be grateful for your views.

IMMEDIATE

My immediately preceding telegram.

Following is statement by Mr. Hull referred to.

[Begins]

2. Since National Foreign Trade Week was observed last year the war against the aggressors has approached its most crucial stage. Ultimate collapse of the armed forces of our enemies is certain, and [? group omitted] can hasten that collapse if we continue to maintain at every moment our utmost effort in complete unity with the other nations associated with us in this war.

3. The coming victory throws into clearer and sharper focus some of the tremendous tasks and problems which we shall face at the end of hostilities. Without relaxing our war effort in the slightest degree we must give profound thought to post-war problems and begin to take steps which will help to solve them. We must hold fast to a clear vision of the security and well-being for which we are fighting and work towards effective means to preserve them after they have been won.

4. National Foreign Trade Week is a most appropriate occasion for taking stock of our situation. Employment on the home front is at an all-time high. Many millions now employed in making the things with which the war is waged will need good jobs after the war making peace time products, as will the many millions now serving in our armed forces. Private enterprise will I believe meet this challenge with courage and resourcefulness. I believe also that the great majority of American business men will recognise the need as well as the unique opportunity for utilising our enormous capacity in the production of the kinds of peace time goods best suited to our material and human resources; for choosing those lines of production that can stand on their own feet without heavy tariff protection or subsidies.

5. Only as the people everywhere have the opportunity to produce those things and perform those tasks for which they are best fitted and to exchange those products for products of other people at home or abroad, will the world have the maximum supplies of things to be enjoyed. This can be achieved only as we co-operate with other like-minded nations, as we are co-operating now in the war, to provide a basis for expanding trade and commerce among the nations on a sound and equitable basis.

6. Shift from war time to peace time commerce will undoubtedly entail some rather difficult adjustments both in our domestic economy and in our economic relations with other countries. Those adjustments must not involve such blunders as occurred after World War I when we as well as other nations, adopted commercial policies and took economic measures that disregarded and injured citizens of other countries. Neither this country nor the world could stand a repetition of the bitter resentment of the victim nations, the retaliatory actions, and economic chaos and depression which finally helped to plunge us into this war.

7. After this war international economic relations must be developed through co-operative measures. There must be international arrangement for currency stability as an aid to commerce and settlement of international financial transactions. Through international investment capital must be made available for sound development of latent natural resources and productive capacity in relatively undeveloped areas. Above all provision must be made for reduction or removal of unreasonable trade barrier and for the abandonment of trade discriminations in all forms.

8. Such an international system of trade and financial relations embodying sound economic standards and principles of justice must be created and made effective in order to support any international organisation that may be set up to keep and enforce peace. Otherwise the structure of international security would be threatened with collapse as a result of economic disorder and conflict.

9. Leadership towards a new system of international relationships in trade and other economic affairs will devolve very largely upon the United States because of our great economic strength. We should assume this leadership and the responsibility that goes with it primarily for reasons of purely national self-interest. We ourselves cannot live in prosperity and security in our own country while people in other countries are suffering want and being driven to despair by economic hardships. If we are to have jobs for all our workers and markets for all our goods people in other countries must likewise have the opportunity to produce to their maximum capacity and to pay us with the fruits of their efforts for the things we want to sell them.

10. Government of the United States and other United Nations Governments are endeavouring to make as rapid progress as possible towards the objectives set forth in the Atlantic Charter and Mutual Aid agreements and Moscow and Tehran declarations. In carrying out this great task they need and must have the support of the people whose interests they serve.

My immediately preceding telegram.

At the afternoon session of the conference yesterday delegates from other political parties spoke in the following order:

Messrs Londos, Theotokis, Canellopoulos, Sakkalis, Roussos, Rendis.

2. First four speakers gave their full support to M. Papandreou and spoke in strong terms against EAM for what they had done in Greece. M. Canellopoulos who is a good speaker in his own language, [group undec. ?though] a lengthy one, seems to have made an excellent impression [group undec. ?by his] outspoken character [group undec. ?and his] support in contrast with the attitude of [group undec.] quickly outweighed Ven.... The latter was on two occasions as a result of enquiries put to him forced to confess that by an oversight he had omitted from his statement in the morning certain facts about the mutinies which were unfavourable to EAM.

3. M. Rendis who spoke last in the name of Liberal Party made it quite clear that his [group undec. ?party] aligned itself strongly with M. Papandreou thereby un-masking little intrigue which M. Ven... 's [group undec.] adviser had been trying to engineer.

4. M. Roussos spoke for Communism in the first instance. He was very much on the defensive. He made familiar statements that EAM had taken the lead in struggle against the Germans, that they had lost more men than anybody else in consequence, that their object had always been national unity that their patriotism and loyalty to the Allies were second to none, that they had had nothing to do with the mutinies in Egypt. He made no attempt however to answer any of the charges which had been made against EAM during the afternoon nor did he rebut anything in M. Papandreou's opening statement.

5. What emerged from yesterday's proceedings was complete isolation of EAM and growth of [group undec.] M. Papandreou as leader. From account I received late last night M. Papandreou conducted proceedings with tact and firmness.

6. Press correspondents yesterday only received opening statement of M. Papandreou as it had been prepared in advance. A résumé of other speeches will be given to them this afternoon. They were inclined to be critical of strong language he used about EAM. I hope that they will not send damaging messages before they receive the whole picture. If B.B.C. which is being closely followed by delegates, reproduces unfavourable comments from British press it will do great harm at the conference and give the impression that EAM have British backing thereby undoing my own efforts here.

been made against EAM during the afternoon nor did he rebut anything in M. Papandreou's opening statement.

5. What emerged from yesterday's proceedings was complete isolation of EAM and growth of [group undec.] M. Papandreou as leader. From account I received late last night M. Papandreou conducted proceedings with tact and firmness.

6. Press correspondents yesterday only received opening statement of M. Papandreou as it had been prepared in advance. A résumé of other speeches will be given to them this afternoon. They were inclined to be critical of strong language he used about EAM. I hope that they will not send damaging messages before they receive the whole picture. If B.B.C. which is being closely followed by delegates, reproduces unfavourable comments from British press it will do great harm at the conference and give the impression that EAM have British backing thereby undoing my own efforts here.

Moscow newspapers May 17th publish report of Reuter's interview with Marshal Tito who said he did not think the Germans had plans for new offensive against the Partisans. German plans included isolated blows with object of pinning down Partisans. Marshal Tito thought the second front would soon be opened. The Russians would advance into the heart of Germany. The Germans would not abandon Yugoslavia or the Balkans without a struggle. Marshal Tito intended to fight after liberation of Yugoslavia until Germany's final defeat. While admitting the Allies were doing much in the way of supplies, such aid rendered from the air was incomplete and only a drop in the ocean.

Massigli has suggested confidentially on his own initiative that permission should be given to Alphand who would be accompanied by two experts on finance and production to fly to London immediately. Alphand would be in possession of latest instructions of General de Gaulle in regard to negotiations at present in progress between Koenig and Eisenhower on the question of civil administration. The two experts would remain in England but Alphand would be obliged to return to Algiers after a few days to report to de Gaulle. Such procedure would eliminate the necessity of Le Troquer going to England at present.

2. The difficulty of permission being granted to anybody to leave England at present was frankly explained but Massigli is so anxious to find a way out of the present impasse particularly as agreements are reported [?grp. omit. ?to] have been already concluded by His Majesty's Government with Belgium, Holland and Luxembourg on civil administration that he has asked that the suggestion be submitted to you and has requested immediate reply. If the reply is favourable he would seek the approval of de Gaulle and members of the committee.

3. May I have your instructions as soon as possible.

MOST IMMEDIATE

My telegram No. 762.

There is possibly an element of bluff about the German attitude and the Minister for Foreign Affairs' object may be to rush us into the abandonment of the attitude taken up in our note of April 14th and at the same time into commitment to increase supplies to Turkey beyond anything we contemplate. His proposals do not commit him to reducing increased figures of exports in any new agreement with Germany. He may intend to extend the Clodius agreement on the present lines, leaving us merely with his assurance that he will reduce exports in practice in the proportion that we can supply Turkey's needs.

2. On the other hand, the proposals are not far removed from those in my telegram No. 743, and in addition involve contractual obligation on Turkey to continue present [grp. undec. ? chrome] ban and to reduce other exports below stated figure for the rest of the war. There may be some advantage in securing this.

3. Recent analysis of Turkish imports from all sources over the last five years prepared by B.A.C.C. and sent to Allied Supplies Executive and Washington by bag May 15th indicates that complete break of trade relations with the Axis might have much more serious effect on Turkish economy than has hitherto been appreciated and a correspondingly greater burden upon ourselves. If, therefore, we stand pat on our note of April 14th and refuse to discuss, except on basis of 100% reduction of strategic commodities, we risk meeting with refusal (see paragraph 7 of my telegram under reference) and although the risk of driving Turkey into Germany's arms seems small in the present general situation, it cannot be dismissed as non-existent. There would for instance, be the latent risk of their goingback on the chrome decision. Nor can strong German reaction to 100% reduction, if Turkey were to accept it, be entirely ruled out.

4. My own feeling is that, though it would be a tactical mistake to indicate readiness to fall in with the Minister for Foreign Affairs' proposals as they stand, or to allow ourselves to be rushed, a not unsatisfactory practical arrangement with the Turks may now be possible. The essential thing for the moment is to make some reply before May 22nd if we are to retain our initiative.

5. This might be on general lines that proposals are interesting but do not go far enough.

6. The best line might be for my United States colleague and myself to present written protests as in paragraph 3(a) of my telegram No. 743 and, after reference to chrome decision and to our desire to see other strategic commodities completely cut off, to say that we recognise that certain difficulties are involved and that if Turkish Government, [grp. undec. ? is] prepared to [grp. undec.] all future contractual obligations to Germany and satellites (and to reduce deliveries to Hungary in practice) in regard to the commodities mentioned in our note of April 14th to 50% of the 1943 exports, and in practice only to supply these commodities within stipulated limits in so far as they are counter-value goods which we cannot supply and agree to be essential to Turkey's needs, we are prepared to enter into discussions on this basis. In saying this we could indicate that the field to be covered by discussions would include the possibility of supply of essential needs from Allied sources, removal of the existing export ban and future purchasing arrangements (paragraph 3 of my telegram No. 743).

7. In view of urgency I have felt bound to telegraph my own recommendations as above without waiting for consultation with my United States colleague. I have very hope that he will be in agreement with them and will telegraph again tomorrow.

My telegram No. 1220.

During the course of 4 hours talk on May 14th full record of which follows by bag, Professor Lange who impressed me favourably gave the following information about visit of several days which he had made to units of Polish Army where he had been allowed to mix freely with many officers and men.

General impressions. The age of soldiers ranged from about 17 to 45. The men were of good physique, very high morale and well equipped. They have recruited from amongst refugee families in Siberia, from concentration and labour camps, gaols, factories, collective farms and of late large numbers from liberated territory and lastly, so Lange positively assured me, from Polish official underground movement. Amongst troops were many Poles born in U.S.S.R. who as Soviet citizens had served in Red Army. Like the rest they were eager to fight their way back to Poland. Owing to shortage of officers (training schools were being set up to remedy this) some battalions were commanded by Red Army officers which worked well enough although General Berling was naturally anxious to dispense with their services as soon as possible. The troops were very free in airing their grievances in the presence of General Berling beginning with complaints about the lot of their families dispersed throughout Soviet Union in conditions of great privation.

Political attitude of General Berling and his officers. Lange formed a high opinion of General Berling as an administrative officer who evidently commanded the entire respect and devotion of his men. Both Berling and a number of officers expressed their hatred of all Poles of [grp. undec. ?Pilsudski] persuasion, declaring there was no room for men of this stamp in the new Poland. Berling condemned General Anders for his outspoken hatred of U.S.S.R. which was both foolish and dangerous to future of Poland.

About half of the troops with whom Lange spoke looked towards Mikolacyzk as head of an émigré Polish Government but had no good to say of any of his present colleagues excepting Minister of Public Welfare. The remainder encouraged the [grp. undec. ?Pilsudski] union of Polish patriots but even they believed in Mikolacyzk and expressed the wish to see him in U.S.S.R. to take the political lead at the time of re-entry into Poland. All troops were very bitter about Sosnkowski and maintained that he had led astray a number of Poles who should gather round Mikolacyzk to head a popular movement. Although Wanda Wasilewska was respected by those soldiers who looked towards union of Polish patriots they were apt to be scared of her communism, and could not condone her marriage, referring to her as "the Ukrainian woman".

New Poland. Virtual unanimity prevailed about the future of the Pole. The army was ready to accept Curzon line but it was strongly felt that Lwow should remain Polish. No one wanted any form of Sovietisation or collective company farms. Programme envisaged for the future included peasant ownership of land, nationalisation of heavy industries, private ownership of smaller industries and a freely elected democratic Government which would establish firm and friendly relations with U.S.S.R.

WE, The King's Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, have now, for the first time since the outbreak of the war, been able to meet together to discuss common problems and future plans. The representatives of India at the War Cabinet and the Prime Minister of Southern Rhodesia have joined in our deliberations and are united with us.

At this memorable meeting, in the fifth year of the war, we give thanks for deliverance from the worst perils which have menaced us in the course of this long and terrible struggle against tyranny. Though hard and bitter battles lie ahead, we now see before us, in the ever-growing might of the forces of the United Nations, and in the defeats already inflicted on the foe, by land, by sea and in the air, the sure presage of our future victory.

To all our Armed Forces who in many lands are preserving our liberties with their lives, and to the peoples of all our countries whose efforts, fortitude and conviction have sustained the struggle, we express our admiration and gratitude. We honour the famous deeds of the Forces of the United States and of Soviet Russia, and pay our tribute to the fighting tenacity of the many states and nations joined with us. We remember indeed the prolonged, stubborn resistance of China, the first to be attacked by the authors of world-aggression, and we rejoice in the unquenchable spirit of our comrades in every country still in the grip of the enemy. We shall not turn from the conflict till they are restored to freedom. Not one who marches with us shall be abandoned.

We have examined the part which the British Empire and Commonwealth of Nations should bear against Germany and Japan, in harmony with our Allies. We are in cordial agreement with the general plans which have been laid before us. As in the days when we stood all alone against Germany, we affirm our inflexible and unwearying resolve to continue in the general war with the utmost of our strength until the defeat and downfall of our cruel, barbarous foes has been accomplished. We shall hold back nothing to reach the goal and bring to the speediest end the agony of mankind.

We have also examined together the principles which determine our foreign policies, and their application to current problems. Here too we are in complete agreement.

We are unitedly resolved to continue, shoulder to shoulder with our Allies, all needful exertions which will aid our Fleets, Armies and Air Forces during the war and thereafter to make sure of an enduring peace. We trust and pray that the victory, which will certainly be won, will carry with it a sense of hope and freedom for all the world. It is our aim that, when the storms and passions of war have passed away, all countries now overrun by the enemy shall be free to decide for themselves their future form of democratic government.

Mutual respect and honest conduct between nations is our chief desire. We are determined to work with all peace-loving peoples in order that tyranny and aggression shall be removed or, if need be, struck down wherever it raises its head. The peoples of the British Empire and Commonwealth of Nations willingly make their sacrifices to the common cause. We seek no advantages for ourselves at the cost of others. We desire the welfare and social advance of all nations and that they may help each other to better and broader days.

We affirm that after the war a World Organisation to maintain peace and security should be set up and endowed with the necessary power and authority to prevent aggression and violence.

In a world torn by strife, we have met here in unity. That unity finds its strength, not in any formal bond but in the hidden springs from which human action flows. We rejoice in our inheritance of loyalties and ideals, and proclaim our sense of kinship to one another. Our system of free association has enabled us, each and all, to claim a full share of the common burden. Although spread across the globe, we have stood together through the stresses of two World Wars, and have been welded the stronger thereby. We believe that when victory is won and peace returns, this same free association, this inherent unity of purpose, will make us able to do further service to mankind.

A message in very similar terms has been sent to the Prime Minister also signed by Svolos representing the Political Committee of National Liberation, Por[phyrogennis] for E.A.M. and Roussos for the Communist Party. Svolos informed Mr. Leeper that he has no objection to the publication of the messages.

2. State Department will no doubt have received text of message to the President from Mr. Macveagh. You could inform them that the Prime Minister proposes to publish the message addressed to him within the next few days. Before doing so we are ascertaining from Mr. Leeper whether the names of the signatories can be disclosed. Matter does not appear to be of such importance that we need try to synchronise publication of the two messages.

MOST IMMEDIATE

Your telegram No. 4371.

State Department reply just received (see my immediately following telegram) returns a flat negative to your proposals for a compromise settlement and urges that nothing less than a total embargo should be required of the Portuguese Government.

2. We have stressed over-riding importance of securing an immediate settlement which will virtually deny to Germany wolfram over the next few vital months and the fact that the risk, if not the certainty, of becoming involved in long-drawn out negotiations is of far greater danger even than in the case of Spain, since we have not in this case even a temporary embargo and substantial quantities of wolfram are moving to Germany while we argue.

3. The State Department profess confidence that much stronger line of approach to Salazar which you now propose (and of which they fully approve) will secure complete objective and that in any case it should be given a full trial. They do not appear to have considered what steps they would next propose if Salazar remains obdurate and do not regard it as necessary even to consider a compromise at least until a full trial has been given to the proposed new representations. This of course seems to show a complete failure to appreciate Salazar's mentality or probability that a demand for an embargo under threat may render it impossible to obtain even a compromise settlement at a later stage.

4. I will try and see Hull to-morrow (Friday) afternoon and propose to repeat our arguments to him as forcibly as possible. Have you any further instructions or any personal message which you wish me to convey to him?

NEWS TREATMENT

The fighting in Italy and the continued bombing of German industrial centres have been the featured news of the week. Canadian participation has been highlighted.

The Saskatchewan papers have featured election statements and speeches on their main domestic news pages. Ontario, B.C. and Quebec papers have given prominence to the forest fires in those provinces. Mr. King's address to Parliament after his return was conspicuously placed on main news pages.

EDITORIAL COMMENT

Topics of interest in the news have been reflected in the subject matter of the main editorials. With the new offensive in Italy editorials on the war operations have reached the highest total in many weeks. Discussion of Commonwealth relations has dropped off with the close of the London conference.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

War

The largest number of editorials deal with the fighting in Italy and its possible relation to the invasion. Satisfaction with the part being played by the Canadian forces is expressed and there is considerable admiration and appreciation of the French co-operation. The KITCHENER RECORD makes a particular point of the fact that the armies in Italy form a "true United Nations Army". It says:

> An impressive aspect of the fighting in and around Italy is the wide variety of troops participating in the the struggle...From all corners of the earth there have been gathered together men of many nations, of many races, of many shades of colour and of many creeds to form a true United Nations army which is bent on taking the starch out of the German "master race".

Editors appear to be of the opinion that all portents point to the imminence of invasion, but continue to warn against any easy optimism with regard to its success.

The MONTREAL HERALD suggests that the delay in launching the invasion from the West may be due to the necessity of waiting for the Russians:

> It may well be that it is not Russia who is waiting on the Allies, but the Allies who are waiting on Russia. On the long north and South extent of the Russian front spring does not come simultaneously. The weather experts say, and the German radio also has been stressing it, that on the Romanian front ground is already hard enough for the movement of heavy vehicles. On the central front, before Lwow, the gateway to Poland and the shortest route to Berlin, the ground has been a little soft for the past week, but should be ready now, barring heavy rains, for the movement of armour. North of there, White Russia is still soggy, and there are still patches of snow on the Estonia-Latvian front. It is estimated that these will not harden for another week. From this point of view the recent occasional Russian chirps of complaint about the slowness of the Allies in starting the invasion may have been just eyewash for for the benefit of the Germans.

The SYDNEY POST RECORD reviews the formation of the New French Army and says:

> Only a small fraction of the new French army is being used in Italy. Many times the number of soldiers who have been action in the last few days are no doubt waiting impatiently somewhere around the perimeter of Europe for the word to strike back into France itself. When the new French army begins to fight on its own soil a new chapter in the history of this war will be unfolded.

United Nations

The speech delivered by Prime Minister Churchill on the opening of the debate in the British House on foreign policy has been well received. The following comments are typical of the general reaction of English-language papers:

> MONTREAL GAZETTE: The outline of the coming world organization to preserve peace took firmer shape after the review of foreign affairs with which Mr. Churchill opened the two-day debate in London yesterday....With the Prime Minister's speech the world has moved another step closer to the association of peace-loving nations on which the future of mankind rests, and it is fitting that the nation that stood alone so long against the menace should take the lead in preventing its recurrence.

> VANCOUVER NEWS HERALD: Prime Minister Winston Churchill's speech in the House of Commons foreign policy debate Wednesday will go far to assure the world that Britain does not lack vision in her approach to the postwar world. Mr. Churchill has chosen what appears to be the only satisfactory basis of compromise -- the establishment and maintenance of a just international settlement through an international organization...

Most French-language papers approve of the speech, though some object to particular portions of it. LA PATRIE welcomes the apparent agreement between Mr. Churchill and Mr. Cordell Hull:

> Relue aujourd'hui, au lendemain du discours que vient de prononcer M. Churchill, cette déclaration de M. Hull révèle la similitude des politiques américaine et britannique à l'égard des grands problèmes de l'après-guerre. Le premier ministre de Grande-Bretagne désire fonder la paix future sur l'autorité d'un organizme international pourvu des moyens de faire respecter ses décisions. C'est précisément ce que recommandait M. Cordell Hull... S'il y a des divergences entre les Etats Unis et la Grande-Bretagne, au sujet du règlement de certains problèmes de l'après-guerre, elles n'affectent donc pas les grands principes fondamentaux exposés ci-dessus.

L'ACTION CATHOLIQUE objects to the suggestion of a "Commonwealth bloc":

> Si les dépêches rapportent fidèlement les paroles du Premier Ministre, celui-ci affirmerait que les nations du Commonwealth se sont entendues et feront bloc lors de la conférence de la paix...La constitution d'un tel bloc ne contredit-elle pas certaine parole de M. King?

French-language papers were particularly interested in Mr. Churchill's reference to Spain:

> LA PATRIE: On ne pourra qu'apprécier les propos pleins de justesse et de compréhension qu'a tenus M. Churchill à l'égard de l'Espagne.
> L'ACTION CATHOLIQUE: Nous applaudissons des deux mains ce passage du discours de M. Churchill. Pour avoir exprimé souventes fois la même idée, L'ACTION CATHOLIQUE a été traitée de fasciste. Qui va accuser le premier ministre d'Angleterre de fascisme?

LE SOLEIL regards Mr. Churchill's attitude to Franco as dictated by political expediency.

There has been some comment on the relaxing of the law governing travel to the United States. This move on the part of the Government has been welcomed. The ST. CATHARINES STANDARD says:

> The government relaxation is to be commended. A little freer intercourse with our neighbours to the south, in this crisis of war, a crisis of survival, cannot help but lead to better understanding or more knowledge gained by Americans of what Canada is doing in the war.

However, editors point out that even with these relaxations, other travel restrictions in Canada and the United States will prevent any large movement of Canadians across the border.

There have been further editorials in the French-language press on the subject of Father Orlemanski's visit to Moscow. With the exception of LE JOUR and LA VICTOIRE, the tone of these is well represented by the following from LE NOUVELLISTE:

> Peu importe ce que Staline aurait déclaré ou promis à l'abbé Orlemanski. Un engagement de plus ou de moins cela importe peu à Staline! D'ailleurs s'il peut être question de régler un problème affectant les intérêts de l'Eglise en Pologne c'est avec le Vatican et non pas avec un prêtre américain que Staline devra traiter.

LE DEVOIR writes an editorial in favour of sending foodstuffs to children in German-occupied Europe:

> L'abominable tragédie de la guerre, la faute inexpiable que rien ne saurait laver devant l'humanité, serait la lente agonie de millions d'enfants sur la terre d'Europe, condamnés à la tuberculose et à la mort "pour fins stratégiques".

Other topics discussed under this classification have been the President's review of Mutual Aid, Canada's aid to Russia, the presidential elections in the United States, and one or two comments on the St. Lawrence Waterway.

Commonwealth Relations

Discussion of Commonwealth Relations has died down considerably since the joint statement issued at the close of the Prime Ministers' Conference. The majority of editors now seem agreed that all parts of the Empire are seeking the same goals, though there may have been some misunderstanding as to methods. It is felt that this misunderstanding has now been ironed out, and arguments about closer collaboration within the Commonwealth have consequently become much less frequent in editorial columns.

All papers received in time for this SURVEY comment on Mr. King's return and extend him a cordial reception. Typical comments are as follows:

> KITCHENER RECORD: Members of the House of Commons extended Prime Minister Mackenzie King the glad hand and expressed pleasure over his safe return from the historic conference of Commonwealth prime ministers in London. The sentiments which the people's representatives expressed to Mr. King irrespective of party affiliations are those of the nation as a whole. It is generally conceded that the prime minister did a pretty good job in London as spokesman for the senior dominion.
> TORONTO GLOBE AND MAIL: Party politics was submerged, and properly so, in cordial welcome extended to the Prime Minister of Canada on his return to Ottawa from the historic conference of Commonwealth statesmen in London. Mr. King represented the senior dominion at that memorable gathering with dignity and distinction, and brought back a message auguring well for future relations.
> WINDSOR STAR: Mr. King is more than the leader of a political party. He is the Prime Minister of Canada and in that capacity he went to the Imperial Conference in London....In the heat of bitter political argument party men do not hedge in asserting their views. Mr. King, himself, can slug it out verbally with the best of them. He does not back away from debate. But, there are times when party politics shades into the background and all Members of Parliament meet on a common plane. One of these occasions came when the Prime Minister of Canada returned in safety to this Dominion...

VANCOUVER SUN: Of Mr. King, who is back in Canada from attending the conference of prime ministers of the Empire, we shall say that he represented us well, got into no diplomatic scrapes while he was absent from home....We have to win the war and then to grapple with vast questions of social planning and prodigious physical development. Mr. King appears to be as alive to the importance of both as any empire statesman. On the personal side too he will be congratulated by every Canadian, because it is a formidable undertaking for any man facing 70 to fly back and forth over the Atlantic as he has done.

Mr. King's address to Parliament after his return was also very well received with only one or two exceptions.

HAMILTON SPECTATOR: One is not warranted in inferring from his statement in Parliament yesterday that he receded from his earlier attitudes, but, rather, that he himself was agreeably surprised by the discovery that Britain and the dominions stand largely on common ground, see eye to eye on the major issues, and give every promise of proceeding in harmony toward the fulfilment of their mutual ideals.

MONTREAL STAR: Two points stand out in the statement made by Premier Mackenzie King in the House of Commons yesterday regarding his attendance at the London Conference of Commonwealth Premiers. One is his emphasis on the unanimity that characterized the conference ....The other point in Mr. King's address which must have impressed all who have read it was his reference to that phase of the war on which we are about to enter.

OTTAWA JOURNAL: To Ottawa citizens who met to honor him Prime Minister King warned: "The postwar era will not be an easy period in which to live". It was a reminder we cannot have too often, especially from those in authority. For we have had too much Pollyanna talk too many dewy-eyed millenarians with promises of a paradise of plastics and gadgets immediately the guns stop shooting.

GLACE BAY GAZETTE: The predilection of Canada's Prime Minister to utter serious and profound remarks that, upon analysis, mean nothing has long been an irritant. It was apparently too much to hope that, after his brilliant participation in the Imperial Conference, he would conform to that same high standard upon his return...We do not know who is the author of his more important speeches, although we detect the fine hand of Leonard Brockington; but whoever his ghost writer is, he ought to write speeches that suit Mr. King's temperament. The Prime Minister of Canada will be judged by posterity, for his actions, not for his speeches.

Almost every French-language daily included on its editorial page a short note of welcome to Mr. King on his return home. Pro-Liberal papers added praise and congratulations to their greetings. LE CANADA calls Mr. King "our greatest leader since Laurier"; LA PRESSE writes an extremely laudatory editorial offering him "the homage of our admiration". LA PATRIE says:

> La mission que vient de remplir à Londres le premier ministre du Canada fait étape dans l'histoire politique de notre pays. Même les adversaires de M. King reconnaissent que le Canada gagne en prestige international et en autorité au sein du commonwealth, à la suite du discours qu'a prononcé M. King devant le parlement de Grande-Bretagne. L'attitude canadienne, au cours des entretiens des premiers ministres britanniques, a été celle d'une nation qui demeure fidèle à ses attaches et à ses traditions, mais qui entend néanmoins demeurer seule maîtresse de sa destinée politique.

In TERRE DE CHEZ NOUS, a farmers' weekly with a wide circulation, Roger Duhamel, who is also an editor of LA PATRIE, writes in a more critical tone of Mr. King's speech in London:

> Un discours à tiroirs, comme d'habitude, qui permet des variations très étendues aux différents orateurs politiques, selon qu'ils s'expriment devant un auditoire anglo-canadien ou canadien-français....Dans l'ensemble, le discours de M. King à Londres ne change rien à rien. Il n'a fait aucune déclaration sensationnelle ou inédite. Ce n'est qu'une pièce de propaganda électorale à destination des consommateurs canadiens. Comme telle, l'avenir prochain dira si elle a atteint son but.

LE DEVOIR continues to discuss Mr. King's attitude at the conference, maintaining that those who interpret it as favorable to Canadian independence are wide of the mark:

> On représente M. Mackenzie King sous les traits d'un fougueux autonomiste qui a remporté à la conférence des premiers m ministres du Commonwealth une victoire éclatante sur les impér impérialistes centralisateurs. Rien n'est plus loin de la vérité....L'unité de l'Empire, tel était le but vers lequel rendaient tous les délégues à la conférence des premiers ministres. M. Mackenzie King serait le premier à se récrier si, prenant à la lettre la propagande libérale de LA PRESSE, du CANADA et du SOLEIL, on lui demandait si l'attitude qu'il a adoptée à Londres signifiait qu'il était en faveur de l'indépendance du Canada..

DOMESTIC AFFAIRS

Federal Politics

Main interest of the week has centred around the advice given by M. Henri Bourassa to the Bloc Populaire that members should support C.C.F. candidates where there was not one of their own. Many of the reactions in the English-language papers are of a humorous nature at the expense of the C.C.F. and suggest that M. Bourassa has acutely embarrassed Mr. Coldwell. A few of the more serious comments are quoted as typical of the interpretations placed on this statement:

> MONTREAL HERALD: We are convinced that Mr. Bourassa's record as an anti-British agitator is sufficient to deflect many votes from any candidate he endorses, even in the Province of Quebec.
> MONCTON TIMES: What is apparent, however, in the Bourassa manoeuvre is that the C.C.F. is becoming the synthesis of all those in the country who are determined on achieving their own ends, whether their aims converge or not. If they cannot proceed directly through their own parties they will proceed indirectly through the C.C.F., which thus tends to be the instrument of disruptive forces, pulling the country this way and that.

It is a tendency that the C.C.F. itself will have to recognize and overcome.

WINNIPEG TRIBUNE: Mr. Bourassa's support of the C.C.F. comes at a particularly interesting time when Liberal hacks and the government's puppet press have been hinting darkly at an alliance between the Progressive Conservative and the Quebec Nationalist groups.

QUEBEC CHRONICLE TELEGRAPH: No matter whatever else may be said of the Bloc in criticism, it must be credited with having a particularly keen eye to its own interests and when Mr. Bourassa tells its sympathizers to vote C.C.F., he knows quite well what he is doing. The very fact then, that a strong C.C.F. is considered by the Bloc to be in its own interests, it is one more reason -- and a conclusive one -- for patriotic, responsible Canadians to vote against the C.C.F.

For the French-language press M. Bourassa's remark was the leading story of the week. LE SOLEIL writes:

> Dorénavant, les Canadiens français savent qu'en votant pour le Bloc d'un Maxime Raymond ou d'un André Laurendeau, ils aideront à la combinaison du groupe dont M. Coldwell est le chef....Nationalistes et socialistes s'entendent sur plus d'un point, mais ils sont unis plus particulièrement par leur désir commun d'accéder au pouvoir.

Next day, after Mr. Coldwell's declaration on the subject, LE SOLEIL says:

> De cette déclaration, aussi piquante qu'importante on peut induire que le parti de la C.C.F. appuie en principe la politique militaire du gouvernement libéral, que M. Bourassa lançait un ballon d'essai....que cette offre est repoussée avec énergie par M. Coldwell....

LE DROIT says:

> La tactique de M. Coldwell est claire. Il redoute que, dans les provinces anglo-canadiennes, on exploite le conseil de M. Bourassa, au détriment de la C.C.F. et qu'on laisse entendre aux électeurs de langue anglaise que voter pour la C.C.F., c'est appuyer un parti qui s'alliera à un groupe québecois qui ne partage pas leurs idées sur le Canada et la guerre. Le leader de la C.C.F. a vu juste. Le Toronto Globe and Mail s'est hâté d'exploiter le conseil de M. Bourassa dans le sens redouté par M. Coldwell.

MONTREAL-MATIN does not take M. Bourassa seriously:

> M. Bourassa est un pince-sans-rire. A-t-il simplement mêler les et se payer un peu la tête et du Bloc et du C.C.F.? Plusieurs le croient.

Armed Services

The question of using soldiers on the farms to alleviate the serious shortage of help has been discussed by several editors. The Windsor STAR says:

> Granted these men were not recruited for that sort of work, but they would be much more profitably occupied at it than most of them are at present in training camps. They were drafted to defend Canada in case of attack or invasion, but the Government still refuses to make them available for overseas service. Without being unduly complacent, we must recognize the fact that there is today little chance of an assault on this country by our enemies. Even if raids should occur at isolated points, a sufficient force could be maintained in the vital areas to deal with this situation while the larger majority of the trainees are helping on the farms. There is not today even the excuse of training. Officers in charge of the drafted units admit that they are desperate to find ways to occupy the time and attention of the men.... Meanwhile, prisoners of war are given almost complete liberty to work in the fields and many of them are positively dangerous. The constant record of escapes should show they are not to be trusted but they are being placed in positions where they can commit sabotage or actual violence, while our uniformed men are really wasting their time.

There have been many bitter comments on the shooting of the 47 Allied airmen attempting to escape from a German prison camp. Although no editors have been quite so outspoken as the London Daily Express, the majority suggest that this shooting has all the earmarks of another planned German atrocity.

Two French-language dailies, LE DROIT and L'ACTION CATHOLIQUE, together with a number of weeklies, comment on the report that some soldiers were ill-treated and forced to sign up for active service in Vernon, B.C.

Social Problems

Problems of housing, juvenile delinquency, education, teachers' salaries, health, etc., have been widely discussed without new or noteworthy comment.

Although no French-language dailies have commented upon the Guenette Case, several weeklies attack the Mounted Police. LE BLOC, organ of the Bloc Populaire, uses the following banner headline: LE DRAME DE ST-LAMBERT: GEORGES GUENETTE FUT ABATTU COMME UN CHIEN: QUE JUSTICE SOIT FAITE. LE BLOC's story begins as follows:

> Dimanche, le 7 mai, à l'aube du jour de Seigneur, à cinq heures et 45 exactement, Georges Guénettes, jeune homme âgé de 24 ans et 4 mois, tombait face contre terre dans un sillon fraîchement tracé, instantanément foudroyé par la balle meurtrière de la Gestapo d'Ottawa.

LE PROGRESS DU GOLFE writes:

> Ce jeune compagnard hors-la-loi, fils unique, soutien de son père et de sa mère, n'était tout de même pas un bandit cambrioleur ou assassin. La "Mounted Police" devait et pouvait prendre les moyens de l'arrêter, mais non de le tuer... Quels sont les responsables d'une pareille tragédie? Les "Mounties" ont-ils obéi à des ordres? Fait du zèle? Manqué de jugement ou d'aptitude au maniement des armes? Il faudrait le savoir pour que ne se répète pas cette malheureuse affaire.

Provincial

The forthcoming election in Saskatchewan has been the main topic of interest under this classification. Many editors have been campaigning against the C.C.F. and supporting the Liberal or Progressive Conservative Parties. Editors appear generally agreed that the results will be indicative of possible federal results in the next general election.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRIME MINISTER: C223290 TOP SECRET

I have just received some information which I believe throws some light on the background of Mr.Churchill's preoccupation with the Russian question during the meetings of Prime Ministers.

I am informed by a friend in the British Intelligence Service that during the first week of May Mr.Churchill received an offensively worded personal message from Molotov taxing the United Kingdom with having sent a secret underground mission to Roumania without informing the Soviet Government that this step was in contemplation. The mission,which was despatched in December last,was in fact apprehended by the Roumanian authorities immediately on arrival and publicity was at once given to the fact that its members had been taken prisoner. These have been keep in Roumanian custody and not handed over to the Germans who wished to hold them, and have, up to now, been allowed to keep the secret cyphers and sending transmitters which they brought with them. With the connivance of the Roumanian authorities, the mission,though prisoners of war, have been used as a channel of communication between the British authorities and Maniu and Prince Stirbey and other Roumanians anxious to get Roumania out of the war.

Although the Russians were not told of the original British plan, they have known of its results for four or five months, and this makes it strange that Molotov should have waited until the first of May before charging the United Kingdom with lack of candour and cooperation.

Churchill was very angry about the tone of the Soviet communication,to which he replied in kind. Here matters were deadlocked for a week until Eden's return to the Foreign Office. He sent a much more conciliatory message to Moscow explaining why the United Kingdom had thought the despatch of this secret mission to Roumania would help the Allied war effort, and attempting to remove the Russian suspicion against the United Kingdom of trying to make a private deal with members of the Roumanian ruling classes without consulting their Allies. Since then you will have seen from Dominions Office telegram No.Circular D.758 of May 20 that the United Kingdom have now suggested to the Soviet Government that efforts to bring Roumania out of the war should be recognized as a primary responsibility of the Soviet Union,while efforts to organize and consolidate Greek resistance to the enemy should be recognized as primarily a British responsibility. Agreement on this formula may lessen the friction and misunderstandings which have attended Allied diplomatic efforts in the Balkans.

This incident, about which I have only learned since returning to Ottawa, seems to me in retrospect to have unduly influenced Mr. Churchill's appreciation of the possibilities of continuing cooperation with the Soviet Union, and indirectly to have affected his attitude toward a number of related questions and explaining in part -

(1) his preoccupation with the regional organization of Europe
(2) his readiness to see Germany playing an important part in such an organization in five years time, and
(3) his indignation at de Gaulle's suggestion that France should have a "permanent ally" of the Soviet Union (In this last connection it may be observed that de Gaulle really did not go beyond the hope that France might achieve the same sort of relationship with the U.S.S.R. that the United Kingdom had achieved under the 20 years Treaty of Alliance with the Soviet Union).

NEWS TREATMENT

The advances in Italy and the subsequent capture of Rome were the major headline news stories of the week. The papers of June 6 were completely taken up with the invasion. From the amount of space devoted to it, the "breach of Germany's West Wall" looks like the greatest news story ever printed. The morning papers carried two and three inch banner headlines, and devoted several pages exclusively to stories and reports from invasion headquarters and other sources. The evening papers gave even more space to stories and eye-witness accounts of the launching of the attack, and to pictures and biographies of all the Allied leaders.

Owing to the heightened interest of the war news few items of domestic news have been headlined or given prominent placing on the main news pages. The riots in Montreal were fairly widely reported, and meetings or statements on the necessity for conscription for overseas service have been given noticeable prominence by many papers. A number of Ontario papers carried reproductions of the official statement of the Chief Commissioner, Liquor Control Board of Ontario, respecting the further restrictions in the sale of spirits in that province.

The western papers showed some interest in the forthcoming Saskatchewan election, giving prominence to addresses and statements by various candidates.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

War

Owing to the accelerated pace of war developments within the last few days, many editorials during the period covered are already out-dated. The great majority of them dealt with the probable date of D-Day, while others had to do with the appeals to spare Rome, the advance in Italy, etc. The words of President Roosevelt, "Liberation rather than invasion", were the basis of considerable comment, and the 4th anniversary of Dunkerque brought forth many inspirational editorials.

United Nations

The main subject of interest in this field was the announcement by U.S. Secretary of State Cordell Hull that the Washington Government was ready to proceed to discussion with Great Britain, Russia and China on the organization of an international security body. Secondary subjects were the nomination campaigns in the United States, aid to Russia, the underground in occupied countries, and the attitude of the Vichy government in relation to the French people as a whole.

The following extracts, taken in sequence, give a fair interpretation of the reaction of Canadian editors to the peace organization suggested by Mr. Hull:

WINDSOR STAR: One of the most important matters that will have to be dealt with by the four-power conference on post-war world organization will be a decision as to the method by which force will be applied to guarantee peace. So much has been said of an international peace organization that the impression has gone abroad that all the United Nations are agreed on this principle. This is not so. In fact, it is one of the most contentious points with which the diplomat will have to deal.

VANCOUVER NEWS HERALD: It is pretty generally acknowledged that after the last war we lost the peace by not convincing Germany she was beaten. By the use of skillful propaganda the defeated enemy stirred up a considerable body of misguided sympathy among weak-minded emotionalists in both Britain and the United States. Now that Victory is assured there are signs of a repetition of similar softness.

FORT WILLIAM TIMES JOURNAL: Two wars unparalleled in dimensions and destructiveness and within the last thirty years have shown that any nation which values its own independence and the liberty of its people must take steps to provide realistic safeguards. Already there are those who are deeply distressed by this war of the present and who are hoping for its end but who also are worried over the possibility that later on another war will break out. Terrific events have shown that peoples who value freedom cannot leave themselves unguarded and be safe from molestation and danger.

HAMILTON SPECTATOR: The prospects today are for more effective action. The principle of international co-operation for the maintenance of peace has been accepted by both political parties in the United States....

VANCOUVER SUN: Mr. Roosevelt has long been resolved to avoid the mistake of Woodrow Wilson after the last war. The chief of these was to make the peace settlement an issue of party politics. Already it is evident that Mr. Roosevelt has gone a long way towards keeping the peace settlement out of party politics altogether.

WINNIPEG TRIBUNE: Mr. Hull's invitation is a clear sign that the Big Four are likely to get down to the business of framing the world organization without delay. That is all to the good. If the matter were left hanging in the air until after the war, all their pious protestations might come to nothing. It has been obviously necessary to set up certain world economic organizations like UNRRA, in advance of victory. Otherwise the United Nations would have no machinery for coping with the relief of starvation in liberated countries. Similarly it is necessary to have the framework of a world political organization ready before the victim nations are liberated and peace is imposed upon enemy countries. If the great powers put off deciding the shape of the world organization, they would invite chaos. Europe is going to be hopelessly disorganized in any event.

The MONTREAL GAZETTE takes the opportunity to comment again on Mr. King's attitude toward the Halifax proposals:

> Yet it is clear that the Big Four will be not only the preliminary organization, but the nucleus in any wider group with which the main power and responsibility will continue to rest. It would seem that such an organization as this is widely out-of-accord with the views on international policies held and presented by Prime Minister King after Lord Halifax's speech. Mr. King opposed then a consolidation even of the British Commonwealth with the fear that it would introduce the bloc principle into international affairs. In particular, he feared the effect that such a bloc might have upon the United States and Russia. But now these two nations, together with Great Britain and China, have themselves accepted the bloc principle as providing the only dependable foundation for world security. Since Mr. King was so forthright in opposing the British Commonwealth bloc, will he now show an equal vigor in opposing this bloc of the Big Four? Surely, in accordance with his own principles, he has even stronger grounds for so doing. If he does he will find himself in the piquant position of opposing the governments ofnthe United States, Russia, Great Britain and China. More than this, will Canada refuse to co-operate in a world organization founded upon the bloc principle?

The French-language papers have also shown considerable interest in the organization of a world peace body. LE DEVOIR, commenting upon the attitude of the United States toward co-operation in future world affairs, writes:

> Il semble bien que l'isolationisme qui depuis deux siècles fut la caractéristique dominante de la politique des Etats-Unis, soit désormais chose du passé. ... Mais la position nouvelle que les Etats-Unis prennent dans le domaine international va transformer le visage du monde. ... Désormais se lève à l'horizon politique, militaire et économique une puissance qui va faire pâlir ce qu'on considérait jusqu'ici comme le sommet impérial, qui devra maintenir sur pied une grande partie de sa force militaire, et sera forcé, quoi qu'il en veuille, d'intervenir de façon plus ou moins directe, dans presque tous les problèmes du palier international. Les possibilités en pareil état de choses sont illimitées et dans un quart de siècle, certains pays pourraient bien être marris d'avoir éveillé une telle puissance de son pacifisme traditionnel.

LA PATRIE is of the opinion that the significance of the United States taking the lead in proposing a meeting on world organization lies in the implication that isolationism has been finally abandoned. It also points out that Mr. Hull took the precaution of having his program approved by a senatorial committee before approaching Great Britain, Soviet Russia and China. LA PATRIE concludes:

Les grands Etats accepteront peut-être plus tard cette idée d'un gouvernement mondial, mais pour le moment le nationalisme est encore trop vivace pour que cette formule idéaliste ait quelque chance d'être adoptée. Celle d'une police internationale que les grandes puissances exerceraient chacune dans une zone définie est de réalisation plus facile.

LE DROIT puts forward the case of the smaller states:

Les petits Etats ont parfaitement raison de réclamer le droit d'avoir leur mot à dire, sur un pied d'égalité avec les grandes puisances dans la direction des affaires du monde. Ils ne peuvent se contenter d'une simple voix consultative.

Commonwealth Relations

The main feature of the week was Mr. Curtin's visit and his address to Parliament. Almost all daily editors expressed the warmest welcome to Mr. Curtin, coupling this with words of appreciation for the part which Australia has played in the war. Typical comment follows:

> LONDON FREE PRESS: Hon. John Curtin, prime minister of Australia, will receive a whole-hearted welcome today from the Canadian House of Commons and the Senate. In this welcome they will be echoing the feelings of the Canadian people who have nothing but the warmest regard for the people of our fellow dominion down under.
> OTTAWA CITIZEN: Prime Minister John Curtin of Australia is welcomed to Ottawa both for himself, for the qualities he has displayed as a British Commonwealth leader, and as the first citizen of a sister Dominion that has played such an outstanding part in the fight for freedom during this war.

Mr. Curtin's address was very well received and editors took particular note of the broadness and conviction of his speech. The MONTREAL GAZETTE sums up the general reaction when it says:

> No one could mistake his forthright declaration of the necessity of placing peace firmly on a foundation of power, and of bringing together in a beneficent bloc those "great nations" with which such power now rests. It was Prime Minister Curtin's urgent appeal that the fraternity and collaboration that the Big Four had found necessary to meet the attack, should be nourished by all the genious of statesmanship to keep the sword from becoming the means of government instead of the light of reason.

LE DROIT, however, made a somewhat different interpretation of the speech:

> De ce qu'il a dit au sujet de l'après-guerre, il ressort que Mr. Curtin réclame une très intime collaboration de l'Empire britannique. Sur ce point, le premier ministre d'Australia s'accorde parfaitement avec celui du Canada.

The TORONTO GLOBE AND MAIL in a series of four special articles reviews the results of the Commonwealth Conference, which it claims vindicated the point of view of Lord Halifax and of the GLOBE AND MAIL. In the first article it says:

> Achievement was inherent in the Final Declaration of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers issued at the conclusion of the London conference. The true importance of the decisions reached was implicit in the unity of thought which the declaration stressed. But the general terms in which "common agreement" on the fundamental principles of foreign policy

MONTREAL GAZETTE: The political gyrations in which Canada's Communists are indulging, as they preen their deceptive Labor-Progressive feathers in an effort to win acceptance in polite political dovecotes, are becoming as ridiculous as they have always been unconvincing.

MONTREAL HERALD: Pessimistic observers of the Canadian political scene should be grateful to the newer parties for the recent introduction of alleviating touches of sunshine. Who among the gloomy critics can withold a smile as Tim Buck, his pre-war red toned down by an admixture of imperial purple, accuses the C.C.F.-ers of socialism and radicalism? How cheering to those who editorialize on politically portentous trends must be the Labor-Progressive leader's offer of allegiance to the Liberals.

BRANTFORD EXPOSITOR: Strange indeed are the changes undergone in the devious courses of political evolution. The Canadian Communists, who used to be "a gin" almost everything and everybody except themselves, and who were singularly disinterested in this war until the Soviet Union was forced into it, are now in favor of several things, including some political ideals they bitterly denounced for years, and they take second place to none in appealing for victory.

Social Problems

The usual topics of housing, education, delinquency and health have been the basis for a considerable number of editorials. There has been practically no comment on the fire in the Jewish synagogue in Quebec, L'ACTION CATHOLIQUE being the only French-language paper to express any opinion. This paper enquires why two mysterious fires, one at the synagogue in Quebec and the other at the synagogue in Toronto, are "being handled and described so differently?"

There have been only two editorials, so far, on the rioting in Montreal. Both appear to refer chiefly to the earlier disturbances on St. Antoine St.

OTTAWA CITIZEN: Perhaps the enemy within would welcome more publicity, so long as it included no exposure of the hidden hand. There is obviously more behind the inflamed state of mind among schoolboys in the purlieus of Montreal, and the adult knaves associated with them, than the conventional brand of nationalist politics.

LE JOUR: C'est un incident déplorable, auquel il ne faudrait pas cependant accorder une importance exagérée. Les petits gars qui se sont cassés la figure avec entrain ne peuvent être considérés comme de bien grands coupables. Les vrais coupables, ce sont ceux, qui, de part et d'autre, ont semé dans ces jeunes esprits des germes de discorde. Ce sont ceux qui ont enseigné aux petits Canadiens français la haine de l'Anglais et aux petits Canadians anglais, le mépris du Français.

Armed Services

Many editors have commented upon the figures of total eligible male population and number of married men over 25 called up in different sections of the country, which were discussed in the House. The discrepancy between figures for Quebec districts and for other parts of the country is emphasized, and editors claim that the enforcement of the N.R.M.A. is obviously much less rigorous in Quebec than elsewhere.

> were announced provided little by which to measure the magnitude of the accomplishment or to indicate the practical plane on which the common policy is to be applied.

The GLOBE then goes on to claim that:

> By a campaign of confusion beat up across the nation over the Halifax proposals, the anti-Commonwealth press focused attention not on the realities in the international situation which compel Commonwealth solidarity but on the imaginary restrictions which that solidarity was supposed to impose..... But all those bogies....have been swept away.

In a subsequent article the GLOBE stated the purpose of the series as follows:

> In an effort to dispel confusion, to show what actually happened at London, and how completely Prime Minister King has moved from the no-Commonwealth-bloc position we propose to re-examine and analyze the pre-conference environment.

The Globe closes with the following conclusions:

> But the Prime Ministers did make the most important addition in Empire history to the Commonwealth machinery by their decision to perpetuate the conference by means of "frequent meetings", at regular intervals. ... Certainly there can be nothing fixed today against the fulfilment of that purpose through the future, nothing but the principle of the complete sovereignty of the partners. Changes there will be, coming gradually perhaps, to meet the demands of the prime machinery, the Prime Ministers' conference. It will be evolved as the machinery to aid co-ordination of Commonwealth activities in the emergency of war was evolved, with more attention to the function it must fill than to the form it will take.

LE DEVOIR, in speaking of Mr. King's attitude toward international collaboration, expresses the view that there is no difference between the Prime Minister's imperialism and his internationalism:

> Ceux qui, dans l'Empire, à la conférence des permiers ministres du Commonwealth ou ailleurs, préconisent l'internationalisme sous forme d'un organisme mondial, travaillent à la fois au maintien de la paix future et à la survivance du Commonwealth en tant que Commonwealth. C'est ainsi que l'on concilie impérialisme et internationalisme. Les Dominions, à titre de nations officiellement autonomes, feront partie de l'organisme international, mais ils feront tout d'abord partie de l'Empire. Ils pourront, à l'occasion, quant les intérêts de l'Empire ne seront pas en jeu, adopter des attitudes indépendantes. Mais sur toutes les questions vitales pour l'Empire, en tant que tel, ils agiront comme membres de l'Empire. Cet arrangement permettra à la Grande-Bretagne de conserver sa place comme grande puissance, avec la Russie et les Etats-Unis.

DOMESTIC AFFAIRS

Federal Politics

The main topic of the week was the manifesto of the Labor-Progressives at their three day convention in Toronto in which a coalition government of Liberals and Labor-Progressibes was suggested. Most editors who comment do so in a more or less facetious manner. The following are typical:

A few editors have commented upon the need for more adequate hospital facilities for service men, and certain Toronto papers bitterly criticize the delay in starting the Sunnybrook Farm hospital.

The reported intention of the Government to "comb out" the civil service for available manpower for the armed services has been welcomed by many editors.

Manpower and Labour

There has again been little interest shown in labour matters. Questions of manpower are mainly dealt with in relation to reinforcements for the armed services, and to the "waste" of manpower in a home defence army. Most interest has centered in the British White Paper on Postwar Employment, and editors who have discussed the subject express considerable approval of the principles there laid down.

Economic Controls

Discussion in Parliament of the ceiling price on strawberries has caused some criticism of the government, mainly on the ground of "wasting time". The VANCOUVER SUN says:

> This strawberry business is not exactly the kind of thing that should require a discussion in Parliament in a well-ordered democracy.

A few Ontario papers have discussed the further curtailment in the liquor ration, and express the view that the Federal Government has made a mistake in its handling of the situation and that the liquor question should be left in the hands of the provincial governments.

A few editors have followed the lead of the OTTAWA JOURNAL in its criticism of the confusion surrounding the recent announcements regarding oil-burning furnaces. The JOURNAL says:

> Under the date May 25 a letter signed by A. S. Morgan executive assistant to the Oil Controller, went from his Toronto office to "all fuel oil suppliers" in Ottawa and presumably to the trade in general.... The Department of Munitions and Supply, which presumably controls the Oil Controller, seemed surprised at this announcement, but told the Evening Journal on Monday that while householders falling within this comparatively small class could get permission to reconvert to oil they really shouldn't take advantage of it. The next day, in the House of Commons, Minister Howe said flatly that conversion of heating plans from coal to light fuel oil could not be permitted at the present time. The Oil Controller and the Minister ought to get together on this matter -- the present situation is a bit confusing. For those who are effected by the announcement from Mr. Morgan it should be said that they converted to coal voluntarily and at their own expense because Mr. Howe asked it, that those who did not convert -- and they were in the great majority -- never have suffered the least trouble in getting fuel oil, that it is quite natural if the minority group feels it has done its share in saving fuel oil.

Finance

There has been considerable approval of Mr. Ilsley's statement on the increased income allowable to old age pensioners. Many editors feel that the age at which pensions are paid should be lowered to 65.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRIME MINISTER

I am attaching, for your approval, a draft report on the Prime Ministers' meetings which could be circulated for the background information of our representatives abroad. It is put in general terms and is not really very informative, but it would, I think, help to give them a useful indication of the general point of view from which the questions arising in London were viewed.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRIME MINISTER.

Re Commonwealth Relations, Prime Ministers' Conference 1946 ✓

We have learned from private advices from London that there is some prospect that a suggestion will be made for holding another Prime Ministers' conference this spring. The idea seems to be that a Prime Ministers meeting might be held in conjunction with the proposed Commonwealth discussions on commercial questions which, on present plans, would precede the negotiations for tariff reductions between some fourteen countries that are a part of the United States commercial proposals. If so, the time would probably be the latter part of March.

It seems unlikely, however, that all the Commonwealth Prime Ministers could gather in London at that time. Mr. Fraser is, I think, now on his way to London to attend the General Assembly in January. Field Marshal Smuts is contemplating attendance at the second part of the Assembly which may be held in May or June. Mr. Chifley might possibly be able to attend at that time as I believe that he takes a great interest in the commercial and financial discussions. I think it likely that the idea will be dropped but possibly there will be an approach to you from Mr. Attlee.

At the conclusion of the meetings, the assembled representatives of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa place on record their appreciation of the value of the free discussion and exchange of views that characterises the relations of the countries of the British Commonwealth. These methods of consultation have proved their worth. They are based on a continuous exchange of information and comment between the different members of the Commonwealth. They are flexible and can be used to meet a variety of situations and needs, both those where the responsibility is on one member alone and where responsibility may have to be shared. They are peculiarly appropriate to the character of the British Commonwealth, with its independent members who have shown by their sacrifices in the common cause their devotion to kindred ideals and their community of outlook. While all are willing to consider and adopt practical proposals for developing the existing system, it is agreed that the methods now practised are preferable to any formal centralised machinery. In their view such centralised machinery would not facilitate, and might even hamper, the effective co-operation which is the essential characteristic of the nations of the British Commonwealth and their great achievement.

They reaffirm their belief in the efficacy of free and constant consultation and co-operation, not only within the British Commonwealth of Nations but also in the wider international sphere. They are determined to do everything in their power to maintain to the utmost possible extent in time of peace the historic co-operation achieved by the Allies in time of war. They look forward to the steady development throughout the whole world of closer international co-operation based on increasing mutual confidence and devoted to the raising of human standards in conditions of liberty. They declare again the determination of their Governments to give the fullest recognize that one can speak only superficially, but at least on the surface

1) GENERAL IMPRESSIONS OF VISIT TO BRITAIN

a) London has been "tidied up" - local services have been quick to clear away as many as possible of the scars of war damage;

b) there is less tension and less sense of strain than when I visited Britain last autumn;

c) there is still evident fatigue as an after-effect of six long years of war conditions;

d) there is stringency in the available supplies both of CLOTHING AND FOOD - food is adequate in quantity but it lacks some of the variety which, after 6 years, people had looked forward; even so, there is an evident willingness to share the already straitened rations with the still-more needy nations of Europe;

e) some senseof rejoting in e.g. the full-scale resumption of outdoor sports (cricket &c), as well as in the atmosphere of early summer with London in all its glory of greenery and flowers;

f) some recognition of the great need for patience in dealing with many problems, both domestic: socialization of certain industries and resources;
allocation of manpower;
rebuilding of manufacturing capacity for export and foreign: development and recapturing of foreign export markets; relations with the great powers (especially USSR)

Express word of appreciation of hospitality extended by United Kingdom Government throughout three weeks in London both to myself and to members of my staff accompanying me.

2) MEETINGS OF COMMONWEALTH MINISTERS

a) recall that before my arrival in London discussions had been proceeding in two separate weeks on topics of special concern to Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa.

b) after my arrival in London, some of the same ground traversed again, plus a consideration of some new items.

3 Principal subjects receiving attention in closed meetings:

c) Council of Foreign Ministers, Paris (reports by Mr. Bevin) and preparation of peace treaties looking to Conference in Paris / note: date stillindefinite; Council of Foreign Ministers resumed on Saturday last, June 16; until Soviet objections can be met and overcome in some way no likelihood of Peace Conference before autumn) /

d) Problems of administration in Germany;

e) machinery for consultation and co-operation (information services; completion of exchanges of High Commissioners; procedure in "informing" as distinct from asking for "comments";

xxx / see separate note by J.A.G. re Commonwealth Consultation /

f) defence research and service liaison arrangements (talks still continuing in London);

g) general discussion of trade agreements within the Commonwealth;

h) atomic energy; progress in research and development in light of such proposals as those contained in Lilienthal Report (USA).

3 Other problems considered in inter-departmental meetings attended by members of my staff:

i) Commonwealth legislation touching citizenship and nationality of married women (Canadian Citizenship Act now widely accepted as a model for corresponding legislation elsewhere among the nations of the Commonwealth);

j) registration of treaties under the United Nations (no exclusive Commonwealth arrangements, and to this extent a departure from practice of NOT registering intra-Commonwealth agreements under the former League of Nations).

3 Further meetings between myself as Prime Minister and Ministers of the United Kingdom, including Mr. Attlee (Prime Minister)
Lord Addison (Dominion Affairs)
Mr. Dalton (Chancellor of Exchequer

6 Great benefit from renewal of friendly personal contacts with other Ministers of United Kingdom, especially

Herbert Morrison (Lord Privy Seal) - food mission to Canada & USA

Ernest Bevin (Foreign Secretary) - reports of Paris meetings; impressed with great load he is carrying, dealing with USSR with great restraint and patience;

also renewal of friendship with Smuts
Nash
Evatt
Beasley (Asutralian H.C. in London)

Greatly pleased by results of discussions in London (summed up in final communiqué) - emphasis on flexible character of machinery providing for continuous consultation and for decision in Council chambers of respective nations concerned; virtual unanimity on all essential matters (emphasis again away from centralization) press at early stages tended to place emphasis on differences rather than on matters of agreement; but believe the outcome highly satisfactory.

3) VICTORY PARADE IN LONDON, June 8th 1946

Two main impressions

a) the enormous contributions in men and materials made to the Allied War effort by the British Commonwealth and Empire quite apart from the tremendous effort of Britain herself in armed forces and on the home front;

b) the staggering cost of war: what it would mean to have to keep up armaments on the scale represented by this parade of mechanized weapons of all kinds.

CANADA represented in the marching parade by smartly-turned out contingents of each of the three services

Royal Canadian Navy
Canadian Army
Royal Canadian Air Force

a representation of the part which Canada had had in the world-wide fight for freedom

One over-riding impression: THE WORLD INSECURE - the subsiding of an earth-shaking storm the need for patience, vision, imaginativeness in tackling the manifold problems of world organization the need for co-operation and mutual helpfulness in the approach to security and prosperity, since both are indivisible.

10) Arrangements made for passage toCanada of wives and children of Canadian service men-

During voyage back to Canada in HMT "Queen Mary" had opportunities of seeing the great care and sympathy and patience which surround the whole process of bring to Canada the wives of Canadian servicemen and their children; a fascinating commentary on one of the most important increases in our population there has ever been at any time.

On this voyage, 2200 "Canadian dependents", of whom 22 945 children; mothers from all parts of British Isles, with the accents of London, the Western Highlands, the Eastern counties;

all animated by a sense of great expectation in building new homes in all parts of Canada;

most favourably impressed by conduct and by sense of community if interest; also by strong and healthy children.

Aboard ship was able to visit, in company with the Senior Medical Officer, medical examining rooms,

dispensary,
surgical and sick bay quarters,
children's hospital ward, nurseries

all in charge of a most competent and understanding staff:
medical officers and orderlies of the R.C.A.M.C., nursing sisters both of the RCAMC and the Canadian Red Cross;
cheerfulness and patience in ministering to this happy band of Canadians.

Pleasure in being able to extend a word of welcome on behalf of Government and people of Canada to assembled mothers one morning at sea;

Appreciation of all arrangements made by No. 1 Ship Staff (Lt. Col. W.E. Sutherland, O.B.E., Ship's Commandant) for comfort and welfare of all passengers travelling as dependents

(mention, e.g., arrangements for the sending of free telegrams to next of kin in Canada or U.S.A.)

Something reminiscent of Canadian hospitality from the moment these 2200 Canadians boarded this great ship at Southampton, and continued along every mile of the journey to Halifax, where other hands took over.

very sorry to have to give up projected visit to the battlefields where Canadians had fought and to the cemeteries where they lie buried;

also visits to France, Belgium, the Netherlands, and to Germany; felt urgency of business in Canada - the BUDGET remaining legislation made it imperative I should return without further delay once the Victory Celebrations had concluded; hope that when I am able to visit Europe again (perhaps at the time of the Paris Conference, I can carry out this long-cherished plan of visiting places consecrated in the memory of Canada.

From reports received from officials who have recently visited the countries I have mentioned, it is evident there has been some improvement in conditions generally, though they are still far from approximating the 1939 position.

In Western Europe generally, and especially in Denmark, there are prospects of an abundant harvest; in France especially there is a constant spectre of inflation: the situation in which people who have money can buy practically anything they want if they pay for it, with all the resulting inequalities of distribution of some of the necessities of life.

9) THE PLACE OF CANADA

On each visit to Britain since 1941 I have found myself prouder than ever before of the place which Canada occupies in the thoughts and feelings of the people of Britain and of many parts of Europe with which we have had close contacts.

One answer, I believe, is to be found in the admiration for the way in which the war effort of Canada was conducted, and for the spirit of mutual aid which was extended to many of Canada's allies among the United Nations.

Another answer is in the members of allied forces who were trained in Canada, and who have now been able to take back to their homelands something of the Canadian spirit as they knew it.

For the moment, the immediate Canadian contribution is in ~~XX~~ FOOD - primarily in wheat (which in many European countries fills a far larger place in the domestic economy than we in Canada realize) - not exactly a new contribution, since during the war Canadian gifts of wheat (outright ~~fights~~ gifts, e.g. to Greece) helped literally to save the lives of thousands of people in those parts of Europe under the Nazi yoke);

there is also a Canadian contribution through what I might call the continuing aspects of Mutual Aid, in the form of credits under Loan Agreements and the Exports Credits Guarantee Legislation (1945); by this means we shall be able to contribute not only to the physical needs of food, clothing and shelter, but we shall also help in some degree to restore the domestic economy of trading and manufacturing without which no world-wide prosperity is possible.

Perhaps the highest degree of recognition comes from the fact that the effort of Canada has been taken to be the effort of a whole people, and an effort of that whole people sharing in the needs of other lands.

If in this task we can persevere we have nothing to fear for the future interests of Canada abroad.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

STRATEGIC POSITION OF THE BRITISH COMMONWEALTH.

REPORT BY THE CHIEFS OF STAFF.

IN order that there may be an agreed background to other discussions concerning Commonwealth Defence, we have prepared a broad strategical appreciation of the position of the British Commonwealth in the light of our resources and modern conditions of warfare.

2. Recent developments make it appear that Russia is our most probable potential enemy, far more dangerous than a revived Germany. In a conflict with Russia the early and whole-hearted participation of the United States on our side would be vital.

We consider the problem of Commonwealth defence against this background.

Main Support Areas and Vital Communications.

3. We must first consider those areas on which a Commonwealth war effort will be based and without which it would not be possible for us to fight at all.

These areas we have referred to as main support areas, by which we mean areas which contain essential concentrations of man-power, industrial potential or sources of food or raw material.

4. It is clear that the following will be main support areas :—

(a) United Kingdom;
(b) The American continent, including South America;
(c) Africa, south of the Sahara, including East Africa;
(d) Australia and New Zealand.

During the last war India was developed as a main support area. The political future there is at present uncertain, and we cannot be sure that India will remain a single political unit or even a member of the Commonwealth. In view, however, of her man-power and industrial potential, it is of the utmost importance that her political situation be stabilised so that she remains a main support area.

5. The United Kingdom at present contains 63 per cent. of the white man-power of the British Commonwealth and an even greater proportion of its industrial potential, but it is, at the same time, in a highly vulnerable position. As a long-term policy it should be possible to build up the war potential of the Dominions so as to reduce the relative importance of the United Kingdom. But for many years the contribution of the United Kingdom will remain so high that in spite of its vulnerability it must continue to be a main support area.

6. The communications between the main support areas through the Atlantic, Pacific and Indian Oceans are of vital importance, particularly the Atlantic sea communications to the United Kingdom.

Although the sea and air communications through the Mediterranean cannot be classified as vital in the same way as our Atlantic communications, limitations of shipping and the necessity to preserve our freedom of action will make their continued use of very great importance.

Other Areas of Importance to the Security of Main Support Areas.

7. Russian policy at present appears to be to extend her influence to further strategic areas by all means short of major war, and if this process were allowed to continue unchecked we should start another conflict in a most unfavourable position.

Against this threat, and in order to ensure the security of our main support areas, and the sea and air communications between them, we must :—

(a) ensure that at the start of a conflict we have sufficient depth in front of our vital main support areas to allow the necessary time for us to mobilise our own forces and for the resources of the United States to be brought into play;

(b) deny to Russia the opportunity of acquiring in peace large additional resources of man-power and war potential;

(c) retain the necessary bases from which areas of importance to Russia can be brought under threat of attack by air or long-range weapons. This may be our one effective military deterrent to Russian aggression and the only means of defence open to us at the outset of war. For this purpose the United Kingdom as the sole base would be quite inadequate, since many areas of importance would be out of range.

8. In the areas necessary to achieve these aims we do not suggest that we must maintain our influence in peace by a display of military force. In the event of war with Russia we are certainly likely to have to give ground in some of these areas and we would not necessarily try to defend them all. We should, however, on no account weaken ourselves by surrendering our influence in areas of major strategic importance in advance of a war. We should therefore maintain our influence in peace time, using the methods most suitable in each case. These may be political, economic, military or a combination of the three.

9. The areas of particular importance to us in order to fulfil the objects set out in paragraph 7 above are Western Europe, Middle East, India and South-East Asia. In the former two, Russian pressure is already evident and we must anticipate that this will be extended to India and possibly South-East Asia also.

We examine below the strategic importance of each of these areas.

Western Europe.

10. The preservation of Western Europe from Russian domination is of direct importance to the security of the United Kingdom and of the sea and air communications to this main support area. It is of particular importance that the man-power and industrial resources of the area, and especially those of Germany, should not be at the disposal of Russia.

We should therefore be prepared to give the countries of Western Europe the support necessary to ensure that in peace they do not fall under Russian influence.

Middle East.

11. The preservation of our position in the Middle East is essential to prevent the spread of Russian influence throughout the Eastern Mediterranean and also into Africa. From bases in the Middle East we could bring under long-range air attack, not only the important Russian industrial and oil-producing areas of Southern Russia and the Caucasus, but also many other important industrial areas of Russia. Finally, the oil supplies of the Middle East, though extremely vulnerable, are of immense importance to the Commonwealth.

India and South-East Asia.

12. Apart from the fact that we must strive to retain India as a main support area, her security is linked with that of South-East Asia, which, in turn, forms the outer defence of Australia and New Zealand. Moreover, airfields in North-West India are, except for those in Iraq, the nearest we have to certain important Russian industrial areas in the Urals and Western Siberia.

Conclusions.

13. We conclude that—

(a) The security of the Commonwealth main support areas of the United Kingdom, the American Continent, South Africa and Australia is essential. It is of the utmost importance to retain India as a main support area.

(b) The sea and air communications in the Atlantic, Pacific and Indian Oceans which link our main support areas are of vital importance.

Communications through the Mediterranean, though not vital, are of very great importance.

(c) In view of the present Russian policy we should take the necessary political, economic and military measures to maintain our position and influence in Western Europe, the Middle East and South-East Asia. Thus we shall secure the essential depth in front of our main support areas; gain the necessary time to mobilise the forces of the Commonwealth and for the resources of the United States to be brought into play; and retain the air bases necessary to our strategy.

14. These main strategic requirements are based principally on facts of geography and the distribution of man-power and natural resources which do not change. We consider therefore that the basic principles of our strategy set out above will not be radically altered by new developments in methods or weapons of warfare.

ANNEX.

COPY OF A LETTER DATED 9TH APRIL, 1946, FROM THE HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR SOUTH AFRICA TO THE PRIME MINISTER OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.

I have the honour to forward herewith the text of a personal telegram which I have received for transmission to you from Field-Marshal Smuts :—

"I notice that a meeting of Big Four Foreign Ministers may take place at Paris this month. Even at the risk of appearing wearisome I wish once more to impress on you and Mr. Bevin the vital importance of the Mediterranean aspect of the coming Peace Settlement for the future of the British Commonwealth and of World Peace. That future may be deeply compromised if the former and existing position in the Mediterranean is seriously altered, as it will be if Russia gains a footing there, either by way of bases or Mandates, whether solely or jointly with other U.N.O. members.

"The Mediterranean remains the main artery of our Commonwealth Communications, and to expose it to future weakening would be to tamper with the future of the Commonwealth and therefore also future World Peace, to which the security of the Commonwealth is vital. Nowhere do we interfere with Russia's vital communications, and we should not allow any tampering with ours. That way future world trouble lies, as the Commonwealth would not be a free agent with Russia in the Mediterranean. Russia's behaviour in the Iran trouble is a timely warning to us, and convincing proof that she is determined, U.N.O. or no U.N.O., to apply any squeeze she may consider necessary to secure her objects. In the light of this realistic experience we should be doubly on our guard for our future, especially in our vital Mediterranean sphere. Our readiness to conciliate Egypt in the coming treaty negotiations makes it all the more imperative that our Mediterranean position as a whole from Gibraltar to Suez and the Red Sea should not be weakened. France and Italy we may freely count on as future friends. But we have learned to be profoundly doubtful about Russia and her Satellites.

"The Commonwealth should therefore make up its mind at this early stage that under no circumstances will it agree to a Russian Mandate, either sole or joint, over any of the Italian Colonies in Africa. A U.N.O. Mandate, with her in it, would only be one degree less dangerous than a sole Mandate to her. And I trust that the United States will be made to realise, before it is too late, that her own future security calls for a strong and free British Commonwealth, and that for this the security of our Mediterranean lines of communication is essential.

"With these considerations in mind I would urge most strongly that the United Kingdom Government at this meeting of Foreign Ministers should not agree to any Mandate to Russia or any Mandate in which she participates over the Italian Colonies. Rather than be forced to such an agreement the United Kingdom Representatives should stand firm for a postponement of the issue, and meanwhile retain the present British Control over the ex-Italian Colonies. This is a matter where our future demands the greatest firmness now, for any concession here may affect the far future. Russia has annexed Sakhalin and the Kuriles without bothering about Mandates, and Britain and the United States have agreed. The United States has not yet shown her hand in regard to Pacific Islands and bases. Why should Britain be forced to surrender what she now holds at immeasurable sacrifices of the whole Commonwealth? If it becomes necessary, a delaying game may be the safest in the interests of both the Commonwealth and future of World Peace. The United States should be made to realise this. In any case, I have no objection to my views being communicated to her if this is considered useful."

EXTRACTS FROM STATEMENT TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS BY THE RIGHT HON. H. V. EVATT, MINISTER FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS, 13TH MARCH, 1946.

The United Nations.

A key point in the foreign policy of Australia is enthusiastic and sustained activity in all aspects of the work of the United Nations. Admittedly the Constitution of that Organisation has certain defects. These we stressed at the proper time. At San Francisco, however, the rough and inadequate draft plan of Dumbarton Oaks was greatly improved, and I make bold to claim that there is no responsible public man who does not fully and generously recognise Australia's valuable contribution to the process of improvement effected at San Francisco.

I do not wish to quarrel over words, but I think it is quite erroneous to describe the United Nations Organisation merely as an "experiment." On the contrary, it is the best presently available instrument, both for avoiding the supreme and ultimate catastrophe of a third world war, waged with all-destroying weapons, and also for establishing an international order which can and should assure to mankind security against poverty, unemployment, ignorance, famine and disease. The United Nations, in the conception of that great man, Franklin Roosevelt, existed to help realise the twin objectives of freedom from fear and aggression and freedom from want. We shall continue steadfastly and courageously to play our part in this Organisation, on which must rest most of the hopes of men of goodwill throughout the world.

Future of International Co-operation.

It would be a miracle if the cessation of actual hostilities had given rise immediately to an era of peace and security. It is natural for populations which have suffered the privations of war to expect an immediate and dramatic improvement in their material conditions when hostilities cease. Actually, of course, such a sudden change is impossible. It is necessary that this should be fully understood in order to counteract any feeling of frustration or disillusionment because the fruits of victory have not yet been gathered.

Again, when hostilities cease, there is a tendency for Allied countries who have acted in almost complete unity during the war to become more aware of and to accentuate differences in outlook which by resolute and brilliant leadership have been submerged during the crisis of war. It is particularly easy to concentrate upon these points of differences, and to accept them not only as vital, but as irremediable. In my view, this is a most dangerous attitude of mind. It can lead only to disaster if it is unchecked. I have in mind, in particular, criticisms of the Soviet Union without whose magnificent contribution complete victory over Hitler would have been either long delayed or impossible. While the British Commonwealth has fairly been said to have saved the Soviet Union in 1939 and 1940, equally the Soviet is claimed to have saved the British Commonwealth in 1941 and 1942. In truth, the unity in wartime of these Powers and the United States saved the world from Fascist dictatorship.

A chief factor which has created doubts as to the peaceful intentions of the Soviet Union is its expansion both territorially and in zones of special influence since 1939. The basic fact of expansion is undoubted. During the crisis of war both President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill entered into agreements giving the Soviet Union considerable territorial gains not only in Western Europe but also in the Far East. Most of these arrangements for territorial expansion were made by the United Kingdom and United States alone and without prior reference to their allies. They were made primarily in the belief that the Soviet Union would be a trusted and peace-loving ally not only in time of war but in time of peace. Surely that belief is not yet given up.

The real question is, not whether the Soviet Union territory and zones of influence have expanded, but what is the underlying intention and purpose of the Soviet Union. Is it to secure the political domination of other countries, or is it merely to protect Russia against any repetition of the so-called cordon sanitaire which united all reactionary influence in Europe against her during the period between the two great wars? Is it aggressive in substance, or defensive in substance? That is the great question. It will not be forgotten that in the Munich era of appeasement of Hitler and his Axis associates, there was the greatest inclination on the part of some Eastern democracies to isolate the Soviet Union and to hail Hitler as the saviour of civilisation against the so-called Bolshevik hordes. It is important to note that some of those who, between 1933 and 1939, first endured, then pitied, and, finally, embraced Hitler and most of his works, are now to be found amongst those who are prepared to join forces at once against the Soviet Union without any important investigation as to whether its expansionist policy is aggressive or defensive in intent.

A second factor in the situation is the very recent application of atomic energy to warlike purposes. An agreement was made between Britain and the United States of America in relation to the new discovery, and in that arrangement the Soviet Union was not included. Therefore, suspicion amongst the three major Powers is not confined to suspicion of Russia, but it includes also suspicion by Russia. Whether these suspicions are justified or not is beside the point. On the one hand we know that on the part of the peoples of the British Commonwealth and the United States of America there is no aggressive intention against Russia. But the Soviet Union points to the long era of appeasement, when their attempts to make the League of Nations an effective body were continued right up to the point of virtual liquidation of the League at Munich. The period of mutual suspicion seemed to end either in June 1941 when direct aggression against Russia made her our ally or in 1942 when the twenty-year treaty of friendship between Russia and Britain was signed at London.

Now having lived through the great period of wartime partnership, which promised a permanent understanding between the three great Powers on all fundamentals, one is presented almost daily with the monotonous question—does Russia intend aggression?

Having no clear evidence to the contrary and having during the last four years come to know some of Russia's greatest statesmen, I take the view that the Soviet Union's policy is directed towards self protection and security against future attack. In my opinion, her desire is to develop her own economy and to improve the welfare of her peoples.

The two most hopeful signs are first the almost miraculous success of the Allies in the war, and, second, the fact that in a short period of less than twelve months, the Charter of a new world organisation has been created and the organisation itself has come into being. Fifty-one members of the United Nations have pledged themselves to support the principles laid down in the Charter and the work of putting the principles into practice has begun. By these principles all the nations undertake to refrain from aggression and to bring disputes before the United Nations for adjustment.

It is not difficult to find some flaws in the Charter itself. Neither will it be difficult to prove that the machinery of the United Nations is not being used as effectively as it might. The important thing, however, is that a Charter does now exist and that a world organisation has been set up under which the habit of international conciliation and consultation can and must be developed. It is the duty of all of us to encourage the habit of reference to the United Nations, because frequent contact between its members will lessen active suspicion and gradually encourage positive confidence and trust. The recent speeches of Mr. Attlee and Mr. Bevin on the proceedings before the Security Council rightly emphasise the importance of personal contact and frank exchange of views as a step towards more complete understanding.

I do not suggest that this analysis gives any reason for complacency. On the contrary, I think that we need to remind ourselves constantly that the winning of the peace needs a sustained effort, probably no less than the winning of the war. Fascism, Hitlerism, were not ended with the deaths of Mussolini and Hitler. They are insidious philosophies which we sought to overthrow during the war. In my opinion they have not been finally defeated either in international or in domestic affairs.

Australia has consistently maintained the view that the United Nations Organisation should be given the fullest possible support by each member. By this means, a collective world opinion can gradually be built up, and it may also be possible to avoid the establishment of rival blocs of powers viewing one another through an atmosphere of distrust and suspicion. This policy will be pursued by Australia in the Security Council where every effort will be made to ensure full discussion of international disputes as and when they arise. In this respect the initial meetings of the Security Council were remarkably successful. There was free, full and frank discussion at which the public was present. Those who had claimed that the Security Council would meet in secret and avoid a public discussion were confounded by the event.

Even full and public discussion is not enough. Indeed it may degenerate into mere assertion followed by mere counter-assertion, charges followed by counter-charges. There should, therefore, in most cases, be a careful investigation of the truth of the assertions and the charges and a true assessment of the facts by the Security Council or other United Nations agencies followed by a just recommendation or decision. This procedure would be in accordance with the true spirit of the Charter of the United Nations. That is the organisation which was established by all its members for the very purpose of discouraging isolated or limited alliances in favour of collective action in accordance with the principles of justice and law laid down in the Charter. The main purpose of the United Nations is security against war. With atomic energy being used for purposes of unlimited destruction a new world war would cause devastation almost beyond human imagination and would end modern civilisation as we know it.

Special prerogatives and privileges have been vested in the major Powers by the United Nations Organisation. Their mutual confidence is an essential feature of the new international order. Those who by a calculated policy sow distrust between them endanger the life of the United Nations. Those who endanger the life of the United Nations threaten our chief bulwark against a third world war.

Australian Status in Pacific Councils.

The status which has been gradually accorded to Australia in these Pacific Councils is sufficiently proved by three important appointments of distinguished Australians: first, that of General Northcott as leader of all the British Commonwealth occupational forces in Japan; second, that of Mr. Macmahon Ball, representative on the Allied Council not only of Australia but of United Kingdom, New Zealand, and India as well; third, that of Sir William Webb, Australia's War Crimes Commissioner, as President of the Allied Tribunal for the trial at Tokyo of Japanese major war criminals.

The appointment of an Australian, on Australia's nomination, to represent not only Australia but other Governments of the British Commonwealth, including the United Kingdom itself, is a development of great importance. At the time of the Balfour Declaration of 1926 equality of status in international affairs between the United Kingdom and each of the self-governing Dominions was asserted. But this principle was stated to be modified in practice by dissimilarity of functions in relation to matters of defence and foreign relations. In other words, the theory of equality was subject to the practice of inequality. I need not trace here the rapid development in practice of Canada and Australia's activities in the international field between 1926 and 1946. It is sufficient to suggest that an entirely new concept in British Commonwealth relations is now emerging. This concept tends to reconcile full Dominion autonomy with full British Commonwealth co-operation. The same principle involves the possibility of a Dominion acting in certain regions or for certain purposes on behalf of the other Members of the British Commonwealth, including the United Kingdom itself. This is evidence that the machinery between nations of the British Commonwealth has now reached a stage where a common policy can be carried out through a chosen Dominion instrumentality in an area or in relation to a subject matter which is of primary concern to that Dominion. This principle is capable of extension and suggests the possible integration of British Commonwealth policy at a higher level by a new procedure. Its importance is very great and may rapidly increase. We appreciate the full support we have received from the British, New Zealand and Indian Governments and also from the United States Government in these significant arrangements in relation to Japan.

Opening of Meeting.

1. MR. ATTLEE welcomed Mr. Chifley and Dr. Evatt representing Australia, and Mr. Nash, representing New Zealand. He expressed his regret that it had not proved possible for all the Dominion Governments to be represented at the opening meeting but he looked forward to the arrival later of the Prime Ministers of Canada and South Africa.

MR. CHIFLEY thanked Mr. Attlee for his welcome and expressed his pleasure at being able to come to London.

MR. NASH also thanked Mr. Attlee. He expressed the regret of the Prime Minister of New Zealand at his inability to be present.

Review of Foreign Policy.

2. MR. ATTLEE invited Mr. Bevin to give a general review of foreign policy.

MR. BEVIN said that the policy which His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom were following in discussion of the peace settlements was founded on the United Nations Organisation, with regard also to the need for safeguarding the defence of the British Commonwealth. Foreign policy was so closely linked with strategic needs that he feared he would be obliged to encroach in his review on questions of defence and British Commonwealth communications.

Mr. Bevin referred to the difficulties that had arisen between the Allies in the post-war settlement. He was trying to work with both the United States and Soviet Governments, but difficulties had been experienced with each, and especially with the latter. He had eventually found it necessary to take a firm line with the Soviet Government at the First Assembly of the United Nations Organisation and he hoped that they would be more reasonable in their attitude at the forthcoming meeting of Foreign Ministers in Paris.

As regards the Mediterranean, the Soviet Government had staked out claims which would establish them in a position threatening British Commonwealth communications. He had so far resisted the Soviet claims, a course which was in accordance with the views expressed strongly by the South African Government.

The United Kingdom Government for their part aimed at the establishment of a security zone from the Iberian Peninsula to Aden to protect the lines of communication to the Indian Ocean and the Pacific and the vital oil resources in the Middle East. Our primary difficulty was that there was no territory in the Middle East on which we could with security build up our base. It remained to be seen whether we could secure reliable facilities in Egypt as the result of the negotiations now going on there. In case that proved impossible, consideration had recently been given to the possibility of establishing the main base for the Middle East in Kenya. Despite its distance, a base there would have advantages, since it would also face towards the Indian Ocean and would provide a natural meeting-ground for South Africa, India and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Bevin also stressed the importance of our supporting social development in the Middle East. We could not afford to be represented as defending the Pashas while the Communists obtained the support of the common people. He had established a Middle East Office to endeavour to stimulate social progress. It would be able to call on pools of experts in health, irrigation and other matters to advise and assist Arab Governments.

A difficult problem was awaiting settlement in the Straits. The Soviet Government claimed a special position there. The United Kingdom Government took the view that the Straits should be an international waterway and had expressed their readiness to revise the Montreux Convention. Much depended on the settlement reached in this case since it would affect the Soviet view as to the settlement in the Dodecanese and it would also affect the political situation in Greece.

In Eastern Europe generally, it was difficult to penetrate behind the iron curtain let down by the Russians. His policy was to concentrate for the moment on trade agreements which might lead on later to a solution of political difficulties. He hoped that he was about to conclude a reasonably satisfactory trade agreement with Yugoslavia and negotiations were proceeding with Poland.

In Western Europe, the political future of France was very uncertain, and the United Kingdom Government's relations with her had been complicated by the difference of view over the future of the Ruhr and Rhineland. He had, however, worked out tentative proposals with a view to exploratory discussions with the French, Belgian and Netherlands Governments; and the United States Government had communicated proposals for a treaty to provide for the disarmament of Germany, which would, he thought, serve as a useful basis of discussion. In Northern Europe the political position of Norway was difficult. As to Spain, while he disliked the Franco régime, a breach with Spain would involve the loss of valuable supplies of pyrites, ore and resin.

The general aim of the United Kingdom Government in Europe was to support the principle of social democracy, which was not acceptable to the Soviet Government. The United Kingdom Government were handicapped by their temporary inability to offer either credits or supplies, and the ultimate success of this policy must for a time remain in doubt.

MR. CHIFLEY said that the main question which the Australian Ministers wished to discuss with their colleagues from other parts of the British Commonwealth was that of future arrangements for defence in the Pacific. Australia had been in a very difficult position in 1942–43. They had recognised then that the British Commonwealth must use the greater part of its resources to preserve the United Kingdom—if that had been overrun, the rest of the Commonwealth could scarcely have survived—and that in those circumstances they could not expect that much material assistance could be given towards the defence of Australia and New Zealand. They wished, however, to do their best to ensure that such a situation should not arise again in the future. It was possible that Japan might again become capable of aggression in the Pacific; and the security of Australia and New Zealand might be threatened from other quarters. They were anxious, therefore, that properly co-ordinated arrangements should be made in advance for defence against aggression in the Pacific, so that the future security of Australia and New Zealand could be assured.

DR. EVATT added that it was the desire of the Australian Ministers to see that the United States was associated with arrangements for defence in the Pacific. Thus, while they were willing in principle to give the United States Government facilities for military bases in the South-West Pacific, they would wish to be assured that these bases would be used in accordance with a common defence policy for the area.

Dr. Evatt said that he had been greatly interested in Mr. Bevin's suggestions for building up a line of communication from the United Kingdom through Africa to the Pacific.

As regards the Peace Conference, the Australian Government recognised that United Kingdom Ministers had special interests in and special knowledge of Europe's problems; but Australia was anxious to play its part in the negotiation of the peace settlements with European Powers, and felt that it was entitled to do so in view of the contribution which it had made as a belligerent in Europe in both the great wars of the twentieth century. At the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in London Australia and other Dominions had made their views known. They had requested the calling of a conference of active belligerents in the European war, which would review all recommendations of the Council of Foreign Ministers. Subsequently, at the Moscow Conference it had been agreed that the draft Peace Treaties should be considered at the wider Peace Conference, at which Australia would be represented. He hoped that at this wider Conference there would be real consultation with the Powers not represented on the Council of Foreign Ministers. He requested that, if there were problems which could not be solved at the forthcoming meeting of Foreign Ministers in Paris, the wider Conference would be given a practical opportunity to solve them.

Dr. Evatt agreed that relations with the Soviet Government constituted the greatest current problem of foreign policy. This problem could best be considered in relation to specific issues, as they arose in the course of the conferences. He hoped, however, that none of the Governments of the British Commonwealth would wish to proceed on the postulate that conflict with Russia was inevitable. Such a postulate would result in the problems of the peace settlement and of territorial adjustments being solved, not in accordance with principles of justice, but solely in accordance with military and strategic planning with Russia as the designated enemy. Such a possibility was disastrous and utterly inconsistent with the principles of the United Nations Organisation.

MR. NASH said that during the last war the United Kingdom had saved civilisation, in the sense that the great contributions made by the British Dominions and the United States of America would have been of no avail if the United Kingdom had not stood firm in 1940. Now, however, the United Kingdom was confronted with a situation more difficult than any which she had faced before, and he did not see how she could maintain her influence unless all parts of the Commonwealth came closely together in peace, as they had done in war. The time had gone when the United Kingdom alone could tell other countries what to do. If the British Commonwealth could be regarded as a unit in foreign policy there would now be three world Powers of roughly equal influence—the British Commonwealth, the United States and the Soviet Union. Each had a different outlook and philosophy in world affairs; and it seemed that the policies of only two out of the three were reconcilable.

Throughout South-East Asia and the Far East there was a rising tide of nationalism. Public attention was now focussed on the problem of famine in these areas; but we should realise that these peoples had never in the past had enough to eat. As they became better educated they realised the extent to which the Western peoples had drawn from them resources with which they might have improved their own standards of life, and they were ready to set higher standards for themselves. They were no longer prepared to accept domination by the Western Powers. The peoples of the British Commonwealth were now prepared to assist them to develop their economy and to raise their standard of living. We could no longer defend policies which maintained half the world in plenty at the cost of leaving the other half in conditions of starvation. The result of raising the standard of life of the peoples of the East would be to increase their power; and, unless we were to make them more dangerous to ourselves, we must at the same time find positive means to convince them of the advantages of a peaceful way of life. We must seek a positive policy in which we could persuade the United States Government to join us; but we should be handicapped in making progress in this direction so long as we were uncertain of the policy of the Soviet Union. It would be tragic if that uncertainty forced us to abandon progressive policies and concentrate on measures of self-defence; and the consequences for the world's future over the next 100 years would be disastrous. He hoped that it might be possible to find some means to avoid this policy of despair.

Mr. Nash said that his primary object in attending the present conference was to see how New Zealand could best contribute towards a common scheme for the defence of the Pacific area. The defence of this area could be assured only by the co-operation of the Governments of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and the United Kingdom; and he agreed that there would be great advantages if the United States could also be induced to play a part in such a common plan. If a common scheme of defence could be arranged, New Zealand would be ready to play her part, both financially and otherwise.

The following points were made in discussion:—

(a) The future development of Japan must, for the time, remain uncertain. A country of this size could not be held down indefinitely; and, if the victorious Powers attempted to follow that course, by military occupation or control, they would bleed themselves white in the process. Our policy must be to seek to transform Japan into a useful and reliable member of the comity of nations. We should, in particular, avoid the type of treatment which had left Germany eager for, and capable of, further aggression within twenty years after 1918.

We could not exclude the possibility that China and Japan might draw more closely together. China might become interested in such a rapprochement. There were already Chinamen who felt that there were no great divergencies of interest between China and Japan. And advantage might be taken of conflicts of interest in China between the Great Powers. There were already signs of conflict between Soviet policy in Manchuria and United States policy in North China. The Japanese population in China might also increase. It seemed likely that members of the Japanese armies in China would remain there in substantial numbers. And the payment of reparations by Japan might have the same effect if China's claim to reparations (which was larger than that of any of the other Powers) could be satisfied only through the importation into China of large numbers of Japanese technicians. Such a movement might have the effect of creating a considerable war potential in China. Finally, it should not be overlooked that the Chinese bitterly resented the secret treaty between the United States Government and the Soviet Government about the disposal of Port Arthur; and this might become a further rallying point between China and Japan.

(b) MR. CHIFLEY stressed the importance of securing facilities for British Commonwealth bases in the Netherlands East Indies. This was a point which should be kept in mind in discussion of any political settlement between the Netherlands Government and the Indonesian leaders. If an independent Indonesian republic were created, it would become even more important that we should secure appropriate military facilities in such places as Batavia, Sourabaya and Koepang. This was in the outer ring of any defence scheme for the South-West Pacific and was almost as important for that purpose as New Guinea.

(c) MR. GEORGE HALL said that he would like to put it on record that—except in North Borneo, which was still under military administration—civil government had been re-established in all the British Colonial territories in South-East Asia and the Far East.

(d) Reference had been made in the discussion to the growth of nationalist feeling in various countries throughout the world. It would be mistaken to suppose that these movements were always inspired by Communists acting on the instructions of the Soviet Government. In addition, there had been a widespread swing-over of political opinion towards the Left. MR. CHIFLEY said, in particular, that Admiral Mountbatten was convinced that the nationalist movement in Indonesia had not been inspired by Communists.

MR. ATTLEE emphasised that in the circumstances created by the development of new weapons, the United Kingdom had become very vulnerable to attack. The Empire had many of her eggs in a small basket in an uncomfortably exposed position. It was, therefore, of first importance for the United Kingdom to stimulate the independence of neighbouring European States.

As regards the route through the Mediterranean, this must necessarily remain of great interest to the British Commonwealth. Our difficulty there was that we had no secure foothold of territory in the Middle East west of the southern end of the Red Sea. Mr. Bevin had already explained the difficulties in Egypt; and Palestine would not provide a satisfactory alternative.

Mention had been made of the problem of India. There was one aspect of that problem not always realised. Thanks to the peace and security which we had maintained throughout India, her population was increasing at the rate of 5 million a year without a corresponding increase in her food resources.

LORD ADDISON said that two points in particular seemed to him to have emerged from the discussion; first, a general recognition of the need for more effective machinery for co-operation between the different parts of the Commonwealth; secondly, a general recognition that co-operation with the United States in many spheres of policy would also be necessary.

He wished to suggest that the possibility of closer economic co-operation should be explored. For instance, Australia was the producing area geographically marked out as the natural one to supply food to India, and he would like to suggest that there were here possibilities of building up trade on a very large scale. He hoped that the future Government in India would be willing to build up large stocks of grain as a reserve against recurring famine.

Reference had been made to the growth all over the world of the spirit of nationalism and the demand for better standards of life. It would be a mistake for the Commonwealth to regard this as necessarily a menace to its well-being. That would depend on our method of approach to these movements. They might well be turned to our advantage.

The immediate question, as epitomised by Mr. Nash, seemed to him to be that the Meetings should think out machinery for making co-operation between the different parts of the Commonwealth more effective, particularly in the great area between New Zealand, Australia and South Africa. It seemed to him that there were great possibilities of building up a more coherent system than that which existed at present. It had been shown in the war that the different parts of the Commonwealth could co-operate closely to their mutual advantage. The same should be possible in peace.

Regional Organisation in South-East Asia and South-West Pacific.

3. MR. BEVIN, during the course of his review of foreign policy, referred to the organisation which had recently been established in South-East Asia under Lord Killearn as Special Commissioner for the area. It seemed to him that this was an organisation which had great possibilities. There was great need for economic development in all the countries of South-East Asia, where there were great resources and the general standards of living were still low. It would be to the common advantage if these standards could be raised. There was here a vast potential market at present largely untapped. The area was one in which many countries were concerned. Thus it was pre-eminently an area in which co-ordination of effort would be to the common advantage. He saw Singapore as the focal point in this co-ordination. Lord Killearn's headquarters would be there. He hoped that it would be the focus round which the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and India could build up the development of the whole area. The British Commonwealth and Empire was somewhat strung out in this part of the world; he looked to the new organisation at Singapore to provide a meeting ground for certain practical purposes, and he hoped that it could be built up to provide a binding link between the different parts of the Empire. While we should need and value the co-operation of foreign countries immediately interested in the area, such as France, Siam and the Netherlands East Indies, he did not see that a forward policy in this area need bring us into conflict with any of the other Great Powers.

Lord Killearn's organisation was starting in a modest way. At the moment it was primarily concerned with the urgent problem of organising and co-ordinating food supplies for the area. Lord Killearn had just held a useful Conference on this subject, at which the heads of the administration of all the territories had been present and also a representative from Australia. Mr. Bevin saw further useful work to be done in the field of nutrition, a subject on which Australia and New Zealand had already contributed much. There seemed to him also room for the development of broadcasting and other publicity services and for the co-ordination of shipping facilities. The organisation would be able to draw on the experience gained by the South-East Asia Command which had covered the whole area. He suggested that the opportunity should be taken of the meetings of Prime Ministers to discuss fully the possibilities of developing the new organisation.

DR. EVATT said that he had been much interested in Mr. Bevin's statement. He welcomed his emphasis on the need for improved economic standards in the area. That was important from the point of view of both security and welfare. He recalled that Australia and New Zealand had themselves proposed a year or two ago the establishment of a regional commission for the South-West Pacific. The area which it was to cover did not extend so far to the West as Singapore. He believed that there were great possibilities in the idea of closer association for regional purposes. He suggested that in studying the subject as suggested by Mr. Bevin, the earlier proposals made by Australia and New Zealand should be included. MR. BEVIN agreed to this suggestion.

Strategic Position of the British Commonwealth.

The Meeting had before them a report (P.M.M. (46) 1) by the Chiefs of Staff containing a broad strategical appreciation of the position of the British Commonwealth in the light of Commonwealth resources and modern conditions of warfare.

LORD ALANBROOKE, speaking on behalf of the Chiefs of Staff, amplified the report before the Meeting, and with the aid of maps explained the factors which had led the Chiefs of Staff to the conclusions recorded in paragraph 13 of their report. He emphasised that the appreciation was not compiled on the assumption that war was imminent or inevitable, but it set out the military position in which the Commonwealth found itself at the present time and the precautionary measures which it should take for its future defence.

LORD TEDDER dealt with the air aspect and recent development of weapons. He explained the importance of the time factor and the necessity for ensuring the security of bases in any possible future conflict.

SIR RHODERICK McGRIGOR explained in the light of modern developments the importance which still attached to keeping the sea communications open between the vital areas of the Commonwealth, and the future efforts and requirements of the Navy in dealing with this problem.

The Meeting, after hearing the views of the Chiefs of Staff, had a full discussion on the strategy outlined in the report, with particular reference to its bearing on the United Nations Organisation.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

THE DRAFT PEACE TREATIES WITH ITALY, ROUMANIA, BULGARIA, HUNGARY AND FINLAND.

MEMORANDUM BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

AS a result of the Moscow Agreement (Annex A) the Deputies resumed work on the Peace Treaties in London in January. The Italian Treaty has been discussed on the basis of the original United Kingdom draft Heads and the conclusions reached at the Council in September. The Balkan and Finnish Treaties have been discussed on the basis of draft Treaties submitted by the Soviet Delegation.

I.—ITALIAN PEACE TREATY.

The Soviet Deputy, M. Gousev, has put forward a number of extreme claims and has been unwilling to make any concessions on any important question. The main features of the Deputies' discussions have been :—

A.—Venezia Giulia.

The Deputies appointed a Four-Power Commission to visit the area. The Commission's report is not yet complete and the alignment of the new Italo-Yugoslav frontier has thus not yet been discussed in substance by the Deputies. But in the course of the discussions about the terms of reference of the Commission, the Soviet Delegation showed their sympathy for the extreme Yugoslav claim (which covers the whole disputed area and parts of Italy proper), whilst the three Western Powers favoured an Italian Trieste linked by a corridor to Italy. The United States Delegation suggested a frontier which would follow the 1914 Austro-Italian frontier in the Isonzo Valley down to Gorizia, which would leave to Italy the towns of Gorizia and Trieste and the Western half of the Istrian peninsula including the Arsa coalfields.

B.—South Tyrol.

The Deputies consider they are precluded by the Foreign Ministers' decision in September from considering the Austrian claim for the whole of the South Tyrol. Whilst the other Delegations would have been prepared to examine minor rectifications in Austria's favour on the basis of the Austrian memoranda, M. Gousev declined to do so.

C.—Franco-Italian Frontier.

Apart from the Briga-Tenda area the United Kingdom and United States Delegations are ready to accept the French claims. M. Gousev has declined to express any view.

D.—The Dodecanese.

Greece's claim is supported by the United Kingdom, United States and French Delegations. M. Gousev has refused to discuss this question.

E.—Future of the Italian Colonies.

M. Gousev has maintained the Soviet claim to sole trusteeship over Tripolitania, whilst signifying his readiness to agree to collective trusteeship over the other Colonies. Mr. Dunn, the United States Deputy, has maintained the United States proposals for U.N.O. Collective Trusteeship over all the Colonies and has privately informed M. Gousev that the United States Government would not support the claim of any one of the Big Four to sole trusteeship over any colony. The French Delegation advocate Italian trusteeship over all the Colonies. The United Kingdom Delegation have argued that this problem should be dealt with in two stages: limiting the Treaty provisions to the renunciation of Italian sovereignty, and leaving the future arrangements for later discussion.

F.—Reparation.

M. Gousev has maintained the Soviet claim for 100 million dollars with a further 200 million dollars for Yugoslavia, Greece and Albania. Whilst the other three Delegations recognise Italy's liability to make reparations, they maintain that she is physically incapable of doing so, except in certain limited forms : surplus war plant, external assets, or State property in ceded territories.

G.—Economic and Financial Clauses.

With the exception of restitution, on which the Soviet Delegation advocate a thesis different to that recommended by the United Kingdom, United States and French Delegations, the Soviet Delegation have refused to discuss in detail any of the economic and financial clauses pending settlement of the reparation issue.

H.—Military, Naval and Air Clauses.

Good progress has been made with these and agreement has been reached at expert level on limiting the Italian Army to 265,000 men and the Italian Air Force to 350 machines. Various measures of demilitarisation are to be applied to Pantellaria, the Pelagian Islands, Sicily and Sardinia and probably also on the Franco-Italian frontier. Certain types of weapon, e.g., rockets and submarines, are to be prohibited.

The two principal unresolved problems are the disposal of the Italian Navy and the establishment of Allied machinery to verify the execution of these clauses.

I.—Disposal of the Italian Navy.

The four Delegations are agreed that Italy shall be allowed to retain a Navy, but its exact size is still under debate. The Soviet Delegation have advanced a claim to one-third of the Fleet, which is contested by the other three Delegations. The disposal of the balance between the other Allies has not yet been discussed.

J.—Allied Machinery for the Enforcement of the Military, Naval and Air Clauses.

The Soviet Delegation are opposed to the establishment of any machinery. The other three Delegations consider such machinery is necessary if only for a short period.

II.—Treaties with Roumania, Bulgaria and Hungary.

As there are common features between all the Peace Treaties the failure to agree on an Italian draft has impeded progress on the Balkan Treaties. There are, moreover, certain major questions on which difference has arisen between the Soviet Delegation on one side and the United Kingdom and United States Delegations on the other. These are :—

A.—The need to define frontiers which the Soviet Delegation argue is unnecessary.

B.—Provisions for the Danube, to any mention of which the Soviet Delegation are opposed.

C.—The limitation of the Armed Forces of these three enemy States, which the Soviet Delegation consider is unnecessary.

D.—Adequate economic and financial provisions, more especially the restoration of United Nations property, rights and interests which the Soviet Delegation tend to regard as superfluous.

The payment of adequate reparation by Bulgaria to Greece has not yet been discussed and may present difficulties.

III.—Treaty with Finland.

Once the other treaties have been agreed this treaty should present little difficulty.

ANNEX A.

Extract from Moscow Agreement.

AS announced on the 24th December, 1945, the Governments of the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom and the United States of America have agreed and have requested the adherence of the Governments of France and China to the following procedure with respect to the preparation of Peace Treaties :—

1. In the drawing up by the Council of Foreign Ministers of Treaties of Peace with Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland, only members of the Council who are, or under the terms of the agreement establishing the Council of Foreign Ministers adopted at the Berlin Conference are deemed to be, signatory of the surrender terms, will participate, unless and until the Council takes further action under the agreement to invite other members of the Council to participate on questions directly concerning them. That is to say :—

(a) The terms of the Peace Treaty with Italy will be drafted by the Foreign Ministers of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, the Soviet Union and France;

(b) The terms of the Peace Treaties with Roumania, Bulgaria and Hungary by the Foreign Ministers of the Soviet Union, the United States of America and the United Kingdom;

(c) The terms of the Peace Treaty with Finland by the Foreign Ministers of the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom.

The Deputies of the Foreign Ministers will immediately resume their work in London on the basis of understandings reached on the questions discussed at the first plenary session of the Council of Foreign Ministers in London.

2. When the preparation of all these drafts has been completed, the Council of Foreign Ministers will convoke a conference for the purpose of considering Treaties of Peace with Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland. The conference will consist of the five members of the Council of Foreign Ministers together with all members of the United Nations which actively waged war with substantial military force against European enemy States, namely : U.S.S.R., United Kingdom, United States of America, China, France, Australia, Belgium, Belo-Russian S.S.R., Brazil, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Ethiopia, Greece, India, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Union of South Africa, Yugoslavia and Ukrainian S.S.R. The conference will be held not later than the 1st May, 1946.

3. After the conclusion of the deliberations of the conference and upon consideration of its recommendations the States signatory to the terms of armistice with Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland—France being regarded as such for the purposes of the Peace Treaty with Italy—will draw up final texts of Peace Treaties.

4. The final texts of the respective peace treaties as so drawn up will be signed by representatives of the States represented at the conference which are at war with the enemy States in question. The texts of the respective peace treaties will then be submitted to the other United Nations which are at war with the enemy States in question.

5. The peace treaties will come into force immediately after they have been ratified by the Allied States signatory to the respective armistices, France being regarded as such in the case of the Peace Treaty with Italy. These treaties are subject to ratification by the enemy States in question.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

DISPOSAL OF THE ITALIAN COLONIES.

MEMORANDUM BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

I.—Introduction.

MY purpose in this paper is to summarise the salient features of this question, to describe developments during recent months and to examine a number of alternative solutions. Facts and figures on the population and finance are given in Annexes A and B.

2. The major points on which any consideration of this question must be based will appear in the course of what follows; but its primary importance to us lies in the fact that these territories are at present in our possession by right of conquest and are under British military administration, and that they flank the main line of Imperial communication between the United Kingdom, India, Australia and New Zealand. The war with the Axis has demonstrated their strategic importance and any decision as to their disposal must be closely related to the broad question of Imperial Defence.

3. It is my wish, before His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom come to any decision on the policy to be adopted, to confer with my Dominion colleagues so that we may agree on a policy which will not only satisfy the interests of the British Commonwealth, but will also take into account the necessity of arriving at a practical solution and of obtaining the acceptance of the major Powers, so far as is possible, and of the inhabitants of the territories themselves.

4. The advantages and disadvantages of arriving at an immediate solution are examined in paragraphs 19–22. Whether it is wise or not to delay the final international arrangement disposing of these territories, it is at least imperative in my view that we should decide urgently in our own minds what our immediate policy is to be. I cannot over-emphasise the responsibility which the Government of the United Kingdom is bearing in its present administration of these territories and if it should be decided to postpone decision on the policy to be adopted we shall still have to decide in what form this administration is to continue.

5. There are in my view two questions of great urgency which have to be decided as quickly as possible, even if it is resolved to hold over any decision on the whole problem of the Italian Colonies to a later date:—

(1) Our present position in the Ogaden and the Reserved Area, which are both territories under Ethiopian sovereignty, is dependent on a treaty with Ethiopia which expires next March. It has to be decided, therefore, whether, in order to obtain our objectives in East Africa, we should proceed at once to negotiate an agreement with the Emperor of Ethiopia.

(2) The problems of the present administration of the Italian Colonies are discussed more fully in this paper. The urgent question at the moment is to decide how the administration is to continue if we feel it is wise to maintain it for any protracted period. There are not only acute difficulties of staff. There are grave dangers of trouble, particularly in Libya, if the United Kingdom Government continue to make no declaration of policy which satisfies to some extent the heavy pressure which the inhabitants themselves are putting on the administration. If no such declaration is made, it is inevitable that our popularity will wane, and that the inhabitants will add violence to their pressure, and ultimately it may be impossible to put through any proposals on which we may finally decide. At the same time it must be borne in mind that we are bound under International Law to pursue a policy of Care and Maintenance, and any unilateral action which we may take must be such as not to have International repercussions, that would equally render impossible the application of our final proposals.

6. On those two points an early decision is required. The broader question of the final settlement is one which needs yet more careful consideration, and in this paper I have attempted to set out the advantages and the disadvantages of the alternative proposals which have been made.

II.—Retrospect.

The United Kingdom Government's Commitments.

7. The United Kingdom Government, up to September of last year, had entered into the following commitments :—

(i) On the 8th January, 1942, the then Foreign Secretary said in the House of Commons : " His Majesty's Government are determined that at the end of the war the Senussis in Cyrenaica will in no circumstances again fall under Italian domination." In addition, in 1940 General (now Field-Marshal) Wilson told an assembly of Senussi Chiefs : " We shall co-operate . . . . so that the Arabs may be entitled to regain their freedom and take back their lands from Italian oppressors and restore their independence once more."

(ii) They are committed to consultation with the British Somalis by pledges given in Parliament that their status would not be changed without consultation.

(iii) They are morally bound to consider the interests and wishes of the inhabitants of the former Italian Colonies and, in particular, they subscribed to the Declaration in the San Francisco Charter (Article 73) in recognising the principle " that the interests of the inhabitants of these territories " (i.e., all dependent territories) " are paramount " and of accepting " the obligation . . . . to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the people and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions." The inhabitants, in particular of Libya, have been given to believe that they will be formally consulted before any decision is taken on their future.

Council of Foreign Ministers, September 1945.

8. Before the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in September the United Kingdom ideas for the future of the Italian Colonies were as follows :—

(a) Tripolitania to be placed under international trusteeship with Italy as Administering Authority.

(b) Cyrenaica to be placed under international trusteeship with the United Kingdom as Administering Authority.

(c) Italian Somaliland, together with British Somaliland, the Ogaden and the Reserved Areas, to be placed under international trusteeship with the United Kingdom as Administering Authority.

(d) Eritrea to be given to Ethiopia, except for the North-Western Lowlands which were to be joined to the Sudan.

These proposals were not submitted to the Council of Foreign Ministers in September because the situation was radically altered by the presentation of the United States plan for Collective Trusteeship and the Soviet demand for Tripolitania.

9. The United States proposals are as follows :—

(a) Libya will be granted independence at the end of ten years. In the interval it will be under a U.N.O. trusteeship agreement. This will provide for an administrator with full executive power appointed by and responsible to the Trusteeship Council of U.N.O. To him will be attached an Advisory Committee of seven composed of representatives of the United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, France, Italy and the United States and a European and an Arab resident of Libya selected by the five Governments named.

(b) Eritrea will be accorded the same treatment as in the case of Libya, the Advisory Committee in this case, however, to include two residents of Eritrea appointed by the five Governments. There will, however, be a territorial cession in favour of Ethiopia which will give Ethiopia access to the sea through the port of Assab.

(c) In the case of Italian Somaliland, there will be a similar trusteeship arrangement, without, however, any fixed date for independence. There will be an administrator appointed by and responsible to the Trusteeship Council of U.N.O. and an Advisory Committee including two residents of Somaliland in addition to the representatives of the five Governments named.

(d) In the case of all three colonial areas, the Security Council of U.N.O. may, if it deems necessary, select strategic points for administration by it as strategic areas in the interest of world security.

10. The United Kingdom Government decided to give the American proposal conditional support for the following reasons :—

(a) The probable effect on public opinion in this country;

(b) The proposal provided a means of dealing with the embarrassing Russian request for sole trusteeship over Tripolitania;

(c) The importance of assisting the United States Administration to engage American responsibility in this field, while public opinion in the United States was in the mood.

This decision was made on the assumption that, if the United States plan was accepted, the United States would play its part. This, it was pointed out, was vital.

11. The decision of the Council of Foreign Ministers in September was to refer to the Deputies "for preliminary consideration the matter of trusteeship for the Italian Colonies, suggesting that they should make the widest use possible of the proposals of the United States Delegation and take into account the views expressed by the other Delegations . . . ." and "asked the Deputies to present their report on this question to the Governments members of the Council not less than fourteen days before the opening of the next Plenary Conference of the Council."

Views of other Governments.

12. The French advocate Italian trusteeship over all the Colonies, subject to certain territorial rectifications with adjacent French territory.

13. Egypt considers that a plebiscite should be held in Libya and would welcome any of the following solutions: a free and independent Libya which could become a member of the Arab League; incorporation in Egypt; or an International Trusteeship to be exercised by Egypt or the Arab League. These Egyptian proposals have been endorsed by other Arab States.

14. The Emperor of Ethiopia has laid claim to both Eritrea and Italian Somaliland and recently despatched representatives to discuss with the Foreign Office the whole question of Ethiopia's frontiers. The Ethiopian Foreign Minister was informed that the United Kingdom Government wished to solve the problem of the grazing grounds of the British Somali tribes which lay in Ethiopian sovereign territory, and that the solution which the United Kingdom Government put forward in the interests of the inhabitants was the unification of all the Somali territories, and that if the Emperor was prepared to consider this solution favourably it would be easier for the United Kingdom Government to support Ethiopia's claims to Eritrea.

Views of the Government of South Africa.

15. The South African Government transmitted on the 20th September, 1945, a memorandum which stated that in their view "the chief issue of the disposal of the Italian Colonies is whether or not the protection of the strategic Empire route through the Mediterranean and Red Sea is to be maintained or abandoned." It continued that the future control of strategic bases in Cyrenaica and Italian

Somaliland should contain an effective guarantee to the British Commonwealth that the danger it had to fight against during the last two wars should not occur again, and that, as a result of Russia's expansion in the Near East, to place the Colonies under international control would expose the Arabs to increased Soviet influence. The memorandum concludes that the Red Sea communications are as important as ever and that therefore in order to reconcile British strategic interests with the United States proposal for Collective Trusteeship—

Cyrenaica should be retained under strategic control either—

(i) as a British strategic base under the Security Council; or
(ii) by granting independence to the Senussi and making a treaty with them under agreement with the Security Council; or
(iii) by putting it under Egyptian administration on condition that the military clauses in the Egyptian Treaty applied to Cyrenaica.

Tripolitania should either be returned to Italy and demilitarised or placed under International Trusteeship.

Eritrea should be given to Abyssinia and the Somali territories unified under British mandate.

16. In a message of the 6th October, 1945, Field-Marshal Smuts pointed out that "Russia had had her reward for her enormous efforts in Europe. Why should the British Commonwealth not have theirs for their immense efforts in Africa and the Mediterranean basin and elsewhere? We are prepared also to concede to the United States of America much of a free hand by way of strategic bases in the Pacific. She should loyally support us in our vital African interests," and should appreciate "that ours is not a mere selfish interest, but a vital necessity of future world balance and world peace." In another context Field-Marshal Smuts stated that Eritrea should only be given as trust territory to Ethiopia on condition that the United States accept the Massawa area as a security base, since it is in British interests to associate the United States in this all-important line of communication.

17. At the end of January a message was received from Field-Marshal Smuts setting out his views in the light of current developments on the three principal objectives to be achieved in the disposal of the Italian Colonies—

(a) to exclude Russia from any share in the Italian Colonies whatever;
(b) to preserve British strategic interests in North and East Africa;
(c) to win the lasting friendship of Italy.

Field-Marshal Smuts concludes that the United States plan is dangerous to British interests, and urges strongly that we should "play for time (he mentions a period of five years) rather than commit ourselves to steps which we may regret in future." In his view we should keep Cyrenaica and Tripolitania for the time being, with a view to restoring at any rate Tripolitania to Italy under trusteeship: meanwhile we should appeal to the United States to adopt a helpful attitude to us over the Italian Colonies, just as we are doing with the United States over Pacific territories.

III.—Undesirability of Delaying Tactics.

18. The various proposals which have been made for the disposal of the Italian Colonies reveal two principal differences of approach. Certain of them postulate that an immediate international agreement should be arrived at, while others maintain that decision on their future must be delayed.

19. The arguments for delay are—

(1) The international situation is so confused that it is preferable to wait until it clarifies before arriving at any decision.
(2) It is still uncertain whether the United Nations Organisation is capable of bearing the great responsibility of colonial administration in this period of its perilous infancy, and whether therefore any of the Italian Colonies can safely be entrusted to its charge under collective trusteeship.

W.L.M. King Papers, Memoranda and Notes, 1940-1950,
MG 26 J 4, Volume 324, pages C223301-C224270

PUBLIC ARCHIVES
ARCHIVES PUBLIQUES
CANADA

20. On the other hand, there is no advantage in playing for time unless we are likely to be in a better position to attain our objectives at the end of the time gained than we are at present. Delay might see Russia better placed in a few years time for asserting her aims in the Mediterranean and Levant, and the United States might be even less willing than now to share in responsibility in this area. It is therefore unsafe to assume that delay would improve our chances of keeping Russia out of Africa.

21. Delay would, moreover, have the following serious disadvantages :—

(i) If we refuse to discuss final arrangements for the Italian Colonies, the Russians will probably retaliate by refusing to commit themselves on the future of the Dodecanese and even on the Italian Peace Treaty as a whole, while throwing on us the odium of obstructing a settlement.

(ii) The United Kingdom would bear an increasingly burdensome administrative and financial responsibility for the colonies. There are already acute difficulties over staff which are increasing as demobilisation proceeds.

(iii) The uncertainty about the future complicates the task of the British Military Administrators and affords in the administered territories, and in the Middle East generally, grounds for criticism and intrigue which are likely to become increasingly embarrassing and to make the final settlement more difficult. The longer that British tutelage lasts the greater will nationalist feeling grow, and after a number of years it might become impossible to impose any settlement which could be agreed internationally. It is probable also that Libya may become infected with the Soviet propaganda that is active in the Middle East, and that Ethiopia will stir up trouble in Eritrea and Italian Somaliland.

(iv) Finally our present position in the Ogaden and the Reserved Areas has a definite time limit. It depends on the Anglo-Ethiopian Agreement of December 1944, which was secured only in the face of very keen opposition and which expires in March 1947. Failure to conclude a new Agreement with Ethiopia on the future of Italian East Africa might result in British troops continuing to occupy the Ogaden and the Reserved Areas beyond the time-limit of March 1947. We should then be exposed to the same criticism as Russia in recent weeks with regard to Persia. Moreover, the United States Government recognise Ethiopia's frontiers as those of 1935 and do not consider that there is any dispute regarding them. Unless we can push through our plan for a unified Somalia before the expiry of the present agreement, we shall never do so, unless we are prepared to involve ourselves in serious international complications, including perhaps the loss of American sympathy.

22. These are strong arguments for reaching a settlement now. But it is also becoming urgent to state our position in the discussion of the Italian Peace Treaty. The American Delegation have maintained their earlier proposals and have elaborated them without, however, giving any precise idea of how they would work in practice. The French Delegation has maintained that trusteeship over all the colonies should be exercised by Italy. The Russian Delegation has repeated its claim to individual trusteeship over Tripolitania, stating that it would agree to Collective Trusteeship for the other three colonies. It is understood that Mr. Dunn recently informed M. Gousev that the United States Government could not support a claim by any one of the Big Four to Individual Trusteeship over any of the colonies. Whilst the United Kingdom Deputy has attempted to postpone any decision on the future arrangements in the Colonies by taking the line that this was a matter which could be considered at leisure and that the only immediate decision required was agreement on a provision in the Italian Treaty that Italy should renounce her sovereignty over the colonies, it is now clear that the United States and Soviet Governments at least are not prepared to defer discussion of the future arrangements.

Our Objectives.

23. As stated above, the question of the Italian Colonies is closely related to that of Imperial Defence. In my view it is essential that we should maintain our position in the Mediterranean and Red Sea. It is not only a question of preserving this life-line in time of war, but also the vital importance of acting in peace-time on the soft under-belly of Europe from the Mediterranean. If we maintain our position along this life-line, the stability of the Middle East generally will be an essential factor. The attitude of the neighbouring Arab States is, therefore, important in its relation to the future of the Italian Colonies and the solution must not be one which will disturb our relations with those countries. If, as I believe, we should develop British East Africa as a strategic reserve without renouncing our position in the Middle East, our approach to the problem of the Italian Colonies must be based on :—

(i) denial of these Colonies to any hostile influence, and perhaps even
(ii) retention by us of certain strategic facilities at key points.

In my view, therefore, unless the decision is taken to renounce our position in the Mediterranean and the Middle East we must agree to no solution which does not fulfil (i) above and it may also be desirable to satisfy the requirements of (ii).

24. Therefore, as I see it, our main aims must, therefore, be :—

(a) to arrive at a settlement which satisfies the interests of Imperial Defence;
(b) to prevent the Russians gaining control of any one of the colonies, and to reduce to a minimum their share in any international arrangements and their opportunities for interference;
(c) to sponsor a settlement which will meet, to the fullest extent practicable the needs and wishes of the inhabitants of the ex-Italian Colonies, i.e.—

(i) self-government for Libya;
(ii) a united Somalia;
(iii) the fusion of the major part of Eritrea (i.e., excluding the Moslem area) with Ethiopia;

(d) to secure United States support.

25. I believe that even if it were possible to dispose of the Italian Colonies in opposition to the United States, that it would be most undesirable from every point of view that we should attempt to do so. In order to secure United States support it is essential not to go back on the decision in September to accept the United States plan in principle, subject to certain modifications and further examination of its practical application. We are not, perhaps, committed to support of this plan in its entirety since if it proves impracticable I will be justified in recommending its abandonment, but we are committed to giving it very serious consideration and I do not believe that we would obtain the support of the United States if we did not at least accept as starting-point the principles on which the American Collective Trusteeship proposals are based, namely :—

(i) that there should be no imperialist exploitation of the ex-Italian Colonies;
(ii) that the independence of the inhabitants should be recognised as soon as practicable.

Principal Alternative Solutions: General.

26. The solutions which present themselves can be based in the case of each territory on the following four general principles :—

(a) the principle of Collective Trusteeship (as proposed by the United States);
(b) the principle of Individual Trusteeship by a Power other than Italy (on which were based the British ideas of last September, the Russian claim to Tripolitania, and the proposals made by Field-Marshal Smuts);
(c) the restoration of her Colonies in some form to Italy (as proposed by the French Government and in the case of Tripolitania only, by the British plans which were not tabled at the Foreign Ministers' Conference in September);

(d) the recognition of local independence either by the creation of new States (as suggested for Cyrenaica by Field-Marshal Smuts, para. 15 above) or by the transfer of certain territories to the States to which they naturally belong.

27. The advantages and disadvantages of the American proposals for Collective Trusteeship lie principally in its possible methods of application. The American proposals aim at avoiding the projection of Great Power politics into the Italian Colonies. It is for this reason that the plan lays down that Trusteeship should be exercised not by the Four Great Powers but by U.N.O. acting collectively through the organ of the Trusteeship Council. If as a result of its application the plan leads to the introduction of a number of nationals from the Great Powers, there are clearly strong objections to it. There is an inevitable risk that the nationals of certain Great Powers will not be internationally minded, but will merely be the instrument of that State's power politics and also probably the disseminators of propaganda.

28. Moreover, as pointed out by the French Deputy, the system of Collective Trusteeship is a new conception which would place a considerable burden on the United Nations, itself an unfledged organisation. Its practical application would need, therefore, to be worked out very carefully. Considerable study has been given to this problem by departments in Whitehall, who have concluded that the United States proposals are feasible if the following points are all satisfactorily covered in the practical application of Collective Trusteeship :—

(i) The " Advisory Committees " of the United States plan would have to be eliminated as they would be likely to lead to a clash of responsibility, to project into each territory Great Power rivalry (which it is precisely the object of the Americans to avoid), and at the same time to provide the U.S.S.R. with opportunities for direct interference. The United States Deputy, no doubt aware of this danger, has now indicated that the Committee's powers would be very limited.

(ii) Wide authority would have to be given to the man on the spot.

(iii) An international Colonial Service would be required to ensure continuity of policy and administrative efficiency.

(iv) The arrangements for each territory would have, moreover, to take account of local conditions and would thus vary widely. Where possible, elaborate machinery superimposed from outside should be avoided, and we should seek instead to build on whatever already exists locally, reinforcing it at the beginning if need be with outside talent, but striving from the very start to make the maximum use of local institutions and local personnel. The United States memorandum proposes a standard plan to be applied in all territories alike, and in this respect will thus require substantial modification.

29. In general, therefore, Collective Trusteeship, if suitably modified, might be the form of International Trusteeship least open to the dangers of Great Power politics.

B.—Individual Trusteeship.

30. The principle of Individual Trusteeship is open to several very serious objections. It is true that the United Kingdom has a better claim than any other Power to be awarded the individual trusteeship of one or more of the Italian colonies. But a reversion to the idea of Individual Trusteeship would certainly give strength to the Russian claim to Tripolitania. It is imperative to exclude Russia from the large share in the colonies which she would be able to claim if either Individual or Four-Power Trusteeship was applied. Whilst trusteeship by a group of Powers might in theory be acceptable, it would in practice be very difficult to exclude in every case the U.S.S.R. from such a group, and by adopting this principle we should thus run the grave risk of giving the U.S.S.R. a larger share than she will enjoy under a system of Collective Trusteeship.

31. Moreover, the British Commonwealth would be exposed once more to a charge of imperialism if any part of the Italian Colonies were placed under British rule. The international implications of a request for British trusteeship over any of the territories must thus be balanced against the strategic advantages which we would thereby acquire. Such a request would not obtain the support of the United States Government, since, as mentioned above, the American Secretary of State's Deputy in London has stated that they could not support a claim by any one of the Big Four to Individual Trusteeship over any of the Colonies.

C.—Restoration to Italy.

32. The return to Italy of her Colonies might help to make her a friendly and sound democratic Power in the Mediterranean. On the other hand her Empire was an economic liability to her and provided her with little outlet for emigration. Its loss would thus cause no serious injury to her economy and might in fact relieve her of a burden which, in her present financial position, she might be unable to bear. Moreover, the populations of all the colonies, whatever their differences, are united in their hostility to Italy and restoration of Italian rule in any form could only be enforced with great difficulty, perhaps only by force of arms. Finally, any effort to restore it by force would have most unfortunate results on our position in Egypt and the whole of the Middle East.

D.—Independence or Union with natural motherland.

33. The recognition of local independence is a question which must be discussed in its relation to each territory in turn. The only general consideration is that all the Colonies, even the Somalis, would wish to have their sovereignty recognised in theory even if they exercised no administrative powers in practice.

Principal Alternative Solution in Relation to each Colony.

34. I shall now examine in respect of each of the Italian Colonies the various alternatives which have been put forward bearing in mind :—

(a) their practicability;
(b) British interests;
(c) international implications;
(d) the wishes of the inhabitants;
(e) the United Kingdom Government's commitments.

Libya.

35. The factors which operate as regards Collective Trusteeship for Libya as proposed by the United States Government are generally those which have been considered above (paragraphs 27–29). There are in addition certain aspects which are peculiar to Italian North Africa. The principal advantages of Collective Trusteeship for this territory are :—

(a) that if the principle of eliminating Great Power politics is applied, Russia will be denied any large share in the control of the colony;
(b) that it does not close the door to any later settlement which may be necessary to provide for the interests of the Italian population and for a later possible division of territory into administrative units which would after a number of years be capable of independent Government.

36. In order to keep the door open to any later possible division of the territory, it might be possible to have an international administrator at the head with a deputy administrator for each territory beneath him who would be responsible for the administration of Cyrenaica and Tripolitania separately, while their superior would control such departments as currency and commerce in order to avoid any unnatural frontiers and difficulties of movement between these two Arab territories.

37. The main objections to Collective Trusteeship for Libya as a whole lie in the fact that while it would deny Russia any considerable share in the administration, it would also deny it to the British Commonwealth and might render impossible the acquisition of such strategic facilities as we may consider essential.

B.—Individual Trusteeship.

38. British Trusteeship is open to the objections stated in paragraphs 30–31. Russian Trusteeship is inadmissible. Neither the United States nor France would accept sole responsibility. There is, however, the possibility of placing Cyrenaica under Egyptian or Arab League Trusteeship. Such a solution would facilitate the conclusion of a Treaty with Egypt in which we could extend the military facilities that we require in that country to Cyrenaica. On the other hand Egyptian Trusteeship would be extremely unpopular with the inhabitants and it is likely that the administrative ineptitude of the Egyptian Government would lead to conflict with the inhabitants similar to that which harassed the Italians for many years.

39. The Egyptians have shown themselves singularly incapable of administering any people outside their part of the Nile Valley. With the exception of a small group of Libyans who have been educated in Cairo, probably not exceeding a hundred in all, no one in Libya has suggested that they should come under Egyptian rule or trusteeship and the great majority treat such suggestions with derision. Moreover, Egyptian administration would only be practicable if it were supplemented by the employment of European and particularly British officials and it is doubtful whether the Egyptians would accept this condition. It is probable that Egyptians who were sent to administer Cyrenaica would consider their position either as exile or as a means of self-enrichment.

40. The Arab League is incapable at present of bearing the burden of trusteeship. Either solution would probably therefore lead to unrest in the area, which would disturb the stability of the Middle East on which depends the security of our position in the Eastern Mediterranean and the Red Sea.

C.—Restoration to Italy.

41. Although the Italians withdrew all their residents from Cyrenaica during the North African campaign, there are still a considerable number in Tripolitania (38,000) and these present a serious problem. The administration and economy of this western territory depends largely on the Italians and would suffer under Arab rule. Moreover, it would be invidious to place the Italians at the mercy of a race that bear them only ill will, and their status would have to be specially protected. There would seem, therefore, to be a strong case for some special form of administration for the coastal belt of Tripolitania. It may, in fact, be a suitable area for Collective Trusteeship, whatever régime is established in the rest of Libya. The coastal belt might, in theory, be restored to Italy under trusteeship, but trusteeship implies eventual independence, and it is questionable whether this small area of mixed population, in which the Italians are in the minority, would be practicable as a self-governing unit. Tripolitania, moreover, is more advanced than Cyrenaica, and if Cyrenaica should be given any form of autonomy or independence, as is discussed below, it would seem invidious to treat Tripolitania as a territory of lower development.

42. Since in any event trusteeship over the Tripolitanian coastal belt would be of comparatively short duration, Italy would hardly gain any lasting benefit from it, and, indeed, any development of purely Italian interests would be contrary to the spirit of the Charter. In order to give to Italy an area for emigration and colonial development it would seem necessary to go further and restore the coastal belt to her in full sovereignty. The outstanding objection to this course lies in the fact that the Italians would be outnumbered by over 15 to 1 by hostile Moslems who would constantly be spurred to revolt by the knowledge that their neighbours in the rest of Libya were enjoying at least comparative freedom.

43. The Tripolitanians, moreover, make no distinctions between Fascist or Democratic Italian Government, since the latter were responsible for the original invasion and campaign of conquest. The segregation of the Tripolitanian coastal belt from the rest of Libya would cut off the Arabs who have already been expropriated by the colonists from the best part of the territory, as well as from Tripoli which has been their capital for many centuries.

44. Moreover, to restore Italian control, including trusteeship by Italy, over any part of Libya would greatly prejudice our relations with Egypt and the Arab League and would provoke local protest and even revolt, and could only be prevented by use of force. As the present administering Power it would fall to us to provide this force, and it seems impossible for us to place ourselves in the position of having to re-establish Italian authority with British troops. (see paragraph 32).

D.—Independence or Union with Natural Motherland.

45. A further possible alternative would be to attach Tripolitania to Tunisia with which it has had long historical associations and close affinities. This could be achieved by uniting the two territories under trusteeship. French acceptance of this plan would be conditional at least on France exercising trusteeship. This in the first place would be open to the objections which have been discussed above, to trusteeship by any of the Four Major Powers. It would also be open to the objection that the Tripolitanians are hostile to the French and have been further embittered by the knowledge that the latter are in occupation of the Fezzan and have territorial ambitions in this area, as well as in the frontier areas. It is doubtful, moreover, whether France would accept trusteeship over Tripolitania even if it were offered to her.

46. An alternative which has been under discussion for some time is that the inhabitants of Libya should be enabled to choose their own form of government. There is little doubt that the Cyrenaicans and the tribal elements in Fezzan and Tripolitania would opt for independence under Sayyid Idris and would also almost certainly request British financial and technical assistance. The attitude of the Arabs in the Tripolitanian coastal belt is less certain. If they considered that the choice was trusteeship or independence under Sayyid Idris it is probable that they would prefer the second course.

47. It is necessary to examine how far the Libyans are capable of self-government. There is a close analogy with the Iraq of a quarter of a century ago. Like Libya to-day, Iraq was a backward Arab country that had just been liberated from foreign rule by British arms and consequently found itself under British Military Administration. Iraq achieved full self-government in twelve years. During that period the Iraqi State contracted with the United Kingdom that there should be a measure of British control over Iraqi affairs in certain departments. Iraq, therefore, enjoyed virtual independence, subject to certain limitations laid down in the Treaty of Alliance. The position was recognised in 1924 by the League of Nations. This resulted in a certain duality in Iraq's status. On the one hand she was a non-self-governing State placed under British mandate by the League of Nations. On the other, she was a self-governing State which had unified limited sovereignty by a treaty with a mandatory Power. It is probable that Libya could reach the position of Iraq in 1932 in an even shorter period than twelve years. It is certainly doubtful whether Libya is ripe for complete independence at the moment, but in comparison with Iraq in 1920 Libya has comparatively few handicaps. There is no division, for instance, between the Sunnite and Shiite religious sects, nor is there a Kurdish problem. In Sheikh Idris al Senussi Libya has to-day one political asset of the utmost value which Iraq lacked in 1920. Whereas Iraq possessed no native dynasty, and King Faisal, who was imported from outside had great difficulty in establishing himself, the Senussi Sayyids won their hold on the loyalty of Libyan tribesmen long ago. Moreover, Sheikh Idris is a man of ability and the Senussi succession is assured by certain near relatives who appear to be capable of following in his steps.

48. Arabs who have not assimilated European political ideas conceive the ideal State to be a monarchy in which the monarch consults the Council of Sheikhs, notables and religious dignatories. His representatives would govern the tribes and administrative districts with assistance from the Advisory Councils. It has also been a normal Arab practice for the monarch to have European advisers and technical officials. The Libyans are certainly not different from other Arabs in that they are capable of a form of self-government. Their religion and traditions convince them of this and Moslem law and their Arab customs provide the machinery. There is thus already the necessary tribal organisation to administer the areas outside the towns. They are also capable of administering smaller towns, but they would need assistance in the administration of the cities, of which there are, in fact, only three (Benghazi, Tripoli, Misurata). Since the beginning of the war the Libyans have been trained in administration by the British Military Authorities. In both Tripolitania and Cyrenaica the Arabs are taking an increasing share in the work of the administration and are occupying positions of authority. There are, for instance, approximately 350 native officials in the districts and 100 in the towns of Benghazi, Derna and Barce, holding responsible positions, while a number of officials in out-stations carry considerable responsibility with immediate British supervision. A capable police force has been recruited which, except in one riot in Tripoli in November of last year, has shown itself adequate to deal with any normal trouble that might arise. It seems, therefore, that Libya is ready for a more advanced form of administration than the United States plan envisages.

49. On the other hand, there is no one in Libya capable of dealing without foreign assistance with the more general affairs of State, particularly foreign affairs, drafting of legislation, the higher branches of the judicial system, general aspects of finance and economics, and medicine, agriculture, public works, posts and telegraphs, &c. Libya, moreover, cannot raise sufficient revenue to support a reasonable administration for some years to come.

50. Libyan self-government is a possibility provided—

(a) there is continuity of British guidance at the top throughout the period of transition from the present Military Administration to a future independent State;

(b) the new State is given a subsidy sufficient to prevent its lapse into a discreditable primitive condition until such time as it can balance its budget.

51. If some form of independence is to be introduced, it would be desirable to consult the inhabitants on the choice of their titular head. If the matter were put to the vote, the method which is requested by the Libyans themselves, the majority of Tripolitanians as well as Cyrenaicans, would vote for Sheikh Idris, because it is the only means they can see of avoiding a return to Italian rule or trusteeship, a Russian trusteeship, or the Collective Trusteeship proposed by the United States. To all three solutions they are strongly opposed. Moreover, if Libya were divided it would be difficult to establish a satisfactory frontier since it would have to pass through a nomadic area. There is, moreover, little prospect of establishing a satisfactory independent State in Tripolitania within a number of years. Division would also lead to unhealthy rivalry between the two territories in attempts to obtain subsidies and assistance.

52. It would seem therefore advisable that, unless more important factors decree that either territory should be disposed of separately, Libya should be treated as a unit. This applies to whatever régime is introduced in Libya, for the desire of the inhabitants not to be divided is manifest, and they have strong common bonds. Moreover, the Arab League is strongly opposed to any division.

53. Although the position of Sheikh Idris as head of the State would probably be recognised without great difficulty, the Tripolitanians would resent any direct control by the Senussi and a degree of autonomy would be essential. Thus Sheikh Idris could exercise direct rule over the tribal elements of Cyrenaica and Fezzan through the existing tribal system. In the towns of Cyrenaica his powers would pass through the Arab councils instituted by the British Military Administration, while in the towns of Tripolitania there would have to be a remote control, and probably a special status for the Italian and Jewish colonies.

54. The degrees of independence which might be established are as follows :—

(a) Full independence as a sovereign State under Sheikh Idris—a country ready for membership of the United Nations. Since Libya is still less advanced than Iraq in 1932, it will be desirable that the United Kingdom should accept the offer of a treaty which would certainly be forthcoming from Sheikh Idris, by which in return for financial and technical assistance he would grant strategic facilities. Its status would be analogous with that of Iraq during the period 1920–22, except that Libya would not be placed under trusteeship (mandate).

(b) It might also be possible to consider Libya as a territory analogous to the class A mandates of the League of Nations, or, as the Covenant stated, "of a stage of development where its existence as an independent nation can be provisionally recognised, subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a mandatory until such time as it is able to stand alone." This form of independence comes closer to the American plan. It appears that the State Department envisage Libya being placed under some system similar to the class A mandates, with the mandatory powers being exercised by the Trusteeship Council and a certain degree of autonomy being granted to the Senussi.

55. This scheme (b), like that of collective trusteeship, is open to the objection that we might not be able to obtain any strategic facilities that we might require.

Italian Somaliland.

56. The objections to any proposal, such as the United States plan, to continue to treat Italian Somaliland as a unit are examined more fully in Annex A. There seems to me to be only one satisfactory solution to the Somali question and that is the unification of all the Somali tribes under one administration.

57. The attitude of the Somali inhabitants as a whole to such unification is not articulate but it is probable that they would welcome it. Provided Jigjiga is included in the proposal (it is now in the Reserved Area), the Somalis of the Ogaden and the Reserved Area would welcome inclusion in any administration which took them out of Ethiopian control. As the record of British rule in British Somaliland is not an altogether happy one, it is unlikely that the British Somalis would deplore our departure, though they might regard surrender of their status of British-protected persons as being a retrogade step. On the whole, however, the Somalis, while probably preferring continuation of the British Administration, would not object to an international one provided Italy was excluded.

58. Since the Somalis are a primitive people who will not be ripe for independence for some considerable time, whatever form of administration is set up must have an element of permanence. At the same time it need not be an elaborate system of government since military administration of the territories during recent years has proved that the best method is to interfere little in the life of the inhabitants. The principal requirements of this area are external financial support for economic development, and whoever exercises trusteeship will be carrying substantial financial burden.

59. The general considerations on Collective Trusteeship above (paras. 27–29) are pertinent since the administration would have to continue for a long period. This course appears to be the most promising way of achieving a United Somalia.

B.—Individual Trusteeship.

60. Trusteeship by any member of the British Commonwealth or by the United States would be open to the objections which have been discussed above (paras. 30–31). It is, moreover, most unlikely that the United States would assume this responsibility.

C.—Restoration to Italy.

61. The restoration of Italian rule, besides running counter to the deep feelings of the Somali inhabitants, might also lead to the situation which arose in 1935 when Italy showed that her development of Italian Somaliland was devoted primarily to fulfilment of her imperialist designs on Ethiopia. In view of Italy's fickleness as an Ally we might find a hostile Power occupying territory adjoining any future strategic reserve which we might build up in Kenya and becoming embroiled with us over the Suez Canal and Red Sea route.

C223722

D.—Independence or Union with Motherland.

62. The possibility of making the Somali territories, or any one of them, independent must, for a number of years, be ruled out as impossible.

63. Another solution is presented by the claim which the Emperor of Ethiopia has made to Italian Somaliland. This is objectionable on a number of grounds. It would be most unpopular with the Moslem inhabitants and it would condemn them to indefinite backwardness and probably oppression and misrule. The only basis for this claim is Ethiopia's need for an outlet to the sea, and this can be met much more satisfactorily in Eritrea.

64. In any decision on the future of the Somali territories we must bear in mind our commitment to the British tribes, and it will be imperative, if a decision is taken to transfer them from British protection to any other form of administration, to consult them on their future.

65. It may be desirable to maintain certain British strategic facilities in this area, and if Collective Trusteeship should be introduced in a unified Somalia we might be able to secure these by agreement with the United Nations in return for our offer to part with British-protected territory. If, on the other hand, it is not necessary to secure these facilities it may be sufficient merely to ensure that the whole area is demilitarised.

66. Another factor which may have to be taken into consideration in the future of the Somali territories, and particularly British Somaliland, is the prospect of striking oil. At the moment, however, it has no concrete significance. Prospecting in British Somaliland has established that the colony has oil reserves of some importance, but for about five years it will probably be impossible to determine their capacity. At the moment it appears that this capacity is not great and even when developed would probably not exceed that of Egypt. It is doubtful whether it is of sufficient importance to modify the suggestion that the future of the Somali territories lies best in their unification. It is probable, moreover, that in return for our gesture of renouncing our protection over British Somaliland, we could safeguard any British oil concessions or prospecting rights in this area.

Eritrea.

67. The American proposals would place Eritrea under Collective Trusteeship for a number of years and thus retain the present frontiers under one administration. As Eritrea had never existed as a political entity until the Italians created it at the end of the last century, and it is ethnically disunited and economically non-viable, there is no good reason for preserving it as an administrative unit under any form of administration, whether under Individual Trusteeship or restored Italian rule. The right solution would seem to be to dismember it along its natural lines of cleavage. Since there is no prospect, or indeed desirability, of a recreated Kingdom of Tigrai, the best course might be to meet the wishes of the Christian Unionists of Eritrea who desire incorporation in Ethiopia. This transfer would give Ethiopia the highlands in the centre of the Colony. Although the Danakil inhabitants of the southern coastal areas are neither Christian nor sympathetic to Ethiopia, it is difficult to see what alternative there is to the course of giving them also to Ethiopia which would unite them with a large number of Danakils in the Aussa province. They are hardly numerous enough to be considered as a possible future independent entity and therefore are not a suitable subject for trusteeship. To incorporate both the Coptic Christian highlands of Tigrinyan Eritrea and the Danakil lowlands to the south would give Ethiopia access to the Red Sea and at least one port in Assab.

68. There are, however, alternatives to Ethiopian annexation of the district around Massawa which is mainly inhabited by Moslems. It is probable that the Emperor, in claiming a port on the Red Sea before he expanded his claim to cover the whole of Eritrea, had Massawa rather than Assab in mind. It is very doubtful whether his acceptance of the United Somalia plan would be granted unless he was given at least Massawa in addition to the Christian and Danakil areas mentioned above. It has also been proposed that Massawa should be a United Nations security base operated either by the United Nations as a whole through the Security Council or by the United States (paragraph 16). The objections to the former are probably that this would give Russia a direct interest and control at an essential point in the Red Sea. It is questionable whether the Americans would wish to establish themselves in Massawa though it may well be desirable to associate them in this line of communication. If it is considered that the British Commonwealth require exclusive strategic facilities in Massawa, it is possible that we might secure them by giving the Emperor an undertaking to support his claim to the port provided he offered us such facilities there as we might require. It is, however, doubtful whether we can achieve the United Somalia project unless we offer the Emperor sufficient inducement to part with the Ogaden and Reserved Area. It may therefore even be necessary to be in a position to offer him the whole of Eritrea without any limitations on his sovereignty, including the Moslem areas in the North and North-West.

69. There are two principal alternatives for these North-Western areas :—

(i) incorporation in Ethiopia, which would run counter to the wishes of the inhabitants. It would also probably burden the Government of the Sudan with an extremely troublesome frontier dividing the Sudanese Beni Amer from the Eritrean Beni Amer with consequent border disturbances;

(ii) transference of these North-Western areas to the Sudan to which they naturally belong.

The main objection to this second course is that it lays the British Commonwealth open once more to the charge of painting more red on the map and if we feel it necessary to call on the other Big Powers to renounce their claims to the Italian Colonies we shall have to make a similar renunciation ourselves and apply it to any government in which we play a major part.

70. Eritrea is in many ways at a higher stage of development than Ethiopia. Its inhabitants are on the whole more progressive and Italy achieved there a great measure of economic development. In order to prevent Eritrea relapsing it might be better to award it to the Emperor with the stipulation that he must give certain guarantees to the United Nations. On the other hand, to insist on such reservations might make it impossible to conclude an agreement with the Emperor which would satisfy our requirements in the Somali territories.

Conclusion.

71. I have an open mind as to the best course. I am, however, satisfied that we can hammer out a policy which we can all advance without fear. Although the problem is very difficult, there are four encouraging factors of fundamental importance. In the first place, we are occupying the territories under discussion and no settlement can be arrived at, to which we object. Secondly, our administration is popular in all the territories, and the views and needs of the inhabitants coincide very closely with our own. Indeed, they would almost certainly accept any settlement which we proposed, provided it was based on the principles underlying this paper. Thirdly, we have the goodwill of the United States, although this would almost certainly not extend to any purely British settlement. Finally, the interests of the Arab League and our own are very close, and a solution acceptable to the League would immeasurably strengthen our position in the Middle East.

ANNEX A.

Background.

1. The former Italian Colonies have few features in common. The two principal ones are their poverty and the attitude of the inhabitants to their former rulers. In spite of an energetic colonial policy, it was only possible for the Italians to run their colonies at an economic loss. Their colonies indeed were developed not so much for economic reasons as for strategic. Although the inhabitants of each of the territories are dissimilar and in Eritrea far from homogeneous, they all nevertheless share hostility to Italian rule, which varies from bitter hatred to intense reluctance to be restored to it.

2. There are certain features in each territory which deserve separate consideration.

Libya.

3. The Italian possessions in North Africa, collectively termed "Libya," comprise three principal separate regions which are separated from each other by inhospitable and thinly populated desert, namely Cyrenaica, Triolitania and Fezzan. In the first two of these are relatively small areas of cultivable land on the Mediterranean coast and in the third a group of oases deep in the hinterland. Historically Tripolitania has been associated with Tunisia, and Cyrenaica with Egypt. Of the present population of just over one million, the vast majority are Arab or arabicised Berbers. The total Italian and Jewish populations of Libya are 38,000 and 31,000 respectively. The Italians are confined exclusively, and Jews mostly, to Tripolitania, and the greater part of the Moslem population is settled in the cultivable areas on the coast and in the oases. The whole territory is poor in economic resources, depending almost entirely on agriculture and fisheries. Its small population and scanty resources would condemn it to increasing poverty and backwardness unless its needs were met by outside support.

4. More than half of the thirty years of Italian occupation were spent in bitter warfare against the tribesmen and particularly against the Senussi, and this has intensified the hatred of the inhabitants for their former rulers. The entire Moslem population is strongly opposed to a restoration of Italian rule in any form, but there is, however, a divergence of views on the form of government which the inhabitants would prefer. The Moslems of Cyrenaica are welded together in allegiance to the Senussi religious fraternity, which is the only existing native political force in Libya. What Sayyid Muhammad Idris and his Senussi followers are aiming at in Libya has actually been achieved in Arabia by Ibn Saud and his Wahhabi followers. The strength of the Senussi movement was illustrated by the tenacity of its resistance to Italian conquest between 1911 and 1931 in Cyrenaica and Fezzan in contrast to the disunity displayed by the less primitive agricultural and urban population of Tripolitania.

5. Sheikh Idris not only commands the allegiance of the vast majority of the Moslem population of Cyrenaica and Fezzan but also of a number of tribes in Tripolitania. Certain Tripolitanian leaders have invited him to become ruler of all Libya, but it appears that they favour this solution not so much for itself as one preferable to other threatened alternatives which, in the eyes of the Tripolitanians, would seem incompatible with native self-government, for example, the possibility that France may retain possession of Fezzan which she is at present administering.

6. The Cyrenaicans appear to be solidly and consistently in favour of independence under the rule of Sheikh Idris with British support. In this they see eye to eye with the sheikh himself whose desire for British support is explicit and emphatic. In Tripolitania, apart from the movement which invited Sheikh Idris to become ruler, there are two principal currents. One runs in favour of British trusteeship, or perhaps of Tripolitanian independence fortified by British political, financial and technical assistance; the other is openly hostile to the Senussi and favours trusteeship by Egypt or the Arab League. This is, however, confined to Libyans resident in Egypt and to Egyptians of Libyan extraction.

Italian Somaliland.

7. The future of Italian Somaliland (1,200,000 inhabitants of whom 5,000 are Italian) cannot be satisfactorily considered separately from the future of the whole Somali area—"the Horn of Africa." This area, comprising all that lies east of a rough line drawn rrom the southern end of the Red Sea to the mouth of the Juba River, is inhabited by the single race of nomadic people, the Somalis, who speak dialects of a common language, have the same customs, religion and form of tribal organisation and are at approximately the same stage of economic and cultural development. This territory is at present divided between Italian Somaliland, Ethiopia and British Somaliland. The landward frontier of the latter separates the inhabitants from the grazing areas essential to their livelihood. These grazing areas are contained in the Ogaden and Reserved Area which fill the angle between British and Italian Somaliland, and which, until 1935, formed part of Ethiopia. Most of the frontier between the latter and Italian Somaliland has never been demarcated. Since the defeat of the Italians in East Africa in 1941 all four of the above areas have been under British military administration. The inclusion of the Ogaden and the Reserved Area was negotiated in the Anglo-Egyptian Agreement of 1944, which terminates in March 1947.

8. The great majority of the inhabitants of French Somaliland are not, in fact, Somalis and economically this colony is connected with Jibuti and not with the Somali territories described above.

9. There is a clear case for the rationalisation of existing political frontiers and for the union of all these Somali-inhabited territories (i.e., British and Italian Somaliland, Ogaden and Reserved Area) into one country under one administration. In this alone lies the area's only hope of progress.

10. The whole area is extremely poor and both British and Italian Somaliland have only been administered at a loss. By unifying the whole area it may be possible, in a number of years, to reach a position where a modest administration can just pay its way, though external assistance would be needed at the outset.

11. The views of the Somali inhabitants have taken no positive direction. The inhabitants of the Ogaden would resist by force any attempt to restore them to Ethiopian control, and there would be similar bitter opposition from the Italian Somalis if Italian rule were restored.

12. All the facts mentioned above argue strongly in favour of the unification of these three territories. The inclusion of the Ogaden and the Reserved Area is essential since without it the frontiers of the United Somalia would be long and unmanageable and communications would be most difficult. Moreover, the British tribes would remain deprived of their essential grazing grounds and the difficulties of administration would remain unsolved. It is, however, only possible to create a United Somalia with the assent of the Emperor of Ethiopia, and in considering the whole problem of the Italian East African Colonies the position of Ethiopia is fundamental.

Eritrea.

13. The problem of Eritrea presents three principal similarities to that of the Somali territories. In the first place it is closely connected with the position of Ethiopia and, in the second, the political frontiers of Eritrea run counter to history, geography, economics, religion, race and language. There is as clear a case for the rationalisation of the political geography of this territory as there is for the Somalilands. Thirdly, both the Somali territories and Eritrea have never been in a position to meet their expenses from local revenues and have depended on outside assistance.

14. The present population of Eritrea is about 800,000, of which 37,000 are Italians (confined almost entirely to the Asmara district). The natives fall into three main divisions: Tigrinyans, Beni Amer and Danakils.

15. The Ethiopian province of Tigrai, which was the nucleus of the ancient Kingdom of Ethiopia and, until the usurpation of the Shoan dynasty, provided the rulers of that Empire, is divided in two by the 1935 Eritrean-Ethiopian frontier. There are thus 3,000 or 4,000 Tigrinya-speaking people in the mountains of Eritrea who are closely akin to the ruling class of Ethiopia. The frontier between the Sudan and Eritrea divides the nomad Beni Amer into two sections, although their affinity is such that the chiefs of each part are drawn from the same family. The Danakils are divided between the Red Sea plains of Eritrea, French Somaliland and the Ethiopian hinterland. The pre-eminence of the Sultan of Aussa in Ethiopia is recognised by the Danakils in all of the three territories. The Tigrinyans are Coptic Christians, and the Beni Amers and the Danakils are Moslem. There are thus three main divisions of Eritrea, two Moslem sections separated by a Christian.

16. Although the inhabitants of Eritrea are politically backward and inarticulate compared with the population of Italian North Africa, they have expressed their wishes in simple and clear terms. The Moslems, whatever their district, class, occupation or political development, are united in objecting to Coptic Christian rule whether it should be exercised by the Christian Eritreans, a reconstituted Kingdom of Tigrai or by the Emperor of Ethiopia. The Moslems of the North, including the districts of Keren, Agordat, Massawa and the Dahlak islands have through their chiefs petitioned for independence under United Nations trusteeship exercised by the United Kingdom for from ten to fifteen years, in view of the knowledge and understanding of Eritrea's problems that British administration has acquired during its existence. The Moslems of this northern area would presumably be satisfied by incorporation in the Sudan since these territories lie close to and have close affinity with the tribes west of the Sudanese frontier. The Danakils of Eritrea join to some extent in the wish for United Kingdom trusteeship and in opposition to Christian rule, although they have shown no objection to union in Ethiopia with their Aussa brethren.

17. The Tigrinyans in the central Eritrean mountains are divided into "separatists" and "unionists." The present relative strengths of these two Christian parties are not easy to estimate. The Separatists join with the Eritrean Moslems in reluctance to come under the Shoan dynasty of Ethiopia, though they have a traditional yearning for union with their Tigrinian neighbours in Ethiopia within a restored Kingdom of Tigrai. The Unionists, centred principally in Asmara, support incorporation in Ethiopia.

Italian Colonies.

Notes on I, Finance; II, Population.

I.—Finance.

There are no figures available showing the revenue and expenditure of each colony separately under Italian Government. Total expenditure on all the colonies together amounted to 7,356,959,000 lire (£118,660,629 at 62 lire to £) for the financial year 1939–40. The figures for 1943–45 are taken from the Report of the Military Administration of the Italian Colonies from 1944 to the Present Time (War Office, March 1946). The Budget represented by these figures is, of course, on the care and maintenance basis on which the colonies are being administered under British Military Government. Import and export figures for 1934 are available for Tripolitania, Cyrenaica and Eritrea, and for 1936 for Somalia.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

THE RUHR AND THE WESTERN FRONTIER OF GERMANY.

MEMORANDUM BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

IT is probable that the question of the Ruhr and Germany's western frontier will be discussed, if only informally, at the meeting of Foreign Ministers now about to take place in Paris. Much thought has been given by His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom to this problem, and three memoranda are attached to this paper which the Cabinet has recently considered on the subject. It is simplest to consider the matter under four separate heads, relating respectively to the Ruhr, the Rhineland, the Saar and an American proposal for a treaty on German disarmament.

The Ruhr.

2. The problem here is to reconcile the justified demand for security with the need to retain this key industrial area for the benefit of European reconstruction. In the past the Ruhr has provided the tools for repeated German aggressions, and there is no disagreement but that adequate safeguards must be provided against this happening again. The French proposals for this purpose are simple but severe. They are that the Ruhr should be detached from Germany altogether and constituted into an international State, the industries being taken over by international consortiums. The United Kingdom Government have, however, decided that there are two insuperable objections to the political separation of the area. It would be economically disastrous, and it would be likely to create an irredentist movement in Germany of unmanageable proportions. They have, accordingly, been seeking an alternative solution which, while avoiding these dangers, would meet France's legitimate anxieties. This, it is felt, could be achieved by keeping a firm control over the Ruhr industries while leaving the territory itself as part of Germany. Two methods of controlling the industries have been considered. Under the first they would be placed under international ownership. An international holding corporation would be formed on which each of the directly interested Powers would be represented, and this would control the German operating companies. Under the second method, the industries, instead of being internationally owned, would be made into a socialised German corporation responsible to the Government of a German province which would be formed for the area. Germany's obligations in regard to the transferred industries would be laid down in the peace treaties and an international control organisation would be formed to supervise the performance of these obligations. Under either of these methods it should prove easier than under the French proposal to reconstitute the industries after the reparation plan has been completed, so that their products may serve the peaceful economy of Europe.

3. As between the two methods suggested, there are clearly advantages and disadvantages in both and no firm decision has been taken by the United Kingdom Government in advance of discussion with the Dominions Ministers and the Governments of the foreign countries concerned. One immediate step, however, can and should be taken, and that is to establish a new German province in the Ruhr.

4. A further point of importance is whether the Soviet Government should be invited to participate in the proposed international control. On the face of it there seem strong grounds for offering to the Russians in western Germany no greater facilities than they may be prepared to give to the western Powers in eastern Germany.

The Rhineland.

5. The French Government have proposed that the German territory west of the Rhine should be separated from Germany and constituted into one or several independent States which would be almost entirely self-governing, except that they would be subject to permanent occupation by Allied troops. There are economic and military objections to detaching this area politically from Germany, and His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom propose to resist this part of the proposal. On the other hand, they see no reason to object to the stationing of French, Belgian and Dutch forces in the area for an indefinite period.

The Saar.

6. The French Government have asked that the ownership of the Saar mines should be transferred to France, the territory included in the French customs and currency system, French military forces stationed permanently in the territory, and the territory itself transferred to French administration pending a final settlement. It is proposed to agree to these proposals, with the reservation that the assets so transferred should be debited to France on reparation account.

The American treaty.

7. The Americans have proposed a draft treaty on the disarmament and demobilization of Germany (Annex C to Appendix I, p. 40). At this stage it is highly confidential. By the terms of it the United States, United Kingdom, Soviet and French Governments would bind themselves to ensure the complete disarmament of Germany and to maintain it by a system of inspection and, if necessary, military measures. Certain points in this proposal require further clarification, but in principle it seems warmly to be welcomed.

APPENDIX I.

[Gen. 121/1.

THE FUTURE OF GERMANY AND THE RUHR.

Conclusions.

I must lay before my colleagues a number of problems which raise far-reaching issues. The answers are not easy and yet they must be found. They cannot be delayed indefinitely. The French Government are pressing for an early reply to their proposals regarding the Ruhr and the Rhineland, and they have now suggested a Four-Power Conference to consider them. They have also asked for a more immediate decision on the Saar. I myself favour early discussions between the Four Governments concerned, not only on the French proposals, but on the future of Germany as a whole, its level of industry, and its control, and, finally, on the United States proposal for a Four-Power Treaty to ensure disarmament.

2. I, therefore, ask my colleagues' views as to the line I should take in any forthcoming discussions with the French, United States and Soviet Governments. To facilitate consideration and decision I have formulated the following propositions which cover, I think, the various questions involved.

(1) As regards the Ruhr, is it in British and general interests that this area of natural industrial wealth should be economically sound and become a positive element in European reconstruction?

(2) If so, how best can the necessary conditions be achieved, e.g.:—

(a) by keeping industry under British control so long as our occupation of the British zone lasts, and then handing it over to the German Government with or without safeguards;

(b) by placing the Ruhr industry under international ownership and control, while returning eventually the territory to the German State;

(c) by placing the Ruhr industry under international ownership and control, and at the same time detaching the territory from Germany and setting it up as an independent State under international control.

(3) As regards 2 (a) what are the prospects of our being able to continue for any length of time the military occupation of our zone and the feeding of the German population? If the prospects are bad, is the solution to work for the early creation of a German Government to whom the whole of Germany, including the Ruhr, should be handed over?

(4) Again if it is decided to leave the Ruhr inside Germany and under German administration, can we expect to get from the United States and Soviet Governments agreement to a higher level of industry than that thought safe for Germany as a whole, i.e., modify the Potsdam decision? Can we hope to get agreement for a positive policy for a German Ruhr and not merely for one of negation and prevention?

(5) As regards 2 (b), could the Ruhr industry be run efficiently under international ownership and control if it remained within territory governed by the German State? What account must be taken of the probability of a Communist and Soviet-controlled German Government in Berlin? Would this increase the risks of leaving the Ruhr industry inside the German State, even though it might increase the likelihood of the Soviet Government agreeing to the area enjoying easier economic conditions?

(6) As regards 2 (c), supposing we decided that our requirements would only be met by removing the territory of the Ruhr from Germany, would an international administration prove workable? Could we be sure that it would not involve, in the long run, worse economic and political consequences, either to ourselves or to the Germans, than continuation of the present conditions by which we remain solely responsible for the British zone while we remain in occupation?

(7) As regards the Saar, should we support the French demand that the mines be restored to French ownership and the area itself included in the French customs union, whatever decision is ultimately reached as regards the Ruhr or Rhineland? This would strengthen French economy and increase their sense of security.

(8) Should we support the French proposal to turn all German territory west of the Rhine into one or more separate independent States? If the Ruhr were separated and internationalised, the case for separating the left bank of the Rhine would be strengthened. Should we in any case object to the maintenance of French, Belgian, Luxembourg and Dutch garrisons in this area indefinitely?

(9) Should we welcome Mr. Byrnes' proposal for a Four-Power Treaty for the disarmament of Germany which would provide, after the termination of Allied occupation, a system of quadrupartite inspection? Should we stipulate that it did not preclude continued occupation for an indefinite period of certain key areas of Germany by the Four Powers concerned and that it took account of the eventual agreement in regard to the Ruhr?

I.—Position in Eastern Europe.

At the Potsdam Conference it was agreed that pending the final delimitation of Poland's western frontier at the peace conference, the former German territories east of the Oder–Western Neisse line should be placed under the administration of the Polish State and removed from the Russian zone. This transferred area would include Danzig but exclude the Königsberg area which was to be placed under Soviet administration.

2. It was also agreed that the German populations remaining in Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary should be transferred to Germany in accordance with a plan to be prepared by the Control Council. In November the Control Council approved a plan, providing for the transfer to be completed by the end of July 1946. Though this date is likely to be postponed and though some of the Germans in question, particularly in Czechoslovakia, may be allowed to remain in their countries of origin, nevertheless by the end of this year the bulk of the German populations in Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary will probably have been expelled and distributed among the various zones of Germany. The Yugoslav Government have also asked for the expulsion of such of their German population as still remain in Yugoslavia.

3. Though it was laid down at Potsdam that the final delimitation of Poland's western frontier should await the peace settlement, it has been generally taken for granted that no change in the Potsdam line will be made in Germany's favour. But the Potsdam decision places Russia in a very strong position. The Poles will never be able to dispense with Russian protection in order to hold their newly acquired lands. At the same time the Soviet Government will always have a means of enticing the Germans into their camp by offering to return some of the lost territory.

4. The economic difficulties in Germany are clearly increased by these Potsdam decisions. Not only has she lost a great part of her best food producing land, but she has to receive into the reduced territory a vast number of penniless immigrants. The position is aggravated by the failure to carry out the Potsdam decision to treat Germany as a single economic unit. The Russian zone is, in fact, a walled-off area, economically as well as politically, and has suffered both by the wholesale stripping of its industrial and agricultural wealth and by the uneconomic redistribution of land and by the fact that the Russian Army of Occupation has been living off the land. Where factories have been left they are believed to be working largely on Russian orders.

5. Politically, the Russian zone in Germany (population about 18½ million) is being organised along the model applied in other territories under Soviet domination. All preparations are being made for a single United Workers Party which will be rigidly controlled from the top and will amalgamate the old Social Democrat and Communist Parties. The men in effective, if not nominal, charge will be Communists trained in Russia. The trade unions are similarly being organised in the approved Russian manner.

6. The aim of these manœuvres seems to be to include the eastern half of Germany in a solid block of Soviet-controlled territories stretching from Lübeck to Trieste. Finland, Poland, Hungary, Roumania, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria and Albania are either in the bag already, or very nearly so. The prospect of Czechoslovakia holding out is not too hopeful. In Austria the issue is as yet undecided, but the Russians, of course, occupy the eastern part and, as in Germany, the capital is an international island in the Soviet-occupied provinces. Greece would fall into line if the E.A.M. ever got control there. Turkey is being subjected to a war of nerves designed to force her into the Soviet orbit. The Scandinavian countries are also showing signs of nervousness in regard to Soviet Russia.

7. The Soviet Government have now stated their intention to prepare a 5-year economic plan for the territories within their sphere of responsibility. The purpose of such a plan will no doubt be to harness the resources of the whole area, including presumably the Russian zone of Germany, for the benefit of Russian rehabilitation and one of its likely consequences will be to seal off this area even more completely than at present. Russian trade will no doubt largely fill the gap left by German trade in the Eastern European countries. Nor are the aims of the Soviet Government confined to the actual territories mentioned. They are closely interested also in physically controlling the sea routes, viz., the Straits on the one side and the Baltic on the other. It can have been no coincidence that the Poles recently asked for a permanent coaling station and free port at Sassnitz in the island of Rugen. Nor has Bornholm yet been evacuated.

II.—Western Germany.

8. Western Germany is divided into British, French and American zones of occupation.

9. Politically, our policy is to build up a British form of democracy slowly from the bottom. We have been at pains to lay the foundations solidly, with the result that not even the lowest level of elections will be held in our zone before the summer. But nominated councils have now been set up and are functioning. It is our aim to transfer responsibility to the Germans as fast as is thought practicable. The Americans have gone ahead with far greater speed. Local elections have already taken place and State Governments have been set up. There is reason to think that the process has been put through too quickly in the interests of the American demobilisation programme and that the foundations are likely to be shaky. Not much information comes out of the French zone, but little seems to have been done so far in the political field.

10. The strongest political parties are the Social Democrats and the Christian Democratic Union, and both are showing signs of vitality. The Christian Democrats are largely, but not entirely, a survival of the old Catholic Centre Party. The Social Democrats in Western Germany strongly oppose any idea of fusion with the Communists. The Communists for their part are a small but vigorous and well-organised minority, their strongest influence being in the Ruhr and Hamburg. They are in close touch with the Communists in Berlin and through them with the Russians. They had little success in the elections in the American zone and would be unlikely at present to win many seats in ours. As in the Russian zone, they are now openly enlisting Nazis into their ranks and beating the nationalist drum on the theme of United Germany and no annexations in the West.

11. Economically the British zone is badly placed. Even in peace time it is not self-supporting in foodstuffs. To-day its normal source of supply in Eastern Germany has been destroyed as a result of the Russian military occupation and Soviet policy. It contains the most badly damaged industrial areas and its population is swollen by immigrants from the East and now numbers some 21 millions. A further 1½ million immigrants from the East are still to come. We therefore have a very serious liability. Imports into the zone to keep the population barely above starvation level are expected to amount to at least £100 million sterling in 1946, of which we only expect to recover half in exports. The American zone (population about 16 million) is less industrialised, but it, too, is not self-supporting in foodstuffs and is also carrying a swollen population. The French zone (population about 6 million) is at the moment the worst off of the three as, unlike ourselves and the Americans, the French live to a great extent off the country.

III.—Future of the Ruhr.

12. With this picture before us it is clear how much importance attaches to the future of the Ruhr. The natural resources of the Ruhr cannot be destroyed. Its highly skilled population must be able to live. Yet its output must be rendered innocuous. My own approach to the problem was to try to make the Ruhr safe for Europe by transferring its industries to a Public Utility Corporation controlled by an international consortium. I wished to ensure that this area should not longer produce war material but should supply the whole of Europe with much-needed peace-time commodities, output being rationalised and integrated with corresponding industries in the participating countries. I proposed, therefore, to transfer the ownership of the essential industries to an international corporation, the shares of which would be held not by private individuals but by Governments. I also wished the Ruhr to concentrate on semi-finished products, the finishing industries being located elsewhere in Europe. In order to secure Russia's agreement to the plan I proposed to associate her with it from the outset.

The E.I.P.S. Plan.

13. I therefore directed E.I.P.S. to work out a plan on these lines, the area in question to be governed as part of Germany but to be occupied by an international force for an indefinite period.

14. The plan prepared by E.I.P.S. is at Annex A. Broadly, it provides for economic control being exercised through ownership or part ownership of a selected group of industrial companies. It assumes fulfilment of the Potsdam Reparation Plan, the occupation of the whole of Germany for at least five more years, and for indefinite occupation by an international force of the area where the principal industrial concerns in question lie. It also provides for Soviet participation in the control. The area proposed is the Northern part of the Rhineland province and the Southern part of Westphalia. In certain circumstances in order to round off control it contemplates acquisition of industrial concerns situated outside the area.

15. The industrial concerns are the principal coal and steel complexes, including the Hermann Göring Steel Works at Salzgitter (outside the area), as well as the principal chemical, engineering and public utility enterprises. Ownership of the concerns would be transferred to an International Holding Corporation, voting control of which would be retained by the participating Powers. Profits, however, would be made available to the German people, either through a new local authority covering the area, or to the provincial governments of the Rhineland and Westphalia or, if desired, to a central German Government. These profits could be used to buy imports for Germany and, in so far as they allowed, to meet the costs of occupation and reparations payments. The Corporation would be directed by a Council of representatives of each participating Power who would report direct to their Governments and would have votes equivalent to the shareholding of their Government, decisions being taken by a 51 per cent. vote. In addition, industrial councils would be set up for each main industry, together with committees on general finance, employment and trade. Below these would come German managements of the operating companies.

16. After termination of total occupation and winding up of the Control Commission in Berlin, the powers of the Corporation would be defined in a charter from the German Government which would be the subject of agreement with the participating Powers. The Corporation would possess no additional powers such as the right of veto over legislation or of compelling the German Government to pass new laws, but any breach of the charter would constitute a breach between the German Government and the participating Powers entitling the latter to impose sanctions. The sanctions proposed would be temporary assumption of government in the area, and the use of the occupying forces to reinforce the Corporation's authority, if necessary by cutting off coal and steel deliveries to the rest of Germany. The plan suggests the Security Council of the U.N.O. be made a Court of Appeal for the German Government, but to counter undue delay a provision is proposed whereby a 75 per cent. vote of the Council of the Corporation would constitute automatic authority for the Commander-in-Chief of the occupying forces to take action in advance of any such appeal.

17. To make the plan more palatable to the Germans it is proposed that control should be terminated at the end of a stated period of 50 years, subject to the Security Council, the possibility of Germany receiving a share in the voting rights before then being also held out. The products of the area would pass freely throughout Germany and the participating Powers would grant them most-favoured-nation rights. The plan envisages the danger in time of world slump of the participating Powers seeking to export their unemployment to the Ruhr. It therefore contemplates inter-governmental arrangements on cartel lines to ensure Germany a share of the world markets and to protect her home markets. Measures are also suggested for control of foreign exchange earnings.

18. The E.I.P.S. report also considers, but rejects, a proposal for a lease of a prescribed area, coupled with ownership of the principal industrial concerns as above, on the ground that it would be tantamount to political separation, that it would involve the participating Powers in functions of government and that, because of the sensitivity of the area to booms and slumps, it would be preferable that it should be part of a larger unit to which it would contribute, or, alternatively, from which it would draw relief.

19. The E.I.P.S. do not conceal the fact that whatever powers are taken under the Peace Treaty to ensure fulfilment of control, it would be extremely difficult to ensure execution in the face of deliberate and persistent opposition by a German Government or non-co-operation by the local population. Attention is also drawn to the risk of disagreement among the participating Powers and to the great danger which would ensue if control were in consequence abandoned to Germany after industrial development had been revived. Accordingly the plan is designed to give as free a hand as possible to the German managements, while any powers of vetoing legislation are withheld on the ground that to be effective they would have to be so extensive as to render impossible the relationship between the Corporation and the German Government " which would be essential for the plan to have any chance of success."

20. There are clearly grave risks inherent in the plan. It depends admittedly for success on the co-operation of the German Government. It frankly seeks to gain German co-operation by confining the Corporation to the minimum functions necessary for supervision of the plan, by associating U.N.O. with it, by setting a time-limit and by holding out a bribe of an eventual share in the control itself. On the other hand, it does provide for the presence of troops of occupation and machinery for bringing them into immediate action by means of a 75 per cent. vote of the Council of the Corporation. None the less, the E.I.P.S. plan remains dependent for success on the goodwill of the German Government. The latter, by sabotage, by political or other pressure, could reduce the Corporation to impotence without even necessarily transgressing the provisions of the charter. Nor would it be easy for a Corporation thus confined in its functions to play a positive rôle as a Public Utility Authority in the interests of Europe as a whole as opposed to purely German interests. Moreover, in assessing the attitude of the German Government in Berlin we must bear in mind the probability of its being associated with the Soviet Government both politically and economically.

The French Plan (see Map 2).

21. The French Government had also been giving thought to the problem of the Ruhr. Already in August 1944 M. Massigli informed Mr. Eden of his Government's desire that the Rheno-Westphalian basin should be permanently occupied, placed under a special political régime and drawn into the western economic orbit. At the Foreign Ministers' Conference in London in September 1945 M. Bidault circulated a memorandum which included the statement that " the final separation of this region, including the Ruhr, from Germany is both indispensable in order to cover the French frontier and an essential condition for the security of Europe and the world." The Conference decided that the questions raised by the French memorandum should be the subject of preliminary study through the diplomatic channel and then submitted for consideration by the Council of Foreign Ministers with a view to decisions being taken.

22. Shortly after the London Conference a delegation of French officials visited London with the object of explaining the French proposals. A report on these discussions is at Annex B. The French have since then held discussions with the United States, Soviet, Belgian and Netherlands Governments, but the attitude of these Powers has not yet been revealed. It will be seen that the French base their proposals on the idea of security. They take the view that the Germans will be highly discontented with the final peace settlement because it will confirm the loss of their Eastern territories, and it is only by removing the Ruhr and the Rhineland from their control that they can be effectively prevented from renewed aggression. The French do not try to justify their proposals on economic grounds, though they deny that there is any inherent economic objection to them. They claim that the rich resources of the Ruhr can only thus be made available in safety for general benefit. The French freely admit, however, that it would be most dangerous if a new régime were set up in the Ruhr and then, at a later stage, owing to a disagreement between the Controlling Powers or for some other reason, the régime were abandoned.

(a) The Ruhr.

23. The French plan requires the complete and permanent severance from Germany of the territories west of the Rhine and of the Ruhr area itself. The Ruhr would be organised as a separate political entity of some 5 million inhabitants and subject to an international political and economic régime. The Four Powers occupying Germany would lay down the régime, Belgium, Luxembourg and Holland being invited later to associate themselves with it. Whilst the local administration would be appointed by the local population who might also eventually participate in the Government itself, the latter would be in the hands of a Governing Commission of nine members appointed by a majority decision of the Powers directly concerned. The members, once appointed, would act collectively, not as representatives of Governments but as an international body. The Commission would have all the powers of government and would organise a gendarmerie and a police force. To ensure internal security a force of 50,000 troops provided by the States directly concerned and paid for by the Ruhr would be permanently stationed in the territory at the orders of the Governing Commission. The supervision of the régime would be carried out by the signatory Powers who would guarantee its integrity in conformity with the provisions of U.N.O.

24. Industrial concerns would be taken over by international consortiums, shares being held by the participating Powers. The latter would supply working capital as far as necessary, profits being divided among the Allies or used as reparations. In the Ruhr as in the rest of Germany the war industries would be completely suppressed, the iron and engineering industries being much reduced but coal output increased. Iron and coal production would be closely linked with that of France, Belgium and Luxembourg. There would be a new and separate currency with a local bank of issue. There would be no special barrier round the Ruhr and there would be no objection to the export of Ruhr products to Germany.

(b) The Rhineland.

25. The Rhineland, consisting of German territory west of the Rhine, would also be finally and completely separated from Germany. It would become the territory of an independent State or of two or three independent States, which would be almost entirely self-governing except that they would be subjected to permanent occupation by Allied troops.

26. France, in conjunction with Belgium and Luxembourg, would undertake the military organisation of the left bank of the Rhine up to, and including, Cologne. Further north it is suggested that this should be a matter rather for Belgium, Holland and the United Kingdom if the latter consider it appropriate.

27. The French view is that Germany must never again be able to use the Rhineland as in the past as a springboard for attacks against France, and that this purpose can only be achieved by the permanent presence of troops, including if possible those of the other Western Powers, along the whole length of the west bank of the Rhine.

(c) The Saar.

28. It is proposed that the Saar mines, whose ownership was granted to France by the Treaty of Versailles and regained by Germany in 1935, should once more become French property, with the corollary that the territory itself should be included in the French customs and currency system since the economies of France and the Saar are almost entirely complementary. Whilst the final form of government would be decided in due course, French military forces should be stationed there permanently.

29. The French Government have recently pressed that a decision in favour of separation of the Saar on the above lines should be taken at once and if necessary in advance of the decision in regard to the Ruhr and the Rhineland. They are anxious that it should be established that the Saar should not be subjected to the Potsdam policy in regard to the level of German industry and that immediate steps should be possible to bring about its recovery and integration with French economy. In fact, they are asking for the Saar what the Poles have obtained for Upper Silesia in advance of the peace settlement.

30. The French proposals cannot be fully appreciated unless set against their background. After the last war the French sought above all security against their richer and more populous neighbour; in addition, they wished to get what reparation was possible for the physical damage to their country. To satisfy these aims they put forward two territorial demands apart from the return of Alsace-Lorraine. First they claimed the annexation of the Saar territory. Secondly, they pressed for the political separation from Germany of the territory west of the Rhine, its constitution as an autonomous State or group of States, and its inclusion in a customs union with the western countries. The essential military conditions were that the Rhine bridges should be controlled and that the barrier should be held, not by the French alone, but by inter-Allied forces.

31. Under both heads they were disappointed. In the Saar they obtained temporary ownership of the mines but, at the insistence of the British and Americans, the territory was placed under international administration, its final fate to be determined by plebiscite after fifteen years. The plebiscite in 1935 showed an overwhelming majority in favour of reincorporation in Germany with the result that the ownership of the mines reverted to Germany.

Their proposal for the Rhineland was also opposed by both Great Britain and the United States, and eventually they were persuaded to drop it in favour of (a) treaties of guarantee, (b) the temporary occupation of the Rhineland, and (c) the permanent demilitarisation of the German territory to the west of the Rhine plus a 50 kilom. strip to the east. The treaties of guarantee in the event never came into force at all. The occupation of the Rhineland was prematurely brought to an end at the very time when Germany was beginning to regain her strength. The demilitarised zone, though subsequently confirmed in the Locarno Agreement, was violated by Hitler with impunity in 1935. In 1940 Marshal Foch's worst fears were fulfilled.

32. In putting forward their claims to-day the French therefore have a background of painful experience. They regard a favourable settlement of this question as the pivotal point of their whole foreign policy. If we reject their claims or whittle them down in such a manner as to deprive them of what they regard as essential to security, we can have little hope of maintaining close relations or influence with the French. They will seek their security elsewhere, probably in Moscow. The defeatism, which is at the bottom of the great part of their present internal troubles, will be intensified, and the chances of their returning to stable conditions will be to that extent diminished. Furthermore, the failure to put Anglo-French relations on a really close footing will prejudice our relations with Belgium and Holland and will make more difficult of attainment that close co-operation between ourselves and the Western European countries which we regard as a very important element in our future security.

33. As for the actual French proposals, it may be said that they present a clear cut, logical scheme which has the merit of finality and is free of the type of compromise that proved so unsuccessful in the Versailles settlement. If the plan worked as the French believe, it would certainly provide a complete safeguard against the Germans initiating another war of aggression. The E.I.P.S. plan for the international control of the Ruhr industry could be fitted into it and it might be argued that the elimination of the German Government and Administration would lessen the opportunities of those wishing to make the E.I.P.S. plan unworkable. There would be no objection to the profits of the area contributing to payment for the imports of Germany and reparations. The area would enjoy its own free waterway of the Rhine.

34. On the other hand, the French plan raises a number of difficulties. The fact that the Governing Commission would be responsible to outside Powers and not to the population is difficult to reconcile with the political principles for which we stand and which we are now trying to instil into the German people. All the German political parties would bitterly oppose political separation as would also the trades unions, and they would be strongly backed by German sympathisers abroad. It is conceivable that the Controlling Powers might in course of time lack the necessary determination to maintain the separation in the face of such opposition.

35. The economic difficulties are also considerable. Our economic advisers believe, despite French arguments to the contrary, that by creating an administrative barrier between the Ruhr and the rest of Germany, the plan would be economically disastrous for both areas and would also, in times of slump, involve the Controlling Powers in the necessity to find relief for the population of the Ruhr.

Level of Industry in Germany and Security.

36. Both these plans, the E.I.P.S. plan leaving the Ruhr inside Germany and the French plan severing it from Germany, must be viewed in the light of the current discussions on the future level of industry in Germany. We are now faced with a deadlock on this issue in Berlin where both the Russians and the Americans are seeking to impose such a reduction of the overall level of German industry as in our opinion will prove fatal to the maintenance of future German economy through failure of exports to balance imports.

37. My own idea was to make of the Ruhr a positive element of European reconstruction and co-operation by enabling it to work under full international control for the peace-time requirements of Europe. I did not contemplate the establishment of an international consortium for purely negative purposes of prohibition and inspection. Yet, unless a level of industry is allowed in the Ruhr substantially higher than that now proposed for the rest of Germany, the prospects of the successful operation of a Public Utility Corporation would be remote indeed. The French proposals do not involve any modification of the general level in favour of the Ruhr, and the area for which it is proposed that the Allies should assume full responsibility would be bankrupt from the start.

38. I suggest, therefore, that it is essential for the success of any such plan that the Ruhr—whether as part of Germany or as a separate State—should be allowed a higher level of industry than that laid down for the rest of Germany.

39. If this view is accepted, the question arises whether we are more likely to secure the conditions we need by proposing to separate the Ruhr from Germany and to place it under international government, than by leaving it inside Germany under the German Government. As we have indicated above, the E.I.P.S. plan is based on co-operation with the German Government, it seeks to impose a minimum of restrictions on German management and in fact depends for success on German goodwill. On the face of it, it seems hopeless to suppose that the strong resistance of the Soviets and the United States to the fixing of a higher level of industry could be overcome in favour of a plan for the Ruhr which left such freedom to German enterprise.

40. For if an adequate level of industry is one condition for success of the plan, the other is security against German attempts at interference and recovery of control. Here it must be admitted that the French plan of complete separation offers greater security than that of E.I.P.S. The economic aspect of the French plan is obviously open to adjustment.

41. There is nothing inherently impossible in the area being governed by an outside authority. The Saar was so governed for many years under the League of Nations. Clearly the council of the holding company would not be suitable for this purpose, but a governing commission or commissioner could be appointed either responsible to the Four Powers while the Control Authority remains in Berlin, or to the U.N.O. It should not be impossible to devise safeguards to ensure the prosperity of the Ruhr being made to benefit the rest of Germany.

42. If separation were adopted it is suggested that the area in question should be larger than the narrow Ruhr proposed in the French plan, and should extend to and include the area west of the Rhine up to the Dutch frontier. This would have great administrative advantages. This whole area could be formed into a separate State with full local government under a commissioner or a governing commission selected by the U.N.O. with which the new State and consortium could be closely associated through the Security Council and the Social and Economic Council. The international force (which is also contemplated under the E.I.P.S. proposals) would be situated in this area under the orders of the administrator and might come to represent the residue of the military occupation of Germany when the time came to abandon the present generalised occupation.

The Soviet Attitude.

43. The Soviet Government are deeply interested in the Ruhr. Under the Potsdam Agreement they stand to obtain from it a considerable part of their share of reparations from Western Germany. Apart from that, they are determined that it shall never be used as the economic backbone of either a German revival or a Western bloc aimed against themselves. At the Potsdam Conference the Soviet Delegation tabled a proposal whereby the Ruhr, while remaining part of Germany, would be placed under special administration exercised by a Council of British, United States, Soviet and French representatives. No further details of their proposal have been given, but it is safe to suppose that it would be designed to depress the Ruhr rather than to revive it. Any proposal, therefore, which aimed at raising the level of industry would meet with deep Soviet suspicion, not only as diminishing reparation deliveries of industrial equipment but as a political threat to themselves. The Soviet Government have given no indication whatever as yet of their attitude to the French plan beyond saying that they are studying it. The Soviets must be expected to play a large rôle in the Ruhr in any case, whether as members of an international régime or as the Power behind the German Communist Party.

The German Attitude.

44. Here it is necessary to consider the German attitude. We must expect all German political parties to be hostile to any international control of the Ruhr, but especially to its separation from Germany. Indeed, the Berlin Communists are already insisting that the Ruhr must remain German. The Social Democrats and the Christian Democrats, who can hardly be expected to be less nationalistic, are already showing signs of following suit.

45. In deciding the future of the Ruhr we must clearly take into account the probable picture of post-war Germany. The most striking feature at present is the determined action being taken by the Soviet Government in the Eastern Zone and especially Berlin to support and impose the Communist Party. The Soviets have provided leaders for the latter in two Moscow-trained men, Ulbrecht and Pieck. The Communists, aided by the Soviet authorities, are at present busy forcing through fusion with the Social Democrats in the East and their aim is to extend the fusion to the parties in the Western Zones. Their aim is to create a new party, the United Workers' Party, which behind a democratic façade would be Communist-controlled. The Communists have already penetrated the Trade Union movement and imposed a single union system in Berlin. In the Western Zones the two leading parties, the Social Democrats and Christian Democrats, led by Schuhmacher and Kaiser respectively, are so far resistant to Soviet penetration. The Communists are numerous in the Ruhr and Hamburg but comparatively unimportant in the rest of the West. Their organisation, however, is more active and widespread than that of their rivals.

46. So long as the present zonal occupation continues and Germany is not centralised, our presence and that of the Americans in the West affords some protection to the democratic German parties against Communist pressure from the Eastern Zone. We can try to stiffen the Social Democrats against fusion and enable them and the Christian Democrats to strike root in the various local elections which are envisaged. Once Berlin again becomes the seat of a German Government, the latter will be exposed to strong Communist and Soviet pressure. The Communists will be entrenched in the East and will proceed to the offensive against the parties in the West. For I fear we must proceed on the assumption that the Soviet Government will continue to do all it can to ensure that the future German Government will be Communist and Soviet-controlled. This is the attitude they have adopted in other border countries; their methods in Germany are true to type. According to our reports from Berlin no opportunity appears to be missed for stressing the incompatability of East and West and the need to draw inspiration for German unity entirely from Moscow.

47. In these circumstances, we should be wise, I think, to prolong the present system of administration and government by zones and delay the setting up of a single German Government operating from Berlin. By this means we would gain time for the democratic parties to grow and for completion of our own arrangements in the Ruhr. But, on the other hand, so long as the zonal systems continue we shall not be able to reduce the cost of our occupation, notably that of feeding the German population in our Zone.

48. But what likelihood is there of their being able to resist the Soviet-controlled parties in the long run? We can support them throughout the Western Zones in the opposition to the Communists. We can back them with our publicity. The only support likely to count, however, would be the giving of favours and the establishment throughout the West of a much higher standard of living, and that we are precluded from doing by the Potsdam Agreement. But what are the chances of the democratic parties maintaining their resistance against Communist pressure, especially after British and United States troops are withdrawn and the level of industry is maintained at such a low level as to create chronic unemployment?

49. I think it is possible that were there no Soviet backing, the democratic parties might hold their own. The black record of Soviet occupation usually reacts against the chances of the local Communist party when there is no outside force behind them. But so long as the Soviets are established in the Eastern Zone, and even after their withdrawal so long as they are present on the Oder, it must be extremely doubtful whether the German democratic parties will resist. The German character predisposes them to totalitarian parties. The effects of defeat and economic chaos must increase this.

50. Events in Austria provide an interesting parallel. So long as there was a chance of a Communist Government in Vienna, the Soviet Government took the lead in the Allied Council in pressing for greater freedom for the Austrian Government. Since the elections, at which the Communists failed, the Soviet Government have turned their other face to Austria and are blocking every move to increase her independence, and their occupying troops are digging in for another winter. We must anticipate, in fact, that, unless the German Government comes under Communist control, the Soviet Government will prolong their occupation on one pretext or another and apply the bludgeon to bring it about.

51. If the chances are thus against our being able to prevent the German Government from becoming Communist and Soviet-controlled, we have from the security angle a very serious argument for trying to hold at any rate the Ruhr by removing it not only from the economic control but also from the political control of Berlin. If Germany is likely to be under Soviet control, it is better that Germany should not include the arsenal of the Ruhr. The fact that the German parties would be against us at the start should not blind us to the possibility that in the long run an international Ruhr, if a success, might become the focus for Western Germany later.

52. On the other hand, we must face the fact that the Soviet Government may decide to back a Communist German Government in resisting the detaching of the Ruhr territory and even of the Ruhr industry from Gemany. In that event we should have either to acquiesce in Germany retaining the Ruhr, with such purely economic controls as we could establish, or be prepared to stand out with the French (and with doubtful American support) in opposing its return by continuing our occupation in the face of combined German and Soviet pressure.

The United States Attitude and Proposal for a Four-Power Treaty.

53. The United States Government have not yet given any indication of their attitude towards the French proposals. In the Four-Power Council in Berlin, however, they have allied themselves with the Soviet Government in obstinately blocking our attempts to raise the level of industry in Germany. They are also pressing the French Government to agree to the setting up of a centralised German administration in Berlin. They are, of course, known to be anxious to reduce and withdraw American troops of occupation as soon as possible.

54. Mr. Byrnes has now communicated to me and to M. Molotov a tentative draft for a Four-Power Treaty on German disarmament and demilitarisation. The text of this proposal, which is highly confidential at this stage, is at Annex C.

55. By the terms of the Treaty the United States, the United Kingdom, the Soviet and French Governments would bind themselves to ensure the complete disarmament of Germany (Article 1). Upon the termination of the Allied occupation a system of quadrupartite inspection would be set up (Article 2), acceptance by Germany of these provisions being an essential condition of terminating the Allied occupation (Article 3). The quadrupartite Commission of Control set up under Article 2 would report to the Four Governments whenever by a majority of vote they believed that Article 1 was in danger of violation, at the same time submitting recommendations for action. Thereupon the Four Powers would agree to take such prompt military measures as were needed. For this purpose they would within six months negotiate detailed agreements laying down the procedure of the Commission of Control, the numbers and types of forces which each party should contribute, their location and such other facilities which they would provide (Article 4). The Treaty would run for 25 years (Article 5).

56. This American proposal is no doubt designed to speed up the termination of the total occupation and to facilitate an early American withdrawal from Germany. None the less it provides for the completion of disarmament first. Again a German Government would have to be in existence to undertake the necessary pledges. It would bind the United States Government for 25 years to the principle and practice of inspection of Germany and of the use of force, by means of contingents to be agreed in advance, in the event of violations. The Treaty is not presumably intended to take the place of the general Peace Treaty with Germany, which will have to be concluded with all the belligerents. The provisions for inspection and eventual action in regard to disarmament on a purely Four-Power basis would obviously be far more effective than any similar provision requiring agreement by a large number of Powers.

57. On the other hand, inspection alone cannot be accepted as a satisfactory means of control of Germany. The lesson of inspection after the last war is there to show how successfully the German Government eluded such control and rearmed under our noses. It is certain that the French Government, or for that matter the Soviet Government, would not regard mere inspection of the Ruhr in the conditions proposed as a substitute for occupation and a more specialised form of control on some such lines as discussed above. Nor could I possibly recommend that we should agree to withdrawal of our own forces from the Ruhr merely on the strength of the completion of disarmament and the acceptance by a German Government of the servitudes of the Treaty. Under my own conception of the Ruhr, upon which the E.I.P.S. worked, I always contemplated that the area must be occupied by an international force for an indefinite period.

58. I think, therefore, that the American proposal should be welcomed for the assurance it contains of continued United States participation in inspection and eventual measures of repression. On the other hand we should stipulate that the parties must not be precluded from maintaining partial occupation of Germany merely because disarmament has been completed, a German Government set up and a system of inspection provided.

British Interests.

59. British interests may be summarised as follows :—

(1) Security from the revival of German aggression.
(2) Reasonable economic well-being in Germany and Europe.
(3) Reduction of the British costs of occupation of Germany and feeding of Germans.
(4) A democratic and Western-minded Germany.
(5) The restriction of predominating Soviet influence as far East as possible.
(6) The recovery of France as a solid member of the Western democracies.

60. For (1) and (2) control of the Ruhr is the key which is at present in our hands.

61. For (3) we must face the fact that it is going to become increasingly difficult to keep the American troops in Germany. Hardly less difficult will it be to keep our own troops in Germany, especially if it means spending vast sums in dollars in feeding our Germans. If we and the Americans go we must try and cut our losses and save as much of the position as possible.

62. For (4), if we cannot prolong the zonal government of Germany with all that it means in manpower and money, there is no alternative but to set up a German Government. In view of the economic position and the German propensity for totalitarian solution, the prospects are unfavourable unless there is a change of Soviet policy as a result of which the Soviet tide recedes.

63. For (5), if we and the Americans cannot maintain indefinitely the military occupation of our zones and if we cannot keep the Soviet Government from dominating a central German Government in Berlin, then there are grounds for retaining control over the Ruhr for the West. We should have more control over a separate Ruhr under Allied military occupation, which included the Soviets in the control, than over a German Ruhr as part of a Germany under a Communist and Soviet-controlled Government in Berlin.

64. For (6), a settlement of the Ruhr and the Rhineland which would reassure France is essential.

ANNEX A.

ECONOMIC AND INDUSTRIAL PLANNING STAFF.

THE CONTROL OF THE RUHR.

NOTE BY THE SECRETARY.

THE attached paper has been prepared at the request of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and incorporates the views of the British Element of the Control Commission for Germany.

4th February, 1946.

CONTROL OF THE RUHR.

1. We have been asked to examine and report on the best type of régime which could be set up in the area of "North" Rhineland and Westphalia to secure for the Allies control over Germany's war important industries in that locality without separating the area politically from the rest of Germany. In considering this problem we have further been asked to examine two alternative methods, namely :—

(a) control through the ownership or part-ownership of a selected group of industrial companies;
(b) the lease to the Allied countries concerned of a prescribed area of German territory, coupled with the ownership or part-ownership of the principal industrial concerns within that territory.

Finally, we have been asked to consider what would be the general economic consequences of taking away the territory on the west bank of the Rhine and setting it up as a separate State. Our views on the effects which this would have both on Germany and on the new State are set out in Annex A (1).

Assumptions.

2. In considering this problem we have made the following basic assumptions :—

(a) that a Reparation Plan giving effect to the Potsdam Agreement will be carried out;
(b) that the occupation and control of the whole of Germany will continue for at least a further five years from now;
(c) that when the military occupation of Germany as a whole ceases, military contingents of the Allied Powers principally concerned will continue to occupy an area in Western Germany in which the majority, at least, of the principal industrial concerns taken under Allied control are situated;
(d) that Russia will participate in whatever form of control is set up in Western Germany.

3. After studying the two alternative proposals set out in the terms of reference, we have reached the conclusion that ownership or part-ownership of a selected group of industrial companies would be the most satisfactory method of achieving our main objective, namely, the development of the industries of Western Germany in the interests of European prosperity in such a way as to leave us with a maximum degree of security that is possible without a political separation of the area in which these industries are situated from the rest of Germany. We would like to stress, however, that whatever powers are taken under the Peace Treaty to ensure that the purposes of our control are duly carried out, it would be extremely difficult to ensure their execution in the face of deliberate and long-standing opposition by a central German Government or the sustained non-co-operation of the local population. Moreover, in so far as their control had permitted the industrial development of Western Germany beyond the stage that would have been likely had the Allies acquired no interest in

C223757

German industry, the danger to security if disagreement amongst the controlling Powers or German obstructionist tactics resulted in the Allies relinquishing their control would be greater. On the other hand, the avoidance of this danger by the separation of this area from the rest of Germany would have such disastrous effects on the general economy of the latter and the Ruhr, and in consequence on Western Europe as a whole, as to constitute a potentially greater source of danger than the theoretical risk inherent in our present proposal (see Annex A (2)).

4. In the following paragraphs we set out our recommendations in regard to the structure and nature of the control under the proposal which we favour.

The Area.

5. The area in which the industries most important from the security aspect are concentrated is the northern part of the Rhineland Province and the southern part of the province of Westphalia (hereinafter referred to as " the area "). We have considered whether industrial undertakings outside the area should also be included in the control and have been unable to reach a decision on this point. On the one hand, it is argued that since effective control will depend upon the presence of occupying forces it would be a mistake to take into control any undertakings in parts of the country where occupying forces are not stationed. Assuming that the Germans wished to undermine the authority of the Participating Powers, they would be certain to concentrate first on those outlying properties, and if the Participating Powers were not able or prepared to take the necessary counter-measures, their position would be weakened not only vis-à-vis these particular properties, but also with regard to the other properties within the area. The other view is that, in spite of the great force of this argument, there may be certain exceptional cases which would justify the acquisition of industrial concerns outside the area. These exceptions should be confined to cases where the ownership of a concern outside the area, but within the British or American zones, would result in the Allies obtaining virtual 100 per cent. control of an important German industry. An example of this is the Hermann Göring Steel Works at Salzgitter, which with the plants in the Ruhr would probably represent the bulk of German steel production. The complete control of this industry would enable the Participating Powers to exercise considerable influence over its relationships with other steel-producing countries. It would enable them to supervise the operations of Salzgitter more closely than would be possible under rights of inspection conferred under a Peace Treaty. A decision on this point might be left open for later discussion with the other Powers concerned.

Industries to be controlled.

6. The following groups of industries will be taken into control by the Allied countries concerned :—

(a) The undertakings in the area of the six principal coal and steel complexes, viz. :—
  (1) Gutehoffnungshütte Aktienverein für Bergbau u. Hüttenbetrieb, Nürnberg.
  (2) Hoesch A.G., Dortmund.
  (3) Klöckner Werke A.G., Duisburg.
  (4) Friedrich Krupp, Essen.
  (5) Mannesmann Röhrenwerke A.G., Düsseldorf.
  (6) Vereinigte Stahlwerke A.G., Düsseldorf.
(b) All the other colliery companies and their associated companies in the area.
(c) All the other steel companies and their associated companies in the area together perhaps with the Hermann Göring Steel Works at Salzgitter (see paragraph 5 above).
(d) All the principal plants within the area belonging to large complexes principally interested in the chemical and engineering industries and major public utility enterprises (such as I.G. Farben, Demag, Rheinisch-Westfälisches Elektrizitätswerk).

(N.B.—The taking over by the Allied countries concerned of industrial complexes in the area is recommended for two reasons. First, it is impossible to draw a hard-and-fast line between steel and engineering; control of steel works which is essential would therefore automatically entail control of some engineering works. Secondly, we are committed under the Potsdam Agreement to break down concentrations of economic power; this will be particularly difficult to achieve owing to the lack of an investing middle class in Germany; if we cannot succeed in leaving these complexes in German ownership and breaking them up into their smaller constituents, the most satisfactory alternative would seem to be to acquire them ourselves.)

Form of control.

7. The undertakings would be acquired as going concerns and transferred to an International Holding Corporation. The share and loan capital of the companies owning acquired undertakings, which would in most cases include assets which the International Holding Corporation would not wish to acquire, would be left in the hands of their original owners. The latter would look to the appropriate German authorities for compensation for the assets acquired by the International Holding Corporation but would retain through their share or loan holdings their interest in assets not so acquired, e.g., those outside the area. New German subsidiary companies would be formed by the International Holding Corporation to control and manage all the acquired undertakings. For the sake of clarity, the following definitions have been used in the ensuing discussion of this organisation :—

Corporation means the International Holding Corporation.
Operating Companies means the wholly-owned subsidiary companies operating the undertakings which have been acquired.

The capital structure of the Corporation need not be considered in detail at this stage, but it should be so designed as to ensure that the voting control would be retained by the Participating Powers while the profits, subject to such reserves as were thought necessary, were made available to the German people. The voting rights might be allotted to the Participating Powers in something like the following proportions :—

	Per cent.
United Kingdom, United States, France and Russia (each)	20
Holland	10
Belgium and Luxembourg together	10

The profits might be allocated either to the new local authority referred to in paragraph 17, or to the provincial Governments of the Provinces of Rhineland and Westphalia in amounts approximately proportionate to the value of the industrial properties acquired in each of these two Provinces. The provincial Governments rather than a central Government have been suggested partly because this would be in conformity with our policy of decentralisation, and partly because there might be no alternative central authority in Germany at the time the transfer was made. When, however, a German Government has been established and its administrative structure fixed it may prove to be desirable that it, rather a local authority, should receive the profits.

Constitution.

8. The direction of the Corporation would be in the hands of a Council which would consist of one representative appointed by each Power who would report direct to his Government. These representatives would be non-technical and would be concerned primarily with matters of broad general policy. They would also make decisions on recommendations received from the Industrial Committees (see below). Each representative on the Council would have votes equivalent to the percentage shareholding of his Government in the Corporation. Decisions of the Council would normally be taken by a 51 per cent. vote.

9. In addition to the Council, Industrial Committees would be set up for each of the main industries in which the Corporation was interested. Similar committees might be established to deal with such general subjects as finance, employment and trade. These Industrial Committees would consist of one member from each of the countries concerned. The main functions of the committees would be to ensure that these industries carried out the general policy laid down by the Council, to keep themselves fully informed of their operations and in particular to take all steps necessary in regard to these companies to ensure the observance of the industrial disarmament clauses of the Peace Treaty. The voting rights of the directors of these Industrial Committees would be similar to those of the Council.

10. Below these again would come the German managements of the operating companies. Each group of industries would elect from amongst its members an executive body which would be the principal point of contact between the industry and the Industrial Committees.

11. In general, the policy of the Participating Powers should be to give as free a hand as possible to the German managements and the principal though not exclusive power which the Industrial Committees or the Council would enjoy would be that of veto.

Dispossession and compensation of previous owners.

12. The undertaking would be taken over by simple requisition, the owners looking for their compensation to whichever authority, local or central, was designated as the recipient of the profits of the Corporation. Some special arrangements might be necessary in the case of interests acquired from non-German owners.

The relationship of the Corporation with the central German authority.

13. This can be divided into two phases :—

(a) the period when the central authority consists of the quadripartite Control Council;
(b) after the Control Council has terminated and there is a central German Government.

14. As far as (a) is concerned, the powers of the Corporation will need no precise definition; their properties being situated in Germany, they will be bound by decision of the quadripartite Control Council and it must be assumed that since the four Powers represented in Berlin will be the four largest individual shareholders in the Corporation, no divergences of views are likely to develop other than those which in the first instance should be settled by the Control Council. In any case, during this period there will be no security risk.

15. When, however, the Control Council is wound up, the Corporation will need to have a charter from the German Government which will be incorporated in an agreement with the Participating Powers. The precise powers which the Corporation will need to enjoy in order to carry out its objectives can be left to be worked out in detail during the earlier stages of its existence when the Control Council will still be operating.

16. We have considered whether the Corporation would need any additional powers, such as the right to veto legislation or compel the German Government to pass new laws. Although at first sight there would appear to be some advantage in such an arrangement we have reached the conclusion that in practice it would be unlikely to achieve the desired effect. If the German Government is determined to sabotage by all means at its disposal the carrying out of the purposes for which the Corporation has been formed, the rights of positive and negative powers over German legislation which the Corporation would need to protect itself, would be so far-reaching as to render it impossible at the outset to establish the sort of relationship between the Corporation and the Government which would be essential for the plan to have any chance of success. We therefore think it preferable that the powers of the Corporation should be defined quite clearly in the charter. Any breach of the conditions set out in that charter would constitute a breach of the agreement between the German Government and the Participating Powers and would therefore entitle the latter to impose sanctions.

17. In order for the sanctions to be effective the Participating Powers must be prepared to take action along two lines. One of these is the temporary assumption by them of the powers of government within the area and the other the use of the occupying forces to reinforce their authority. It will be easier to apply the former if, at the inception of the scheme, a new local authority is set up for the area. Although the new local authority would in normal circumstances have precisely the same relationship with a central German Government as any other local authority, it would have its own separate administrative machine which could be adapted for use by the Participating Powers in the area, should the occasion arise. The use of armed forces would certainly be required under these circumstances and it might also be necessary to make use of these if some action short of the assumption of powers of government were thought sufficient.

For example, the stationing of contingents of the occupying forces at key points on the boundary of the area could be used to cut off at a moment's notice shipments of coal and steel from the Ruhr to the rest of Germany.

18. The relationship of this arrangement to the United Nations Organisation would have to be considered in the light of future developments. It might prove desirable for questions affecting the application of the agreement to be brought before the Security Council and in particular for the German Government to have the right of appeal in any case where the Corporation was exercising its powers in a manner which could be shown to be detrimental to German national interests where no issues affecting security were involved. A further point which must be considered is whether the Participating Powers will have the right to apply military sanctions within the area on their own initiative or whether they must first obtain the permission of the Security Council. The latter, though perhaps more logical, might be dangerous in that delays would probably occur which might prejudice the authority of the Corporation. This would be particularly likely if, in the event of a breach occurring which, in the opinion of the Participating Powers, justified recourse to military action, the German case was heard as well as that of the Corporation. A preferable arrangement would be a provision to be included in the Corporation's charter whereby a 75 per cent. vote of the Council constituted automatic authority for the Commander-in-Chief of the forces of occupation to take such action as the Council might prescribe. If this was accepted it would be only reasonable, however, to give the German Government the right of appeal ex post facto to the Security Council.

19. Two other points have been suggested for making this scheme more acceptable to the Germans and therefore less likely to arouse their lasting opposition. The first of these is a clause in the charter which would provide for the termination of control by the Participating Powers at the end of a stated period subject to the concurrence at that time of the Security Council. The second is that we should hold out to the Germans the promise of an eventual share in the voting rights of the Corporation provided they had co-operated satisfactorily with it in the meantime. As regards the first of these proposals, we think that if the Germans knew at the time the Corporation was formed that they would ultimately regain control of the acquired undertakings it would have an important psychological effect. From this angle a period of, say, 25 years, which would be within the lifetime of the majority of the population, would be most advantageous. But in view of the difficulties of re-educating the Germans within so short a period and the important security aspects involved, no period of less than 50 years is likely to be acceptable to the Participating Powers. The promise of eventual participation in the voting rights of the Corporation presents greater difficulties. The Germans could not receive a share larger than that of the four principal Powers, and this would not be sufficient to influence the decisions of the Council in matters of legitimate interest to the German Government where decisions are taken by a 51 per cent. majority vote. It might, however, enable them to interfere in the one field in which the Participating Powers should have undisputed authority, namely, the use of armed force as a sanction against a breach of the agreement involving a threat to security.

Tariffs.

20. It is important that the products of the operating companies should be allowed to pass freely and without discrimination throughout Germany. In the matter of import duties and of internal duties levied in their territories, the Participating Powers should grant most-favoured-nation treatment to goods produced by the controlled industries of the area. In all other respects they should make no arbitrary discrimination against such goods. Presumably any agreement arrived at by the Commercial Conference to be held during the coming summer would be applied so far as relevant to this case.

Industrial Policy.

21. One of the great obstacles in the way of the Allied control of the principal industries in Western Germany achieving the objectives which we have in mind is the very real danger that in times of world slump the Participating Powers would exercise their control over German industry to ensure that it was Germany and not the industries of their respective countries which suffered the adverse consequences of declining world demand. In other words, there would be great temptation for each of the controlling Powers to export their unemployment to the Ruhr. To prevent this, some inter-Governmental arrangement will be necessary which will secure for Germany a share in world export markets; allow her to participate in expansion of productive capacity brought about by the increase in world demand, and in times of slump to protect her home market for her home industries. This would in effect mean the setting up of a form of inter-governmental cartel and although the U.S. Government are known to be opposed to cartels, they may be prepared to agree to some form of inter-governmental machinery designed to meet this specific case.

Raising of fresh capital.

22. If the operating companies are to be allowed to expand to meet an increase of world demand for their products, the Corporation will need to raise additional capital from time to time. Generally speaking, this capital should be raised from internal sources through the new local authority or the provincial Governments of the Rhineland and Westphalia. The latter could issue their own provincial Government bonds, and perhaps be given the right to secure these on earnings of the Corporation. In the latter event, however, the bond holders would receive no lien on the properties of the operating companies and no rights of foreclosure, since it is important to ensure that the security of the Participating Powers is preserved intact. The operating companies should also have the right to borrow abroad. In the event of one of the Participating Powers being willing to put up the money, opportunity should be given to each of the Participating Powers to subscribe pro rata to the loan. The unwillingness of one or more Powers to subscribe should not of itself convey a right to veto the intended loan, provided that the necessary majority vote of the Council had been obtained to its issue. Subscription to a foreign currency loan by a Participating Power should not confer any additional voting rights. As in the case of internal borrowings, issues made by foreign Governments could be secured on revenue but not on assets.

Control of foreign exchange earnings.

23. It has been suggested that the Powers represented in the Corporation should retain possession of the foreign exchange earnings of the operating companies, and only release these to the German authorities on satisfactory proof that they were not being used for undemocratic or warlike purposes. The Corporation would certainly need to protect itself in its charter from any foreign exchange control imposed by the central Government being exercised in such a way as to defeat the objectives for which the Corporation has been established. It is, however, important in our opinion that the general relationship between the Corporation and the German Government should be such that the Corporation would respect the authority of the German Government except where this can be shown as being used in a manner injurious to the Corporation's interests. It would therefore, in our opinion, be wrong for the Corporation in the case of the foreign exchange earnings of its operating companies to be placed in an exceptional position in which it became in its own right a judge of the political policy of the central German authorities. On the other hand, it might well be desirable, as a means of applying pressure in the event of a breach of the Peace Treaty, for the United Nations to have some general control over German foreign exchange expenditure as a whole. If so it would seem preferable to do this by means of canalising German foreign exchange receipts into some central banking fund, which the United Nations Organisation would have the right to block in cases of emergency.

Timing.

24. If it is agreed that control by means of a holding company is the best means of achieving our objectives, it would be inadvisable for the Allies to take over the industries listed in paragraph 6 above until the undertakings in question can be operated as going concerns, and until the removals of plant and equipment under the reparation programme have been completed. When these conditions have been fulfilled it is probable that the structure outlined in the preceding paragraphs might be set up within a period of about twelve months. Pending the creation of the Corporation, the occupying Power in whose zone the undertakings to be acquired are located might take their assets into custody in the same way as has already been done in the case of the Ruhr mines.

The lease to the Powers concerned of a prescribed area in German territory, coupled with the ownership or part-ownership of the principal industrial concerns within that territory.

25. At first sight this proposal appears to have many attractions. In fact it amounts to a lease to the Participating Powers for a fixed period of years of certain functions of government within the area concerned, which would be much smaller than the provinces of North Rhineland and Westphalia. In practice, however, it has many disadvantages. If the Allies were to exercise all the functions of a German Government, it would amount to political separation of the area from the rest of Germany. In any case, it would not be practicable for the Participating Powers to exercise these functions. The property interests of the Participating Powers in that area would be confined to the assets of the principal industries, e.g., coal and steel, but all the rest would remain with their existing owners who for administrative convenience would remain subject to German law. Moreover, since the area in question (i.e., the Ruhr) would be most sensitive to the impact of booms and slumps, it would be essential for the area for taxation and currency purposes to be treated as part of Germany. In other words, in times of prosperity the central German Government would expect to obtain revenue from the area with which to subsidise the poorer parts of Germany, while in times of slump the area itself would require subsidising out of the central revenues of the country.

26. If there was any real chance that the Participating Powers would receive the fullest collaboration from a central German Government these difficulties would largely disappear, but we do not think that this is a risk that we could afford to accept. A leased area with an antagonistic German Government would present intolerable problems. There would be no guarantee that the local German municipal authorities would be prepared to obey the orders of the Participating Powers, and if they did in fact adopt ca'canny measures, the Participating Powers would have no option but to take over the administration of the area themselves. This would be a considerable administrative burden in any circumstances, and if a Seven-Power Control involved the establishment of a Seven-Power Kommendatura, it is most unlikely that any efficient non-German administration could be achieved. There is also the political difficulty that if the lease was not regarded as separation the area would have the right to send deputies to the Reichstag. The Participating Powers would find themselves in an extremely embarrassing position if these deputies openly avowed their desire to terminate the régime. In the economic field the position of the Participating Powers could be made extremely difficult. If in times of slump the German authorities failed to subsidise the population of the area and widespread starvation resulted, the Participating Powers would have a direct responsibility to provide relief, which they could scarcely evade.

27. Although for the above reasons we have come to the conclusion that control by means of an international holding company is preferable to control by means of a leased area, we still regard the lease with all its dangers as preferable to political separation. In the first place, it would be possible under such an arrangement for the area still to remain part of the German Customs system, which would not be feasible if it was politically separated from the rest of Germany. Secondly, a lease has less finality about it than separation, and it would always be possible for the Participating Powers to vary the terms of the lease according to the behaviour of the central German Government.

ANNEX A (1).

Establishment of German territory on the west bank of the Rhine as a separate State and the effects of such a proposal both on the new State and on the rest of Germany.

WE have assumed in considering this problem that the territory to be separated from Germany will be confined to that part of the Rhineland and the Palatinate which lies on the west bank of the Rhine and will exclude the Saar. In subsequent paragraphs we refer to this territory as "the State."

Effect on the State.

2. There is little doubt that if the State were separated from the rest of Germany and set up as a new entity it could be made economically viable. The State possesses important natural resources in the shape of hard and brown coal mines, with rich agricultural land which should in time be capable of development to produce a substantial surplus of the higher cost foodstuffs. From the industrial point of view it contains important steel and engineering industries and unless these are substantially reduced under the reparation plan they could be adjusted in such a way as eventually to make the area largely self-sufficient so far as the production of plant and equipment is concerned. The State also contains important chemical industries. There is a substantial surplus of electric power in the State, but it is deficient in gas.

3. In spite of the satisfactory position summarised in the preceding paragraph, the setting up of a barrier between the State and the rest of Germany would undoubtedly create difficulties in regard to the disposal of the surpluses which are now consumed in other parts of Germany. There is a close connection between the State and the Ruhr, the latter taking surplus power from the State and sending it gas. The State also looks to the Ruhr for technical leadership. There are also strong economic connections with other parts of Germany to which the State sells important quantities of chemicals, including in particular carbide and cyanamide, and also special steels. The State also disposes of its surplus sugar production to the rest of Germany. With separation the State would become a new currency area, and on the basis of past experience, her exports to Germany would substantially exceed her imports from Germany. It is unlikely that Germany would be able to afford to import the surpluses from the State as in the past, given the economic difficulties with which she is faced and the further probable effects of the reparation plan. The State would therefore have to find new outlets for part at least of the exports which formerly went to Germany.

4. In general we conclude that there are no insurmountable economic objections from the point of view of the State itself, to its establishment as a separate political entity, provided that its population is not increased above its pre-war level. We would, however, point out that the creation of small independent States with a separate currency and fiscal system of their own is contrary to general economic trends since it involves the creation of new tariff frontiers and is apt to retard the development of world trade. We should regard the prospects of the State as being very much more promising from the economic angle if it could be included in a Customs Union with, say, Holland, Belgium and Luxembourg.

Effect on the rest of Germany.

5. There can be no doubt that from the point of view of the rest of Germany, the separation of this area would add to her economic difficulties. The loss of territory in the east will have a very harmful effect on the economy of the country in any case, and it is extremely doubtful whether once the reparation plan has been carried out she will be able to support a tolerable standard of living without external assistance. It follows from this that the removal from Germany of any further area which is itself economically viable will increase the difficulties of the remainder of the country. There are certain added disadvantages in that separation would tend to result in the rupture of the strong economic and technical links which now exist between the Ruhr and the industries situated in the north of the State. This will be particularly the case in view of the fact that the production of the east and west banks of the Rhine were so largely supplementary. Hindrance to the free exchange of goods will necessarily lead to new capacity in Germany which will add a further burden to the German economy at a time when it will be endeavouring to piece together the assortment of plants left behind after the reparation removals.

6. There is one special burden which will be imposed on the rest of Germany. The loss of territory in the east will leave Germany with a far greater density of population than she had before the war. The settlement of Germans transferred from ceded territory in the east and from central Europe will present great difficulties. The State, in view of its present comparatively low density of population and opportunity for agricultural development is a natural reception area for some of the transferred population. This would no longer be the case if the State were set up as a separate entity since it would be important to ensure that it did not start its life with prospects of appreciable unemployment. Adjustments at a later date on any large scale would be impracticable since the nationality of the inhabitants of the new State would have to be determined at the time it was set up and the subsequent influx of large numbers of Germans would prejudice any chances of stability. The creation of the State would therefore add to the difficulties with which the German Government is already faced in settling transferred populations.

ANNEX A (2).

Economic Effects of the Political Separation of the Ruhr from the Rest of Germany.

THE French admit that their proposal to split the Ruhr from the rest of Germany would create economic difficulties, certainly for the rest of Germany and possibly for the area itself. They consider, however, that the problems of reconstruction which confront Germany are so vast that the additional difficulties which might result from the separation of the Ruhr would be relatively insignificant. In any case they maintain that the decision in regard to their proposal must be taken on political grounds alone since the economic consequences of separation should not be allowed to affect the main issue.

2. We agree that if an overwhelming case can be made for separation as the only satisfactory method of preventing future German aggression, the economic consequences are not sufficiently serious to warrant a rejection of the French plan. But the French admit that the most disastrous step that could be taken would be to set up a new State and later abandon it. It is therefore essential that we should be satisfied before separation that the economic difficulties arising from it would not be so great as to weaken the will of the participating Powers to continue it indefinitely. Disagreement between them as to the way in which their control should be exercised would give the Germans an opportunity of which they would be quick to take advantage, to play off one against the other and this might well prove to be its undoing. In the following paragraphs we examine the difficulties that are likely to arise.

3. The French have agreed that the separation of the Ruhr from the rest of Germany is not an alternative way of obtaining security to the principle of de-industrialisation which was agreed to at Potsdam. On the contrary, they have stated explicitly in a memorandum elaborating their proposals that the Potsdam reparations programme will be carried out in full.

4. It was agreed at Potsdam that Germany's metallurgical, chemical and engineering industries and certain other industries which were of particular importance to her war potential should either be eliminated or reduced in capacity to the level necessary for her peace-time economy. It was further provided that the standard of living which Germany would be allowed to enjoy should not exceed the average standard of living of all European countries other than the U.S.S.R. and United Kingdom, and that plant and equipment which was unnecessary for the maintenance of such a standard of living should be removed as reparations.

5. If these measures are applied to the whole of Germany it is probable that it is the Ruhr that will bear the highest degree of de-industrialisation since it is in that area that the greatest concentration of Germany's metallurgical, heavy engineering and heavy chemical industries exist. Although Germany will need to maintain considerable exports in order to meet her essential imports the reparation plan will almost certainly be framed in such a way as to concentrate exports in the consumer goods industries which have less importance from the point of view of war potential. The Ruhr area is largely deficient in these consumer goods industries and the output of the Ruhr will therefore predominantly be used either to meet the direct requirements of that area or to produce semi-finished goods for export to the rest of Germany. The one exception will be coal, where there should be a substantial surplus available for export to non-German destinations.

6. The French in their proposal have suggested "that the economy of the Ruhr should be reorientated towards the West." But if after the reparation plan has been carried out the steel, engineering and chemical production of the Ruhr is exported westwards and not made available to the rest of Germany, the latter will, in fact, be deficient of the materials needed to maintain the approved standard of living. If she cannot obtain these goods from the West she will undoubtedly turn towards the East where the increased coal and steel production of Silesia appears to offer a promising alternative source of supply. Czechoslovakia, though to a lesser degree, could also help to fill in the gap created by the loss of Ruhr products. Both Poland and Czechoslovakia are politically and economically under the Soviet influence and if they were to become the suppliers of the Rump Germany in the place of the Ruhr it seems probable that Soviet influence would spread westwards. In other words, the reorientation of the Ruhr economy towards the West is likely to bring about a corresponding reorientation of Russian economy towards the West.

7. In order to counteract this tendency it would be necessary not only to abandon the idea of reorientating the economy of the Ruhr with the West, but to foster the maintenance of the economic relations with the Rump Germany. Before the war the use of Ruhr products in Central and Eastern Germany was deliberately encouraged by means of transport and other subsidies. Whether, without these subsidies, Central and Western Germany would still be a market for Ruhr products remains to be seen, but the immediate steps necessary to encourage this trend would be a Customs Union between the Ruhr and the rest of Germany and a common currency in both areas. The French have stated categorically and with good reason that they could not countenance a Customs Union since this would prejudice their plan of permanently separating the Ruhr from the rest of Germany.

8. The Economic Security and Reparation programme agreed in Potsdam cannot be carried out without leaving behind it a serious unemployment problem. It is clear that the French hope that the inhabitants of the new Ruhr State and of any other areas in Western Germany which may also be detached, will develop a vested interest in their future independence. This is hardly likely to be achieved if the independent State has to start its life with an appreciable proportion of its population unemployed and with little hope of finding work. It stands to reason, therefore, that the Ruhr and any other part of Western Germany politically separated from the Reich will not be reception areas for Germans transferred from Poland and Czechoslovakia and Central Europe, but on the contrary will wish to eject the surplus population which cannot find a means of livelihood. In the case of the Ruhr 1–1½ million people will have to look elsewhere for absorption and if emigration is disregarded the only place they can go to will be the Rump Germany, whose population will already be swollen considerably by refugees from the East. The population of Rump Germany, as a result of these transfers from the East and West, is likely to be in the neighbourhood of 61 millions as compared with a pre-war population of 49 millions. Rump Germany deprived of free access to its remaining important natural resources would clearly be unable to support so large a population without external assistance. The French recognise the adverse economic effects of separation on the Rump Germany and have suggested as a solution that the necessary financial assistance might be provided by transferring to the Rump Germany the surplus foreign exchange earnings of the Ruhr. In making this suggestion the French have assumed that the favourable balance of trade of the Ruhr will be sufficient to meet the adverse trade balance of the rest of Germany, but this is open to doubt. From a plan which the French Element of the Control Commission have recently prepared in Berlin for the future level of German industry after the reparation plan has been carried out, it is evident that the French accept the views of the British and American Delegations that even a unitary Germany will only just be able to balance its imports and exports. The separation of the Ruhr from the rest of Germany cannot but restrict the volume of trade in both areas. Under these circumstances it seems unlikely that even if the Ruhr were to succeed in achieving a favourable balance this would be sufficient to meet the deficit of the Rump Germany. Furthermore, an arrangement whereby the Ruhr subsidised the rest of Germany from which it had been forcibly separated would be highly artificial and in that it retarded any improvement in living standards would not be conducive to encouraging the population of the Ruhr to remain independent.

9. As regards the Ruhr itself, it is by no means a foregone conclusion that it would be a prosperous State. Before the war the national income of the Ruhr was about the same as the average income throughout Germany. It was a good deal lower than Berlin, Hamburg and other industrial centres where the finishing side of German industry was concentrated. In times of slump the Ruhr had to be supported from the central revenues of the State while in more prosperous times the State had to pay subsidies on the increased quantities of Ruhr products moving over the rest of Germany. If the Ruhr is separated from the rest of Germany there will be no equalisation fund to which she can look for financial assistance in times of depression. Moreover, since the numbers of her population will be fixed at the time of separation, she will be unable to absorb some of her unemployed in neighbouring agricultural areas as she now can. In other words, unless the controlling Powers are to ensure that even in times of world slump the Ruhr industries operate at a high level there is every possibility that it may become a gigantic depressed area. It seems hardly likely that the participating Powers would be prepared during these periods to maintain Ruhr output at the expense of their own production, and under such circumstances the Ruhr, far from being able to subsidise the rest of Germany, would itself look for assistance to the participating Powers.

10. The obligations of the participating Powers under the French plan will be considerable. They cannot rely on a power of veto only, for the administration of the area will be in their hands and it is therefore they who will be laying down the policy by which the new State will be governed and will be responsible for the resulting political, social and economic conditions. Unless the participating Powers are co-operating successfully in the world at large, differences of opinion in other spheres of interest are likely to be reflected in an uncompromising attitude in the inter-Allied administration of the Ruhr. Under these circumstances the divergent political ideologies of the Soviet Union and the United States, for example, would remain irreconcilable and the new State would drift helplessly along without guidance.

11. In the economic field, in particular, the situation would be likely to be very difficult. As already mentioned, in times of slump the Ruhr might have a substantial adverse balance of payments and even need relief imports from abroad. The capacity of the various participating Powers to provide relief would vary and it is most improbable that each would agree to provide its proportional share. Though the United States would be in the position to provide the necessary goods, her continued interest in the well-being of Europe cannot be guaranteed. It is most improbable that the United Kingdom could afford to provide its contribution. The Soviet Union would hardly be prepared to support financially an area which she would still regard as part of a Western bloc and therefore a potential threat to her own security.

12. Differences of opinion and of interest are also likely to arise in regard to the development of the Ruhr. If it is to have a vested interest in its own continuance some industrial expansion will be necessary and this will call for external financial assistance, since the area is too small to provide all the capital itself. Here again doubt arises as to whether inter-Allied administration would agree that the Ruhr could raise an external loan or on the purposes for which the loan could be used. Each of the participating Powers would consider its own commercial interests and tend to oppose any development that might in future compete in world export markets with its own domestic industries. It is equally doubtful whether, if the borrowing were authorised, any or all of the participating Powers would be willing to provide the money. Failure to reach agreement would retard the recovery of the Ruhr and increase the sense of unfulfilled moral obligation; while the influx of too much capital might result in the re-creation of a heavy industry which, if the régime were to collapse, might leave Germany ready to hand a modern and integrated war potential.

13. In the light of the foregoing arguments we have reached the conclusion that, however attractive the French plan may superficially appear, it creates economic difficulties of such magnitude and contains the seeds of such inter-Allied dissension that the one fear which the French themselves recognise, namely, the subsequent abandonment of the plan, is a very real danger indeed. By comparison we should regard a proposal which left the Ruhr politically a part of Germany but transferred to the participating Powers the control of its principal industries as a more feasible plan.

ANNEX B.

[C 8129/22/18]

Mr. Bevin to Mr. Duff Cooper (Paris).

(No. 2068.)

Sir, Foreign Office, 16*th November*, 1945.

I HAVE sent your Excellency from time to time records of the meetings which have been held with French officials with a view to elucidating the French proposals with regard to the Ruhr and the Rhineland. I now enclose a final report on these discussions which has been agreed with the French authorities. The first annex to the report is also enclosed, consisting of a French memorandum (in translation) on the economic aspects of their proposals. The second and third annexes, consisting of a statement by Sir David Waley with regard to the French economic memorandum and a counter-statement by M. Alphand, are not yet available in final form. They will be forwarded to you as soon as possible.(1)

2. In the course of these discussions every effort has been made to make it quite clear to the French representatives that it was not the purpose of His Majesty's Government in entering on this stage of the talks to express any views of their own concerning the French proposals. The sole object was to obtain clarification of the French proposals and their implications in order that His Majesty's Government might then be in a position to consider their attitude towards the proposals.

3. It is understood that the French Government have already initiated similar conversations with the United States and Soviet Governments separately, and they will no doubt inform us of the results of these conversations in due course. Meanwhile His Majesty's Government propose to study the French proposals in an attempt to define their policy towards them.

4. I am sending copies of this despatch to His Majesty's representatives at Washington, Moscow, Brussels and The Hague and to Sir William Strang at Berlin for their confidential information.

I am, &c.
ERNEST BEVIN.

Enclosure.

Report drawn up as a result of the Franco-British Conversations which took place in London from 12th–26th October concerning the Future Administration of the Rhineland and the Ruhr.

IN the course of the meeting of Foreign Ministers in London the French Delegation circulated on the 14th September, 1945, a memorandum setting out its views on the steps being taken with regard to the control and administration of Germany.

In this paper the French Government recalled that it had been informed on the 31st July of the text of the arrangement reached at Potsdam between the American, British and Soviet Governments regarding the "Political Principles which would govern the treatment of Germany in the initial period of control." The French Government had since that date expressed reservations about this agreement. These reservations concerned particularly the decision to re-establish forthwith German central administrations set up in Berlin which seemed like the first manifestation of a rebirth of the Reich.

Moreover, the French Government had observed that in the terms of the Potsdam communiqué the territory situated to the east of a certain line would be handed over to the administration of the Polish Government and would immediately be removed from the authority of the Inter-Allied Control in Berlin and from the authority of future German central administrations. The French memorandum, without raising objections a priori against an arrangement on these lines, drew attention to the danger that this arrangement might be interpreted as confirming the maintenance of German sovereignty over the rest of Germany.

The French Government, which has on many occasions given public notice of the importance which it attaches to the future of the Rheno-Westphalian region in particular, asked the Council of Five Ministers for Foreign Affairs that pending the settlement of a definite status for this area it should be laid down that the area would be withdrawn from the authority of German central administrations if these were later set up.

This proposal was set out before the meeting by M. Bidault, Minister for Foreign Affairs, on the 14th September, 1945. It was agreed that a study of the whole of the questions raised by the French memorandum would be pursued through the diplomatic channel.

The French Government asked the Governments concerned to state their views on the procedure to be followed in order to carry out this decision.

The British Government suggested on the 8th October that in the first stage the conversations should be carried out by the French Government separately and directly with each of the three other Governments. The British Government proposed that a Franco-British exchange of views should begin immediately in London. It was agreed that these first conversations would have no other object than to inform the British Government about the French Government's views, without involving commitments on either side. The conversations would begin on a general plane and would without delay be followed by technical discussions between experts to study all the aspects of the problems which had been raised.

Mr. Oliver Harvey and M. Couve de Murville were appointed for this purpose by the two Governments and had a first conversation on the 12th October. At the same time the French Government instructed the French Ambassadors in Washington and Moscow to inform the American and Soviet Governments and to notify them of its desire to proceed, as soon as possible, in the same manner with each of them.

The London conversations were carried on between the 12th and the 26th October by means of meetings of political, economic and military sub-committees.

The rest of this report contains a statement of the French position and of its implications as these have been elucidated in the course of the conversations. The British representatives did not express any views on the practicability or desirability of the French proposals.

The French Point of View.

The main preoccupation of the French Government is security. After the last war nothing was done to infringe the integrity of Germany and the measures of security which were taken, i.e., military occupation, were only planned for a limited period during which there was, in fact, no chance of Germany becoming a danger to peace. The maintenance of German integrity implied the maintenance of a military Power whose energies were inevitably directed towards revenge and the recovery of territories which Germany had lost as a result of the war. This error must not be repeated.

In the opinion of the French Government, the security of Europe and of the world demands that Germany should lose the free use of the war potential represented by the industry and the resources of the Rheno-Westphalian area. It is also desirable that these rich resources should be made use of in the general interest. Moreover, the security of the west against German aggression demands that the Rhineland countries should not be able to reconstitute an avenue, an arsenal and the starting point for an attack directed against France and more generally against the western Powers. To meet these preoccupations, the French Government does not propose to have recourse to territorial annexation but to exclude from now on the activity of any central German authority from the Rhineland and the Ruhr and to establish in these areas a régime conducive to the objectives indicated above.

Two general principles can at this stage be set out :—

(1) Whatever may be the details of the final arrangements, it is most important that a decision of principle should be taken immediately to the effect that these territories should be permanently separated from Germany and that this should be made perfectly clear to the inhabitants by a public declaration. This decision implies that the areas in question would be removed from the authority of the Allied Control Council in Berlin at a date which remains to be fixed, but which should be within the shortest possible time.

(2) These territories should not constitute as a whole a single entity either politically or economically. Different régimes must be worked out for each of the areas involved.

Adequate military forces must be permanently stationed in the German territories on the left bank of the Rhine, including perhaps some bridgeheads on the right bank.

In so far as this occupation is intended to constitute a covering force for France itself, i.e., up to and including Cologne, it would be for France to see to the military organisation of the left bank of the Rhine, perhaps in conjunction with Belgium or Luxemburg.

Further north the problem is not of such direct interest to France but rather to Belgium, Holland and to the United Kingdom, if the latter considers it appropriate. The object of the forces of occupation will be primarily strategic. These forces will constitute the outposts of the general defence system of all territory west of the Rhine.

The Rhineland should not form part either of Germany or of France and must be subjected to permanent military occupation. The establishment of a definite status for this area in accordance with these principles will depend on the development of local conditions. There may be a single State subjected to inter-Allied military occupation, or there may be two or three States each occupied by the troops of different Allied Powers.

Subject to their accepting the presence of foreign garrisons and refraining from militarisation and from attempts to rejoin Germany, the Governments of the State or States to be created in the Rhinelands would be free to manage their own affairs.

(b) The Saar.

The Saar mines, whose ownership was granted to France by the Treaty of Versailles and was regained by Germany in 1935, must become once more French property, with the corollary that the territory of the Saar should be included in the French customs and currency system, since the economies of France and the Saar are almost entirely complementary. The final form of government of the territory would be decided in due course. French military forces should be stationed there permanently.

(c) The Ruhr.

The Ruhr area consists of the coal mines and of the factories associated with them. It has a population of about 5 million inhabitants.

The French Government considers that, in order to ensure that the natural and industrial resources of this area shall no longer be exploited for military purposes but rather in conformity with the general interest of humanity, it is essential to treat the area not as part of a State or even of a larger territory but as a political entity independent from Germany and subjected to an international political and economic régime.

All the countries concerned should participate in the organisation of this régime : the States particularly concerned should participate in the selection of the members of the Government, the other interested Powers in some other way.

The local administration should be appointed, so far as possible, by the local population, which could also, in due course, participate in the functions of Government.

An international force would be stationed in the territory and its integrity should be guaranteed by all the Powers concerned.

The Ruhr territory would be open to the trade of all countries. It would be served by the international waterway of the Rhine and, in the opinion of the French experts, would probably be prosperous. There would be no objection to the Ruhr exporting part of its production to the rest of Germany provided, of course, that these exports did not include any kind of war material. The Governing Commission and the Powers which were in a position to direct the commission's activities could orientate the production of the Ruhr in any direction which seemed desirable. In particular they could take all necessary measures to ensure that the Ruhr did not unfairly compete with other areas with a similar range of production.

The principles of economic disarmament which may be drawn up by the Control Council would be applied in the Ruhr territory in the same way as in Germany. Part of the probable surplus in the Ruhr trading accounts could perhaps be used for a certain period as part-payment for necessary supplies imported into Germany on the basis that such supplies may be calculated by the Control Council.

The mines and the most important industrial enterprises would be expropriated and turned into an international interest. The exploitation of these mines and enterprises and of the mines belonging hitherto to the Reich should be taken over by international public utility undertakings. The interest of the workers should be safeguarded.

It has been made clear by the French experts that the French proposals have not been put forward on economic grounds and that the decisions to be taken depend essentially on political considerations. These questions are dealt with in greater detail in a French memorandum and in British and French comments which are attached to this report.

Such are the outlines of the French proposals concerning the organisation of the Rheno-Westphalian area.

The question has been raised of the date at which these arrangements should be put into effect. The French view was that while it is important to agree, as soon as possible, that the whole of these areas should be separated from Germany, there is not the same urgency in coming to a detailed decision with regard to the future status of the Rhineland.

The Ruhr, on the other hand, raises urgent problems, notably with regard to coal production, which interest many Powers. The implementation of the Ruhr régime should be undertaken immediately and could be carried out in stages beginning with economic measures.

The International Régime in the Ruhr.

Detailed study was undertaken of the nature of the régime envisaged for the Ruhr with the following results :—

(1) Establishment of the régime.

The international régime of the Ruhr should be laid down by a decision of the four Powers in occupation of Germany. Belgium, Luxemburg and Holland, as Powers directly concerned, should later be invited to associate themselves with this decision.

(2) Objects.

This decision shall specify that the object with which this régime is established is to ensure that the natural and industrial resources of the Ruhr are no longer exploited for military purposes but in conformity with the general interest of humanity.

(3) Area.

The territory subjected to this régime shall be as small as possible and should include particularly the coal basin and the principal industries associated with it. The limits of the area covered by this definition are shown on a map drawn up by the French experts.

(4) Separation from Germany.

The régime envisaged involves the complete and permanent separation of the territory from the German Reich and the establishment of the territory as an entity in international law to be named the Ruhr Territory. The inhabitants of this territory who possesssed German nationality would lose it and would have the right to become citizens of the Ruhr Territory. They could, on the other hand, within a period to be fixed, opt for German nationality on condition that, if they did so, they left the Ruhr Territory.

The Governing Commission or an authority appointed by it for this purpose would lay down rules governing the entry into the Ruhr territory of all persons who left it on the arrival of the forces of the United Nations or who, at that date, were not habitually resident there. For the future, conditions for the acquisition and loss of Ruhr territory nationality would be decided by the legislative authorities of the territory.

(5) Governing Commission.

The question was asked whether the Ruhr should be governed by a body set up through the United Nations Organisation or by a group of States acting outside the framework of the United Nations Organisation.

The view was expressed, so far as the French representatives were concerned, that the conception of trusteeship could not be applied to the Ruhr and that it would be better to put the régime under international control established by a special agreement between the Powers concerned.

It is clear that the instrument setting up the new régime should be registered with the United Nations Organisation.

The government of the territory should be entrusted to a Governing Commission composed of nine members corresponding to the following list of ministerial departments :

Political.	Transport.
Interior.	Posts and Public Works.
Finance.	National Economy.
Justice.	Labour and Public Health Education.

The members of this commission should be appointed by majority decision of the Powers directly concerned. Their appointments should be terminable in the same fashion. They would be appointed for five years and be replaced by rotation. Retiring members would be eligible for re-election. The commission would decide the functions of each of its members and those which it would carry out itself. The head of the commission would be appointed by a majority decision of the Powers directly concerned. He would act as the executive of the commission.

The character of a political régime drawn up on these lines would be determined by the fact that the Governing Commission was entrusted with a political mission with the object of maintaining international security. The members of the Governing Commission would be appointed by certain Governments acting collectively and would not be regarded as the representatives of these Governments but as the members of a collective body whose functions were of international concern.

It is contemplated that in due course the local population might participate in the exercise of government.

(6) Powers of the Commission.

The commission should have in the Ruhr territory all the powers of government. Consequently, it could take all legislative and administrative measures which it might judge necessary. It could, in particular, maintain or modify adminstrative institutions. It would appoint and dismiss officials and magistrates, some of whom might, if necessary, be recruited among nationals of foreign countries.

Justice would continue to be administered by the courts existing in the Ruhr territory at the entry into force of the new régime except that a new Supreme Court would be substituted for the Reichsgericht of Leipzig. The Governing Commission would be able to modify existing judicial arrangements.

As a consequence of the separation of the Ruhr territory from the German Reich the Governing Commission would take all necessary measures for the replacement of the Reich by the new territory particularly as regards the ownership of goods which were the property of the Reich, and it would take all measures necessary for the complete separation of public services such as railways and posts from those of the Reich.

(7) Gendarmerie, Police and Customs.

The Governing Commission should see to the organisation of a Gendarmerie and of a police force of the territory which could be recruited on the spot and would function under its authority.

C223773

It would similarly provide for the frontier police, whose personnel would, at first, be partly recruited outside the territory. A customs administration would also be necessary, whose personnel would be, in the main, recruited locally except for the highest officials.

(8) Armed Forces.

In order to ensure internal security in the Ruhr territory the States directly concerned would put at the disposal of the Governing Commission a military force, whose numbers have been estimated at 50,000, which would be stationed permanently in the territory.

The upkeep of this force would be paid for by the territory.

The different contingents would be placed under a single command.

The commander-in-chief would be appointed by the Governing Commission in rotation from among the officers of the States mentioned in paragraph (1) of this section and after consultation with the Governments of these States. He would be directly responsible to the Governing Commission.

Air forces (about ten fighter-bomber squadrons) could be put at the disposal of the Governing Commission without being stationed in the territory.

These armed forces and the persons attached to them who were in possession of an identity document, issued by the military command, and all those employed by these forces or in their service should be liable only to the military jurisdiction of the force.

All persons accused of a crime against these forces or members of them could be tried before the military courts of these forces.

The Governing Commission would be the only authority capable of declaring martial law. The nature of such martial law would be decided by the legislature of the territory.

(9) Foreign Relations.

The United Nations would be able to appoint consuls in the Ruhr territory. It would be for the Governing Commission to grant them an exequatur.

The Governing Commission could arrange for the protection of Ruhr citizens and interests abroad by appointing consular agents who could be nationals of the territory in which they were to function, and at a later stage by the appointment of career consuls.

The Governing Commission could also entrust this protection to one of the Powers indicated in section 5 above.

The Governing Commission would take the necessary steps to arrange for the independent participation of the Ruhr territory in technical and administrative international unions and commissions and to negotiate economic treaties affecting the territory.

(10) Supervision and Guarantee of the Status of the Ruhr Territory.

The supervision of the application of the Ruhr régime would be carried out by the Governments who signed the instrument setting it up (see section 1 above).

These Governments would receive each year an annual report from the Governing Commission on the manner in which its functions had been carried out, and on the situation of the Ruhr territory.

These Governments would see that the Governing Commission's activities were in conformity with the objective set out in section 2 above.

These Governments would work out the directives to be given to the commission.

They would be entitled to receive claims concerning the Ruhr territory which might be submitted through the diplomatic channel, and to deal with them in such manner as seemed suitable.

The above-mentioned Governments would guarantee the integrity of the Ruhr territory and would ensure respect for its status. The scope of this guarantee would be in conformity with the provisions of the United Nations Charter.

The Governments who signed the arrangement setting up the Ruhr territory would draw up from time to time a list of States who should receive copies of the annual report of the Governing Commission by virtue of their importance either as importers or purchasers for the economy of the Ruhr.

The signatory Governments would receive the observations of these States on the report and could invite one or more of these States to take part in their discussions on this subject.

General Observations.

The French proposals are based generally on the idea that the only satisfactory way of ensuring that Germany is never again in a position to wage a war of aggression is to remove from German control the mineral and industrial resources of the Ruhr. If Germany is deprived both of Silesia and of the Ruhr she would almost certainly not again present a danger to security.

The proposals with regard to the occupation of the Rhineland are complementary to the proposals with regard to the Ruhr, the establishment and stability of the international régime for the Ruhr being facilitated by the occupation of the Rhineland, in view of the geographical situation of the two areas. The object of the proposals is to deprive Germany of an area which she has more than once used as a base for invasion. It is not intended that the Rhineland should be intensively occupied. The important thing is that the Allies should have the facility of stationing troops on the Rhine over its whole length.

It would be of great importance to estimate the reactions of the population both in the Ruhr and in the rest of Germany to the introduction of proposals on the above lines, but it is practically impossible to do so in advance.

The French view is, in general, that the Germans will be discontented with any possible settlement of Germany and will inevitably harbour feelings of revenge. It is only by removing the Ruhr from the control of Germany that these feelings could be prevented from assuming practical expression in a new outbreak of militarism and aggression.

If the proposals were to be introduced, the sooner this could be done the better, since in the present state of Germany less violent reactions would be expected than when the Germans had recovered to a greater extent.

The administration of the Ruhr would have to be carried out in such a way as to make the new régime as attractive as possible to the inhabitants. This would involve, e.g., allowing them a higher standard of living than the rest of Germany, but it is not intended that the programme of removal of plant for reparations from the Ruhr territory should be modified if these proposals are put into effect. It would also naturally be desirable to allow the inhabitants of the Ruhr as much freedom as possible in running the affairs of the territory, but it would be most undesirable to hold out any hope to them that they might eventually become independent of international control.

The introduction of the French proposals would not enable the Powers occupying Germany to reduce their forces immediately in case the separation of the Ruhr and the Rhineland might lead to local unrest in Germany. But it would enable the occupying Powers to reduce the duration of the occupation of the rest of Germany, since Germany would, without the Ruhr and the Rhineland, be unable to develop her military power. (This does not take account of the other purposes of occupation, such as the re-education of the German people and the installation of a democratic Government.)

The most dangerous thing would be if a new régime were set up in the Ruhr on the lines of the French proposals and then at a later stage, owing to disagreement between the Controlling Powers or for some other reason, the régime were abandoned. For if this resulted in the reincorporation of the Ruhr territory in Germany the latter would, at a stroke, reacquire her richest industrial area.

Annex 1 to Report.

French Memorandum concerning the Future Economic and Financial Régime in the Ruhr.

(Translation.)

THE object of the present memorandum is to set out in a preliminary way the economic and financial consequences of the establishment in the Ruhr of an international régime such as has just been recommended by the French Government (aide-mémoire from the French Ambassador in London of the 31st August, 1945, and report of the 12th October, 1945, on the Rhineland and the Ruhr).

2. It is important first of all to emphasise that the desire of the French Government to detach the Ruhr territory from Germany and to impose upon it a separate international régime is due above all to considerations of security and not to economic grounds. The importance of solving the problem in this manner for the future security of Europe is clearly shown when it is remembered that, taking into account the losses of territory in the east and the entry of the Saar into the French customs area, the separation of the Westphalian basin would deprive Germany of the great majority of the resources which would be necessary for making another war, i.e.:—

	Per cent.
Coal	95
Cast iron	78
Steel	80
Rolled products	78

as compared with pre-war production in Germany.

3. Nevertheless the French Government considers that this loss of territory, which is of fundamental importance from the political point of view, could constitute an important element in the reconstruction and prosperity of Europe whatever might be the resulting economic and financial difficulties in the early stages. The present memorandum contains nothing more than a general exposition of this idea. It is difficult to collect statistical data on the production of the Rhineland and Westphalian areas, but in our opinion the further details which will have to be obtained are not likely to modify the conclusions of this first study.

4. To answer the questions which arise it seems necessary to study the consequences of the future political régime of the Ruhr under the following heads :—

(i) Economic disarmament programme for the Ruhr and the future of its different industries.
(ii) Future arrangements for ownership in the Ruhr.
(iii) The labour problem.
(iv) Customs and monetary arrangements and the influence of the proposed solution on the economic conditions of various other countries and particularly on Germany.

(i) Economic Disarmament of the Ruhr and the Future of its Principal Industries.

5. The withdrawal of the Ruhr from the control of the German State does not imply that economic disarmament rules in force in Germany should not be applied in the Ruhr territory. In the Ruhr, as in Central Germany, war industries must be completely suppressed.

6. This statement does not in any way mean that the Ruhr territory will be deprived of all its industries. There exist important finishing industries which are of use in peace and which ought to be kept up. Certain manufactures which are at present carried on in the centre of Germany could be transferred to the Ruhr under inter-Allied control. The economic links between the Ruhr and Germany will of course not be entirely broken, but in making Germany dependent for certain essential products on a Ruhr territory governed by the Allies we shall have made a contribution to the economic disarmament of the German State. At the same time the International Government of the Ruhr will have the power and the duty to arrange production inside the territory in such a way that this territory does not constitute a disturbing element as regards the neighbouring economic arrangements in the search for foreign markets.

It is in this spirit that we must examine what should be the development in the Ruhr of the iron and engineering industries, of coal production, of power production, of the chemical industry, and of various other industries.

(a) Iron Industry and Engineering Manufacture.

7. The application to the iron and engineering industries in the Ruhr of the principle of suppressing all warlike manufacture will result in a first large-scale reduction in the production of these industries. This involves the transfer as reparation, or, failing this, the destruction of all large-scale forging works and presses, of heavy steel rolling-mills for armour plating and heavy billets, of workshops for producing guns, of aircraft engine manufacture, &c., and consequently a proportionate reduction of the means of production of cast iron and steel. The high quality steels manufactured in electric furnaces are principally required by armies, and the electrical steel works in the Ruhr should consequently be suppressed. It seems that part of their plant could with advantage be transferred to Allied countries as reparation. The same applies to the machine tool industry.

8. Thus the iron and steel industries which will be able to maintain existence in the Ruhr will only be those which are required by a peace-time economy.

In this connexion the Ruhr should be supplied, to an extent which will have to be decided, with semi-finished iron products by the French industry in Lorraine in exchange for the despatch from the Ruhr of coking coal or of coke. This will result in a reduction in the production of cast iron and steel in the Ruhr, whose industry will be more concentrated on rolling and on the manufacture of products requiring a greater degree of finishing.

German iron production will be closely linked with the production of France, Belgium and Luxemburg, but the cast iron and steel production of the Allies would be increased at the expense of the Ruhr production. Instead of exporting French iron-ore to Germany we would import coke and coking coal into Lorraine. Lorraine would thus be in a position to supply steel to the finishing industry in the Ruhr with a view to the manufacture and export of finished products from there. These exports could be made to anywhere in the world, but principally to Germany and Eastern Europe.

9. It would definitely be possible to carry out a substantial reduction of the iron and engineering industries of the Ruhr once the manufacture of arms was suppressed. Detailed figures can only be given after a closer study. The calculation would, moreover, depend on the reduction of the industrial capacity of the rest of Germany, which would be the Ruhr's principal client. Nevertheless, a first examination leads the French authorities concerned to believe that a production figure for Germany and the Ruhr of 6 million tons of steel a year (excluding the Saar and Silesia) would suffice to meet the normal needs of Germany and to provide for a certain amount of exports of rolled products. The relative proportions to be established between the iron production of the Ruhr and of Germany must form the subject of further study. Moreover, in view of the difficulty of determining exactly at the present moment the steel requirements of Europe during the reconstruction period an additional safety margin of 2 million tons could normally be allowed to the Ruhr as a reserve.

Supplies of ore for the iron works of the Ruhr should be provided first from German ore and in the next place from Lorraine ore. These sources must make up as large as possible a proportion of the possible requirements of the Ruhr. The rest of what is required would be imported from Sweden and North Africa. As all this ore would be transported on the Rhine it would be simple to supervise the quantities.

(b) Coal Production.

10. There is every advantage in maintaining and even increasing as much as possible the exploitation of Ruhr coal. Production reached 120 million tons a year in 1943. It was only 100 million tons in 1937, of which 60 million were consumed in Germany and 40 million exported. Two-thirds of the exports went to the western countries (France : 12–15 million, Belgium, Holland; also Italy, Switzerland and Scandinavia).

11. The requirements of the Ruhr and of Germany will necessarily be very much reduced. It will be possible to increase considerably the amount which France will absorb, also the exports to Belgium, Holland and Italy. The exports in question will be composed essentially of coking coal and of coke. It is necessary to envisage in the coming years a reduction in our imports from England as a result of the reduction of British production.(2)

French needs are, moreover, less for coke than for coking coal in order that advantage may be taken of the gas and by-products drawn from the production of coke from coal.

The Ruhr coal industry would therefore remain an important factor in the activity of the territory and would continue to employ the greater part of the 250,000 workers and employees who were working in it before the war.

(2) It must be noted that, since English supplies consist mainly of hard coal and the increased imports of coke and coking coal from the Ruhr into France would correspond to the increase in our iron production, they should not upset the English exporters as soon as the latter are in a position to resume their exports on a large scale.

(c) Power Production.

12. The Ruhr is a great power producer. Electricity is supplied by gas and coal installations. Gas is supplied by the coking works and blast furnaces. These two kinds of power are exported far beyond the limits of the Ruhr Basin.

13. Power production will automatically be reduced to a considerable extent by reason of the measures proposed above (reduction in the production of coke and of cast iron). It does not seem that it would be necessary to apply any additional measure tending to reduce still further the power production of the Ruhr.

14. In addition it would be very desirable to see power supplies from the Ruhr directed towards the countries situated to the west, France, Belgium and Holland, by means of the construction of pipes for the long-distance transport of gas and particularly by electric high-tension lines.

(d) Chemical Industry.

15. The chemical industry of the Ruhr must be subjected to the general principles of destruction, transfer and control laid down for the rest of Germany. In particular a beginning would be made in the suppression of all manufacture considered useful for war purposes and in the first place to the manufacture of synthetic petrol.

16. The remainder of the chemical industry will be automatically subjected to certain reductions as a result of the decrease in the number of coke works. In general an effort will be made to export coal in accordance with the general principles indicated above rather than to leave it on the spot in order to allow of the functioning of all of the industries derived from it.

17. Nevertheless, there must exist in the Ruhr a limited chemical industry whose markets would be principally for peace-time needs in Germany, particularly the nitrogen industries and the production of nitrogenous fertilisers necessary for German industry.

(e) Various Industries.

18. Aluminium. French policy envisages the complete suppression of aluminium in Germany. There existed in the Ruhr, however, near Lünen, an important complex of alumina production (90,000 tons) and aluminium production (45,000 tons) which functioned on an economic basis. If a reduced production of aluminium is maintained in Germany (e.g., 25,000 tons a year) it might be possible to concentrate the total production in the Lünen factory. In this way supervision would be more effective than if various installations for this purpose were authorised to continue to function in the heart of Germany.

19. The other Ruhr industries whose production meets peace-time needs will have to be allowed certain activity: textiles, leather, food products, &c. Besides local consumption these factories would find their markets chiefly in Germany and in Central and Eastern Europe. In fixing these commercial channels account must clearly be taken of the legitimate interests of the Allied countries.

(ii) Future Arrangements for Ownership in the Ruhr.

20. On the supposition that the Ruhr is industrialised and that the international authority gives the orientation indicated above to the industries of the Ruhr territory it must be asked what will be the status of the undertakings comprised in the territory. It is impossible to leave the mines in the hands of their present owners. For political and security reasons it will be equally necessary to expropriate those who at present control heavy industry. This policy will necessitate the taking over of these undertakings by a new managerial staff or at least close supervision. All the Allied countries who take part in the international Government will be faced with a problem of personnel. The countries concerned must clearly provide as soon as possible for recruiting the necessary managerial staffs, whereas the technicians can be found among the German personnel.

21. Expropriation pure and simple seems, in fact, to be the only solution. It would result in an abrupt severance of all the financial links which at present join the industry of the Ruhr to the business interests of Cologne and even more of Frankfurt.

22. In these circumstances who will assume the rights of ownership in the Ruhr territory which will thus have become vacant? It does not seem that recourse should be had to private interests. The solution which seems to merit acceptance is the taking over of these industrial activities by international consortiums whose shares would be held by the States entrusted with the administration. These States would have to supply the consortiums with working capital in so far as this could not be provided by the expropriated companies. The profits, in so far as they were not reinvested in the enterprises, would be divided between the Allied nations and would count against reparations due from Germany or would be utilised for any other purpose (and in particular for the payment of imports agreed to be indispensable for Germany).

(iii) Labour Problems.

23. We shall have to give particular study to the results of internationalisation of the Ruhr on the above lines with regard to the demographic situation and especially as regards labour. It is clear that the general result of the measures proposed will be a reduction in the Ruhr's labour requirements.

24. At the same time it can be supposed that in connexion with this reduction there will be an important decrease in the working population of the Ruhr as a result of the departure of all the foreigners there. Before the war the Ruhr included numerous groups of Polish workers who will without doubt wish to return to their native country. Since the war the Nazi Government had brought into the Ruhr a very large number of foreign workers as forced labour (French, Dutch, Polish, Ukrainian, Belgian, Italian). According to certain figures the proportion of foreigners reached 60 per cent. in 1943. It is clear that all these workers are now leaving Germany.

25. It remains to be asked how the German population, who will live in the Ruhr, will adapt themselves to the new tasks which will be allotted to them. It is impossible to give the answer in advance.

In the light of the above observations one can nevertheless estimate that the movements of population which will take place in the Ruhr will not be of great magnitude and will not cause any important disturbances. On any hypothesis these movements will not be different from those which would have had to take place if the Ruhr had remained an integral part of Germany.

(iv) Customs and Monetary Régime and Implications as regards International Exchanges.

26. It is clearly difficult to describe in detail and in advance what will be the customs and monetary régime of the Ruhr and what will be the consequences of internationalising it as regards international exchanges. In view of the lack of recent statistics and information on production in Germany it is not possible to do more than suggest certain hypotheses.

27. On the other hand it is necessary to bear in mind that the solution proposed by the French Government is above all dictated by anxiety with regard to future security. It will always be possible to demonstrate, with the help of figures, that this solution is not particularly reasonable from the economic point of view. It can always be said that it is not right to create a new customs unit in Europe when every tendency is to extend the limits of free economic areas. It would be possible to go so far as to say that the best solution from the strictly economic point of view would be the establishment of a greater Germany. The answer is that the French Government has not any intention of justifying its ideas by economic considerations.

28. The economic structure of any region tends inevitably to adapt itself to territorial solution imposed on political grounds. But in the present case it appears to us that the solution which we have in mind corresponds not only to the essential needs of security, but could be an important factor in the reconstruction of Europe and of its prosperity.

29. There would be no question of the immediate establishment of customs barriers on the frontiers of the Ruhr territory. A customs control would naturally be established between the Ruhr and the territory surrounding it, but the essential object of this step would be to allow the International Commission to supervise the execution of such measures as it might have taken.

30. The economic and political severance of the Ruhr will imply the creation of a new currency. It will be necessary to found for this purpose a bank of issue. The revenue it will require for this purpose will be easily provided by the excess of deposits over withdrawals.

31. At this point it is necessary to reply to an objection to the detachment of the Ruhr territory which has been raised especially in Great Britain. It has been maintained that this solution would deprive the old Reich of the most important part of its resources, and would thus leave in the centre of Europe a population of the order of 50 million in a continual state of poverty, with the result that a permanent source of trouble and a threat to the tranquillity of Europe would be kept in being. It is true that the internationalisation of the Ruhr will, in the first instance, create in Germany a serious economic disequilibrium, over and above the difficulties already created by the annexation of Silesia by Poland. German exports of coal and coke, of iron products, finished and semi-finished metallurgical goods and even textiles and chemicals will suffer a considerable diminution. It will doubtless be possible to reduce German import requirements, since the need for armaments will have disappeared altogether. But it will remain indispensable, even if agricultural production in Germany is expanded to the greatest possible extent, to provide for the necessity of buying abroad a very considerable tonnage of food-stuffs. In 1937 Germany, with 69 million inhabitants, imported cereals to the value of 427 million marks, and meat, cattle, dairy produce, fruit, fats, coffee, tea, &c., to the value of 940 million marks. Even a Germany of 50 million inhabitants would therefore have to remain to a large extent an importer of food-stuffs.

32. It is therefore certain that during the period of the readaptation of its economic structure the new Germany will have great difficulties in coping with the deficit on its balance of payments. How is such a deficit to be dealt with?

(a) In the first place it must be observed that the severance of the Ruhr and the Saar will remove from Germany populations which, since their activities are almost exclusively industrial, do not contribute to the feeding of the country.

(b) Within the limits of what can be achieved agricultural production in Germany would have to be raised to its maximum level by every conceivable means.

(c) Germany would continue to possess important industries, since she would retain such regions as Saxony, Thuringia, Berlin, Hamburg, Hanover and Kassel. Germany's resources would be devoted exclusively to her peaceful needs, and no longer to the purchase of raw materials or manufactured goods of military value.

(d) From the point of view of density of population, Germany is at the moment undergoing exceptional difficulties. No permanent solution of this question can be arrived at so long as difficulties continue in this degree. Measures will have to be taken to remedy them, notably by adopting a policy of emigration.

33. Nevertheless, all these measures will be insufficient to enable the new Germany to exist without external support. But the territorial measures here contemplated will not in themselves aggravate the problem at all, since nothing will prevent the employment of the export surplus of the Ruhr for such purposes as it would have been put to within the old limits of the Reich. The surplus of foreign exchange resulting from exports from the Ruhr could be devoted, as the responsible Powers may decide, either to reparations or to meet a proportion of such foreign purchases by Germany as are deemed indispensable by the Inter-Allied Control Council.

34. The foregoing considerations are sufficient to determine the essential character of the territory which should be detached from Germany and subjected to an international régime. This territory should include the majority of the industries and mines whose production it is necessary to control. But in order not to increase the difficulty of the problem which has to be solved, every effort should be made to determine the minimum area compatible with these conditions.

The boundaries traced on the attached map would provide a satisfactory solution to the political problem, the economic consequences of which this memorandum has attempted, in broad outline, to describe.

Annex 2 to Report.

Statement by Sir David Waley.

THE French delegation provided an aide-mémoire which is of great use in elucidating the views of the French Government on the economic and financial aspects of an international Ruhr State.

In paragraph 27 of the memorandum, the French Government remark that the solution which they advocate is, above all, dictated by considerations of future security. They add that one could always show that economically it is not very rational. The reply, they say, would be that the French Government in no way thinks of justifying its proposals by economic considerations. Thus, in pointing out that the proposals involve certain economic and financial difficulties, the United Kingdom representatives are on common ground with the French representatives. There is, however, a considerable difference of view as to how serious such economic and financial difficulties would be, although we are certainly on common ground in regarding a prophecy about the future as exceedingly and peculiarly difficult in such a case as this. It seems to us that the difficulties which must attach to any proposal to convert a relatively few square miles of a country into a separate State might be particularly grave in the case of a very highly industrialised State. There would be many disadvantages in turning the Isle of Wight into an independent country, but it seems to us that there would be even greater disadvantages in turning the industrial areas in South Wales or the Tyneside into a separate State.

Economic fluctuations affect an industrial area much more acutely than an area of mixed industry and agriculture. In times of slump, an industrial area is faced with acute unemployment. The absorption of the unemployed into the surrounding countryside is made much more difficult if the surrounding countryside is in a foreign country. A country consisting of an industrial area at the time of economic depreciation would find it singularly difficult to raise sufficient revenue to meet its expenses and to find a market for sufficient exports to cover its imports.

On the other hand, in times of prosperity, it is arguable that the exports of the Ruhr and the rest of Germany taken together would cover the imports of those two territories taken together, but if the Ruhr is detached from Germany, the rest of Germany would no longer be able to obtain its minimum imports. This point is dealt with in paragraphs 31–33 of the French memorandum and in paragraph 33 it is suggested that the export surplus of the Ruhr might be partly used to meet a deficit in the balance of payments of the rest of Germany. This system, under which the Ruhr would normally or on occasions, help out the rest of Germany by a kind of Lend-Lease seems to us likely to give rise to acute political difficulties and also it would be difficult to reconcile with the object of making the Ruhr territory entirely independent from the rest of Germany.

To put the matter in the simplest way, we find it difficult to believe that it will be a good thing to put a political frontier round a "Special Area" and to constitute it as a separate State.

We have not attempted to consider in detail how the proposal would affect the commercial interests of the United Kingdom. We think, however, that the effect on a long-term basis on the United Kingdom coal trade would need very careful consideration and we should not wish to accept, without further examination, the point of view expressed in the footnote on p. 32 about the effect of the plan on the United Kingdom coal trade.

The proposal that coke from the Ruhr should be imported into Lorraine and turned into semi-manufactured metal goods, though it would clearly possess certain advantages, might need further examination from the point of view of United Kingdom trade interests.

We have noted that paragraph 5 of the memorandum states that the policy of removing capital industrial equipment surplus to Germany's peace-time needs would be applied in the Ruhr State as in Germany. This seems to us important, since any other policy would be to the detriment of countries entitled to reparation deliveries, including the U.S.S.R. On the other hand, in paragraphs 17 and 18, it is suggested that in certain instances exceptions might be made and the production of nitrogen and aluminium might be allowed in the Ruhr as a detached State, though it would not have been allowed in the Ruhr if it remains part of Germany. We think that the wisdom of such a policy would need to be further considered.

To conclude, our main doubt is whether the financial and economic objections to making a separate political State out of a territory comparable with the Tyneside or South Wales are likely to be relatively insignificant, as the French experts believe, for, in our own view, such difficulties would probably be very formidable.

Annex 3 to Report.

Reply by M. Alphand to Sir David Waley.

(Confidential.)

THE French aide-mémoire on the future economic and financial régime of the Ruhr has three essential objects :—

(a) To show that the proposed international régime will result in placing under Allied Control considerable resources which otherwise could be used by Germany for preparing a new war.

(b) To show that these resources if they are utilised in a rational manner by the international Government can constitute an important element in the reconstruction and prosperity of Europe.

(c) Lastly to show that the separation of the Ruhr will not necessarily have such economic consequences for Germany as to perpetuate in the centre of Europe a state of disquiet and insecurity.

This aide-mémoire gave rise to very thorough and frank exchanges of views between the French and British Delegations. The comments which were made did not lead us to modify our position. But they are extremely useful to us in allowing us to give precise form to various important points and to examine in advance the measures that will be necessary to overcome the economic difficulties feared by our British colleagues.

I would like to reply to the principal criticisms which have been formulated by Sir David Waley.

I. The British Delegation thinks that a highly populated and entirely industrial State like the Ruhr will be more sensitive than any other State to economic crises.

The idea is clearly right. It could be applied equally well to Belgium, for example, as to the future Ruhr State. We can hope that efforts will be made to promote throughout the world a policy of expansion and full employment which will enable us to limit the consequences of world economic fluctuations. Moreover the fact that the mineral and metallurgical products of the Ruhr will be nationalised will allow the States responsible for the administration to carry out more easily the plans intended to limit unemployment.

II. Our British colleagues think that we are very optimistic to imagine that the Ruhr will necessarily have a favourable balance of accounts. Certainly it is impossible to calculate exactly the various elements in the commercial exchanges of the future international State, but it is possible to believe that, given the considerable increase in the volume of coal which will be exported, the metallurgical resources which will remain in the territory, the products of peaceful industries (notably engineering, chemical and textile industries), the Ruhr will definitely have an exchange surplus. It must, in fact, be remembered that all these products are in very great demand throughout the world and we must hope that a suitable international policy will permit of the maintenance of these markets. Besides, the Ruhr will only have to import from outside its iron-ore and its food. This represents a comparatively small amount which could be covered by exports of coal alone, so that the exports of other industries would constitute the assets side of the balance of payments.

III. At the same time, the British Delegation expressed some apprehension about the competition which the Ruhr might make on foreign markets against English industry. This fear seems inconsistent with the pessimistic views they expressed about the existence of a favourable balance of payments for the Ruhr territory. It is easy to answer that the competition of the Ruhr territory administered by an international Government in which Great Britain herself will participate will be much less dangerous than that of a territory administered by a German Government, accustomed to the practice of dumping and discrimination.

IV. Finally, we do not believe that the separation of the Ruhr must result in any important aggravation of Germany's economic situation. We indicated the reasons for this in paragraph 32 of our aide-mémoire. I would recall that the Ruhr will not be surrounded by an impassable customs barrier. It will be possible for its resources to be exported to Germany and the excess of its balance of payments could, if necessary, be used in part in order to pay for part of Germany's supplies.

Sir David Waley fears that this kind of lease-lend will cause considerable political difficulties and will not allow us to make the Ruhr entirely independent of Germany. We have already said what we think of this idea: the Ruhr will be independent of Germany, but Germany will remain dependent on the Ruhr, which is exactly what best meets the need for security by which we are inspired.

It only remains for me to express the hope that our conversations have contributed to the enlightenment of our respective Governments. I think, as does Sir David Waley, that there is more a difference of degree than of substance between our points of view. I thank our British colleagues for the objective manner in which they have been good enough to examine the French proposals.

(Secret.)

DRAFT TREATY ON THE DISARMAMENT AND DEMOBILISATION OF GERMANY.

PREAMBLE.

ON the 5th June, 1945, the Governments of the United States, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom, and the French Republic declared their intention to effect the total disarmament and demobilisation of Germany. In substantial measure this intention has already been fulfilled. Nothing shall prevent the completion of the process. It remains to ensure that the total disarmament and demilitarisation of Germany will be enforced as long as the peace and security of the world may require. Only this assurance will permit the nations of Europe and the world to return single-mindedly to the habits of peace. To achieve this objective, the Governments of the United States, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the French Republic agree to engage in the common undertaking defined in this treaty.

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting parties agree that they shall take steps jointly to ensure that:—

(A) All German armed forces, including land, air, anti-aircraft and naval forces, all para-military forces such as the SS, the SA, and the Gestapo, and all organisations auxiliary to the foregoing shall be and shall remain completely disarmed, demobilised and disbanded.

(B) The German General Staff and the staffs of any para-military organisations shall be and shall remain disbanded.

(C) No German military or para-military organisation in any form or guise shall be permitted in Germany.

(D) The manufacture, production, or importation of military equipment in Germany shall be prevented. In particular, the high contracting parties shall prevent the manufacture, production, or importation of:—

(1) All arms, ammunition, explosives, military equipment, military stores and supplies and other implements of war of all kinds;
(2) All naval vessels of all classes, both surface and submarine, and auxiliary naval-craft;
(3) All aircraft of all kinds, aviation equipment and devices and equipment for anti-aircraft defence.

(E) The establishment, utilisation or operation for military purposes of any of the following shall be prevented:—

(1) All military structures, installations and establishments, including but not limited to military airfields, seaplane bases, and naval bases, military and naval storage depots, permanent and temporary land and coast fortifications, fortresses and other fortified areas;
(2) All factories, plants, shops, research institutions, laboratories, testing stations, technical data, patents, plans, drawings, and inventions, designed or intended to produce or to facilitate the production of items listed in the paragraph (D) above.

(F) Under conditions which may be established by the high contracting parties, the demilitarisation and disarmament required by this Article shall be subject to the following exceptions and to no others:—

(1) The formation and employment of such detachments of German civil police as may be essential to the maintenance of public security, and
(2) The manufacture, production or importation of minimum quantities of those items listed in paragraph (D) (1) above, such as explosives or ingredients of explosives, which may be essential for purposes or construction, mining, agriculture, or for other peaceful purposes.

ARTICLE II.

To implement the disarmament and demilitarisation provisions set forth in Article I, the high contracting parties agree that they shall make provision for a system of quadrupartite inspection, which shall become operative upon the termination of the Allied occupation of Germany. This system of inspection shall be conducted through a Commission of Control to be established by the high contracting parties on a quadrupartite basis. The Commission of Control, through its officers and agents, shall conduct, in any and all parts of German territory, such inspections, enquiries and investigations as it may deem necessary to determine whether the disarmament and demilitarisation provisions set forth in Article I are being observed.

ARTICLE III.

The high contracting parties agree that for the duration of the period of Allied occupation of Germany, they shall, through the Allied Control Council and in their respective zones, enforce strictly the disarmament and demilitarisation provisions set forth in Article I. They agree further that the express acceptance by Germany of the provisions of Articles I and II shall be an essential condition to the termination of Allied occupation of German territory.

ARTICLE IV.

The Commission of Control provided for in Article II shall submit a report to the high contracting parties whenever, in the opinion of a majority of the members of the Commission, it has reason to believe that a violation of the disarmament and demilitarisation provisions of Article I has occurred or is about to occur. In conjunction with such report the Commission shall submit a recommendation for action on the part of the high contracting parties which appears appropriate to a majority of the members of the Commission. Upon receipt of such report and recommendations, the high contracting parties will, by common agreement, take such prompt action—including action by air, sea or land forces—as may be necessary to assure the immediate cessation or prevention of such violation or attempted violation. The high contracting parties agree that, within six months of the effective date of this treaty, they shall consult for the purpose of negotiating special quadrupartite agreements which shall provide in the greatest practicable detail for inspection, enquiry and investigation by the Commission of Control, for the numbers and type of forces which each party shall make available for purposes of this treaty, for their degree of readiness and general location, and for the nature of the facilities and assistance which each shall provide. Such special quadrupartite agreements shall be subject to ratification by the high contracting parties in accordance with their respective constitutional processes.

ARTICLE V.

This treaty shall be ratified by the high contracting parties in accordance with their respective constitutional processes. The ratification shall be deposited with the Government of . . . . which shall notify all the high contracting parties of each deposit. This treaty shall come into force upon the deposit of ratifications by each of the high contracting parties. This treaty shall remain in force for a period of twenty-five years from its effective date. The high contracting parties agree to consult six months before the date of expiration of this treaty for the purpose of determining whether the interests of international peace and security require its renewal, with or without modification, or whether the German people have so far progressed in the reconstruction of their life on a democratic and peaceful basis that the continued imposition of the controls defined herein is no longer necessary.

APPENDIX II.

[Gen. 121/2.
11th March, 1946.]

THE SAAR TERRITORY.

1. Part of the French Government's proposals for a settlement of the future régime in Western Germany relates to the Saar. Their specific proposal on this subject as made in the course of conversations with French officials in London last October was as follows :—

> "The Saar mines, whose ownership was granted to France by the Treaty of Versailles and was regained by Germany in 1935, must become once more French property, with the corollary that the territory of the Saar should be included in the French customs and currency system, since the economies of France and the Saar are almost entirely complementary. The final form of government of the territory would be decided in due course. French military forces should be stationed there permanently."

2. An official communication regarding the Saar has now been received from the French Ambassador, and a translation is attached as Annex A. The French request is briefly that the question should be considered at the earliest possible moment by the four Foreign Ministers or by delegates appointed for this purpose, and that they should agree to transfer the territory immediately to French administration, the final determination of the régime being left to the peace settlement. This is in effect what was granted to the Poles at the Potsdam Conference in respect of the Eastern provinces of Germany. The French communication defines the territory as approximating to that placed under an international régime in 1919, with some small, but undefined, additions. The population of the old Saar territory was approximately 864,000 in 1939.

3. The British Element of the Control Commission has already drawn attention to the desirability of an early decision as to whether the Saar is to be left to Germany or not, as without such decision the plans for Germany's future economy may be drawn up on false premises. I would therefore ask my colleagues to agree that we should support the French request for an immediate discussion of this question by the four Powers. I see no objection to dealing with it as an entirely separate issue from that of the Ruhr and the Rhineland, and I think we can assume that the new post-election Government in France, whatever its character, will maintain the demand for the incorporation of the Saar.

4. I also ask my colleagues to agree that we should in principle support the French request that the territory be transferred immediately to French administration. The extent of the territory to be transferred will need to be further examined in the light of the precise proposals which the French Government put forward. The question will also arise, and should, I suggest, be considered forthwith by the appropriate Departments, whether the assets of the transferred territory should be debited to the French on reparation account.

ANNEX A.

(Translation.)

The absence of any agreement on the status of Western Germany presents very serious difficulties which are daily becoming more apparent in the course of the work of the Control Authorities in Berlin.

The French Government have already made known the reasons why they are not in a position to study the establishment of certain central German administrations as long as the competence of such administrations extends to the Ruhr and the Rhineland.

The uncertainty which continues to exist on the future status of the Saar leads to even more immediate difficulties.

On the one hand it seems extremely difficult to fix Germany's "level of industrial life" and in particular the steel production capacity which she will be allowed, without first knowing whether the Saar is to be incorporated in the French customs unit or not.

On the other hand the Control Council must determine without delay the industrial removals which are to take place from former German territory for reparation purposes, and the retention of certain of these factories in the Saar territory depends on the nature of the solution to be found to the question of the Saar.

In these circumstances the French Government wish to define in a clear manner the administration which they desire to see established forthwith in the Saar territory; such definition to be without prejudice to the subsequent discussion of the plans already outlined by them on the question of the future status of the Ruhr and Rhineland.

1. Boundaries of the Saar Territory.

The boundaries of the territory to which this proposal applies are much the same as those of the former Saar territory created in 1919. But this territory was an imperfect improvisation which aimed at grouping together the whole of the coal basin. It would now, therefore, be necessary to make certain adjustments, particularly with a view to avoiding the dissection of certain agglomerations and with a view to including lines of communication or industrial towns whose importance has grown since 1939 and which are linked to the economic unity of the coal basin.

2. The administration envisaged is based above all on economic considerations; to deprive Germany of a part of her war potential and to integrate the Saar in France's economic and monetary unit.

(a) The Economic administration.

(i) The Saar mines, ownership of which was given to France by the Treaty of Versailles and which were recovered by Germany in 1935, should revert to the ownership of the French State.

(ii) The Saar territory would be included in the French customs unit. This customs union would be facilitated by the fact that the economy of the Saar territory and that of the neighbouring French territories (Alsace and Moselle) are for the greater part complementary.

(iii) The Saar should be integrated in the French monetary unit and the franc should forthwith be substituted for the mark.

(b) The Political administration.

The final status of the Saar would only be determined at the time of the Peace Settlement.

The political conditions whose application France considers as both adequate and essential are the following:—

(i) The Saar territory should be withdrawn forthwith from the competence of the Control Council in Berlin and never again be subordinated to a German Central administration.

(ii) A French military force sufficient to guarantee internal order and frontier control should permanently be stationed in the territory.

(iii) France should assure the permanent control of the administration of the territory.

The status of the inhabitants, particularly as far as their nationality and right of option are concerned, should be settled at a later date.

The French Government would forthwith take all the necessary measures to sever completely public services such as railways and posts from those of the Reich. They would undertake the protection abroad of the Saar nationals and interests.

The above proposals are restricted to the conditions which are indispensable for realising the complete separation of the territory of the Saar from that of the Reich. Their adoption would permit the Control Council Authorities to take a certain number of decisions of an economic character which at present remain in suspense as a result of the absence of any agreement on the Saar. The French Government therefore request that they be most urgently considered by the Governments responsible for the supreme authority in Germany, and with this in view suggest that they be discussed as soon as possible by the four Foreign Ministers or by the delegates whom they may appoint for this purpose.

THE RUHR AND WESTERN GERMANY.

I HAVE already circulated to my colleagues two papers dealing respectively with the Future of Germany and the Ruhr and with the Saar Territory (Appendices I and II). I have been giving anxious thought to these problems and now ask my colleagues for authority to proceed on the following lines :—

2. I ask for authority to explore the situation with the interested foreign Governments on the following general lines, though I would not propose to make any final commitment until the Dominions have been consulted at the forthcoming Imperial Conference :—

(a) The Ruhr.—(i) To explore the situation on the basis of international control over the Ruhr industries without political separation of the territory from Germany on the general lines suggested in paragraph 5 of this paper. Meanwhile officials would be instructed to prepare a detailed plan as a matter of urgency.

(ii) As an essential prelude to any long-term arrangement, to proceed within the British zone with the interim measures outlined in paragraph 6.

(b) The Rhineland.—To support the French Government's proposal that French, Belgian and Dutch forces should be stationed in German territory west of the Rhine for an indefinite period, but to resist their proposal for the detachment of the territory from Germany.

(c) The Saar.—To agree that the ownership of the Saar mines should be transferred to France, the territory included in the French customs and currency system, French military forces stationed permanently in the territory, and the territory itself transferred forthwith to French administration pending a final settlement. The assets so transferred should be debited to France on reparation account.

(d) The American Draft Treaty.—To inform the United States Government that His Majesty's Government welcome their proposal for a treaty as a most useful basis for discussion.

3. My own original proposal was that the Ruhr should remain part of Germany, but that its industries should be internationally controlled along the lines of a plan prepared by the Economic and Industrial Planning Staff and shown in Annex A to Gen. 121/1 (Appendix I). The following points were raised on that proposal :—

(a) Would my suggestion that the Ruhr should concentrate on semi-finished products and that the finishing industries should be located elsewhere in Europe be acceptable to other countries and indeed to our own?

(b) Would it be possible to confine to the Ruhr the proposed control over German heavy industries? Might not a central German Government, if left free to do so, build up outside the Ruhr heavy industries which were not subject to international control?

(c) What would be the relation between the standard of life in the Ruhr and that in the rest of Germany?

(d) Would the local administrative officials and the German workers in the Ruhr be likely to adopt a policy of obstruction and passive resistance towards the International Holding Corporation and to be supported in this policy by the German Government or administration and by workers elsewhere in Germany?

C223790

4. These points have now been considered with the following results :—

(a) There is general agreement that from the security angle there would be every advantage in encouraging the basic industries of the Ruhr up to the semi-finishing stage, leaving the finishing industries to be set up in other parts of Germany and elsewhere in Europe. There is also general agreement that this should be our aim as soon as the redevelopment of those basic industries is allowed. But for the time being we are bound by the level of industry plan approved by the Control Council which restricts production to a level that will bring serious unemployment to the area. This unemployment would be increased still further if we were now to exclude from the area all the existing fabricating industries.

(b) All heavy industries depend on coal or power, and the Ruhr is the only important source of these in Germany apart from the brown coal fields in Saxony which cannot provide coking coal for steel production. By controlling the Ruhr coal output we shall control the development of the steel industry not only in the Ruhr area but all over Germany. Moreover, it has never been suggested that if a special system of control is applied in the Ruhr, the development of industry in the rest of Germany should be left entirely uncontrolled. The peace treaty will, it is hoped, provide for a thorough system of industrial inspection.

(c) It was agreed at Potsdam that Germany's standard of living should, during the initial period of control, not exceed that of the European average excluding the United Kingdom and Russia. The reparation plan agreed at Berlin will ensure that this principle is strictly observed. It is not possible to predict at this stage how the standard of life in the various parts of Germany will develop after the reparation plan has been completed. All that can be said is that it will be essential to the success of international control of the Ruhr that the standard of life in the area should be at least as high as that prevailing in the rest of Germany.

(d) All political parties in Germany are deeply hostile to any idea of the political separation of the Ruhr from Germany. Their attitude to international control of the industries is less clear. The best estimate of opinion is that, while the Communists would follow Russian guidance whatever it might be, the democratic parties might be brought to accept a plan of the kind worked out by E.I.P.S. if it were accompanied by some immediate advantages and could be represented as a step towards Germany's re-establishment in the Western International framework. Their acceptance might be facilitated if the plan were modified in the sense set out in the next paragraph.

5. Further consideration has been given to the E.I.P.S. paper during the past few weeks, and I am led to think that the basic conception of international control within the German State might be better implemented on the following lines. A new German province would be formed in the area affected by the scheme. Instead of the industries being owned internationally they would be made into a socialised German corporation whose relation to the Provincial Government would be the same as that of the National Coal Board in this country to His Majesty's Government. Germany's obligations in regard to the transferred industries would be laid down in such detail as was necessary, in the peace treaties, and an international control organisation would be formed to supervise the performance of these obligations. Thus political control, with of course the possibility of political and military sanctions, would be substituted for industrial control through ownership. My impression is that a scheme of this nature, with its emphasis on political rather than industrial control, would be more acceptable to the French, while German opinion would certainly prefer to see German industries in German socialised ownership rather than owned by an international corporation. The actual direction of the products of the area into the channels we desire would have to be brought about by the various interested Governments applying appropriate commercial policies.

6. If this scheme is generally agreed, I should propose to proceed by the following stages. The first step would be to create a new German province covering the area to which the scheme is to apply. I am advised that this could be done without difficulty by unilateral action on the part of the British Commander-in-Chief. The next step would be to set up a provincial administration of that province, which would have the necessary powers over the proposed German corporation to which the industries in the area would be transferred. This will take some time to achieve, and in the meantime I would propose to follow in regard to the other industries in this area the same policy that has already been carried out in regard to the Ruhr mines, namely, to vest them as a temporary measure in the Commander-in-Chief, announcing at the same time that while their ultimate disposal remains to be decided they will not be returned to their previous owners. Although it is part of the plan that these assets should subsequently be transferred to the proposed German corporation, there is some doubt whether this transfer could be effected by the Commander-in-Chief under the powers which he exercises as a zone commander or whether it would not need the quadripartite approval of the Control Council. This, however, is being further examined and will not affect my immediate proposal. It follows that during the early stages the direct control over these industries would be exercised solely by the British zone commander, though he would of course be subject to quadripartite control at Berlin in so far as the legislation to deal with these industries is a matter affecting Germany as a whole. Nevertheless, to prepare the way for my ultimate objective of international control I would from the outset associate the Western Powers most closely affected and the United States by inviting them to appoint in the first place advisers to the British officials nominated as custodians of these industrial assets, and later, when the German corporation has been formed, to the British body which will control it. But when the quadripartite control of Germany comes to an end this British body would change into an international organisation on the lines set out in paragraph 5 and at that stage the advisers appointed by our Allies would become fully associated with the control.

7. A highly important point for decision is whether the Russians should be admitted into the scheme suggested. My own view is that we should not offer to the Russians in Western Germany any greater facilities than they might be prepared to give us in Eastern Germany, e.g., participation in the international control of the industrial area of Saxony. One may assume that they would not wish to set up such an international control in their own zone. If, therefore, at any time during the evolution of this plan the Russians were to claim the right to appoint an adviser or an ultimate share in the international controlling body, I should only be prepared to accept this provided that they were to give us similar participation in the international control of a similar organisation in their zone.

8. In considering this whole problem we must, however, bear in mind that we have given our agreement in Berlin to a plan for the future level of German industry the effect of which will be to reduce the level of German industry as a whole to about 50 or 55 per cent. of the 1938 level. The heavy industries are to be more drastically reduced than others, the productive capacity remaining to them being of the order of a third of pre-war. This will in particular affect the Ruhr where the heavy industries chiefly lie. The plan was accepted by the British representative on the clear understanding that it would be open to review if any of the basic assumptions of the plan were modified. One of these assumptions related to the German western frontier and it would clearly be modified if the French plan of separating the Ruhr from Germany were accepted. But it would be impossible to call for review on this ground if a system were introduced on the lines favoured by the Committee on German Industry, under which the German western frontier would not be changed. Unless, therefore, we are prepared to denounce the Potsdam Agreement—and this is a matter which I propose to discuss in a separate paper on our general policy towards Germany—it seems to me that we must proceed on the assumption that the level of industry plan will be carried out. This, I fear, will inevitably postpone for some years any hope of fulfilling one of my principal ideas, which is that the Ruhr should be turned into a positive element of European reconstruction. I have not, however, abandoned this conception and hope that the proposal for controlling the Ruhr which I have outlined will enable me to persuade the Russians that a prosperous and expanding industry in the Ruhr may hold out great advantages for them as well as for the rest of Europe. The full association of the Germans in the development of their own industry under international control, as this modified plan contemplates, seems to me better calculated to achieve this objective than does the idea of international ownership which deprives the Germans of an interest in the welfare and well-being of their own industries.

9. I took the opportunity of the period required for consideration of the points mentioned in paragraph 3 above, to invite the views of the Chiefs of Staff on the strategic aspect of this problem. Their report, of which a copy is attached, may be briefly summarised as follows:—

Our main strategic aims in Western Europe are that no potentially hostile Power should be in a position to dominate Western Europe and, secondly, that on the outbreak of any future conflict our strategic frontier should be as far east as possible. Our policy towards Germany should be guided by the consideration that Russia is our most likely potential enemy and is a more serious danger than a revived Germany. Three proposals for the organisation of the Ruhr are considered and none is thought wholly satisfactory for meeting these aims. The first, namely, that the Ruhr should simply remain for the time being as part of our zone of occupation with the control of its industry in our hands, has many advantages since it gives us for the immediate future the maximum freedom of action and leaves the area and its industry under our control for so long as the occupation of Germany is maintained. But the necessary corollary of this proposal is that the Ruhr should be returned to German control when occupation ceases. This will be dangerous if Germany is drawn into the Russian orbit. The Chiefs of Staff regard the French proposals as unacceptable. They regard the E.I.P.S. plan as a possible compromise but draw attention to several serious disadvantages in it. The Chiefs of Staff see no objection to the occupational commitment involved in the E.I.P.S. plan which would amount to 10,000 British troops and which they consider would probably be less than that involved in the French plan.

10. There remain the questions of the Rhineland, the Saar and the draft treaty proposed by the United States Government, the text of which is contained in Annex C of Gen. 121/1 (C.P. (46) 156).

11. As regards the Rhineland, economic and military arguments have been advanced against the French proposal that German territory west of the Rhine should be set up as a separate State or States detached from Germany. French ideas on this point have been far less definite than their ideas about the Ruhr, and there should not be so much difficulty in reaching agreement with them on this aspect of their plan provided we can accept their main proposal that their forces, and those of the Belgians and Dutch, should be stationed permanently in the area. I would propose that this should be our policy. It is not thought necessary that any British troops should be stationed in this area.

12. As regards the Saar, I suggest that His Majesty's Government should support the French proposals and that the assets of the territory transferred to French administration should be debited to the French Government on reparation account. I submit these recommendations to my colleagues' approval.

13. The Chiefs of Staff have reported favourably on the American draft treaty and, though certain clarifications are required, I am convinced that this American initiative is of great importance and potential advantage to ourselves. I would accordingly propose to inform the United States Government that we welcome their proposal and consider it provides a most useful basis for further discussion, subject to the clarification of certain points.

C.O.S. (46) 105 (O).

CHIEFS OF STAFF COMMITTEE.

THE FUTURE OF GERMANY AND THE RUHR.

Report.

WE have examined the Foreign Secretary's paper* and the questions you put forward in your letter. It is not possible to deal with these without considering wider questions of our strategic interests in Western Europe.

2. It must be assumed that the Silesian industrial area is permanently lost to Germany. From the point of view of future war potential, the Ruhr is by far the most important area of Germany. Deprived of both the Ruhr and Silesia, Germany could hardly count as an independent factor in Europe.

From the military point of view, therefore, the future of the Ruhr and the Rhineland will largely determine the future of Germany. Thus is becomes necessary to consider what our long-term policy with regard to Germany as a whole should be.

Long-Term Policy regarding Germany.

3. Our main strategic aims in Western Europe are that :—

(a) No potentially hostile Power should be in a position to dominate Western Europe.

(b) On the outbreak of any future conflict, our strategic frontier should be as far east as possible.

The deduction from the above is that we must do our utmost to ensure that France and the Low Countries remain friendly to us. Our position would be greatly strengthened by the creation of a western democratic Germany. Failing this, it is essential that the authority in control in Germany should not be hostile to us.

This authority must be that, either of a revived and independent Germany, or of whatever Power might be in a position to exert a controlling influence in Germany. At present it seems that, once the existing system of Allied occupation is terminated the only foreign Power which could establish a controlling influence in Germany would be Russia. Our policy towards Germany should therefore be shaped by whether, in the long run, we regard a revived and independent Germany, or Russia as likely to be the greater danger to our security.

It is clear that the worst situation of all, and one which we must try to avoid at all costs, is that of a revived Germany dominated by Russia, since we might then be facing the combined war potential of both Powers.

4. If we consider that the principal danger to our security is eventually likely to come from a revived and independent Germany, then our policy towards her should be guided principally by the necessity of keeping her war potential as low as possible. At the same time, however, we must not drive Germany into the arms of Russia.

Alternatively, if Russia is considered the more serious danger, our policy towards Germany should be such as would not prevent us from building her up again if this becomes necessary. In addition, so that we could count on effective German assistance in the event of conflict with Russia, we should try to avoid arousing permanent German antagonism towards us.

5. The above are questions of the highest policy and are to a great extent political. We consider that it is still too early to decide these issues finally, but, if we have to shape our policy now we can, from the military point of view, choose only the second alternative since Russia appears, at present, our most likely potential enemy.

In the event of conflict with Russia we cannot, in view of the man-power and war potential at her disposal, afford to exclude any method of redressing the balance. Moreover, Germany is so placed strategically that, if she was prepared to resist, she might be able to gain the necessary time for us to develop our own effort, and for the resources of the United States to be brought into play.

6. It would clearly be politically unacceptable, nor is it militarily necessary, to adopt a policy of rebuilding Germany in the immediate future. We consider, however, that our policy should be shaped to give us maximum freedom to do this later in case it should prove to be necessary. Such a course will be subject always to the following provisos :—

(a) We must be able to carry the United States with us in any proposals we make.

(b) We must not so offend France and the Low Countries that we alienate them permanently.

(c) Any arrangement which allows the stationing of Russian forces in Western Germany or extends Russian influence is undesirable.

(d) We wish to reduce our occupational commitment as far as possible and to avoid a permanent commitment on the continent.

(e) Any settlement which does not conform to the spirit of the Atlantic Charter is unlikely to stand the test of time.

7. In the light of the above overall considerations, we examine the points raised by the Foreign Office.

Proposed Methods of Control of the Ruhr.

Method 1.—Eventual Return of the Ruhr to Germany.

8. This gives us for the immediate future the maximum freedom of action in that it would avoid the necessity of deciding now upon any special long-term régime for the Ruhr, and would leave it under our control as long as the occupation of Germany is maintained. Moreover, the prospect of the eventual return of the Ruhr might divert German attention to the question of the recovery of her next most important lost province, Silesia, and therefore incline Germany to a policy of collaboration with the West rather than the East. The fact that we would remain in occupation of the area until it was considered safe to abandon the occupation of the whole country would give us, at any rate for some time, a considerable degree of security against a revived and hostile Germany.

9. On the other hand, this plan contains, as a long-term policy, an element of risk in that, should it not achieve its object and should Western Germany in spite of it be drawn into the Russian orbit, Russia would gain the war potential of the whole of Germany, including her most important industrial area. Whether or not this plan would bring us solid advantages must therefore depend upon its being accompanied by a positive policy towards Germany which will hold out real hope for the future to her, and so combat despair and its accompanying opportunities for Communist propaganda. This policy should ensure keeping at least Western Germany outside the "iron curtain."

We would relate this policy to the Foreign Secretary's remarks on the formation of a Western "zone," and to our views on areas of strategic importance.

It must not be overlooked that this plan may be expected to be vigorously opposed by France. The risk of alienating her that it involves would have to be faced, and a means found to persuade her that it will be in her long-term interests to accept it.

10. As regard occupational commitments, this plan reduces our long-term occupational tasks to a minimum, since, once the occupation of Germany as a whole hand been abandoned, there would be no need for forces of occupation east of the Rhine. The reluctance to evacuate the Ruhr might prolong the occupational commitments as a whole. On the other hand, it seems to us that the decision whether or not to abandon the occupation of Germany as a whole is likely to be influenced primarily by other factors.

Method 2.—E.I.P.S. Plan.

11. This plan has the following advantages :—

(a) It ensures that sanctions can be applied quickly if the need arises.

(b) Our share in the control over the industries of the Ruhr will offer us a certain degree of security whoever may be in control of Germany.

(c) French insistence on the separation of the Ruhr appears to be weakening, and they might therefore be brought to accept this plan.

(d) It should ensure that United States troops remain in Europe for a prolonged period.

(e) If the Russians are included in the plan, they are robbed of their propaganda line with the Germans that it is the Western Powers who are screwing down Germany.

12. The plan has, however, considerable disadvantages :—

(a) We abandon the position which we hold at present of being the sole authority in the area.

(b) It is doubtful whether the Germans would regard the return of the territory only, without control of the industries which give it its main value, as a concession of any great consequence.

It would not therefore divert German hostility away from the Western Democracies, and if the Russians are not included in the plan, might drive Germany into the arms of Russia by giving Russia a weapon with which to incite the German population against us.

(c) On the other hand, if the Russians do participate in control, it might be difficult to exclude Russian troops from the Ruhr while allowing forces of the Western Powers to be stationed there.

In the event of our being forced to admit Russian troops, it is unlikely that we shall be able to prevent them establishing a Russian zone, and with it a secure base for the conduct of Communistic activities.

(d) International control would be held responsible by the German population for any distress caused by slumps, unemployment, &c., and a difficult internal security problem would therefore exist. This unrest might be exploited to their own ends by the Russian representatives on the controlling body in the Ruhr.

(e) There will be an inevitable danger of conflicting economic interests between the controlling Powers, and the consequential danger that in the course of time one or more Powers might withdraw, causing a breakdown in control.

(f) The plan produces an indefinite, though small, occupational commitment.

13. With regard to the questions raised by the Foreign Office regarding occupational commitments, it is not possible to give a firm estimate of the number of troops required, but the figure of 50,000 quoted for the French Plan seems reasonable. Since the other participating Powers would presumably provide contingents, we should probably have to provide not more than 10,000, and this is a commitment which could be accepted.

The fact that the territory would not be politically separated from Germany should render the task of occupation easier rather than the reverse since such a régime would presumably be more acceptable to the population than one involving complete separation. It should be noted that militarily it would be highly desirable that the area should be extended as has already been proposed,* so as to include an area west of the Rhine up to the Dutch frontier. If this is not done the Ruhr area would become an island surrounded by potentially hostile territory.

Method 3.—French Plan.

14. Acceptance of this plan should improve our relations with France. Otherwise it produces no advantages which we cannot obtain under the E.I.P.S. plan, and only accentuates the disadvantages of that plan.

The Ruhr will be detached permanently from Germany. The scheme will therefore encounter the bitter hostility of the Germans, and in the passage of time will fail to retain the continued support of popular opinion in the democracies. It seems to us that German hostility to this plan, combined with the effect it would have upon German economy, would almost certainly drive Germany into the arms of Russia. Furthermore, the plan would entail an indefinite occupation commitment which, in view of local hostility, would probably be larger than that required under the E.I.P.S. plan, without any corresponding advantage from the security point of view. In addition, Russian influence would be allowed to extend into Western Germany.

Summary.

15. None of the three methods proposed is wholly satisfactory, nor can we at present see any solution to the problem of the ultimate disposal of the Ruhr territory which fully meets our military requirements. The French plan we regard as unacceptable.

From the military point of view, we wish to prevent Western Germany from falling under Russian domination. This requirement would be most nearly met by Method 1, i.e., retention of the Ruhr within our area of occupation and its ultimate return to Germany. The feasibility of this must, however, depend upon a political estimate of the possibility of keeping at least Western Germany within the Western democratic zone, and the plan will clearly raise considerable political difficulties.

If Method 1 cannot be adopted, the E.I.P.S. Plan offers a possible compromise. It has, however, the very great disadvantage that it extends Russian influence into Western Germany, and leaves the seed of discontent among the local population, and the danger of future disagreement between the Allies.

The Saar.

16. The French have a good claim to ownership of the Saar mines and for the inclusion of the area in their Customs Union. We consider that their demand will be difficult to refuse, and as there are few military implications to this we should certainly offer no objection on military grounds.

Remaining Territory West of the Rhine.

17. From the military point of view, we can see little object in setting this area up as a separate State, since at best it can only be a small weak unit which would be a continual source of dispute between France and Germany.

18. In order to increase our essential security against attack from the east, whether by Germany or Russia, we should support the indefinite maintenance of French, Belgian and Dutch garrisons throughout the area west of the Rhine. This will apply whatever solution is reached with regard to the Ruhr.

19. We see no necessity to provide a British contingent in this area. If, however, the provision of such a contingent would mean that the Americans would do the same, thereby giving them an indefinite commitment in Europe, we think we should also be prepared to provide a small force.

Conclusions.

20. We conclude that :—

(a) Our long-term policy with regard to Germany must take full account of the fact that Russia is a much more dangerous potential enemy than Germany; it cannot be shaped solely from the point of view of preventing a revival of a threat from Germany.

(b) We therefore wish, from a military point of view, to bring about a situation in which Western Germany will not be dominated by Russia.

(c) In the light of the above, the implications of the three solutions proposed for the Ruhr are as follows :—

(i) Provided we can obtain American co-operation and can convince the French that it is in their long-term interest to agree, and provided that it is coupled with a positive policy towards Germany that will ensure at least Western Germany remaining within the western democratic zone, Method 1 most nearly meets our military requirements.

(ii) Method 2 (E.I.P.S. Plan) presents a compromise but only at the price of Russian participation, to which we are most strongly opposed.

(iii) Method 3 (French Plan) is unacceptable.

(d) There are no military objections to acceptance of the French proposals with regard to the Saar.

(e) We should only support the French proposals that French, Belgian and Dutch garrisons should be maintained indefinitely in German territory west of the Rhine if the Ruhr and the adjacent Rhineland are also to be occupied by Allied Forces.

Note on proposals for a meeting of Prime Ministers of the British Commonwealth, London, 1946.

A. General Arrangements and Timing.

1. The earliest notice of the proposed meeting is in a memorandum from Mr. Wrong dated December 19, 1945.

The intention then was that a meeting of Prime Ministers might be held in conjunction with the proposed Commonwealth discussions on commercial questions. The probable time suggested was the latter part of March (1946).

Mr. Wrong noted the unlikelihood of all the Commonwealth Prime Ministers being able to be in London at that time.

2. Official intimation of the proposed meeting came in a telegram from Mr. Attlee on February 4, 1946 (No.26)

Mr. Attlee thought the time had come when it would be of "great advantage" to arrange a meeting. He appreciated the difficulty of Mr. King being absent for any length of time from Canada, but added that in any event Mr. King might think it desirable to represent Canada at the meeting in Paris of the Peace Conference, which, in accordance with the Moscow Agreement, was due to be arranged for May.

Mr. Attlee's suggestion therefore was that they should try to arrange a meeting in London a week or ten days before the time fixed for the opening of the Paris Conference.

This message was sent also to Mr. Chifley and Field Marshal Smuts. Mr. Fraser was at the moment in London.

3. Mr. King's reply of February 10 (No.26) welcomed the suggestion that a meeting might be arranged in London in May, and expressed Mr. King's intention to arrange Parliamentary business so that he could attend both the London meeting and the Paris Conference.

4. Mr. Chifley's reply (of Feb.8, repeated to Ottawa as No.2) said a visit to London would only be possible immediately after Easter when Commonwealth Parliament would be in recess. He did not intend to go to the Paris Conference; Dr. Evatt would be Commonwealth Representative at this latter meeting.

5. Field Marshal Smuts reply (of Feb.9, repeated from London as No.377) welcomed the proposed meeting before the Paris Conference.

6. Mr. Attlee sent a further message (Feb.13, No.33) suggesting April 29 for opening date, and that an attempt should be made to ensure the Peace Conference opening about ten days thereafter.

He also sent a draft of a statement intended to be made in Parliament in London on Feb. 18.

7. Mr. King's message of Feb.15 (No.32) stated that arrangements already made for the resumption of the Dominion-Provincial Conference in Ottawa on April 25 would prevent his being in London on April 29. He feared he could not change these plans to involve an absence from Canada earlier than the middle of May.

8) On receiving this message, Mr. Attlee postponed his proposed statement pending further consideration of dates. (Feb.16, No.36)

9) In a further message (Feb.20, No.38) Mr. Attlee asked if to meet Mr. Chifley's commitments to leave London not later than May 5, Mr. King could re-arrange his timetable to make April 29, or at any rate, May 1, possible.

10) Mr. King's reply (Feb.21,No.34) pointed out that matters to be considered by the Dominion-Provincial Conference were "of first importance" to the federal as well as the nine provincial governments concerned; also that the Budget could not be presented to Parliament until the results of the Conference were known.

Mr. King asked if it might not be arranged to have the meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers held immediately after the Paris Conference.

11) Mr. Chifley next suggested (Feb.23, repeated to Ottawa as No.3) a meeting in two stages, one as soon as possible after Easter, the second series of consultations at a later date.

12) To this Mr. Attlee agreed as the best that could be achieved: i.e., a preliminary meeting, with Mr. Chifley and any other Prime Ministers who could attend, shortly after Easter, and a subsequent meeting either before or after the Paris Conference as might prove convenient.
(Feb.25, Circ. D.154~~7~~)

13) Field Marshal Smuts telegraphed it would be practically impossible for him to attend before April 29, but he did not wish this to delay an earlier meeting of other Prime Ministers. (Mar.5 repeated to Ottawa as No.3)
(Note: in the event, he reached London on April ~~22~~ 28).

14) On March 5 Mr. Attlee informed Mr. Chifley (Circ.D.197) that the United Kingdom govt. would be ready to begin meetings with him on April 23.

15) Mr. Fraser informed Mr. Attlee on March 7 (repeated to Ottawa as No.5) that Mr. Nash expected to be available in London at the same time as Mr. Chifley.

16) Mr. Attlee again proposed a public announcement (March 11, Circ.D.214, D. 215, explaining that the first meetings would be with Mr. Chifley and Mr. Nash, with the Prime Ministers of Canada and South Africa joining in discussions as soon thereafter as they were free to do so.

17) Mr. King, commenting on this draft announcement expressed doubt whether the gathering could be called a meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers, and suggested that it be definitely stated that it had not been possible to arrange a meeting at which all Prime Ministers of the Commonwealth could be present simultaneously.

Mr. King added that he felt the idea of associating the time of the meeting with the Paris Conference should be adhered to. Unless this were done, it would necessitate either a long wait in London, or two separate visits to Europe which it would be most difficult to arrange.
(March 11, No.67)

18) In a telegram of March 12 (repeated to Ottawa as No.4) F.M. Smuts used almost identical language.

Mr. Attlee thereupon postponed his announcement. (March 12, Circ.D.233)

19) Mr. Chifley concurred in the altered form of announcement (March 13, repeated to Ottawa at No.6), and so also did Mr. Fraser (March 13, repeated to Ottawa as No.7)

The announcement, in agreed terms, was therefore made in the House of Commons at Westminster on the afternoon of March 18.

20) There is no further reference to a time of arrival in London of the Prime Minister of Canada until April 11. Mr. Attlee's telegram of that date (Circ.D.348) refers to a third week of the Conference, "when we hope Mr.Mackenzie King will have arrived". (On the time-table specified for the first and second week, the third week would begin on May 7).

(See also Mr. Massey's tel. of April 12, No.937)

21) In a telegram to Mr. Attlee on April 18 (No.148) Mr. King mentioned that he would have to combine in one absence from Canada his participation in the talks in London and his attendance at the Paris Conference. Assuming that the latter would not be delayed beyond the beginning of June, he had made travel arrangements which would bring him to London about May 18. (This would preclude Mr. King's being in London while Mr. Chifley was there, but Mr. King hoped he might see Mr. Chifley in Ottawa on the latter's return journey from London to Australia.)

22) Mr. Attlee's reply (April 21, No.76) suggested there could be no clearer idea of the date of the Paris Conference until after the Foreign Ministers had met in Paris (April 25). He added:

> "We should be very unhappy if the contingency of postponement of the Paris Peace Conference resulted in your missing personal contact with us, Field Marshal Smuts, and the representatives of Mr.Chifley and Mr. Fraser.....It would be a great disappointment to us and to public opinion in this country if it were found impractical to hold some meetings.... with all the Prime Ministers or their representatives present."

Mr. Attlee appealed for Mr. King's arrival by May 6 at the latest if at all possible.

23) Mr. King sent a reply on April 23 (No.155), indicating that after consideration with his colleagues whether he could postpone or rearrange commitments to make possible arrival in London by May 6, all were agreed it would be quite impossible for him to do so.

Mr. King also detailed the questions necessitating his being in Ottawa for some days (e.g. the Budget, United Kingdom Loan legislation. He thought it might be advisable to defer making final the plans for his visit to London; but once a date had been fixed for the Paris Conference, it ought to be possible to find a mutually convenient date for a meeting in London, which might perhaps follow instead of precede the Paris Conference.

J. A. G.

24) In a message dated April 26 Mr. Attlee stated that the situation respecting meetings in London had been changed (a) by the fact that F.M. Smuts would be in London at the same time as Mr. Chifley and Mr. Nash, and (b) by the decision to hold a meeting of the [redacted] Council of Foreign Ministers in Paris. He added:

"The result is that we must, we feel, discuss with [redacted] the three countries who are represented here a number of * questions which are really of very direct interest to Canada. We can postpone these until the week beginning May 6th but hardly longer, as it looks as if it would be necessary to bring the present consultations to a close at the end of that week".

* questions referred to included:

atomic energy	)	"clearly inappropriate"
general policy towards Germany	)	to discuss without Canada being present

Mr. Attlee thought it would be "very unfortunate" if the present discussions were to close in the middle of May without a Canadian representative having taken part; and he hoped Mr. King would be able to send someone to represent Canada at any rate in the discussions beginning May 6. (no difficulty about conferring with Mr. King after the Paris conference, but this would not meet difficulty of week of May 6).

25) Mr. King told Mr. Attlee, in a message dated May 1, that the Cabinet, after consideration, had decided that no one of the Ministers who might take Mr. King's place could be spared.

All things considered, Mr. King felt best course was to proceed on his original plan to leave (on May 12 (13) without waiting for date of Paris conference to be fixed.

Mr. King added that he was glad to know that some of the Commonwealth representatives were likely still to be in London during the latter part of May, and he looked forward to joining in exchange of views with them on questions of mutual concern. If other questions emerged on which a preliminary indication of the Canadian point of view might be helpful, he hoped Mr. Attlee would feel free to continue to raise them through the usual channels.

26) In a communication of May 7 Mr. Attlee stated it was intended to adjourn the first series of talks on May 8, and to resume them after Mr. King's arrival (May 20 suggested).

At the same time, "papers" covering discussions thus far on

Council of Foreign Ministers, Paris
Peace Treaties with Italy and satellite states
Ruhr and Western Frontier of Germany
Atomic Energy

had been forwarded for Mr. King's information.

27) Mr. Attlee added that on certain questions, particularly those relating to defence, he would like to have the opportunity of separate discussions with Mr. King.

28) Mr. King's reply to Mr. Attlee's message of May 7 (dated May 10 and communicated through Earnscliffe) stated that the records of proceedings so far received indicated a purpose and method of procedure completely different from anything he had been lead to expect. Reviewing earlier exchanges of messages, Mr. King recalled that the agreed announcement of March 18 had specified that the proposal for a meeting of Prime Ministers (as such) had been abandoned, and instead arrangements had then been made to hold "a series of consultations".

Mr. King felt that the printed papers carried with them "in form and substance all the responsibilities that would fall on the shoulders of a Prime Minister at an Imperial Conference." (This would ordinarily involve an agreed agenda circulated in advance for study and discussion at home, plus ministerial representation in addition to Prime Minister, together with expert advisers).

Mr. King said frankly he was not in any position to assume an obligation of this kind on behalf of Canada. He had assured Parliament (as he noticed F.M. Smuts had assured the South African Parliament before leaving the Union) that he expected the discussions to be informal, exploratory, and confined to major matters of mutual interest, in which the representatives would be free tospeak their minds without verbatim records being kept and without reports being given out to the press from day to day. He (Mr. King) would greatly hesitate to participate in proceedings of a more formal character.

Further, he had felt it necessary to let Parliament know, before his departure, exactly the extent to which he might be expected to speak for Canada on any matters which might, ~~in~~ appearances or in reality, commit Canada to any so-called Commonwealth policy either on

1. The Situation in the Pacific

(a) first mentioned as "the particular subject of discussion" in Mr. Attlee's telegram of invitation.

(Feb. 4/46, No. 26)

(b) Mr. Chifley and Mr. King concurred.

(c) official announcement made by Mr. Attlee on March 18, 1946, said:

> "The main subject for discussion will be matters pertaining to the Pacific"

(d) Mr. Fraser told the High Commissioner for Canada in Wellington on April 9 (Telegram 27) that main purpose of meeting in Canberra (Chifley, Fraser, Nash) was > to discuss territorial settlements in Pacific and U.S. claims for certain strategic bases.

N.Z. did not object to joint rights in certain air bases (e.g. in Western Samoa) but > they were quite opposed to granting of sole rights (i.e. U.S. use was acceptable provided U.K. and Australia enjoyed equal joint rights).

(e) Mr. Attlee subsequently suggested that the above should be discussed during first week of talks

(for second week, see Sections 6,8)
(for third week, see Sections 5,7,4)

~~CONFIDENTIAL~~ SECRET C223807

Note on Proposals for a meeting of Prime Ministers of the British Commonwealth, London, 1946.

B. 2. Coordination of Commonwealth Defence

(a) reported by High Commissioner, London, as a "principal subject" figuring in press reports following Attlee announcement (Mar.4, Tel.621)

(b) subject had been mentioned in White Paper on Defence (Feb.21, CMD 6743)
One extract from Section viii reads:

"His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom acknowledging to the full the tremendous efforts put forward in the common cause by the whole Commonwealth and Empire, earnestly desire to continue in peace the full partnership established in war. It will be necessary to consider with the governments of His Majesty's Dominions and India the way in which the lessons of the war can be applied to promote consultation and collaboration in defence matters during peace."

(c) The Political Correspondent of the Sunday Times (London) on March 3 wrote that he understood

"particular attention is being given to devising an improvised (sic) system of consultation and co-ordination for defence .... (One method under consideration is) the establishment of an Organization, comparable with the Military Staffs Committee of the United Nations, with appropriate functions in relation to Imperial defence."

(d) Other press reports spoke of a co-ordinated plan for Imperial defence said to have been drawn up by Field Marshal Alanbrooke as a result of his recent tour (through the Mediterranean, India, Australia and New Zealand, but not to Canada, which he last visited in September 1944.)

(e) On this question (as on the related question of Commonwealth trade), Mr. Massey suggested that the public, on the basis of press speculation, might be "led into great expectations"of the Prime Ministers' meetings, and said it would be useful to have any guidance the Department might offer in case the subject attracted still more attention.

(f) The Department's reply is in Tel.695 of March 23. It expresses concern over the possibility that the character and importance of the consultations in prospect for London were being over-emphasized in the United Kingdom.

It assumed this might be due to three main causes

i. profound anxiety over Soviet policy
inevitable uncertainty about continued firmness of U.S. policy both producing desire to play up strength of Commonwealth as a whole and lay stress on capacity of Commonwealth governments to take concerted action

ii. Labour government anxious to give no ground for charges it was not an effective guardian of Imperial interests

iii. waning faith in capacity of United Nations Organization to be an effective guardian of peace and security had given rise to renewed interest in the military power of the Commonwealth.

(g) On question of Commonwealth defence, it was recalled that no general proposals for post-war co-operation had been made since Lord Cranborne's suggestion at end of Prime Minister's meetings in London in June, 1944;

some plans had been put forward for co-operation in particular tasks (cf. defence research);

official language of U.K. Ministers and in documents which Dept. had seen indicated some desire to see created an organization to plan and direct "Imperial Defence" (suggested that phrase should be dropped from current vocabulary because of unnecessary misunderstanding and irritation, and because it had little value in relation to strategic realities today);

(h) Summary of other reactions contained in Department's reply:

- quite apart from proven war capacity in event of general war, Canadian responsibility for defence of Canadian territory (together with responsibility for defending, in collaboration with U.S. the approaches to northern part of this continent) was a very important aspect of the defence of the British Commonwealth;

- Canadian opinion does not think in terms of defending Imperial interests as such (i.e. sharing responsibility for defending areas remote from Canada)

- Canada was deeply concerned that security and strength of whole British Commonwealth should be maintained, but could not conceive this as being effectively safe-guarded by exclusive commonwealth arrangements;

- The strategical interests of the Commonwealth were so diverse that their protection required the co-ordination of defence between individual Commonwealth countries and foreign states.

Note: Following an enquiry from the Acting High Commissioner in South Africa, a memorandum containing the substance of this reply was, on direction, communicated to Field Marshal Smuts for his personal information.
(April 12, No.46)

(j) Suggested by Mr. Attlee (March 27, Circular D. 285)

- defence questions affecting particularly U.K. Australia and New Zealand, especially U.S. request for bases in Pacific Islands

- defence co-operation in forms suitable for the different circumstances of the various members of the Commonwealth

On this latter question, Mr. Massey reported (March 29, Telegram 846) that although the U.K. Government were under pressure from many sides "to urge on other Commonwealth countries a tightly-knit system of Commonweal th defence", Government spokesmen had "consistently fought shy on giving this conception positive support."

(Attention was called to a debate in the House of Lords on March 28, in which close integration of defence planning for the Commonwealth had been urged. In reply, Lord Addison had said:

. . ."There are regional groups of problems in the consideration of which everyone is willing to co-operate. But it is very different from having a group of high-powered, superior persons at the top, who might be tempted to give orders to those nations. That would not work . . ."

(k) Field Marshal Smuts told Acting High Commissioner for Canada at Capetown (April 10, Telegram 33) he thought U.K. sources might, in interval between his own and Mr. King's arrival in London, try to influence him to modify his attitude so that when Mr. King arrived there would be a lack of uniformity between South African and Canadian ideas on Commonwealth defence.

He asked for a memorandum setting out points mentioned in paragraphs f,g,h, above. This was, on authorization from Ottawa, done.

(l) Attention was called (in Mr. Massey's telegram No. 1026 of April 27, to a TIMES article on "Next Phase of Empire Defence" - reporting a purported plan which included dispersal of military and industrial resources throughout the Commonwealth; and redistribution of manpower for new planning and directive organizations

When Mr. Massey enquired at the Dominions Office as to the credence to be attached to this report, it was stated to be "unfortunate"; there was in fact no question of a prepared plan being put forward as a formal submission to Commonwealth Ministers. It would be open to Mr. King when he arrived to say whether he wished to discuss the particular subjects under reference.

(m) The subject of Commonwealth Defence does NOT figure in the provisional timetable circulated by Mr. Attlee (on May 10) for the meetings from May 20 through May 24.

3. Commonwealth Trade and the Future of Empire Preference

(a) reported by High Commissioner, London, as a "principal subject" figuring in press reports following Attlee announcement (March 4, Telegram 621).

(b) High Commissioner, London, was informed on March 23 (telegram No. 695) that Department had no information that these matters were to be brought up in London.

Such a course did not seem appropriate in view of carefully prepared program leading up to general conference on international trade. (late 1946 or early 1947). Preliminary Commonwealth talks in preparation for conference of drafting countries were scheduled for mid-July.

(c) Field Marshal Smuts suggested (April 3, H.C.L. telegram 882) an exchange of views on trade barriers and Imperial preference

Mr. Attlee's comment (April 6, Circ.D.326) was that discussion of economic subjects at London meetings had not been contemplated because of later meetings on commercial policy

(d) New Zealand Government stated (April 8, repeated to Ottawa as No. 12) that they would welcome "a general exchange of views on trade barriers and Imperial preference."

(e) During the first series of talks ending on May 8, both F.M. Smuts and Mr. ~~XXXXXX~~ Nash had suggested it would be "useful" to have "a general talk about commercial policy and imperial preference". Mr. Attlee had explained that it was suggested that the technical issues involved should be the subject of expert meetings a little later; but it was the general feeling that a brief discussion of principles on the ministerial level would be helpful.

(f) In his message to Mr. Attlee of May 10, Mr. King mentioned that he did not expect any general discussion on commercial policy or imperial preference to be of much value without the presence of the Canadian Minister of Finance.

(g) In the timetable circulated on May 10, commerical policy questions are put down for Thursday, May 23, at 3:45 p.m.

4. Peace Treaties (see also Section 6)

(a) Suggested by Mr. Attlee for third week of talks
(for 1st week, see Sec.1 (April 11, Circ. ,D.348)
(for 2nd week, see Secs. 6,8)

(b) referred to again by Mr. Attlee in following extract (April 21, No. 76)

". . . the meeting of the four Foreign Ministers in Paris may be impelled to reach what may in effect be conclusions, to which we shall be committed, about some of the major issues to be settled at the Paris Peace Conference, and this renders it particularly desirable that we should be in the closest touch with you here while the meeting of the four Foreign Ministers is still going on. . ."

(this latter meeting began on April 25)

(c) Mr. King's reply to this point was as follows: (April 23, No. 155)

"As to the course of events at the Paris Conference, it is my understanding, and I have so informed Parliament, that all states invited to the Conference will have full opportunity to examine the draft treaties on their merits and to express their views and to put forward suggestions for amendments. In this way we would hope that the final treaties would reflect a real concensus of view of the countries participating. This procedure makes it important that the members of the Council of Foreign Ministers should agree to give full weight in drafting the final text of the treaties to the views expressed by the other states represented in the Conference. If these countries' views were to be ignored, it might make it difficult for the governments concerned to secure the support of their parliaments and peoples for the final peace treaties.

In any event, there does not at this stage appear to be any alternative to the procedure already agreed between the Big Three at Potsdam. Certainly I know you will agree that it would not be possible to lay down in advance a Commonwealth policy which the United Kingdom Foreign Secretary could advance at the meeting of the Council in Paris prior to the general Conference at which the countries of the Commonwealth will be separately represented. You will recall that a somewhat similar procedure was suggested at the time of the first meetings of the Council of Foreign Ministers in London in September last, and that the procedure proposed did not work out very well. I should fear possibilities for further misunderstandings if an attempt is made to revive this procedure now."

4. (d) Commenting on this situation, Mr. Wrong telegraphed the Under-Secretary on April 24 (No. 998). Of representations made to him by Dominions Office, he remarked:

> ". . .in spite of the assurances given us by London and Washington, the Big Four are now unlikely to consent to any departure at the Paris Conference from the main decisions of the Foreign Ministers on the peace treaties. The deterioration of the general situation means that these decisions will be reached only after prolonged bargaining. The real Peace Conference may, therefore, be the Council of Foreign Ministers, and the countries invited later to Paris may only have a choice between signing and not signing the peace treaties. The present, therefore, may be the time to exert influence on the results."

(e) Comment by Mr. Attlee in his message of April 26 (gray).

> " . . there is of course no idea on our part that the Foreign Secretary should advance a "Commonwealth Policy" What we have in mind is that it is of the greatest value to the Foreign Secretary in putting forward United Kingdom views, to know how far these are in harmony with the general views of the other members of the Commonwealth. So far as we are concerned we fully agree with the view which you /Mr. King/ have expressed (in telegram No. 155 of April 23) that each country concerned must have a full opportunity atthe Paris Konference of expressing its views, but we cannot disregard the probable line that the other countries will take at the Council of Foreign Ministers.

(f) The subject was proposed for discussion also in Mr. Attlee's message of May 7 as > the proceedings of the Council of Foreign Ministers at Paris,and the question of the p eace treaties with Italy and satellite states.

(g) The subject appears, as described above, in the timetable circulated on May 10, with the addition of treaties with Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland, for discussion on Monday, May 20, at 3:45 p.m.

(b) Mentioned by Mr. Attlee on April 26 as a question on which the views of Canada would be of direct interest and concern. On this (he said)

"it will be necessary to discuss with the others the present position, including the latest grave developments relating to the attitude of the United States. But it would clearly be most inappropriate for us to do this withiut Canada being present".

10. General

(a) ". . . the consultations will afford an opportunity for conversations on other matters of common concern.

(Mr. Attlee's announcement, March 18)

(b) Field Marshal Smuts suggested (April 3, HCL tel.882) certain subjects arising directly out of the war, such as:

war marriages,
nationality of married women.

On the latter point, Mr. Attlee had already stated on March 26, in reply to a question in the House of Commons, that the meetings would not afford suitable opportunity to raise this question, as it would not be a full Imperial Conference.

Later (April 6, Circ. D. 326) Mr. Attlee mentioned it was hoped there would be a Commonwealth meeting in summer or autumn to consider certain nationality questions, and it might be thought preferable to leave technical questions until then.

The New Zealand Government agreed in this sense (April 8, No. 12)

(c) Mr. King telegraphed Mr. Attlee (April 18, No. 148) he had no comments on suggested topics, but had been glad to note concensus of opinion that no formal agenda is required or appropriate. He assumed proceedings would not go beyond an informal exchange of views on main questions of mutual concern.

(d) Nationality of married women:
F.M. Smuts had suggested after his arrival in London a preliminary talk about this subject and citizenship. While leaving the technical details to an experts meeting later on, it was felt that a general discussion of principles at the Ministerial level would be helpful.

(e) The question has accordingly been put down for Tuesday, May 21 at 3:45 p.m.

(f) The final meeting (Friday, May 24 at 11:00 a.m.) is for "any other business".

(for 2nd week, see Secs. 6,8)

(b) referred to again by Mr. Attlee in following extract (April 21, No. 76)

". . . the meeting of the four Foreign Ministers in Paris may be impelled to reach what may in effect be conclusions, to which we shall be committed, about some of the major issues to be settled at the Paris Peace Conference, and this renders it particularly desirable that we should be in the closest touch with you here while the meeting of the four Foreign Ministers is still going on. . ."

(this latter meeting began on April 25)

(c) Mr. King's reply to this point was as follows: (April 23, No. 155)

"As to the course of events at the Paris Conference, it is my understanding, and I have so informed Parliament, that all states invited to the Conference will have full opportunity to examine the draft treaties on their merits and to express their views and to put forward suggestions for amendments. In this way we would hope that the final treaties would reflect a real concensus of view of the countries participating. This procedure makes it important that the members of the Council of Foreign Ministers should agree to give full weight in drafting the final text of the treaties to the views expressed by the other states represented in the Conference. If these countries' views were to be ignored, it might make it difficult for the governments concerned to secure the support of their parliaments and peoples for the final peace treaties.

In any event, there does not at this stage appear to be any alternative to the procedure already agreed between the Big Three at Potsdam. Certainly I know you will agree that it would not be possible to lay down in advance a Commonwealth policy which the United Kingdom Foreign Secretary could advance at the meeting of the Council in Paris prior to the general Conference at which the countries of the Commonwealth will be separately represented. You will recall that a somewhat similar procedure was suggested at the time of the first meetings of the Council of Foreign Ministers in London in September last, and that the procedure proposed did not work out very well. I should fear possibilities for further misunderstandings if an attempt is made to revive this procedure now.

(a) ". . . the consultations will afford an opportunity for conversations on other matters of common concern.

(Mr. Attlee's announcement, March 18)

(b) Field Marshal Smuts suggested (April 3, HCL tel.882) certain subjects arising directly out of the war, such as:

war marriages,
nationality of married women.

On the latter point, Mr. Attlee had already stated on March 26, in reply to a question in the House of Commons, that the meetings would not afford suitable opportunity to raise this question, as it would not be a full Imperial Conference.

Later (April 6, Circ. D. 326) Mr. Attlee mentioned it was hoped there would be a Commonwealth meeting in summer or autumn to consider certain nationality questions, and it might be thought preferable to leave technical questions until then.

The New Zealand Government agreed in this sense (April 8, No. 12)

(c) Mr. King telegraphed Mr. Attlee (April 18, No. 148) he had no comments on suggested topics, but had been glad to note concensus of opinion that no formal agenda is required or appropriate. He assumed proceedings would not go beyond an informal exchange of views on main questions of mutual concern.

(d) Nationality of married women:
F.M. Smuts had suggested after his arrival in London a preliminary talk about this subject and citizenship. While leaving the technical details to an experts meeting later on, it was felt that a general discussion of principles at the Ministerial level would be helpful.

(e) The question has accordingly been put down for Tuesday, May 21 at 3:45 p.m.

(f) The final meeting (Friday, May 24 at 11:00 a.m.) is for "any other business".

Note on Proposals for a meeting of Prime Ministers of the British Commonwealth, London, 1946.

Br Commonwealth Relations - Prime Ministers' Conference, 1946

B. 2. Coordination of Commonwealth Defence

(a) reported by High Commissioner, London, as a "principal subject" figuring in press reports following Attlee announcement (Mar.4, Tel.621)

(b) subject had been mentioned in White Paper on Defence (Feb.21, CMD 6743)
One extract from Section viii reads:

"His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom acknowledging to the full the tremendous efforts put forward in the common cause by the whole Commonwealth and Empire, earnestly desire to continue in peace the full partnership established in war. It will be necessary to consider with the governments of His Majesty's Dominions and India the way in which the lessons of the war can be applied to promote consultation and collaboration in defence matters during peace."

(c) The Political Correspondent of the Sunday Times (London) on March 3 wrote that he understood

"particular attention is being given to devising an improvised (sic) system of consultation and co-ordination for defence .... (One method under consideration is) the establishment of an Organization, comparable with the Military Staffs Committee of the United Nations, with appropriate functions in relation to Imperial defence."

(d) Other press reports spoke of a co-ordinated plan for Imperial defence said to have been drawn up by Field Marshal Alanbrooke as a result of his recent tour (through the Mediterranean, India, Australia and New Zealand, but not to Canada, which he last visited in September 1944.

(e) On this question (as on the related question of Commonwealth trade), Mr. Massey suggested that the public, on the basis of press speculation, might be "led into great expectations" of the Prime Ministers' meetings, and said it would be useful to have any guidance the Department might offer in case the subject attracted still more attention.

(f) The Department's reply is in Tel.695 of March 23. It expresses concern over the possibility that the character and importance of the consultations in prospect for London were being over-emphasized in the United Kingdom.

It assumed this might be due to three main causes

i. profound anxiety over Soviet policy
inevitable uncertainty about continued firmness of U.S. policy
both producing desire to play up strength of Commonwealth as a whole and lay stress on capacity of Commonwealth governments to take concerted action

ii. Labour government anxious to give no ground for charges it was not an effective guardian of Imperial interests

iii. waning faith in capacity of United Nations Organization to be an effective guardian of peace and security had given rise to renewed interest in the military power of the Commonwealth.

(g) On question of Commonwealth defence, it was recalled that no general proposals for post-war co-operation had been made since Lord Cranborne's suggestion at end of Prime Minister's meetings in London in June, 1944;

some plans had been put forward for co-operation in particular tasks (cf. defence research);

official language of U.K. Ministers and in documents which Dept. had seen indicated some desire to see created an organization to plan and direct "Imperial Defence" suggested that phrase should be dropped from current vocabulary because of unnecessary misunderstanding and irritation, and because it had little value in relation to strategic realities today;

(h) Summary of other reactions contained in Department's reply:

- quite apart from proven war capacity in event of general war, Canadian responsibility for defence of Canadian territory (together with responsibility for defending collaboration with U.S. the approaches to northern part of this continent) was a very important aspect of the defence of the British Commonwealth;

- Canadian opinion does not think in terms of defending Imperial interests as suhh (i.e. sharing responsibility for defending areas remote from Canada)

- Canada was deeply concerned that security and strength of whole British Commonwealth should be maintained, but could not conceive this as being effectively safeguarded by exclusive commonwealth arrangements;

- The strategical interests of the Commonwealth were so diverse that their protection required the co-ordination of defence between individual Commonwealth countries and foreign states.

Note: Following an enquiry from the Acting High Commissioner in South Africa, a memorandum containing the substance of this reply was, on direction, communicated to Field Marshal Smuts for his personal information.
(April 12, No.46)

(j) Suggested by Mr. Attlee (March 27, Circular D. 285)

- defence questions affecting particularly U.K. Australia and New Zealand, especially U.S. request for bases in Pacific Islands

- defence co-operation in forms suitable for the different circumstances of the various members of the Commonwealth

On this latter question, Mr. Massey reported (March 29, Telegram 846) that although the U.K. Government were under pressure from many sides "to urge on other Commonwealth countries a tightly-knit system of Commonweal th defence", Government spokesmen had "consistently fought shy on giving this conception positive support."

(Attention was called to a debate in the House of Lords on March 28, in which close integration of defence planning for the Commonwealth had been urged. In reply, Lord Addison had said:

. . ."There are regional groups of problems in the consideration of which everyone is willing to co-operate. But it is very different from having a group of high-powered, superior persons at the top, who might be tempted to give orders to those nations. That would not work . . ."

(k) Field Marshal Smuts told Acting High Commissioner for Canada at Capetown (April 10, Telegram 33) he thought U.K. sources might, in interval between his own and Mr. King's arrival in London, try to influence him to modify his attitude so that when Mr. King arrived there would be a lack of uniformity between South African and Canadian ideas on Commonwealth defence.

He asked for a memorandum setting out points mentioned in paragraphs f,g,h, above. This was, on authorization from Ottawa, done.

(l) Attention was called (in Mr. Massey's telegram No. 1026 of April 27, to a TIMES article on "Next Phase of Empire Defence" - reporting a purported plan which included dispersal of military and industrial resources throughout the Commonwealth; and redistribution of manpower for new planning and directive organizations

When Mr. Massey enquired at the Dominions Office as to the credence to be attached to this report, it was stated to be "unfortunate"; there was in fact no question of a prepared plan being put forward as a formal submission to Commonwealth Ministers. It would be open to Mr. King when he arrived to say whether he wished to discuss the particular subjects under reference.

(m) The subject of Commonwealth Defence does NOT figure in the provisional timetable circulated by Mr. Attlee (on May 10) for the meetings from May 20 through May 24.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

DRAFT TRUSTEESHIP AGREEMENTS FOR UNITED KINGDOM MANDATED TERRITORIES IN AFRICA.

JOINT MEMORANDUM BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR DOMINION AFFAIRS AND THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES.

ON the 17th January, 1946, the Foreign Secretary informed the General Assembly of the United Nations of the intention of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom to place Tanganyika, Togoland and Cameroons under the International Trusteeship System. This statement was formally welcomed in a Resolution adopted without dissentient vote on the 9th February. A similar statement was made on behalf of the United Kingdom at the Final Assembly of the League of Nations in April.

2. The General Assembly of the United Nations was also informed that the United Kingdom Government had drawn up draft terms of trusteeship for the three territories in question and had communicated them to certain States regarded as being in any event "States directly concerned." These States were, in respect of Tanganyika, the Union of South Africa and Belgium; and in respect of Togoland and the Cameroons, the Union of South Africa and France. Copies of the draft were also sent to the Governments of China, United States, U.S.S.R. and (in respect of Tanganyika) France, for information only. In a restatement of these intentions to Parliament the Prime Minister added that, as soon as the concurrence of the "States directly concerned" had been obtained, the texts would be communicated to Parliament and to the Legislative Councils concerned. The drafts were communicated to the Governments of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa before being formally submitted to the "States directly concerned."

3. The agreement of the Belgian Government to the draft terms of trusteeship for Tanganyika has already been received. No communication has yet been received from the French Government in respect of the proposed terms of trusteeship for the Cameroons and Togoland under British mandate. The South African Government have not so far expressed their formal agreement or disagreement.

4. Field-Marshal Smuts has, however, expressed certain general doubts, mainly on the following points:—

(a) the strategic aspects of placing Tanganyika under trusteeship;
(b) the danger that, if these territories are placed under trusteeship, the Soviet Union, by its membership of the Trusteeship Council, will acquire an opportunity to interfere in African affairs;
(c) the general form of the draft trusteeship agreements; the South African Government would have preferred to see the agreements in a form nearer to that of the "C" mandates, particularly in relation to the two questions of non-discrimination and, in the case of Tanganyika, of closer union with other British East African territories;

(d) timing; the South African Government would prefer to postpone further action until Soviet and United States policies have become clearer.

5. The views of the United Kingdom Government on the above points are briefly as follows:—

(a) our Chiefs of Staff consider that the draft terms of trusteeship are satisfactory from the strategic point of view;

(b) the possibility of foreign interference is inherent in the trusteeship system (as in the mandates system); but if foreign Governments are disposed to make difficulties in regard to African territories, they will be able in any event to do so in one form or another;

(c) it would not be practicable to expect international approval for terms of trusteeship for these three territories based on the "C" mandates for other territories; nevertheless, our draft terms represent an important advance on the former "B" mandates, particularly in respect of defence and economic development, and do not, in our view, present any obstacle to closer union between Tanganyika and other British East African territories;

(d) we are anxious to proceed with the conclusion of the agreements in order to dispel uncertainty both in East Africa and internationally, and we do not consider that a policy of delay would operate to our advantage.

6. In general, the United Kingdom Government consider themselves committed by the declarations made to the United Nations, to the League of Nations, and also to Parliament, to proceed with placing these three territories under trusteeship. It is in any case important to publish the draft terms of trusteeship as soon as possible for the information of Parliament and the Legislative Councils concerned. As stated above, such publication has already been promised, and it is difficult to justify further delay when it is public knowledge that the terms have already been communicated to the South African Government and a number of foreign Governments. The South African Government have indicated that they would see no objection to immediate publication provided that their approval or disapproval of the terms was not thereby implied.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

ECONOMIC AND WELFARE CO-OPERATION IN SOUTH SEAS AND SOUTH-EAST ASIA AREAS.

MEMORANDUM BY THE PRIME MINISTER OF AUSTRALIA.

1. South Seas Regional Commission.
2. South-East Asia Commission.
3. School of Colonial Studies.
4. Short-wave Broadcasts.

1. Proposed South Seas Regional Commission.

The emphasis which has been placed on welfare and increasing living standards during discussions at the Prime Ministers Conference is wholly in accord with the views of the Australian Government which were expressed by the Minister for External Affairs in April 1943 :—

> "Peace and stability in the Pacific in the post-war period can be achieved only by building a way of life in the Pacific in which the varied nations and peoples can live together in peace and prosperity. We can succeed in building such a way of life only if we prepare plans which take into account the legitimate aspirations of the peoples and if we provide a basis for economic development which will provide improving standards for all the peoples of the Pacific."
> "The Atlantic Charter promises to the peoples of the Pacific, as well as to the peoples of the more developed parts of the world, freedom from want. The United Nations have a duty to see that this promise is implemented. If freedom from want means anything, it means decent standards of living for all peoples and the end of any possibility of unfair exploitation of weak peoples by those who are stronger and economically more fully developed."

In the Australian-New Zealand Agreement signed in Canberra in 1944, the two Governments agreed—

> "To promote the establishment, at the earliest possible date, of a regional organisation with advisory powers, which could be called the South Seas Regional Commission and on which, in addition to representatives of Australia and New Zealand, there might be accredited representatives of the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States of America, and of the French Committee of National Liberation."

The Agreement stated the functions of such South Seas Regional Commission to be to secure a common policy on social, economic and political developments in the area, and in particular the commission would—

"(a) recommend arrangements for the participation of natives in administration in increasing measure, with a view to promoting the ultimate attainment of self-government in the form most suited to the circumstances of the native peoples concerned;
(b) recommend arrangements for material development, including production, finance, communications and marketing;
(c) recommend arrangements for co-ordination of health and medical services and education;

(d) recommend arrangements for maintenance and improvement of standards of native welfare in regard to labour conditions and participation of natives in administration and social services;
(e) recommend arrangements for collaboration in economic, social, medical and anthropological research; and
(f) make and publish periodical reviews of progress towards the development of self-governing institutions in the islands of the Pacific and in the improvement of standards of living, conditions of work, education, health and general welfare.''

Later in 1944 at Wellington the two Governments set out the general form of the proposed Commission :—

'' (a) The general form of the Organisation of the South Seas Regional Commission should be as follows :—

(i) The Commission proper which should consist of representatives of the Governments and Administrations in the Region;
(ii) A Secretariat;
(iii) Research and functional bodies established by the member Governments on the advice of the Commission.

(b) Provision should be made for associating with the work of the Commission existing research and functional bodies.
(c) There should be held regularly a South Seas Conference for the discussion of Pacific Islands problems. This Conference might comprise nominees of Governments represented on the Commission (these nominees to represent administrations, scientific bodies, missionary bodies, and native peoples), together with nominees of international organisations concerned with welfare problems (e.g., the I.L.O. and the Food and Agriculture Organisation).
(d) The native peoples shall, wherever practicable, be enabled to take part in the work of the Commission and its agencies.''

It has not been possible so far to establish an organisation for the promotion of welfare and the advancement of native peoples in the Pacific area. Provided the United Kingdom Government is willing to participate, the Australian and New Zealand Governments would undertake to establish the South Seas Regional Commission immediately.

2. Proposed South-East Asia Commission.

Consideration was also given to the establishment of a South-East Asia Commission which would include representatives from Australia and New Zealand and also the United Kingdom, United States, the Dutch and other Governments interested. It was suggested that such a Commission should give at least some attention to air communications, the allocation and disposal of vital raw materials, besides the more strictly welfare aspects such as health, nutrition and social and political developments.

3. School of Colonial Studies.

The Australian Government has already decided to set up in Canberra a School of Pacific Studies. This school will be primarily concerned with research into all aspects of life in the Pacific area, and it is hoped that in due course it shall develop into a valuable centre for study for nationals of all countries interested in the Pacific area.

There is also already in existence a school of Colonial Studies which was set up during the war for the specific purpose of training officers for the administration of territories won back from the enemy. The school is now a civilian school for the training of the administrative officers required in Australia and Australian Mandated territories. The school has performed and will perform a valuable service, and can immediately be adjusted to cater for the needs of the United Kingdom, New Zealand, or other Governments interested in the training of administrators for Colonial or Mandated areas.

It is suggested that one positive means of international co-operation in the Pacific and South-East Asia areas would be to regard the School of Pacific Studies and the School of Colonial Affairs as being appropriate research and teaching organisations for British Commonwealth and other countries concerned with the administration of areas in South-East Asia and the Pacific.

4. Short-wave Broadcasts.

During the war the Australian Government decided to set up a short-wave station which would be the primary instrument of political warfare in the South-East Asia and Pacific areas. Short-wave broadcasts are continuing in many languages, and as the facilities are already there the other Commonwealth Governments may wish to avail themselves of them.

War-time experience has shown that the broadcasts in foreign languages require specialised knowledge of the peoples and countries concerned. There would be great advantage in a close liaison with the South-East Asia Commission and the Pacific Regional Commission, as well as the School of Pacific Studies. It is suggested, therefore, that any short-wave work should also be centred in Canberra.

REVISION OF ANGLO-EGYPTIAN TREATY

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that he had been greatly concerned to hear that His Majesty's Government were proposing, at the outset of the negotiations for the revision of the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty, to offer to withdraw all British troops from Egypt. For years past Egypt had been considered a vital link in the British chain of communications through the Mediterranean and the Suez Canal. The British Commonwealth, unlike the other two great Powers of to-day, depended for its power and influence on its communications; and the position which we had held for years in Egypt, at the very centre of those communications, should not be cast away without anxious consideration.

MR. BEVIN said that His Majesty's Government had originally intended to propose that all British troops should be withdrawn from Cairo and Alexandria and that combatant troops should be withdrawn from other parts of Egypt, leaving only the administrative troops required for the maintenance of a base in the Canal Zone. They had, however, been advised that, in view of the very strong political feeling on this point in Egypt, the Egyptian Delegation would be obliged to reject such a proposal. The truth was that we had retained our troops for too long in Cairo and Alexandria, and had provoked strong nationalist feelings which would not now be satisfied with anything short of an offer of complete evacuation. The British Delegation had, however, advised that, if an offer of complete withdrawal were made at the outset of the negotiations, this would create an atmosphere in which it would be much easier to conclude satisfactory arrangements under which British troops could rapidly take up positions in Egypt on a threat or outbreak of war. It was in these circumstances that His Majesty's Government had authorised the British Delegation to offer complete withdrawal by specified dates, viz., the evacuation of Cairo and Alexandria by 1948 and complete withdrawal by 1951.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that, while he agreed that British troops should be withdrawn from Cairo and Alexandria, he thought it important that the British Commonwealth should maintain a military base elsewhere in Egypt. Such a base, if it was to be effective, must be established and maintained in peace; it could not be improvised on the outbreak of war. It should not be forgotten that the British Commonwealth had won the last war in the Mediterranean - in campaigns based on their prepared positions in Egypt.

During his stay in Cairo in the last few days he had discussed this matter with the King of Egypt. He had told him that South Africa had faced a similar problem in the past. They had wished to terminate the regime under which United Kingdom troops and installations were scattered throughout South Africa; and they had done so by offering Simonstown as a military and naval base for use by United Kingdom troops in peace and in war. By that means South Africa had secured her objective of the withdrawal of United Kingdom troops from all other parts of her territory; and at the same time the essential needs of the United Kingdom had been met.

Field Marshal Smuts said that this seemed to have made a deep impression on the King, and he had subsequently spoken in similar terms to Sidki Pasha. The latter had raised the objection that, as the British already had bases at Malta, Haifa and Cyprus, they had no need of further bases in Egypt. To this the Field Marshal had replied that Egypt was a nodal point in the British line of communications through the Mediterranean and that in his view a British base in Egypt was essential to the defence of the British Commonwealth.

MR. BEVIN said that His Majesty's Government were as anxious as Field Marshal Smuts that the British Commonwealth should retain appropriate military facilities in Egypt. They had been advised that, so long as they indicated their readiness to agree to the complete withdrawal of British troops from Egypt, the Egyptian Government would probably be willing to agree to arrangements which would enable us to maintain installations on their territory in such a condition that British troops could be rapidly re-introduced on a threat of war. They had, however, been advised that it would be inexpedient to seek to secure concessions on bases as a condition of evacuation. If we had sought to force through our original proposals, disorder would have broken out in Egypt and we should probably have had to maintain our position there by force. The resulting situation would have been brought before the Security Council, on the basis that we were retaining British troops in foreign territory against the will of the local Government. If, however, we approached the matter by first offering complete evacuation, as a concession to political feeling in Egypt, there were good prospects that we should be able subsequently to arrive at satisfactory agreements in respect of our essential military needs. In any event, we were not offering to complete the withdrawal of British troops from Egypt until 1951.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that he was gravely concerned at the risks which were being run. Even though the concession of a base were not made a condition of withdrawal, he would greatly prefer that the two agreements should be made simultaneously; and he still hoped that it might be possible to secure at an early stage satisfactory assurances about the retention of the military facilities required by the British Commonwealth in the Canal Zone.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS

1. MR. ATTLEE welcomed Field Marshal Smuts, who had arrived in London that morning. He was very glad that the Field Marshal had found it possible to come to this country to take part in these consultations.

COUNCIL OF FOREIGN MINISTERS

2. MR. BEVIN gave the meeting an account of the proceedings at the meeting of Foreign Ministers which was being held in Paris.

The attitude of the Soviet Delegation had so far been more conciliatory and helpful than it had been at the first meeting in London in September. Thus, they had accepted at the outset the French proposal that all Delegations should take part in the discussion of all the Peace Treaties - the point of procedure on which the London Conference had broken down - and they had also agreed to the preamble of the draft Italian Treaty, without pressing their earlier objection to the inclusion of a reference to the assistance which Italy had given to the Allied cause after her surrender in 1943. They had also agreed to the appointment of a body of experts to report on the extent to which Italy would be capable of making reparations deliveries. Committees of experts has also been appointed to work out detailed proposals for the distribution of the Italian Fleet, and to consider the economic implications of the French proposals for rectifications of the Franco-Italian Frontier.

The question whether the problems of Austria and Germany should be considered at this meeting of the Council had been discussed and adjourned. The Agenda for the meetings on 29th April and subsequent days had not yet been settled; but it was likely that the Soviet Delegation would press for a very early discussion on the disposal of the Italian Colonies.

DISPOSAL OF ITALIAN COLONIES

3. The Meeting then discussed the attitude to be taken at the Council of Foreign Ministers regarding the disposal of the Italian Colonies. They had before them a memorandum by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (P.M.M.(46) 15) setting out the salient features of the question.

MR. BEVIN recalled that before the meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in London in September last, the United Kingdom Government had taken the view that the best arrangement would be on the following lines:-

(a) Tripolitania to be placed under international trusteeship with Italy as Administering Authority;

(b) Cyrenaica to be placed under international trusteeship with the United Kingdom as Administering Authority;

(c) Italian Somaliland together with British Somaliland, the Ogaden and the Reserved Areas, to be placed under international trusteeship with the United Kingdom as Administering Authority;

(d) Eritrea to be given to Ethiopia, except for the North-Western Lowlands which would be joined to the Sudan.

These proposals had not been submitted to the Council because the situation was radically altered by the presentation to them of the United States plan for collective trusteeship and the Soviet demand for Tripolitania.

The United Kingdom Government thought that the best means of combatting the embarrassing Russian demand was to give conditional support to the United States' suggestion. There was also this argument in favour of supporting the United States proposal that it was much to our interest to engage American responsibility in this field.

The Council of Foreign Ministers had referred the matter to their Deputies for further consideration and report. During their discussions, the United Kingdom representative had suggested that the Peace Treaty with Italy should do no more than provide for renunciation by her of her rights in her Colonies, the disposal of them being left over for later settlement by the United Nations. There were admittedly disadvantages in delay - these were set out fully in the memorandum before the meeting - but on the other hand this course would have the advantage of removing one main difficulty in the way of the negotiations for the peace treaties and it would perhaps be easier a little later on to see the shape of things to come.

Mr. Bevin said that he had asked Mr. Byrnes his present attitude on the question. It appeared that he still remained firmly opposed to the Russian request but equally firmly in favour of collective trusteeship. Mr. Bevin said that the subject would be one of the most important which the Council of Foreign Ministers had to discuss in Paris and much depended on a satisfactory solution of it. It was urgent to settle the terms of the peace treaty with Italy so that some progress might be made with her rehabilitation. The terms of the armistice, even if some relaxation of them were allowed, were too rigid to permit of this. He would welcome the views of Dominion Ministers as to the line he should take. He was himself inclined to the view that he should continue to press that the treaty should only provide for the renunciation of Italian rights, the disposal of the Colonies being left over for later settlement.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that, while the Italian Colonies in themselves were not of great importance, they were situated in positions from which a hostile nation could strangle the lines of communication between the British group of nations. He was afraid that determination of their future in the atmosphere of today might result in a solution which was not in the best interests of the British Commonwealth. The Commonwealth was going to find it very difficult to maintain in the difficult conditions of the moment the position it had won for itself in the war. Unlike the other great Powers, it was not a compact geographical block, and this made it vitally dependent on the communications between its various parts. If its communications were affected, what remained of its strength? Their security was essential to it. He regarded security in the Mediterranean as important above all other considerations to the future of the Commonwealth.

Great changes were coming over the face of the world. For instance, in Western Europe forces were shaping which might disrupt the whole set-up to which we had been used. Russia was advancing with gigantic strides. She had great power and exercised it ruthlessly. Unless determined efforts were made to protect the Western countries, they would all fall under Russian influence. Field Marshal Smuts thought it most important to define the boundary beyond which we would at all costs stop the infiltration of Russian influence.

For this reason he regarded the rehabilitation of Italy as most important. It had been a tragedy that the Commonwealth had been at war with Italy. It had no quarrel with the Italian people but only with the dictator who had led them to ruin. We must do everything in our power to help Italy to regain her self-respect and to consolidate her position.

For this reason Field Marshal Smuts said that his own instinct had been to agree with the French proposal that the Italian Colonies should be returned to Italy. This would do much to restore her self-respect and morale and encourage her to look towards the Western European nations for support. If, however, that course was not practicable, then he thought delaying tactics were the best. Possibly in Libya the setting up of an independent state might be the ultimate solution. At the moment, however, let us play for time.

In his opinion, the Russian proposal that she should be given trusteeship over any of the Italian Colonies should be resisted at all costs, particularly in the Mediterranean, where if she obtained a footing the whole of our communications would be endangered. We could not at any price allow the Russians to acquire power in an area which was of vital significance to the future of the Commonwealth.

He was also opposed to the United States proposal for collective trusteeship under the United Nations Organisation. He had the impression that this had not been carefully thought out. The disunity at the Conferences of the four Great Powers was a sufficiently obvious pointer to the difficulties which would result from such a solution. Moreover, the administration of the Italian Colonies would call for the expenditure of large sums of money. He did not think that the members of the United Nations Organisation would be willing to provide it. He did not consider that the United States' proposal would work in practice. And it would open for the Russians the door into the Mediterranean.

MR. CHIFLEY and DR. EVATT agreed that on no account should trusteeship over Tripolitania be granted to the Soviet Government. Not only would there be strategic objections to this course but Russia had no grounds of principle or justice for her claim. Nor did return of any of the colonies to Italy seem to them a good solution, for, as the inhabitants harboured a violent antagonism against Italy, it would invite future trouble. If any country was to be the individual trustee, they thought it should be a British country. The decisive actions in Africa had been won by the forces of the British Commonwealth. Individual trusteeship would certainly be more satisfactory than joint or collective trusteeship. Experience of joint administration was not such as to recommend trusteeship by two, three or four Governments; and it was very uncertain whether an efficient administration could be built up on the basis of the United States' proposals for collective trusteeship by the United Nations Organisation. The administration would be bound to be top-heavy. It should be noted that the United States Government had not suggested collective trusteeship for the Japanese islands in the Pacific in which they had a special interest themselves.

The Australian Government were not in favour of delaying a decision. If the Council of Foreign Ministers did not reach a decision on the subject, the proper authority for doing so would be not the United Nations Organisation but the twenty-one former belligerents who would be represented at the forthcoming

Peace Conference. France, for instance, had less right to an effective voice than certain other countries who would be represented at the Peace Conference. And there was no reason why members of the United Nations, which had taken no part in the war and had perhaps not even been well disposed to the Allies, should have any voice in the decision.

MR. CHIFLEY said that, in his view, one of the fundamentals of the present world situation was the necessity for us of British-American co-operation. It might be important to build up the strength of other countries - of Italy and France for instance - and to seek their support, but it was of infinitely greater importance to cement our friendship with the United States and to secure their active interest in every part of the world which was also of interest to us. United Nations trusteeship of the Italian Colonies as proposed by them would at least have the advantage that it would ensure that the United States maintained some degree of interest in these countries.

MR. BEVIN said that he entirely agreed as to the necessity of British-American friendship.

MR. NASH said he was completely opposed to acceptance of the Russian request. It might well, he thought, really have been made primarily for bargaining purposes to strengthen the demand for a base in the Dodecanese. British honour was pledged that Cyrenaica should not return to Italian rule. Indeed it would be difficult to reconcile the return to Italy of any of her former Colonies with pledges to have regard to the interests of the inhabitants. He favoured an arrangement for trusteeship by an individual power. No one of the various powers was, he thought, more entitled to such a trusteeship in Libya than the British Commonwealth - or one of its component parts - who had been largely responsible for its conquest. If the British Commonwealth could not obtain the trusteeship of Libya, it might be given to the United States. Failing this, he would agree to collective trusteeship, though he doubted very much whether it would really prove workable.

MR. ATTLEE suggested that the only safe principle to observe was to consider the wishes of the inhabitants. On this basis he did not think that the Russians could establish much of a claim in the Dodecanese. In Libya there seemed little doubt that there would be much support for some degree of independence under the Senussi Sheikh Idris.

Mr. Attlee called attention to the fact that all the Italian Colonies were "deficit areas"; they could not pay their way. The administration of them, even on a care and maintenance basis, was costing the United Kingdom a considerable sum and any Power which became responsible for their administration would have to be ready to spend money on it.

MR. NASH said that, if any one of the British Commonwealth Powers obtained the trusteeship of the Italian Colonies, it would be largely to secure the strategic communications of the Empire and he suggested that it would be reasonable that other parts of the Empire should share the cost.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS thought that the strategic benefit of administration of these areas would be worth considerable expenditure of money.

MR. HALL said that he had been impressed by the unanimity of view in favour of individual trusteeship and of the United Kingdom being the trustee. It seemed, however, unlikely that it would be possible to get agreement to any one of the Great Powers being given individual trusteeship of any of the Italian Colonies. If the United Kingdom were to become individual trustee for Libya, Russia would probably stake a claim for trusteeship over Somaliland or Eritrea. Failing individual trusteeship, there seemed to him only two possible solutions: collective trusteeship or independence.

After further discussion, MR. ATTLEE said that it seemed to him that there was a fair measure of agreement on the subject among those present. It was agreed that Mr. Bevin should be guided in his negotiations by the views expressed. If the negotiations made progress while Dominion Ministers were still in this country, it should be possible for him to consult them further before final decisions were reached.

REVISION OF ANGLO-EGYPTIAN TREATY

4. An exchange of views took place on the attitude to be adopted by the British Delegation which was to negotiate in Cairo the revision of the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty.

The discussion is recorded in a Confidential Record.

TRUSTEESHIP

Draft Agreements for United Kingdom Mandated Territories in Africa

The Meeting had before it a memorandum (P.M.M.(46) 12) outlining the background of the United Kingdom Government's proposals for placing Tanganyika, British Togoland and the Cameroons under trusteeship.

MR. CREECH JONES said that the United Kingdom Government had thought it right to take the lead in this matter. The United Kingdom had always supported very strongly the principle of the mandate system; the principle of trusteeship was one which had long been advocated by the Labour Party and indeed by liberal opinion generally in the United Kingdom. Obviously there could be no question of obtaining international agreement for any policy towards the mandated territories less liberal than that represented by the mandates; and there was a distinct advantage in taking the initiative in supporting the new system. A declaration of the Government's decision to place the three territories under trusteeship was accordingly made to the United Nations General Assembly; and a further statement of intention had been made and endorsed at the Final Session of the League of Nations Assembly.

As regards the proposed terms of trusteeship, they were based on those of the 'B' class mandates. But the draft Agreements marked an important advance in two respects. First, the limitations imposed by the mandates in regard to defence had been abandoned and adequate authority taken for defence measures. Secondly, the provision that there should be economic equality for all was now subject to the overriding principle that this must not conflict with the well-being of the inhabitants. In the case of Tanganyika, care had been taken so to draft the proposed terms of trusteeship to ensure that it would not preclude closer association with neighbouring territories. The question whether any of the territories should be designated strategic areas under the Security Council had been considered, but the decision had been against this course. The Chiefs of Staff had reported that the draft terms were generally acceptable from the aspect of security.

Mr. Creech Jones said that the draft Agreements for the Cameroons and Togoland had been sent to the French and South African Governments and that for Tanganyika to the Belgian and South African Governments for their concurrence as being in each case "States directly concerned". The Belgian Government had intimated their concurrence. The reply of the French Government was still awaited. It was desired that Parliament and the Legislative Council of the territories concerned should have the fullest opportunity to consider the terms and the United Kingdom Government were anxious to proceed with publication. He understood that the South African Government had felt some diffidence in regard to the terms, but he expressed the hope that they would now feel able to signify their concurrence.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that he did not wish to make any further representations to the United Kingdom Government in regard to the three draft Trusteeship Agreements. He had already drawn attention to the points on which he desired the United Kingdom Government to be fully satisfied. The South African Government had no objection to the United Kingdom Government's proceeding with publication of the draft Agreements.

He assumed that the arrangements of Dominion Governments in respect of their mandated territories would not be prejudiced by the action of the United Kingdom Government. South West Africa was in a special position and the South African Government contemplated a settlement on different lines for this territory. After the 1914-18 war South Africa had refrained from annexing South West Africa, in deference to President Wilson's wishes, but the 'C' mandate terms had given her very extensive rights there. A new situation had been presented with the close of the mandate system, but he did not wish on this occasion to go into the question of the course desired by the South African Government.

Field Marshal Smuts expressed concern lest under the new trusteeship system the administering Governments should not have power to limit or control immigration. There had been adequate powers under the 'C' mandates, but not under the 'B' mandates, with the result that Tanganyika had had at the outbreak of the war in 1939 more German than British inhabitants. He would not regard as satisfactory a situation in which that could happen again. In the case of South West Africa, if South Africa could not obtain agreement on reasonable conditions to the course which she now proposed, she would continue to administer the country under the terms of the existing mandates. The United Nations Charter seemed to provide that this might be done, though as the League of Nations had now been wound up there could, of course, be no Permanent Mandates Commission to whom she would be able to report. The French might follow the same course. It was not indeed impossible that the United Kingdom would be the only mandatory power to place territories under trusteeship, apart from Belgium who in respect of Ruanda-Urundi could hardly do other than follow the United Kingdom's lead.

Field Marshal Smuts considered that the opportunity for mischief-making would be much greater under the trusteeship system than under the mandate system. The Permanent Mandates Commission had been composed of experts, appointed not as representatives of their countries, but as individuals. Most of them had in fact been nationals of small States with no direct interest in the mandated areas. The Trusteeship Council, on the other hand, would be composed of the representatives of States, including the Great Powers, and they would be bound to be swayed in their decisions by political factors. Experience of recent months did not inspire confidence in the prospect of their working in harmony without regard to their own interests. South Africa would, therefore, proceed with caution. The members of the British Commonwealth which held mandates had, he thought, done their best, in a purely humanitarian spirit, for the inhabitants of the mandated territories; in South West Africa conditions had certainly become incomparably superior to those of the previous German rule. But he feared that now power politics would be introduced under decent pretences into a system which was meant to be humanitarian in nature.

DR. EVATT said that he agreed entirely with the action taken by the United Kingdom. If the draft Trusteeship Agreements which she had circulated were approved he thought that they would be a considerable improvement on the existing 'B' mandates, in their provisions regarding defence, equality of opportunity and the possibility of association with neighbouring territories.

The mandated territories in the Pacific were under 'C' mandates. These, like the 'B' mandates, contained provisions for the benefit of the native population and for the prevention of the use of the territories for defence purposes. Under the trusteeship system, the obligations to promote the advancement of the people would remain as before, but there would be much more satisfactory provisions regarding defence. Australia and New Zealand had observed the obligation to undertake no defensive measures in their mandated territories, but the Japanese had not done so. It would be necessary for Australia that she should in future be able to establish defence arrangements in New Guinea. Under the new system she would be entitled to do so; and, indeed, there would be a positive obligation under Article 84 of the Charter to "ensure that the trust territory shall play its part in the maintenance of international peace and security".

Dr. Evatt did not share Field Marshal Smuts's fears that the provisions of the Charter would permit undesirable immigration. The drafting of Article 76 of the Charter had been the subject of much discussion at San Francisco. In its final form the provision about equal treatment for the nationals of all members of the United Nations was subject to the obligation to promote the advancement of the people of the country. It would clearly not promote the advancement of the people of New Guinea to permit the immigration of Orientals to that country. Therefore, he thought Australia could exclude Orientals from New Guinea just as they excluded them from Australia.

Nor was he afraid of undue interference by other nations. The nations on the Trusteeship Council would have no executive powers whatever and he did not see why their activities should be more troublesome than those of the Permanent Mandates Commission.

The definition of the term "States directly concerned" was undoubtedly difficult. He would have been inclined to interpret it as meaning the Principal Allied and Associated Powers during the Great War. The United Kingdom had in practice submitted her draft Agreements to neighbouring countries.

Dr. Evatt said that he thought the objectives of the system were good; the Australian Government had played their part in establishing it and should give a lead in placing the mandated territories for which they were responsible under it.

MR. NASH said that he thought the new system was a great advance on the old system. The only territory which New Zealand held under mandate was Western Samoa. They proposed that it should be placed under trusteeship and they were now preparing a draft agreement which they proposed to submit to Australia, the United Kingdom, the United States and France, as the States directly concerned.

He agreed with Dr. Evatt that on the defence aspect the new arrangements were very much better than the old since they would permit the trusteeship power to defend the territory itself and to use it for defence of the region of which it formed part. He also agreed with Dr. Evatt's view that the provisions of the Charter would not permit undesirable immigration. It would certainly not be in the interests of Western Samoa if Chinese or Indians were allowed to enter that territory in any number.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS said that he hoped that Dr. Evatt and Mr. Nash were right in this view. He could not himself help wondering whether it would be possible to keep these territories permanently barred against immigration from China and Japan. There was, of course, no question of immigration from Japan at the moment, but eventually Japan would emerge from her present subjection. China was a Great Power and would herself be on the Trusteeship Council.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

THE PROBLEM OF THE DISPOSAL OF THE POLISH ARMED FORCES.

MEMORANDUM BY THE PARLIAMENTARY UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

1. The Polish Armed Forces under British Command number over 200,000 men, of whom over half are in Italy and the rest in the United Kingdom, Germany and the Mediterranean, and in the Royal Air Force and the Polish Navy. There are, in addition, some 21,000 Polish civilians in this country, of whom less than half have a claim to be regarded as residents, and there are also 37,000 civilian refugees in East Africa, South Africa, India, New Zealand, Palestine and the Lebanon, over 27,000 of whom are parents or children of members of the Armed Forces.* The total number to be dealt with is therefore of the order of 250,000, not counting dependants acquired by the men since leaving Poland, e.g., Italian wives of the Polish 2nd Corps.

2. In a statement relating to the Crimea Conference which was made by Mr. Churchill on the 27th February, 1945, he said :—

> "His Majesty's Government are resolved that as many as possible of the Polish troops shall be enabled to return in due course to Poland, of their own free will and under every safeguard, to play their part in the future life of their country. In any event, His Majesty's Government will never forget the debt they owe to the Polish troops who have served them so valiantly, and for all those who have fought under our command I earnestly hope it may be possible to offer them citizenship and freedom of the British Empire if they so desire. I am not able to make a declaration on that subject to-day because all matters affecting citizenship require to be discussed between this country and the Dominions, and that takes time."

3. The present policy of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom on this question was defined in a statement issued on the 20th March, after consultation with the Polish Provisional Government, to all members of the Polish Armed Forces under British Command, setting out the issues before them and urging them to decide now to return to Poland on the strength of assurances received from the Polish Provisional Government. In that statement His Majesty's Government took the line that no guarantee of settlement in British territory, or of British naturalisation for all members of the Polish Armed Forces under British command could be given, but that His Majesty's Government would be ready, in collaboration with other Governments, to give what assistance they could, when the time came, to enable those who had fought with us throughout the war and had finally decided not to return to Poland to begin, with their dependants, a new life outside their own country.

* It is estimated that the approximate numbers in the different parts of the Commonwealth are Canada 500; Australia 250; New Zealand 800; Union of South Africa 500; Southern Rhodesia 1,500; India 5,000; East Africa 18,000 and Palestine 5,000.

4. From the reports so far received it appears that the distribution of these statements was carried out by General Anders and the other commanders without comment and propaganda, and that on the whole the Polish commanders appear to have refrained from attempts to influence the men one way or the other in making their decisions. Privately, however, General Anders has expressed the opinion that the terms would discourage rather than encourage repatriation on the ground that they preclude the vast majority of his troops from returning to Poland with any degree of personal safety.

5. It is too early as yet for the United Kingdom Government to be able to estimate with any degree of accuracy the number of men who will elect to return to Poland, but it is already evident that the great majority will refuse to go. On this assumption provision must be made for their early removal from Italy, except for such number as it may be possible to receive into civil life there—a matter on which the United Kingdom Government are making approaches to the Italian Government. The total number of Polish troops for whom resettlement arrangements must be made, including those already in the United Kingdom, may be of the order of 170,000–200,000, and it is clear that provision for their accommodation, even temporarily, would represent a serious burden on the resources of this country which the United Kingdom Government ought not to be expected to bear alone. It would represent an increase of the total existing alien population by some 60–70 per cent.; and if dependants are to be added as well the increase may be as much as 150 per cent. or even more.

6. There is a number of possible outlets for these men, including :—

(a) Absorption into the British Armed Forces and into industry, mining, agriculture, public works and other jobs in this country.

(b) Absorption into the countries of Western Europe, with the possible exception of Scandinavia, as well as into the United States and Latin American countries.

(c) Absorption into other parts of the British Commonwealth and Empire.

7. The United Kingdom Government are actively pursuing the question of utilising the services of these men in industry in this country and taking a proportion of them into the Armed Forces. It is hoped that it will be possible to absorb a substantial number in relief of the existing man-power deficit, but it is evident that it will not be possible to deal with more than a relatively small proportion of the whole in this way.

8. As regards foreign countries, preliminary enquiries have been set on foot. The French and Belgian Governments have so far undertaken to receive only members of the Polish Armed Forces who were resident in France and Belgium before the war. It appears unlikely that the Belgian Government will be prepared to take any more, but there is some possibility that the French Government may be persuaded to accept further numbers after the conclusion of negotiations about the importation of Polish labour which are now going on with the Polish Provisional Government. Replies are awaited from the Scandinavian countries, but the prospects of absorbing any significant numbers in those countries are not thought to be very favourable.

The United States Government have undertaken to look into the question, but the possibility that they will be able to offer much assistance is narrowed by the special efforts which they are already making to facilitate within the framework of the quota the immigration to the United States of displaced persons, the majority of them orphaned children. It is, however, of some interest that, according to a New York Times report of the 19th April, Lt.-General John C. H. Lee, Commander of the American Forces in the Mediterranean, has proposed that a haven be found in the United States "for at least a large portion of the 107,000 Polish soldiers of General Anders' Army." According to the same report, the United States War Department has confirmed that Lt.-General Lee's recommendation has been received and referred to the State Department for further study.

Some of the Latin American countries, in particular Chile, Brazil, the Dominican Republic, Bolivia and Guatemala, have shown favourable preliminary reactions to enquiries as to their attitude, and if their replies are taken at their face value these countries may ultimately absorb a number of the order of 20,000–30,000.

9. Even putting the most favourable construction on the replies so far received, it is clear that we cannot rely on a contribution from foreign countries that will do much more than touch the fringe of the problem, and the United Kingdom Government are of opinion that even to achieve this it will be necessary to give a lead to foreign Governments. This would have the further advantage that we should be in a position to take the best of the Poles and those with the most valuable technical qualifications, and not allow foreign countries to skim the cream of possible settlers.

10. The possibility of finding a home for some in the Colonies is being considered. But present indications are that the numbers they can absorb will not be large.

11. It is clear that, when all these possibilities have been exhausted, there will still remain the problem of disposing of a very considerable number of Poles.

ANNEX I.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT IN ATOMIC ENERGY IN THE UNITED KINGDOM.

THE following is an outline of the plans being made for the development of atomic energy in the United Kingdom :—

2. During the war the first essential was the production of bombs for use against the enemy at the earliest possible moment, and it was decided that this implied the concentration of the main effort in the United States. Some research was carried on in this country. A certain number of our atomic physicists were working on Radar and were, therefore, not available. Of the remainder, however, the great majority were sent to the United States to take part in the project and to Canada where an experimental pile was being built.

General Organisation.

3. The Government now feel that it is essential to develop our work on this subject on a much larger scale in the United Kingdom. The wider aspects of policy are dealt with by a Ministerial Committee under the Chairmanship of the Prime Minister. To advise him, an Advisory Committee on Atomic Energy was set up under the Chairmanship of Sir John Anderson, consisting of officials of the Departments concerned, together with a number of representative men of science. In view of the scale and nature of the work involved, and the need for close touch with the engineering industry, departmental responsibility for it has been entrusted to the Ministry of Supply. The work is divided into two main sections, (i) research and development and (ii) production. To act as head of the organisation for production and other aspects of atomic energy, apart from the direction of research, the Government has appointed Marshal of the Royal Air Force Viscount Portal of Hungerford. Research and development will be carried on at an experimental station which is being established for the purpose at Harwell, near Didcot, the Director of which will be Professor J. D. Cockcroft. It may be found desirable that certain later stages of development work up to large pilot plant scale should also be carried on elsewhere. Some further details of the work to be carried out under these two heads are given below.

Experimental Establishment.

4. The experimental establishment is intended to cover all aspects of atomic energy and will therefore be concerned in large part with the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes, though provision will also have to be made (either at the establishment or elsewhere) for work on military applications. In addition to the determination of necessary physical, chemical and metallurgical data, the activities of the establishment will include the construction on a pilot scale of plants for the production of useful energy from nuclear fission. The equipment of the establishment will include a small air-cooled graphite pile dissipating about 6,000 kilowatts. In addition, a small number of units of the plant used for the electro-magnetic process in the separation of U235 will be installed, both for the separation of isotopes and in order to develop our knowledge of the process.

5. A permanent airfield at Harwell, near Didcot, has been made available for the site of the establishment, and buildings are now being converted. The capital cost of the establishment is estimated at approximately £2½ millions, of which about one quarter will be needed for the construction of the small experimental pile. The running cost when the full staff has been assembled is expected to amount to about £500,000 a year, exclusive of work connected with military applications of atomic energy.

6. It is estimated that approximately 200 graduate scientists will be required and the total staff, including laboratory assistants, work people and draughtsmen, administrative and clerical officers, &c., will amount to some 800–1,000. It is hoped that these needs may be met to some extent by arranging for scientists to be seconded to the project on a part-time or temporary basis from the Universities.

7. It is proposed that, subject to the needs of military security, the work of the establishment shall be carried on under conditions which, as regards freedom of discussion and publication of results, shall approximate as closely as possible to those of a University.

Large-Scale Production.

8. The Government have also been considering plans for producing on a large scale in the United Kingdom the fissile materials which may be used as a source of atomic energy :—

(a) for research and development;
(b) for eventual large-scale industrial application;
(c) for military applications.

The conclusions reached by the United Nations Commission on Atomic Energy will of course affect the eventual use to be made of these materials.

9. The general position is that two main processes have been developed for the use of uranium as a source of atomic energy, in the first of which the rare isotope U235 is separated from ordinary uranium, while in the second plutonium (element 94) is produced in a pile. After a review of the properties of these materials is has been decided to concentrate for the present on the production of plutonium, though the Government are keeping an open mind on the need for building a plant later for the separation of U235 should technical development make that course desirable.

10. The Government are therefore proposing to construct in the United Kingdom one or possibly later two graphite piles to supply material for these purposes. It will necessarily be some time before we can hope to produce the quantity needed for research and development in this country.

Nuclear Physics.

11. The Government are well aware that schemes for the utilisation of atomic energy can only flourish in the midst of thriving research in nuclear physics. The plans for this are not complete pending the return of many of our workers from North America. But the provision of apparatus for accelerating charge particles to high energies and for the study of the nuclear reactions initiated by these particles is well advanced. At two centres cyclotrons are already built and at others plans are in different stages of completion for the installation of high energy apparatus of various types, including apparatus designed to reach energies not hitherto attained artificially.

Legislation.

12. The Government have been preparing a draft Bill for the control of all atomic energy activities in the United Kingdom, and it is understood that certain Dominion Governments are contemplating similar legislation. Copies of the draft United Kingdom Bill will be forwarded to Dominion Governments as soon as its terms have been settled and the United Kingdom Government would be grateful if copies of any Bills which Dominion Governments may have it in mind to introduce could similarly be sent to them for their information. The subject is a new and difficult one, and points may arise on which an exchange of ideas would be helpful.

ANNEX II.

INTERNATIONAL CONTROL OF ATOMIC ENERGY.

THE United Nations Commission will shortly begin its deliberations. These will focus the discussions which have been proceeding in many countries on the international control of atomic energy. Canada and Australia are both members of the Commission.

2. The Terms of Reference of the Commission are set out in four paragraphs of the Assembly Resolution of the 6th January, 1946 (Appendix "A"). The first deals with the exchange of basic scientific information for peaceful ends, and the remaining three with the control of atomic energy and the safeguards necessary to ensure that it should be effective. The Resolution also declares that the work of the Commission should proceed by separate stages, the successful completion of each of which will develop the necessary confidence of the world before the next stage is undertaken.

3. All methods of international co-operation in the field of energy fall into two classes : those which do not and those which do involve some modification of existing conceptions of national sovereignty. Measures in the former class are, of course, much easier of achievement, and may be very valuable in the preliminary stage of building up confidence between nations; but they could at best go only part of the way towards the final objective of guaranteeing the world against the development of atomic energy for other than peaceful ends. Measures in this first class include the interchange between countries of scientific information and of scientific workers and the pooling of information about raw materials. Simple agreements to outlaw the use of atomic weapons would also fall within this category.

Exchange of Information.

4. In the Washington Declaration by the President of the United States, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the Prime Minister of Canada, the three Governments stated that "the basic scientific information essential to the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes has already been made available to the world" and declared their "readiness to proceed with the exchange of fundamental scientific information and the interchange of scientists and scientific literature for peaceful ends with any nation that will fully reciprocate."

5. Action to implement this declaration rests, in the first place, with the three Governments who at present control the information on atomic energy accumulated during the war. They must, in their domestic measures of control, allow scientists full freedom to exchange ideas and information with their scientific colleagues at home and abroad, provided that this exchange does not go beyond the limits of basic scientific information.

6. It is not at all easy to define exactly where basic scientific information ends and information about the operation of large-scale plants begins. Basic scientific information is not satisfactorily illustrated by the Smyth Report published by the United States Government, since basic research involves a large amount of precise numerical data which has not yet been made available by the United States Government.

7. So long as exchanges are confined to printed papers, difficulty may well be found in assuring the parties to the exchange of information that a proper degree of reciprocity is being displayed. A better test may, therefore, well be found in the interchange of scientists working in this field.

8. At the present time it is not thought that the Soviet Government have much to contribute to an exchange of information, since their programme for the development of atomic energy may well be in its early stages. It would not seem unreasonable, however, to ask in return for the release of scientific information to them that they should disclose on what scale their work is organised and where their principal scientists in this field are working and on what aspects.

9. Exchanges of scientific information could be followed up by exchanges of information about geological deposits of uranium and thorium. The furnishing of such information might enable a comprehensive account to be drawn up of the world resources of these materials, and this in turn might lead to the evolution of a workable scheme for the control of atomic energy. In a matter of such vital importance, however, reliance could not be placed upon a survey which depended solely upon uncorroborated statements furnished by individual Governments. In order to carry confidence, the survey would have to be organised on an international basis; this would mean inspection of mining areas and checking of returns by foreign geologists employed by and acting under the direction of some appropriate international agency.

Outlawing the Atomic Bomb.

10. One method of dealing with the atomic bomb which would not involve any modification of national sovereignty would be for all nations to sign an undertaking renouncing the use of this weapon. The trust which would be placed in such a Declaration by itself is, of course, limited. Since, however, such an undertaking would still permit the manufacture of bombs for defensive purposes (as in the case of chemical and biological weapons, the use of which is declared illegal under the Geneva protocol), it would not deprive us of the means of retaliation against a nation violating the agreement. To renounce the production of such weapons is a more serious step which could not be taken without effective safeguards.

Measures of Control.

11. The Assembly therefore suggested that the Commission should discuss "effective safeguards by way of inspection and other means to protect complying States against the hazards of violations and evasions." "Other means" may be taken as referring either to some system of sanctions or to the internationalisation of atomic energy. The implication of a system of sanctions is that military force will be at the disposal of the United Nations to restrain aggression. Such a proposal is not a problem specifically concerned with atomic energy and would not be suitable, therefore, for discussion by the Commission.

12. Before considering the internationalisation of atomic energy the issues raised by inspection must be considered. The purpose of inspection is to ensure that one or more of the processes vital to the production of atomic bombs cannot be carried on in secret. There are two distinct issues to be settled :—

(a) Whether inspection is politically practicable.
(b) Whether it is technically feasible.

13. As regards political practicability, it is, of course, the case that any system of inspection implies some limitation of national sovereignty. Inspection of mineral areas and of the production of raw materials would not in itself provide a 100 per cent. safeguard; inspection of plants developing or using atomic energy would also be required. This means in effect that inspectors would have to be given free access to any part of a country and the right to visit any factory within the country. All nations would find unpalatable the limitations on industrial and military secrecy which would be involved. Special difficulties would be likely to arise in the case of a country of the size of Russia; in addition, national policies and prejudices in the U.S.S.R. make it unlikely that members of an international inspectorate would be allowed the freedom necessary to enable them to produce the complete reports on which full security would depend.

14. If it were found that the inspectorate was meeting with obstruction or evasion in a particular country, we should constantly have to ask ourselves whether a point had been reached at which the Government of that country must finally be accused of a breach of the agreement. This would be a grave step to take and a decision might inevitably be delayed for some time. In the interval those Governments which had observed the agreement by giving up the production of atomic weapons would have placed themselves at a disadvantage. When the step was taken it would inevitably lead to accusations and counter-accusations and to a grave deterioration in international relations.

(2) Inspection of Plants.

Inspection of Raw Material Production.

16. This would involve—

(a) Inspection of production at known mines.
(b) Inspection of by-products.
(c) Detection of new discoveries.

There is little doubt that such inspection could be carried out, given unrestricted access to all mines and right of occasional aerial reconnaissance. The only minerals which have to be searched for are uranium and thorium. There is already a great deal of valuable information about the probable location of these minerals, even outside those areas which have been surveyed by the United Kingdom or United States geologists. Nevertheless. the task involved would certainly be formidable.

Inspection of Plants.

17. However successful the control of raw material might be, it would be difficult to keep an exact check on the movement of small quantities of material. This method must therefore be supplemented by inspection of plants for the production of fissile material. Inspection of plants cannot be effective without full knowledge of their method of operation. If therefore the exploitation of atomic energy for peaceful purposes is to be coupled with a system of inspection, this will involve a general disclosure of all knowledge relating to the industrial use of the process. Unfortunately this knowledge represents a large part of the knowledge required to make a bomb. In each case it is necessary first to produce a certain quantity of fissile material (plutonium or U235). The only processes which are peculiar to the bomb are—

(i) An additional refining process involving additional plant to produce fissile material of the requisite high standard of purity.
(ii) Construction of the mechanism necessary to initiate the detonation of the bomb.

Some of these processes require special scientific skill of a very high order, but they demand only a small proportion of the total resources necessary for the production of an atomic bomb.

15. Opinion is divided on the question whether inspection would be feasible. On the one hand it may be argued that some control may be exercised through a knowledge of the whereabouts of the principal scientists in this field, who are few in number; that atomic plants are very large; that they need quantities of electricity and cooling water and that radioactivity can quickly be detected by the use of a "counter." On the other hand, the Board of Consultants under Mr. David Lilienthal which recently reported to Mr. Secretary Byrnes's Committee on the International Control of Atomic Energy, felt that international inspection of nationally owned atomic plants would be a hopeless task. They based this conclusion on two considerations :—

(a) The large number of inspectors required and the difficulty of recruiting adequately trained scientists for a mere policy duty.
(b) The impossibility of ensuring that the inspectors were sufficiently up-to-date in their knowledge of a rapidly growing science to detect evasions.

Internationalisation of Atomic Energy.

19. The Lilienthal Board of Consultants, therefore, recommended a scheme which demands in effect the internationalisation of almost all the processes involved, not only in the production of bombs but in the production of fissile material, and, therefore, of the primary industrial processes needed for the production of atomic energy. They held that the problem of international control was insoluble, so long as "dangerous" activities were carried on by individual nations. They therefore proposed that all mining of uranium and thorium and all subsequent stages in the production of fissile materials should be placed in the hands of an international "Atomic Development Authority." This authority would make the fissile material and would sell it to individual Governments for industrial use only after it had been "denatured" in such a way as to make its use in a weapon impracticable. (Scientific opinion in this country is at present doubtful whether a process can be devised which would achieve this object with certainty.) The only other atomic activities which would be carried on by individual nations would be those which are considered "safe," i.e., cannot provide a cloak for bomb manufacture. These are apparently limited to fundamental research and medical treatment.

20. The political difficulties involved in this proposal are, of course, even greater than those involved in the inspection of nationally owned plants. It is not, for instance, clear how the international authority is to reach conclusions on matters involving so much national rivalry as the location of plants for the production of fissile material. And this scheme, like any other, would break down in time of war, since the international plants would be seized by individual nations. The setting up of an Atomic Development Authority would have, of course, to be accompanied by a system of inspection but such a system would be easier to carry out than it would be if " dangerous " activities were permitted to national Governments. Mining of uranium or thorium and any production of fissile material, except by the international authority, would, in itself, be illicit. This, it is argued, would be comparatively easy to detect. To determine whether or not mining and production, not in itself illicit, was directed to an illicit purpose (i.e., the production of weapons) would be far harder. The fact, moreover, that the international authority would have certain positive functions in the development of atomic energy would, it is thought, ensure that it possessed the technical knowledge and the qualified staff to enable it to carry out the more limited type of inspection proposed under this scheme.

The need for establishing confidence through procedure by stages.

21. Any scheme for the international control of atomic energy (whether through the inspection of nationally owned plants or the setting up of an international development authority) will involve as its first consequences the disclosure of technical information relating to processes common to the industrial and the military uses of atomic energy. Since, moreover, its object would be to secure the elimination of atomic weapons from national armaments, it would presumably require as well agreement by the United States at least to stop producing atomic weapons. Other Powers may demand, in addition, that her present stock should be destroyed or dispersed.

22. In both these ways, therefore, it would be necessary for the United States to make a considerable sacrifice of their security in the near future which they ought not to accept unless they obtain an effective guarantee of lasting security through a system of international control. Once they have sacrificed in this manner part of the lead which they now hold in production and technical knowledge, there will be no going back. It is essential, therefore, that before such a system is adopted, they and we should be satisfied that it is politically as well as technically practicable. It is for this reason that so much emphasis was laid during the Washington discussions upon the need to build up confidence through procedure by stages. Under this procedure, action at each stage would not be taken until a satisfactory understanding had been put into operation on the previous stages and the willingness of other nations to co-operate had been demonstrated.

APPENDIX " A."

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE UNITED NATIONS ON THE 6TH JANUARY, 1946, ESTABLISHING A COMMISSION TO DEAL WITH THE PROBLEMS RAISED BY THE DISCOVERY OF ATOMIC ENERGY.

Resolved by the General Assembly of the United Nations to establish a Commission with the composition and competence set out hereunder, to deal with the problems raised by the discovery of atomic energy and other related matters :—

1. Establishment of the Commission.

A Commission is hereby established by the General Assembly with the terms of reference set out under Section 5 below.

2. Relations of the Commission with the Organs of the United Nations.

(a) The Commission shall submit its reports and recommendations to the Security Council and such reports and recommendations shall be made public unless the Security Council, in the interest of peace and security, otherwise directs. In the appropriate cases the Security Council should transmit these Reports to the General Assembly and the members of the United Nations, as well as to the Economic and Social Council and other organs within the framework of the United Nations.

(b) In view of the Security Council's primary responsibility under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security, the Security Council shall issue directions to the Commission in matters affecting security. On these matters the Commission shall be accountable for its work to the Security Council.

3. Composition of the Commission.

The Commission shall be composed of one representative from each of those States represented on the Security Council and Canada when that State is not a member of the Security Council. Each representative on the Commission may have such assistance as he may desire.

4. Rules of Procedure.

The Commission shall have whatever staff it may deem necessary, and shall make recommendations for its rules of procedure to the Security Council, which shall approve them as a procedural matter.

5. Terms of Reference of the Commission.

The Commission shall proceed with the utmost despatch and enquire into all phases of the problem, and make such recommendations from time to time with respect to them as it finds possible. In particular, the Commission shall make specific proposals :—

(a) For extending between all nations the exchange of basic scientific information for peaceful ends;

(b) For control of atomic energy to the extent necessary to ensure its use only for peaceful purposes;

(c) For the elimination from national armaments of atomic weapons and of all other major weapons adaptable to mass destruction;

(d) For effective safeguards by way of inspection and other means to protect complying States against the hazards of violations and evasions.

The work of the Commission should proceed by separate stages, the successful completion of each of which will develop the necessary confidence of the world before the next stage is undertaken.

The Commission shall not infringe upon the responsibilities of any organ of the United Nations, but should present recommendations for the consideration of those organs in the performance of their tasks under the terms of the United Nations Charter.

P.M.M. (46) 11th Meeting.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

CONFIDENTIAL ANNEX, MINUTE 1.

(3rd May, 1946—11 a.m.)

Atomic Energy.

THE Meeting had before them a note by the Secretaries (P.M.M. (46) 19) to which was annexed—

(i) a note on United Kingdom arrangements for research and development work on atomic energy;
(ii) a note on the proposals for the international control of atomic energy.

MR. ATTLEE said that, in view of the delicate negotiations which were at present in progress between the United Kingdom Government and the Governments of the United States and Canada on the subject of atomic energy, it was important that there should be no public disclosure that this matter had been discussed in the course of the present consultations.

On the question of research and development, the Dominion Ministers were aware that our work had been based upon the close partnership with the Canadian and United States Governments which had grown up during the war. Much of the information which we possessed derived in part from American and Canadian sources and we were, therefore, bound to act in agreement with them in the use which we made of it. We had not yet negotiated a revision of our war-time agreement with the Americans and they were naturally anxious, on the one hand, that proceedings before the United Nations Commission on Atomic Energy should not be prejudiced by any fresh bilateral understanding, and on the other that knowledge of American origin should not be spread to a wider circle in advance of concessions which they might have to make as a result of recommendations of the Commission. We were still hoping to reach an understanding with them providing for the full exchange of scientific and technical information between us; but the position was delicate and there were at present limitations on our freedom of action. Subject to these limitations, we were most anxious that there should be the fullest possible co-operation between the Governments of the Commonwealth. Such co-operation might be concerned with any of the following :—

(a) Fundamental scientific research.
(b) Production of raw materials.
(c) Large-scale plants for the production of fissile material.

The position with regard to the international control of atomic energy was set out in Annex II to P.M.M. (46) 19. The United Nations Commission had not yet begun its deliberations, and its first task would be to consider what effective safeguards could be devised, by way of inspection and other means, to protect complying States against the hazards of violations and evasions. Mr. Attlee said that, in general, he was inclined to be sceptical about the possibility of control through an international inspectorate, and felt that in practice it would probably be necessary to build up any system of international control by stages.

Mr. Attlee then invited Lord Portal to make a statement on the United Kingdom atomic energy project.

LORD PORTAL made a full statement explaining the lines on which it was proposed that the Harwell Research Establishment should be developed and the progress already made with the setting up of the establishment. Research and development work on a considerable scale was expected to start there early next year and the existing plans for the whole establishment should have been substantially implemented by July 1947. He emphasised that the services of any scientists from the Dominions who were considered by Dominion Governments to be suitable for the work and could be spared for a time would be warmly welcomed at Harwell. He hoped that Dominion Ministers would accept in principle the temporary posting of suitable men for a period of service at Harwell after which they would return to their own country, and that in view of the difficulty of direct recruitment at such a great distance, each Government would accept responsibility for selecting and paying their own scientists during the period of attachment. If this form of co-operation were approved in principle, the details could be discussed at the official level.

Lord Portal explained that the supply of raw materials had a powerful bearing on policy and that investigations carried out in recent months tended to show that previous estimates had been optimistic. We had a fairly clear picture of where substantial supplies of uranium were likely to be found and there had been informal discussions with representatives of the Dominions on the question of carrying out raw material surveys within the Commonwealth.

With regard to the preparations for large-scale production in the United Kingdom, the headquarters of the production organisation had been set up at Risley in Lancashire and the necessary staff was being recruited. Design work was in hand for the plant required for the production of uranium metal which would be carried out at Springfields, near Preston, and the fundamental research work into the processes used in the purification of uranium ores and the manufacture of uranium metal had been carried out. On the basis of this, negotiations for the purchase of the various raw materials which were required for the processes had in some cases been completed and in other cases were actively in hand. It was hoped that production operations would start at the Springfields factory in September 1947 and that the first uranium metal would be produced at about the end of that year. Preliminary consideration had also been given to the question of selecting a site for the pile and the plutonium separation plant, though it would be necessary to operate the uranium metal fabrication plant for a year before sufficient stocks of metal to start the pile were available. A great deal of other fundamental organisation work was going on at Risley and steps such as the standardisation of engineering stores, the development of systems for purchasing, progressing and programming, and estimating are well advanced.

MR. CHIFLEY said that there was some reason to believe that there might be in Australia substantial deposits of thorium which could supplement the available supplies of uranium. It was hoped to carry out a more careful survey with a view to determining what quantities of materials were available and meantime the Australian Government had already taken powers to protect the available supplies of thorium from exploitation. He asked whether there was not a danger that too much of the limited supplies of fissile material available would be devoted to warlike developments, with the result that possible industrial development would be handicapped. On the question of international control, it had to be borne in mind that any scheme of control could be vitiated by failure to co-operate on the part of any one of the States concerned.

DR. EVATT pointed out that the Lilienthal Report on the International Control of Atomic Energy seemed likely to form the basis of the proposals which would be put before the United Nations Commission by the United States Government. These proposals might not be acceptable to other nations since the implicit assumption in them was that the United States would not share any information with regard to use of atomic energy for warlike purposes with other nations until such time as these other nations could in any event have obtained the information for themselves. With regard to the proposal that an International Atomic Energy Development Authority should be set up to conduct all intrinsically dangerous operations in the nuclear field, the success of this would seem to depend on the effectiveness of the proposals for denaturing fissile material, as to which scientific opinion appeared to be sceptical.

FIELD-MARSHAL SMUTS said that, although the original estimates made by the Americans of the uranium deposits in South Africa had been too optimistic, he believed that in fact the amount available in South Africa would be found to be higher than had been suggested in the later reports made by British investigators. He was anxious that the world's supplies of material, which, so far as could be seen, were limited, should be used to the best advantage. He was most sceptical about the success of any scheme of international control, since all the proposals which he had so far seen appeared to be incompatible with the existing conception of national sovereignty. He felt, therefore, that the British Commonwealth should not place too much reliance on the outcome of the proposals for international control and that in the meantime every effort should be made to promote research and development and to find sources of raw materials within the Commonwealth. He hoped that it would not be found that the United States were monopolising all the available Canadian supplies.

MR. NASH said that a recent expedition to a remote part of the west coast of New Zealand had given some reason to hope that some supplies of raw material would be found in New Zealand. The New Zealand Government favoured international control and felt that the right line of advance was that suggested by the Washington Declaration, namely, the consolidation and extension of the authority of the United Nations Organisation and the creation of conditions of mutual trust in which all people would be free to devote themselves to works of peace. Unless an advance could be made on these lines he did not believe that mere fear of the results of the use of atomic weapons would deter an aggressor. At the same time he agreed that in the meantime the members of the Commonwealth should safeguard their position by developing the resources available to them.

MR. NOEL-BAKER said that he had been in the United States when the Lilienthal Report had been published. The conclusions in the report had not yet been accepted by the United States Government, but it was not unlikely that they would be put forward by the United States Government to the United Nations Commission, and it might be that the concept of an International Atomic Energy Development Authority would promote that spirit of international goodwill and co-operation which was the essential basis of any scheme of international control.

MR. ATTLEE said that the general feeling of the meeting seemed to be that the members of the British Commonwealth should lend their support to the establishment of a scheme for international control under the ægis of the United Nations Organisation. At the same time, however, it had to be recognised that the successful working out of such a scheme was problematical, and it was essential that we should go ahead in the meantime with research and development and with the exploitation of raw material resources within the British Commonwealth. For this purpose it was desirable that all the raw material possibilities in the Commonwealth should be fully surveyed, and he hoped also that Dominion Governments would be willing to help forward the United Kingdom programme of research and development by lending scientists to serve for agreed periods with the team at Harwell. He thought there was general agreement that we should do all we could to co-operate together in these matters.

MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS.

POLICY TOWARDS GERMANY.

MEMORANDUM BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

THE attached paper sets out some of the problems facing us in Germany, with particular reference to the question whether we should continue to work towards a unified (though federalised) Germany or whether, in view of the Russian attitude and the danger of Communist domination of Western Germany, we should regard this as dangerous and work towards a Western German State or States which would be more amenable to our influence. Our present policy in our own Zone is compatible with an eventual German federation with regional units having wide autonomous powers co-ordinated in certain restricted matters by a federal body at the centre. I shall be grateful for an expression of the views of my colleagues on the questions raised in this paper. My own feelings at present are that the general dangers of splitting Germany now are greater than those of continuing our present policy and that we can hope to avoid many of the dangers of centralisation by insisting on political development along federal lines.

It is very likely that I shall have to deal at the present Conference in Paris with some of these general German questions. The French Government are very keen on the idea of federalisation, while the United States Government have hitherto strongly advocated the immediate introduction of certain central administrations. I would propose that when it became necessary to discuss these questions here I should take roughly the following line :—

> " The objective to be aimed at by all four Occupying Powers in guiding constitutional and administration developments in Germany should be a decentralised federal structure based on regional units with considerable autonomous powers. When it is agreed between the Four Powers that the time has come to set up a central German Government, they will consult together again as to the means of doing this, but the central government will in no circumstances be given such powers as would restrict the autonomous status already given to the regional units. Meanwhile, there will be no objection of principle to the establishment of such German central administrations as may be found absolutely essential for the purpose of treating Germany as an economic whole. The central administrations should be restricted to co-ordinating the activities of the regional units. They should act through the local German governments and their activities in each Zone would be subject to the control of the respective Zone commanders. If the Four Powers agreed on principles of this nature the detailed application of them would be referred for study to the Allied Control Commission in Berlin."

It seems that a proposal on these lines might go some way towards reconciling the French and American points of view and would not altogether exclude the possibility of splitting Germany into two parts if, owing to Russian non-co-operation, this latter became inevitable.

Policy towards Germany.

1. I circulate as an Annex to this paper a survey of the present situation in Germany. Its salient features are the following: –

(a) Conditions in Germany.

Though a beginning has been made with reconstruction, nevertheless practically every German town is still in ruins; communications are far from fully restored; industrial production in the western zones is at about 15 per cent. of pre-war; there is a grievous shortage of food and coal: the population is swollen, by forced immigration from the east. Political parties and trade unions are emerging, after an initial period of political apathy. The Communists have captured the east. Though they are active and well organised in the west, they are, as yet, only a minority.

(b) Potsdam Agreement.

The Potsdam Agreement set out drastic principles for the destruction of German militarism and National Socialism. It removed from Germany an area in the east amounting to about a fifth of the pre-war territory. It provided for payment of reparation by the removal of Germany's industrial equipment to a point which would leave her standard of living not higher than the average European standard. The plan subsequently agreed for this purpose will reduce the general level of industry to about half that of 1938, and reduce the heavy industries to about a third. Potsdam postulated political decentralisation and economic unity. Germany was to be treated as an economic whole and central German administrations were to be established to deal with economic matters, but for the time being no central German government would be established. When accepting the level of industry plan subsequently drawn up by the Control Commission, the British representative made the reservation that it would need to be reconsidered if the assumptions on which it was based were not fulfilled. One of these assumptions was that Germany would be treated as an economic whole.

(c) Allied administration.

The central German economic administrations have not yet been set up, nor is Germany being treated as an economic whole. Four-Power government at the centre is beginning to creak and the burden of government to flow to the zones which are tending to become quasi-independent.

(d) Russian attitude.

Three main elements may be seen in Soviet policy:—

(i) to prevent at all costs the revival of a strong and independent Germany;
(ii) to prevent western Germany with the Ruhr, or even the Ruhr alone, being brought into any close grouping of the western democracies;
(iii) to ensure that Germany eventually looks east and remains under strong, and if possible exclusive, Russian influence.

The Russians have not yet come down in favour either of a unitary Germany or a zonal Germany. They are, at present, hedging and making the best of both worlds. They have established themselves securely in their own zone, are making a strong bid to capture Berlin for the Communists, and are preparing to launch out on a more forward policy in the west.

(e) The British zone.

The economic difficulties fall most hardly on the British zone which is mostly an industrial area and never self-supporting in food. The industries are broken and food imports hard to come by. The cost this year to the British Exchequer will amount to at least £80 millions net. We are creating German authorities to take over responsibility for the administration and endeavouring to build up democracy from the bottom. It is proposed to hold borough elections this autumn and plans have been laid for the holding of other elections up to the province level in the course of the next year. These developments would be compatible with the eventual introduction of a federal system for the whole of Germany. Whatever the speed of these constitutional developments may be, however, both our troops of occupation and our Military Government personnel will be greatly reduced by the end of this year.

2. Up till recent months we have thought of the German problem solely in terms of Germany itself, our purpose having been to devise the best means of preventing the revival of a strong aggressive Germany. At times the emphasis has been on re-education, though usually on controls and measures of security. This purpose can clearly not be discarded. It is one which we have in common with the Russians. But it can no longer be regarded as our sole purpose, or, indeed, perhaps as our primary one. For the danger of Russia has become certainly as great as, and possibly even greater than, that of a revived Germany. The worst situation of all would be a revived Germany in league with or dominated by Russia. This, of course, greatly complicates an already complicated problem. It involves avoiding measures which would permanently alienate the Germans and drive them into the arms of Russia. It involves again showing sufficient purpose not to let it appear that Russia, when it comes to the point, always gets her way in four-Power discussions about Germany. It involves showing ourselves to be no less constructive in our approach to the problems in our zone than the Russians loudly proclaim themselves to be in theirs. And, above all, it involves maintaining a sufficiently high standard of living in western Germany to prevent the Communists from exploiting to their advantage the economic hardships suffered by the population. All this calls not only for the highest qualities of resource and tenacity but also for a readiness to use the necessary man-power and resources to uphold our purpose.

3. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his budget speech, pointed to our expenditure of £80 million this year on civil administration and on food for the Germans in our zone, and described this as in effect paying reparations to Germany. This revelation has caused considerable consternation to the public, and the first question for decision is therefore whether we are to go on using our man-power and resources to uphold our position in Germany or whether we are prepared to see Russia absorbing western Germany as she has already to all practical purposes absorbed the east. It should be borne in mind that Russia can absorb countries without spending money on them, but we cannot. The western way of life demands a minimum of material wellbeing.

4. As an occupying Power we maintain our claim to repayment and have better opportunity to enforce it. At the same time it is obviously essential to consider every possible means of reducing such expenditure to the minimum. We might, for example, invite our western Allies to contribute to the renovation of the Ruhr coal industry on which they so greatly depend. We can insist with the Russians that Germany must in reality be treated as an economic whole, and that the surpluses in the east are used for the benefit of the whole country. Nevertheless, however great our persuasive ability and our efforts to develop the production of our zone, there is no likelihood of its being self-supporting for some time, or of our being able to avoid the major part of the burden of meeting its deficiencies. Not even the modification of the reparation plan would ease the immediate liabilities, since for some years to come there is no possibility of industrial activity rising to the permitted level.

5. It is easy to over-simplify this issue and regard it as one between continuing our occupation and control with all the expense that is involved in that responsibility and withdrawing from Germany and so saving our pockets. But even if we were to evacuate Germany completely, we should hardly be prepared to see the country rotting in starvation. Disease knows no frontier. By withdrawing from Germany we could no doubt save ourselves some expense, but not the whole bill, and we should have little control over the manner in which the money was used or what type of authority in Germany, e.g., Nazi or Communist, had the use of it.

6. On the assumption that we are not prepared to leave the field to Russia, the question arises whether we should be best advised to maintain and develop the present policy of Potsdam or to throw it overboard and organise our own zone as an independent unit according to our own ideas, bringing in the other western zones as we can. The Potsdam Agreement provides for the decentralisation of the German political structure but also for the establishment of central German administrations for certain economic purposes. The Agreement provides that no central German government will be established for the time being, but it must be assumed that the establishment of central economic administrations would logically lead in due course to the establishment of a central Government, though the powers of the latter might be considerably limited by reinforcing the autonomy of regional units in some kind of federal structure. Allied control may continue in some form for many years, but one cannot expect the indefinite prolongation of Allied government. The Control Machinery Agreement on which it is based was only designed for the initial period of occupation. Sooner or later the Germans will have to govern themselves, whether under a central government (albeit of a federal character) or state or zonal governments.

7. So far as our short-term interests are concerned there can be little doubt that they would be best served by the establishment of central administrations without further delay. They are essential to the treatment of Germany as an economic whole, and their absence gives the Russians a ready excuse for maintaining their zone as a closed area. As it is a larger food producing area than western Germany, the barrier makes for better economic conditions in the east than in the west, at any rate so long as food shortages continue. It is of course impossible to feel any assurance that, even if central administrations were set up, the Russians would work the system honestly and would not merely try to use them to infiltrate into western Germany, while taking good care that they were not used by the western Powers to infiltrate into the east. Constant vigilance would have to be exercised to see that there was complete reciprocity between the Russian and the western zones in carrying out the policy of a unitary Germany. But the existence of central administrations would at least fortify our claim, which we cannot at present assert, to penetrate the iron curtain economically, and to draw any surpluses from the east into the hard-stricken western zones. At present the Russians are using their zone not only to feed the Red Army but to send home food-stuffs and manufactured goods as reparation.

8. But one cannot think of the problem solely in terms of its immediate effects, seeing that central administrations would logically develop in due course into a central government. It is therefore of importance to estimate in which direction a central German government would be likely to turn, at the same time bearing in mind that even if western Germany were set up as a separate state, that state might itself succumb to the communist pressure which would certainly be directed against it. No firm answer can be given on the possible complexion of a central German government. The Russians are probably as doubtful about it as are we ourselves. If a central government were set up during the present period of Allied occupation and four-Power control, its composition would presumably depend on the result of nation-wide elections, conducted under four-Power supervision. It may be assumed that the Communists, or the new Socialist Unity Party, would gain the upper hand in the Soviet zone. The same is also probable, though not so certain, in Berlin. According to present indications in the United States zone and in regions of North Rhine and Westphalia of the British zone, the Christian Democratic Union would probably be the largest party. In Hanover Region and Hamburg the Social Democrats would probably be the strongest, with in Hamburg a substantial communist and in Hanover Region a substantial right-wing runner up. In Schleswig-Holstein the right-wing parties would probably prevail. If the German government in Berlin fairly reproduced the outlook of the country it would be neither wholly eastward looking nor wholly westward looking. The question would then turn on whether the western democracies or the Soviet Union would exercise the stronger pull. On the whole the balance of advantage seems to lie with the Russians. It is highly unlikely that the western democracies would be able to exercise any influence in the east, at any rate outside Berlin itself. On the other hand, Communism already has its addicts in western Germany, and the liberal attitude of the occupying authorities in the west would allow them a free hand. Added to this would be the constant pressure of propaganda and of agents from the east. And the prevailing material conditions would give them an excellent ground for their activities. They would find the position favourable both in the short-term and in the long-term. For the next year or so, no matter how great our efforts, one must expect hunger, cold and lack of shelter. Later on the level of industry plan will take effect, causing large-scale unemployment and preventing any rapid reconstruction. In such conditions Communism will have an obvious appeal and, with its emphasis on strong authoritarian government, can be plausibly represented as the only kind of system which can possibly cope with so desperate a situation. Even if the first national elections gave the democratic parties the advantage, one must feel greater doubt about the subsequent ones.

9. A federal system for Germany would minimise these dangers. It would be based on the grant of considerable autonomous powers to the provinces with a co-ordinating body at the centre whose powers would be strictly limited. It would be necessary to examine exactly what division of powers would be most suitable, with a general tendency to restrict the powers of the centre to the barest minimum necessary for its co-ordinating function. The powers reserved for the centre would be mainly those concerned with economics and finance, though there might be no objection to leaving even certain financial powers to the provinces, which might, for instance, be allowed to organise their own social security services. Under a scheme of this kind central administrations, whether set up now under the Allied Control machinery or later under a federal German government, would act through the local German governments and would be prevented so far as possible from organising a network of their own agencies throughout Germany. It may be objected that a federal structure of this kind would not be likely to offer serious resistance to communist influence at the centre, since the latter would be able, with even a small amount of military or para-military force (organised no doubt with Russian assistance) to swallow up the disarmed and divided regional units one by one. This danger exists, but on the whole it seems less serious than to provide the communists with a centralised machine ready to hand, such as Hitler found when he came to power as a result of the centralising tendencies which had operated in Germany since the time of Bismark.

10. In seeking a solution of our dilemma the following considerations should be borne in mind. Though we could argue that the principles laid down at Potsdam were only designed for the initial control period and are therefore now due for reconsideration, nevertheless to throw the Potsdam policy overboard entirely and organise our zone as an independent unit would have very grave consequences :—

(a) We should be unable to retain for long even the façade of four-Power co-operation in Germany and should soon find ourselves forced out of Berlin.

(b) The hopes we still entertain of breaking down the iron curtain would have to be abandoned. The whole of ~~W~~ Eastern Germany and indeed of eastern Europe would be irretrievably lost to Russia.

(c) We should also have to defend our zone (or western Germany) from the infection of political and economic influences from the east. For example, we should have to set up a separate currency and almost certainly a separate nationality.

(d) All this—which would in effect amount to bringing western Germany into a western anti-Soviet bloc—would mean an irreparable break with the Russians, who would go all out to destroy our policy in western Germany and turn the population against us. This task would not be difficult in an industrial area in a period of acute food shortage. They would, no doubt, also redouble their attacks on us in all other parts of the world, and the prospect of U.N.O. continuing in such circumstances would be slender.

(e) The Americans are probably not yet ready for this. Certainly their leading representatives in Germany would oppose it tooth and nail. In any case one could not count on continued American support even if they came to agree to it. But full American support would be essential.

(f) The French might or might not support us, depending on the strength of communism in France. In any case Communist influence would be strong enough to make their support an uncertain factor.

(g) The Belgians and Dutch (as indeed all minor Allies) would be distressed by any reduction of reparation which would be involved in organising western Germany for prosperity, but the prospect of restoring a prosperous trade with Germany might reconcile them to the loss to some extent. They would be less easily reconciled to the " forgive and forget " attitude towards the western Germans which our new policy would necessarily involve. Their love for German Socialists is no greater than their love for other Germans.

(h) We should find ourselves at the mercy of German blackmail—" We must be given this and that, or we shall be overwhelmed by the Communists." We should probably soon have to accept a German army.

(i) The fear and contempt which Germans feel for Russia, coupled with their unforgiving resentment at the loss of the eastern provinces, might keep them content for a time with holding Russia at the Elbe. But, whether we like it or not, the conception of German unity is a basic fact which has survived many centuries and is unlikely to be destroyed by any artificial creation established to-day. Sooner or later the east and the west would join up again.

(j) Meanwhile we should have lost the one factor which might hold us and the Russians together, viz., the existence of a single Germany which it would be to the interest of us both to hold down.

11. The foregoing are powerful arguments against abandoning the Potsdam policy and setting out to organise our own zone or western Germany as a separate unit. On the other hand a "western" policy, if developed with determination and subject to the conditions mentioned in paragraph 12 below, could have certain attractions :—

(a) It would be clear both to the Russians and to the Germans that we were determined to resist the further westward expansion of Russian influence and of communism. In this we could expect the support of the great majority of Germans, whose assistance we should have in resisting the infiltration of agents from the east.

(b) By denouncing the level of industry plan and limiting reparation to more reasonable proportions we should give the western Germans a hope for the future even though it would in itself bring them little immediate material benefit.

(c) If the German population became more contented by seeing our determination to save them from the Russians and restore their economy, the tasks of our authorities would be lightened, as also would those of the German authorities as they take over responsibility for administration.

12. It must, however, be stressed that two conditions are essential to the success of a "western" policy. The first is that we should give an immediate fillip to the population by raising the food ration and maintaining it at a satisfactory level. Even if the level of industry plan was discarded, we must reckon with an interval of two or three years before German industries could be so far rehabilitated as to render western Germany self-supporting. Secondly, we must be assured of full and continued support from the United States.

13. Whatever decision be taken on this fundamental problem, there are certain matters which we should keep to the forefront of our policy. These are :—

(a) to concentrate on constructive measures in our zone, both political and economic, and refuse to be deflected from our course by the Russians or such satellites as the World Federation of Trade Unions;

(b) to accelerate constitutional development in our zone and to develop the local autonomy of the provincial governments, giving them the widest practicable powers and organising them in such a way that they will fit into a federated structure either for the western zones or for Germany as a whole;

(c) to maintain and, if possible, increase the present food ration in the British zone and western Germany as a whole, and to use every pressure to extract food surpluses from the Russian zone for the benefit of the rest of Germany;

(d) to take every possible step to increase coal production and see that a sufficient proportion is devoted to the re-activation of German industry;

(e) to apply the economic principles of Potsdam to the western zones even if the Russians refuse to collaborate, and in any case to foster the solidarity of the western zones;

(f) to act in fullest collaboration with the Americans;

(g) to maintain our position in Berlin.

14. The measures suggested in the preceding paragraph are not a substitute for a permanent policy, but until we see more clearly what is likely to be the future of the Ruhr, the most important single problem affecting our position in Germany, it is difficult to come to a final decision. It must be recognised, however, that the question of central economic administrations, which the United States Government still feel to be one of the most urgent requirements for Allied policy in Germany, raises the fundamental issue whether Germany is to be a single state or split into eastern and western Germany corresponding to the Russian Zone and the three Western Zones respectively. If agreement was reached between the four Powers that we should all gradually work towards a federal system in Germany, into which the proposed new Province of the Ruhr would fit, this might allow the decision to be somewhat postponed, but it cannot be indefinitely avoided. If it was felt that we had to abandon the idea of a unified Germany, even with a federal system, it would be most important to ensure that responsibility for the break was put squarely on the Russians.

ANNEX.

SURVEY OF PRESENT SITUATION IN GERMANY.

I.—Allied Government and Policy.

Declaration of Defeat.

1. Germany surrendered on the 7th May, 1945. On the 5th June a Declaration regarding the Defeat of Germany was signed in Berlin by representatives of the United Kingdom, United States, U.S.S.R. and France, whose Governments thereby assumed supreme authority wtih respect to Germany. The general conditions in which they undertook this responsibility were that practically every large town in Germany was in ruins, the communications had been disrupted and the administration had disappeared. That immediate starvation and epidemics did not set in was due to the existence of considerable food reserves and to the efforts of the Allied military administration.

Control Machinery.

2. Plans had already been worked out for the Allied government of Germany. These provided for the exercise of the supreme authority by the Commanders-in-Chief of the four Powers, each of whom is supreme in his own zone of occupation, while in matters affecting Germany as a whole they constitute jointly a supreme organ of control called the Control Council. The whole of Germany is under military occupation and is for that purpose divided into four zones. Berlin is jointly occupied in four sections and is administered by a four-Power body known as the Komendatura.

Potsdam Agreement.

3. The first public statement of Allied policy was issued after the Crimea Conference in February 1945. This was supplemented by the Potsdam Agreement of August 1945. The Potsdam Agreement set out the purposes of the occupation as (i) complete disarmament and demilitarisation, (ii) to convince the German people of their total defeat and of their own responsibility for their present suffering, (iii) to destroy National Socialism, and (iv) "to prepare for the eventual reconstruction of German political life on a democratic basis and for eventual peaceful co-operation in international life by Germany."

4. Among the political principles to govern the treatment of Germany in the initial control period were the following :—

(a) that so far as practicable there should be uniformity of treatment of the German population throughout Germany;

(b) that the administration in Germany should be directed towards the decentralisation of the political structure and the development of local responsibility. This would include the restoration of local self-government on democratic and elective principles, the permission and encouragement of all democratic parties, and the introduction of the representative and elective principle into regional and provincial administrations. For the time being no central German Government would be established, but certain essential central German administrative departments would be set up in the economic field, acting under the direction of the Control Council.

5. Economic principles were also set out, and agreement was reached on reparation. The main features of these two sections were that the production of war material would be prohibited, the production of war-important industries rigidly controlled and restricted to Germany's peace-time needs, and surplus productive capacity removed as reparation or destroyed; but payment of reparations should leave enough resources to enable the German people to subsist without external assistance at a standard of living not exceeding the average standard of European countries excluding the United Kingdom and the U.S.S.R. The first charge on exports should be for approved imports. The reparation claims of Russia and Poland would be met by removals from the Soviet zone, and those of the other Allies from the western zones; but Russia would also receive 25 per cent. of the equipment removed from the western zones, part of which she would exchange for raw materials of equivalent value. The amount of equipment to be removed from the western zones would be determined within six months, viz., by the 2nd February, 1946. It was also laid down that during the period of occupation Germany would be treated as a single economic unit and that primary emphasis would be given to the development of agriculture and peaceful domestic industries.

6. It was decided at Potsdam to transfer to Polish administration the former German territories east of the Oder–Western Neisse line (except for the area around Königsberg which would be handed over to Russia). It was agreed that the German populations of Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary, would be transferred to Germany in an orderly and humane manner in accordance with a plan to be drawn up by the Control Council. The Control Council agreed on a plan to this effect in November 1945.

II.—General Situation To-Day.

Four-Power co-operation.

7. The end of the war left Germany a vacuum. The question still to be decided is how this vacuum is to be filled, and the answer will be a touchstone of Great Power collaboration. The general conception at the planning stage was that the four Powers should fill the gap by jointly exercising the supreme authority until such time as Germany had been purged of her vices and could safely be permitted to resume her own independent place in the European structure. The first essential to the success of this policy is, of course, that the four Powers should maintain a united front and, so long as matters of high policy have not supervened, harmony has not been lacking. Personal relations are for the most part good, and in certain important matters the interests of the four Powers coincide. There is, for example, no disagreement in principle on the need to disarm Germany. Agreement has been reached on such big issues as denazification, the reform of the judicial system and the future level of German industry. Nevertheless, the spirit of co-operation has tended to weaken as fundamental issues arise involving national interests and ideologies. No Power is at present strong enough to capture Germany as a whole, nor is the organisation for so doing at present in existence. But in its own zone each Power is doing its best to sow its own beliefs which, in so far as the East and West are concerned, are diametrically opposed.

8. This fundamental antagonism between the totalitarian and the liberal creeds, both of which claim to represent the true democracy, has been somewhat overclouded by extraneous disputes. The French, not having been invited to the Potsdam Conference, were critical of its conclusions from the start and, in particular, of the decision to set up German central administrations. They argued that the existence of such administrations, if given authority over the whole of German territory, would inevitably prejudice their aim to detach the Ruhr and the Rhineland from Germany. For this reason they have used their veto on the Control Council to block the establishment of these administrations. Their intransigence has exasperated the Americans whose great purpose it is to get the main Potsdam objectives, such as disarmament and denazification, finished off as quickly as possible and then hand over the administration to the Germans. American exasperation has not been limited to criticism of the French. We, too, have had our fair share of it, owing to our slower and more cautious approach deriving from our long-term interest in the future of Germany. But the Americans in Berlin have usually been careful to keep on the right side of the Russians, with the unfortunate result that there has at times been almost a Russo-American bloc in the Control Commission. This, of course, has suited the Russians very well, and they have exercised much ingenuity in singling us out for criticism and, at the same time, flattering the Americans.

Central and zonal administration.

9. Quadripartite government is itself an unprecedented experiment. In this troubled atmosphere and unaided as it is by any central German administrative authority, it is bound to creak and the burden of government to flow to the zones which tend to become quasi-independent, each administered according to the views of the occupying Power. This tendency is furthest advanced in the Russian zone and, though their unit of administration still remains the "Land," they have gone so far in the process towards zonal administration that they could set up a zonal government without difficulty at any time that suited them. We in our zone work on the province or "Land" but have established zonal advisory bodies and are contemplating the establishment of certain zonal executive bodies. The Americans work direct from their own element of the Control Commission to the three "Land" Governments in their zone and the only co-ordination between the three "Länder" lies in conferences between the "Land" Governments. The French, who are wedded to the idea of decentralisation, have not set up any zonal organisation in their zone but are rather following the American plan of building up the provinces.

10. The Potsdam Agreement postulated political decentralisation and economic unity. Political autonomy in the zones would therefore not be inherently contrary to Potsdam. At the same time the zonal boundaries were not drawn up for that purpose. In some cases, e.g., in Baden and Würtemberg, they cut across the old state boundaries. In any event it is scarcely conceivable that they will be maintained indefinitely after the occupation has come to an end, if only for the reason that they will recall the period of German humiliation. There can be no permanent political future for an independent zone. In the economic sphere the division of the country into zones is of greater immediate consequence. Germany was developed as an economic unit, as was recognised at Potsdam. Each part inevitably suffers if the zonal frontiers are trade barriers; and the British zone, being the least self-supporting in foodstuffs, suffers worst of all. To-day there is a very limited interzonal trade and an interzonal postal, telegraph and telephone system has begun to operate. It has also been agreed that a four-Power commission shall proceed to all four zones to watch over the application of the reparation plan. But the zones are now, in large measure, artificially separated economic units and this, together with the absence of central economic administrations, is greatly impeding efforts at reconstruction. Above all, no sound financial system can be looked for without a financial administration at the centre.

Transfer of populations.

11. The foregoing difficulties arise because part of the Potsdam Agreement has not been carried out. There are no central German administrations and Germany is not being treated as a single economic unit. Other difficulties are due to the precisely opposite reason that the Potsdam Agreement is being carried out. Potsdam laid down that the German populations remaining in Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary should be transferred into Germany, which was itself greatly reduced in area by the loss of the eastern provinces. The exodus had already started on a considerable scale before the war ended. But the completion of the transfer involves, according to the plan subsequently worked out by the Control Council, no less than 6½ million persons. The Control Council agreed that these should be transferred by the end of July 1946. Though this date will certainly not be kept and though the Potsdam Agreement laid down that the transfers should be carried out in an orderly and humane manner, nevertheless the operation cannot fail to constitute one of the major problems which the authorities in Germany will have to face. These people arrive with few belongings and little money and often in a poor state of health. An unduly high proportion of them are women, children and old men. The prospect of their finding either work or homes is meagre and they also create an additional drain on the already inadequate food supplies.

Reparation and level of industry.

12. A further decision taken at Potsdam which will have the gravest effect on Germany's economy is that relating to reparation and the level of German industry. It was already agreed at the Crimea Conference that Germany should make compensation in kind to the greatest extent possible for the damage she had caused. The principles according to which this should be carried out were agreed at Potsdam and have been summarised in paragraph 5 above. The next step was to determine what Germany's level of industry should be and, after long and at times embittered discussion, the Control Council eventually approved a plan on the 30th March, 1946. Under this plan certain industries of particular importance to war purposes are to be eliminated entirely, while others will be restricted to various percentages of the pre-war level. No restriction on the other hand is to be placed on peaceful industries, while the production of coal is to be maximised. It is estimated that the general effect will be to reduce the level of industry as a whole to a figure of about 50–55 per cent. of the 1938 level. But the heavy industries are to be more drastically reduced than others, the productive capacity remaining to them being of the order of a third of pre-war. Steel capacity is reduced to 7·5 million tons a year, and the actual production is not to exceed 5·8 million tons without the specific approval of the Control Council.

13. This plan is far more drastic than His Majesty's Government had wished, but it was found impossible to stand out against the combined determination of the other three Powers. All that proved possible was to enter the reservation that the plan would call for revision in the event of any of the main assumptions on which it was based being altered. Such assumptions were that the western frontiers of Germany would not be changed, that Germany would be treated as a single economic unit, that the population would not exceed 66½ million, and that it would be possible for exports to pay for imports to the extent contemplated in the plan.

14. The Russians had an understandable interest in insisting on a drastic solution. In the first place they are to receive 25 per cent. of the proceeds by way of reparation. Secondly, they are determined to eliminate any risk of the western Powers having a powerful German war potential at their disposal. Thirdly, a low standard of living in the western zones will facilitate the spread of communism into those areas. The attitude of the Americans is less easy to understand. They may perhaps have been influenced by the desire to be rid of a commercial competitor, or by the Morgenthau tradition of pastoralising Germany, but even so slum conditions in the heart of Europe are unlikely to be to their permanent advantage. The French can, of course, not be expected to resist any measure, however shortsighted, that will weaken Germany.

15. It is impossible to make any accurate forecast of the effect that this plan will have upon Germany. At the moment the level of industrial production is still far below the amount permitted by the plan. In the western zones it is running at about 15 per cent. of pre-war. What the plan does is to ensure that Germany's economy will not be allowed to rise above a very low standard for an indefinite period. Large-scale unemployment, increased still further by the influx of refugees, must therefore be expected as a more or less permanent state of affairs. Added to which there will be the psychological effect upon the population of seeing their sources of employment removed or destroyed. It is unfortunate that the British zone is the area which will suffer worst from these effects.

Food crisis.

16. The immediate impact of the level of industry plan will then be chiefly psychological. Food and coal on the other hand are vital problems to-day. The world food crisis is common knowledge. But there are a number of reasons why it falls particularly severely on Germany. Before the war Germany was up to about 90 per cent. self-supporting in foodstuffs, thanks to a highly-developed and protected agriculture and to the large-scale production of artificial fertilisers. The economy was centrally organised so that the surpluses from one area supplied the deficiencies of another. In particular there was a large flow of foodstuffs from the agricultural east to the western industrial districts. Large tracts of these producing areas have now been detached from Germany. The eastern territories were also depopulated and devastated by war. Furthermore the central planning has disappeared. Such surpluses as there may still be in the east—and their present volume or even existence is unknown—are retained by the Russians for their own purposes. Imports on a heavy scale are therefore needed to maintain a bare subsistence for the population of the western zones. When the war ended, these areas were still in possession of considerable stocks, largely drawn from the liberated countries. To-day those stocks have been used up, and this at the very moment when the whole world is faced with an unprecedented food shortage. It is only natural that Germany should come low on the list of claimants. The result has been that we have had to reduce the ration in the British zone to just over 1,000 calories for the ordinary consumer and the Americans have had to come down to 1,275. The ration in the French zone is theoretically at about 1,000 calories, but it is doubtful whether this is being maintained in practice. These levels are not sufficient for health. Yet there is no immediate prospect of raising them. Food has therefore become the major problem of the man in the street in western Germany as well as of the Allied authorities. Upon the solution of this problem depends not only our good name as administrators but any hope we have of re-educating the Germans. Democracy as understood in the west cannot be built on starvation. For the Russians things are easier. In the first place they have the food producing land if they like to use it. Secondly, their way of life has less need of healthy economic conditions as a foundation.

Coal.

17. Equal in importance to food is the question of coal. Indeed, the two problems interlock. When we first entered Germany, coal production had virtually ceased. Thanks to the efforts of our authorities it was gradually built up again until by the beginning of March 1946 the hard coal output was 1·1 million tons per week or about 40 per cent. of the 1938 level. The cut in the food ration, which fell on the specially favoured miners as on everyone else, had an immediate repercussion and production quickly dropped by about 20 per cent. Nor is it likely to rise appreciably unless and until the ration is raised. It may indeed fall still lower. The effect of this cannot be overstated. There is practically no economic activity in Germany which does not depend on coal for its source of power. It affects food production as it affects everything else. Until more coal is forthcoming, economic activity will continue to stagnate, and even the level of industrial production permitted by the Control Council's plan will not be reached. Nor is the coal now produced devoted solely to Germany's domestic needs. On the contrary the present governmental directive is that the maximum possible should go to export and only so much be retained in Germany as is needed to meet the minimum requirements of the occupation. And even this does not satisfy the French who persistently demand that the percentage for export should be raised regardless of the effect of such a measure either on Germany itself or on the mining industry from which the coal is derived. Coal in fact is a crucial problem whether regarded from the point of view of our administration of Germany or from that of our relations with our Allies.

German political developments.

18. German political development is naturally affected by these day-to-day problems of existence. It would in any case have been unreasonable to expect a population which has been denied all political expression and contact with the outside world for so long to make at once much intelligent use of the liberty which foreign armies had bestowed upon it. And of course this liberty was itself circumscribed by the necessities of military government, not to mention such material impediments as the disruption of all communications and the destruction of all the big towns. It is not surprising therefore that all early reports from Germany spoke of the political apathy of the population. Nevertheless, political parties have started to revive. In the east the Communists with strong Russian backing have made the running and are well on the way towards eliminating or absorbing all other parties. The single party system is likely soon to be an accomplished fact in the Russian zone. In the western zones the most important political parties are the Social Democrats and the Christian Democratic Union, neither of which have any inclination to make a united front with the Communists. The latter are an active and well organised minority but have hitherto been unable to make much headway without the support of the Red Army. Their future prospects will depend on the effectiveness of the policy of the Western Allies and on the degree of material well-being which the latter succeed in maintaining. But there is one objective in which all parties are united, and that is the preservation of German unity. Opinions may differ on whether Germany should be a centralised or federal State, but any suggestion that she should be dismembered is anathema to all alike. In the campaign for German unity the Communists have cleverly taken the lead, cynically ignoring the immense truncations which their Russian backers have imposed in the east. The other parties cannot oppose them on this issue, which is perhaps the only one on which all Germans think alike.

Trade Unions.

19. Along with political development trade unions have started to form again. Here, too, there has been considerable apathy in the rank and file, but they have been encouraged by the interest shown by trade union organisations abroad. A T.U.C. delegation has visited the British zone, while a delegation of the World Federation has been to Berlin and toured the whole country. The manner in which trade union development should proceed is not yet settled.

The T.U.C. advised strongly in favour of the British system of a confederation of autonomous unions. For the most part German opinion seems to incline rather towards a single centralised union, and this is likely to be favoured by the World Federation, which seems to be largely an agent of Russian policy. As elsewhere, the Russians hope to capture the trade union movement in Germany and create out of it a powerful weapon for attaining their political ends.

Denazification.

20. After their visit to Germany the World Federation issued a report, and its recommendations were significant. Most of the immediate practical problems of reconstruction were ignored. No reference, for example, was made to the food crisis, unemployment, the need for reconstruction or production, or to the refugee problem. Chief emphasis was laid on denazification, on which the attitude of the officers of military government was strongly criticised. Denazification is, of course, a matter of the first importance. It is impossible to leave the development of Germany to the men who played leading parts under the Nazi régime. The difficulty is to find other people of experience and ability. A further problem is the danger of creating a large body of ruthless discontented persons who will have no outlet for their energies except to sabotage any orderly government that may emerge. Such difficulties are ignored alike by the World Federation and by the Russians, whose purpose seems to be to create the maximum dislocation in the western zones and be left free to organise their own zone in their own way. They have no compunction in using Nazis where it suits them, and, of course, the two have much in common. It is unfortunate that we so often find ourselves on the defensive on the question of denazification, which is used as a stick to beat us with by the Russians who themselves appear to be interested in exploiting denazification as a measure of class warfare.

III.—Situation in the Zones.

A.—British Zone.

Administration and politics.

21. When the British forces first took over in the zone most things had come to a standstill. The immediate job was to knock some sort of shape out of the chaos left behind by the collapse; to get the coal mines working, the railways running, canals and waterways cleared, bridges repaired, food distributed and displaced persons repatriated. It is everywhere agreed that our military authorities made a fine job of it. The zone has been regarded by many as the best run, and the behaviour of the British soldier, his common sense and fairness, made him the most popular of the foreign troops in Germany. How far the food crisis will change this remains to be seen.

22. In the early days direct military government was the only method of administration possible, if only because the local German administration had disappeared. The change is now being made to civilian control. The Army Corps Commanders, who have hitherto been military governors of their districts, will confine their duties to that of garrison commander. Civilian regional commissioners will be appointed to each of the five regions in the zone. Among the subordinate staffs civilians are replacing soldiers. The change serves two purposes. In the first place, it is necessitated by the shortage of service officers resulting from demobilisation. Secondly, it is part of our definite policy of placing responsibility on the Germans for their own administration. British control and supervision will take the place of direct government except in subjects which are necessarily reserved.

23. The German bodies to whom these responsibilities are being transferred are at present councils nominated by the British authorities. Such councils have already been established at almost all district levels and at certain of the higher levels. The intention is to replace them in due course by elected councils. The present provisional time-table for elections is—

District elections, Autumn, 1946;
Regional elections, Spring, 1947;
Zonal elections, Summer or Autumn, 1947.

24. In addition to the provincial and local councils, a start has been made with establishing machinery to cover the whole zone. Early in March a zonal advisory council was set up, composed of civil servants, technicians and representatives of the political parties, trade unions and the co-operative movement. There is also an economic advisory board and a zonal finance department, and in addition a central office for food and agriculture with executive powers. It is too early to say how effective these bodies will prove to be.

25. Our policy is to build democracy from the bottom upwards. Political parties were at first approved only on a local basis, but now they are permitted to organise on a zonal basis. Though there was at first widespread political apathy, a number of parties are now showing activity. The three main parties, the Social Democratic Party (S.D.P.), the Communist Party (K.P.D.) and the Christian Democratic Union (C.D.U.) conform to the prevalent continental pattern. There are in addition the Lower Saxon Party, the Free Democrat Party, both fairly Right wing and likely to amalgamate, and the Centre Party (Catholic). This has so far refused to merge with the C.D.U., which stands somewhat more to the Right than the Centre Party.

26. The Social Democrats are at present probably the strongest party numerically in the zone. Their leading figure, Schumacher, is an outstanding personality. Courage, personal integrity, a strong anti-Nazi record and even stronger Socialist convictions, have made him the spokesman, though not always unchallenged, of the Social Democrats in the three western zones and in a lesser way of the independent Socialists in Berlin. The main points of the party policy include nationalisation of industry and social reform, German territorial integrity and political unity, the independence of the party as against the Communists and the attraction of the middle-class and workers' vote in support of democracy on a western pattern.

27. The Communist Party follows the Berlin–Moscow line. Its main aims are German unity (the Ruhr for the worker), S.P.D./K.P.D. fusion in a Socialist Unity Party with a view to establishing a workers' republic on a single party basis, and the realisation of Marxist as opposed to western democracy. It is outspoken in its criticism of British policy, particularly in respect of denazification and food. This criticism is likely to find many sympathisers unless the food situation improves.

28. The Christian Democratic Union favours private enterprise and religious freedom. It attracts former property owners and can hope to obtain a large proportion of the Nazi vote, though the possibility that many nominal and other Nazis may vote on the Communist ticket should not be excluded. It could hardly hope to survive a prolonged depression. It is in touch with the Christian Socialist Union, its counterpart in the American zone, which was the most successful party in the only elections so far held.

29. The trade union movement in the British zone was slow to develop. This is hardly surprising as it is clearly difficult to reconcile the exigencies of military government with trade union activities. Recent development has been more rapid. No estimate of the total numbers for the zone is available. The following figures give some indication of the position at the end of March. North Rhine Province, 470,000; Hamburg 130,000; Cologne 35,000; Hanover 20,000; Duisburg 20,000; Wuppertal 20,000. Trade unions are not allowed to indulge in political activities, nor have they much say in hours of work or wages which have largely been fixed by Control Council legislation. This leaves little scope except for discussion on conditions of work and denazification of industry. The immediate major issue is organisational, whether unions should be organised centrally or on a basis of autonomous unions. The T.U.C. delegation which visited Germany in November recommended in favour of autonomous unions so as to give the rank and file their proper say and prevent them being run from above. The German workers on the whole, however, seem to favour centralisation as giving them increased strength. At the first zonal trade union conference held in Hanover on the 12th March it was decided to establish four provisional organising committees and also a zonal organising committee. This was roughly on the lines recommended by the World Federation of Trade Unions. The large-scale unemployment which is likely to result from the level of industry plan must be expected to have a powerful effect on trade union opinion.

Economic Background.

30. To meet occupational and minimum civilian requirements the following main industries were put into operation when the reorganisation of the essential industries began: steel, mining supplies, agricultural machinery, textiles, building materials, chemicals (fertilisers, soap, pharmaceutical products, vaccines). A plan known as the Spartan plan was devised to co-ordinate essential supplies of coal, iron, steel, timber and power, all in short supply, to basic industries. The targets set under this plan are inevitably low. The quota of steel output planned for the second quarter of this year is no more than 400,000 tons, which is only a fraction of that permitted by the level of industry plan. Insufficient steel in its turn affects the coal output for which both the other German industries and the European countries are desperately competing. The general situation is bad. The over-all industrial production of the zone at the end of February was estimated at 15 per cent. of the pre-war level. Progress in restoring industrial output is limited by shortage of transport, steel, coal and other raw materials. Given the low industrial output, unemployment is at present surprisingly small. The latest figures show only 360,000 unemployed, with 275,000 unemployable. They may, however, conceal some hidden unemployment as workers still hold considerable savings and may not trouble to look for work while there is so little to buy for their wages.

31. The administration of the Ruhr mines is conducted by a British organisation named the North German Coal Control. The former owners have been expropriated and the ownership is held for the time being by British custodians. Before the recent cut in the food ration, production of coal had been raised to about 40 per cent. of pre-war, or over a million tons a week. 225,000 men were working in the Ruhr mines in February, 1946, and great, though not very successful, efforts were being made to increase the man-power in the industry. The immediate prospect is not good for the following reasons: the miners and their families are underfed, there is shortage of trained man-power, many experienced managers and foremen have been removed on account of their Nazi sympathies, the machinery needs renovation, but this is rendered impossible by the governmental directive which gives the lion's share of the production to export.

32. Of even greater immediate importance than coal is the problem of food. Here the situation is nothing less than alarming. It has already been referred to in Section II of this Annex. The acuteness of this problem may be judged by the fact that our present efforts are directed not to increasing the 1,000 calorie ration, but to preventing its further reduction. But this scale of nourishment means slow starvation and, if it is not soon improved, the consequences, both physical and moral, will be incalculable.

33. A further problem that deserves mention is that of housing. Its seriousness needs no emphasis and will be increased by the further influx of refugees from Poland, of whom 1½ million are to be expected in the zone during the coming months.

Occupation Forces.

34. It is hoped that by the end of the year the numbers of the British forces of occupation, including the Air Force, will be reduced to about 137,000. They will be supplemented by two Belgian divisions, and it is possible that some of the other western Allies may make a contribution. The establishment of the British Element of the Control Council is to be reduced to 20,000 by the end of the year.

Occupation Costs.

35. In his budget speech the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave a figure of £80 million as the estimate for the cost of civil administration and food imports. This is a nett figure after deducting the prospective proceeds of exports. Nor does it include the cost of the military establishment. The present figure for the pay and allowances of the troops of occupation is about £65 million a year. This will, of course, be reduced as the numbers of the occupying forces are brought down. The most serious expenditure is on food imports, as for the greater part they are paid for in dollars. The Potsdam Agreement provided that imports should constitute a first charge on exports, but it is unlikely that all imports will be covered in this way for a considerable time. Discussions are proceeding with our Allies with a view to modifying the present arrangements which weigh particularly heavily on the British zone.

B.—United States Zone.

Administration and Politics.

36. The Americans approached the problem from the standpoint of getting quick results. Their aim was twofold: first, to "liquidate" the war by drastic implementation of the Potsdam provisions in respect of denazification, disarmament, demilitarisation and de-industrialisation; secondly, to transfer to the Germans as quickly as practicable responsibility for administration both in the zone and at the centre. The Germans would be encouraged to work for recovery and to establish a democratic Germany with a peaceful economy, sufficient to ensure an average European standard of living.

37. The kind of time-table the Americans appear to have set themselves was as follows:—

Elections at the lowest level (January, 1946).

Elections at rural and municipal district levels (March and May, 1946).

"Land" elections for the three State legislatures: Bavaria, Hesse, Würtemberg-Baden (October, 1946).

Central German administrations for economic purposes to be established immediately after Potsdam.

The second phase of control, that of "gradual recovery," to start from the 2nd February, 1946, the date on which the reparation plan was to be determined in accordance with the Potsdam Agreement.

Transfer from military to civilian control to take place on the 1st June, 1946.

Main tasks of occupation to be finished by the end of 1947. Zonal frontiers could be opened and a German administration set up. In 1948 the occupational forces could be withdrawn and by the end of that year the peace could be signed. The military phase would be over.

Control would be exercised for a further ten to fifteen years. Germany would then join U.N.O.

38. This general approach, based on the principle of indirect control and a relatively short occupation, had numerous attractions. Germany's war potential would be drastically eliminated; the "boys" could be got home quickly; indirect control would permit of economy in American man-power; Germany would be self-supporting at an early date.

39. Things have not worked out altogether as the Americans hoped. At the centre their hope of transferring responsibility to the Germans for economic matters has been blocked by the refusal of the French to agree to central German administrations. In the zone the American administration, though not without merits—it has shown remarkable efficiency, for example, in restarting public services and repairing the transport system—has on the whole been disappointing. This is perhaps due fundamentally to the fact that the average American does not belong in Europe and is only anxious to get home. In this the American soldiers, whether of the forces of occupation or of military government, have been all too successful, and continuity of administration has been woefully hampered by perpetual changes in personnel due to demobilisation. The hoped-for transfer from military to civilian control has, moreover, been blocked at Washington by the refusal of the State Department to take over the responsibility.

40. There have been sensational stories of misbehaviour by the G.I.s (the sternest critics being the American home press) and, though these are no doubt much exaggerated, the fact remains that the G.I.s do not seem to have earned great respect from the population. Much trouble, too, has been caused by the rigid and ruthless manner in which denazification has been carried out. No care seems to have been exercised to avoid the creation of an unmanageable body of discontents.

41. But it would be a mistake to paint too black a picture. The Americans have, in fact, succeeded in their main purpose of setting up German authorities and handing over to them the responsibility for administration. In this they have gone further than any of their partners, for the three States in the American zone have now Governments of their own. These are, so far, nominated bodies and, in respect of the population, have almost dictatorial powers. In due course they will be replaced by elected representatives.

42. As regards elections, the Americans have been making the pace. Those at the lowest level were held in January, despite German requests for delay. The results followed very closely the prevalent central European trend. The Christian Socialists and non-party members took the lead. The Social Democrats came next, and the Communists were a poor third.

43. The political parties in the American zone are less influenced by what happens in Berlin. Local loyalties and traditions find their extreme expression in Bavarian separatist and monarchist movements, alleged to receive some French support. The three main parties, however, all favour political unity. Herr Hoegner, the S.P.D. Prime Minister of Bavaria, does not take so strong an anti-fusion line as Herr Schumacher in our zone. He would accept fusion with the Communists if there was a secret ballot. Kaiser, Chairman of the Berlin Committee of the Christian Democratic Union, stated, after a recent visit to the United States and British zones, that many Christian Socialists there seemed to regard the Soviet zone and Berlin as lost to communism, and that they were adopting too reactionary a line. The Church influence in Bavaria and in South Germany is also an important political factor.

Economic Background.

44. The American zone is far less industrialised than the British. Nevertheless, it contains some important industries, including the headquarters of I.G. Farben. The breaking up of large industrial complexes is everywhere a major American objective and, after this had been consecrated by the Potsdam Agreement, the American authorities took over direct control of I.G. Farben, whose assets were vested in the Control Council.

45. Industrial activity in the zone is at a low ebb, for the same reasons as impede its restoration in the British zone. Industrial output has recently been estimated at only fifteen per cent. of the pre-war level, the same percentage as in the British zone. Little coal is produced in the American zone, which depends on imports from the Ruhr.

46. The food situation can be judged by the fact that the normal ration has just been reduced to 1,275 calories. But food off the ration is more easily obtained in the American zone, which for this reason is probably the best fed of all. Before the war the zone was said to be eighty per cent. self-supporting. But food production has suffered as a result of the lack of fertilisers and agricultural machinery and of the transfer from arable to pasture land. The zone, moreover, has to support its quota of refugees, a problem which will increase as the transfer plan is implemented. One and three-quarter million are to be transferred into the zone from Czechoslovakia as well as 300,000 from Hungary.

Occupation Forces.

47. A recent United States press report gave an estimate of 306,000 troops in Germany and Austria in June, to be reduced to 100,000 in Germany alone by the end of the year. The first figure would fit in with other statements made. The end of the year figure does not, however, agree with a statement made by General McNarney, the United States Commander-in-Chief, who put it at 300,000. What is certain is that, all going well, large-scale withdrawals at an early date are planned. These forces would be replaced by a specially recruited American mobile "occupational constabulary." The location in Germany of a super-Bomber Fortress Force has also been suggested. It is probable that the United States Government have no firm plans for the length of time they will continue to maintain an army of occupation in Germany. At the start they certainly contemplated a short occupation of about a couple of years. But lately they seem to be becoming impressed with the need to maintain their forces if they wish to exercise their proper influence in European policy. In a recent speech the Assistant Secretary of State at the State Department declared that America was determined to retain enough troops in Germany to see that Germany was reduced to a predominantly agricultural State.

C.—The French Zone.

Administration and politics.

48. The French position in Germany is a difficult one. Their defeat in 1940, their small contribution to the final victory, their own internal perplexities and their exclusion from the international conferences in which policy towards Germany has been decided, have inevitably placed them in an inferior position. Their zone of occupation bears all the traces of having been an afterthought. It was carved out of the British and United States zones and is shaped like a figure of eight. The boundary goes through the provinces of Würtemberg and Baden, leaving the capitals of both in the American zone. Desultory negotiations have for some time been in progress with the Americans for its rectification. Except for the Saar the zone is largely poor, agricultural territory.

49. Despite their weak international position the French have made strenuous efforts to impress upon the Germans under their control the glory and magnanimity of France, to reconcile them to French control by offering them the co-operation of France and to attach them to the ideas of western and French civilisation. But these efforts have been prejudiced by a certain inefficiency of administration, a certain insecurity induced by requisitioning of food and property, and a general tendency to exploit the resources of the French zone for the benefit of France. These derive from the natural desire of the French troops to compensate themselves and to get their own back for the long sufferings inflicted by the Germans on France. In this there is a marked difference of outlook between the forces of occupation and the paternalism of military government officers.

50. The headquarters of the French military government and of the forces of occupation are located in Baden-Baden. Military government, which has been extensively civilianised, consists of a central administration which receives its directives from Paris rather than Berlin. In Paris a special control office has been set up, as in London, to deal with the affairs of Germany and Austria. The zone is divided into five districts, each under a "délégué supérieur." Administration in the districts is based largely on the principle of indirect control, and military government works through a reconstituted German civil service. The intention is to set up German civil directorates in each district and, when these find their feet, to withdraw military government. There is no central German administration for the zone.

51. The three main political parties have been authorised and the French intend to start holding elections next September. Hitherto political activities, as also trade union development, seem to have been fairly rigidly restricted to a local character and the re-establishment of political contacts on an all-German basis is discouraged. The French hold strongly to the conception of decentralisation.

52. The administration of the French zone has frequently been criticised as inefficient by the Germans. But it has come under even stronger criticism from left-wing circles in France who complain that the French personnel are largely drawn from Vichy elements. There have also been some rather scathing comments on the number of personnel employed.

Economic Background.

53. The French attach very great importance to the Saar which they wish to keep under permanent occupation and to incorporate in the French customs and monetary unit. They also wish for the ownership of the mines to revert to France. As an immediate measure they have asked that the territory should, like the areas transferred at Potsdam to Polish administration, be transferred to French administration and removed from the competence of the Allied Control Authority in Berlin. Meanwhile they seem to have taken energetic steps to re-activate the mines which are now producing at about fifty per cent. of the pre-war output. In 1938 annual production was running at nearly 14 million tons.

54. Before the war the zone was said to be eighty per cent. self-sufficient. The food situation to-day is however very bad. The official "normal consumer's" ration in March was 1,075 calories, but a quadripartite commission recently reported that in certain areas it was not much above 800 calories. There are special reasons for this in addition to those which have caused the deterioration in the British and American zones. In the first place the French occupation forces live largely off the land. Secondly, large exports were made to France, particularly in the early phase of the occupation.

Occupation Forces.

55. It is believed that French occupation forces in Germany have recently been drastically reduced. They are now estimated at between 60,000 and 100,000. At one time the figure was put as high as 230,000. French officers, officials and N.C.O.s are entitled to bring their wives and families with them to the French zone This they appear to have done on a large scale.

D.—Soviet Zone.

Administration and politics.

56. The first reports from the Soviet zone were black: famine, disease, disorder, mass removals of equipment, machinery, livestock, rails and even of people. The German population was terrified, and everything seemed to have turned out just as Dr. Goebbels had predicted. War had come home to roost with a vengeance. Conditions in the zone during the first period, with the exception perhaps of Saxony and Thuringia, were, in fact, appalling. In Frankfurt on the Oder the Soviet-installed burgomaster told members of the first conducted press tour that 12,000 people, one-sixth of the population, had died in the first six months from sheer hunger. This statement was later officially amended to 12,000 deaths by all causes. In the first flush of victory and after the reconquest of their own devastated areas, the Red Army were not in the mood to respect persons or property. To have held them back would probably in any case have been impossible. But it was above all the Soviet " iron curtain " policy which gave plausibility to the wildest rumours. It was felt that there must be something to hide.

57. When, therefore, in January, the first carefully conducted journalists were allowed to visit the zone, it came as a general surprise that conditions in Saxony and Thuringia, if not in Brandenburg, though far from good, were much the same as in the other zones. There were several reports of a " maze of smoking chimney stacks," of conditions that compared very favourably with those in the Polish administered territories over the border. There can be little doubt that they were on the whole correct, and that behind the " iron curtain," lifted on occasion to suit Russian convenience, a positive policy was being pursued. Admittedly, reorganisation was accompanied by some confusion and inconsistencies. In their closed zone the Russians were evidently digging themselves in. They were not merely ruthlessly eradicating a Fascist order, but also energetically creating a new order to put in its place, the new order being based on a single class, a single party and a controlled economic pattern.

58. If the new order was to become lasting and real, it had to be built up wherever possible on convinced and indoctrinated German Communists, though time-servers from other German parties could provisionally be utilised. Full use was accordingly made of those Germans who had been trained in Moscow, and it has been claimed that some 7,500 picked ex-Wehrmacht men from the U.S.S.R. were returned to Germany for this purpose. The members of the Free German Committee in Moscow were allegedly flown back to Berlin. Wide powers and privileges were at an early stage given to these Germans, though ultimate Soviet control was absolute. Orders had to be followed implicity. Political discipline and obedience were the highest qualifications. The strength of this approach, backed as it was by intensified propaganda, land reform and appeals to national sentiment, lay in the fact that it gave purpose and direction to forces which had for long been repressed. What had been done in " Brown " was now being done in " Red."

59. All Soviet actions in Germany are based on Potsdam, but, as General Sokolovsky, now Commander-in-Chief, once pointed out, the really essential feature in Potsdam from his point of view is " democratisation." Other problems such as reparation and the standard of living are by comparison relatively unimportant. The first task was to save Germany's political soul. Once this had been thoroughly done in the Soviet zone, it could perhaps be extended to the western zones, where social and economic disintegration would probably help to expedite the process.

60. The administration of government in the zone is carried out by Germans. Strict control is exercised and the initiation of all policy rests solely with the Soviet authorities. German administrations have been set up on a " Land " basis. Central departments have also been in existence for some time, and the progress towards a zonal administration is further advanced than in our zone. The German administrative personnel is nominally drawn from members of the anti-Fascist United Front (Communists, Social Democrats, Christian Socialists and Liberal Democrats). Most of the key posts are in fact held by Communists. German administrators have both executive and legislative powers, but their authority is based on Soviet rather than popular support and no elections have yet been held.

61. Anti-Fascist parties were set up immediately after the collapse, and later the four main parties of the United Front referred to above were allowed to develop. The idea of Berlin as the capital of Germany and the headquarters of German parties in all zones was encouraged. The traffic of ideas was, however, to be one way. Berlin views and Marxism were to be exported and dumped on the western political market, but bourgeois democratic sentiments were not to be imported in exchange. When elections are held it is likely that the United Front will go to the poles as a single list, though the Liberal parties will perhaps be allowed to participate separately in order to create the illusion of democracy and to keep the door into the western zones open. But the Social Democrats have already been practically eliminated and forced into fusion with the Communists as a Socialist Unity Party. That there was no genuine and spontaneous wish for fusion can be seen from the resistance with which it has met in Berlin where the Social Democrats can hope for support from the Western Allies. But in the Soviet zone itself the Social Democrats have succumbed to the mixture of bribery and intimidation to which they have been intensively subjected.

62. In addition to the political parties, the Soviet authorities make great use of trade unions to further their ideas. Trade union activity on a strictly Soviet model is sedulously fostered. The co-operative movement is also put to use and will no doubt be developed, as elsewhere, as a means of eliminating all opposition through the use of the ration card.

63. Meanwhile propaganda to Germans is being intensified. Repeated rumours are heard that once the Socialist Unity Party is set up Soviet occupation forces will be withdrawn. There have been inspired rumours that German reparation plant will not be removed. There is also talk of a possible revision of Germany's eastern frontier. The issue of German political unity has been exploited to the full. The Communists (and all the Berlin parties) have spoken strongly in favour of the Ruhr for the German worker. Separatist movements have been attacked. Berlin Communists have also to some extent encouraged the public to compare the relative order and prosperity in the east with the chaos and famine in the west.

Economic Background.

64. At an early stage of their occupation the Soviet authorities carried out sweeping reforms of the banking and insurance system. The existing firms were closed down and new public institutions set up in their place. There is less evidence that they have taken any steps to nationalise industries, though no doubt many of the old captains of industry have been eliminated as have the large landowners. These are said to have been deported to the island of Rügen where they are set to menial work. In industry there have been very extensive removals of plant which will probably continue, but it is doubtful whether they have been on the vast scale originally imagined. There are in fact indications that reconstruction is contemplated on the lines of a planned economy to be put to the use of a Soviet five-year plan. Industrial activity in Saxony has been estimated at 35 per cent. of normal. British journalists who visited Dresden were told that some 12,000 factories, largely producing consumer goods, were back in production. There is said to be sufficient brown coal to enable the factories to operate, coal being the main bottleneck both in the British and United States zones. At an industrial exhibition in the Zeiss Ikon building in Dresden in February of this year, some 3,000 exhibitors were said to have been represented. The Leipzig Fair is to be started again; it is significant that the order to this effect was signed by Marshal Zhukov and that business men from other zones are to be invited to attend. Trade with the western zones is practically non-existent, but on occasion special deals have been allowed. Textiles to the value of £38,000 were sent to the British zone in exchange for fifteen lorries and 600 tyres. Some exchange on a similar barter basis has taken place with the American zone. Most finished products are, however, likely to be sent east. A recent report was given over the Berlin Radio that 30,000 tons of cotton and flax had been sent from the U.S.S.R. for processing in the zone. Another report suggests that rails running east and west are not to be removed. It is perhaps too early to judge from such unco-ordinated pieces of information what Soviet industrial policy is or to what extent the German industrial capacity can be put to the use of the Soviet five-year plan. But it may well be that the Soviet authorities are anxious to see a far more drastic de-industrialisation in western Germany than they are themselves prepared to accept in the east. A clearer estimate of their policy may become possible when, as is now contemplated, liaison missions are exchanged between the zones.

65. The land reform is the most sweeping economic measure so far carried out. It was completed quickly and ruthlessly. The immediate effect of the splitting up of the large estates has probably led to a reduction of food output, but it was almost certainly conceived primarily as a political measure. It eliminated the Junker class and it also provided small holdings for a considerable number of refugees and formerly landless peasants. All the estates over 100 hectares were broken up and redistributed in 5-hectare holdings. The redistribution of farm machinery, horses and cattle was obviously far more difficult. The measure is probably, on the whole, popular. It implies a fundamental change in the social and economic structure of eastern Germany. Whether it will prove, or, indeed, is designed to be, lasting is another matter. The new holdings are regarded by experts as too small to be economic and the collective farm may be the final solution.

66. Food rations are at present estimated at 1,580 calories in Berlin, Dresden and Leipzig, 1,260 in the larger towns, and 1,020 in the remaining areas. There is little reason to think that food conditions are better than in the west or that they will be so for some time to come. In some districts there are reports of famine. It has, however, been said that the present ration scale will be maintained until the new harvest. No food has yet been sent from these normally surplus areas to the western zones, though there have been reports of some going to Russia and Poland. Large quantities are also required for the Red Army, which lives off the land.

Occupational forces.

67. The total number of Soviet forces in Germany is not known. Press reports have put the figure at 1 million. It is, however, surprising that most reports on the zone state that Soviet troops are not much in evidence. There have been fairly widespread rumours that Soviet occupation forces would be withdrawn once a Socialist Unity Party had been set up and that they would be replaced by a special police force. But there are no signs that the Soviet Government has set any limit to the period of occupation. Marshal Zhukov has been quoted as saying " We will never leave Germany."

E.—Berlin.

The City's importance.

68. Berlin politically to-day is three things: the capital of defeated Germany, the seat of the Allied Control Council and the centre of the Soviet zone and headquarters of the Soviet Military Government.

69. As the old capital Berlin has importance in the following ways: The association and tradition of government remain—once a capital, always a capital. Again, all German political parties and many Germans who do not belong to parties still regard German political unity as the one thing which must be saved out of the national wreck; the suprazonal status of Berlin is, in a way, a guarantee of that unity, for the presence of four Powers in Berlin acts as a guarantee against absolute domination by any single Power.

70. As the seat of the Allied Control Council and its subordinate committees and directorates Berlin is the place where the four zones, as well as the four Powers, meet. Its four sectors are British, American, Soviet and French respectively. They are the zones of Berlin. Its Control Council in miniature is the Komendatura. It is a sort of fifth zone—an international island in the Soviet zone of occupation. At Potsdam it was decided to treat Germany as an economic whole and to establish certain German central administrations.

Berlin is, inevitably, the place where such administrations would be set up and the only logical centre of such an economic whole.

71. As to Berlin's position as the centre of the Soviet zone and the headquarters of the Soviet occupation forces, it should be remembered that the city was captured by Soviet troops and, on the principle that takings are keepings, it is not surprising that they should regard it as more theirs than anybody else's. Also, while they were in sole charge they were able to do the initial cleaning up. Soviet nominees were appointed to many posts in the city administration and police. This influence remains. An island in the Soviet zone, Berlin is largely dependent on Soviet goodwill. The three western Allies are responsible for the feeding of their respective sectors, but the food, the trains, the roads, must all pass through Soviet territory. For the Soviet Element it is the home ground. The western Allies are playing away.

The K.P.D.–S.P.D. struggle.

72. On the German internal political level the most important issue at the moment is the K.P.D.–S.P.D. fusion struggle. In its briefest outline the position is that the Soviet authorities are anxious to see the S.P.D. and the K.P.D. merged into a single Socialist Unity Party at the earliest date, as they have already merged in the Soviet zone itself. Such a party would essentially be dominated by its communist element and the Social Democrats would, in fact, lose both their independence and character.

73. The Social Democrats in Berlin at first tried to postpone the decision on fusion pending an all-German Social Democrat conference. Pressure was however, brought to bear on both the central executive committee and the Berlin executive committee with the result that the leaders of the party eventually came out in favour of fusion. They were not, however, able to carry all their party with them in this decision with the result that the party split into anti- and pro-fusion groups. The anti-fusion, or independent, Social Democrats succeeded in organising a referendum in the three western sectors of Berlin on the 31st March, and 80 per cent. of those who voted were against fusion, although 62 per cent. were prepared to co-operate with the Communist Party. The Soviet authorities did not allow voting to take place in their sector and subsequently did all they could to show that the results of the referendum were indecisive and meaningless. Meanwhile they organised conferences both of the S.P.D. and the Communists. The two parties held separate conferences on the 19th and 20th April, followed by a combined conference on Easter Sunday and Monday. These conferences were regarded as Reichsparty rallies, delegates from the western zone being invited and elected to the central committees of both parties and also of the Socialist Unity Party. The fusion of the S.P.D. and K.P.D. in the Soviet zone was announced on Easter Monday. At the time of writing the new Socialist Unity Party has not yet applied to the Allied Komendatura for permission to exist in Berlin. In practice it exists in the Soviet sector, while in the western sectors it has been made known that no meetings of the new party or the opening of offices will be allowed until the Komendatura has agreed to the statutes and programme of the party. There appears to be no reasonable doubt that the independent Social Democrat Party can maintain itself in the western sectors, but inevitably greatly increased pressure will be brought to bear on it by the Russians and the German Communists.

The importance of keeping a foothold in Berlin.

74. The conflict of national interests in policy towards Germany is reflected in miniature in the quadripartite control of Berlin. It might at first sight be argued that it would avoid friction all round if Berlin were left to the Russians, and that in remaining there we are only going out of our way to invite Allied quarrels in what seems essentially a German cause. This would, however, appear to be a shortsighted view. The importance of Berlin has already been emphasised. If our foothold were lost, eastern Germany would be completely sealed off from the west. Such division would be purely one-sided, since the western Allies would find that they could not effectively seal off western Germany from the east—just as to-day Soviet views and news are exported to the world but little world news is imported into the U.S.S.R. In addition our withdrawal from Berlin, and the loss of prestige it must involve, would go far to convince many Germans in the west that unity and security could only be achieved by accepting communism in their turn. They would surely feel that Soviet domination in the east had come to stay and they would wonder how long the western Powers would continue to hold on in western Germany.

IV.—Estimate of Russian Intentions.

75. It is perhaps a mistake to exaggerate the clearness of purpose of Russian policy in Germany. The Soviet Government may well be as perplexed as we are ourselves. Nevertheless certain broad conclusions may safely be drawn. It is fair to assume in the first place that the Soviet Government have retained an abiding impression of the offensive and defensive power of Germany as shown in the war. They have no wish to take any risks with Germany which, at any rate if aided in her recovery by other Powers, could once again prove a very formidable enemy. She must therefore be kept weak and safely contained. Equally formidable in Soviet eyes is a combination of the western democracies, of whose potential offensive power the late war bears eloquent witness. This combination, strong in itself, would become still stronger if harnessed to that of a Germany restored with western support and guidance. It also possesses, in Soviet eyes, a great power of political attraction for Germany. If, relying on their material power and moral influence, the western Powers could see their way to draw western Germany into their orbit, the Soviet Government would think it natural that they should proceed to do so; and they are keenly on the watch for signs of such a development.

76. There may be said therefore to be three main elements present in Soviet policy towards Germany :—

(a) preventing at all costs the revival of a strong and independent Germany;
(b) preventing western Germany with the Ruhr, or even the Ruhr alone, being brought into any close grouping of the western democracies; and
(c) ensuring that Germany eventually looks east and remains under strong, and if possible exclusive, Russian influence.

Meanwhile, the Soviet Government are faced with the problem of pursuing their aims in, at any rate outward, association with a group of Powers for whose material resources they have a healthy respect and for whose ulterior intentions they have a deep mistrust.

77. The manner in which they have used the Potsdam Agreement as an aid to their policy is worthy of note and, indeed, of respect. So far as the destructive measures prescribed at Potsdam are concerned they have insistently stood out for the strictest application and interpretation of the relevant clauses—e.g., those relating to disarmament, demilitarisation, denazification, destruction and restriction of war potential, reparations, the scaling-down of Germany's peace-time level of industry and standard of living. On the other hand, they have been less interested in those positive or constructive provisions of the Potsdam Agreement which call for four-Power action. Germany is not yet treated as an economic whole. Interzonal trade is of negligible volume. There is no pooling of food and other resources. The Russians appear to be maintaining that in present circumstances imports and exports shall be balanced on a zonal basis. In their own zone they carry out their own political and economic policy behind an iron curtain, which has as yet been lifted only to carefully conducted visitors. This policy has a constructive as well as a repressive aspect. On the repressive side they are eliminating the bourgeois classes as part of the process of denazification and land reform. But a worker, even if formerly an active member of the Nazi party, may be admitted into the ruling communist fold. On this class basis they are evidently seeking to propitiate the population, by letting the Germans in large measure conduct their own affairs and even encouraging them to beat the nationalist drum. On the economic side they are reactivating German light industries for the production of consumer goods, and they may before long be able to justify their claim that material conditions in their own zone are better than elsewhere in Germany.

78. These developments prompt the question, do the Soviet Government desire to see a unitary Germany administered from Berlin as foreshadowed at Potsdam? Or do they wish to perpetuate the zonal system of administration? Some of their acts and expressions of view speak in favour of the first hypothesis, and some in favour of the second. The truth probably is that they have not yet made up their minds; that they are at present hedging, as the French delegation conveniently enables them to do by blocking the establishment of central German administrations; and that meanwhile they are making the best of both worlds, establishing themselves securely in their own zone, to which they will add Berlin if they can, while at the same time asserting and maintaining to the maximum degree their interest in, and right of access to, the western zones and their demand for the integral application throughout Germany of those provisions of Potsdam which suit them.

79. They are unlikely to be in any hurry to modify this situation of their own accord, more particularly as both the unitary Germany and the zonal Germany have possible disadvantages from their point of view. They may also wish to avoid any fundamental decisions until after the French elections and perhaps until they can estimate the prospects of the Socialist Unity Party catching on in western Germany or, alternatively, of the western democracies successfully organising a reasonably prosperous existence in the western zones. They are probably less certain than some western thinkers that a unitary Germany governed from Berlin would necessarily be under decisive Soviet influence. Even a Communist Germany would be unlikely to forget or forgive the amputation of the eastern provinces, for all the efforts the Russians could use to divert its hostility towards the west; nor are the traditions and doctrines of Russian and German communism identical. On the other hand they may well see grave dangers in the zonal solution, lest it result in the permanent establishment of western and capitalist influence in the western zones, the incorporation of western Germany in the western bloc, and the integration of a revived German industry in the western economic system. An acute observer in Berlin recently summed up his view of Russian intentions as follows. The developments of the past few weeks had now convinced him that the Soviet authorities had no intention of permitting effective four-Power control over the affairs of their zone. They might conform to certain formal four-Power rules, but they would run their zone politically and economically as a matter of their own exclusive concern. They would not allow it to be effectively treated as part of a German economic whole. On the other hand they would no doubt be anxious for Germany to be treated as a unit for purposes of political activity, since this would promote the spread of the new Socialist Unity Party throughout Germany. Their hope was, from a secure and inviolable base in their own zone, to extend their influence westwards. Only when Germany was unified politically in the way they wished would they allow Germany to be unified economically and by that time they would think that Germany should be run by Germans and not by the Allies.

80. Of one thing we may be sure. They will not rest content with organising their own zone. Already they are actively supporting the Communists in the western zones and, as soon as they feel their organisation sufficiently complete, they may be counted on to launch out on a more forward policy in the west. Herr Grotewohl, the Social Democrat leader in Berlin, who has espoused the cause of fusion with the Communists, put the matter in a nutshell in a speech celebrating the decision of the party conference in favour of fusion. " The new party " he said " will not halt at the Elbe."

P.M.M.(46) 11TH MEETING, MINUTE 1

Confidential Annex

(3rd May, 1946 - 11 a.m.)

ATOMIC ENERGY

The Meeting had before them a note by the Secretaries (P.M.M.(46) 19) to which was annexed

(i) A note on United Kingdom arrangements for research and development work on atomic energy;

(ii) A note on the proposals for the international control of atomic energy.

MR. ATTLEE said that, in view of the delicate negotiations which were at present in progress between the United Kingdom Government and the Governments of the United States and Canada on the subject of atomic energy, it was important that there should be no public disclosure that this matter had been discussed in the course of the present consultations.

On the question of research and development, the Dominion Ministers were aware that our work had been based upon the close partnership with the Canadian and United States Governments which had grown up during the war. Much of the information which we possessed derived in part from American and Canadian sources and we were, therefore, bound to act in agreement with them in the use which we made of it. We had not yet negotiated a revision of our wartime agreement with the Americans and they were naturally anxious, on the one hand, that proceedings before the United Nations Commission on Atomic Energy should not be prejudiced by any fresh bilateral understanding, and on the other that knowledge of American origin should not be spread to a wider circle in advance of concessions which they might have to make as a result of recommendations of the Commission. We were still hoping to reach an understanding with them providing for the full exchange of scientific and technical information between us; but the position was delicate and there were at present limitations on our freedom of action. Subject to these limitations, we were most anxious that there should be the fullest possible co-operation between the Governments of the Commonwealth. Such co-operation might be concerned with any of the following:-

(a) fundamental scientific research;

(b) production of raw materials;

(c) large-scale plants for the production of fissile material.

The position with regard to the international control of atomic energy was set out in Annex II to P.M.M.(46) 19. The United Nations Commission had not yet begun its deliberations, and its first task would be to consider what effective safeguards could be devised, by way of inspection and other means, to protect complying States against the hazards of violations and evasions. Mr. Attlee said that, in general, he was inclined to be sceptical about the possibility of control through an international inspectorate, and felt that in practice it would probably be necessary to build up any system of international control by stages.

U.S. Report proposes an Atomic Development Authority

This was suggested in PM's speech of Dec 17/45

Mr. Attlee then invited Lord Portal to make a statement on the United Kingdom atomic energy project.

LORD PORTAL made a full statement explaining the lines on which it was proposed that the Harwell Research Establishment should be developed and the progress already made with the setting up of the establishment. Research and development work on a considerable scale was expected to start there early next year and the existing plans for the whole establishment should have been substantially implemented by July 1947. He emphasised that the services of any scientists from the Dominions who were considered by Dominion Governments to be suitable for the work and could be spared for a time would be warmly welcomed at Harwell. He hoped that Dominion Ministers would accept in principle the temporary posting of suitable men for a period of service at Harwell after which they would return to their own country, and that in view of the difficulty of direct recruitment at such a great distance, each Government would accept responsibility for selecting and paying their own scientists during the period of attachment. If this form of co-operation were approved in principle, the details could be discussed at the official level.

Lord Portal explained that the supply of raw materials had a powerful bearing on policy and that investigations carried out in recent months tended to show that previous estimates had been optimistic. We had a fairly clear picture of where substantial supplies of uranium were likely to be found and there had been informal discussions with representatives of the Dominions on the question of carrying out raw material surveys within the Commonwealth.

With regard to the preparations for large-scale production in the United Kingdom, the headquarters of the production organisation had been set up at Risley in Lancashire and the necessary staff was being recruited. Design work was in hand for the plant required for the production of uranium metal which would be carried out at Springfields, near Preston, and the fundamental research work into the processes used in the purification of uranium ores and the manufacture of uranium metal had been carried out. On the basis of this, negotiations for the purchase of the various raw materials which were required for the processes had in some cases been completed and in other cases were actively in hand. It was hoped that production operations would start at the Springfields factory in September 1947 and that the first uranium metal would be produced at about the end of that year. Preliminary consideration had also been given to the question of selecting a site for the pile and the plutonium separation plant, though it would be necessary to operate the uranium metal fabrication plant for a year before sufficient stocks of metal to start the pile were available. A great deal of other fundamental organisation work was going on at Risley and steps such as the standardisation of engineering stores, the development of systems for purchasing, progressing and programming, and estimating are well advanced.

MR. CHIFLEY said that there was some reason to believe that there might be in Australia substantial deposits of thorium which could supplement the available supplies of uranium. It was hoped to carry out a more careful survey with a view to determining what quantities of materials were available and meantime the Australian Government had already taken powers to protect the available supplies of thorium from exploitation. He asked whether there was not a danger that too much of the limited supplies of fissile material available would be devoted to warlike developments with the result that possible industrial development would be handicapped. On the question of international control, it had to be borne in mind that any scheme of control could be vitiated by failure to co-operate on the part of any one of the States concerned.

DR. EVATT pointed out that the Lilienthal Report on the International Control of Atomic Energy seemed likely to form the basis of the proposals which would be put before the United Nations Commission by the United States Government. These proposals might not be acceptable to other nations since the implicit assumption in them was that the United States would not share any information with regard to use of atomic energy for warlike purposes with other nations until such time as these other nations could in any event have obtained the information for themselves. With regard to the proposal that an International Atomic Energy Development Authority should be set up to conduct all intrinsically dangerous operations in the nuclear field, the success of this would seem to depend on the effectiveness of the proposals for denaturing fissile material, as to which scientific opinion appeared to be sceptical.

U.S. opinion considers it can be done
